House of Commons Debates

THIRD SESSION—EIGHTH PARLIAMENT

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 3rd February, 1898.

The Parliament which had been prorogued from time to time, was now commanded to assemble on the 3rd day of February, 1898, for the despatch of business.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

A Message was delivered by René Edouard Kimber, Esquire, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod :

MR. SPEAKER,—

His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this Honourable House in the Senate Chamber.

Accordingly, the House went up to the Senate Chamber.

And the House being returned,

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

MR. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House, that I have received from the Judges selected for the trial of Election Petitions pursuant to "The Dominion Controverted Elections Act," certificates and reports relating to the elections :

For the Electoral District of London ;

For the Electoral District of the County of Brant ;

For the Electoral District of the West Riding of Assinibola ;

For the Electoral District of the East Riding of the County of Simcoe ;

For the Electoral District of Champlain ;

For the Electoral District of L'Assomption ;

For the Electoral District of the North Riding of the County of Ontario ;

For the Electoral District of Beauharnois ;

For the Electoral District of King's, P.E.I. ;

For the Electoral District of Richmond, N.S. ;

For the Electoral District of Lunenburg.

By which the said elections were dismissed and the sitting members declared duly elected.

VACANCIES.

MR. SPEAKER. I have also the honour to inform the House that during the recess I have received communications from several members notifying me that the following vacancies had occurred in the representation, viz. :—

Of Joseph Lavergne, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Drummond and Arthabaska, by the acceptance of an office of emolument under the Crown.

Of Charles Eugène Pouliot, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Temiscouata, by decease.

Of J. B. Romuald Fiset, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Rimouski, by being summoned to the Senate.

Of William Lount, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Toronto Centre, by resignation.

Of Fabien Boisvert, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Nicolet, by decease.

I accordingly issued my several warrants to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to make out new writs of election for the said electoral districts respectively.

MR. SPEAKER. I have also the honour to inform the House that the Clerk has received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery a communication under date of 14th January, 1898, owing to the absence from Canada of the Speaker of the House, that he had received notice that a vacancy had occurred in the representation of the electoral district of Quebec Centre, in consequence of the acceptance of an office of emolument under the Crown by François Langelier, Esquire, and the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, in accordance with subsection 2 of section 8, Chapter 13 of 49 Victoria (Revised Statutes of Canada) issued a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

NEW MEMBERS.

MR. SPEAKER. I have further the honour to inform the House that during the recess the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery has received certificates of election and return of the following members :—

Louis Lavergne, Esq., for the Electoral District of Drummond and Arthabaska ;

Charles Auguste Gauvreau, Esq., for the Electoral District of Temiscouata ;

Jean Auguste Ross, Esq., for the Electoral District of Rimouski ;

George H. Bertram, Esq., for the Electoral District of Toronto Centre ;

Joseph Hector Leduc, Esq., for the Electoral District of Nicolet ;

Albert Malouin, Esq., for the Electoral District of Quebec Centre.

MEMBERS INTRODUCED.

Jean Auguste Ross, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Rimouski, by the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and Mr. Guay.

Albert Malouin, Member for the Electoral District of Quebec Centre, by the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and Mr. Belcourt.

George Hope Bertram, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Centre Toronto, introduced by Sir Louis Davies and Hon. Wm. Paterson.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 1) respecting the Administration of Oaths of Office.—(Sir Wilfrid Laurier.)

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform this House that when the House attended His Excellency the Governor General this day, in the Senate Chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a Speech to both Houses of Parliament, and, to prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy of the Speech, which is as follows:—

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

I have observed with great pleasure the remarkable advance in the political importance and material prosperity of Canada during the year which has just closed.

The loan recently effected has shown that the credit of Canada has never stood so high in European markets, and affords reasonable ground for expecting that the burthens of the people will, in the near future, be materially reduced by the substitution of a much lower rate of interest on our indebtedness than that which now exists.

I congratulate you upon the exceedingly cordial reception accorded to the representatives of Canada at the Jubilee ceremonials, and also upon the warm appreciation manifested everywhere throughout the Mother Country in reference to the conduct of Canada in materially reducing the rate of duty upon goods imported from the United Kingdom into the Dominion.

The action of the Imperial Government in denouncing the treaties with Germany and Belgium also affords most satisfactory evidence of their desire to facilitate your efforts to promote the closest possible commercial relations between Canada and the remainder of the Empire, and will, I trust, contribute materially to the development of Imperial trade.

The extraordinary gold discoveries recently made upon the Yukon and its tributaries, appear likely to result in an enormous influx of people into that region, and have compelled the Government to take prompt action for the preservation of law and order in that distant and almost inaccessible locality : measures will be laid before you for that purpose.

A contract has been entered into, subject to your approval, for the completion at the earliest possible moment of a system of rail and river communication through Canadian territory with the Klondike and principal gold fields, which it is expected will secure to Canada the larger portion of the lucrative traffic of that country.

The bountiful harvest with which we have been favoured by a benevolent Providence has contributed greatly to the increase of our prosperity, and I am glad to note that the trade and commerce of the Dominion, and more especially the amount and values of her principal exports, have increased greatly during the past eighteen months, and there is good reason to believe that this improvement may be maintained, if not augmented, during the remainder of the present year.

I observe with pleasure that certain Government contracts recently let contain provisions calculated to suppress the evils of the sweating system.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

The accounts of the past year will be laid before you.

The Estimates for the succeeding year will likewise be placed upon the Table at an early date.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

Measures will be submitted to you respecting Superannuation, the repeal of the present Franclise Act, and a plebiscite on the question of Prohibition.

These and other measures I commend to your earnest consideration, invoking the Divine blessings upon the important labours on which you are again entering.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved :

That the Speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both Houses of Parliament be taken into consideration to-morrow.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have no desire to interpose any objection to considering this Speech, but I think it would be more convenient to pursue the usual course and adjourn until Monday.

The PRIME MINISTER. That is not the usual course; the usual course has always been the contrary, to take into consideration the Speech from the Throne on the following day.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have no particular objection, but I think that is not the ordinary course. Does the hon. gentleman propose to adjourn the House until to-morrow and take up the consideration of the Speech to-morrow, or to pursue the usual course of considering it on Monday?

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend is in error, the usual course is to adjourn the House until the following day, and this is the course which I propose to follow on the present occasion; this has been the course in every other instance, so far as my memory goes. I need not say, however, that if it would be more convenient to my hon. friend to take it into consideration on Monday, I would be very well disposed to oblige him in that respect.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am in the judgment of the House, but I think that was the course pursued on the last occasion.

Mr. SPEAKER. On the last occasion a similar motion was carried.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If that be the case, I will not interpose any objection to the consideration of the Speech to-morrow.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved:

That Select Standing Committees of this House for the present session be appointed for the following purposes:—1. On Privileges and Elections.—2. On Expiring Laws.—3. On Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.—4. On Miscellaneous Private Bills.—5. On Standing Orders.—6. On Printing.—7. On Public Accounts.—8. On Banking and Commerce.—9. On Agriculture and Colonization,—which said committees shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House; and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon; with power to send for persons, papers and records.

REPORTS.

Report of the Joint Librarians of Parliament.—(Mr. Speaker.)

Report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries (Marine Branch).—(Sir Louis Davies.)

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and at 3.55 p.m., the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 4th February, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

UNITED STATES REGULATIONS IN THE YUKON.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to draw the attention of the right hon. the First Minister to the great anxiety felt by the people of this country, and especially of British Columbia, respecting the arrangements that have been made by the United States of America regarding communication by the Chilkoot and White Passes. I shall be exceedingly glad if the Government will lay on the Table any information on that subject, so as to relieve the public tension that exists in regard to it. It is quite possible the Government may be able to give the House the information now, as the matter is of a very pressing character. I am told that parties who have gone from Victoria and Vancouver for the purpose of fitting out for the Canadian Yukon gold fields, are now returning and going to Seattle to get their supplies, because they think it better to pay the Canadian customs duties on American supplies when they reach the border of Canada, than to be subjected to the onerous and oppressive regulations that at present exist. So far as large companies are concerned, it is a matter of vast importance. Every member will see that where hundreds of independent individual miners are going into a country it becomes a most exasperating and oppressive condition for them to be obliged to pay $9 a day, as a telegram from the Board of Trade of Victoria states the people are called upon to pay, for a person to escort them through a few miles of American territory—I will not say American territory, because it is practically disputed territory, and the question whether it belongs to the United States or to Canada should long ago have been settled. I am quite sure the First Minister will see the great importance of this matter and will give it that prompt attention which its importance demands.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I quite realize the anxiety that is felt, not only by my hon. friend, but by the whole of the Canadian public in regard to the subject to which he has just called attention. I am quite sure the hon. gentleman realizes that the Government have not been derelict in their duty in that respect, and that they have done whatever it was in their power to do to bring about a more satisfactory state of things than that which now exists. I am not in a position at this moment to make any communication on the subject, but I have reason to hope and believe that at an early day, perhaps early next week, the Government will be able perhaps to make some communication.

THE CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask the attention of the Prime Minister to one other matter? I see among many important points touched in the Speech from the Throne there is one with respect to a Yukon railway, about which we have no information before the House and no papers. Does the hon. gentleman consider we are to discuss this subject without that information, or will it be given to the House at an early date?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). As my hon. friend has observed, the Speech from the Throne refers to this matter, and proceeds to say that the contract entered into by the Government is subject to the approval of Parliament. The intention of the Government is to proceed with that measure at once, to have the Bill introduced on Tuesday next, and of course, all the papers will be laid on the Table of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. In the meantime we shall have to discuss the Speech without them. We shall have to depend on the "Globe," as usual.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). We can perhaps do better without papers sometimes.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House proceeded to the consideration of His Excellency's Speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. BERTRAM. Mr. Speaker, I rise with some degree of diffidence to perform the task which now devolves on me in moving that an humble Address be presented to His Excellency in reply to the Speech from the Throne. When asked by the leader of this House to assume this responsibility, I was deeply conscious of my inability to worthily perform such an important duty; but I realized that in being asked a compliment was being paid to the constituency which I have the honour to represent, and under those circumstances I could not do otherwise than show my appreciation by accepting, even though that acceptance brought with it an obligation which I hardly hope to satisfactorily fulfil. I am encouraged however, by the fact that a new member speaking for the first time in this House under such circumstances has always had the hearty sympathy and kind attention of all members on both sides of the House. I venture to rely upon that same sympathy and that same attention while I proceed to make some references to the Speech of His Excellency.

The Speech opens with a reference to the increased importance and material prosperity of Canada during the year that has just closed. I am sure we all rejoice at the prosperity of Canada, and we also rejoice most heartily that Canada occupies a larger place in the British Empire than she ever occupied before, and that she also occupies a larger place in the eyes of other nations than at any previous time in her history; under these circumstances we may fairly congratulate the country on the position we now occupy in this respect. It is also most satisfactory to know that the credit of Canada is continually on the ascending scale, that on the European market her credit stands higher than ever; and as we continue to borrow money at lower interest and our credit steadily improves, these will tend to lessen the burdens of the people and at the same time supply us with money to open and develop the latent resources of this country.

The cordial reception which was accorded to the Canadian representatives at the Jubilee representation, I think, should afford this House a great deal of satisfaction. The magnificent reception tendered to the Prime Minister of this Dominion at the Jubilee was one that I am sure struck a chord in the hearts of the people, and although I frankly admit that the commanding personality of the Prime Minister had something to do with that reception, still on the other hand we all know that the action of this Parliament at its last session in seeking to bring about closer relations with the mother country and giving the mother country a better opportunity to secure trade with this Dominion, especially as regards exports, as compared with some other countries, also touched a chord in the hearts of the people of Old England, and this action of the Dominion Parliament was rapidly followed by the abrogation of the German and Belgian treaties, a result we had never been able to accomplish, but which was the response made by the mother country to the action of this Parliament. In that respect the action of the Canadian Parliament, followed by the action of the mother country, succeeded in accomplishing that which previous Parliaments had been trying to secure for a considerable period, but had never succeeded, and this was the response made by the people of England to the action of this Parliament on that particular occasion.

The Speech alludes to the Canadian Yukon Railway contract, and as this question has attracted considerable attention and is one of very great importance indeed, I desire to make more than a passing allusion to that portion of the Speech of His Excellency. It is one in which we are all interested; it is one relating to a matter of the greatest consequence to the country at large, and it is one which should be approached in a calm and judicious spirit for the purpose of ascertaining, as far as we possibly can, what is best for the interests of the country, and when we have arrived at that conclusion, of proceeding at once to act in accordance with the conclusions at which we have arrived. I think the House will agree that the Government deserve great credit for the active measures adopted by them to have law and order administered in the Yukon district, because a new problem had to be solved. A tremendous number of people had gone in there during last year, and a very large number are going in this year, and something had to be done for the purpose of maintaining law and order in that country, and the Government deserve the thanks of the people for the prompt and hearty way in which they looked into and dealt with that matter, a result particularly due to the Minister of the Interior and his actions in that connection. We have a new development in this country, which, as I have said, is a matter of very great importance indeed. Although of course there is no way of arriving at the actual figures, yet it is estimated on somewhat good authority that from fifty thousand people to two hundred and fifty thousand will be wending their way to the Klondike territory during the year 1898. Whether that be the case or not it is difficult to say, but one fact is generally agreed upon, and that is, that there will be a tremendous rush of population into that district. If 100,000 people go to our mining regions this year, the volume of business that will be developed will surpass anything before experienced in Canada. It is, therefore, a matter of very great consequence to our whole people that active measures should be immediately taken to secure to Canadians the enormous trade which will follow in the wake of this great influx of people.

Now, Sir, what has been going on during the last few months? We have seen a struggle, waging for some time past in order to secure that trade. I do not blame the people of the United States for doing everything in their power to secure the commerce of that region, and if they have advantages which in some respects we do not possess on account of our having to pass over American territory to enter the Yukon district, I do not blame the Americans for availing of these advantages to the utmost extent of their power. On the other hand the people of Canada are most anxious that steps should be taken to secure this trade for them. That is the idea that is dominant in the minds of our people at the present time. They believe that every effort should be put forth to secure that the trade of the Yukon should be turned to the profit of Canadians, and not to the enrichment of the people of the United States. We have the great difficulty to contend with at the present moment that our own country is almost inaccessible through our own territory, and our people on their journey to the Klondike are submitted to many inconveniences such as the imposition of duties on goods purchased in Canada. The problem was one which our Government had to deal with and to deal with at once, because time is the essence of everything, and in my humble judgment we could not afford to allow even one year to pass. We all know that when trade runs in a certain channel at the commencement, it is likely to develop in that channel and it is a work of great difficulty to divert it afterwards. I say, Sir, that it is the first duty of our Government to secure that the trade of the Klondike should pass through its natural channel, through Canadian territory, so that we may reap the advantage of it.

Another important consideration has to be taken into account. We all know that mining booms do not last for ever, and although I have no desire to reflect upon the reports made by any one, yet we have no right to suppose that everything said regarding that territory will be found to be absolutely true. Each one who runs in quest of gold does not find it, and there can hardly be a doubt that a great number of people who go to the Klondike will be disappointed. During the past year thousands have been wending their way with supplies, over the mountains and through the passes of that region, and when that number is increased by a further fifty thousand people, or perhaps a hundred thousand, it is absolutely necessary that provision should be made to enable large numbers to get out of the country rapidly and safely. If there was not a means provided of enabling people to return, there would to my mind be very great danger of disaster befalling a large number of the people, should they be unable to return if things do not turn out as they expect. It is therefore well that our Government should consider this particular phase of the question. I need not dwell upon the great necessity for a railroad into that country over Canadian territory, nor need I dwell upon the vast advantages which the people of Canada will derive from securing the Klondike trade; these are facts that are patent to all. There is no difference of opinion upon these points, and therefore I will not dwell at greater length upon them.

I shall now proceed to deal with a subject upon which perhaps there may be a difference of opinion, and in respect to which a course might be taken which the people and the Parliament of this country would not endorse. Under ordinary circumstances, I believe it is the duty of every government to consult Parliament before entering into any large contract at any particular time. That, I believe, is a principle which should at all times be held to be sound, and I have no desire to withdraw from it. But at the same time, if circumstances arise which make it imperative that immediate action should be taken for the purpose of carrying out the principle of the greater good to the greater number, for the purpose of promoting the interests of the whole country, then I say that the Government should not hesitate to take such action. We know perfectly well that some of the best things that are accomplished in business are accomplished by men who have pluck and boldness in their natures, and the same thing applies to the government of a country. A government that is bold and plucky in doing what they think is best will satisfy the people of the country better than a government destitute of courage, and which is afraid to act promptly. I agree also, that in the case of any large contract, it is a most important thing that we should advertise for tenders. That, I think, is fair and right. It is a sound principle, and the question which this House has to consider is, whether the Government was justified under the present circumstances in letting a contract without calling for tenders, and doing that without consulting Parliament. We will have to come to a conclusion on these questions in accordance with the facts and in accordance with what we think to be best in the interests of the country at large. There is one thing in connection with the letting of that contract which I think is unprecedented. There may be some members of this House who know to the contrary, but I am not aware of tenders ever having been asked for the construction of any railway or any great work, on the basis that no money was to be paid for that work. There are few contractors indeed who would feel inclined to tender on any large work with the understanding that they were to be paid in something that it was difficult to attach a monetary value to. I therefore say that this extraordinary and unprecedented circumstance had to be taken into consideration. It may perhaps be said that the Government should have given a liberal cash bonus for the construction of that road, and should have retained the land, but I believe the principle laid down by the Government in this respect will be supported by the country at large. That principle is, that that great and inaccessible region which is fit for nothing else than mining, should itself be responsible for the cost required to develop it. After all, we must remember that the building of a railroad into that country is not like building through agricultural lands, where for years there would be permanent sources of revenue to such a road. We may build this railway into the Klondike and something may happen which would render it to be of less value afterwards. It is therefore a most important thing that that country itself should be made to pay the expenses of building a railroad through it. That being the case, I believe the great mass of the people of this country will agree, that the action taken by the Government was proper. I am inclined to think that if the Government had called for public tenders on the same basis that they have arranged for this contract, there being no money payment, there would be few tenderers indeed. I am sure that the business men of this country will recognize that the Government would have had very little chance of receiving tenders and of providing for the immediate construction of this railway on such a basis. What would have been the effect of the Government advertising for public tenders for the construction of this railway on the basis that no money should be paid, but that it should be paid for in mineral lands? It would look very much as if the Government of Canada themselves had no faith in that country, because they were not disposed to put any of their own money into the work. Therefore, I claim that such a course would have been fraught with great risk and danger. More than that; had the Government failed to obtain a satisfactory tender for the building of the railway on that basis, it would have been ten times more difficult for them afterwards to negotiate a contract for its construction than if such a course had not been pursued. The arranging of a contract on such a basis, with no money payment, had to be a matter of negotiation, from the necessities of the case; and therefore, I believe that the action of the Government in endeavouring to ascertain by negotiation whether a satisfactory arrangement could be arrived at for the construction of the railway will meet with the approval of the people of this country. I maintain that the circumstances of the case called for immediate action. We could not afford to lose one year's trade of that country, which certainly would have been lost if the Government had gone about the matter in the usual way, by calling for public tenders; and for such a loss the people of this country would have held the Government responsible. I know that when you look at the number of millions of acres of land given to the contractors for the building of the railway, the figures look large.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BERTRAM. But when you look at the map, and see the quantity of land granted, compared with the size of the whole country, it does not look so large after all. Moreover, what does that grant of land to a company mean? In my judgment, it means simply the adding of so much to the mineral development of the country at large. We know that the company, to be able to get anything at all out of the lands, will require to develop them; or, if they sell them to another company, that company will have to develop them; and I maintain that the development of those lands will not interfere with the development of other lands, while their development will add tremendously to the business of the country at large. Some exception may be taken to what has been called a monopoly to the railway contractors in the provision that for five years no other railway shall be built into that country. Now, it seems to me, in reading over that contract, that the Government have simply made provision that no railway into that country will be bonused or chartered by this Parliament for the next five years if it comes from any part of the American territory. We know that a great many companies are applying for railway charters for railroads intended to run into the country from the Pacific coast over American territory; and the American Government, by means of customs duties, would have power to control the business of such railways. I do not believe that this Government or this Parliament would be justified under any circumstances in bonusing a railway running into that country with an outlet in American territory. Therefore, I say that it was of great importance that the Government should see to it that any railway assisted by them should pass over Canadian territory. The navigation of the Stikine River is free: the territory over which the railway will run from Glenora to Teslin Lake is Canadian; and from Teslin Lake to Dawson City, I understand, there will be unbroken navigation. So that when this railway is built we shall have a means of access into that country which will redound greatly to the trade and credit of Canada. Allow me further to say this, that to ask any contractor to make a deposit of $250,000 as security that the contract shall be completed within the time specified, when the contractors themselves are not receiving any money for the work is, I think, something unprecedented in the history of railway construction in Canada; and from the character of the contractors, I am inclined to think that that railway will be completed within the time. If that is done, it will be one of the greatest feats ever accomplished in this country, and will make the people of other countries feel that after all, when action or work of any kind is required, Canada can do her share, and her Government can be relied upon to act promptly. Another important feature of this contract is that the Government reserve alternate blocks of land, so that when the company engage in prospecting or development work, this country will get the benefit of it without any cost to itself; so that whenever the company add value to their own lands, they will add value to the Government lands, which will repay this country to a great extent. In that way I believe the country will reap more benefit than it would have done if the Government had proceeded to develop these lands itself.

Reference is also made in the Speech from the Throne to the bountiful harvest and to the increase in the trade of the country. In this congratulation I think we can all most heartily join. We all know that a bountiful harvest is necessary to make the country prosper and to increase the business of our manufacturers and merchants: and we had a very satisfactory harvest last year.

But there is another matter which, although not alluded to in the Speech, I desire to refer to very briefly, as having contributed to the material advancement and business of this country, and that is the manner in which the Government have dealt with our fiscal policy. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, this House will agree with me when I say that business cannot be done, business cannot be developed and expanded, unless there is confidence throughout the land, and I maintain that this Parliament, by its action last session in the revision of the tariff, gave the business people of this country a confidence which they did not possess to the same extent before. There was an impression among a certain class that the fiscal policy of the Liberal party was not as sound as it ought to be.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BERTRAM. But now that it is complete—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh! Oh!

Mr. BERTRAM. There was an impression, I do not deny it, in the minds of some business people and manufacturers that the fiscal policy of the Liberal party could not be relied upon to the same extent as the fiscal policy of the Conservative party. I admit that—but a change has since come over those men. The manufacturers and the business men of this country now realize, more than they ever did before, that this Government, that the Liberal party, mean no harm whatever to the business interests of the country. That feeling of confidence has permeated the whole land, and helped to create new channels of trade, new business and new developments, and therefore I say that the fiscal policy of this Government has been of great benefit to the Dominion as a whole.

It is not my intention to go at any length into that particular question, but still I would like to set myself right, and I wish to say that while I do not pretend to be able to agree in every respect with the Government, or that every member of the Government will be able to agree with me in everything I say, I shall none the less give it a generous and an ardent support. It does not necessarily follow that I am called upon to endorse everything that comes from it—for I do not suppose it claims infallibility—but I have no hesitation in endorsing the fiscal policy of this Government. I go further than that, I say that the pledges which the Liberal party made to the people of this country regarding tariff revision have been redeemed in every particular. I am quite well aware that such is not the opinion of the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper). I had great pleasure in reading the hon. gentleman's speech, made at Winnipeg the other day, because whenever the hon. gentleman does speak, he speaks eloquently and forcibly, and I always like to read what he has to say. In that speech I found the following paragraph:—

Who is there that does not know that these gentlemen went over this country for eighteen years denouncing the policy of protection and declaring that every vestige of protection should be uprooted and scattered to the winds, and that a free trade policy should prevail.

Now, I quite agree with the hon. leader of the Opposition, that if such had been the conduct of the Liberal party during eighteen years, that party would be unworthy the confidence of the people. But I do not agree with the hon. gentleman in his statement of fact. By putting an extreme interpretation upon some particular catch phrase, by carefully selecting some paragraph from some particular speech, he might strive to create the impression that the speaker thus quoted was in favour of absolute free trade, and that such was the policy of the Liberal party. But all that does not alter the outstanding, the underlying fact, that the Liberal party never had any intention of abolishing the customs duties of this country. The old Liberal policy did not do anything of the kind. The Liberal party was in power before, and it had a tariff policy of about 17½ per cent. That was not a free trade policy. That could not be called a free trade policy which imposed a duty on goods imported. What I understand by a free trade policy is a policy which would allow the manufactures of other countries to come into this country free of duty. A policy of that kind is an impossible one, one which never was intended and never was expected. We all know that even the old Liberal tariff of 17½ per cent would not now meet our requirements, the expenses of the country had been increased to such an extent that it was impossible to go back to that tariff; and it became necessary to raise the duties in order to meet the increased requirements of the country. But what did the Liberal party promise? It pledged itself to reduce the tariff; it pledged itself to do what it could to apply freer trade principles to our tariff consistent with a proper regard to the interests and the requirements of the country, and it pledged itself also not to overlook the fact that we had not as free a hand to deal with the tariff as we would have had if there had been no protection during the past eighteen years. And I claim that the Liberal party has carried out its pledges in this respect. What did it accomplish in the tariff revision of last year? The duties were greatly reduced on a long list of goods—I feel disposed to make this statement because such substantial reduction is not generally known throughout the country. The duties under the old tariff were so mixed up on the specific and the ad valorem basis that nobody could tell what the percentage of duty was. But when you combine these duties and convert them into a percentage on the value, you then begin to understand what the reductions really were. It is not my intention to go into the particulars, but I have the document here and can prove what I say. I say that the Liberal party last session reduced the tariff on a great many goods manufactured in this country to the extent of 10, 15, 25, 35 and 40 per cent. I call these heavy reductions in the tariff on goods imported into this country, and I say, therefore, that the Government have fulfilled their pledges to reduce the tariff as much as possible, and I am inclined to believe that no one thought for a moment that the Government would have lowered the duties to the extent they did. The tariff was pared down to a revenue basis, which is the basis on which the Liberal party has always held our tariff should be imposed. Extreme protection was struck off entirely. The ordinary requirements of the country were considered, and the tariff reduced to a revenue basis. That revenue tariff benefits all the interests and industries of the country much more effectually than could a protective tariff. In that respect I claim, therefore, that the tariff has been reduced materially and levelled down to a revenue basis, and in so doing the Government have fulfilled the pledges they had made, because it was never for a moment contemplated that these duties should be entirely struck off and the manufacturers of other countries admitted free. I desire also to repeat here what I have said elsewhere. We have had a tariff agitation for a long number of years, we had a revision last year, and the time has now come when we should have permanency and stability. Permanency and stability are required in the tariff of a country to enable its trade and business to extend; and now that a new era of prosperity and business revival is dawning upon us, it would be a great mistake indeed to discuss impending changes in the tariff. I do not mean to say for one moment that there should be no change whatever for some years to come, or a considerable time to come. New conditions and circumstances may arise which will require some changes in the tariff; but what I say is that the tariff revision of last session was so complete and satisfactory to the country at large that even many members of the Conservative party have been unable to find very serious fault with it, and that being the case, we ought to have permanency and stability in our tariff. But on the other hand, we ought also to be ready, when new conditions arise, to make any further changes which may be necessary.

Allow me to illustrate what I mean in that respect. Take, for instance, the duty on lumber. We know that the tariff was revised last session, but American lumber is admitted to this country still as it was before, free of duty, while Canadian lumber which was formerly admitted into the United States free of duty, is now dutiable. In the discussion that went on it was impossible to regard the log and the lumber duties otherwise than as interdependent and affecting one another, and it is most reasonable that the legislation of the United States on this subject of the lumber duties should be regarded in deciding upon the legislation upon that subject for Canada. This question has been before the public for a considerable number of years. At present, while American lumber comes free into Canada, there is a duty of $2 per thousand on lumber going into the United States. Thus a new condition has arisen, and, while I do not say that a duty should be imposed upon American lumber coming into this country, I do say that, new conditions having arisen, the Government will be bound seriously to consider the question in the light of those new conditions and decide the problems that are thus raised so as to promote the best interests of the country at large.

I am very glad to find a reference in the Speech from the Throne to the fact that the Government has abolished, so far as Government contracts are concerned, the sweating system. This shows that this Government, after all, is alive to the interests of all classes of the people and seeks to do what is best for all. I am glad to see, also, that there is some reference in the Speech to the questions of superannuation, the Franchise Act and the plebiscite. These are a part of the pledges of the Liberal Government and the Liberal party and I am glad to find them mentioned in the Speech of His Excellency because it is an indication that the Government intend to redeem their pledges with regard to these important questions.

It is not my intention to take up the time of the House much longer. I look to the future of this country with great confidence. There was never a time in our history when the people were so confident of the future of the country as they are now. It is a great satisfaction to me; it is a great satisfaction, I am sure, to the Liberal party and to the country at large to find that the prognostications of our friends of the Opposition as to what would befall the country if the Liberals came into power have not been realized. We know that confidence reigns throughout the land, and that confidence is a prime cause of increase of business. And so we look forward with hope and confidence to the development of the latent resources of the country to the greatest extent possible. And with such an immense territory, with such an energetic people and with such an efficient Government we may expect great things. We should be proud that we are living under such a free system of government and under such good institutions as we enjoy. I know of no country under the sun in which I would rather live than in this beloved Canada of ours.

Mr. GAUVREAU. (Translation.) In rising to second the Address to be presented to His Excellency in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I must confess, at the outset, that when asked by the leader of this House to accept that very honourable task, I did somewhat hesitate to assume the onerous responsibility of the duty devolving on me; and the more so, as in rising for the first time in this House, to address the representatives of the people in the Commons of Canada, methinks I hear, Mr. Speaker, a warning voice issuing from the seat you occupy, or rather I fancy I hear still echoing through this House the voices of former speakers who have achieved such brilliant oratorical triumphs under similar circumstances; and, although deeply conscious of my own inability, I crave the indulgence of all members on both sides of the House.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that there is a two-fold obligation involved here: that of seconding the Address which now devolves on me, and that of listening to the few remarks I am about to make, a task which devolves on you. I shall perform my task to the best of the ability which divine Providence has imparted to me; and, as to the hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, the plaudits which have just greeted me, as also the experience of the past, warrant me in believing that they will hear me throughout with that kind indulgence they have unfailingly bestowed on those who, like me, have craved the same, under similar circumstances.

The hon. member for Toronto Centre (Mr. Bertram), who has just taken his seat, has so exhaustively covered the ground that there remains but a few ears of corn for me to glean in the otherwise extensive field of the Speech from the Throne, and at the risk of repeating more or less correctly in French what the hon. gentleman has so well said in English, I will perform my task to the end, within the limited space of time allotted to me. The year 1897, that has just closed, will be recorded in history as one pregnant with the most memorable events of this latter part of the nineteenth century. Were history to record nothing but the celebration of the sixtieth anniversary of Her Majesty's reign, the majestic proportions of which are being emphasized as we recede from it, that event alone would suffice to immortalize the year 1897, the precious remembrance of which will be handed down to the remotest posterity by poets, historians and orators, as an unprecedented celebration in the history of mankind, when it was given us to witness a genuine outburst of loyalty and devotion on the part of the English people, and of the outlying portions of the Empire, which were so worthily represented at the foot of the Throne of Her Majesty, and in particular, the Dominion of Canada, represented by our most distinguished Prime Minister, the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Lady Laurier.

In after years, when scrutinizing the history of civilized countries, many a one will pause in wonderment before the apotheosis conferred by a nation on a woman we all admire, and let me add, Mr. Speaker, a woman we all love, and with the poet of old, the student of history will then cry out: Stop, traveller, you are travelling on sacred ground; Sta. viator.

I may perhaps, in my turn, be allowed to look back at past events, as far back as the outset of the present reign, which did not begin under very auspicious circumstances for our country. In 1837 a most gloomy period of our history, when the crown of Great Britain was being placed, perhaps with a trembling hand, on the head of a girl sixteen years old, this country, which has been called the finest jewel of the British Crown, threatened to be buried under the ruins of a domestic strife that had developed into a bloody revolution, and the great Papineau, who might be called the Canadian Daniel O'Connell, was then thundering out his fiery philippics, protesting against the abuses of the authorities, and arraigning the provincial government for their arbitrary and tyrannical course. The constitution of 1791 was then tottering under the repeated blows of its assailants, and amidst the bitter strife of the contending factions, the dawn of the era of 1841 could be foreshadowed, with the union of Upper and Lower Canada, which, in the mind of its author, was calculated to give the death blow to the French Canadian nationality; a consummation which was happily averted, through our being brought into daily contact with a people as much distinguished for their energy, their spirit of enterprise as for their love of progress: I mean the British people.

Through the radiancy or rather contagion of good example, a miracle has been wrought; and instead of our nationality being buried in the grave prepared for it, a new life, on the contrary, was infused into it. As years rolled by, many prejudices disappeared, and on the day when it was given us to see a French Canadian occupying the exalted station of adviser of the Crown and Prime Minister of the country, may, more, on the day when it was given us to see a scion of that people who, in 1837-38 had risen in arms against the Government of the day, intrusted with the mission of representing at the foot of the Throne of Her Majesty—and how nobly he fulfilled his mission, with what dignity and honour for himself we all know—a colony in which the British element predominates, and the French Canadian element is in a minority; on that day, Mr. Speaker, I say, British statesmen undoubtedly must have been satisfied that a colony where such tolerant views and harmony prevailed, where religious, political and civil liberty were so well understood and applied, without any of those terrible struggles, the offspring of religious bigotry, being engendered through the diversity of religious creeds; undoubtedly, I say, on that day, these statesmen must have come to the conclusion that such a colony was ripe for liberty and the moment had come for that people to take rank among the free states in the greatest Empire of the world, with the power of making their own treaties, and weighing enough in the balance to be able to exact and bring about the denunciation of treaties by which trade was being handicapped and the development of the natural resources of the country was being retarded and checked. 1837, 1867, 1897; these three epoch-making dates are pregnant with lessons not only for us, men of the present generation, but also for those who will come after us. Now, Sir, I ask, what position do we occupy to-day in the eyes of the world, on the very morrow of the Jubilee celebration, of the grand apotheosis conferred by a people gathered from the four corners of the globe, on that sublime woman, Queen Victoria, Empress of India? I am well aware that 1897 is the Jubilee year; but I am also reminded that it was marked by the discovery of the Klondike gold mines, an unlooked-for and most welcome discovery of untold wealth, and one well calculated to fill with hope the breasts of all Canadians who wish to see our country rich and prosperous. The gold fever is raging in every quarter of the globe, and is spreading among the most enlightened people of the old world. Powerful syndicates are being formed, at the head of which appear the leading men in financial, commercial and aristocratical circles of Great Britain, and those powerful syndicates are going to invest their capital in this country and thus assist the exploiting, on a large scale, of the fabulous wealth of the gold fields of our new Eldorado. As the Jasons of old, the gold-seekers, from the different countries of the world are about to rush to the conquest of a new golden fleece, the access to which is perhaps still more difficult in our days than it had proved in times gone by; but I am sure it will give better and still more remunerative returns. I would fain borrow the pen of the author of the Arabian

Nights and possess the talent of the great masters of oratory to set in a proper way before this House the enormous advantages accruing to the country from these discoveries which are fast assuming the proportions of an international event, owing to the intense excitement they have aroused throughout the civilized world.

Now, Mr. Speaker, fortune smiles on us and wealth comes to us from several other quarters. There really seems to be a conspiracy of political events to produce prosperity, as if the Government of this country had inherited from some good fairy the conjurer's wand. Through their wise and enlightened policy, a new impetus has been given to trade, and by a readjustment of the tariff on just and equitable lines, a new era of prosperity has been ushered in, a consummation so long wished for by the people of the Dominion. Were you to put the question to the farmers of this country, a most interesting and necessary class of our population, they would, I am sure, tell you that the country is blessed with prosperity and that everywhere the fires of content are blazing upon the hearthstones. To dispel every vestige of doubt, Mr. Speaker, let us hearken to the voice of the people speaking through the by-elections that have been held within the year, and here we have a decisive and authoritative answer to the question. But let me rather say this: that the hon. gentlemen who, like myself, have the honour of representing in this House purely agricultural constituencies, know very well that their constituents are contented and full of hope.

Why, Sir, is it not a fact that agricultural products are fetching most remunerative prices? Is it not a fact that wheat has reached an un hoped-for price? Is it not a fact that the sale of our cattle is fetching very good prices, compared with those of previous years, thanks, undoubtedly, to the wise policy inaugurated by the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), in connection with a very ticklish matter, the abolition of the quarantine with the United States? And let me seize this opportunity to tender, in the name of the country, my heartfelt thanks to the hon. Minister of Agriculture for having established a cold storage system which has proved a complete success and the advantages of which are now before the country in such a way as to carry conviction in the minds even of those who shut their eyes to the evidence of facts.

Now, if we turn to the manufacturers, a most important factor in the commercial development of a young country like ours, they will also tell us honestly that prosperity is ours again. It would, forsooth, be an idle task for them to deny it, in the face of the increase that has taken place in our foreign exports, as shown by the statistics; nay, more, they would tell you, Sir, that they have felt all their doubts dispelled, and confidence returning with the positive assurance given them that in this matter of tariff readjustment, no rash change should be attempted, but, on the contrary, every change in it should be cautiously made, as warranted by the exigencies of the hour. Let us glance at the table of the failures, a most infallible barometer of the increase or decrease of national prosperity, and one which shows us whether we are on the ascending scale in the commercial sphere, or whether we are slowly verging to bankruptcy. I do not think I am going beyond the mark in stating that there was a decrease of 15 per cent in the number of failures last year, compared with those of the previous year. Those statistics are more eloquent than all the speeches we could make on this side of the House.

Mr. Speaker, although I do not take much stock in the statements of newspapers, however, allow me to quote in this connection, the words of a Montreal paper, "La Patrie," which has an extensive circulation in the country:

Canada is truly a privileged country. We have no international imbroglio to fear; our institutions are working harmoniously; every day we are discovering new resources, and at this time of writing, there is no country in the world on which the eyes of Europe are riveted with more interest than on this land of ours.

As the impartiality of such a statement, coming from a Liberal newspaper might be suspected, let me refer to another great daily of the city of Toronto, a Conservative newspaper; and here is what the "World" said in the same connection:

We are entering upon an era of great, immense developments. Within the next decade, we are sure, our population will have doubled. The year which has just commenced will be marked by astounding progress throughout the west, British Columbia and the Yukon.

There is no gainsaying it, Sir, the discovery of the Klondike gold fields and their working on a large scale will rapidly increase the tide of immigration to this country, and secure us a large and healthy class of settlers, and Canada, which has so much to gain by such a movement, far from trying to check it will, on the contrary, do her best to develop it by all the means within her power. Immigrants from all parts of the civilized world will come to swell our population, develop our latent resources, and build up the country, while our fertile, limitless and attractive prairies of the North-west will witness a large influx of settlers who shall make it their home, securing thereby, if not wealth, at least a certain comfort and an assured future. History repeats itself, Sir, and once the gold fever is over which, anyway, cannot but be temporary, it will be the turn of Manitoba and the North-west Territories to benefit by this movement; and then, with a wise, honest and economical Government, which means a Liberal Government, at the head of the affairs of the country, with a system of laws than which none is better, with a rapid growth of population and, meanwhile, a steady development of our wealth, then, I say, will come the day when yearly deficits will be replaced by wonderful surpluses, the application and effects of which for this country cannot be overestimated at this remote date.

Mr. Speaker, I could further say that the exodus has been checked, that the financial equilibrium has been restored, but I must come to a conclusion, as I realize that allowing myself to be carried away by the marvellous things which meet my gaze, when raising the curtain of the future, I am apt to forget that I am taking the time of the House and I must not abuse the indulgence of the hon. members. Let me, Sir, before I resume my seat, tender my thanks to the Government of this country and congratulate them for having given us more than idle hopes. I know that the hon. gentlemen who now sit on the Treasury benches, are not satisfied, as was the case under the Conservative rule, with a deluge of words in a desert of ideas, but, on the contrary, that all promises are redeemed. I know that the Government are not satisfied with governing, but that they make it a point to forecast events, and through that political foresight not only is the stability of a government secured, but our finances and commercial prosperity are likewise made stable. Truly, fortune smiles on us; wealth is ours; and to quote the words of the hon. gentleman who was at the time the young and talented member for Drummond-Arthabasca, we are no longer threatened with the chastisement of Tantalus, but rather with the effects of the over-indulgence experienced by Gargantua. At all events, prosperity is ours once more, and if I rightly understand the utterances which re-echo from all parts of the country, peace, union, harmony are going to prevail in this country. Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to give expression to a wish from the innermost depths of my heart, and it is this: may the day soon dawn over this country we all love so much, when we may be enabled, in a common feeling of brotherhood, all and every one of us, men of British, French Canadian, Scotch or Irish descent, whether Protestants or Catholics, may we, I say, all repeat in unison, so that they may re-echo to the remotest corners of the Dominion, that sublime message sent by heaven to the earth, those sublime words which re-echoed throughout the heavens of Galilee under the light of the Star of Bethlehem: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men." who have it to heart to make this Canada of ours a rich, free and prosperous country, through the union of all our fellow-countrymen, irrespective of the diversity of creeds and languages.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am sure that the House has listened with very great interest to the addresses just delivered by the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram) and the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Gauvreau). I congratulate the House very heartily upon at least having present, in the able representative of Centre Toronto, the gentleman who is responsible for the existing tariff of this country. We had a good deal of curiosity to know how such a remarkable production was brought about: but we were informed, during the election campaign in Centre Toronto, that the architect of the tariff was the gentleman who has just, with so much ability, given us his opinions. We knew that he was a distinguished manufacturer, we knew that he had a very large and important industry connected with machinery and hardware; but we did not know, until the revelations made during the discussion in that election, that the hon. gentleman had constructed, line by line, the present tariff, that there was not a single article from A. to Z. that had not passed under his careful inspection, and—I think he went very far towards saying—received his imprimatur. Now, Sir, it is always a satisfaction to know who is responsible in these cases. But I was a little surprised that the gentleman, although the architect of this great tariff, and having the advantage of having a very admirable model prepared beforehand for him to follow, should make the very remarkable admission that he did make during his interesting address. That admission was that there was a great deal of consternation throughout this country caused by anticipations of what the Liberal party would do if they got into power. What was the cause of that consternation, what was the reason for it? Why, the reason was that there were a number of people in this country who believed that these gentlemen were sincere, that they really meant what they said when in Opposition, and that if they obtained power they would carry out the pledges they had given to the people. And I think I can tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bertram) what relieved the public mind, what it was that gave that buoyancy to the feelings of the business men of this country that he says they at present enjoy. The reason is that these business men found that they were mistaken in supposing that the Liberals were sincere. The business men found that these gentlemen who, during eighteen years—except for a brief period when they were advocating unrestricted reciprocity and the taking of the tariff of United States as a model for Canada—had been declaring that if they obtained power they would tear up protection root and branch, who had been saying, in the forcible language used by the right hon. the First Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) on the other side of the water that protection was a curse to Canada—instead of redeeming their pledges had called in a bloated manufacturer who had been fattening upon the vitals of the country to frame a tariff for this Dominion.

Mr. GAUVREAU.

That, I think, must in some measure account for the tariff that has been constructed. I can only say, Sir, that the presence of that hon. gentleman in this House to-day, the speech made by him as the architect of this tariff, as the man upon whom the Government depended for its construction, and the declaration that he has made, all prove that the statements made by the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) that this was only an initial step, and that they were going straight on to redeem their free trade promises, were a mere delusion; for we now learn that the tariff is a finality, that for ten years, as the hon. gentleman promised the people of this country during the Centre Toronto election, no change was to be made in this tariff. And there is no doubt that he was warranted in saying so, because the right hon. the First Minister, on returning to the shores of Canada, stated, in the first public announcement that he made, that one of the greatest injuries that could be inflicted upon the country was the tinkering of its tariff, and that it must rest where it was. Now, I do not know whether that would quite satisfy the hon. members who sit behind the Government and who have been led to believe that the few reductions in the tariff, slight as they were, were only the entering wedge which was to be driven steadily in until a free trade tariff was attained. I do not know how these gentlemen will be pleased, but I think that the people of Canada will read with great satisfaction that there is to be no more tinkering with the tariff, and no further reductions made in it. They know that Canada has attained its present position under the operation of a tariff very much like that which the hon. member for Centre Toronto is in favour of; they know very well that Canada owes its present position to such a tariff; that by its means it was lifted out of the slough of despond into which it sank when those hon. gentlemen were in power before, at a time when poverty and want were stalking through this country until a protective tariff was brought forward. They know that under the protective tariff every industry in this country was re-invigorated, that hundreds of industries which it had been impossible to carry on previously, were brought into existence, that labour has been employed, and that money and wealth have been distributed throughout this country in virtue of that protective tariff. Therefore, I say that it is no wonder that the intelligent people of this country acquainted with those facts, were greatly dismayed at the promise made to implement the pledges that had been given to Parliament before those gentlemen came into power. Now, however, I think the people are becoming reassured. But what does the hon. gentleman say?

Does he mean to tell us that the tariff of the Conservative party was not sufficiently protective, because, as one of his first steps, he has had the duty on coloured cottons increased? If we are to understand that, it will be another evidence to the country of the power of that hon. gentleman, and another assurance to the country that while he sits in this House he will not permit of any trifling with this offspring of his that he is so proud of having brought into existence.

Now, Sir, I am unable to follow to any great extent the very eloquent address delivered by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Gauvreau). I understand that hon. gentleman is a poet, and although I was not able to follow his address in the French language as closely as I would like to have done, I understand that he attributed the existing prosperity of trade in Canada to the present Government. Well, Sir, they say that there is a license permitted to poets in dealing with hard facts which is not permitted to ordinary individuals, and I think the hon. gentleman must have been exercising largely his poetic license when he made that statement. The hon. member for Centre Toronto frankly stated that one of the chief causes of the present prosperity of Canada, at which we all rejoice, because we are all equally interested in it, was the bountiful crop with which Providence had favoured this country. I do not suppose that even a poet would consider it quite right to claim credit to the Government for what Providence had done for the country. But there is something else which was not referred to, and which has also had an important bearing on this question, and that is the high price of wheat, the fact that wheat, one of the great staple exports of this country has within the last year, doubled the price which it has commanded for several years previously. Does the hon. gentleman claim credit to the Government for that fact? Does he mean to say that they are responsible for the famine in India, or for the drought in Russia?—because, unless he does, he is not able to claim credit for the Government for the high price of wheat. Sir, there is no one branch of industry that owes one jot or tittle of its prosperity at this moment to any act of which this Government has been guilty.

Now, Sir, I propose to come to the Speech itself. I find that the first matter mentioned here, and to which allusion was made by the hon. member for Centre Toronto, was the loan recently negotiated by the Finance Minister in London. I do not hesitate to congratulate that hon. gentleman upon the success of his loan. We were all rejoiced to learn that the loan was negotiated on terms so favourable, that is a matter of common congratulation to the country. But I do not think that anything that has occurred in that connection warrants the statement in the Speech "that the credit of Canada has never stood so high in European markets." I deny that. I say that when the late Government went out of office, and when the hon. gentleman went to London, he found the credit of Canada standing just as high as it stands to-day; therefore that statement is not justified by the facts. The loan was a creditable one, it reflects credit upon the country and upon the Finance Minister, and we are all delighted with it. But it is not true to say that he obtained a price better than the 2 per cents yielded at a premium of 7, at which they stood when we left power, and at which they stood when the hon. gentleman went across the Atlantic. I appeal to the hon. gentleman who was formerly Finance Minister (Sir Richard Cartwright) in verification of the statement that the great improvement that took place to the credit of Canada in the money markets of the world, took place when we were able to pass from 4 per cents to 3 per cents, and obtain the price that we did, and under the administration of the Conservative party those 3 per cents gradually reached a premium of 7 per cent. But there is another point in regard to that loan to which I want to call the attention of the House, and particularly of my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Richard Cartwright), and that is that I am able to claim that the action taken by the present Finance Minister supports a view that I held in a very strong controversy with the then Minister of Finance, and that was in regard to the question whether it was best, in the interests of Canada, that a loan should be put on the British market at a fixed price, or at a minimum price, and tenders asked for. The hon. gentleman and I had a very fierce controversy on that subject, as he will no doubt remember, and I claim that the present Finance Minister is a convert to my view rather than to that of the hon. gentleman with whom I discussed the subject.

Now we come to that most interesting of all subjects, the Jubilee, and I am certain there is no member in this House, and there is no person in this country, belonging to any party or any class, whose heart was not thrilled with the liveliest emotion at that wonderful celebration. The spectacle exhibited to the world of Her Majesty the Queen surrounded not only by millions of her loyal subjects vying with each other in devotion to her throne and person, but surrounded by representatives of all the great outlying portions of the Empire, was a spectacle that will not soon be forgotten. I say more. I believe that the exhibition of power manifested when England, without drawing a ship from a foreign station, without drawing a ship from her great fleet in the Mediterranean presented to the world a display of naval power such as had never before been witnessed, was a spectacle not only calculated to excite feelings of loyalty and satisfaction in every British heart, but to contribute to the peace of the world. I wish to take this opportunity, and in doing so I am representing the feelings not only of every member on this side of the House but of every individual in the country, to tender my hearty congratulations to the right hon. leader of the Government, who represented Canada on that occasion, on the distinguished honours which he obtained. I could not, however, help wondering, when in common with all the rest of us, I yesterday gazed with admiration on the right hon. gentleman bedizened with the order of the Grand Cross of St. Michael and St. George, and the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honour of France, what his democratic friends thought, those who used to be roused to wild enthusiasm when he denounced with scorn those as tin pot titles. I am afraid when the temptation was placed before the hon. gentleman he was something like Bob Acres with his courage—his democratic sentiments oozed from his fingers' ends, and being unable to resist the temptation he yielded to it. However, Sir, I look upon it as a matter of advantage to the country that the right hon. gentleman, being now duly installed in a most noble and distinguished order, will be prepared to maintain that which is not the least important of British institutions, by which Her Majesty marks her appreciation of services rendered to the Crown by the bestowal of these important orders. Everyone will agree with the reference made by the hon. mover of the Address to the distinguished personality of the right hon. First Minister. We all appreciate it, and we were all gratified to know that in the person of the Prime Minister the Dominion was represented on the other side of the water by one whose personality was such that we could all be justly proud of him. We all recognized the force and truth of that admirable portrait painted by the great Latin orator of Cambridge University, Professor Sandys, when he declared that the right hon. gentleman spoke eloquently in two languages. His eloquence gave him additional force, for there are no people in the world, with perhaps the exception of the French, who are more affected by eloquence than the British public. But before I pass on, I wish to make one observation that escaped me in regard to these orders. I observed with some little surprise from the decorations worn by the right hon. gentleman, that he had accepted the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honour of France. I could not understand it—I cannot understand it now. I had a similar honour tendered to me by the King of Belgium when I had the honour of representing Canada as commissioner at the Antwerp Exhibition. Knowing, as I did, that no British subject could accept a foreign order, except with the consent of the Crown, I went to the Colonial

Office and saw Sir Robert Herbert, who was the Chancellor of the Order of St. Michael and St. George, if I remember rightly, at that time. I applied for permission to accept an order precisely similar, except that one was from Belgium and the other from France, to that received by the right hon. gentleman. That permission was refused; and it was not only refused, but Sir Robert Herbert placed in my hands a statute which declared Her Majesty had not the power to consent to the acceptance of a decoration from a foreign power except for services on the battlefield. I do not know whether my hon. friend won his decoration on the battlefield; but unless he did so, I cannot understand why he should appear as Prime Minister of Canada wearing a decoration that I understand to be prohibited by the authority of the Crown, except in cases in which Her Majesty is able to give consent, and that alone applies to a distinction won on the field of battle.

To pass to more serious subjects, I regret that the eloquence with which the right hon. gentleman enthralled the people with whom he came in contact on the other side of the Atlantic, was not used in the interest of Canada. I watched narrowly the course which the right hon. gentleman pursued during the time he was representing this country, and it is with the deepest regret that in the discharge of the duty which I owe to this House and the country, I am compelled to say that instead of having used wisely his eloquence, which at such a time might have accomplished more for Canada than perhaps at any other period in our history, the right hon. gentleman forgot what was owing to the Dominion and turned back not only on Canada but on himself, and used the high authority with which he was clothed to do the greatest injury to Canada that it is possible for any man to do. What was that? I dare say this House has not forgotten that the subject of preferential trade has been discussed in this country. What is preferential trade? Preferential trade is the policy of adopting an arrangement between the British Government and her colonies under which colonial products will go into the markets of England free as at present, while the products of foreign countries coming into competition with them will be subjected to duty.

In 1884 the Right Hon. Mr. Foster, one of the most distinguished men who ever adorned the Liberal ranks in the United Kingdom, founded the Imperial Federation League with a view of drawing more closely together the colonies and the mother country. He did me the honour to consult me on more than one occasion, and I told him that after giving the subject the closest consideration, I had arrived at the conclusion that what would bind the colonies and the mother country indissolubly together was a policy of preferential trade such as I have referred to. The answer of the right hon. gentleman to me was: Well, I am a free trader, but I am not so fanatical a free trader that I would not be perfectly willing to adopt that policy to accomplish such a result. Mr. Foster unfortunately died, and a number of the members of the Imperial Federation League were not so emphatically in favour of going as far as he would in that direction. I had not taken much part in the Imperial Federation League from its formation down to 1889, but in the latter year I was pressed to attend the annual dinner of the league, and to give my view in regard to the status of the question in Canada. I repeated there that in order to cement the tie that bound the colonies to the Crown, it was in my judgment necessary to adopt a policy of preferential trade under which the interests of Great Britain would be greater in her colonies, and under which the colonies in return would evince their gratitude by giving a corresponding advantage to British products in the markets of Canada. That became the subject of a very lively discussion, and I am quite certain that it had something to do with the dissolution of the Imperial Federation League. At all events, the difference of opinion that arose in the league on that occasion led to the formation of the United Empire Trade League in March, 1891. That league was formed by leading gentlemen of both parties in the House of Commons and in the House of Lords, who advocated by all means in their power the adoption of this policy of preferential trade on the basis I have stated. They waited on the Marquis of Salisbury in 1891, and put before him the great advantages that would accrue to the Empire if Great Britain adopted the policy of placing her colonies on a better footing than foreign nations in her markets. The Marquis of Salisbury replied: That is a very grave question; it is one for which the public mind is hardly prepared, and he told the deputation to go forth and promulgate their views, and that if the people of the country were converted to that doctrine, then their battle would be won, because the Government would offer no opposition. As a result of this, at the close of the last general election in England, those gentlemen were able to go to Lord Salisbury and point out to him that a very great number of the representatives in Parliament had been elected as avowed supporters of preferential trade. Lord Salisbury then said that it would be impossible to take up the scheme unless some plan were put forward on business principles. Our Parliament in 1891 resolved that when the British Government would admit to the United Kingdom the products of Canada upon better terms than those accorded to the products of foreign countries, then Canada would be prepared to make a corresponding reduction of duty in favour of British goods in her markets. In 1894 the historic conference took place in Ottawa, at which were represented Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, Canada and England, and after full discussion a resolution was adopted affirming the principle of the resolution passed by the Parliament of Canada, and asking that Her Majesty's Government would favourably consider the question. Unfortunately, it fell to the duty of the Marquis of Ripon to reply to that appeal, and I need not tell any person who is acquainted with English politics that the Marquis of Ripon was Colonial Secretary in a Government which rested upon a very narrow majority in the House of Commons, and which, however otherwise well disposed, was not in a position to deal with such a question as that. When the members of the United Empire Trade League went back to Lord Salisbury in 1896, and pressed him to give effect to the declarations that had been so thoroughly sustained throughout the country at the general election, he told them he wanted a scheme. In that year I came to Canada—as I dare say some hon. gentlemen will recollect—and I was invited to deliver an address before the Montreal Board of Trade. In that address I endeavoured to show the practicability and the feasibility of the adoption of that policy, and I urged it in the strongest possible manner. The Toronto "Globe," the organ of the great Liberal party in this country, criticised my action, and said: Why should Sir Charles Tupper waste his time and his breath in advocating preferential trade in Montreal, when it is a policy which every man in this country will hold up both his hands in support of; and the "Globe" further said: The battle has to be fought in England. Well, the "Globe" was right in that. I have no hesitation in saying that when on this great Jubilee occasion, Canada had an opportunity of being represented by the leader of this Government, that battle would have been won if it had been fought in England by him. Sir, I shall give you my reasons for entertaining that opinion. My answer to the "Globe" was: It is quite true that the battle must be fought in England, and that is why I am here urging upon the boards of trade at this meeting in Montreal, and all over Canada, to send delegates to represent them at the Congress of the Chambers of Commerce of the Empire, and press there this question of preferential trade. The Toronto Board of Trade passed a resolution affirming the policy in the strongest and most emphatic terms, and suggesting precisely how, in their opinion, it should be carried out. That resolution read as follows:—

Resolved, that, in the opinion of this conference, the advantage to be obtained by a closer union between the various portions of the British Empire are so great as to justify an arrangement as nearly as possible of the nature of a Zollverein, based upon principles of the freest exchange of commodities within the Empire, consistent with the tariff requirements incident to the maintenance of the local government of each kingdom, dominion, province or colony, now forming part of the British family of nations.

That was very specific and very clear. An hon. gentleman who is now a member of this House, although he was not then, Mr. Osler, was sent to represent the Board of Trade, and to press this resolution. I have only read the last clause of it, because that is the most important; and when he had put that resolution before the Congress of the Chambers of Commerce of the Empire, the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, the Colonial Secretary, who opened the conference, made a most important and striking speech, in which he substantially endorsed the resolution passed by the Board of Trade, and maintained that the policy was perfectly practicable of accomplishment on those terms. He said:

If they (the colonies) desire, as we desire, and as we believe they do, this closer union—if they are willing to make some sacrifice of their present arrangements and convictions in order to secure it—let them say so. Let the offer come voluntarily from them, and I believe it will be considered in this country, not in any huckstering spirit, but that it will be entertained as part of the great policy which is intended to unite in the closest bonds of affection and of interest all the communities which are under the British flag and all the subjects of Her Majesty throughout the world.

The next authority we have on that important question is no less distinguished a person than the right hon. the First Minister. He was then appealing to the people of this country to give him power, and was stating to the people what he would do if they clothed him with power; and I think that every member of this House will admit that no more solemn obligation can rest on the shoulders of any public man than the obligation to redeem honourably, honestly and faithfully the pledges he gives to the electorate when he is seeking power at their hands. This is what he said at London, on the 17th of May, 1896:

In regard to this question of preferential trade, Mr. Laurier desired to say that Sir Charles Tupper was no more favourable to the idea than himself.

He went on to say:

My hope is—nay, my conviction is—that on the 23rd of June the Liberal party will be at the head of the polls; and then it will be the Liberal party, with its policy of a revenue tariff, that will send commissioners to London to arrange for a basis of preferential trade.

These were the terms in which the hon. gentleman pledged himself to carry out the policy of preferential trade if he obtained power. Under these circumstances, had we not a right to expect that some effort at all events, on his part would be made to show that he had not attempted to delude the people of this country with false promises, only to trample them under his feet and to turn his back upon them after they had accomplished the purpose of securing for him his position of power and influence? The hon. gentleman had the opportunity placed in his hands, and I hold in my hand the speech with which he was met by His Grace the Duke of Devonshire at Liverpool on landing, on the very threshold of his entrance into England, on which occasion, as hon. gentlemen know, the Duke of Devonshire made a speech which brought down upon him next morning the denunciation of the extreme free traders and Cobdenites all over the United Kingdom. They declared that he had shown on that occasion that for the purpose of meeting the views of the colonies he was prepared to turn his back on free trade and adopt a preferential tariff between England and her colonies. He said:

Very few disciples of free trade fifty years ago would have believed for a moment that at this time France and Germany would be carrying on an enormous trade under strictly prohibitive conditions, and not only that they would not have opened their markets to us, but they would be competing over us for the possession of as large a portion as possible of the surface of the earth, not for the purpose of opening it up out of the universal benefits of free trade, but for the purpose of excluding from those portions English trade. The world has not become the commercial paradise which was predicted in the early days of free trade opinion, when it was hoped that free trade would bind all the nations of the earth so closely together that it would be a matter of comparatively little importance by whom they were ruled, or under what influence they were governed. We have since learned by painful experience that no old nor new markets are being thrown open to us by the influence of free trade alone, and that if we want to provide for increasing commerce, which is necessary for the support of our increasing population, we must find those markets for ourselves, and must use every opportunity either of expanding or consolidating our colonial possessions.

Here was the evidence, given in the strongest terms, that His Grace was prepared to follow in the lines so admirably laid down by Mr. Chamberlain, of adopting a policy of preferential trade within the Empire. Sir George Turner, the Premier of Victoria, was present on that occasion, and I will read as short an extract as possible from his speech, although I should like to read a longer one, in order to give the House the spirit of the position he occupied:

If proposals be made to us which will show us that the whole of our trade, the whole of our dealings can be on fair, just and equitable terms conducted with Great Britain, we will only be too willing to enter into that bargain, because we know that that will be manifestly for the benefit and advantage of all of us who are part of this great Empire.

The Premier of New Zealand, the Hon. A. J. Seddon, said:

I am proud that it has been reserved to us to listen to the admirable address which His Grace has given this afternoon. Since thirty years ago, when this matter was first discussed, there has gone forward a movement which will increase in strength and volume until all doubts be removed, and that, instead of that, which you all require going to foreign nations, we can give you that help; we desire to do so. Help us to do it and you are doing your duty to the great Empire to which we all have the honour to belong. Let me remind you of what took place at the conference in London in June last. There the thinking men of our nation, those who command our manufactures, those who command the commerce and trade of our country, showed that they desired to put to the world, and to put to those in charge of Imperial affairs what their views honestly were upon this subject. And he who is at the present moment at the head of colonial affairs—I allude to the Right Hon. Mr. Chamberlain—said: "Let the colonies come to us with a proposal or proposals, and it shall not be treated in any huckstering spirit." Nothing was done under that until recently, but there was a conference held of the Prime Ministers of Australia at Hobart, and a resolution was passed in which we said that we had not arrived at that stage at which proposals should be made, but that the situation is so grave and serious that, in the interests of the colonies and of the Empire, it should be inquired into.

I regret to say that instead of the right hon. gentleman realizing what every honest man in Canada looked to him for, instead of doing what he had solemnly pledged himself to do, he turned his back upon Canada, he turned his back upon himself, and rejected this very proposal at the outset, which, I have shown, step by step, accumulated such tremendous cogency and force. These are the terms in which he spoke:

I claim for the present Government of Canada that they have passed a resolution by which the products of Great Britain are admitted on the rate of their tariff, at 12½ per cent, and next year at 25 per cent reduction. This we have done, not asking any compensation.

Are there any terms in the English language which the hon. gentleman could have used that could be more opposed to the pledge he had given? Because the whole question was one of compensation, and that was a question which Mr. Chamberlain declared would be decided in no huckstering spirit. If the colonies, he said, would make a proposal to give benefit to Imperial trade, the British Government were ready to consider the advisability of giving that preference to the products of the colonies in the British market which was of such vital consequence to Canada. The right hon. leader of the Government went on to say:

There is a class of our citizens—

Mark, Mr. Speaker, the sneer. What did the "Globe" tell the right hon. gentleman? The "Globe" told him that every man, woman and child who was old enough to know and realize the importance preferential trade would be to Canada was of one opinion, and that was that it was most desirable to get it. And yet we have from the right hon. gentleman this sneer, not at the Conservative party alone, but, if the "Globe" stated the truth, at every intelligent person in the country.

There is a class of our fellow citizens who ask that all such concessions should be made for 'quid pro quo.'

But that is, Mr. Speaker, the very basis, the foundation of preferential trade within the Empire.

The Canadian Government has ignored all such sentiments.

Was that the language the right hon. gentleman held in London, Ont., when he said he was as strong in favour of preferential trade as I was, or the language he used at Toronto when he said that his best efforts would be used to obtain that preferential trade, of such vital importance, on the lines suggested by the Right Hon. Mr. Chamberlain? The right hon. gentleman continued:

We have done it because we owe a debt of gratitude to Great Britain. We have done it because it is no intention of ours to disturb in any way the system of free trade which has done so much for England.

If the right hon. gentleman were in a position to cut adrift from the obligations which he solemnly assumed and which rested upon him, if he were in a position to place a value upon a Cobden medal that was over and above all the interests of Canada, then it would have been all right for him to use such language. No terms that can be found in the English language more calculated to violate the pledge the hon. gentleman had given to the people of this country as to what he would do when in power. And when he was clothed with power, and on that great jubilee occasion, when the English people were ready to give us everything for nothing almost, he had no right to say on behalf of Canada that he was looking simply to this mess of pottage which he had made up his mind to secure. I shall not have to labour much to bring every unprejudiced mind in this House to the conclusion that the hon. gentleman did not realize our just expectations and failed to discharge that duty towards his country which his country expected him to discharge. Again, at Birmingham Mr. Chamberlain, in glowing language, showed the vital importance of adding the tie of interest to the tie of sentiment, of having a mutual bond of self-interest binding the colonies and the mother country together, of recognizing this principle of commercial confederation. But what language did my right hon. friend use? He said:

Many schemes of union had been suggested, but they all had the fatal objection of interfering with the freedom of trade of the colonies.

Does the hon. gentleman say that we want such freedom of trade in the colonies as will prevent our products, when sent to the great markets of the United Kingdom, obtaining higher prices than they obtain now? I think that such an interference with our trade would be welcomed by every man of any intelligence. My right hon. friend continued:

The colonies had already granted certain concessions to the mother country, but they asked for no 'quid pro quo,' no pound of flesh.

I have, Mr. Speaker, been fighting the battle for preferential trade actively since 1839 down to the present hour, at the boards of trade all over the United Kingdom, and in every section whenever the opportunity offered, and the bitterest opponent of preferential trade never took grounds stronger, more emphatic, more determined against it than the right hon. gentleman took on this question, which, the organ of his party declared, was considered by every man of intelligence in Canada as of great importance to our country, and which he had himself endorsed in the fullest possible manner. Let me quote still stronger language which the hon. gentleman used, as if he were determined to break down, at once and for ever, this agitation for preferential trade between the mother country and her colonies:

What we give you by our tariff we give you in gratitude for the splendid freedom under which we have prospered. It is a free gift. We ask no compensation. Protection has been the curse of Canada; we would not see you come under its baneful influence—for what weakens you must weaken us.

Now, Sir, this is the mode in which the hon. gentleman disappointed the just expectations of the people of this country in reference to this vitally important question of preferential trade. I leave it to the judgment of this House, I leave it to the candid consideration of every intelligent man in this country, whether I should not fail in my duty as a member of this House and as a citizen of Canada if I did not draw attention to the facts.

But, Sir, the right hon. gentleman seems to be equal to any fortune. When I came from England, I was interviewed on the subject of what had taken place on the other side of the water, and I then gave expression to the view I am expressing now—that the leader of the Government when clothed with power to represent the Dominion on this great jubilee occasion had utterly failed to redeem the promises that he had made. And the hon. gentleman himself seems to have come to the conclusion that I was not very far wrong. He attended a banquet at Toronto and made a speech there. Let me contrast that speech with his previous utterances. The hon. gentleman, having performed the acrobatic feat of taking a double somersault between Canada and Great Britain had returned to Canadian soil and now found himself face to face with the men he had betrayed. I do not use too strong a term when I say that he had betrayed the men who took him at his solemn pledged word and gave him power to accomplish this great work for Canada, seeing that though, having such an opportunity as a man does not have more than once in a lifetime to do a great work for his country and gain a reputation that would live through all time in the hearts and minds of Canadians, yet he, dazzled with this Cobden medal craze and desiring to add this brilliant decoration to the others he had obtained, turned his back upon himself and upon Canada. But, when face to face with the men he had betrayed, what did he say? He said:

I have only this to say with respect to this charge of these self-constituted diplomats—

Well, Sir, I have never called myself a diplomat, although the hon. gentleman was good enough to confer this distinction upon me. I hope I have not proved more unworthy of it than the right hon. gentleman himself proved in his great diplomatic feat with the United States when he unbosomed himself to a newspaper reporter and paraded a long series of matters that he intended to discuss with the American republic. And, by the way, I told the hon. gentleman at the time that that kind of diplomacy would not pay, that it would not do to attempt to accomplish a great diplomatic feat in that way; and I think that he has come to the conclusion that I was right. He has had evidence enough of it. He and his colleagues have been down to Washington, they have virtually been on their knees time and again to the Government and the Congress of the United States, and have come back utterly discomfited, so much so that the ire of even the great lover of the United States, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) has begun to rise, and we hear him saying at least that we must stand upon our dignity. I do not wish to be understood as saying that the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has no diplomatic talent, because I find that, after this good-natured sneer at your humble servant on the subject of diplomacy, he endeavoured to show that he was a practical diplomat, that he had, in fact, exhibited an amount of diplomacy that was really remarkable and most creditable. I can only say that I will give to the House the language of the right hon. gentleman on that occasion, which will show the kind of diplomacy he was prepared to use. He said:

Certainly, if I thought I could have obtained for my country, for the products of Canada, a preferential treatment in the markets of Great Britain, I would not only have been wanting in patriotism, but I would have been wanting in reason—I simply would have been an idiot—if I had failed to obtain such preference. (Laughter and applause.)

I have not used any language so strong as that which the right hon. gentleman has used towards himself. But I cannot contradict him, seeing that it is exactly what he did.

As I have said before, that is diplomacy with a vengeance. He went on to say that he had got the denunciation of the treaties, that there was nothing now in the way, that the coast was clear and the ground ready for discussion, and that the discussion could go on with the hope of obtaining some satisfactory solution of the problem. Where is he now? He has turned his back upon free trade and upon Cobdenism. Returning to his own country he gives it as the only excuse why he did not try to get preferential trade that he could not get it. One is reminded of the old quotation:

It was all very well to dissemble your love,
But why did you kick me downstairs?

Though he dissembled his love for Miss Preferential Trade, there was surely no reason for kicking her downstairs as an evidence of his affection for her. But the right hon. gentleman is not altogether wanting in diplomatic talent, for he has really adopted the policy of his great French diplomatic prototype. We all know that the name of Talleyrand will be handed down to future generations as that of one of the most accomplished diplomats that ever lived, and the basis of Talleyrand's diplomacy was that ambassadors were sent abroad to lie for their country—that an ambassador could not be expected to tell the truth.

I observe by the conversation going on between the leader, the hon. gentleman opposite and his colleague (Sir Richard Cartwright) that I am being subjected to some criticism. I may possibly have attributed the saying to the wrong person, but we know that Talleyrand's maxim was that a lie was all right if the truth could be reached by means of it.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I was just wondering if the motto the hon. gentleman has quoted applied to High Commissioners as well as to Ambassadors.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Now, having questioned the right of the hon. gentleman to the character of a diplomat, I had occasion to run my eye over the history of Talleyrand and find some remarkable likenesses in the right hon. gentleman, to him. No doubt, he will be deeply gratified to hear what I say, for he knows that I am comparing him with one of the most astute diplomats that the world has ever seen. Those who are interested in the matter will find in Appleton's encyclopedia of biography, under the title Talleyrand, the following:—

Here the question occurs, therefore, What were his convictions? Faith in what any single party might understand by principle Talleyrand had not; yet he possessed some rare quality of mind which, to him, supplanted the place of such a faith, and which has been aptly designated a 'supernatural indifference'—an indifference not to his own fate, but to whatsoever event might befall the men or the institutions surrounding him, so that his own schemes remained buoyant. Napoleon's summary judgment of him is perhaps nearer the truth than any more laboured criticism, and his words are these: 'Talleyrand was always in a state of treason, but it was a treasonable complicity with fortune herself; his circumspection was extreme, he conducted himself towards his friends as if, at some future time, they might become his enemies—'

I think there is a little resemblance there.

—“and towards his enemies as though they might become his friends.”

I think we have had some evidence of that, too, not very long ago.

This, after all the apologies we have read of him, seems to be the sum of the matter, and however admirable such a character might be as a minister of foreign affairs, there is surely too much of the Mephistopheles element in it to satisfy any lover of honesty; it is a judgment, also, by no means ex parte in character, for the fact stated is implied in the very apology for him. What else is the argument that he shifted from one party to another, lest he should partake in the threatened corruption of the body of which he foresaw the decay, except another way of stating his treasonable complicity with fortune? and what would any cause be worth if all its supporters were in this state of perennial treason towards it? What, again, is the moral worth of that man, however great his capacity, who supports a cause on condition of its success?

Now, Sir, I am quite sure that the hon. gentleman will accept that in full of any criticism of him as regards the likeness that I have discovered between him and his great French prototype. But, Sir, the Toronto "Globe" came to his rescue. They found that the hon. gentleman was in a very tight place. They knew that he had declared in Toronto what he would do if he got into power, and they knew that he had done the very reverse of what he had promised, that he had done everything that man could do to prevent any person harbouring a sentiment favourable to preferential trade. The "Globe" came to his rescue with a falsehood—nothing more or less; and I will prove that, because it was not merely a misstatement—the "Globe" understands this question too well to be mistaken. They came to his rescue with this statement:

It is just as well that the real facts of the matter should be known. During the visit of the colonial premiers to Great Britain, Mr. Chamberlain made the proposition that there should be absolute free trade between Britain and her colonies, on condition that the former placed a small customs tax on commodities from foreign countries.

Is that true? The right hon. gentleman knows that it is false. He knows that no such thing took place between the Premiers. What did take place between Mr. Chamberlain and the Premiers is on record. Mr. Chamberlain has placed it on the Table of the House of Commons, and has given the most emphatic contradiction to the "Globe". Now, I will quote the hon. gentleman against himself and against the "Globe," and I will show that the statement made in the "Globe" that Mr. Chamberlain's policy was one of absolute free trade, is the very reverse of the truth. Mr. Chamberlain declared in the presence of the assembled Chambers of Commerce of the Empire, that he adopted the Toronto resolution, which was in favour of a revenue tariff, and that is the construction that hon. gentleman placed upon it himself. Now, Sir, the First Minister, in Toronto, on the 4th of June, 1896, is reported to have said—speaking then as leader of the Opposition:

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Now, the statesmen of Great Britain—

I ask the attention of the House to this, because it sums up the whole case with a clearness, a perspicuity and an accuracy that I think are calculated to excite the admiration of the friends of preferential trade.

Now, the statesmen of Great Britain have taught that the governments of the colonies have come to a time when a new step can be taken in their development. What is that? That there should be a commercial agreement between England and the colonies. That practical statesman, Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, has come to the conclusion that the time has come when it is possible to have within the bounds of the Empire a new step taken which will give to the colonies in England a preference for their products over the products of other nations. What will be the possibilities of such a step if it was taken?

The hon. gentleman was then seeking power, not abusing it after he had got it.

We sell our goods in England. We send our wheat, our butter, our cheese, all our natural products, but there we have to compete with similar products from the United States, from Russia and from other nations. Just see what a great advantage it would be to Canada; if the wheat, cheese and butter which we would send to England should be met in England with a preference over similar products of other nations. The possibilities are immense.

Then the hon. gentleman was seeking the suffrages of the people. But not so when he begged England to turn her back upon that policy and to have nothing to do with preferential trade because it involved protection, and protection had been a curse to Canada, and he, as a Canadian, was anxious that England should be spared any such misfortune.

England does not expect that we should take her own system of free trade.

There is the answer to the "Globe," there is the true answer, there is the policy of Mr. Chamberlain, as outlined in the clearest terms.

England does not expect that we should take her own system of free trade such as she has it; but I lay it before you that the thing the English people would expect in return is that, instead of a principle of protection, we should adopt a revenue form of tariff pure and simple. These are conditions on which we can have that boon.

The hon. gentleman said that his policy was a revenue tariff policy, and that he was in a position to obtain that. Now, Sir, I think we have disposed of that question for the moment. We have shown that the right hon. gentleman has utterly failed to realize the just expectations of the people and the Parliament of Canada, but that, on the other hand, he has done all that man could do to strike down a policy that every person knows is of vital importance to this country. When it is remembered that the United Kingdom consumes a hundred millions of bread and meat more than she can raise and that, under that policy, we could furnish the whole of it from Canada, "just imagine," to use the eloquent and graphic illustration of the right hon. gentleman, just imagine the possibilities of such a condition of things.

Now, Sir, I come to that clause in this Speech in reference to the Jubilee, in which we are asked to congratulate ourselves —upon the warm appreciation manifested everywhere throughout the mother country in reference to the conduct of Canada in materially reducing the rate of duty upon goods imported from the United Kingdom into the Dominion.

They did not do it, Sir. Not only did they not do it, but there never was a more complete delusion imposed upon any country than that imposed upon the people and press in England in reference to this pretended policy of preferential trade brought forward at the last session of this Parliament. We drew attention to that at the time. There is no doubt that it served a purpose; there is no doubt that almost the whole of the London press and of the provincial press through England caught at the prospect and became wildly enthusiastic in favour of that policy. And why? Why, Sir, as a rule, it was understood that the resolution proposed by the Parliament of Canada was one to prevent any country that did not do as England did, accept the goods of Canada without any duty at all, from enjoying the same advantage. A gentleman wrote a long article in one of the quarterlies, and the whole basis of his argument was that the policy of Canada had been laid down emphatically, that no other country than England could enjoy this advantage, because no country could enjoy it unless she received the goods of Canada upon the same terms that England did. The whole thing was a complete delusion, but it was considered to be a most wonderful advantage to England. Merchants and manufacturers in the United Kingdom, all those who are anxious to sell their goods, were led to believe that Canada was offering a mighty boon to the people of England, without money and without price, that a great reduction was being made in the duties, which would be the means of building up and increasing trade between that country and the Dominion. All this was based on a complete delusion, which was thoroughly exposed in this House last session. But I must say this to hon. gentlemen opposite: all this furore, all this excitement, all the interest created on this subject in the United Kingdom was due to us and not to you. Where would you have been with your preferential tariff if we had not fought you to the death at the polls in 1891, and prevented you carrying out a policy of adopting the tariff of the United States as against England? If you had not been defeated and driven back, if the country had not been rescued and saved from the treasonable attempt to undermine the British institutions of this country as well as her commercial policy, you would not have had it in your power to take off one-eighth of the duty on goods coming in from the United Kingdom. Did I use too strong a term in designating it a treasonable policy to British institutions? What did we hear the other day? Hon. Edward Blake—why he did it I cannot quite understand—travelled through this country, reminding the people that when an attempt was made by the Liberal party to break down what he regarded as British institutions and adopt an American policy in this country, he had abandoned his party and had left their ranks. The Liberals having been defeated at the polls by the Conservative party, the country had been rescued, and the Liberal party had been able to adopt a policy which would enable him to sleep with them once more. I think the right hon. the First Minister will admit that one of the ablest of the premiers who attended the International Conference was the Right Hon. Mr. Reid, Premier of New South Wales. What did Mr. Reid say? Let me read as neat a bit of sarcasm—it consists of only three sentences—as I ever heard. Speaking at a meeting of the Chambers of Commerce, he said:

Might he make a startling announcement? His friend, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, had announced by the Canadian people a reduction of the somewhat heavy duties as a recognition of the principle that bound them together. He honoured him and the Canadian people for that step. If he had come to tell them that one of the most flourishing parts of the Empire—New South Wales—was about to open her ports to British commerce with a tariff fairer than her own, they would hail the announcement with great pleasure. Unfortunately it occurred two years ago. (Cheers and laughter.) If it had only occurred in this memorable year of the Jubilee, he had no doubt that the Premier of New South Wales would have been the fiscal lion of the hour. (Laughter.) But he had the misfortune to achieve his free trade victory in the mother country of Australasia two years ago. (Cheers.)

Canada was about to take off a percentage of the duties on English goods imported into the Dominion, and there was wild excitement, every merchant, manufacturer and artisan thinking he was forthwith to be made rich. Members of this House know the result. The New South Wales Government had removed, not one-eighth, but the whole of the duties from goods coming into that colony from England, and yet their action had never excited a word of commendation or an expression of satisfaction for the benefit conferred.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I regret very much to detain the House at such length, but the subjects brought before the notice of the House by the Speech seem to make it necessary to do so, and after all perhaps it is the most convenient mode to deal with these questions in order to save the time of the House. When you, Mr. Speaker, left the Chair I had come to the proposal of the Government last session in regard to preferential trade, and it will be in the recollection of the House that a very sharp issue was made between the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches and those on this side of the House. We have now reached the point when we are in a position to deal more effectively with those questions than we were then. When the Government proposed, with a great flourish of trumpets, to show their loyalty by establishing a preference in favour of goods imported from the United Kingdom, we joined issue with them, and told them it was impracticable under the measure they proposed to accomplish anything of the kind. The House will recollect that we were met on that occasion by the united phalanx of the Treasury benches, who held that those treaties did not apply. The resolution offered to the House read as follows:—

That when the customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada on terms which, on the whole, are as favourable to Canada as the terms of the Reciprocal Tariff herein referred to, are to the countries to which it may apply, articles which are the growth, produce, or manufacture of such country, when imported direct therefrom, may then be entered for duty, or taken out of warehouse for consumption in Canada, at the reduced rates of duty provided in the Reciprocal Tariff set forth in Schedule "D."

The first point we took in respect to that measure was, that the Government could not pass it, that they could not obtain the assent of the Governor General to it, that he would at once tell them that under his instructions it was impossible for him to pass a measure of that kind. That objection was treated with great contempt by hon. gentlemen opposite. But in the course of a month they grew wiser, and they returned and very quietly proposed the clause which we said would be necessary in order to enable the Governor General to give his sanction to the Bill or to any Act whatever. This clause provided for the introduction of all the countries which under treaty with Great Britain might be found to be entitled to the reduction. Hon. gentlemen opposite, notwithstanding the fact that they submitted that clause to the House and amended their Bill, declared without any hesitation or qualification that this was done as an act of caution, that there was no doubt as to the Government's position, and no hon. gentleman was so loud and pronounced as the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and in referring to that hon. gentleman I desire to say that I learned with pleasure of the honours conferred on him by the Crown and I hope he will long live to enjoy them. That hon. gentleman scouted the idea presented from this side of the House, and he delivered a long argument, which was heralded in some rather important journals in England as an important deliverance on this constitutional question. It was stated as an explanation of the fact that no reply was made to the refutation of that hon. gentleman's argument, that although a young man of some prominence, the hon. member for Halifax had made a reply, it was not necessary to answer it as the Government were anxious to close the debate. I believe the fact is that the argument presented by the hon. member for Halifax was so overwhelming that the Government sought in vain among the legal talent of the opposite side of the House for any one to undertake a reply. I think I am correctly informed when I say that the answer the Government received from their supporters in the legal profession was that the answer of my hon. friend was overwhelming and unanswerable, and that is the true reason why the debate was allowed to close without a reply being attempted. What has been the result? The result has proved, notwithstanding the loud-mouthed affirmations of the Minister of Marine, that there was no foundation for his argument, that it was a mass of sophistry and perverted the historical position of the question, and in fact there was nothing in it. It will be remembered that when the First Minister asked what his view of the question was, he rose and gave it with great confidence. He said the Government had examined all the treaties of the world, every treaty of every country, and had found that England was the only country that would be entitled to preference under that clause, and therefore it would give a complete preference to England. That was the position taken. Hon. members on this side of the House asked what about Belgium. The reply they received was that Belgium was excluded, and the Government were quite certain there was not another country in the world except England that would come within the preferential clause. After two or three days' discussion the Government ascertained that New South Wales would be entitled to it, as its tariff was absolutely lower than that of England; that she could not be excluded, but she was the only exception. We suggested that Holland, Japan and other countries could claim the benefit of the clause, and that it would be impossible to shut them out. What has been the result? Here we have a sheaf of Orders in Council extending from 23rd April to 5th November, containing what? Day after day the scales have fallen from the eyes of hon. gentlemen opposite, and they have learned that all the statements from this side of the House were absolutely correct and could not be controverted; country after country has been admitted and order after order has been passed, and hon. gentlemen opposite find they have only succeeded in throwing the business and trade of this country into inextricable confusion by their absolute inability to deal with a question that ought not to have required the slightest discussion at the hands of any intelligent man who had any knowledge whatever of public affairs. That is the position that these gentlemen are in, and what is the result? Where, I ask hon. gentlemen opposite, is this vaunted preference for England that was heralded far and wide by them? They admit themselves now that it has no existence, and that they have admitted country after country to the preference. In all this, there was no excuse for the Government. They had under their own hands, in the archives, all the data that would enable them to deal with this subject in a business-like manner, and attention to which would have prevented them experiencing all these humiliations they have suffered, and all the confusion into which they have thrown the business of the country. As I pointed out at the time, Canada is a part of the International Customs Union, and in consideration of the money paid by this country, the Government receive from day to day, from the Central Office in Belgium, any alterations which take place in the customs tariffs of those countries which come within the purview of the International Customs Union. The Government have no excuse for the manner in which they acted. The declaration of the right hon. the First Minister that there was no country in the world except England that was entitled, under that resolution, to this preferential tariff, has been proven to be utterly foundationless. This pretended preference for England has proved to be an utter delusion and a snare, and all this furore which was caused in this country and in England as to the preferential tariff being valuable to the mother country, has been demonstrated to be an absolute farce. That is the position in which these hon. gentlemen are. When the Minister of Finance introduced these tariff resolutions to the House, I ventured to say to him: You cannot give this preference to England alone, and his answer to me was: Well, we have done it. With all the arrogance that the most profound ignorance would warrant, the Finance Minister said: You must not tell me, we cannot do it, for we have done it, and to-morrow morning every customs-house within the Dominion of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean will enter British goods at a reduction of one-eighth. I told the hon. gentleman then: You are only humiliating yourself all the more; you will have to admit twenty other countries to this same privilege, and you will be forced to the humiliation of instructing your officers, whom you have now misled, that they will have to refund every cent of duty that all these countries have paid in excess of the duties charged on English goods. That is the predicament of the Government to-day, and one more humiliating it would be impossible to imagine. Read this sheaf of instructions sent out day after day, as the scales fell from their eyes, and you find that they have discovered that twenty-six countries, in addition to England, are entitled to this privilege. This is the result, notwithstanding that the First Minister declared with all confidence that his Government was perfectly satisfied that there was not another country in the world but England which was entitled to the privilege. That is the humiliation which has fallen upon the Government of Canada in connection with this pretended preference which was put upon the Statute-book, and which will stand there as a monument of the utter incapacity of this Government to deal with a question which no intelligent person could possibly be excused for not knowing how to deal with properly. I am not quite sure that it was altogether incapacity, but it is either an evidence of the most crass ignorance, or worse still, it was done with knowledge of the fact, and was an attempt to mislead the House and the country in reference to a most important fiscal question. As the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) is well aware, the Government provided that all these goods from Great Britain must be direct importation. They changed that, and any person who goes through this sheaf of explanations and instructions given to Government officials will find, that they countermanded all these orders and provided that when goods came from Great Britain, whether direct or indirect importations, they must be admitted at the reduced rate. As a result, the most inextricable confusion has been imported into the whole business.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

I am glad to see the Finance Minister in his place, because he has no doubt a vivid recollection that when I ventured in my modest way to suggest, that there was doubt as to the possibility of such a thing as he proposed to do under this resolution, he retorted: We have done it. Well, Sir, you did do it, and what did you do? Why, you placed on the records of this country, evidence of the incapacity of the Finance Minister of Canada to understand the first principles of a fiscal question with which he had undertaken to deal.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I am glad I came in time.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am glad the hon. gentleman did come into the House, because I should not have ventured to say that unless he were present. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) told us last session, that he had given a preference to England, but what does he say now? He sees that he stands face to face with the fact, the startling and astounding fact—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In saying this, I am only quoting the language of one of the most eulogistic papers this Government possesses. I refer to the London "Canadian Gazette," the columns of which are filled with the most fulsome flattery of this Government individually and collectively. This London "Canadian Gazette," the subsidized organ of this Government, on the 16th of September last, heads an article:

The tariff in operation.—A startling result. And it says:

The Canadian preferential tariff has now been in operation for four months, and what is the effect? We published the official figures last week for the year so far as expired, and let us see how the record of British exports to Canada stands for the four months at the lower tariff. The result is at first sight a startling one.

These are the words to which the hon. gentleman took exception, believing that they were mine; but they did not originate with me. They are taken from their own organ as a condemnation and exposure of what was done. They state that there has been a decline, and then they go on to give the amount of the decline month by month for May, June, July and August, totalling £171,565 sterling less than for the same period of the previous year. And yet this was the mighty boon given by the preferential tariff, which was to make everybody in England rich, and which caused such a wild fervour as to what this country was doing.

This is, we say, startling. It is certainly not what we had been led to expect.

And what was the result? The year closed with a decrease of $3,567,554 of goods imported from England as compared with the previous year. That is the gigantic preference that was given to England. I might draw attention to another fact which is rather striking in view of the very bold, high tone taken by the Government in this House as to how they were going to treat the United States of America. They had met with a repulse there, and they came back here bursting with indignation, and threatened in tones of thunder on these benches what they were going to do to that country. They were going to treat every country as it treated Canada. Well, Sir, England treated this country with open arms, admitting everything that we could send to her without let or hindrance. She has taken millions more this year, without a farthing of duty, than she took in the previous year, although that was the greatest year for the exports of this country to the United Kingdom in the history of the country. And, Sir, what is the position of the United States? Why, Sir, while you have a decrease in our imports from England of over $3,500,000, you have an increase of over $3,000,000 in the imports from the United States, the country which you were going to teach to be careful how she offended this Government. Well, Sir, the hon. Finance Minister went down to Sheffield, where he made a speech and also gave an interview; and what did he say? Did he say that they had done it? No; he said they had not done it at all. He said:

In this way, not by any act of ours, but by the effect of these Imperial treaties, the preferential tariff as between England and the continental nations, came to an end. For the present, therefore, there is no preferential tariff in Canada for British goods.

That is the humiliating position the hon. gentleman was obliged to take there. But he gave them a little comfort at the same time, and I trust, for the honour of Canada and for the honour of the hon. gentleman himself, that his words will be made good. What did he say? Why, Sir, he said that when the treaties came to an end, then Canada would give Great Britain the preferential tariff—that as soon as the denunciation of the treaties occurred and took effect, on the first day of August next, the result would be that Canada would honourably carry out her proposal to give a preference to Great Britain. Am I correct in saying that the hon. gentleman in England led the British public to believe that would be the case—that when the denunciation of those treaties took place, the tariff of this country would give this preference to England?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend is quite safe in assuming that any statements I made to the British public were entirely correct.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. May I read something for the information of the hon. gentleman?—because I think he got a hint from an hon. gentleman not a hundred miles away from him to be very careful what he said; and it is evident that the advice was not lost upon him. He said:

After the first of August, 1898, the Belgian and German treaties will come to an end, and thus all obstacles to preferential arrangements between England and her colonies will disappear. Then the terms of the preferential tariff will apply to the products of Great Britain, and to such of her colonies as are willing to adopt a liberal trade policy towards Canada.

These were the words of the hon. gentleman, and as he says that what he said in England may be relied on with the utmost confidence—

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Or in Canada.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not think in Canada, because in Canada he said they had done it, and now he says they have not done it.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If my hon. friend quoted me fairly, he would find that I said that we had done it, but by the action of the Imperial authorities, not by any action of ours, it for the moment came to an end.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. But the hon. gentleman forgets that in the position he occupies he ought to have known then, as he knew afterwards—and if he did not know it, I do not know any one else, unless it was the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), who was equally oblivious to the fact—that those treaties were binding. The hon. gentleman said :

If there were no treaties to interfere with us there would be to-day one-eighth off, and on the first of July next there would be another one-eighth off ; but the treaties will check us until the first of August, on which date the two-eighths reduction will have come into operation.

The hon. gentleman knows that it cannot come into operation under his clause even when the treaties are terminated, for he has been told so by the highest authority. The Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain has told the Premier, and he has laid the statement on the Table of the House of Commons, that under that clause or any similar clause, no preference can be given to the United Kingdom, and he has explained why. Because, he says, of a clause in all the most-favoured-nation treaties which England has in the world—and Canada, he says, is bound by many of these treaties: and they cannot be denounced, because there is no period specified for their denunciation. A treaty which has no time specified for its denunciation can only be terminated by war—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Or by common consent. The Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, has explained to the right hon. the First Minister that under no such clause as that can any preference be given to England—why? Because the most-favoured-nation treaties declare that whatever is given by one country to another must be given to every country which has most-favoured-nation treatment. Mr. Chamberlain explained this so plainly that a child of ten years old could understand it. In fact, I was ashamed, almost, when I read the explanation to see the minuteness which he appeared to think necessary in order to make it perfectly plain. He has maintained that Canada cannot give this preference by any such clause as has been put on the Statute-book, which provides that any country which has as low a tariff as the minimum tariff of Canada is entitled to come in, but that Canada must pass an Act giving that privilege to the goods of Great Britain, nominating and giving it to nobody else. Is the hon. gentleman prepared to do that?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Had not my hon. friend better wait for the budget?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, I have the answer now. I have the hon. gentleman here in black and white. I have here his own declaration that that is what they intended by it; and as that is the only means by which they can do it, I take it for granted that they will do it.

But there is a very serious difficulty in my hon. friend's way which he has probably not thought of, and of which, in justice to him, I ought to remind him. A very important interview took place recently, on a very interesting occasion in London, between the right hon. the First Minister and the Cobden Club. On that occasion my hon. friend was decorated with this medal which he seems to value more than the keeping of good faith with the people of Canada, and these are the terms on which that medal was given. Lord Farrer, the most bitter foe of preferential trade that can be found within the British Empire, a most able foe, and one who is so determined a free trader that he denounces every form of reciprocity as one of the most insidious and improper forms of protection, made the speech of presentation, and these are the terms on which my right hon. friend was decorated with the medal :

There is a party amongst us who would willingly discriminate against German and Belgian goods, and who look upon the denunciation of the German and Belgian treaties as a step towards what they have been pleased to call the commercial federation of the Empire—a system under which commercial union in the different parts of the Empire will be fostered by laws excluding or discouraging foreign goods. If this were to be the consequence of what you have done, I need hardly say that we of the Cobden Club would not have been here.

This language is very significant. Lord Farrer went on to say :

It is because we believe that your efforts are founded on the opposite principle, and will be followed by opposite results, that we, followers of Adam Smith and of Peel, of Bright and of Cobden, are here to congratulate and to thank you. You do not ask us to abate one jot of our free trade principles.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Let my hon. friend listen to what follows and see whether he will endorse that statement :—

You ask for no preferential treatment—

I do not hear my hon. friend say "hear, hear" to that, and I am very glad of it, because it proves the accuracy of the "Globe's" statement that every man in Canada, of every class and party, is in favour of preferential trade. Lord Farrer continued :

You ask for no preferential treatment, you make yourselves as large a step in the direction of free trade as your present circumstances will permit, and you desire to treat the rest of the world as you are now treating us.

What does my right hon. friend think of that? Does he not see at once that the medal which decorates the right hon. leader of the Government and which he seems to value so highly, is a barrier—complete barrier, so far as he is concerned—to the carrying out of the pledge he gave the people of Sheffield. That pledge was that Canada would honourably carry out—and I trust that the promise will be redeemed even if this medal would have to be surrendered—the preference he had avowed on the floor of Parliament and in face of the world that he was desirous of giving to England, and England alone, for the First Minister declared that England was the only country that was going to benefit from the preferential treatment. I say, Mr. Speaker, that Canada would be humiliated to the last degree if, under these circumstances, we would hesitate, when these treaties are denounced, in carrying out the pledge given by the Minister of Finance to pass an Act, under which that preference could be given to England and England alone. As I have said before, it is a very serious matter for the right hon. the First Minister. The medal must go. My right hon. friend, instead of drawing back on that occasion and explaining that there had been a misapprehension, when these vital terms, so far as the interests of Canada are concerned, were stated to him, spoke as follows:—

Canada has adopted freedom of trade, I hope and believe, as her guiding star. Other countries may follow, and probably we may expect that all countries issued from England will one after another follow her example. I was a free trader before I came to England, I am still more a free trader after seeing what free trade has done in England.

Nothing could be more conclusive. The contract was sealed and signed. The president delivered the medal and pinned it to the breast of my right hon. friend, and therefore it is impossible that any step can be taken by him for preferential trade with Great Britain except on terms which will compel him in honour to return that medal. Having received it under false pretenses, he is obliged in honour to return it, and the sooner he does so, the better, in my opinion, it will be for him. I believe it is made of gold, but whatever the metal may be of which it is composed, that hon. gentleman will find that that medal will be a millstone around his neck and will drag him down to destruction in the presence of the free and enlightened electorate, if he continues to wear it on the terms on which he has received it. I cannot conceive a more unfortunate position for Canada to occupy than that of having the right hon. gentleman, after all this shower of decorations, turn around and say: Well, we did not intend it after all. We simply humbugged you and gained our object in the meantime, but have no intention of carrying out what we proposed.

Now, I have drawn the attention of the House to what this preferential trade amounted to last year. There was the striking fact that instead of having done anything for England, this mighty boom, for the giving of which the hon. gentleman was held up as a saviour of his country, when on the other side of the Atlantic, had the effect of reducing the exports of Great Britain to Canada to the lowest point they have reached since confederation. Suppose the people of England had known that at the end of the year, British exports to Canada would have been reduced by three and a half million dollars, they could have concluded that no people would have been so insulted and misled by the statements of any public man. Here is a striking article that came from London on the 21st of September, when the people over there began to get their eyes opened and to find out that their trade was decreasing instead of increasing. The able and diligent secretary of the London Chamber of Commerce issued a circular in which he said:

The expectations of the free traders have undoubtedly been disappointed by the extension, to practically all countries except the United States, of what was supposed to be an exclusive British preference.

The English people thought, in the innocence of their souls, that when the First Minister of Canada stood up in Parliament and declared that under that clause no country except Great Britain could enjoy the benefit of it his statement was correct, but they found out how little dependence could be put on it.

This has tended to check the expected diversion into purely British channels of trade now done through Britain with France, Germany, etc.

Another retarding influence is the absence of exact official information as to the intentions of Canada after August next. Will the preference then be exclusively British?

They had not then seen, I suppose, the speech of my hon. friend at Sheffield.

The great difficulty is the lack of exact official information as to the intentions of Canada.

That is the question which the hon. gentleman has got to answer, and the answer to that question involves the character of the Government of Canada, it involves the confidence of the British people in the word of a Canadian Minister.

I pass on now to the denunciation of the treaties. On the other side of the Atlantic the right hon. the First Minister held up this preference everywhere as a mighty boon. He told the people there of the population of Canada, of its enormous resources, of its great wealth, and he stated how delighted the people of Canada were, without any quid pro quo, refusing to ask anything in return, in pure love and affection, to give this mighty boon to Great Britain. The hon. gentleman has the most remarkable faculty of any public man I ever knew for never making any two speeches alike on any public question.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I know some who have quite a different quality.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Quite so, and I would rather be known to the end of time as one who repeated the same sentiments than to be fairly charged with never making two speeches alike, and never maintaining a principle a second time, but always making every speech a contradiction of a previous one. I have watched the hon. gentleman's career, and have studied his public speeches with the greatest care and attention. I ask any hon. gentleman on either side of the House to name a single principle, a single public question, upon which the right hon. gentleman has affirmed anything without afterwards turning his back upon that position and affirming exactly the opposite. In my judgment, this is a fatal characteristic. If there is one thing more than another of vital importance to the country it is that there should be faith in the statements of public men. I charge the right hon. gentleman here and now with having violated every principle he ever professed. I know not a single exception, I am open to conviction, and if it can be shown that I am wrong upon a single point and if the hon. gentleman can name a single issue upon which he has not repudiated his own utterances, I stand ready to tender him an apology. On the other hand, I can name a score of the most important public questions on which he has at one time advanced one opinion and at another time the very contrary, just as I have proved that he did with regard to the question of preferential trade. In England he told them that this preference was a great boon. I wonder if the hon. gentleman does not think that the intelligent people of England will call to mind the old maxim "Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes." Does he not think that they will begin to wonder how this was paraded as such a boon to them when they find that it has been followed by the reduction of their trade with this country of three and a half millions below the worst year they ever experienced before? But the hon. gentleman again, in that wonderful acrobatic style of which he is past master, vaults to the other side on his appearance in Canada. In England this was a mighty boon given to them, but he no sooner reaches Montreal or Toronto than he presents it in an entirely different aspect as a great sacrifice that England was asked to make for Canada, that they had to sacrifice 60 to 40 per cent in order to denounce the treaties. And thus on the same instrument and with the same theme he plays an entirely different tune on this side of the Atlantic from that he played on the other. I do not think that that style of policy will last very long. It may do once, but I do not think that you can repeat it with the intelligent English people; and I think that great humiliation is in store for Canada when the English people learn, as they are learning by bitter experience, that they have been completely deluded, and that, notwithstanding all the furore, this preferential trade with Canada which was to have been such a boon was not merely a myth, but the very reverse of an advantage.

Now, not to show any undue partiality, I desire to say a few words to my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies). I dare say that hon. gentlemen opposite remember that there was a great convention of the Liberal party held in this city in 1893. They then settled what was to be the policy of the party. Many policies had been discussed and promulgated through the country, but now they came together and made a policy or pretended to do so. Then the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries was sent as a missionary to the maritime provinces to explain what the change in policy was. He told them that there had been a good deal of misunderstanding with this unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, but this was all settled, and the party had agreed upon their policy for the future—it was to be a pure free trade policy. Speaking in 1893, he said:

Well, gentlemen, I say no more. Whatever doubts or differences there may have been about our trade policy in times past, there is none now. Our platform is clear and definite. To-day the people stand face to face with such an issue, and the next contest is to be won between free trade and protection.

He wanted to show what free trade was. He did not mean absolute free trade—nobody supposed that—but a revenue tariff. He said:

A 17½ or 20 per cent tariff was high enough to give protection to the manufacturer. If it were not, the manufacturer should go down.

Why did he allow a manufacturer, the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram) to make a 30 per cent tariff? I am glad he did so, as I think it was in the interest of Canada. But the hon. gentleman when he does that, must not claim to be a free trader. But what does the hon. gentleman suppose is the rate of duty exacted by the Government of Canada upon English goods under this preferential policy during this year? It is no less than 30.69 per cent. The hon. gentleman declared that a 17½ per cent tariff was enough, but upon the goods brought from England the duty charged was over 30 per cent.

My hon. friend and I had a little controversy on the question of discrimination, and I dare say that he remembers it. I thought then that he was serious. When this great Liberal Convention made a declaration to the world that the tariff of Canada discriminated against Great Britain, I thought the hon. gentleman was really serious. But I said then it was not true, and I hold that opinion still. I not only said it, but I proved, as I think, to the hon. gentleman when he discussed this question, that he was entirely wrong, and that he had based his impressions as to discrimination upon erroneous data which examination showed to be unfounded. But that did not cure him. The hon. gentleman, in London, committed himself to the same declaration where he said :

In 1895, the last year to which he had access to the tables, Great Britain took $60,000,000 worth of Canadian products, while the United States took only $40,000,000. Canada took from the United States $60,000,000 worth of her produce, and only $30,000,000 worth from the mother country. When the Liberal party came into power in Canada—

Mark this, Mr. Speaker.

—they thought something should be done to reverse these figures, this state of affairs. If it had been brought about by natural causes, those causes might well have been left to work out their own results ; but when they saw that they were produced by artificial means, they determined that all the obstacles in the way of development of trade between Canada and the mother country should be removed.

What does the hon. gentleman say to that now ? Was that sound or was it unsound ? Was that all a delusion ?—as I told him a year ago it was a delusion. If that is good argument, then the Liberal party having brought about a change in those figures, the discrimination, if discrimination there has been, has been increased by this Government, because the figures show that the very reverse of what he promised in England has taken place. Now, I call the hon. gentleman's attention to that, because I trust it will make him a little more careful when dealing with subjects of this kind that really require some attention.

I now come to notice another branch of the subject, and that is a declaration made by the First Minister at the Board of Trade meeting in Montreal. I wish to invite the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to this subject also ; and I take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, of telling that hon. gentleman how glad I am to find that he has reached that higher stage in the order to which he and I have the honour to belong, and also express the hope that the hon. gentleman may long live to wear the Grand Cross of St. Michael and St. George with all the dignity which is so natural to him. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, on a recent occasion, made a speech which was in most remarkable contrast to the speeches that hon. gentleman has been in the habit of delivering for the past twenty years.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I am afraid you have not read all my speeches.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I never lose an opportunity of enjoying a thing of that kind. The hon. gentleman absolutely was gracious enough, and I thank him for it from the bottom of my heart, to say, at a famous gathering in Toronto on a recent occasion, that Providence had had some little share in the blessings that have attended the country during the present regime, and he referred to it as a happy coincidence. I have no hesitation in saying to the hon. gentleman that I would prefer to see them sit on that side of the House till the last hour of my life, than to witness any check in that prosperity and progress which every man in Canada knows are vital to the advancement of our country. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman made a statement, the accuracy of which from such a distinguished source, as he knows, will become historical, and he will admit with me that when an error is made in statements that will be handed down to future generations, it is important that the error should be corrected. He is reported to have said :

Among the many pleasing incidents that had attended the celebration of Her Majesty's Jubilee last summer, not the least pleasing was the manifest recognition of the right of Canada to precedence among all British Colonies, so amply shown by the magnificent reception accorded to Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

I say to the hon. gentleman that that is not true. I tell the hon. gentleman that no person witnessed with greater pride and pleasure than myself, the position occupied by the right hon. gentleman who represented Canada on that occasion. But that he had any precedence that Canada has not enjoyed for many long years, I deny. I say that Sir Alexander Galt, who represented Canada as High Commissioner in the city of London, was accorded by the Crown, by the Mansion House on every great social and festive occasion, the first position as belonging to the premier colony of the Empire. When Sir Alexander Galt was appointed High Commissioner for Canada, he was at once unanimously elected by all the representatives of the self-governing colonies in London, to be their chairman. When I had the honour of succeeding Sir Alexander Galt I received the same precedence at the hands of the Crown, I was unanimously elected to the same position, and during my twelve years, more or less, of residence in the city of London, no person was ever sustained in a more loyal, a more enthusiastic, a more kindly manner than I was as the representative of Canada, the head of the self-governing colonies of the Empire. Under these circumstances I say that it is not just to attempt to change an historical fact, and to make it appear that any change took place in that regard. As I said before, the right hon. gentleman who represented Canada on that occasion naturally took the place that has long since been assigned to Canada as the first colony in the Empire.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. More than a colony.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is more than a colony, and from the time that she became more than a colony down to this hour, without any question on the part of any other portion of the British Empire, the first rank and position have been accorded to whoever represented her on every occasion. I say that was the position Sir Alexander Galt occupied, that was the position that I had the honour to occupy, and that is the position occupied by Lord Strathcona and Mount Royal to-day, whether at the Mansion House, or at any of the great Guilds or on any royal function—whatever it be, he takes his place as the representative of Canada at the head of all others. Although this is not a matter of great import, I still feel bound to put my hon. friend right on that point.

The First Minister addressed a banquet at Montreal on December 17th, and I find some reason to criticise what he said on that occasion. He spoke as follows:—

If I may be privileged on this occasion to say one word of my own personal self, I would say that for many and many years it has been my hope that I would not close my eyes, that I would not sink into the grave, before I had seen Canada lifted up to the state of a nation. (Cheers.) Well, I may now die, for this day I have seen.

No person would regret more than I that any such fate should befall the right hon. gentleman, for we shall always have the most sanguine hope that the Liberal-Conservative party will come into power when an appeal is made to the people, provided the right hon. gentleman continues to lead the Government. He further said:

I was in Paris, in the land of my own ancestors, when the telegraph wires flashed the news that England had denounced the treaties which she had for twenty years and more with Germany and Belgium. What was Canada before that day? On the continent of Europe what was it—in France, in Germany, and everywhere else? Simply a name—simply a blotch on the map, and nothing more.

Did any person ever read such transcendent nonsense—that Canada, until the denunciation of the German and Belgium treaties, was a blotch on the map and nothing more. I do not know what stage of the dinner had been reached when the hon. gentleman delivered his speech, but it must have been late. Again, he said:

But when the day came that, at the instance of Canada, England, a great nation, denounced her treaties with—

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend says "hear, hear." I will prove to him that the statement is not true, and that it was not done at the instance of Canada. He has gone off at half-cock. Again:

—Germany and Belgium, and signified to the German Zollverein and to Belgium that twelve months hence those treaties would cease, on that day I felt a proud citizen, because on that day my dreams were realized, and Canada became a factor among the nations of the earth.

The hon. gentleman must be a veritable Rip Van Winkle; he must have been asleep during the last twenty years if these are the opinions he holds as to the position Canada occupies. The right hon. gentleman stated on another occasion that the reason why Canada was a nation was because she was free. Would freedom make a nation? Are the Manxmen a nation? They are tolerably free. Does the hon. gentleman really mean to say that freedom makes a nation? It is not freedom. Freedom is very well for a nation, but it is only a constituent part. What more? Did confederation do nothing to make a nation of Canada? Why were the hon. gentleman's lips sealed in face of the fact acknowledged by the civilized world that the confederation of the British North American provinces was one of the most important events that ever transpired? Why had he no word to say in favour of confederation? Was it because it owed nothing to him? Was it because the party to which he belonged, the Rouge party of Lower Canada, fought confederation to the death, and had they been able to maintain their views and sentiments, there would have been no Canadian confederation to-day and no nation for the hon. gentleman to talk about? It was to that great, powerful, brave, determined and patriotic French Canadian, Sir George Etienne Cartier, probably above all others, that we owe confederation. Had Sir George Cartier not had the courage and patriotism not only to take up that measure but to fight it through in spite of all the opposition that the party to which the right hon. gentleman belongs could give him, confederation would not have become an established fact. Instead of recognizing the services of the man who had done more to make Canada a nation than perhaps any other man in British North America, they never ceased to persecute him until they hounded him into an untimely grave. That was the recognition given to the man to whom the national position of Canada to-day is due. Had the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway nothing to do in making a nation of Canada? When I went to Washington at the invitation of that eminent and eloquent American, Mr. Bayard, a gentleman who recently occupied the position of ambassador from the United States to England, I was the Secretary of State, he met me and taking me by the hand, said: "Sir Charles Tupper, the confederation of Canada and the construction of a great inter-oceanic line of railway from the Atlantic to the Pacific, has made Canada a nation and we might as well recognize the fact." Those measures which statesmen of the first rank in England treat as of the most vital importance to the mother country, never pass the lips of the right hon. gentleman, I believe, from the day he set his foot on the shores of Great Britain and France down to the time he left. What about the Treaty of Washington? Had we no national status when the Imperial Government sent as one of the joint High Commissioners to Washington Sir John Macdonald to deal with the fisheries question and to protect Canadian interests. And when it was provided that that treaty, which settled all those great questions between the United States and Great Britain at that time, could not come into effect except by the Parliament of Canada giving its ratification thereto, was there no national significance in that arrangement? The right hon. gentleman knows there was. I need not refer to the occasion on which I had the honour, as one of Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries, nominated by Canada, but representing Great Britain as fully as did the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain to visit Washington, where after three months we succeeded in negotiating a treaty that received the unanimous consent of the Parliament of Canada and was only defeated by a party vote in the Senate of the United States, but which treaty and the modus vivendi established under it had been the means of settling all questions touching the Atlantic fisheries in a satisfactory manner and so as to remove all friction. Had Canada no nationality when Her Majesty's Government, for the first time in the history of a colony in the Empire, decided to take a Canadian, a person nominated by Canada, and appoint him to the position of plenipotentiary representing Her Majesty's Government and charge him with the duty of negotiating a treaty between France and Canada? Was there no national characteristic in that act? The right hon. gentleman talked a good deal in Paris regarding improved trade relations, but I do not think he mentioned the fact that the Government which preceded the present Administration had negotiated with the present foreign Minister of Finance, M. Hanotaux, a brilliant and able statesman, commanding confidence not only in his own country but in other countries, and that a treaty was negotiated between that statesman and myself. I think I know why the right hon. gentleman did not refer to that treaty: it was because on that question, as on every other, so far as I am aware, he has been on both sides. He voted against it, and when his following was going the other way he changed his vote and supported it. That was Talleyrand's idea of diplomacy. What does the right hon. gentleman (Sir

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Wilfrid Laurier) say to the position I occupied in Paris in 1893, when for the first time in the history of Canada, or in the history of any part of the British Empire outside the British Islands, a representative of Canada took his seat at a great International Conference on equal terms with the representatives of Russia and of Germany, and the representatives of the other twenty-four powers who joined in that conference? Was that, or was it not, a recognition of the national position of Canada? It was; and the hon. gentleman knows that compared with that, the denunciation of the Belgium and German treaties is utterly insignificant. Thus, at Brussels, at St. Petersburg, at Vienna, and in London, Canada was represented by a person named by the Government of Canada, and took his place on equal terms with the other representatives of other nations. What does the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) say to the international arbitration on the Behring Sea question in Paris, when on the nomination of the Government of Canada, Her Majesty's Government selected a Canadian to act as agent of the Imperial Government, and selected the late Sir John Thompson to sit alongside Judge Hannen as a representative of the British Government. Was not that a great international function? Were we a mere blotch on the map then? The hon. gentleman could not dare to have intimated any such thing to the statesmen whom he met in Paris, because they knew differently. It is a libel upon the fair name of Canada and the position she occupies to make such a bombastic speech as the Premier did in Montreal, wherein he said: We were a blotch on the map. It appears to the hon. gentleman that it was simply the denunciation of the treaties with Belgium and Germany that made Canada a nation. But the hon. gentleman must have forgotten a speech he made a few weeks before his visit to Montreal. Let me read it to see if he really did think that Canada was a mere blotch on the map. This speech was made on the 19th of June, and as the treaties were not denounced until the 30th of July, therefore Canada was still a blotch on the map. Sitting alongside of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales at the Imperial Institute did the right hon. gentleman speak about Canada as he did at Montreal? Oh, no; he said then:

Sir, the colonies were born to become nations. In my own country, and perhaps also in England, it has been observed that Canada has a population which in some instances exceeds, in many other instances rivals the population of independent nations, and it has been said that perhaps the time might come when Canada might become a nation in itself. My answer to that is simply this:

You can imagine, Sir, and I can imagine, and I imagine with pride, the manner in which my right hon. friend would draw himself up to his full height as he gave utterance to this magnificent sentence :

My answer to that simply is : Canada is a nation.

It was a blotch on the map then, but yet the hon. gentleman, under the warming influence of the Imperial Institute dinner, thought that it was really a nation. He continued :

Although Canada acknowledges the suzerainty of the sovereign power, I am here to say that independence would give us no more rights than we have at the present day.

Put that alongside of the speech at Montreal, in which he declared that Canada was a blotch on the map until the treaties were denounced, and I think the right hon. gentleman will find that he will have to curb his eloquence, and allow his judgment to control it a little more. I ventured to criticise rather strongly the statement that these treaties were denounced at the instance of Canada. The hon. gentleman is a splendid opportunist ; he never loses his chance, he avails himself of every opening. He happened to be in Paris when the Belgium and German treaties were denounced, and if you read his pathetic speech on that occasion to the people of Paris, you will find that he said that he had accomplished the denunciation of the treaty—he did not say anything about Belgium—with Germany. And then, when the right hon. gentleman went a little further, and—master of that acting, which I think must be sincere, because I can hardly imagine any one doing it so perfectly in insincerity—when he pointed out with choked utterance and tears streaming from his eyes, how he had stood before the monument at Strasbourg ; then, although he did not say it, he left it to be inferred that he had the pleasure of avenging that blow on Germany by the denunciation of the treaty. At Halifax, having seen my criticism, the right hon. gentleman said :

Sir Charles Tupper was quite right in saying : “I did not get the treaties denounced ; it was Mr. Fielding.”

I beg pardon of the Finance Minister for naming him, but this is a case which really requires it. The Premier there stated it was entirely due to Mr. Fielding. He explained to the Halifax audience :

But when Mr. Fielding came with his tariff and gave a preference to British goods, then, Sir, the British nation, finding that we were making the sacrifices ourselves, and doing it without asking any reward, generously came forward and granted what had been heretofore refused. This credit, I say, is due altogether to my friend, Mr. Fielding.

Now, we have it at last, that in the person of the distinguished Finance Minister of Canada, we see the man who was in at the death, the man who succeeded in the denunciation of the German and Belgian treaties. But, Sir, that is not true.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, I will put my hon. friend the Finance Minister on the stand to prove that there is not a word of truth in it. Some people may imagine that when treaties are denounced, it is not an important matter to know who denounced them. But in my mind, it is important, and for this reason : I say that Canada obtained the support, as she has been in the habit of obtaining for the last dozen of years—I speak from personal experience—and the enthusiastic and active co-operation of every representative of the colonies in Great Britain. I say I would be an ingrate if, after Canada had enjoyed again and again at my instance the co-operation, and the successful co-operation—

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What does the hon. gentleman wish to call attention to ? Does the hon. gentleman think that, if one is dealing with a question in which he has been personally interested, there is anything objectionable in stating the fact ? I think not. At all events, it appears to me scarcely seemly to make an interruption of that kind. I say that at my instance, again and again, on occasions of the greatest importance to Canada, I invited every representative of a British colony to meet at my office, where I put before them the measures which I wished them to support, and obtained for those measures their hearty support and co-operation ; and we went in a body to the Colonial Office, or to the office of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or to whichever office the question to be dealt with appertained ; and I say that I would be an ingrate if, after having secured the combined influence of all the representatives of the colonies, given by them most heartily and fully, I threw them aside when I ceased to need them any longer. I say nothing would be more unseemly than for any person to put forward on behalf of Canada the claim that this thing was done by or at the instance of Canada alone, which, as I have said before, is not true ; and I now give the proof of the hon. Minister of Finance of what I say. He was speaking at the Cutlers' feast down in Sheffield, in the presence of gentlemen who would have resented it if any attempt had been made to claim for Canada the exclusive credit of the denunciation of those treaties ; and this is what he said :

In conclusion, I have to say that the action of Her Majesty's Government, at the request of the Colonial Premiers—influenced possibly by the action of Canada—the action of Her Majesty's Government in denouncing those treaties, which seemed to be a barrier between the mother country and the colonies, is one which deserves and receives the profound gratitude of the people of Canada.

I endorse every word of this, which was uttered in good taste ; and it was infinitely more to the interest of Canada that a statement of that kind should be made and that credit should be given where credit was due, than that anybody should attempt to grasp the whole credit for Canada. But I have a higher authority than the Minister of Finance. I have the statement made on the floor of the House of Commons by the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, who ought to know, as it was he who obtained the denunciation of the treaties. He narrates the facts, and there they stand on record to give the most emphatic and complete contradiction to every one of those statements which the hon. gentleman has put forward here, there, and everywhere, that Canada has done this thing. What does she say?

The Premiers of the self-governing colonies unanimously and earnestly recommend the denunciation at the earliest convenient time of any treaty now hampering the commercial relations between Great Britain and her colonies. This was the unanimous wish of all the self-governing colonies, and it was accompanied by a most important and significant resolution, which was this: "That, in the hope of improving the trade relations between the mother country and her colonies, the Premiers present undertake to confer with their colleagues with a view to seeing whether such a result would be properly secured by preference given by the colonies to the products of Great Britain." On receipt of these resolutions the Government decided to withdraw their adherence to the treaties.

I call attention to this statement, and it is an important one, because it is only justice to every man who had a part in a measure so important to this country and all the other colonies, that it ought to be recognized; and I do not think it will be necessary very soon to say anything more on that subject. But, as I said before, the hon. gentleman never appears to be able to maintain any single principle for any length of time. On the question of Imperial Federation, what did he say? At the St. Jean Baptiste Society here, on November 7, 1891, he said:

There are people in my country who say that an imperial federation, that is, a federation between England and her colonies, would be the best alternative for Canada. As far as the Monroe doctrine is applicable to Canada, I am in favour of the Monroe doctrine. I do not want any European interference in our affairs, and it would be suicidal on the part of Canada to engage herself in a federation that would force us to take part in all the wars that Great Britain, on account of her position, is obliged to undertake in all parts of the world. I consider that this fact alone suffices to turn the Dominion from any such idea.

On a very important public question, the question of a closer combination and federation between the mother country and this country, these were the views put on record by the hon. gentleman in a formal speech to people who were hanging on his words and treasuring them up as jewels beyond all price. Well, Sir, what did the same hon. gentleman say in England on the same question? I will not refer to Mr. Goldwin Smith's insinuation, that the social environments of colonists across the water are apt to turn their heads sometimes; but I want to know what the hon. gentleman has to say to the statement he made to the St. Jean Baptiste Society, and the following statement which he made before the London Chamber of Commerce—I think, at the Hotel Metropole. The hon. gentleman will, no doubt, remember it, because he will remember the enthusiastic cheers which greeted his every utterance from the time he rose to his feet until the time he sat down. The hon. gentleman said:

At no distant date it was manifest to all that the parting of the ways would be reached by England and her colonies, and when the parting of the ways should have been reached the problem would be whether the colonies would be more closely united with the mother land or whether their relations should cease altogether. The colonies had a national pride, and no tie and no bond would be permanent in the colonies until it gave to its pride the greatest possible expression.

What did the hon. gentleman mean by that? Is that what he meant when he was talking to this St. Jean Baptiste Society?

In Canada they had unbounded faith in their own country. When she had reached the full development of her manhood nothing would satisfy but Imperial representation. He knew that this question was not free from difficulties, but it was the part of strong men to undertake difficulties.

Well, Sir, I dare say the House remembers the story of the man in days when people used to prepare a little for the bon-mots which they used at dinner parties. He said to a friend: "I am going to say a clever thing to-night." "What is that," asked his friend. "That I cannot tell you," he said; "but when there is a little lull in the conversation, just say: 'Samson was a strong man,' and see what will happen." At the dinner party his very obliging friend waited till there was a lull in the conversation, and from a seat at the end of the table he called out, "Samson was a strong man," but the other did not pay any attention. He called it out in a louder tone, and then his friend looked up and said: "No doubt he was, but you must be a deuced sight stronger to be able to drag him in here without either rhyme or reason." It will require a veritable Samson to accomplish what the hon. gentleman says. Does not the hon. gentleman know that the subject of colonial representation in the British Parliament has been discussed for years until at length it has ceased to be the subject of discussion, because every one who has examined it knows right well that the difficulties in the way are such as to render colonial representation in the Imperial Parliament absolutely impracticable. The hon. gentleman was not there in his individual capacity but as representing Canada. Where did he get the mandate to say to the people of England that Canada is prepared for a Parliamentary federation of the Empire—that she is prepared for Imperial confederation? What did the hon. gentleman mean? I know that he attempted to qualify his statement on another occasion by saying that of course such representation must not involve the giving up of any part of our autonomy. But my right hon. friend will excuse me when I say that that is absolute nonsense and absolute contradiction of terms. There can be no representation in the Parliament of Greater Britain by the colonies except such a confederation is formed as exists in Canada to-day. And then all these great questions that now devolve for settlement on the Federal Parliament of Canada would necessarily devolve upon that Imperial confederation; and the people of Canada, before they can become a party to an Imperial Parliament, embracing the colonies, held at St. Stephens, four thousand miles away from where we are now sitting, must come to the conclusion that the Dominion Parliament will occupy, as regards the Imperial Parliament, the position that Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island occupy in relation to this Parliament. Is there a man with a head on his shoulders within the domain of Canada who would entertain such a proposition for a single moment, even if practical? But it is utterly impracticable, and when the hon. gentleman declared a policy in direct opposition to the language he used when speaking on the same subject in Canada, he showed that he entirely forgot himself in the midst of the Jubilee celebration. The hon. gentleman brought this subject of Imperial federation up again and again. He regretted that he could not hope to live to see its fruition, but that he hoped some other French Canadian would live to teach freedom to this Parliament of Greater Britain in days after he was gone. It appears to me that the hon. gentleman entirely forgot himself. I am happy to say that I am very near the conclusions of these criticisms.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have no doubt that it is almost as unpleasant to hon. gentlemen opposite to listen as it is for me to speak, but, Mr. Speaker, I have a duty to perform, and when a gentleman, who has been clothed with the great power and responsibility of representing this country in England, did not discharge that duty as he should have done, I should fail in the performance of my duty if I did not rise to comment on his extraordinary course. Here is another case in point of the same change of front, to which I have felt it my bounden duty to call the hon. gentleman's attention so many times. He said, at the same meeting of the St. Jean Baptiste Society, held on 7th November, 1891—not so long ago:

It has also been said that we should establish a line of steamers between England and her possessions, by virtue of which trade could be cultivated between Canada and the British Empire to the exclusion of the rest of the world. I have only to say, with regard to such an idea, that it is absolutely absurd.

Those were the right hon. gentleman's views on the fast line.

For my part, I prefer the Yankee dollar to the British shilling, especially when the dollar is so near and the shilling is so far away.

Put that speech of the hon. gentleman alongside the brilliant and eloquent eulogy of the fast line service which he gave the other day in Toronto, and you will see, Mr. Speaker, that I am not beyond the mark when I say that I have searched the records in vain to find the hon. gentleman speaking twice on the same subject without speaking each time in a different voice. That change of face policy, no matter in what direction the face is turned, is a dangerous one. The man who is capable of holding to a policy, who, having carefully examined it, boldly avows it and stands by it, is the only man who can reasonably expect that an intelligent people will long continue to follow him. I am doing, I trust, a great service to my right hon. friend when I call his attention to the fact that the record he has so far made is one that renders it absolutely impossible for any intelligent man to place the slightest confidence in anything he may say at any time and at any place. What did he say in Quebec, the other day, on the same subject of the fast line? He said:

There was, gentlemen, one question which agitated for a long time public opinion in this country, and especially in the city of Quebec. That was the question of the fast line. You have heard it spoken of for a long time. You know that promises were not wanting, but that nothing was done.

Was that true? Will any man in this House who knows anything of the question dare to tell me that nothing was done by the late Government? Why, we took this question of the fast line up. Parliament devoted one hundred thousand pounds per year to it for ten years. It was found that the promoters could not do anything, and Parliament, at the suggestion of myself, after communication with the Duke of Devonshire, increased the subsidy to $750,000. A year was expended by a very energetic man, Mr. Huddart, who has the contract between Australia and Vancouver. I had been instructed by the Government to give Mr. Huddart all the aid I could, and did so. I saw the great shipping companies, I saw the great naval construction armament company, of which the Duke of Devonshire was chairman, and Lord Brassy a director, I saw a large number of gentlemen deeply interested, who would have given anything to take up the question of a fast line between Great Britain and Canada, but they all said it was absolutely impossible to finance the scheme upon a subsidy of that kind. What, then, did we do? The hon. gentleman said that nothing was done. I ask him if nothing was done when, under those circumstances, representing Canada, I went to the Right Hon. Mr. Chamberlain, the Colonial Minister, and got from him a pledge to contribute from the British exchequer £75,000 sterling per annum for ten years. Was it doing nothing when, under the authority of this Parliament, we advertised for tenders, and obtained one from the Messrs. Allan, including the Glasgow Allans, people of immense wealth, and who sent one of their partners over here to negotiate the matter. We got a tender, and everything was arranged, and the only thing wanting was the signature of the Governor General to the Order in Council accepting the tender, subject to ratification by the English Government. Was that doing nothing? It is true that His Excellency refused, although he knew that the Order in Council was drafted under the authority of Parliament, for the purpose of saving time, and although there was no excuse for refusing to sign, because the contract provided that it was subject to the approval of the House, which was then to meet in three weeks. Yet it was refused. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) came into power. I put my dignity in my pocket and when I went out of office I wrote him a letter and begged him to get the signature of the Governor General to the Order in Council, as it would save a year. It would have saved two years. By the first of May next, that fleet of fast steamers that the hon. gentleman now declares to be so eminently important to Canada would have been crossing the Atlantic, shortening the time and making Canada the highway and thoroughfare for the mail communication and travel of a great part of America and Great Britain. But the hon. member did not do it. He took a very extraordinary course. Nothing was done about signing the Order in Council. But the hon. gentleman did something. What was it? One of his colleagues came out at a public meeting at the Board of Trade of Quebec and denounced the fast service and said that it was not wanted, and this was the gentleman the Prime Minister sent to England to negotiate for the fast line service. Is it any wonder it failed? He knows, and the Minister of Finance knows as well as I do, that when the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) left England, and when the Finance Minister left England, they despaired of accomplishing anything with relation to this contract. Two years have been lost, and not a keel has been laid. A contract may have been made, and, after a great struggle, the securities may have been got upon the pledge to return them; I do not believe they could have been got upon any other terms. But where is the work? Not a blow has been struck. Two years have been lost, and you will have to begin de novo, and you will have to avail yourselves of what we secured, and that is the aid of the Imperial Government to the extent of £75,000 sterling per annum.

I have only one more remark to make in regard to the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite, and I regret that I am compelled to make it. I read with amazement the following statement made at the Canadian Club dinner by the right hon. the First Minister:—

The time might come when Canada might claim a more intimate union than at present, but so long as England sent to Canada as representatives of the Crown such men as they had had he did not think there would be any desire for change on the part of Canadians. (Hear, hear.) Canada had been exceedingly fortunate in the men who had come out there to represent England, and Lord Aberdeen had endeared himself to all Canadians.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will any man in this House say "Hear, hear" to the following sentence? I do not believe it. Sir, I do not believe there is a man so lost to propriety.

He had shown that he could pass through a crisis, keeping an even balance among all parties.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That only shows what hon. gentlemen are capable of. I ask the First Minister, I ask him in the presence of this House and of the country, whether he knew or did not know that when that change of government occurred in which he said the Governor General showed that he could keep an even balance among all parties, the Governor General's conduct was denounced by the press representing more than half the electors of Canada?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Almost every portion of the Conservative press denounced the course pursued on that occasion as a violation of the constitution. I proved on the floor of this House by evidence that no man could meet, by evidence that the First Minister did not meet then and cannot meet now, that he had violated on that occasion every British and every Canadian precedent. Under the circumstances—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think that the hon. gentleman should withdraw that remark.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not know that I was out of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. There is a rule of the House, which is well known, no doubt, to the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), that nothing is to be said disrespectful to the Governor General.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. You entirely mistake me, Sir. I am not saying anything disrespectful of the Governor General, because the First Minister assumed the responsibility of the act, and I have the right to deal with it and to find fault with him for supporting a violation of the constitution.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order. Chair.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to ask—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. When gentlemen opposite have a weak case they never want to allow the other side to be heard. I always feel that I occupy a strong position when they will not hear the truth.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to ask you, Mr. Speaker, if it would be in order for me to read a speech delivered in the interest of the Liberal party by the Governor General of Canada a few days ago in Toronto, a speech supporting the policy of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and opposing the policy of the Conservative party.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The reason I called the hon. gentleman's attention to the rule is that, as I understood him, he said that the Governor General had violated the constitution. Perhaps I misunderstood him.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, if you will read the debate which took place on the change of government in this House, you will see that I not only stated that, but proved it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw the expression he has just used with regard to the Governor General.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I can only say that if hon. gentlemen will refer to the debate I speak of, they will find that, with the Speaker in the Chair, I was allowed to speak for over an hour and to lay before the House reasons to show that, in my judgment, the constitution had been violated.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I expect the hon. gentleman to withdraw the expression he has used with regard to the Governor General. We are not referring to the debate which took place last year.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am perfectly in order in referring to a debate which took place last year.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not dispute that, but I say that the hon. gentleman should not use the expression I have referred to.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman does not find that in the debate—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I expect the hon. gentleman to withdraw the expression.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman does not find that, with the Speaker in the Chair, I was allowed to debate that question, I will be quite prepared to withdraw that statement. And I am quite sure that my hon. friend will see the justice of that remark. Now, I propose—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I propose to close very shortly.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not think hon. gentlemen will improve their position by these interruptions. They will find that nothing will be gained by trying to stifle debate. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have all but done—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. But there are one or two subjects to which I wish to refer.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not think the hon. gentleman will say that I am mistaken in saying that the rule I have referred to exists. It is absolutely against the rules of the House to speak disrespectfully of the Governor General, and I think it is contrary to the spirit of those rules to say that the Governor General has violated the constitution.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What I say, and what I did say, was that, in my judgment, such was the case, and that the responsibility was assumed by the hon. gentlemen opposite. I have been in this House for a great many years, and I have heard this question discussed again and again. I can refer you to a case where Mr. Mackenzie was the leader of the Government in this House and when a question arose of a similar character. I only wish to maintain the rights of the members of this House, and I wish to do so with all deference to the Chair. I should be very sorry to say anything that was not entirely in accordance with the rules of this House. But I differ on the question of fact, and you cannot make me say that I do not think that the Governor General violated the constitution. I could not conscientiously say that, because I do not think that it would be true. I say, therefore, that when the right hon. gentleman assumed responsibility for the act, I deal with him. The hon. gentleman maintains that I am wrong, that the Governor General did not violate the constitution.

The PRIME MINISTER. That is a very poor subterfuge.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman may think it is a subterfuge.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I understand the hon. gentleman will not withdraw the expression which he has used against the Governor General.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am not prepared to say that, in my judgment, the Governor General did not violate the constitution. I say that when this matter was a subject of debate, I was permitted by the Speaker in the Chair to go a great deal further than anything that I have said to-night.

Mr. WALLACE. If I might be allowed to say a word—when you first arose to call attention to a point of order, you called the attention of the leader of the Opposition to the fact that he must not reflect upon the Governor General, and you sat down, Sir. Then, Sir, because a clamour arose on the other side of the House, you got up again and asked him to take it back.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not think that the hon. gentleman has a right to reflect upon the decision that I have just given.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have very little more to say, and I will conclude my remarks as soon as possible. But I want to say a few words with reference to the Yukon Railway, as it is mentioned in this Speech.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The Chair having ruled that a certain expression is out of order, it is imperative that the gentleman who has used that expression, should withdraw it, else he cannot continue his speech, according to the rules of this House. It is also distinctly out of order to discuss the ruling of the Chair after it has been formally made.

Mr. BERGERON. That is what you are doing now.

Mr. CASEY. No after-discussion can affect that decision. I ask you whether the hon. gentleman is in order in proceeding with his speech after refusing to withdraw the expression which you have ruled to be out of order. I think the House will sustain me in raising that point of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. It is very much to be regretted that the hon. leader of the Opposition will not withdraw the expression which he has just used concerning the Governor General. But I understand him to say now that the Government is responsible for the Governor General's action, and that the attack he has made was directed against the Government. Consequently, I understand him to withdraw any expression which is injurious to the Governor General himself.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear. I pass away from that disagreeable subject with great pleasure. Before I sit down I want to—

Mr. CASEY. I rise to a point of order. I want to have it understood from the hon. gentleman himself that he withdraws the expression complained of. Does he say that he withdraws it?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. He has just declared that he withdraws any expression which was injurious to the Governor General.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. CASEY. Has he said so?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. He has said so.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Now that the great constitutionalist on the other side of the House has been set right, I will proceed. I am a little surprised at reading the next paragraph in the Speech:

The action of the Imperial Government in denouncing the treaties with Germany and Belgium also affords much satisfactory evidence of their desire to facilitate your efforts to promote the closest possible relations between Canada and the remainder of the Empire.

Now, Sir, what does that mean? Can any person on the other side of the House tell me what is meant by "the remainder of the Empire"? It goes on to say: "and will, I trust, contribute materially to the development of the Imperial trade." Now, Sir, I believe that paragraph indicates a want of knowledge on the part of the Government of what has taken place and of what the denunciation of the Belgian and German treaties means. If the First Minister wrote that paragraph, I could understand it, because we know that, notwithstanding all the discussion that has taken place in reference to the German and Belgian treaties, the right hon. gentleman has never mastered the subject and does not know what those treaties involve. I hold in my hand a speech made by that hon. gentleman at Quebec on his return, wherein he said:

There can be no doubt of the advantages which Canada will gain from the denunciation of those treaties, the greatest, undoubtedly, being the increased fiscal independence for us as a nation. Those treaties were in the way of the fiscal arrangement which we could have made with the sister colonies, or even with foreign nations, because the moment any such arrangement has been made, Germany and Belgium would have to step forward and claim such arrangement without giving anything in return.

Now, I beg to inform my right hon. friend that he is entirely mistaken, that the German and Belgian treaties have no more to do with arrangements between Australia, or South Africa, and Canada, than they have with China. What prevented trade arrangements being entered into between Canada and the other colonies, especially Australasia, was this: that in the constitution of the Australian colonies, there was a provision that they could not make any differential fiscal arrangements without the assent of the Home Government, and consequently they could not even make arrangements between Victoria and New South Wales. Some time ago the constitution was so amended as to enable them to make interprovincial arrangements within Australasia; but the fact remained that no Australian colony could make trade arrangements with Canada. In consequence of the resolution passed by the Ottawa Conference asking that these difficulties in the way of interprovincial arrangements should be removed, the Imperial Government introduced a Bill into the Imperial Parliament which made it possible to make what arrangements we pleased between Canada and any part of Australasia. A treaty was made between New Zealand and Canada years ago. Under that Act of the Imperial Government, all difficulties were removed.

I desire to refer for a moment to a very interesting part of the Speech, and it is that which refers to the Yukon. There is a paragraph in the Speech which reads as follows:—

The extraordinary gold discoveries recently made upon the Yukon and its tributaries, appear likely to result in an enormous influx of people into that region, and have compelled the Government to take prompt action for the preservation of law and order in that distant and almost inaccessible locality; measures will be laid before you for that purpose.

Of course, I will not discuss the arrangements that have been made with respect to the preservation of law and order there, except on one point, and to that I desire to draw the attention of the Government for a moment. I dare say, some hon. members have discovered that there is somewhere an Ottawa liar, that occasionally statements are sent to the press over this country from Ottawa which are entirely false and unfounded. I read one of them. It is dated January 28, and was sent, not to Toronto or Montreal, where it would immediately have met with contradiction, but to British Columbia and the North-west Territories, for the purpose of having an injurious effect on the character of a public man before there is any possibility to contradict it:

While parties have been here wire-pulling at Ottawa for weeks back to obtain permits for taking whisky to Yukon, Sir Charles Tupper is said to have got ahead of all his compeers and obtained for the Klondike Mining and Transportation Company a permit for the sale of 50,000 gallons from the British Columbia Government. It will be taken to the northern boundary of the province and shipped from there as the purchasers see fit. It is computed that the company can make several hundred thousand dollars on the venture.

I say to this House that this statement has not the slightest foundation in fact, that I never applied for a permit to send a gallon of whisky to the North-west, Klondike, or anywhere else. It says that I applied to the Government of British Columbia. That government has no power to grant a permit to take a gallon of whisky into the North-west Territories, as every member of the House knows. The statement was simply a falsehood manufactured without the slightest basis. I probably would be the last man in Canada who would do anything of the kind, even if I had an opportunity. And why? I had the honour to propose the prohibitory law which applies to the whole North-west Territories, and when Minister of Customs I carried that measure through Parliament; and I was in a position to say, at a temperance breakfast to which I was invited in London on one occasion, when they were talking about prohibitory enactments and their practicability, that I had the honour of obtaining from Parliament a prohibitory law covering the largest portion of the earth's surface to which such a law was ever extended. Gentlemen present asked: Was it carried out, did it do any good? I answered: Yes, it did a great deal of good, and you will see it was vigorously enforced when I tell you that on board of a Canadian Pacific Railway train the pocket of a member of Parliament was searched by the Mounted Police, a flask found and its contents emptied on the ground. This will be further apparent when I tell you that at a great banquet tendered to Lord Dufferin, after his visit to the North-west, the only liquor obtainable in which to drink his health was Perry Davis' Pain-killer; thus you will see how vigorously the law was enforced. This question came up before the company of which I was chairman, and I said to them: I am under the impression—I have had nothing to do with the subject for some time—that there is a prohibitory law in force there. I sent a message to Mr. Blount, my private secretary, who applied to the Government and was told that a prohibitory law was in force and no person was allowed to take liquor into the North-west. This was conclusive evidence and closed the subject. I may say, for the information of the Minister of the Interior, that it was added that, as the Minister of the Interior was a strict prohibitionist, there was every hope he would maintain that principle. I can only say that he will have my hearty sympathy in every possible effort to prevent the introduction of liquor into the North-west Territories. In my judgment, there is the same objection to its introduction in the Yukon district as in the other part of the North-west Territories. One of our strong reasons for prohibiting the manufacture, use or sale of liquor in the North-west Territories was the danger of inflaming the minds of the Indians and leading to trouble, for at that time there was a very small number of whites and a very large number of Indians in the territory. In my judgment, one of the great difficulties to be apprehended in respect to the Yukon country is an influx of 100,000, 150,000 or 200,000 people from all parts of the world, including many men of very lawless character, and I believe all measures the Government can adopt to prevent the introduction of intoxicating liquors in that country should be taken in the interest of the country.

I now come to the contract for a railway from the Stikine to Teslin Lake. I do not intend to discuss this subject until the papers are laid on the Table. It would be premature for any hon. member to arrive at a settled conviction in one way or the other until the whole case has been presented to the House and we have heard from the Minister of the Interior, and obtained the papers so as to know the ground on which the action adopted by the Government has been taken. But I want to refer to a slanderous attack made on myself in reference to that matter. The character of any member of this House is of importance to every one in it, to whichever side he may belong, and whatever can be done should be done to discountenance unfounded, slanderous statements calculated to affect the character of a public man. I refer now to the "World" newspaper of Toronto, and I characterize the statements there made as the most cowardly attempt to slander the character of a public man I have ever met since I have been in public life. If the "World" had had the courage or manliness, instead of dealing in malicious, lying inuendoes, to make a statement to which they could be held responsible, I could forgive them, because I would suppose that, believing they had good ground for the statement they made, they felt warranted in the public interest in making it. I say that no more serious personal attack can be made on the character of a member of this House than to charge him with being corruptly concerned in any contract given by the Government. The public man—I care not who he may be or what member of this House he may be—the public man who can be shown to be corruptly connected with any contract in which public money or public property is to be used, is guilty of an offence that ought to deprive him of a seat in this House, and to drive him out of public life. I may say for the information of the House, that since the House rose, and while I was in my room, some kind friend sent me a copy of "La Presse," and I will do "La Presse" the justice to say that they have not exhibited the contemptible cowardice that the Toronto "World" has exhibited in dealing with this subject. "La Presse" charges me distinctly with being a party to, and with being personally interested in the Mann-Mackenzie contract. One of my French friends will read it to the House more accurately than I could, but I read French sufficiently well to at once understand and to appreciate the slanderous character of the statement in that paper. The moment I read it, I addressed the following telegram to Mr. Donald McMaster, Q.C., of Montreal:—

Please see "La Presse," Feb. 2nd, fourth page, second and third columns, where it is stated among other things, that I am personally interested in the Mann-Mackenzie contract, and that with Messrs. Blair and Sifton am conspiring to profit out of it at the expense of the country. Demand immediate retraction and apology; otherwise desire you to institute criminal proceedings without delay.

These gentlemen will now have an opportunity in a court of justice of showing what foundation they have for this slander. During the last five minutes in the House, I have received the following reply to this telegram:

Montreal.—I have your telegram about "La Presse," and it is receiving my best attention.

DONALD McMASTER.

That is the course which I am prepared to take with any responsible man in this country, or any responsible newspaper in this country, that ventures to attack my public character in relation to a matter of this kind.

Before I sit down, Mr. Speaker, I wish to state to the House exactly what I know in relation to this matter. When hon. gentlemen opposite were good enough to relieve me of the responsibilities and emoluments of office, I found it necessary to turn my attention to business, and I could not think of any business in which I could engage that would be more valuable to Canada than to endeavour to use the influence that I had obtained by long residence in London, among financial and commercial men, in drawing British capital into Canada, for the development of our country. I hope, Sir, there is nothing in that course that does not commend itself to the approval of every person. Well, Sir, having been very successful in meeting with a generous response to my application for money from capitalists in England, I felt it my duty to use every effort in my power to secure a wise expenditure of that capital and a satisfactory return, because I know that on the result of dividends being paid, it would be possible to obtain any amount of capital for Canada, to be used for so important a purpose. Well, I visited British Columbia, and I went carefully through the gold, and silver, and copper, and lead mines in the Western Kootenay and Slocan district, with the result that I came to the conclusion that the mineral wealth of British Columbia was almost inexhaustible, and that all the impressions I had previously formed had fallen far short of what I now believe the reality will prove to be. One of my companies being the Klondike Mining, Trading and Transport Corporation, I got all the information I could with reference to the gold fields of the Canadian Yukon, and I came to the conclusion, after giving the subject the best consideration in my power, that it was of vital importance to Canada that we should establish an all-Canadian route. The hon. the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) visited the Chilkoot and White Passes, and I must say that I had no hesitation in publicly commending his energy and his attention to his duties in that regard, because I felt that was due to a public man, who at a good deal of personal inconvenience visited the country to obtain the knowledge which was necessary to enable him, as a Minister of the Crown, to formulate his policy. Under the conviction that I owed it to Canada to do everything in my power to conduce to what I had come to the conclusion was absolutely essential to the best interests of Canada, I called upon the Hon. Mr. Sifton, Minister of the Interior, as soon as he returned to Victoria. I told that hon. gentleman the conclusion at which I had arrived. I told him that from the best information I could get from well qualified sources, I had come to the conclusion that there was one route, and one route alone, which in the first instance it was absolutely essential should be taken up by the Government and developed, and that was the route on the Stikine River, going from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake and thence down by the waters. I pressed that upon him very strongly, with a view of getting the earliest possible means of communication with Dawson City, because I had a discussion on the matter with Major Walsh, a very able officer in the service of the Government, as to the probability of his getting in, and knowing the difficulties he had to encounter, I believe it would take him a very long time. I told the Minister of the Interior that I believed it would be found practicable to send an ocean steamer to the mouth of the Stikine River when the ice had formed, and with horses and sleds and provisions and equipages of every kind, to go up on the ice to Glenora or some portion of the upper part of the Stikine River, and by a sled trail go down on the ice to Teslin Lake long before navigation would be open at all. I pressed on that hon. gentleman in the strongest and most emphatic manner I could his duty as Minister of the Crown to spare no effort to endeavour to accomplish a connection in that way. I told him I had interviewed the Government of British Columbia, and they had assured me they were prepared to co-operate with the Government of the Dominion in opening, in the first instance, in the absence of the railway, a sled trail, to be made into a trail as soon as the snow went off. I went further; I said to the Minister of the Interior: You heard me make a very strong speech last session on the floor of the Commons in opposition to Government aid to railways. I said: I am prepared to take it all back so far as this road is concerned. I said: I am so convinced of the vital importance to Canada of at once establishing a railway connection between the Stikine River and Teslin Lake that, so far as I am able to judge, if you will take the scheme up vigorously and put it through at once as a Government work—I believe you will have the hearty support of the Parliament of Canada and the people of Canada as well. I believe now that the importance of that work cannot be overrated, and I will tell you why. Every one who has paid any attention to this subject knows that although the loss of life has been comparatively small, yet the sufferings of those going to the Klondike have been intense, and the destruction of horses which have died by the thousands on these Chilkoot and White Passes was a perfect disgrace, and attracted a great deal of attention. But what was more. I felt that as the Government of the United States claimed the territory over some fifteen or sixteen miles on both of these passes, they were in a position to offer such obstruction, and they did offer such obstruction, to Canadian enterprise and Canadian energy as to make it vitally important that an all-Canadian route should be obtained. So that, instead of having to go on any territory claimed by the United States, they should be able to go from Victoria, Vancouver or any other part of Canada into that country without touching American territory at all. I may have overrated the importance of it, though I do not think I did. But I felt it my duty as a public man to take the position I did; because there are some questions that are higher than party. Of course, from a party point of view it is desirable that the Government should make all the mistakes they will; but when it comes to be a question between Seattle or San Francisco being the base of supplies for all the thousands of people that will go into the Canadian Yukon territory instead of Canada, I say it becomes a matter of the most vital importance to the whole country. Under these circumstances I pressed on the hon. Minister of the Interior the importance of using the best means in his power to secure the end in view. The paper to which I refer, the "World" newspaper, had brought out, perhaps through some espionage—no, it could not be that, because the statement was false. It stated that I had an interview with Mr. Mann and Mr. Mackenzie in Vancouver. I met Mr. Mackenzie in the train. I met Mr. Mann in the public hall of the Vancouver Hotel. He never was in my room; I never was in his; I never had an interview with him or with Mr. Mackenzie; and when that contract was signed and sealed, I was as ignorant of it as any man in this House. When it was made public by the papers in Montreal, I happened to be there on business—and my hon. friends behind me know pretty well what that business was. I certainly did not know that anything of the kind was going on. After coming back here I called on the Minister of the Interior and asked him what prospect there was of getting this sledge road through at once, because unless the work was done at once the ice would be gone and the opportunity would be lost. The hon. gentleman told me that he was not in a position to inform me, because it was a confidential matter ; but, he said, "I expect to be able to give you information in a very few days." That was all that took place between the hon. Minister and myself. He gave me no information ; I did not know the Government were negotiating with Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie at all, or that they had a contract, or that the Government were not going to do the work themselves. I feel it my duty to make that frank statement to the House.

I do not intend to take up the contract itself until we have the papers before us ; but I think the Government may well turn their attention—and the sooner they do so the better—to the mining regulations of that country. One of the gravest charges made against this contract—and it is a very strong charge—is that while a wealthy and powerful body of contractors have only to pay a royalty of one per cent, ten per cent is exacted from the miners. I may say that what took place between the hon. Minister and myself in British Columbia I stated publicly at a banquet given to me in the city of New Westminster, and I did it designedly, for the purpose of bringing public opinion to sustain the pressure which I was endeavouring to bring upon the hon. gentleman. I took great exception to the mining regulations, and I am glad they have been modified ; but I am satisfied that when the matter is examined, it will be found utterly indefensible to exact a royalty of ten per cent. Why, Sir, what does it mean ? You must remember that the mining in that country is not carried on by capitalists ; it is poor man's mining. It is a description of mining in which a man with a vigorous constitution and a year's provisions to sustain him, and clothing, and a pick, a shovel and an axe, possesses all the appurtenances he requires to carry on the business. Suppose a man goes in at the risk of his life, as many did, or at the risk of his health, as many did, and takes up a mining claim ; and suppose, by dint of great industry he takes out in the course of a year $22,500 worth of gold. Wages are enormous, the cost of living is enormous, the circumstances under which the work is done are of the most terrible character, and it is not at all unlikely that it will cost him $20,000 to take out the $22,500. What is the result ? The result is that you deduct the first $2,500 before you assess the product ; that leaves $20,000, on which ten per cent is $2,000, and the man has $500 left for his year's work, while the Government has $2,000. That in brief is the argument, and I think that what would meet with the most hearty approval of this country would be the reduction of the royalty imposed on the miners, if not to one per cent, certainly to not more than two per cent. In the province of British Columbia, a poor province, where there are an immense number of mines, the royalty on gold is one per cent. In the province of Nova Scotia, where gold-mining has been carried on as a successful industry for many years, the royalty on gold is two per cent. I believe that if the Government will give this subject their careful consideration, they will come to the conclusion that there is no act they could do that would meet with more hearty approval in this House or out of it, than a great reduction of that heavy charge.

There is another point of grave importance, and as there are probably some negotiations going on in reference to it, I want to direct the attention of the House to it. It is this. The Government of this country have an opportunity which they never have had before and never will have again, of dealing with the unjust labour laws of the United States of America. Every person recognizes, and it came to be recognized in this House, that the right hon. First Minister was obliged to pledge himself at the last general election, that, if he could not obtain a modification of the repeal of those labour laws that were found to be so oppressive to Canadians along the border, or to Canadians who wanted to go into the United States for work, this Parliament would be asked to retaliate by passing a similar act. Now, Sir, no country can complain with any foundation if another country adopts its own legislation ; and what I would ask this House and the Government seriously to consider in the interest of Canada, is to pass a law to provide that the same laws shall be applied to the citizens of any country which that country applies to Canadians. While the United States shut us out from obtaining a free miner's license or from working in a mine in the United States, I would not allow a citizen of the United States to work in our mines. I would simply adopt their own legislation with reference to alien labour, mining and everything else that affects the mutual rights of the two people. If they complained of it, they would complain without any possible ground of justice ; and I take this opportunity of drawing the attention of the Government to a matter which I regard as very important ; and that is the desire and determination of the United States to capture to a large extent the gold and trade and business of the Canadian Yukon district. I believe this Government have an opportunity that will never occur again. Now, Sir, I am sorry to have taken up so much of the time of the House, but I shall close in very few words. I am delighted to find the Government are going to bring in a Superannuation Bill. I believe that the frightful injustice perpetrated since the Government came into power must convince every member of this House that the sooner the superannuation law is changed the better it will be.

With reference to the Franchise Act, I would like to take this early opportunity of saying—I do not know that I am able to speak for every person, but certainly I can speaking for myself and a great many other members of the party—that, in my opinion, a universal suffrage law based on a satisfactory residence in the country and constituency, with a cheap form of registration, would solve this difficulty which, I frankly admit, exists, of a very expensive Act, and would avoid the humiliation proposed of our people electing members to this Parliament on different franchises in different provinces. I beg to apologize to this House for taking up so much of its attention, and I must express my regret to my right hon. friend for not having been able to conclude my remarks at an earlier period, and thus giving us earlier the pleasure of listening to him.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I have listened, Mr. Speaker, without any astonishment to the extraordinary harangue—I cannot call it a speech—in which the hon. gentleman has vented out the spleen and disappointment which have filled his soul ever since a certain day in the year 1896 which I shall not further harrow his feelings by mentioning. Well, knowing my hon. friend, having had a long experience of his ways and methods, I must say that I was prepared for a very large share indeed of wild and extravagant declamation, but I must pay him the compliment—doubtful though it be—that upon this occasion he has fairly out-Heroded Herod, or, to speak more accurately, out-Tuppered Tupper. But such is the high estimate which we have formed, on this side of the House, at all events, of his power of vituperation, of his recklessness of statement, of his faculty of distortion, that, for my part, I repeat it again, I heard it all without any astonishment. My hon. friend is not in a happy frame of mind; he is angry; he is choleric; he is wrothy—and the cause is not at all far to seek. I once heard upon the floor of this House our friend Joseph Rymal declare that there was not a she-bear deprived of her cubs half so ferocious as the Tory party when deprived of office. If that was the cause of the hon. gentleman being choleric and wrothy, we can easily account for the extraordinary outbreak of disappointment and bitterness we have just heard from him. There are many things in the speech of many hours to which perhaps I might reply, but my hon. friend will pardon me if I say that the speech of five or six hours to which we have listened this afternoon and evening, was well characterized this afternoon by the hon. gentleman who seconded the Address, when he spoke of a deluge of words in a desert of ideas. I must say for my hon. friend that I cannot follow him in everything he has said. I cannot, for instance, follow him in the statements he made, which were decorated with such adjectives as “want of ability,” “humiliation,” “incompetency” and “profound ignorance.” After all, we must all submit to the laws of fate. The laws of fate are in-exorable, and painful as it may be to us, it is evident that it is our fate as a Government not to come up to the expectations of my hon. friend. My hon. friend is not the first man who, smarting under a sense of disappointment, finds some solace for himself in reviling those who are stronger than he. Shakspeare has shown us Thersites, deformed and scurrilous, venting his spleen on account of his deformity, in the camp of the Greeks, by abusing the leaders of the army; and after a more vicious tirade than ever, concluding by this pious ejaculation: “I have now said my prayers; let the Devil Envy say amen.” It would have been quite in order for the hon. gentleman, when he concluded his speech, to have said, like Thersites: Now that I have finished my prayers, let the Devil Envy say amen. My hon. friend has weighed us and found us wanting, and he has seen the signs on our walls of our condemnation. I must say that such a judgment and such a verdict, uttered in so solemn a manner, might prove disquieting and disturbing were it not for the fact that we know, from many an experience, that whether as a judge of events or as a prophet, my hon. friend is the very reverse of a Daniel. Where in the world has he seen the signs of condemnation?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Toronto “World.”

The PRIME MINISTER. I must confess that I have not thought of that, but the Toronto “World” evidently does not comprise Toronto Centre, which sent us, some few weeks ago, so able a representative as the one to whom we have had the pleasure of listening this afternoon. Neither has he seen signs of condemnation in Temiscouata, which elected by acclamation my hon. friend (Mr. Gauvreau) who seconded the Address. Neither has he seen them in Rimouski, where my hon. friend was also elected by acclamation, because hon. gentlemen opposite did not dare try the issues with us. Neither did he see any in Drummond and Arthabaska, where the hon. gentleman's friends did try the issues and were snowed under by a majority of over 700. Neither did he see them in Nicolet, an old Conservative county, which was carried by its present representative in 1891 by one of a majority, which he lost in 1896 by 130, or something like that, and which he has now carried by a majority of over three hundred. Neither has he seen signs in Quebec Centre, where my hon. friend (Mr. Malouin) has just been elected by acclamation. My hon. friend has spoken in somewhat extravagant language. There might perhaps be something to retort to, if one were blessed with the happy faculty, which is so natural to him, of blowing his own trumpet and singing his own praises. But I must confess to my hon. friend that in that art, in which he is past master, I am absolutely incompetent. I must further confess—and I do so with due humility—that if he judges us from the summit of his own estimate of himself, he has very good reason to be severe upon us.

It is not every man who can say that he has made Canada. To-day my hon. friend gave the testimony to my late lamented friend, Sir George Etienne Cartier, that he had been one of the foremost promoters of the confederation of Canada. But I must tell the hon. gentleman that in doing this tardy justice to Sir George E. Cartier he was very unfair to another gentleman, he was very unfair to no less a person than Sir Charles Tupper, because we have it upon the authority of Sir Charles Tupper himself that he it is who made Canada. On a certain occasion he spoke in this manner:

My history is the history of the Dominion of Canada; my history is the history of the confederation of Canada; my history is the history of the progress and prosperity of this country.

Sir George E. Cartier was one, Sir John A. Macdonald was another, George Brown was another who, we were all under the impression, had had a good deal to do with the history of confederation, but they were simply puppets in the hands of my hon. friend; he, and he alone, did it. Well, Sir, I have only this to say to my hon. friend: Every thing is relative in this world. I will not compare him to ourselves, but I will simply answer him in the language of a celebrated gentleman in the old Parliament of France in the time of the revolution, in the language of L'Abbé Maury, who being taunted once by Napoleon that he thought a good deal of himself, said: "No, I think very little of myself when I judge myself, but I think a great deal of myself when I compare myself with others."

What shall I say now, Sir, of the unseemly attack, of the most unseemly attack, which was made by the hon. gentleman, without any provocation whatever, upon the representative of the Queen in this country, upon the Governor General? Sir, I can always forgive a man for speaking hard words in the heat of debate, but I cannot forgive a man for making a deliberate attack upon a gentleman who cannot defend himself, and then sneaking out of the consequence through a poor subterfuge such as we had an exhibition of to-day. However, Mr. Speaker, we can allow this to pass. That attack will do no harm to the august person against whom it was directed. Neither the honour of Canada nor the credit of Canada will suffer by it; if anybody is to suffer by it, it is the hon. gentleman who, forgetting himself, forgetting his station, used the unseemly language which we have heard this evening.

Now, Sir, my hon. friend told us this afternoon that he was not a poet; but I think he showed us that he could take many licenses, though they were not poetical. But I must give him this credit, that he did not attempt to challenge the figures and the statements brought forward by my hon. friend from Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram) when he spoke of the prosperity of this country. Canada is prosperous as it never was before. The fact is that ever since this Administration came into office, Canada has gone forward with leaps and bounds. The hon. member for Centre Toronto this afternoon said nothing but what is well known, when he said that Canada occupies a prouder station to-day, not only within the Empire but throughout the world at large, than she ever did at any previous period of her history. The fact is, Sir, that Canada has seen more progress during the last eighteen months than she ever realized at any similar previous time in her history. When the historian comes to write the history of this country from confederation up to the present time, he will make a jump from the year 1867 to the year 1897, and will date from the latter year a new era in the national development of this country. Neither did my hon. friend challenge the statement, though he has denied many things, that Canada has been blessed by Providence with a bountiful harvest. In the days of the old regime a good harvest would have been attributed to the National Policy. I have heard that said. We simply give credit to Providence for our blessings in this respect. But if we have good harvests we have also good prices. My hon. friend hastened to say that it was not due to the tariff. If I were to use the same kind of language formerly used by himself and by his friends, I would say directly that the price of wheat is due to the tariff. Why, Sir, has not wheat risen to the price of $1 per bushel, and have we not heard the statement made by followers of the hon. gentleman that $1 a bushel was the Grit price of wheat. We have got back to the Grit price of wheat. But we do not claim anything of the kind. We never claimed that the prices of the products of the land could be regulated by the tariff. What we do claim, however, is this, that the tariff has been revised in such a fair and judicious manner as to give confidence to the people of this country, and to make it possible for them to take advantage of every opportunity that offers to increase our trade with the world. We do not go beyond that claim. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman had still some little blame to cast upon my hon. friend who framed the tariff. He claimed that what changes we have made in the tariff had proved unprofitable to the people of Canada. Let me quote him an authority which he will admit upon this point, as strong and valuable as any authority that can be quoted. Mr. Edward Gurney, the late President of the Toronto Board of Trade. This is the way he spoke of the changes which have been made in the tariff:

I believe that in a large measure the confidence of to-day is attributable to the able and intelligent treatment of this question by the Government of the day, which, while it has not pleased us all, and has in some instances seemingly sacrificed interests in a way not readily appreciable by a business man, has on the whole been broad, coherent and consistent, and a due regard for the present and future of Canada should restrain Ministers of the Crown and others from intimating that the tariff has in it no stability, and that the safe position for business to assume is that which I once discovered on a tombstone: "Stranger, be thou all eye, all ear, all expectation, lest death steal upon thee in an unwary moment."

Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman did not speak very long upon that subject. But he devoted some three or four hours of his speech to discussing the question of preferential trade, and especially in an effort to show my own derelictions in that regard. The hon. gentleman was kind enough to speak of the manner in which I had endeavoured to represent Canada at the Jubilee celebration, and I thank him for the kind words that he used in that connection. But at the same time he did me the honour of attacking me personally for the course which I had pursued in England in reference to the matter of preferential trade. I must say, however, that the attack which he made upon me was very moderate compared with the attacks which are made every day by the press which supports him. In the press which supports him I am represented every day as a traitor. Treason is a word which I find in almost every article of those newspapers. And, by the way, I may mention that even the hon. gentleman made use of the same expression in one portion of his remarks. Well, Sir, the word treason does not affect me very much. I am getting accustomed to it. Why, Sir, in the press which receives inspiration from my hon. friend, in my own province, for months and for years I was daily denounced as a traitor to my race and to my religion; while in the press that supports him in the other provinces, the theme upon which they enlarge is that I am a traitor to the whole country. All I can say is that there is about as much truth in the one charge as there is in the other. But what is the next charge brought against me by the hon. gentleman? He says that I have turned my back while in England upon the cause of preferential trade. Let me give him my answer—it will be direct and simple. My answer is, that if to-day the idea of preferential trade is no longer a vain and idle one, if there is any spark of living truth in it, if it is ever to become an accomplished fact, the first step towards the realization of this idea was taken last summer when I was in England. Sir, the hon. gentleman knows it quite well. Let me put a question to him. Is it not a fact that up to last summer all theories of preferential trade within the Empire were met with one insurmountable difficulty? The insurmountable obstacles was the existence of the German and Belgian treaties. The hon. gentleman knows it right well. The press that he inspires knows it as well as he does. Why, the boys in the streets that sell the newspapers know it as well as he does, everybody knows it. But in order to bring him once more fresh to the attention and to the knowledge of his blind and deaf followers, let me give them here now the very text of the treaty with the German Zollverein:

Article 7. The stipulations of the preceding articles, 1 to 6, shall also be applied to the colonies and foreign possessions of Her Britannic Majesty. In those colonies and possessions the produce of the States and the Zollverein shall not be subject to any higher or other import duties than the produce of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or of any other country of the like kind, nor shall the exportations from those colonies or possessions to the Zollverein be subject to any other or higher duties than the exportation to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

It is quite plain that so long as these treaties were in existence, all idea of a preferential tariff within the Empire had to be abandoned. Sir, the fact is well known to the hon. gentleman and to his friends, because they have laboured also to obtain a repeal of these obnoxious treaties; but they laboured in vain, they laboured perhaps with more zeal than discretion or judgment. We all recollect the most pathetic speech delivered by my hon. friend last year in this House wherein he recited the efforts which had been made by his party to obtain the denunciation of these treaties, the efforts made by Sir Alexander Galt when High Commissioner in London, the efforts made by himself while he occupied the same position, the efforts made by Sir John A. Macdonald, by Sir John Abbott, by Sir John Thompson, by my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster). Yet all these efforts, all these solemn protests and petitions made in season and out of season, were without avail. Sir, according to an old Greek legend the Empire of the world was promised to the man who could untie the Gordian knot. And there were ambitious men at that time, there were Tuppens in those days as there are now, and the Tuppens of those days wore out their fingers in the attempt to unloose the intricate cords. They failed, every one of them, until at last Alexander of Macedon came, and he simply solved the difficulty by cutting the knot. Well, Sir, the Alexander of Macedon who has solved the question in our day is my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. It was he who solved the difficulty by cutting the knot when in his tariff last year, he assumed the position that England had authority to denounce the treaties, or he could refuse the offer which we made to her. Such was the position when I left for England. If I had followed the example of the hon. gentleman, I should have gone about to advocate preferential trade. I should have asked for the pound of flesh. If I had blundered as he blundered, I would have failed as he failed. But I pursued a different policy. I did not go about asking for the pound of flesh, I did not go about advocating the cause of preferential trade. Instead, I adopted the tactics of old Cato in Rome, who never made a speech in the Senate without in some way bringing in his famous denunciation "Delenda est Carthago." In every speech which I made in England, and heaven knows I made a good many, I never failed to impress upon the British public that they should give us help in obtaining from the Government the denunciation of those treaties. Well, Sir, on the 1st of August last, the treaties were denounced. Now, the hon. gentleman stated this afternoon, repeating what he has stated before in still more forcible language than he stated to-day, that after all we had obtained no advantage for Canada, that our policy had proved a complete fiasco, that though we had obtained a denunciation of the treaties we deserved no credit for it. Let me call a witness against the hon. gentleman here. I will call against him no less a person than the "Hon. Sir Charles Tupper, Bart., G.C.M.G., C.B., M.P., Ottawa (late Prime Minister and ex-High Commissioner for Canada)." The treaties were denounced on the 1st of August. On the 7th of August there was issued a prospectus of the "British Empire Finance Corporation, Limited," and at the head of the board of directors I find the name of "Hon. Sir Charles Tupper, Bart., G.C.M.G., C.B.," and all the rest. Let me read the opening words of this prospectus:

This company was formed to acquire and develop within the British Empire, and under the security of British laws, industrial undertakings and other enterprises of a sound character, and to assist in opening up the resources of the colonies and dependencies of Great Britain. The recent denunciation of the German and Belgian treaties, and the removal thereby of the restrictions hitherto existing upon preferential inter-British trade, will have the effect of developing enormous and profitable resources hitherto neglected in the colonies, and will throw open new fields for highly remunerative investments.

Sir, this is the result of our policy, acknowledged by the hon. gentleman himself when he had more interest to speak the truth than he has upon the present occasion. But that was not enough. After that victory had been achieved, the hon. gentleman says that if we had advocated the cause of preferential trade and asked for a quid pro quo, asked a preference against all other nations we would have attained it. Well, Sir, he has said so, he has said many things. He is a prophet after the event, he has been often a misguided prophet. On the 29th of July, not more than two days before the treaties were denounced, the hon. gentleman staked his reputation on the statement that our policy was an absurdity, was a blunder, and the day would never come when it would be anything else, it would always remain a blunder. Two days afterwards he had received his own answer in the fact that the treaties were denounced, and the week after he could make the statement which has just been read. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman goes further. He says that in taking the position that I did take, I went back not only upon my policy, but upon myself. The hon. gentleman stated I had abandoned the cause of preferential trade. What I stated in Canada was, and by the words I stand, that if ever the cause of preferential trade is to become an established fact within the boundaries of the British Empire, it can only be upon the lines of free trade. The hon. gentleman has quoted in support of his doctrine the authority of Mr. Chamberlain. I take issue with the hon. gentleman. Mark my words, let them be marked on the other side. I say neither my hon. friend nor any one of the apostles of preferential trade on the other side of the House would accept preferential trade on the lines laid down by Mr. Chamberlain. The only man in England who has thoroughly studied preferential trade, given attention to it and taken an intelligent and statesmanlike view of it is the distinguished gentleman who is now at the head of the Colonial Office. Before I proceed further, I should like to know from hon. gentlemen opposite whether they are protectionists or not. Would it be an unfair question if I were to ask the hon. leader of the Opposition if he is a protectionist, or if the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) is a protectionist, or if the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) is a protectionist, or the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), who has always been a strong apostle of preferential trade, is a protectionist? No doubt they will one and all say they are protectionists, not only for Canada but also for England. Now, let me quote the language of Mr. Chamberlain. That hon. gentleman spoke several times on this question, but his most notable speech was that delivered at the Canada Club dinner in London on March 25th, 1896, and this is the speech from which hon. gentlemen have often quoted. Here is the very language used by Mr. Chamberlain:—

I have laid down four propositions which I think cannot be controverted. The first is that there is a universal desire among all the members of the Empire for a closer union between the several branches, and that, in their opinion, as in ours, this is desirable—nay, it is essential for the existence of the Empire as such. My second proposition is that experience has taught us that this closer union can be most hopefully approached in the first instance from its commercial side. My third proposition is that the suggestions which have hitherto been made to us, although we know them to have been made in good part, are, when considered from the point of view of British interest, not sufficiently favourable to be considered by this country.

My fourth proposition is that a true Zollverein for the Empire, that a free trade established throughout the Empire, although it would involve the imposition of duties against foreign countries, and would be in that respect a derogation from the high principles of free trade and from the practice of the United Kingdom up to the present time, would still be a proper subject for discussion, and might probably lead to a satisfactory arrangement, if the colonies on their part were willing to consider it.

Now, who in the Opposition is willing to come to the question on this basis, that there should be no customs duties within the empire? Let him rise in his place. Let hon. gentlemen opposite tell the people of Canada that they are prepared to advocate a system of preferential trade on the basis that there shall be within the empire no customs duties whatever. Let them say they are willing to give up our customs duties against Great Britain, I do not say against Germany, France or the United States. Among hon. gentlemen opposite none will prove to be so loyal an apostle of preferential trade as to say that he and his associates are willing to give up protection against Britain. Do we not know that the National Policy, of which even at this late date we heard a eulogy on the floor of this House to-day, was intended to stab the trade of Great Britain? Let me proceed further with my quotations from the speech of Mr. Chamberlain. This is how he concluded this part of the argument:

But the principle which I claim must be accepted, if we are to make any, even the slightest progress, is that within the different parts of the Empire protection must disappear, and that the duties must be revenue duties, and not protective duties in the sense of protection, for the products of one part of the Empire against those of another part.

This is very plain. Mr. Chamberlain says in so many words that within the empire there can be no protective duties by one part of the empire against another part. Are hon. gentlemen opposite ready to assent to this proposition? They will not have the chance of making declarations contradictory to the position they occupy. The answer was made by the hon. leader of the Opposition last session when discussing the effect of the reduction of 25 per cent which we were offering to Great Britain. This is how he characterized it:—

The industries of Canada built up at such enormous cost, industries which have made Canada what it is to-day, industries that represent an enormous amount of capital invested, industries that have enriched Canada by the progress and prosperity she has enjoyed while they have been in operation. These industries will become paralyzed again when exposed to a reduction of 25 per cent on this general tariff, and one after another they will succumb.

I must say the hon. gentleman has again proved a false prophet. Although a reduction has been made, not of 25 but of 12½ per cent, never at any time in the history of Canada have her mills been so fully employed. Let me go one step further. Let me take the proposition of Mr. Chamberlain as he made it. No one will deny, every one will admit that there is grandeur in his proposal. I do not discuss it from the economic point of view, but simply from the political point of view, and I do not hesitate to say there is grandeur in the idea of a galaxy of nations acknowledging the same allegiance and all bound together by the ties of free trade. But is that the idea hon. gentlemen opposite have in their minds? No; they could not rise to the high conception presented by Mr. Chamberlain, but they would drag him down to the low level of their own paltry conception. The truth is that the question of preferential trade at the present time has to be discussed from the point of no customs tariff existing within any part of the empire, and I do not say that Canada is now ready for it. Canada is not ready to give up its customs tariff, and so long as Canada is not ready to give up its customs tariff, it is no use to preach the doctrine of preferential trade, whether here or in England or anywhere at all.

I have not much to say in regard to what the hon. gentleman has stated with respect to the Klondike Railway. I rather commend the course he has taken on this occasion on this subject. There is a good deal, however, to say with respect to the mining regulations, which also can be deferred to a future occasion. I am not prepared to say that I agree with everything said by the hon. gentleman in this respect, though I am strongly of the opinion that we should endeavour by all means to keep that far distant part of our country for our own people. Great developments have taken place since last session. Canada has at all times been able to boast that it is endowed by Providence with many rich gifts. Her fertile plains and valleys are certainly not surpassed in any other country; her forests are not equalled by the forests of any other land; her fisheries are rich; but suddenly gold discoveries have been made in our own territory which, if they prove as extensive as they are supposed to be, will no doubt make Canada one of the most famous gold producing countries. But this discovery has been made under very exceptional circumstances. It had been supposed up to the present time, that gold was, as it were, a product of the sun, to be found only in these regions adjacent to the equator. The discovery in Canada has been made well within the land of the midnight sun, the land of almost perpetual winter. The same has taken place in this case which has taken place at all times in history after a discovery of gold, from the time that Jason and the Argonauts went in search of the Golden Fleece down to our own generation, when the discoveries of gold were made in California and Australia—thousands of men rush at once in search of the precious metal. If we remember that this Yukon district, but for its gold, is absolutely barren, and that it does not produce a pound of food, we cannot be surprised that it should have engrossed at once the attention of the Government in order to give it in the first place something like a substantial judicial administration, and then in the second place an easy and speedy means of communication. I thank my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) for his commendation of the efforts put forward by my colleague the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton). The Minister of the Interior, at great inconvenience to himself, proceeded at once to the ground to find out what was the best means and the shortest route to obtain immediate access to these gold-producing regions, and he came to the conclusion, which I am glad to say is shared by my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper), viz., that a line of railway from the waters of the Stikine River to Teslin Lake would be the most expeditious route, I have seen it stated somewhere that the route should proceed from the interior. I do not say that this would not be a good idea if we were calculating only what should be the ultimate route to be selected. But I do not give this present route from the waters of the Pacific to the waters of Teslin Lake and and the Yukon River as a finality. It is simply a route for immediate communication, and it is intended to provide food and supplies next winter for the thousands of men who will be in that region. That is the object, and the only object we had in view. It was not to establish a perpetual permanent route for a communication which might be more in accordance with the interests of the country—that has to come later. At the present time the only thing we had in view was that the thousands of men who should go into that country the coming summer would not be exposed to starvation next winter, and that there should be an easy and speedy mode of communication to reach that far-distant land.

I shall not now discuss the contract which we made, for it is not opportune at the present moment to enter into such a discussion. Let me say further, that one of the characteristics, and one of the most important objects of the contract which we made, is not only to have a railway communication completed on the first of September, but to have a sleigh road opened by the first of March. That is one of the great objects we wished to accomplish. I shall imitate on this point the action of my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper), and I shall not discuss the subject further, because as I stated this afternoon, the discussion shall commence not later than Tuesday next.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am glad to say that there is one point, if only one, in which I am able to agree with my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper), though he spoke some five or six hours. I agree with him, and most cordially join him in the flattering and well-merited compliments which he paid to the mover and seconder of this Address. My hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Bertram) was preceded here by his fame as an orator, and he has shown us to-day that he can discuss all the questions which affect this country of ours, as intelligently as any old parliamentarian could. My hon. friend from Temiscouata (Mr. Gauvreau) has shown us, from the literary speech he has delivered, that we can expect a great deal from him.

My hon. friend from Temiscouata (Mr. Gauvreau) dilated eloquently upon the lessons to be derived from the Jubilee celebration.

The Jubilee celebration was remarkable chiefly for two distinct and characteristic features. In the first place, it was above all things a tribute of devotion and personal attachment to the Sovereign, to the noble woman who during the course of a long life in the most exalted station has ever displayed those qualities which grace her sex, gentleness and generosity, and who at the same time has shown that she was possessed of those sterner attributes which made her the model of sovereigns, as she was already the model of women, and which have so much endeared her to so many millions of subjects. Of all the touching scenes which were witnessed on Jubilee Day, none was more touching than the singularly warm, singularly sincere expressions of devotion, of love, and of affection, which spontaneously went forth to Her Majesty from her subjects in the poorer quarters of the great metropolis.

From another point of view, the Jubilee celebration was as suggestive as it was impressive. It was a revelation of the wonderful development which has been attained by the British Empire, a revelation of its strength, of its extension, of its cohesion. Those who saw the Jubilee procession from Buckingham Palace to the Cathedral of St. Pauls, could not but have their minds carried back to the ancient days of Rome, to those famous pageants where the victorious general ascended the Via Sacra in a blaze of glory and triumph. It was a triumph indeed, was that procession from Buckingham Palace to the Cathedral of St. Pauls; but it was a triumph, how different, how widely different, from the triumphs of ancient Rome. Here was not a warrior coming after a campaign, laden with the gory spoils of many provinces, or many kingdoms, or with thousands of slaves and prisoners fettered to his chariot—the triumphant in this case was a woman, a woman no longer in the flower of youth, but already marked by the hand of time, and in her cortege were the men of many lands and of many religions—men from the black races of Africa, men from the yellow races of Asia, men from the mixed races of the West Indies; Christians, Mahomedans, Buddhists—but free men all. Free men all, some of them wearing the uniform of the British army and proudly marching to the strain of England's martial airs. And when in front of the noble temple, under the canopy of Heaven, the vast throng reverently invoked the blessing of Almighty God for the aged Sovereign and her vast dominions, a thrill passed over every one present, and each felt in his heart the conviction that, as the Roman Empire had been built up by force and violence, so it had been destroyed by force and violence; but that the British Empire lived, and could live ever, upon the eternal laws of freedom and justice.

And as it is for the British Empire as a whole, so it is for every component part of that Empire. That is the inspiration which shall ever guide us in the discharge of the duty which the Canadian people have entrusted to our care, and it is with this resolve that we, on this day, meet the Commons of Canada.

Mr. MACLEAN. Mr. Speaker, I think I owe it to myself and the newspaper with which I am connected that I should make some reference to the statements made here to-night by the hon. leader of the Opposition. That hon. gentleman has referred to slanderous statements. I can only say this, that we have had on the floor of this House to-night, in connection with the Governor General, something that is slanderous, something that is discreditable to the hon. gentleman who vilified the Governor General as he did to-night. This is not the first occasion on which that hon. gentleman has been criticised by newspapers. If I can gather anything from his speech to-night, he is saying something against the "World" and in favour of a newspaper which dubbed him "a political cracksman." Now, if the hon. gentleman has been misunderstood in regard to this question, he has only himself to blame. On Thursday of last week, on the day when the "Globe" newspaper announced the terms of this Yukon deal, the hon. gentleman found himself in Montreal early on that day. He went into the "Witness" office and asked to be interviewed, and on that occasion he made this statement.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to tell the hon. gentleman that I never was in the "Witness" office in my life.

Mr. MACLEAN. It is the "Gazette" I intended to allude to. The hon. gentleman went into the office of that paper to be interviewed, and was interviewed, and this statement was published in the "Gazette" of the following morning and also in the "World." It is dated, Montreal "Gazette," Friday, January 23, and it says:

Sir Charles Tupper left for Ottawa yesterday (Thursday) afternoon. Before returning to the capital he granted an interview to a "Gazette" representative. Questioned with reference to the Government's Yukon policy, Sir Charles said: "I notice with very great pleasure the announcement that the Government have promptly provided for the maintenance of an all Canadian route to that great gold mining centre, towards which the eyes of the world are now strongly directed. I have no doubt that the measures that they have taken to secure the prompt construction of a sled road between the Stikine River and Teslin Lake, to be made into a good trail as soon as the snow disappears, and followed by the construction of a railway to be opened by September next, will meet with the approval of Parliament. I regard these measures of incalculable value to Canada, and shall be only too glad to give the Government the best support in my power on a question of such vital importance at this moment."

Then the hon. gentleman got on a car and came to Ottawa. Here, the same night he sent for the reporter of the Toronto "Mail" and gave out an interview with himself, showing an energy that is more than surprising in order to get his views before the public and his approval of the deal, and in the "Mail" of the following morning there was this announcement:

Ottawa, Jan. 27.—(Special.)—[Thursday.] Sir Charles Tupper was asked by your correspondent to state his views regarding the Yukon Railway. As to the arrangement made with Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, Sir Charles Tupper said that they were men who had the capital, resources and energy to carry it out. They were probably the only men in Canada who could put the undertaking through in the time that it was specified. Sir Charles gave the Government credit for acting with such vigour as it had shown, and asserts that the opening of the Canadian route strongly urged by him upon both governments interested is the proper course to pursue.

On Friday morning that interview did not appear in the "Citizen" of Ottawa, but instead of it there appeared this rather ominous sentence in an article on the Yukon deal:

And then, think of the tremendous influence a corporation thus richly endowed will be able to wield in the lobby. There may be found supporters of the deal in unexpected quarters. The Government itself has priceless favours at its disposal in the administration of the Yukon gold fields.

The hon. gentleman in making that statement, which he did in several interviews, as leader of the Opposition, to my mind committed a serious blunder. If the Opposition have a case against the Government's policy in regard to the Yukon, it is because first of all they made that contract without consulting Parliament. That is our contention, and I hope it is a sound one. But there is another contention which I will argue as being at the basis of parliamentary government in this country, and it is this, that not only is a government bound to consult Parliament, especially within six days of the meeting of Parliament, but the leader of an Opposition is bound also to consult his followers, and not to commit them to a policy upon which they have not been consulted. We have already had an example of this in this country, and the reason the Conservative party sit on this side of the House is because the Conservative leaders undertook to "jolly" their party into accepting a measure without consulting their friends in the House, as they were in duty bound to do. I stand here to maintain that principle. The leader of the Opposition should have called his followers together before committing them on this question, and most of all he should have awaited the announcement of the full policy; he should have held back; he should have suspected something wrong on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite rather than to have run in and approved of what he is not now quite sure he will approve of when it comes before the House. Now, what happened in Montreal? Why, on Friday night, the "Herald," the organ of hon. gentlemen opposite, quoted Sir Charles's statement, which appeared in the Montreal "Gazette" of that morning, and proceeded to use it to bolster up the case of the Government. Their case apparently required a great deal of bolstering. The Toronto "Globe" took up five columns on the first day to bolster up this deal, and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, I think, took great care that no person should get information of this deal except the "Globe" newspaper.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Nonsense.

Mr. MACLEAN. The "Herald's" article of Friday night was quoted later on by the "Globe," and what does it say:

No one will appreciate better than Sir Charles Tupper the supreme importance and advantage which attach to the unusual safeguards which the Government have obtained as a result of the caution and firmness with which they have moved.

Now, the hon. gentleman seems so anxious to approve of this project—I hope he is going to condemn it later on—that he supplied the Montreal "Herald" with all the ammunition it required. There was a lot more in the "Herald" that night. It had an interview with Col. Tisdale approving of the transaction, and these interviews and the editorials based on them were quoted by the "Globe" of Monday, as follows:—

The Montreal "Herald" has been interviewing public men on the Government's Yukon Railway project. Sir Charles Tupper was among those who gave his views. He had no doubt the measures taken would meet with the approval of Parliament.

I have some doubt whether they will meet with the approval of Parliament.

"I regard these measures," he said, "as of incalculable value to Canada, and shall be only too glad to give the Government the best support in my power on a question of such vital importance at this moment." Sir Charles's only regret was that the bargain was not more speedily entered into, because a great deal of useless expenditure has no doubt been involved by the delay.

Has the hon. gentleman only one regret now in connection with that contract?

I hope he will have a great many, and that he will present them to this House. The "Globe" then goes on to quote the "Herald" as follows:—

Col. Tisdale, another member of the late Conservative Administration, who happened to be in Montreal was also interviewed. He said: "It was necessary to place the work in the hands of reliable and energetic men, and the Government had certainly succeeded in doing this. In the matter of time, he thinks the Government was fully justified in acting promptly and in not waiting for Parliament to meet. Delay was to have been avoided at all hazards."

And Col. Tisdale seems to have the idea that there were not other "reliable and energetic men" to do the work. Where is my hon. friend, the member for Glengarry? Does he say that there is only one firm in this country which can do this work—that no one but Mann & Mackenzie can do it? Why, Mr. Speaker, there are scores of contracting firms in Canada who can do that work just as well and who would do it much cheaper. I protest against the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) taking advantage of his position to say that only one firm could do the work, because he thus gives up half the case that will be urged against the contract when it comes up in the House.

On the same Saturday "La Patrie," the organ of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) took occasion to reply to what "La Presse" had stated on Thursday evening. "La Presse," said "La Patrie," is trying to destroy the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

Some hon. MEMBERS. En Francais.

Mr. MACLEAN. The word used is "détruire," and I suppose, according to the hon. gentlemen, the proper translation of "détruire" is to knife. "La Patrie" went on to say:

"La Presse" objected to the Yukon proposal at the very moment when Sir Charles Tupper, the Conservative chieftain, had proclaimed that this contract would be of incalculable benefit to Canada, and that he would be only too happy in helping the Government in this measure.

Does the hon. leader of the Opposition mean to say that the monopoly clauses in that contract, are of vital importance to this country, and that he will do all in his power to endorse both of those transactions? Will he stand up to-day and say, as he says in his interviews, that he endorses that land grab and that monopoly?

Then, on Saturday "La Patrie" felt justified in publishing the following editorial from which I quote for the benefit of the House:

The sagacity and the energy of our friends in Ottawa in this matter have been recognized by Sir Charles Tupper himself—

The great leader himself recognized this——and by the Hon. Mr Tisdale and by other Conservative chiefs.

The "Globe" has been getting its whole defence of this deal from quotations from what the hon. leader of the Opposition has said in its favour, and on January 29th it said :

The general tone of the press—
Which I deny—

—including Liberal-Conservative and Independent, is favourable to the Government plan for an all-Canadian route to the Yukon district. The "Mail and Empire" says the route is that favoured by Sir Charles, and in an interview published in the Montreal "Gazette," Sir Charles gives his unqualified approval of the scheme.

On behalf of the Conservative press of Ontario—and I think I know them, and I believe they respect me—I desire to say that they are opposed to that deal, that they are opposed to the monopoly clauses and above all opposed to the principle of not putting up that great contract to tender. But what occurred in this city of Ottawa? The "Citizen" of Friday last had the paragraph I have already quoted; but on Saturday morning, instead of using the interviews given to the "Mail" it published this article signed by "Onlooker," and the writer of which, I believe, is not very far away from the hon. gentleman.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name.

Mr. MACLEAN. All I can say is that the ex-Minister of Finance was met on the streets of Ottawa by a friend of his—at least so I am told—who went up to him and congratulated him on the excellent article, and the hon. gentleman was so pleased with the compliment that he did not deny the authorship.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman would allow me one moment, I desire to say that there is not a word of truth in that from beginning to end.

Mr. MACLEAN. Does the hon. gentleman say that it was not his article?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman may be very smart. I was not referring to the article, but to his statement.

Mr. MACLEAN. I gave the statement on hearsay. But I now give him the fact that he was the writer "Onlooker" of that article, and now give him the opportunity of denying it.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend is a journalist, and he knows that as such he is not doing a manly thing in trying to get a secret which is a secret of the editor and the writer alone.

Mr. MACLEAN. The hon. gentleman will not deny that when the hon. leader of the Opposition was seeking in every way possible to commend this contract, the writer of this article signed "Onlooker" was busily arraigning the Government for this Yukon deal, and I can only tell the ex-Finance Minister that this article is the clearest and straightest indictment of the Government that I have yet read in connection with this transaction.

Mr. FOSTER. That is good for "Onlooker."

Mr. MACLEAN. And it is to his credit, and I direct the attention of the leader of the Opposition to this article and the charges which it contains against the Government, and I would ask him to say whether he was faithful to his duty and to his party—and he, as leader, has a duty to his party as well as we as are privates—in rushing headlong to approve of a transaction which is condemned, in the article to which I refer. However, I do not propose to read it to-night, because a great many have seen it but there is one phrase in it which the writer, describing the Toronto "Globe," appeared to be describing a politician well known in this country :

Alas, the Toronto "Globe" has descended to be a prospectus writer to every doubtful Government proposal, the advance agent as it were with its posters—flaring and grandiloquent—for each succeeding scheme of wasteful expenditure and monopoly.

And all this occurred at the very moment when the Conservatives of Ontario were interested, more than at any other time, in what I have called before to-day the transportation problem. If there is one thing which struck the Conservatives of Ontario more than another, it was the indecent way in which at the close of the last session of the Ontario legislature, two subsidies were rushed through, which, we have now found out, were for the benefit of the same people who control the Yukon Railway. The Conservatives of Ontario were discouraged; they saw some connection between the subsidies voted at Toronto and the Yukon deal at Ottawa, and looking forward to the elections about to come off in our province, they expected the Opposition at Ottawa to expose the iniquity of all these deals. Instead of that, however, they found the Conservative leader of the Opposition rushing forward in the most anxious way to approve of the policy of his opponents. This grab at Toronto is in the interests of the Canadian Pacific Railway, as is also this Yukon monopoly, and the Conservatives in Ontario and elsewhere in Canada are getting tired of finding their party and especially their leader approving all these projects for the aggrandisement of the Canadian Pacific Railway, introduced in this House by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Last session many Conservatives were very sore at the fact that the Crow's Nest Railway job—I call it a job—had the unqualified endorsement of the leader of the Opposition. We who were here wished to oppose that project; we thought the hon. gentleman would see his way to oppose that project. But an effort was made to make of us a registering machine for the decrees of hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not wish to be put any longer in that position. When the Crow's Nest Pass was up, the leader of the Opposition closed his speech then in these words:

I do not intend to detain the committee in listening to my very voice further than to say that I regard the measure now submitted to the committee as of such great importance that I am not disposed to deal with it too critically, nor have I the means at my disposal to do so. I can only say that if this is the best proposal that can be submitted to secure the prompt construction of the road, I for one am prepared to give it my humble support.

When is this perpetual support to these Canadian Pacific Railway deals to end, especially when they are proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite and supported by our friends on this side of the House? We have got to decide on some settled policy in regard to these matters on this side of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACLEAN. Yes, and the first plank of that policy will be to trust Parliament and to give every contractor in this country a fair opportunity to tender for Government work. The people in Ontario are altogether in favour of a change in regard to the policy of the Opposition on railway matters. We have got something at stake. We propose—at least some of us propose—to educate the people in regard to these railway questions. We are trying to introduce something that is progressive and in the interest of the people, and not in the interest of the great Canadian Pacific monopoly. We propose to condemn such unconstitutional propositions as the one now before the House. If it had not been for such papers as the Toronto "World," which had the courage to speak out, which had the courage to check the hon. gentleman, the Conservative press of this country would have been silenced in connection with this deal. Indeed, an effort was made to silence the Conservative press, an effort was made to drag them into this deal, but thank God, there is not to-day a Conservative paper in Canada that approves of the deal, and there is not a Conservative paper in Canada that approves of the conduct of the hon. gentleman in rushing forward to sanction this project, or his conduct in going about the country to give it his approval, as he did in Montreal, and especially when his own friends, like the writer of that article signed "Onlooker," when newspapers all over the country were getting ready to denounce this most iniquitous proposal, as I consider it to be. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of some pain to me to make an explanation of this kind. It requires some courage in a member of this House or in a newspaper to state frankly and boldly what he or it thinks. The "World" may not have said what it desired to say in a way that would please the hon. gentleman. Newspapers have got to act quickly sometimes; public opinion must be stirred, and sometimes they have to say things that they cannot directly prove. But if the hon. gentleman has any complaint to make, he must blame it on himself, and especially must he blame himself when he finds the Toronto "Globe" publishing a cartoon which shows the leader of the Government on one side and the hon. gentleman on the other, sanctioning the Government's policy. He should not blame the "World" newspaper for what has happened: he should blame his own indiscretion, and most of all he has himself to blame for not trusting his party, for not consulting his party before he endeavoured to commit them to a policy that is against the public interests of Canada, which is against constitutional practice, and which, if continued, will end in placing this country in the power of the monopoly of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the greatest, the strongest, and most dangerous monopoly in this country to-day.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 7th February, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved:

That the Order for the consideration of the motion for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session have precedence over all other business except introduction of Bills.

Motion agreed to.

GALLICIAN SETTLERS.

Mr. DAVIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to bring to the attention of the Minister of the Interior a report that appears in "Le Manitoba" of 2nd February, from the Rev. R. P. Page, who arrived the day before in Winnipeg from his mission among the Gallicians established in the neighbourhood of Yorkton. He reports that they are in a state of the greatest destitution and are without the necessaries of life. The report is in French, but I can summarize it by saying that Mr. Page gives the idea that these people are in a state of want. He says that the attention of the Minister of the Interior has been called to this, and I should like to know from the Minister whether the report, which is very serious, as to the condition of these people is well-founded, and if so, what steps have been taken by the Government.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The Immigration Commissioner at Winnipeg has full instructions from me to take such measures as may be necessary to prevent any destitution amongst these people. An officer of the department is stationed at Yorkton who is especially acquainted with every family among the Gallicians settled there, and he has the matter under his personal supervision. I think it quite impossible that the report which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) refers to, can be correct, but I will take immediate steps to have inquiry made.

LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR OF NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. DAVIN. I should like to ask the Prime Minister, whether the rumour which is now widespread, that the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has been promised the appointment of Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories, is correct?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The rumour to which my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) alludes cannot be widespread, because it never reached me.

UNITED STATES CUSTOMS REGULATIONS AT SKAGWAY AND DYEA.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, whether he is in a position to make any communication to the House in regard to the question of the customs arrangements in force at Skagway and Dyea? The right hon. gentleman said he would give us the information as early as he possibly could.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am not in a position to give the information to-day, but I affirm what I stated the other day, that we expect to be in a position to make such a statement at a very early date.

THE CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY CONTRACT.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to ask whether my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) expects to lay on the Table of the House to-morrow, the Mann-Mackenzie contract for the construction of the railway?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Yes.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In connection with that subject it would be very interesting if we could have an estimate; if only a probable estimate, but the most correct estimate that can be given, of the amount of gold that has been taken out of the Canadian Yukon country, and as far as may be possible, what proportion of that has been taken out by Canadians, and by persons from other countries.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am not sure to what extent we can supply the information just now asked by my hon. friend, but I am sure that the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) will do all in his power to give every possible information on that subject.

THE UNITED STATES RELIEF EXPEDITION TO THE YUKON.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the Minister of the Interior, or the First Minister, whether he can give any information to the House as to whether the United States Relief Expedition has started into the interior of the country; if so, from what point, and if any United States troops are to accompany it beyond the Canadian frontier.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The information in my possession is to the effect that the United States relief expedition was to sail from some American port for Skagway on or about the first of February. Since then I have received no information. The question of the accompanying of this expedition by United States troops has been a subject of communication between the Government at Washington and the Government here. United States troops under arms will not accompany the expedition over Canadian territory. The question of whether United States troops not under arms shall be allowed to be sent over Canadian territory, for the purpose of more expeditiously reaching American territory on the other side of the 141st meridian, is now under consideration and negotiation between the two Governments.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Bertram for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, in some respects the position assumed by the First Minister on Friday last is unique in the history of this Parliament. I suppose not the most cynical Grit sitting opposite to me would arise in his place and deny that it is of the utmost importance that a public man who leads a great party in this country, whose record extends through many years of opposition to a Government whose policy he did not approve of, and who had made public and repeated pledges to the electorate at various times and in various places—that it is, I say, of the utmost importance that a public man under these circumstances should honestly and thoroughly keep his pledges, and when he came to power, if to power he came, by virtue of the suffrages of the electors, that he should, as the leader of a Government and entrusted with power to carry out the policy which he had previously advocated, at least keep faith with the electorate and carry out those policies which he had deliberately and repeatedly promised from time to time when he was seeking the suffrages of the people. If that be true—and I think both sides of this House will agree in maintaining it—the leader of the Government, now that he has been a year and a half in power, and able to embody his policy in the active work of administration and in public enactment, must have expected to be called upon to listen to a criticism of that eighteen months, and must have felt that it was his duty to have answered the chief points in that criticism. But, Sir, instead of that, the hon. gentleman seems to have been surprised—more than that, to have been somewhat galled. He seems to have felt that it was almost treasonable that my friend the leader of the Opposition should have pretended to call him to account for his one and a half years of stewardship—should have placed before him the pledges he had made, and pointed out their non-fulfilment, and urged with force and strength and logic the position of the Government as against that of the Opposition in this respect. But, Sir, my hon. friend, as I said, appears to have been surprised that such should have been even thought of: and it did seem to me, when he arose and accused my hon. friend of being in an angry and disappointed mood, that he himself offered to this House a spectacle of almost childish anger in the position he took with reference to the criticism that had been made. The hon. gentleman must not allow the adulations and honours which have been his meed for some eighteen months now, to lead him to suppose that he is above criticism, or that, when he takes his place in this House, he is not to stand on a level with every other representative man, and give reasons for his actions, and reply to charges which are made against him. If he does have that idea, the sooner he divests himself of it the better. Now, Sir, what did the hon. gentleman give as a reply to the able and exhaustive, and I am bound to say, the temperate arraignment by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition of his policy during the last eighteen months as compared with the pledges of seventeen years? He commenced by showing his anger, and by administering what he supposed was a severe, but what seemed to me to be a somewhat childish castigation to my hon. friend. He then went on to boast of many things that had been done, without thinking it worth while to prove one of them. He made a meagre and somewhat unfortunate statement as to the proposed Yukon deal. That, he declared, was after all but a temporary measure, intended to get in supplies for next winter. He gave a confused and altogether inadequate explanation of the position he took in Great Britain with reference to preferential trade, on which point he was most strongly arraigned by my hon. friend, and will be held to account in this country from one end of it to the other.

And then, like a good general—no, Sir, but like a man who aspires to be a general, and has never studied the true tactics and science of war, he seeks by a display of rockets and fireworks to divert the attention of his own followers, at least, from the paucity and meagreness of the reply which he has made to the criticisms passed upon him. It is just as if he had a guest who came to him in the morning, stayed with him all day, and got neither dinner nor supper, but whom, late at night, the hon. gentleman took to the door of his hospitable home, put a Roman candle in his hand, touch it off, and as his guest of the day saw it splutter and explode and watched the green and blue lights far off in the heaven, said to him: Au revoir, monsieur, you must now consider you have had an excellent dinner and a good substantial supper, and I wish you a pleasant night's sleep. Well, that is all the right hon. gentleman's followers got from him. Are the hon. gentlemen who sit beside my right hon. friend satisfied with that answer of their leader?

An hon. MEMBER. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. One man—one man out of the whole following is satisfied, and he a Minister of the Crown. Well, Sir, if the party opposite is satisfied with that answer of the leader, the Opposition on this side can afford to be thoroughly satisfied.

But I propose, even though I have to travel over some of the grounds traversed by my right hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper)—and he went over the ground very fully—to make some points, even on the same line, as strongly as I can, in the faint hope that possibly some one of my right hon. friend's colleagues, seeing the utter insufficiency of the reply of their leader, may essay to do something worthy of the occasion. Now, with reference to the Speech from the Throne, upon which this debate is proceeding, we may sum up the first part of it as being an assertion with regard to the political importance, the material progress and the good credit that Canada enjoys to-day. Well, that political importance and that material progress and that good credit, whatever it may be, gentlemen on this side most heartily appreciate and are thankful for. But to say that certain things exist is one thing, and to say that they exist because the party opposite is in power and because my right hon. friend leads that party, is quite another thing. Who made it possible that Canada should have this distinguished political importance which she enjoys in the British world to-day, this material progress and this good credit? I think all will agree with me that three conditions are necessary, and these do not spring up in a day or grow up in a night. These are stable political conditions, good transport facilities, and a varied industrial development. These three conditions are of steady, solid and long growth—not of the mushroom type which spring up in a single night—and we have to clearly and honestly see the difference between the existence of the fact itself and the attributing that existence to certain causes. My hon. friend may boast of these three attributes which Canada possesses, and in boasting of them do honour to himself and his country, but when he seeks to make it apparent that these are in any way the results of the action and policy of his Government, then he makes a claim which we are perfectly justified in discussing. Stable political conditions are necessary, every one will admit. But what would have been the political condition of the Dominion if a certain agitation, begun in a certain portion of the Dominion, carried on by a certain gentleman who to-day occupies the position of Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) had been successful? We cannot forget—it was not more than fourteen years ago—when a gentleman by the name of Fielding, a resident at that time in the province of Nova Scotia, entered upon a propaganda which had for its purpose the taking of Nova Scotia, and if possible New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island out from this confederation and the formation of a union amongst themselves of these provinces. It is fortunate for us that the good sense and long-headedness of the people of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island did not allow them to go the length of even sympathizing with the views of the hon. gentleman, and it speaks well for that caution of the hon. gentleman, which is, perhaps, to a large extent, his best characteristic, that when he saw it was hardly possible to accomplish his purpose, he let the agitation die out and it has never been heard from since.

But if Mr. Fielding, the Finance Minister of to-day, had been able to work out his sweet will, this Dominion would not be what it is to-day, and these stable conditions, which contribute so much to our political importance and good credit, would not exist.

Memory takes me back also to the agitation, not many years old, participated in by my right hon. friend and his colleagues to his left and his right, when the Liberal party bowed before Mr. Erastus Wiman and his commercial union scheme with the United States, and which they carried on with might and main, even after the defection of their strongest man and old-time leader (Mr. Blake), who characterized it as likely to dis sever the good relations which heretofore existed between Canada and the mother country and lead to intimate political connection with the United States. The good, hard common-sense of the electorate of Canada balked the attempt, but if it had not been balked, if these hon. gentlemen opposite had been successful, where would be now the stable conditions which gives political importance and good credit to Canada in the Jubilee year of Her Majesty?

Sir, with reference to good transport facilities, who does not know that one of the best indications of Canada's credit in the old world is the quotations of Canadian Pacific Railway stocks. It is almost, if not really, as good as the quotations of Canada's Government securities, and why? The quotations of Canadian Pacific Railway stocks is the barometer of the commercial credit and expansion of this country, and they go up as monied men and business men in commercial centres read into them the progress and expansion of the trade and traffic of this country. Where was the Liberal party, under the leadership of my right hon. friend and his predecessors, when the fate of the Canadian Pacific Railway was hanging in the balance, waiting upon the vote of this Parliament, when it was fighting for its existence, and when the Dominion of Canada felt through and through that as fortune went on, that occasion, so would the weal or the disaster of the country and of the whole Canadian people.

It had at that time assumed such an importance, was of such a nature, that if it had failed, it would have been a failure of Canada, and would have been so regarded in the different countries of the world. When the battle was fought for industrial improvement in this country, the National Policy was started in 1876, where were hon. gentlemen opposite, who to-day talk of the political importance, the material progress and of the good credit of this country? They were banded in complete and in utter opposition to both the principle and practice of protection. They followed the same course from that time, but were thwarted again, by the good strong common sense of the electors of Canada. In 1887, their former leader bowed his head to the inevitable and counselled his party to accept an established fact and make the best of it, but was thrown over for giving that advice, and the battle went on under a new leader until—strange nemesis—in 1897 the new leader in the hour of victory turned around and embraced that very principle and practice which for seventeen years his party had denounced. Sir, these are the things which have made Canada a country whose political importance, material progress and credit are noteworthy throughout the world and are regarded with pride by every Canadian.

Another point that is taken up in the Speech from the Throne is a promise—no, not a promise, but a hope, a somewhat distant hope held out that the burthens of this country shall be decreased. How? Decreased, Sir, by reason of the good credit of the country standing on the foundations which I have spoken of. We are told that the credit of this country will enable the Finance Minister, when the present loans fall due bearing a comparatively high rate of interest, to renew them with loans bearing a lower rate of interest. So that the present Grit doctrine with reference to lightening the burthens and reducing the taxes of the people takes an entirely new form; it is to be measured by the decrease in the rate of interest that can be got when we come to renew our current loans. Oh, what a fall was there! And yet we are told that all pledges have been kept. Who of us is there whose ears are not still ringing with Grit denunciations of the Liberal-Conservative party? Who does not clearly remember their hot and streaming tears of sympathy for the overburdened electors? And what did they promise to do, these true knights of financial science who had bared their swords and buckled on their armour and who were going into the contest to rescue the overburdened electors and to release them from their shackles of over-taxation and expenditure? What was their doctrine then? They cried that the burdens of the people were monstrous and must be alleviated. How? By lessening taxation, by economy, by reduction of expenditure and of the debt. But we have heard nothing of that within the last eighteen months. All that has passed away into that-not-very-far-off oblivion where lie buried side by side the many pledges that the Grit party has made within the last seventeen years. Ah, no, I must not forget that there is another method. The valiant Knight of Denunciation of former years spoke not long ago since in the city of Toronto. He had but little hope for decreasing expenditure then. He must have felt that new light had dawned upon him, for I doubt if ever before he had stood on a platform when the staple article of his speech was not a denunciation of the burdens put upon the people and asseveration of his desire and his intention to lessen them by doing away with over-expenditure and lessening the taxation. When he spoke at Toronto he had not even thought of this patent device of the Finance Minister to hold out the hope of a little lightening of the burdens of the taxpayers in future years when our current loans are renewed, which will be soon, but he was going to decrease the burdens of the people by bringing in population. Last year he sympathized with some gentleman on this side of the House belonging to the maritime provinces and deplored the little increase in population as compared with former times. But to-day, Sir, this young and lusty Knight intends to endeavour in every way he can individually and collectively with his party to increase the population of the country and so lessen the per capita burdens of each individual.

The next thing referred to in the Speech is the reduction of duties, that is the tariff measure which was introduced and carried through this House last year and which produced, it is said, such a favourable impression in England. And the reference is not veiled but open that one of the great merits of that measure was that it produced a wonderful feeling of sympathy in Great Britain. Sir, I should think that this should be one of the last things in the course of their history as administrators of this country that hon. gentlemen opposite would allude to, for, if there is anything which was commenced under false pretenses, which was based upon false grounds and which has led in every case to humiliation, backdown and disaster, it is that particular feature of the tariff legislation which they carried through the House last year. What are the facts with regard to that so-called preferential legislation? In the first place these hon. gentlemen legislated in the face of treaties which were well known and which for thirty years had been on the records of the Imperial Parliament and had been sanctioned by statutes of that Parliament. They legislated in the face of despatches which, over and over again affirmed the scope and validity of those treaties and their binding character. They legislated in the face of actual decisions worked out in the practical business of customs administration. Canada had been in one or two or more instances reminded of the existence of these treaties, and asked that she should adhere to them in good faith, which Canada did do. They uttered their legal dicta, those gentlemen, some who were lawyers and some who were not, with the greatest assurance that they were right and that every one else was wrong. Why, even the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), though disclaiming to be learned in the law, thought that as a man of common sense he might venture his opinion, and he did. His opinion was that as these were not preferential in their nature, that as they were wide open, so to speak, and for the acceptance of all under conditions which were specified, they did not partake of the nature of discrimination, and consequently they were not in violation of those treaties, and would not so be held. The hon. gentleman differed from some of his colleagues as to this legislation. On the one hand, many of his colleagues declared then and have declared since that this was preferential legislation, a preference for Great Britain alone; but the Minister of Trade and Commerce declared that it was not preferential in essence, that it was not meant for Great Britain alone, but was open to the whole civilized world. He says :

But I say with respect to the offer we now make, that it is not a preferential offer at all in the true, legal sense of the word. That offer is open to all the whole world. The Americans may avail themselves of it, and so may the Germans and the Belgians. The whole world are welcome to avail themselves of it on the same terms and the same conditions on which England may take advantage of it.

And then in another part of his speech, he says :

If the Americans were willing to give us full and fair reciprocal advantages, I would recommend trading with them for the benefit of Canada and the Empire, too; and I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) may find out before he is many years older that very probably, although I admit it is a little round-about way, this is not a bad way to get it.

So that the Minister of Trade and Commerce had this idea, that it was not meant for England primarily or particularly, but that it was open to the whole world, and that under its operations he expected to compass the round of the nations, taking them in one by one, and amongst them, and not the least, the United States of America as well. But, Sir, the right hon. gentleman who leads this Government gave his legal opinion, too. Of course, the hon. gentleman has been a long time engaged in politics, and political strife is not very consistent with the daily duties and readings of a law office; but such knowledge as he had, and such legal lore as he could summon, were brought to bear upon this question, and when I asked him across the floor of the House if he would tell the House before we were called upon to vote whether :

He considers that if this resolution passes and becomes law he is bound to give the same treatment to Belgium and Germany and other countries that have with Great Britain most-favoured-nation treaty clauses ?

He said :

If you want my answer now, I decidedly say that it does not apply to either Belgium or Germany.

But, Sir, the climax was reached when my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), as the legal luminary and Ajax of the party, set his gigantic legal intellect into evolution, and forcibly—speaking in the physical sense—made his points, one by one, to the discomfiture of all opponents, and of the Law Lords of Great Britain. He said :

I thereby submit that in the face of our customs autonomy, and in the absence of any such restrictions as exist in the Australian Constitutional Acts, and in virtue of the limitation on the treaty-making powers of the Crown, and the absence of Imperial and colonial legislation giving effect to these treaties, they do not apply to Canada. * * * * I say that this resolution neither discriminates nor differentiates, it attaches no terms which are not common to Great Britain and to all countries, and if Great Britain's fiscal system entitles her, as it does, to the immediate benefits which are daily flowing from the acceptance of our conditions, and if Germany and Belgium do not get the same advantages now, it is not because of our legislation or our offer, but because of their own refusal to comply with the conditions which we have put in our offer.

And when the hon. leader of the Opposition ventured to say that there had been some little legal argument made upon this side of the House, my hon. friend rose indignantly to reply :

He was supported in his position by the other Ministers, some of them, not altogether undistinguished as lawyers in the locality from which they come.

Of course, not comparing with my hon. friend, but then they were not altogether undistinguished. But he said :

Can the hon. leader of the Opposition produce the opinion of a prominent lawyer, or even of a fledgling lawyer, endorsing the absurd and ridiculous statement? He, the leader of the great Conservative party, is, I am proud to say, alone in the position which he takes.

Well, Sir, this legal Ajax of the Government took himself, and his arguments, and his title, and went to London. He argued the case forcibly and learnedly before the Law Officers of the Crown. He urged all that he had urged here, and I suppose a great deal more. And, Sir, what was the result? That after a little time the answer came, and a tolerably distinct answer it was. The Law Officers advised :

That the Crown is bound by the German and Belgian treaties in respect of trade between these countries and Canada, that the obligation in these treaties that the produce of Germany and Belgium shall not be subject to any higher or other duties than those which may be imposed upon similar articles of British origin, is absolute and unqualified, and as the United Kingdom has been admitted to the benefit of the Canadian reciprocal tariff, Germany and Belgium are entitled to it also. * * * The Law Officers advise also that on the admission of Germany and Belgium, the benefit of the reciprocal tariff must be extended to all countries entitled in Canada by treaty to most-favoured-nation treatment in tariff matters. Notice was given on the 30th of July to terminate the treaties, and in the meantime effect should at once be given in accordance with the undertaking given by your Ministers to the Law Officers' decision, the excess of duties levied should be repaid on demand. Despatch follows by mail.

That is the answer, that is the humiliation, that is what I consider the disaster; because it can never add to the prowess and standing of Canada when its Government takes a position so adverse, so patently adverse, to great treaties and enactments, and finds afterwards that objections had been fairly taken to it. A better way than that might have been found, and I will point it out by-and-by. But nothing daunted the vallant knight. He came back, wearing the laurels of his defeat with a jaunty air, and was tendered a banquet at Charlottetown. He waxed eloquent while speaking; metaphors and similes crowded into his brain, and he declared:

The germ planted in 1892 has grown and flourished into a green bay tree, and to-day the birds of the air, not only in this country, but in the countries of Europe, are lodged in its branches.

It seems to me that when I read Bible history in my school days—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FOSTER. And the reckless jollity with which some hon. members meet this remark shows that, judging from themselves, they have little faith in my reading it when I am grown up—it seems to me when I read Bible history, that a green bay tree was something to which the wicked were likened; and my hon. friend, without knowing it, was most appropriate in the simile which he used. But my hon. friend will have a quarrel soon with his right hon. leader, because his leader declared here on Friday that the first step was taken in this matter when he was in England last year and when the treaties were denounced. Now, it appears that his lieutenant declared at Charlottetown that the germ had been planted in 1892, that it had grown for five years until it had come to be this mighty bay tree. And to what purpose was this mighty bay tree prostituted? The birds of the air, not only in this country, but in European countries, nestled in its branches. Later on in his speech the hon. gentleman, wearing still, I say, with a jaunty air, the laurels of defeat, said something like this:

With reference to the preferential trade resolution, he had been appointed to argue the case before the Law Officers of the Crown. He would not weary his hearers with a synopsis of the argument. Suffice to say that he had been successful.

“And now the unity of the Empire is a proclaimed fact, ringing up and down the universe,” he added. My hon. friend has a disposition which I envy him. In success he can smile and be jubilant; in the bitter hours of defeat he smiles equally and is equally jubilant, because he thinks he has been successful even when he has been defeated.

So much, then, with respect to the legal position of the matter. But, Sir, there is something which is more blameworthy than this. The hon. gentlemen opposite created a false impressiion at home, which means much, and abroad, which means more, with respect to this clause in their tariff. The impression they created was that it emanated from the desire largely dominant in the Canadian heart for exclusive trade relations with Great Britain and the British Empire, and they heralded it abroad in Canada and in Great Britain, as being a measure which gave its advantages to Great Britain, and to Great Britain alone. That was the impression which was sought to be created in this country, and which hundreds of thousands of people believed to be the true state of things until the whole matter was sifted and explained. It was the impression it produced in Great Britain, which ran into the Jubilee celebration and which lasted somewhat longer than the celebration, but reached an inglorious end at last when at length the result of the investigation of the facts came to be known. No less a person than Mr. Kendrick Murray, the secretary of the London Chamber of Commerce, says that

The expectation of the traders has undoubtedly been disappointed by the extension to practically all countries, except the United States, of what was previously supposed to be an exclusive British preference.

Mr. Kendrick Murray simply echoes the impression made everywhere and cultivated sedulously in Great Britain, that this was a meed of benefit given solely to Great Britain and her traders. I think, Sir, that it is very unfortunate when hon. gentlemen, because they cannot agree among themselves as to a definition of their policy, add two meanings to it and arrange to adopt either of them by which they will be able at the time to do the most good; to argue that the clause is not preferential exclusively to Great Britain, when they have to meet men in favour of wider commerce; that it is exclusively for Great Britain, when they have to meet the sentiment that asks and longs for the closest exclusive trade relations between Great Britain and all her colonies. It is particularly unfortunate that Great Britain should ever have the experience of finding out that a Canadian Prime Minister and a Canadian Government were so unfortunate in the expression of their policy, to say the least, that they led the British people to believe they gave one thing when in fact they were giving another and a very different thing.

But what has been the effect of this course? Hon. gentlemen opposite have been shown to be all wrong in their action; duties collected have had to be repaid, with the attendant costs; the scope of the clause was larger than they had intended, and if one says in excuse: Well, when notice was given by Great Britain that the treaties would be denounced, it was found by the decision of the Law Officers of the Crown that until the denunciation became effective the most-favoured nations' goods had to be admitted under that clause, if any one as an apologist of the Ministry makes that argument now, I cite him the other fact, and that is, that under that clause the Ministers themselves have opened up the benefits of it to nations and countries which have no most-favoured-nation treaties with us at all, and are entirely outside the pale. Hon. gentlemen opposite first denied that the effect of the clause would go further than England. They were wrong. They then denied that it would go further than Belgium and Holland at all events. They were wrong. They next denied that it would go further than the most-favoured treaty nations. They were wrong. Japan and the Netherlands came and demanded entry for their goods under this clause, and they were accorded entrance. To-day, as Mr. Kendrick Murray states, there is not a great country in the world whose commerce is worth much, outside the United States, which is not having the advantage of the same clause; and yet hon. gentlemen were Jubilee heroes and took Jubilee honours which largely came to them on the faith they inculcated that Canada had in the Jubilee year made a magnificent and exclusive gift to Great Britain out of good heart and good will alone.

What have been the results of this action? It was stated that it would make a great change in the commercial trend, and that Great Britain's trade with this country would increase under this preferential advantage of one-eighth first, and later of two-eighths or one-fourth. Has it? The facts have a right to speak, the facts must be heard; and as the facts were against hon. gentlemen in those other particulars I have mentioned, the facts are equally against them in this respect. The truth is that the imports from Great Britain to this country have suddenly fallen under the one-eighth advantage which those hon. gentlemen claimed they had given to Great Britain. We have, unfortunately not received the last quarterly report of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, which should have been due on 1st January, I think, and so there is nothing to go on in the way of public record but the first quarterly report and the English returns. Let me take the English returns first. I find by the English returns that the exports of Great Britain to British North America for the nine months ending 30th September, 1896, were of the value of $12,800,000. For the same period of 1897 it was $11,765,543, or a decrease of 8½ per cent in English trade so far as England's exports to this country are concerned, assuming that the imports to Newfoundland were equal in both periods.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright. I did not catch what my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) is quoting.

Mr. FOSTER. The nine months ending 30th September.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. How are you making your comparison, for 1895 or 1896?

Mr. FOSTER. 1896 and 1897 are the two years.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I thought you said 1895?

Mr. FOSTER. There was a decrease of 8½ per cent in English trade with us. In cotton goods there was a decrease from $1,729,353 to $1,450,241; in linens from $573,347 to $446,579; in laces, silks and that like, the reduction was from $33,823 in one case to $20,911, and in the other from $114,936 to $77,739. Iron and steel goods decreased from $2,309,000 to $1,669,900, and apparel decreased from $1,395,642 to $1,152,314, and so on through the list that is given. Now, I am free to admit that this takes in but five months of the actual working of the preferential tariff, but at all events that is the state of things as developed by the Trade Returns from Great Britain.

How is it then with reference to the imports from the United States; because one great glory of this new legislation was, that it was to increase British trade with us and to decrease United States trade with us; at least to change the relative proportions of the two. From the United States, during the eight months up to the 31st of August of these two periods, the import of corn in the last period increased to $2,267,901 as against $1,761,230 in the preceding period. The imports from the United States of manufactures of iron and builders' hardware, increased from $379,546 worth to $389,015 worth, and so on through a considerable list. I cannot avoid upon this point, calling the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce to an argument that he once made; seriously made I have no doubt. I want to present it to him and to ask, if he will seriously make it again. I know his stubborn adhesion to a thing he has once said, even though it be wrongly said, but I have yet hope that in this case, the thing is so patent and so clear, that my hon. friend will say that he has erred. In 1897, in this House ("Hansard," p. 1244) Sir Richard Cartwright said :

Under the tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite, England and the importation of England's goods was discriminated against to an extraordinary degree. In 1896 we exported to England, apparently, $66,000,000 worth of our products ; to the United States, $44,000,000 worth. We bought from England, $32,000,000 ; and from the United States, $58,000,000. There, if you will, is a genuine practical discrimination to an enormous extent against England and in favour of the United States, under the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Now comes an afterthought ; it struck him and he gave it vent :

I have always said that the National Policy was a Yankee device imitated from the Yankees, and in fact a benefit to them chiefly, and there is the proof of it.

Well, Sir, if the tariff of his opponents, the National Policy tariff, discriminated, as he called it, and discriminated to that extent against England in favour of the United States, what is the result of last year's Liberal tariff ? It is astounding. It is that in 1896 we exported $66,000,000 worth of products to Great Britain and $44,000,000 to the United States ; and in 1897, we exported to Great Britain $77,000,000 and to the United States $49,000,000, being an increase in exports to Great Britain of $11,000,000, and an increase of exports to the United States of $5,000,000. But when we come to the discriminatory part, it stands in this way : That whereas in 1896, we took from Great Britain $32,000,000—and so discriminated against Great Britain enormously according to the Minister of Trade and Commerce—yet in 1897 we took only $29,000,000. And, whereas we took from the United States $58,000,000 in 1896, under this preferential tariff which was to remedy this gross discrimination against Great Britain, we actually took $61,000,000 of their imports.

Now, Sir, the logic in the case is irrefutable. If there were an enormous discrimination against Great Britain under the former tariff measure, to the extent of these imports relatively, it is still greater and still more enormous under the new tariff, because under it the imports are less from Great Britain and the imports are greater from the United States of America. But, Sir, it was stated that this new tariff would reduce the taxation ; that is, would reduce the rate of duty. Has it done so ? Taking the three months' report of my hon. friend, the report from July to September of 1896, I find that the total imports were $17,690,000, the duty paid $5,210,000, and the percentage of duty 29·56 per cent. That, be it remembered, was in 1896, under the old tariff. During the three months under the new tariff the imports were $17,764,000, the duty was $5,127,000, and the percentage rate of duty was 28·86 per cent. That is, under this new tariff—without protection, and when all its robbery and attendant piratical influences and effects were swept away, and the new and rejuvenated tariff of the hon. gentlemen was brought in—the total reduction in the percentage of duty in the three months compared with the three months in the preceding year (in which first three months the preferential tariff was in vogue) the total reduction of duty amounts to the enormous sum—and now the burdened taxpayers will surely breathe freely—the reduction in the rate of duty amounts to the enormous sum of 70-100ths of one per cent. If ever that old Latin quotation : "the mountain laboured and brought forth a ridiculous mouse," ought to be resuscitated for use, this is the proper time to call it to the attention of my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright). But, Sir, the hon. gentleman went still further. The First Minister, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Finance, and every one of the Ministers, and all of those who echoed their words have declared, that the tariff has been revised from the old protectionist basis, and that now we have practically a revenue tariff.

The right hon. the leader of the House said on Friday last that he had fulfilled his pledge : that there should not be a duty for protective purposes, but simply for revenue purposes. I take the goods which were imported and which I referred to in the illustration when I was comparing the imports from Great Britain, and figuring out the percentage of duty under this tariff, what is the result ? Clothing is now 31 per cent. Does my hon. friend mean to tell me that 31 per cent is only a revenue duty, and that there is no protection in it ? Dress goods, 32½ per cent—is that a revenue duty, with no protection in it ? Knitted goods 32 per cent ; hats and caps, 30 per cent ; cottons, bleached, dyed and coloured, 31 per cent ; coal, 23 per cent—is that a revenue duty, may I ask the Minister of Finance ? Rice, 59 per cent—is that a revenue duty, I may ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce ? I remember his impassioned deliverances of many years ago against that rice duty ; and here we have—I am not sure that it is not concealed under the mechanism of a double duty—a duty of 59 per cent on the people's rice. Manufactured cotton goods, 27½ per cent—is that a revenue duty ? Cutlery and hardware, tools and implements, 27½ per cent. Pickles and sauces, 32 per cent ; provisions, lard, meats, &c., fresh, 32½ per cent ; and coal oil—I forbear to wound the susceptibilities of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) by stating just what the amount of that duty is ; but I beg leave to call his attention to these words :

It was a specific duty of seven and one-fifth cents per gallon at that time, and Mr. Davies asserted that the rate amounted to a protection of 123 per cent on the coal oil imported into Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. He concluded with a touching appeal to the House for sweeping away this enormous anomaly. He said: "I plead on behalf of the mass of the people—not on behalf of the rich people in cities and towns, who have their electric light and gas—but for the great mass of the people who are obliged to buy this oil. This is class legislation of the worst kind. It bears most seriously upon the Maritime Provinces, and it bears with enormous weight upon the poorer classes in the Maritime Provinces."

And yet this is a duty for revenue purposes, and there is not a vestige of protection in it! Shall I go any further in attempting to prove the statement with which I commenced, that in the whole outcome of that legislation the Minister's words and predictions have been falsified in every respect by the decisions of the law officers of the Crown, by the arbitrament of the facts, and by the course of business history during the last six months; and to-day, Sir, we have a tariff law in effect which gives privileges to nine-tenths of the foreign countries in the world, and withholds them from nine-tenths of our sister British colonies, all in the name of kinship and imperial unity. We have, Sir, a tariff under whose operation we find that Great Britain's trade decreases, that that of Belgium increases, and that that of Germany increases, and despite which the trade from the United States increases as well. But, Sir, they say, look at the increased exports; that is a proof that this policy has been successful. Is it? Let us see. The increased exports are in round numbers $16,900,000 this year. I am going to say nothing about the higher prices, and nothing about famines and causes for these higher prices; every one understands them. But I am going to subject to scrutiny that argument which they have been vaunting throughout the length and breadth of this country as a proof of the wisdom of their policy, that though the imports have fallen off, the exports have increased by $16,900,000. Well, Sir, I do not suppose that the very fact of hon. gentlemen having put this clause in their tariff late in the year 1897, made apples four times as great a crop for exportation as they were in the year before, and gave $1,000,000 of an increase in exports. I do not suppose that clause or that tariff legislation was the cause that the export of butter was doubled, giving a little over $1,000,000 to the good of the export column; that wool increased in export by twice as much, and added $600,000 extra to the volume of exports; that hides added $500,000; that grain added $6,000,000; that flour added $1,000,000; that the mines added $3,200,000; and that the forests, including manufactures of lumber, added some $4,000,000; making in all $17,500,000 more than the total increases in exports. Not one of these articles was affected in the remotest degree by the tariff legislation of last session; and in reference to every one of them, if any effect can be claimed for any policy, it can be claimed for the policy which was initiated and established by the Government which preceded that of hon. gentlemen opposite, and which they had the good sense to follow out and not to destroy. Wherever these gentlemen have fulfilled their pledges, they have hurt the industries of this country. They have not hurt as many industries as they otherwise would have done, I may call to the attention of the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram), because they have not kept those pledges which he was naive enough to say had caused a feeling of distrust and want of confidence in the Liberal policy all through this country. Nor, Sir, has their tariff in any respect lessened the burdens of the country. A rather peculiar thing which is worth mentioning, is this. I find that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was in London, and whilst there he addressed a meeting; I am not sure but it was a meeting of the Chamber of Commerce; and in the course of that address, he made several statements which call for notice. In the first place, he effectually condoned all his sins of fifteen years in affirming that this country was burdened beyond redemption by the debt which had been piled up, by declaring to an audience of business men in the heart of London:

While it might be mentioned that the Government had to some extent mortgaged its future by reason of the large expenditures which had been incurred by developing the illimitable natural resources of the country, they did not, however, face the future with fear and trembling, but with confident hope and assurance. They felt that what they had incurred they would be able to pay.

And what they had incurred was for the purpose of developing the illimitable natural resources of this country. But, Sir, he went further:

They felt that what they had incurred they would be able to pay; and in the present year, by making both ends meet, they had given the best answer to those who had asserted that they had acted too hastily.

Did the Government make both ends meet? Had the Finance Minister so certified to the Minister of Trade and Commerce? Was the Minister of Marine and Fisheries under the impression that he was electioneering somewhere in Prince Edward Island under the shadow of that green bay tree, under which the wicked too often shelter themselves, and was just as oblivious of what ought to be truthfully stated there as he is sometimes in the electioneering campaigns in this country? He stated to the business men, the financiers of London, that this Government were making both ends meet this year, and so were erecting for themselves an imperishable monument. How did they make both ends meet? By spending the largest sum on consolidated funds account that has ever been expended in this country—by incurring a deficit of $519,981 on current consolidated expenditure account alone. Yet, he says, they made both ends meet. And over and above this, they have spent on capital account $4,000,000 and increased the debt by over $3,000,000. And yet this kind of reckless statement is made in financial London to the statesmen and business men of Great Britain, that this Government had made both ends meet, and so had earned for themselves the plaudits of all good men. But there were some other admissions. There was, at one time, he said, in the Dominion, arising from causes which he could not explain, a sort of desire or premonition that the future of this country would be bound up with the future of the United States. Did my hon. friend try to explain that? Did he try to investigate the causes? Could he not have found them? Could he not have found them in the campaign of 1891, in which he and his party ran full tilt for discrimination against Great Britain and the closest commercial relations with the United States, as being the foundation of such an impression? And yet my hon. friend, again sheltering himself under the shade of that green bay tree, naively put it aside as something too deep for his explanatory powers to grapple with.

Sir Louis Davies is also reported as having said :

He observed that Canada, small as was her population, had fought the battle of life under a system of fiscal government that he did not approve of. He was a free trader.

Now, some one said the other night, in the course of this debate, that there were no free traders amongst the Liberals. I think it was the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Bertram). If he did, I now ask him to revise his statement. When a man stands up in the middle of London and says to his audience: "I am a free trader," what does it mean? Does it mean that he is a revenue protectionist to the extent of 29.86 per cent? Surely not. But one impression could be given, namely, that he was a free trader, as the term is understood in Great Britain—a free trader of the good old Cobden school. The only impression could be that he stood on the very same platform with his leader Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who was so good a free trader of the Cobden school, that he put away from him and Canada—which is the most serious part of it—the best opportunity we ever had of getting trade relations with the Empire which would be invaluable to us. He also took up the argument of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), that the policy of the past had been discrimination against Great Britain and that the policy of this Government was just the reverse. But I have shown you how this Government has acted towards Great Britain. Later on, he went on to say, much the same as his leader :

That England has protected us with her army and fleets, she has given us civil and religious liberties, she has never asked us to contribute one cent towards that army and fleet. Out of the fulness of our heart and our love we have now yielded to the desire to cement more strongly the bond of union which ought to unite the mother country and the colonies, and are prepared to propose a preferential tariff, the result of which will be that British goods will be admitted to Canada much lower than any foreign goods.

Now, the date of this meeting I do not know, because it is not given here, but I take it, that it was probably after—yes, it was, as I see by the context—after the decision of the law officers of the Crown, that we were bound by the treaties. Now, if there was any meaning in that sentence, it means that these hon. gentlemen, having found out that they were mistaken, and having run through with this comedy of theirs, are now prepared, at the earliest date this session, to excise that article from their tariff and to place in the tariff a clause which shall give to Great Britain, and Great Britain alone, preferential advantages—not admitting any other country to a participation in them. I mention that to clinch the argument made by my hon. friend the other night and to add weight to it. But if we are to believe that, what are we to believe with reference to the statement of the hon. Finance Minister, who, when asked at Sheffield whether there would be any change in the tariff, declared :

We do not believe in tariff tinkering; it hurts business. Therefore, although I did not go so far as my free trade proclivities would have carried me, there will be no more important changes made at the next session.

Now, if this change is made, it will be a most important change; and there is, therefore, diametrical opposition between the statement of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) and the statement of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding).

In another part the Minister of Finance was asked squarely the question: "Do you intend to give Great Britain exclusive preferential advantages by legislation?" And my hon. friend, with that caution which he exercised over much, because sometimes it does not conduce to clearness or perspicuity, replied pretty much in these words: I must tell you, Sir, in answer to that question, that having put our hand to the plough, we do not intend to turn back. Now, Mr. Speaker, that may be either a negative or a positive or nothing at all. I wish we could get a definite reply from my hon. friend. I suppose that if I were to meet him some very cold morning and say to him : Good morning, it is a very cold morning, he would not say "yes" or "no," but would say : Well, I think we will have to be guided by the reading of the thermometer. He would be very careful not to commit himself.

Now I proceed to another branch of the subject. It is brought out by the assertion of the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram) that the Ministry have fulfilled all the pledges they ever gave. That was his statement. Now, the hon. member for Centre Toronto is tolerably past the years of youth. He is not an old man, but old enough to know the importance of the statement that he makes. Had he really looked into the matter, had he read the pledges, and had he come to the conclusion that he could stand in the face of the House of Commons—not on a hustings platform—and make the statement that the Ministry had fulfilled every pledge they had made? I am afraid my hon. friend will have to revise that position. Let us see one of the pledges that the Ministry made. Here, I may say that pledges can be made in two ways by a party in opposition. They can be made by the trend and meaning of statements impressed generally upon the people, or they can be made, in so many definite words, clearly declaring for certain things. In both those respects, the gentlemen who to-day are governing this country have made pledges, over and over, to the people which they have not pretended to implement and which they do not propose to implement. Why, what shall we think of the position taken by my hon. friend the Postmaster General, and the later position taken by this Government of which he is such a distinguished, clear-headed member.

My hon. friend, when he was a member of the Opposition, fought hard and long, he observed widely and keenly, and came to the conclusion that one of the most dangerous elements in the political life of to-day was this facility with which governments could modify or control the actions of the members who supported them, by dangling offices before their eyes. I am not going to say he was wrong; but if he was right then, what business has he to sit in the Government which violates that principle to-day? No reason except that of preferment and emolument. If a man believes as a cardinal principle that it is corrupting and debasing to the politics of this country that members shall sit behind the Government with promises of offices in their pockets, he has no business to remain in a Government which does that thing. Are his words not fresh before the members of this House :

Sir, if the Government of the day can dangle public offices before their followers, and induce a few, and perhaps an increasing number, to aspire to these positions, instead of representing their constituencies here and exercising an unbiased judgment and a wholesome influence upon the Administration of the day, they become mere parasites upon the Administration and cease to voice the opinions of their constituents. Not only do they do that, but moving among their colleagues, they become, as it were, corrupting agencies among their own ranks. And so, a small percentage of persons in that position are likely to impair the independence of the whole body. So it has become, in my opinion, a crying abuse, and Parliament is cast down from its high position. And not only is the will of the people being interfered with, not only is Parliament being subordinated to the Administration, but there is even a worse evil growing out of this abuse. All through the country the electorate, noticing these things, are coming to the conclusion that the highest aim a man can have in seeking public life is that he may, through Parliament, find his way to a comfortable position for life. If that becomes the highest aim of those who seek public life, then public life becomes a means, not of advantage to the public but of private gain. And thus we shall have coming into public life office seekers, place-hunters, instead of those ready to make sacrifices for the love of their country, and ready to undertake the labours of public life for the good they can do in the interest of the people. So that whether we view this evil with regard to its influence on the existing House, or with regard to its demoralizing influence upon public opinion, in either case, I submit, it is of such pernicious character as to demand the earliest interference on the part of this Parliament.

He introduced a Bill, and in advocacy of that Bill said :

How can a member of this House, who has the promise from the Government of a position of emolument be free to vote or take a stand as a representative of the people against the will of the Government? However independent he may desire to be, that relation entirely destroys his usefulness as a representative of the constituency which sent him here.

Men will come here not to serve the country generally, but the government of the day, in order that they themselves may profit and the interests of their constituents will only take a very secondary position.

I ask my hon. friend : If that were true then, if those words were the outcome of an honest heart and a firm conviction that public policy should be moulded upon the sentiments then expressed, why does he remain in a Government which for eighteen months has violated every canon that he laid down and has practically reduced men in this House to a condition of vassalage by raising an expectancy of office yet to come? Sir, there sat over yonder, during one or two sessions of this House, a gentleman, the law partner, I believe, of the leader of this Government. And it was common report all through this city, and that from the best of sources, that a judgeship was his, and it only required the time that was necessary in order to make that arrangement before he should take his seat upon the bench. How comes it, Sir, that Mr. François Langelier sat in that seat over yonder, at variance with his party's management, from top to bottom, at variance upon public questions which were debated in this House, and yet said no word. Not until a year and a half had passed and he felt that which had been promised him by the Premier of this country was likely to slip out of his grasp, did he make the ignoble kick on ground of patronage, while questions of principle had been passed over again and again. Will the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) justify his Government? And will my hon. friend (Mr. Mulock) justify his leader in holding out—no, not holding out, but actually putting into the pocket of a member of this House—the promise of either a judgeship or a governorship, a promise which he had to implement, not because of good will, but because forced by the revolt of his followers against delaying the gift of patronage to his supporter? Sir, who cannot remember that after Mr. Masson, a member of this House, and a supporter of the previous Administration, was appointed to a judgeship in the western part of Ontario, appointed at the end of a Parliament—though, I suppose, that makes no difference in principle, still, it was at the end of a Parliament—who cannot remember how these hon. gentlemen, who to-day fill Ministers' seats, were loud in their declarations against the iniquity of this thing? Why, Sir, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) then described the appointment as a crime on the part of the Government, and a shame, and a disgrace. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) stated that Mr. Masson had been sitting one session, if not two, in this House in practical defiance of the Independence of Parliament Act, and, to all intents and purposes, with that appointment in his pocket. And such instances can be multiplied twenty times, showing the abandonment of former principles. And yet my hon. friend from Centre Toronto rises as a new member in this House and declares upon his solemn faith that the Government has implemented every pledge made to the people. Here was a pledge, not made in a speech merely, but more strongly by a resolution moved and a Bill introduced and strongly supported by gentlemen then in opposition and now leading members of the Government of this country.

Then, Sir, what with reference to the promise of public works and subsidies? How often has that been declaimed against by good Liberals? Of course, I am not now speaking of my hon. friend from Centre Toronto, for he is a good Tory. He is Liberal-ized for the nonce, but in his heart Tory principles are strongly entrenched. He it was who came to Ottawa when the first gun of tariff change was to be fired, and sat down beside the Finance Minister and with him went over the tariff line by line, taking good care that certain manufacturers of hardware should be well protected. But Liberal-ized as he is, what has he to say to this pledge I have referred to? I appeal, no less, to my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), an honest man. I ask if for seventeen years he did not take strong ground with his confreres against the promise of public works as a means of bonusing members and their constituencies? He undoubtedly did. It does him honour. He was joined by every member of the present Ministry. Up and down this country the people were taught to believe that, when the Liberals came into power, there would be no more of these things, that no more should promises be given to members of large franchises being voted to them and great subsidies to their counties. What do I read?

I, the undersigned, declare that on several occasions during the months of March and April last, and before coming to power, Hon. Mr. Laurier, the Prime Minister, gave me the assurance and the formal guarantee that he would have voted by the Parliament of Canada in favour of the South Shore Railway Company, composed of Messrs. Hyacinthe, Beauchemin, J. M. Fortier, estate of Hon. L. Tourville, estate of Joel Leduc, F. X. Choquette and others, the subsidies in cash required for the construction of the South Shore Railway from Sorel to Chaudière Junction, near Lévis, and that the said subsidies will be voted at the present session this year at Ottawa, at least from Sorel to St. Gregoire.

R. M. S. MIGNAULT, M.P.

Yamaska, May 14, 1897.

That was read in the heat of an election contest in that same county of Yamaska, in order corruptly to influence the electorate. Sir, some excuse may be given for a Minister who may say, in looking over a section of country, Yes, I think that is a section of country which ought to be benefited in a certain way, and when I get into power, if I do, I will use my influence to have money granted for developing that portion of the country. That is one thing. It is going far, but it may be justified. But there is no justification in making a special promise to a special man, or a special company, or a special set of individuals. That is a corrupt promise, meant only to be a corrupt promise, usable only for purposes of corruption. And yet my naive and innocent friend from Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram)—and he will be more careful before he is in this House many months—rose and in all the blush of his maiden speech, declared that the Ministers have implemented every pledge that they ever made to this country. Sir, do I need to go further with these pledges? They can be found by the score, they are all over this country, and before this session of Parliament is through, many of them will be brought to the attention of this House. These are sufficient to prove the statement that I have made. So, Sir, the First Minister himself went down to Nicolet, in the heat of a contest where a railway was really the only politics that there was before the people. Did he introduce Mr.

Leduc this afternoon? For Mr. Leduc was elected. But there was a war, a battle royal, between two companies for railroad subsidies. When the First Minister went down he said, amongst other things—well, he did not go so far as to promise out and out that a subsidy would be granted, but he said to the assembled electors substantially: You all know that if you wish favours from the Government in the way of a subsidy for your railway, it is better for you to send a supporter to the Government than an opponent. Now, Sir, the right hon. gentleman is wrong in that statement. He, as the Prime Minister of this country, has no business so to promise the people's money—that is what they always called it before. It is not so much looked upon as the people's money now, it is the Government's money. The franchises of this country are rapidly becoming the possession of the Government to be doled out as the Government wish, being fully persuaded that by proper appliances they can induce their obedient followers to register the decrees which they in secret conclude ought to be carried out. But, Sir, to take the people's money and go down to an independent electorate, and to stand as the Prime Minister before that electorate and say: If you want a subsidy you yourselves know it is better to send a supporter of the Government than an opponent—it is virtually taking the public money and promising it to his party for the sake of getting a supporter in this House. What shall we say with reference to the Minister of Public Works? So much is to be said that I dare not enter upon that fertile field of investigation very far this afternoon. But the Minister of Public Works had a bad half hour at Lévis during a certain political turmoil down there, and he argued bravely and waited patiently, and by and by the only way that he could bring his audience was to say: Don't you want elevators here in Lévis? A cry went up from all quarters, Yes, yes, yes. The Minister knew how to do it. He goes down and publicly promises them elevators, speaks of his friend the Minister of Railways, how disappointed he is that he is not there with him to see what could be done in the way of public works for Lévis. These Ministers are paragons of purity when in opposition, but apostles of corruption when once they have got possession of the Government benches and of the public treasury. Yet they have kept all the pledges they gave to the honest electorate of this country. Surely the hon. member for Centre Toronto owes this House an apology for such a statement. I shall say nothing of numerous others, but I am inclined to call as witnesses some hon. gentlemen from that side of the House, and some supporters of the old Liberal party. There sits the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas). Does he believe that the Government have implemented all their promises? Has he had any conversation since Friday last with the member for Centre Toronto? Have no heated passages occurred between them? The member for Centre Toronto, having revised the tariff on protectionist lines, says that the Government has implemented all its pledges; but the member for East Assiniboia, speaking to his constituents, declared a few days ago, 19th January:

We, in East Assiniboia, are not wholly satisfied on the tariff changes. I have, however, often stated that a government cannot sweep the whole thing away in a year or two. The Conservatives would have been very pleased to see us do it, for it would have created such a panic that they would have swept the Liberal party out of office.

What an admission. If the Liberal party had been true to their pledges and brought their legislation on, it would have created such a panic that, in the opinion of the member for East Assiniboia, and he is right, it would have swept them out of office.

Instead of doing that, we have begun by cutting off a few inches at a time of the dog's tail, and by and by we will get to the body.

Never, my hon. friend from Assiniboia, will you get beyond the last outward tip of hair on that dog's tail, except you march over the dead body of the hon. member for Centre Toronto. That tail is a long tail, and there are many, many hairs at the very end of that tail, and you have not plucked out one yet. And before you get to that dog's vulnerable body you will be many, many years older than you are today. So there is one hon. gentleman who does not think that the Government has implemented its pledges. Near him sits another, if my eyes do not deceive me, the good-looking member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson). Now, Sir, the good-looking member for Lisgar—who, I see, acknowledges the compliment—owns a paper, and he has been giving loose to western ideas in that paper, of which here are some:

If the Liberal Government yields to the pressure that is now being brought to bear by prominent Liberals at Ottawa to have the duty on binder twine, which, according to legislation last session, will be entirely wiped out in a few months, retained, it may as well make up its mind to fully capitulate to the protectionists, for, with the exception of barbed wire, it will then have been practically abandoned every free trade or revenue tariff outpost which was occupied by the party for so many years.

That is very good, but here is something better:

From the literature which the Liberals circulated prior to the election, we expected to see the duty on agricultural implements entirely swept away, but instead of that the implement manufacturers are placed in a better position than ever by a reduction in the duties on the raw materials which they require.

Then he mentions coal oil ; but, again, I forbear on account of my sympathies for the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. But he ends up with this encouraging statement for my hon. friend for Centre Toronto :

It was also disturbing to the free trade mind to see Mr. Bertram, the new Liberal member for Centre Toronto, elected upon a platform of non-disturbance of the tariff, and to find no repudiation of the sentiment from Ottawa. To say the least, it was disquieting to the average reform mind in the west, which has been confidently counting upon a steady scaling down of the tariff from year to year.

There is another one disappointed. What shall we say of the organ of the Patrons, the "Farmer's Sun." There are Patrons here, and the "Sun" was the staunch defender of these virtuous men when it was so easy to be virtuous, to wit, when in Opposition. What does the "Sun" say. It says :

It is impossible to deny that so far they have disappointed us. They were to frame a tariff for revenue only, and the principle of protection was to be set aside. They were to practice rigid economy, cut down all unnecessary expenses, and abjure all extravagant schemes. They were to settle the railway grievances of the North-west. In all this they have so far failed, and what they have done is scarcely worth the efforts made by independent men to effect a change. The tariff is little less protectionist or burdensome than it was before. That there has been any appreciable reduction of duties is not clear. The small concessions that have been made, as in the case of binder twine, have borne the character rather of sops to free traders than of moves in a broad and bold policy of free trade. The protectionist manufacturers appear to be satisfied, and they have reason for their satisfaction. The farmers are dissatisfied, and their dissatisfaction is well founded. What will be the effect of the preferential clause is not yet clear. But we may be pretty sure that it is meant rather for political effect than as a fiscal revolution. It cannot fail to put a weapon into the hands of our commercial enemies in the United States and to discourage the free trade party there.

There is another important element which contributed to place the party in power in their places, that is not satisfied. Here is the Simcoe "Reformer." It says :

There was a good reason for introducing Sir Oliver into the Senate with the portfolio of Justice, for the Liberals were very weak in that august and venerable body, having at that time only Senators Scott and Power possessing even low average debating ability, and certainly no Liberal was so qualified for the Ministry of Justice as Ontario's Premier. But Mr. Laurier reached out further than was either prudent or considerate for his old supporters when he brought in Fielding to supplant Cartwright in the Finance Department, a position he is not, never was, nor never will be, qualified to fill with a tithe of the ability that the old warhorse possesses, and whose style becomes rather the precise linendraper than the man who has his office and its responsibilities in a firm grip. Then Mr. Sifton was brought in, though no one can reasonably claim for him exceptional ability or even quickness or safe judgment. He is said to be a man strongly endowed with a keen eye to family advantages and given to petty vindictiveness. Not satisfied with the selection of the above imported, the new Premier brought in Mr. Blair, the piebald Premier of New Brunswick, who for years was recognized as a somewhat questionable manipulator of men, and who comes nearer to the general conception of the "practical politician" than any man who ever held a portfolio in a Liberal Government, if we except the present Minister of Public Works.

Nothing too good for Tarte—even if it be a backhanded compliment from the Simcoe "Reformer." That paper further says :

Mr. Blair was said by those nearest to him to be ready to drop on either side of the fence, and is further said to have demanded the portfolio of "railways and canals or nothing" when he was asked to join the Federal Government. Why this "Mokanna" wanted the railways and canals is best known to him, but the fact of his impudent demand being acceded to is enough to give us pause in asking if the firm hand was at the helm. The partial outcome of Blair's admission to the Government is the Drummond County Railway purchase and the impending scandal, together with the Crow's Nest Pass Railway deal, etc. Then the absurd climax was reached when Mr. Laurier called into the Cabinet Mr. Dobell, a Quebec Tory and son-in-law of the late Sir David Macpherson.

There is another Liberal who does not think the pledges given by hon. gentlemen opposite have been implemented. I notice that the member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) has had occasion to give tongue as well. He has not been pleased by these Yukon mining arrangements. Who has been ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Tupper.

Mr. FOSTER. These regulations have been changed three times, and who knows but there are other changes in progress. The member for Alberta said in his paper :

It is a relic of barbarism worthy of the most benighted savage races. It is a piece of high-handed robbery, and is going to be the means of once more having Canada's name thrown to the winds by the swindling operations of politicians. The Yukon law just passed is reserving every alternate gold claim to the Government, so that whenever an election is to be called the Government can bribe any person or corporation it wants to with an odd gold mine or two. It is going to retard the whole Dominion by curtailing the trade of the merchants, the freight and passenger carriage of the railways and steamers and ordinary pack and wagon freighters.

He added :

On several occasions the people of Canada have had to assert their rights against villainous legislation. This is one more occasion when this will have to be done, and blood shed that should not be.

The sooner Sir Wilfrid Laurier comes back to look after his brood of irresponsibles, the better for himself and party.

I find the Dundas "Banner" declares "there are just as many leeches for blood under the Grit rule as under the Tory rule"; and the "Plaindealer" declares there are too many Cabinet Ministers. There is another pledge unfulfilled. The leader of the Government and his supporters are pledged to the country to reduce the extravagant list of Cabinet Ministers. The present Postmaster General opposed it in the days when he was in Opposition, the days when it was easy to be virtuous in those respects. Now he says nothing; but the "Plaindealer" places its finger on the sore and says that now is the time when this pledge can be implemented. Sir Oliver is going out, let us have one Minister less. But Sir Oliver has gone out, and another has taken his place and there has been no diminution in the number. As to the Intercolonial extension, it says:

Why should Reformers as well as others not suspect a deal which puts millions at the command of a gentleman who was instrumental in buying a $30,000 plant for the sons of a Minister?

The $30,000 was party funds, forsooth! So was the $45,000 that caused the Pacific scandal, that hurled from power the most popular First Minister Canada ever saw.

Even the Hamilton "Times" is down on the Ministers for riding about in private cars. How our hopes have been blighted! At the first trip by the Prime Minister made to this city it was heralded from one end of the country to the other that he, a good democrat, would not use a private car, but chose to ride in the regular first class car alongside his fellow citizens. The right hon. gentleman soon got over that. The examples offered him were too many and too bad. When the Minister of Public Works, who is so dominant in almost every proceeding, set the pace with his private car and coloured porter and surrounding luxuries and eating delicacies like a bird, the Prime Minister very soon followed the example, and I believe he took a special down to Rivière du Loup all by himself. The Hamilton "Times," that good old Liberal paper, raises its Puritanical voice in denunciation of Ministers who when out of office attacked and scathed the Government of the day for using private cars, and yet when hon. gentlemen opposite came into office they used them just as much as their predecessors. And the member for Lisgar, in a late issue of his paper, said that now the Prime Minister should implement his pledge, that there would be one less Minister, at least, in the Cabinet.

Here is the opportunity, take advantage of it, and implement the pledge that you made. I shall not read to this House that scathing arraignment from the Huntingdon "Gleaner" of last year's session of Parliament, on the broken pledges and the increased expenditure. There is one probably greater than all, and to which I must allude, because the impression was made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce himself, and he, I am sure, never wishes to create an impression that he does not honestly try to implement. That hon. gentleman, on a certain occasion, wrote a letter to the Patrons of Canada. It was written before the election, and was meant for consumption and to catch the Patron vote, and in that letter the Minister of Trade and Commerce wrote:

What are the other planks of the Patron platform affecting Dominion politics? They are these: (1) Economy of administration; (2) purity and independence of Parliament; (3) tariff for revenue only; (4) reciprocal trade; (5) protection of labour from monopolies; (6) no railway bonuses. Now there is simply no single one of all these objects which the Liberal party have not been fighting for, moving resolutions for and doing their very best to obtain any time during the last twenty years.

The hand-book of Liberal principles published during the recent campaign declared the identity of the Liberal and Patron policies as to bonuses, and said:

The policy of bonusing railways by cash and land grants from the Dominion Government has become a fruitful source of jobbery, speculation and corruption. Under its operation favourites of the Government have been enriched. The policy of granting these subsidies has repeatedly been condemned in Parliament by the Liberal party, and this resolution (of the Patrons) is in harmony with the attitude of the Liberal party upon this question.

There is the pledge of the Minister of Trade and Commerce; there is the pledge of the hand-book of Liberal principles; both of them have been violated; for never in an equal space of time in the history of the Canadian Parliament have more bonuses in money and lands of the country been given by a Government, in the first place acting in camera and making the arrangements simply for their followers to register; then coming down to the House and forcing their measures through. The first thing they did was, in view of a by-election to take over and operate for six months or more the Baie de Chaleur Railway, for which proceeding they had no warrant or resolution of this House, for which they had no vote of this House, and for which they had no legal or constitutional right. They made a loss to the people of Canada, and then they came down here and cried pecavvi, and got their friends to vote them $12,000 to make up that loss. Under the plea of urgency, the Minister of Railways in camera with his colleagues made a binding arrangement with the Grand Trunk Railway and Drummond County Railway, which contemplated a capital investment of $7,000,000. They made that arrangement without a resolution of Parliament, without discussing the advisability or the inadvisability of it, and without taking into their confidence either their own party or the House. Relying upon the argument of necessity, they came down to the House at the last, and when the back benches revolted, the Government said: The Government is pledged to it, they have signed the contract, you must see us through or we will go out. Are these the free conditions under which the Government should administer the franchises and money of this country? And, Sir, the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, although an undertaking which had been discussed, and the principle of which was conceded, these gentlemen opposite hurried to put it in commencement and operation by giving nearly two millions more dollars than the road could have been obtained for by the preceding Government, or obtained by them for that matter. They did this on the childish plea that they had gotten from the Canadian Pacific Railway promises of general freight reductions, but before one-third of the line is graded, for business reasons and business reasons alone, the Canadian Pacific Railway has made an almost equal cut of their rates over all the Northwest and through that great section of country. Not a single Government paper ventured to say that anything else than business considerations led to this reduction.

And, Sir, this other deal, the Yukon deal, which is now facing the country, was sprung upon the country, sprung upon Liberals as well as the Tories, sprung upon the country one week previous to the assembling of the people's representatives, sprung upon the country after secret conference, when no one, not even the most intelligent of our people, knew that such a thing was in the wind, except, of course, those who were interested, or who the Government wished to become interested. It came before the country through the "Globe," which the Government took into its confidence, and through which it sent forth its policy, and now through the member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram), with a slight addition; and through the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), with another addition, and a most unfortunate one, which was that after all it was but a temporary expedient. The Government came before this House with these conditions signed, sealed and delivered; the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) declaring ten days ago that one condition of the contract was, that in twenty-six days, before this Parliament could possibly debate, thoroughly discuss and pass this measure, one part of that contract was to be finished by Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie. Sir, these are things which may well cause Liberals who are not sitting in Parliament, Liberals who are not asking and looking for favours, Liberals who have no designs upon front benches or fat positions; these are things which may well make these Liberals back in the country (and good men all this country through), ask themselves: Whether or not we have come to the pass in our parliamentary history where the Ministry take the franchises of the country and dispose of them as they will, in secret, and then rush them through Parliament by their majority without affording any opportunity for free and manly discussion. It is no wonder that the "Farmer's Sun" feels that in this respect the promises and pledges and past history of the Liberal party are not being implemented by them when they are in office.

And now, Sir, I come to another subject. I am not going to put before my right hon. friend his own pledges made in the city of Toronto, where he absolutely and unconditionally promised that if he got into power he would reduce the expenditure by two or three millions at least. He has made no effort to do this, but on the contrary these expenditures have been kept up to a larger amount than ever before. I am not going to take the thousand and one pledges on all the subjects which he has given; given lightly without a thought perhaps of their tendency and consequences, and when they are brought to his face, treating them just as lightly as if hereafter it was to be a legend, a tradition only, that in Canada amongst public men public faith and public pledges were an honourable guarantee that ought to be honourably borne and honourably kept. I want to proceed to my right hon. friend's position in England on this preferential trade business, and I must ask him to give me his attention whilst I try to discuss the question. The subject has been discussed, but I propose to put the question to him again, and I propose to put it again and again, and I have no doubt that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House will put it again and again until we have some satisfactory explanation from the Government benches; or until we prove that the position taken by the right hon. gentleman was highly detrimental to Canada, was unauthorized by the people of Canada, and was such as he, as the representative of this country, should not have taken. This investigation requires close attention, and the first point that I wish to make is as to what was the position of the right hon. gentleman in Canada on preferential trade. His position was set forth in two speeches—one made in London and the other made in Montreal. What he said in London was this:

We would have for our goods a preference which would not be given to the goods of another nation.

I call attention to these words, for this purpose. My hon. friend took another position after that. He took a position of opposition to any trade arrangement with Great Britain which would make it necessary for Great Britain to become protectionist to the extent of putting a discriminating duty upon foreign imports; but when he was in London, giving his policy to the electors, he declared that the project of preferential trade did include the necessity of Great Britain giving preferential treatment to the products of Canada, to a certain extent at least. He went on to state :

That practical statesman, Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, has come to the conclusion that the time has come when it is possible to have within the bounds of the Empire another step taken which will give to the colonies in England a preference for their products over the products of other nations.

That is clear ; it shows what was clearly in the hon. gentleman's mind.

What would be the possibilities of such a step if it was taken ? We sell our goods in England. We send our wheat, our butter, our cheese, all our natural products, but there we have to compete with similar products from the United States, from Russia, and from other nations. Just see what a great advantage it would be to Canada, if the wheat, cheese and butter which we send to England would be met with a preference over similar products of other nations. The possibilities are immense.

Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, the new and progressive Secretary of the Colonies, has declared that the time has come when it is possible to discuss that question. But, Sir, if England is going to give us that preference, England would expect something from us in return. What is it she would expect ? England would expect that we would come as closely to her own system of free trade, as it is possible for us to come. England does not expect that we should take her own system of free trade such as she has it ; but I lay it before you that the thing the English people would expect in return is that, instead of a principle of protection, we should adopt the revenue form of tariff, pure and simple. These are the conditions upon which we we can have that boon.

Is not that as clear as anything the hon. gentleman has ever said ? The points are clearly defined : first, that England will give us a preference for certain of our goods ; and, second, that we shall have to come as closely as possible to England's free trade, though she does not expect us to conform to it altogether ; but we shall have to give up the protection idea, and that is the condition upon which we can have the boon. If ever a pledge was given by a public man just previous to an election that he would in Great Britain favour preferential trade for this country under these conditions, it was given by Mr. Wilfrid Laurier, as he was at that time, in the city of London. Now, in Montreal a little earlier than that, he stated :

In regard to this question of preferential trade, I desire to say that Sir Charles Tupper is no more in favour of the idea than I am myself. He added : " My hope is—nay, my conviction is—that on the 23rd of June the Liberal party will be at the head of the polls, and that it will be the Liberal party, with its policy of a revenue tariff, that will send commissioners to London to arrange for a basis of preferential trade.

I want to emphasise that remark. Where were the commissioners to be sent ? Sent to England, to arrange a basis of preferential trade. With whom ? With the British Government. Not sent to a public meeting at Liverpool, which was the first place where the hon. gentleman opened his mouth, and where he did all the damage. I make this point now, in advance of my argument, that under that pledge, in view of the invitation of Mr. Chamberlain to a conference of the colonial Premiers at which commercial union was the first subject to be discussed, it was the hon. gentleman's bounden duty to have sealed his lips close until he sat with Mr. Chamberlain and with the other colonial Premiers at that conference. Did he do that ? We will see later on. The only point I wish to affirm now is that he knew the conditions of preferential trade when in London and in Montreal, and he pledged his honour as a public man in favour of them.

What more, Sir ? Have I need to say that there was a call for a conference ? Here is the despatch that was sent out on the 23th of January, 1897, and it was an invitation to discuss many subjects of the greatest interest to the Empire, such as commercial union, colonial defence, and so forth, commercial union being placed first on the list.

Then, Sir, they passed the preference tariff, so-called, and that was heralded in England as being exclusively for British products. There were the advance steps already taken. Public opinion had been cultivated in this country until nine out of every ten men would have welcomed preferential trade with Great Britain on those terms if it could have been got. Public opinion was being moulded in Great Britain until a great change had taken place there, and, under the influence of the Jubilee year, British trade sentiment was seeking for the basis of a compromise which would bring the colonies into commercial union with the mother country, and was ready under the generous impulse of the time to give to Canada and the other colonies all that possibly could be given to bring it about. The soil was well cultivated here, and well cultivated in Great Britain. The sower of the seed more than any one else in his capacity at that time, was crossing the briny Atlantic. How will he sow the seed, and what is the seed he will sow ? Then, Sir, when Mr. Laurier, as the representative of Canada, stepped off the vessel at the Liverpool docks, and made his way to that assemblage that was gathered to meet him, headed by the foremost men in the Cabinet of the country, what was the condition of things in Great Britain ? There was a great exultation of colonial importance among all classes, and the idea of inter-Imperial trade and inter-dependence never had been at such a tense heat. There was an intense feeling that something practical should be done in the Jubilee year to cement this union, and to add commercial bonds to those of loyalty and blood already existing. There was generous trend in British sentiment to go further than the old Cobdenistic theories would warrant, for the sake of the practical end in view, namely, the great future development of the Empire as a whole, at home and in the colonies. There was a Government which had invited proposals through its Secretary of State for the Colonies, and had sent the Duke of Devonshire and Lord Chancellor Halsbury to Liverpool, who held out the hand of welcome in such a definite way as to call down upon them the animadversions of every Cobdenite in England. What did the Premier of Canada do? More than that, there was to the common-sense British mind the pressure of outside competition and foreign tariffs narrowing their foreign market and impinging on their home market, which was gradually rooting out long settled ideas and causing a revulsion of opinion in favour of a practical business tariff. At that auspicious moment, Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his brother colonial Premiers made their entry upon British soil. What did Sir Wilfrid, as the representative of Canada, do? Did he keep the pledge which he gave to the electorate here, that he would favour preferential trade, involving preferential duties by Great Britain and involving a preferential tariff by us? Did he keep his pledge that he would send a delegation to talk this matter over with the Government of Great Britain? Did he, if he had not anything favourable to say of it, keep his mouth sealed until he met Mr. Chamberlain and the members of the British Government? Or did he open his mouth to stimulate, with all the eloquence at his command, that public opinion upon which Mr. Chamberlain must have relied to carry to a practical conclusion that one project which he set so much store by. No, Sir, before he saw Mr. Chamberlain, before the Premiers met in conference, in the face of the invitation of the Duke of Devonshire and Lord Chancellor Halsbury, immediately on landing at Liverpool, he drew on his musty store of old Cobdenism, and declared that as for preferential trade, Canada would have none of it. "Ours is a free gift," he said. "We ask no compensation. Protection has been the curse of Canada. We would not see you come under its baneful influence, for what weakens us must weaken you." Then and there he put the quietus on the movement for preferential trade with Great Britain—against his pledge given to the people of Canada; against every dictate of prudence that a statesman should have been guided by; in advance of the conference to which he and his fellow-Premiers had been invited for the discussion of that very subject, and for the devising of a plan to further this very same preferential trade. Then passed, in a moment, the labour of many years in this Dominion. Then passed, in a short moment, the labours which for the past five years have been unremitting and herculean in Great Britain towards the same end. Then passed, the opportunity which the Colonial Secretary had long waited for. No wonder, when that statement was wafted from Great Britain to the world Mr. Chamberlain said:

It would have been hard enough to carry through the idea had all the colonies been persistent and enthusiastic advocates of it, but Canada does not favour it, and New South Wales opposes it. These are the leading colonies, and with them in practical opposition, it becomes impossible, and I would not now touch it with a pair of tongs.

No wonder Lord Rosebery said that:

Mr. Chamberlain had a proposal which had some force and gained some strength, but now, "it must be approached with the reverence due to a corpse," for Canada's Premier has said that "if the British Empire is to be maintained, it can only be on the condition of the most absolute freedom of trade."

So passed for many a year, not only the most auspicious moment for the gaining of this great boon for the colonies, for Canada, for the Empire, but passed for many a year, I fear, any successful hope of bringing British statesmen to the point of again imperilling their influence with their people to educate them towards so great and so far-reaching a project. No wonder Mr. Asquith declared afterwards that Sir Wilfrid Laurier had given a death blow to the heresy that it was wise and opportune, under any circumstances, to deviate one hair's-breadth from absolute free trade, and that it would have been a pity if he and the colonies had gone in favour of asking England to put the least preferential duties on goods from foreign countries.

So to-day the hon. gentleman occupies this unenviable position, of having made a pledge to the people of Canada of having defined the principles on which the pledge was to be carried out, of having bound himself, if a public man ever did bind himself, to have a conference with the Government of Great Britain on the matter, of having gone across the ocean to hold this conference, and then, immediately on landing, before any conference could be held, using his mighty influence—an influence which was temporary, but none the less strong at that moment—against the project he had pledged himself to foster, and which was dear to the hearts of everybody here and becoming dear to the hearts of many of the citizens of the British Isles. Why did my hon. friend do that? Was it through devotion to the interests of Canada? No, Sir; it was due to his devotion to the principles of free trade as laid down by Cobden. In an interview at Birmingham, and on the occasion when he accepted the Cobden medal, he made it plain that the reason why he was against preferential trade was that it involved two things. One was—and that was the chief objection—that it would make England forego free trade and cause her to err into the paths of protection to the extent of putting on a preferential duty on foreign products. Is it any wonder that an influential trade journal should have said :

From the day he landed in England until the day he left he seems to have been oblivious to the fact that in his mission he was the representative of all Canada. He seems rather to have imagined that he was sent there for his own self-glorification and in the interest of his party. * * * When he arrived in England he found a large and influential section of the politicians and press full of enthusiasm over the preferential policy of Canada and energetically discussing the corresponding duty of finding some equivalent advantage which Great Britain might confer on Canada, even by so doing it might be necessary to modify the free trade policy of the past fifty years. The complacent Sir Wilfrid, following up his usual policy of conciliation, which means abandonment of claims, relieved the merchants, manufacturers and politicians and the press from all necessity of further discussion by informing them that they were troubling themselves without cause, because Canada neither wished for nor would accept any favours. It is little wonder that he achieved much popularity through such a surrender of Canada's claims.

And again :

We have frequently directed attention to the fact that every trade journal in England entertains the opinion that preferential tariffs on the part of the colonies involve an equivalent preference on the part of Great Britain. During the grand Jubilee celebrations in England it may have been all right and proper that the accomplished and eloquent Premier of Canada should dilate on the loyalty of Canadians, their affection for Her Majesty and their attachment to British institutions. It may have been quite fair that Sir Wilfrid Laurier should claim credit for the fact that Canada granted preferential tariff treatment to England without any stipulation for an equivalent, but it was an act of supreme folly for him to tell the British Government and people that Canada neither hoped nor desired any preference for its products in the markets of the mother country.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. FOSTER. I was going on to prove the motive which the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) had in opposing preferential trade, and any possible offer of preferential trade in Great Britain. I had set it down to the theory, which he himself had expressed not only at Liverpool but at other places, that he was opposed to preferential trade with Great Britain because it involved the placing of preferential duties, and, to that extent, protective duties, by Great Britain upon the goods imported from foreign countries, and that he believed to be inimical to and a violation of free trade doctrines and principles, and that this violation would result to the injury, primarily of Great Britain, secondarily of the colonies. Now I find that the right hon. gentleman was interviewed by the London "Chronicle," and the interview was published on the 15th June, which was before the conference with Mr. Chamberlain, if I remember rightly, and before the denunciation of the treaties. Amongst other questions put to him by the interviewer was this :

"We have heard of schemes of preferential duties based upon English duties against the foreigners, and we have heard, too, of ideas of Zollverein."

"Zollverein ?—"

—said the right hon. gentleman—

"Well, as I understand it, a Zollverein means, in the very nature of things, protection—a tax upon imports of some kind, and at this moment I would not be prepared to fall in with such a proposal."

Again he said :

"We are quite content with British rule now, and our latest revision of the tariff shows it. No, no, a Zollverein must mean protection, and protection is the greatest of all mistakes. Yes, I am quite convinced of that—quite convinced—protection is the greatest of all mistakes."

"But—"

"—the colonies are young, Mr. Laurier," I said jestingly, "and what are weakly infant industries to do without a wall to shelter them from the cold blasts of competition?"

"Oh, yes," said Mr. Laurier with fine scorn, as if meeting an old and very fraudulent friend, "yes, yes, infant industries? Protection is the greatest mistake even for them."

* * * * *

"But the idea of a Zollvereinist," I said to Mr. Laurier, "is, of course that England should lead the way. You would not say 'No' if England proposed to tax wheat and meat from the United States, and Russia, and the Argentine while admitting free of duty your Manitoba No. 1 hard wheat, your Alberta ranch beef, and your rosy apples from Annapolis Valley?"

To which Mr. Laurier replied :

"Well, no, perhaps not. If England were willing to give us a preference over other nations, taking our goods on exceptionally favourable terms, I would not object. It would not be for Canada to shut herself out from the advantage. It would be a great boon for the time. But how long would it last? Would it be an advantage in the long run? That is what men who think beyond the passing moment have to ask themselves. Suppose England did such a thing, and abandoned her free trade record. She would inevitably curtail the purchasing power of her people, and do you not think we should suffer from that, we who alone have natural resources enough to feed you millions from our fertile lands? I have too great belief in English common sense to think they will do any such thing. What we have done in the way of tariff preference to England, we have, as I said, done out of gratitude to England, and not because we want her to enter upon the path of protection. We know that the English people will not interfere with the policy of free trade, and we do not desire them to do so. We know that buying more goods from England she will buy more from us, and so develop trade, and the moment trade is developed Canada is benefited."

"Then, Mr. Laurier, you stand for a free trading British Empire, and have shown by your tariff proposal how it may be brought about?"

And the answer comes :

"At one time I might have thought something of a Zollverein, but when I reflect, it is not good policy, and England will not adopt it."

The same principle comes up both in the address on the presentation of the Cobden medal and in the reply by the right hon. gentleman when he accepted it. The keynote of the condition upon which the Cobden medal was presented to the right hon. gentleman was that he was believed to be a representative of that unflinching Cobdenism which in England is totally and generically opposed to anything like the imposition of discriminating or preferential duties because they savour of protection, and which, while it welcomes as much trade as possible with the colonies will not care for that trade and does not want it, if it has to take it on the condition of imposing even the lightest duties upon foreign goods, as that would admit the principle of protection. The acceptor of the Cobden medal in his answer repeated almost the very words and duplicated exactly the meaning of Lord Farrer who presented the Cobden medal to him, and therefore sealed the terms which I have stated, that he himself was so much of a free trader that he could subscribe to the Cobden idea, and take the Cobden medal, because he believed that it would not be for the benefit of England first, or for Canada afterwards, that the slightest deviation should be made in England from the absolute free trade ideas.

Now, while I have no quarrel with the hon. gentleman because he holds these ideas privately and as strongly as he may, I do say that he had no mandate from the Dominion of Canada or from the people of Canada to present these private and strongly-held ideas of his, however right they may have been, as the views and the wishes of Canada in this matter, because they most certainly were not. Now, Sir, what is the excuse the right hon. gentleman has given for his action, for taking the first opportunity at the Liverpool meeting, to wholly deny and negative any idea of preferential trade? What is his excuse for not having waited for the conference? What is his excuse for not having carried out the pledge that he gave in Toronto, in London and Montreal? The excuse is given first in his absence by the Toronto "Globe," and afterwards by himself when he returned to this country. And what said the Toronto "Globe?" at a very critical point in the Centre Toronto canvass, if I mistake not, where the question of preferential trade was being warmly discussed. Suddenly one morning the Toronto "Globe" came out with what appeared to be an official or semi-official statement of the case, which made every reader look with both eyes and which caused very serious thought to all throughout that city. This is the "Globe's" statement :

Conservative newspapers keep up a constant fire of criticism on Sir Wilfrid Laurier because, as they allege, he refused to agree to a preferential tariff between Britain and Canada, as proposed by Mr. Chamberlain.

It is just as well that the real facts of the matter should be known. During the visit of the colonial Premiers to Great Britain, Mr. Chamberlain made the proposition that there should be absolute free trade between Britain and her colonies, on condition that Britain placed a small customs tax on commodities from foreign countries.

Now, Sir, I think I have a right to ask, and I think this House has the right to the answer. I would ask my hon. friend if that statement in the Toronto "Globe" was true, and if after he landed at Liverpool and between that and the conference, or at the conference, any such proposition was made to him categorically by Mr. Chamberlain as is stated here in the Toronto "Globe," namely, a proposition that on the condition of there being absolutely free trade between Great Britain and her colonies, Great Britain would place a preferential duty upon some of the great products of Canada? I think we have a right to that answer, and I hope my right hon. friend will give the House an answer to that question.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman knows as well as I do that the conference which took place between Mr. Chamberlain and the Colonial Premiers was confidential. A report has been made of everything that took place in those conferences, but so far no authority has been given to publish it, though it is probable that at some future date, not very remote, the conference will be given to the public. But the hon. gentleman knows as well as I do that, until I have authority to publish it, I am not at liberty to say what took place there.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, Mr. Speaker, I take two positions: first, that if these papers are yet confidential and cannot be brought down to this House, how was it that the "Globe" newspaper, at a critical moment, made a semi-official announcement in categorical language as to the proposition that had been made and the reply of the Premier? That is one question, but there is another, Sir, which is stronger yet. If these papers are not in a position to be laid before the House, what right had my hon. friend to state to this House, last Friday night, that the only condition upon which preferential trade could be discussed was the condition that there should be absolute free trade and no customs duties between the different parts of the Empire? Is he in a position to state that authoritatively because Mr. Chamberlain made that proposition to him? He is, or he is not. If he is in a position to state it before this House, he is in a position to lay on the Table the papers with reference to it to substantiate it; if he is not in a position to lay the papers substantiating it before the House, he is not in a position to quote information from that proposition and from those papers. Now, Sir, the right hon. gentleman can take whichever of those positions he pleases. In either case somebody has leaked, somebody has made an announcement that he had no right to make, or there is no such announcement to be made—one or the other. Now, as we can get no categorical answer, let us argue the point. In the first place, let us call the right hon. gentleman himself. The right hon. gentleman himself, in London and Toronto, declared that a condition of this preferential trade was, not that there should be absolute free trade, no customs duties amongst the different parts of the Empire, but that there should be no protective duties; that is, a revenue tariff must be the basis on which it could be framed, and that only. That is the hon. gentleman's statement in those places. The hon. gentleman's statement goes to prove that at that time, at least, there was no such proposition, and he did not understand Mr. Chamberlain's words uttered at that time as having such tendency. We go one step further. Mr. Chamberlain, in 1896, made a statement in London, at the Canada Club, or before the assembled chambers of commerce—I do not know which—it makes no difference. It is not possible, in reading what Mr. Chamberlain said, to torture his words uttered at that time into an absolute and unconditional statement of a basis upon which this must proceed, namely, that there should be no customs duties, but absolute free trade, between the different parts of the Zollverein. More than that, I read from the hon. gentleman's own speech on Friday a quotation from Mr. Chamberlain, speaking in 1896, in which that gentleman said:

But the principle which I claim must be accepted if we are to make any, even the slightest, progress, is that within the different parts of the Empire protection must disappear—

Not a revenue tariff, not a customs tariff.

—and that the duties must be revenue duties, and not protective duties in the sense of protection for the products of one part of the Empire against those of another part.

That, Sir, is the sensible view of the case, that is the view the London "Times" took, for no sooner had the "Globe's" semi-official statement been cabled to England, than the London "Times," in an editorial, stated that it could not believe it, that Mr. Chamberlain was a practical man, and it could not believe that he had ever laid down hard and fast lines of that kind. More than that, Sir. By the circular of June 28, 1897, calling the Premiers of the colonies to a conference with Mr. Chamberlain and other members of the Government during the Jubilee period, Mr. Chamberlain invites them, not to discuss a hard and fast proposition, but to discuss the question of commercial union. They went to England, they met Mr. Chamberlain, and the latest utterance we have from Mr. Chamberlain is in the official reports of that conference, so far as it has been made public, where Mr. Chamberlain speaks to the assembled Premiers and outlines the subjects which they are to take up. After outlining certain other subjects, he takes up the one of commercial relations, and says:

I pass on, then, to another question, and that is as to the future commercial relations between this country and her colonies. How far is it possible to make the relations closer and more intimate? I have said that I believe in sentiment as the greatest of all the forces in the general government of the world, but at the same time I should like to bring to the reinforcement of sentiment the motives which are derived from material and personal interests. Undoubtedly the fiscal arrangements of the different colonies differ so much among themselves, and all differ so much from those of the mother country, that it would be a matter of the greatest complication and difficulty to arrive at any conclusion which would unite us commercially in the same sense in which the Zollverein united the Empire of Germany.

That is not the statement of a man who had reduced his ideas to a hard and fast proposition and flung it as a sine qua non amongst the Premiers of the colonies. It is the statement of a broad-minded business man, permeated by a strong purpose, and willing to give and take and confer as to how that great purpose may be brought about. He goes on:

But this is a matter upon which at the present time, rather than suggest any proposals of my own, I desire to hear the views of the gentlemen present.

Can anything be clearer than that Mr. Chamberlain was not in a position to make any hard and fast proposition to the colonial Premiers? "Meanwhile," said Mr. Chamberlain, as though unwilling to let the least possible chance for an understanding on this matter to escape him:

Meanwhile, however, I note a resolution which appears to have been passed unanimously at the meeting of the Premiers in Hobart, in which the desire was expressed for closer commercial arrangements with the Empire, and I think it was suggested that a commission of inquiry should be created in order to see in what way practical effect might be given to that aspiration.

Gentlemen, said the right hon. Secretary of the Colonies, I have no hard and fast proposition. This subject is surrounded with difficulties, and I do not want to present such a one to you. I ask you to think it over and confer with me here and now. But if you think it is best to take more time to consider it, follow out the suggestion, if you will, of the Hobart Conference, and have a commission, and I will appoint some one to act with you on that commission; and in that way take time, which is a factor in these things, and we will probably get to some conclusion that can be practically worked out. He goes on :

If it were the wish of the other colonies to join in such inquiry, Her Majesty's Government would be delighted to make arrangements for the purpose, and to accept any suggestions as to the form of the reference, and the character and constitution of the Commission, and would very gladly take part in it.

That is the latest from the right hon. Secretary of the Colonies ; that is his statement when the assembled Premiers of the colonies were before him in that conference : that was the statement he made after the ruthless tongue of the right hon. gentleman, at the first available opportunity, in Liverpool, declared that Canada would have nothing to do with preferential trade, that she wanted Great Britain to pursue the path of old Cobdenism, and not to be led away by any impractical suggestions that might arise from a century and a time far different from those in which Cobden lived.

Sir, I say this, that the Toronto "Globe," in my opinion, never placed that semi-official announcement there without some authority—and it could only come by leakage—if it came straight and embodied the truth of the conference of Premiers in England. I say, that the Premier on Friday last laid down an absolute condition which he could only have laid down on the ground that that had been stated to him in England and by the authority of the British Government, and if he was not prepared to lay the papers of that conference on the Table of the House, I submit he had no right to draw a conclusion from the papers on the assumption that such a proposition was made, especially when all the probabilities of the case go most strongly against the assertion that Mr. Chamberlain ever made such a proposition. It would not have been business-like, and Mr. Chamberlain's conduct in regard to this question from the first has been eminently broad-minded and business-like. The hon. gentleman said :

I did not go about advocating the cause of preferential trade.

We have seen he did not. No, he went about denouncing it, he went about declaring that Canada would have none of it. That is the way he fulfilled his London, Toronto and Montreal pledges, and that is the way he misrepresented the sentiment of Canada in its business point of view. Like Cato, he cried from morning till night, "Delenda est Carthago," and went about Great Britain chaunting the chant of death instead of the note of life, a new-born life which was just appearing above the horizon, and which promised such great strength, development and permanence for the British Empire throughout the world.

If preferential trade—

Mr. FOSTER.

he says,

—is not a vain and idle dream.

Mind you, the right hon. gentleman almost asserts it is a vain and idle dream—he gives it conditionally—if it is not, he says, the first step was taken when I was in England, namely, on August 1st. Whilst those treaties existed no idea of preferential trade could be entertained, said the right hon. gentleman. He has confounded results with causes which bring about results. He has not distinguished between an idea and the realization of the idea. He thinks that the realization, so far as the denunciation of the treaties is concerned, having taken place when he was in England, that was the first step, when in reality, if not the last, it was very nearly the last step. The idea produces the realization in every great reform and change that takes place in the world. The idea is to be sown, nurtured, cultivated and spread until it gathers force beneath its covering so as to break down intervening barriers and come to its full realization. Yet the hon. gentleman, filled with his own importance, declared that not a step was taken towards this realization till he was in England. The despatches which have passed between this and other colonial governments from 1880 until the present time, the conference of 1894, when representatives of all the British colonies met in this city and passed a resolution in favour of preferential trade, count for nothing, the influence is nil. The resolution of this House of Commons praying for this same arrangement by petition and a resolution affirming the willingness of this House to grant preferential treatment to Great Britain, count for nothing as moulders of opinion and as contributing to a final result. The work of Englishmen, hundreds of thousands of them, good men and true, who for the last ten years have been working for free trade as against the bare tenets and bald results of free trade, those men and their labours count for nothing : the first step was taken when the right hon. gentleman was in England. For years we laboured in vain, all barren of results. The Gordian knot was there and not untied until Alexander of Macedon came and ripped it up with his little sword. I congratulate Alexander of Macedon ! But I will take the liberty of saying to the right hon. gentleman that the Gordian knot or a sphinx-like puzzle is scarcely to be compared in its solution, which must be instantaneous, if at all, to a great forward movement amongst a great Saxon people, which has for years made for breaking down long-established barriers and the opening up of a new commercial era which will add to the life-blood, strength and prosperity of the British Empire.

A better way, I think, I could have counselled, and it would have been this : That the right hon. gentleman should have decided first plainly and clearly what to do, to give preferential trade to Great Britain, and put it in the tariff just that way, and no other way, so that it would come into effect when Great Britain removed the treaties which prevented it from taking effect. Then we would have violated no treaties, we would have traversed no decisions. Then we would not have brought ourselves into humiliation and disgrace on every point taken by the Government, and the trade of Canada would not have been thrown into confusion, and we would not have had to eat the leek; and, in my view, it would have been infinitely more effective in Great Britain, for the people would have seen in the Canadian tariff an exclusive preference for British trade the moment they chose to allow it to go into operation by denouncing the German and Belgian treaties. That course would have obviated every difficulty; it would have appealed to the British mind infinitely more than the course which was adopted, and with that provision on our Statute-books, I doubt whether the right hon. gentleman would have dared to go over to the United Kingdom and raised his voice against preferential trade. It is a pity for Canada that this provision should not have been embodied somewhere, so that it would have controlled the right hon. gentleman.

To sum up. The right hon. gentleman is opposed to preferential trade because it involves protective preferential duties by England. This, he considers, would be a violation of free trade principles; this would be hurtful, primarily to Great Britain, and secondly to the colonies; therefore, he is opposed to preferential trade now, and, as preferential trade can never be brought about without a preference, which involves these very things, so his position is clear: he is opposed to preferential trade now and for ever.

I ask my hon. friend the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram), whether or not he declared in Toronto, that he was an ardent preferential trader, that he believed in it, and whether or not he canvassed votes on that statement? In his heart I believe he is, as the most of Toronto's business men are, preferential traders to a degree. He (Mr. Bertram) has heard the statement of his right hon. friend whom he follows. I ask him to settle in his own mind as to whether such a leader will lead him—a follower burning for preferential trade, and a leader burning with such an ardent desire to preserve the musty cobwebs of Cobdenism, that he is now and will be henceforth and for ever, opposed to preferential trade because it involves protective preferential duties being put on by Great Britain. A man cannot serve two masters and be honest with himself. If my hon. friend (Mr. Bertram) is a preferential trader from conviction, he must drive preferential trade into his leader, or, he cannot follow a leader who leads him into the depths of the Serbonian bog, rather than into the light and freedom of commercial intercourse between the different parts of the British Empire.

I come now to mention another point in the Speech, in which it deals with the Yukon Railway project. We have not before us information as full as we should have had; that is locked up where so much other information is; in the breasts or in the pigeon-holes of the cabinet of this country. But we have certain information given to the Toronto "Globe," expanded a little by the mover of the Address (Mr. Bertram) and commented on very briefly by the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government. The remarks I made this afternoon show my attitude with reference to this question from the prima facie point of view. This Government from the very start has shown a disposition to nullify the importance and the powers of Parliament. It did it in a high-handed way, when, after having voted down all the appropriations for the succeeding fiscal year, not only in detail, but a proposition to give a credit vote for two months; it then, when the elections were over and it was brought into power, by Governor General's warrants—a thing opposed to the spirit of the constitution, and to the actual legal enactment upon the Statute-books—this Government expended, or took power to expend nearly two millions of dollars. The Government made the next plunge on a railway deal, in which, without a resolution or authorization of this Parliament or a vote therefor—they having consequently as little power to undertake the arrangement as they would to drain the Red Sea—they undertook at a political crisis to administer a railroad not owned by the Government, and wrongfully involved this country into $12,000 of expenses, and they had to come down and get themselves indemnified by having that sum voted by Parliament. Last year under the plea of urgency, a plea which has been utterly swept away by succeeding events—because the urgency of last year has prolonged itself into a year's time and the roads are not taken over, and the Minister of Railways is not in a position to operate them—but under a plea of urgency, on a matter which had never been discussed in this House, and for which there was no consent or resolution of the House, they bound themselves by a hard and fast contract to an expenditure which involved the setting aside of a capital of $7,000,000 with which to meet that yearly expenditure. And, Sir, they dragooned their followers into voting that in this House, they dragooned the House into voting it too, and by what means? By means the most disreputable, Sir, that were ever employed by a Government in this country. An agreement which was mentioned in the Speech from the Throne is concluded, no papers laid on the Table of the House, a contract kept in the pocket of the Minister of Railways for nearly two months, and then at last thrown on the Table of the House, without a report which is worth the paper it is written on, and kept to within ten days of the prorogation of the House when not more than one-third of the members of Parliament were in their places. That is the work of this Government with reference to great railway deals involving the expenditure of vast sums of money. A plea of urgency, a plea of the public weal! Here, Sir, we have it again. A scheme in which secrecy is the prominent factor, in which suddenness is joined with secrecy. In the face of Parliament assembling within ten days, a rush and a route is made to carry the thing through; and worse than all, there is granted a monopoly with two clauses, which clauses of monopoly are in my mind reprehensible from beginning to end. What I consider the strongest prima facie case against the Bill is: That a railway 150 miles in length, a bridge standing between two great routes of travel and over which tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands of travellers must go and come, is placed under the watch and ward of two gentlemen with a monopoly for ten and five years, and with a subsidy more to be considered and of graver moment than a money subsidy taken from the coffers of this country—a subsidy which consists of the pick of three and three-quarter millions of acres of placer and lode mining country, in that which is supposed to be the richest of all gold countries.

This is the prima facie case. There must be something very strong that has not yet been given to this House, which can overthrow that prima facie case. As it looks now, it is by all odds the most daring, the worst, and the fullest of possibilities for widespread corruption, of any scheme that has ever been placed before this or any other House of Commons. And as we look upon it now, I am bound, as a member of this House who is jealous that Parliament shall not be robbed of the privileges which it cost so much to gain, who does not wish to be a mere registering machine for the secret compacts of the Government, who does not wish to put into the hands of two men, however reputable they may be—and I am saying nothing against these two enterprising contractors—the strongly auriferous deposits of the richest gold country in the world—so supposed to be; and that supposition is acted upon in this very transaction by the Government itself. Now, Sir, if the Government, when they lay these papers on the Table of the House, have got dynamite under them, or can show that there is some overwhelming state reason why this should be done, it may change my opinion; but I am bound to state that prima facie the case is a bad one, and until that bad flavour is taken away, I for my part propose to oppose the scheme.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. LANDERKIN. That is its justification.

Mr. FOSTER. It is well when a man believes himself buoyed up on a sufficient reason.

Now, Sir, the right hon. gentleman says:

Canada is prosperous as never before. Since this Government came in Canada has gone ahead by leaps and bounds. More progress has been made in eighteen months than in any other previous period of her history.

This is only a boast, however. There was not a figure given to sustain the statement. I shall be glad as one citizen of Canada, if that statement can be borne out by the facts. I like to see this country prospering; I would like to see her progress in every succeeding year greater than that of the year before. But let me ask my hon. friend again, as I did earlier in my address, if Canada is prospering, why is it? Canada is prospering because of the impetus given to her prosperity by the rich mining development of the country, which began in 1890, in the celebrated Slo-can district in British Columbia, and which, by prospecting, by patient endeavour and by the reaching out after indications and the explorations following thereupon, with the employment of courageous labour and capital, has been expanded in its area, until to-day in British Columbia proper, we suppose, with reason, that we have one of the greatest mineral regions in the world. The same thing applies to portions of Ontario—and I am speaking now simply of the new developments, not of the old; and to this we now add later development of the great country to the north, including the so-called Yukon district, and the district lying to the south of it, between that district and British Columbia proper. This mining development has added a life and energy and impetus to the prospective prosperity of Canada which is having an undoubtedly exalting and uplifting effect on the business interests of the whole country. But have the hon. gentlemen in their eighteen months of power brought all this about? The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) was good enough to say, either in Nicolet or in Lévis, that gold, too, had been discovered since this party came into power; and I have no doubt that his audience, looking up into his honest face, paid the greatest deference to that statement, and wondered what a demi-god indeed they were privileged to have as a member of the Government, who, with a power greater than that of the genii of old, when once he came into a position of trust and emolument, passed his wand lightly over the stretches of British Columbia, up the regions of the Seine and Rainy River, and even to the far-away snows and mountains of the Yukon, and conjured to the surface the glittering and shining gold.

For the sake of the mining interest they took power to have all the smelting for British Columbia done within British Columbia—took it with a flourish of trumpets. The power remains there, but the hon. gentlemen have not exercised it. Since they took that power, a mine operated in Rossland has erected its smelter in Northport, south of the line, right in the face of the power these gentlemen took, and they have not stirred. They have done nothing for the mining interest, and yet the development of the mining interest is to-day the chief factor in the swelling prosperity of Canada.

The Yukon regulations are such that anybody who runs may read them. Three times, at least, they have been changed, each time having been arranged evidently without consultation or proper knowledge; and they have had to be ripped in pieces and re-arranged when proper knowledge and representation were brought to bear upon them; and to-day they are in a position which is unsatisfactory in a very large degree to the mining community from one end of this country to the other.

What have they done with regard to the increase of trade? They have added no vessel to the carrying fleet on the Pacific. They found it there when they came into power, the work of their predecessors. They have added none to the West India route; they found a good line of steamers there when they came in. They have added nothing to the Atlantic service; but they have done this. They found a contract for a first-class service on the Atlantic which, had it been carried out, would have given a first-class service within two years. They tore it up. They gave into the hands of one of their practical men the authority to get a new contract. Two years afterwards there is no more certainty of its being got through their own brokers, than there was at the time they tore up the Allan contract and essayed a new attempt. So, Sir, you may go through the whole piece. When you ask yourselves what they have done, the answer comes back again: whatever good they have done, they have done because in trade and fiscal matters they did not carry out their pledges; whatever harm they have done, they have done because they did carry out their pledges. They have been wise enough to carry out and extend those measures with regard to agricultural products, immigration and the canal system which were parts of the settled policy of the late Government, which were instituted in most cases and carried on by them. But, Sir, I think the sublimity of nonsensical oratory was reached by my right hon. friend, when, raising himself to his full height, he declared that the historian of the future would jump from 1867 to 1897. What historian? The true Grit historian who wants to shut his eyes to every good in his opponents and every fault in his friends. Yes, he would like to skip the period between 1867 and 1897. He would like to skip the disastrous record of a Grit Government from 1874 to 1878. He would like to skip, for the credit of his party, the record of an Opposition, which for seventeen years fought every progressive measure, beginning with the National Policy, ending by getting into power on their opposition to these measures, and after they got into power, turning round and embracing every measure which they had cursed for seventeen long years. The Grit historian would like to skip that period, but for any man of light and leading to stand before a House like this and a country like Canada and declare, in his elation and self-gratulation, that because he was now Premier, in 1897, the future historian of this country would skip the period from 1867 to 1897, is to present a spectacle of self-complacency and personal vanity unique indeed. The historian, he coolly tells us, would skip all that splendid development of prosperity, nationality and industry, which has had no parallel in any country; he would skip the additions of territory—Prince Edward Island, British Columbia, the North-west Territories, none of them would be worth mentioning—and yet the possession of this united territory is our warrant for our credit as it stands and our prospects for the future. He would skip the building of those splendid arteries of commerce—the Intercolonial Railway, the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the canal system of this country, including the "Soo" Canal. No historian, the right hon. gentleman calmly assures us, will consider those worthy of a paragraph. In his anxiety to reach the period when the right hon. gentleman became Premier, he will be silent as to all these. The rise and progress of the varied industrial life, which has lifted this country from the plane of a pastoral, and fishing, and lumbering community to that of a great country able and sufficient to carry out the improvement of its natural sources, and to lay tribute upon every great country that supplies raw material, by bringing that raw material to its own shores and with its own brains and its own muscle, making it up in Canadian factories and Canadian workshops. All that would be skipped. Those splendid ocean routes which to-day carry commerce between us and the east—a rapidly increasing commerce—and carry our commerce to various other ports of the world—no mention of these by the historian in his eagerness to reach the period when the right hon. gentleman became Premier. All this splendid history of the welding together of scattered provinces into a premier confederate colony—all this, in the hon. gentleman's mind amounts to nothing. The historian would have but one object in his eye—the Laurierian period, commencing in 1897. Sir, I think that the historian of the future, as the historians of the past, some of whom are still with us, will never skip that splendid period in the history of this country in which the energized soul and life of this confederation showed itself in every movement, every purpose and every project. The man who misses that, misses the gist and quality of early Canadian history, and he would be condemned to eat the husks for the remainder of his life if he made so grave a mistake. Sir, biblical history tells us of a celebrated character named Nebuchadnezzar who, residing amidst the luxuries of great Babylon, came, at a certain time, to think he had made it all, and lifted up his voice and said: Is not this great Babylon which I have builded. He suffered from something which has a long Greek name, and for that he was obliged to go out and eat grass for seven years with the beasts of the field. I present this terrible example to my right hon. friend and warn him lest a similar fate should befall him.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). No doubt, Mr. Speaker, the debate up to the present has been one of a rather unusually instructive and interesting character, and I am free to say that all the various gentlemen who have contributed to it, from the mover and the seconder down to the gentleman who has just taken his seat, have distinguished themselves in their respective ways. I am free also, Sir, to confess that I am lost in admiration. I do not know which deserves the greatest credit—the tactical skill of the leaders of the Opposition or the sense of party loyalty and party discipline evinced by their supporters. Some of us perhaps were a little disposed to think that the hon. baronet, who leads the Opposition, was just a trifle verbose in his opening, but I am sure that I speak the unanimous sense of this side of the House when I tell him that we would have listened to him twice as long for the sake of his peroration and the incidents which followed.

Sir, the spectacle we had the pleasure of beholding on Friday night was one which, in a pretty long parliamentary experience I think, I may say, was equalled by few and surpassed by none, save on the one memorable occasion, about two years ago, when seven Ministers of the Crown saw fit to withdraw their advice from His Excellency in the interval between the presentation of the Address and the consideration thereof. Now, I am not able to speak with authority of the ceremonial which may attend the opening of the Conservative caucus, but I would just venture to suggest to the chairman of that institution, whoever he may happen to be, that if it conforms to the ritual which prevails on such occasions, I do not think he could do better than open the proceedings by a reference to that famous passage in Dr. Watts which, I dare say, hon. gentlemen opposite will remember, and which runs thus:

Mr. FOSTER.

Birds in their little nest agree,
But 'tis a shameful sight,
When children of one family
Fall out and scratch and bite.

Now, while my hon. friend who has just sat down (Mr. Foster) has, as is customary with him, given us a display marked with great rhetorical skill, we cannot but feel that he is rather thrown away upon this generation.

Mr. FOSTER. A stiff-necked and rebellious generation.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. So you find it. I remember long ago, an editor (a naughty Reform editor it was this time) suggested that if the hon. baronet who leads the Opposition had lived nineteen centuries ago and practised the healing art in the city of Jerusalem, it was almost certain that Sapphira would have preferred him to Ananias every time. Similarly I may observe that I think my hon. friend opposite, the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) has come into this world about two thousand years too late. I do not think it would have been possible now, or even at that early date, to have constructed a philosopher out of him, even of the cynic kind, although he has some affinities thereto, but I am bound to say that, in my poor judgment, a most magnificent sophist has been lost in him.

Mr. FOSTER. The old sophist was a very fine gentleman.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Well, he was; and I am free to say, that the hon. gentleman, as a juggler with facts, as a deviser of innuendoes, as a twister and perverter of plain and obvious truths from their plain and obvious significance, might match any sophist of them all. He is facile princeps there.

But nevertheless, the hon. gentleman has still his moments of weakness. It was quite right of him to deny the soft impeachment levelled at him by my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean), when he was charged with having produced that somewhat spicy article signed "Onlooker," in a journal of this city. But it was not discreet of him to reproach my hon. friend from East York with breach of journalistic confidence. I fear he gave himself away. Perhaps he will pardon me for making a suggestion. Of course, it is not for us to pry into the domestic secrets of the hon. gentlemen, but it is rumoured that the hon. gentleman opposite, and some parties with him, are rather disposed to dethrone the honourable baronet from his place of pride in favour of the hon. gentleman beside him. Permit me to say that I think that the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) might find that a very barren victory. He may find that the old lion is capable of being dangerous still. And, as Lord Byron remarked of one of his favourite heroes, with a slight amendment :

Though old he was a Tartar,
And not at all disposed to prove a martyr.

Furthermore, Sir, you and I know that in all well-regulated families of any standing, whether they be private or political, there are reasons for not hastily deposing persons of experience like the hon. baronet. In all these families there are cupboards, and in all these cupboards there are skeletons. Now, Sir, let us suppose for one moment that the hon. baronet should take to telling the House and the country all he knows of his hon. colleagues. And just fancy—suppose his colleagues were to take to telling the House and the country all they know of the hon. baronet. As to the hon. leader of the Opposition, I trust he will not misunderstand me, that he will not think I am aiming to proselytize him when I say that, in my opinion, from the time that he returned to Canada to this moment, he has shown most unmistakable clear grit. Nevertheless, his valour ought to be tempered with a little more discretion. I would suggest to him that there is no use of running amuck against exalted personages, as he did the other night. I am not prepared to say that he is not justified by tradition and precedent. As well as I can recollect, it has been the old and time-honoured Conservative belief that you may always rotten-egg a Governor General if he does not happen to agree with you. Some members of the party have even emphasized this view by burning Parliament buildings and by publishing annexation manifestoes in order to express their extreme distaste at the conduct of the representative of Her Majesty. At the same time, I can believe that the hon. gentleman is not quite so rancorous as he appears. If I am not altogether mistaken in recalling a certain interesting occasion, not so very long ago, in this city, among the many costly tributes which were tendered to the hon. gentleman, not the least costly, not the least elegant, was one presented by the exalted personage referred to. Therefore, I infer that the hon. gentleman is not so implacable as he seems. He may have thought it well to imitate the children of Isreal, who revenged themselves on their enemies by accepting from them jewels of silver and jewels of gold before they went out into the wilderness to look for more.

Now, I desire to state—and I am sure that I speak the opinion of hon. gentlemen beside me—we do not for one moment deprecate any fair or proper criticism of our proceedings; that is the business of the Opposition. We did it according to the best of our abilities when we sat on that side of the House, and we certainly cannot object if they do the same. But criticism, in order to be effective, must have some sound foundation. I notice the criticism made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), and concurred in by the leader of the Opposition, a criticism of a very remarkable kind, to which I wish to call the special attention of their friends and ours. Sir, these hon. gentlemen declare that they have proof positive in the public returns of the utter failure of our policy to encourage trade with England. And what does the House suppose is the proof they give? Sir, it was said by the hon. baronet, and endorsed by his friend beside him, that the proof of the utter failure of our policy is to be found in the fact that in the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1897, the imports from England amounted to $29,412,000, being a reduction of $3,000,000 odd, and that hence our policy had failed. Well, Sir, surely these hon. gentlemen do not wish to conceal from the House that our policy came into effect only at the end of the tenth month of the year—on the 23rd of April, 1897, my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) brought down his Budget. Up to that time the whole of the trade was carried on under the tariff framed by these hon. gentlemen. Now, no human being supposed or expected for one moment that within two months we could change the operations of eighteen years. Sir, I take these figures, and from these identical figures I deduce the strongest possible condemnation of the policy of these hon. gentlemen. In the twenty-five years from 1873 to 1897, our imports from Great Britain fell from $68,000,000 to $29,412,000. Sir, that was the result of their policy. That loss that the hon. gentleman speaks of, including that deficit of $3,000,000 odd, is due directly, clearly and unmistakably to the policy of these hon. gentlemen themselves. This was five-sixths more their year than it was ours, even allowing—which I cannot for a moment allow—that we should have been able within two months to materially affect the ordinary course of trade. So it is plain and clear to a demonstration—the logic is inevitable, as the hon. gentleman said—that the exact result of their policy was to double our trade with the United States, as far as imports were concerned, and to reduce more than one-half the trade from England. Now, Sir, I will tell hon. gentlemen opposite, that if they want to criticise our policy, they must wait a little. In the first place, the effect of our tariff does not fairly begin until the first of August next, when the 25 per cent reduction takes effect. If on the first of July next the tariff returns show the same results relatively that they do to-day, still more, if on the first of August, 1899, the tariff returns show that our trade with England has diminished and trade with the United States has increased, then we may say, and say with some truth, that our well-intentioned and liberal exertions to aid English trade have not had the success we expected.

But to say on the evidence adduced by those hon. gentlemen, on the evidence of our returns down to July, 1897, which embrace but two months of the whole year, that there is the smallest justification for the assertions they have made, that our policy has failed, is to trifle with the intelligence of this House and with the intelligence of their supporters in the country and elsewhere. Now, I do not feel particularly called upon to rise to the high moral altitude which mark the opening of the hon. gentleman's speech. All I can say is that I hope that in the future his practice will correspond to it, for up to the present time we have had, I am sorry to note, a marked divergence between his moral platitudes and his practical performances. But when he talks of our crude tactics and strategy, and more particularly when he wants to know whether we are satisfied with our leader, Sir, I think it is time to ask him whether he is satisfied with his. He is good enough to call attention to the quotations of the Canadian Pacific Railway in 1898, and to remark that those are tolerably clear evidence and go to prove the high status of Canadian securities. Perhaps he would tell us what Canadian Pacific securities ranged at in 1896 when he left office. As to the moral quotations which go to show the difference between the position of Canada then and the position of Canada now, Sir, I do not want to recall those painful pages in our history; but let those men who desire to do so, mark the difference between the Canada of to-day and the Canada of 1891. Let them turn to the pages of the English journals which rang from one end of the United Kingdom to the other with the painful record of the corruption and the political debauchery, which was exposed in the committee rooms of this House in 1891, and let them compare those with the innumerable compliments justly and deservedly paid to Canada and to the representative of Canada during the course of the year which has just passed.

Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman was pleased to enlarge at great length upon the humiliation, upon the disgrace, which marks the position of Canada because, forsooth, the English law officers choose to disallow our contention as to the actual effect of a certain clause in our tariff. Of course I am not going to rely on my own judgment in a matter of this kind, but I have to tell the hon. gentleman this, that there are two wholly different contentions as to the effect of a reciprocity treaty, and consequently as to the effect of such clauses as we introduced. He knows right well that there is one school of jurisconsults, and a very good school, too, who hold with us, and there is another who hold with the English law officers of the Crown; but it is not worth our while to discuss now which of those may or may not be correct. This I have to tell him: The greater the difficulties that stood in our way, the greater the legal and technical obstacles that stood in our way, the greater the opposition to the carrying out of our policy and the denouncing these treaties, the greater the credit that is due to this Government, and due especially to my hon. friend beside me, for conquering those difficulties, for obtaining the object we desired, and for reversing the policy injudiciously and indiscreetly entered into by former English Governments, and for obtaining for Canada the proud distinction of having been the first colony to emancipate herself and to emancipate her sister colonies from restraints which should have never been laid upon them, by the confession of the Premier of England himself. I say that was as great a political and diplomatic triumph as could well be conceived, and I repeat that the greater the obstacles, the greater the credit of the achievement.

Now, I return for one moment to the criticism on the result of our preferential tariff. Sir, the House will remember that that hon. gentleman put it in somewhat this fashion. He declared, as I took down his words, that we were giving privileges to nine-tenths of the foreign countries that traded with us, and denying them to nine-tenths of our own sister colonies. Who that heard those words and was not familiarly acquainted with the details of our trade and navigation, but would believe that we had entirely failed in our attempt to exclude foreign countries from the benefits. What is the fact? Why, Sir, that of the total volume of imports into Canada in the last year, six-tenths nearly came from the United States which are all excluded from the benefit of it, and three-tenths or thereabouts came from Great Britain, which are admitted. What does the remainder amount to? Why, Sir, deduct Germany, deduct Belgium, and deduct France, all of which were specially entitled under special treaties, one of which we ourselves had concurred in, and there hardly remains half a dozen millions, and those half a dozen millions are chiefly composed of such articles as tea and sugar, as to which the clause in our tariff did not apply at all.

Now, I turn to another matter on which the hon. gentleman bestowed considerable attention, and which it is certainly desirable we should bestow some attention, although I am bound to say that I fail to note any particular concurrence between the views advocated by himself and those of the hon. gentleman whom I suppose he still continues to call his leader, as to the question of our contract for opening up the Yukon and the Klondike. He is perfectly well aware, and I am perfectly well aware, that it is entirely out of the question to discuss with any profit the details of this measure until it is brought before the House in the shape of a Bill, and until the contract is laid on the Table. But there are certain, broad clear and distinct matters of fact as to which the House are at present in a position to form a fair opinion. Now, Sir, I am perfectly ready to admit, if it gives any satisfaction to the hon. gentleman, that I would have greatly preferred, as my colleagues would have greatly preferred, to have been able to deal with this question in the ordinary way and by the ordinary methods; we would have been very glad indeed to have been able to have a proper survey made of this route, and we would have all been delighted to have asked for tenders at public competition. But, Sir, we did not do so, and I think we will be able to show the House that if we had done so, we would have utterly failed, on technical grounds, in doing our duty to the people of this country, we would have exposed the interests of Canada to very great peril, and that under the circumstances which exist there was no option whatever for us to act otherwise than we did act. I do not in the slightest degree deprecate the hon. gentleman's criticism, or the criticism of any other hon. gentleman as to the line which we saw fit to adopt; but I do desire to place more particularly before our own friends and before the country at large, briefly the reasons which led us to adopt this extraordinary and unusual course. Now, Sir, I think there is no man who has paid the slightest attention to the affairs of the Yukon, but realizes that there is need of very great speed in opening up that country if we are to avert a grave disaster in the event of any large number of people finding their way into that country with the present communications remaining as they are. I think, in the next place, that every man, in spite of the rhetorical declamation of my hon. friend, will admit that in this matter those persons who are going to expend several millions of their own money, not the money of the people of Canada, mind you, for the purpose of carrying out this enterprise, are taking tremendous risks. There is no use in gainsaying the fact that this matter in its present shape is a huge gamble. Our duty, I think, required us not to risk the money of the people of Canada; our duty, I think, required us to take measures to secure that if this did turn out, as we hope it may turn out to be a very rich country indeed, the people of Canada should have their share of the profit while they escaped taking any risks. I should like to know, given those conditions, what plan, scheme or device hon. gentlemen opposite have to propose. What better scheme could they devise? It is idle to say we should have waited till the House met, then have called for tenders, then have entered into the long and tedious negotiations which of necessity would have elapsed before we could have finally adjusted so difficult a matter to our minds. Had we done so, farewell to any hope of obtaining adequate communication with the Yukon this year. This would have been a disaster, in view of the extraordinary influx of people which we have reason to believe will flow into that country. Had we sat still and failed to rise to the occasion, had we failed to do what I say is clearly and manifestly our duty to do, who would have been so loud in denouncing us as utterly incompetent and unfit to hold our places as the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat? Sir, suppose, and it is supposable and it is an imaginable condition that after all it is said and done we find there is no such huge amount of gold as we expect in the Klondike and Yukon, and suppose we had undertaken the construction of the railway and spent millions of money in endeavouring to exploit it, and then received nothing, how this Chamber would have rung with denunciations of our folly and incapacity. I now take the other alternative, which we all hope will prove to be a fact. Let us suppose that these regions furnish the richest gold fields known in the world, that they possess huge and rich placers—what then? The people of Canada stand to receive dollar for dollar, pound for pound, in thus opening up the country. I repeat that we stand in that position without risking a cent or a copper. I do not wonder that the hon. gentleman takes exception to such a proceeding; it was not the way he and his colleagues went about such matters.

Mr. LANDERKIN. They gave both land and money.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Just one observation more. I trust, and here I appeal to the better sense and better feeling both of the right hon. gentleman and of his colleagues, that throughout this discussion we shall be wise enough and prudent enough to preserve a courteous and temperate attitude towards the United States and its proceedings. I have always felt that in dealing with our neighbours, the golden rule is: 'suaviter in modo, foriter in re.' We propose to act on that maxim. In a case like this, bluster is worse than useless. There is no doubt these boundary questions are both difficult and tedious. The Government of Canada in dealing with this matter are necessarily acting under a sense of grave responsibility. They are responsible to Canada first, they are responsible to the Empire in the second place, and I hope and trust that while we shall stand firmly together to protect the just rights of Canada, both sides of the House will agree to conduct the discussion so far as may be so far as affects the pretensions or claims of the United States in a calm and dignified manner, and assuredly this is infinitely more likely to bring about a proper solution of these difficult questions than any bombast or any declamation on our part. We will not surrender the rights of Canada; neither, on the other hand, are the Government going to be forced forward into taking injudicious action to please a small section of the population. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) was good enough to inquire why we thought the Canadian Government deserved some reasonable measure of the confidence of the people. Well, Sir, I am happy to tell the hon. gentleman that it seems to me there are good and sufficient reasons why the present Government should ask and receive the confidence of the majority of this House and the confidence of the majority of the people. The hon. gentleman could not deny, he did not dare to deny, that to-day the credit of Canada stands at the highest point which the credit of the Dominion has ever reached. The hon. gentleman could not deny, although he tried to minimize the force of my hon. friend's statement, that the trade of Canada has been extending by leaps and bounds for the last eighteen months. In olden times does not the House remember with what energy and emphasis my hon. friend and those behind him insisted on the fact that the best, the most startling and astonishing proof of the great success of the National Policy was that in one year, I believe, the exports exceeded the imports by something like $1,000,000 or thereabouts. In our first twelve months the exports exceeded the imports by $17,000,000; for the next six months the exports exceeded the imports by $20,000,000. How those hon. gentlemen would have glorified themselves had they had such a record to show, and yet how easily and carelessly almost, the ex-Finance Minister passed it over to-day. Sir, it is a matter which I think warrants the Government receiving the confidence of the House and the country that, as I have said and as my right hon. friend has said, never since the day of confederation has Canada, as a country, been treated with anything like the same consideration on the part of England and other countries as Canada receives to-day; and I say with confidence that we owe that consideration to a very large extent indeed to the policy of this Government, which the hon. gentleman tells us has done nothing to secure it. It is a matter of no trifling moment, as he knows right well, that treaties with important countries like Germany were denounced because they conflicted with the policy of Canada and because the Canadian Government requested the British Government to do so. And as a trifling proof that the confidence of the people has not weakened in the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues, must I recall to the hon. gentleman's memory the long roll of Liberal victories that have marked the course of the Liberal party since it came into power? Does the hon. gentleman consider it of no consequence that whereas we met Parliament eighteen months ago with a majority of 22—I think that was what the hon. baronet claimed when members were selected for the various committees—now I think we can count 47 good men and true to support the Government. Does the hon. gentleman consider it a matter of no moment that

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Prince Edward Island has declared itself Liberal by a most decisive majority? And what does the hon. gentleman say in regard to Nova Scotia?

An hon. MEMBER. Only shreds and patches.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. And the hon. gentleman will also remember that five gentlemen were introduced by my right hon. friend and his colleagues the other day, and I think not one new member was introduced by the Opposition.

An hon. MEMBER. Beware of the Ides of March.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. We will take care how to cross that river when we come to it. The plain fact is this, to my mind, that we have had almost too much good fortune. I am not desirous of seeing the Opposition weaker. I have learned the truth of the advice given by an old and eminent English statesman that the best guarantee of good government is to have on the other side of the House an active, well organized and unscrupulous Opposition. Two of those requisites are there already, and I hope hon. gentlemen may yet secure the third. I will not for one moment deny, I do not desire to deny that the task of the Government of Canada is in many respects a delicate and difficult one. We are bound on the one hand to take advantage of our opportunities and to make the most of them for the good of the country; we are bound on the other hand—and we have had our lesson during the eighteen years we spent in the wilderness—we are bound on the other hand, to avoid discounting the future as was done so freely during that period. Sir, it is a matter of common notoriety that every day, almost every hour, any quantity of projects, many of them projects of merit, are submitted for the consideration of the Government. Now, with respect to these I have to say frankly, that it is not enough to secure the co-operation and aid of the Government, that the project should be good per se. We hold that more than that must be shown. It must be absolutely necessary in the general interests, and it must be one which promises reasonably speedy results.

It is no fault of ours that we came into power to find this country saddled with a very heavy debt; it is no fault of ours that we find this country saddled with a very heavy expenditure; that we find it saddled with a very heavy taxation, although we have tried to reduce it to a reasonable extent. Nor is it any fault of ours that we have heavy direct engagements to meet, which were left behind by the hon. gentlemen opposite. Here I may take the liberty to criticise one of the illustrations given by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster). He was good enough to tell us that all the gain that he could find was something like three-quarters of one per cent reduction on the tariff. Well, I think his reduction, after two years cogitation was about one-fortieth of one per cent, so that at any rate we are thirty times better than he is. Be that as it may, I want to point out to him, because I am not sure he understands it, and I want to point out to the House, that this question of taking averages is essentially a fallacious one. The effect of such a tariff as he had on the Statute-book with its heavy specific duties, with its tendency towards high protection was largely this: that a great many articles were absolutely prohibited from entering into this country at all. Now, I could draw a tariff, and I have no doubt the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) if he applied his mind could also draw a tariff, in which there would appear to be a comparatively small sum levied, and it is a comparatively low average rate of duty, and which at the same time might exclude so many goods as to act as an extremely heavy burden on the people of this country. Where there are two tariffs, both ad valorem, there might be some reason in his comparison, but where he compares a tariff, largely specific, or specific and ad valorem, with a tariff which is chiefly ad valorem, he entirely mistakes the real trend and condition of the case when he alleges, that he can show there is only at present this apparent reduction, and he will remember that one-half of our scheme has yet to come into effect, which he does not seem to have taken at all into consideration—he will find that the reduction is probably much more considerable than he states.

Then, Sir, it is not our fault if our income is very heavily mortgaged. Those hon. gentlemen who have listened to the remarks I have made from the other side of the House in past years, will do me the justice to remember that the point I chiefly insisted upon on all occasions, in opposition to the projects of the hon. gentlemen then in power, was this: that they were mortgaging the entire income of the country. I know of no country where the available funds in proportion to the expenditure are so small, where the mortgages, so to speak, of our collective income are so large as in Canada to-day; and it is no credit to the Ministers of Finance of the period to which he alluded, that that state of things should have been permitted to exist. I have said that the immediate chances of large retrenchments are not great, and for this simple reason: that we have not got $38,000,000 or $39,000,000 to cut and come upon, but that we are practically cut down to a matter of $8,000,000 or $9,000,000, and what retrenchments can be made must be made from that comparatively limited area.

I have stated before, and I repeat it now, that the best way to improve our condition is by such measures as my hon. friend the Postmaster General has taken, who I hope will be able to show the House when his estimates come down, that the huge deficit amounting to nearly three-quarters of a million of dollars which has so long prevailed between revenue and expenditure in the post office, is being wholly extinguished. Another mode by which I hope—although I admit there are great difficulties in the way of my hon. friend (Mr. Blair)—another mode by which I hope the public revenue can be enlarged and practically speaking the burdens of the people greatly reduced, will be, by such improved administration of our railway system, that we may obtain some moderate return on the $55,000,000 sunk in the Intercolonial Railway. Another thing, which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) treats lightly enough, is that the success of my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) on my left, has paved the way for an enormous reduction ultimately in the burdens of the people. To-day, on our sinking funds and ordinary interest we pay a matter of about $12,000,000 a year. If the policy of my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) succeeds; if we are able within a moderate space of time to get rid of the sinking funds, and to reduce the rate of interest on our debt to 2½ per cent or thereabouts, the result will be that the $12,000,000 charges that now stand in our books will be reduced to $7,000,000. Those are modes in which substantial and great savings can be made; those are modes to which my hon. friends in the Cabinet are applying themselves with all diligence. But, Sir, in the course of eighteen months we cannot overcome the consequences of the folly of our predecessors in power; the Augean stable takes more time to clean, and in eighteen months we could not be expected to overcome the results of accumulated errors and misconduct of eighteen years. I add this: there is every reason to believe that the policy of my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), in taking advantage of these mineral discoveries, to which my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) opposite rightly attributes a good measure of the prosperity we hope to enjoy, is likely to result in a very large addition to the population of our country, and in that way too, a very large and important reduction in the burdens of the people will be made. If we can bring down the gross expenditure to $35,000,000 on a population of 7,000,000, I take it the country will be a great deal better off than with a gross expenditure of $40,000,000 and a population of 5,000,000. These things I think are now within measurable distance.

Sir, for that end, as I have said, we must ask for time. We must ask for something more; we must ask for the same loyal and generous support from our friends that has been so freely given us in the past. We on our part are bound to try our best to deserve it, and to that end, among other things, I am authorized to say, that the Government in the endeavour—we are aware that engagements were incurred during last session, which were calculated to strain the resources of the country to some extent—in that endeavour, we desire therefore to incur in this session as few expenditures as we possibly can, consistent with the absolute needs of the country. One thing more. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) could not conclude his speech without alluding to the “ruthless tongue” of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). It is the first time I have heard that epithet applied to my right hon. friend, although there is no doubt that he has deserved on many occasions high eulogy for his powers as an orator. He (Mr. Foster) talked of the humiliation and disaster we have encountered, and he had the audacity to tell us that he believed the future historian would dwell with pride and pleasure on the eighteen years during which he and his friends held power. Sir, the future historian whether he be Grit or Tory, if he be an honest man, will feel himself compelled to say when the time for writing the history of Canada comes: that Canada never sustained a greater misfortune than when in 1878 it turned out Alexander Mackenzie and replaced him by the hon. baronet and his friends. I have before this maintained on the floor of Parliament, and I am prepared to maintain it again: that if an honest debit and credit account be taken of the resources of Canada in 1878 and the resources of Canada when these gentlemen went out of office, the balance would tell very heavily against them. Putting aside the mere material question, the well-known enormous depreciation of property of the greatest portion of the population which went on during that period, what, after all, is the real wealth of the country? The real wealth of the country is the number of intelligent, God-fearing and industrious men and women who exist in it; and when, Sir, in the history of Canada, did Canada see so poor and mean a record as during the eighteen years of these hon. gentlemen’s management? As I have said before, I am astonished at the audacity of any hon. gentleman hailing from the maritime provinces, and most of all hailing from the province of New Brunswick, who, with the knowledge that his own province was reduced to a state of atrophy for ten years, with no increase to the population, rises and tells us that the last eighteen years will be for ever bright spots, bright and particular stars, in the history of Canada. Sir, I tell the hon. gentleman that the result of those eighteen years was, as his own conduct in 1896, and the conduct of a great many of his associates at that time, showed, so to debauch and degrade and demoralize public life in Canada, that it may well require more than eighteen months to restore it to the position it formerly occupied.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Though I have good hopes that within a reasonable space of time, having set our faces in the right direction, we may succeed in achieving a great improvement, I do not mean to say that any country could trust these hon. gentlemen for eighteen years and not be materially the worse for it. I know well that they have alleged that they added to the wealth of Canada. They did no such thing. They added to the wealth of a few individuals in Canada, and they impoverished the great mass of the people. I repeat that if a just and true estimate were taken, it would be found that if you placed on one side the increase of the debt, public and private, and the enormous depreciation of property which took place throughout Canada, and on the other side everything they choose to claim as additions to our wealth made during that period, the debit account would be very heavy against them. On the other hand, I tell the hon. gentleman and his friends that there never was a period in the history of Canada when our public life had sunk so low as it had during the concluding years of their reign. We are bound to take example by these hon. gentlemen. I am perfectly willing to hear their criticism, and I am bound to say that I regard the hon. gentleman as to a great extent the right man in the right place. His volubility will be well used in calling in question what we have said on previous occasions. I am not disposed to differ from him on that head: I welcome his criticism; I am glad he should make it. But I am not prepared to allow him or any other hon. gentleman on that side to contend that Canada had anything to be proud of under their regime.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the members on this side of the House have, so far, any great reason to complain of the manner in which the debate has gone on, or to regret much that has been said from the Treasury benches. I think this House was somewhat surprised that a man with the parliamentary experience and knowledge of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) was reduced to such a poor line of argument and declamation as he has given an exhibition of this evening. We have heard better speeches than this from the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and, if he will allow me to say so, we recognized in some of the personal language in which he indulged, the old member for South Oxford, who, on account of those serious crimes and misdemeanours, in the opinion of his party, was deposed from the position of financial adviser and locked up during the last general election. It seemed to us, last session, that the lesson had done him good, for a more urbane, courteous and delightful parliamentarian it was impossible to pick out from the benches opposite than the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. But he itches for the old authority he once wielded, and I fear that in his jealousy and rage he is venting his spite on us instead of on the men who sit round him and who think so little of him. The hon. gentleman, I say, was slightly personal. I have a right, I think, to claim that. He invaded, not only the home of my respected sire, but he came into the nursery which I am responsible for, and brought before this House of Commons in the debate on the Address some tittle-tattle in regard to some personal relations which had existed with a certain high personage in this country, to whom no reference has been allowed on this side of the House for almost any explanation whatever. While I will not go into personal matters as to what happened before that certain high personage made a grave constitutional mistake—if that expression be allowed—and merited in this House, and out of it, the condemnation of the Canadian people, let me come to the reminiscence the hon. gentleman gave us when he said that the Tory party had been fond of rotten-egging Governors General, and let me remind him—perhaps it is unnecessary to do so—that no Governor General was ever rotten-egged by the Conservative party since that hon. gentleman left the party. But there has been at least one Governor General in Canada, Sir Edmund Head, who had for a long time to submit to the vilest abuse of a personal character at the hands of the Reform party, which that gentleman has joined, their press and their leaders heaping upon him epithets so gross and abusive as would not to-day be suggested by any person in this Chamber, Mr. Speaker, either on your right or on your left. Then, the hon. gentleman, in the pitiful manner in which he attempted to dodge the points made in this debate on this side of the House, made the confession that, after all, in regard to reciprocal legislation, or reciprocity treaties, there were two schools; and the trouble, to sum up his argument, is this, that he either led or followed his colleagues into the wrong school. The hon. gentleman was bold enough—and there is no limit to his audacity, as we know—to discuss troubles which were brewing, as he supposed, on this side of the House—personal difficulties and personal differences. It did seem to me, if my vision was good, that some colleagues of his got very restless as he referred to party troubles. It did seem to me that the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil), the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell), the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Préfontaine), the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux), the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Madore) and the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette), not to mention a whole host of that majority of which he boasts, all moved restlessly in their chairs and felt that a direct personal allusion to them might be uncomfortable. Then the hon. gentleman, later on, in discussing the argument of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), spoke of six-tenths of the imports, as I caught the figure, being from the United States, which had been excluded entirely from the preferential clause, and he commented on the omission of the hon. gentleman to take that into account in the calculation he made. That enables me, in passing, to remind the Government and the House of a peculiar feature of that tariff that has not been dwelt upon very much in the debate so far. While the Government were pretending—ior, according to their own admission, it has turned out to be a pretense and nothing more—that they were consumed by a love and affection for the mother country, which they had been singularly deficient in for a great many years past, and were giving to the mother country great gifts and concessions, and while it was true that 'nominatim' the United States did not and could not enjoy this so-called preferential portion of the tariff, great care was taken, as we see by the results, to give the United States a tremendous preference in fact by the transfer of certain articles from the dutiable to the free list. Of this transfer the United States got the greatest benefit, owing to the choice made of the articles put on the free list, and the proximity of the United States to the Canadian market. In the case of iron and steel, and in the case of coal also, a marked preference has been given the United States.

If I recall another portion of the hon. gentleman's argument aright, he went on to rejoice, and to me it was an intense pleasure to find him rejoicing over prosperity in Canada. We are agreed in this respect, that there is a great prosperity in the country about which we can boast; but as to the causes of that prosperity, his modesty did not prevent him from ascribing them to the act to the policy and action of the Government. I am sorry that I cannot take that view, and the hon. gentleman himself has furnished us with reasons for being somewhat stubborn. I hold in my hand a speech delivered by the hon. gentleman—one more carefully considered than that he has just delivered—in which he assured the Liberal convention that fiscal reform was all good enough in its way, but that while something might be done for our benefit by fiscal reform, no prosperity could come to this poverty-stricken country, this country in which ruin and devastation prevailed at the time, unless we had free admission into the markets of the great American Republic. But the hon. gentleman to-night, forgetting that theory which he held for so long a time, endeavoured, in the excitement and enthusiasm of the moment, to take credit for the fact that in spite of the barrier being raised in that market higher against us than before, our trade has increased and prospered. He took credit entirely for the acts of the Canadian Government, whether wise or otherwise, which were wholly independent of the co-operation and support of the country to the south of us; and towards the end of his remarks, the hon. gentleman gave us the secret of his line of conduct, when in Opposition, by telling us the kind of Opposition which practically he had promoted. Desperate indeed it was, and while the hon. gentleman feels now that he is in a position no doubt to instruct, there is one feature in that lesson which I, for one in this House, do not feel at all tempted to imitate, and that is his determination to suspect something wrong in everything the Government did. Much, however, as I may suspect the Government in general, I do not intend to discuss any phase of policy which they may lay on the Table of this House in any such spirit during this or any other session when I may occupy a seat in this House. I followed the hon. gentleman's remarks with great attention, and I do not think that it is necessary for me, with all respect to the hon. gentleman and the ability he possesses, to make further reference to what he said.

But this is a debate of great interest. It is a debate which will be carried on, I think, for some time with great interest and benefit to the country, because it concerns subjects of moment, and which are becoming all the graver and more important for the scant attention they are receiving from hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches, after the very exhaustive treatment of them by those who have already spoken from this side of the House. Hon. gentlemen opposite must remember that, however strong they may feel their position to be, these subjects are being canvassed, and are exciting the people from one end of the country to the other. Charges are being preferred of a most serious character concerning the promises they have made and the pledges they have violated. To the very thorough discussion of broken pledges concerning the tariff and preferential trade, and retrenchment, and the independence of Parliament, the only answer of the First Minister practically was this: We have, notwithstanding all that, carried the elections, and the Queen's Jubilee was one of the most glorious experiences of my life. That, however, will not satisfy the country. All the excitement attending that happy year and all the loyalty for which this country is famous will not relieve hon. gentlemen opposite from the necessity of meeting the charges made against them. There must be, before this debate is over, a more reasonable attempt made to meet those charges, if these hon. gentlemen are to continue in the lucky career that so far has been theirs—capturing seats here and there throughout the country.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

I want to press home an unpleasant charge, because I believe it my duty to do so, and I call the First Minister's attention to it, because it has been made, not altogether by one as much opposed to him as I am in public life, and because it comes from a great legal authority. It comes from a gentleman who has co-operated with him in this House. It is the opinion of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), delivered in the presence of my hon. friend when he was in Opposition, it is true, and given on a subject to which I have frequently called the attention of the Government. In 1891 great excitement took place over a Federal election, and the leader of the Government, the then leader of the Opposition was charged with having accepted the terms of a most important conference known as the Quebec conference of 1887—a conference that decided to reorganize or readjust the whole financial arrangements between the Federal Government and the different provinces. That was perhaps the most important subject decided by the conference, and that involved a very large expenditure of money.

The leader of the government in Quebec, the ally of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government here, stated that the leader of the Opposition of that day promised to give effect to this, if he came into power, and he had bound himself by a solemn engagement to give at least a majority of 15 votes to Mr. Laurier. One of my colleagues in the late Government, the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) in this House resurrected a question and answer between the hon. gentleman and Mr. Desjardins, who was in the House at that time, whether the leader of the present Government admitted that the statement which Mr. Desjardins had made was correct, and he admitted that he had accepted the terms of the Quebec conference. And then the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), sitting in this House, used expressions—and I only repeat them to show how strong his opinion was—that not merely had a bargain been made in 1887, but part of the bargain had been carried out, with the promise of the present Prime Minister to redeem these pledges and to carry out the terms of the Quebec conference of 1887 when he came into power, the leader of the party in the province of Quebec had been able to obtain the votes, not only had his own government succeeded, but he had been able to obtain a majority in the province of Quebec in the election of 1891 for the present leader of the Government. And the hon. member for North Simcoe said, that if there ever was a bargain and sale, then the present Prime Minister was bought and sold by the premier of the province of Quebec, and that the Prime Minister had got his majority in the province of Quebec by corrupt and scandalous means. That language was used in the right hon. gentleman's presence; but the language, whether fair or unfair, covered the opinion of the hon. member for North Simcoe, based upon admitted facts in regard to the readjustment of the provincial subsidy. And I have not been able yet to obtain the slightest hint from any occupant of the Treasury benches that the promise of the right hon. gentleman is to be redeemed. In this debate I would ask and press the question upon the gentleman, whether he is able now to say if he has the slightest intention of carrying out the terms of the Quebec conference of 1887.

Now, after this pitiful condition of affairs—for that it is pitiful, those who consider these promises and these pledges made at the time and under the circumstances, and not merely the absence of the performance or the absence of the excuse for the non-performance, must see—it need not surprise us to find the dissensions to which I have referred, and the incapacity which has been demonstrated and no attempt made to defend it or explain it away, in regard to our financial matters. We have practically repeated in Canada an Aberdeen Ministry—Aberdeen in the sense of being torn by dissensions, Aberdeen by reason of its incapacity. And as that incapacity becomes notorious, as did the incapacity of a former Administration of the same name, I have no doubt that the same fate will overwhelm it. I might be charitable and suggest an excuse to the Prime Minister for not keeping these promises. One will have to cudgel his wits very hard to suggest even a plausible excuse. But as I see these charges pressed home and an absence of any explanation from the Treasury benches, when, indeed, I find the hon. gentleman, even on the question of prohibition, endeavouring to hedge and to frighten off those who would otherwise vote for prohibition, should he give them an opportunity, in the manner which has been proposed, I have to suggest to him an excuse which was given by Mr. Hall Caine on one occasion during his visit to this capital. Speaking after dinner on an important question, he asked that his statement should be taken qualifiedly owing to the time of the evening when he spoke. And he illustrated thus: Once upon a time, a rat was drowning in a vat of beer, and a cat passing by, the rat appealed to her to save him, saying that death from the fumes was so horrible that it would infinitely prefer to be eaten by the cat. A bargain was then and there made on this basis. The cat gave its paw to the rat, which jumped out and at once ran into a hole near by, and, while brushing himself off, looked out. The cat reminded him that there was part of the bargain which had escaped his memory, that in consideration of the assistance given him, he should submit to be eaten. "Oh," said the rat,

"that promise was not binding; as you saw yourself. I was in liquor at the time I made it." That is the only possible suggestion that I can offer to the hon. gentleman for his failure to carry out this long string of promises, some of them made after dinner, all of them brought to his memory time and time again, yet never fulfilled.

I wish to make an observation to the mover (Mr. Bertram) of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. And I have a small quarrel with him, seeing the secret is now out how it came about that my representative in the Cabinet, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), the Minister from the province of Nova Scotia, was not able to hold up the Nova Scotia end in the readjustment of the tariff. We have some important industries in the province, and I believe those industries have the good will of the Minister of Finance. I have reason to believe that, and have never had reason to believe the contrary. But it is clear, after the statement of this gentleman in Toronto, who wished to obtain articles of our manufacture in the steel and iron works of Nova Scotia at a lower rate, so as to be able better to handle his finished product, as he would consider it, he readjusted that tariff in the very way that the Minister of Finance and I did not wish to have done. And I say that what has given him joy—and after all is said and done, and since it cannot be mended, I hope it has given him better than joy, some substantial return—I wish him to understand that it has been largely at the expense of Nova Scotia labour; for, while the tariff has so far not caused the works in Nova Scotia to be closed down altogether, the way in which they have been kept open since the time that tariff was changed to their detriment has been by reducing the wages of the workingman. I do not think the hon. gentleman from Centre Toronto, in making the tariff, was compelled to reduce the wages of his workmen or employees.

I desire to draw the attention of the Government to a serious subject, and not in a captious spirit shall I approach it. It is a subject of importance to both the east and west of this country, it a subject occupying a great deal of the attention of the boards of trade, and it is a subject which the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce referred to in general terms when he spoke of the conditions that existed in the large political sense, and the forbearance that should be exhibited by Canada in dealing with, if I understood him to say, matters of foreign relations, as we can act in those matters only through those who advise the Queen outside of our own Cabinet. Now, this is a subject not wholly of the Yukon Railway. I agree with those who have spoken in this debate that a subject so grave as that, and indeed so exciting, is much better and more calmly discussed when the House is in possession of all the facts. For instance, the statement made in answer to the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) to-day, was a statement that removed a great many rumours that have been going about in connection with this question of the transport of troops. It is well in those matters, I think, to have official facts before coming to a definite opinion, and in that I agree with the hon. member for York, whatever one's impressions on the prima facie statement of the facts may amount to. But I would refer rather to some questions in connection with the laws of this country as they stand, laws over which we have complete control. I see the Minister of Customs is not enjoying altogether my observations, but still if I could obtain his attention for a moment, I would remind him that there is no difference of opinion, as I understand it, in this Parliament as regards our coasting laws being in their nature reciprocal. It has been the policy of Canada to concede privileges where privileges could be obtained from the United States in that matter, and where our marine was not allowed coasting privileges in the United States, it was the policy of all Parliament's and of all Government's to see that their privileges were similarly curtailed. Yet it is a fact that at present these laws are not equally administered, and in the great clutch that is being made for trade in Alaska and in the North-west Territories, by cities on the Pacific Coast from San Francisco upwards, the United States shipping is enjoying at present a most unfair advantage, because the laws of the United States are being administered sharply so as to prevent any Canadian bottom taking Canadian goods coming from an American railway to an American port, on to a Canadian port. They prohibit a Canadian vessel carrying United States freight from any eastern United States city from a Canadian port to either San Francisco or to the northern ports of the United States, while our officers allow United States vessels to carry Canadian freight from Canadian ports to Canadian ports. The subject has been brought to the Minister of Customs, formally, as I have been advised, and I draw again formally his attention to it, because the people on the coast have a right to complain particularly when the rivalry is now so keen. Their desire is this that if the law advisers advise the hon. gentleman that the present legislation of Canada is not as restrictive upon her rivals in shipping as American legislation is upon us, then the hon. gentleman should hasten to this House and have our laws put in a condition which generally they were supposed to hold.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Will the hon. gentleman state wherein he thinks that our laws are more liberal to United States coasting vessels than their laws are to us?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In the case I put, that we now permit United States vessels to carry Canadian freight to Canadian ports, directly or indirectly. For instance, we allow a vessel to bring Canadian freight from a Canadian port and by transshipment to a Canadian port, but the United States laws do not allow that, for though a vessel is going between a foreign port and their own port, their idea is that you should not carry the freight of United States, directly or indirectly, between two United States ports. It may be as I say, and I guard myself, that under the state of our coasting laws that point has been overlooked, and that it is the rivalry and competition that have brought this out. But the subject has been brought up, and a suggestion has been made which I think a reasonable one, as Congress is even now, I am told, engaged in considering how far they can further restrict our coasting trade, that we should watch that legislation, and that we should be consistent with our past attitude and—we can do nothing else—restrict their privileges in our ports to the extent that they restrict our privileges in theirs. No matter what one's economic principles have been in the past on tariff matters, I understand that in coasting matters the two parties are at one.

Now, there is another important question that should not be overlooked in connection with this question of railway construction into the Yukon and in connection with the Stikine River. I am told that it is of urgent importance that some proper means should be taken for the safety of vessels passing through the canon. I am told, for instance, that it is absolutely unsafe for a vessel to attempt to go up when one is coming down, and that the situation in the river is such that there is grave danger of vessels meeting at that point. I am told a suggestion has been made that a telephone should be operated there so as to signal when a vessel is coming down and when another is going up. The reason that I drag these questions into the debate upon the Address, Mr. Speaker, is their extreme urgency, and any one who has followed the thought, so to speak, among the miners, commercial men and transportation companies, will fully appreciate that no time should be lost in considering such matters as this when they are brought to the attention of the Government, and I understand that most of these subjects have been before the Government since November last. Now, there has been in that connection a question of great moment on the Pacific Coast. In speaking of this matter I do not for a moment pretend to pose as the mouth-piece of the people on that coast, who are so well represented in Parliament, but it happens that the point to which I wish to call attention concerns the people of the province, one constituency of which I have the honour to represent, equally with the people of the Pacific Coast. In this question of transportation the people of the east are directly connected with the people on the Pacific, and the supplies that are held for the purpose of being sent into the Yukon, as every one understands, are obtained in large measure on credit from eastern warehouses. And consequently this is a subject of very grave importance. I think I am within the mark when I say to the Government that whoever was to blame for the delay, whether the Canadian Government or circumstances over which they had no control, there has been very bitter disappointment expressed in the cities of Victoria and Vancouver in connection with the absence of anything like a full realization of their hopes as regards spring business. They had made the best preparations, they had spent enormous amounts in advertising their facilities and ability to supply all who wished to enter the Yukon country. They had been persistent in their representations, the correspondent of the "Globe" having complained of the manner in which the boards of trade had deluged the Ministers in regard to the necessities of those people whom they represented. But these were in no sense the desires and necessities of those people alone; they were pioneers of what might have been and may yet be a tremendous development of Canadian trade, and being on the spot they were in a position to send good advice to the authorities in connection with this subject. There was a telegram sent by the Minister of the Interior on the 3rd January, which gave every one in Vancouver and Victoria much pleasure and satisfaction. It was a telegram definite in its terms, without any qualification whatever, and it stated that arrangements had been made with the authorities of the United States whereby the exaction of a fee of $9 a day from Dyea to Skagway, across disputed territory, possibly even British, which had to be paid any man taking goods through those sub-ports of the United States into Canadian territory would be removed, and consequently this tax, which amounted almost to a prohibitory tax so far as those routes were concerned, being out of the way, there was nothing to prevent any wise and prudent man from making his arrangements and accordingly incurring very large liabilities in obtaining supplies. Large and small traders went to work and laid in large quantities of goods on that score. Hon. gentlemen can hardly realize, unless they have been there, the intense disappointment felt when on 22nd January those people were informed that nothing definite had happened since 3rd January respecting those regulations, and when the people learned by men coming down that this enormous inspection fee was not only retained but acted on so as to deter men from going into the country with supplies. Ordinary men were not able to pay officers of the United States customs $9 a day while travelling over that stretch of the disputed territory. Those telegrams were hard enough to read and to understand. But the Prime Minister even to-day has had to say he cannot remove the anxiety of the people in the slightest degree, and consequently this anxiety and bewilderment still continue. In the meanwhile all rival American cities, Seattle in particular, are enjoying a great measure of success over those troubles that were supposed to have been removed on January 3rd. I will not be led at this stage to make certain observations that the Government are aware I could make by way of complaint against the action of the United States. I will refrain from doing so, and will content myself by saying that if when all the documents are brought down, it is quite clear that the Canadian Government have neglected any step they could reasonably have taken, they will most undoubtedly be held strictly to account for neglect in such an important matter. That is but reasonable, and that is what is expected. In that connection, however, whether I speak for one section of the country or another, I believe the spirit of Canada is in such a condition that not only would it be a popular thing for the Government to do, but the day will come when some Government will have to do it, and that is to use an old expression, fight fire with fire, and so far as we have it within our ability, outside of those matters which appertain to the Imperial Government, we shall have to meet the United States, our commercial rivals, in the same spirit and temper with what they continually meet us. I say if the Americans, not appreciating the manner in which they have been considered as regards any complaints reaching the Government regarding their rights of navigation on the Yukon and Stikine,—and there were several cases when complaints were made—having no regard for the promptitude with which this Government carries out all treaty obligations which affect them and the extraordinary liberality of our laws with respect to mining, and our treatment of them in Canadian Alaska and our North-west Territories as compared with the manner in which Canadians or British subjects have been treated in American Alaska or in the American States—I say the time has come, and come now to legislate on these lines. They cannot complain, nor could such a complaint be framed as would be considered by any impartial court as being of any value or moment, because our concessions have up to the present time not brought us anything, not a concession on their side on any feature of the legislation. I would impress this view on the Government. They are for the moment all powerful and are in a position to meet this spirit which I believe exists in the country, which will dominate the country and dominate its politics, for our wheat fields and gold fields already have become famous and we have succeeded in attracting the very best minds of the mother country and the very best element to come here and to settle, and the Government will excite a movement from the British Isles by adopting the policy I suggest, which is to keep the valuable rights in those territories and mining districts for the citizens of those countries in which British subjects can obtain similar rights. Name no country, but carry on a reciprocal system of legislation in general, and the Government will do a great work by accelerating the influx into that country of the classes of people we want, and they will also do a great deal in keeping out possibly an element that is undesirable even in the country from which those people may come. So much in general, and I only speak of the subject in general, in order that I may as far as possible attract the attention of the Government to these questions which are of such great importance to the country at the present time and which are so disturbing in some of their aspects as regards business which is now being carried on, and which without adjustment I fear will involve many people in Canada in a condition of absolute ruin.

I am not going to travel, so far as I can possibly avoid it, over the subject of preferential trade, not wishing to repeat what has been said before. I shall state as my opinion, that preferential trade is going to be the great question for the people of this country and of the Empire. In my mind, preferential trade is now in a singularly happy condition. The only point upon which I differ from the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) is that I do not believe that the ill-advised utterances of the Prime Minister have killed that movement; on the contrary, I believe it is not in his power, any more that it is in the power of Mr. Chamberlain, to kill a movement of that character. While I believe that the course of the right hon. gentleman was to retard the movement and to block it for a moment, yet all the signs of the political horizon seem to make for its strength and progress. It is a marvellous thing that in England you could obtain any time, let alone at formal conferences, the consideration and attention of either of the two political parties to a subject which undoubtedly does involve all the heresies such as Mr. Asquith, Lord Rosebery and the Cobden Club friends of the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) charged against it. He would be a bold man who would deny that this subject is now being ably threshed out by the Colonial Minister himself, and that it is a movement which is receiving great encouragement from him. But it is a question which the soldiers as well as the statesmen of the Empire are discussing, and it is a subject which concerns the army and navy of England as much as it does her commercial interests. It is a question that will not down and the future for it is hopeful.

The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) seems to excuse himself so far as he may for the violation of his pre-election promises by the supposed hostility of Mr. Chamberlain to any practical method of carrying out preferential trade. The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who in the course of his speech dwelt so much on the absence of customs duties in connection with Mr. Chamberlain's idea, went on to read from Mr. Chamberlain's speech an extract which showed that never for a moment has the Colonial Secretary dreamed that a system of preferential trade in the Empire could be obtained in any other way than through customs.

If I am not out of order, Mr. Speaker, and I do not wish to trespass upon the rules of the House in this connection, I may perhaps point out that Lord Aberdeen has given utterance to opinions, at Toronto in 1897, and I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) whether I am correct in supposing that when Lord Aberdeen addressed the National Club, he spoke the views of his advisers, and whether, when on that occasion he discussed the subject of preferential trade, he was speaking the views of the right hon. gentleman and those who sit with him? It would be important in connection with my observations to know that.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) knows very well that when Lord Aberdeen spoke on the occasion to which the hon. gentleman has referred, he did not speak as the Governor General of Canada, but he spoke simply as Lord Aberdeen.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Then Mr. Speaker, is it permitted for me to discuss the speech of Lord Aberdeen when he spoke in Canada not as the Governor General?

Mr. SPEAKER. With reference to criticism in this House on the course of the Governor General, I am inclined to think that the proper rule for us to follow is: that in reference to any public question on which His Excellency speaks or acts, his speeches or his acts are not free from criticism in this House, because there is for all public acts of the Governor General a responsible Minister on the floor of this House who has to answer. Of course, I mean that in such discussion there must be the greatest propriety and respect in the language used. I do not think we can debar ourselves in this House from discussing the public acts of the representative of the Crown. With reference to private acts or speeches of the Governor General,

I apprehend that the greatest possible respect should be shown to the high position which he occupies here, and to the fact also, that in this country, while he occupies that high position it is impossible for him to defend himself from attacks that may be made against him personally. The name of His Excellency the Governor General should be as seldom as possible brought into our discussions. If the matter is not a public one, the least we say about the acts of the gentleman who occupies the position of Governor General the better. If reference to his private acts can possibly be avoided in the public interest, it is my opinion that they should be avoided. I would not say that under all circumstances this House would be debarred from discussing such a question, but I would strongly urge the impropriety of discussing the private acts or utterances of His Excellency the Governor General. If possible it should be avoided, and if it is not possible to avoid it, then it should never be done without the greatest possible respect for His Excellency.

Mr. POPE. Is it possible for the Governor General to act in Canada in the dual capacity of Governor General and Lord Aberdeen?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to add to any embarrassment, by discussing what it is quite clear suggests itself to your mind; the propriety of Lord Aberdeen speaking on this subject at all. That is not the purpose of my reference. I want to find out where the Government of the day stand in regard to the gentleman whom they are supposed to advise. I say it is an extraordinary thing—not in regard to Lord Aberdeen—it is an extraordinary thing that there has come to pass such a condition of affairs as this: that on a question which now, perhaps more than any other, divides the two political parties in Canada, the Governor General can make a speech on such a subject, give expression to his views, and yet have no Government and no Minister who will dare to say that he spoke by their authority. I believe myself that there is no precedent in the constitutional history of this country, at any rate during the Victorian era, for such an extraordinary course that a representative of the Queen is left high and dry, stranded absolutely, and in such a position that though he has given his views in the most positive manner, with all the weight that attaches to his position, to the electors and public of Canada, he has not now a Cabinet which will dare to say that he spoke their views on that occasion, and spoke after consideration with them: for I venture to suggest that the only occasion on which it might be possible that a gentleman in his position, representing our Sovereign, could speak, would be after he had a Cabinet or a Prime Minister ready to take full responsibility for all that he said and to adopt those views as their own. Therefore, without dwelling on that subject, because it is apparent how unfair and how extraordinary it may be if we come to this in Canada, that there may come to us a Governor General, an august person, a man having a great influence from the very position he holds, who will throw himself into the political arena without any responsibility whatever, assisting either political party in the country, and yet in this position that sometimes there will be gentlemen in the Government who will accept responsibility for him, and at other times, when it is not convenient, they will decline to take any responsibility whatever. But I wish to point out that Lord Aberdeen, in speaking in Toronto, fell into the very same error as hon. gentlemen opposite; and because of his observations, and what followed them, I think there is great strength in the position of the Opposition that has not been altogether dwelt upon, as to the change that is coming over public opinion in England. Lord Aberdeen, at Toronto, felt that the policy held by the Canadian Opposition on the question of preferential trade was impracticable, and he instanced the unfortunate position in which were the sugar planters and the sugar trade in the West Indies, and the strong claims the planters had, and the strong appeals they were making to the mother country: but he pointed out how absolutely impossible it was, owing to the view that existed in England on the subject of free trade, to expect for them any relief: and the argument was, how much more hopeless it was for rich and abounding Canada to expect any success for preferential trade. Lord Aberdeen's observations were hardly made when information came from England giving the impression that the English Government does intend to come to the relief of the sugar planters of the West Indies. Since Lord Aberdeen was in England a great change has come over public opinion there, and therefore the opinions he expressed on that occasion exposed the weakness of the advice so quickly that it should not, I submit, under any circumstances weigh with the people of this country. The Prime Minister, however, lays too much stress upon and attaches too much importance to the views of Mr. Chamberlain. Mr. Chamberlain is a valuable ally and has seen more quickly perhaps into the subject and its future importance to the Empire than any other man in England. The Prime Minister himself avowed before the election that he was by no means dismayed. But the success of the movement depends on no one man. No movement of any importance could hope to succeed if for its success we looked to the opinions of one man or another, as individuals. We must look to the importance of the cause itself, and the right hon. gentleman, while he is running away from this subject and changing his opinions about it, has not answered the arguments which he himself used in its favour in Toronto when he spoke of the value it would be to Canada and to the Empire. If nothing else will bring it about, the necessities of the Empire will promote it; and no man, I take it, will to-day deny that the necessities of British trade are very great. What is assisting to change the minds of many men in England on fiscal questions is the extraordinary and unprecedented competition which British trade is receiving at the hands of the very countries which the free traders long ago prophesied would be laid low or would be comparatively unimportant rivals through the adoption of protectionist heresies. I wish to argue with the right hon. gentleman, to win him back, if I can, to the views he expressed and the pledges he gave in June, 1896, to bring him again into the ranks of those who advocate what is an undoubted boon to this country, and what he himself recognizes as such. Look at the changes that have taken place. Peel was an out-and-out protectionist, and a day or two afterwards he was the leader of the movement for the repeal of the Corn Laws, which was his great reform. But I come from Peel at once to the right hon. leader of this Government; for how often has he changed his opinion on that very question? It has been proved in this House that the hon. gentleman was in 1871 an avowed protectionist; and when he excused himself before the Speaker for entertaining those views, on the ground of his extreme youth, he was rather embarrassed, as he will admit, by "Hansard" being produced and proof being given that in 1876 he was also an avowed protectionist; and I want to remind him that in 1879 he used this language, as reported in "Hansard":

He would not be averse to a moderate system of protection to those industries which we had the ability to create, but which required, at the outset, assistance against foreign competition. He knew these views were not held by those who surrounded him, but they were his views.

When the hon. gentleman reached England in 1897, he was a free trader, and he became a member of a club which denounces not only protection, but also denounces reciprocity and fiscal federation as masks for protection. Then, again, how public men can change their opinions. Let him consider that it is not altogether certain that those who oppose preferential trade in England will continue to do so. The hon. gentleman, in 1891, advocated preferential trade with the United States. In 1896 he approved preferential trade with Great Britain. He thus advocated two policies, the one the opposite of the other. And in 1897 Lord Rosebery gave us his opinion of the right hon. gentleman's work in England. I take the following telegraphic summary of his remarks:—

Manchester, Eng., Nov. 2.—Lord Rosebery addressed a large meeting here last evening in connection with the centenary celebration of the Chamber of Commerce. He reviewed the history of free trade, elaborately eulogizing what he described as its "advantages to England."

Lord Rosebery contended that the condition of agriculture abroad, despite bounties and protection, was little better, and in some cases was worse than in England. He quoted Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Dominion Premier, as "a most illustrious authority, sustaining the view that it is free trade which has preserved and consolidated the British Empire." He fully agreed with Sir Wilfrid Laurier. He declared that any deviation from absolute political and commercial freedom would only weaken the bonds holding the Empire together, and that "anything in the direction of an Imperial Zollverein would weaken the Empire internally, and excite the permanent hostility of the whole world, already seriously excited by British prosperity under free trade."

He said he "would tread softly in the presence of the idea of a Zollverein," for he believed it already dead. It behooved them to walk strongly and warily in the path of the Empire, but such a Zollverein would form a permanent menace of war.

Lord Rosebery, I believe, on that occasion, gave my right hon. friend the palm for having contributed to the death of this project of an Imperial Zollverein.

This brings me to another change of base on the part of my right hon. friend which, I hope, will convince him that because a man argues for or against a certain cause to-day is no reason for believing that the light will not come to him at a later period. In 1893 the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) forestalled the present Government in their so-called preferential trade policy, and it is interesting to look back for a moment at what the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce then said concerning the policy which he shortly afterwards attempted to adopt. On that occasion the right hon. leader of the Government read this part of the resolution of the hon. member for North Simcoe:

That the tariff ought to be amended also by a substantial reduction of the customs duties in favour of the United Kingdom, in whose markets all Canadian products are admitted free of duty, and of these nations which, under treaty obligations with Great Britain, would be entitled to the same advantages.

Now, my right hon. friend objected in toto to that clause which I have just read, and yet which is the identical policy governing the administration of the affairs of this country during the last year. He objected to it on several grounds. He was opposed to sentiment having, at any time, anything to do with the control of our fiscal policy, and he said that if the proposition were to carry, sentiment would in this case carry consequences so wide and so large, they would simply prove a weight to Canada. That was a dire prophecy regarding the putting in force of a policy which the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) now claims as better than all others. My right hon. friend went on to say:

But when the proposition of the hon. gentleman is not only to reduce the duties on British goods, but also to reduce the duties on goods of all countries with which Great Britain has commercial treaties, the proposition, if adopted, would offer a serious obstacle to the future course of Canada.

And later on, in the same speech, he further opposed any such policy as that which has governed us during the past year, as involving a serious disturbance of revenue and wide economic revolution. So that I press this instance in the lives of interesting public men, on the hon. gentleman's notice and ask him to take courage and not, on account of Mr. Chamberlain's supposed vacillation, which I do not think exists, on the question, abandon the cause which he has already admitted is fraught with so much benefit to this country.

Then Mr. Ross is no mean authority. The Hon. George W. Ross has come out as an exponent of this policy, and, at any rate until he receives the Cobden medal, will, I fancy, be true to the cause.

Then we have the colonial premiers meeting in England, and as I do not think full reference was made to that interesting occasion, I might add to the history of the movement by referring to the meeting of the colonial premiers on June the 12th, when the chairman mentioned that "the object of the United Empire Trade League was the furtherance of mutually advantageous trade, on a preferential basis, between all who shared allegiance to Her Majesty the Queen." The chairman was a member of the English House of Commons, and the Lord Chancellor, in speaking on that occasion, said:

He, as a Minister of the Crown, had to be doubly cautious, but he could say that he had been a rank protectionist all his life, and he had not forgotten the fact. Under these circumstances, and remembering, after all, that the tie which united nations and the colonies to the mother country must be, in a certain degree, the interest of those who directed its counsel, it certainly was no unimportant matter that they should endeavour to preserve the trade of the Empire and to get employment for its people. As long as the interests of all were preserved, he believed it would be impossible to set the colonies against the mother country or the mother country against the colonies.

At the same meeting Sir George Turner said:

He believed the colonies would be very glad indeed to give some preference, so that they might trade with Great Britain for goods which they now received from other countries. He thought the proposition should come from Great Britain, and he had no hesitation in saying that any advance from Great Britain would be received in no huckstering spirit, but with every desire to enter into a fair, reasonable and equitable arrangement—such an arrangement as will be advantageous to all parties.

And the Hon. C. C. Kingston, Premier of South Australia, said:

It was a conference of Australian Premiers, whose first object was to discuss the matter which was the object of that league. There was unanimity of opinion upon that matter. At the same time, it occurred to them that it would be better if the mother country and her statesmen were to formulate proposals for their acceptance. Any such suggestions would receive the most sympathetic consideration in the lands from which the Ministers came; for, above all, in their trade relationship, in every relationship they would infinitely prefer that their transactions should be with their own kin and their own flesh and blood.

Now, in addition to what was said by those authorities, and which is sufficiently encouraging to show that in the mother country and in the colonies the subject has been seriously considered and carefully discussed, I have a word to say. But I would like to define my own position, so far as this question relates to our own tariff. I am, as I have always been, a protectionist, and yet I say that there is nothing in any of the opinions that have been expressed by those who have favoured the subject in England that would make it impossible for such arrangements to be carried out by those who are sincere and consistent protectionists, because while I advocate protection, I have always belonged to the party in Canada who are not extreme protectionists but advocate a revenue for tariff based on protection—a tariff which shall give the protection necessary to foster our interests and at the same time enable us to obtain sufficient revenue. Mr. Chamberlain and men of that character know full well that in a colony like this there is no possible way of obtaining revenue for federal purposes without a customs tariff, and the only difference between us is whether that should be arranged, having careful regard to the necessity of protecting interests, or without any regard whatever to the interest of trade and manufactures.

Now, I believe that a union between the colonies and the mother country that would throw down any necessary protective tariff or any necessary element of protection would neither be good for the mother country nor for the colonies. Loyalty in the colonies to the mother country is not loyalty to the English manufacturers. We should be a great load and a great drag to those in the mother country were we to adopt any policy that would weaken us on our own ground and in our own plans of bearing our responsibilities and discharging our duties. Nevertheless, I believe that concessions could be made and arrangements brought about that would not interfere with any of the great interests of this country, manufacturing or agricultural, that would substantially effect this object in view. The hour is late and I shall content myself, considering the easy task that lay before me when I rose, with making one or two observations on this question on the nationality of this country. I believe in the nationality of this country. I believed in it long ago, and I have done what little I could with the younger men of Canada in boasting of that nationality and encouraging its growth whenever the opportunity arose I was so educated in the party to which I belong. But how was Canada made a nation? There are independent judges. I propose to quote one, a gentleman whose name has been spoken with great respect, a gentleman who had the pleasure of meeting the right hon. leader of this Government and ascertaining from him all that he could say on behalf of Canada and on behalf of the party to which he belonged. The gentleman I proposed to quote, evidently had studied carefully the politics and the history of this country. No doubt he had read in the London "Standard," for instance, the observations of the right hon. gentleman's colleague, the Finance Minister, in informing the English public as late as 1886 that the whole tendency of the Canadian system is to squander money in the far west. No doubt he knew of another ally of the right hon. gentleman, the present Attorney General of Nova Scotia, who, speaking in the presence of the Finance Minister when they went to electrify and educate the electors of the county of Annapolis, said that it was war against God and nature and against every element of geography to attempt to establish any consolidated nationality under our present union. He knew that the right hon. gentleman's allies had endeavoured as the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) has explained to tear to pieces the Canadian confederation. He knew that Mr. Blake in 1871, had denounced the Canadian Pacific Railway undertaking as fatal to the existence of the union, that Mr. Blake in 1880 had moved to postpone its construction, and in 1881 had denounced the contract as fatal to the future of Canada. And knowing all this, and seeing what had been done in spite of these objections on the part of powerful men of Canada, realizing the position that Canada had obtained under a Liberal Conservative Government that had been able to carry out these great schemes, he settled the questions as to who had made Canada a nation. This gentleman, the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, speaking in the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce on January 18th, 1898, said:

Why, it is not so long ago since the greater part of the Dominion of Canada was considered to be nothing more than a wilderness of snow, in which with difficulty a few wild animals were trapped for the sake of their skins. (Hear, hear, and a voice, "What about the Klondike?") And its prosperity is only due to the fact that within a few years that magnificent enterprise, the Canadian Pacific Railway, opened up this vast country, opened the greatest wheat fields in the world, and is going to open up probably the greatest gold fields in the world. (Hear, hear.)

That is the tribute paid by the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, the Colonial Minister, to the work of the Conservative party in Canada, bitterly opposed, opposed tooth and nail by the gentleman who, last year, claimed all the credit for Canada being a nation.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Mr. DAVIN moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

REPORTS.

The Civil Service List.—(Mr. Fitzpatrick.)

Tables of Trade and Navigation.—(Mr. Paterson.)

Report of the Department of Inland Revenue.—(Sir Henry Joly de Lotbiniere.)

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 8th February, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BETTER OBSERVANCE OF THE LORD'S DAY.

Mr. CHARLTON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 2) to promote the better observance of the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday, as a day of rest.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have been asked to explain the Bill, and I desire at this stage to offer a few words of explanation. The introduction of this Bill, I presume, is becoming a transaction which savours somewhat of monotony in this House. If I consulted my own wishes and my own interests as a politician, I certainly should not introduce this Bill. I am conscious that it has stood in my way in a political sense, and has made me unpopular to some extent among my fellow-members in this House. I have felt, however, as a matter of duty, that the introduction of this Bill was a step in the public interest; and, being of that opinion, I have introduced it session after session, and not for any purpose of acquiring popularity; for I am not so stupid as to suppose that I am acquiring popularity in taking the step that I take to-day. The Bill introduced to-day differs from the Bill of last session. It embodies but one provision, that prohibiting the publication of Sunday newspapers, which provision received the sanction of the leader of this Government last session, and the sanction of Sir John Thompson when he was Premier of this Dominion, and I presume that it will pass without objection. I have dropped the other provisions of the Bill, hoping that by doing so this feature, which I consider the most important and essential pertaining to the measure, will without difficulty receive the sanction of the House.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PUNISHMENT OF SEDUCTION AND ABDUCTION.

Mr. CHARLTON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 3) to amend the Criminal Code, 1892, for the purpose of making more effectual provision for the punishment of seduction and abduction.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SAFETY ON RAILWAYS.

Mr. CASEY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 4) further to secure the safety of railway employees and passengers. He said: This is the same Bill as that which I introduced last year on this subject, as amended by the committee to whom it was submitted. The House will remember that a select committee was appointed to consider this Bill, and that committee heard evidence and consulted long and earnestly on the subject of its various clauses, and the Bill as now introduced is the result of that investigation. I would call the attention of hon. members to the blue-book containing the evidence taken before that committee, including some very important matters relating to British legislation on the same subject. During the last session of the Imperial Parliament, an Employers' Liability Bill, involving the same principle as the Bill I am now about to introduce, was adopted, and it has been in force since. That Bill is given in extenso in the blue-book referred to, and I think it would be well worth the while of all members who have railway men among their constituents to look into that blue-book.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DRAINAGE ACROSS RAILWAYS.

Mr. CASEY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 5) respecting drainage on and across the lands of railway companies. He said: This Bill is also similar to the one for the same purpose which I introduced last year. The Bill only got so far as to be considered by the Railway Committee. When we got there I was asked by the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) to let the Bill stand over, as he had some hope of introducing general legislation on the relation of railways to the public this session. I hope of course, that he will see his way to introduce such legislation; but I re-introduce this Bill, which is founded entirely on the Act on the same subject which is in force in Ontario, as an indication of what I think should be done in the matter. Of course, I shall be prepared to withdraw it if the Government introduces satisfactory legislation on the same subject.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 6) to confirm an agreement between Her Majesty the Queen and Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, and to incorporate the Canadian Yukon Railway Company. He said: I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that it will be agreeable to the House if I should accompany the motion I have just made for the introduction of this Bill, with a fairly full explanation of its different provisions. The Bill, as it is framed, does not correspond entirely with one dealing with a similar subject introduced in 1881 by the late Government to regulate and confirm the contract which had been entered into with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. That Bill did not confirm the contract, as we propose by the present Bill, but simply conferred on the Governor in Council the general power to issue a charter and incorporate a company.

We have deviated from that course in the present instance to this extent, that we propose Parliament to constitute the corporation and confer upon it the powers, of which it should properly be put in possession, and leave substantially nothing remaining to be done by the Governor in Council. The Bill fairly divides itself into two rather separate and distinct classes. The first, which covers only one or two sections, confirms the contract. That, of course, will be at once conceded to be the important portion of the Bill. The other clauses, which are quite numerous, are the customary ones, creating and conferring powers upon the corporation as to the capitalization and the other incident and necessary provisions for the company's full equipment. I do not think it will be considered at all necessary that I should detain the House with any explanations regarding those clauses, but rather draw attention to the important features of the Bill.

Now, Sir, for a proper understanding of this very important question, I think it is essential that hon. members should, as far as possible, be put in possession of the facts, circumstances and considerations, which have impelled the Government to the particular line of action they have taken in this matter. In this I may be departing from the usual course on the first reading of a Bill, but I think that the gravity of this subject and its general importance, will afford sufficient justification for my course; and I think it will be admitted that such a departure should rather commend itself to the House, having regard, first, to the urgency and next, the very great importance of the whole subject. Hon. members of this House will recollect quite clearly that before the close of last session, evidence was pouring in upon us of the immense discoveries of gold that were taking place in the Yukon district, and returning parties from that remote region were bringing us the most fabulous accounts of its mineral deposits. No one who is at all interested in public affairs could fail to realize that very important questions were likely to arise in that country in connection with these great gold discoveries. The Government had, therefore, as soon as the session of Parliament was over and it was possible for them to give attention to the matter, pressed upon their consideration the solution of—not one problem alone—but various problems of very great magnitude. We had to devise some means of solving the question as to how civil government should be effectively established and carried on in that region; we had to provide for the protection of life and property and the general preservation of public order, and we felt that in a great measure involving these was the question of providing proper transportation facilities into and out of that country. It became clear to us that we should immediately address our attention to dealing with these problems in a manner which would be most effective and best promote good government and the general welfare and prosperity of the country. In obtaining information with regard to the probable influx of people into that country, we were led to believe that the number of people who would be likely to seek the Yukon region during the present year would be exceedingly large. I believe that agents of transportation companies, who have the means of acquiring accurate information and forming a pretty fair judgment, advised—at least some of them did—that as many as 250,000 people would be finding their way into the Yukon country during the present year. Others connected with transportation companies also did not form so high an estimate of the probable numbers, but a large proportion of them, at all events, put the figure at 100,000, and none, so far as my information goes, put it as low as 50,000.

Now, what does the influx of such a number of people mean in transportation requirements? Why, the statement is made by officials of the Department of the Interior, speaking from actual knowledge, that it is unsafe for a man to go into that country unless he has assured at least supplies to last him a year, and the estimate is that a year's supplies will average in the neighbourhood of a ton per man. Now, supposing only the smallest number estimated seek to enter that country during this year, supposing there should only be 50,000 going to the Yukon, what would that involve? Why, it involves the transportation of 50,000 tons of supplies of all kinds. That is the information which I have from official and other sources. Well, the Government had to consider this difficulty—the getting of 50,000 tons of freight into that country to meet the demands of 50,000 people, with the facilities at their disposal absolutely inadequate for the transfer even of a considerable proportion of that quantity of tonnage. I dare say that some hon. friends opposite may think people are not likely to go into that country unless they are equipped sufficiently for such an expedition. But that is not the result of the observations of the officers of the Government. People will go there—indifferent, careless or thoughtless as to what will be their condition when they get there. Each will go in the hope, perhaps, that there will be no scarcity of provisions, at any rate, that there will always be a little margin for a few people, without stopping to think that there may be others in precisely the same case.

Now, Sir, if this information given to us is accepted—and, as a responsible Government we could not do other than accept the information we had received—what was the duty of the Government? I ask, Mr. Speaker, what was the duty which devolved upon the Government and what course ought we to take under the circumstances? With such a probability staring us in the face, could we afford to allow any time to be wasted; could we allow months or even weeks to go by which should be utilized if we were to meet the demand for transportation facilities? However desirous we might be, as we all would naturally be, to consult Parliament on this subject, to take the opinion of the representatives of the people and to ask authority before we had in any degree committed the Government to action, could we, I say, under the circumstances in which we were placed, realizing the responsibility that devolved upon us, do otherwise than we have done? I put this strongly, I desire to put it strongly, because the facts admit of our doing so. Under the circumstances, with the facts we had before us, with the knowledge we possessed, no course was open but that of prompt, immediate and instant action. If we had failed—let me put that to hon. gentlemen who surround me—if we had failed in acting upon our knowledge and convictions in this regard, should we not have been unworthy of confidence? Life, property, order, the prestige, the credit, the honour of Canada—these were involved in our meeting in a sufficient manner the demands which were in this way forced upon us.

Now, it may be said : You had a force of North-west Mounted Police in that section ; why could you not rely on them to preserve order ? What could they have done in the face of such a condition of things as we believed might possibly arise in that country ? What would be the use of a small force with thousands of starving men about them struggling for the possession of the scanty supply of food that there might be there. Such a struggle would probably result in a perfect carnival of crime, and would reflect most deservedly upon the Government and people of Canada. Now, I ask hon. gentlemen opposite if, in making this statement upon the facts which I have presented to you in this brief way, I am exaggerating the obligation which rested upon the Government ? In what direction did the duty of Government lie ? Remember, Mr. Speaker, further, this condition of things which I have depicted to you is a condition of things which we regard as likely to arise in our own country, not in some remote disconnected section of the world in which we have no particular interest, but within the boundaries of Canada, for the good government of which, for the protection of life and property within which we are as much responsible as we would be in any of the settled portions of Canada. As we are thus responsible, a failure to realize and prepare for the duties which rested upon us could not have failed to cast the utmost discredit upon the Government and people of Canada.

Another imperative reason for immediate action, which I feel justified in mentioning, is that, if the precious metals abound in that country to the extent to which it is represented they abound, a question of Canadian trade immediately and necessarily arises. The importance of securing that trade and preserving it to Canada becomes a national question of the greatest interest, and makes it all the more important, and all the more necessary that we should act promptly, lest by inaction on our part this important trade, or a very considerable part of it, should be diverted, and might not at any later period return. This demand for action on our part, from the business men of Canada, from the manufacturers, the farmers, the wage-earners, from all classes in Canada, was that we should see to it that this trade should not be lost to us—for it is ours, it is within our own borders and of right belongs to us, if, by any legitimate or proper means we can secure it for the people of our own country. Looking at that phase of the question also, I ask what was the nature of the duty which lay upon the Government of Canada ? With these convictions, with this sense of responsibility, ought we to have waited until it was too late to act for this year ? Ought we to have deferred action with fear and trembling lest we might perhaps do something which Parliament might not in every particular approve ? Ought we to wait for fear of inviting condemnation, or ought we to act ? Our conclusion was that we should act. And we did so relying upon the good sense of Parliament—of both branches of Parliament—for the approval of our action when the whole measure in all its bearings is understood.

Now, Sir, I have endeavoured, briefly, and I am quite conscious I have done it very feebly, to state the situation as the Government found it in that country. And I may say that immediately after the last session of Parliament, feeling that all the information that it would be possible for us to procure ought to be procured, and that information should be as accurate and reliable as possible. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) himself proceeded to the Pacific Coast and went to, or very nearly to, the scene of action in that country, passed through two or three of the passes and made himself acquainted with the situation as far as it was possible for him to do. Further, he despatched officers, competent and reliable officers, to look the ground over and explore it. He sent railway engineers to find out what were the most advantageous and the most favourable routes for railway construction, so that he might be satisfied and be in a position to satisfy the Government in regard to this question of railway construction and the best routes that were to be found which could be taken advantage of with the least possible delay. The gentlemen who were employed by him for that purpose gave their very best attention to the duties with which they were entrusted. They worked faithfully and energetically, but the task was an arduous one, and it was quite impossible even to finish their labours earlier than they did ; and it was not until about the 15th of December that we received from these officials their reports.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. May I ask the Minister of Railways if he will be good enough to lay a copy of these reports upon the Table of the House ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think there will be no objection to my hon. friend being furnished this information. My recollection is—and the Minister of the Interior will be able to set me right, if I am wrong—that while he received an interim report about the latter part of the month of December, their final report was not received until towards the middle of January. You will see, therefore, that we had not been in possession of information very long before we took action. Perhaps it might be of interest to the House for me to state in a brief way the general result of the information which was furnished by these officers. There are a number of possible routes for a railway from the coast into that country, but I think I am drawing a fair conclusion from the reports before us when I say that there are practically only five routes which could be considered debatable at all. The first is what is called the Skagway or White Pass route to Tagish Lake, and thence by the Hootalinqua River, the mileage of which is estimated at about 123 miles.

Mr. FOSTER. Between what points ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. From Skagway through White Pass to the Hootalinqua River.

Mr. FOSTER. How far is it to Tagish Lake ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not know exactly. I judge it is probably in the neighbourhood of 80 or 90 miles. The second route which they refer to is through the Chilkat Pass to Fort Selkirk; that route is between 300 and 350 miles long. The third route is through Chilkat Pass to Tagish Lake and the Hootalinqua River, and is about 110 miles long. The fourth route is from the Taku Inlet to Teslin Lake, 145 miles long. The fifth is from Glenora or Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake, 150 miles long. Now, of the five routes which we had before us, we had no hesitation, after fully considering them all, in rejecting the four first which I have named. We rejected them upon various grounds, but one principal ground was applicable to them all. In respect to them all it was necessary that they should cross a portion of the territory from the sea which was claimed, or at all events, was in the possession of a foreign government. We regarded that as a serious objection, as one which would be regarded unfavourably by the people of Canada; we regarded it as an objection which would strongly impress the business men and business interests of Canada, and we therefore rejected those routes. I need not go into all the details with regard to those various routes. Some of them were very expensive. The White Pass route, we believe, would cost a great deal of money; The Chilkat Pass route would cost a great deal of money; probably, among all these four the Chilkat route is, though the longest, the most favourable from a business point of view, and one which, were it not for the national considerations, might be very favourably regarded. But they were all rejected as not coming within the conditions which the Government of Canada concluded ought to exist before we should undertake the construction of a railway into that country. Now, a railway by the Teslin Lake route was decided on, the distance of which is, as I have said, estimated to be about 150 miles. In order to utilize that route, vessels will reach the ocean port in closest proximity to it at Fort Wrangell, a distance probably of not more than 150 miles from Telegraph Creek or Glenora.

Mr. FOSTER. In what territory is Fort Wrangell ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think it is probably in the United States territory; at all events, they claim it, and they are in possession of it, and have a customs port at Fort Wrangell. But the Stikine River, whose waters we propose to use, is a river that, under treaty with that country, we are entitled to use without being subject to any conditions. Navigation upon it is open to us as it is open to them.

Mr. FOSTER. Will my hon. friend allow me to ask another question for information? A vessel starting from Victoria, bound with freight and passengers for Glenora, will it be able to go to Glenora and be able to land its goods on the wharf there for the railway ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Certainly not, unless it is a very shallow craft.

Mr. FOSTER. Where will it have to unship ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The ocean transit will terminate at or in the immediate neighbourhood of Fort Wrangell, near the mouth of the Stikine River.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to ask the hon. gentleman, for the sake of clearness: Does he mean to say, that such goods starting from Victoria and reshipping at Fort Wrangell, a port in United States territory, and going up to Glenora, even though we have free navigation of the Stikine River, will not be subject to the United States customs ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think I am quite justified in going that far, and in saying that a ship which is freighted from Victoria or Vancouver, the object of which is to effect a transshipment at or near Fort Wrangell, may do so without encountering any obstacles from customs authorities—I think so. I will show the House why I think so. I presume, that if an ocean steamer proposed to land at Fort Wrangell and tie up at the wharf there, and unload goods at that port, they would be subject to the customs authorities; but I know no reason myself why a craft such as is used, or any other small craft available for the transshipment of this freight by the Stikine River, should not lie alongside a steamer which carries freight from our own ports to Fort Wrangell or to that locality, and transfer the freight from the larger to the smaller vessel, and the latter might then pass on its way. However, whether I am right or not in this, that is the condition that exists.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope my hon. friend will not think I am interrupting him, for this matter is, by his own admission, one of very great moment. As those four routes were thrown aside by the Government because of that consideration, has the Government taken the precaution of getting an authoritative statement from the law officer of the Crown on that point?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have not, Mr. Speaker, obtained any opinion from the law officer of the Crown on that subject.

Mr. FOSTER. Or has my hon. friend, or any member of the Government, got from the United States Government their contention and claim as to what would be their rights under such circumstances?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I cannot inform the hon. gentleman what information any other member of the Government may have received upon this subject. I am stating the case as it appears from my own knowledge and my own information with regard to it.

The situation, then, is this: vessels laden with freight for Telegraph Creek and the Yukon country may come to Fort Wrangell and many unship. If for the time being it may be necessary to go through some formality with the United States customs authorities, the difficulty would be very slight and far less onerous than elsewhere, the expense would be exceedingly trifling and the other conditions would be very much more favourable than could possibly exist if they had to travel over a long stretch of foreign country, involving the attendance and payment of the United States officers, as we have been doing for some months past in connection with other routes. The Stikine route was decided on by the Government largely because it afforded the nearest approach to an all-Canadian route that was possible under the circumstances; and it becomes possible, or will become possible, if in the future there should be found to be any difficulty whatever in the way of the use of the Stikine River or the approach to it, as suggested by hon. gentlemen opposite—for the Government to have a railway connected with the railway known as the Stikine and Teslin Lake line, extending from Telegraph Creek south, and there brought to an ocean point which is purely and exclusively in Canadian territory, and thus guarantee us for all time against any possible contingency as regards our Canadian line.

Mr. CHARLTON. What would be the additional mileage?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It would add about 200 miles to the Teslin line, and this is the scheme which the Government has been promoting, and it is mentioned in the contract which I am now submitting to the House.

We have, as I have said, concluded that the railway must be built; we have concluded that it must be built this season; we have concluded that the proper site for the railway under all the circumstances is from Telegraph Creek or from Stikine River to Teslin Lake. With those preliminary conclusions arrived at, I will now direct the attention of the House to the contract itself. The Government knew, or at all events we thought we knew, what was wanted in this direction. Then came the question as to how we could get what we wanted, and upon what terms could we get what we wanted. Some people have said: You ought to have advertised for tenders and asked contractors for what price they would build it. We had not time; it would not be possible to do so under any circumstances. It was not possible within the short time of ten days or a fortnight, which was about the limit of time we had available, to issue advertisements and receive tenders; it would take about that length of time to get out the advertisements alone, much less to receive offers and consider them as many people offer, ignorant of the difficulties surrounding the situation and without knowing the character of the undertaking, would have offered to enter into a contract. This is not a class of undertaking in which you would advertise for tenders. We have never done so, it was not done by our predecessors, and I presume it will never be done by any Government. The reports and information which those officers to whom I have referred furnished us, were to the effect that a railway by the Teslin Lake route could be built and got into running order by the 1st of September next, if we acted with promptness and expedition. If hon. gentlemen agree in the conclusions at which I arrived, that it was our duty to act, to build this line, that the proper route under the circumstances has been selected, and that railway communication is indispensable in view of the conditions existing or likely to exist in that country, the further conclusion is irresistible that we should act at once, without a moment's delay. If the people of the country realized as strongly as we do the imperative duty resting on the Government, they would think that we were making a laughing stock of ourselves by inviting tenders for this contract. That is the view I take in respect to this measure, and that is the view of the Government in deciding to grapple with the situation at once, and trust to the good sense of Parliament and the country to say that we could take no other than the course we adopted. Some hon. members also say that it was our duty to invite tenders on the basis of a grant of a smaller quantity of land. How could we estimate the value of the land? We did not propose to give any money to the enterprise; we proposed that the Yukon territory should pay for the railway. How could we tell the value of the land; how could we tell in advance and fix for purposes of a tender the value of a land subsidy? One man would regard a million acres as worth millions of dollars and by letting his imagination have full play, that it contained untold quantities of gold. Another man, more canny, careful and conservative, might think there might not be a thousand dollars worth or a whole dollar's worth of the precious metal in the millions of acres offered. Thus, one man would take one view, another man another. We could not tell what value to place on the land, and no body of men, I do not care whether they possess the wisdom of Solomon, could decide what would be a fair and reasonable estimate to put on the land. It rests on chance, on conjecture wholly.

An hon. MEMBER. It is a gamble.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, it is absolutely a gamble, nothing more and nothing less. Therefore, we could not publish to the world that we would give 5,000 acres per mile, less 5,000 acres might not catch the fancy of persons wishing to undertake the construction of the road. We could not offer 50,000 acres, for it might prove too much, and while a less amount might suffice to induce capitalists of a speculative turn to enter into a contract. We could only do as we did: when we found men willing to negotiate on a reasonable basis and enter into a contract, then to push forward the work with all reasonable speed and expedition. I do not think it would be possible to make a more irrational, a more absurd, a more utterly childish proposition than that in such an undertaking and in a great emergency, we should ask for tenders on ten day's notice, and ask the price at which contractors would be prepared to carry out the work.

As to Mackenzie & Mann, they called on the Government. Other gentlemen called on us as well—they were not the only people who called.

Mr. FOSTER. Who did?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We had quite a few people. I was not in Ottawa much at that time, and I am not as well informed with respect to those minute particulars and details as is my hon. friend Mr. Sifton. He will take occasion to enlighten the House fully on the matter. I know there were others. There were others who said they represented large amounts of capital and had untold means behind them and were willing to talk railway. But none of this large capital ever materialized; and, as far as I know, we did not get our eye on the credentials to establish how solid and capable these people were to carrying out the undertaking. However, we did have two gentlemen to make us an offer, we had Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, and I suppose my hon. friends opposite will not sneer at their capabilities. They had been looking this thing over, and I believe they made overtures to my hon. friend as to the construction of this railway, or, to be correct, perhaps I should say, not as to the construction of this railway, but as to the construction of another railway, namely, the Chilkat Pass Railway, which naturally business men would much prefer to construct rather than the other. The result of their approaching the Government and of the negotiations which took place between us, was, that they were induced to drop their Chilkat enterprise and to take up with the Teslin line.

Mr. BLAIR.

Mr. WALLACE. Would the hon. member (Mr. Blair) permit me to ask him if the Chilkat Railway is what he called No. 2 line?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The Chilkat Railway would be No. 2 line. It is a line, I may say, which we could not build under any possible circumstances in less than two years, and which, therefore, would not answer in the present emergency. We knew Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, and anybody who knows these gentlemen, knows them to be responsible men, to be capable, strong, experienced men, to be men who have carried forward large enterprises of this same description, and who could not be bettered by any men in Canada. I am not going to say they are the only men in Canada who would be capable of carrying this work out, but I am going to say that they were the only two men in Canada that we knew of who were willing and capable of contracting to carry the work out. Therefore, after the negotiations, which covered a number of days after the most careful consideration by the members of the Cabinet, as a whole and individually, after every member of the Cabinet had studied the question, impressed with its great importance and with the immense desirability of making an arrangement that could be defended—after all this, and after my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), in the most indefatigable manner, had given his continued labour to the bringing about of a proper solution of these negotiations, we came to an understanding with Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, and the contract has been entered into which is now before you.

Whatever may be said with regard to the features of this contract, we have, at all events, the satisfaction of knowing that the men we have entrusted with its carrying out, are men who are admittedly on all hands competent to do it, and who will do it if it is in the power of contractors to perform. There is some satisfaction in that, and I believe I am entitled to claim on behalf of the Government that in that respect our position is absolutely unassailable.

This brings me to the contract itself, and just at the outset I desire to convey as clearly as I can, in a general bird's-eye view, as it were, of its clauses and of its provisions, some idea of it before I get into a closer examination of its details. What the Government wanted to accomplish was this: we wanted to secure a sleigh road within six weeks from the 25th of January last, all the way from the mouth of the Stikine River to Teslin Lake, with shelters and stopping places provided every twenty-five miles along the entire route; we wanted to build a railway, suitably equipped, up to the standard of the Kaslo and Slocan narrow-gauge railway, 150 miles, or thereabouts, from the navigable waters of the Stikine to the navigable waters of Teslin Lake.

Mr. CHARLTON. What is the estimated cost of that 150 miles of narrow-gauge road?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The estimated cost?

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have not the figures exactly before me, but I understand it was estimated to cost in the neighbourhood of $25,000 per mile. Of course it might cost something less than that in a different part of the country, where there are greater facilities for construction. I am glad the hon member (Mr. Charlton) has invited my attention to that matter. It is impossible for any one to say just what the cost of the railway may be. Transportation, of course, is very expensive, and the conditions are absolutely and entirely different from those which prevail in other parts of Canada. The high rate of wages, cost of living, severity of the climate and many other conditions enter so very largely into the calculation of cost, that even an experienced person, unless he himself had prosecuted similar work in that country, would scarcely be justified in affirming that he knew what the cost of such a work would be.

Mr. FOSTER. Did I understand my hon. friend (Mr. Blair) aright in saying that, after sending engineers and explorers and receiving their reports, he, as Minister of Railways, signed a contract giving so much for the building of the road, and has not under his hand an estimate from his engineers of what that road would cost?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) precisely understands: that I have not under my eye an estimate, or a statement professing to be an at all close or accurate statement of what the probable cost of that railway would be. Now, not only did we desire to have completed and equipped this railway with great speed, but—

Mr. MONTAGUE. Might I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) if any such statement had been asked for from the engineers who went over the road?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I cannot say. The hon. member (Mr. Montague) will understand that I have not been in communication with the engineers.

Mr. FOSTER. Somebody ought to introduce the Bill who does understand it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The idea of the hon. gentleman and my idea, as to who should introduce the Bill, may not agree. The aim of the Government was in this contract to secure, further, that this railway should be constructed with such speed that railway trains carrying freight and passengers would be steaming over the whole line by the first of September next, and thereby to secure two months open navigation this year of the Teslin Lake and following waters. In the fourth place, it was the object of the Government to build a line by an all-Canadian route, thereby applying every available means for securing the vast anticipated trade of that region for the people of our own country. In the fifth place, it was our object to secure necessary steamship transport facilities from Teslin Lake to Dawson City immediately on the opening of the railway, and to so settle the terms of the contract as that the Yukon country should, as it were, pay for these advantages itself, so that not a dollar of the cost should be paid by the Government of Canada, or a dollar of liability assumed by us in that regard.

Now, Mr. Speaker, these are the objects which the Government desired to accomplish in making the contract; these are the objects which we have succeeded in accomplishing in the making of the contract, and we have received from the contractors no less a sum than a quarter million dollars deposit as security for the faithful carrying out of the contract by them.

Mr. FOSTER. On which you pay interest?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. On which we pay interest, while the money remains in our hands, unless it shall be forfeited.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). And on which we receive interest.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. And upon which we receive interest as well as pay interest.

Mr. FOSTER. Are you putting it out at interest ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I suppose the Minister of Finance should have introduced this Bill, so that he could have answered that particular question as well. Now, Mr. Speaker, what do the contractors get from the Yukon country, or, if you will, from the Government, in consideration of these covenants and these undertakings on their part—five substantial and important covenants and undertakings ? They are to get 25,000 acres of land per mile, selected in blocks at least six miles by twenty-four miles in area. No block can be selected less than six miles in width by twenty-four miles in length. Of these blocks four portions will be taken and become the property of the company, and alongside of them will be an equal number of alternate lots which remain the property of the Crown.

Mr. HAGGART. If the hon. gentleman will excuse me, I do not clearly understand. Every block the contractors get must consist of a block six miles by twenty-four miles, which they own themselves ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Of which they own one-half. There must be eight sections in each block selected. The moment a stake is put down, a base line is started and a selection is made. The company cannot get from the area they select more than four blocks of three miles by six for themselves, alongside of which and located alternately between which are blocks of the same size which remain the property of the Government ; so that each area selected consists of a block not less than six miles one way by twenty-four miles another way. Now, the selections are to be made subject to conditions and reservations to which I will refer later, and which go to show that the utmost care and caution has been exercised by the Government ; so that if the company should happen, as the result of the efforts they may make in prospecting those lands, to strike upon a valuable gold area, they cannot absorb or monopolize it all, because the Government blocks lie immediately alongside of those of their own which may contain these valuable mineral deposits. There is another important reservation, that if it happens that the company asks to have an area staked out which covers or includes a mining claim or claims which have been already located and recorded by any free miner, such a claim is at once excluded from the selection. It does not pass with the grant, but continues to be the property of the free miner and remains outside of the title which passes ultimately to the company.

Mr. FOSTER. Who selects the base line ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The base line, as will be seen

Mr. BLAIR.

when I come to discuss the clauses of the contract, works almost automatically, except that the starting point is to be made at the request or selection of the company. The company may send out their prospectors, and they may conclude that they have struck an area which is likely to be profitable. Then they indicate to the proper officer of the department the place where they want the stake put down. The stake is there put down, if it does not include a watercourse or is outside of the provision of the contract which refers to watercourses. The stake being placed, the line called the base line must be run from it in a direct course either due north and south or due east and west, and that base line runs down the centre of the tract with three miles on each side of it, together making the six miles which constitutes the length, as it were, of the blocks, and the next three miles constitute the width of the block which the Government owns, and so on along this base line until at least eight blocks have been run off. There may be more ; there is no limitation on the number. The company may ask that there may be two or any multiple of two added to the eight blocks, and they may add blocks on each side annexed to their own area up to a limited number. But there cannot be less than twenty-four miles by six miles laid out in any one selection. In addition to the reservation which I have spoken of with regard to the free miners' claims, we reserve from the power of selection the waters of certain important rivers which are mentioned in the contract, and certain important lakes which are also mentioned there. We reserve the beds and the banks up to high water mark, and twenty-five feet beyond it, on each side of all the rivers named in the contract, and the lakes which are also named.

Mr. FOSTER. And the company does not get those ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It cannot get those ; it cannot acquire any rights in respect of those ; so that, on all the great lakes and rivers in that important country, which cover and include a very considerable portion of what we believe will be the placer-mining of the country, we have absolutely precluded the company from acquiring any interest whatever.

Mr. FOSTER. Does my hon. friend mean by a watercourse—because this is very essential—a dry bed in most seasons of the year, such as Bonanza Creek and Eldorado Creek, which are now being staked out and worked as placer claims ? Does he mean that those courses which are at some period of the year watercourses, though not navigable, are rivers, so that the company cannot get them ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I say that every one of the beds and banks up to twenty-five feet beyond high water mark of all the rivers and lakes named in the contract are absolutely and entirely excepted from the selection by the company. Whether they are dry or whether they are wet is utterly immaterial.

Mr. FOSTER. But the hon. gentleman is giving as a reason why this contract should be accepted, that the river beds—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am stating the facts.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman may be stating the facts, but surely I have the right to ask him, for the sake of a clear understanding, at this time, whether he is really sure, that he is doing anything more than reserving from this company the navigable and navigated streams and lakes. Is he sure?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have told the hon. gentleman that each of the rivers named in this contract is, to the extent of its full width, and up to high water mark on each side, and for twenty-five feet beyond, excepted from the operation of this contract and not within the right of selection by the company. I have said that and nothing more, and I would thank the hon. gentleman, when he quotes what I have said, to state it accurately. I presume we may be asked: Why did you give so many acres as 25,000? Why did you not give the contractors less? Well, I may frankly acknowledge that the reason was because they would not take less. We could not force them to take less. We bartered and negotiated with them. Members of the Government and sub-committees of the Government—sub-committees constituting pretty nearly the whole numerical strength of the Government—urged on Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann every conceivable argument in order to get them to reduce their terms. And we did get them down very much below, I can assure you, the demands they made, but we could not get them below 25,000 acres per mile, and therefore did not. I had some little curiosity myself, when I asked the question here, to know how many thousand acres per mile these hon. gentleman, in their combined wisdom, putting all their heads together, with all the knowledge they possess, would say should be given to Mackenzie & Mann as the consideration for this contract. I would like any one of them to reply. Or would any one of them, having a sense of the responsibility which rests upon the members of the Government, dare to say that they would rather insist on taking off 5,000 or 10,000 from that contract per mile and throw the whole contract to the dogs, than face the country with the proposition to add 10,000 or 15,000 acres per mile to the terms proposed? That is the question. It is not a question what these gentlemen, with their pockets full of money and ready to invest untold millions in that Klondike country, would be willing to give, or what value they would be willing to attach to these lands; but what amount would these hon. gentlemen, if they themselves were determining the question, feel they ought not to exceed, at the risk of a failure of the negotiations. That was a pretty serious question for the Government to face, and we had to face it. We came to the conclusion that if we could not get 5,000 acres per mile taken from the price, it was our duty to give Mackenzie & Mann the 25,000 they exacted as a condition of their taking up the contract.

When you come to think about it, what is there in the question of 1,000 or 5,000 or 10,000 acres out of the millions we have up there, and which we do not know are worth anything or not? It is a pure question of chance—absolute chance in every particular. It is all very well for gentlemen who do not intend to invest a dollar in the enterprise, who, if they had thousands, could not be induced, under any conditions, to hazard an investment in the securities of this company—it is all very well for such gentlemen to cry out about the waste of $50,000,000 actual value given this company to build this railway. But if you were to ask them to take up one of the company's bonds at perhaps 95 per cent discount—no, they would be too careful and cautious to invest in so hazardous an experiment. They would not take the risk, but they will make these wild statements, because they hope thereby to discredit a political opponent. But coming down to the question of business, coming to the responsibility of concluding the negotiations, I want some one of them to tell me how many thousand acres he would feel the public interest would impel him to insist on the company's taking off, the refusal by the company to take off, which would justify the Government in putting an end to the negotiations. I do not know, for my part, whether the company of Mackenzie & Mann has made a profitable contract or not; I do not know whether they are going to make a great lot of money out of this thing or not. I sincerely hope they may. They deserve to do it, and I hope they will. And I say this, notwithstanding the carping criticism of gentlemen who write for the newspapers under the nom-de-plume of "Onlooker," and who criticise a great transaction like this in a picayune spirit, somewhat after the fashion of a parish vestryman dealing with the question of a five-dollar expenditure, or who, when they are not so criticising, are slandering better men—men who prize and value their character in the community at least as high as the hon. gentleman does, and who set as high a value upon their moral status. I say, therefore, although I have no more interest than my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, in this transaction—and I believe in my soul he has not a farthing interest in it—although I have no interest directly or indirectly, I do hope that these contractors or the company which may become associated with them, may make handsome profits out of this venture. They deserve to do so. Why, if when we were facing a serious crisis—for I say it was a crisis in the history of our Dominion—these gentlemen, who are all responsible men, were willing to assume the responsibility of carrying this enterprise through, who is it who will be small enough to deny them handsome results? I certainly would not. If they, by the expenditure of their means, by their energy and business and organizing capacity can find precious metals of great value in this territory, and develop it, who is going to prosper? Is there any business man, is there a producer or manufacturer in Canada, who will not benefit by the enhanced prosperity and increased business which will flow from the development of this country, if these people have the valuable property hon. gentlemen opposite say they have? But the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite are mere conjectures, utterly incapable of proof.

Mr. FOSTER. Has my hon. friend any information as to the acreage of the placer areas in the Yukon district?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have not any available for the hon. gentleman at this moment.

Mr. FOSTER. Have my hon. friend and the Government placed any value at all upon this acreage of placer mining country which is to be chosen by these gentlemen—any value at all per acre?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No doubt the hon. gentleman, with his large financial and business experience, and his somewhat extensive mining knowledge, will be able to form a judgment on that question perhaps as well as any member of the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. But I am not introducing the Bill.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he has formed any judgment as to the value of these lands? Now, we are proposing to give the contractors 25,000 acres per mile, guarding the selection of these lands as carefully as it is possible for us to guard it. Whether we have given them in one of these acres a bonanza or a second Eldorado we do not know. We may have done so; but we may not. It is all a chance, but it is one of those chances in which happily for the Government and the country, the risk is all carried and borne by the other parties to the contract. We do not assume any risk; they do. And, Sir, upon all the principles which govern business transactions it is only fair that if these people who will carry this risk, who will expend their millions in carrying out an enterprise for the benefit of this country, should reap magnificent results. I do not think the people of Canada will refuse them the benefits which they have thus deserved. We take none of the chances; they take them all; and I think that, under the circumstances, this must be the strongest confirmation of the policy and the conduct of the Government in the judgment of any fair-minded man. I do not expect hon. friends opposite to approve of this thing. But I am glad to know that in the main, in the substantial features of this contract and this policy, we have the approval and commendation of the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) who leads the Opposition. I am glad that that hon. gentleman has taught some of his supporters that there is in the ranks of the great Conservative party at least one man who has had enough business experience, enough experience of the responsibilities which attaches to members of Government, who has enough patriotism and breadth of mind to rise, for the consideration of a great public question, above the mere consideration of party ends and party interests. I have not very often been the recipient of compliments from my hon. friend opposite; I do not know that we have exchanged any of a flattering kind, nor do I expect any in the future. But I will say that if the party were constituted of such as some who have given expression to their views upon this question in this House, then, I think the party would not deserve to be led by a man of the breadth and capacity of the hon. gentleman who now leads the Conservative party in this House. Outside of all these questions on the value of the land, and so on, which must be a matter of mere guess, of speculation and conjecture at the best, I feel confident that the country would reap its benefit not by the holding of these lands particularly. It would reap no special benefit from that. These lands must go to somebody, somebody must acquire them in order to work them—otherwise they are no better than if no precious metal lay under the soil—we are not doing any more than is done, even by the great country to the south of us, for when they convey an acre of land they pass the title to all minerals without reservation even of the precious metals. In this case we get the railway built in that country by giving away its lands, and the Government will find its account in the increased business which will result to Canada if a fraction of these imaginary ideas as to the value of this property is realized as the result of the contractors.

Now I have endeavoured to cover the general features of this contract as carefully and as fully as I could, and now I proceed to give a synopsis of the different sections of the Bill. The contract is dated 25th January last and is executed by the Minister of Railways through the Minister of Inland Revenue, I being myself absent, and the Minister of the Interior on one part, and Mackenzie & Mann on the other. Under the first clause the contractors covenant to build a railway with proper terminal facilities from the navigable waters of the Stikine River in British Columbia at or near the mouth of Telegraph Creek, Glenora, or the mouth of Clear Water River to the navigable rivers of Teslin Lake, an estimated distance of about 150 miles, by the 1st of September, 1898. The railway is to be of the general standard and gauge of the Kaslo and Slocan Railway in British Columbia. Owing to the extreme urgency and need of having trains over the line as soon as possible, and not later than the 1st of September, a proviso is added that, for the purposes of the season of 1898, and of complying with the requirements of the contract as to completion, it shall be sufficient if on or before that day the contractors have the track laid so as to permit of the operation of the railway, although the whole work be not fully completed so as to entitle the company to claim acceptance of the road by the Government, or to earn its land subsidy. As time will not permit of plans being made, submitted and approved of in the usual way before location of the line of railway, and before the work of construction is carried on, for the protection of the Government, and to prevent an undue extension of the line and larger mileage, the land subsidy, it is provided, shall not be allowed upon a larger mileage than the Minister considers reasonably necessary for covering the distance between the terminal points.

Clause No. 2 provides for the submission to Parliament, at the next session, of a Bill to confirm the contract and to authorize the terms thereof being performed, and for the incorporating a company with power to acquire and contract, and to carry out its provisions, and power also to build and operate the railway I have described, together with an extension thereof and branch lines; the most important of which is an extension southward into British Columbia to a point capable of being made an ocean port, and an extension northward to Dawson City. Power is contemplated by this clause to be given the company to build a line when, but not before, the Governor in Council may consent, from Lynn Canal to Fort Selkirk.

Mr. HAGGART. What distance is that?
The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. From the Chilkat Pass.

Mr. HAGGART. How many miles?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Three hundred to three hundred and fifty miles from the Chilkat Inlet. This power, you will observe, was held in reserve. There has been as yet, no charter granted by Parliament for the construction of a line through the Chilkat Pass. We anticipated that an application might be made. The same view which the contractors had that this was the most desirable of all routes to build would influence contractors or promoters to take up this enterprise, and the Government thought that it would be only reasonable, since we refused to allow, or to encourage or aid the construction of a line via the Chilkat Pass to Fort Selkirk, by Mackenzie, Mann and those with whom they were associated, but induced them to take up this other work on an all-Canadian route, not to allow any other company to be incorporated for the purpose of constructing a road that would enter into direct and probably successful competition with the all-Canadian line built by these contractors.

Now it is needless for me to add that the land subsidy is only contracted for in respect of the line from the Stikine River to Teslin Lake; with respect to the other lines and branches mentioned, the Government assumes no obligations to ask Parliament for a grant in aid of their construction. It is further provided in the second clause that the Act of incorporation of the company shall give the company power to build wharfs and docks, to acquire and operate steam and other vessels in connection with its railway; to erect telegraph and telephone lines; to carry on mining and smelting operations, and other incidental powers connected with the development of the mines; the power to issue land grant bonds and bonds to secure the company's undertaking.

Clause No. 3 provides that upon the incorporation of the company and the assignment of the contract to the company by the contractors, and the company's covenanting with the Government to carry out the same, and upon the railway from Stikine River to Teslin Lake being completed and accepted by the Government, the contractors shall then, but not before, be relieved from personal responsibility thereunder, and the company shall be substituted for Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, and the company shall be deemed to be the contractors and shall be bound to carry out the work contracted to be performed.

Now, Sir, I come to clause 4. This clause is what has been characterized, or will be characterized, I suppose, as the monopoly clause. I want to put the facts before this House, at all events, as they strike my mind, and I claim that this clause, instead of being objectionable, is one of the most, if not the most, defensible clauses in a contract composed of defensible clauses from beginning to end. I think that this clause ought properly to be called, not a monopoly clause, but a clause for better securing the trade and business of the Yukon district for the Canadian people. The clause was in fact forced upon Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann: it was not forced upon us, but was forced upon them by us. I repeat what I said before. The company desired to build that line. We said: No, we cannot permit it. Well, then, they said, somebody else will build that line if we go on and build by the Teslin route, it being, from a business point of view, the most favourable. We said: We will not allow it for a term of years, at all events; and in our own interests it was done, not in theirs, because the contract could not have been entered into unless we were prepared to give them some protection against the destructive competition which would arise if this other route were built—destructive not only to the company, but, as I have suggested, destructive to Canadian interests, we believe. The clause is not inserted therefore in their behalf, but for the protection of our own interests. It provides for a line of railway from the Lynn Canal through the Chilkat Pass to Fort Selkirk, if the Government authorized or required it to be built; and if they were disposed to aid it, the aid should be given to them and no others. If we felt that the work ought to be proceeded with, then we would simply yield to the request when the time arrived, which they pressed upon us now. That is to say, we should allow them to take the work up which otherwise, in the absence of our refusal, they would have taken up at the present time. I have said that this line of railway would doubtless be authorized into that portion of the Yukon country as the best commercial route. The railway contractors would feel like making use of this route as the one most desirable from a business point of view. But the Government felt that they could not reasonably expect a responsible company to take up the Teslin Lake route if they were liable to be met with competition at the hands of a company who should own a route from the Lynn Canal, and the clause was for this reason, chiefly, inserted in the contract. It is quite unnecessary to say, but I may perhaps say it, that this does not in the slightest degree interfere with any existing charters which have been granted. We only engage to ask Parliament to consent to stay its hand for a term of five years, from the incorporation of another company in that neighbourhood, or from the incorporation of a company from the boundary into the Yukon country. We have had present in our minds this fact, that between now and the expiration of that date, we will be able, by exploration surveys, and by careful examination of the ground, to determine whether or not an assured all-Canadian route from east of the Rocky Mountains, can be found running in that direction from Edmonton west, and whether, in that period, such a line could possibly be constructed. In the meanwhile, five years will afford us an opportunity to investigate that question, to which, I think, I may say, in passing, it is the intention of the Government to direct its early attention. Now, by clause 5, the company are entitled to receive, during ten years from the 1st of September, 1898, in preference to any other company, such land or money subsidy as the Government may authorize to be granted in aid of the extension of the railway from the Stikine River to an ocean port in British Columbia if we decide that it is necessary to do so, if Canadian interests demand that it shall be done; and we engage that they shall have the first offer of any aid that we are willing to give for carrying out that undertaking.

Clause 6 provides that the tolls to be collected by the company upon its line of railway from Stikine River to Teslin Lake shall be fixed by the Governor in Council, and the tolls so fixed shall not be liable to reduction until the railway has been in operation for four years; then, at the expiration of which time the tolls shall be reduced by 25 per cent; in other words, for seven years from the date of the going into effect or operation the original tolls as fixed may be reduced by 50 per cent. The rate so fixed may continue three years longer, when the general railway laws of Canada will take effect as respects the company's tolls.

Mr. CHARLTON. Has any determination been arrived at as to the granting of tolls?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. None.

Mr. CHARLTON. So much per mile, per passenger, or per ton?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No; those are details that, I may say, Mr. Speaker, we have not yet had time to deal with officially.

Under clause 7 of the contract, the lands granted to the contractors shall be free from taxation for ten years from the granting thereof, except as respects municipal taxation by any incorporated city, town or village in the Yukon provisional district.

Clause 8 is an important one, and imposes on the company the obligation within six weeks from the 25th of January last to construct a practical sleigh road from the mouth of the Stikine River to Teslin Lake, and to provide suitable shelters or stopping places for travellers at intervals of not more than 25 miles along such road.

Clause 9 compels the company to provide, or to arrange with others to provide, steam-boat transport for freight and passengers between the terminus of their railway on Teslin Lake, or any other terminus or from any extension thereof, northerly to and from Dawson City.

Clause 10 requires the company, within ten days after the execution of the contract, to deposit as security $250,000. That amount, I believe, has already been deposited.

Clause 11 is one which, in a general way, provides for the aid or grant of 25,000 acres per mile.

I referred in my previous remarks to the manner in which the lands are to be selected. The selection is governed by the clauses and sub-clauses of clauses 12, 13 and 14 of the contract chiefly. The scheme of division or selection provides that the Government shall own alternate blocks with the company. This is a valuable provision and reserves, it appears to me, to the Government a full participation, equal with the company, in the benefits of any valuable minerals which may be discovered. The blocks into which the land selected shall be divided are to be not less than three miles in one direction by six miles in the other, or than eighteen square miles in all. Not less than eight of these blocks can be taken in any one selection, and of these eight, the odd-numbered blocks belong to the company, and the even-numbered blocks to the Government. It is, therefore, provided that when the company makes any selection at all in any locality, the selection must cover and include an entire block of twenty-four miles in one direction by six miles in another. It may include any number of blocks additional which the company may choose, but the number shall not be less than I have stated. A block twenty-four miles by six would mean 144 square miles, and would contain 92,160 acres. So that it will not be open to the company in earning its entire subsidy, to make more than eighty selections of blocks in all that region, one-half of which, as I have stated remain the property of the Crown.

Important exceptions are made in two directions. First, the Government reserves the beds of the principal rivers of the region—the Yukon, Lewes and Hootalinqua—and the beds of the Lakes Teslin, Bennett, Tagish, Labarge and Marsh, and between twenty-five feet beyond ordinary high water mark on each side of these rivers, and on all sides of these lakes, the contractors are debarred from making any selection of lands. These reservations, it will be observed, still continue available for the general public to carry on placer or sub-aqueous mining, and it will be still open to the Government to apply its regulations, authorizing companies to carry on sub-aqueous dredging or other operations, without these presumably valuable parts of the country being subject to claim or selection by the company.

Another important exception which the contract provides for is that all mining claims actually held, and recorded pursuant to Government regulations by free miners up to the time that the selection is made, and the lands are especially reserved following such selection, are excepted from the grant, and although any of these claims may be found within the territorial limits of a block, the claims do not pass to the company, but are expressly excepted therefrom. The lands may continue open to the staking of claims, under the mining regulations by miners, and subject to the mining regulations, until they have been earned by the building of the railway. Land selections are permitted to be made as each ten miles of the line is reported upon by the Government engineer to be completed within the terms of the contract, and when a selection is made after the completion of these ten miles, the lands so selected are reserved for grant; and from the time of the reservation, claims may not be staked out by free miners or other selections made thereon; but the grant of the land will not pass, nor will the title become vested in the company until the final completion of the whole line.

Clause No. 13 allows the contractors three years from the 1st September, 1898, to select one-half of their lands, and six years from the same date to select the balance. The object of the company will naturally be to stake out their lands and make their selections as soon as possible, so as to prevent the location of miners' claims; but the time afforded the contractors has been considered by the Government a reasonable time, seeing that they will require to organize their parties for prospecting throughout the country, and such prospecting over so difficult and extensive area will likely consume quite a considerable time.

Mr. CASEY. Within what area may they select?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Within the boundaries of the territories west of the Mackenzie River. Clause No. 15 secures the free rights of passage and use along the navigable or floatable streams within any lands selected by the contractors, and they covenant not to impede navigation in any way; and if any stream is diverted by them from its natural channel, an equally navigable or floatable channel shall be provided in lieu thereof.

Clause No. 16 contains in express terms the proviso that all mining claims actually held and recorded shall be excepted from the grant, as I have above mentioned.

Clause No. 17 deals with the important question of royalty. The Government has reserved a royalty of 1 per cent upon all gold mined by the company upon lands which they have acquired, and which are mined by placer or alluvial or hydraulic mining; and this royalty shall continue so long as there is any royalty upon these classes of mining. If at any time the regulations with respect to placer or hydraulic mining are changed, and no royalty whatever is imposed thereupon, the royalty upon the production of the company would of necessity cease. The same royalty, however, upon quartz mining shall be imposed and will be continued, notwithstanding that a royalty under Government regulations might not be imposed on other quartz mining. It is anticipated that the operations of the company may, in view of the reservation of the beds of the rivers and lakes referred to in clause 14, be chiefly in the line of quartz mining. This rate of 1 per cent corresponds with the rate which is paid in the province of British Columbia on all precious metals, and it is felt that the imposition of any higher rate or royalty would seriously militate against any financial arrangements which the company might need to make for the carrying on of the undertaking.

The general effect of clause 18 is to permit of a reservation of two blocks of the five to which the company would be entitled on their land subsidy on the completion of each ten miles. The two blocks may be selected as each ten miles are completed, and are then reserved for the company, and as a necessary consequence excluded from location by others. The remaining blocks, however, which go to make up the whole acreage for the full line, could not be reserved until the line is accepted as fully completed, and until that event occurs no grant from the Crown will issue. It will be seen that the Government is hereby reserving, as an additional security for the final completion of the undertaking according to the contract, three-fifths of the lands which will be earned by completion of the railway. The remaining clauses are less important.

Clause 19 provides that in case any land is accepted out of the blocks taken by the contractors on account of miners' claims or otherwise, the quantity so accepted shall not be counted in the acreage of land to which the company is entitled.

By clause No. 20 the contractors shall upon application sell to actual settlers, at prices to be fixed by the Governor in Council, any arable land which may be found in the country, and which may form part of their selection under the contract; provided, however, that the minerals and the rights to mine shall be reserved in such sale.

Clause 21 contains an engagement on the part of the Government to send an engineer at once to make an inspection and approve of any ten miles of the line of railway which may have been built.

Clause 22 provides that the grant of land selected by the contractors under their contract shall be in fee simple, and shall include all precious metals and minerals—reserving only the royalty.

Clause 23 declares that a provision shall be made in the Act incorporating the company against any discrimination in operating its railway as between customers, either by discriminating rates or otherwise.

Mr. BLAIR.

Clause 24 provides that water available for hydraulic or placer mining on the contractors' lands, or on the Government lands, shall be used by those mining on such lands under regulations established by the Governor in Council.

The last clause provides for the submission of the contract for the approval of Parliament.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have concluded my reference to this Bill, and I am afraid that I have about exhausted the patience of hon. members. I desired to put this matter as fully as possible before the House on the first reading, in order that the Bill might not go before Parliament and the country unaccompanied by such explanations as I have been able to make with reference to its provisions. I believe, Sir, that this Bill will stand close examination. The Government has great confidence in this measure and in the wisdom of its clauses, and all we desire is that the Bill shall be fairly examined and that it shall be well understood. We have taken the responsibility—in some sense, an unusual and exceptional responsibility—of entering into this contract so close on the eve of the session of Parliament. We could not conscientiously see that we had any other course open to us, and we were obliged to take the responsibility upon ourselves, reluctantly, regretfully I may say, but none the less imperatively. We put this Bill before Parliament, and we put it before the country, as the expression of our confident judgment with regard to what the needs of the situation called for. In doing this we have acquitted ourselves of our responsibility, and it will remain with Parliament; not with one branch of Parliament alone, but with both branches of Parliament, to say whether or not this Bill shall become law.

Mr. HAGGART. It is not my intention to discuss the Bill at any great length at this stage, because I have not had an opportunity of reading the contract which has been laid on the Table just now, or of reading the Bill itself. However, from what I have heard, it is the most extraordinary Bill that was ever introduced to the Parliament of Canada. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) was introducing a simple measure for the purpose of building a railway, but the character of the measure, perhaps, justified his warmth of expression, for he found it necessary to criticise the actions of the leader of the Opposition, and to further criticise in no very complimentary terms some hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. It should be a pure business transaction with regard to which there was no need for warmth of expression. It is a simple question which has to be discussed upon the Bill itself.

The Bill, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) stated, is in two parts. One is to ratify a contract entered into by the Government with Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, and the other part provides for the formation of a company, or the giving of a charter to a company, which authorizes these gentlemen to transfer their contract and gives them power to build the road under the contract with the Government. That is a perfectly justifiable proceeding, and precedents can be found for it in the action of previous Governments. The first thing to be considered is the necessity for building this road, and I may say that the Minister of Railways has perhaps made out a case in reference to that, with which I shall not quarrel. As to the plan and the route adopted for the road, I intend to offer a little criticism now reserving of course my fuller comments for a later stage. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) stated that there were five plans before him, three of which were rejected on account of their passing over portions of American territory, and it was the decision of the Government to have the road entirely upon Canadian soil. As I understood the Minister (Mr. Blair), the road proposed to be built is from a place called Glenora to Teslin Lake. Glenora is on the Stikine River, in Canadian territory, and, of course, Teslin is also in Canadian territory. But in order to reach Glenora we have to pass up the Stikine River from Fort Wrangell. As we all know, that part of the Stikine River is in American territory, and by the Treaty of Washington we have a common right with the Americans to navigate the Stikine River. The ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) asked the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) whether he inquired what our legal rights were as to the navigation of that river, and although he had decided upon this road and told us he preferred it on account of its being an all-Canadian route, yet he stated that he had not made inquiries from the legal department of his Government as to what our particular rights on the Stikine were. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) presumed that an ocean vessel sailing up to Fort Wrangell had the privilege of lightening her cargo and passing it from there to Glenora, because, as I understood it, that part of the Stikine River between Fort Wrangell and Glenora is not navigable for ocean steamers. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) followed the controversy between Canada and the United States, he must know that, notwithstanding our having the right of navigation on the Stikine River, the Americans insist upon making the customs regulations in reference to that river, and he must also know that where the Americans have the common right of navigating our rivers, we insist upon a similar right of regulating our customs, and have always insisted upon it. The Americans have the right of navigating the St. Lawrence River, but does not the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) know that we insist upon making the customs regulations, and does he not also know that the Americans insist upon making customs regulations in reference to the Stikine River and all such other rivers within their territory upon which we have the right to navigate? Instead of this being an all-Canadian route, we have the right to go to Fort Wrangell, and the very doubtful right—although it has the authority of the Minister of Railways—of lightening the load of an ocean steamer and carrying it from the port of Fort Wrangell to the point at Glenora.

Mr. FOSTER. In another vessel.

Mr. HAGGART. Exactly; in another vessel altogether. How would we like, if the Americans, who have the right to navigate the St. Lawrence on equal terms with our own people, should take a vessel down to the head of our canals, lighter it into American vessels at our own port, without customs regulations at all, and navigate it down the St. Lawrence to Montreal? We never would allow them that right. We never claimed such a right, and we have no right to claim it, with regard to the navigation of the Stikine River, and no nation like the Americans will ever grant us any such rights on that river. These are the facts, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) had better inquire into them before another step is taken in the proceedings under this Bill. He had first better find out what our legal rights upon the Stikine River are. Admitting the necessity of this road, for, though I have not had time to consider it, I think the Government have some justification for building even a temporary road, as the Premier calls it, for the purpose of establishing traffic facilities in that country. You will notice the extraordinary arguments of the hon. Minister of Railways. He states that a gentleman connected with transportation in this country estimated the number of people who would go into that country next year all the way from 250,000 down to 50,000. The hon. gentleman's opinion may be correct; I have no doubt it is. He founds his argument upon the lesser number, and estimates that each person will take in a ton of goods per year, or 50,000 tons. Then, in another breath, the hon. gentleman goes on to ask what is the value of these lands which we are giving to the company. It is all a gamble, he says, a matter of speculation. Yet he built up a case which proved the advisability of giving the company as little land as possible for the simple reason that the traffic over the road is to be of the enormous extent he mentioned. What kind of a road are we going to have? The hon. Minister tells us that the Government engineers went over the country, but he does not tell us what the gradients of the road are to be.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think you have got all that in the standard.

Mr. HAGGART. I know the standard of the Kaslo and Slocan Railway as well as the hon. gentleman does. It is a road built among mountains, twisting around a hill, with a curvature perhaps fifty times greater than anything that will be necessary on this road. We know nothing about this road, for we have not the report of the engineer, which, I suppose, the hon. gentleman will lay on the Table of the House before another stage of this Bill is taken. The standard of the road, he says, is to be that of the Kaslo and Slocan Railway. What kind of a road is that? A narrow-gauge road, with rails twenty-seven or thirty pounds to the yard—the same kind of rails as those at present used on Galt's line of railway from Lethbridge to the boundary of the United States. I believe the contractors have bought the rails and the old engines of that road for the purpose of putting them on this road. At any rate, the road is only going to be a temporary road, as the hon. leader of the Government stated the other evening—a narrow-gauge road, built upon any gradients and with any curvature the contractors may think fit, so long as it comes within the specifications of that mountain road built by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company from Kaslo to Slocan.

Mr. FOSTER. Not built by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. HAGGART. It was an independent road, but it was afterwards obtained by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I thought you knew all about it.

Mr. HAGGART. Perhaps I am mistaken on that point. I did not know who the possessor of the road was, but I have been over it, and I know exactly what its character is. What are the Government to give for the building of this road? They are to give 25,000 acres of land per mile, or for the whole road, 3,750,000 acres. How to be selected? To be selected, according to the statement of the hon. Minister of Railways, in alternate sections of six miles by three, the Government getting the alternate sections of the same size. The hon. gentleman says: Oh, what is 25,000 acres of land in such an immense area as we have in the North-west Territories? As an hon. gentleman stated the other evening, it is but a blotch on the map. Although many Government parties have been sent out to explore the country, I make the statement, that there has not yet been found in the whole of Alaska gold-bearing lands to the extent of 3,000,000 acres; and the amount you are giving here is not to be judged in comparison with the extent of the whole country, but with the extent of the gold-bearing area, and I venture to say that it will be found to be equal to at least one-half of the whole gold-bearing area of that country. How will the hon. Minister build the other road which he says he intends to build from Edmonton? How is he going to make the extension from Glenora southward? He has given away half of the gold-bearing lands of the country for the purpose of building a tramway 150 miles long, on which he does not know even what toll shall be charged. He boasts of the bargain he has made with the contractors, but he does not know what the bargain is. He says he is going to have the tolls reduced 50 per cent in four years, but he does not know what they are to be in the first year. It is the duty of the hon. gentleman also to give this House the estimates of his department of the cost of building that road. He has the survey of the route made by the engineers who went over the country and located the line, and we want to know what the quantities are so as to judge whether he is making a good bargain with these parties or not. We want to know all the particulars, because we can judge from the quantities just as well as the hon. gentleman can. Why does he give the contract to these parties without tender? He says it had to be done in a hurry. Did any one in the country know that he was negotiating with these parties for the building of this road? Did the people interested in that country know anything about it? Nothing whatever. He says he took offers from other parties. He says, further, that he had only ten days in which to arrange the matter. Could not the hon. gentleman have consulted six men, or ten, or eighty, and have sent to them private invitations to tender for the construction of this road, just as easily as one? I am not saying anything against the contractors whom the hon. gentleman has selected. They are two efficient men, well able to perform their part of the contract: but there are other contractors in the country as able as they are, and every one of these men had a right to be asked to make an offer by private tender for the building of that road. Further, the contractors have a monopoly for the next five years. The hon. gentleman, if I understood him rightly, said that the Government have pledged themselves that they will not charter a line of road which starts from American territory and runs into that particular portion of the country, because the Americans might charter a railway through their country, and thus enable people who wished to go into the country to do so by a much shorter line than the Mann & Mackenzie road.

The Government have pledged themselves not to grant a charter to any party for a number of years, if I understand the hon. gentleman aright, or to give a monopoly. Further than that if the Government desire to extend the road southwards at some future time, and if they intend to give bonuses for the purpose of assisting such extension, either in the shape of cash or land grants, these gentlemen are to have that contract too. Not only have they the contract for the building of this 150 miles of road, but they have the ownership of it as well. The Government will not own the road. This 150 miles will belong to these parties themselves. I did not hear from the hon. gentleman whether they are bound to run it. They are bound, I think, under the contract, to run it for one year, and then they may close it up and make all they can out of the 3,750,000 acres of gold land which they will have. It is too ridiculous. Is there any company in the world which, if it had the selection of 100,000 acres of gold land in that country, or land on which gold is likely to be found, who could not go to Toronto or Montreal or London or any other financial centre and raise more money three times over than is required to build the 150 miles of road which this Government are giving over to this company. I think there is not a business man in the country who knows these facts, who, if he had 100,000 acres of gold land—not to speak of 3,750,000 acres—in a section of the country such as this is reported to be—because, after all, we are predicating all we are doing on the information we have at present with reference to that country—there is not a business man who could not raise, under these circumstances, three times the amount required to build this line. The hon. leader of the Government ought to be informed as to whether this is likely to turn out a paying speculation or not. No doubt the Government are informed from the parties they have up there—the Mounted Police, the officers of Customs, the officers of the Department of the Interior. The Government must know the capabilities of that country at present, and if the probabilities are one tithe what they are reported to be in the newspapers, a more monstrous bargain was never made by any Government. That any such bargain will pass the Parliament of Canada, although the hon. gentleman says it will, I very much doubt. I will venture to say, from the information I have at present with reference to that transaction, that no member of this House who values his constituency, who looks to the probability of being returned again, will ever vote for a Bill of that kind. The idea—the whole country was rejoicing in the discovery, we saw the daylight, we saw the prospect of the country becoming a great nation, we supposed we had the largest gold field at present in the known world, the eyes of every nation in the world were looking towards us, the hon. gentleman himself estimated that 250,000 people would go into that country this year, and yet he gives away one-half of that country for the purpose of building this tramway of 150 miles. Oh, but he says, he has reserved the beds of most of the streams. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have looked at this Bill. These streams, one of which is the Yukon, and two or three lakes, are reserved, in not one of which, I believe, has there been any gold found—because we all know there is no gold found on the main streams of the Yukon, or very little, or in this Teslin Lake, but on the little streams that flow into the Yukon at different points. Does he reserve the gold in these small streams? No, but he gives the contractors the right to all the gold that can be found in them, he gives the contractors the beds of the streams themselves. Although a stream be navigable, the contractors can divert it, so long as they give the rights of navigation on the diverted streams, but the bed of the stream is theirs.

I am not acquainted with the full details of the Bill. I would ask the hon. gentleman what my hon. friend has asked for, that the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) shall bring down all the reports which he has with reference to the minerals in that country. He has had an officer, I believe, up there who is very well posted.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The House will be put in possession to-morrow of all the information and reports, in the fullest detail, in the possession of my department.

Mr. FOSTER. And the maps?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Yes, everything I have.

Mr. HAGGART. Will they be supplied to each member?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Just as fast as they can be prepared. Of course the hon. gentleman will perceive it will be somewhat difficult to prepare the copies for each member.

Mr. FOSTER. There is a map already prepared which takes in that line of the coast and gives all the routes, and I think each member ought to have that.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. If the hon. gentleman will say what is required in order that they may have the fullest information, I shall endeavour to supply everything they desire.

Mr. HAGGART. I understand from the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) that the engineers who went and surveyed—I do not know whether they located or not—but who went over the different lines of railways belonged to the Interior Department, and the information was furnished to that department and not to his.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Yes, the reports were made to me.

Mr. HAGGART. I would like information with regard to that.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. It will be brought down.

Mr. HAGGART. And I shall postpone until then further discussion of this important subject, which was introduced, I must say, in a manner most unusual—I have never heard of a measure of this importance introduced before the Queen's Speech is passed. It is an extraordinary proceeding, and perhaps it is better the House should be fully informed in the matter, and be taken into the confidence of the hon. Ministers, for they are setting a precedent which perhaps it would not be advisable to follow in other cases. I shall reserve further and fuller discussion of the Bill until I am better informed of the details.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not wish to detain the House, but the hon. gentleman who has just sat down has made some very wild statements which call for comment, and which I am surprised a gentleman of his experience would venture to risk his reputation by making. In the first place, he stated, amid the cheers of his followers, that the Government had given away one half the territory of this particular country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. McMULLEN. One-half of the gold-bearing portion. Now, I have it on the authority of Mr. Ogilvie, who is certainly fairly well acquainted with that country, that its gold-bearing territory exceeds 125,000 square miles. Now, what does that amount to? It amounts to no less than 80,000,000 acres, and we are giving this company 3,750,000 acres, or one acre out of every twenty, to construct a road for the purpose of developing that enormous territory. We keep over 76,000,000 of acres for ourselves, while they get 3,750,000 acres. Now I am amazed to find an hon. gentleman who has been a Minister of the Crown rising on the spur of the moment and making such extravagant statements as the hon. gentleman has made in an attempt to discredit the Government for their action in parting with this land under the circumstances. All experimental lines constructed in Canada have not been by any means of great value to their promoters. If my hon. friend is at all acquainted with the experience of those who engaged in constructing experimental lines into the mountainous sections of the United States, rich in the precious metals though we knew them to have been, he knows that not 10 per cent of those lines are to-day in hands of the original owners. Nearly all of them have been closed up and are now lying idle, or they are being operated by the men who took the bonds. Considering the absolute necessity for the construction of this line, considering the extreme emergency which the Government had to face, I think that their course has been the best one and that it is advisable that immediate access should be given to that country without going over American territory. Even suppose it is found out, after the road is built, that these men who received a grant of the land and who are going to build the road have received a very valuable territory, even though it prove to have almost inexhaustible stores of mineral wealth, it must not be forgotten that they risk enormously to get it in undertaking what they have bound themselves to do. I hope for the sake of the country that they will carry out what they have undertaken. I believe this will prove a good bargain for us. One notable feature about it is that it is not characterized, as were contracts entered into in former years by hon. gentlemen when in power, by any condition committing the credit of the country to the expenditure of a single dollar. The taxpayers are not called upon to pay a farthing.

Mr. WALLACE. I regret, Mr. Speaker, that the discussion is precipitated on the first reading of the Bill, as the contract involves a discussion, a somewhat full discussion in response to the invitation of the Minister of Railways, without our having the advantage of reading the documents, and without our having had an opportunity to weigh the various propositions involved in the contract and in the Bill. I can assure hon. gentlemen opposite that I am not at all envious at seeing them sit upon that side of the House. But while the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) was speaking, I did regret, and I regret now that just for one short week these gentlemen were not on this side of the House. Remembering as we do their denunciations, their numerous objections in discussing everything submitted by the late Government, I know that many of them are sorry that they are not here so that they might give vent to their indignation.

Mr. TAYLOR. Name.

Mr. WALLACE. Name? Well, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), the hon. member for North Lambton (Mr. Lister), the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), and the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser). I could name a score more who would be delighted to have even for one single hour a chance to engage in their old work of denunciation. For, in all their history, in the history of this Parliament there never has been such an outrageous proposition submitted to it as this.

When I saw the advance posters a week or ten days ago in the "Globe" newspaper, I thought it was such a very bad bargain; but I had no idea of the full iniquity of it until it was laid bare by the Minister of Railways attempting to defend it while submitting it to the House. Why, he told us in the course of his speech that the great object of this particular railway was to furnish a Canadian route; that the other schemes Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4, though they had many advantages and although he said one of them had undeniable advantages over this route, they all had this disadvantage that they went in part through American territory. But when he was questioned on the matter when he was asked as to the navigation of this river he halted, he hesitated and finally made a guess. But the fact is that this road commences about 125 miles up the Stikine River. According to the hon. gentleman's own statement, Fort Wrangell, near which the navigation of the river commences, is in United States territory. When questioned, he admitted that ocean steamers could not sail up the Stikine River but that their cargoes must be transhipped at a point at or near Fort Wrangell and taken up in flat-bottomed steamers. So the Minister of Railways states, and so our information is, independent of his statement. And the hon. Minister says that if you go into the harbour of Fort Wrangell and tranship products there to a river steamer you will have undoubtedly to pay the American duty on those goods in order to bring them into Canadian territory at the beginning of the railway. Before these gentlemen come before the House of Commons and the people of Canada and say that they are making a contract for an all-Canadian route they should be prepared to show that it is really an all-Canadian route. They are not able to say that with regard to this contract. The Minister of Railways himself says that the goods must be transhipped and when transhipped must pay duty. Knowing the Americans as we do, knowing the history of their intercourse with Canadians, knowing the advantage they have taken of Canadians at every opportunity, we know that we can not expect any concessions or favours from them. Carrying out the law they will have the power, according to the Minister of Railways and Canals, to levy the American duty on every dollar's worth of Canadian goods sent up the Stikine River, though we have the free navigation of that river for ever, thanks to the foresight and prescience of the late right hon. Sir John Macdonald, the Government has to demonstrate, as they have not yet done, that it is a Canadian route in reality before they can expect to get the approval of the House of Commons or the people of the country for this contract.

The Minister of Railways and Canals has failed to prove that point, and therefore I say the House must pause, the House must wait for the information before they can approve of a contract which, while it was heralded as an all-Canadian route. The Minister of Railways and Canals himself has demonstrated to-day that it is not an all-Canadian route in the sense in which we desired it to be, that is, giving us free access through Canadian territory for Canadian goods without paying duties to American custom-houses.

Now, there is another consideration. The Government say that, in considering this contract, they were brought face to face with a case of urgency fraught with many disastrous possibilities. In the first place, they say, they had to provide for the administration of justice in that country, and that if we wanted to send up North-west Mounted Police, we could not do so unless we had transportation facilities by which to send them. That calls to mind the fact that Major Walsh, who has been sent up there to administer affairs in the Yukon territory, has not arrived there yet. I cannot give the exact date, but I think I am correct in saying that his appointment was made several months before he started for the Yukon, and during this time he was going around the country. I hope the Government will explain the reasons why Major Walsh and the officers and men of the North-west Mounted Police accompanying him remained here for two months after their appointment before they started for this district, knowing the severity of the winter, and knowing all the conditions that prevailed there, making travel in the winter season difficult, if not impossible. Speaking from memory, his appointment was made in the month of August, and he and his party did not start on their trip until about October; fully two months elapsed from the time of his appointment until he was sent away. Well, the consequence has been what might have been expected, that he has been stayed on the route, that he has gone a short distance towards his destination, and that he and his party are now tied up on the route, far away from Dawson City, far away from those thousands of people for whom he was required to administer law and order. But, Sir, judging from the history of other portions of this country, judging from what has been done elsewhere, there is not much danger under the British flag of law and order being set at defiance. Do we not know that at Rossland, in British Columbia, there is a population composed of similar elements, sometimes called a lawless population, a large portion, at any rate, of which is composed of miners and adventurous spirits, and no strong force was required to keep them in order? The statement has been made—and I believe it is true, because I have been there myself and know the circumstances—that in Rossland, with its 6,000 of population, only one constable was needed for the whole community. Law and order prevail, and a man's life is just as safe there as it is in the city of Ottawa. People could travel round at any hour of the day or night, and without any fear of being molested. However, I think it is quite a proper safeguard to send a force to the Yukon territory, a moderate force, not one involving such an enormous expense; because I think the returns will show that the expense of sending so large a force up there at the time has been very great, and that it was not a wise arrangement to have made at that time. Now, Sir, I come to another important point, the necessity for building this railroad and for making the bargain the Government have made with the contractors. The Minister of Railways told us that the estimates that had been made of the number of people who are likely to go in there; he did not venture to make the estimate himself, but he told us that men who ought to know, men who had given the transportation problem a great deal of attention, expressed the opinion that 250,000 people might be going into the Yukon in the year 1898; while conservative estimates made by these same gentlemen would not reduce the figures to less than 100,000. But, said he, taking half of the lowest estimate that was made, look at the enormous number of people that would require transportation facilities, look at the absolute necessity of a railway being built in there. Look, said he, at what is given to these men for building a railway through this country, not a country where a trade is to be built up by slow degrees, not a country to be opened up by years of toil, by an agricultural community, but one being brought into life and existence at once, a country which may receive an influx of 100,000 people during a single season. Mr. Speaker, we cannot tell yet what they are to get for building this railway. We are not told what the company is to get for these steamers which they are to build. But if you take as an estimate for this cheap tramway that they are going to build, $15,000 a mile, which I have no hesitation in saying will amply suffice to build that road, you have two and a quarter million dollars, and you can add a million to that as the cost of the sleigh road.

After Recess.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair I had referred to the fact, which I lamented and which I am sure the House and the country will regret, that the Government when they came down with this important proposition, and submitted it to the House, were not able to present a clearly cut statement as to the facilities for bringing in Canadian goods into Canadian territory. Transshipment could take place at Fort Wrangell, under direction of the American customs authorities. The Minister of Railways had to confess that if transshipment took place at Fort Wrangell the American duty would have to be paid, but he expected that out in the open sea they could transfer goods from ocean steamers to flat-bottom steamers, but would have to go up the Stikine River into American territory where the American Government would not permit transshipment or business to take place. It was claimed for the contract and the Bill presented to this House to-day as its great merit that the proposal is for an all-Canadian route, signifying and conveying the impression through the country that this route has nothing to do with the American customs or anything to do with United States control. I was proceeding to call attention to the contract itself. I had referred to the fact that the cost of the road, 150 miles of construction, would involve an expenditure of $15,000 per mile, and I assume that as an outside estimate for this narrow-gauge tramway which has been proclaimed by the Prime Minister himself as only a temporary structure. Taking the cost at $15,000 per mile, the total expenditure thereon would be $2,250,000, and, allowing a very large margin indeed, the cost of the cheap flat-bottom steamers for river service might be placed at $1,000,000, making the total expenditure for railway and steamers $3,250,000. The cost of operating the road for one year might be placed at $750,000, which is also a very extravagant estimate; and this would place the cost of road construction, steamers and operating expenses for the whole of one year at $4,000,000. This is the responsibility that Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann have undertaken. It is no doubt a large enterprise—it is so large that it frightened the Government from undertaking it. But looking at the other side of the picture, and taking the figures which the Minister of Railways has given as a conservative estimate, and not taking 250,000 people as the number that will be transported, according to the estimate of transportation companies, into that country during the present year, 1898, but reducing the number to 100,000, how do the figures stand as to receipts from the railway and steamboats after they have got into operation? The result will appear like this. One hundred thousand passengers will pay $100 each, and I am very much below the mark in placing it at that figure. Those people going in will thus pay $10,000,000. Assume that one-half the number should return during the year—people will be going and coming constantly—and pay the same rate, but they will have to pay higher no doubt going up than coming down, there will be $5,000,000 from passengers making the return trip. Taking the estimate of the Minister, that every passenger will require a ton of freight and placing it at the rate of $50 per ton, the receipts under that head would be $5,000,000. The rate of freight as well as passengers would be gauged and controlled by the competition which the company would have to meet. What would be that competition? There is the overland route, and we know the enormous sums these people have to pay. The Minister of the Interior no doubt will come down with a very large account for services in carrying in freight for the Government. The public press reports that the cost of taking in a few tons of freight was $80,000 to the Government ; I do not know whether that is correct or not, but the press reports that expenditure. Another competitor for passengers and freight would be the route by the Yukon River. In order to reach there vessels have to sail from Victoria about 2,600 miles to the mouth of that river. It is 1,700 miles up that river in addition before Canadian territory is reached. The river is filled with shoals and sandbars, it is exceedingly dangerous navigation for river steamers ; wood is very scarce along the route because the latitude is so very high, and there are innumerable difficulties in connection with the route. Steamers are only able to make one trip a year, and sometimes they cannot make even the round trip, so the expense of going that way is exceedingly high. This railway company will regulate its rates according to the competition which I have outlined. When I place the rates at $100 per passenger and $50 per ton for freight. I am placing them much below the figures charged. Taking, then, the receipts as $10,000,000 from passengers coming in, $5,000,000 from passengers going out, taking the freight at 100,000 tons at $50 per ton, the receipts during 1898 would reach $20,000,000. The total expenditure for the construction and operation of the road for the year and the building of steamers and all expenses I place at $4,000,000, leaving an enormous profit for the contractors. But supposing that instead of 250,000 people, which the Minister indicated as the number likely to go into the country, we take the lower number 100,000 upon which latter number I have made this calculation and cut that number in two, let us make a calculation on the basis of 50,000 passengers, which is a lower estimate than is made by the Minister or any competent authority. The receipts from 50,000 passengers on the basis of $200 each would be $10,000,000, as against a total expenditure of $4,000,000, leaving for the one year a net profit of $6,000,000, over all expenditures. Yet we are told that they are enterprising men who have taken their fortunes and lives in their hands ; that the Government, with all the information from miners who have brought down gold, with the reports of their officers as to the exceeding richness of the country, the Government were yet afraid to tackle the question. But in addition to giving these contractors control for this year, the Government give them control, and exclusive control, for years to come over this territory as regards the carrying of passengers and freight. What more do they give these contractors ? I am more than amazed.

We were told by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), whose vision, I am afraid, is obscured by that palace at Regina, that Mr. Ogilvie reported that there was 125,000 square miles, or 80,000,000 acres, of this gold-bearing country, and that this grant would be only one acre in twenty. If the hon. member for North Wellington gives that as his opinion and quotes it to affirm its truth, then so much the more censure upon the Government that they were afraid to undertake the work instead of giving these contractors an enormous quantity of gold-bearing lands for no consideration whatever, because if the member for Wellington is right, the very charter to build the road and run the steamers on the route would give them more than a proper recompense. But, Mr. Speaker, what about those three and three-quarter millions of acres ? The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) tried to draw attention away from the fact that mining in that country is placer mining, located in the beds of the rivers and in the little creeks, and that the Government has provided that the line shall be three miles at the base and extending up wherever the company chooses to locate. The company will, of course, locate right away, and when they do locate they are to have blocks of three miles by six miles, or in all 325 of these blocks. As the Minister explained that they have to take an area of six miles by twenty-four miles, of which the Government shall have one-half and the contractors the other half, then, on account of these blocks, six by twenty-four miles, extending up the river twenty-four miles, the company will take possession of just 81 rivers. If they take forty-eight miles, or twice the distance up the river, they will have forty of these immensely rich creeks, such as Bonanza Creek, and these others that Mr. Ogilvie, in his report, tells us about. The Government now tells us that this was a case of urgency. Why, they knew of the richness of this country long ago. They had the reports of Mr. Ogilvie as early as July last, and they had the people returning from that country with great quantities of gold. The later evidence is only confirmatory of the evidence given long ago, because these rich discoveries have been made for years. I remember that in 1893, five years ago, I sent a customs officer up there, and the first year he returned four or five thousand dollars in customs revenue, which has been increasing year by year in consequence of the number of people going in there. However that may be, the enormous riches of that country were clearly established in December, 1896, and the news of it came out to civilization in July, 1897. Here is Mr. Ogilvie's report :

Twenty-one above discovery on Bonanza was the one which first proved the value of the district. The owner of this claim was in the habit of cleaning up a few tubfuls of dirt every night and paying his workmen at the rate of a dollar and a half an hour. Claim No. 51, El Dorado, next produced a pan of $57. This was succeeded by one of upwards of $80. Then come one of

One pan, held in a man's hand and the gold shaken out, returned $212. Why, I am told that a pan yielding 10 or 20 cents makes it profitable enough for a man to earn $10 or $20 a day, while here is a single pan making $212.

And this is what caused the intense excitement in that country. I believe the excitement outside was even greater than it was there. The news went down to Circle City late in December, and it at once emptied itself and came up to Dawson. The scenes of the Forty-Mile rush were repeated. The miners came up any way they could, at all hours of the day and night, with provisions and empty handed.

Mr. Ogilvie has been recognized for years as making most conservative estimates, and yet he says here :

Bonanza and Eldorado Creeks afford between them 278 claims.

Two hundred and seventy-eight claims, Mr. Speaker, would not be as many as are included in one of those three by six miles claims of which the contractors get 325 to make up their three and three-quarter million acres.

Their several affluents will yield as many more, and nearly all of these claims are good. I have no hesitation in saying that about a hundred of those on Bonanza will yield upwards of $30,000,000, and about thirty on the Eldorado will yield a million each. These two creeks will, I am quite confident, turn out from $60,000,000 to $75,000,000, and I can safely say that there is no other region in the world that has afforded so many home stakes—that is, fortunes enabling the owners to go home and enjoy the remainder of their days at their ease—considering that the work has had to be done with very limited facilities, the scarcity of provisions and of labour, and that the crudest appliances only are as yet available. When I tell you that to properly work each claim ten or twelve men are required, and that only 500 were available that season, it will give you an idea of the difficulties which had to be contended with.

Mr. Ogilvie winds up by saying :

This will be the largest, as it is probably the richest, gold field the world has ever known.

That is the opinion of Mr. Ogilvie, and that is the report upon which the Government have acted. They tell us now : Oh, we had to do something. And what did they do ? They gave 5,860 square miles of these valuable claims, not scattered all over the country, but for every ten miles of road the contractors build, they are entitled to drop on their claim, and I venture to say that, while they have an army of railway builders working there day and night, they will have another army of prospectors who will take possession of all these creeks that show to be any way rich. Does any one mean to tell me that Eldorado and Bonanza are the only creeks with enormous quantities of gold ? No ; there are others and others, and this company, having the right to take these for every ten miles of road they build, will every fifteen days be enabled to take a fresh claim. They will have Eldorado and Bonanza creeks innumerable for this contract. This Government has given away half of all the riches up there, and I shall show clearly that they have given a large part of the other half away, too.

Now, Sir, how could this be a case of urgency when the Government knew all about it in July ? They certainly knew it in August, and they did nothing. They knew it in September, October, November and December, and yet nothing was done. It is true, that the Minister of the Interior went up there and started Major Walsh on his mission when it was impossible to get through. He is now hundreds of miles from Dawson City, where he will have to remain until navigation opens in the spring, and perhaps after all he will wait to get through on this new railway and this new line of steamers.

But we were told by the Minister of Railways that they had tried in every way to get this contract accepted by these gentlemen. It was almost pathetic, Mr. Speaker, to hear the hon. gentleman reciting to this House the efforts that they had made. He shed copious tears evidently, and besought these gentlemen to accept less than 25,000 acres per mile. He said that it was not the spasmodic shedding of tears, but that day after day he was surrounded by a large committee of the greater number of the members of the Cabinet, who implored those hard-hearted contractors to consent to take less than 25,000 acres per mile. I am quite sure that all the members of the Cabinet were not present. I am quite sure that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) was not there. He had many other public duties to perform. He was down in the province of Quebec quelling a rebellion, fighting his old-time friends. He had his hands full. It appeared at one time that his hands were more than full. I am certain that if the Minister of Public Works had been there he would not have consented to give this contract to Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann. He would have undertaken the job himself. He has many friends who are on the lookout for something too, as past experience has proved, and if they had known that these negotiations were going on from day to day they would have been on hand. The Minister of Railways tells us that he was down on his knees every day beseeching these stony-hearted contractors to accept a little less than 25,000 acres a mile, and he implored us on this side of the House to say how much less we would have asked these contractors to take. Mr. Speaker, I would have asked them to take 24,999 acres a mile less than they got, and then they would have been getting an enormous profit. I am sure that I am not speaking at random when I say that if the contractors of this country had known that the Government were making a contract with some one, or were anxious to get some one to build the railroad, and were offering such enormous, such unparalleled subsidies, there would have been a hundred such contractors in Ottawa within twenty-four hours ready to bid each other down, and to take far less than these contractors are to receive from the Government. But, Sir, these negotiations were going on; the people of this country knew nothing about them; no one knew that Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann were in Ottawa, day after day, negotiating and planning to get this contract. If they had known it, there is not a contractor or a capitalist in this country who would not have been willing to put his money into the work without these enormous subsidies of the richest mineral land the world has ever seen.

Now, Sir, the hon. Minister asks: "What were we to do?" Why, Sir, are the Government incapable of taking any action? Has the governmental machinery broken down, so that the Government are incapable of undertaking anything themselves? Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann have surrounded themselves with competent and capable engineers, with staffs of experienced workmen, with all the appliances necessary for rapid railroad building, and the Government could have secured the services of men like Mr. Mann or Mr. Haney—because we have the best railroad builders, I believe, in the world to-day—men of experience not only in our own country, but in all other countries. The Government could have gone to these men and said to them: "We want to have this road built as expeditiously as money and appliances can do it, we want you to use every effort to get it built, and we will pay you liberally and handsomely for your services for six months or a year." Could not the Government have secured the services of able and competent men, of the very men who are doing this very kind of work in this country to-day? Why, Sir, it is a reflection on the Government themselves to say that they were unable or incompetent or unable to undertake such a task, when the urgency of the case required that Canada should be up and doing. But it appears that they were letting the months go by, one after another, and doing nothing until the month of January came, when they said: "We must meet Parliament in February and something must be done, so that we can go before Parliament and say, see what a progressive and enlightened Government you have." Even the Minister of Railways himself did not seem to have any reports, or any definite knowledge of the situation or of the country through which the road was to be built, or of the cost of the road. He has not explained any of these things to this House, and I presume it was because he had nothing to explain. But, Mr.

Speaker, this was the course that was taken: a rash, mad, headlong, precipitate bargain was made without due consideration of the consequences—giving away for nothing the richest gold fields the world has ever seen, and giving them away unnecessarily; because plenty of men would have built this road without asking for any such bonus.

Now, Sir, the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) said before six o'clock that this was an excellent bargain. He said that if these men do make money they are risking enormously, and he did not believe it was a good bargain for them. According to the evidence and the information we have, which is reliable and accurate, they are risking nothing; they are going into as sure an enterprise as they ever went into in their lives. He tells us that the experience of the United States is that these roads are not profitable. I will venture to say that our good friend was simply speaking at random. He told us further, that not ten per cent of the original promoters of these roads own them to-day.

Well, I characterize that as a similar statement, because I do not think the hon. gentleman can mention a road to-day which is in that condition. If he can, I would like to hear from him what one it is. Now, there is one other point, and I think it is a very important one in connection with the building of this road. We are told that the Government are imposing a royalty of 10 per cent on all the mines operated by all miners throughout the country. But this company is not to pay 10 per cent to the Government, but only 1 per cent. Now, suppose that a mine is being operated and that it costs $90 to produce $100 worth of gold, the 10 per cent they have to pay to the Government will leave the enterprise without a dollar of profit to those who are dealing direct with the Government, but if they deal with this company, which only pays 1 per cent, there will be a clear profit of $9 per 100. What more? Take Eldorado and Bonanza Creeks, where Mr. Ogilvie estimates will be taken out between $60,000,000 and $75,000,000, what is to prevent this company going to these men who are mining on those creeks and saying to them: Drop your claims with the Government, we will take them up and make a bargain with you. We will divide the 10 per cent, taking 5 ourselves and allowing you 5. You will thus save 5 per cent, and Mackenzie & Mann will make an equal amount. That can be done, and the additional advantage to these miners will be this, that whereas each miner has to pay $15 for a license each year to the Government, and only gets a yearly license that has to be renewed with the Government; in the case of lands obtained from Mackenzie & Mann, they will have the fee simple for ever, they will have the Crown grant transferred to them without any condition, and have to pay no mining license. But in the case of Government mining lands, the miner must pay a miner's license, must work his mine, and have the license renewed on his claim every year. So that there is every inducement to the men on these claims to make another bargain, and make it with Mackenzie & Mann rather than with the Government. That I consider an enormous advantage to these men, because it will make it the interest of every miner in the country to pay them tribute.

But the "Globe" newspaper, in commenting on this scheme, told us that the Government has wisely prevented agricultural lands from being given to this syndicate, and has protected the farmers up in these northern regions. Mr. Speaker, British Columbia extends to 60 degrees north latitude. All these lands which the Government have given must be north of that 60 degrees. As a matter of fact, all the mines that have been discovered are probably north of 64 degrees, a region where there can be no agriculture, for 66½ is the Arctic circle—a region where there is no farming and no necessity to protect and to preserve agricultural lands. These contractors do not want agricultural lands. What they want is mining lands. They have 325 of these claims, three miles by six miles. They have, wherever they may choose to select them, and they will undoubtedly select them at the places discovered to be valuable mining territory. Why, they can cut their lands up into almost innumerable mining claims and placer claims. I see by the mining regulations that a bar-digging claim may be 100 feet wide, and dry-digging has to be 100 feet square, or one-fifth of an acre. Creek and river claims may be 500 feet long and not more than 100 feet wide, which is somewhat less than an acre. The bench claim is to be 100 feet square, or less than one-fifth of an acre. Why, with 25,000 acres for one mile of road they could have 25,000 of those acre claims or 25,000 of those smaller claims and be practically owners of the country, because a Government claim, subject to 10 per cent royalty, is not nearly so desirable a property as the Government contractors' land with only one per cent royalty, and with the fee simple and no yearly license to pay, and none of these onerous responsibilities with which the Government may saddle the placer and other mines in that country.

I believe that the Government should take some means to effectually return to Canada a part of the large expenditure which they have incurred and are likely to incur in the future in carrying on the Government of the country, and in carrying out the regulations which they have imposed, but it appears that the first regulations which they made have been abrogated. New regulations have been made, which, we are told, will be equally unsatisfactory in their results, and if it be true that the contractors have only to pay 1 per cent, while those working the Government claims will have to pay 10 per cent, I am quite sure that will have the most unsatisfactory result, so far as the obtaining of revenue by the Government from these properties is concerned.

Another point that I did not understand the Minister of Railway's reference to is this. The Parliament of Canada, at its last session, granted two charters for building railways from the Pacific Ocean into that country. I would like to know from the hon. Minister what he proposes to do with reference to these.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). We do not propose to do anything. We leave them severely alone. I presume we are not going to interfere with any rights given by Parliament.

Mr. WALLACE. They do not get 25,000 acres of mineral lands per mile.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think the probabilities are rather against that.

Mr. WALLACE. The other one has got it all. I think there are two ways in which the Government have been negligent, and have not acted as they might have to protect Canadian interests. We have seen during the past season—and I am sure it must have been a matter of regret to every Canadian—that it was persistently heralded throughout the world that this great mineral wealth, these great mines of gold, were in Alaska, in the territory of the United States. And I am told that Seattle, on the Pacific coast, is doing the largest business in providing private outfits and supplies. What I blame the Government for is for not having taken steps in the first place, to let it be known throughout the world that these mines were in the Dominion of Canada, solely under Canadian control, and that Canada was going to look after them in her own interest and the interests of the British people. And another thing—and the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) referred to that the other day, and, for my part, I think it is one of the most important matters that has to be dealt with in regard to that rich country—we should treat the United States in this matter exactly as the United States treats us Canadians. They will not permit Canadians to go in there and become free miners and to take up the mining lands as we permit them to do in Canada, and why should we give them greater privileges than they are ready to give us? It may be quite true that where we are inviting people in, where we are urging them to come in and assist in developing the country, we must make liberal regulations in order to accomplish that end. But the people are rushing to that country, they are bound to get there. Not only are Canadians going there, but people from the British Islands and British residents from Africa, Australia and New Zealand and residents of foreign countries as well. I contend that the first duty of the Government, seeing that there are such enormous riches in that country, was to proclaim that we will have regulations reserving these riches for British subjects. But the Government instead of considering these things, instead of taking that loyal and patriotic stand, have utterly neglected their opportunities. We found the members of the Government scattered during recess, scarcely one of them being found in Ottawa. They have utterly neglected their duties in regard to this important matter. They allowed matters to drift along almost until the time that the House was to sit, and then they made a precipitate rush to do something. But it is imperative that British interests, that Canadian interests, should be looked after and not lost sight of. As I have said, the people are rushing in there, and you could not keep them out, perhaps. But you can make regulations which will confine this wealth to British people. We are told that the business of the country is slipping into American channels. Efforts should be made by the Government to open up avenues of trade and to secure the entry of Canadian goods into that country. Few realize the enormous quantity of goods consumed in a mining country. Take, for instance, the West Kootenay country. Eight years ago the customs revenue did not amount to $20 per day in the whole of that country. To-day, as the Minister of Customs will tell you, there is a customs income of more than $1,000 every day. Besides, there is an enormous quantity of Canadian goods consumed. This, for a population of 20,000 people, gives an idea of the enormous trade in such a country. So it may be with our Yukon country, that richest of countries, with its 100,000 people, as it is estimated there will be at the end of the coming season. This means from $5,000 to $10,000 a day of customs duties to the benefit of the Government, besides the sale of an immense quantity of Canadian goods in that country. But, so far there appears to have been apathy and neglect and utter want of consideration for the interests of Canada by this liberal, by this progressive Government that we are told is always alive to the interests of the country—but which fails to do anything when the opportunity offers.

I have shown that the Government has not a clear-cut, decisive knowledge of how Canadian goods are to go into that country, even if this railway were built to-morrow, without paying American duties. They have given this company a subsidy by giving them practically an exclusive right to build a road there which will yield them a profit, as I have shown, of more than double the cost of the road in the first year. They are giving them untold wealth in mineral lands which they are handing over to them. They are neglecting British interests. In every business operation in connection with that country they have not considered the interests of the people of Canada, but have been practically permitting the United States to control our business affairs. But what was more humiliating still, Sir, we have read in the papers that the American Government was sending supplies in there to relieve the wants of these people. Why, we were told that the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) went down to Washington to consult the Secretary of War there, because the Secretary of War was ill and could not come up to consult our Government in the matter. What had the Secretary of War to do with giving relief to starving humanity? Are there no other departments of the United States Government charged with that duty? The reason their action was, as I read it, that they wanted to get a military foothold, they wanted to get some sort of possession of our Canadian territory. We know what their dealings with Canadians and British people have been. They get a foothold here and a foothold there, and when they once get possession, it is exceedingly hard to dispossess them. We were told by the Minister of the Interior yesterday that negotiations were going on at the present moment for American troops without arms to go through Canadian territory, so as to reach another portion of United States territory. I should like to know what portion. I should like to know why this permission should be given, or what necessity there is for their going through Canadian territory, a privilege never granted to Canada by the United States Government in the past, even when it was urgently required. The Minister of the Interior told us that whatever rights we had would be sacredly guarded by the Government, that he would see to it that none of the rights that Canada possesses to-day should be sacrificed to the United States. I remember him speaking of that in Kamloops, and that sentiment was loudly applauded by those present. But I was grieved when I saw in the papers—it was denied afterwards—that the American army was going to be permitted to go in. The statement made yesterday is a partial acknowledgment that negotiations are on foot for that purpose. I think we should give the American Government to understand, that if there is want, if needy people are to be provided for, the machinery of our Government is amply sufficient to provide what is necessary in that regard; that if the American people see fit to send supplies to those of their people who are in need, they can trust the Government of Canada fairly and honestly to distribute it, without permitting American soldiers to perform that duty. Sir, I think that is humiliating to the people of Canada. It is quite unnecessary, and I hope the Govern-ruent will in future, as I am afraid they have not been doing in the past, study the interests of Canada and of Canadians only.

Mr. MORRISON. I am somewhat surprised at the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, and which he has been labouring to give to the House for the last two hours. I would suppose that an ex-Minister of the late Administration should have had something more substantial to present to this House on such an important question. I am equally surprised at the few remarks which the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) made to the House to-night on this matter, surprised at the depths of ignorance he displayed on matters pertaining to a department over which he had control for some years. The reference he made to some of the railroads, particularly to one mentioned in the contract, surprised me all the more inasmuch as it is a piece of road with which he ought to have been very familiar; and when he displays such lack of knowledge of matters with which he is presumed to have been conversant, what opinion can we form of his remarks in relation to a matter which has sprung up so recently as the one now before the House? The hon. gentleman, in referring to the road which was made a criterion in the contract, or a model for the railway under consideration, stated that it extended from Kaslo to Slocan, which would be equivalent to saying that a certain road extended from Toronto to the province of Ontario. The Kaslo and Slocan Railway is a very well known railway in the province of British Columbia, and ought to be well known to the ex-Minister of Railways. It is a road which I think was built during the incumbency in office of that hon. gentleman, and why he should have been so far afield in his reference to it, I cannot understand. I will not say that he intended to mislead the House and the country in his reference to the Kaslo and Slocan Railway because it has been selected by the Minister of Railways as a model by which Mackenzie & Mann are to build this road from Teslin Lake to Telegraph Creek. As a member seeking for information from hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this matter, the remarks of the ex-Minister of Railways gave me the impression that he was not endeavouring to present his views properly and honestly before this House. I think that hon. gentlemen who speak upon this question ought to endeavour to present their views as fairly and squarely as possible to the House, so that we may be able to form an opinion as to whether the Government did right or wrong in making this contract. This is a matter equally important to us all, whether we be Liberals or Conservatives. It is a matter out of the sphere of politics altogether, and I hope that the efforts of hon. gentlemen opposite to drag it into the sphere of parish politics, will fail. I know that there is plenty of common sense on the other side of the House, and I believe it will come to the surface on this occasion, and that many hon. gentlemen opposite will support the Government in regard to this important matter. The hon. member who last spoke expatiated at great length upon the millions that would be made by somebody in consequence of something in connection with this work. He far exceeded the famous Colonel Sellars in that respect. Now, as an hon. member stated to-night, a man who will go to work and transact business on paper, deluding himself into thinking that he is prospering because he may figure out large dividends, is very apt to come out at the wrong end ultimately. Sir, the figures which the last speaker has given the House are altogether fallacious and misleading, and he made an entirely wrong application of them. As he laid so much stress upon figures, let me give him a few by which I come to an opposite conclusion. The hon. gentleman, perhaps, did not know that at the present time there are 7,000 people inside the passes of the Yukon country, and that there are 3,000 people on the Yukon River waiting the opening of navigation on that river. That is 10,000 people, at any rate, who, beyond all peradventure, will be in that country in a very short time. The only present means of transporting goods in bulk into the Yukon territory is by way of the Yukon River during the season it is open for navigation. At the present time there are very few boats on that river; it is estimated by those who know that even at the height of navigation there will not be more than twenty-five boats having an average capacity of 125 tons, carrying provisions, passengers and freight up to St. Michael's, and beyond to Dawson City. Now, twenty-five boats with an average of 125 tons, and making two trips in the season—which is the maximum number of trips they can make—can carry 6,250 tons of provisions next summer. As I said, there will be 10,000 people in there soon after navigation opens. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken, thought a conservative estimate would place at 50,000 the additional number of people who will go in there by some means or other. It is a matter of calculation that it will take 25,000 tons of provisions to feed 50,000 people, and I have shown that the utmost capacity of the boats now plying on that river, is 6,250 tons. Where are you going to get all the provisions to feed not only 50,000 people, but 60,000 people? The 50,000 people who will go in there will not go by the Yukon River, they must go over those passes, that is if they can get over them, and what does that mean? Of food, baggage, machinery and tools, all of which are absolutely necessary to every man who goes in there, about two tons will be required to every man. For 50,000 people there will be required 100,000 tons of material, food, provisions, machinery, &c. Now, the lowest possible rate, the lowest known rate so far, at which goods have been transported in there, has been six cents per pound, while it is well known that 10 cents per pound is the prevailing rate at present, and has been for some time. Ten cents per pound means $200 a ton, or $20,000,000 to transport 100,000 tons into that country for the accommodation of 50,000 people, which is admittedly the minimum number who are expected to go in there. Any person who has been at Vancouver, Victoria or New Westminster during the past six months must be specially blind if he could not see that at least 100,000 people would be in the Yukon country this season, and may have gone there since I left the coast. Vancouver is filled with people, Victoria is likewise filled; trains going west are all crowded; in Vancouver and Victoria there is hardly a house vacant, the hotels were packed to their capacity and rooms could not be engaged in advance. That is, however, only an earnest of what is coming upon us. When it is considered that in order to transport in that northern country 50,000 people, it will cost something like $20,000,000 hon. members can readily see the tremendous problem that faced the Government. The item of transportation is but one item. Suppose 100,000 people come to the Pacific Coast, and I think there is no member in this House who knows anything about the condition of affairs who will not conceive that that is a conservative estimate—suppose that number come to that part of British Columbia en route to the Klondike, they will spend on average $500 at various points on the Pacific Coast for outfitting. What does that mean? It represents an expenditure of $50,000,000. Add the cost of transportation and you have $40,000,000 more. So from the items of fitting and transportation for 100,000 people there will be nearly $100,000,000 expended. That appears incredible; but it is a matter of simple multiplication, and we must pay a little heed to the inevitable. I contend, and assert it boldly that this state of affairs will occur beyond peradventure, if it does not exist at the present time, it will prevail within the next few months. The Government were not blind to it; but they realized that if the minimum number of 50,000 were to go in there—and they would do so or die in the attempt—the existence of a state of affairs which offered no means of affording succour to them, because they would be in need, would involve most serious responsibility. What would be the attitude of this House towards the Government if they had been so recreant to their duty as not to have adopted the most extraordinary and the earliest steps possible to solve the problem, without waiting for tenders and without consulting the ex-Controller of Customs or the ex-Minister of Railways? I contend it would have been nothing less than criminal if the Government had not taken the very first means of providing in some legitimate way for getting food into the Yukon country for the large number of people who will go there within the next six months. I contend, if there was nothing more, that that was a sufficient justification for the Government to enter into the contract which has been made and which is now under discussion. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen opposite to indulge in vagaries. It is difficult to believe that they stated what they think, and extravagant statements were indulged in this afternoon by two of the speakers from whom we would have expected a little more common sense in the discussion of such an important matter as that now before the House. The last speaker ought to know, because apparently he had taken care to gather together a lot of statistics, which, however, were not applicable to the present discussion, that one of the reasons for taking these active steps in providing communication was that it cost the mounted police $1,000 per ton to move their supplies a distance of 26 miles. What opportunity for transport would an individual have, no matter how much means he might possess, when it cost such a large amount for an able-bodied force like the mounted police to move their freight? The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) stated, after indulging in a great deal of chaff, that the Government ought to take very pronounced steps in regard to the attitude assumed by the United States in the matter of Yukon customs regulations. To that extent I quite agree with him. That is, however, just what the Government has done. The Government in letting the contract to build this road entirely within Canadian territory has struck a death blow to the trade carried on by Americans, who have been capturing and in fact purloining trade belonging to the people of Canada. By building this road from the head of Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake it will kill the trade by the Lynn Canal, which is in American territory. It will divert all the Yukon trade into Canadian channels, and our Canadian cities on the Pacific Coast will prosper and benefit, and that means that our eastern cities will prosper and benefit, because our Pacific Coast cities are likewise entrepôts for the business centres of the east. The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram) knows that very well, and in fact all business men know it. True, none of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the other side of the House are business men, and so they may be pardoned for losing sight of that fact. As I contend, the strongest blow that has been delivered to American trade has been the letting of a contract for a Canadian road which will divert trade to Canadian territory.

—Mr. WALLACE. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will permit me to say a word. I am a business man and the hon. gentleman is a lawyer.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman will remember that I formed my opinion entirely from his discourse. The ex-Minister of Railways rang the changes on the fact that goods going up the Stikine River would have to be transhipped, and he deprecated the action of the Government in entering into a contract that was considered an all-Canadian route, whereas it was not, and in this way he endeavoured to mislead. That is a difficulty which I am certain the Minister of the Interior will explain to the satisfaction of this House and the country.

Mr. HAGGART. I took the words of the Minister of Railways for that statement.

Mr. MORRISON. I am now dealing with the remarks made by the hon. gentleman. The Minister of the Interior will, I am quite positive, satisfactorily deal with that phase of the contract; I am quite satisfied of that from conversations I have had with him, and I will not go further into it. Even assuming that the obstacles referred to by the hon. gentleman do exist—and I deny it—is he so ignorant of the geography of the country as not to know that at Port Simpson, in Canadian territory, ships might call very easily and without very much delay, transfer their goods and send them up to Telegraph Creek. Another fallacy indulged in by both hon. gentlemen was emphasizing the fact that those three millions or more acres of land given to the company were gold-bearing mineral lands. That is a fallacy of fallacies. Certainly the information and knowledge possessed by those hon. members is different from everything that has been published or talked about regarding this matter. I venture to say that not one acre in ten thousand would even have colour along the route of that road, or in the vicinity of it. It is not a quartz mining country as far as we can understand. If Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie take their chances on the land containing gold, and it is not positively known that there is gold there, I cannot see what argument gentlemen opposite can make out of that. The contractors cannot take the land with them; it remains there. Were it known definitely that those vast stretches of territory were very rich in gold, or did contain gold, then there might be some shadow of argument in the contention of hon. gentlemen opposite. However, the gentlemen who took this contract have to take their chances. I cannot say that the contract was one-sided, either in favour of the Government or against it, and it would be manifestly unfair if it were so. If the Government made a contract with Mann & Mackenzie by which these gentlemen were to lose money and be ruined, the Government would be as open to criticism as gentlemen opposite think they are in the present instance. I agree with the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) that it is regrettable that the debate should have been precipitated at this stage, and consequently I have simply endeavoured to give one or two reasons to show the great urgency with which the Government were met with in considering the matter. If there were no other considerations for what is termed precipitation than these instances I have pointed out, they would be sufficient justification for the Government to enter into the contract, which I am quite confident will meet with the entire approval of the country and of the majority of the members of this House.

Mr. MONTAGUE. We must all regret that the discussion of this very important question has been precipitated in Parliament before Parliament has really been informed what there is in the subject and what are the details of this contract which has been given to Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann. I was somewhat astonished at my good friend from New Westminster (Mr. Morrison) criticising the gentlemen who have already spoken on this side of the House, and saying that they had talked vague generalities instead of going into the details of the measure. Well, I would ask my hon. friend (Mr. Morrison) what else he could expect, since the Bill was presented only this afternoon, and since the explanations which the Minister (Mr. Blair) gave were nothing more than quotations from the Bill itself. My hon. friend (Mr. Morrison) said that the late Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) had displayed great ignorance of that country, and of the affairs of his department when he presided over it, because he (Mr. Haggart) happened to say that the model railway in connection with this transaction ran from Kaslo to Slocan. When my hon. friend (Mr. Morrison) has been some years in the House he will know that we are all apt to make these slips; and beside, I may tell him, that in the province of Ontario, the Kaslo and Slocan Railway is perhaps not known to be run to Sandon or the concentrator of the Noble Five Mine, yet the people in that province, though they may have only a vague idea of the Slocan district, at any rate know that the town of Sandon, which the Kaslo and Slocan Railway connects Kaslo with, is the centre of the Slocan district.

I listened to my hon. friend (Mr. Morrison), who has spoken as a member from British Columbia, expecting that he would not talk vague generalities, but that he would give us some information with regard to the reasons why this contract, placed before this House by the Government, should be adopted. I am bound to say that my hon. friend (Mr. Morrison) did give some facts, facts which to me prove three things.

In the first place, he proved conclusively to my mind that the Government did not begin the consideration of this subject nearly early enough, and his speech all through was a condemnation of governmental delay in the consideration of this question, which he regards, and which the House regards, as a most important one. The next thing which he (Mr. Morrison) proved was, that a railway should undoubtedly be constructed, and he proved that to a House that was very willing to accept the proof, however poorly given, because as I take it, the feeling upon this side of the House as well as upon the other side is in favour of that view. But, the question before Parliament is not as to whether it is important for Parliament to provide transportation facilities to the rich fields of the Klondike—we are all agreed upon that—but the question is as to the best mode of providing it, and as to the economy of the arrangement proposed to be made by the Government with two contractors, namely, Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie. The third thing which my hon. friend (Mr. Morrison) proved to the satisfaction of the House, when he stated the enormous trade which this railway was about to do were it completed, was that no grants were necessary, but that the road would be such an enormously remunerative one that this Parliament, instead of giving money or treasure for its construction, should have received a bonus from those who were given the right to construct it, since they were likely to make an immense amount of money out of its operation.

Now, Sir, I have stated to begin with, that it is in no carping spirit that the gentlemen on this side of the House discuss that measure. I do not believe there is a gentleman upon this side of the House who is not as anxious to see proper facilities for freight or passengers provided for that rich section of the country as are the members of the Government themselves. We regard it as a most important matter, and indeed perhaps as more important than some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House regard it, for I noticed with some little astonishment that some gentlemen opposite, who two or three years ago were known as the watch-dogs of the public treasury, slept in sweet repose while this contract was being discussed by one of their leaders, the Minister of Railways. The speech of the Minister of Railways this afternoon was, according to the authority of old parliamentarians, a somewhat strange proceeding, and if it were a strange proceeding in point of the time at which it was delivered, it was a still stranger proceeding as a justification of the contract and arrangement which has been placed before this House. Sir, a Bill upon any subject introduced by the Government to the House of Commons, is the conclusion of the Government after its deliberations upon that subject, and so far as that question is concerned speaks for itself. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair), in making his explanation to the House, has merely made running comments upon what that conclusion was, but he has failed to give the House what he might well have been required to give it, namely, the reasons which found weight in the minds of the Government in impelling them to the conclusion which they reached, and which is voiced in this House by the Bill which has been presented for our consideration.

Why, Sir, look at the position of affairs this afternoon. Here was the Minister of Railways introducing one of the most important measures as regards transportation to which this House of Commons has ever listened, and yet, when he was explaining that he had bound the contractors down so that they should have their transportation maximum rates reduced year by year, or after a certain period of years—and he was exceedingly anxious to show the House that in a very short time they would cut the freight and passenger rates in two—after he had gone to all the trouble of explaining this to the House, he was asked what was the highest rate they would be allowed to charge at the present time; he was unable to say that he had any information on that subject. I give that as a sample of the explanations that were given of the Bill, and I ask my hon. friend from New Westminster whether, in view of such explanations, he will repeat his statement that we should be condemned for talking vague generalities in connection with this important subject.

Now, Sir, the address of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals divides itself into two portions, as he divided his Bill into two portions. In the first place, he discussed the question of the necessity of the railway, a matter to which I have already referred, and upon which there is scarcely a division of opinion in this House. But let me remind the hon. gentleman that he did not tell us at what time the consideration of this very important subject was taken up by the Cabinet. He said—and I took his words down—that he gave the subject immediate consideration after the session; and yet, if we are to believe the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), who has just spoken, the full Cabinet was not here during the summer, but month after month passed by before these gentlemen came to consider, as a Government, the subject, for a disregard of which, he says, they would have been held guilty before the eyes of the whole world. Now, Sir, we shall require to know, and I suppose the papers will give us some light on the subject—when this subject became a question of consideration before the Government, when it was decided to construct such a road in some way, when information was begun to be gathered for that purpose, and when authorities were consulted as to the best routes and the proper mode of construction.

The next point to which my hon. friend refers is the justification of the contract which he has presented to the House this afternoon. What were the reasons he advanced in its justification? In the first place, he said that these contractors were very excellent contractors indeed. No one in this House will deny that. They are Canadians of whom Canada ought to be proud. They are Canadians who have made a splendid success of their business. They have done good work wherever they have done work. But to say that the contractors are very estimable men, and to say that they have performed their work in a very satisfactory manner wherever they have done work, is not to admit for a single moment that the well-established practice that great contracts such as this should be open to public tender to many other contractors equally able to build it, should be disregarded and thrown to the winds. Sir, a picture has been drawn, but it can never be sufficiently drawn, of the extreme indignation that would have arisen on this side of the House against the late Government had any such proceeding as the one followed in this case been followed by the predecessors of hon. gentlemen opposite. I can well understand every one of these gentlemen, from the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) down to the humblest member who graces a seat on that side of the House, rising in a perfect whirlwind of anger, and charging every sort of corruption against the Conservative Administration. We are not here to charge corruption or any improper conduct. If there has been anything of that kind it will come out sooner or later before the public or before the Parliament of Canada. But we are here to say that the well-established rule for the granting of such great powers and privileges by public tender should not have been disregarded in this case, but that it is a safe and sound principle, and one that should be followed by a Liberal as well as by a Conservative Administration. In saying this I am not saying one single word against the contractors, nor charging collusion of any kind; but I am saying that hon. gentlemen opposite have in this respect deserted every principle for which they contended on this side of the House, and with an eloquence which covers thousands of pages of "Hansard," during the time they were sitting to the left of the Speaker in this House.

The next point which my hon. friend made was that it was a good route. Well, Sir, if it be a good route, I fail to see by what manner of logic we can be asked to make a bad bargain. It may be the very best route which the country affords, and yet for all we know this may be the very worst bargain that could be made for that or any other route. Why, Sir, it is simply childish to stand up in Parliament and ask the representatives of the Canadian people to pass this Act to confirm a private arrangement with private parties, discussion in connection with which was only known to the Government and those parties, simply because they are good contractors and because it is a good route. Even as to the route, however, opinion does not seem to be unanimous; for, if I remember correctly, only a few days ago a prominent gentleman belonging to the other side of the House, well knowing the importance of Klondike and Alaskan matters, publicly stated that it was one of the worst routes that could be selected, at least by a Government. But, as I can only talk vague generalities upon that point, not having the information of either the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville) or the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Morrison), I will not continue to discuss the question of route, but will only repeat what I said, that the excellence of the route is no justification whatever for a private contract having been entered into with these parties.

The next ground on which the Minister of Railways justified the contract was that it was a good bargain. Well, Sir, what is a good bargain? A good bargain, it appears to me, in plain, simple language, is this, where you give something and get value in return; and, after the Minister of Railways declared it to be a good bargain, how did his knowledge present itself to this House? He was asked, in the first place, if he had an approximate idea of how much this railway would cost for construction, and he was absolutely unable to give even the merest approximate of an idea as to what it would cost. Then he was asked what the value of the lands was, and he gave an answer which appeared to me to be hardly worthy of the dignity of a Minister of Railways. He asked the ex-Minister of Finance whether he knew. Sir, we have scarcely ever seen such a thing as that done by a Minister of the Crown when asked a question on a grave and important subject. I quite understand that the lands were worth nothing—the ex-Minister of Finance knew that full well—that the value was not in the lands, but in the minerals. Well, I know that the question of my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) and the question of my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) was not as to the value of the mere soil, frozen or unfrozen, but as to whether the Government had any reliable information, or any information at all, as to the value of the mineral lands and the timber lands of which they were giving many millions of acres to the contractors for the construction of this road. In other words, he gave no answer at all. He had no conception of the cost of the railway and no conception of what we are giving, and yet he had the hardihood to tell the House that we should accept the proposition because it was a good bargain. Sir, there never was such a proposition made to the Parliament of Canada, and never such feeble reasoning advanced why such an important matter could receive the sanction of this House and country.

The next question is raised by my hon. friend the member for New Westminster (Mr. Morrison). He says that the contractors build the railway and take their chance. Sir, they build the railway, but they take no chance at all.

An hon. MEMBER. They take the gold.

Mr. MONTAGUE. They take the gold, as my hon. friend says. They have the power to select these lands all over that great region of country; and if I know Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, they are clever, clear-headed business men, who are not going to select the lands to which my hon. friend from New Westminster referred as perhaps not having a cent's worth of gold in a ton of earth. They will be bound to select the richest land they can find, and nobody in this House or country will blame them for doing it. They take no chances, because they have the power to select 3,750,000 acres of mineral land and timber lands in that country, as their reward for the construction of this road; and if I am not incorrectly informed, there is before the Parliament of British Columbia at the present time a Bill giving them an actual cash subsidy as well. Well, here is the point: The Government are asking this House, so far as the statement of the Minister of Railways is concerned, to jump into this enormous contract without giving us any information as to value of what we are giving or what we are getting.

The next point to which the hon. gentleman referred was, that it was a Canadian route. Well, that was pretty well discussed this afternoon, and I think that the House is at present in a condition of doubt as to whether this is an all-Canadian route or not. It is true, we had an explanation this afternoon, and we are promised, according to the statement of my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Morrison), an explanation of the explanation to-morrow afternoon. It is a pity that the Government in presenting this matter to the House did not put a gentleman to introduce it who understood it and could have given us an explanation that we might have discussed here and now. It is a pity that we have to await for a re-explanation on a most important point, and it is not complimentary to the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), if the Government of which he is a member consulted the Department of Justice on a matter concerning which great international difficulty may arise, and gave him no information concerning it before he stood up to introduce his Bill. When the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) was asked this afternoon whether the Department of Justice had been requested to give an opinion as to the international difficulties likely to arise in connection with customs at the very beginning of the project, he was compelled to answer that he did not know whether any such opinion had been asked of the Department of Justice, or whether any opinion had been expressed by the authorities of the United States as to our rights or want of rights in this connection. That is a point on which this House will need enlightenment.

But there is another respect in which, I think, the Government have absolutely failed, and that is the point referred to by the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) and by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) this afternoon. Sir, when the Government were endeavouring to make a Canadian policy for the Klondike, it would have been very easy indeed to have a much more pronounced Canadian policy than they did, even if they have selected an all-Canadian route. A few months ago, when there was a rush to the quartz-bearing and galena-bearing districts of British Columbia, very great excitement arose, and there was very great pressure of public opinion that we should reserve these mineral locations for Canadians alone and refuse them to the people of the United States. To my mind, that was a debatable point, because in the refractory ores of the Rossland district and the somewhat expensive working mines of the Slocan district, it was important that we should have more capital than Canada had at that time at her command, for the purpose of development, and it was a question of serious consideration as to whether these claims should be reserved for the pure and simple occupation of Canadian and British subjects, or thrown open to the world. But, as has already been pointed out, no such thought comes in when you come to discuss the placer beds of the Klondike region. Instead of capital being required for development, instead of thousands of dollars having to be spent in running expensive tunnels and sinking expensive shafts, all that is required is the man with his shovel and energy and pluck to dig out gold for himself; and I have no hesitation in saying that the proper policy for this Parliament to pursue is to declare that these lands shall only be staked out by people who are subjects under the British flag, and not by foreigners. And I take that position in no mean or carping spirit, but because this Parliament should mete out to the people of the United States and every other foreign country the treatment that is meted out to us. I have here the United States Mineral Statutes. The first clause is one simply reserving the mineral lands of the United States as the property of the people of the United States, but the very next clause requires that a man who locates a claim there, whether lead or silver, or gold, or anything else, must be a citizen of the United States or declare his intention of becoming a citizen, before he can put a stake into the ground and claim a foot of territory. I have had experience in connection with that very matter myself. When I came to stake a claim to mineral lands in the United States, I was immediately put to the test of citizenship in that country before I could legally hold one single foot of ground.

An hon. MEMBER. Read the statute.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will not only read the clause, but I will say this, that in this House, this afternoon, there is a prominent member who purchased land in the State of Washington which had been properly located by a citizen of the United States. He purchased the lands and paid his money, and they proved to be valuable. But shortly afterwards the legislature of the State of Washington passed an Act which did him out of his ownership of those lands, and he lost the money which he paid to the locator, and has no rights whatever under the laws of the State of Washington. Here is the clause, Sir :

All valuable mineral deposits in the lands belonging to the United States, both surveyed and unsurveyed, are hereby declared to be free and open to exploration, and the lands in which they are found to occupation and purchase by citizens of the United States and those who have declared their intention to become such, under regulation prescribed by law and according to the local customs or rules of miners in the several mining camps so far as the same are applicable and not inconsistent with the laws of the United States.

And further still, Sir, if the location is owned by a corporation or syndicate, every member of that syndicate must be a citizen of the United States before he can own a share of these mineral locations. And what do we see to-day? Let me read a statement made in the daily press of to-day which bears directly upon this question. This is a despatch from Montreal :

The Canadian Pacific Railway people are feeling very sore to-day over a recent act of the United States Government. Some time ago the Washington authorities asked the different railways, the Canadian Pacific Railway amongst others, to tender for the carrying of 500 reindeer and 75 attendants from New York to Seattle. The tender of the Canadian road was $247.60 per car, but the American Government awarded the contract to the Pennsylvania Road, whose tender was $286.72, or a total loss to the War Department, on 35 cars, of $1,369.20.

In other words, to take some supplies to the very country we are discussing, the Government of the United States are willing to lose about $1,400 rather than to give an hour's labour to Canadian workmen. That being the case, I say it is the duty of this Parliament to proceed immediately not only to the consideration of railway facilities to the Klondike, but to say that so far as the rich mines of the

Mr. MONTAGUE.

Klondike are concerned, we will reserve them for Canadians and to give labour to Canada's people.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON. I regret that I had not the opportunity of speaking a few words on the Address before the introduction of this Yukon Railway Bill, for owing to an important engagement, I shall be unable to be present when the debate on the Address is concluded. Another reason for my wishing to be present is that I have learned to admire the Speech from the Throne even on short acquaintance. I was glad to see in the Speech that the bountiful harvest was mentioned as one of the causes of our national prosperity. I suppose that the country has an idea that good times and bad times are manufactured right here on this sacred spot on Parliament Hill.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I do not desire to deprive the House of the pleasure of hearing my hon. friend on the Address, as he has not been able to speak before. But he is perhaps not aware that the debate on the Address has not been adjourned, but will be resumed as soon as this debate is over.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON. I have just stated that, owing to an important engagement, I shall not be able to be present, a matter which I regret. I was not going to speak on the Address. I was about to say that such a favourable mention of the good crops in the Address ought to set the country right in the matter, and so tone it up for the shock it will receive when it reads the particulars of this Yukon Railway deal. I have read everything I could see and have listened to everything I could hear in connection with this Yukon Railway. I did hope that the debate on the Address and this debate would bring out some new facts which would improve the character of the bargain and make it more palatable to the Canadian people. But I have heard nothing to change the opinion I formed when the terms were submitted to the country and were first published in the organs of hon. gentlemen opposite. I want to speak in a spirit of deep humility, for I am at a new game when I attempt to discuss engineering questions. This Bill represents a bargain which the Minister of the Interior has made for the building of 130 or 150 miles of tramway through a country that presented no natural obstacles and where supplies can be delivered by vessels at the starting point. I thought the bargain was a bad bargain when I read its terms when first given. I think the bargain is a bad bargain now that I have heard all that has been said in its defence. I am not opposed to the building of this tramway, and I am not one of those who take any stock in the cry that the Minister of the Interior went to Washington to betray the Yukon country to the Yankees. The fact that geographical conditions enabled our American friends to dictate the terms on which Victoria, Vancouver and other Canadian cities should trade with Dawson City, that single fact alone was a reason why this country should assume any reasonable expenditure, yes, a liberal expenditure, in order to overcome those geographical conditions and establish the right of Canadians to trade in their own country. The Government could have counted on the support of public opinion in any reasonable expenditure, and a very reasonable expenditure would have done all that Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann are going to do for Canada.

The subsidy of 25,000 acres per mile gives these favoured gentlemen nearly 4,000,000 acres of gold fields in the Yukon. It may be argued that, excluding the gold claims already taken up there are not 4,000,000 acres of gold claims in the Yukon. Well, if the supply of gold claims run short, Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, with their right of first choice, will be able to take up everything in sight. Then the road they are building will be an easy approach to the Yukon country, which will be largely the private property of the interests that Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann represent. This will be the net result of the arrangement, as I understand it. In order to get a tramway which can be built for the cost of a dozen or two of the public buildings which the late Government used to plant in county towns of doubtful constituencies, Canada gives these contractors the right to 4,000,000 acres of gold lands in the Yukon wherever they can be found. I have tried to see the merits of this Bill, but for the life of me I cannot see where it can be justified.

The immediate construction of this tram-road is a boon to Canada, but its resources could have secured this boon without giving away a good third of the gold claims that will ever be discovered in the Yukon. I submit that the Minister of the Interior made a bad bargain for the country, because he has given away scores of dollars of its wealth for every cent that will be invested in the building of this tram-road. I say he has made a bad bargain for his party, because he could have dealt openly and fairly in the matter. The road from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake was the key to the whole transportation question. When the hon. gentleman came back from the Chilkoot Pass he could have let it be known that the country would pay no cash subsidy, but would give the franchise to the men who would do the work within the stated time for the smallest area of mineral lands.

I am satisfied that within thirty days, if he had started on time, the Minister of the Interior could have had a better offer than this bargain, and I do not think he possibly could have got a worse one. I am not questioning the efficiency of these contractors, I suppose they are capable men. But Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann were not kings in the contracting world until they built the Dauphin Railway for the Manitoba government. Up to that time there were several greater contractors in Canada. But the Minister of the Interior found these men out, and his friends put them forward as the only two men in Canada who could take up this small job of building a tramway within the time fixed by the Government. The country may think that there are other pebbles on the beach, but no, it is all a mistake. Canada has only two contractors, Mr. Daniel Mann, of Montreal, and Mr. William Mackenzie, of Toronto. If my memory serves me aright, these two gentlemen wanted to build the Crow's Nest Pass Railway for the Canadian Pacific Railway. Sir William Van Horne thought he could get on without them, but he will change his opinion now that they are going to build the Teslin Lake Tramway on terms that will give the Canadian Pacific Railway—well, pretty much everything that they have not got already. This agreement, Mr. Speaker, represents a crime which the Liberal Government are about to commit in the name of economy. The Conservative Government had a habit of committing its crimes in the name of patriotism. I was a Conservative but I thought that the late Government were too subservient to the Canadian Pacific Railway. I apologize to any member of the late Government who will accept the offer of my vain regrets. The Conservatives in power gave largely to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, but they at least allowed the company to open up its resources which were the country's gift. The Liberals in power have allowed the Canadian Pacific Railway and its friends to reap where they have not sown. Sir William Van Horne sat down without other people's enterprise and opened up the Kootenay country, and then this Liberal Government comes along and gives three million dollars of the country's cash to build a railway for the Canadian Pacific Railway. Last session the cry was "save the country's commerce," and three million dollars went to the Canadian Pacific Railway for the Crow's Nest Pass road, and the coal lands which should have paid for this road, went to Cox and Jaffray and their associates in British Columbia. This session the cry is "save the country's money." The treasury must be guarded against a cash subsidy for the building of a tram road which would only cost a few hundred thousand dollars all told; the treasury is guarded by a bargain which gives to friends of the Canadian Pacific Railway, gold fields up to four million acres, on which they can issue millions and millions of dollars worth of stock in England. Of course, it will develop the country, and if the country is being benefited, we know that will aid these gentlemen. The Kootenay country was developed without any help from the gentlemen who grabbed the coal fields, and the Yukon country is not very far from being developed without the help of the gentlemen who are enfranchised to build a tramway which will pay from the start, and will take up all the gold fields in sight. If the Liberal party in Canada is proud of the dealings of this Government with the Canadian Pacific Railway, then all I can say is that the Liberals in Ontario at least must judge their friends by one law and their enemies by another law. If the Conservative Government had come down to Parliament with any such arrangement as this, why, the organs of the Liberal party would have shrieked about awarding public franchises by public competition. The Liberal party, when they were in Opposition, did not have any confidence in a Conservative Government. A Liberal party in Opposition that criticised everything that was open to criticism, must have troubled Mr. Van Horne and the Canadian Pacific Railway; the arrangement which prevailed last session must have been far more satisfactory to Sir William, and as long as he was satisfied, there was not a single word from the gentlemen who direct the policy of the Liberal-Conservative Opposition in this House. The hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition has suddenly become an authority of great repute in the Liberal party. The Liberals rejoiced when their organs told them that he had certified to the good character of the Crow's Nest Pass road, and they rejoiced much more when their organs told them that he had said this Yukon Railway bargain was without spot and blameless. I know that the candid friend is not popular, but for the sake of my duty I will endanger my popularity by telling the Conservatives in this House that they will never get back the confidence of the country by supporting every deal that the Canadian Pacific Railway wants, and by opposing every deal that the Canadian Pacific Railway does not want. If the Conservative party has made up its mind not to lose the favour of the Canadian Pacific Railway, it may as well give up any idea of gaining the favour of the country. I do not believe that the Conservative party has anything to expect from the Canadian Pacific Railway. Why should the Canadian Pacific Railway support the Conservative party in Opposition? The Canadian Pacific Railway opposed the Liberal party in Opposition. In election after election its influence was used to crush every Liberal candidate who could be crushed by such means. The Canadian Pacific Railway has not lost anything by its hostility to the Liberals when in Opposition. I must say for the Liberal Government that it may have its vices and its faults, but this Crow's Nest Pass deal and this Yukon Railway bargain show that it has at least the Christian virtue of returning good for evil, and blessing in office the men who cursed them in Opposition. There is nothing to be gained by the Conservative party in running after Sir William Van Horne's band wagon. Before Sir William Van Horne will withdraw the influence of his powerful corporation from the Liberal Government, he will want to see what he can get from the other side. The best thing the Conservative party can offer Sir William Van Horne at present is a slow note, and before he withdraws the political influence of his great corporation from the present Government he will want to see gilt-edged securities. I would be the last man in the House to raise the cry against the Canadian Pacific Railway or against the capital required to develop the country. Whenever the Canadian Pacific Railway or capital takes long chances, I think they should have the chance of winning large profits; but when the Canadian Pacific Railway and its friends, as in the Crow's Nest Pass road and this Yukon Railway deal, are to benefit from other people's enterprise in opening up these regions, then this Government treats these men as if they were the pioneers who created the resources to which they are attached for their own profit. I say the Liberal party in office in this respect has been false to the pledges of the Liberal party in Opposition. This Government owed everything to the country and nothing to the Canadian Pacific Railway; and it occurs to me they act as if they owed everything to the Canadian Pacific Railway and nothing to the country. I have detained the House longer than I intended on this matter, but I feel very strongly in connection with this Yukon Railway. I feel that the country is being betrayed by the men who should be its defenders. I do not presume to offer advice to any gentleman. The Yukon Railway bargain will prove to be a disgrace to its authors, and if the Opposition in this House chooses to make itself an accomplice in the transaction then honourable gentlemen who are responsible for the policy of this opposition can answer to their constituents. I am responsible to my constituents. I am speaking for the people who sent me here, and on their behalf and in their defence, I will vote against the ratification of this bargain every chance I get.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). With the consent of my hon. friends, I will move at this stage:

That the Order for the second reading of Bill No. 6, intituled: "An Act to confirm an agreement between Her Majesty the Queen and Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, and to incorporate the Canadian Yukon Railway Company," be made the first Order of the Day on Tuesday next, and on subsequent days after Questions to be put by Members, until the said Order is disposed of.

Motion agreed to.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL AND MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to take this opportunity of drawing the attention of the House for a few moments to a matter which I regard as of very great importance. It will be remembered that at the last sitting the question was brought before the House of the responsibility of the Government for a speech made by His Excellency the Governor General at Toronto on a recent occasion, and the right hon. the Prime Minister, as will be seen by reference to "Hansard," when he was asked whether he assumed the responsibility for that speech, said :

The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) knows very well that when Lord Aberdeen spoke on the occasion to which the hon. gentleman has referred, he did not speak as the Governor General of Canada, but he spoke simply as Lord Aberdeen.

Now, Sir, I take the position that the attitude assumed by the right hon. the First Minister is entirely at variance with the system of parliamentary government which prevails in this country, that it is opposed to all the authorities, that it is opposed to every precedent and that in fact it discloses a condition of things which would simply be found intolerable. The idea that a gentleman occupying the exalted position of Governor General of Canada is to be permitted to address a public audience on questions of political controversy in this country, and that the Government of the day shall refuse to accept the responsibility for those utterances, is, I undertake to say, entirely in antagonism with the principles of government that are recognized not only in Great Britain but in Canada. The right hon. gentleman will see, if he will turn to "Todd's Government in the Colonies," page 52, the statement that in no case is the Governor responsible to a local Parliament for his conduct in office. That is a thoroughly well understood principle. The Governor General is responsible to the Imperial authorities alone ; he is not responsible to this Parliament in any shape or form. But fortunately we are able to meet that difficulty by having the constitutional practice of holding the Government of the day responsible for every utterance on a public question of that character in reference to the local affairs of this country—holding the Government of the day responsible for every utterance of that exalted personage. In "Todd's Parliamentary Government in England" will be found the following passage :—

The only deviation on the part of William IV. from the strict rule of abstinence from all political conversation with persons not of the number of his "immediate constitutional advisers," was when, at the request or with the knowledge of his Ministers, he would invite an interview with some peer or lord of Parliament, for the purpose of endeavouring to allay the violence of party strife, or of promoting the success in Parliament of Ministerial measures which he deemed of vital consequence, and which were in jeopardy through the extent of opposition they were encountering.

Then on page 254 there is the following statement :—

During the Grey Administration, in November, 1831, a circumstance occurred which induced the Premier to address a word of caution to the King, lest the strict line of abstaining from the expression of political opinion towards persons not in his constitutional service might be overstepped without the knowledge or consent of Ministers.

I think nothing could be stronger and more emphatic than the statement to which I have referred.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER. I suppose the hon. gentleman intends to follow his remarks with a motion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I intend to follow my statement by a motion, but it will require some little time in order to deal fully with this question, which is of the greatest possible importance if we are to have any reference in this country to constitutional practice and precedents. At page 52 of "Todd's Parliamentary Government in British Colonies," will be found the following :—

Under certain circumstances—as where the points in dispute involved a question of Imperial policy—the Governor would be entitled to invoke the interposition of Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies before surrendering the contest. It is, in fact, his duty invariably to communicate to the Secretary of State any difference of opinion between himself and his Ministers which involves the question of his responsibility to the Crown in connection with the responsibility of his Ministers to the local Parliament. If the Crown should decide against the Governor, he must yield the point in dispute or resign. If the Crown oppose him, the contest is immediately transferred from the agent to the principal, from the Governor to the Imperial authority, from whence his powers are derived. In no case is a Governor to be held personally responsible to a local Parliament for his policy or conduct in office.

One of the great advantages of British institutions, and I hold it to be a very great one indeed, is the fact that under the British constitutional system the representative of the Sovereign holds a high and exalted position, above and distinct altogether from the conflict of party ; and the result of that is of the most vital importance to the country, because it enables all parties and all classes of the people to join in supporting the authority of the Crown and in exhibiting that respect and confidence to Her Majesty or Her Majesty's representatives which it is quite impossible to prevail under any other system. If the view presented to this House by the First Minister, that the Governor General is permitted to enter into the political conflict in this country, that he is enabled to make addresses on questions of public controversy, on a question that at this moment presents a broad line of demarcation between the two great parties; if it is to be supposed that so exalted a personage as the representative of Her Majesty can come down into the arena of public discussion and take one side or the other without any person being held responsible for that action, it will be at once seen that it is utterly at variance with the principle that places Her Majesty or the person who represents Her Majesty in a colony on a plane on which no such conflict can arise between them and any party in the State. By reference to "Todd's Parliamentary Government in British Colonies," vol. 2, page 805, the following statement will be found:—

Remember that the first care of a Governor in a free colony is to shun the reproach of being a party man. Give all parties and all the Ministries formed the fairest play.

That is a letter from Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton, who in 1859 was Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies. That puts on record exactly the view that prevailed in Great Britain, and which prevails wherever constitutional practice is known and recognized. Then, on page 815 will be found:

The position of a constitutional governor towards those over whom he is set as the representative of the sovereign, and especially in relation to his ministers, is one of strict neutrality. He must manifest no bias towards any political party, but on the contrary be ready to make himself a mediator and a moderator between the influential of all parties, and he must be uniformly actuated solely by a desire to promote the general welfare of the province or dependency of the Empire committed to his charge.

It is not necessary that I should quote any stronger authority than that. I may say, that in "May's Parliamentary Practice" (page 312) will be found the following:—

Her Majesty cannot be supposed to have a private opinion apart from that of her responsible advisers.

This places the matter in the strongest possible juxtaposition to the attitude assumed here by the right hon. the First Minister, who told us that if Lord Aberdeen made a speech, not as Governor General, but as Lord Aberdeen, he was entitled to his opinion, and it was a matter which, in fact, did not concern the Government; and consequently they did not hold themselves in the slightest degree responsible for any statement that might be made by His Excellency the Governor General in regard to any political question whatever.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

I may say that we have had the question under discussion before, and it was then disposed of in a manner that every one in this House will regard as entirely conclusive, and which must necessarily settle all controversies in relation to it. On that occasion there was placed on the records of this House the opinion, not only of the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, but the opinion of the then leader of the Government, the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie. The question then arose in connection with a speech made in British Columbia by the Earl of Dufferin, Governor General. It was in regard to the appointment of Senators, and His Excellency took the ground of vindicating the good faith of his Administration, which he regarded as important should not be challenged, and which he also regarded as not taking any part in what might be called a partisan controversy of any kind. Mr. Mackenzie said ("Hansard," 1877, page 373):

I accept the responsibility and am quite willing to account to the country or to the House, which the hon. gentleman says I must do.

Sir John A. Macdonald said ("Hansard," page 373):

I concur with the hon. gentleman that he cannot be responsible for the speech of another individual when he does not know of it. He is, however, responsible for every utterance of the Governor General, except when that illustrious individual expressly states that what he states he says as an Imperial officer by Imperial command.

That is the only, that is the sole, that is the single occasion on which a person holding the exalted position of Governor General of Canada could make any statement without the inevitable result of his Ministers being held responsible for it. Otherwise, as you are well aware, Mr. Speaker, it would be impossible for the rule of this House to be maintained which prevents any disrespect to the Governor General. That is avoided by the established rule and principle that the Government of the day must do one of two things: they must accept the responsibility of every utterance of the Governor General—save and except the instance to which I have just referred—or they must resign, and the Governor General must find some persons to take their place who will accept that responsibility, or he then is placed in the position of being amenable to the Imperial Government. I invite the attention of the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to this language of Sir John A. Macdonald:

It is important that that principle should be laid down if we are to be a free country. If responsible government is to be maintained, this principle should be strictly upheld, and I am surprised to hear an hon. gentleman occupying the position of Premier of this Dominion, who boasts that not only is the country under responsible government, but that its constitution is moulded after the same plan and on the same line as the British Constitution, should aver that he is not responsible for the language of the illustrious individual who so worthily represents the Crown in this country.

* * * * *

This is the first occasion since 1841 that I have heard this doctrine denied and repudiated by the leader of what was the great Reform party. The representative of the Crown can have no more rights in Canada than the Crown itself, and the Crown could not make any utterances on public affairs for which some Minister would not be responsible. Some Ministers must be responsible for every announcement, every statement, every opinion expressed by the Sovereign, and, if that principle is once abandoned, then we shall return to the old system so much decried, and for which the old official party, both in Upper and Lower Canada, were attacked and properly attacked.

Again Sir John Macdonald, speaking in the same debate :

So much are Her Majesty's Ministers in England responsible for the utterances of the Sovereign, that a member of her Cabinet is always with her, whether she goes to Balmoral, France or the Isle of Wight, so that no question affecting the public weal, or the exercise of her power or prerogative as a sovereign, could be answered by her except on the responsibility of one of her advisers.

* * * * *

We have the right to believe that every utterance on public matters by the Governor General is held to be an utterance for which the Ministers are responsible, and we have no right to say or believe that any such utterance is made by him except upon the advice of his Ministers.

* * * * *

If it should happen that the representative of the Sovereign should do here what the Sovereign would never do in England, namely, make a declaration for which his Ministers were not responsible, then they had a plain duty to perform, to state that they would not be responsible for the statement, that they did not sanction it, and that it was made without their advice, and they must take the constitutional privilege of relieving themselves of the responsibility.

The remarks of the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie in reply will be found at page 375, "Hansard," 1877. He said :

I admit the responsibility of the Ministers for every utterance made by the Governor General respecting public affairs, or which has any bearing on public affairs, but I do not believe that either Her Majesty in England or her representative here is bound in every word or sentiment uttered to consult the Ministers, or to have the Ministers at hand always to consult.

* * * * *

The statement I made was that I was responsible—

That is evidently a clerical error, and the word "not" is clearly omitted. It should read :

The statement I made was that I was not responsible for any inaccuracies in the Governor General's speech, that I was not responsible for any utterance in it of the nature referred to by the hon. member for Cumberland.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You said : "I cannot be responsible for the utterances of another individual."

That was precisely the position taken by the right hon. gentleman last night on a similar occasion. Mr. Mackenzie added :

I say that yet—responsible for the utterances of another individual on matters not affecting state affairs. * * * To prevent any possible misconception, I repeat that I believe now, and have always believed, that the Ministers must necessarily be responsible for every utterance coming from the Governor General affecting public affairs. I mentioned that I was not responsible for the inaccuracies referred to.

This refers to certain verbal inaccuracies that had occurred in the Governor General's speech.

Now, Sir, we have here not only the parliamentary authorities on this question, but we have the fact established that on the floor of this Parliament both the leaders of the two great parties in this country admitted in the plainest and most distinct terms their entire responsibility for every utterance of the Governor General on questions of public affairs. The only case in which the Ministers are not responsible is the case laid down by the authorities, in which the Governor General makes a statement on Imperial questions by the command of the Imperial authorities. That is the sole and single case in which the Ministry of the day are not held to strict account and responsibility for every utterance the Governor General makes ; and I say it will be quite impossible for any person reading the speech delivered by the Governor General on the occasion to which I have referred, to say that it was not on a question of public affairs. It was upon a question of the sharpest possible controversy at the present moment between the right hon. gentleman opposite and the Liberal-Conservative party in this House and in this country, that is, the question of preferential trade : and upon that question the Governor General delivered himself of a speech in which he went into an elaborate argument to show the utter impossibility of Canada hoping to obtain anything in the shape of preferential trade. His Excellency pointed out to the National Club, before which this speech was delivered, the fact that if the Imperial Government would allow the great interests of the sugar industry of the West India Islands to be destroyed without making any effort to save them, or without being able to come to their rescue, because it would interfere with the principles of free trade which govern in England, it was utterly impossible that Canada could expect that the principles of free trade would be trespassed upon in any way in Great Britain by the Imperial authorities for the purpose of giving to Canada the advantages that she would enjoy under a system of preferential trade. I say, it would be impossible to find any case in which a Governor General made a statement more completely and directly bearing upon a question of political controversy between the two parties in this country; and to say that a person occupying so exalted a position as the Governor General of Canada can take part in political controversies, taking one side or the other and make statements, without his Ministry at once accepting the entire responsibility of those statements, is in complete antagonism with every authority that is to be found bearing on this question, and with the universally recognized practice in Great Britain and the practice as clearly and undoubtedly established in this country by the concurrent sentiments of two gentlemen occupying the distinguished position of Prime Minister, one of the Conservative, and the other of the Liberal party. The consequences must at once be seen. It requires no argument from me to show this House the utter impossibility of the hon. gentleman shrinking for a single moment from assuming the entire responsibility of the utterances of the Governor General on an occasion of that kind, without involving, as you, Sir, and every person in this House must see, the unpleasant consequences of having the conduct and the speeches of the Governor General of Canada made a subject of political discussion and animadversion in this House and out of it. The rules of this House prevent any such thing, and the very fact that they do shows what a monstrous thing it would be, apart from the invasion of the principles of responsible and parliamentary government, for any party in this country to be subjected to animadversions and criticisms upon a question of partisan politics in the country without an opportunity of dealing with them on the floor of this House. In a free country, having parliamentary government, the responsibility for the Governor General's utterances on every question of this kind is wisely devolved upon the Government of the day, and all difficulty of uttering a disrespectful word of His Excellency is avoided; because, when the responsibility of his utterances is assumed by the Government of the day, you then have a free opportunity of discussing the question without entrenching in the slightest degree on the rules of Parliament. I hope that the hon. gentleman made that statement unadvisedly. I hope he is not prepared to maintain it, because, if he is, I can only say that he takes a position which no English statesman would venture to take, a position which has been repudiated, as a possible position for a Minister of the Crown to occupy, by the leaders of both the great parties in this House on a former occasion. There is no statement which the Governor General of Canada can make—I affirm it without fear of contradiction here or elsewhere—on a matter of public affairs in this country, as to which the hon. gentleman will not be obliged to do one of two things: he must either assume the entire responsibility for it, under the system of parliamentary government that exists in all its fulness here, as it does in England, or he must resign his position as a Minister of the Crown, and allow His Excellency to seek for advisers elsewhere. I beg to move the adjournment of the House.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I have no fault to find with the constitutional doctrine which my hon. friend has just stated to the House. I would simply remark to him that upon this occasion he is trying to raise a tempest in a tea-pot. As to the doctrine which he has laid down, there is no one in this House, or out of it, who could take a single word of exception to it. Whenever and wherever His Excellency the Governor General offers any opinion on public questions affecting the people of Canada, which may be in controversy between the two parties in this House, of course it goes without saying that his advisers are responsible and must take the consequences. But my hon. friend knows that His Excellency, in the discharge of his duties, is called upon, on many occasions, to express views publicly upon other subjects than the political questions which affect the people of Canada. His Excellency may be called upon to attend an agricultural dinner, and my hon. friend will not contend that his advisers should be held responsible for the opinions which he may see fit to express on agriculture. Or His Excellency may be called upon to preside at a dinner of artists, and if he there exposes his views on art or letters or things germane to them, I do not suppose that the ministerial responsibility will be held to extend to such expressions of opinion. Or, as has been the case within my own experience, His Excellency may be called upon to attend a dinner of commercial travellers, and my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) and myself have had the pleasure of being at the same board with His Excellency at the commercial travellers' banquet; and if His Excellency speaks on commercial matters, I suppose the ministerial responsibility would not govern his opinions on such matters. But on every occasion, whatever it may be, whether it be a commercial or an agricultural dinner or a dinner of artists, on which the Governor General expresses views and opinions upon the public questions of Canada, then of course his advisers are responsible and gladly responsible. Now, when I was asked yesterday the question which was put to me by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), I answered at once that His Excellency, on that occasion, had spoken as Lord Aberdeen. If on that occasion he spoke as the Governor General—and he would have spoken as the Governor General if he uttered any opinion affecting at all the political welfare or the public questions of Canada, or the question which is at present at issue, the preferential trade question—his advisers are quite ready at once to accept the responsibility for everything he said. But, in my opinion, on that occasion His Excellency said nothing whatever which related in any way to the question of preferential trade; and when the question was put to me yesterday, I spoke vaguely, I must say, at the time, from the recollection and the impression which I had gathered from a casual perusal of His Excellency's remarks. I have thought proper to refresh my memory since, and I find from a report which, I suppose, my hon. friend will not impeach, the report of the "Daily Mail and Empire," the following language of His Excellency on the question at issue:

We can all appreciate the attractiveness of any plan which would at once operate as a stimulus and development of our staple agricultural industries, but I think we may also reasonably express a hope that the attractiveness of such a plan, at least while it is necessarily one of theory rather than of practice, will not divert attention and energy from the work of paving the way for further extension along the ordinary and natural lines towards increase of Canadian trade, by such methods, for instance, as are indeed at present being pursued with so much encouraging success—for example, the successful attention given to the best ways of packing and shipping perishable products, and the use of the system of cold storage, and so forth. In speaking thus, it must not be supposed, as I have already hinted, that there is any want of appreciation of a sort of "royal road" to large and rapid development, but sometimes an apparent short cut, especially if there is an unexpected wire fence intervening, is not in the end the quickest. As to practical attainment, it is interesting to notice what has occurred with reference to the sugar industry. For some time past, and, I am afraid, at the present moment, certain parts of the Empire—Queensland, and, more particularly, some of the West Indian islands—have been and are suffering much because of the unremunerative price of sugar. What is the cause of this? It is well known. It is the result of the high bounties given by the French and German Governments to the sugar manufacturers in those countries, amounting to about 30 shillings ($7.50) per ton. The result is that the British sugar grower is confronted with this artificial disadvantage, which has caused a fall of nearly 40 per cent in the price of sugar in Great Britain. The old retail price was about 4d. (8 cents) per pound; it is now from 2d. (4 cents) to 2½d. (5 cents). It has very naturally been suggested that if the British Government would put a countervailing duty upon foreign sugar sufficient to counteract the effect of the foreign bounty, the grower in British colonies could compete with a prospect of reasonable profit. Of course, the result would be also to raise the price of sugar, but only to the extent of something like a halfpenny per pound. A commission has recently sat upon this subject, but the result is that though one distinguished member of the commission recommended countervailing duties, the commission as a whole do not report in favour of that remedy.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Is that the "Globe" report?

The PRIME MINISTER. No, it is the "Mail and Empire."

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The next paragraph is the one I have particularly marked, it appears in the "Globe," and seems to have been left out in the "Mail and Empire."

The PRIME MINISTER. I will come to that later on:

They felt that although sugar could not be regarded as so fundamental a necessity as other foods, they could not see their way clear to recommend this, because the majority of the people would not be in favour of it. My object in mentioning this is to lay stress on the methods proven to be the ordinary methods of excellence in securing the best markets. (Applause.)

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Would my hon. friend allow me to read into that from the "Globe" the paragraph I refer to.

The PRIME MINISTER. I will read it myself from the "Globe." But let me, before I go any further, say that I cannot find in this language of His Excellency any expression of opinion or doctrine but simply a statement of fact. But if my hon. friend is so very hypercritical that he will find in this language of His Excellency any expression of doctrine on public questions, I say here, on behalf of the advisers of His Excellency, that we endorse and hold ourselves responsible for it. Let me read from the version of the "Globe." We have all had the experience of having our speech reported. Those of us who have been some years in public life have had more or less experience of reporters, and we know that reporters—not through any fault of theirs, probably the fault is ours—do not always report our views as we feel convinced we have expressed them. Sometimes—I suppose most of the time—it is ourselves who are in the wrong, and sometimes it may be they, but it is no unusual thing to find a speech reported in two different papers, and each report show some considerable divergencies from the other.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I will save the right hon. gentleman the trouble of reading the "Globe" report. I compared his reading of the "Mail" report with it down to the words: "The commission as a whole do not report in favour of the remedy." Down to that point, the report in the "Mail" is word for word what it is in the "Globe," but if the hon. gentleman will take the "Globe" and read the following paragraph beginning: "This is so obviously significant," he will appreciate the position I take.

The PRIME MINISTER. Up to these last words: "In favour of that remedy" the reports are the same, but there is one sentence more in the "Globe":

This is obviously significant. It seems to mean, for one thing, that a proposal to increase the cost of sugar, even to the small extent of a halfpenny per pound, would not have much prospect of acceptance. The inference, then, would be that a similar increase, or even a smaller increase on foodstuffs of an even more fundamental character than sugar would not be more likely under present circumstances to be adopted.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The PRIME MINISTER. Which of these two reports is the accurate one—the report of the “Globe” or the “Mail”? Let us suppose—I do not want to get into a controversy about that—but let us suppose that it is the report of the “Globe.” There is one sentence more on the same line of the speech which evidently was guarded on the part of His Excellency which, so far as I can see did not intend to go into controversial politics but simply made a statement of facts. It seems to me that under such circumstances, to draw the inference that His Excellency actually went into the political arena is an inference not at all warranted by the facts of the case. His Excellency guarded himself very carefully it seems to me, from the imputation which is now cast upon him and did not give the slightest expression of opinion on either one side or the other. He simply laid down the difference in that way, made a comparison between food and sugar and went no further. But if my hon. friend wishes to be hypercritical and put in the most unfavourable construction upon these two different reports; if, instead of taking the one which seems most consistent with the traditions of the high office of Governor General, he wants to take the report more favourable to his view of the case in order to make a point against His Excellency, I have only this to add and to repeat—that the advisers of His Excellency stand by every word that has been stated by His Excellency as being in every particular true and correct. More than this I will not say. After fighting so long the battle for responsible government, the Liberal party will be found at all times ready to stand by the constitutional doctrine of the olden days. We do not want any personal government in this country. We have responsible government, and we will stand by it. Again, I repeat that the advisers of His Excellency stand by his words, but I disclaim on the part of His Excellency any desire to descend into the political arena, to enter into controversial discussion.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not propose to prolong the discussion, because, as I understand the right hon. gentleman, and as I think the House understands him, he has receded from the position that he, confessedly somewhat carelessly, assumed last night. But I wish to add to the extract from the “Globe” another extract from the “Globe,” which the right hon. gentleman did not read and that extract following immediately after that read by the right hon. gentleman is as follows:—

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

My object is to lay stress upon the methods which have been approved for securing the best markets for the best products.

And when this was cabled to England, very shortly afterwards, the summary given—a fair summary, as I consider of either the “Mail” or the “Globe” report, bore out the view I have taken. The London “Globe” (England), observed: “At a banquet given at Toronto to Lord Aberdeen, the Governor General considered it incumbent on him to discourage Canadian statesmen from conceding further fiscal advantages to the mother country. He assured his audience that Great Britain would never reciprocate and enforced that proposition by reminding them that the present Government had refused to save the West Indies from ruin by putting a corresponding duty on bounty-subsidized sugar imports.” The right hon. gentleman seemed to refer to inaccuracies in these reports. He is in a position to enlighten the House on some future occasion and give them the exact facts. But I am informed on the best authority that His Excellency’s manuscript went both to the “Globe” and to the “Mail and Empire.” I made that statement in good faith, but the question could be inquired into whether the press misrepresented the Governor General’s words.

UNITED STATES CUSTOMS REGULATIONS AT DYEA AND SKAGWAY.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). I do not wish to speak on the subject which has just been discussed, but I take the opportunity when the motion is before you, Mr. Speaker, to mention to the leader of the Opposition at the request of the Prime Minister, the information that has reached the Department of Customs with reference to the new regulations which have been issued by the United States government with reference to the transfer of goods at Dyea and at Skagway. On the second of this month new regulations were framed and they have reached the department, having been sent by the treasury at Washington. As the hon. gentleman remarked the regulation that was enforced with reference to the transport of goods over that strip of country over which the Americans claimed to exercise jurisdiction had been carried on hereto by a United States officer accompanying the party who was entering Canadian territory, and he was remunerated at the rate of $6 a day together with expense of maintenance.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. About $9 in all.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. About $9 in all. That was felt to be a hardship, and one could see that it was a hardship especially if there were only one or two in the party. The regulation now in force continues that, but adds two other propositions. The party may file a bond with sufficient security, then the goods may pass through this strip of territory over which the United States claim to exercise authority, and upon a certificate of the goods entering Canada that bond is cancelled. The other proposition is that the party, if he prefers, may deposit the amount of the customs duties with the collector at Skagway or Dyea. He will enter the goods and will take with him the manifest and a duplicate entry. This duplicate entry he will present to the United States officer, the United States having made provision to put an officer on the frontier, and this officer will examine the bill of entry, check off the goods by that bill, and if he finds that all the goods are intact he will give a certificate that such is the case, and the party, upon producing that certificate or sending it to the officer at Dyea or Skagway will get a refund of the money.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. May I ask the hon. gentleman is the party to send all the way back for the money?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I will refer to that. As I mentioned the first course remains in force in case parties may desire to adopt it. But a bond may be filed and sufficient securities, and not money deposited, and on the exportation of the goods the bond will be cancelled. But, as I suppose there is no responsible transportation company, I do not very well see myself how they would be able to give a bond with the securities at present. It is possible that the third proposition may be the one that parties may avail themselves of, that is, depositing the amount of duty, taking their entries with them, and having them cancelled after examination by the officer at the frontier. The proposition is of course that he gets the money back where he deposited it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. When he is coming out next year, he will get his money back.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. It is when the certificate gets back to the place where the money was deposited, certified by the sub-collector at the frontier that the goods were passed into the territory. When that certificate, duly endorsed by the party who deposited the money, reaches the officer with whom he made the deposit, then he gets it back.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the distance across?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. About 15 miles. That engaged the attention of the Customs Department, and the department submitted, with a view to encourage Canadian trade and facilitate transportation of Canadian goods, an Order in Council to His Excellency the Governor General in Council, when the certificate of the party entering that country has been duly certified and vouched for by the American officer, to authorize the Canadian officer there to cash that voucher or that order out of the customs money that our own officers will have, at par, or should any one happen to have purchased their vouchers, properly endorsed from the party who had them, to accept them in payment of customs duties. We think that will make it much pleasanter for men entering goods into that country. His Excellency was pleased to give his sanction to that order, and it will be the duty of the department, under the authority thus conferred, to make such regulations and send such instructions to our officers at the port as will enable this to be carried out, I trust, with perfect security to the revenue, and with great convenience. I think hon. gentlemen will agree with me, to parties entering that country.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Is the hon. gentleman able to say whether these instructions have reached the officers at Skagway and Dyea?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. They have just been decided on, it is only within the last day or two that they have received this regulation. It was adopted by the Treasury Committee on the 2nd of February. I may say with reference to another subject that will be of interest, perhaps, that the Customs Department have had inquiries from British as well as Canadian parties with reference to navigation in the Yukon. The question has been asked whether British vessels or Canadian vessels navigating the Yukon would be permitted to touch Canadian ports or land at places in order to purchase wood and supplies. In the new regulations that have been issued, that is provided for, and it is permitted under Customs supervision. Also in the navigation of the Yukon and Porcupine, regulations are made for the transfer of goods on to river boats at St. Michael's destined for Canadian points.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Is that under the Customs supervision, too?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes.

Mr. WALLACE. Do I understand the Minister of Customs to say that an American officer is placed on the Canadian boundary to cancel entries going through American territory?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes, the Canadian going in, say at Dyea or Skagway, presents his entry with the amount of duties, and he deposits that money, he carries the duplicate of the entry with him. The United States have placed one of their officers at the boundary.

Mr. WALLACE. I want to ask whether, during all these months, there has been no American officer at the boundary until now?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Hitherto an officer has accompanied our officer from Skagway or Dyea. When that certificate or voucher is given, it will be cashed by our own Canadian Customs officer, and instead of requiring the individual to go back to Dyea or Skagway and get his money, it will be cashed by him, and our officers will collect it after it has been duly endorsed by them.

Mr. SPEAKER. Before I put the motion, I would like to mention that the last part of the discussion upon it is of course an irregular discussion, because a motion to adjourn was moved for the specific purpose of bringing into question the responsibility of Ministers for the action of the Governor General. But the subject is so exceedingly important in every way that of course the irregularity was not noticed. But I do not want the House to consider this as a precedent, because on a motion for a specific purpose to adjourn the House, the subject cannot be changed.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

Order for resuming adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Bertram, for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in answer to his Speech at the opening of the session, being read,

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would ask my hon. friend whether at this hour it is worth while to proceed with the adjourned debate.

The PRIME MINISTER. There are 40 minutes to 12 o'clock, perhaps that will dispose of an ordinary speech.

Mr. FOSTER. We expect an extraordinary speech.

The PRIME MINISTER. If my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) thinks he cannot dispose of the subject in forty minutes, I would not force him to go on.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would suggest that the hon. member who moved the adjournment of the debate before, has still a right to move its further adjournment at present.

Mr. DAVIN moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

REPORT.

Public Accounts for the year ending 30th June, 1897.—(Mr. Fielding.)

The PRIME MINISTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and at 11.25 p.m. the House adjourned.

Mr. WALLACE.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 9th February, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ALIEN LABOUR BILL.

Mr. TAYLOR moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 8) to amend the Act to restrict the importation and employment of aliens.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Explain.

Mr. TAYLOR. The right hon. gentleman who leads the Government requests me to explain the Bill I have just introduced. I may say that I regret very much that he was not present last year when this question was under discussion. It will be within the recollection of many members of this House that I have for several years introduced a Bill bearing this title. At the session before the last, two years ago, the right hon. gentleman requested that the Bill which I then introduced should be allowed to stand until the following session, owing to the fact that no legislation, except the Estimates, would be put through that session. I acceded to his request on the understanding that I should introduce the Bill the next session, and that he would lend his valuable assistance to the passing of a Bill, word for word and line for line, similar to those that were enforced against Canada by the United States. I introduced a Bill similar in every respect to the one I had brought before the House for several years, and which was a copy of a portion of the United States law, but to my surprise, when I arrived here, the first day of last session, I found that the Government had put up one of their supporters to forestall me, and had introduced a Bill, line for line and word for word, the same as mine, as far as it went, but added two or three clauses similar to a proposition then before the United States Congress, which the United States Congress proposed passing that session. The Government referred both Bills—the one proposed by the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Cowan) and the one I had introduced—to a sub-committee composed of two members of the Government, two of their supporters, and three members of the Opposition. I was a member of that committee. The committee sat and reported to this House a Bill to which I did not give my consent. I objected to the amendments that were added as making the Bill, in my opinion, unworkable and useless; and I would ask the right hon. gentleman now how many actions have been taken to prevent Americans from being employed in Canada, under the Act passed last year. Has it been enforced? Now, let me read a letter written by the hon. Secretary of the Treasury at Washington in reply to a letter sent by the Canadian Carriage Company at Brockville :

Washington, D.C., Dec. 28, 1897.

Canadian Carriage Co.,
Brockville, Ont., Canada.

Sir,—I am in receipt of your communication of the 23rd inst., addressed to the Honourable the Secretary of the Treasury, in which you state your firm is considering the matter of establishing a branch in Morristown, a small place directly opposite Brockville, in the United States, and requesting to be advised whether it would be in violation of our laws for the department to accord you the privilege of sending at certain times your superintendent and foreman, and occasionally some skilled workmen across the river daily to perform services in this country.

In reply, I call your attention to the Acts approved February 26, 1885, February 23, 1887, and March 3, 1891, inclosed herewith, from which it appears that this department cannot grant the privilege desired, and that the action as contemplated by you, if carried out, would be in violation of law.

Respectfully yours,

T. V. POWDERLY,

Commissioner, General.

There was the request made to establish a branch industry in the United States and have the superintendent of the works on this side visit that branch occasionally to see how it was being carried on, and that request was refused. In reply to it, the American authorities sent a copy of all the American Acts in force against Canada and other countries. The Acts that the United States have in force against Canada I have embodied in this Bill. The Bill contains some fifteen clauses, and is designed to do what the Prime Minister promised should be done—to bring into force into Canada an Act, word for word, and line for line, similar to that of the United States, and an Act that will be workable. This Bill repeals the Act passed last session and substitutes in lieu thereof, word for word, the Act passed by the United States against Canada. That is what I have always fought for; that is what the workmen of this country expect at the hands of this Government in order that Canada and Canada's labour shall be kept for Canadians. During the year a number of representations have been made to me that there were flagrant violations of the existing law and that neither the Government or anybody else paid any attention to them, the Act being, apparently, unworkable. I was urged to introduce a Bill that would meet the case, and I have done so. I hope it will meet with the unanimous approval of members on both sides of the House.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

POLLING DAY A HOLIDAY.

Mr. PENNY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 9) to amend the law respecting holidays. He said: I have found that on election day a great many citizens have been deprived of their votes owing to being obliged to attend to their business, particularly working-people, who are not allowed time to be absent from their work. The object of the Bill I have introduced is to make election day for the Dominion of Canada a public holiday.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

Mr. Joseph Hector Leduc, Member for the Electoral District of Nicolet, introduced by the Premier (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and Mr. Bernier.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERVISORS.

Mr. McMULLEN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 10) to authorize the appointment of a board of civil service supervisors. He said: This is a Bill similar to the one I introduced last year. The object is to authorize the Government to appoint a board of civil service supervisors to investigate and regulate the civil service of the Dominion—both the inside and the outside service.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

Mr. BRITTON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 12) further to amend the Criminal Code of 1892. He said: The purpose of this Bill is to except from those sections of the Criminal Code which require corroborative evidence, sections 181, 189, 190. Those who take the trouble to look at the Criminal Code will see that section 181 has reference to girls over 14 and under 16; and sections 189 and 190 refer to another class of cases. I think there will be abundant reason shown why these should be excepted. Another point in this Bill is that it allows an appeal, after application to the Court of Appeal, and the Court of Appeal giving leave to any person accused who has asked the trial judge to reserve a case. The law at present provides that the accused cannot apply to the Court of Appeal for leave except with the consent of the Attorney General. When such a right is given in civil cases, it seems to me much more should it be given in criminal cases. The last point of the Bill is to repeal section 748, which allows the Minister of Justice to grant a new trial in criminal cases. I think that point is one well worthy the consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 7) to regulate freight rates on railways.—(Mr. Reid.)

Bill (No. 11) to amend the Criminal Code, 1892, respecting cruelty to animals.—(Mr. Penny.)

Bill (No. 14) respecting the attachment of salaries out of moneys in the hands of the Government of the Dominion of Canada.—(Mr. Richardson.)

MOUNTED POLICE PENSIONS.

Mr. DAVIN moved for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 13) to amend the North-west Mounted Police Act. He said:—Under the Mounted Police Pension Act, as it stands to-day, twenty-five years' service are necessary to entitle a man to claim a pension; I propose to amend that by reducing the time to twenty years. At present he may be compelled to retire and receive his pension after twenty-five years' service, and by this amendment I propose to make the time twenty years.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to direct the attention of the Government to a very important point in regard to the Bill which was submitted to the House yesterday. The House will recollect that I said I would defer any discussion on that question until it came up for its second reading, which is usually the time when discussions on important measures of that kind are taken. It has occurred to me, however, that it is my duty under the circumstances, and after a careful examination of the Bill, to draw the attention of the Government to the provision clothing the contractors with the necessary power to carry out the work, and to point out that an important omission has been made therein. The great object, as recognized by every person, I believe—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is not in order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will conclude with a motion.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman should observe that the Orders of the Day have been called, and I do not think it is in order to move the adjournment of the House, in order to discuss this question.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will not discuss it, then. However, the point I wish to draw attention to is so important that if I were to reserve it until the second reading of the Bill, my right hon. friend would have some reason to complain that his attention had not been called to it before. It is solely in that view, and in the hope that the difficulty may be met to some extent, that I draw the hon. gentleman's attention to it now. The object of all friends of that measure, certainly the avowed object, the object that is entertained everywhere in view of its importance, is based on the desirability of having an all-Canadian route, and it appears to me that under these circumstances the practice that has been adopted in the United Kingdom, the practice that has been adopted in the United States of America on more than one occasion, as no doubt the hon. gentleman will remember, should have been adopted here in order to preserve its character of an all-Canadian route, because it is absolutely necessary to provide against the transfer of that contract and of that charter to a foreign company, which would, in my judgment, entirely invalidate and destroy the effect of it. I need not call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that the enormous extent of those mining territories that the contract proposes to hand over to this company, greatly enhances the importance of such a provision being made, and I assume that there will be no difficulty on the part of the Government in inducing the contractors, although it appears not to be in the contract or in the charter, to consent to such a provision as would entirely preserve the Canadian route which the Government desires, from being transferred to a foreign country and thus defeating the object that it has in view, and from transferring a large portion of important Canadian territory in the same way. I draw the attention of the right hon. gentleman to it now in the hope that he may be able to effect such an arrangement before the further consideration of the measure, as at present there appears to me to be an absolutely fatal difficulty in the way.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am not sure that I share altogether the anxiety of my hon. friend with regard to this question. At all events, the consideration which he has given to it is worthy the attention of the Government, and certainly I am very grateful that he has directed our attention to the point. We will give it the best consideration that we can in the meantime.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

House resumed consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Bertram for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in answer to his Speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to express the opinion of one coming from the Northwest Territories in regard to the Speech from the Throne; I also rise to say something of the present political situation in this House and in the country, as suggested by the Speech from the Throne and illustrated by the debate. Sir, the debate this year is the most extraordinary debate which, I believe, has ever taken place on an Address in any Parliament. Sir, from this side of the House two powerful arraignments of the Government's position have been made; but from the Ministerial benches, although the two foremost men on that side of the House have spoken, the replies have taken the character of playful badinage, as though the right hon. gentleman who leads the House and the hon. gentleman who wears now Grand Cross of St. Michael and St. George, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, thought that the people of Canada took no stock whatever in the charges made by hon. gentlemen from this side of the House, or else thought that to those charges there was no answer possible, and that therefore the best way to cover them up was by trying to make a joke and then sitting down, in the vain hope—vain assuredly it is—that the people of Canada, or, at least, the Liberals of Canada, would be taken in by a policy so obvious as that. Now, Sir, it has been thus far a very peculiar debate, and I want to call attention to one of its peculiarities. We have had several comparisons. The Prime Minister compared the leader of the Opposition to a very famous character in classical poetry. Now, my right hon. friend will excuse me if I tell him that there is no such character in Homer or in Shakspeare as Thersites, but there is Thersites. My hon. friend throws back his head. My hon. friend is eloquent in two languages, and it is therefore excusable, when speaking in the tongue that was originally foreign to him, but in which he is now a master of expression, that he should occasionally mispronounce a word. But he knows as well as I do that in academic halls he was guilty of an unpardonable offence in making the i short in Thersites. However, it was a very extraordinary and inapt comparison, because Thersites is a low ill-shaped railer against the great men of Greece in the Trojan war.

The ex-Minister of Finance compared the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to Ajax. And in the play of Troilus and Cressida Thersites rails at Ajax and rails even at Achilles, but this is to be noted, that in nearly everything he said of Ajax, all who knew anything of Ajax, would agree with him. Hon. members have all been in the comparative line in this debate. My hon. friend who leads the Opposition compared the right hon. gentleman to Prince Maurice de Talleyrand, and I leave that where it is. The Prime Minister compared the Finance Minister to Alexander of Macedon. I wish I had a spiritualistic telephone and could transmit the compliment to the great leader of armies wherever he may be. Then the ex-Finance Minister compared—I am bound to say that when comparisons come from this side of the House and I do not agree with them, I am prepared to express my opinion—compared, not, I think, appropriately, the Prime Minister to Nebuchadnezzar. I do not recognize the appropriateness of the comparison of the leader of the Opposition to Thersites any more than that made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he compared the leader of the Opposition, not to an individual, but to the whole body of the Israelites of Egypt spoiling the Egyptians and then going out into the wilderness to search for gold. But they did not go to search for gold: they went into the wilderness to go to the promised land and were fed on manna in the meanwhile. If the hon. member for Cape Breton (Sir Charles Tupper) is now in the wilderness, he is as certain to go to the promised land as were the children of Israel, although to do it will not take forty years.

Let me say, as I am speaking of the form of these speeches, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce—I am sorry he is not in his place—for a man of his experience in Parliament, for a man of his social culture, was guilty of one of the most extraordinary parliamentary crimes that has been ever committed. What was that? I deprecate, unless under extreme necessity, bringing the name of His Excellency into debate in this House. But what did the Minister of Trade and Commerce do? He actually made a reference, which I have here—it would be unbelievable if I could not refer to it—in order, as he thought, to make a point. Because the leader of the Opposition brought before the House certain utterances of His Excellency—the Minister of Trade and Commerce actually suggested that my hon. friend should not have done what no doubt he thought was his duty. And why? Not because it was wrong, not because it was an unparliamentary proceeding, but because he was the recipient of a tribute from their Excellencies on an interesting occasion. This is what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said, at the close of his suggestion that it was the Tory party that burnt down the Parliament buildings:

If I am not altogether mistaken in recalling a certain interesting occasion, not so very long ago, in this city, among the many costly tributes which were tendered to the hon. gentleman, not the least costly, not the least elegant, was one presented by the exalted personage referred to. Therefore, I infer that the hon. gentleman is not so implacable as he seems.

What the hon. gentleman means to suggest is that the acceptance of a present or gift from a man occupying an august position, by a man occupying one of the highest positions in the colonial Empire of Britain would be something in the nature of a bribe, a bribe for silence or for expressed flattery. It is one of the most scandalous things that ever took place in Canada, and it is especially scandalous coming from a man of the years and authority and occupying the position of Minister of Trade and Commerce.

The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) used a phrase which I believe has been unjustly dealt with on this side of the House and even by his own colleague. I believe injustice has been done to him. The right hon. gentleman said that when the historian sat down to write of Canada he would take the years 1867 and 1897; and I must say the hon. member for York fell into what I deemed an error. He fell into this interpretation of the remark of the Premier, that what he meant was this, that the historian would be engrossed exceedingly by the wonderful events that occurred in the summer of 1896 and he would have nothing to say respecting all the events that passed during the previous thirty years, but he would write a history of the country from 1897 on; and the Minister of Trade and Commerce actually flouted the idea, scouted the idea, drew himself up and put on the most indignant countenance, and it is a countenance which from long practice can look fierce and indignant to an extreme degree, and he said, in effect: do you suppose the historian would bother himself with the events of the last thirty years? What I fancy the right hon. Prime Minister, and he will correct me if I am wrong, intended was that 1867 was the beginning of an epoch, and as that year was the beginning of an epoch, so 1897 was the beginning of an epoch too. That is a rational statement on the face of it, and is not open to the laughter that would greet a proposition that the historian would not note what had taken place for thirty eventful years. What was the note of 1867 and the note of those thirty years? National Expansion. Who were the men who gave the keynote at that time? They were Macdonald, Tupper, Cartier, Brown and D'Arcy McGee. Those powerful minds, some of whom remained with us until lately, and one leading name still adorns this House. I repeat, what was the note of those thirty years? It was national expansion, the national expansion of Canada. And in the hands of the Conservative party, what was done? Province after province was added to the confederation, the Canadian Pacific Railway was built, the canals were enlarged and deepened, the North-west was acquired, and at last, Canada was rounded into the proportion of a nation, so that when the Prime Minister went over to represent us in England at the Jubilee, he represented not a mere colony like New South Wales or Victoria, but he represented seven colonies and a vast territory of continental proportions, a galaxy of colonies, he represented a country that was bound to take pre-eminence and to take national bulk in the eyes of the Empire and the world. And what did it? It was the note of national expansion and the men whose inspiration that note was; some of these men are sleeping in their peaceful graves, but their names live forever, and one of them though sleeping in his long home in the Kingston graveyard lives by his deed and his thought, so that to-day we can say of him as the poet of Albrecht Durer, and which has been translated by Longfellow, who may thus be parodied:

Dead he is not, but departed;
For the truly great man never dies.

Well, Sir, in 1873 a change took place. The Government was not beaten but Sir John Macdonald resigned, and why? It was because he and his Government had made a contract with Sir Hugh Allan and the charge against Sir John was, that he sold the contract. It was supposed to have been an extravagant bargain, but at this day Liberals and Conservatives, and all thoughtful men know that so far from being an extravagant bargain, there is not an engineer of authority you can speak to who will not say: Neither Sir Hugh Allan nor any company could have built the road on the terms that were made with him; and as for selling the charter, that charge has been long since exploded. What happened then? Well, as may be seen in this country to-day, as was seen in 1896, and as has been seen all through our history, the Conservative party is much more sensitive in regard to the character of its public men than is the Liberal party.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, it is true, and there is a reason for it. That reason I need not refer to in a detailed analysis, but if you go into the past history of both parties you know very well that not merely did the genius of rule and the instinct of government belong to the Conservative party, but from one reason or another they had within them more of the light of culture than had the Liberal party.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. DAVIN. That is no reproach to the Liberal party; they could not help it probably, but anyway it is a fact. Now, Sir, the result of that charge made in 1873 was that it created a furore throughout all Canada, and Conservatives that never cast a Grit vote in their lives, voted Grit in 1874 when Mr. Mackenzie went to the country. And some of those electors who came back in September, 1873, to put the Conservative party in power, and many of their children and their relatives voted again against the Conservatives in 1896. They voted against the Conservatives last election not entirely because of the school question, for they were dissatisfied about other matters as well, but amongst us in the North-west Territories and in Manitoba, the language of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), language that he used from Halifax to Vancouver, the language that he used in the Windsor Hotel at Montreal, when the banquetting room was placarded with "Death to protection," and every possible motto that could indicate that protection was a curse to the country, the language of the right hon. gentleman at Sohmer Park, and at Winnipeg where he declared: "Protection was slavery as bad as African slavery in the South," and he would rescue us; all that had something to do with changing Conservative votes into Liberal votes. Then the right hon. gentleman came to Moosomin, and dwelt upon the dreadful iniquity of the tax on farming implements from which he would relieve us; at Regina the same silver voice declared that he would leave no tax on implements, and at Moose Jaw when he asked what the freight rates were, he said it was a dreadful thing, and he was going to sweep away the freight rates. Thence he went to British Columbia, and wherever he went he just said the thing that at that moment would please the people, and many of the people believed him.

Does the right hon. gentleman suppose for one moment that the people of the country did not take him seriously? They did take him seriously. They voted for him and they said: We will take your note of hand. But now that he has been in power twenty months, and in his third session, they say: We want you to redeem your notes, we have had enough of the sunny ways, do you suppose that your promises and your pledges are to be regarded as mere barren brambles in these sunny ways? In this year of 1897 our country has had national expansion; we are over five millions of people and the credit of Canada stands as high to-day almost as that of the mother country in the money markets of the world. The portals of time are thrown open. Are these gentlemen who are now clothed with power, who have the priestly garments of the time on, in whose hands fate has put the wand of office; are they able to pronounce the shibboleth which entitles them to enter these portals? The portals of time are thrown open to admit the new era, and do these hon. gentlemen know the word that will entitle them to enter? Sir, the note of these thirty years was national expansion, but the note of 1897, and for the immediate future which lies beyond, is Colonial equality in Imperial union. Can these gentlemen opposite pronounce the word? They feel the breeze and power of the time in their garments, and they look down the road that should be taken, but it is with a haggard and restless and unfamiliar eye, and they are afraid to tread the path that fate calls on this country to take.

I say that the note of this time is colonial equality in Imperial union, and when the right hon. gentleman went to England he should have sounded that note; we expected him to sound it. He did not represent the Liberals alone—and we know from the member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram) that there are Liberals who are preferential trade men—but he represented Conservatives as well; and from the language that we, and I in my humble way used in this House, when he was about to start, to the best of our power we gave him a God-speed and declared our confidence in him as a man fit to represent us in England. But the right hon. gentleman apparently did not know; some extraordinary spell was on him; the language that he used in Montreal, and in Toronto, and in St. Johns, was forgotten; there was some malison on him, so that one could apply to him the words of the great modern poet:

How could the light that lit you for a space
Fall, through sick weakness of a broken will,
To the dead cold damnation of disgrace?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the House for one moment to what is not in the Speech, and which we western members had a right to expect. I see the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) has left the Chamber. When he heard me mention the word Moosomin, I saw he took to his heels, because I manage to make even him hear me when I speak on North-west matters.

Mr. BENNETT. He has gone to read Dan Rose's book.

Mr. DAVIN. Dan Rose's book? Do you suppose that is what is in his mind now? No. He silently dreams of the golden crop that is to come to him from Klondike arrangements. Dan Rose's book, forsooth! it is but the narrow-necked clams that give appetite to the feast that is before him. Now, Sir, the hon. Minister of the Interior told us at Moosomin that he was opposed to the National Policy. He denounced the National Policy; he condemned it. Sir, the National Policy is there to-day. It was a pleasant thing to me as an old Torontonian to see the face of the member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram); but, Sir, it was of ill-omen to the farmers of this country to see the Address moved in this House by a leading manufacturer, and to hear that hon. gentleman assure us that the manufacturers need not be afraid—that though for a time they had no confidence in the Liberals, yet now they know the Liberals, and they know they can have confidence in them. What does that mean? It means that he knows that the Government are not going to carry out their pledges to the farmers. But of still worse omen was it when the Prime Minister brought a certificate of character—from whom? The Prime Minister has been held up to us in the west as the good Samaritan who was to heal our ills, the liberator who was to free us from slavery, and to break the chains of protection on our ankles, and the gyves on our wrists, put there by the trusts and combines of the manufacturers; and to whom does the Prime Minister fly for a certificate of character? To Mr. Gurney, who is not only a great manufacturer, but the head of the greatest trust on this continent, the stove trust. It is very like a man who had posed as a saint going to the master of the infernal regions for a certificate of his purity.

Well, Sir, we expected to see some evidence in the Speech that we should get tariff reform. We expected to see something about coal oil; we expected to see an announcement from the Minister of the Interior that we should have a Bill bearing on Dominion lands, which would get rid of the odd sections in the North-west Territories, which also the hon. gentleman promised at Moosomin. We expected to see something about a Hudson Bay Company. But not one of these things is to be found in the Speech. Now, is it a wrong thing to hold public men to their pledges? I am sorry the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) is not here, but I am going to quote him.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.
Where did he go?

Mr. DAVIN. Oh, I think he thought that I might deal with him. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is not here to hear it, but the country's ear is open, and tomorrow morning the country will hear what that hon. gentleman said. On page 133 of a pamphlet of speeches published in 1878. Mr. Cartwright, as he then was, said:

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Why go back so far as that?

Mr. DAVIN. Are they afraid of their utterances, Mr. Speaker? This is a statement of a general truth that I am going to quote, and I ask the attention of my hon. friend from Hamilton to it:

I say that it is our duty to stamp the mark of public reprobation, as I now do, on men who have proved out of their own mouths thus false to the high trusts you committed to their hands.

Well, Mr. Speaker, is it necessary for me to quote the promises made by the Prime Minister to reduce the tariff; to take the duty off coal; to take the duty off coal oil or to greatly reduce it; to relieve the agriculturists as regards implements? It is not necessary; they are well known; and to refer to them and point to this speech is to make the greatest possible condemnation of the Prime Minister and his colleagues. But, Sir, I am not going to content myself with that. I will not go so far back as 1878. Here is the Liberal campaign sheet of 1882. If you examine the tariff as it was in 1881, you will find that within a fraction it is very much the same as the tariff of to-day. The tariff of to-day, in regard to many things a poor man buys, is higher than that of 1881. Now, I ask your attention to this language, referring to the tariff of 1881:

RESULTS OF THE N. P.

The N. P. imposed a rate of duties that largely increases the cost of sugar, that increases the cost of stoves and hardware, that increases the cost of ploughs and all agricultural implements, that makes cottons and woollens dearer than would have been the case under the previous tariff, and that benefits a few individuals at the expense of the masses. To show, for instance, how the Canadian farmer is made "to pay for his whistle" by the present tariff,—

This is as true of this tariff as of the tariff of which it was written:

—we may adopt an illustration of a day's work and life on a farm, which cannot be questioned on the ground of accuracy. The farmer starting to his work has a shoe put on his horse with nails taxed 41 per cent, with a hammer taxed 40 per cent, cuts a stick with a knife taxed 27½ per cent, hitches his horse to a plough taxed 30 per cent, with chains taxed 27½ per cent. He returns to his home at night and lays his weary limbs on a sheet taxed 30 per cent, and covers himself with a blanket that has paid 70 per cent. He rises in the morning, puts on his humble flannel shirt taxed 60 per cent, shoes taxed 30 per cent, hat taxed 30 per cent, reads a chapter from his Bible taxed 7 per cent—

I believe that tax is off now. I remember that it was said of a lawyer who used to drive a very hard bill, that before he sat down to write it he said his prayers.

—and kneels to his God on a cheap carpet taxed 30 per cent. He sits down to breakfast: eats from a plate taxed 40 per cent, with knife and fork taxed 30 per cent, drinks his cup of coffee or tea sweetened with sugar taxed 45 per cent, seasons his food with salt taxed 35 per cent, pepper 35 per cent, or spice 35 per cent. He looks around upon his wife and children, all taxed in the same way—

Now, mark this, and I call the attention of the First Minister to it——takes a chew of tobacco taxed 100 per cent—

Well, tobacco is higher now; I suppose it is taxed 125 per cent.

—and if he indulges in a cigar he has first to pay a tax of 120 per cent, and then he is expected to thank John A. that he lives under the freest government under heaven.

What we would write down now is that he is expected to thank Sir Wilfrid Laurier that he lives under a Government that keeps every one of its pledges.

Now, as bearing on that topic, let me show you this illustration, and I may tell you that it is one which has created some feeling throughout the North-west Territories. There is not a shop in the Territories, where tobacco is sold, in which the man inside the counter does not say to the purchaser:

Which will you have? This is the Conservative plug, and here is the Liberal plug. I now show you, Mr. Speaker, a specimen of each plug, and can any one be surprised that the customer should say: Give me the Conservative plug, for that is a solid plug. Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is, and just compare it with the other—the Liberal plug. Well, there is the same difference between the Liberal policy and the Conservative policy. The Conservative policy is solid and sound and what it professes to be, but the Liberal policy is just as that Liberal plug of tobacco—too light, and the people will not have it. Neither will they long stand the light weight which these gentlemen are now dealing out to them.

Let me read further from this, which was the campaign sheet of the Liberal party in 1882. It is headed "Taxes"—and mark you, Mr. Speaker, the present Government has kept the tariff about the same as it was in 1881, which they then so vigorously denounced, as you will see by this pamphlet. Here is what I find, at the very start, in this pamphlet:

Taxes.—Sir John, by his National Policy, committed himself to the policy of levying taxes on grain and coal.

Well, we can likewise say that Sir Wilfrid Laurier, by retaining that same tariff to-day, has committed itself to the policy of levying taxes on grain and coal. Then the pamphlet goes on:

Such a tax has raised the price of every ton of coal the poor man has to buy.

Why, we know it has, especially we in the North-west, where fuel is dear and scarce; and these hon. gentlemen opposite have consequently not kept their promise to the poor man when, by their tariff, they retain this tax. I further read:

The tax on coal has also increased the cost of production. An increase in the cost of production reduces the profits of manufacturers—a reduction of their profits lowers the rate of the workingman's wages. It at the same time raises the price of fuel to the workingman, as the tax on wheat has raised the price of his bread. Sir John's policy, then, weakens home manufactures, lowers the rate of wages, and increases the cost of living.

Well, that is the language in which the Liberal party denounced a tariff which was practically the same as the tariff we now have. We know what they have done about cotton. They condemned, when in Opposition, in the strongest possible manner, the tariff on cotton, and yet they have, when in office, raised the duty on the poor man's cotton. In view of those circumstances, is it to be supposed that the farmers of the North-west, or the farmers of this country generally, can be content? How can they be content, when they find that promise after promise has been belied? We were promised in the North-west, and we took great stock in the promise, that the expenditure would be lowered. But what has taken place? The expenditure has been raised by $1,400,000. I shall not give you all the items, but only those that most concern us in the Territories. I must again express my regret at not seeing the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) in his place, because I intend bringing something before the House which interests him, and which, if he will not answer here, he will have to answer later before Canada. He promised to reduce the expenditure in the management of the Indian Department, and he took away from Regina the Indian Commissioner's Office, on the pretense that he would thereby lower the expenditure. He also dismissed men wholesale from the Indian Department on the same pretense. But what are the facts? At this moment, in 1897, the cost of running the Indian Department is $17,000 higher than it was in 1896. How is he going to get over that? I would like to have him here to explain, but I suppose he will, if I may quote one of the figures used by the right hon. First Minister; hide his head in the sand like the ostrich, and kick out at the stars, at gods and men, vainly supposing that such tactics will save him from popular reprobation.

Let me take one or two other items. The interest on the debt has been increased by $143,000; the cost of the militia has been increased $530,000, and the mounted police—what do you think has been done with regard to that? The policy which the Government has adopted with regard to the mounted police leaves the North-west Territories at this moment in great peril. The ranchers out there are in great excitement because the word has gone out to take the mounted police from Fort McLeod and Calgary up to the Klondike. The policy of reducing the mounted police has had the effect of alarming the people of the North-west, and left the Government, too, when they wanted men for the Klondike, in a tight and difficult place. They reduced the mounted police, one of the finest forces in the Empire, by 150 men, and how much do you suppose they saved? They saved just $6,000. They ought to have saved $150,000, because their calculation was that each man cost $1,000. But instead of saving $800 or $1,000 per man, they reduced the force by 150 men or more and saved only $6,000.

But I must hark back again to the tariff, because I see the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Jameson) has come in, and I wish to remind the House that that hon. gentleman expressed his disappointment with his own Government last summer, and should like to hear what he has to say here on the same subject. They had a meeting in Winnipeg, at which the hon. gentleman attended, and at which he told a doleful tale. He told them that when he and his fellow-Liberals from the west tried to get a reduction on implements they found that it was not they, the representatives of the farming province, who had the ear of the Government, but Mr. Frost and the other implement makers.

I want to call the attention especially of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) to the fact that the expenditure has been greatly increased, and that consequently in this respect neither have the Government kept their word. I want to show what is said by some of their own supporters on that point. You will remember, Sir, that the "Gleaner," which is a supporter of the Government, called attention to the strong utterances of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in favour of keeping down expenditure. The "Gleaner" then showed what the expenditure was; it showed that the expenditure had increased to $54,000,000, and quoting the strong language of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, it denounced him for not carrying out his pledges especially in the absence of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. The "Gleaner" did more than that. It went over the conduct of the Liberal party and condemned that party. There cannot be the least doubt that whether we look at the expenditure or at the way we have been treated in the matter of the tariff, or whether we take promise after promise, not a syllable of any of the promises made in Opposition has been implemented by hon. gentlemen in office.

Take another promise that was given us—the maintenance of the purity of Parliament. Why, Sir, has there ever been such a scandalous violation of the independence of Parliament as was witnessed in this House in the conduct of Langelier? To make the position of judge a football of party exigencies was bad enough, for it was calculated to lower the character and dignity of the judicial office, but to take the Lieutenant-Governor's position and treat it in the same way was, I hold, derogatory to the dignity of the Crown. Again, these gentlemen were going to give us purity of administration. Why, Sir, you cannot speak of it without laughing. I do not see the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) in his place, that apostle of purity, the gentleman who declared that Greenshields was a man and a brother because he gave $30,000 to buy a paper for the Minister's sons; the gentleman who does not see anything shameful in what, when he was before the court in the Grenier matter, he declared on oath he had done; a gentleman who, I believe, does not know the conscience of the Liberal party. The conscience of the bulk of the Liberal party is sound.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. I am glad to hear that cheer. There may be gentlemen looking for positions who are as Langelier was here, who have their letters in their pockets and who, by-and-by, if they are not met, will shake those letters in the face of the

Mr. DAVIN.

Prime Minister and make him toe the mark. But though there may be such men, I say that the heart and the conscience of the Liberal party throughout Canada are sound, and they are outraged by the fearful spectacle presented ever since this Government came into power. From the moment it took office until the present time the Government has gone from bad to worse, sinking deeper and deeper in ring after ring that smells with piscatorial effluvia. And now we have this Klondike deal as it is called. When the Liberal party was in power before, just as now, they began to grow corrupt. And not only that, they began to have differences among themselves. But, Sir, no act of corruption of the old Liberal Government, not the Foster affair, not the Neebing Hotel, not even the Steel Rails amounted to anything compared with the Drummond deal, the Crow's Nest Pass deal, and now this gigantic Klondike affair. This last has all the appearance of an enormous trust of which the Government are a part. You cannot look at it for a moment without seeing that there are millions in it for more than one. With the money in this Klondike deal they can buy up the whole country from Halifax to Vancouver. It is an attempt to raise money to cover past indebtedness in the late election—you see I know something about your affairs. It is intended to put half a million here, and half a million there, and half a million elsewhere—I do not know for whom, but there is more than one "boy," you may be perfectly certain, in this. It is intended to make a corruption fund for the next general election.

Mr. BENNETT. How much for Hardy?

Mr. DAVIN. And something, I suppose, for Hardy. But let me say, Sir, with some experience as a politician, that you cannot win an election with money alone.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) laughs. He knows right well that you cannot win an election with money alone, for all the money that Mercier gave him for New Brunswick and elsewhere did not enable him to win that election. I have just said that differences arose in the Liberal party when it was previously in office. But they were nothing to those of the present time, just as the corruption of the party when Mackenzie was in power is nothing to the corruption of the present time. But let me say that it probably does not come home as close to the right hon. gentleman, as it would have come to the leader in Mackenzie's time. As I understand it, the right hon. gentleman has adopted what is called the English Cabinet System, a system that the late Sir John Macdonald leaned to latterly, though I believe that for the greater part of his time, Sir John carried on his Government as the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) said once, by Order in Council, that is to say he kept a string on his Ministers, he kept a certain check upon them, and in that way he kept things pretty straight. But the right hon. the present Premier follows rather the system that is followed in England. He holds a Minister responsible for his department, and then says to the country: This man is in charge of this department, he is responsible, and the Prime Minister gives him a free hand. What is the result? He has taken in, for instance, the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) with ten years' reputation for corruption in New Brunswick, such as no provincial Minister ever had, and he has given him a department in which he may plunge his arms, not up to the elbows merely, but up to the shoulders in the public treasury. Although the hands of the Prime Minister may be clean, though he may have in regard to these things the poor virtue of clean fingers yet morally before the people of Canada he is responsible for what these people do. There is the Minister of the Interior, with energy very useful to his friends, but whose rashness and inexperience have been strikingly illustrated in Indian Affairs and in the Klondike. We were taunted, he had the audacity to taunt us here with divisions amongst ourselves. This from a party, the wing of whose army which is strongest and on which the Prime Minister most leans is honeycombed with internecine jealousies and torn to pieces with internecine strife. Let me read a picture by a great hand of what has been going on in Quebec. This is from a paper which I am sure will be an authority with every man in this House. The article is headed: "A Bundle of Sticks," and this is the picture it gives of the Liberal party in Quebec.

An hon. MEMBER. What paper?

Mr. DAVIN. The "Star," an independent paper. This is what it says:

When there were rumours the other day of war between Norway and Sweden, we could not help feeling a pang of pity for his unhappy Majesty, the King of Sweden and Norway. It must be a painful thing for a monarch to have to declare war against a brother monarch; but it must be particularly painful when the other monarch is himself. The only sovereign who could act in this dual capacity gracefully is the German Emperor. He is about the only great general who could successfully lead a cavalry charge against himself, and at the same time form himself into a hollowsquare to receive the charge.

But we have something like this anomalous state of affairs in the present condition of the great Liberal party of this province. What is the Liberal party of this province if not the party of Tarte, Préfontaine and Beausoleil, the party of Stephens, Guérin, Rainville and Bickerdike? This is the party that has not only proclaimed war against itself, but is prosecuting the war most vigorously. The elements of union are by no means lacking, for we have Tarte and Beausoleil marching together shoulder to shoulder in a punitive expedition against Préfontaine. If Préfontaine is to be Mayor, then Tarte and Beausoleil will know the reason why. Mr. Préfontaine is threatened with an expensive campaign, when, but for his Liberal friends, he might have had an election by acclamation. But this does not prevent his forming an offensive alliance with Mr. Tarte for the purpose of ousting Mr. Beausoleil from the representation of the East Ward. And although Mr. Beausoleil will have to fight like the doughty warrior he is to save his own seat, it does not prevent him joining heartily with Mr. Préfontaine in the siege of the Hon. Joseph Israel Tarte in the Department of Public Works.

It requires a war map to follow all the complications of this most interesting fight in detail. But the offensive and defensive alliances may be briefly summed up as follows: Tarte and Beausoleil against Préfontaine; Préfontaine and Beausoleil against Tarte; Tarte and Préfontaine against Beausoleil. Was ever anything like it out of comic opera? The only hope of an early termination of this most complicated warfare seems to be in the intervention of some friendly powers. When Rainville and George Washington Stephens get through pummelling each other at Quebec, and Bickerdike and Guérin will allow one another to get up, they may be able to interfere effectively. Meanwhile, it is awfully embarrassing for Tarte, Préfontaine and Beausoleil. When any two of them meet, they do not know whether to fraternize or "shoot at sight," and their distressed commander-in-chief, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, hasn't the least idea where he is at.

Now, Sir, that is a good picture of the state of things in Quebec, given by an artist on the spot; and yet we are told by the hon. gentleman who is Minister of Trade and Commerce that there were great dissensions amongst this party. The Minister of Trade and Commerce was good enough to suggest that there were skeletons amongst us. Well, Sir, there may be a skeleton in our party; I should think it a very odd thing if a large party could be found without a solitary skeleton. But, Sir, on that side of the House, because we know it well—there is a whole dissecting-room; and I have not the least doubt that if we can get at the facts, and probe them properly—take this Klondike business—why, if we can probe that, and probe it well, we will find that not merely have they a whole dissecting-room, but in that one particular deal a charnel-house of corruption.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would like to draw the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that he has been on two or three occasions somewhat unparliamentary in using so freely the term "corruption." It is not a term which, I think, can be bandied across the House with reference to individual members at all. I find it stated in Denison's and Brand's decisions that:

An hon. member having spoken of another hon. member as having been "detected in the grossest practice of corruption" is called upon to withdraw the word.

Mr. DAVIN. "Detected."

Mr. SPEAKER. "Detected" or "guilty," it is exactly the same thing. The hon. gentleman certainly would not accuse an hon. member of being guilty unless he supposed he had been detected. So I see no difference in the cases. I hope the hon. gentleman will have some regard to that rule.

Mr. DAVIN. I agree with your ruling, Mr. Speaker. May I ask you, Mr. Speaker, as a favour to show me how I have offended against that ruling?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has thrown charges of corruption across the House this afternoon on several occasions. The hon. gentleman accused the Minister of Railways of having been for ten years, I think he said, a notorious corruptionist in New Brunswick—or words almost to that effect. That is quite out of order. Had I drawn the attention of the hon. gentleman to it at the time, as I probably should have done, I would have required him to withdraw them.

Mr. DAVIN. Of course, if I have said anything unparliamentary, I desire to withdraw it. I wish to bow entirely to your ruling, but do I understand that it is wrong to say that if we could probe this Klondike matter thoroughly we would find ourselves in a charnel-house of corruption? Is that unparliamentary?

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman referred to any individual member of the House as being guilty of corruption he would be out of order. General terms like that might be admissible, but I am speaking of their application to individual members.

Mr. DAVIN. Now, I am going to read the words of a former leader of yours, and a former leader of the Prime Minister, words that will apply to that Klondike affair, fit it pat. I have no doubt they will be received with the respect that they deserve. I hope it is not unparliamentary to say that there is about that Klondike matter a strong piscatorial effluvium.

Mr. SPEAKER. Of course, I do not think it is at all unparliamentary for the hon. gentleman to endeavour to fly over the heads of the House.

Mr. DAVIN. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to fly over their heads, I want to reach their hearts, if I can. I am aiming, as far as I can, to produce some repentance, and I am also seeking to impart enlightenment. My aim, Sir, is to make converts in this House and converts outside; and I may tell you, Mr. Speaker, that within the last twelve months, and I am sure you will be glad to know it, my missionary efforts, my seeking to bring people out of political darkness into political light, have been most successful. Now, one of the things I object to in that Klondike business is its secrecy. I say there is no reason for making a secret contract. I condemn also the policy of hurrying it on on the eve of the meeting of Parliament, signing a contract when you could either have delayed it for a week, or else called Parliament to meet three or four weeks earlier, and lay it before Parliament. I object to having Parliament dethroned. I object to having Parliament deprived of its functions of supervision and scrutiny, and I object most strenuously to the monopoly. I object most strenuously to the tremendous price paid, 25,000 acres per mile, 25,000 acres, instinct with gold, pregnant with gold, for building a railway that will not be able to do the work. Mark me, the railway that has been described by the Minister of Railways will not be able to do the work that is necessary to be done over that country. Now, listen to what the Hon. Edward Blake said, and it will fit pat to this affair:

Mr. DAVIN.

They pride themselves on their Pacific Railway contract.

I do not know that we could with truth say that they pride themselves on their Mackenzie & Mann contract. I do not think that they are very proud of it. The Minister of Railways, when he was introducing his Bill yesterday, presented the most extraordinary spectacle I ever saw, and I have had some experience in parliamentary life. I never in my life before saw a man introduce a Bill and get violently angry with some imaginary opponent, hit out right and left, flame up purple red with indignation at some critics that rose before his inflamed fancy, and do a lot of boxing in anticipation of the fight that was to take place three or four days ahead. I know that there are timid men on this side. I know that the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) is a man of some timidity, and of course the timidity of the leader of the Opposition is well known, the timidity of the old war-horse of Cumberland is notorious. I know well that it was calculated to frighten them; but I may tell you, Mr. Speaker—and I have no doubt the House on both sides will hear this with gratification—I have spoken since with the leader of the Opposition, with the member for York, and with the late Minister of Railways, and I find that although their nerves were slightly disturbed for a time, they are now convalescent and in a normal condition. Well, this is the language of Edward Blake:

I condemn that bargain as improper, being made in secret, without public tender, contrary to the existing policy of the people and of Parliament, and opposed to the provisions of the law.

I condemn it as extravagant, since the enterprise will cost us $60,000,000 and 25,000,000 acres of the choicest lands, while the road is to belong to the company, which will realize the cost of its part of the work out of its land and money subsidies.

I condemn it as outrageous, in conferring on the company a practical monopoly, for twenty years, of the trade of our North-west Territories, and large privileges and exemptions, very valuable to them and still more detrimental to the public.

I condemn it as indefensible, being consummated in the face of a tender to perform the same obligations for $3,000,000 less money, for 3,000,000 acres less land, without the monopoly of trade, without the exemptions from taxation, and on other conditions much more favourable than those of the contract.

Why, Mr. Speaker, I condemn on the very grounds stated by Hon. Mr. Blake, and the country will also condemn, that Klondike contract, and I tell hon. gentlemen opposite that a policy of silence will not enable them to escape from their responsibility. The name of my leader, the leader of the Opposition, was connected by the papers with this Klondike matter, and you will remember, Sir, it was stated here by the leader of the Opposition that he had telegraphed to his lawyer to sue "La Presse" for making a charge against him as having been connected with the transaction. I have here a letter written by Mr. Donald Macmaster, Q.C., in respect to this. It is as follows :

"La Presse" says it loyally accepts your statement made in the House, and expresses regret for having said what it did.

So that "La Presse" has apologized for the charge made against Sir Charles Tupper, and that sweeps to the winds the assertion that Sir Charles was in any way connected with that Klondike deal.

Mr. BRITTON. Where is the contradiction from the "World" ?

Mr. DAVIN. The "World" did not make any charge ; it merely made a suggestion. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) is a cautious man and an experienced journalist. He may tremble on the threshold, but he does not rush in where angels fear to tread. In connection with a boast made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, which was referred to here to-day, I want to call attention to some of his own words. We have just seen the right hon. Premier and one of his colleagues introduce one of the victors at the by-elections. We had in that extraordinary reply, delivered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, a statement that the victories at the by-elections were evidences of popular confidence. I have here a speech delivered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in 1892, and there is in it a paragraph headed "Unexampled Successes," and it has reference altogether to by-elections. What did he then say ? He stated that the successes of a Government in the by-elections are no indication whatever of the feeling throughout the country, because, he says, what is perfectly true in Canada, that the advantages of the Government in the by-elections are so great that fighting the Government is equivalent to meeting a man who is playing with loaded dice.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Whose speech was that ?

Mr. DAVIN. It was delivered by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce. He said :

Yet, nevertheless, with all those things against them, we find the Government sustained at all points throughout Ontario, and absolutely winning 18 out of 20 by-elections. Sir, the mere statement of those figures is in itself enough. Does any sane human being who knows anything at all of the conditions of political life believe for one moment that this result was obtained by honest means ? The thing is an absurdity. Those figures carry condemnation on the very face of them. "As well defend Sodom." As well say that it is possible to cast double sixes eighteen times out of twenty. Sir, it is only possible on one condition, and on one only—that the dice are loaded.

Thus according to the hon. gentleman whenever a Government wins by-elections in great numbers, the dice are loaded. But we had an election recently in Ontario, which was significant. I allude to Centre Toronto, which sends here as its representative a large manufacturer, who made a defence of the Government in a peculiar way. The hon. gentleman defended the Ministry, and I am bound to say that while he was delivering his maiden speech in this House there was not a blush on his cheek ; I watched him closely and there was not the slightest change in his complexion, but there was a hesitancy in his speech when he faltered out the statement that the Government had kept their promises. It is of course supremely in his interest and in those of the manufacturers he represents that the assertion should be forced down the throats of the constituencies that election promises have been kept. What is the significance of that election ? Does it mean that Toronto supports the Government ? The hon. gentleman himself believes in preferential trade ; he had to lift the Conservative banner in order to win that constituency. He unfurled the banner of preferential trade ; and I am bound to say I do not know where his own leader is as regards that banner, but at all events the hon. member for Centre Toronto made it his flag of victory. Not only so, but he told the people, just as he told the House the other day that the Liberal party—I am not going to labour this point because it has been well covered by other speakers—never professed free trade but only a reduction of the tariff. We had, however, the eloquent language of the Prime Minister in Winnipeg, on which occasion he stated that he was for free trade as it is in England. I am calling attention to the significance of the recent Toronto election. That constituency originally was a Liberal one. First, in 1872 Robert Wilkes defeated one of the most popular Tories in Canada, Frank Shanly, by a majority of 182. In 1874 he defeated Angus Morrison by a majority of 380. In 1875 Mr. John Macdonald was elected by acclamation. In 1878 we had to put up a Liberal, Robert Hay, who was at one with us on the National Policy, in order to win the seat. In 1882 Mr. Hay was again returned. In 1887 and 1891 Mr. Cockburn carried the constituency. Then Mr. Lount carried it by a majority of 240. Next it was carried by my hon. friend (Mr. Bertram) by a majority of 250. I must say to my hon. friend that it was a small majority, and I will tell him why. It was a small majority because he is an ideal candidate for that constituency; he is a good speaker on the platform; he is a successful manufacturer and commercial man, and he waved the Conservative banner as he went before his constituency. Out of nine contests, five Liberals were returned and four Conservatives, and Centre Toronto may thus fairly be claimed to be a Liberal constituency. With two Liberal Governments, the Dominion and that of Ontario working for him, my hon. friend, instead of his having a majority about equal to that secured by Mr. Lount, who was not an ideal candidate, he being a lawyer, he should have had 1,000 majority. What were the facts? This Klondike deal had some connection with the Centre Toronto contest. One of the leading men in the Klondike deal had put up money to enable the constituency to be carried by the Liberals; and the whole thing had been arranged to return the present member by acclamation, but the young Liberal-Conservatives became alarmed. If they had gone into the field in time, and if that magnificent speech made by my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) on the Saturday night, that great battle note of economy showing up the dreadful fall of the Liberal party from its principles, if that speech had been made one week earlier, I believe—much as I am pleased with seeing my hon. friend (Mr. Bertram) here—I should have been still more pleased to have seen my hon. friend, Mr. Howland, representing that constituency.

I have quoted the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that it was a proper thing to hold men to their utterances, and now I want to deal with what I deem to be the most serious charge against the Government, and that is their conduct and the conduct of the Prime Minister in regard to preferential trade. I never heard a more complete indictment made in my life, in a court of justice or anywhere else, than was made by the leader of the Opposition the other day in this House in connection with this question. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) replied to the leader of the Opposition and to the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster). Did the Minister prove that any statement made by these two gentlemen was unfounded? Not at all. But he thought it a sufficient thing to say indirectly, that the leader of the Opposition was a liar, for he said if he had been in Jerusalem 1900 years ago, Sapphira would have preferred him to Ananias.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And he was not called to order, either.

Mr. DAVIN. There is no calling to order under these circumstances. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have known the leader of the Opposition politically, and personally also, for thirty years, and I say that there is not a man who can stand up and show that any statement of fact ever made by that hon. gentleman was unfounded. The only charge I ever heard made against him with the least colour of foundation was, that he was too hopeful of the North-west, for it was contended that the North-west did not come up to his anticipations. Let me in this connection refer to that part of the Queen's Speech which mentions the North-west. Why, Sir, the farmers are rolling in wealth now in the North-west Territories. About Indian Head, Regina, Moose Jaw, Moosomin, all over the Territories and over Manitoba too, the farmers of the North-west are rolling in wealth, and banking sums varying from $1,000 to $15,000 clear profit on individual farms. That is the country which my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) has opened up and was so hopeful about. The leader of the Opposition quoted the language of the Prime Minister in London, Toronto and elsewhere, and also his conduct in London and Liverpool, and he made the charge that the Prime Minister did not properly represent Canada—not in demeanour—but in connection with the grave business that presented itself. The Minister of Trade and Commerce met that charge by saying by application, that the leader of the Opposition was a liar; but does he suppose for one minute the people of Canada, or the Liberals of Canada, will accept any such reply as that? The Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke of cutting the Gordian knot, as the Prime Minister had boasted that the Gordian knot was cut. Why, Sir, both of them forgot, that they declared from their very seats there, that there was no Gordian knot to cut, and the Prime Minister when he went to England said so. And, when all these things are pressed home to these gentlemen, they content themselves with making a few jokes and having recourse to metaphor. Sir, the thing is too grave to be allowed to slip by like that, and I wish to call the attention of the House and of the country to the state of the preferential trade question at this moment. When the Prime Minister was seeking power he declared at London that he was in favour of preferential trade; that Mr. Chamberlain was in favour of it also, and that he (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) if he got into power was going to get us preferential trade. He made the same declaration at Montreal and at Toronto, and he made it at St. Johns, P.Q., also, and this illustrates a very peculiar feature of the right hon. gentleman. The way in which he made the declaration at St. Johns, P.Q., may be an explanation of the extraordinary position he is in to-day, because I cannot believe for one minute that the Prime Minister would wilfully falsify, and my theory of the position the Prime Minister is in is this: That out of perfect lightness of heart and a desire to say what is pleasant on all occasions, he went and said (because he found it was popular all over Canada) that he was in favour of preferential trade. Now, it has been shown that the Prime Minister contradicted himself in this matter, and I am going to show that such is his levity of mind, when he was leading a great party and seeking power, in the same speech and almost in the very same breath, he made the same contradiction that is on record as between his utterance in Liverpool and his utterance in London. I have here his speech made in St. Johns in the province of Quebec, in July 7th, 1896. He said:

To-day your principal market is the British market. It is possible for us to make an arrangement by which England will give us market for all our products, if we give something like reciprocity to certain British products. I am for that policy.

There is preferential trade with England for you, but mark what he says in the next paragraph:

We can be on good terms with everybody, and that is the thing we have set before us. If we establish good relations with the United States, we may perhaps have the benefit of the re-opening of the negotiations, and the renewal of the treaty of reciprocity.

Here in the same breath, in two contiguous paragraphs of his speech, the Prime Minister stated he was for preferential trade with England and for unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. The contradictions that have been pointed out by the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) and by my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) are thrown in the shade completely by this contradiction made in the same speech, and it explains what otherwise is almost inexplicable: the extraordinary contradictions which arise in the utterances of the Prime Minister. I have studied the right hon. gentleman and analysed him carefully, and I believe these contradictions arise from the fact that he has not thought down to rock-bottom the great political questions of the day, and founded principles thereon. There is no stability of principle there, and his amiable facile nature leads him to say pleasant words on all occasions. Of course, that is very nice, but it is not desirable in a leader of a government or in any politician, speaking on great questions. I really fear that if my right hon. friend had to address an audience of rats, he would say to them that he took a great interest in rodents, that they were the most interesting of quadrupeds, and he would not mind taking them into his confidence and assuring them that he himself had a penchant for cheese.

The right hon. gentleman quoted from Mr. Chamberlain, and curiously enough the quotation showed that Mr. Chamberlain was at one with himself, as he spoke in London. He said in London that he was in favour of a revenue tariff, and that a revenue tariff and preferential trade would go well together. Mr. Chamberlain, in the quotation which the right hon. gentleman made from his speech, said that there would have to be a modification in the tariffs of the colonies, and it would have to go in the direction of a revenue tariff; and we all agree that there would have had to be modification.

Now, the Minister of Trade and Commerce declared that there was a great difficulty in bringing about a denunciation of the treaties. The hon. gentleman is either trying to bamboozle this House and this country, or he is grossly ignorant of the state of opinion in England at that time. The movement had been in existence in England for years. My hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) not only found a strong feeling existing in England in favour of preferential trade, but he helped to increase it, and he knows very well that that feeling existed not merely among the statesmen of England, but amongst the farmers and merchants all over the country. There was a going-out towards preferential trade; and our charge against the Prime Minister is not that he killed the movement—because I do not believe he could kill it—but that he dazed and staggered it for the time being. He hit it a deadly blow, but I do not believe he knocked the life out of it. Now, Lord Salisbury has been quoted and Mr. Chamberlain has been quoted; but I am going to quote to you not only what Lord Salisbury said, but what the Right Hon. Arthur Balfour said in regard to that subject, and it is very important. I am not only going to show you what Mr. Balfour said, but what was taking place all over England, of which these gentlemen seem perfectly ignorant. On the eve of the Jubilee there was hardly a nook in England where, in mechanics' institutes, and in various little literary societies this question of preferential trade was not discussed. I have here a report of one of those meetings—that of the South Wilts Chamber of Agriculture, which took place at Bath. At that meeting a Mr. J. W. Titt made a long argument in favour of preferential trade, and quoted the Right Hon. Arthur Balfour, among others, as follows:—

Should the colonies desire to adopt the policy of a customs union, and the treaties between Great Britain and Belgium and the Zollverein interpose obstacles in the way of the realization of such a desire, it would be the duty of Her Majesty's Government to consider how to remove those treaty restrictions and to shape their course accordingly.

You see that the Right Hon. Arthur Balfour regards preferential trade and the denunciation of those treaties as correlative—as bearing something the same relation to each other as a plate does to the meat you eat off it; and for any one of these hon. gentlemen to say: If we had asked for preferential trade, we would not have got the denunciation of the treaties, is something like a man who is invited to dinner saying, "I will eat your meat, but I will not have your plate." or, "I will take your plate, but I will be hanged if I will eat your meat," and then coming back and saying, "I got the plate, but I didn't get the meat; if I had asked for both the plate and the meat, I should not have got either." Here is Mr. Arthur Balfour saying that the two things are correlative, and that one of the reasons for denouncing these treaties was, that they stood in the way of preferential trade. Now, Mr. Speaker, does any man who listened to it, believe for a moment that there is anything in the statement that it was difficult at that time to get these treaties denounced. Why, Sir, for years many people were trying to get them denounced, and they were in this position. If you travel through an Alpine country—through the Valley of Chamouni, for instance—you will sometimes see an avalanche above you, and the ligament that holds it has been worn away so much that a girl going through the valley and shouting or singing will so shake the avalanche that the ligament which holds it gives away and the avalanche comes down. That was precisely the position in which these treaties stood. The ligament that held them had long been wearing away. Here is the quotation this man makes from Mr. Chamberlain:

The colonists have with the mother country a common origin, a common history, a common language, a common literature, a common love of liberty, and law, common principles to assert, and common interests to maintain.

Then he quotes the Earl of Rosebery, who is a charming and refined man, but I never thought that he was the figure for Romeo when he was made the leader of the Liberal party. He has recently given utterance to some things which I do not like on this subject, but here is what he said in the quotation to which I refer:

It is, as I believe, impossible for you to maintain in the long run your present loose relations to your colonies, and preserve those colonies as part of the Empire. I wish to say that on the grounds of commercial interests alone this question is worthy of the consideration of our great commercial communities.

Then he quoted the Marquis of Salisbury as far back as 1887. This question, which by the mere word of the Premier was swept away, was discussed as far back as 1887! and here is what the Marquis of Salisbury said in regard to it at that time:

The Marquis of Salisbury, in a letter dated April 5, 1887, in reply to a correspondent, stated that "he did not imagine that differential duties in favour of our colonies, whatever might be said for or against them, can be properly described in the term 'protection.'"

Showing in what direction his mind was going. This writer also quoted a long article from the San Francisco "News-Letter," which pointed out how important this scheme of preferential trade was, and what a dangerous thing it was to the power of the United States. It said that it would make an imperial United States of Great Britain, and give it an amplitude of power such as it never had before. And, Mr. Speaker, connected with this question is the question of defence, on which let me say one word. Why, Sir, any contribution which these colonies will have to make, by-and-by, towards the defence of the Empire will be a mere flea-bite. The same fleet will be needed for Imperial defence that is necessary for Imperial England to maintain and the colonies will have doubled their wealth. At the meeting I speak of, this resolution was proposed:

That in the opinion of this chamber—the Chamber of Agriculture of Wiltshire—the commercial federation of Great Britain with all her colonies and possessions on a trade basis, giving preferential treatment to all within the Empire, is of the most supreme importance.

Mr. John Hall seconded it and said that if England wanted to keep her colonies she must have something more than sentiment to bind them to her.

The right hon. gentleman told the people in a bunkum strain that he knew the heart of John Bull. Why, here is John Bull himself—the farmers themselves—talking. Here we are at the heart of John Bull, in the great county of Wiltshire, and what the people there say is that they want something more than mere sentiment to bind the colonies to the mother country. Lord Folkestone was present and supported the resolution, and Mr. Carpenter said:

He had always been opposed to protection, but he should support the resolution in favour of the federation of the Empire.

What happened? The resolution was passed at that meeting unanimously.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. When was that?

Mr. DAVIN. On the eve of the Jubilee. It was an important event, and only one of many. It was held on May 22nd, 1896. That was the state of opinion all over England when the right hon. First Minister went across. England was then prepared for the very thing the right hon. gentleman subsequently declared for in the west. I am not going to repeat in detail what happened, because we all know it. My right hon. friend went to Liverpool, the Duke of Devonshire held out to him his hand for preferential trade, and my right hon. friend put it rhetorically and scornfully aside. He said Canada did not want it, that what Canada gave was a free gift. At that time he had not made those speeches, the burthen of which was 'delenda est Carthago,' those speeches which were all for the denunciation of the treaties, because when he went to the banks of the Thames, he told the "Chronicle" man: "We say those treaties do not apply." So that on his visit to London during the Jubilee, that knot which he declared Alexander of Macedon had cut, he, the master of Alexander of Macedon, who is now before us, then said did not exist. A change afterwards came over the spirit of his dream, but only when all the harm had been done. He went to Toronto on his return, and attended the banquet of the Board of Trade in that city, and there, where of course they were all preferential trade men, he did what he always does, and what illustrates my analysis of the right hon. gentleman—the only analysis creditable to him that I have been able to make of his character. Wherever he happens to be, he wants to say something pleasant; so that although he had in England declared that he did not want preferential trade, although he had in England accepted the Cobden Club medal, and the encomiums of Lord Farrer, who, in presenting the medal, laid stress on the opinions dear to the Cobden Club—although he had done all this, what did he say at Toronto?

It was said he should have demanded preferential trade from Great Britain as well as the getting rid of the obstructive treaties, but if he had asked for both he would have received neither. He had appealed, not to John Bull the man of business, but the man of big heart. One step had been gained, the step that first had to be gained, and if he had attempted more, it would have meant failure. The way was clear now to preferential trade, so soon as Great Britain was ready to grant it.

Why, we have the proof that not only were the statesmen of Great Britain ready to grant it, but that England herself, the great heart of John Bull, was beating for this preferential trade. But what does the hon. gentleman tell us when he comes back? He tells the Board of Trade at Toronto that while he was the guest of these men, while accepting that Cobden medal, while enjoying their sumptuous hospitality, all his statements, his statement that Canada wanted nothing in return whatever, were all a piece of sly diplomacy, a piece of dexterous perfidy. It pains me—and I say it unaffectedly—to find a First Minister of Canada playing such a role.

We have had, during this debate, some very extraordinary and very strong literary comparisons. For instance, the leader of the Opposition has been compared to the scurrilous and unsightly Thersites. Now, when we take the course of the right hon. gentleman on this preferential trade question, there is a comparison that suggests itself, and I do not make it in any offensive sense. If you take the career of Milton's Satan, after he meets his followers in Pandemonium, and follow it from that out, you will find a most extraordinary similarity between it and the course of the right hon. gentleman. Satan's account to his followers of his exploits in duplicity, as recorded in "Paradise Lost," bears a remarkable similarity to my right hon. friend's account of his doings on the other side. I suppose that, in all his reading, the hon. gentleman may have read the comedy of Foote. It is a comedy that was borrowed from the French, and the humour of it consists in this, that the hero gets himself, by reckless statements, into scrape after scrape; but still his confidence in his extraordinary resources, his imaginative power of concocting, is so great that he never doubts for one minute that he can lie himself out of any scrape that he gets into. Well, he was a feather-brained man of fashion; but you will remember that when the grand divan of demons takes place, as recorded in "Paradise Lost," Milton's terrible hero declares he is going to deliver them out of hell, and that he will alone first explore the way. He meets Death and Sin, and, true to his policy, flatters them. Then he visits the country of Chaos and Old Night, and promises to reduce the new created world to darkness, which promise he has, of course, no intention of keeping and which is contrary to what he promised his fellow demons. Then he meets the Angel of the Sun, to whom he represents himself as what he is not in order to gain certain information, and then he transforms himself completely, and is found at the ear of Eve whispering suggestions to her. Again, in the assumed character of the Serpent, he assures her that he has eaten the forbidden fruit, which he has not, and that if she will eat of it, she will become a god, which he knows she will not. When brought before Michael and charged with his unlawful intrusion into Paradise, he first says that his object was to fly from pain. When taunted with being the first to fly from pain, he replies that that was not his reason, but that his object was to avoid hazarding his armies in untrod ways and first spy out himself the new created world. Now, mark the way Milton, the great Puritan poet, makes the Archangel Michael reply :

To say and straight unsay, pretending first
Wise to fly pain, professing next the spy, Argues no leader, but a liar traced.

Satan then returns to Pandemonium and boasts of what he has done, but in the midst of his boasting, his professions are belied by the degrading transformation which takes place, when he and all his followers are suddenly changed from angelic forms into hissing serpents. The leader is transformed into a serpent and his followers take the new shape, and looking at the speeches we have listened to from the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the hon. member from Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram), it would seem as if these gentlemen had assumed the garb of dissimulation adopted by their leader and propose to rival him in duplicity. Before quoting Mr. Chamberlain's last speech let me clinch this matter about the professions of free trade. I have here a despatch from Montreal dated 30th November, which says that the "Star's" London cable says: that the Cobden Club is quite satisfied with the position of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. And this is the character they give him, a character that may be very useful to him, but I shall be glad to know how it will be received by the gentlemen who listened to his silver eloquence at the famous Board of Trade banquet :

In view of the adverse comments made in Canada and elsewhere on the fiscal policy of the Dominion Government, the committee think it right to state that they have reason to be satisfied that the present Administration at Ottawa is inspired by a genuine desire to advance on the lines of free exchange so far and as rapidly as possible, consistently with prudent regard for the difficulties created by the long rule of a high and comprehensive protective system.

Here, as late as November, the Cobden Club states that it was quite satisfied with the Prime Minister; and from this and from his utterance of last night, notwithstanding what his supporter from Toronto Centre, speaking under circumstances when a member is supposed to express the very ideas of the Premier, said, he must be held to be opposed to preferential trade. In conjunction with the opinions I have quoted of the Right Hon. Arthur Balfour, of the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) himself, of Lord Salisbury, made before the Jubilee, take what Mr. Chamberlain said, speaking at Liverpool three weeks ago in favour of closer union with the colonies, speaking of the Jubilee, he said :

It was the growth of an overmastering and a universal desire in favour of closer union.

You will observe that, Sir. Of course as has been shown by what other hon. gentleman.

Mr. DAVIN.

men have quoted in this House, and as I have further established by the opinions of these Wiltshire farmers, they were ready, in the glow and heat of that jubilee period to do more than meet us half-way if we had reached the hand to them. Mr. Chamberlain proceeds :

It is not for us to take the initiative. We would rather follow the lead; but what I think I have already accomplished is to convince them that wherever they live, however far their home may be from the centre and from the mother land, we, at any rate, are prepared to meet them more than half-way in any proposal they may make to us (cheers), in any desire which they may express for their closer union (cheers); and, gentlemen, it will come (hear, hear), if not in our day, then in that of our successors.

Later on he says :

But, in whatever way it may be presented to us, we shall not be deterred either by the economic pedantries or the selfishness which is a virtue with some politicians from giving favourable consideration to any proposals which our brethren across the seas may make to us. And in such a consideration, I for one—

I ask your attention to that——do not believe the English people will keep a strict account of profit and loss.

So that to-day the sentiment is precisely the same as it was. And now, harking back to what I said before, the note throughout the British Empire at this moment is a note of colonial equality in the Imperial Union, and the men we have on the Treasury benches of Canada cannot sound that note.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) attempted to reply to the statement made by the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) as to the effect of this tariff in discriminating against England. Why, Sir, the returns show it. The "Sun," of Toronto, pointed out what was shown by these late returns in reducing the imports from England. Is not that sufficient to show discrimination against England and to show that this so-called preferential clause gives no preference to the mother country? But I have a curious testimony on the same subject. I have here the "Iron Age," a journal published in the United States. And what did it say of this tariff as soon as it was passed :

The new tariff, therefore, cannot be properly described as one discriminating against the United States. A further examination of it and of the attitude of the Government will completely free it from any suspicion of being anti-American. It is not too much to say, indeed, that it shows strongly a pro-American bent. First of all, there is the offer of reciprocity. Next, there is the treatment of American products in the general tariff.

As to this offer of reciprocity the "Sun," which I have already quoted, says that whatever the Ministers may say, their object is not to have a preference with England, but to have a preference with United States. And the Toronto "World," which has been referred to here, had articles a short time ago declaring that the Ministers were looking to Washington. And here we have this American paper saying that the tariff has a pro-American bent :

Of all the changes made in the general tariff, the most sweeping were those made in the duties on iron and steel and the manufactures thereof. Large slices were taken off most of the old duties, and some of the most important articles, such as mining machinery and—next year—barbed wire, were put on the free list. What foreign country will receive most, if not all, the advantage of this? Clearly the United States. It is true, Britain gets her goods in at a rate of duty now 12½ per cent, and next year 25 per cent, less than the general rate, but nobody supposes, the Government least of all, that she can ship iron and steel goods into this country against the United States competition.

Looking over the whole list of Canadian imports of iron and steel goods, we find in nearly every article that the balance is enormously in favour of the United States.

Then the "Commercial," a Canadian journal, says :

Even if bar iron, of which, until recently, we imported altogether from the United Kingdom to supplement our own output, a larger quantity is now supplied to us from over the line than from Great Britain, our imports of bar iron in the fiscal year ending June 30 last amounting to $52,827 from Britain and $56,587 from the United States.

This is in line with the figures given yesterday by the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster). The whole article goes on strongly to point out that this tariff is more in favour of the United States than of England. So that this so-called discrimination in favour of England is a sham. The Gordian knot is an afterthought on the part of the right hon. Prime Minister. There was no Gordian knot to be cut by Alexander of Macedon, and there was no such difficulty as the Minister of Trade and Commerce tried to make out in getting the denunciation of these treaties for which he claimed so much credit for the Premier.

Let me say of the right hon. gentleman that so far as representing us personally in the Jubilee was concerned, I think he represented us well. He is a gentleman, he is a man of culture, he is a fine orator, and he represented us well in those respects. I have seen a letter written by a lady high in society in England, commenting on the Premier, and she said that the reason the Canadian Premier was thought so much of was that, compared with the other Premiers, he was a much more refined man. Well, we all know that, and I have always borne testimony to the fact, and the Conservative party had better take note that there are educated and social fads which have to be reckoned with. I was glad to see what Mr. Willison said in his account in the "Globe," although he probably exaggerated a little, for the London papers did not say that our Premier was the most prominent figure. The "Spectator" made it clear that the six most prominent individuals, after Her Majesty, were all soldiers, mentioning Beresford as first amongst them. But I have no doubt whatever that my right hon. friend behaved himself in such a way as to look for no allowances—to quote my own language of last session—to be made for him. I was glad to see that he attracted so much of Imperial public attention, and if my patriotic pride received a dash at all, it was in this: It pained me for a moment to observe that this Imperial public attention was divided with my right hon. friend by the South Australian kangaroo. Now, Sir, the kangaroo has, to some extent, the best of it, for he has remained under the royal roof and has become a royal institution; and although I am glad to see that the right hon. gentleman has come back with a title, if that was necessary to his happiness, honoured by Her Majesty, still the Atlantic rolls between him and the eyes of royalty, whereas the eyes of royalty rest on the South Australian interesting importation. But there is one other advantage the kangaroo has. The cries of the kangaroo are the same today as they were then, and they have always been the same, and he jumps in precisely the same way. But I am afraid, Sir, that the cries of my right hon. friend will continue to vary, and that he will jump and box the compass in the same eccentric fashion that he has done in the past.

As to titles, I want to say something more about them. The right hon. gentleman went to Renfrew and there a clergyman addressed him and said: "Sir Wilfrid Laurier." The right hon. gentleman said: "No, not Sir Wilfrid, plain Mr. Laurier. I am a democrat to the hilt." Now, Mr. Speaker, what was the meaning of that? Did the right hon. gentleman mean that he was a social democrat or a political democrat? He cannot have meant that he was a political democrat, because that would mean favouring an undivided government of the people, and would show that he was anti-monarchic, and I believe that he is loyal to our constitution. He must have meant that he was a social democrat, and did not want those factitious distinctions to separate him from his fellow-men. I am with the right hon. gentleman in that. A man may be loyal to the British Empire, a man may be thoroughly devoted, as I am, to the British Empire, and yet may feel that with us here in Canada, where after all we are a great democratic community, titles are a mistake. For instance, there is one title that we cannot wear without being ridiculous. The moment you make a man a lord in Canada he flies the country, because in Canada he is a lord without a slave. For instance, Lord Mount-Stephen, when he received that title, intended to live in Montreal, but he found that somehow it would not do, there was something ridiculous about it. When he would go into the St. James Club, and they "my-lord" him, they were ready to laugh in his face. It does not suit. The only thing that seems able to go down is the title of Sir, a knighthood or a baronetcy. So I assume that the hon. gentleman meant a social democrat. Here was a pledge to that portion of the people throughout Canada who feel strongly on the subject. You will find them amongst the farmers, in cities, in Toronto and elsewhere, men who believe that it is a mistake to have titles in Canada. That was a pledge to these people that he would not take the title. There was no necessity for it, such as may sometimes lead to a change of political opinion. This was a matter entirely within my right hon. friend's own will; and yet the shoes were not old that carried him to Renfrew when he took a title and became a right hon. ; then he goes over to Paris and takes a Grand Cross of the Legion of Honour. Why, Sir, it is one of the most extraordinary things in his extraordinary career. It may be said of him as was once said of a Roman Emperor, that if he had not reigned, everybody would have said he could have reigned magnificently. After my right hon. friend became Prime Minister, in twenty short months, say in two years, judging him by his utterances prior to the election of 1896, and his utterances since, he has gone through the whole compass, boxed every point of that compass; so that the quadrature of Laurierian opinion is one of the most difficult things that was ever attempted; you might as well attempt to square the solar parallax. I see my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce has come in and I would like to call his attention to some things that I have said, even at the risk of repeating myself. I wish then to say to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that in his absence I have read that fine utterance of his in a speech made in 1878, in which he said, but in more eloquent words than I can use, that nothing was juster than that an engineer should be hoist with his own petard; in which he said that nothing was juster than to gibbet men with their own utterances; to compare their performances with their utterances, and to show them up to the people of Canada. I have also quoted that hon. gentleman's statements in regard to economy, and I have shown that their economy has taken the form of adding $1,400,000 to our expenses. I have quoted the hon. gentleman's utterance in regard to purity, and although I will not say that there is an utter corruption. I may say, to put it in an indirect way, that the people of Canada are not in a mood to believe that there is very much purity on those benches. I have also called attention to the fact that this great veteran of parliamentary life, this master of parliamentary fence, this master of all the arts of Parliament, of all the weapons in the whole armoury of parliamentary debate, that when he rose to reply to the ex-Finance Minister and to the leader of the Opposition who had made the greatest indictment that had ever been made against a Government, all he could say was that, in metaphorical language, the leader of the Opposition was a liar, that if the hon. gentleman had lived 1900 years ago Sapphira would have preferred him to Ananias. I see that the hon. gentleman is greatly amused at his own joke. Does the hon. gentleman think, however, that with such gingerbread as that the people will be satisfied? Does the hon. gentleman suppose that when the people see this Queen's Speech they will be satisfied with such a meagre bill of fare when they supposed they were going to a substantial banquet? Does the hon. gentleman suppose that the Liberal party which he educated up to believe in purity, to believe in economy, to believe in crushing corruption in every form, to believe contractors were dangerous persons to entrust with power—does he believe that the people will be satisfied with what we now see taking place? I want to call the hon. gentleman's attention to what is said about contracts in the speech from which I have already quoted. I hinted that this business was—and in designating it I suppose I shall have to refer to some one entirely outside of this House—in its complexion and construction that of an enormous trust. Here is what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said as to the sources of supply for a Government that wants to be corrupt:

The Red Parlor, alias the protective manufacturers (of which the hon. member for Toronto stands a distinguished ornament, and Mr. Gurney is powerful in the stove trust), all of whom were expected to contribute in proportion to the advantages they received.

Next in order comes the contractors on public works. Here there is every opportunity for a corrupt government, and the evidence given before the committee of the House last session show it was made the most of.

I ask the attention of the House particularly to this statement in view of the Klondike deal:

The Minister practically holds almost every contractor at his mercy, and except in the case of a dispute and of some party turning Queen's evidence, detection is a very difficult matter.

Look at this Klondike matter. I read the contract yesterday. It is within the power of the Government to allow the company to make enormous earnings under any circumstances, but a mere turn of the hand on the part of the Government could put millions in their pockets. What does this mean on the eve of an election, when a party can go to these men and say that the party requires $200,000 or $300,000? Of course it will be forthcoming. That is what the Minister of Trade and Commerce meant. As the hon. gentleman has now come to his seat, I will again revert to the tariff. The hon. gentleman said in that speech:

This state of things is due to a fiscal system which has turned a considerable percentage of our most active business men into legalized robbers, how much to the steady and systematic debauchery of the subsidized press, and how much to the spectacle of direct, continuous and organized corruption with which every politician is only too familiar.

"Legalized robbers" is the phrase that the Minister applies to manufacturers, and it must be remembered that those manufacturers are to-day as well protected as when he made that speech.

Mr. FOSTER. Better.

Mr. DAVIN. The member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram) says they are better protected, and that they have confidence. What hope then have the farmers of the North-west Territories of having those promises implemented, when the Minister of Trade and Commerce refuses to answer the appeals of his own party and the appeals of the independent press? The hon. gentleman must have read what the "Star" said of him—that he is the last plank to which the pure Liberals of this country were clinging. That journal declared that he is the last hope of the pure Liberals to save them from the boodling element. How is the hon. gentleman doing it? In a weak and ineffective way he defends the Klondike deal, and hon. gentlemen opposite, knowing well that he is a powerful man and a man of experience and knowledge, awaited his statement in response to the cheers that greeted him the other night. They were cheers from the Liberal ranks that the hon. gentleman has not received in other days. They marked a lingering hope that there was still one sound plank in the Government, which would stand fast in putting down boodlers in contracts entered upon by the Government; and the "Star" appealed to him, and the best element of the Liberal party appealed to him, but I am sorry to say there is no sign that the hon. gentleman is going to rise to the opportunity afforded him.

I have here a paragraph written by Mr. Willison, from London, and which appeared in the "Globe" on October 23rd, 1897. Mr. Willison wrote, praising the right hon. the Prime Minister:

But while ornate and eloquent, it was soon found that his head was in thorough command of his tongue, and that he could not be stampeded by any organized demonstration of cheering or led into by-paths by the seductive luring of even the Duke of Devonshire or Mr. Chamberlain.

What was the seductive luring of the Duke of Devonshire and Mr. Chamberlain but the candid and broad offer of preferential trade? So we have it stamped and driven home that as regards Canada obtaining preferential trade, although the Prime Minister found on visiting England that not merely the statesmen, but the farmers were prepared to accord it, he cast it aside and came back and declared it was all a piece of frippery, a piece of diplomacy. Of course we cannot take stock in it, none whatever. In regard to this matter I do not think it is necessary to say anything further, for if ever there was a nail driven home, that nail has been driven home.

I spoke about promises not being kept. One of the promises is a very interesting one at the present moment, for it seems to be that one of our North-west institutions in the future is to be the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). One of the promises made was this, that the Government would not spend money on expensive buildings in small places. But what did we see last session? We saw—and probably that is the explanation why the hon. gentleman is coming up to reign at the palace at Regina—the hon. member voting with twenty Tories against the present Government. On concurrence he moved a resolution in regard to public buildings and was supported by nineteen members, including the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Bain), and some other good Liberals. Thus we had the hon. gentleman voting against his party, and I rather think he planned to make things unpleasant for the Government just as Mr. Langelier had done; and as Mr. Langelier was hoisted on the bench, so the hon. member for Wellington is going to be a figure-head for the North-west vessel, now breasting its future, for it has just been launched into practically responsible government, and I suppose this appointment will be made partially because the hon. gentleman intended to make it unpleasant for his friends. There was another promise that has not been kept. It was a promise in regard to the votes for railways. That promise has not been kept, and there is not a promise made by the party now in power that has been kept.

We are entering on a new era. Although we are entering on a new era, who are the real leaders of the country? The Conservatives. One epoch is ever the child of another. The epoch that has gone before this epoch of thirty years, the epoch of national expansion, was the natural father of this epoch of colonial equality in imperial union, and yet we hear from the Government nothing but a faltering cry. But throughout the Dominion of Canada that note is strong, and that note will receive expression, and when the first opportunity occurs the people of the country will overthrow this Government, which stands with its pledges violated, its honour stained, its record lowered in the dust by its own conduct for these twenty months. That Government, Sir will at the first opportunity, melt away like, in the rays of the sun in early spring, a mockery king of snow.

Mr. BENNETT moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested to me by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, that the members would be very much interested in the lecture which is to be delivered this evening by Mr. Ogilvie on the Klondike region. For my part, speaking on behalf of the Government, we are in the hands of the members. If it is the wish of our friends on both sides, we are willing to accede to it. May I ask if there is any probability that we shall soon see the end of the floods of eloquence which we have listened to for several days, so that the debate can be concluded this week.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. So far as I can see, I do not know of any disposition to continue the debate much longer, and I think it is very near its termination. I must say that I think it would be of great advantage to the members to have an opportunity of hearing the very interesting, instructive and able lecture of Mr. Ogilvie.

The PRIME MINISTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 6 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 10th February, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REPORT.

Report of the Auditor General for the year ending 30th June, 1897.—(Mr. Fielding)

MOUNTED POLICE PENSIONS.

Mr. DAVIN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 15) further to amend the Mounted Police Pension Act, 1889.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

Mr. DAVIN.

FRANCHISE ACT AMENDMENT.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 16) to repeal the Franchise Act and make provision in lieu thereof. He said: The object of this Bill is to repeal the existing Franchise Act and to substitute therefor the laws of the different provinces as to the qualification of voters, polling divisions and preparation of lists.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Bertram for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, when, last evening, I moved the adjournment of the debate, the hon. leader of the Government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) asked the leader on this side (Sir Charles Tupper) when this flood of oratory might be expected to cease. I can promise the right hon. gentleman that so far as I am concerned, there will be no attempt at oratory. While the hon. gentleman assumed an air of jocularly, I was fully convinced that there was within his breast a deep and earnest desire that this debate might at once close. He would desire that, no doubt, because of the fact that, as he must know, the eyes of the people of this Dominion are upon himself and the gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches with him. The hon. gentleman knows that Canadians are a reading people and that they are anxiously perusing the newspapers of the day. Aye, and worse still for the hon. gentlemen and his friends, he knows that that which is to-day throughout the Dominion the greatest moral force, the independent press, is strongly against him and those associated with him. Why, Sir, even such partisan newspapers as the Montreal "Witness" from time to time denounce the hon. gentleman. Such newspapers as the organ of the hon. gentleman from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), the Simcoe "Reformer," issue by issue, are reading lessons to the hon. gentleman and his friends. And now and then, from the honest columns of the Huntingdon "Gleaner," comes the complaint that the hon. gentlemen are to-day, after eighteen months of power, false to every pledge they made in the long eighteen years when they were in Opposition. Therefore it is, I believe, that the hon. gentleman desires and asks that this debate should be at once brought to a close. Moreover, he knows that a storm is rising in his following. I do not refer to the men who sit there with their positions in their pockets and who, therefore, readily respond to the crack of the party whip. I do not refer to the men similar to those who sat here last session with judgeships and lieutenant-governorships in their pockets, men so suspicious of their leader that they would not take his word, but must needs have him write his promise. I do not ask, or intend to ask, that these hon. gentlemen should listen to a word I say, for I know that words of mine would be wasted upon them. Nor do I seek to be heard by the hon. gentlemen who in the past year have been hurrying from one end of the civil service to the other in order to have their friends and relatives foisted into public positions. Who, knowing what the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) had said in years past, would have believed that he would be one of the first to have a hungry political friend, aye, a relative, too, given a place in the Kingston Penitentiary? Who would have expected that the hon. gentleman would sit here having in his pocket the promise of the lieutenantship of the North-west? And it is a notorious fact that such is the case. Only the other day, in the plenitude of his zeal to do his party a service, he jumped up unasked and endorsed the Yukon deal, though the Minister of Justice (Mr. Mills) tells him that the deal he is prepared to endorse may be so modified and changed as to be almost unrecognizable.

The hon. gentleman should restrain his ebullition, he should restrain his gratitude, and exhibit at least some decency by showing that while he is grateful, he is not boastful of having been so easily mollified. Now, the hon. gentleman who moved the Address in this House, the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram), made, in my opinion, a very debatable address. He boldly plunged into the pastime of throwing down challenges, and one of the most wonderful statements the hon. gentleman made was that to-day the Dominion of Canada was proud in the fact that it has a Government that had redeemed every pledge that it had made. Redeemed every pledge to whom? Why, redeemed the pledge made to the hon. member for North Leeds (Mr. Frost) that the duty should be kept on agricultural implements. But have they redeemed the promises they made to the farmers of this country that the duties should be removed from agricultural implements? Have they redeemed any of the long list of pledges that they made in respect of tariff changes in this country? Sir, I join with great pleasure in the congratulations from this side of the House, as well as the other, that in Ontario to-day, aye, Sir, and throughout the whole Dominion, we are enjoying a greater prosperity than we have been for years past. But surely the hon. gentleman will not be so arrogant as to claim credit for that for his own party. There is not a man who reads, or a man who runs, but knows that had it not been for the immense mineral development of British Columbia and the Yukon district, to-day throughout Ontario the woollen mills that are running full time would all be closed. Those are some of the causes that have brought about the prosperity that we are all rejoiced to know exists in the country. But the country knows very well that the state of confidence now prevailing in the Dominion to-day is due to the fact that the Liberal-Conservative press from one end of the Dominion to the other, instead of assailing the Government by decrying the state of the country, have loyally upheld the interests of Canada, and claimed that the times were better and were improving. The Conservative press has not resorted to the schemes and machinations the "Globe" was wont to resort to, in hounding down the country and depicting it in the darkest colours. I say that hon. gentlemen opposite have to thank the people of this country for having some confidence in them to-day; they have also to thank the Conservative press throughout the length and breadth of this Dominion for its patriotic course. Now, Sir, the leader of the Government was not at all happy I think the other night in addressing the House. It seems to me that some of the hon. gentlemen who sit behind him and who are to-day independent—and I trust there are many independent men on that side of the House—could not have been pleased to hear the hon. member for Centre Toronto, with his well-known protectionist principles, stand up in the House and champion the cause of this Government, this Government whose members had for years appeared before the people of Canada with promises that if they were returned to power they would break the shackles of industry, and do away with the monopolies which they claimed were existing in this country. Why, Sir, if there is a bloated monopolist to-day in this House, apart from the hon. member for North Leeds, who is well protected, it is the hon. member for Centre Toronto who, had he not declared in strong terms in the city of Toronto on the eve of his election, that he was a protectionist, would not be seen in this House to-day. Why, Sir, where were the Ministers upon that occasion? Where was the Postmaster General? Where was the Controller of Customs? Why did we not see the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the city of Toronto on that occasion appealing to the electors in the strong and vigorous language that he used years ago, calling the manufacturers scoundrels great and scoundrels small, who were bleeding the people of Canada white. None of them were found there. But the hon. member for Centre Toronto, in one of his addresses on that occasion, said:

I say there should be no further revision of the tariff of any consequence for at least ten years—

And the newspapers report that that sentiment was greeted with loud applause. Then he went on :

—so that the people can go on and do business without hesitation. We stand on that plank at present, that the tariff should be left as it is, and give the business men a chance to go on and develop the trade of the country without fear of any change in the tariff.

Why, Sir, who ever heard of such humiliation, who ever heard of such a backing down on the part of a political party? I believe that to-day the large majority of the electors of this country, if the opportunity were afforded them at the polls, would say that the hon. gentlemen had by their practices done exactly what was expected of them. We find to-day that in Canada the two great parties are no longer divided on the question of free trade and protection. I think it would be better for some hon. gentlemen opposite, some of the independent members, if such there are, that they should take action after the example of their ex-leader the Hon. Edward Blake, who, when he saw that he could not allow himself to be dragged down to the point of making a complete somersault in politics, boldly went out of his party and at least preserved for himself a clear conscience and a knowledge of having retained the respect of the honest men in this country irrespective of politics. But that change having taken place, and the line of demarcation between the parties being no longer drawn between free trade and protection, the distinction between the parties must now exist in respect to the action of the leader of the Government on his recent visit in England, the line between the parties in this country must be based on the question whether the party in power are or are not in favour of preferential trade with England. From this side of the House the declaration has gone up in unmistakable terms that the Liberal-Conservative party are a unit on that platform, and when the time comes I believe our party will await with confidence the verdict of the people on that issue. Now, Sir, the leader of the Government and his party followers have completely changed their position, have changed their views on protection, and embraced the policy of their opponents. The hon. gentleman the other night saw fit to make no denial of the many strong charges made against him in that respect, and in a very petulant mood, in a very angry tone, deprecated the opinion that had been expressed on this side of the House. He said that such utterances were humiliating, unparliamentary and improper. Well, I cannot help but think that the term "humiliation" as applied to the hon. gentleman's party is correct, that is provided they have any sense of humiliation. If they have no sense of humiliation, then I must submit that it must be at least annoying. Then the hon. gentleman complains that they have been charged with incompetency in their administration of public affairs. Well, there is a difference of opinion on that point. I am sorry the Postmaster General is not here at the present time because, if there is any gentleman in this House or in this country who thinks that the Postmaster General has not shown himself thoroughly incompetent for his office, then I am greatly mistaken. Why, what did we see? We saw the Postmaster General of Canada issuing an order that the postage on letters from this country to Great Britain was to be three cents, when the merest lad, almost, in the country must have known that there was an international postage arrangement. What is the humiliating position to-day in which the people of this country find themselves? If they send a letter to a friend in the old country the result is that their friend has to pay postage again, unless it has been paid in this country by the department. Could there be a more absurd action taken by any Minister than that? I am sorry for the sake of the hon. Controller of Customs that he, with his lusty lungs, made that announcement in the city of Toronto. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman roared that statement out. However, he has a quarrel with the Postmaster General for presuming on his innocence, I will not say the ignorance of the Controller of Customs, because it was no business of his. Now let the First Minister recall this fact, that the gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches to-day are not masters of the people, but they are the servants of the people of this country, at all times and on all occasions. No answer has been made in the replies delivered by the leader of the Government and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who affected very old jokes and attempted to be jocular with the House; but those hon. gentlemen dare not go into Ontario constituencies and attempt such defences of their party. Do they not know that to-day in Ontario, where the local elections are being waged, one of the greatest charges against the present provincial administration is that their friends and allies in the House have been false to the promises they have made and that it is rebounding on the administration of that province. Friends of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce must have felt almost sorry for the hon. gentleman the other night when the gallant knight laboured to perpetrate jokes, which, no doubt, had been ready cut and dried for the last three months. I did admire the hon. gentleman in his old trenchant and flashing style, when he assailed the National Policy, and all who heard him the other night must have come to the conclusion that Richard is not himself, that he is a different person now when he is a hanger on to office, because the hon. gentleman is only a hanger-on, for he was almost pushed out of the Cabinet, but he still is a hanger-on, although having little standing-ground. There is a special reason why the right hon. leader of the Government felt a little testy. He evidently felt annoyed at being called to account for his past declarations as a democrat. Who would have thought that the right hon. Premier, who promenaded though the country as a democrat, would be the man ready at the first opportunity to accept a glittering bauble when proffered him. But the right hon. gentleman was at a disadvantage in this, that he had the honour thrust upon him, he could not refuse it; and for that reason, as an act of courtesy, he accepted it at the hands of Her Majesty. How different was the position of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. He cannot complain that undue advantage was taken of him, and that he was not advised in advance, for on the day he landed he had knighthood thrust on him. The hon. gentleman's fame had gone abroad, even over to England. I do not know whether it was due to the great legal opinion he delivered last year on preferential trade, but at all events the hon. gentleman's reputation had preceded him, and in fact he stated in an address to his constituents regarding the acceptance of a title, "I wish to be fair and honest. Before I accepted it, I consulted my friends, because I had been advised that the honour would be proffered me." Those hon. gentlemen are to be congratulated on their knighthoods; and while there was a question whether the right hon. Premier was entitled to take a decoration from France, owing to the fact that it could be accepted by a British subject only in case it was given for distinction or prowess on the battlefield, I must say that if this nefarious Yukon deal goes through, there will be several others whose actions in the gold fields will entitle them to honour. Passing from the trade question, let me now consider another phase of public questions. What was and has been during the last eighteen years, particularly in Ontario, the cry and claim of the leader of the Government and those associated with him but that they wanted in Canadian politics nothing but clean men. The hon. gentleman has certainly a very vague and strange idea of what a clean man is in politics. Shades of Alexander Mackenzie! shadows of George Brown! when you look at the motley assortment who sit on the Treasury benches. Every one recollects Alexander Mackenzie's famous letter in which he told privately a friend that he was sitting holding his arms on the public treasury. And why? Because he was afraid of the camp followers and hangers-on. And what a spectacle is presented today. The public treasury is guarded by men who are, if their evidence is true, far from being above suspicion. Fancy the Minister of Public Works in this country, the head of the greatest public spending department, a suppliant at the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway for a paltry $3,000. Why, the Minister of Public Works knew his man, and there is no doubt Mr. Shaughnessy knew his man, whom, for a paltry $3,000, he could get under his thumb.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT. I do not wonder that the hon. gentleman laughs, because it was a small effort. His next job was $20,000 for the Drummond Railway deal.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There is not one word of truth in what the hon. gentleman has said.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Mr. BENNETT. I regret I have not under my hand the evidence in the Grenier case.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There is no evidence of what the hon. gentleman says. There is not one word of truth in it. He will say it again, perhaps.

Mr. BENNETT. I read the evidence in that celebrated case, and surely the hon. gentleman will not deny that he got a loan of $3,000 from Mr. Shaughnessy. Does the hon. gentleman deny it?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not deny it. The hon. gentleman is asking a question. He said he read in the evidence in the Grenier case that I borrowed a sum of money from Mr. Shaughnessy. The facts of the case are these. I have already stated them to the House, and I will state them again. Years ago Mr. Shaughnessy came to me, after I had made great financial losses, and offered me a loan of money. I declined to take a loan of money from him. Then it was suggested that my sons, being in the printing trade, might get an advance, which would be repaid in printing. The amount has been repaid in printing, from the first dollar to the last dollar.

Mr. BENNETT. This shows how easily the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), with a lieutenant-governorship in his pocket, is satisfied. What has the hon. Minister proved by the statement he made? He said that years ago Mr. Shaughnessy came to him and proffered him a loan of money. I accept the statement that years ago Mr. Shaughnessy proffered him a loan of money, which he refused. At that time the hon. gentleman was a hanger-on of the Conservative party, and the reason Mr. Shaughnessy approached him was in order to secure his services with the Conservative party. The hon. gentleman stands convicted. Why should Mr. Shaughnessy approach the hon. gentleman and proffer him money when he was the hanger-on and in the close confidence of the Ministers in the then Conservative Administration? I care not what the hon. gentleman's friends may think of it, or what they may say of it, but this I do know, that sitting among the ranks of hon. gentlemen opposite are men who are ashamed to see in this House and in the Government a man occupying the position of Minister of Public Works who is under such obligation as is that hon. gentleman. Can anything be expected in the way of impartial conduct, can anything be expected of a man who is under the very hands of speculators and jobbers? Is it any wonder that the whole country is affrighted at the spectacle of a man of his stamp and class holding the position he does. What does the Montreal "Witness" say of him? I observe the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is advising the Minister of Public Works he had better keep quiet. I always admired the sagacity of that hon. member, and cannot help but think that at the present moment he is so advising the Minister.

Why, Sir, look at the independent press of this country to-day. Look at friends pressing and crowding the Minister of Public Works to the wall. Ah, Sir, if there is a man secure in the Cabinet to-day, it is the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), for he can stand on his pedestal and dare and defy the whole Liberal party. What is the Prime Minister reported as having said in the province of Quebec a while ago? He said: that if the Minister of Public Works had to leave the Cabinet, he too would have to go. They are a kind of political Siamese Chang and Eng, when one dies the other expires, when one dies the life blood of the other will sap away and he too must go.

We were told that we were to have clean government in this country. That is what some of the hon. gentlemen opposite tell us, but what do some of their own friends say about it? There sit on that side of the House some hon. gentlemen from the province of Ontario who are men of wealth and men of independence. The hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is known throughout the province of Ontario as being a wealthy man. He, from time to time has shown signs of independence; and what is the opinion of the hon. member for Norfolk of the motley assortment who now sit on the Treasury benches? That hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) very properly was accorded by his constituents last fall, on the anniversary of his twenty-fifth year of public life, a demonstration that I think befitted the hon. gentleman, and which was proper and meet. On that occasion an address was presented to him (Mr. Charlton) and if anybody should happen to read that address, they might run away with the opinion that it had been written by the hon. gentleman himself, but I should say it occurred rather in this way: His style of writing and style of speaking has become so popular where he lives, that all the editors have become inoculated by it, and you will consequently see that this address is the writing, or rather the style of the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). Anyhow, on that occasion, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) was presented with an address, and I will read you a sample brick from that address to show you how his style of writing is eagerly followed and copied in that county:

Not only as a party leader have you achieved success and fame, but the name of John Charlton as orator, economist, financier, moral reformer and deadliest foe of vice is a household word with every Canadian family.

Further in this address it goes on to say, and I agree with every word of it, as I agree with what has been said in the past:

We believe it to be your proud distinction to have made an impression on Canadian hearts and homes second to that of no man of your time. There may be those more adroit in political fence, there may be those more versed in artful ways, there may be those who have more wires and strings in hand, but no man in public life holds a securer place in the confidence and esteem of his fellow countrymen.

Well, Sir, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) knows the men who sit behind him; aye, Sir, he knows every one of them, and which one of them did he mean was a political fence? If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) did not write the address he certainly acquiesced in it, and made a most proper reply. Sir, I have always understood that a fence is the man who stands between a thief and the one who has been robbed, and who the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) meant are the fences in that aggregation of hon. gentlemen opposite, is in his heart, but on the present occasion I will be bound to say he will not speak. He says:

They are more adroit in wire-pulling.

Well, I will not ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) to make an explanation on that score, because although he is not of the Cabinet, I do not think he has yet despaired that he may receive the position of Ambassador to Washington. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) is one of the men that his political friends wish to get rid of. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) is to go to the North-west because the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) would not go, and as if the Liberal party had designs on his life, a little time ago, the "Globe" newspaper selected the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to go to the Yukon as ambassador. There must be a deep game going on, when they would want to push from the front ranks the men in the party who on one or two occasions have manifested some signs of independence. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton)—and his friends know it full well—is capable of taking a little adulation and flattery, and this lets in a little light on the secrets of the party, because in this address his admirers go on to say :

‘It is our firm belief that your accession to one of the highest offices of state would be an assurance to all who love morality, justice and equality and hope for advancement, that the halcyon day of Canadian prosperity had surely dawned. This grand and imposing element of your fellow countrymen will never rest until your guiding hand assists in the control of the ship of state.

I wonder which of the present Ministers are helping the hon. gentleman to get into the Cabinet. The “Globe” newspaper wants to send him to the Yukon, and I believe there is not a helping hand extended by any one member of the combination to draw the hon. gentleman in. Then, in a boastful spirit, and I have no doubt it went down very well with the hon. gentleman, his adulators referred to a phase of his political past which is rather inconsistent with the actions of John Charlton, moral reformer, and deadliest foe of vice, because they say this of the hon. gentleman :

The proud position of your party to-day can be regarded by no fair-minded man in any light other than as largely due to your generous bounty.

Well, Sir, I have heard of the hon. gentleman’s generous bounty with the electors in his own riding ; I have read of one dollar bills, and two dollar bills finding their way into cooking stoves, as exposed in the courts in the hon. gentleman’s election trials. Is that the bounty that the hon. gentleman or his friends refer to ?

Mr. CHARLTON. May I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) to correct a misstatement ; one among a great number. I never have had an election trial.

Mr. BENNETT. I thought the hon. member (Mr. Charlton) would drop into the hole ; he came down without shooting. Why, I knew it was not the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton). He has always been too canny to have an election trial ; it was his brother who was the wicked partner. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will declare that that was disclosed in the evidence in one of the election trials of his brother. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) has said that I have made misstatements, but surely he will not repudiate that magnificent address, and surely he will not blame me for bringing before this House—and I trust before a small section of the country—portions of that address, which show the high esteem and the high regard in which he is held.

There was another gentleman in this House last session, and he had an excellent opportunity of finding out the companions with whom he was fettered ; I refer to the late hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr.

Lount). That gentleman (Mr. Lount) came here heralded as a great lawyer, as a great advocate, and as a man who would speedily come to the front. Mr. Lount came here but he soon quit the company in which he found himself, and why did he ? I shall read from the Toronto “Globe” of Nov. 16th, and these are the reasons, among others, why Mr. Lount quitted the company he was in :

A man, however, had to think of something more than the public interests. His time had been encroached on so much that it became a question to him whether he would have to live on his parliamentary allowance, retire from public life, or become a professional politician. He was not prepared to do the latter. However inefficiently he might have discharged his work in Parliament, his record was clean from any taint of foul or wrongful doing. Nor would he descend to the position of making up professional losses by advantages to be gained in public life.

Mr. Lount sat right among these hon. gentlemen, he was closeted with them, he was surrounded by them, and when he looked on every hand and saw what he declared to be the making up of professional losses by unprofessional conduct and by disgraceful actions, he was not prepared to be associated with that party any longer. When these hon. gentlemen talk of giving to the people of Canada a clean administration, they must by their actions, and not by their words, show and prove to the people of Canada that they want nothing but clean men in public life.

Now, the hon. gentlemen, after a long recess, have brought before this House and the people of this country a proposition most startling in its magnitude. The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram) properly stated that the Government of the day was a bold Government and a plucky Government. Sir, I agree with the statement of the hon. gentleman that they are bold. Why, they are bold even to madness. I agree with him that they are plucky. Why, Sir, no men could possibly have the pluck these hon. gentlemen have, if they followed reasonable and rational conduct. Why, Sir, what have they done ? They come to-day before Parliament with a proposition which for magnitude has never before had its equal or has never been approached by anything in the manner and form of a public undertaking. These hon. gentlemen are prepared to give away the very greatest riches that have ever been disclosed in the whole world—for what ? For a consideration most paltry and most absurd. One needs only to go back six months in the political history of Canada to see how coolly and cautiously all these plans have been laid. One has only to peruse the files of the “Globe” newspaper and read what that paper has said on behalf of the men behind this immense contract, to see that it is not the sudden thought of a day, but a monstrous scheme which was brought into existence months ago, and is only now sprung upon public attention. When the hon. Minister of Railways brought the scheme before the House, what excuse had he to offer for lack of explanation? If the proposition is of the extent which the country believes it is, no Minister should come before the House and the country without being fully prepared to explain it in all its details. Why, Sir, who are to-day behind this huge scheme? Look into the public prints of Ontario. Boldly and without a blush, not wishing to retract or withdraw, are to be found Mann & Mackenzie, a large firm of public contractors. Allied with them are Mr. Robert Jaffray, Senator Cox and other men who are known as large capitalists in the province of Ontario; and beside and beyond all this, all these men are known to be in close touch with the political party of the day. The hon. gentlemen at the outset make this excuse: they say there is reason for producing this proposition at the present time because time is flying and the proposition must be taken up at once. Why, Sir, one would imagine that it had only been within the last few weeks that the great wealth of the Yukon district had been known to the people of this Dominion. The Ministry underrate the intelligence of the people of Canada, when they say that, because away back in May, 1897, it was well known to the public press of Canada that unlimited wealth was to be found in the Yukon district. Then, the Government had before them the reports of the explorations of Mr. Ogilvie, their own surveyor; they had maps of the country; they had all the information that they have to-day. Why, then, did not the Government come down a year ago with this proposition? Simply by reason of the fact that they knew that the proposition was so wild and so great that they were afraid to spring it upon their supporters in this House, much less upon the country. But Mann & Mackenzie waited and got exactly what they wanted; they got an opportunity to show to these gentlemen their strength and power in the province of Ontario. The Centre Toronto election was a tribute to it, the monied power of Mann & Mackenzie gained the fight for them; and from the moment the Government, pleased with their success, were willing to take upon themselves the burden of this contract. Sir, there is no excuse for the Government coming before Parliament and the country to-day and telling them that this matter is of such urgency and of such pressing moment that it must necessarily be proceeded with; because a year ago the Government possessed all the facts which they are in possession of to-day.

But there is another proposition of the hon. gentlemen in which they violated all their ante-election promises. They have come before this Parliament to-day, as they did in the case of that nefarious Drummond Railway deal, and have asked their followers—what? To vote through a contract into which they have entered without asking their followers whether that contract is or is not agreeable to them. The hon. leader of the Government wishes this debate to come to a close. No wonder he does, because he saw last year what a public discussion in this House was. He saw in this House last year, by the long discussion which took place on the Drummond deal, and by the nature of the exposure of it in the public prints, that that scheme was, as I believe it is, effectually killed. The people of this Dominion have to thank the Conservative party for having ripped in the bud one of the most outrageous steals and raids on the public treasury ever attempted; and hon. gentlemen will find to-day in this House a spirit of independence so strong among the independent members on their own side, that they will be forced to withdraw this Bill. Why, Sir, at the outset the Government bring down a Bill and ask their supporters to take it in its entirety; and after they have heard the complaints that have been made, the Minister of Justice has been forced to admit in the Senate that the contract is not a binding contract; that the contract which has been submitted to Parliament is not a contract that they will be asked to ratify, but that such changes will be made in it as the supporters of the Government will be willing to accede to. Why, Sir, what does all that prove? It proves that the very boldness of these exploiters of the raid on the public treasury, Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, did not themselves believe that they could pass through Parliament a scheme of this kind; and so they have gone into the work, asking the Ministry to make the best possible deal they can, and they will consent to that arrangement. Why, it is idle to address hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to any professions they have made, because they throw them all to the winds. No sense of decency is left in them, and I am pleased to know that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) is in the city to-day, because we may look to him to denounce this Government, as he did the late Government, for what he was pleased to term raids on the public treasury. I hope that he will, in accordance with the wishes of his constituency—and I know the wishes of many of his constituents—denounce this outrageous raid which to-day is being made on the public treasury. Why, here are men who for years were protesting that every contract should come before Parliament, that its terms should be submitted to Parliament and assented to before the Government were committed to it—here they are to-day taking the high ground of not asking the intervention of Parliament but of bringing down to their subservient followers a bill of fare and telling them that they must accept it in its entirety. But I am pleased to be able to say that the opposition which has been manifested to this scheme in this House and the exposures of it made by the press throughout the country, have had the effect of forcing the Government to capitulate, so that we had the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Mills) telling us yesterday in the Senate that the Bill was so bad the Government would not call on its followers to swallow it in its entirety. These hon. gentlemen are plunging into this enterprise, without knowing where they stand; although one would imagine that, guided by the experience of the past, they would be very chary before taking any more leaps in the dark.

What is the proposition with regard to construction? They come before Parliament to-day with a proposition, the strongest plea in favour of which is that they are about to construct an all-Canadian route. But, at the same time, they are forced to admit, as hon. Ministers did yesterday, that they are not sure of their ground even in that regard. When the Stikine River is reached, they know that there must of necessity be transshipment from the larger to the smaller vessels, and they know that such transshipment is amenable to the customs laws of the United States. True, the hon. Controller of Customs (Mr. Paterson) said yesterday that he believed an arrangement had been entered into for transshipment into Canadian vessels going up to Dawson City by the St. Michael's River. I would now ask that hon. gentleman if his statement that arrangements had been made with the United States Government to permit the interchange of commodities from ocean-going vessels to river boats in the Yukon River is also applicable to the Stikine?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). As I remember it, in the United States regulations, the name of Stikine does not specifically appear, but they mention Juneau, Dyea, and, I think, St. Michaels and other ports in this country. I think that is the wording. I can show the hon. gentleman the rules, but I have not got them under my hand.

Mr. BENNETT. Surely the hon. gentlemen are not going to take such a leap in the dark as that, after the experience with the English postage and the preferential trade matters. No wonder the London "Times," in view of the course of the Government on postage and preferential trade matters, should have thrown out the word of warning which I will read for the benefit of hon. Ministers:

In any case, goods carried by this route have to be transhipped from ocean steamers to river steamers at Fort Wrangell, where the American customs levy their duties. It appears, however, that the actual navigation of the river, as long as it remains within the Alaskan boundary, is guaranteed as free by our treaties with Russia and with the United States. We are bound to assume that the Government of the Canadian Dominion have taken all these matters into account before entering into the contract for the railway, which is intended to effect the connection between the Pacific coast and the Yukon.

I suppose, however, the Government expect blind support from their followers, even if no reasonable solution is given of that question.

Now, if there is one clause in this whole Bill that should be denounced, and denounced without stint, it is the monopoly clause. For the next ten years, no other railway is to be allowed in that country, and contractors may extort—and I think that is only a fair word to use in view of the enormous powers conferred upon them—what rates they please from those who will have to use their railway. For the first four years they are allowed to charge whatever rates they please; but we will assume, for the sake of argument, that they will charge at the rate of $1 per 100 pounds. After four years, they are only to charge at the rate of 75 cents per 100 pounds, carrying out their calculation on the basis of $1 per 100 pounds. Three years after they are allowed to charge 56 cents per 100 pounds, so that to-day these hon. gentlemen are giving this gigantic monopoly the privilege of charging their passengers and customers a great deal more than they are prepared to accept in seven years from to-day, or nearly 50 per cent more than a proper and fair rate. Yesterday the House was treated by one of the British Columbia members to an estimate of the vast amount of freight that would be taken from this country, and when one takes that into account, one cannot help seeing that the privileges conferred under this monopoly clause are simply enormous.

Now, if it be correct, as is stated by the hon. Minister of Justice in the Senate, that changes are to be made in this agreement, all I can say is that this side of the House can fairly take credit to themselves for having drawn this concession from the Government, and as we have made these hon. gentlemen converts to protection in the past, so we may congratulate ourselves on having made them converts in this matter.

But when one comes to realize the immense grant of lands that the Government have given to these contractors, one is almost staggered at its gigantic proportions. Last night Mr. Ogilvie, the surveyor, whose name is now world-wide, owing to his connection with the Yukon district, made this statement, as reported in the public press, that there are 149,000 square miles of mineralized lands in that country. Under this proposition, this company is to have 5,850 square miles of those lands. And what kind of lands? Not such lands as may be allotted to them by the Government, but the very pick and choice of the best lands in that country. I make an estimate on this calculation, which is a fair calculation, that of the 149,000 square miles of territory, five per cent will be the very best and choicest mineralized lands, and the House will see, at a glance, that these contractors are to have 5,850 square miles of the very choicest mineralized lands. What is worse than that, they are not bound to select their lands at once but are given time, so that the hardy pioneer, the sturdy miner, who, at the risk of his life, goes into that country, becomes simply a prospecting agent in the hands of Mann & Mackenzie for their benefit and nothing else. Why, Mr. Speaker, the boldness of the proposition is such as to startle any one. And no wonder the hon. gentlemen are anxious to have this startling proposition rushed through the House.

Now we can make comparisons. I have information that I believe to be correct, showing the fabulous wealth of that country. I have had the privilege of conversing with a gentleman who recently returned from that country. One can hardly believe that the tales that are told on that subject are within the realm of truth. But it was to be expected that great gold deposits would be found there. In the northern part of British Columbia for the last forty years rich gold finds have been made, and across Behring Straits, in Russian territory, it is a notorious fact there are mines that have been worked to the greatest extent and have yielded unbounded wealth. It was a matter of conjecture, therefore, that in this Yukon district there were exceedingly rich deposits. And to-day we find men going there and taking up small holdings of one or two hundred feet, which holdings yield not thousands merely, but millions of dollars. But yet it is intended to throw away this vast quantity—5,850 square miles of the finest mineral lands in that whole country for the benefit of this gigantic monopoly and those who are behind it. Why, does this House know that the famous mine known as Le Roi mine in British Columbia, covers a space of only 162 acres, and does the House know that $3,000,000 has been offered for this 162 acres? Yet the wealth of British Columbia does not begin to compare with the untold wealth of this Yukon district. The confidential reports of Mr. Ogilvie are before the department, but the department ignores them, and puts into the hands of this gigantic monopoly 5,850 square miles of the best mineral lands in that country. Sir, the people of the province of Ontario, I know, expect from the men who sit on the other side to remonstrate against this proposal. I see before me on that side men of means, men who are not place-hunters, men who have not been placated within the last six months by the gift of paltry offices for the benefit of needy relatives, men who are expected to stand up for the interests of the Dominion. I appeal to such men as the hon. member for North

Mr. BENNETT.

Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to assert their independence. I appeal to the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Bain), to the hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Somerville), to the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan). I was going to say the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron), but he has been placated since last session by having the postmastership of Goderich given to his son-in-law. I do appeal with some confidence to the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and also to the hon. member for Kent, a gentleman of means who is not an applicant for any office at the hands of the Government, a man whose constituency expects from him some remonstrance in this matter. I expect as much from the hon. member from West Durham (Mr. Beith). And so I could go through the whole list. I do not wish to be personal, but there are men on that side of the House who, if the public prints are correct, stand in as unenviable a position as did Langelier who represented Centre Quebec until his recent appointment to office. The names of these gentlemen are in the public prints and in the mouths of their friends as being recipients of the Government's bounty. I do not expect from men who have positions in prospect any remonstrance against such a proposition as this, but I do expect from such gentlemen as those I have named, as well as from some other provinces than Ontario, that they will manifest their disapproval of this proposition.

But after this Government has given away the richest heritage the country ever had, what are we to get in return? Why, the Prime Minister told us that the building of this tramway is only a temporary arrangement after all, and that within a little time some substantial means of communication with that district must be provided. Where are the hon. members from the North-west? Where is the hon. member from Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis), the member from Alberta (Mr. Oliver), whose constituents expect them to stand up for the construction of a line from Edmonton? What are these hon. gentlemen to have in order to help along the line through their country? Mackenzie & Mann are to have over half of the richest lands of the Yukon; who, then, is to pay for the line of railway from Edmonton that must be given to these hon. gentlemen to placate them and secure their vote for this monstrous proposal? Why, for that they must come back to the older provinces; and we shall be asked to plunge our hands into the public chest to aid this line of railway so as to conciliate the constituents of these hon. gentlemen simply because they have subserviently accepted this scheme to make Mackenzie & Mann multi-millionaires.

Where is Mr. Mackenzie to-day? It is announced in the public press that he is en route to England. This great scheme does not affect him enough to keep him in the country to look after it and assist it through Parliament. He knows he need not be here; he knows that willing hands are here to force the deal through. But Mr. Mackenzie is accustomed to guide great enterprises, and he is now on his way to England—to do what? To lay before English capitalists the contract he has with the Canadian Government, to show them that he has the abounded wealth of the Yukon in the hollow of his hand. And he will be able to come back to this country with a company formed, the stock of which will amount—to thousands, as I was about to say—no, but tens of millions of dollars. Never was such a proposition laid before Parliament to despoil the whole country of its greatest wealth. Why, as compared with this, some of the arrangements of this Government are puny, are pigmy things. Yesterday afternoon the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) referred to what has been called the “Dan Rose book.” It is scandalous for the Dominion of Canada to have emblazoned on such a book that it is authorized by the Dominion of Canada—a cheap-jack scheme to put into the pockets of a party hack like Rose three or four hundred thousand dollars. And as a reward for what? For services rendered by him in St. John’s Ward to secure the election of the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram). It is a disgrace to the Dominion to have offered on the public news-stands a book of that kind, filled as it is with cheap advertisements, and on the outside the announcement that it is authorized by the Dominion of Canada. I am told on good authority that the book which is to-day being sold at 50 cents a copy could have been produced at 10 cents a copy at the Printing Bureau here. What would have been the effect if it had been so produced? Why, the Government could have flooded Europe and the United States with that book, and it would have been the greatest advertisement that Canada ever had. But instead of that it is handed over to a party heeler to make a large profit for himself. Then we are told in the next breath that Parliament is going to get 10,000 copies of the book. May I ask, if there is any Minister here who knows anything of these trifling matters of the Yukon deal or the book, is that book to be distributed among the members of Parliament? I would ask, Mr. Speaker, if there is any Minister who is enough concerned in this trifling Yukon deal to inform the House—

Mr. LANDERKIN. Put a notice on the paper.

Mr. BENNETT. I accept the statement of the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin). I regret that he is not a member of the Cabinet. I think he is much more able and much more fit to be one, and he is certainly much more courteous, than the most of them.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I do not think you are a judge.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman says I was mistaken in thinking that he was courteous. I will admit that I took for substantial the veneer. Now, may I ask the Ministers, will any one of them condescend to tell us if this book is to be distributed to any extent by the Government, either in Canada, the United States or Europe, or to members of Parliament?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). There are 20,000 copies to be distributed.

Mr. BENNETT. Where?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Very largely to be given to members to distribute.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Might I suggest to the hon. gentleman that if the book is now published, members of Parliament have reason to expect promptly to receive copies of it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I can assure the hon. gentleman they will be placed in the hands of members of Parliament the moment they are received, and a good many more than one copy.

Mr. BENNETT. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to transgress much longer on the time of the House. But I want to say this, that I do not appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite for any change of heart, with very few exceptions, on this question. I have seen those hon. gentlemen opposite subservient to the party whip two sessions ago, and I know that they will, most of them, always be responsive to that. But those hon. gentlemen must remember that the time will come when they must come down from the lofty position they are taking as masters of the people, and become servants of the people. Let them remember that never did a political party in the province of Ontario present the humiliating spectacle that that party presents to-day. Outside of this Cabinet there is not a man sitting behind the Government who aspires to a Cabinet position, not a single one. Fancy, in the great province of Ontario, the banner province, as it has been heralded, of Liberalism, to be backed up, not by men with ambition to come to the front ranks in their country, but by men who wish to drag from their masters positions such as they think themselves capable of filling. Why, who could believe that such a spectacle would be presented by the Liberal party? Who could imagine the present state of things who remembers how often those hon. gentlemen declaimed throughout the province of Ontario that when they did come into power there would not be found a man ambitious enough in their ranks to ask for Cabinet preferment? Yet we see their humiliating position to-day. There sit to-day behind the leader, men before whom for months there has been dangled the position of a judgeship at Toronto. Their friends know it. The former member for Centre Toronto had the promise dangling before him until he became disgusted, and retired from the House. There are two gentlemen there to-day who, if they intended to remain in public life, would not be so subservient as they are, but would be kicking against the pricks. To-day a Senatorship in the province of Ontario is dangled before them, because the Government feel it gives them the votes of two or three men who sit behind them. To-day, and for years past, positions have been dangled before the hungry followers of the hon. gentlemen, and well enough they know it.

Mr. LANDERKIN. There is no hunger in the land now.

Mr. BENNETT. But sometimes my hon. friend experiences drought. Now, Sir, I take this occasion to protest, in the name of the constituency that I have the honour to represent in this House, against this gigantic, this monstrous, exploitation of the public treasury. I protest against it in the name of common decency, because it is not common decency to give untold millions of dollars worth of property away to any exploiters of the public treasury. Sir, I say that as long as this session does last, and I trust the session will run into months before this monstrous proposition will be accepted by this House, I shall oppose it. I trust that as we have already, by discussion in this House, affected the public mind, and even affected some of the independent members on the Opposition side, because we have forced the Minister of Justice yesterday to state that the Government are prepared to recede from the position they originally took—so do I hope and trust that by discussing this matter to the bitter end, we shall secure some modification of the contract, while the Government may still go on with the work, which I am pleased to see has been commenced, because every hon. gentleman on this side of the House, I believe, is in favour of the construction of that road at the earliest possible date. But let the Ministers come to the House with a reasonable and fair proposition, and I am bound to say that it will receive the support and hearty acquiescence of every hon. gentleman on this side of the House. But so long as they ask us to approve a proposition as monstrous as this one, then I can tell the Government that so far as my humble efforts are concerned, even at the risk of pre-longing this session many months, it will meet with my determined opposition.

Mr. BENNETT.

Mr. CRAIG. I would not rise to address the House at this moment if I thought any member on the other side wished to take the floor, but as I understand none of them will attempt to speak, I will go on and discuss some features of the Address. I am sure that all the members on this side of the House join in congratulations on the prosperity of the country, although I cannot agree with some of the reasons which are stated, and which have been given by the hon. member for Centre Toronto, for this prosperity. In the few remarks I shall make I intend to criticise, in some respects, the speech of the hon. member for Centre Toronto. He claims that while some share of the prosperity this country is now enjoying came from a bountiful harvest, for which we are all thankful, yet the chief part of this prosperity came from the fiscal policy of the Government, adopted at the last session of Parliament. He says:

This Parliament, by its action last session in the revision of the tariff, gave the business people of the country a confidence they did not possess before.

Sir, this is a remarkable statement, and I would ask why the revision of the tariff last session gave the business people confidence. I answer that it is because the tariff was not materially changed. The people of this country had been listening for eighteen years to hon. gentlemen opposite, then in Opposition, who declared that protection was the curse of this country; that as soon as they came into power they would do away with every vestige of it; that the tariff would be entirely changed, and they would go as far as they possibly could in the direction of free trade; that while they could not adopt free trade at the present time, yet free trade was the goal at which they aimed. I say the people of the country listened to that, and a great many of them believed what was said. Many of the farmers of the country believed that when the Liberal party came into power free trade would be in a great measure introduced. The business men and manufacturers feared these promises would be carried out, and as the hon. member for Centre Toronto said, referring to the tariff of last year, that tariff gave confidence to the business people because the principle of protection was retained. I wish it to be distinctly understood that it was not because free trade elements were introduced in the tariff, it was not because the party now in power carried out their promises and pledges made in Opposition that confidence was restored, but it was because they retained the principle of protection and thereby showed the people they were not going to destroy our manufacturing industries all over the country which had been built up by the National Policy. The hon. gentleman also said :

There was an impression—I do not deny it—in the minds of business people and manufacturers that the fiscal policy of the Liberal party could not be relied upon to the same extent as the fiscal policy of the Conservative party.

That was a very natural impression, and the hon. gentleman said it existed. Why? Because the people took the Liberal party at their word and believed they were sincere; they had listened to speeches delivered by the present First Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and thought they were sincere in making those promises, and that they were not delivering speeches simply in order to get into power, when all their promises and pledges would be cast aside. They were told that the Liberal party believed in free trade and would put in practice their professions if they came into power, and the general impression prevailing over the country among business men, and especially among manufacturers and workingmen, was that their policy was not so sound as it ought to be. I was very much amazed to listen to the hon. member for Centre Toronto, when he said that the pledges made by the Liberal party in the country had been redeemed in every particular. The hon. member who seconded the Address is a poet. I think a poet should have made that remark, because it should not assuredly have been made by a business man. How any man could look at the pledges and promises made by members of the present Government when in Opposition, read them carefully and calmly, and declare that those pledges had been fulfilled in every particular, is more than I can understand. But it depends, no doubt, on the members who may be considered to represent the Liberal party. If the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Frost), the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood), or the Minister of Customs, are collectively or individually taken as representing the party, then I can understand the statement, because all those gentlemen have in past days declared their belief in the principle of protection. Under the Mackenzie Government they advocated protection. They told Mr. Mackenzie how the workingmen in Montreal, as a result of the tariff, were starving and soup kitchens were being established, and they asked the Government to adopt protection. But if the present Premier, or the Minister of Trade and Commerce, or the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, is to be considered as representing the Liberal party, I do not understand how the party have fulfilled their pledges. We all know how those hon. gentlemen denounced protection, how they said it was a curse to the country, how they proclaimed that, when they got into power, they would demolish every vestige of protection. Those declarations were familiar to members of this House and to the people of the country, and the "Globe" reported those promises and pledges and gave them as a reason why the party should be returned to power. At all events, that proved to be one reason why they were returned to power. It was, however, only one reason. Another great question came up, and that proved an important factor; but a leading reason in the western country, no doubt, was the declaration of leading members of the Liberal party, that if returned to power, they would frame a tariff in the direction of free trade. The hon. member for Centre Toronto made another remarkable statement. He said :

Now, I quite agree with the hon. leader of the Opposition that if such (denunciation of protection) had been the conduct of the Liberal party during eighteen years, that party would be unworthy of the confidence of the people.

I pronounce hon. gentlemen opposite unworthy of the confidence of the people on the ground stated, because I hold that any party which makes pledges and acquires power and casts them aside—some of the parties say they never made such pledges—is unworthy of the confidence of the people. I know there are many staunch Liberals today who think the Government have not done their duty and have not fulfilled their pledges, and I was very much surprised that a man possessing the intelligence of the hon. member for Centre Toronto should imagine for one moment, even after indulging in a stretch of his imagination, that the Government had carried out their pledges.

Leaving the tariff out of the question, one of the great pledges made to the country, and it is one that met the approval of all parties, was that the Liberal party would inaugurate a system of strict economy. They said that if put in power, they would not permit wasteful expenditures, as the Conservatives had allowed, and that they would not bring down large estimates for great public works. Have they carried out that pledge of economy? In order to answer that question it is only necessary to look at last year's Estimates. Those brought down and passed exceeded any Estimates ever submitted by the Conservative party. So it requires no argument to prove that, in respect to their pledge of economy, hon. gentlemen have failed most signally. I am glad they failed in their pledge regarding the tariff, as a man who believes in protection and who defends the National Policy. I am as strong a believer in protection as I ever was. I have thought over and considered the subject, and have looked abroad in the country and weighed the policy of the United States, and I repeat, I am as strongly in favour of protection as ever, and I am glad the Government departed from all their pledges so far as the tariff was concerned. If I could commend them for any action, it would be for that: I do commend them for it. If their followers are satisfied, I am quite satisfied on that score. The hon. member for Centre Toronto further said—and in this statement I think he was rather giving away the secrets of the party :

They never intended to give free trade, because it would be impossible.

It all depends on what is considered free trade. A great many speeches were delivered by hon. gentlemen opposite during one session in favour of free trade, and the hope was expressed that such a policy would be adopted as soon as possible. Yet the hon. gentlemen now declare they never intended to carry out free trade. If that statement was scattered among ardent Liberals, they would be surprised. I spent much time, during my contest, in showing that free trade was impossible, because my opponents were in favour of free trade. I pointed out that we must have customs-houses and collect revenue. They said the Government would adopt the free trade policy and would remove the obnoxious duties. Now the member for Centre Toronto says the present Government never had any such intention. He further said :

The predictions of the Conservatives have not been fulfilled.

In what respect does the hon. gentleman mean? We said that if the tariff was reduced materially and protection taken away, then the greatest calamity would come upon the country. And if the Conservative prediction has not been fulfilled—Why? Just so far, and no further than to the extent they have retained the fiscal policy of the Conservative party, is the country prospering. If the Liberal party had cut the tariff down as they promised to do, then our prognostications about disaster and financial panic would have been fulfilled. But I am glad they took the advice of some of their supporters who are largely interested in the commerce of this country, and did not interfere with the tariff as it was feared they would. I regret to say that in the town of Port Hope some of those unhappy things have come to pass. We have a binder twine factory in that town employing about 70 hands, which for seven months last year ran day and night, and paid out $500 a week in wages. To-day that factory is closed, and the men who worked in it are walking idle about the streets, no doubt feeling not very friendly towards the Government in power. There was a duty of 12½ per cent on binder twine coming into this country, but the Liberal Government have removed that duty and so the Port Hope factory is closed. I cannot imagine on what logical grounds the Government can hope to please the farmers by allowing binder twine in free, when they do not allow agricultural implements in free, except indeed that the men who manufacture binder twine have not such a strong influence with the Government as the men who manufacture agricultural implements. No other reason appeals to my mind. Agricultural implements cost more to the farmer than does binder twine, and yet a duty is retained on agricultural implements while the manufacture of binder twine is destroyed in this country. The idea in removing the duty was that binder twine would go free into the United States, but to-day, manilla binder twine, such as we make here, is met with a duty of 45 per cent in the United States. Why should we allow the factories in the United States to manufacture binder twine and send it into Canada free, when if we make binder twine in Canada and send it into the United States, we must pay a duty of 45 per cent. It is altogether a strange policy for this Government to adopt. I have seen that a short time ago the Government was asked to re-impose the small 12½ per cent duty on binder twine, and I trust they will do so, because I think the condition under which this manufacture exists at present is very anomalous and not creditable to them. I am not speaking for the Consumers' Cordage Company, but I am speaking for the workmen who are idle in the town of Port Hope. I have no interest in the Consumers' Cordage Company, but I have in those honest workmen, and I want to see them employed again. One of the very best workmen amongst them has already been compelled to go to the United States, and I do not want the others to be forced to emigrate in order to get work in a binder twine factory across the line. When the Conservatives were in power, the Liberals charged us with driving people out of the country, and I trust, now that the absurdity of the thing is so apparent to them, that they will not force these men to leave Canada to make binder twine in the States and send it over here. I want to see binder twine made in Canada, and I want to see part of it made in Port Hope. The price of this commodity is not excessive; it is in fact very low, and there was no reason whatever for removing the duty. The prison made binder twine, the patrons' binder twine factory, and the competition among other factories are sufficient guarantee that the prices will be kept down.

The right hon. the Premier quoted the opinion of Mr. Gurney who was President of the Toronto Board of Trade, in support of the tariff of the present Government. Now, Mr. Gurney and other Conservatives were satisfied with this tariff because they expected something a great deal worse from the party now in power, and they were glad to find that they got off so well as they did. Mr. Gurney and other manufacturers believed the Liberals were going to carry out their promises, and they were pleased to find that when the Liberals got into power they did not do so. I hold, Sir, that the present tariff law of the Government, together with the speech of the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram) is a strong justification of the fiscal policy of the Conservative party.

There is another matter to which I wish to refer, although I do not know that what I shall say will have any weight with the Government. We find that this rich region of the Klondike is now being advertised all over the world, and that men are pouring into that country from all directions. We have been told in this House, that the American mining laws do not allow any except naturalized citizens to own mining claims in their country. Is it not well that our Government should consider whether they would not take a leaf out of the book of the United States Government. Is it not well that they should consider whether they will continue to allow Americans (who will not allow our citizens the same privilege) to go into the Klondike, buy up the rich claims, and carry Canadian wealth out of Canada. I am not in favour of any harsh restrictions, but I do believe the Americans cannot blame us for copying them; on the contrary they should take it as a compliment. If they are willing to reciprocate in that matter, we might do the same, but so long as they prevent Canadians owning mining claims in their country, it is, I believe, wise for us to consider the urgency of our doing the same thing. I am a strong believer in the policy of Canada for the Canadians, and especially in a matter of this kind. This gold is not unlimited, it will not last forever, and I believe we should make some discrimination between foreigners and British subjects in regard to our mining regulations.

I have a few words to say on this Yukon railway contract, and only a few words as the subject will be fully discussed later. I was a little surprised, as many members on both sides of the House no doubt were, at the speech of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) in introducing this Bill. His speech was very energetic indeed, but to my mind it was from beginning to end an apology, an attempted defence of the contract. I notice he appealed to his own followers from the start, as if he knew that in their minds strong arguments existed against the contract, and as if he knew that undoubtedly there were strong prejudices to be overcome. Referring to the fact of the contract being signed so short a time before the calling together of Parliament, the Minister said, that this contract was signed by the Government under the circumstances regretfully and reluctantly. He excused the whole thing on the ground of urgency, but to my mind the more that contract is looked into the worse it appears, and the more we examine its details the more indefensible it is. It seems to me that if the Government can defend this contract successfully, they can defend anything. Now, as to the character of the road that is to be built there. The Montreal "Witness" yesterday stated, that it was not what should be expected from what is known as a Government road, and they conclude that it is not much of a concern after all. A great many people in this country will hold the same opinion as the Montreal "Witness." If it be true that 50,000 people are going to the Klondike over this road during the coming season, not to speak of the numbers coming out, and if they are to carry the thousands of tons of freight we read about, then the road should be more substantial than it is proposed to be.

That is one thing that should be insisted on: the road should be a substantial road. But it is said that it is to be a narrow-gauge road, that the rails to be used are light rails, which have been used on another railway, and that the locomotives are old. I do not know whether this is so or not; but these matters should be found out before this contract is ratified, if it is to be ratified by Parliament. We should see that the road is not a mere temporary road, as it has been described, and as the Montreal "Witness" says it is, but a good, substantial road. I notice that the Premier says that this road is simply a temporary one, intended to provide immediate communication for the thousands of men who will be in that region next winter. He would not say that it was even the best route, and he mentioned another route from Edmonton which he thought would be preferable. No doubt, he said that to satisfy the members from the North-west Territories. But if this is only a temporary road, to be built for the purpose of providing food and supplies for the people in the country next winter, then I think it is absurd to pay any such price for it. What are we going to pay for that road? It is said that we are not to give any cash for the road, and that is held up as a great argument in favour of this contract. That argument might appeal to some people; but if we are not going to give cash, it is well to look at what we are going to give. We are going to give 3,750,000 acres of land—in my mind, practically the whole of the gold-bearing land of that country; because when we consider the opportunities these men, who are sharp business men with unlimited means, have of selecting that land, in three years and six years, we can see that they can easily send out prospectors and find out where the gold is, and take it all. But we are going to give them more than that large quantity of land. We are going to give them a monopoly for many years, and the right to charge just what they please. In considering this matter, it struck me that there would be a great many men willing to build this road for the monopoly alone, without the land. But it is said that it is all a matter of chance—that perhaps this road will not be wanted in a few years at all. But that argument was knocked on the head by Mr. Ogilvie in his lecture last night, when he said that there would be enough gold in that country for the next ten years at any rate, how much longer he did not know, for everybody who went in there. So that for ten years at any rate, this road would have plenty of traffic. Then, these men have not only the land and the monopoly, but they have an immense business already waiting for them. If this were a road for which they would have to wait for several years for business to grow up, there might be some justification in paying a large price for it; but in this case thousands of people and thousands of tons of freight are waiting for this road; so that there will be plenty of business as soon as the road is opened to pay these men immensely for all they have put in to it. So that they have not only lands and the monopoly, but they can fix their own rates as they please.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The hon. gentleman is not stating the case fairly. It is provided in the contract that the tolls are to be fixed by the Governor in Council.

Mr. CRAIG. Is it?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes. The hon. gentleman's predecessor made the same mistake, but I did not think it worth while to interrupt him.

Mr. WILSON. How long do the rates last when they are fixed?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. For the first four years they must be fixed by the Governor in Council, and after that they are reduced automatically.

Mr. CRAIG. There is no doubt the Government will allow liberal rates.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Fair rates.

Mr. CRAIG. I take that for granted. At any rate, they have a monopoly, with very good rates. I have not been able to read this contract yet—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I thought that. Will the hon. gentleman refrain from criticising it until he has seen it, and then he will come round and vote for it.

Mr. CRAIG. I am taking the Minister of Railway's version of it; I do not know whether he knows anything about it or not. I think he was asked what the rates were, but he did not know. I think it would be well to fix the rates in the contract; for I have not enough confidence in the Government to think that they will have the rates fixed to suit me; I think they will be more likely to have them fixed to suit the contractors. I was rather amused at the Minister of Railways stating that the reason they did not give these men less than 25,000 acres a mile was because they would not take less. When he is asked why the Government do not fix lower rates, he may say the same thing—because the contractors will not accept lower rates. Then, what will the Government do? I do not know. I suppose they will say, "We could not do anything better, so we had to let them go." When the Minister of Railways was explaining this contract, he said he did not know whether the contractors would make anything or not, but he hoped they would. Well, I think he has a very good idea that they will, and I am sure the contractors have. He said that it was only a matter of chance—that there might not be much gold in the country after all. The hon. gentleman does not appear to have read Mr. Ogilvie's report. When he was speaking, the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) suggested that it was a gamble. The Minister of Railways was pleased to have that word suggested to him, and he said it was a gamble. Well, I do not think it is a gamble at all for the contractors. I do not think there is much of a gamble about it when they will have a monopoly and good rates, and a business waiting for them, which will pay them over and over again.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Are you prepared to take a few thousands of stock?

Mr. CRAIG. Send them around to me and I will see.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not a dollar.

Mr. CRAIG. As I said, I do not intend to make any more remarks about this deal. But I thought it was only right that I should call attention to some of the statements of the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram), when he claimed that the Liberal party had fulfilled all their pledges. I want him to point out one pledge that they have fulfilled in reference to the tariff. I am glad, and I think the country is glad, that they have not fulfilled their pledges. More than that, I say that the hon. member for Centre Toronto was elected because they had not fulfilled their pledges, and because he was able to say that he was a protectionist and in favour of preferential trade, and other measures which the Conservative party had been advocating for years.

All these things the Conservative party have advocated for years, and if he only sat in his right place instead of on that side—if he only sat on this side, where I think he ought to be, I do not think he would stand up and say that the Liberal party had carried out its pledges. He would not, however, have to modify his ideas on the subject of protection, because he stands just where we do on that question. I do not know whether it is vain to hope that there will be members on that side of the House who will refuse to support this contract.

Mr. CAMPBELL. There will be more on that side.

Mr. CRAIG. If these hon. gentlemen look at the matter as I do and see it with my eyes—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. But the hon. gentleman says he has not read the contract.

Mr. CRAIG. I listened to the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair), and I supposed that he had read it. I listened to him attentively and took notes of his speech, and I take his interpretation of the contract, and fail to see how any independent member of this House can support it. I intend to read it carefully at a future time, but I have heard sufficient from the hon. Minister of Railways to justify me in condemning it at present; and trust it is not vain to hope that there will be some members on that side with sufficient independence to oppose this iniquitous measure, if they find it is not in the interests of the country. I know that party ties and party prejudices are strong, but there are times when they should be cast aside, and I do hope that hon. gentlemen opposite will read this contract for themselves and study it carefully, and if they think it is not in the interest of the country, have the courage to vote against it. If they do, this contract, which I hold is indefensible, judging it by the explanation of the hon. Minister of Railways, will not pass this House.

Mr. SPROULE. But for the item in the Speech from the Throne, Mr. Speaker, which refers to the Yukon Railway, I would have contented myself with silence on that Speech for the present, and have trusted to the chance of saying what I have to say upon the various measures announced in it, as from time to time they engage the attention of this House during this session. It appears to me, however, that this question is too momentous to let pass in silence, and we would not be doing our duty, as representing the people, if we refrained from lifting up our voices, at the earliest possible day, in condemnation of this deal. Now, I ask myself, for the moment, what has been the record of this Government in the short time they have had office. They had been in power barely twenty months; and although the Toronto "Globe" published the other day a statement that up to the present they had redeemed literally every specific promise they had made to the people, I am quite sure that that statement, even coming from that high authority, will not be accepted by the country as correct in the face of the well known facts. I asked myself, when the "Globe" made that statement, did it refer to the policy of protection, every vestige of which was to be abolished, as we were so often and vehemently told by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) should his party ever get into power. Well, in spite of those professions, we found that in the tariff brought down last year protection was there very much the same as in the old tariff which it replaced. Of that I do not complain, but I complain of the dishonesty of the men who told the country that the interests of the Dominion required the abolition of every vestige of protection from our tariff, and who, when they got into power, found it convenient to belie their own statements by doing just the reverse. Then, I ask myself, is it in the abolition of monopolies that this Government has carried out its pledges? Why, look at the Crow's Nest Pass transaction, which they put through last session, and look at the Mann & Mackenzie contract now engaging the attention of the House, and in which we have conclusive proof that the present Government are the champions of the most dangerous monopoly which, in my judgment, it has ever been sought to establish in this country. We were unable to prevent the consummation of the Crow's Nest Pass monopoly last session, and we are to-day asked to consent to another which, in my estimation, is the worst of all; and this notwithstanding the pledge of these hon. gentlemen to destroy, when they got into office, every vestige of monopoly in the country. What an unenviable record they are building up for the party! I content myself now with merely a rapid mention of these facts, which must show the electorate how far these hon. gentlemen have been deceitful in their professions and inconsistent with the line of policy they laid down themselves.

At an early stage of the last session of Parliament the right hon. First Minister informed this House that he was compelled to go to England to pay his respects to Her Majesty on the occasion of the Queen's Jubilee, as representing this important colony of the British Empire. When he left, we were all buoyed up with the hope, knowing his great ability, that he would admirably represent this country and accomplish what the people of Canada desired so much at the time. We hoped that he would endeavour, as much as possible, to obtain preferential trade between this and the mother country for the advantage of both, seeing he has so frequently said to the Canadian people it was desirable and that he was in favour of it. The right hon. gentleman left behind him at home his right-hand man, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce

(Sir Richard Cartwright), who was supposed to be the soul of economy, who would let nothing pass that was not stamped by the most rigid economy, which these hon. gentlemen told the people was what was absolutely required. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce was left here so that the people of Canada might feel certain that nothing but the most rigid economy would be practised during the absence of the First Minister. Well, my right hon. friend went to England, and at the earliest opportunity, when the intimation was given him that there was a strong probability the people of this country would receive preferential trade and that England would form with her colonies a commercial Zollverein by which we would obtain advantages that foreign countries would not enjoy, the hon. gentleman cast the intimation aside almost with scorn. He said that Canada, in her loyal generosity, was prepared to give the people of Great Britain advantages in her own markets which other countries had not, and that Canada wanted nothing in return. If the right hon. gentleman had been dealing with his own money, I could understand his acting in that generous way, but I fail to understand how he can be justified in rejecting a boon that would have been of the greatest benefit to us. Did the people of Canada expect anything of the kind from him? Did they send him over for that purpose? No, if he had told them before they entrusted him with the duty of governing this country, that he intended doing anything of the kind, they would have elected him to stay at home, and would never have given him the opportunity to represent this country in England. He would never have had the opportunity of telling the people of England that Canada did not want anything in return for the concessions she had given England. For years we had been endeavouring to educate the people of England to the desirable standpoint of entering into negotiations with us which would be mutually advantageous, and yet, at the very time when there was an immediate possibility of accomplishing this, the right hon. gentleman told the people of England we did not want it. He then came back ornamented with the Cobden medal. I notice that since then all the cartoons of the hon. gentleman show him with the Cobden medal prominently displayed on his breast, and no doubt that will stick to him as long as he lives. This is one of the evidences of inconsistency in his public career, a thing above all others, I imagine, that he ought to be ashamed of. As to the title he accepted, I say nothing about that. But when he comes before the people with a tariff affording practically the same protection as was given before, and then goes to England and convinces them that he, more than all others, had supported the cause of free trade in

Mr. SPROULE.

Canada, he shows that he was equal in a certain kind of statesmanship to that shown by Napoleon Bonaparte, who was a master in representing himself as the champion of different causes, the antipodes of each other, in different places. The right hon. the Premier convinced the Cobden Club that he was a free trader; he convinced the manufacturers of Canada that he was as much a protectionist as the Conservative Government. That is not a very enviable record.

But to come back now to what is proposed in the Speech from the Throne. I should not have risen in this debate but for the proposition in connection with this Yukon Railway. Hon. gentlemen opposite came into power declaring that if they were returned to power they would destroy monopoly, they would not give away the public domain or the public money in any way so as to fasten a monopoly upon the country. But we have submitted to us at the very beginning of this session a contract and Bill which establish, to my mind, the most outrageous monopoly and gives it an enormous area of the most valuable part of our territory. What are the grounds on which the sanction of Parliament is sought in such haste for this arrangement? The Premier has made a request that the second reading of this Bill should be moved next Tuesday and that the debate continue day by day until it is finished. This, it is said, is necessary because of the urgency of the case. Now, we are all agreed as to the necessity of a railway into that country at the earliest practicable day. But we are not agreed as to the consideration it is proposed to give for the building of the road, nor are we agreed that the matter should be decided upon the exceedingly meagre information before us. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) was asked for information, but his answer was that the Government had not had time to get it. If there is not time to get reasonable data, how can the Government ask the House to consider the question? We are here to do business on business principles. We are supposed to represent the average intelligence of the country, and to ask us to go it blind in this way, to decide such an important question on almost no information, is nothing less than an insult to the intelligence of the people's representatives, and to the people themselves. The Minister of Railways was asked: Where are the reports of the engineers? And his answer was: We have none. How then do you know what the railway is likely to cost? We do not know, he says, we have only made a guess. But, in the next breath, he says: We have sent engineers over the route. It seems that even the Minister of the Interior has gone over the route or examined two or three of the passes, doing the work not only of Minister but of engineer as well. If he has made a report to the Government surely that report ought to be given us so that we may be enabled to judge of the merits of this proposal, as members of the Government have been. What excuse is given for this great hurry and for passing this Bill with meagre information? We are told that the urgency is great. But, as the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) said, who created that urgency? It was known two years ago that gold was plentiful in that country, for it was being sent down in large quantities for the payment of customs duties on goods coming into that country. The agent of the Government, Mr. Ogilvie, has been there for years. He sent down reports from time to time. And the reports he sent down show us the almost fabulous wealth in that country. Then, why did not the Government act earlier? What urgency could there have been to justify entering into a contract ten days before Parliament was to meet. Ten days will not make so very much difference, but if it would, why not call Parliament ten days earlier? I object to this also because it was a contract entered into in secret. Why was it so made? If I have a piece of land to sell, I naturally advertise it so that I may attract the greatest number of buyers. And if a private firm have a contract to give they advertise for tenders. Why not do the same in this case. It may be said that we have only one or two contractors fit to do that work. How can that be known? We have had many contractors who have carried on gigantic works in an admirable manner. Who knows but that we have a dozen or twenty contractors who can do as well as Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann. The very fact that this contract was made in secret, brings it under suspicion in the public mind. The very first thing to be done was to make this project public, so that the financial corporations of the world might have the opportunity to bid on it. But, as a matter of fact, even the members of Parliament did not know that such a contract was in contemplation. How then could the financial companies of the country be aware of it? Who did know about it? Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie certainly did. The Minister of Railways was asked if he has consulted any other firm, and he replied, yes. But when asked who they were he said he did not know. Either he had forgotten, or he had never been told. It would be interesting to know what other firms were consulted. Besides Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie, Senator Cox, who seems to get an inkling of all these things, had some information about it. Then where was Mr. Jaffray, a friend of the Government, a gentleman who is known as one of the liberal givers of the party. But the rest of the country seems to have known nothing at all about the matter.

Then, the consideration given for the construction of the road is infinitely too large. If we can believe but a part of what we hear, it is plain that land to be given contains fabulous wealth entirely out of proportion to the expected cost of this road. We listened to Mr. Ogilvie last night, and he gave us valuable information about that country. He told us, for instance, that one man bought a small claim of about 250 feet square for $4,000, paying $500, all the money he had. He worked for a few months, and at the end of that time, by his own unaided labour, he had taken $15,000 worth out of that hole, and it was said to be no bigger than a grave in which a man could lie. Now, if one single man, with his pick and shovel and his little trough, can take that out of one hole, and there are so many of them there equally rich, then I say that we are giving away land in that country possessing fabulous wealth. What are we giving? We are giving 25,000 acres of land per mile. There is nothing to show what should be the outside limit of the amount of land that we will give; we will at least give that. It is estimated that we will give at least 3,750,000 acres of that land. And how is it selected? It is selected in a way that enables the contractors, or the company that represents the contractors, or the corporation, to take up all the gold-bearing lands in that country that are not already taken up. It gives them power in that contract to freeze out every man that has grub-staked his claim there, and who is working it successfully at the present time, if they can get the land around it. Now, I say we are giving entirely too much. During last session of this Parliament, had it not been for the Upper Chamber, this country would have been committed to an expenditure yearly representing a capital of seven million dollars for the Drummond County Railway, and the advantages that we were to receive from the Grand Trunk Railway for the Intercolonial Railway coming into Montreal. During last session, also, we gave away what we believed to be the most wealthy part of the mining lands in British Columbia in the shape of coal lands to another company known as the Crow's Nest Pass Company. We gave them a large amount of land and about three and three-quarter million dollars to build a railway there. We also gave them a monopoly, besides the coal land there, for all time to come, and we consider that coal is the most valuable mineral we have in that country to-day. Now, at the opening of the present session, the first thing that meets us is a proposition to give a large tract of the richest gold lands that we have in the country. We give these people a right to control, so far as we know, all the gold lands that we possess in that country at the present time; indeed, we give them a great deal more, because, after they take what is given to them, they can cover all the gold lands that we possess at the present time that are not already taken up, and yet they will not have selected half the land that is coming to them. I think we are giving too great a consideration entirely. And for what? For building what is practically a tramway out of the old rails of the Lethbridge Railway, the old cars and the old iron that is lying there, and worth nothing to the people that own it to-day except what it might be sold for as old iron. In order to secure transportation facilities into that country, we are going to give away the massive wealth that is contained in the gold-bearing areas of that country. But we are told that we do not know what it is going to cost. Now, if we do not know what it is going to cost, and the Government do not know, then I say they should not ask this House to sanction the contract, going it blindly, as they are doing in this instance. The country expects better of them, the country expects that when they submit anything to this House, it will be accompanied by such information as will enable the representatives of the people to judge fairly whether it is a good bargain or a bad one, whether it is in the interest of the country that it should be sanctioned or whether it would be against the interest of the country if we did so. Therefore, I say, that in view of the lack of information, we are justified in refusing to sanction this contract. But then, we are told, as an important consideration, that we require an all-Canadian railway route; and yet, in the next breath, when the Minister of Railways and Canals was asked, Is this an all-Canadian route, where is the starting point of this railway, he tells us that it is in the United States. Then, if it is in the United States, how can it be an all-Canadian route? Now, we are told that one of the things above all others that is most to be desired is, that it should be gone on with at once. People are going in there, freight is waiting there for some means to carry it, we are hampered with that transportation trouble, and with the freight regulations that the United States may impose upon us in the way of a customs duty, and therefore we want an all-Canadian route. The "Globe" told us that it is an all-Canadian route, but the Minister of Railways says that it is an all-Canadian route that starts in the United States. Then, if it starts in the United States, it cannot be an all-Canadian route. Now, we have only a right to use that river at Fort Wrangell the same as the United States have, and, notwithstanding the fact that we start there, and notwithstanding the concessions that the Minister of Railways says the United States are giving us to-day, they may change these concessions to-morrow, if it suits their purpose, and they may hamper us to such an extent that we cannot carry on trade successfully from that point; so that that great consideration of an all-Canadian route will then entirely disappear, and will prove not to be what it is now represented to the people of Canada. It is not an all-Canadian route, because the point from which it starts, Fort Wrangell, is in the United States. Now, I say the contract gives this company a monopoly in transportation and a monopoly in mining. We raised a great complaint against the contract that was entered into by the Ontario Government with the Engledeue Company about their mining belt in the province of Ontario, and we thought that was a dangerous monopoly. But it sinks into insignificance when put alongside this one that you are now proposing to give this company. Why, they can control the transportation in that country, and take immense sums out of the people for transporting the stuff that is likely to go in there in the next few years, if they keep the tolls as high as they are likely to keep them. They would make enough out of transportation alone, saying nothing about the gold-bearing lands, to pay them for the cost of this railway two or three times over. But they have control over these transportation rates for several years. The Government says that we cannot have another road there for several years. Now, we heard a great deal of complaint from hon. members on that side of the House, when our friends were in power, with regard to the dangerous monopoly that was given to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company when they went into Manitoba and the North-west Territories, and they fought that point so strongly and educated the sentiment of the people in that western country to such a pitch that they were almost up in open rebellion against that monopoly; they created a feeling in Ontario against the so-called monopoly; they made protestations so loud before the electorate that one would have thought they would be the last people in the world ever to give a monopoly to any company in transportation. But no sooner are they in power, than they go further themselves than the previous Government, and they give even a more dangerous monopoly than that could possibly be. Why? Because Manitoba and the North-west Territories must settle up slowly, and the amount of goods carried over that road for a few years is very small. But here we are told there is a large quantity of freight waiting to be carried by some company, by some road, and therefore whatever is done to create traffic there will be done inside the next two or three years. Greater development will take place in that country in the next two years than took place in the North-west Territories, with regard to freight, in some ten or twelve years. Therefore, the monopoly is dangerous in proportion to the necessity of having a route. Then, it gives a monopoly over mining, because every prospector in that country becomes an agent for this company. They have a right, as soon as they find lands with gold in paying quantities in any locality, at once to run their base line. By the powers given them they can run it in almost any direction; they can run it north, or south, or east, or west; they can run it according to the general line of the water-course of a lake or stream. Then, when that does not satisfy their purpose, they can vary it and change it in one direction or the other. So that practically you say to them: You can plant your stakes anywhere, you can run your base-line in any direction, even so as to take up the land around where a man has been working for months and where he has ascertained that there is gold in paying quantities. I should like to ask a question which seems to be very important and interesting to the poor man. What is to prevent this company, in the event of a man finding gold in a certain place, acquiring all the lands surrounding his claim, which would be only a few hundred feet square? What is to hinder the company so hampering the miner in his operations that it will be practically impossible for him to continue his operations? In such an event, he would not be able to travel through the company's property without becoming a trespasser, and he would have no means of transportation except by their will and pleasure. How can a miner carry on his operations under such conditions? The miner would be forced to sell his property, for he would have no means of ingress and egress. Does the Minister of Marine and Fisheries say he would not.

THE MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do.

MR. SPROULE. What right would he have to go in and out in order to carry on his operations?

THE MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He would have perfect right of access.

MR. SPROULE. Is it given to him in the contract?

THE MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It does not matter whether it is expressly stated, he possesses it at common law.

MR. SPROULE. It must be at common law, or under the mining law, or under this contract.

THE MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Have you read the common law to ascertain the fact?

MR. SPROULE. I have tried to find out from those who ought to know, from legal gentlemen who are members of the House, and they have been unable to tell me that it is so. They do not think it is so. I am therefore justified in supposing it is not so, and I have the right to ask for this information because it is very important for every poor miner who has endured the hardships and at length found a spot where gold can be mined. This is a point that should be made plain, because the miners do not know their position, and in my opinion they will be hampered and forced out of their claims and this gigantic company will take control, the miners being obliged to sell at whatever price the company will be disposed to give, and that will not be the outside value. There is another very important consideration which seems to have been lost sight of, and it is this. The company can sell out their contract to an English company or to any foreign company, and no doubt Mr. Mackenzie is going over to England for that purpose. Possessing those rights you could float companies over there with capital of millions, or keep half or three-fourths of the stock in your own hands; these men will be able to raise money to build the road fifty times over, and let the new company come out and prospect the lands, and at the end leave the present contractors multi-millionaires. One clause of the contract reads:

3. Upon the incorporation of said company and upon the assignment by the contractors to such company of this agreement, and upon the said company covenanting with the Government to carry out the same, and upon the said railway from Stickine River to Teslin Lake being completed and accepted as aforesaid, the contractors shall then, but not before, be relieved from personal responsibility hereunder.

We are told the country needs an all-rail Canadian road. But suppose this company sold all its rights to an American company in California or New York interested in controlling transportation routes to that country, how easily they could secure that control. There is no provision that this shall continue to be run as an all-Canadian route. In view of the absence of such a clause it is little less than childish to declare that it provides that we control our transportation route, which will mean keeping the trade in the hands of and for the interest of Canadians. There is nothing, I repeat, to prevent the contract being sold to an American, English or German company, giving them this great gold region and the control of the transportation route, in opposition to the interests of British Columbia, Manitoba, the North-west Territories as well as the eastern provinces. There is nothing to prevent the contractors selling out and any other corporation acquiring the contract. What, then, would be the position? We would be in the position similar to that of the United States towards the Alaska Company, which controls that territory. The company would acquire vested rights, and we could not interfere with them because there had been a sacred contract made with Parliament which could not be broken, and the people of Canada would thereby be called upon to suffer from the shortsightedness of the Government which made the contract. It is a shortsighted contract, and a bad one for the people of Canada. Let hon. members look at the relative percentages to be paid as royalty. This great and wealthy corporation, which can make millions out of the mining rights on their lands, are asked to pay a royalty of one per cent on the gold mined, while the poor miner who has been obliged to meet great difficulties and even lie out in the snow in that inhospitable country, is charged 10 per cent royalty. We give the company the same rights as the miner, but we only ask one per cent royalty from them. This amount is either too low as regards this corporation or too high towards the poor miner. There is no power which can convince the miner that he is receiving full justice from the Government when they demand 10 per cent royalty on the gold he takes out as the result of his labour and hardships, while at the same time they ask only one per cent royalty from this corporation. An hon. member has handed me a clipping which appears to support my contention. The paragraph is headed: "Millions in It," and is from a paper published in the province of Quebec. It is as follows:—

Mr. Mann, one of the contractors of the Yukon Railway, it appears, declared yesterday in Vancouver that this year his line would carry between two hundred and fifty and three hundred thousand tons of freight. At $50 a ton—an extremely moderate rate—that will give a revenue, for the first year, of fifteen millions for a line that will not cost three millions. And it is to allow two contractors to do such a good stroke of business that the Government grants them nearly four millions of acres of gold-bearing lands.

We are justified in concluding that that statement is true, because it is founded on a fair estimate of the quantity of trade that must be handled by that company. This royalty is undoubtedly too large to be paid by the poor miner. The discrimination is in favour of the wealthy, and against the poor man, who is already handicapped in life, as is every man who earns his living by the labour of his hands and the sweat of his brow. This contract gives power to the company to squeeze every miner out of the country. This is protection for the poor labourer with a vengeance. It is, however, complete protection for the great corporation and the wealthy men who already have everything with which to protect themselves; it is according to my mind one of the greatest strokes of protection possible for this powerful corporation and the least protection that could be afforded to the poor man who is working on his claim.

Hon. gentlemen have only been twenty months in power and already they have built up a record, in the course of which they have failed to carry out their promises and pledges to the people. Formerly everything was for the poor man, to-day everything is for the rich man, as was also seen in the contract for the Crow's Nest Pass. That deal was forced through at the end of last session when most of the members had gone home, and the first piece of legislation this session is in reference to this extraordinary deal. When we take 5,860 square miles out of the gold-bearing lands, what will be left? Scarcely anything worth leaving, and this corporation will practically own the gold-mining region, while at the same time they will possess a monopoly of transportation under the contract, when Parliament passes it, but I trust Parliament will not pass it. What will the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Rogers) say? His platform was: No monopolies and no more assistance to railways. What will the members from the North-west say, for they endorsed the platform of the Patrons? What will the hon. member from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) say, for he fought against monopolies and railway grants for years past? What will the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Somerville) say? These gentlemen were always crying in days past: "Down with the monopolies; restrict rich corporations; do not give assistance to railways in land grants or in money grants out of the public treasury." What will the hon. members from British Columbia do in regard to this contract, and this monopoly? They know as well as I do, they know better than I do, that this monopoly will be against the interests of their country, as it will to a great extent lock up in the hands of these great corporations the gold fields of that country for all time to come. What will these members say if an American company gets control of the transportation which this contract gives? But, we are told: Oh, but the Government control the freight rates. Do they? As I read the contract it only provides for supervision over the tolls collected by the contractors or the contractors' company on the line of railway, between the Stikine River and Teslin Lake. But this company are to put boats on that river, and they are to carry freight from the terminus of the line down to Dawson City, and will any one tell me that the Government can control the rates to be charged on the other parts of the route? The Government have no power to interfere with rates except on the line of railway, and in all other cases the contractors have unlimited right to do as they please. The contractors get their freight at Fort Wrangell, and the Government control the tolls over the line of railway, but they do not and cannot interfere with the tolls over the greater portion of the route where the high rates no doubt will be imposed. Who is going to give information to the Government as to whether the rates charged by the contractors are fair or unfair? Will the rates be based on the cost of transit to-day when you have to go through these mountain passes by dog trains and submit to the many inconveniences which exist? Upon whose recommendation will the rates be fixed by the Government? Why, the company will come down to Ottawa here and make representations that it is worth so much to carry that freight through, and by these representations of the contractors the Government will be influenced. The Government have sent no persons up there to obtain for them reliable data and information, or if they have, they have carefully kept it from the representatives of the people in this House. We are justified, Sir, in coming to the conclusion that the freight rates which will be charged there in the first instance will be both exorbitant and extravagant. The other evil connected with the contract is that you cannot disturb the freight tariff first established for four years. Why, Sir, with free competition in that country, in four years the whole face of the situation would be changed with regard to railway tolls. My friend (Mr. Domville) who is now advocating a road through from Edmonton—to my mind one of the most valuable routes of all—what does he think of this contract? The contractors have control of the transportation now. His road will get no support but this road will get everything. What chance have the people of the North-west Territories to get any road into that Yukon country, when every consideration is given to the present contractors, and none will be given to them for five years?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That does not extend to the North-west Territories.

Mr. SPROULE. Which does not?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It does not interfere with building a railway from Edmonton.

Mr. SPROULE. It does not interfere, I suppose, but that road will get no assistance. If you give all the assistance to one route you handicap all the others.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Oh, no.

Mr. SPROULE. Certainly it does. You say you will not give any assistance to railways for a number of years.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No such thing.

Mr. SPROULE. How much land will you give any other road, then?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman is not fair; he knows that is not the case. If the hon. gentleman reads the contract, he will see that only relates to lines running from the international boundary.

Mr. SPROULE. Will the hon. Minister (Sir Louis Davies) be kind enough to read the contract. I have read it and I know that is what is said.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I say that provision only relates to lines running to the international boundary line, and does not relate to any line running to the North-west Territories or to any point upon the Canadian railway.

Mr. SPROULE. Does the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) say that they have not contracted and agreed to give no franchise rights to build a road there for some years?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do most assuredly say that we do not. The hon. gentleman's mind is filled with a wrong conclusion altogether. There is nothing of the kind in the contract.

Mr. SPROULE. I ask the hon. gentleman to read the clause and then set me right if I am wrong.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Take a half hour after dinner, Doctor, and you will understand it.

Mr. SPROULE. I am not speaking to the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell). He will have enough to do to square himself with his own constituents on this question.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Speaker, before you left the Chair at Six o'clock, a controversy arose between the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) and myself regarding what I considered the portion of the monopoly given to this company, that is, as to the right of any other company to build a railway into that district. In justice to the Minister and also to myself, I am pleased to say that I had not correctly read the clause. In reading it hurriedly in the very short time at my disposal, I failed to grasp the whole extent and meaning of that portion, and therefore I did an injustice to the Minister. But it still contains a very important monopoly to the company, and I will read it, so that it may be plain to those who take any interest in it:

For five years from the first of September, 1898, no line of railway shall be authorized by Parliament to be constructed from Lynn Canal or thereabouts or from any point at or near the international boundary between Canada and Alaska into the Yukon District, and for five years from said date no aid in land or money shall be granted to any person or company other than the contractors and the contractors' company to assist in building any such railway.

The important feature of that clause, I take it, is this. Any company building a railway rapidly into that country would naturally run it from the international boundary or from Lynn Canal, because that is the shortest and most available route for obtaining ingress into and egress from the country. This makes the monopoly to this company all the more important, for they will control it for at least five years. No other company can expect or will receive any assistance from the Government for a competing line, for it is provided:

The contractors and the contractors' company shall be entitled to receive in preference to any other person or company during ten years from said first of September, 1898, such aid or assistance in land or money as the Government may be authorized and may see fit to grant in aid of a line of railway from the Stickine River to an ocean port in British Columbia.

In one instance, they have a monopoly for five years, during which time no other corporation will receive a charter or be assisted by the Government, and in the other instance they have the option of any assistance that is given for ten years. So, I say it becomes a very important monopoly to them and a very dangerous one to the country.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman will pardon me, I know, because he is now stating the contract correctly. I wish to call his attention to one limitation which he has omitted, that the company are only entitled to the option for ten years to build for the best terms the Government can get to an ocean port, but even that option does not extend to any line built to Ashcroft or to Edmonton or to any point along the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway or to any other portion of Canada.

Mr. SPROULE. I understand that. That was the important difference, I understood, between the hon. Minister and myself. But they have this option, which I consider a very dangerous one. I have said that the contractors have control not only over the railway transportation, which is to be regulated in the first instance by the Governor in Council, but over the transportation on the river to this extent :

The contractors or contractors' company shall provide, or arrange with others to provide, steamboat transport of freight and passengers between the terminus of said railway on Teslin Lake, or other terminus northerly thereof, and Dawson City to and fro.

Now, I hold that the monopoly of the transportation of goods over the railway gives the company a special advantage in controlling the steamboat transportation on the river. As they will handle the goods in the first instance, another company cannot get as fair a chance to carry the goods after they leave the railway as their own company or the company they arrange with. Then, the Government have taken no power to control the steamboat rates, and the steamboat companies, which will transport the goods five or six times the distance the railway will, will be under the control of this company. Consequently, their monopoly will give them the power to control the freight rates for the whole distance. While the Government takes power to fix the rates for the short distance over the railway, it leaves the company with full power to charge exorbitant prices upon freight taken for a long distance over their own steamboat lines or over the steamboat lines they arrange with.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My hon. friend will see that as regards the railway line there is no competition, and we have taken power to control the rates. With regard to the water line, there may be fifty steamboat companies in competition with each other, which forms a sufficient control without our making provision for control.

Mr. SPROULE. I see that plainly ; but I will suppose that I am sending goods over the Canadian Pacific Railway to Manitoba or the North-west Territories, and I reach a point where two railway lines are available. There I might have competition, but the goods having to be consigned over the Canadian Pacific Railway in the first instance, gives that company a power to make it impossible for me to utilize another railway line and get the advantages of the competition. We find that railways do exercise this power to-day to the disadvantage and inconvenience of the public. For that reason, I say the contractors have practically a monopoly over the steamboat transportation, and we have no control over the freight rates they may charge to the people in that country. I understood the hon. Minister of Railways, I do not know whether correctly or not, to say, with regard to the deposit, that the contractors deposited $250,000 in cash, and that we were to get the interest on that deposit.

Mr. WALLACE. No, they get it.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood him to say that we get it. I thought that was absurd, because if they put their money on deposit, I do not see why they should not get interest on it, and that is what the contract says. Then, this contract practically gives the contractors a roving commission to build railways all over that district. Does the Minister deny that ? If so, I will give him the clause.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is right.

Mr. SPROULE. It gives them the power to build—

An extension northward to Dawson City, and an extension southward to a point in British Columbia designated by the Government and capable of being made an ocean port, also a line of railway from the waters of Lynn Canal to Fort Selkirk or thereabouts, by way of Chilkat Pass, also branch lines of railway from any points on the company's railway to any property owned by the company, also lines of railway from any navigable waters to any property owned by the company.

It does not specify the navigable waters, and therefore practically all they have to do is to get property anywhere, and then build to any of the navigable waters in that country in any direction, north, south, east or west.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I would call the hon. gentleman's attention to that, because I am quite sure he will not object when he knows the facts. Suppose this company run a base line of forty, fifty or one hundred miles from Teslin Lake—suppose they run a base line and determine to build a large smelting works and carry on quartz mining and spend a large amount of money in development. Will the hon. gentleman object to giving them power to build a railway to carry their quartz to navigable waters?

Mr. SPROULE. No, but suppose another company has property in that country and wishes to build to some navigable water.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is nothing to prevent it.

Mr. SPROULE. And this company objects on the ground that they have the right to build a line in the same direction from their property to the same navigable water.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That does not exclude any competitive line that Parliament may choose to grant a charter to.

Mr. SPROULE. No, but this company has the right to build the line, and will claim that Parliament has no right to grant competition in that locality.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Oh, yes, it has.

Mr. SPROULE. This company will put that up as a vested right, no doubt, so that practically they are given a roving commission to build railways all over the country, as I understand it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Would you object to that?

Mr. SPROULE. No, if the same right were given to all others. What I object to is giving it to one company alone. If you give it to everybody else, I have not the slightest objection. The hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) dilated with a great deal of force on the provision denying them the right to the bed of navigable rivers, and the "Globe" claimed that this provision was inserted so that the company might be prevented from interfering with the placer mining of the poor man. But we find that this was not the object. We find this was limited to certain specified rivers and lakes, and looking up the map to see where these specified rivers are, we find that they are not in the gold-bearing district at all. What are they:

No portion of the beds of the rivers Yukon, Lewes, Hootalinqua, or of the lakes Teslin, Bennett, Tagish, Labarge or Marsh.

Not one of these is in the district where the gold is known to exist in large quantities.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not the Yukon River?

Mr. SPROULE. The gold-bearing beds are not on the Yukon.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The gold-bearing beds, which have been discovered so far, are not on the Yukon but on the tributaries to it.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. But the hon. gentleman knows that these rivers run through that portion of the territory which Mr. Ogilvie has reported to be the gold-bearing district.

Mr. SPROULE. The public were led to believe that this was done to safeguard the placer mining, whereas it was not.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Let me explain why it was done. I happen to know pretty well, because I was at the making of the contract. It was done to preserve navigation. These rivers form the navigable waters down to Dawson City, and from the reports of Mr. Ogilvie and others it was found absolutely necessary to protect the interests of companies who would run boats up and down that river, by giving them the right to stop at any stopping place on either side of the river, so that we not only reserve the bed of the river, but twenty-five feet on each side, for landing places wherever they could be found. Thus any number of lines will be at liberty, without prohibition from this company, to have these stopping places.

Mr. SPROULE. If the hon. gentleman had been present when the Minister of Railways made his explanation—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I was not, unfortunately.

Mr. SPROULE—he would have heard that hon. gentleman say that this was to prevent gold mining in the beds where the poor miners were carrying on operations. The object of the clause may be a very good one, but the country was misled by the explanation of the "Globe" that it was intended to protect the poor man in his placer mining, whereas it has no connection with that at all, because it is not in these rivers and lakes that gold has been found in any paying quantities up to the present time.

The contract also provides that "the contractors shall upon application sell to actual settlers for farming purposes, at prices to be fixed by the Governor in Council, any arable lands forming part of these selected hereunder," and the "Globe" dwelt on that at great length. But this applies to a country where, according to Mr. Ogilvie, you could only raise potatoes if you kept them blanketed all summer. The newspapers supporting hon. gentlemen opposite dilated on this. They said: We did not do as you did in the North-west case, leave it optional to that company to put on their arable lands any price they like. We, on the contrary, have safeguarded the people who will go into farm there, by compelling the company to sell to them at prices fixed by the Governor in Council. What object could these newspapers have, except to hoodwink and blind the people when they advanced such an argument? Why, all the information we have shows that it is absolutely impossible to grow anything in that country which is grown on the farms here, and that in fact there is no arable land in it. I believe that this is a very bad bargain and I condemn it. I condemn it, first, because it is a secret bargain, made in secret with parties whom we do not know—because no publicity was given to it and no tenders invited. No information was given to capitalists that such a road was under consideration and required, and the contract was entered into, in this secret manner, with individuals who are, in all likelihood, going to make a great deal out of it and give the country a very small return.

I condemn it because we are asked to enter into the contract without any information to enable us to estimate the cost of it, the quality of the road when built, or the amount of money we are giving for it. We have none of the data that would enable us, as representing the people, to intelligently deal with it.

I condemn it because we are, so far as any one can judge, with the information available, paying entirely too much for it.

I condemn it because it creates a monopoly of transportation, a monopoly of mining, which will assuredly be detrimental to the individual miner and prospector as well as to the people of the country generally. There can be no doubt whatever on that point.

I condemn it because it gives power to crush out the poor miner and labourer, whose rights are not protected against a powerful corporation. They cannot fight such a corporation, and a miner, after prospecting for a length of time, using his means and labour and undergoing hardship, whenever he reaches the paying goal, can be crushed remorselessly by that powerful corporation.

I condemn it because it is not an all-Canadian route. That is one of the strong grounds on which we are asked to support it—that it will be an all-Canadian route, which will ensure to the people of Canada the right to carry on their own trade, through their own country, without any competition.

Mr. SPROULE.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Hear, hear.

Mr. SPROULE. But there is no doubt that the United States have it in their power to hamper us by means of customs regulations and prevent our effectively using that road, if they so desire.

I condemn it because there is nothing in the contract to prevent the company from selling out to any foreign corporation at any time, and putting it in the power of a foreign company to control transportation to the detriment of Canada and the Canadian miner.

I condemn it because it establishes a bad precedent that will be quoted as a justification for every scaly transaction that may be presented to Parliament in future.

I condemn it because the suspicious circumstances surrounding the whole transaction savour of a job out of which some parties are likely to make a great deal of money without giving value to the country in return.

I may say that there is one strange coincidence which particularly struck me in connection with this matter. It was a peculiar time when this was announced to the world, at the same time as was the dissolution of the Ontario House. The provincial legislature had prorogued, but there was no dissolution. The papers on both sides said that there was to be a dissolution, and the election would immediately follow, but it was held back, nobody knew why. But the very day after this bargain was announced the dissolution took place. Here were just grounds for suspicion. We find politicians interested in the advancement of the party of the Dominion, and in the province co-operating. Take, for instance, Senator Cox, Mr. Jaffray, Mr. Willison, Mr. Mackenzie, Mr. Mann and others. There is no power that can convince the people of Ontario that there is not a heavy subscription coming out of that deal to be used in the provincial elections against the opponents of the Liberal party. I hope it is not the case. I should like to see the time in Canadian public life when both parties would go to the country upon a fair and honest basis, without advantage being taken by either in the expenditure of money or in the use of patronage by which they can deal out cold justice or warm justice as the circumstances may require. I feel that we have not yet reached those happy days. I believe that the time will come when it will be shown that in the election now about to be held the Government party had at their disposal money which they used in it that came directly or indirectly out of the secret contract entered into at that time.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, while there are some things in the Speech from the Throne that pleases me, there are some things, as sometimes happens, that I cannot approve. As a matter of course I think that the Government has done well in recognizing the bountiful harvest as the great cause of our prosperity. Another cause of that prosperity is not that, as the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram) said, the Government had carried out its pledges, but that they have not. The only pledges that they have really carried out in their tariff legislation is with reference to binder twine and barbed wire. And we have seen the effects of taking the duty off binder twine. We have had the hon. Senator Cox down here with a deputation to interview the Government on that subject. He told them that he had bought stock in binder twine industry under the protective tariff for which he had paid par, and, if they did not restore the duties he would be glad to take fifteen cents on the dollar for it. Not only that, but he said that this company had large dealings with the bank with which he was connected, and if the duty was not restored the bank would be unable to make further advances to carry on the business. That is a very serious state of things. Then Mr. Ballantyne, a prominent Reformer of western Ontario, representing the patron binder twine concern, was here with a deputation of stockholders—I presume they were stockholders—in that concern for the same purpose. What action the Government has taken, of course, I do not know. I hope they will restore the duty, because I would rather see our manufacturers prosper than to see their men walking the streets idle because the Government is trying to be consistent on this small scale. I would like to refer the hon. member for Centre Toronto to his neighbour, the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson). That hon. gentleman publishes a paper in Winnipeg, in which he said a very short time ago that if the Government put binder twine on the dutiable list again, they would have abandoned all that they contended for except with regard to barbed wire. From what I have seen of the hon. member for Lisgar, I take it that he is a very strong free trader when he is in the west, but when he comes east his policy is not to quarrel with the Government. I would like to give the hon. member for Centre Toronto evidence that the Liberal party did pledge itself for free trade, that is if the leader can pledge his party. I think that no person will deny that the Premier at a public meeting in Montreal in the general election campaign of 1896 promised that he would take the duty off iron and coal. I presume the reason he made these specific promises was that he had been talking free trade very strongly, and fearing that he was in danger of alienating the manufacturers, offered them free materials in this way as an inducement on the other side. Not only that, but the hon. gentleman, in a speech at Grand River, in Gaspé county, in August, 1895, said: "If he were Prime Minister he would make it his business to remove the duty on pork and flour." The hon. member for Centre Toronto knows that not one of these four articles has been placed on the free list. The Government did reduce the duty on flour, but so very little that the change had no practical effect. I desire to refer to the utterances of another prominent member of the Government, although he does not occupy so prominent a position in the Government as it was anticipated he would—for obvious reasons. I refer to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). It was said that a direct bargain was made by the leaders of the Reform party that if they came into power they would not have Sir Richard Cartwright as Finance Minister, the manufacturers being afraid to trust him because he was such an ardent free trader and had made such strong statements throughout the country. He said:

We will collect a revenue by duties placed upon articles which we cannot produce in Canada, as that is the only possible method of taking every vestige of protection out of the tariff and still raising a revenue.

I believe that is the principle adopted in England, and so the main effect of duties is to increase the revenue. We know that a few years ago the Minister of Trade and Commerce talked very extravagantly of the National Policy robbing the people. He has said time and again that it filched from fifty to one hundred million of dollars a year out of the pockets of the people for the benefit of the manufacturers. Supposing that to be true, I do not know of language strong enough to characterize the acts of the present Government, because, if the ex-Finance Minister, Mr. Foster, is any authority, they have only reduced the tariff 71 one hundredths of one per cent; consequently they are still taking very nearly 100 millions out of the pockets of the people, in addition to what goes into the public treasury. But I think the good sense of this House does not credit that statement. I think that was probably one reason why the Liberal party kept the Minister of Trade and Commerce off the stump during the last election, namely, because to his extravagant statements, they were so extravagant that the people could not really believe them. I have several other extracts from speeches of the hon. gentleman. On October 25, he said:

The time is ripe for very extensive and far-reaching reforms. I, for my part, would be sorry to see the issue dwindled down to a mere question of revenue tariff. We need, among other things, a radical readjustment, not only of our tariff, but of the whole system of taxation.

Now that puts me in mind of an incident that occurred when the Mackenzie Administration was in power some years ago. They fell into the habit of having successive deficits, until the sum total became a very serious matter. So they said they must raise more revenue, and the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, who was then Finance Minister, undertook to readjust the tariff. After tinkering with it for a considerable length of time, they paid the highest compliment they could to the policy of their predecessors, by adopting their duties, only adding 2½ per cent. That is just what they have done in this present Parliament; they have pursued the same course in open violation of all their pledges made to the country during the time they were in Opposition. Now if you will look at "Hansard" for 1893, page 714, you will find this :

Our policy from first to last has been to destroy protection, which has been grinding out the vitals of the country.

Sir, I would like to ask the hon. member for Toronto Centre (Mr. Bertram) if he has ever seen the speeches of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, or whether he entirely ignores him as a leader of the party, or whether he feels that he cannot be bound by the expressions of any leader. I will say this for the hon. member for Centre Toronto, that I was much pleased with his address on the whole, particularly with his manner of delivery. Of course I did not agree with his matter altogether, as we see things from very different standpoints. Now I will give you another one of the strong statements of the hon. Minister with reference to free trade and protection :

We denounce the principle of protection as radically unsound and unjust to the masses of the people, and we declare our conviction that any tariff changes based on that principle must fail to afford any substantial relief from the burdens under which the country labours. This issue we unhesitatingly accept, and upon it we await with the fullest confidence the verdict of the electors of Canada.

Now that was putting it very straight and strong. Well, there is another hon. gentleman in the Cabinet who talks a good deal, who is a very nice fellow, but he seems to change his opinion pretty frequently also. I do not know whether he is able to give reasons for the change or not. Sometimes hon. gentlemen feel called upon to give reasons and sometimes they do not. I refer now to the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies). He is leading the House to-night, and he is doing it admirably. Speaking at Middleton, in 1893, he is reported to have said :

Well, gentlemen, I need say no more. Whatever doubts or difficulties there may have been about understanding our trade policy in times past, there is none now. Our platform is clear and definite. * * * To-day the people of Canada stand face to face with such an issue, and the next contest is to be one between free trade and protection. * * * The policy of the Liberal party, on the contrary is the reform of the tariff by the elimination from it of every vestige of protection.

Now, I would like to ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if he thinks the country has pronounced in favour of the Liberal party on these lines. If he does think so, then I think the Liberal party is acting very unfairly towards the country, because if the country pronounced in favour of the Liberal policy, certainly the party ought to carry out that policy. But when they came to power they found that they had made statements the fulfilment of which the country would not sanction, and promises that their followers in Parliament would not endorse. Well, what did they resort to? They appointed a commission to go all over this country and interview the manufacturers, business men and farmers. They had ridiculed the Conservative party for doing the same thing; but I do not ridicule the Reform party for doing it; I think they acted wisely and well. I think it is much better that they should break their promises, that their leader should be discredited, and the whole party, for that matter, than that the country should be ruined by their keeping their pledges. Now the leader of the party made some other promises. The Liberal party in our part of the country is always posing as the party of purity. They have looked upon other people as not being quite as good as they were. During the last election campaign they tried to make the people believe that the Conservative party was a party of corruption, and I think perhaps they almost persuaded them that it was so. Therefore it is not to be wondered at that a large number of people believed in the principles enunciated by the leader of this Government, in the city of Toronto, in 1896, where he made this statement :

When last Sir Wilfrid Laurier was in Toronto he delivered a speech at the Massey Hall, in which he said that no man who had been connected with any questionable transaction should hold a position of honour and responsibility under the Crown.

I believe all the people in the city of Toronto would endorse that remark. I believe the people of this country as a whole would endorse that principle; and I hope that the time will soon come when we will have no other class of men in the Cabinet. I may say that for my own part I wish there were no other class of men in this House, because I think that the representatives of the people should be men who are above suspicion. He went on to say :

He cited several French cases in which public men had been compelled on mere suspicion to abandon public life. He added that this was the standard of morality that he would set up. He would give us clean men, men of whom not one unfavourable criticism could be uttered.

This was the language used by the hon. gentleman at the same time that one of his most intimate friends was the famous Mr. Ernest Pacaud, a gentleman who had taken $100,000 of the public money of the province of Quebec to carry on elections, trying to elect the Liberal party in 1891.

and whatever was left was spent in protesting the seats of Conservative members. Then there was Mr. Charles Langellier, who was Secretary of State in the Quebec Liberal Government. He was helping Mr. Pacaud to get these letters of credit discounted, and it was shown clearly before the commission appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor, that these men had corruptly taken public money and spent it for election purposes. I do not intend to go into that particular matter any further. I am sorry the Minister of Railways is not in his seat at the present moment, and in his absence I should like the leader of the House to give me his attention for a moment. I find it reported that at a public meeting held in Kingston about 31st January, a telegram was read purporting to come from the Minister of Railways. Mr. Harty read a telegram from Mr. Blair promising that a contract for three engines would be given to the locomotive works for construction at once, with a promise that another order would follow after Parliament had made the necessary appropriation. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman now leading the House if he is aware whether Mr. Blair sent such a telegram.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, I am not.

Mr. WILSON. Is it a secret as to whether such an Order in Council was passed or not?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have not heard of it.

Mr. WILSON. Then, we must take it for granted that it was a bogus telegram.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not suggest that. I simply say I do not know.

Mr. WILSON. It looks as if it had been sent to influence the electors of Kingston to vote for Mr. Harty. The present leader of the Government, who is so pure, and announced his policy so clearly, and stated what kind of men he would secure to form a Cabinet, seems to have a very dear friend, one who has been a very dear friend to other men in politics, and who still says he is a Tory. About the first man called to office was the very intimate friend of Connolly—I refer to Mr. Tarte, and I am sorry he is not in his seat.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. member must refer to an hon. member by the constituency he represents.

Mr. WILSON. I will take that back, and say, the Minister of Public Works. It was not stated with the intention of being an insult to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. But I observe the hon. gentleman made the mistake in mentioning other names.

Mr. WILSON. I am very much obliged to the Deputy Speaker for calling me to order. I was going on to say that about the first man asked to become a member of the Cabinet was no less a person than the present Minister of Public Works. At Lévis, on 17th or 18th December last, the Minister of Public Works explained how he entered the Cabinet. He said:

I regret to know that certain groups have not full confidence in me. I have done for the best. I have often been tempted to go back to journalism. When Sir Wilfrid Laurier called me into his Cabinet, I said, "You know I am a poor man; allow me to attend to my business." But he said, "I have received the support of many Conservatives. I want you in the Cabinet to represent them."

It was very liberal for the First Minister to appoint the hon. gentleman to represent those Conservatives who had voted with him at the last general elections. I know some Conservatives who, perhaps, do not look upon the Minister as their representative.

I wish to call the attention of the House for a few moments to a statement made by the Minister of Public Works at the Grenier trial. The hon. gentleman was put into the witness-box and there made a statement under oath: that Mr. Pacaud had come to him and made a proposition that if the Opposition in the local House of Quebec offered no opposition to the award of Mr. Whelan's claim, he would give him $5,000. The Minister of Public Works said he went to the leader of the Opposition, Mr. Taillon, who said he was not going to offer any opposition to it, and Mr. Pacaud paid him the $5,000. The Minister said that he was doing no wrong, that he was not a member of Parliament, that it was not public money, that he did not take it for his private purposes, that he used it for political purposes, and the great virtue of the expenditure was that it weakened his opponents just to that extent. There are many Reform papers published in the country, and it may be interesting to observe what they say in regard to the Minister of Public Works. The following article appeared in the Huntingdon "Gleaner" in the early part of October:—

He (Mr. Tarte) was to have been paid a salary of $4,000 as organizer and actually got only $1,300, which he spent for the party. That he bled contractors and politicians aspiring to seats, and received Government money for which he had given no value, he frankly acknowledged, yet claimed he was innocent, because he spent the money for party purposes.

His entire defence is to be rejected with indignant scorn. What is wrong in the individual is wrong in the politician, and the man who extorts money for his party is morally as bad as he who extorts it for himself—the only difference in the former case being that he does not add selfishness to obtaining money by crooked means. Under the rulings of the judge, the jury found Grenier guilty, but that does not exonerate Tarte, who leaves court with a reputation blackened by his own admissions. Tarte was the go-between to press claims that could not be advocated openly, and took pay for the services rendered or expected.

That is the way in which the leader of the Government built his Cabinet, that is the kind of men he took in; the Minister of Public Works was the intimate friend of Pacaud and also the intimate friend of the First Minister. I have several other extracts from newspapers at my hand, but I will not trouble the House with them.

I want to call the attention of the Postmaster General for a moment to the fact that some members of this House have carried in their pockets appointments during a year and a half. A gentleman sat in this House for two sessions, according to his own statement, after being promised a lieutenant-governorship, if he was not appointed to a judgeship before a vacancy in the higher position occurred. The Postmaster General is, no doubt, so busy in the department looking up confidential letters, that he does not observe these matters, and yet during the last session of the last Parliament he introduced a Bill providing that no gentleman should be eligible for Government office until one year had passed after the expiration of the Parliament. Then, too, quite a number of members of Parliament have been appointed to office during the short reign of this Administration, and I certainly think the Postmaster General owes to this House an explanation of his occupying a seat in the Government which allows such things to be done.

There are certain extraordinary things in connection with this Yukon Railway contract, and not the least remarkable was the extraordinary speech of the Minister of Railways in introducing the Bill to the House. He told us in effect: It is a huge monopoly; we do not know what we are giving to the contractors, we do not know what the railway will cost, and we do not even know whether Canada has a right to tranship goods at Fort Wrangell, a proceeding which is necessary in order to reach the railroad. The Government knew of these gold discoveries since before the House prorogued last June, and it does seem strange to me that they should not have sent engineers to have the lands surveyed and a report received in time to call for tenders. They go it blind; they do not know what the land is worth, they do not know what the road will cost, and they never had an estimate made.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There was an estimate made.

Mr. WILSON. Then, if there was, the Minister of Railways seemed to know nothing about it, because he told the House there was no estimate made. The Government take credit that they have power to fix the rates on this railway, but they take good care that the rates shall be fixed for ten years, with two reductions. They first say there shall be no alteration of the rates for four years, then that there shall be a reduction of 25 per cent, and then in another three years a further reduction of 25 per cent. Does not that mean that the people who send in their goods when the railway is first completed, will have to pay double what the freight is worth? Does any one believe that after seven years the railway will carry goods for half what is charged to-day, and not make a profit? I do not think so, and I do not think the Government think so either. The clause is not a proper clause, for it means practically that the contractors can fix whatever rate they like for several years, and then their line comes under the general provision of the Railway Act. I was at Mr. Ogilvie's lecture last night, and I was much pleased with it, as, I believe, every one else was. Mr. Ogilvie told us of a man who was not the sole owner, but had only an interest in six claims, and his share for one winter amounted to $106,000, and during the following summer he sold his interest in these claims for $2,000,000. That is the kind of land that this Government is going to give 3,750,000 acres of land to build a railway 150 miles long; and in addition to that they are fixing the rates on that railway at about double what they should be.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer for a moment to the preferential trade question, and I wish to refer to it because of the lecture delivered by no less a prominent Reformer than the Hon. G. W. Ross, at Toronto, on the 5th December last. He gave a great many instances of public men there who are in favour of preferential trade, but whether the action of the right hon. the Prime Minister in England will not totally destroy our chance of preferential trade or not is now a serious question, and, in my opinion, the right hon. gentleman's Jubilee speeches have had a strong tendency in that direction. He tells us himself that he did not advocate preferential trade anywhere, and that he told the people of England that what Canada had done for English commerce was a free gift. We used to be told in the old days, that if the Liberals were in power we would get reciprocity with the United States. Well, they have been over a year and a half in office, and we have not got a reciprocity treaty yet, and I do not think we are any nearer to it than when they came into power. Here are the views of the Hon. G. W. Ross on this question of reciprocity with the United States:

The conclusion is thus irresistibly forced upon us that, so far as Canada is concerned, it is utterly useless to entertain the idea of a reciprocity treaty with the United States for the purpose of removing either present or future irritation. Our experience, in many cases bitter and humiliating, is against any expectation of that kind. I am, therefore, reluctantly I must admit, obliged to eliminate from the consideration of this question all speculation with regard to its effect upon international relations.

Had the treaty of 1854 been continued for some years longer, it is doubtful whether the advantages to Canada, great as they no doubt were, would not have abated substantially by the resuscitation of industries which the civil war had destroyed.

Trade follows the flag and British subjects follow British trade. For the further settlement of this country, as well as for strengthening our relations with the Empire, our obvious policy is to develop trade with Great Britain.

That is the speech that might be made by any Tory, and I would advise hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches to read that speech as I did. I also read the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) in Toronto, and I looked upon it as a very moderate and reasonable speech. I was glad to see that the hon. gentleman frankly admitted that the Liberals made a great many promises in eighteen years; a good many of which had not been carried out, though he hoped in time they would. I believe it will take a long time, and I hope so, too. For my part, I am glad that the great Liberal party has thought more of the country than they have of their pledges.

Mr. POPE. Hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, when speaking of the Minister of Public Works, should be rather more careful of the reflections which they make upon the character of that hon. gentleman, because he has taken his oath that he is a Conservative. He has stated that he is in that Government to represent us there, at the special request of the First Minister of this country, and while I must say the selection does not show a very high appreciation of us Conservatives in the mind of the First Minister, yet he has made it, and we are in duty bound to recognize the selection as at least a powerful portion of the organization that sits opposite to us. A man who can dictate, as the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) has dictated, a man who can thrash men in and out of office, who can damn them politically in our province, man after man, no matter how big or important they may have been in the past, whatever party they may belong to, a man who has played with them fast and loose, and has left them politically in the gutter, rolling in the mire, some of them Conservatives and some Liberals, is a man of whose wonderful power we as Conservatives have a right to feel proud. It only shows that if the Cabinet opposite were composed of Conservatives, what a wonderfully powerful organization it would be. When one of the weakest and most uncertain of our number is placed in their midst and dictates to them right and left, we can realize what would happen if other men whom we could easily name had found a place there. But, Sir, the right hon. First Minister has been criticised for the selection he has made of his Ministry. I presume we will all admit that it is the right hon. gentleman's own business to associate himself with such men as he sees fit; but, Sir, while we recognize that principle, the right hon. gentleman can well understand that this House and this country will form a certain judgment of his nonest intentions by the associates he gathers around him.

Now, Sir, look at that Cabinet. I have no reflection to make upon its personnel; but I say that in its formation the greatest tribute was paid to the Conservative party for what they have said and what the country has said of them in the last seventeen or eighteen years. There were two things that were laid down: first, that the policy advocated by the Liberal party was unsound, and consequently the Opposition in this House did not contain the men out of which to form a Cabinet. We see in front of us a Cabinet of strangers, men drawn from the different provinces because they are specialists. Their special art is known in their respective provinces. They are men of grand artistic tastes, and they have operated in their several fields for years, and have built up the reputations they possess. We see gathered in that Cabinet a combination of men and reputations such as never sat in any cabinet of this country of ours. Take the province of Quebec, in which I have a right to be particularly interested. Of the hon. gentlemen who sat on this side of the House and supported loyally, faithfully, and well the First Minister during many years of Opposition, I ask you to look over these front benches, and christen the Minister who ever had a seat on the Opposition side of this House during those years. Were we not right in saying, then, that the ability did not exist among the Liberal members of this House, so far as the province of Quebec was concerned, out of which to form a Ministry? And has not the right hon. First Minister endorsed the position we took in that respect? It may be a reflection, and in my opinion it is a sad reflection, upon the ability and the faithful services rendered to the right hon. gentleman by more than one man who sits on the Government side of the House to-day, and who occupied a seat on the Opposition side for ten or fifteen years. But as the hon. First Minister deals with his own following, we have a right to measure the sincerity and confidence of the man. If we measure him first by the way he has treated the principles advocated by himself and his party in Opposition, the promises he made to this country, over and over again, for seventeen years, and place alongside of that the treatment that he meted out to his faithful followers and supporters during all those years, I ask by what rule of common sense should I be asked to have confidence in the right hon. First Minister? If the right hon. gentleman had been able to form that Government from the Liberal element in his following, there would not have been so much cause of complaint as we know exists, and justly exists, in the province of Quebec among the old Liberal element. But, instead of that, where did he find the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte)? Who could have placed that hon. gentleman's political bed? Where did he ever stop over night? He was up before four in the morning; he could not stay in one bed twenty-four hours; he was out of one thing and into another. Then, take that hanger-on to the Government, the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell)—where did the right hon. First Minister find him? Where did he search him out? Not on the fence. I do not think he had even got up on the fence. I think the right hon. First Minister let the bars down, and let him walk through.

Mr. DAVIN. He says he is one of the first men of Canada.

Mr. POPE. Yes, one of the future first men. He is the Minister who is going to build the fast line of steamers from England to Canada.

An hon. MEMBER. Bottle-shaped ships.

Mr. POPE. Yes, bottle-shaped ships, and he has been nearly two years at the business; and I want to say that after he has expended two years more with the combination he is engaged with to-day, he will be just as near the finish of the business as he was when he began. Messrs. Peterson, Tate & Company are respectable men, but they have not any financial standing in England, and I do not believe it is possible to complete the contract through these men. The only result of the arrangement has been to postpone, from year to year, what would have been a great boon to this country.

Now, Sir, this discussion has taken a very wide range, and we all, I suppose, may feel at liberty to deal with almost anything that may be found in the political atmosphere. In reference to the preferential trade arrangements, so-called, that were made by the right hon. First Minister in England, when I read the speech delivered by him at Liverpool, I was so astonished that I could not believe that I had received the right report; and I was only the more astonished when I heard the right hon. gentleman in his seat in this House give the weak explanations he chose to give in connection with that matter. As a farmer I had looked forward to the bringing about of preferential trade arrangements with Great Britain as the greatest possible boon—in fact, as the only guarantee that we could stand in relation to Great Britain in a better position than any other part of the world. It is well known that the right hon. leader of the Opposition and those who sit behind him were strongly in favour of the propositions which had been mooted by Mr. Chamberlain and other Imperial statesmen, who had said that they were prepared to entertain such arrangements as would bring about an Imperial Zollverein, or a preference for the productions of the colonies in the markets of Great Britain. We thought we would be required, without doubt, to make some sacrifice, when the right hon. First Minister said two or three times from his seat in the House: would you be prepared to do this or do that? I say, as a member of the British family, as a Canadian representing a Canadian constituency, that we would not ask Great Britain to make sacrifices in our interests that we were not prepared to meet by reciprocal sacrifice on our side. Sir, we would no more refuse to do that than would the British Government think of asking us to make concessions that they were not prepared to meet.

During the six months that I had the pleasure of being in England I had the opportunity of meeting from time to time men of some importance—members of boards of trade and others, among whom this question was a lively subject of discussion, and in no instance did I hear any of them ever suggest asking that we should give to Great Britain something and receive nothing in return. They always said what can you do for us? And I laid out to them what I think is quite as sound, that there was an abundance of trade for us both, the preferential interchange of which would benefit each. In the first place, as a manufacturing nation, we were young and immature, and our industries ran on the cheaper lines of products, whereas they being a much older and well equipped manufacturing people, who produced rather the higher grades than the lower, there was scarcely an article of manufacture which could be mentioned in which there was not opportunity for us to arrange a sliding scale by which they could obtain a preference in our market. In return for this, I said, we expect you to give us a preference in your market for the productions of our farms and forests. That would make us the heart and centre of the British Colonial Empire. We are the greatest agricultural country, for our population, in the world, and every article produced on our soil would then find a better price in the English market than in any other markets under the sun. We are now getting good returns, but if hon. gentlemen opposite fancy that the temporary high prices and prosperity which we are enjoying to-day and which is so welcome, is going to see them through to the end they will find they are sailing under false colours. To-day the only man in any business in any country who is making money over and above his fellow-men is the one who has a preferential position, either by a patent or some other arrangement; and if this preferential trade arrangement had been effected, as it could have been, we would have had a patent which would assure prosperity from generation to generation to the growers of the produce of our soil. The vexed question of immigration would have been settled, as every immigrant leaving Europe would have known that after he landed in Canada the product he sent to the English market would have been worth more than if grown on American or any other foreign soil. I believe that preferential arrangement would have been easy to realize if the right hon. First Minister had had the required business capacity. Fancy a man leaving this country and going across to make a bargain, and then, when he arrives at Liverpool, saying: I will give you everything for nothing. A more unbusiness-like proposition never was laid before any people. The sentiment of England at the time was strong in favour of better trade arrangements with the colonies. You might go into any theatre or any public place you choose in the country, and if you wanted applause all you had to do was to get off something in favour of closer colonial connections or against German competition. All that Mr. Chamberlain, such was the state of public sentiment at the time, had to do to satisfy the English people with the position which we desired to obtain in the English market, was to declare that it required the denunciation of the Belgian and German treaties, and that would have been done in the twinkling of an eye. There was a man who felt disappointment pretty keenly when he read the speech of the right hon. leader of this Government. That man was the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, who had spent time and energy, and exposed himself to all sorts of criticisms, to make the Greater Britain what the Central Britain is to-day among the nations of the world. He had used every effort, he had spoken frequently, he had distributed literature throughout England to prepare the public mind for the reception of his new theory, and he found all his labours, all his efforts, destroyed in a second by the speech delivered by the right hon. gentleman on landing at Liverpool. I cannot conceive as a business man how the right hon. gentleman came to take the position he did. Whether the motion of the waves as he passed over the ocean affected his mental equilibrium and cut him loose at the wrong time, I do not know. Whether visions of the honours which were to be showered on him or of the meeting with Her Majesty, whether the prospect of future knighthood, or the recollections of speeches delivered in Boston or elsewhere, had turned his brain and made him feel that he was compelled to make this sacrifice of his country's interests, I cannot say, but certainly his first speech to the people of England was a most unfortunate one. Great must be the political honours which required a sacrifice of such magnitude as that which the hon. gentleman made immediately on landing. But whatever be the cause that hurried him into that temporary moment of insanity, the result was most unfortunate to this country. It will hold us back for years and keep us standing simply on the same footing as other parts of the world when we might have obtained a preference in the English market.

It is not my intention to detain the House for more than three or four minutes, but I could not conceive it consistent with my duty to sit down without referring to the Yukon contract. I have been unfortunate in my efforts to speak on this occasion. I intended to speak yesterday, but when the hon. member for West Assinibola (Mr. Davin) delivered that Latin speech which so interested us, all the Latin got into my head, and I quite forgot my native tongue and could not venture to address the House. I had just got my courage up to-day and was about to speak, when my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) rose and caught the Speaker's eye, and I had to give way. I intend to speak on this railway question at a later stage and do not propose now to pass too serious reflections upon the Government for the policy they are pursuing. I can see that great deliberation was given to this contract. I can see, as the hon. Minister of Railways said, that a full Cabinet had considered this question. As I look over the various clauses, I can see the impress in each of different people. I can see in one clause the work of the great mind of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher). Sir, any man would know it in the dark as the work of the hon. gentleman, and he is entitled to all the credit for it as his crowning effort in the great contract.

They call this a railway. Why do they not call it by its proper name—a steam tramway? Let them tell the people what the First Minister has said, that this is a temporary means of transport, a steam tramway built into that country. Anybody who knows that western country knows that the difficulties of railway construction are confined to the fringe or along the coast line, and, as you go north, these difficulties lessen and at last entirely disappear. I have not seen the profile of this road; I do not know that there is one. The hon. member who at this moment leads the House (Sir Louis Davies), intimated that there is one. The hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair), a day or two ago, said there was not. But I see that he has been driven from the Cabinet since that time. I understand that a meeting of the greater cabinet was held to-day, in which some serious troubles arose, the result of which is that neither the Minister of Railways nor the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) is present to-night. We regret their absence. These difficulties arise in every political family. I have been a member of a family in the past in which some difficulties arose. I offer my hearty sympathy to hon. gentlemen on the other side. The proposal, then, is to build a steam tramway over a line, the engineering difficulties of which are confined to thirty miles. After that you reach a plateau which carries you to your destination. The cost of that part of the road will be—let us say, double what it would be in this section of the country—about $15,000 a mile. I venture to say, that you can let the contract at that rate. Do not tell us that the putting in of this sleigh-road is one of the considerations that we get. No man would undertake a contract in that country without putting in a sleigh-road. A contractor who would attempt to do without such a means of transport would be simply crazy. He must get his goods in and have them distributed along the line, and establish camps and offices. Nobody has any objection to this sleigh-road being built, but the Government must not put that forward as a reason why we should give up a big portion of our territory.

Now, as to the earnings of the road. Comparison has been made, and will be made, outside with the Canadian Pacific Railway. Hon. gentlemen opposite do not do that here, where people know better. As a matter of fact, they do not rise at all, having apparently lost the use of thier limbs. But outside of this House, they will rise and compare this arrangement with the arrangement made for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. But there is no comparison. The Canadian Pacific Railway was a transcontinental line, far more difficult to build in many points. Then, it was a railway, not a tram-road, and was built to a standard far higher than this is to be. Moreover, the company had to make their own traffic. They ran through an uninhabited section, where the traffic was so little that hon. gentlemen opposite, then on this side, declared that they never could earn enough to pay for grease for the wheels. Hon. Edward Blake, then leader of the Opposition, said that the country through which the railway passed was full of moss, morasses and swamps. The road had to go through the mountains, which were difficult to surmount and which yielded no traffic when they were surmounted. That was the description of the country given by these hon. gentlemen, and that was a patriotic pride they manifested in this great national highway, which now they bow down and worship. But to-day, for this little tramway, there is traffic waiting. Traffic is being booked every day in London, in New York, in all the principal cities of the world—people going to the Klondike. I am told that some 80,000 or 90,000 have been booked by the Cook people alone. This is vastly different from what it would be if the contractors had to depend on mere uncertainties. The people who are going to the gold fields with their equipage, will pay an average of at least $50 apiece on this road. Suppose that 100,000, or even 50,000, people go over the road. There you have the figures, and you can calculate it for yourself. Add it up, multiply it, do anything you like with it, and you will find that there is a profit in it. Subtract all you want to, and you will still have enough to pay for building the road. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) smiles.

Mr. POPE.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Why not make it $100? Or suppose you make it $10.

Mr. POPE. No.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Why not?

Mr. POPE. It is not enough. You must count on a reasonable figure.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What would the hon. gentleman call a reasonable figure?

Mr. POPE. Fifty dollars.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If we could get it done for one-third of that, what would you say?

Mr. POPE. The hon. Minister is like the rest of the Liberal party in the House; they can hint and suggest, but they dare not say. He is a responsible Minister of the Crown, and is a party to this contract. They are all in it: the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), as I have intimated—he has a hand in it, too. And neither of these hon. gentlemen dares to stand up and say that a man with ordinary equipage—some men will have half a ton, others will have four tons, but take the average—will get over that road for less than $50. No man will object to paying that, and I will bet money that as a matter of fact, they will pay more. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries dares not rise in his place and say that they will pay less. Several hon. gentlemen have asked whether members who object to the present contract will subscribe stock in this enterprise. This is their stock argument—I apologize for the pun. Will the hon. Minister tell me, or will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) sitting alongside of him tell me, that he would accept a proposition to build that road for less money? I am willing he should take time to consult his colleagues; and if he will come back here and say that they will accept a bona fide offer, I tell him that I will produce in less than three days an organization of men who will undertake to construct that road—and who will put up the forfeit of $250,000—for a subsidy a great deal less than it is proposed to give under this contract.

The hon. gentleman thinks that I am bluffing him. Well, Sir, if the contract is not a hard and fast one, as was stated by the Minister of Justice in the Senate, he has an opportunity of knowing whether I am bluffing; he has an opportunity of putting it to the test. The people will then know whether there is more than one set of contractors in Canada capable of undertaking the construction of a tramway 150 miles in length, at the longest. Of course, Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether this distance of 150 miles is correct, or whether it is 125. We have not the data upon the Table of the House, and therefore I will not discuss that point. I can only say, as everybody else would say, that the character of the two gentlemen who have undertaken this contract is quite sufficient, so far as their reputation as contractors goes, to warrant that they will carry out their part of it, there is no doubt about that. But to say that it is not in the public interest that the Government should have searched through this country, either by newspapers or by private tenders, or by any other means they chose to adopt, to ascertain whether there were other contractors in Canada who were able and willing to undertake this work, I cannot for a moment admit. When they decided to build this piece of road it would not have cost them anything to do so, because they have no postage to pay, the Government get their stationery free, and they could have written to various contractors without it costing the country a cent, and then they would not have been in the miserable position of the Minister of Railways who bewailed the situation in this House when he said that they could not beat them down any more. Who was beating them down? Mackenzie & Mann on the one hand, or the Government on the other? The Government disclosed, by the very fact that they did not advertise, by the very fact that they made no noise about it, that they were not seeking for other competitors. They were conducting a private negotiation with these gentlemen, whether it was honest or dishonest, I am not here to say. I am not here to charge the Government, but they must know that the country is suspicious of secret bargains, and they must expect that reflections will be cast upon them from one end of Canada to the other. Although hon. members in this House may speak strongly upon the question, I can tell the Government that they will find that people in the country will speak upon it more strongly still. Why, I should suppose that this Government, as a safeguard to themselves, as a mere act of discretion, as wise and prudent administrators of public affairs, would have advertised, would have communicated at least with men capable of carrying out their agreements with the Government, to see if it was not possible for them to make a better bargain. I am astonished especially at this bargain when I remember that the Government had to counsel them a business man like the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell), a gentleman whom they let through the bars, a gentleman whom they found perched, either on the fence or just over it—some hon. member suggests under the fence, but I cannot believe that the hon. gentleman from Quebec West, in the hour of victory, would have been found under the fence. But that we were told by the press at the time that the hon. gentleman became an outside member of that Government because he was a business man, and we remember that his entry into the Government was heralded by the Montreal papers as a guarantee of the business capacity of this Cabinet. Sir, that is true, and that the hon. gentleman, with his wide experience, should have allowed his innocent colleagues, men unversed in business, men who had been so long in political life that they had lost their cunning, that they no longer possessed business acumen—I say it is incredible that the hon. member for Quebec West should have allowed them to make such a contract. I warn the Government that they will be subjected to severe criticism throughout the country for entering into this secret bargain, a bargain made behind the curtains. I can only repeat what has already been said in this House, that I do not believe such an exhibition of incompetency can be found in the history of any Parliament in the past, and I hope after this question has been threshed out in the House, and in the Senate, and if it ever gets there, before the people also, that we shall never have another like it.

Mr. ROGERS. I wish to say just a few words before this motion is put. I do not intend to trouble the House with a long speech, nor have I a pile of newspaper clippings before me from which to quote, as many other hon. members have been doing. I think that the circumstances in which the country finds itself at present, are quite sufficient to engage our attention, without our going back ten or a dozen years. I wish to say a very few words on the question of tariff reform. The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram), during his election campaign, made certain statements which I must say put the farmers of this country on their ears. I did not mind it so much because we often hear things said on election platforms that are only meant to do duty for the time being. But when I heard the statement reiterated in this House, I felt that I could not let it pass without saying a few words in condemnation. We were led to suppose in the past that some changes would be made in the tariff by which the burdens resting upon the farmers of this country, would be to some extent lessened. We had hoped during the last two sessions that we would get some relief, and were willing to wait patiently, knowing that our numbers in the House were too small to enable us to bring much direct pressure to bear upon the Government. We have been charged with being influenced by the party whip. It is too often the case that men measure other people's corn by their own measure. I am proud to say for the honour of the Patrons that neither party has ever attempted to approach them with any inducements to gain their support; both of the old parties have had too much respect for us, and too much respect for themselves, to do anything of the sort, either directly or indirectly. We are responsible for our acts to our own constituents. But charges have been circulated among my own constituents in an underhand way, that I had pledged myself to support the Reform party, that I had even put it in black and white. But the men who sent me here have too much confidence in me to believe that I would ever be untrue to their interests. The Reform party have never approached me directly or indirectly.

Speaking not only for myself, but for others, I say that I would not have considered such approaches, if made. In regard to the tariff, the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bevan) has stated that it was a permanent settlement. We do not consider it so; we believe it will be amended. We are anxiously waiting for reform to be made, and we have continued to entertain hopes along that line. Undoubtedly the Government are not responsible for what the member for Centre Toronto has said, but I should like to have an expression of opinion from the leaders to the effect that they are not in accord with that sentiment. It would relieve myself and my colleagues very much. Hope deferred sometimes makes the heart sick, and we did not expect this blow. Probably I am speaking prematurely and should wait the announcements in the Budget Speech, but I can give a word of caution and an expression of opinion that the farmers are not satisfied with the tariff. They have great burdens to bear, and we felt that the National Policy was too heavy to carry, and it was becoming more burdensome every year. We are sometimes asked why we support hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. I fail to understand, speaking from a farmer's standpoint, why we should support the advocates of the National Policy. I was in times past prepared to give the National Policy a trial and to give weak manufacturers an opportunity to become established. We have done so nobly and have stood by them, but we have had no good results. Our population has not increased, the pecuniary circumstances of our people have not improved and our mortgage debt is higher. We must all regret to observe by the returns that the chattel mortgages are $2,000,000 more in Ontario alone than they were formerly. I cannot see where the National Policy has aided the farmer. We had hoped that some little reform or slight benefit would be given them by changing the tariff, and it may yet take place. It is said that the present preferential tariff has had no good effect because our imports from England have fallen behind. Such may be the case. The business men, no doubt, feel the effects of the present position of the farmers, because of the fact that instead of buying luxuries and thereby increasing their imports, they are endeavouring to pay off their debts. We have been satisfied with the necessaries of life and have endeavoured to unload their debts. The country at large will feel the effects of this action during a few years to come, for I believe there is such an influence at work. Farmers have been brought to realize that they must buy in the cheapest markets and look out for themselves, because they have to compete with all other nations. We have looked after the other man long enough. As regards the progress of the country, we have increased our exports to $60,000,000. But I do not see what the Government policy has to do with that increase. With a tariff ranging from 30 per cent to 35 per cent farmers have been obliged to work harder, during longer hours and do more business to enable them to pay their indebtedness. They are obliged to do so in order to secure the increased exports to the value of $60,000,000 and thus make the country grow and prosper. Speakers at meetings of boards of trade and other business gatherings always refer to what the farmers are sending out of the country; we never hear anything of what the manufacturers have exported. This is additional proof that the wealth and prosperity of the country depends on the farmers. If additional steps are not taken to relieve the burdens of the farmers and general elections come around, the little wedge entered in favour of tariff reduction will receive such a blow from the agricultural sledge hammer as will make the combines and trusts shake and fall. This is simply a note of warning, and I hope hon. gentlemen will not follow the idea presented by the hon. member for Centre Toronto, that the tariff revision so far as it has gone is permanent and nothing more can be expected. We hope for better things at the hands of the Government. What encouragement would the farmers have to supporting hon. gentlemen opposite. This country has had too much protection, and the farmers' representatives cannot be expected to ally themselves with the Tories. They would laugh at us if we did it. I did not seek election, and I come here to act the best I can for the farmers and for my country. As regards the new Klondike deal, I do not think it necessary to say much about it, because if the full details as to the contract had been studied fewer speeches would have been delivered. The only point to which I object is that the Government did not ask some other contractors to hand in bids. If we had any support, there would have been greater opposition to the Crow's Nest Pass arranged last year. The farmers will never send a representative to vote away any more money for railways, and will not sanction such action on the part of their representatives whether Liberals or Tories. I desired to express my view on the tariff, and that is my excuse for rising and addressing the House to-night.

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to occupy the time of the House more than a few minutes, and I take advantage of the opportunity offered me before the debate closes of saying a few words in respect to the question before the House. Referring particularly to the first clause of the Speech from the Throne, I am sure that every hon. member on this side of the House can join in congratulating the Government and the Finance Minister upon the success which attended the floating of the recent loan in the markets of the old country and upon the high place which the credit of Canada occupies in the financial centres of the world. But, Sir, I am sure that if our country does occupy that very high position, and if her credit stands higher than that of any other dependency of the Empire, it has been due to the policy which has prevailed in Canada for the past eighteen or twenty years. And if success has attended the efforts of the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) in making such a satisfactory loan in the old country, we, upon this side of the House, can congratulate ourselves that in furtherance of his mission he received the hearty support of the Conservative party. He was not harassed, as his Conservative predecessors were harassed by hon. gentlemen who now occupy prominent positions in the Government of the country, and who, in order to defeat the efforts of former Finance Ministers, decried the country and its public men, that they might embarrass the efforts to obtain the best price for Canadian bonds.

We, on this side of the House, can congratulate ourselves, and join with hon. gentlemen opposite in rejoicing at the magnificent success which attended the Jubilee celebration in London during the past year, and upon the very honourable and important position which the Premier of Canada occupied in that demonstration. I am not saying too much, Mr. Speaker, when I say that no gentleman in public life in Canada is better qualified, or better fitted by his eloquence and by his courtly grace, to represent all classes and creeds of Her Majesty's subjects in this Dominion, than is the right hon. gentleman who at the present time is First Minister of Canada. We have not found fault, upon this side of the House, so far as I am aware, with the measures which the Government have taken for the preservation of law and order in the new country which is being opened up and developed, but we cannot help saying that, if the views which hon. gentlemen opposite once presented as to the utility of the Northwest Mounted Police, and as to the necessity of maintaining that force in the numbers and the efficiency which the late Government of Canada did—we cannot help thinking, that if these views had prevailed, the Government of the day would not have been able as expeditiously and as cheaply to despatch into the Yukon territory an efficient and effective force for the preservation of law and order.

We recognize, too, on this side of the House, the desirability and the importance of having constructed at the earliest possible moment an all-Canadian route, by means of which those who are going into that country can reach it most expeditiously and at least cost. We believe that every effort should be made, and that the Government should be given every reasonable assistance in at once promoting the construction of such a route. We believe that, as far as practicable, the trade of the Canadian Yukon should be kept for Canadian business men, or for our fellow British subjects across the ocean, and we believe also that every reasonable assistance should be given to those who might be called upon to engage in the construction of that road. But, as has been already said by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, the draft contract which has been presented to us is one of the most remarkable documents which was ever submitted to the Parliament of Canada, and is one of the most extraordinary contracts which was ever entered into between parties. The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram) told us that this contract was an extraordinary one, in that the contractors were not being paid by a cash subsidy from the Dominion Treasury. Well, Sir, for my part, I would much prefer to know what the actual cost of that road was to be, and, as a representative of the people in this House, I would far rather give my vote in favour of some definite sum to aid the contractors in the construction of this road than give them a monopoly and give them a vast portion of our national domain, which, so far as I have heard, no gentleman in this House has yet attempted to estimate the value of. How can it be said that this stipulation in the contract which is before us, is not costing the people of this country anything? Has any gentleman opposite attempted to estimate the enormous value of the lands which it is proposed to give these gentlemen as a consideration for the construction of this railway? If the stories which are told of the fabulous wealth of that Yukon district can be relied on—and some of them are worthy of credence, because they have been told us by a gentleman in the employment of the Dominion Government upon whose veracity we can rely—if these stories are true, the wealth of that country is beyond conception, and if the privileges given the contractors in the selection of that vast area of territory are crystallized into law, then these contractors, lucky men, will be able to make for themselves and their associates in this deal fortunes that will be little short of colossal. Therefore, I say, in the public interest, in the interest of the people of Canada from one end of the country to the other, in the interests of the development of that country, in the interests of those who go into prospecting and mining in that country, it would have been much more practicable and much more reasonable, in my humble judgment, if this House were asked to vote a specific sum of money, which would be all the contractors would receive for the performance of the work they have undertaken.

As I read this contract, the contractors have been given the monopoly of the transportation by that route for five years to come. That being the case, may we not fairly estimate that the profits upon the traffic of bringing in men, supplies and provisions will also be something enormous? The hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Bertram) said that on good authority it was estimated that from 150,000 to 250,000 people might be expected to go into that country this season. Most of these will be conveyed over that railway for a portion of the distance, and so long as they remain there the provisions necessary for their sustenance will have to go in by that road. And, Sir, what limitation is fixed upon the tolls which these contractors, who will own the road after it has been constructed, may levy upon the traffic? For four years they will be permitted to charge tolls fixed by the Governor General in Council; but that these tolls will be upon a generous scale is manifest by the fact that after four years they are to be reduced by 25 per cent and remain at 75 per cent of the original amount for the next three years. After that time, a further reduction of 25 per cent is to be made and to remain at that rate for the three following years, so that not until ten years from the first of September, 1898, and after these gentlemen have enjoyed the enormous advantages which this monopoly will give them, is this railway to be brought under the general law by which the tolls on Canadian railways are adjusted. It is an enormous advantage that for the construction of this tram line we should give these contractors the monopoly proposed under this contract. It has been said, that it might be damaging to the credit of Canada if the Government had asked for tenders for the construction of this railway, and had not been successful in having more than one contractor to make a bid. It is stated in the public press to-day, that more than two months ago gentlemen who represented themselves as agents of the Messrs. Rothschild in London, made an offer to this Government to construct a road from Pyramid Harbour on the Lynn Canal, via Dalton trail, for 5,000 acres per mile and no monopoly. That statement is published to-day, Mr. Speaker, and I ask if there is any truth in it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Does the hon. gentleman want to see the road built from the head of the Lynn Canal?

Mr. CLARKE. I merely asked the question, Mr. Speaker. If there is any truth in the statement, that reputable and responsible gentlemen who represented the great firm of Rothschilds & Company offered to construct the road by the Chilkat route, for a subsidy of 5,000 acres per mile, without any monopoly clause in their contract? I draw attention to that fact, because it dissipates the argument which has been advanced by the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram) to show that the course of the Government was a wise and judicious course, in making this secret arrangement with Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie, and not giving the other great contractors of this country an opportunity to tender for the work. The gentlemen who have got this contract are well known reputable citizens and first-class contractors. I do not think any fault has been found with them on this side of the House. I believe they are thoroughly competent to do the work, and will do it according to the specifications; but I say that they have no right above all other men engaged in contracting in Canada to be given this monopoly, and I hold that the Government, if they had done their whole duty, would have given not only Mann & Mackenzie, but all other competent contractors in Canada, an opportunity of stating on what terms they would do the work.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We gave the very gentlemen to whom you refer an offer to build this very road.

Mr. CLARKE. May I ask if the gentlemen to whom the hon. Minister says he gave the offer were Messrs. Smith & Bratnover?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No. You said the agents of the Rothschilds.

Mr. CLARKE. These gentlemen, I understand, professed themselves to represent the Messrs. Rothschilds.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Is the hon. gentleman in a position to state one of two things—either that the gentlemen whose names he has mentioned represented the Rothschilds, or they did make such an offer to the Government?

Mr. CLARKE. I asked the hon. gentleman if it was a fact, as stated in the public press to-day, that these gentlemen did make an offer of that kind, and did represent themselves as being the agents of the Rothschilds, and did offer to construct a road through the Chilkat Pass for 5,000 acres a mile without any monopoly ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Mention their names.

Mr. CLARKE. Messrs. Smith & Bratnover.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I never heard of them.

Mr. CLARKE. Then we may contradict the statement made in the Montreal "Star" to-day that such an offer was made by these gentlemen. Will the hon. Minister say that no other offer was made for the construction of a road into that territory ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, I will not say anything of the kind, because it has been already explained, time after time, that the Government were determined that the road to be built should be a Canadian road, with its termini on Canadian soil, and we did not think that it was in the interest of the Government to consider the construction of a road with one of its termini on American soil.

Mr. CLARKE. That may have been in the interest of the Government, but I maintain that it would have been in the interest of the people of this country—

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, never.

Mr. CLARKE—if the Government had publicly given the contractors of Canada, those of sufficient substance to undertake the work, the opportunity to tender for it, so as to place all upon an equal footing.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman will permit me to say, as I did not catch the name he mentioned, that the gentleman who does represent the Rothschilds in this country had the question put to him, whether he would make a tender to the Government, and, after considering the whole question and examining all the information the Government could place before him, and cabling to his principals at home, he wrote to the Government that after the fullest consideration he declined to touch it at all.

Mr. CLARKE. Then, Mr. Speaker, I am to understand, so far as the information has been vouchsafed to us—and of course I accept the information as being absolutely correct—that there was one firm of contractors at least in the old country who were looking for work of this kind, and who were prepared to undertake it. That fact in itself, I think, should have been sufficient to warrant hon. gentlemen opposite in asking more than one Canadian firm of contractors as to the terms on which they would construct this work. If I understand the provisions of this contract correctly—I have only read them cursorily once or twice—after this road is constructed, these men will not be compelled to operate it for five years or for three years, or for one year, and there is no provision in the contract for the road being taken over by the Government itself. Now, in view of the statement made by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries—and I understood him to say at an earlier stage that he had a great deal to do with the drafting of this contract—I think it would be only fair to this House and the country that the cablegram which he says he sent to the Rothschilds, and the intimation which the Government received from them that they would not undertake this work, should be laid before us, so that we should understand exactly the terms of the Government's proposition to them.

Now, importance has been given by the hon. member for Centre Toronto to the necessity of having this work constructed as speedily as possible, for the purpose of procuring and retaining the trade of that country for Canadian business men, and because it is absolutely essential in view of the large immigration which is expected to take place into that country, that those who go there should be supplied with the necessary provisions. Now, what kind of a road is to be built to perform this important service ? We are told that this road is to come up to the standard of some road called the Kaslo and Slocan Railway. I believe that is a narrow-gauge concern also. What kind of a road is that for the purpose of carrying supplies and provisions into the country, the development of which will in all probability go on with enormous rapidity ? I am told also that the contractors for this work have bought the second-hand rails and engines which were formerly used on the narrow-gauge road built by the Messrs. Galt from Lethbridge to Dunmore, for the purpose of using them on this railway, which is to form the main route to the Canadian Yukon. I understand that these rails are twenty-seven or thirty-pound rails, and that the road will in fact be a tramway. We have a tramway in the city of Toronto, and I understand that the rails used upon it are not twenty-seven or thirty-pound rails, but seventy-five or eighty-pound rails. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that we cannot congratulate the Government on the wisdom of their action in entering into this contract under these conditions. But, Sir, look at the enormous grant of mineral lands which the Government give to those contractors for doing this work—3,750,000 acres. We are told that we should congratulate ourselves that the people of Canada are not giving them any bonus in the shape of cash or money. But, Sir, is this mineral land worth nothing ? Have these 3,750,000 acres of gold-bearing land no value, or will they have no value when this road is constructed ? Is it not the veriest twaddle—I use the word with the greatest respect—to say that the people of Canada are paying nothing for the construction of this road, when they are giving this enormous quantity of valuable mineral land to the contractors, and tying it up in their hands for all time to come? I stand subject to correction, but I believe that this grant of 3,750,000 acres is equal to a strip of territory eighteen miles wide, extending from the city of Toronto to the city of Montreal. Sir, I ask hon. gentlemen if—the contractors having the right of selection anywhere and everywhere throughout this great territory, and to the extent that I have mentioned—it is not reasonable to suppose that they will secure the richest and most valuable portions of that territory which their surveyors and inspectors can lay their hands on? I say that this contract, entered into as it was within a few days of the opening of this House, entered into secretly, without others being given the opportunity to bid for and estimate upon it, is a contract that will reflect discredit upon the business men of the Administration, and will not commend itself to the good sense and judgment of the people. We have heard the strictures made by hon. gentlemen opposite on their predecessors for having given away large tracts of land to secure railway construction, but not one word so far have I yet heard from any hon. gentleman on that side in denunciation of the conduct of his leaders in tying up this land, which promises to be one of the richest portions of British America.

Just one word more with regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram) as to the action of the Government in carrying out its pledges with respect to the revision of the tariff. According to the "Hansard," the hon. gentleman said:

I say that the pledges which the Liberal party made to the people of this country have been redeemed in every particular.

And he declared further that:

The tariff was pared down to a revenue basis, which is the basis on which the Liberal party has always held our tariff should be imposed. Extreme protection was struck off entirely.

I would like to ask the hon. gentleman by what sleight of hand were the objectionable features—that is, the protective features—in the tariff eliminated in the revision which took place last year? Does the hon. gentleman think this country is to be hypnotized by such language as he uses? What changes were made last year in the duties levied upon the staple articles which are manufactured in the constituency the hon. gentleman has the honour of representing? How were the protective features of the old tariff eliminated? The hon. gentleman was one of the architects of this new tariff, but I challenge him to show how that tariff has fulfilled the pledges which his leaders gave to the country before the 23rd of June, 1896. Sir, among the principal articles of manufacture in Toronto are agricultural implements. I am happy to say that one of the largest and most flourishing of these manufactories in Canada is situated in the constituency of which I have the honour of being one of the representatives; and if hon. gentlemen opposite were honest in their declamations for many long years against the iniquities of the National Policy and had carried faithfully out, after they obtained power, the pledges they had made in opposition, that industry would not be as flourishing and prosperous as it is. If it does flourish, it is because these hon. gentlemen did not have the courage of their convictions, because they dared not carry out the pledges they had made to the agriculturists of the North-west. I ask what changes were made in the tariff affecting agricultural implements? Has the tariff been reduced? Are the farmers not being bled as white by the duties under this tariff as they were under the old tariff? Has any change been made? Yes, but it has been in the direction of favouring the manufacturer rather than the consumer. A change was made reducing the duty on certain items which give an advantage to the manufacturer, but give none to the individual who is always in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite—the poor, unfortunate consumer.

Furniture is another staple article of manufacture in Toronto. What change was made regarding furniture? Did they reduce the tariff on furniture? Not a bit of it. The gentleman who is now running as the Liberal candidate in South Toronto, gave his opinion as to the changes in the tariff so far as that trade was concerned; and speaking on behalf of my hon. friend (Mr. Bertram), the gentleman to whom I have alluded, Mr. Rogers, said at St. George's Hall on the 23rd of November last:

As a manufacturer, I feel that in Mr. Bertram the manufacturers, not only in my own line of business, but in every other line, will have a friend on the floor of the House of Commons in Ottawa. As a manufacturer, I am pleased to say that the trade which I am connected with has received the fairest treatment from the present Government. In 1896 about half of the furniture manufacturers of this province publicly declared their belief that the Government under Sir Wilfrid Laurier would accord them fair and equitable treatment. To-day you may travel from one end of the province to the other, and you will not find a solitary furniture manufacturer but will admit that the tariff legislation of the present Government is fairer to them than that of the late Conservative Government.

How can that tariff be fairer to them and be as fair to the consumer at the same time? Where does the consumer come in under the new arrangement? What consideration has been paid to his interests? I might go on and enumerate other articles manufactured in Toronto—bicycles, musical instruments, stove and iron work, and boots and shoes—do the changes made in the duties on these articles justify the assertion of the hon. member for Centre Toronto that the Government has been true to its pledges and discharged its duty to the country by carrying out in power what it professed in opposition? I do not find fault with the Government for not altering the tariff upon these articles, but I am endeavouring to point out that the country will not accept as Gospel the statement of the hon. member for Centre Toronto that the Government had lived up to their pledges. He could not sit in this House if he had given utterance, during the last two months, to the views held by his leader and lieutenants before June, 1896. Had he done so, the people of Centre Toronto would have had none of him. It is only because he appealed to the manufacturers and assured them that if he went to Ottawa, he would advocate a tariff of stability for at least ten years, that they returned him to this House. I did not intend to occupy the time of the House at great length, and will take another opportunity to say something about this great Yukon deal. But I wish to remark that, in my humble judgment, it would have been much wiser if our Government, in view of the high credit our country now enjoys, especially in the mother country, had first ascertained as nearly as possible, from competent men in their own service what amount would be required to construct that road in the most approved and substantial way, which would give the merchants and business men of Canada the cheapest transport facilities and best possible returns and the best facilities for development, and having borrowed the amount, have given the work of construction out by public competition.

Mr. INGRAM. I do not rise for the purpose of making a speech on this question, but simply to ask a question of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), who has been kind enough to answer the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Clarke). Would the hon. Minister tell us what was the date of the letter from the agent of the Rothschilds?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I cannot remember the date, but it was before the contract was entered into with Mann & Mackenzie.

Mr. INGRAM. How long before?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Some short time before.

Mr. INGRAM. Will the hon. gentleman say whether it was within a month or a week before?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Order.

Mr. INGRAM. Then, I am to understand that in asking this civil question I shall not get a civil answer.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, I will give the hon. gentleman a civil answer. I tell him that the letter from the representatives of the Rothschilds to the Government declining to have anything to do with the building of this road, under the condition that it had to be built by next September, was sent to the Government a short time before the Government agreed with Mackenzie & Mann.

Mr. INGRAM. It must have been less than a month before Parliament assembled. Then I should like to ask hon. gentlemen opposite whether any of our Canadian contractors were furnished with any of this information that they might be in a position to tender for this work?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am not in position to say whether there were other Canadian contractors than Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), who is not here at the moment, will give the information he wants. I have named these two or three contractors that I know of myself.

Mr. INGRAM. I understood the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) to say the other day that this work was of such urgency that the Government had not time to furnish other contractors in this country with information respecting the construction of the road. Now the Minister of Marine and Fisheries tells us that the Government furnished the Rothschilds with all the information they desired and they refused to take the contract. Then there was an injustice to Canadian contractors. I am convinced that had the contractors of this country been given the same information as the others were, the Government would not be obliged to pay 25,000 acres a mile for the construction of this tramway.

Mr. OSLER. I desire to speak only for a few moments, in order to put myself on record at this stage of the proceedings. I do not think it necessary to refer at length to any part of the address of the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram). He is a very late convert to the protection doctrine. I heard his speeches in Toronto with great pleasure, and I should have voted for him with a great deal of pleasure, only that I was loth to vote for one who had been such a sudden convert. I was not sure he would stick. I believe that so long as the hon. gentleman is engaged in manufacturing, in the building of ships and so on, in which I hope he will prosper, I believe that he will be a thorough protectionist, and that the interest of the manufacturers, at all events in his own line, will receive the warmest support at his hands. I am very glad further to notice that the members of the Government have apparently delegated to him entirely the management of taxation of this country, so far as the manufacturers are concerned. And I believe it would save a great deal of the time of this House, if our hon. friends on the Ministerial benches would agree to accept the fact which they know, and we know and the country knows that they have turned a somersault, and are not themselves at all as they knew themselves when they came into power. We know that they have been false to every view they then expressed. And they know we know it. Let them only accept the fact, and we shall save a great deal of time and a great deal of discussion in this House. So long as they have the hon. member for Centre Toronto and a few other level headed business men in their ranks, I have no fear that the tariff will be changed to the detriment of the country.

Now, as to the proposed Klondike deal I am loth to speak of it until further particulars are presented to the House. I assume that the report of Mr. Jennings, the engineer, will be presented to this House showing his estimate of the cost of this road. Mr. Jennings is a man whom all of us, I think, have confidence. He has been over the route, as I understand it, and his report must be in the hands of the Government. But whatever his report may be, I, for one, object absolutely and utterly to the terms of this contract. We have placed ourselves in a humiliating position, in a position which might be taken by a South African State or a South American Republic. We have placed ourselves lower than even China. China sought for a loan, and the powers of Europe asked her to grant a concession to give special powers in that country for a certain length of time. But, poor as she is, shaken as she is, China has apparently refused the offer with scorn. Sir, if you are going into any enterprise, the cheapest way to accomplish that enterprise is to pay the cash for it. The man who has not the cash to pay always pays more. I make the statement here, and I defy contradiction, that if I went to London to-day with the contract which has been offered to these gentlemen, of the pick of 3,750,000 acres of the best mineral lands in the Yukon region, I could sell that land to-morrow for more money than the 25,000,000 acres of land granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway could ever have been sold for. I am not saying that all is gold that glitters, or that all that Mr. Ogilvie tells us is true. But I say that if the Government believes Mr. Ogilvie's statements, if they place sufficient confidence in them to say that it is absolutely necessary to have a road into that district at once, then I say that the Government are justified in spending the money themselves and are absolutely wrong in locking up such an enormous quantity of land. I do not believe that any member of the Government realizes what has been done under this contract. You have made a slave of every prospector who goes into that country for the next five years. Every man who goes in there with an outfit on his back will find one of Mackenzie & Mann's agents looking after him; and if he makes a find they will stake it out and will get all the claim except what the prospector may have registered. Of course he can register his own claim, but who will be likely to get to the office first, the contractor with his complete outfit or the prospector who is obliged to trudge on foot to the place of registry?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman has not read the regulations. These provide that the prospector does not need to go to the office of the district in order to register. Any five of them can come together, elect one of their own number as registrar and register with him.

Mr. OSLER. Yes, and he will have one claim and these contractors will have the rest.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. But the whole five can register claims.

Mr. OSLER. And how many acres will their claims cover?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. And if there are fifty, they can all register.

Mr. OSLER. Yes, and even fifty claims—how much ground—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Or five hundred.

Mr. OSLER. And how many acres will even five hundred take up? Five hundred men could not take up the claims even on one creek. Now I do not believe that the Government have realized at all what they have been doing. They are building what has been described as a tramway with 25 or 30-pound rails. These rails were laid on the Gault road from Lethbridge to Dunmore, to carry coal practically only to supply the Canadian Pacific Railway and to carry also a few cattle. And the rails were taken up. Why? Because they were too light to do the business. The smallest snowfall or the least difficulty of any kind was enough to block the road. And so the road had to be reorganized and a million dollars more borrowed to lay down heavier rails. These are the rails that the Government are allowing the contractors to put down on this track for a distance of 150 miles.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman has no authority for that statement whatever.

Mr. OSLER. Is it provided that they may put down light rails?

Mr. DOMVILLE. Did the hon. gentleman ever see a 25-pound rail in his life?

Mr. OSLER. Yes, lots of them. Now, there must be either one of two things: Either that the traffic on the road will be so light that the 25-pound rail will suffice or else that road won't do the business at all. The Government are making a contract about which they know nothing at all.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I tell the hon. gentleman that he can have no authority for that statement.

Mr. OSLER. I would ask the Minister if there is anything said in the contract as to the weight of the rails.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman will see himself, if he looks on the face of the contract, that it is to be up to the standard of the Kaslo and Slocan road.

Mr. OSLER. What is the weight of the rails?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The contract does not specify what the weight of the rails should be, but the rails on the Kaslo and Slocan, which is the standard, are 45 pounds.

Mr. OSLER. Very well, let it be 45 pounds—it doesn't make much difference. Still, it shows that the Government have entered into this contract, apparently, without considering that matter at all.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am afraid it shows that the hon. gentleman is prepared to condemn it without proper consideration.

Mr. OSLER. I am prepared to condemn the contract, as I see it now, and it will require a great many engineers' reports to make me change my mind. Still, I would be the first man to rise and say that I had been mistaken, if you can show me that this is a necessary thing to do. It has been stated outside that there are private reasons that the Government cannot divulge, why this road should be built at once, and why a secret contract should have been given. Now, if these reasons exist, I say the Government had no right to entrust the building of that road to any private contractors, the Government should have built that road themselves—although it is a terrible risk to run—under their own supervision. I acknowledge that it would be better even to risk the building of it under the direction of the Minister of Public Works and of the Minister of Railways, at the cost of the country, rather than to have it built under this contract. I can see no reason for sanctioning this contract, and, unless better reasons are given than we have yet heard, I cannot understand how members on the Government side can swallow the contract. But if they do so, I, for one, will hereafter never refuse to believe the story, either that Jonah swallowed the whale, or that the whale swallowed Jonah.

Mr. TAYLOR. Before the question is submitted to the House, I feel it my duty, not only to myself and to my constituents, but to the country, to enter my solemn protest against this House sanctioning the contract. I just want to say that in the Address presented to this House at the opening of the last session, His Excellency stated that Bills for a plebiscite and the repeal of the franchise Act would be submitted. We have the word of the right hon. Prime Minister, made on more than one occasion, that the first act of this Government would be to repeal the Franchise Act. We have also the pledge of the Prime Minister to the temperance people of this country that a plebiscite would be submitted at the last session. Both of these questions, in my opinion, as the Prime Minister's word was behind them, demanded urgency. Now the same questions appear in the Address presented by His Excellency at the opening of the present session. They were both permitted to lie over for the past year because there was no urgency. But this question of the Yukon Railway is now submitted on the ground of urgency, and must take precedence over the Prime Minister's pledge to the temperance people and to the country in general on both these other questions, which, in my opinion, are very important. Now, I must say that the Ministers must have been in possession of all the facts in regard to that Klondike country fully two years ago, certainly at the close of last session. But in place of grappling with the question, some of them ordered new palace cars to be made that they might go on a jaunting tour around the country, and they spent the whole season taking trips from one end of the country to the other, some of them going across the ocean, and all this time the Klondike boom was going on, and they were making no provision for the people either getting in or getting out. Now, within eight or ten days of the meeting of Parliament, they come down and say: This is a question of urgency, and they want to raise money to help carry the Ontario elections. Mackenzie & Mann were our friends, and we entered into a contract with them. My hon. friend the leader of the Patron element in this House has made his speech to-night. I wish he had read to the House the declaration of the Patron organization, that he and many others sent broadcast throughout this country, proclaiming on every hustings that if sent to Parliament, they would oppose the subsidizing of any railway either by land or by money. That is the platform of the Patron organization; yet my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Rogers) comes to the House and makes a statement that he has been charged in his own constituency with having sold out to the Prime Minister just before the elections.

I agree with the hon. gentleman that I do not think that that charge could have been made before he was elected, but I think it can be made since his election, and since the Postmaster General went to him and the rest of the Patrons that were elected to this House, and said to them: If you want patronage in your constituency, you have got to support this Government. They accepted the bait and took the patronage, and have gone into the Liberal caucus ever since, and have been supporters of the Liberal party. They were in their caucus to-day and swallowed the Yukon deal, giving away, as my hon. friend from Toronto says, an equivalent of a strip of country 16 miles broad, extending from Montreal to Toronto. And yet they came here to oppose any grant to a railway either of money or land. Mr. Speaker, I must say that, in my opinion, the Government have placed in the mouth of His Excellency, in his Speech, a statement that is not entirely correct, when they compelled him to say:

A contract has been entered into, subject to your approval, for the completion at the earliest possible moment of a system of rail and river communication through Canadian territory with the Klondike and principal gold fields, which it is expected will secure to Canada the larger portion of the lucrative traffic of that country.

Now, the Minister of Railways has submitted a Bill to the House in which it does not appear that this railway will establish communication through a Canadian territory with the Klondike. Therefore, is that statement in the Speech correct?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is correct.

Mr. TAYLOR. No, the route passes through a river, part of which is not Canadian territory, but is in American territory. We have treaty rights to go there and do certain things, but the route is not wholly in Canadian territory, some 125 miles of it is through American territory. Yet His Excellency is made to say in his Speech that we have agreed to build a road and have river communication wholly in Canadian territory, whereas that statement is not correct. I rise simply to enter my protest to the Yukon scheme. I intend to offer it opposition at every stage when the Bill is brought before the House, and I hope a large number of hon. gentlemen opposite, when they hear from their constituents, as many of them will before this debate closes, will see that this Government have gone back on their pledges, that they have given a contract to friends, secretly, without compensation, something they denounced from pillar to post during all the eighteen or twenty years they sat on this side of the House. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Rogers) made the statement that he partially forgave the Government in regard to the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. He forgave them because he was advised by his son, who knew a good deal more than he did, to leave the House before the Minister came down with the Crow's Nest Pass scheme, and he was not here to vote for or against it, that arrangement having been put through during the last hours of the session when there was only a bodyguard here to transact the legislation of the country. This is a different scheme. It is not going to cost the country a cent, they say, the Government are not giving any money; but they are taxing every person who goes over the road and are giving the company a stretch of country 18 miles wide by 350 miles long. I think when the hon. member for Frontenac and many other members hear from their constituents, I repeat, as they will do before the vote will be recorded, they will come to the conclusion, that if they want to represent the people another term, they must vote differently from what they pledged themselves to do in Room 16 to-day.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am quite willing to go on and occupy the time of the House, if necessary; but I simply rose to express my opinion and to enter my protest against the consummation of the contract that has been laid before the House.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I must, from the very outset, confess that it is always a matter of surprise to me to see how the First Minister sways all those who support his Government in this House, and the people of this country will, no doubt, share my astonishment when they learn that my hon. friend has succeeded in silencing the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), and several other friends of his who had previously made it a rule never to let the Address pass without participating in the debate, either to approve or to condemn it. At the time when the Conservatives were at the head of affairs in this country, the followers of the Prime Minister used to make themselves conspicuous by the sallies of their wit; they used to wax eloquent when pointing out to this House the nefarious effects of the Government's policy! Now that the same policy is being attacked by the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, the hon. Prime Minister, through some occult influence, has succeeded in gagging all his friends, thus preventing the hon. member for North Wellington from advocating the Government's policy. And by thus reducing them to silence, what untold tortures, I ask, did not the Prime Minister inflict upon his friends who used so strongly to raise their voices against the Conservative policy and uphold with such vehemence his own policy!

The Speech from the Throne, Mr. Speaker, is like a magic lantern through which the supporters of the Government are made to see all the marvels of the policy of the Cabinet. But, Sir, I do not think the electorate will appreciate the marvels exhibited through this magic lantern with as much enthusiasm as the supporters of the Government do. The criticisms which have been passed upon that policy by the hon. members who have so far taken part in the debate, show beyond a doubt that the Liberal party have no policy of their own; that the financial policy advocated by them was borrowed from the Conservatives, after being somewhat altered by the preferential clause introduced, last year, into the tariff, and the just value of which can only be appreciated next year. As to the railway policy adopted by the Administration, it is at best but a slavish copy of the policy framed by the old Government. As far as the other departments are concerned, their policy, I believe, is not up to the standard of efficiency set up by the defunct administration. According to what was stated by His Excellency, in the Speech from the Throne, one would be led to believe that during the year just elapsed, the Pactolus had rolled its golden waves all over the various provinces of Canada, scattering everywhere political and commercial prosperity.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier.) Hear, hear.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) But, for my part, Sir, I hold that the prosperity with which Canada was blessed during the year that has just closed is, in a larger measure, to be attributed to Divine Providence than to the policy of the present Administration. The Government, I believe, ought to be grateful for that prosperity of which they now boast, not only to Divine Providence, but also to the old Administration.

The PRIME MINISTER. (Translation.) To Providence only.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) Both to Providence and to the previous Administration: to Providence, in the first place, for the bountiful harvests with which certain provinces of Canada have been blest, and, in the second place, to the old Administration, for the steadily increasing credit which the Government have inherited from their predecessors, in taking the reins of power, a credit, I say, which has enabled them to borrow money at lower interest, so that the credit of the Dominion on the European markets now stands on a par with that of the best governed and most prosperous nations of the world. The hon. Prime Minister, when he came into power, found our credit established on a sound basis. He found a country with immense resources and possibilities, and potentialities, a country perfectly equipped, financially and commercially speaking. But now, according to the Speech they have put in His Excellency's mouth, one would be led to believe that the whole credit for our prosperous situation was due to the Administration now at the head of affairs.

As I just remarked, Mr. Speaker, according to the Speech from the Throne, one would be led to think that the Pactolus had rolled its golden waters over all the provinces of the Dominion and that the Government alone were responsible for those blessings. But with reference to the province of Quebec, the only one that has given to the present Government, at the last election, a substantial majority, the trouble is that that province unfortunately, has not been blessed with as abundant a harvest as the other parts of the Dominion have been. Were now the hon. Prime Minister to go through the rural constituencies of his native province, he could easily satisfy himself that, owing to the straitened circumstances in which, not only the farming community, but also the business men in our towns and cities find themselves, the province of Quebec is far from enjoying an unprecedented prosperity. The Prime Minister could satisfy himself that the Pactolus, in the year that has just closed, did not roll its golden sands over that portion of the country; that the condition of affairs could considerably be bettered, and that Providence has frowned upon the province which gave the Prime Minister his majority. Actually the state of trade is considerably embarrassed, and our farmers are in more straitened circumstances than they ever found themselves in for many years past, in spite of the blessings of the present Administration, in spite of that prosperity which the Government make their boast of in the Speech from the Throne.

The Prime Minister stated, in the course of his remarks in reply to the leader of the Opposition that his policy had been endorsed from one extremity of the country to the other; and in order to substantiate his statement, he adduced the fact that his Government had seen victory perch upon their banner at all the by-elections that had been held, more particularly during the past year. Mr. Speaker, the by-elections that have been held in the province of Quebec are by no means an index to the prosperity of the Government's policy. Let the hon. Prime Minister recall to mind, let also his colleagues and his political friends in the province of Quebec remember the statement over and over again made by them before the electorate of that province, at the last general elections: that, if the electors wished to know what was the policy of the Liberal party, they should give that party a chance of administering the affairs of the country during this Parliament. Notwithstanding the depression which prevails in the province of Quebec, the electors of that province thought it their duty to confirm the lease of power they had previously granted the Prime Minister, for at least the whole duration of this Parliament. It was owing to this determination of the electorate that, yielding to the entreaties of the Premier's supporters who, at the by-elections, begged of them to continue the present Administration in power and give the Ministers a chance to govern the country for the full term of this Parliament, the electors of Quebec gave them a favourable verdict in nearly all the constituencies, which, with the exception of Nicolet, were previously represented in this House by supporters of the Government. Such is the reason why the electors have decided to continue their confidence to the present Administration.

With reference to the county of Nicolet, every one knows, and the Prime Minister and his friends know also, by what means they have succeeded in carrying this electoral division, which almost invariably had given its support to the Conservative party. The hon. Prime Minister himself knows perfectly well the means which were resorted to, in order to convert the Liberal minority into a majority in the county of Nicolet. The hon. Prime Minister knows that the influence of both the Federal and Local Governments had to be brought into play, in order to bring about that political change in Nicolet. The hon. Prime Minister knows that three railway companies had combined to give their support to the Government candidate. He knows what the representatives of these companies have done, or, if he does not know it, he will have a chance of learning it during the trial of the election petition which will soon unroll before the legal tribunals; he will learn to what an extent illegal and corrupt practices have prevailed, and such, in all likelihood was the reason which prompted the majority to vote in favour of his candidate. Having had the honour of visiting some parts of that constituency at election time, I was a witness to the unheard of attempts made by the shareholders of the Drummond County Railway Company to induce the electors of the Nicolet County to give their votes to the Administration of the day.

The Prime Minister himself, on nomination day, with that suave eloquence and craftiness in which he is such a master, was heard to declare before the electors of Nicolet that if they wished to have a railway built through the northern portion of their constituency, which is the most densely inhabited of the whole electoral district, it would be much better for them to send a supporter of the Government of the day, and that they would stand a better chance of having their railway constructed if they sent a supporter of the Government as their representative in the Commons than they would have with a member sitting on this side of the House. The hon. Premier knows that his political friends, strong by this statement, did not fail, during the last electoral contest, to develop the idea which he had enunciated on nomination day, and that they went in that direction much further than he himself did. He knows very well the statement made by his friends at the private meetings that, in case the Opposition candidate were returned, it was all over with the building of the railway through that electoral district, which the voters had so much set their heart upon, in order to develop the resources of their county. It was through those manoeuvres that the Liberal party carried the riding. That is why the Prime Minister was enabled to come and state on the floor of the House that at all the by-elections in the province of Quebec, a verdict had been given in favour of his policy, as he had carried every one of them. Let the Prime Minister allow me to tell him that had we fought with equal arms, and had we had fair-play, a different result would have been reached, and a verdict would have been obtained against his policy in several by-elections that have lately been held in the province of Quebec. But, Sir, the Conservatives are not the only party from which criticisms of the Premier's policy are heard. We all know to what manoeuvres the present Government had to resort to in order to prevail upon their followers to support their policy. Everybody knows the attitude taken by the Hon. François Langelier, who has resigned his seat in this House in order to ascend the judicial bench of his province. What was the statement made by the Hon. Mr. Langelier concerning the policy of the Administration? What did a large number of the friends of the hon. gentlemen opposite state in the same connection? They censured the course taken by the First Minister and his colleagues in this House.

Sir, I have just been looking over the statements made by Mr. Calixte Lebeuf, an important member of the Liberal party in Montreal, in which he strongly censured the position taken by the First Minister and his colleagues towards their old supporters. I will spare the feelings of the Prime Minister and of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) and refrain from repeating before this House the severe criticisms passed upon them by a large number of their friends, which are recorded in the press of the country; but I will only tell the Premier that when he states that his policy had been endorsed by the whole province of Quebec, he cannot expect us to sit silent here without bringing to his recollection what his own friends think of his political course, and that of his colleagues in the Administration. The course pursued by the Hon. François Langelier, and by other members of the Liberal party, on the occasion I have just mentioned, was calculated to create a very painful feeling among the French members of the Bar of the province of Quebec, as also in the ranks of the hon. gentlemen sitting opposite. Why, Sir, here is a gentleman, occupying a high station in his party, and enjoying the general esteem of his party, who—I was going to say rises in arms against his leader—stands up for his rights as an old Liberal, claiming that the old members of the party are being ousted by new-comers. Unfortunately for him and for the old Liberals, the Hon. F. Langelier surrendered, under inauspicious circumstances, and on bad grounds, which can not meet with the approval of men who have at heart the honour of public life. The Hon. F. Langelier and the old Liberals whose representative he was supposed to be appear, from the course held by them, to have been actuated by no other motives but that of patronage. The First Minister was censured because he had not implemented the promises made to the Hon. F. Langelier, by delaying his appointment either to a judgeship or to the governorship of the province of Quebec. Sir, there sat yonder, in this House, during two or three sessions, a gentleman, the Hon. Mr. Langelier, who had in his pocket a letter from the Prime Minister containing the promise of either a judgeship or the governorship of the province of Quebec. How, then, I ask, Sir, could Mr. Langelier act with independence, when called upon to vote on measures of public policy before this House? I hold, Sir, that the action of the Prime Minister, when giving by writing to one of his supporters, long beforehand, the promise of an important public office, was an infringement of the Independence of Parliament Act, an Act which the hon. gentlemen opposite ought to have as much respect for as the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have; an Act, I say, which the hon. Premier and his friends, at the time when they sat on the Opposition benches, strongly censured us for violating. Never yet, Sir, through my long experience in this House, have I met with such an outrageous infringement of that Act. The statements of the Hon. François Langelier are on record, showing that he, at least, was not in a position to give an unbiased opinion on the questions of public policy on which he was called upon to vote. I am sorry to have to say that, upon that occasion, the Bar of the city of Quebec has pursued an extraordinary course, when they tendered a banquet to the Hon. Mr. Langelier who had, when leaving public life with a stain upon his name—

Some hon. MEMBERS. (Translation.)
Order, order.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I am referring, Sir, to the attitude of Mr. F. Langelier, when he was engaged in active politics, and I think I am in order in so doing. The stand taken by Mr. François Langelier was clearly an open infringement of the Independence of Parliament Act, and I may tell the hon. gentlemen opposite, who are largely responsible for the infringement of that Act, that their course has not met with the approval of the country.

The hon. First Minister, in the course of his remarks, laid much emphasis on the increase in the volume of trade, as an index to an almost unheard of prosperity. Let me remind the hon. gentleman that, in many cases, such an increase in the volume of trade was but the forerunner of a commercial and industrial crisis, and I refer him in this connection to the Reports on Trade and Navigation for the years 1873 and 1874, which show that, when the Mackenzie Government came into power, the first year of their administration was remarkable for an extraordinary swelling in the volume of trade, while the end of that administration was noted for an unprecedented commercial crisis in the history of the country. Let us hope, Sir, that history will not repeat itself, and that the increase that has taken place this year in the volume of our trade will continue; that our commercial prosperity will be of a permanent and stable character and that the expansion of our exports and imports will not be, as it was in 1874, the forerunner of an unprecedented crisis in the trade and manufactures of the country.

Now, Sir, coming to our trade and tariff regulations, we would have, I think, the right to expect from the First Minister and his colleagues, in the readjustment of these matters, that they did not concern themselves so much with the interests of Great Britain and those of the United States, or of any other nation. The Canadian tariff ought to be framed for Canada alone, and exclusively for her own benefit. When the question is to frame our tariff, to regulate the trade movement of Canada, with a view to raising a sufficient revenue for the needs of the administration of our public affairs, the Premier has no business to grant favours to the mother country. We have not to concern ourselves with any other interests but our own; and I may just as well tell the hon. gentleman now, that I could never understand the fact of the Government giving, last session, preferential trade to the mother country, or a reduction of 25 per cent on all articles imported from Great Britain. I do not see any reason for maintaining this preferential tariff in favour of Great Britain, a policy which, in my humble opinion, cannot but result detrimentally to Canadian trade. Great Britain, I may be told, admits Canadian products free of duty on her markets; but it must be borne in mind that this is not a special favour granted to her Canadian colony. Great Britain extends the same privilege to every nation. It was in order to accommodate her own population that the British Government decided to open the markets of the United Kingdom to the whole world. Therefore, we owe no debt of gratitude to her on that account; we owe no reciprocity to the mother country in return for the advantages which we share in common with the other nations which are holding commercial intercourse with her. I now proceed to deal with one of the most important paragraphs of the Speech from the Throne, one which has roused a great deal of interest throughout the country and in this House, if we may judge from the criticisms it has provoked on this side of the House. I refer to the railway intended to reach the Yukon gold fields, the construction of which is announced by the Government. I do not intend to discuss the Government policy in that respect until all the papers are laid on the Table. But I may just as well say now that if the route chosen by the Government is not the best that could be selected, they are very wrong in granting the company such a large subsidy as that mentioned in the Bill. The route chosen by the Government to reach the Yukon country is said not to be an all-Canadian route. From the geographical situation of that region, I understand that the only means to secure an all-Canadian route, to reach the Klondike region, would be by starting from the Edmonton district. The Government have decided to give to Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, the contractors of the proposed line, in addition to the monopoly, a land subsidy of 3,500,000 acres of auriferous lands. What will there be left of those lands to the Government? What would be the cost of a land subsidy for a railway from Edmonton to the Yukon gold fields? In looking over the map, I see that there is a distance of 1,600 miles of railway to be built, in order to reach the Yukon by an all-Canadian route. The proposed railway may only be of a provisional character; and possibly the Government might, next year, decide to build a permanent railway, and they might again have to grant 3,500 acres of land for a distance of 1,600 miles, to the company undertaking to construct that all-Canadian route; then, all the auriferous lands, now the property of the Dominion, will fall into the hands of the railway companies.

The First Minister understands better than any one else the danger of such a monopoly. My hon. friend, who has long been a resident of the Eastern Townships, knows all the difficulties that were thrown in the way of colonization in that important portion of the province of Quebec, by the British North American Land Company. The Premier knows how dangerous and prejudicial to the Eastern Townships that monopoly proved, and yet, the Government are creating in that remote Yukon region a monopoly a hundred times more iniquitous than that created in the Eastern Townships by the British Government in favour of the company I have just mentioned. All the auriferous lands, now the property of Canada, will fall into the hands of monopolists, who were so strongly denounced by the Premier and his colleagues, when they sat on this side of the House. Now, these very monopolists are becoming, as it were, an essential factor in the development and prosperity of the country. When they sat on this side, the hon. gentlemen looked upon them as a very dangerous class. They even censured the Conservative party for allowing these monopolists to grab the public domain. The First Minister, by endorsing that land grab and monopoly in favour of the Mackenzie & Mann Company, has turned his back and given the lie to all his past professions concerning the railway policy of the country. He has abjured all the past professions of his party, and the country will wonder at the hon. gentleman's inconsistency. I would have approved of a liberal aid in favour of the construction of an all-Canadian railway, from Edmonton to the Yukon, by granting either a money subsidy or a land subsidy outside of the Yukon gold fields. Moreover, we have now reliable data on the auriferous deposits in the vicinity of the Rocky Mountains, and it is known beyond a doubt that gold is found in large quantities, not only in the Yukon region, but also on the rivers which flow through the North-west of Canada. Last season, gold was found on the Peace River, and in paying quantities on the great Saskatchewan. Gold in paying quantities is reported by experienced miners to have been found on most of the rivers flowing through the North-west and the Rocky Mountains.

The Government, instead of groping along and giving away millions of dollars worth of auriferous lands to the Mackenzie-Mann Company, could have, with equal chances, undertaken without delay the building of an all-Canadian route. From the information laid before this House, I am in a position to state that a railway to the Yukon could be constructed through Canadian territory, and with the facilities at our disposal, several auriferous regions still unknown and unexplored for want of railway communication could be opened up. The Government have no idea of the enormous sums of money they are giving away for the construction of this railway. They are entirely in the dark as to the value of the property they are giving to a company of monopolists who, like the North British American Land Company in the Eastern Townships, will part with their lands only at extortionate prices, beyond the reach of poor miners. At the time when they were members of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition in this House, the hon. First Minister, in particular, and his colleagues were loud in their denunciations of the Conservative Government; they were always heard thundering and clamouring for reforms. I shall not take up the time of the House in expatiating upon all the reforms they used to clamour for. I shall confine myself to one of the reforms which the hon. Premier and his colleagues pledged themselves to accomplish, should they come into power; I refer to the reformation of the Upper House.

The hon. gentleman and his friends had set their hearts upon the reform of that body. It was one of the topics they liked to dwell upon before the electorate, at election times, to rouse popular prejudices. All their candidates were loud in their denunciations of the Government for not reforming the Upper House which, they said, was composed of malignant old men. Will the hon. gentlemen pretend that they have reformed the Senate so as to make it more useful, more efficacious, more representative than it was before their coming into office? Certainly not. On the contrary, the Government, instead of making the Senate a more representative body than it was under the Conservative Administration, have made it less representative. So far as the province of Quebec is concerned, the Senate is no longer a body in which the equilibrium is preserved, a body in which the various elements of our population are fairly represented. To tell the truth, the cities of Montreal and Quebec are the only centres which are represented in the Upper House. The hon. gentlemen opposite who, during the last electoral campaign fawned on the farming community, ought, so far as the province of Quebec is concerned, to have made the Upper House a body truly representative of the popular interests; they ought to have selected a larger number of Senators out of the farming community, as representing the landed interests of the country. Why, Sir, the Senate, so far as the province of Quebec is concerned, is no longer represented but by the cities of Montreal and Quebec, as both these cities have a majority of representatives in the Upper House. Montreal gentlemen have been selected as members of the Senate, and the press of that latter city and of the city of Quebec have extolled to the skies a policy of scorn and contempt towards the agricultural community, a policy, I say, of ostracism of that class from the Senate. It is merely going against the spirit and intent of the federal compact thus to ostracise the farming community from the Senate, and to deprive the vast majority of our fellow-citizens of the representatives they are entitled to, as they form the four-fifths of our population. The Government have deprived the farming community, representing the four-fifths of our population, of a majority in the Senate, a majority which entitled them to a fair representation in our Upper House. So, the Government of the day, where failing to walk in the footsteps of their predecessors, have perpetrated an egregious blunder. Instead of reforming, they have deformed the Senate. Speaking of the province of Quebec, I may say that the First Minister and his colleagues have made the Senate a less representative body than it was under the Conservative rule, so far as the opinions of the people and the public interests in general are concerned.

Before I resume my seat, I may add that, so far as the railway policy of the Government is concerned, I reserve to myself the right of more fully criticising it, when all the papers relating to it are laid on the Table. The First Minister, I hope, and his colleagues shall see to it that all the papers relating to the Klondike gold fields are translated into French for the benefit of the inhabitants of the province of Quebec, as a large number of them intend, this year, seeking that region. The First Minister and his colleagues, I trust, will see to it that all the public papers, published in English, concerning that region, are translated into French and fairly distributed to the inhabitants of our province who intend seeking the Klondike gold fields.

Mr. McNEILL moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

THE CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY— KASLO-SLOCAN RAILWAY PLANS.

Mr. HAGGART. Before the motion is carried I desire to ask the Prime Minister, if he will be in a position to lay on the Table of the House, as promised, the information contained in the report of the engineer on the Yukon Railway. I would like also all the information in the department in reference to the Kaslo and Slocan Railway. As the Minister of Marine has made an important statement to-day, I would also wish him, if he would, too, lay on the Table of the House before we consider the Yukon deal, all correspondence with the Rothschild's agents in reference to this particular work, or correspondence with any other parties who called upon the Government.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). All the documents are being prepared, but I do not know about their being laid on the Table of the House to-morrow. They will be brought down as soon as they are ready, and I hope they will all be on the Table when the Bill is discussed. As to the Kaslo and Slocan Railway that is a new thing, and I will have to refer to the Minister of Railways.

Mr. HAGGART. The Department of Railways has approved of the plan and location of the Kaslo and Slocan Railway, and there is no trouble in getting it from the Department of Railways and laying it on the Table of the House.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The hon. gentleman thinks he is well informed with regard to the action of the department on the Kaslo and Slocan Railway. Does he know if this is a Dominion line of railway or if the department had to pass on it?

Mr. HAGGART. Surely when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) makes it a standard of this road, he must have in his department all information in reference to the Kaslo and Slocan.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Perhaps the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) will answer my question.

Mr. HAGGART. I do not know. Perhaps it is a provincial and not a Dominion road, and did not necessarily pass through his department, but I can tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) that they are obliged to furnish all the information to his department. I do not know whether they have done it or not, but it is their duty to do it, and if they have received any assistance whatever from the Dominion Government, either in the shape of a subsidy or in any manner, the road had to be approved by the officers of his department.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) stated with the utmost confidence that the plans were in the office. I take it he spoke from actual personal knowledge that the plans had to pass through that department and were passed upon by him.

Mr. HAGGART. Not at all. The hon. gentleman must know that I never see the plans as head of the department. They are passed on by officers of the department. I do not know whether the plans are in the office or not. I never looked at a plan in the office, and I suppose the hon. gentleman has not done so either. If the hon. gentleman says he has no plans in reference to the Kaslo and Slocan, of course it would be impossible for him to lay them on the Table.

Mr. SPROULE. How does he know about the standard of this railway then?

Mr. WALLACE. The answer given by the Minister of Railways and Canals was not quite satisfactory to me. The contract with the Yukon Railway fixes the Kaslo-Slocan as the standard, and I understood the Minister to say that there were plans of the Kaslo and Slocan in his department.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Did you; well, I did not say it.

Mr. WALLACE. The question was asked whether the information would be laid on the Table, and what I would like the Minister to say is if we are to have the information. The Minister has placed the Kaslo and Slocan as the standard, and of course he did not go it blind. He must have his information which justifies him in fixing that as the standard, and now we want the information brought before the House before next Tuesday, so that we will be in a position to discuss the whole matter intelligently. Is the Minister prepared to give the information?

Mr. BLAIR.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) was slightly inaccurate in stating how the matter arose, because if my memory serves me at all, the ex-Minister himself undertook to state what was in the department.

Mr. HAGGART. No.

Mr. WALLACE. That is immaterial. Will we get the information?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Any information which is in the department I will be happy to furnish.

Mr. WALLACE. That is not quite an answer. The Kaslo-Slocan has been fixed as the standard of the Yukon Railway, and we must have information about the Kaslo-Slocan so as to enable us to form an opinion as to whether it is a good standard or not.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I shall be happy to furnish all the information in the department. I cannot furnish it if it is not there.

Mr. WALLACE. It might be got in time.

NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE.

Mr. DAVIN. There is great anxiety in Alberta amongst the ranchers there in consequence of the police being taken away to go to the Klondike. I am told they are to be taken away from McLeod and Calgary, and some of the ranchers have written to me suggesting that there might be difficulty in recruiting. I believe there is recruiting going on in the North-west Territories and Manitoba. They have suggested that even if sufficient recruits are obtained they will be raw and untrained and unfit for the work. I can myself assure the Prime Minister that when a recruit first enlists in the mounted police he is not fit for prairie work as it requires some time to get them accustomed to it. The ranchers have suggested to me that the difficulty might be got over, if, instead of filling up the ranks with raw recruits the Government were to recruit from the permanent force in the East. It would relieve the West very much if the right hon. the Prime Minister would make an announcement in regard to that.

The PRIME MINISTER. The policy of the Government with regard to this matter was explained last session, and I can only repeat that it is the intention to keep these exposed points, McLeod and Calgary well protected by the police force.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12.05 a.m. (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 11th February, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY— INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows:—

ABERDEEN.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, an approved Minute of Council, appointing the Honourable Sir Richard Cartwright, G.C.M.G., Minister of Trade and Commerce; the Honourable Sir Louis Henry Davies, K.C.M.G., Minister of Marine and Fisheries; the Honourable William Stevens Fielding, Minister of Finance, and the Honourable Joseph Israel Tarte, Minister of Public Works, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons, as Commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of the 13th chapter of the Revised Statutes of Canada, intitled: "An Act respecting the House of Commons."

Government House,

Ottawa, 11th February, 1898.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 17) to amend the Act respecting the Civil Service of Canada.—(Mr. McMullen.)

DRAINS CROSSING RAILWAYS.

Mr. CAMPBELL moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 18) to amend the Railway Act. He said: This is an Act to provide for the crossing of railways by drains, and also to protect farmers along the line of railway from fires that take place and frequently do a great deal of damage to their property situated along such lines. As the House knows, it is almost impossible to get drainage across or under a line of railway, and in the western part of Ontario we have suffered greatly from that cause, and this Act provides a remedy. I may say that a somewhat similar Act has also been introduced by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), and I propose, after the second reading of this Bill, to have it referred to the same committee that will have consideration of the Bill of the hon. member for West Elgin; and I think we will be able to consolidate the two Bills so as to make one perfect Bill out of them.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

UNITED STATES CUSTOMS DUTIES IN ALASKA.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to call the attention of the Government to an important telegram published in the Montreal "Gazette" of this day, in regard to two important subjects that have been mentioned in the House, namely, the Yukon Railway Bill and the question of coasting regulations. A telegram from Washington states that there has been reported by Senator Frye from the Committee on Commerce, a Bill to amend the navigation laws affecting the coasting trade of the United States. The telegram states:

The Bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to prescribe regulations for the transshipment of goods imported into the United States from any foreign port by sea or river route, and also amends the present law found in Section 2108 of the Revised Statutes so as to read as follows:—

"The master of any foreign vessel, laden or in ballast, arriving, whether by sea or otherwise, in the western waters of the United States from any foreign territory adjacent to the northern, north-eastern or north-western frontiers of the United States, shall report at the office of any collector or deputy collector of the customs which shall be nearest to the point where such vessel may enter such waters; and such vessel shall not transfer her cargo or passengers to another vessel or proceed further inland, either to unload or take in cargo, without a special permit from such collector, issued under and in accordance with such general or special regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, from time to time prescribe. This section shall also apply to trade with or through Alaska. For any violation of this section such vessel may be seized and forfeited. The Bill provides for the forfeiture of any merchandise shipped from one American port to another, 'either directly or via a foreign port,' in any other than an American vessel."

I may just add one word to that, without proposing to discuss the subject at all. That is already a construction of the law in the United States which does not obtain under our law at present, as I am advised. For instance, a cargo of American freight coming from an American port cannot be transhipped at a Canadian port and carried on to a United States port. All I pressed for the other night, as hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches will understand, was, that while it is within the right of the United States so to legislate, we must meet them half-way whenever they do it, by similar legislation.

A like provision is also made in regard to the transportation of passengers by a foreign vessel from one American port to another, except that the penalty in this case is placed at $100 each. The penalty under the existing law is $2. The Bill is made to take effect after its passage.

May I also ask the Government's attention to what it seems to me would be of great assistance in the debate on the railway Bill, and I ask the particular attention of the Minister of the Interior, who is familiar with the subject and understands how far in connection with the present negotiations regarding the boundary it is possible to comply with my suggestion. My suggestion is that upon a copy of the map already presented to the House there should be placed indications, for instance, red marks would do, showing the positions in the disputed territory that the United States at present occupy by customs or other officers. I think that would be quite sufficient. Of course, I do not know how far the Government would be warranted in marking what is disputed territory, nevertheless I think it would not confound any proper conception to mark the points they have already occupied in the territory with customs officers.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). It might be as hard to find the disputed boundary as the real boundary.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not press for any impropriety being committed, but I think this can be done, that on the map could be marked the points the United States occupy by officers of any character, customs, or otherwise.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). First, with respect to the question asked as to the boundary line. The difficulty arises at three points particularly. First, in the territory around the Stikine River. There is, however, a provisional boundary, which was run some years ago and provisionally adopted by both Governments?

Mr. FOSTER. How far inland is that?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I scaled it on the map, and from the mouth of the river it is about twenty-two miles—not twenty-two miles in a straight line, but that distance following the windings of the river. There is therefore no present difficulty there. Our officers have been sent there for the purpose of establishing a post just within the provisional line of the Stikine River, and they have been furnished with maps showing the provisional boundary line.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. When was that provisional boundary line established?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Speaking from recollection, it was some time in 1876 or 1877. Difficulties also arose in the White Pass, behind the village of Skagway, and at Chilkat Pass behind Dyea. I believe our contention is that Skagway and Dyea are really in Canadian territory, but as the United States have had undisputed possession of them for some time past, we are precluded from attempting to take possession of that territory.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. May I be excused for saying that I do not think the hon. Minister meant to say "undisputed possession."

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. There has been no protests made. It must be taken as undisputed when there has been no protest made against the occupation of that territory by the United States.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. A claim, I suppose, was made and adhered to?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. There is nothing in the records to show that any protest has been made—an unfortunate thing for us, but it is a fact. I do not know that that particularly affects the discussion, because there has been no real discussion about that particular point. We have taken the position that there can be no doubt raised as to the Canadian territory beginning at the summit; we have taken the position that the claim of Canada to occupy the territory inside of the summit from the boundary at White Pass and Chilkat Pass is not deniable, and we cannot admit it is debatable, and we have instructed our officers to establish posts as near the boundary as physical conditions will permit.

Mr. FOSTER. How far from the water line?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. About fifteen miles from tide water. An accurate survey has not been made in the White Pass, but the distance is about the same, fifteen miles. Therefore, so far as possible under the present conditions, the idea of the hon. gentleman has been carried out, and our officers have been instructed to locate themselves as nearly as possible to the summit on the north-eastern side and to take the summit of the White Pass and Chilkat Pass as the boundary line, without making any admission as to the right of the United States to the territory on the seaward side.

DREDGING LEASES ON THE YUKON, &c.

Mr. DAVIN. I wish to call the attention of the Government to an advertisement which appeared in the Chicago "Record," which reads thus:

THE KLONDIKE, YUKON AND COPPER RIVER COMPANY.

This company is organized on the co-operative plan, and will send thirty to forty skilled men into Alaska and the North-west Territory to engage in transportation, mining, dredging, prospecting and merchandising. They own their own ocean steamers, river boats and dredges. They have secured a lease of fifty miles from the Canadian Government for dredging the Klondike, Yukon, Indian, Stewart and McQueston rivers, where the gravel beds and sand bars are exceedingly rich in gold. They hold the Government contract for carrying the mail from Seattle to Sitka, Juneau, Skagway and Dyea.

We have a number of very important names given as those going on the expedition:

Rev. Frank B. Vrooman; Hon. D. I. Murphy, former U. S. Commissioner of Pensions; United States Senators Wilson and Blackburn; Hon. G. D. Meiklejohn, Assistant Secretary of War.

And some others. The point to which I wish to call the attention of the Government and the House—I do not want to discuss it—is that the statement is made that this company has secured a lease from the Canadian Government of fifty miles for dredging the Klondike, Yukon, Indian, Stewart and McQueston rivers. If the Government have done so in the face of the present laws and the Mining Act, it seems to me to be a very serious matter.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. As to the statements made in the article from which the hon. gentleman quoted, of course the Government have no information beyond that possessed by the hon. gentleman except it relates to action taken by the Government. Regulations were framed some time ago for the issuing of leases for dredging. Under those regulations any one is entitled to apply for a lease—no leases were given to any particular person. The first applicant was treated as having a prior right as in an ordinary mining claim. A very large number of applications have been filed, I am informed by the officers of the department. My present impression is, speaking from memory, that no leases have been issued yet. My instructions were not to issue any leases until the 15th of the month; but I can get the hon. gentleman the information if he desires and definitely state what the fact is. If any lease has been issued, it is one granted in the ordinary way and under the ordinary regulations.

Mr. FOSTER. Are those regulations included in the report laid on the Table as placer mining regulations?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I think they are included in the printed regulations which were issued. There were several editions printed, and they were printed separately and printed together.

Mr. DAVIN. Will the hon. gentleman lay on the Table copies of whatever leases have been issued?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. We can lay a list on the Table, if the hon. gentleman desires. I do not think any leases have yet been issued.

Mr. DAVIN. If any have been issued, will the hon. gentleman lay a list on the Table of the House?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I will give a statement that will afford the hon. gentleman full information as to what has been done.

MR. JENNINGS'S REPORT.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I desire to lay on the Table copies of Mr. Jennings's report on the various routes to the Yukon. I have given instructions that the various maps referred to be blue printed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If orders have not been given for the printing of these papers, I would suggest that a motion be passed authorizing the Printing Committee to have them printed without delay.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. They have not been printed, and there is no objection to the suggestion made by my hon. friend. I have given instructions to have the maps and plans blue printed and a number of copies furnished for the use of members. The reason why I have not been able to lay them on the Table to-day is that the weather has been so dark that the officers have not been able to make the prints up to this time. I hope to have them to-morrow.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Those papers should be sent to the printer. If it is necessary that a motion to that effect should be made, I hope the House by common consent will allow my hon. friend (Mr. Sifton) to make it. If he does not do so, I shall move, Mr. Speaker:

That the Rule be suspended, and that the papers laid on the Table by the Minister of the Interior be printed.

Mr. DAVIN. I beg to second that.

Motion agreed to.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Bertram for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Speaker, I can without the slightest affectation say, that I have never before risen in this House with so much reluctance as I rise on this occasion, to speak upon any subject which has engaged our attention. Not at all, Mr. Speaker, because I have any reluctance to criticise the actions of hon. gentlemen opposite, and to criticise them freely when I think they are wrong, but because I feel a very great reluctance to say anything which may be hurtful to the feelings of a gentleman who is himself so conspicuous for his knightly courtesy to every member of this House, a gentleman, who I venture to say, has done more than any other living parliamentarian to elevate the tone of the debates in this House, and who would himself be, I am sure, reluctant needlessly to wound the susceptibilities of any one of God's creatures. I repeat, Sir, I rise with reluctance to say anything which may be hurtful to the feelings of an hon. gentleman having the characteristics which I have described, and which I believe belong to the right hon. the Premier of Canada. But, Sir, if I were not to speak on this occasion, I believe that I should not be discharging my duty, however painful it may be for me to describe the course which has been pursued by my right hon. friend, in the manner in which I shall be obliged to describe it. I feel I should not be doing my duty to my constituents, and I should not be doing my duty to that great cause which is dearer to me than any other public cause in all the world, were I to remain silent.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when I rise in this House to discuss public questions I generally find myself in a somewhat unenviable position, for I know that there are some hon. gentlemen behind me who think that I am not a good enough party man; and I know that every hon. gentleman on the other side of the House thinks I am far too good a party man, and so it is that I am generally between two fires. However, I fancy that, on this occasion, I shall not in anything I have got to say, offend the susceptibilities of any hon. member on this side of the House at all events, because I think their views and mine jump pretty well together on this question. What I propose to discuss in the few remarks that I shall offer to the House, is the conduct of the right hon. gentleman opposite in connection with the question of preferential trade. I listened in this Chamber to my right hon. friend's defence, or attempted defence of his conduct; I listened to it with the greatest possible attention, with anxious attention, and having listened to what he had to say, I came to the conclusion that if an angel from Heaven had come down to this House he could not have persuaded any unprejudiced mind that the right hon. gentleman had kept faith with the people of Canada. That is a hard thing to say. It is a hard thing to say of any hon. member of this House, but it is a harder thing to say of the right hon. gentleman, my feelings with reference to whom I have already described, and it is a very, very hard thing to say of a gentleman who is the Prime Minister of Canada, and who was representing Canada on a most conspicuous occasion when this unfortunate occurrence took place.

But, Sir, what was the right hon. gentleman's defence? It will be in the recollection of hon. members that so soon as the cablegram was published in the press of this country setting out the startling intelligence that the right hon. gentleman had spoken against preferential trade in the mother country, I called the attention of this House to that cablegram, and it will also be in the recollection of hon. gentlemen, that the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) who sits beside the Prime Minister to-day, and who was then leading the House, said that they all had perfect confidence in the discretion of the Prime Minister, and he (Sir Richard Cartwright) took me somewhat roundly to task for, as he described it, needlessly wasting the time of Parliament in reference to an idle newspaper report. But, Sir, it has turned out to be a fact, an unhappy fact, that that cable report was true. The right hon. gentleman himself admits that it was true, and he attempts to justify his course. Now, what is his justification? In the first place, the right hon. gentleman says that he did not press for preferential trade, because he was afraid of asking too much; because he was afraid that if he did press for preferential trade he would not get anything at all. I want to ask the right hon. gentleman here: What justification has he for making that statement in this House? I want to ask the right hon. gentleman: Why he thought that he could not get preferential trade if he asked it? I want to ask the right hon. gentleman: Why it was that he supposed that the right hon. Mr. Chamberlain would not be prepared to negotiate on the basis of the very proposal that he himself had made? Why did he (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) think that, when he found that not only was that proposal before him, but that the Duke of Devonshire met him in Liverpool on his arrival and welcomed him with a speech which the whole press of England declared to be a foreshadowing of the adoption by the Imperial Government of that preferential proposal. I want to ask him (Sir Wilfrid Laurier): Why he thought he could not obtain preferential trade, or not so much as he wanted to get, when he found that at that very meeting the Prime Minister of New Zealand supported the proposal. Let the right hon. gentleman recollect that the Premier of New Zealand was a convert, or rather that his colony was a converted colony to the principle. Let him recollect that New Zealand was one of the three colonies that opposed the proposal at the colonial conference here; and here was the Premier of that colony backing up the proposal—backing up the suggestion of Mr. Chamberlain which the Duke of Devonshire had practically supported in the afternoon. And yet the right hon. gentleman says he thought that if he pressed for preferential trade, he would be asking too much; and he asks this House to accept that as an excuse for his course. He says that if he had asked for so much, he thinks he could not have obtained the denunciation of the treaties. Why, the right hon. gentleman must surely think us very stupid. The right hon. gentleman surely understands that the denunciation of the treaties was a condition precedent to Mr. Chamberlain's proposal being carried into effect. The right hon. gentleman does not seem to realize, or at least he thinks this House does not realize, that the denunciation of the treaties was one of the very principles embodied in Mr. Chamberlain's proposal. There could not be any preferential trade without the denunciation of the treaties. And yet the right hon. gentleman says that because he wished to have the denunciation of the treaties, he refused to discuss a proposal which implied the denunciation of the treaties. The right hon. gentleman seems to me to have somewhat misapprehended the gravamen of the charge against him. The gravamen of the charge against the right hon. gentleman is not merely that he did not press for preferential trade in England; but the gravamen of the charge against him is that having told the people of Canada that he would do what he could to secure preferential trade, he not only did not press for it, but he opposed it. He fought against it, he argued against it, he used his influence against it. He threw the whole weight of the seven confederated colonies of North America and the North-west Territories against it, and he bore it down and for the time being smothered it. This is the gravamen of the charge against the right hon. gentleman, and it is useless for him to come here and tell us that he was afraid to press for preferential trade lest he should not get as much as he required, when he was not attempting to press for it, but to destroy it. Has the right hon. gentleman made any defence whatever to that charge in this House? Is he capable of making any defence to that charge? If he is, I will sit down and allow him to do so, and I shall be glad to hear him give any reasonable explanation.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. McNEILL. There is an hon. gentleman sitting behind the right hon. Prime Minister who thinks, I presume, that everyone is moulded in the same mould in which he himself is cast. I beg to inform the hon. gentleman that it is not so. I say distinctly that if the right hon. the Prime Minister can get up in his place in this House and defend the Prime Minister of Canada in the eyes of the civilized world from the charge that is levelled against him to-day, I for one shall be glad to hear him do it. Now, what did the right hon. gentleman do within a few hours of his arrival in Liverpool? He was met, as I have already pointed out, by the Duke of Devonshire. In the afternoon the Duke of Devonshire made a speech in which he declared that free trade had not come up to the expectations of its supporters in these latter days—a speech which, as I have said, was interpreted by the press of the United Kingdom as foreshadowing adoption of preferential trade by the Salisbury Government. It was a speech made by a statesman who, perhaps more than any other in England, jealously weighs every word he utters on any great question; a speech made by a statesman who perhaps more than any other of the first rank in England is slow to depart from old principles and adopt new ones; a speech made by a statesman, who by his patriotism and his sober common sense and prudence has endeared himself to the best men of all parties in England; and this statesman, this leader of the Liberal Unionists, this man who had been the leader of the great Liberal party in England itself, told the right hon. gentleman that in his judgment and in the judgment of many others free trade had not come up to the expectations of its supporters. And what did the right hon. gentleman do? After this speech had been made by this statesman, who was an old free trader, a colleague of Mr. Bright himself, what did the right hon. gentleman do? In the evening of the very day on which the Duke of Devonshire had made that speech, the right hon. gentleman flung Mr. Chamberlain's proposal into his face. He told the Duke of Devonshire that he wanted no preferential trade for Canada, after having pledged to the people of this country, right and left, over and over again, his solemn promise that he would do all he could for it. He told the Duke of Devonshire that we wanted none of it. He told him that it savoured of protection, and that protection was a curse to Canada; and he even assigned as a reason for his not wishing to have preferential trade, that he did not wish to interfere with that very free trade which the Duke of Devonshire said was not at this present time and in these altered conditions producing such satisfactory results as its supporters would desire. What is the right hon. gentleman's defence? Is there any defence? Does any hon. member of this House venture to say that the defence offered by the right hon. gentleman the other night touches the gravamen of the charge against him at all?

Well, he has another line of defence. His other line of defence, as he told the people in Toronto, and as he told us here the other night, is, that Mr. Chamberlain's proposal smacks too much of free trade, that we could not in Canada adopt it, because it implies free trade within the Empire. It was, he said, too much free trade. But my right hon. friend surely remembers that he is precluded from making any such statement, because in England he said that he opposed it on account of its being too much protection. How, then, can he explain his opposition in England on the ground that it was too much on the lines of free trade? But the hon. gentleman told us in Toronto, and tells us here, that Mr. Chamberlain's proposal was free trade within the Empire, without any customs duties. I have the hon. gentleman's words. He said that there was to be "no customs tariff existing within any part of the Empire"—that that was Mr. Chamberlain's proposal—and that it was because of that he opposed it. Now, as my hon. friend beside me, the hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster), pointed out, the right hon. gentleman explained in London, Ont., to the people of Canada what Mr. Chamberlain's proposal was. He carefully explained it, and when he went to England he thoroughly understood what it was. With the consent of the House, I shall quote a little more fully than my hon. friend did what the right hon. First Minister told the people of Canada Mr. Chamberlain's proposal really was. But before doing so, let me draw the attention of the House to a question which the right hon. gentleman himself asked me, and it is partly because of that question that I have risen to address this House. The question which he did me the honour to ask me was this: Are you prepared to adopt preferential trade on the basis of the proposal of Mr. Chamberlain? Now, Mr. Speaker, I will give my answer to my right hon. friend, an answer which, I think, will be sufficiently explicit and definite and unambiguous; and the answer I make to him is this: Yes, I am prepared to accept preferential trade, on the basis of Mr. Chamberlain's proposal, as explained by the right hon. gentleman himself in London, Ont., to the people of Canada. Now, I will read to this House what Mr. Chamberlain's proposal was, as explained by the right hon. gentleman himself. What he told the people in London, Ont., was this:

Mr. Chamberlain spoke upon that subject a few weeks ago. I might quote the whole of his speech, but I have not time at such a meeting at this. Let me quote some portions of it. He says: "It seems to me that if the principle of a revenue tariff were to be adopted by the colonies there would be a reason for calling a council of the Empire, and I cannot but think that something like a satisfactory and workable arrangement may be arrived at.

That is what the right hon. gentleman told the people in London Mr. Chamberlain's proposal was. He went on to say:

"But it is a preliminary condition that the colonies should adopt a revenue tariff. (Hear, hear.) We are to have in London in June a meeting of the boards of trade of the colonies to discuss that question. The 'Times,' discussing this very question, spoke as follows:—'Tariff for revenue is to be accepted as a fundamental principle for that agreement. It is only tariff for protection, as between different parts of the Empire which must be abolished. If you want to have preferential trade, a tariff for revenue must be adopted, but you cannot have preferential trade so long as you have protection.'"

There is reason in that. We can well conceive that the English people should tell us: "If you desire that we should give a preference to your products in our markets, it is only fair that we should expect from you that you will treat our own manufactured products in a different spirit from that which you are treating them now. You are treating our products in a hostile manner. We do not ask you to go the length that we go; we do not ask you to remove a customs tariff altogether. We only ask you to remove the protective system. It can be conceived that you want a customs tariff, but bring it down to the point that it will simply be a revenue tariff, a tariff for your own benefit, but not a tariff hostile to us, and then we will be ready to discuss the principle of preferential trade." Upon another occasion, the "Times" said again, that the Imperial Government would consider the considerable concessions involved on her side in a conciliatory spirit, even though to do so would involve a derogation from the high principle of free trade and from the practice of the United Kingdom up to the present time. Mark the concession they are willing to submit to, to tax their own goods if we do it simply for revenue, and we shall have the boon of preferential trade. These are the conditions under which we can have preferential trade. What do you want in this part of Canada to-day? What is it you want for your products, manufactured or natural? There is only one thing you want, markets, markets, markets, and nothing else. (Applause.) You have here the possibility of having the largest market in the world, the market of England. You may have it on certain conditions. You may have it by renouncing the principle which is to be found in your tariff. What are you going to do, I want to know? Sir Charles Tupper tells you that you can have the two things together. I repeat that you cannot have the two things together; you can have one of the two, but you cannot have both. The Canadian people have now to make their choice. What will be their choice? Their choice will be for a revenue tariff and for preferential trade.

Now, the right hon. gentleman has given us his revenue tariff. We know what he means by revenue tariff now; and he says that, under such a tariff as he now has, we may have preferential trade. And so I am prepared to support a proposal to adopt preferential trade on the basis of a revenue tariff as understood by the right hon. gentleman.

Now, what Mr. Chamberlain told us was that protection must disappear as protection. But suppose he had gone further and had said: We must have free trade pure and simple. Then, I would have been prepared to say that I would enter into negotiations with Mr. Chamberlain in order to endeavour to secure preferential trade on more favourable terms. Could there be any reason why I should not negotiate? What does Mr. Chamberlain tell us in his speech? I had thought to read a portion of it, but I have been talking too long already. How does he tell us he came to make the suggestion he did make? He gave us the reason for it in this speech—it was the action of this House and the action of the colonial conference that induced him to make that suggestion. It is a perfectly insignificant question, in comparison with the main question, whether hon. gentlemen opposite or those on this side are entitled to the credit for having induced the Imperial authorities to take the view of this subject that they now hold. But, at the same time, it is scarcely consistent with human nature that we should sit quietly and allow hon. gentlemen opposite whom we have been fighting for years, gentlemen who, the other day, were supporting a policy the very reverse of this, a policy of which the essence was, as explained by its principal advocate in this House, discrimination against every country except the United States. I say it is hardly consistent with human nature that we should be expected to sit here quietly and allow them to run away with the harrows in that way—if I, a humble farmer, may use an agricultural simile. If hon. gentlemen will forgive me, perhaps it is as well that I should read a few sentences from Mr. Chamberlain's speech that the House and the country may see what gave rise to this change in the opinions of the Imperial authorities. It was at the Canada Club, on the 26th of March, that Mr. Chamberlain delivered this epoch-marking speech :

There were prominent men on both sides of the Atlantic who at one time assumed that the manifest destiny of Canada was to be absorbed in the great republic upon its southern frontier. Ah! that was the opinion; it is an ancient controversy—and I do not think it necessary to refer to it now, except to mark the contrast between the doubt and hesitation of those days and the determination now of every son of Canada to maintain his local institutions, his special identity, and at the same time to draw closer the bands which unite him with the great parent state. Well, sir, the recent isolation of the United Kingdom, the dangers which seemed to threaten us, had evoked from all our colonies, and especially from Canada, an outburst of loyalty and affection which had reverberated throughout the world, which had had a great effect, and which testifies to a sentiment which is deeper than words can express. And, sir, it answers the question that we have sometimes asked ourselves. We had been told by cynics that these explosions of loyalty and affection are superficial, that they are ornaments of after-dinner oratory, but that they do not bear the test and trial of serious conflict—that if a war should ever arise the mother country would be left to her fate, and that the colonies would take care of themselves. Sir, that idea, at any rate, must have been dispelled by what has recently occurred. The shadow of war did darken the horizon, and to none of her subjects was the shadow more ominous than it was to our fellow-citizens of Canada. And yet, if that had happened, it would in the first instance have had to be borne by Canada, yet there was no hesitation on the part of the people and Parliament of Canada to say that, in this matter, although it did not affect their interests, it affected the honour of the British Empire, and they made a common cause with us, and they were prepared, shoulder to shoulder, to bear all with us that may arise. Well, sir, their decision was emphasized in the debate to which the president referred. It took place recently in the Dominion Parliament, and the moral of it was summed up.

He then refers to some words of mine in words of compliment which the House, I am sure, will excuse me from repeating. He continues :

I call your attention to the last words of the orator. He speaks of our common Empire, and he struck the right cord when he so described it. For the Empire of Great Britain is the common heritage of all her sons, and is not the appendage of the United Kingdom. Now, Sir, in the course of that debate many speeches were made, all to the same effect, and the resolution was unanimously passed with acclamation. But, again and again, allusion was made to the opportunity, to the occasion which every community of the Empire was bound to seize, and the hope was expressed that something might be done to bring us nearer together. We share that hope. I ask you now, gentlemen, is this demonstration, this almost universal expression of loyalty from all our colonies, to pass away without a serious effort upon the part both of colonial and Imperial statesmen to transform these high sentiments into practical results? I have thought it right, on the first time I have had the opportunity of speaking to you, at least to call attention to the position of this great question which has been before us now for a great number of years, which has attracted intensely the sentiments of the people, but which has not, up to the present time, resulted in anything like a practical scheme.

Then he goes on to deal with the matter, and says :

I observe in the "Times" this morning a telegram from Canada, which tells us that Mr. McNeill, the gentleman who moved the patriotic resolution to which I have referred, has moved another resolution in the House of Commons of Canada, by which he proposes to declare that it is in the interests of Great Britain and the colonies that a moderate ad valorem duty, independent of any existing duty, should be imposed both by the colonies and by the mother country, upon all exports from foreign countries. That, therefore, is a suggestion, for I will call it no more. It is not a formal proposition, but it is a suggestion which has been made to us by our colonies for carrying out a system of commercial union. Sir, at any rate, a proposition of that kind is entitled to respectful consideration, and if we object to it, we ought, I think, to propose an alternative, or we ought—this is the other opportunity for us—to say at once that all we have said, all we have done, all we have thought about Imperial unity, had been thrown away, and the idea had been abandoned as a bad one.

He quotes the resolution passed by the conference, which I have overlooked in reading. Now, then, there is the occasion, there is the reason for Mr. Chamberlain's action, explained by himself, told to us by himself; and it is perfectly useless for hon. gentlemen opposite to suggest that what they have done has been the cause of all that we have seen accomplished. Now, I do not wish to be unfair to hon. gentlemen opposite at all. I think what they have done has had a most material effect in the immediate denunciation of the treaties. I admit that, I have admitted it, and I admit it still. But it was only in the sense so eloquently and graphically described by my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Davin) the other day. It was simply that it snapped the slight thread which held us to the treaties—that was all. The thread was almost entirely worn away before the action of the Government snapped it. Now just allow me to say this, Mr. Speaker, that during all the time that I have been, in my humble way, endeavouring to discuss and to promote this matter, not since 1891 when we moved an Address, have I ever troubled my mind about the denunciation of the treaties. If any hon. gentleman has ever thought it worth while to pay any attention to what I have said on the floor of this House, and certainly many hon. gentlemen to whom I have conversed in private can bear testimony to the same effect, they will find that I have never troubled about the denunciation of the treaties. And why, of late years? Because, as I have stated, if I want to buy a horse from a man, knowing already the quality of the horse, and the horse is in his stable and the door is shut, I do not set about making a great fuss with him to open the door. I show him, first, that it is worth his while to let me have the horse, then I know the door will be opened, and must be opened. And so when any one has said to me in private conversation with regard to this matter, Oh, but what about the treaties? I have always said: Never mind the treaties, the treaties will go just as soon as the people of England are persuaded that it is worth their while to let them go. And I admit now that hon. gentlemen opposite, by the course they have pursued, persuaded the people of England that it is now worth their while to let them go. I quite admit that, and I give them credit for it, so far as credit can be given for an action which had an effect upon the English mind which was not altogether justified. Therefore, so far as the denunciation of the treaties is concerned, I do not think that hon. gentlemen opposite need plume themselves so much upon it. Now, Sir, I want to ask this very simple question of the right hon. gentleman, and I would ask him to be good enough to lend me his attention for a moment while I do so. He has asked me a question, and now I want to ask him a question, and I want to ask it in all courtesy, strongly as I feel about this matter, strongly as I feel that the right hon. gentleman has done so much to dash down the hopes that I and all those who have been labouring with me, have entertained in reference to this question. I want to treat the matter in all courtesy; and I want the right hon. gentleman, in view of the fact that he has offered no defence whatsoever to this House or this country for the course that he has adopted—I want to ask the right hon. gentleman why he did it. I want to ask the right hon. gentleman why it was that he did not keep faith with the people of Canada. I, for one, do not believe that the right hon. gentleman was capable of getting up in London, and in Toronto, in Montreal, and in other places, and deliberately seeking to deceive the people of Canada. I don't believe it, not for a moment. I want to know why it was that he has done what he did do. A suggestion has been made by my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Davin), whose presence in this House, I am quite sure, is hailed with pleasure by both sides of this House—I am sure there is not an hon. member, whose opinion we would value on either side of the House, who does not recognize that the hon. gentleman adds lustre to those debates in this House in which he takes part. I say that that hon. gentleman offered a suggestion, offered an explanation, that I, for one, cannot accept. I cannot believe that the right hon. gentleman opposite, out of mere lightness of heart and kindness of disposition, would go about from one part of the country to another, saying in one place one thing and in another part of the Empire something the very opposite, without any regard for principle whatsoever. I can not believe that, and I do not believe it. There must be some other reason than that. Those who have sat in this House with the right hon. gentleman, as some of us have done during the time that the Manitoba school question was before this country, know very well that there is probably not another man in Canada who can more carefully guard his words, than the right hon. gentleman opposite, or who can better talk platitudes and speak solemn nothings when it suits his party exigencies, than the right hon. gentleman. Therefore, I say that the right hon. gentleman never spoke as he did speak on this question for the reason described by my hon. friend behind me—never. The right hon. gentleman was not speaking platitudes in regard to this question, what he said was all practical and pointed. His words were unmistakable and unambiguous, clear, distinct and definite; and he declared himself to be in favour of preferential trade. Therefore, the explanation offered by my hon. friend behind me will not hold water. Then it has been suggested that the right hon. gentleman was seized by some members of the Cobden Club, or some of the Manchester School people, or Cobdenites, in Liverpool. That has been suggested during the course of the debate, and it has been suggested that they warped the right hon. gentleman's mind in reference to this subject. Are we to believe that the right hon. gentleman, within a few hours of his arrival in Liverpool, at the instance of some Cobdenites, deliberately and without consultation, reversed the policy of his own Government? Does any one believe that the right hon. gentleman, in the first speech that he ever delivered on the shores of the United Kingdom, had not carefully considered what he was going to say, and had not carefully prepared his speech? Let any one who thinks so, read the speech and see if it does not bear marks of the most careful and finished oratory. Therefore, that explanation will not hold water either. The hon. gentleman left Canada determined not to press for preferential trade. The hon. gentleman did not do otherwise, how could he press for preferential trade? Had he done so he would have stultified himself. What was his own policy, what was the policy that he had placed on the Statute-book before he left? His policy was one of trading with all the world upon equal terms. That was the policy he had placed on the Statute-book here. The ink was scarcely dry, and the hon. gentleman left almost before the conclusion of the discussion of that policy; and how could he go to England and advocate a policy the very opposite, not one of trading on equal terms, but a policy of preference. We all recollect very well the scene, when I endeavoured to elicit from the Finance Minister, who is not now in his place, whether the Government were really in favour of preferential treatment of English goods. The hon. gentleman frisked about behind one excuse and another excuse, behind one shelter and another shelter, like a squirrel running round a dead tree: he hid himself behind one excuse and another, and at last he got to the very utmost extremity of the most rotten branch of the tree, and when I pressed him, he said the Government preferred the substance to the shadow. This was just after I had proved that there was no substance in the preference the right hon. Premier was giving to England, and I forbore to cast another cruel stone at the hon. gentleman. There the matter rested. The hon. gentleman could not go to England to advocate preferential trade—it was absolutely impossible.

The question arises: What was the cause, what was the pressure, what was the overwhelming, deadly pressure which placed the right hon. gentleman in the position in which he stands to-day? Where did it come from? That is what I want to know, and what this country will want to know before this question is settled. The hon. gentleman—I am sure, in good faith—made the pledge to Canada. What was the pressure and where did it come from, which led him to break his faith with the people of Canada and set an example to the civilized world of as gross a breach of public faith as is recorded in history? What was the pressure, and where did it come from, which led the right hon. gentleman to risk the defeat of his Government on this question, as he knew he was risking defeat? That is the question I should like to ask, and it is a question to which the people will want to receive an answer before they have done with the matter. Now, I have done with this subject. I have to thank the House for the great patience with which it has listened to me, and I will just say I do not intend at this time to discuss the Yukon question further than to say this, that, so far as it at present appeals to my mind, it is in this way: I heard the Minister of Railways say, or at least I understood him to say, that he did not know what the cost of the building of the road would be, and that he had not the slightest idea of the value of the land proposed to be given to the company for building the road. That is an extraordinary position for the Government to be placed in. When I was in England lately—I only came back at the latter end of October—I found the people were intensely interested, almost, one might say, excited, with respect to those gold lands in the Yukon and Klondike, and it seems to me that the quantity of selected gold land which is granted to these men for the building of this tramway is something which, if manipulated, as it may be manipulated on the London market, may produce, not only millions of dollars, but millions upon millions of pounds sterling. That is how the matter strikes me at present. I shall listen with great interest to what may be said on the other side of the House with respect to this extraordinary contract. I hope I shall be prepared to give hon. gentlemen opposite the benefit of fair-play, so far as my mind is capable of doing it; but I will say that so far this seems to me to be one of the most extraordinary transactions ever proposed to any British Parliament.

Mr. McMULLEN. I had no intention of occupying the time of the House by speaking on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and I would not have done so except for the very pointed—I might say, discourteous—attack upon the leader of the Government regarding preferential trade, that great and important question to which the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) devoted the principal part of his address. I think it is just as well we should clearly and distinctly understand the propositions that were brought under the attention of Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, and if hon. gentlemen opposite can show that the hon. gentleman in a single instance ever expressed himself as favourable to any of the propositions originating on this side of the Atlantic, then I think my hon. friend will be willing to admit that a mistake was made. What were the propositions? First, there was the proposition from Mr. Chamberlain himself. That proposition was that free trade, as now existing in England, should exist throughout the British Empire.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Never.

Mr. McMULLEN. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I challenge the hon. gentleman to put his finger on any evidence for that statement.

Mr. McMULLEN. I will allow the hon. gentleman an opportunity of putting any question to me and of contradicting anything I have said, when I have finished. Mr. Chamberlain outlined the proposition, that free trade between the British Empire and the mother country was, in his opinion, the only basis upon which any concessions could be made, that is, that the goods of England should come into Canada on the same terms as the goods of Canada into England.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Never.

Mr. McMULLEN. And that we should have a fair interchange of commodities the same as they have between the several States of the United States.

Mr. McNEILL. That is absolutely incorrect.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is there any one prepared to accept that proposition? I think our circumstances preclude our acceptance of such a proposal. We have to collect revenue by a tariff for revenue purposes, and, while we are in our present financial position, we cannot possibly accede to any proposal made on that line. What was the next proposition? It was one that originated in Canada. A conference of colonial Premiers was called and held in Ottawa. At that conference a certain proposition was made. The hon. member for North Bruce read part of it, and he led the House to suppose that Mr. Chamberlain was prepared to accept that proposition. I will read Mr. Chamberlain's utterances in London before the Canadian Club on this question. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) read part of that speech, but he did not read it all, and the reason he did not read it all was because the balance did not suit him, as it would not prove what he wanted. These gentlemen opposite have got into the way of garbling speeches for the purpose of trying to make a point against the First Minister. Mr. Chamberlain dealt first with the problem that I have already presented to the House, and then he goes on to say:

I pass on, then, to the second proposal which has been laid before a similar congress to this, and which found expression at the great conference at Ottawa a year or two ago, that is, a proposal which has been favoured by some of our principal colonies, and which has been advocated with great force and eloquence by leading colonists. It is the very reverse, in spirit at any rate, of the proposal I have just been considering, for whereas the first proposal requires that the colonies should abandon their system in favour of ours, this proposal requires that we should abandon our system in favour of theirs, and it is in effect that while the colonies should be left absolutely free to impose whatever protective duties they please both on the foreign countries and upon British commerce, they should be required to make a small discrimination in favour of British trade, in return for which we are expected to change our whole system, and impose duties on food and raw material.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) read that length in his speech, but he did not read the rest, and so I will read the balance for him:

Well, I express again my own opinion when I say there is not the slightest chance that in any reasonable time this country, or the Parliament of this country, would adopt so one-sided an agreement. The foreign trade of this country is so large, and the foreign trade of the colonies is comparatively so small, that a small preference given to us upon that foreign trade by the colonies would make so trifling a difference, would be so small a benefit to the total volume of our trade, that I do not believe the working classes of this country would consent to make a revolutionary change for what they would think to be an infinitesimal gain.

The hon. gentleman for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) read the first part of the speech but he did not read the second, simply because it did not suit his purpose. Now, if any hon. gentleman opposite will get up in this House and prove by quotations from Mr. Chamberlain or any other member of the Imperial House of Commons, that they are prepared to accept a trade policy such as was outlined by the Ottawa conference, and if they can show that Great Britain is prepared to negotiate on these terms, I am quite sure that members on this side of the House will be glad to know it. We have read every word that has been uttered on this great question, and from day to day there are stronger evidences that England is only too well satisfied with her present trade policy to think for a moment of changing it, because we desire the change for the purpose of getting a benefit in her markets. I notice a cablegram in the Montreal "Gazette" of this morning which I think is worth reading. It says:

London, February 10.—In the House of Commons to-day, Colonel Howard Vincent moved an amendment praying the Government to turn its attention to the stimulus given foreign competition with British trade by tariffs and bounties, resulting in a great increase of imports and a decrease of exports. He expressed the opinion that the only remedy was the imposition of countervailing duties.

The Right Hon. Chas. T. Ritchie, President of the Board of Trade, replying, announced that the Government was engaged in endeavouring to convene a conference of the powers with a view of securing the abolition of sugar bounties. He said the Government was also making representations to Germany to secure more favourable rates for British trade over German railways. Mr. Ritchie declared his belief that British trade was never healthier than now, adding that foreign barriers were less dangerous than the barriers erected among themselves, as, for instance, the recent engineers' strike.

He concluded by saying he was convinced that they could achieve nothing by abandoning Great Britain's free trade policy. The amendment was then rejected without a division.

Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) tried to impress upon this House that the feeling in Great Britain for a change of policy was so strong, and was so voiced by prominent members of the British House of Commons, that it had just about reached the point of accomplishment when unfortunately the Prime Minister of Canada happened to throw a wet blanket on the whole thing. Well, that is making a mountain out of a mole hill. There is not a single word or utterance that has been spoken by the leading statesmen in England, that would ever warrant the belief that they were prepared to make the concessions that our people would like to see them make. We would be all glad to have preferential trade. We would be rejoiced if England to-morrow would admit into her markets on a preferential basis the food products of Canada. It would be a decided advantage to us, but the feeling in England is so strong, that any man who would dare to introduce a measure tending in the direction of the re-imposition of protective duties would not live politically for twenty-four hours. The extract which I have read from the speech delivered last night in England by the President of the Board of Trade proved that most conclusively. The ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) pointedly challenged the course taken by the right hon. the First Minister, and the leader of the Opposition lectured us for four hours on the same subject, but after all, when it comes down to the point, these gentlemen opposite are never able to produce an argument to show that what the people of Canada are anxious for in this respect, is at all possible of attainment.

Now, I am amazed to find that some hon. gentlemen who are in opposition to the right hon. First Minister, expressed themselves, when in England at the Queen's Jubilee, in the most approving terms of the course the right hon. First Minister took on that occasion. I have before me a speech made by Colonel Denison of Toronto, and no man in this House will venture to say that Colonel Denison is not a most respected and devoted Canadian citizen, and a Conservative at that.

Mr. CLARKE. He is not a Conservative.

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes, he is. Now, what did Colonel Denison say? You will find this in the Toronto "Globe," of August 3rd last. I will not weary the House by reading the whole speech, but I will make one or two short extracts from it:

He acknowledges that Sir Wilfrid Laurier, while in Great Britain, acquitted himself after the manner of a statesman, and that he displayed particular sagacity in his discussion of the question of inter-Imperial trade with the British people.

He says again:

As a Canadian, I am well satisfied with the way in which Sir Wilfrid Laurier upheld the dignity of Canada.

Colonel Denison was asked:

What is your opinion of the probable effect of the denunciation of the German and Belgian treaties?

He replied:

The denunciation of these treaties marks an epoch in the history of the British Empire. The power of Canada has made itself felt, not only in British but in European diplomacy. It has affected Germany, Belgium and other countries, and every one of these countries knows that it was Canada's influence that produced the result. Another point in connection with the denunciation of these treaties is that it is a tremendous step towards preferential trade within the Empire. Great Britain was going along half asleep. Canada has wakened her, and made her sit up and think. She has been jostled out of the rut she has been following, and is now in a position to proceed in the direction that may be in her own interest and in that of the Empire.

With regard to the Prime Minister's attitude on free trade, Col. Denison said:

His remarks were general and theoretical. The great point of the whole movement was to secure the denunciation of the treaties. Nothing could be done while these treaties were in existence, and in my opinion it would have been a most indiscreet thing for Sir Wilfrid Laurier to have pursued any line of argument that would have aroused the hostility of the great free trade party in Great Britain. The great point was to secure the united influence of all parties in favouring the denunciation of the treaties. The denunciation of these treaties was an important step in advance.

Again, he says:

If ever we get a preferential tariff it will be on this most important ground; we will never get it as a quid pro quo for the small advantage in our market.

That is with regard to the bread supply of England. He pointed out that England was largely dependent upon the United States and Russia for her bread supply, and that in case of war she would be largely at the mercy of those two countries; and then he went on to point out that if we ever got anything in the way of preferential trade, it would be as a matter of prudence on the part of England in order to secure her bread supply from friendly colonies and nations instead of having to take it from hostile nations. That was the ground for the prospect of getting preferential trade.

I want to draw the attention of the House for a few moments now to the charge made by hon. gentlemen opposite that the Reform party have not kept their pledges. I cannot understand why these hon. gentlemen have made such a determined onslaught upon the Government at this very early hour of the session, unless it is that they want to try to build up some kind of argument for Mr. Whitney and his followers to use in the Ontario elections. I fancy that they want to enable him to show that charges of bad faith have been hurled in the face of the Government in this House, and that they have nothing to say in reply. Now, Sir, we want to say this, that the Reform party have kept their pledges; they have done what they promised to do; and they are going on to carry out faithfully and determinedly the balance of all the pledges they made to this House. There is no doubt that the tariff has not yet been fully applied to all the commodities that are imported into this country. But the hon. ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) said that the present tariff was virtually the old tariff, without any of the advantages pronounced by the new tariff. The only change, he said, that was made in it was one-hundredth of one per cent. My hon. friend must remember that the full application of the tariff has not yet been experienced by the people of this country; but they will come to realize its full advantages, I presume, about the 1st of August next, when the preferential clause will come fully into force. Now, I want to give the hon. ex-Finance Minister some answer to the charges he made that there was no difference between this tariff and the old tariff, and that the prices of goods were just the same as before. Now, let me give some items to show the reduction of duty under the new tariff as compared with the old—and I hope the hon. ex-Finance Minister will listen :

In addition, barbed wire is free, and binding twine is free. Now, the hon. gentlemen opposite, ever since the opening of this session, have been hurling across the floor statements to the effect that the new tariff was virtually the same as the old tariff, that it is a protectionist tariff from beginning to end, that no reduction of duty has been made to the people of this country, that no concessions have been made to the consumers. What have they to say of this list? Is it true, or is it not true? I maintain that it is true. Well, I suppose that we will have them still get up and reiterate the charge that there is no reduction in the tariff, that it is just what it was before. But there is one thing certain, any reduction that was made in the tariff was made with the view of altering it into a revenue from a protective tariff. Hon. gentlemen opposite, when they made their tariff, started with the determination to take care of the manufacturer first and of the revenue next. The revenue of the country was with them a secondary consideration, but hon. gentlemen on this side, when they remodelled the tariff, did so with the view of consulting the interests of the consumers first and then considering those of the manufacturers. Our endeavour was to give the people of this country the ordinary commodities of life at the very lowest cost and at the same time give our revenue the fullest benefit to be derived from the duties. Notwithstanding the assertions to the contrary of hon. gentlemen opposite, I maintain that that feature is the main feature of the present tariff; and hon. gentlemen will find, if they examine the matter impartially, that there is considerable advantage to the consumers in this country under the present tariff, when compared with that of the late Government, and I feel satisfied that the people of this country will realize, as they purchase the various commodities, that there is certainly a change in their favour. From day to day and from week to week, as they become accustomed to the purchase of useful commodities under the new tariff, they will find that there is an advantage somewhere, and will credit it, and credit it properly, to the tariff.

Another point to which I wish to refer is the charge of hon. gentlemen opposite that there has been no reduction in expenditure, and that consequently this Government has not redeemed its promise in that respect. Now, I contend there was a reduction in the expenditure last year. No doubt there has been very considerable expenditure connected with the Klondike section, which was not anticipated, but taking the expenditure in the different departments, there has been considerable reduction. The facts were brought before the House last session, but hon. gentlemen opposite seem to have forgotten them, I will state them again for their benefit in order to try and help them to cultivate a better recollection. Take, in the first place, the charges on management of the public debt, last year, there was on this item a reduction of $15,000. There were also the following reductions:—

Civil Government	$ 36,000
Penitentiaries	67,000
Legislation	83,000
Quarantine	16,000
Militia	330 000
Railways and Canals, chargeable to income	140,000
Public Works, chargeable to income	176,000
Ocean and River Service	48,000
Lighthouse and Coast Service	40,900
Fisheries	74,000
Indians	46,477
North-west Mounted Police	145,000

And in the Post Office Department, there was a reduction of $150,875. I fail to understand how hon. gentlemen opposite, in the face of this record, can get up and reiterate the charge that no reduction has taken place and that no efforts have been made to reduce the expenditure. I am amazed that hon. gentlemen would so expose—shall I call it their ignorance—their blindness to the condition of things, that they will persist in saying that this Government is making no effort to reduce expenditure. I earnestly hope they will not continue that line of argument.

We were treated to a long speech from the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). He too boiled over with indignation at the manner in which the right hon. First Minister discharged his duties when in England. He delved through the annals of history, sacred and profane, to find some personage with whom to compare my right hon. friend. The ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) referred to the green bay tree, and the hon. gentleman attempted to make use of that comparison. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) made reference, in his speech, to Ananias and Sapphira, and the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) thought he would go one better and made use of another personage in sacred history. Well, Mr. Speaker, these references set me thinking if there was not some character in history to whom I could compare my hon. friend from West Assiniboia, and after some reflection I failed to think of anybody except Samson who, we are told in Sacred Writ, on one occasion slew a thousand men with the jawbone of an ass. The comparison is not quite complete because my friend from Assiniboia has not yet succeeded in performing that feat, but there is one thing certain, that he has wielded that deadly weapon in this House for a considerable number of sessions without in the slightest way injuring anybody. He endeavoured to make a strong argument against the First Minister, but it fell flat, just as all the other arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite did, based on the flimsy foundation which hon. gentlemen opposite have to content themselves with, when seeking to attack the Government.

Now, I did not intend saying a word on this Address, but I have listened to so many statements, including those of the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) absolutely destitute of foundation, that I could not any longer endure in silence and allow them to pass uncontradicted. I hope these hon. gentlemen will now give the present Government some credit for the economy that has characterized our public expenditure this last year. More than that, we hope to ask their kindly consideration to further reductions this year, and from year to year, I am certain the Government will make an honest and earnest effort to administer the affairs of the country honestly and well.

We have had to listen to insinuations cast out with regard to the Klondike contract. I was somewhat amazed myself to hear the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Sproule) make the insinuation that immediately after the completion of this contract the Ontario elections were hurried on, the writs were issued and everything in readiness, thereby inferring that large contributions for the Ontario elections have been made by the parties who have entered into this contract.

Mr. SPROULE. That is the belief.

Mr. McMULLEN. Hon. gentlemen opposite are putting us in their shoes. That was their way of handling things. The history of poor McGreevy, who is now in his grave, justifies us in coming to the conclusion that that was the course they adopted. Mr. Mc-Greevy admitted that from time to time he was bled to death, in the various government contracts he entered into, so that in the end he had hardly enough to live on. But these hon. gentlemen opposite need not attempt to measure us by their half-bushel measure. I am positive that the Government are going to carry on the affairs of this country honestly and well, and are not going ruthlessly and foolishly and extravagantly to spend public money, as hon. gentlemen opposite did when they were in office. The country is now looking for better things and it is going to have them. The people are going to have honest administration. The hon. gentleman may look, he may investigate, but he will find nothing to the discredit of the Government. Their experience will be that of a poor Scotchman of whom I have heard. He went to bed one night in the same room with an Irishman. They had a little poteen, part of which they used before they retired, but left a little drop in the bottom of the bottle with which to wet their lips in the morning. In the night, the Irishman took the bottle and swallowed what it contained. In the morning, early, the Scotchman rose and crept around to where the bottle was. His friend, hearing him, said, "What are you looking for?" The Scotchman replied, "Oh, nothing." "And that is exactly what you will find there," replied the Irishman. Hon. gentlemen opposite may search, they may have their investigations, but they will find nothing. They will find honesty; they will find that the affairs of the country have been well and prudently handled. I do not wish to detain the House, but I thought it my duty to answer, though in my humble and limited way, the statements from the other side of the House with regard to the tariff and preferential trade.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the hon. gentleman sits down, I would like, with his permission, to ask him a question. I would like to know whether this is his farewell speech, or may we hope for another?

Mr. McMULLEN. I am sure I shall please my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) when I say that I know it would cause him a sigh of regret were I to leave them here. I beg to assure him that he will have the pleasure of seeing me for some years yet in this House, I hope. And I hope to live for many years to see the hon. gentleman occupy the distinguished position that he occupies today.

Mr. BERGERON. Before my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) rose, I had intended to say that I did not at all admire the silence of hon. gentlemen opposite. Like my hon. friend from Bruce (Mr. McNeill), I feel that, following my own inclinations, I would rather not speak than to occupy, even for a few moments, the attention of the House. But, though hon. gentllemen opposite have received instructions from their leader to say nothing, we, on this side, have a duty to the country to perform, and for that reason I claim the indulgence of hon. gentlemen. The fact that hon. gentlemen opposite have not answered the just criticisms of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House is not due, as some might think, to a solemn indifference, but it is due to a well-calculated and discreet silence. The only one who has broken that silence is the hon. member for North Wellington. I should have been surprised had he not broken through the discipline of the party. I remember that, some time ago, the hon. leader of the Government told me that the Liberal party was more difficult to discipline than the Conservative party, because every Liberal member had a mind of his own and was proud of it. I wish to congratulate him on having changed all that. He has stolen that also, along with the rest of the policy of the Conservative party. It is most natural that gentlemen opposite should have received orders to remain silent. There are not four men on that side who stand on the same platform, and my right hon. friend the Premier (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) knew that if these gentlemen were allowed to give expression to their ideas, the Speech would have been torn to pieces and the policy of the Government smashed. But my hon. friend from North Wellington has broken through the rule for silence. For six long years, in your chair, Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to the hon. gentleman. I am glad to say, I learned many things from him. I will not make any imputations, like my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster). I know the hon. member for North Wellington to be a fighter, and I admire him for it. But the tone we hear from North Wellington is different from that we heard last session. If I am not mistaken, the very last resolution against the Government voted on in this House last session, was proposed by the hon. gentleman. He was not then satisfied. He is now. I congratulate him. But I congratulate still more the leader of the Government.

All we have had in this debate, except the little episode to which I will return in a few moments, was the remarks of the few gentlemen who form a sort of mutual admiration society. First, we had the speech of the hon. gentleman who moved this Address. And let me say at once, that the impression made upon me by the hon. gentleman as a debater was a very good one. I believe he is an acquisition to the debating power of the House. He is perfectly satisfied with everything. That is quite natural. For eighteen long years we listened to speeches from hon. gentlemen opposite, then sitting on this side, clamouring against the National Policy and denouncing the manufacturers, who, they said, were stealing the money of the people. But the hon. gentleman, at that time, was taking advantage of the National Policy to build up a great fortune for himself. And, having done so, it is natural that he should say he is satisfied. He believes that the Government has kept all its pledges to the people. It is evident that he was not here to listen to the speeches of the hon. gentlemen when in Opposition, or to take part in making their platform in 1893. If the hon. gentleman is satisfied with the tariff, let me give him a piece of advice. There are two schools of thought on the fiscal policy of this country among hon. gentlemen opposite. One, the protectionist school, is under the tutorship of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte); the other, the free trade school, is under the direction of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). Now, my advice to the hon. member for Centre Toronto is to stick to the Minister of Public Works; for, the moment that hon. gentleman leaves the Government or loses his influence, the National Policy, which has made my hon. friend from Centre Toronto so happy, and which he so strongly favours, will disappear and will be succeeded by the free trade policy of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. We also heard the speech in seconding the Address from the hon. member of Temiscouata (Mr. Gauvreau). I spoke, a moment ago, of a mutual admiration society. The hon. member for Temiscouata made a very nice little speech in French. He has been called a poet, and I think he is one. I hope he will speak often in the House, because we have too little poetry here. I was by no means surprised at the compliments he paid the Premier. We know the relation between the two, and we know what would have been the opinion of hon. gentlemen opposite in former years concerning what has taken place. If I read the newspapers correctly, there was a convention of the Liberal party in Temiscouata, and the choice of the convention was Mr. Pouliot. And the Minister of Public Works sanctioned that nomination and made a great speech in favour of Mr. Pouliot, and said he would carry the county by acclamation.

The present member for Temiscouata (Mr. Gauvreau), stood in spite of the convention, and I think there were five or six men supporting him, whereas Mr. Pouliot had eighteen or twenty. He stood against the Minister of Public Works to fight the Government, and declared he would stand in spite of any other candidate. He maintained that position, and as kicking has been doing a great deal of good on the other side within the last few months, he has carried his point. When the Prime Minister came back from England and got the present member of the county elected by acclamation, the Conservatives did not wish to increase the bad feelings of a divided party, such as the Liberal party presented when the present hon. member carried the county at the by-election. So it was not surprising to hear that hon. gentleman congratulating the Premier of this Dominion.

But, Mr. Speaker, we have heard two other speeches in this House, which I think should have received some answer from hon. gentlemen opposite. The leader of the Opposition made a speech which I think is one of the best and soundest ever made in this House of Commons. The people of this country know where to find him, and they know where the Conservative party in the Dominion stands to-day. That was supplemented by the very able speech of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), a speech such as that hon. gentleman is accustomed to make. Then we had the spectacle which I mentioned a moment ago, of hon. gentlemen opposite professing to believe that these speeches did not require any answer on their part. Now, Mr. Speaker, let me say that if I understand constitutional government aright, there are, as there ought to be, two political parties in the country. Their great aim and their laudable ambition is to obtain power. But above this aim to obtain power must be the higher aim of safeguarding and promoting the best interest of the country. A party who is working simply for the sake of obtaining office, is not a political party in the constitutional sense in which the party system prevails in England. So, Sir, I say, starting from that point, I arraign the Government, from the Premier downward, in that for eighteen or twenty years they had been clamouring against the National Policy, and on attaining to power they have adopted in principle the very policy they had been combatting. I say that the Government of the day have been deceiving the people of this country. I say they have seized power upon a false issue. I want to know what answer they can make against this charge. Sir, on one occasion last year I heard the right hon. gentleman make an assertion which caused me some pain. After an hon. member on this side of the House had been charging the Government with numerous tergiversations, what answer did the right hon. gentleman make? All he could reply was: Yes, and we are here. Is that the way to discuss political questions? Is it a question of merely running for power, is it a question of deceiving the people of this country? Can they tell one story to the people and, after arriving at power, can they turn their backs upon all their previous record? What guarantee can the electors have in the good faith of their political leaders? And this has been done by a party which call themselves Liberal, a party which boasts of having fought in the past for the constitutional liberties of the people. Let me repeat, because we cannot repeat it too often, that the Government of the day are not fulfilling the pledges that they made to the people of this country before the elections. The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram) congratulated the Government upon the prosperity of the country to-day, saying that our credit is good. Yes, and if it is good it is because for eighteen years the Conservative party administered the affairs of this country; if the credit of Canada stands so high to-day in the markets of Europe, it is because, during eighteen years, the manufacturers, and the workingmen, and the farmers, of this country enjoyed the benefits of a Conservative Government, who made of Canada one household of safety and security. Now, Sir, we heard the other night a very eloquent speech from the Prime Minister; and let me say here, and I hope no one will reproach me for it, that in listening to the right hon. Premier speaking the English language with such eloquence and with such prescience, I could not but feel proud of him as a French Canadian, occupying the high position he now occupies. But, Sir, that is as far as I could go, because, after examining what he said, and reading it over, I found that he had made no attempt to answer the arraignment made against his Government by the leader of the Opposition. Then we heard a speech by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). It struck me in listening to him that it was almost worth while for the Conservatives to be in Opposition in order to witness the remarkable change that has taken place in that hon. gentleman. When he was in Opposition everything was blue, everything was going to ruin, the country was going to bankruptcy. But since the hon. gentleman sits on the Government benches his face is wreathed with smiles, everything is all right, the people are happy, the farmers have immense crops, and all this is due to the Government. The workingmen are working overtime, the manufacturers are busy, and if we have reached almost a millennial condition of things, it is owing to the Government in power. I have always had a good deal of esteem for that hon. gentleman personally, but I must say that I thought it was childish in him, not to attempt any answer to the speeches made by the eminent leaders of the Opposition. Then happened what I think was the order given by the right hon. Premier to his friends, not to speak any more. It was quite natural. I was thinking, however, of what would happen if my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. McMillan) would only get up, who, when in Opposition used to speak four or five hours in thundering against the National Policy, if this hon. gentleman had only been let loose, what an awful mess he would have made of it. But let me say a word with reference to the congratulations showered by the hon. member for Centre Toronto upon the Minister of Finance for making the Government loan. I think he said that credit was due to the Administration for the favourable terms on which that loan was made. The Jubilee was also mentioned in the Speech from the Throne; in fact a great part of the Speech from the Throne is composed of congratulations upon everything the Almighty has done for this country—the harvest, the loan, and the Jubilee. Well, Mr. Speaker, so far as the Jubilee is concerned, I, for one, am ready to say that I think the right hon. gentleman did honour to Canada in the way he represented this country in England, and I intend shortly to discuss some of the things which he said there. But speaking of him in his quality of representative of Canada, I am pleased to say, that even if his career were to close now, his public performances and speeches in England will always form a bright page in the history of Canada. I will not say anything of the Yukon Railway contract, because that will soon come before the House in a position where we can discuss it better than we can to-day. As regards the harvest, some hon. gentleman opposite has been kind enough to say that the Almighty had something to do with it, although the press of the Liberal party throughout the country seems to attribute it almost exclusively to the fact that Canada has a Liberal Government in power. Now my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has attempted to answer the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill), and I think that the hon. member for Bruce is to be congratulated on having succeeded in drawing forth an answer from the other side. The hon. member for Wellington says that he entirely agrees with the position taken by the First Minister the other day in regard to preferential trade. Now, Sir, if I understand aright the discussion that is taking place, and the remarks made by the Premier and by the hon. member for North Bruce, there was nothing to justify the remarks of the hon. member for North Wellington.

The member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) said this: That when the right hon. Premier was in Canada and saw the leader of the Opposition going round and meeting with success in advocating preferential trade with England, the right hon. gentleman visited three cities, London, Montreal and Toronto, I think, and said: I too am in favour of preferential trade with England. What did it imply? It implied a preference on all goods going from Canada to England and a preference on English goods entering Canada. The member for North Bruce also pointed out that when the First Minister left Canada he was sincere or he was not sincere in his intention. If he was sincere, when he arrived in England he deceived the people of Canada to whom he had promised preferential trade. If he was not sincere, he had deceived the people when he advocated a policy of preferential trade similar to that advocated by the leader of the Opposition. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) said it was impossible for the Premier to obtain preferential trade because Mr. Chamberlain, forsooth, was in favour of free trade as they have it in England. That assertion, I say, is not according to the facts. What happened at the Toronto Board of Trade, when this question was discussed, I well remember, although I have not the newspaper report with me. Mr. Osler moved a resolution to form the basis upon which we could have preferential trade with England. That resolution was accepted in England by Mr. Chamberlain.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the resolution presented by Mr. Osler was accepted by the Chambers of Commerce in London?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend has not said anything of the kind.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). I beg your pardon.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The resolution carried by the Board of Trade of Toronto under the chairmanship of Mr. Osler, was accepted by Mr. Chamberlain.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). The resolution was not even presented, it was withdrawn. Even amendments to that resolution were withdrawn and a substantive resolution prepared by the Chambers of Commerce was carried. The Toronto resolution, therefore, never went before the Chambers of Commerce.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). I was present.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will give the hon. gentleman the proof. When Mr. Osler as the delegate of the Chamber of Commerce of Toronto, went to London and tabled his resolution, Mr. Chamberlain, in his address, adopted that resolution as the basis upon which he was prepared to negotiate the question with the colonies.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). The hon. gentleman was not there, I was present, and I know the resolution was not submitted to the Chambers of Commerce in London, and it was not accepted by those chambers. It was moved, but it was understood even before it was moved that amendments would be proposed, and Lord Strathcona was to make a speech in favour of it. Even that could not carry the resolution through, and it was withdrawn; a new resolution was proposed by the Council of the Chambers of Commerce and carried in preference to it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. As this is a question of fact, the House will no doubt be glad to have the evidence respecting it before members.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER. If it is the wish of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am sure the House is willing.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER. I have no objection myself.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have the evidence in print, and I should not be prevented from reading when I have under my hand Mr. Chamberlain's own words to the Chambers of Commerce—

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). The statement—

The DEPUTY SPEAKER. This discussion is absolutely out of order. If it is the wish of the House that the discussion should go on, very well; otherwise, the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), who has the floor, should be permitted to continue his speech.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have no wish to interfere with the order of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have the proof under my hand.

Mr. BERGERON. I stated a few moments ago, and I will repeat the statement, that the resolution presented at the Toronto Board of Trade, and which spoke about a tariff for revenue, was repeated almost word for word in a speech delivered by the hon. Premier in London, Canada. This is what he said:

England does not expect that we should abandon our own system of trade such as we have it, but I lay before you what the English people would expect in return—that instead of the principle of protection we should adopt a revenue form of tariff, pure and simple.

Those are the words of the hon. gentleman. The hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) will surely not discuss those words, because I have the report and the right hon. gentleman is present in his seat.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). You are speaking of two different things.

Mr. BERGERON. What the House no doubt wishes to obtain is the answer of Mr. Chamberlain. This is what Mr. Chamberlain said at the Congress of the Chambers of Commerce of the Empire.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). What meeting was that?

Mr. BERGERON. This report is taken from the "Times" of March 10th, 1896. It is a report of Mr. Chamberlain's opening speech at that Congress. He said:

And I admit that, if I understand it correctly, I find the germs of such a proposal in a resolution which is to be submitted to you on behalf of the Toronto Board of Trade. What is that resolution? I hope I correctly explain it. That resolution I understand to be one for the creation of a British Zollverein or customs union, which would establish at once practically free trade throughout the British Empire, but would leave the contracting parties free to make their own arrangements with regard to duties upon foreign goods; except that—this is an essential condition of the proposal—that Great Britain shall consent to replace moderate duties upon certain articles which are of large production in the colonies.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read on.

Now, if I have rightly understood it, these articles would comprise corn, meat, wool and sugar, and perhaps other articles of enormous consumption in this country, which are at present largely produced in the colonies, and which might be, under such an arrangement, wholly produced in the colonies, and wholly produced by British labour. On the other hand, as I have said, the colonies, while maintaining their duties upon foreign imports, would agree to a free interchange of commodities with the rest of the Empire, and would cease to place protective duties upon any product of British labour.

Mr. McMULLEN. Read what Mr. Chamberlain said after that. You are afraid to do it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. BERGERON. I have not been in the habit of making speeches in this House which are mostly composed of recitations, but I used this extract in order to answer the interruption of my hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Wood), and to show him that what had been advocated by the Toronto Board of Trade had been accepted and endorsed by the right hon. the Premier and by the Right Hon. Mr. Chamberlain.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. BERGERON. Yes, and the Premier of Canada when he went to England advocated a totally different thing.

Mr. McMULLEN. We challenge you to read the balance of the speech.

Mr. BERGERON. There is enough already there for the hon. member for North Wellington, and he will hear more of it later on. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) is a very clever man.

Mr. SPROULE. In his own estimation.

Mr. BERGERON. The hon. gentleman from Grey (Mr. Sproule) may think me a bad judge of character, but I believe the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) is very clever, and as a business man he has figured out several articles to which preferential trade would not apply. He told us about iron and numbers of other articles which come from the States, and to which preferential trade is not applicable. Now that is clever, but it is not as clever as he think it is, because I had an idea that he would tell the House that there is actually free trade in the country at the present time; at all events if he does not say so in the House he will say so in the country. The Minister of Public Works tells us in his paper that every one is satisfied in the country, and that the Liberal party is united as one man, but if he goes into his office in Montreal, he will hear the Grits of the province of Quebec clamouring, not only against him—in this I think they are wrong because he is one of the best men the Government have—but clamouring against the whole Liberal party. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) is a very painstaking man, and he has been at work figuring out the reductions in the tariff, as he used to figure out the Auditor General's Report in the good old days. But the hon. gentleman forgot to tell us anything about the tariff on cottons, which is higher to-day than it was when the Conservative Government was in power. When I occupied that Chair, Mr. Speaker, (Mr. Brodeur) which you now fill so ably, I listened to long speeches from the hon. member from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) upon cottons, and upon the amount of money that was wrung from the poor people of this country to swell the purses of the bloated cotton manufacturers. How does it come that the hon. member for North Wellington has nothing to say about the tax on cottons to-day, when it is actually higher than it was under the National Policy. Where has the Liberal party shown that they have reduced the duty on coal oil? We used to hear the hon. member from Prince Edward Island (Sir Louis Davies) and the members from the Northwest Territories, tell us about the terrible tax upon the poor people, but that tax exists to-day pretty nearly the same as it was before, and the people are paying the very same prices as formerly, for if there has been any reduction in price it has gone into the pockets of the middlemen. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) told us his story about the man finding nothing in the bottle. It is not quite a new story, but although I have heard it perhaps hon. gentlemen have not, and a man cannot be blamed for not knowing the latest yarns. However, there is an application of that story and it is, that when the Government of the day disappears after the next elections, and when the Conservatives come back to power, they will find nothing in the public chest, just as my friend's Irishman found nothing in the bottle.

Mr. GIBSON. That is your old story.

Mr. BERGERON. I know hon. gentlemen opposite pretty well and that will be their story. I wish to refer for a moment to the reference in the Speech from the Throne to the Franchise Act. The matter will be discussed fully later on, but I wish to say now, that if the Government bring down a measure which will be efficacious and will not be costly in its operation, they can at once rely upon my support. I believe that they should bring in a good Franchise Act immediately, for it was an outrage to see the people of Nicolet voting recently on a list made in 1894.

Now, Sir, with regard to the plebiscite, I have some remarks to make and some advice to give. Although my right hon. friend (Sir

Mr. BERGERON.

Wilfrid Laurier) is not a total abstainer, and like myself thinks a glass of wine not a bad thing, yet when he was in Opposition he used to speak pretty kindly to those who favoured prohibition. Well, Sir, those who sow the wind will reap the whirlwind, and that is what is going to happen to my right hon. friend. He used to favour prohibition in the old days in Opposition, when prohibition embarrassed the Government then in power, and now that the tables are turned he will experience the same embarrassment. If this plebiscite is carried out it will be an expensive affair, costing two or three hundred thousand dollars or it may be $400,000, and in the end it will make no difference at all in the status of the prohibition question. Gentlemen on both sides of the House know very well that it is an impossibility to enforce prohibition in this country and even though the majority of the electors should favour it, they know very well that it cannot be carried out. In 1879, I heard Sir Leonard Tilley deliver a speech on the question in this House, and if you refer to "Hansard" you will find that speech recorded there. Sir Leonard Tilley had been Premier of New Brunswick. He was a total abstainer all his life, but in that speech he told us that the floors of the legislature of New Brunswick were flooded with petitions asking for prohibition, and when he yielded to these petitions the consequence was that his Government was beaten in the House, and in the country afterwards, and he came to the House of Commons to tell us that he was opposed to prohibition, because it was impossible and impracticable. Instead of trying by the plebiscite to throw sand in the eyes of these good people, who favour prohibition, a great many of whom are sincere and some of whom are not sincere, it would be much better to have strict license laws strictly enforced, and to have inspectors to see that the liquors sold are of good quality and not injurious to health. Another thing which should be done is to put down smuggling. At this very moment there is an immense amount of smuggling in the country, and the liquor got in that way is of bad quality, and being sold at a lower price than the liquor sold under legal restrictions, is extensively consumed and is most damaging to health. If the money which the plebiscite would cost were spent in a more practical and beneficial way it would be of far greater service to the people of the country.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recession.

Mr. BERGERON. Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at Six o'clock for recess, I was talking about the paragraph in the Speech from the Throne relating to the plebiscite. Before leaving that subject, I desire to say one or two words more about it. I have given reasons for believing that the money to be spent for that purpose will be thrown away, as it will have no practical result. I believe every hon. member of this House is in favour of temperance, as it should be understood. No one deploras more than I do the evils of intemperance; but if we all agree that far, we seem to disagree as to the proper mode of remedying those evils. My opinion—and I give it for what it is worth—is, that temperance can be promoted and the evils of intemperance thwarted only by moral suasion, not by an Act of Parliament. I believe that, if our priests and clergymen of any and every denomination would preach and work together in that direction, their efforts would do more good than any law we could pass in this Parliament. Why, Sir, even the Salvation Army—and I am very happy to say so here, on the floor of Parliament—in their own way have done more good and are now doing more good in that respect than any law passed by this Parliament could do. The right hon. the First Minister will remember, I am sure, a great deal better than I can, the proof of what I am saying that was given in the province of Quebec some forty or fifty years ago by a man who was then called the Rev. Father Chiniquy, who is to-day the Rev. Mr. Chiniquy—a man who has done a great deal of good by preaching in favour of temperance in the province of Quebec. I have met in my own county and in other counties men who have declared to me that if they were saved to live until the day they spoke to me, they owed it to the sermons they had heard from the man whom they still called Father Chiniquy.

Now, Sir, I want to say one word more in answer to my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), who brought out the testimony of a man whom I have not the pleasure of knowing, but of whom I know a great many good things—Mr. Denison, of Toronto, who had given a certificate of character to my right hon. friend. I desire simply to say that Mr. Denison may be, as I believe he is, a most honourable man; but when my hon. friend from North Wellington says that Mr. Denison is a Conservative, he does not, I think, fairly represent Mr. Denison's position in politics. Mr. Denison is, and has been for over twenty years, an employee of the Ontario Government at the respectable salary of $4,000 a year, and any certificate that he would give to the First Minister I, at any rate, would take 'cum grano salis.'

Mr. SOMERVILLE. He has been a Tory for forty years.

Mr. BERGERON. The fact that he is employed by the Ontario Government shows that he is not a Conservative.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. It shows that the Ontario Government is a liberal government.

Mr. FOSTER. It will not be after the first of March.

Mr. BERGERON. The hon. member for North Wellington, who is strong on figures, has tried to make us believe that everything promised by our friends when out of power has been fulfilled. He spoke about the expenditure and the public debt. I do not know where he got his figures, for I find by the "Canada Gazette," which is the paper we can all swear by in this House, that the gross debt of Canada has been increased since these hon. gentlemen have been in power, by $13,232,779.52. Then, the hon. gentleman says that our expenditure has gone down. That is not what I find by the "Canada Gazette," which states that the expenditure in 1896 was $1,979,336.17, and in 1897, $2,362,255.52, or an increase since hon. gentlemen opposite came into power of $382,919.35. This is for the year 1897, the year in which hon. gentlemen opposite could control the expenditure. I merely mention these figures to show that the hon. member for North Wellington has to be very accurate in his figures, since we are obliged to criticise the acts of the Government he supports.

Now, I have discussed, as briefly and as well as I could, the questions raised in the Speech from the Throne. I agree entirely with His Excellency in what he says in the last paragraph, where he recommends these few matters to the consideration of the members, invoking the Divine blessing upon the important labours upon which we are again entering. If there ever was an occasion on which the Governor General should implore the Divine blessing on the Government, it is the present one. They need it, and they need a great deal of it.

I have been looking through the Speech for something which I have looked for in vain, and I am going to bring that matter to the attention of my right hon. friend. I hope he will not be angry at me for doing so, because I feel it to be a duty on my part. I want to tell him that I am surprised not to find in the Speech from the Throne anything relating to the schools of Manitoba. For six or seven years we have heard of that question in Parliament and out of Parliament. Everybody who knows anything about the school question, knows that it has been the subject of Grit machinations from the commencement. It has been so in the province of Manitoba, where the premier of that province kept himself in power and made himself popular with the majority by ill-treating the minority. At that time hon. gentlemen did all they could in the different provinces of the Dominion to excite fanaticism on that question. My right hon. friend knows that the organs of the Liberal party in Ontario and in the maritime provinces did their utmost against coercion. The right hon. gentleman knows that the man for whom I think he has the most consideration in the province of Quebec, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), was at the head of a phalanx who were preaching in that province that the minority in Manitoba were oppressed because the Government here were not doing what they ought to do, and urging the Dominion Government to use every means in their power to redress the grievances of the minority in Manitoba. This lasted during the time the question was before the different courts in Canada and out of Canada, in accordance with a motion which had been carried in the House of Commons, at the suggestion of Mr. Blake when he was the chief of the Opposition, and seconded by the right hon. gentleman himself. In the session of 1896, a measure called the Remedial Bill, was brought into this House by the then Government. This Remedial Bill, although not as perfect as some gentlemen would have liked it to be, was approved of and accepted by the minority and all those who sympathized with the minority of Manitoba; but the right hon. gentleman, on that occasion, to the surprise of everybody except his most intimate friends, moved the six months' hoist. Nobody knew better than the right hon. gentleman what that meant. He knew that it simply meant to kill the question, and he did it for that purpose. I believe he was sincere enough in that, because he could not have pleaded ignorance. It was at the end of a Parliament. The right hon. gentleman and his friends, and even some of our friends, joined together to prevent the passing of that measure. We went to the country. The provinces which the right hon. gentleman, I imagine, had his eyes upon as likely to sustain him for his action in moving the six months' hoist, did not answer very well to his expectations. The grand old province of Ontario, where some fanaticism was expected to be found, did not answer as my right hon. friend had hoped. Neither did the maritime provinces; and the province of Manitoba did the reverse of what he could have expected. And his faithful friend in Manitoba (Mr. Martin), who had done more than anybody else to inflict this grievance on the Manitoba minority, was defeated at the polls. Even his other hon. friend (Mr. Tarte), who had pleaded, as an equal extremist on the other side, was also defeated, showing that the people know where their friends are when they want anything in the best interests of the country, and are not to be carried away by fanaticism. Our hon. friends on the other side were very much surprised at the vote given in Quebec, and well might they be. The people of that province supported my right hon. friend, not because they expected he would drop the school question, as he has done, but because they did not understand very well the Remedial Bill. Unfortunately the Conservative press in the province of Quebec was not up to what it should have been.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. It never is.

Mr. BERGERON. My hon. friend need not be anxious on that point. The Conservative party in Quebec unfortunately was not organized as it should have been, and the people of that province really thought that the right hon. gentleman would, on obtaining office, carry out his pledge that he would accomplish more than could be obtained under the Remedial Bill, and that he would render justice to the minority of Manitoba. To his faithful electors of St. Rochs, in Quebec East, he said that he would use the sunny ways of conciliation, and that if these sunny ways were not successful then he would use the strong machinery of the Government at his disposal, if elected Premier, in order to force the province of Manitoba to do justice to his and their compatriots, and co-religionists. We know now what his sunny ways meant. We know now they meant the abandonment of the cause of the minority, but the people did not know it then, and they relied on the promises he made to them. The people of Quebec believed in him and put him in power. What then happened? My hon. friend had promised that as soon as he would be in power, he would send his Minister of Justice to Manitoba to discuss the question with the proper authorities there and endeavour to reach a settlement. The hon. Mr. Mowat did not go to Manitoba, but the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) did, and we know how he settled everything without even doing the minority the compliment of consulting them at all. The settlement was simply one agreed to by Mr. Greenway and the Minister of Public Works, and the minority had no voice in it at all nor did they accept it. My hon. friend, however, did not care about that, he had not the slightest regard for the minority or the pledges of his leader, but accepted something entirely different from what the right hon. gentleman had promised to obtain. Not only did my hon. friend escort into this House the man who was the author and the instigator of this injustice perpetrated on the minority (Mr. Martin), but by the deal he carried through with the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), after he came into power, he brought into this House and into his Cabinet the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), who was one of the chief agents in carrying through this injustice and preventing its remedy. Sir, he did more than that. Sir, the Conservative party, I am proud to say, has always in the past, and I hope will in the future, so manage the affairs of this country as to obtain the approval of the best elements of the people and particularly of the clergy in general. But it has always ruled as a political party and has never gone out of Canada to obtain the opinion of anybody as to how it should manage public affairs. My right hon. friend did otherwise. Although he had not effected any settlement in Manitoba, he thought that as he was First Minister of the Dominion, and bears a French name, and professes the same faith as the oppressed minority, he could go, with every hope of success, to the highest authority in his Church and plead that, in the interests of the country, the settlement he had made, or rather the semblance of a settlement, should be accepted. My hon. friend did not at first go in person, but sent over a delegate—at least Father Proulx, a priest in the province of Quebec, went to Rome with the approval of the Government, and spent a few weeks there in the endeavour to persuade the Propaganda that the settlement was a good one. Father Proulx' mission having signally failed, an old Papal Zouave, Mr. Drolet, supposed to have great influence at Rome, was sent over. But his efforts were so futile, that he was instructed to come back, his expenses being altogether out of proportion to the services he was rendering.

Mr. SCRIVER. What about the by-elections?

Mr. BERGERON. My hon. friend can take all the comfort from them he chooses. After the failure of the Rev. Mr. Proulx and Mr. Drolet, my right hon. friend sent the Solicitor General of Canada (Mr. Fitzpatrick) over to the Holy See, and the Solicitor General brought with him a lawyer from London. Mr. Russell—a Roman Catholic lawyer—in recompense of whose services, a change was made by the Government in their law officers in London. These two gentlemen went to Rome. My hon. friend the Solicitor General went there as a full-fledged Minister, with the title of His Excellency, and, assisted by Mr. Russell, tried what he could do, with equal want of success. Then my right hon. friend himself went over, but he did not stay in Rome very long. I hope he was well received, but from my experience of the Holy City, it takes many days there before one can see anything. My right hon. friend was only there a week, and his short stay inclinès me to believe that he did not obtain there the reception he expected. At any rate, he did nothing. Everything points to the fact that the present Government of Canada asked the opinion of the Holy Father in Rome. I do not blame them for having done that, but what I blame them for is for not having followed it after they did get it. What answer did they receive? Were they told that the settlement was a good one? Not at all. They were told that it was insufficient, inefficient and unacceptable. Now, Mr. Speaker, every Liberal candidate who presented himself for election in the province of Quebec during the last two years, declared on every hustings, even at the last by-elections, that when the Holy Father would speak, he would bow obediently to his mandate. If I am not mistaken, the hon. Solicitor General himself declared that he would resign his seat in Parliament if the position taken by the Government was not sanctioned by Rome. I was surprised not to find any mention of the school question in the Speech from the Throne. Does my right hon. friend think he can drop it in this manner? I do not pretend to speak for the whole Opposition, but speaking for myself and many others, I can tell him that all the people in this country who have any feeling on the subject at all, will remember in good time the conduct of the right hon. gentleman. My hon. friend was anxious to obtain power, the ambition was a laudable one, and he succeeded, but the office cost him a great deal. I do not believe that he was looking for honours, because we all know that he is a democrat up to the hilt; and if he was covered with honours, no doubt he will bear them with a great deal of dignity. But how long is this going to last? Can any settlement be said to be made of any question unless the settlement is based on justice? I say not. In what position does the minority of Manitoba stand to-day. My hon. friend knows it well, and he knows too that he will have to render an account of his conduct towards them. He need not delude himself with the hope that the fanaticism of a certain class of people is going to stand him in good stead in the long run and keep him where he is. Let me say here that there are two men in this Dominion whose names will be revered in the history of this country.

I am sure that I speak not only for those I represent, but that I echo the sentiment of many people, not only in the province of Quebec, but throughout the Dominion, when I say that the names of Sir Mackenzie Bowell and Sir Charles Tupper—two Protestants, not of the same faith as the First Minister and mine, not of the same faith as the minority of Manitoba—will be held up to public honour for having come out boldly in behalf, not of separate schools considered as a distinct question, because they favoured it, but of upholding the constitution of the country. They came out boldly, they risked their reputation, they risked their hold on their own party—they did more than that, they probably lost power through their devotion to the constitution. But when the history of this country comes to be written, their names will appear in golden letters as those of men who practically and manfully stood by the constitution. And here let me say that there is no use in taking any other course in this country. It is impossible for any party to rule the Dominion of Canada without rendering justice to everybody, and particularly to the minorities. Any one who tries to rule otherwise will in the end signally fail, and failure is what my hon. friend must expect when he is called upon to render an account of his stewardship to the people.

The expenditure instead of decreasing has increased. The revenue has increased within the last two months, due to a favourable tide in the affairs of this country, but not in any way due to the Government. They promised they would not give bonuses to railways. But they have given them. You cannot walk in the lobbies of Parliament to-day without meeting gentlemen who are here soliciting bonuses for different railways throughout the Dominion. They declaimed against members of Parliament accepting public positions. I am not a radical on this subject. I do not believe that because a man is a member of the House of Commons he should be debarred from accepting a position which he is fitted to fill. But we know how hon. gentlemen opposite spoke against it. Take the case of Mr. Mason. He was a lawyer, a good lawyer; he had been a member of Parliament for years and had discharged his duties faithfully, and he had given notice of his intention not to seek re-election, but to devote himself to his practice. A judgeship became vacant and was given to him. I think that under the circumstances it was quite natural that it should be offered to him and that he should accept it. But did we not hear the present Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), hour after hour, thundering against granting positions to members of Parliament and even presenting a Bill to prevent it in the future. And yet, how many members have been appointed to office in the twenty months since the right hon. gentleman came into power. I do not want to make insinuations, but it is quite possible that there are others with promises of office in their pockets. A case arose recently in Quebec which exemplified the only point in which these gentlemen have not gone back upon their record—that is in their loyalty to the party. One evening the papers were full of the great happenings in Quebec—a great revolution was impending. And what was it about? It was not a question of principle or a question of constitutional law, but a mere question of patronage, an hon. gentleman writing against his Premier because a promise made to him two years ago was not fulfilled. What has been the outcome of it all? The dismissal of a Lieutenant-Governor who desired to remain Lieutenant-Governor after some interchange of letters with one of the Ministers; another gentleman was put in his place and another gentleman appointed a judge, that is all. Now, it seems to me we should be above these things here. Now that hon. gentlemen opposite are in power, which was what they sought, let us all work together, we in Opposition and they in power, if they wish it and so long as they do right by the country. We will then have less party fighting in this country and more practical work, for nobody on this side will be jumping up to propose prohibition or any other scheme of that kind which has no serious basis in the minds of the people. Let us work together for the good of the country. In a few days the question will be brought before us of the best means of dealing with the mines of the Yukon. I believe that all should be done that can be done by the Government of Canada to help the development of that country. I believe we have in that country the greatest gold deposits in the world, but I fear that we may lose the advantage they would confer upon us, if we do not take immediate advantage of our opportunities. But, greatly as I desire to see that wealth developed, let us not seek that end by squandering the people's money or granting monopolies which will defeat the very object we have in view. However, we can deal with that subject more fully when the Bill is before us. There are other things that we can do. Nature has given us the great outlet to the sea, the St. Lawrence. Within the last few years we have seen that our American friends are ready to spend money freely in gigantic efforts to prevent the trade from the west and the great lakes from coming through Canada. Only recently in the legislature of New York they have voted $17,000,000 to help in widening and deepening what they themselves call a ditch, the Erie Canal. Why, because they understand the importance of carrying the immense wealth of the west through their own channels. Why do not we take equally strong measures in Canada instead of discussing nationalities, discussing religion, discussing other matters which should not be brought before this House. Why do not we work together and deepen our canals, not to fourteen feet only, but to twenty feet if necessary, in order to bring down these immense cargoes that float on Lake Superior and Lake Huron to Quebec, and, if possible, to send them unbroken across the Atlantic. Even the Americans themselves admit the advantage of the St. Lawrence route. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will remember that in 1891 or 1892, the representatives of a great American company came here and secured a charter which would enable them to bring these immense vessels drawing 25 feet of water by the St. Lawrence route and through Lake Champlain to New York and thence across the ocean. Let both sides of this House work together, we in Opposition not wishing to get back into power unless it is for the best interests of the country, not seeking power for the sake of office, but willing, until our policy commends itself to the people, to remain a constitutional Opposition, declaring our principles clearly as we have done, so that the people may understand exactly where we stand and judge us accordingly. We have a great inheritance here. We the people of Canada, have a great inheritance here, probably the finest country in the world. We have immense resources. We want population; we want help; we want hands. Let us people the immense country in the west, let us work hand in hand for the advancement of our country, remembering that we are the descendants of the two greatest nations of the world, remembering that we have a duty to perform in the development of this Dominion; remembering that we owe it to those who shall come after us, to do everything in our power to aggrandize this country and to increase the wealth and improve the condition of the people. If we do this we shall be true to our trust; if we do this we shall show to the people of the world at large that the descendants of dear old France and beloved old England are ready to do their duty under the glorious flag under which we live and under which I hope this Dominion will long remain and greatly prosper.

Motion (Mr. Bertram) agreed to.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved:

That the said Address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General by such members of this House as are of the Privy Council.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved:

That this House will, on Tuesday next, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising a Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved:

That this House will, on Tuesday next, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of a Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved:

That a Select Committee be appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates of this House during the present session, with power to report from time to time; to be composed of Messrs. Beausoleil, Bergeron, Charlton, Choquette, Craig, Davin, Earle, Ellis, Haley, La-Rivière, Monet, Richardson, Scriber, Somerville, and Taylor.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved:

That a Special Committee of five members be appointed to prepare and report with all convenient speed, lists of Members to compose the Select Standing Committees ordered by the House on Thursday the 3rd February instant, to be composed of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Sir Charles Tupper, Sir Richard Cartwright, Sir Adolphe Caron and Sir Louis Davies.

Motion agreed to.

The PRIME MINISTER. There is a motion on the paper which is rather important, but as the day is somewhat advanced, we will defer taking it up until Monday. I beg to move that the House do now adjourn.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 9.05 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 14th February, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

TRANSIT OF GRAINS IN MANITOBA AND THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. DOUGLAS moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 19) to regulate the transit of grains in Manitoba and the North-west Territories. He said: The object of the Bill is to ensure to the people of Manitoba and the North-west Territories the right to ship grain stored in flat warehouses on the lines of the railway, a privilege which they enjoyed up to the end of last year. That privilege in some districts has been removed. We are exceedingly desirous that the privilege should be continued, and the Bill contemplates the continuation of this privilege.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

LAND SURVEYS IN NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

Whether the surveyors of the department have been surveying lands in the North-west? What lands they have surveyed for the year ending 30th June, 1897? What lands they have surveyed from 30th June, 1897, up to the present time? What lands they have surveyed in the neighbourhood of Fort Qu'Appelle?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). 1. Yes. 1 and 2. As the 30th

June is not the close of the year for surveying operations but rather the middle of the surveying season, it is practically impossible to give an accurate answer. The last published report of the Department of the Interior gives detailed information as to surveys made in the calendar year 1896, and the report which is now being prepared for submission to Parliament will contain detailed information as to the surveys made in the season of 1897. No lands were surveyed in the neighbourhood of Fort Qu'Appelle since the 30th June, 1897.

INDIAN RESERVES IN QU'APPELLE DISTRICT.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

What acreage was covered by the Indian reserves in the Qu'Appelle district on the 30th June, 1897? Are the boundaries of the Indian reserves to-day in the Qu'Appelle Valley the same as on the 30th June, 1897? Have lands prior to that date available for the use of settlers been surveyed into reserves? Has the area of hay lands available for the use of settlers been decreased in consequence of such surveys?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). 1. 291,328 acres. 2. Yes. 3. No. 4. No.

CARETAKER AT BATHS, BANFF.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

Whether John Walker was, from, May of 1890 until the 31st July, 1897, in the employ of the Dominion Government as caretaker of the Cave and Basin Baths at Banff? Whether he was dismissed on the latter date? If so dismissed, why?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. John Walker was employed as caretaker of the Cave and Basin baths at Banff from the 2nd May, 1890, to the 31st July, 1897. His services were dispensed with on the 31st July because his method of discharging his duties was not satisfactory.

MEDALS FOR NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

Whether the Minister of Militia has advised that medals be given to the members of the North-west Mounted Police who were engaged in the suppression of the rebellion in 1885?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). The Comptroller of the North-west Mounted Police having applied in April, 1886, for medals for the men of that corps who were under fire during the campaign of 1885, the question was submitted to Council and the medals were awarded by the Imperial authorities. One hundred and sixty-three medals and clasps were delivered to the Comptroller of the North-west Mounted Police on the 15th of September, 1887.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

RECIPROCITY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

Whether any attempts have been made by the Government to obtain from the Government of the United States reciprocity in trade between this country and the United States? If so, what success has attended such attempts?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, informal negotiations have taken place between the British authorities and the United States authorities; not with a view of the reciprocity question alone; but with a view of settling, if possible, all matters now in dispute between Canada and the United States. If my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) will move for the correspondence I will be very glad to place it on the Table of the House.

NORTH-WEST INDIAN RESERVES.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

1. What is the number of Indian reserves in the North-west Territories?
2. What is the number of Indian reserves in Manitoba?
3. What was the object of removing the Indian Commissioner's office from Regina to Winnipeg?

The PRIME MINISTER. 1. 94. 2. 44. 3. The Indian Commissioner reported that he could more conveniently and economically transact his business from Winnipeg, and the object was to accomplish that result.

NORTH-WEST INDIAN SUPPLIES.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

1. Whether any instructions have been given to the officers of the Indian Department in the North-west Territories and Manitoba as to the persons from whom they should purchase supplies and to whom they should give work?
2. If so, through whom were such instructions given, and if given, at whose instance originally were they obtained?

The PRIME MINISTER. 1. Yes. 2. Through the department. I have not been able to ascertain at whose instance originally such instructions were obtained, but they were sent under my direction.

NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

1. What is the number of the North-west Mounted Police at the present time in the North-west Territories?
2. How many have been drafted away to the Yukon?
3. What steps, if any, are being taken to increase the number of the force?

The PRIME MINISTER. 1. The number of police in the Territories, including scouts, dog drivers, and special constables, is 548. 2. The number of police in the Yukon, including scouts, dog drivers and special constables, is 162; total 710. 3. All suitable candidates who apply in person at Regina, are engaged. During the month of January there were about forty applicants, twenty-five of whom were employed on probation. Sixty of the police now in the Territories are under orders to proceed to the Yukon.

EDMONTON AND PRINCE ALBERT ROUTES TO KLONDIKE.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

1. Whether the attention of the Government has been directed to the route via Edmonton and the route via Prince Albert to the Klondike?

2. What opinion has the Government formed as to their feasibility?

3. Whether the Government intends to take any steps to make one or other or both of these routes more available for persons going to the Klondike?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The Government has been directing attention to the question of the route via Edmonton and the route via Prince Albert to the Klondike. For answer to the other two questions, I would refer the hon. member to the Supplementary Estimates, which, when brought down, will show what action the Government has determined upon in this matter.

MAILS AT ST. THOMAS.

Mr. INGRAM asked,

1. Who are the parties that tendered for carrying the mail between St. Thomas Post Office and the railway stations?

2. What was the amount of each tender?

3. Who received the contract?

4. What is the amount the contractor is to receive from the Government?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock) (By the Minister of Agriculture). Tenders for the services referred to, and which are being performed under a contract expiring on the 31st March, 1898, were called for and twenty-two tenders were received. The contract was awarded to the lowest tenderer at the amount of his tender and the matter was placed in the hands of the inspector for the purpose of having the necessary contract executed. The department not having yet been advised as to whether the contract has been executed, it is not advisable at present to give the other particulars asked for but if that portion of the question is renewed after the contract is made, the particulars asked for will be given.

CUSTOMS ON THE YUKON.

Mr. McINNES asked:

1. What are the terms of the agreement recently made at Washington, D.C., between the hon. the Minister of the Interior (representing the Canadian Government) and the Government of the United States, regarding the difficulties of transportation and trade connected with the Yukon gold fields?

2. Has the said agreement been lived up to: (a) By the Canadian Government, (b) By the Government of the United States?

3. Is the Government aware that the United States authorities at Skagway and Dyea continue to compel all purchasers of Canadian goods to take an official escort while crossing the disputed territory—and to pay $6.00 per day for such escort?

4. What steps have been taken by the Government to prevent this intolerable discrimination and otherwise to secure the fulfilment of the said agreement by the United States?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). 1. The arrangement referred to was an unofficial one and consisted of an understanding that regulations should be issued by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, which would render effectual the privilege of bonding Canadian goods over territory in the possession of the United States at Dyea and Skagway, and deal with the navigation by British vessels of the rivers upon the Alaskan coast, the navigation of which is secured by treaty. 2. The regulations respecting the bonding privilege above referred to have been issued, though not yet officially communicated to this Government. 3. The Government is aware that the charges referred to have been levied. 4. It is believed that the new regulations referred to above will prove satisfactory.

G. T. AND O. A. & P. S. RAILWAYS.

Mr. MACLEAN asked,

Whether it is the intention of the Government, under the powers conferred upon them by the Railway Act, to compel the Grand Trunk and Ottawa and Parry Sound Railways to give the public better train connections at Scotia Junction, and to compel the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Pacific Railway to adjust their differences as regards the traffic between Toronto and North Bay, and restore the accommodation that existed on or before January 25th?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The Government realizes the gravity of the situation with regard to traffic arrangements between the railways mentioned in the question by the hon. member, and have been giving the subject very serious consideration; but have not yet concluded as to what course, if any, it is competent for them to take under the powers conferred by the Railway Act.

KINGSTON LOCOMOTIVE WORKS.

Mr. TAYLOR asked,

Has an order been given by the Department of Railways and Canals, or Public Works, to the Kingston Locomotive Works, for locomotives, and if so, at what prices are those to be supplied?

(b.) Were tenders asked for from the Kingston Locomotive Works and other firms as to these locomotives?

(c.) To what parties have letters or telegrams been sent, announcing that such contract had been given to the Kingston Locomotive Works?

(d.) Has any member of the Government sent any such telegrams or letters to either Hon. Mr. Harty or the President of the Liberal Association at Kingston, and if so, at what date?

(e.) Was the purchase of such locomotives authorized by an Order in Council, and if so, what is the date of such Order in Council?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). No order has yet been given by the Department of Railways and Canals to the Kingston Locomotive Works for locomotives. (b.) Tenders have not been recently asked from the Kingston Locomotive Works or other firms. It is the intention, however, of the department, as soon as specifications and plans for a new locomotive have been completed, to open negotiations with the Kingston Works on the subject of the building of some locomotives for the Intercolonial Railway, as the department desires and intends, so far as practicable, to give to a Canadian firm the preference in the manufacture of the locomotives which the Government may require. (c.) No such letter or telegram has been sent as is referred to in this sub-question. (d.) No such telegrams or letters have been sent by any member of the Government as is referred to in this sub-question. (e.) No purchase of locomotives has been authorized by Order in Council.

PAYMENTS OF INTEREST TO QUEBEC AND ONTARIO.

Mr. HENDERSON asked,

1. What is the actual amount of interest paid by the Dominion Government to the Provincial Treasurer of Quebec during the year 1897 ?

2. What was the actual amount of interest paid by the Dominion Government to the Provincial Treasurer of Ontario during the year 1897 ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). (1.) On account of interest on balance of Common School Fund, $5,000. The cheque for this amount was returned by the Quebec Government. (2.) Five per cent interest on $2,394,000, the amount of capital on account of North Shore Railway subsidy per Act 47 Vict., c. 8, $119,700. (3.) Five per cent interest on the amount of capital, $2,549,213.60 granted to the province of Quebec in 1884. This amount, $127,460.68, was entered by the Dominion Government under the heading "Subsidies to Provinces" (Act 47 Vict., c. 4). (4.) On account of interest on Common School and other trust funds, $70,000. (5.) Five per cent interest on $2,848,289.53, the amount of capital granted to the province of Ontario in 1884. This amount, $142,414.48, was entered by the Dominion Government under the heading "Subsidies to Provinces" (Act 47 Vict., c. 4).

DUTY ON BINDER TWINE.

Mr. TAYLOR asked,

Has the Government been urged to re-impose an import duty upon binder twine, and has a definite reply been given to the request, or is the matter still under consideration ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The Government were asked to impose a duty on binder twine. As in the case of other tariff deputations, the parties who made the request were informed that the

Mr. TAYLOR.

Government were not prepared to make a statement as to details of the tariff in advance of the Budget.

ST. HELEN'S ISLAND.

Mr. LEMIEUX (by Mr. Guay) asked,

1. Is it true that the Militia Department intend to set apart a portion of St. Helen's Island to be used exclusively for military purposes ?

2. If so, will the public have free access there to as in the past ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. By an Order in Council of the 3rd June, 1874, the Department of Militia and Defence allowed the corporation of the city of Montreal to use that part of St. Helen's Island which was not occupied for military purposes, on condition that such permission could be withdrawn at the will of the department. During last summer it was found necessary to enlarge the ground thus reserved for the militia, and the fence was accordingly extended so as to embrace a larger area. This was done in conformity with the arrangements of 1874. 2. The public never had access to the portion of the island fenced in for the military, and this rule will continue in force as regards the whole of the land now fenced in as above stated.

LINE OF STEAMERS BETWEEN CANADA AND FRANCE.

Mr. LEMIEUX (translation) (by Mr. Guay) asked :

1. Have proposals been made to the Government for the establishment of a line of steamers between Canada and France ?

2. If so, what is the nature of such proposals ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier.) The Government did receive one or two proposals in that direction. As to the nature of those proposals, I would suggest to my hon. friend to make a motion to that effect.

STOREKEEPER OF LACHINE CANAL.

Mr. QUINN asked,

1. How many persons have been named to the position of storekeeper of Lachine Canal, lately occupied by Michael Bahen, who was dismissed last May ?

2. What are their names ?

3. When was each appointed ?

4. Who is the present incumbent ?

5. Why was the position vacated in each instance ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. Three persons have been named to the position of storekeeper of Lachine Canal lately occupied by Michael Bahen. 2. Their names are Denis Casey, Robert Anderson, Chas. Le Bouthillier. 3. Denis Casey was appointed on the 1st May, 1897. Robert Anderson was appointed on the 8th July, 1897. Chas. Le Bouthillier was appointed on the 30th October, 1897. 4. The present incumbent is Chas. Le Bouthillier. 5. The position was vacated in the case of Denis Casey because he could not keep books properly, and of Robert Anderson because he neglected his duty.

THE GANANOQUE DRILL SHED.

Mr. TAYLOR asked,

(a.) Has the Government removed the drill shed at Gananoque from the site sold to the town for the purpose of a high school ?

(b.) Did the Government give the town a deed of the site for the sum of a thousand dollars ?

(c.) Has the town paid for the said site ; if so, when ?

(d.) Did the Government promise to remove the drill shed within a reasonable time ?

(e.) Is the Government aware that the High School is greatly inconvenienced by the non-removal of the building ?

(f.) Was part of the drill shed taken down to enable the High School building to be erected in 1895 ?

(g.) What disposition was made by the Government of the lumber and timber of that part of the building that was taken down—was it sold by tender—who was the purchaser—how much did the Government get for it—or is the report true that it was given away to one of the Government supporters to repair his wharfs and buildings with ?

(h.) Has the Government rented a warehouse from Mr. C. E. Britton, in which to store the arms and ammunition of the volunteers force ? If so, when, and for how long ? What rent have they agreed to pay for the said warehouse ?

(i.) Has the Government purchased a new drill-shed site from Mr. J. B. Turner ? If so, what price did they pay for it ? How much land does the site contain ?

(j.) Was the said C. E. Britton the defeated candidate for the House of Commons in the general elections of 1882 and 1887 ? Was the said J. B. Turner the defeated candidate for the House of Commons in the general election of 1891 ?

(k.) Was the renting of the warehouse from Mr. Britton and the purchase of the drill-shed site from Mr. Turner, to in part recoup them for their election expenses ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). (a.) Not entirely. A sufficient part has been removed to enable the High School buildings to be erected.

(b.) The title deed in favour of the corporation was sent to Geo. Taylor, Esq., M.P., on the 27th December, 1895, to be transmitted to the corporation. (c.) Yes. By deposit receipt, received 16th November, 1895. (d.) Yes, or rather the town council (on 4th July, 1895) agreed "to permit the remainder of the drill shed to remain on the present site for a reasonable time." (e.) It is stated. The inconvenience is stated, in a letter from the Mayor of Gananoque, dated 28th April, 1897, to be that "the shed stands an unsightly affair and also endangers the school buildings from an insurance point of view." One cause of the delay is that the transfer of the land for the new site was only completed on 13th November last and the removal of the shed was impossible before that was done. The drill shed contained arms and clothing and the removal of these to a temporary armoury was necessary. This could not be fully effected until last month. Mr. J. B. Turner agreed some time previously to pay $200 for remainder of old shed, not already taken down, and to take it down within two weeks of date of purchase of new site. This could not be done until the arms, &c., had been removed from old shed. Mr. Turner has been notified that the shed is now ready for removal.

(f.) Yes, authority telegraphed to Mayor 9th July, 1895. (g.) The council (Mayor's letter of 4th July, 1895) undertook "to take down, and remove and store at our expense" the portion which was to be taken down and to "rebuild a new end to said drill hall for present purposes." Presumably the old materials were in part used to rebuild the new end. Mr. C. E. Britton in a letter dated 21st October, 1897, offered $20 "for that portion of the old drill shed which was torn down and stored inside and outside of the remaining portion" which then remained. On the recommendation of Lieut.-Col. Cotton, A.A.G.A., this offer was accepted. (h.) Yes ; the Government being under obligation to remove the remainder of the old drill shed from the site sold to the town council, in 1895, and the shed not being fit to stand the strain of removal to the new site, it became necessary to secure, temporarily, a suitable building in which to store arms, &c. The Assistant Adjutant General of Artillery recommended, and the Q.M.G. approved of the building selected. Lease dated 20th September, 1897, for one year from 1st October, 1897, with right of renewal. Rent $150 per annum, owner to put up all internal fittings required for arms, ammunition, stores and clothing, which he has done, using the fittings from the old drill shed. (i.) Yes. The lot was selected by the then D.O.C. of the district, now the Assistant Adjutant General of Artillery, and approved by the Q.M.G. as being the best available. The deed is for $2,500. Three lots, frontage of 60 feet each, extending back to the river—size of level portion for building about 180 feet by 95 feet. (j.) I have not inquired. (k.) I am informed by Col. Lake, Q.M.G., that both matters were recommended by the District Officer Commanding and himself without any suggestions from the department, or outside, and without any knowledge of either Mr. Britton's or Mr. Turner's political opinions. From the inception of the negotiations which were begun in 1894-95 between the town council of Gananoque and the late Government, as a result of which the country has been compelled to buy a new site for a drill shed there, one Geo. Taylor, of Gananoque, seems to have taken an active part therein. In the autumn of 1896, said Taylor strongly urged the purchase of the J. B. Turner lots, claiming that the late Government had, through a former Minister of Militia, committed the country to the purchase. He requested me to write to His Honour the Governor of Manitoba—who was the former Minister referred to—for confirmation of his statement, which I did, and, in reply, received a practical confirmation of said Taylor's statement. In view of said Taylor's presumably intimate knowledge of the matter I respectfully refer the member for South Leeds to the said George Taylor for information as to what disposition Mr. J. B. Turner may have made of the purchase money received by him. For the further information of the House I will read a letter just received from the aforesaid J. B. Turner :

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call your attention to the fact that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) is reading, in the way of reprisal, a lot of information, for which he was not asked. I wish to ask you, Sir, whether that is perfectly in order or not ?

The SPEAKER. There is no doubt that answers to questions must be upon the question asked. This is a very long series of questions, and it is very difficult for one to decide, what is or what is not bearing upon the matter. There is a rule, repeated over and over again in the authorities, which allows Ministers of the Crown more latitude in answering a question than would be allowed to a private member. I hope the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) will confine himself as far as possible to the question.

Mr. FOSTER. May I be allowed to say, Mr. Speaker, that that course may be persisted in, but there is an opportunity for reprisal on this side of the House.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). In view of the question put, and in view of the statements I have made, no one can deny that the answer I have made is entirely pertinent ; I am not able to say that the question is pertinent. The following is the letter :

Gananoque, Feb. 12, 1898.

Hon. F. W. Borden,
Minister of Militia,
Ottawa.

Sir,—In reference to Mr. Taylor's questions in regard to who I am, and in relation to the price paid for the drill shed site purchased from me by your Government, I beg to inform you that Mr. Taylor agreed to recommend the late Government to purchase the same site for the same purpose, for the sum of six thousand dollars ($6,000), and he informed me that the Hon. Mr. Patterson, now Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba and late Minister of Militia, wired from Winnipeg to the present Government that he had recommended the purchase of the same site for the drill shed ; all of this can be proved by the most positive evidence. I think it only right that you should be placed in possession of this information, and will be glad to substantiate it by further evidence, if necessary.

I have the honour to be,
Your obedient servant,
J. B. TURNER.

Mr. BORDEN (King's).

PLACER MINING AND TIMBER LICENCES IN THE YUKON.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

1. To whom have permits, licenses or leases for timber lands in the Yukon district been granted by the Government, and what quantity to each, and the amount paid therefor ?
2. To what persons or corporations have leases, licenses or permits been granted by the Government for placer mining or dredging for gold, and what is the extent of ground covered, and the fees paid in each case ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). 1. On the 5th April, 1897, the agent of the department at Dawson City was authorized to issue a permit to Messrs. Harper & Ladue to cut timber at $2.50 per thousand feet, B.M., but the department has not yet been advised whether such permit was issued. No other permits, licenses or leases for timber lands in the Yukon district have yet been granted, but timber berths have been disposed of by public tender, and the following statement shows who have so secured them, the amount paid therefor and the area :

Name.	Bonus.	Area.
A. S. Cross.....	$1,009 60	5 sq. miles.
A. McLean.....	1,001 65	do
E. Vachon	1,005 50	do
G. S. McConnell.....	897 46	do
The Klondike Trading & Transportation Co. . .	200 00	do
J. I. Johnson.....	921 25	do
H. Domville.....	1,105 35	do
J. R. Perry.....	1,109 75	do
A. S. Kerry.....	505 00	do

In addition to the bonus, dues are to be charged at the rate of $2 per thousand feet, B.M., on the timber cut. 2. No licenses, leases or permits have yet been issued for dredging for gold in the Yukon district, but an application from Mr. Robert Anderson for an hydraulic mining location on Hunker Creek was, on the recommendation of the Gold Commissioner, entertained, and authority was granted by Order in Council of the 12th January last for the issue in favour of Mr. Anderson of a lease covering a strip two and one-half miles long by one-half mile wide. The fees to be paid consist of a rental of $500 per annum, and a royalty of 10 per cent on the output of gold after it exceeds $20,000. It may be added that since Mr. Anderson's application was dealt with by Order in Council, regulations have been made as to dredging leases. Several applications are now before the department and will be dealt with under these regulations. As the granting of placer mining claims in the Yukon district is in the hands of the Gold Commissioner at Dawson City, it is impossible to state what persons or corporations may hold the same, what is the extent of the ground covered or the fees paid; but I shall hand to the Clerk of the House a duplicate of the only return received from the Gold Commissioner, and a copy of the regulations under which he acted in reference to the mining locations referred to in such return.

Mr. FOSTER. Will that be printed in "Hansard"?

The PRIME MINISTER. I have no objection that it should be printed in "Hansard."

The following is the return from the Gold Commissioner above referred to by the Prime Minister:—

REGULATIONS GOVERNING PLACER MINING ALONG THE YUKON RIVER AND ITS TRIBUTARIES IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

(Approved by Order in Council No. 1189, of 21st
May, 1897, as amended.)

Interpretation.

"Bar diggings" shall mean any part of a river over which the water extends when the water is in its flooded state, and which is not covered at low water.

Mines on benches shall be known as "bench diggings" and shall for the purpose of defining the size of such claims be excepted from dry diggings.

"Dry diggings" shall mean any mine over which a river never extends.

"Miner" shall mean a male or female over the age of eighteen but not under that age.

"Claim" shall mean the personal right of property in a placer mine or diggings during the time for which the grant of such mine or diggings is made.

"Legal post" shall mean a stake standing not less than four feet above the ground and squared on four sides for at least one foot from the top. Both sides so squared shall measure at least four inches across the face. It shall also mean any stump or tree cut off and squared or faced to the above height and size.

"Close season" shall mean the period of the year during which placer mining is generally suspended. The period to be fixed by the Gold Commissioner in whose district the claim is situated.

"Locality" shall mean the territory along a river (tributary of the Yukon River) and its affluents.

"Mineral" shall include all minerals whatsoever other than coal

Nature and Size of Claim.

1. "Bar diggings," a strip of land 100 feet wide at high-water mark, and thence extending into the river to its lowest water level.

2. The sides of a claim for bar digging shall be two parallel lines run as nearly as possible at right angles to the stream and shall be marked by four legal posts, one at each end of the claim at or about high-water mark, also one at each end of the claim at or about the edge of the water. One of the posts at high-water mark shall be legibly marked with the name of the miner and the date upon which the claim was staked.

3. Dry diggings shall be 100 feet square and shall have placed at each of its four corners a legal post upon one of which shall be legibly marked the name of the miner and the date upon which the claim was staked.

4. Creek and river claims shall be 500 feet long measured in the direction of the general course of the stream, and shall extend in width from base to base of the hill or bench on each side, but when the hills or benches are less than 100 feet apart, the claim may be 100 feet in depth. The sides of a claim shall be two parallel lines run as nearly as possible at right angles to the stream. The sides shall be marked with legal posts at or about the edge of the water and at the rear boundaries of the claim. One of the legal posts at the stream shall be legibly marked with the name of the miner and the date upon which the claim was staked.

5. A bench claim shall be 100 feet square, and shall have placed at each of its four corners a legal post upon which shall be legibly marked the name of the miner and the date upon which the claim was staked.

6. Entry shall only be granted for alternate claims, the other alternate claims being reserved for the Crown to be disposed of at public auction, or in such manner as may be decided by the Minister of the Interior.

The penalty for trespassing upon a claim reserved for the Crown shall be immediate cancellation by the Gold Commissioner of any entry or entries which the person trespassing may have obtained, whether by original entry or purchase, for a mining claim, and the refusal by the Gold Commissioner of the acceptance of any application which the person trespassing may at any time make for a claim. In addition to such penalty, the mounted police, upon a requisition from the Gold Commissioner to that effect, shall take the necessary steps to eject the trespasser.

7. In defining the sizes of claims they shall be measured horizontally irrespective of inequalities on the surface of the ground.

8. If any person or persons shall discover a new mine and such discovery shall be established to the satisfaction of the Gold Commissioner, a creek and river claim 750 feet in length may be granted.

A new stratum of auriferous earth or gravel situated in a locality where the claims are abandoned shall for this purpose be deemed a new mine, although the same locality shall have been previously worked at a different level.

9. The forms of application for a grant for placer mining and the grant of the same shall be those contained in forms "H" and "I" in the schedule hereto.

10. A claim shall be recorded with the Gold Commissioner in whose district it is situated within three days after the location thereof if it is located within ten miles of the Commissioner's office. One extra day shall be allowed for making such record for every additional ten miles or fraction thereof.

11. In the event of the absence of the Gold Commissioner from his office, entry for a claim may be granted by any person whom he may appoint to perform his duties in his absence.

12. Entry shall not be granted for a claim which has not been staked by the applicant in person in the manner specified in these regulations. An affidavit that the claim was staked out by the applicant shall be embodied in form "H" of the schedule hereto.

13. An entry fee of $15.00 shall be charged the first year, and an annual fee of $100.00 for each of the following years. This provision shall apply to locations for which entries have already been granted.

14. A royalty of ten per cent on the gold mined shall be levied and collected by officers to be appointed for the purpose, provided the amount so mined and taken from a single claim does not exceed five hundred dollars per week. In case the amount mined and taken from any single claim exceeds five hundred dollars per week, there shall be levied and collected a royalty of ten per cent upon the amount so taken out up to five hundred dollars, and upon the excess, or amount taken from any single claim over five hundred dollars per week, there shall be levied and collected a royalty of twenty per cent, such royalty to form part of the Consolidated Revenue, and to be accounted for by the officers who collect the same in due course. The time and manner in which such royalty shall be collected, and the persons who shall collect the same, shall be provided for by regulations to be made by the Gold Commissioner.

Default in payment of such royalty, if continued for ten days after notice has been posted upon the claim in respect of which it is demanded, or in the vicinity of such claim, by the Gold Commissioner or his agent, shall be followed by cancellation of the claim. Any attempt to defraud the Crown by withholding any part of the revenue thus provided for, by making false statements of the amount taken out, shall be punished by cancellation of the claim in respect of which fraud or false statements have been committed or made. In respect of the facts as to such fraud or false statements or non-payment of royalty, the decision of the Gold Commissioner shall be final.

15. After the recording of a claim the removal of any post by the holder thereof or by any person acting in his behalf for the purpose of changing the boundaries of his claim shall act as a forfeiture of the claim.

16. The entry of every holder of a grant for placer mining must be renewed and his receipt relinquished and replaced every year, the entry fee being paid each time.

17. No miner shall receive a grant of more than one mining claim in the same locality, but the same miner may hold any number of claims by purchase, and any number of miners may unite to work their claims in common upon such terms as they may arrange, provided such agreement be registered with the Gold Commissioner and a fee of five dollars paid for each registration.

18. Any miner or miners may sell, mortgage, or dispose of his or their claims, provided such disposal be registered with, and a fee of two dollars paid to the Gold Commissioner, who shall thereupon give the assignee a certificate in form "J" in the schedule hereto.

19. Every miner shall, during the continuance of his grant have the exclusive right of entry upon his own claim, for the miner-like working thereof, and the construction of a residence thereon, and shall be entitled exclusively to all the proceeds realized therefrom, upon which, however, the royalty prescribed by clause 14 of these regulations shall be payable; but he shall have no surface rights therein; and the Gold Commissioner may grant to the holders of adjacent claims such right of entry thereon as may be absolutely necessary for the working of their claims, upon such terms as may to him seem reasonable. He may also grant permits to miners to cut timber thereon for their own use, upon payment of the dues prescribed by the regulations in that behalf.

20. Every miner shall be entitled to the use of so much of the water naturally flowing through or past his claim, and not already lawfully appropriated, as shall, in the opinion of the Gold Commissioner be necessary for the due working thereof; and shall be entitled to drain his own claim free of charge.

21. A claim shall be deemed to be abandoned and open to occupation and entry by any person when the same shall have remained unworked on working days by the grantee thereof or by some person on his behalf for the space of *seventy-two hours, unless sickness or other reasonable cause be shown to the satisfaction of the Gold Commissioner or unless the grantee is absent on leave given by the Commissioner, and the Gold Commissioner upon obtaining evidence satisfactory to himself that this provision is not being complied with may cancel the entry given for a claim.

22. If the land upon which a claim has been located is not the property of the Crown it will be necessary for the person who applied for entry to furnish proof that he has acquired from the owner of the land the surface rights before entry can be granted.

23. If the occupier of the lands has not received a patent therefor, the purchase money of the surface rights must be paid to the Crown, and a patent of the surface rights will issue to the party who acquired the mining rights. The money so collected will either be refunded to the occupier of the land, when he is entitled to a patent therefor, or will be credited to him on account of payment for land.

24. When the party obtaining the mining rights to lands cannot make an arrangement with the owner or his agent or the occupant thereof for the acquisition of the surface rights, it shall be lawful for him to give notice to the owner or his agent or the occupier to appoint an arbitrator to act with another arbitrator named by him, in order to award the amount of compensation to which the owner or occupant shall be entitled. The notice mentioned in this section shall be according to a form to be obtained upon application from the Gold Commissioner for the district in which the lands in question lie, and shall, when practicable, be personally served on such owner, or his agent if known, or occupant; and after reasonable efforts have been made to effect personal service, without success, then such notice shall be served by leaving it at, or sending by registered letter to, the last place of abode of the owner, agent or occupant. Such notice shall be served upon the owner, or agent, within a period to be fixed by the Gold Commissioner before the expiration of the time limited in such notice. If the proprietor refuses or declines to appoint an arbitrator, or when, for any other reason, no arbitrator is appointed by the proprietor in the time limited therefor in the notice provided for by this section, the Gold Commissioner for the district in which the lands in question lie shall on being satisfied by affidavit that such notice has come to the knowledge of such owner, agent or occupant, or that such owner, agent or occupant willfully evades the service of such notice, or cannot be found, and that reasonable efforts have been made to effect such service, and that the notice was left at the last place of abode of such owner, agent or occupant, appoint an arbitrator on his behalf.

25. (a.) All the arbitrators appointed under the authority of these regulations shall be sworn before a justice of the peace to the impartial discharge of the duties assigned to them, and they shall forthwith proceed to estimate the reasonable damages which the owner or occupants of such lands, according to their several interests therein, shall sustain by reason of such prospecting and mining operations.

(b.) In estimating such damages, the arbitrators shall determine the value of the land irrespective of any enhancement thereof from the existence of minerals therein.

(c.) In case such arbitrators cannot agree, they may select a third arbitrator, and when the two arbitrators cannot agree upon a third arbitrator the Gold Commissioner for the district in which the lands in question lie shall select such third arbitrator.

(d.) The award of any two of such arbitrators made in writing shall be final, and shall be filed with the Gold Commissioner for the district in which the lands lie.

If any cases arise for which no provision is made in these regulations, the provisions of the regulations governing the disposal of mineral lands other than coal lands approved by His Excellency the Governor in Council on the 9th of November, 1889, shall apply.

FORM H.—APPLICATION FOR GRANT FOR PLACER MINING AND AFFIDAVIT OF APPLICANT.

I (or we) _____ of _____ hereby apply, under the Dominion Mining Regulations for a grant of a claim for placer mining as defined in the said regulations, in (here describe locality) and I (or we) solemnly swear:

1. That I (or we) have discovered therein a deposit of (here name the metal or mineral).

2. That I (or we) am (or are) to the best of my (or our) knowledge and belief, the first discoverer (or discoverers) of the said deposit; or:

3. That the said claim was previously granted to (here name the last grantee), but has remained unworked by the said grantee for not less than _____

4. That I (or we) am (or are) unaware that the land is other than vacant Dominion land.

5. That I (or we) did, on the _____ day of _____ mark out on the ground, in accordance in every particular with the provisions of the mining regulations for the Yukon River and its tributaries, the claim for which I (or we) make this application, and that in so doing I (or we) did not encroach on any other claim or mining location previously laid out by any other person.

6. That the said claim contains, as nearly as I (or we) could measure or estimate, an area of _____ square feet, and that the description (and sketch, if any) of this date hereto attached, signed by me (or us), sets (or set) forth in detail, to the best of my (or our) knowledge and ability, its position, form and dimensions.

7. That I (or we) make this application in good faith, to acquire the claim for the sole purpose of mining, to be prosecuted by myself (or us) or by myself and associates, or by my (or our) assigns.

Sworn before me at _____ this _____ day of _____ 18 _____ .

The rights hereby granted are those laid down in the Dominion Mining Regulations, and no more, and are subject to all the provisions of the said regulations, whether the same are expressed herein or not.

Gold Commissioner.

N.B.—The provisions of these regulations are liable to be changed at any time. Copies of the latest regulations may be obtained by applying to the Department of the Interior, Ottawa, Ontario; or to the Gold Commissioner at Cudahy, Yukon District, North-west Territories.

DRUMMOND COUNTY RAILWAY.

Mr. FOSTER asked,

1. When does the Government propose to commence through traffic from Montreal over the Grand Trunk Railway and the Drummond County Railway, in connection with the Intercolonial Railway?

2. What new officials have been appointed by the Minister of Railways with a view to traffic by the above route? What is the salary of each and the date of his appointment?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The Government proposes, and has great hopes that it will be able, to commence through traffic from Montreal over the Grand Trunk Railway and the Drummond County Railway, in connection with the Intercolonial Railway, on the 1st March, 1899.

The following new officials have been appointed with a view to traffic by the above route:—

A. H. Harris, general traffic manager, 1st December, 1898.....	$5,000
T. H. Underwood, chief clerk, 1st January, 1898.....	900
T. B. Odell, clerk, 1st January, 1898.....	600
J. A. Ryan, messenger, 1st January, 1898.	120
James Hardwell, division freight agent, Montreal, 1st January, 1898.....	2,000
F. W. Thompson, clerk, 1st January, 1898	800
— McKillop, messenger, 1st January, 1898	120
J. B. Lambkin, district passenger agent, Montreal, 1st January, 1898.....	1,400

Savings have been effected in the offices at Toronto, Montreal, Quebec, Halifax and St. John which about equalize the salaries, rentals, &c., now in effect, that is to say, the traffic department of the Government railways system is being modernized without increasing the cost to the railway.

Mr. FOSTER. Thanks for the additional information.

LIQUOR PERMITS IN THE YUKON.

Mr. FOSTER asked,

Does the Government of Canada assume and exercise the right to grant permits for the sale of liquors in the Yukon district?

If so, to whom have permits for this purpose been granted, for what quantities, and for what consideration in such case?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Under the North-west Territories Act, the right to grant permits for taking liquor into the North-west Territories, of which the Yukon district is at present a part, is conferred upon the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories.

Prior to the assumption of office by the present Government an arrangement had been made by which the Lieutenant-Governor issued permits for the Yukon district only upon the request of the Minister of the Interior. This practice has continued up to the present time. From a communication received from the Premier of the North-west Territories, it appears that the Governor of the North-west Territories now claims that under the amended constitution of the Territories the right of the Lieutenant-Governor to issue permits should only be exercised on the advice of his Ministers. The question remains in abeyance for the present and no permits are being issued.

2. If the hon. gentleman will state within what period of time he desires the information asked for in the last clause of his question, a return will be prepared giving the information.

COPYRIGHT IN CANADA.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (by Mr. Foster) asked,

1. What position is the question of the powers of the Canadian Parliament respecting copyright in Canada now in?

2. Does the Government propose to introduce any legislation upon this subject during this session.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). 1. In March, 1895, Her Majesty's Government suggested to the Canadian Government that so soon as convenient one of the Canadian Ministers, or some other gentleman duly authorized by them and fully conversant with the subject, should go to England and discuss the matter personally with Her Majesty's Government. In accordance with the suggestion Mr. Newcombe, the Deputy Minister of Justice, was authorized on behalf of the Canadian Government to proceed to London and confer with Her Majesty's Government on the subject. He did so in the summer of 1895, and reported the result of the conference to the Canadian Government. No action has yet been taken upon the report. 2. The Government has not decided to introduce any legislation during the present session.

ALIEN LABOUR ACT.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

Has the Attorney General of Canada consented to institute any prosecutions under the Alien Labour Act (60-61 Vic., chap. 11)?

Has the Attorney General of Canada caused any person or persons coming into Canada, contrary to the prohibition of the Act, to be taken into custody and returned to the country whence he came?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). W. F. McCreary, of Winnipeg, was on 23rd of July, 1897, authorized by the Minister of Justice at that time to institute proceedings under 60-61 Victoria, chapter 11, and prosecutions for violation thereof, and to authorize such proceedings and prosecutions when he deemed it advisable so to do. Agents were also appointed in other parts of Canada who were instructed in case the United States authorities were enforcing their law with respect to aliens as against Canadians upon the adjoining boundary, to report to the department cases of violation of the Canadian law in the same locality, and to take proceedings where directed by the department. No persons have been taken into custody by the Attorney General and returned to the country whence they came.

TIMBER LIMITS IN YUKON DISTRICT.

Mr. DAVIN. The first three questions of which I had given notice have already been answered. I would, however, ask the others, as follows:—

Whether H. Domville has had timber limits granted him on Lake Labarge or elsewhere in the Yukon?

If timber limits granted to H. Domville, is this grantee related to the hon. member for King's, N.B.?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The name of H. Domville is included in the names I have just given. The department is not in a position to state whether he is or is not related to the hon. member for King's.

MR. WHITE, EX-DEPUTY POSTMASTER GENERAL.

Mr. BENNETT asked,

Is W. H. Griffin, whose place of residence is given as England, and superannuation allowance $2,239.92 per annum in the Auditor General's Report, a former Deputy Postmaster General of Canada? Is Wm. White, formerly Deputy Postmaster General, now in receipt of a superannuation allowance? If so, when did the same commence, and what is the annual allowance as such? Is the said Wm. White still in the employ of the Post Office Department of Canada, or has he been since the date of his superannuation (if he has been superannuated), and if so, what have been his emoluments in addition to his retiring allowance? If still in the employ of the said department, how much longer is it intended to continue his services?

What is the salary of the present Deputy Postmaster General Coulter ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). Mr. W. H. Griffin, at one time Deputy Postmaster General of Canada, was superannuated on the 1st July, 1888, by the Government of that day. Mr. Wm. White, formerly Deputy Postmaster General, after service in the Imperial and Canadian Post Office Departments for over fifty-one years, was superannuated at the statutory allowance of $2,240, commencing on the 1st of August last. Since his superannuation he was employed to inaugurate the system of case examination of railway mail clerks throughout Canada as authorized by the Post Office Act of last session, and conducted such examinations in the various provinces of Canada. In this work he was engaged in all seventy-seven days, for which he was allowed in full all travelling and other expenses and charged the sum of $460.50. On the 29th December, 1897, Mr. White had completed the duties so assigned to him. He may be called upon to conduct future examinations.

The salary of the Deputy Postmaster General is $3,200 a year.

GRAIN TRADE AT FORT WILLIAM.

Mr. DOUGLAS asked,

Will the Department of Inland Revenue furnish the House with a detailed statement of the grain trade at Fort William, giving the number of bushels of wheat under each particular grade received into the elevator under the supervision of the Government inspector, and the number of bushels passing out under each particular grade under the same supervision ?

Does the inspector at that point furnish the department with an annual detailed statement of the same ? If not, why not ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). Instructions have been sent to the Government Inspector at Fort William to prepare at once the detailed statement asked for. The present regulations of the department do not call for all the information now asked for, but only for monthly statement of the grain received into the elevators, but not for the grain passing out of them.

TRANSIT OF CATTLE EXPORTED.

Mr. MACLEAN asked,

Is it the intention of the Minister of Agriculture to publish the report of George S. Macdonald or any other agent of the Government appointed to inquire into the defective accommodation provided for the ocean transit of cattle exported from Canadian ports ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). It is not the intention of the Minister of Agriculture to publish the report referred to ; but it will be available for the inspection of any member of the House who wishes to see it.

Mr. BENNETT.

WHARF AT POINT CLAIRE.

Mr. MONK asked,

1. Has the Government called for tenders in regard to the construction of a wharf at Point Claire, to defray the expenses of which a sum of $4,000 was voted last session ?

2. Is it the intention of the Government to proceed with the construction of said wharf this year ?

3. If not, why not ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows :—1. No. 2. The matter of the site is now under consideration.

FLOODS AT STE. GENEVIEVE.

Mr. MONK asked,

1. Has the Government made any investigation as to the cause of the yearly floods caused by the Ottawa River at Ste. Geneviève, in the county of Jacques Cartier, and alleged to be due to public works executed by the Government on the river ?

2. What is the result of such investigation, if any has been made ?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to erect a dam upon the river-side at Ste. Geneviève ?

4. Is it the intention of the Government to undertake any work in this connection this year ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The Department of Public Works has caused an examination to be made by one of its engineers in reference to the steps that might be taken to prevent the recurrence of floods complained of at Ste. Geneviève, and the whole matter is now under the consideration of the department.

RIVER ST. PIERRE WORKS.

Mr. MONK asked,

1. Has the Government called for tenders in connection with the works on River St. Pierre, along the Lachine Canal, for which a sum of $40,000 was voted last session ?

2. Is it the intention of the Government to proceed with said works this year ?

3. Will the dredging, cleaning and widening of River St. Pierre be carried on the whole length of the river, and if not, then up to what point ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. The Government have not called for tenders in connection with the works on the River St. Pierre along the Lachine Canal, for which $40,000 was voted. 2. The Government have been endeavouring to arrange to proceed with the work, but the municipalities through which the river runs object. 3. It is proposed to deepen the river where necessary from the mouth of the culvert under the canal to the mouth of the canal.

NEW ENGINES FOR THE INTERCOLONIAL.

Mr. GILLIES asked,

1. How many engines have been purchased by the Government in Philadelphia or elsewhere during 1897 ?

2. From whom was each engine purchased? Who were the makers thereof, and in what year were they built?

3. What were the prices paid to the vendor of each engine?

4. What was the cost of each when delivered on the Intercolonial or other Government railways in Canada?

5. Upon what officer's recommendation was each of said engines purchased?

6. Did one of said engines come to Montreal on its way to the Intercolonial? and was it sent to Moncton from Montreal by way of the Canadian Pacific Railway? If so, why was it not sent by way of the Grand Trunk and Intercolonial to Moncton?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. Two engines were purchased in Philadelphia by the Government in 1897 as models for future construction, one being a compound cylinder, the other a single expansion. 2. The engines were purchased from Burnham, Williams & Company, Philadelphia, who were the makers of the engines. 3. One of the engines was built in 1892, and the other engine was built in 1897. 4. The price paid to the vendors for the engines was $10,000 each. 5. The cost of each engine when delivered on the Intercolonial Railway was $10,000. 6. These two engines were purchased on the recommendation of the general manager of the Canadian Government Railways, and after inspection thereof by an expert mechanical engineer on behalf of the department. 7. One of the engines came to Montreal by the Canadian Pacific Railway. It was sent to St. John by way of the Canadian Pacific Railway because it was more convenient to send it that way than by the Grand Trunk and Intercolonial Railways to Moncton.

NEW RAILWAY STATION AT MONCTON.

Mr. POWELL (by Mr. Gillies) asked,

1. What was the total amount paid to the first of February instant for the construction of the new railway station at Moncton, and for alterations and improvements in Moncton station yard?

2. How much of the expenditure in connection with such construction was charged to current expenditure and how much to capital account?

3. What expenditures have been made in connection with the plumbing and heating apparatus for the new station at Moncton?

4. Has the work of plumbing and heating apparatus been done by day's work or by contract? If by contract, was the contract let by tender, and if so, to whom and for what amount? If the work was not let by tender, who was the contractor and what was the amount of the contract?

5. Did the contractor for the station building at Moncton tender for the work of plumbing, and if so, what was the amount of his tender?

6. If the work of plumbing and putting in the heating apparatus in the Moncton railway station is being done by day's work, who has charge of the work or under whose direction it is being done?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. The total amount to 1st February, 1898, for construction of the new station and for alterations and improvements in station yard at Moncton was $91,348.32. 2. The whole $91,348.32 was charged to capital. 3. The expenditure made in connection with the plumbing and heating apparatus for the new station has been $3,181. 4 and 5. The work of plumbing and heating apparatus is not being done by day's labour, but by contract. The contract was let by tender. The contract was first made with James Doody. It was subsequently cancelled, new tenders were invited and the contract awarded to McManus & Co. at $8,277. 6. The plumbing and heating is not being done by day's labour but by contract under charge of Mr. W. B. Mackenzie, chief engineer.

BRAKESMEN ON THE INTERCOLONIAL

Mr. BELL (by Mr. Borden, Halifax) asked,

1. Has the number of brakemen on the Intercolonial Railway trains been reduced? If so, upon what trains and why was the reduction made?

2. Are further reductions in the number of brakemen contemplated? And what number of brakemen is it the policy of the Railway Department to allot to each passenger train?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Yes, the number of brakemen on the Intercolonial Railway has been reduced, upon the following trains:—Nos. 1, 2, 19, 20, 25, 26, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 41, 42, 49, 50, 55 and 56. These reductions were made on account of the business being dull. No further reductions in the number of brakemen is contemplated. It is the policy of the railway to allot to each passenger train as many brakemen as the business of the road requires from time to time.

DR. ROUGHSEGE AND GOLD PERMITS.

Mr. MACLEAN asked,

1. Has the Government given a permit to Dr. Roughsedge, of Edmonton, or a company represented by him, to dredge for gold in the Peace River or any of the rivers in the North-west Territories?

2. If so, to what area does said permit apply, and what revenue is to be paid to the Government?

3. Were tenders invited for the privilege accorded to Dr. Roughsedge?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). 1. A lease to dredge for minerals in a portion of the Peace River has been issued to Dr. Roughsedge, of Edmonton, but not to a company represented by him. 2. The length of the river leased is five miles. The rental is $50 yearly, for each dredge to be used. The lessee shall also pay to the Crown a royalty of two and one-half per cent on the output after it exceeds $10,000. 3. Tenders were not invited. The lease was issued under the regulations.

APPOINTMENT OF MAJOR WALSH.

Mr. MACLEAN asked,

1. What is the date of the appointment of Major Walsh, Administrator of the Yukon district?
2. For what period is the appointment made?
3. What instructions are given to Major Walsh in his capacity as Administrator?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). 1. 15th August, 1897. 2. No specified period. 3. Instructions are contained in Order in Council, which may be moved for in the usual way.

Mr. FOSTER. Will that order be laid on the Table of the House?

The PRIME MINISTER. If so desired.

LOBSTER FISHING IN BAY OF FUNDY.

Mr. COPP (by Mr. Logan) asked,

1. Does the Government intend making a regulation prohibiting the taking of lobsters less than 10½ inches long in the Bay of Fundy?
2. If so, when will it come into force?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). 1. The Department of Marine and Fisheries has considered the necessity of increasing the 9-inch size limit for lobsters to 10½ inches in the Bay of Fundy and favours the change, but has not yet made a recommendation to Council. 2. In any event the measure would not come into force before 1st January, 1899, but ample notice will be given to all interested parties, if the change is made.

GRANTS OF LAND TO COLONIZATION COMPANIES.

Mr. DOUGLAS asked,

What were the conditions on which public lands in the North-west Territories were handed over to the various colonization companies—such as the Commercial Colonization Company, the York Colonization Company, Montreal Colonization Company, the North-west Land Company, &c.?

On what principle were they allowed to tax the settlers with a double price for the lands under their control?

How many acres of said lands have now been abandoned to worse than waste?

Is the Government prepared to take any steps to have these abandoned lands thrown open again for settlement? If so, when?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). 1. The odd-numbered sections within the tract were to be sold to the company, or party, undertaking to colonize it at $2 per acre, payable one-fifth in cash at the time of entering into the contract and the balance in four equal annual instalments, and also to pay the Government five cents per acre for the survey of land, payable in four equal annual instalments, all with interest at 6 per cent per annum. They were obliged within five years from the date of contract to colonize, such colonization to consist of placing two settlers on each even-numbered section and also two on each odd-numbered section. Subsequently it was found that little progress was being made by the companies, and in order to protect themselves for the money paid on account, which amounted in some cases to simply the first payment and in others to only a little more than that, the Government entered into an arrangement by which the companies were given patents for lands at $2 per acre, covering the amount paid in by them on account of their purchases, the balance of land reverting to the Crown. In a number of instances in this settlement the companies received lands not only for the amount of money paid in by them on account of purchases, but in the calculation to ascertain the amount of land to which they would be entitled was included $160 for each settler placed upon lands by the companies and also the amount of money expended by them on roads, bridges, &c., within their tract. In some cases the Government allowed companies to take scrip instead of lands to cover the amount. 2. The department appears to have no control of the companies as to the price charged the settlers for lands which has passed to the companies. 3. There is no record as to the waste lands. All lands abandoned by the company reverted to the Crown. 4. The abandoned lands are open now and have been for years past, excepting portions which have been set apart for railway subsidies.

APPOINTMENTS TO MAJOR WALSH'S FORCE.

Mr. FOSTER asked,

1. How many mounted police were in the Yukon district prior to Major Walsh's appointment?
2. What is the monthly cost per man?
3. How many have been added since, either now being in the mining districts of the Yukon or on the way thither?
4. What amount of money has been expended on the whole force included in the above two clauses—for wages and transport from July 1, 1897, to date?
5. What officials under pay of the Government are at present in or on the way to the Yukon district—and the yearly pay of each man, not including mounted police?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). 1. Twenty-four. 2. Approximately, $125. 3. One hundred and sixty. 4. Approximately, $130,000, including transport of provisions for all Government officials in the Yukon, and for relief of distress.

List of officials under pay of the Government by the Department of the Interior at present in or on the way to the Yukon District, and yearly pay of each.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask my right hon. friend if there is, outside the salary, any allowance for rations or travelling expenses ?

The PRIME MINISTER. I am not prepared to give an answer now, but I will give it at an early day.

TIMBER BERTHS, DISTRICT OF SASKATCHEWAN.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

1. What number of timber berths are held by the Moore and McDowall Company, Limited, north of the north branch of the Saskatchewan River, in the District of Saskatchewan ?
2. Have all ground rents due on said berths been paid ?
3. Have all moneys due to the Government for royalty on timber cut and manufactured been paid ?
4. Has the company a mill in operation as required by the regulations ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). 1. The Moore & Macdowall Co., Ltd., held under license eight timber berths comprising an area of 265.43 square miles, but the company has assigned them to Mr. Geo. Burn, of Ottawa. 2. All rents on said berths have been paid up to the 31st December, 1898. 3. All moneys due to the Government for royalty on timber manufactured and sold have been paid up to the 30th June, 1896. 4. The company has not a mill in operation, but Mr. Burn has advised the department that negotiations are nearly completed for the purchase of the saw-mill formerly operated by the company, and that this mill will probably be in operation in the near future.

DREDGING IN TORONTO HARBOUR.

Mr. CLARKE asked,

1. What sum was expended by the Government in 1896 and 1897, respectively, for dredging in connection with the works for the protection of Toronto harbour ?
2. Was the work of dredging awarded each year by public tender ?
3. What was the price paid per yard for dredging in 1896 and in 1897, respectively ?
4. Name and address of the person or persons by whom the work of dredging was done in each year ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. Nothing expended in 1896 for dredging in Toronto harbour. In 1897 the sum of $5,310.26 was expended. 2. The work was not awarded by public tender. 3. The price paid the contractor was at the usual rate paid by the department for work of that kind, namely, $8 per hour actual working time. The contractor worked from the 29th June to the 26th November dredging 37,214 cubic yards, the cost per cubic yard being 14½ cents. 4. W. E. Phin, Brantford, Ont.

LAND GRANTS TO RAILWAYS IN MANITOBA AND THE N.W.T.

Mr. CHARLTON asked,

How many acres of land have been granted to railway corporations in Manitoba and the Canadian North-west Territories up to the 1st of January, 1898 ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The total area pledged is 39,725,130 acres. The total area earned by construction is 28,406,090 acres.

EXPLORATIONS OF PASSES IN THE YUKON.

Mr. FOSTER asked,

What explorers and engineers have been sent out by the Government to investigate the condition of the routes and passes from the Pacific into the Yukon ; what is the date of the departure of each from Ottawa, and the date of their leaving Victoria or Vancouver for the north ; when did they reach these points on their return, and at what time did the Government receive each report ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Arthur St. Cyr, D.L.S., J. J. McArthur, D.L.S., W. T. Jennings, C.E., Morley Ogilvie, C.E. (assistant to Mr. Jennings), A. B. Ross (assistant to Mr. Jen-ings), and J. F. Richardson, of the Canadian Pacific Railway Telegraph Service. Mr. St. Cyr did not go direct from Ottawa, but left Golden, B.C., on the 9th May, 1897. Left Victoria for the north on the 15th May, 1897. Returned to Victoria on the 13th December and to Ottawa on the 24th December, 1897. Reports were received by the Government on the 7th August and 18th October, 1897. Mr. McArthur left Ottawa on the 17th May and Victoria on the 25th May, 1897. Returned to Victoria on the 4th October and to Ottawa on the 19th November, 1897. Reports received on the 11th September and 16th October, 1897. Mr. Jennings left Ottawa on the 18th August and Vancouver on the 30th August, 1897. Returned to Vancouver on the 1st November, 1897, and to Ottawa on the 17th December, 1897. Reports received at various times as fast as received by Mr. Jennings from his assistants up to the 20th January, 1898. Mr. Ogilvie left Ottawa on the 20th August and Vancouver on the 31st August, 1897. Returned to Vancouver on the 4th December and to Ottawa on the 12th December, 1897. He reported to Mr. Jennings. Mr. Ross did not go from Ottawa. He left Vancouver on the 30th August, 1897, and returned to Victoria on the 4th February, 1898. He reported to Mr. Jennings. Mr. Richardson did not go direct from Ottawa. He left Victoria on the 15th August and returned to Vancouver on the 2nd October, 1897, and reported verbally to me. His written report was received on the 6th December, 1897.

GRAIN TRANSPORTATION BY CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. RICHARDSON asked,

Whether any agreement has been made between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Elevator Company of Manitoba and the North-west Territories, whereby the said railway company agrees not to accept grain from farmers at any point where grain elevators have been built? If so, whether such agreement is not ultra vires of and contrary to the provisions of the general Railway Act?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Not aware of any agreement existing between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Elevator Company of Manitoba and the North-west Territories, whereby the said railway company agrees not to accept grain from farmers at any point where grain elevators have been built. If such has been done, it would appear to be contrary to the 246th section of the Railway Act.

FLOODS ON OTONABEE RIVER.

Mr. LANG asked,

1. Has the Government made any investigation as to the cause of the yearly floods on the Otonabee River, and alleged to be due to public works executed by the Government on the river?

2. What is the result of such investigation, if any has been made?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to undertake any work in this connection this year?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The Government employed Mr. Richard Rogers and Mr. George Pope to make an investigation into the matter of a number of claims for alleged damage to properties along the Otonabee River, and as to the cause of such, if any. The result of the investigation was, that damage did occur, but not from any public works having been built, they were caused by the deposit of large bodies of saw-dust along the river. The Department of Railways and Canals does not at present see the necessity of undertaking any work in that connection, and, therefore, do not propose to do so this year.

GOVERNMENT WORKS ON RICHELIEU RIVER.

Mr. MONK asked,

1. What was the estimated cost of the Government works on the Richelieu River at Belœil?

2. How much has been expended upon these works up to the 5th February, 1898?

3. How much will it cost to complete said works?

4. Why were tenders not called for the construction of said works?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. The estimated cost of the work at Belœil, built of cribwork, was $11,000, not including superintendence. 2. The sum expended to the 5th February instant, is $7,118.05. 3. The estimated amount required to complete the work is placed at $4,500. 4. Tenders were called for the construction of the works at Belœil in December, 1894, and the contract was awarded to the lowest tenderers, Messrs. Bélanger, Amos & Mignault, who transferred it to Mr. Beaulieu who took some steps to proceed with the work, but was absolutely unable to carry it on. On the 25th March, 1896, an Order in Council was passed by the late Government cancelling the contract in question and authorizing that the work be completed by day labour, which course has been followed by the present Government.

CATTLE SHIPMENTS TO BELFAST.

Mr. HUGHES asked,

What steps, if any, have been taken by the Government to secure the opening of Belfast, or other suitable port in Ireland, to shippers for the admission of Canadian cattle on terms similar to those governing their admission into English and Scotch ports?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). This subject is receiving the earnest attention of the Government.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

TIMBER LIMITS.

Mr. DOMVILLE asked,

Will the Government state the names of all persons or corporations that tendered for timber limits under the advertisement lately placed in two public papers, and the amount offered by those that tendered for each limit?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Here is a schedule of individuals or companies who have tendered for timber berths in the Yukon district and the amounts offered for the same:

REGINA TERRITORIAL EXHIBITION.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

Whether all the indebtedness of the Regina Territorial Exhibition has been paid?

Whether the prize of $20 won by Arthur L. Davies, of Moose Jaw, for an essay on "How to make the farm pay," has been paid? If not, why not?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). No. In reply to the question as to whether the prize of $20 for an essay has been paid, my answer is, no. It was one of several accounts about which further information had to be obtained before payment. It was returned to the accountant at Regina for information. That information was not received by the department before the vote passed last session had lapsed, and consequently until a re-vote is obtained from Parliament those further accounts cannot be paid. Mr. Davies's account is one that was approved, and will be paid when the vote is passed.

YUKON RAILWAY—ROTHSCHILD'S AGENTS.

Mr. INGRAM asked,

Who was the agent or agents representing the Rothschilds, to whom the Government supplied information regarding the construction of a railway in the Yukon district?

On what dates or dates was it furnished, and what was the nature of the reply thereto?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I have not the information under my hand to answer that question, but I expect that all information in relation to it will be laid on the Table to-morrow.

CRAIGVILLE AND STROUD MILLS MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. TYRWHITT asked,

What does the present contractor receive for carrying the mails between Craigvale and Stroud?

When tenders were called for, were any others received than that of the present contractor?

Was the contract given to the lowest tender?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (by the Minister of Agriculture). The contractor for the mail service between Stroud and Craigvale railway station receives 19½ cents per trip, or, as the service is daily, $61.03 per annum. There were two tenders received for this service at the time tenders were called for. The contract was given to the lowest tenderer at the rate of his tender.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS—SIDE- WALKS.

Mr. BERGERON asked,

Who was the contractor for the paving in asphalt of the sidewalks, etc., around the Parliament Buildings?

Who furnished the materials for such work, especially the cement, &c.?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The lowest tender was accepted; it was that of the Sicily Asphaltum Paving Co. 2. All the materials were supplied by the contractors.

Mr. FOSTER. Did you accept the lowest tender?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes; I meant to say that.

CREAMERIES IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. DAVIN moved for:

1. The number of creameries in the North-west Territories under the management of the Government.

2. The number of patrons each.

3. The amount of cream received for the year 1897 up to the last month for which returns have been sent in.

4. The amount of butter made in such creameries in 1896 and in 1897, respectively.

5. The number of creameries run during the winter months and the amount of butter made during these months.

6. The amount of butter exported during 1896 and 1897 respectively.

7. The prices received in 1896 and 1897.

8. The average price of butter received by farmers in the North-west Territories not connected with the creameries prior to the establishment of such creameries.

9. The average price paid by local dealers now.

10. Copies of the memorial from North-west farmers sent last year, either to Professor Robertson or the Minister of Agriculture, or to the Government of Canada, with reference to the working of the creameries in the North-west Territories.

He said: Mr. Speaker, some years ago when the subject to which this motion relates was first brought before this House, there was a scepticism on both sides as to the fruitfulness of the idea of lending money for creameries in the North-west Territories; but even with the partial information we have at the present moment, we are face to face with the most gratifying facts, which show that no money was ever employed by a Government more fruitfully than the money that has been employed upon what is called the creamery policy in the North-west Territories. It will be remembered that at the time the proposal was made by me many doubted whether it was a practical proposal which ought to meet with acceptance at the hands of statesmen; but, Sir, to-day the policy has vindicated itself beyond the most sanguine hopes. With even the partial knowledge which is at my command, I am able to lay before this House and the country a statement of things that will be a source of gratification to every patriotic man, especially to those gentlemen who, like my hon. friend from Huron, take an interest in our dairy industries. We have in the North-west Territories—and every day is vindicating the truth of this proposition—the finest and most extensive ranching land in the world; we have the finest and most extensive areas of free agricultural country in the world; and now it is being established that we have in the North-west Territories the largest and richest gold-bearing lands in the world. So that the farmer and the rancher in the North-west Territories, especially the rancher, to whatever point of the compass he looks, has at the present moment a magnificent market. He has a magnificent market in the old country. The results of the creamery policy to which I have referred show that even already we have a great market in Great Britain. But that market, as we have it now, is only a fraction of what it will be in a few years. Then, turn to the west, and you have in the Kootenay in British Columbia, and in the Klondike, a market which probably surpasses that of Great Britain; and the ambition of the North-west rancher does not need to stop at the Klondike, at the Kootenay, or at Great Britain. His eye and heart can extend beyond the broad Pacific, and find another great market in Japan. Japan, as those of my hon. friends who have followed the history of that country know, in addition to the many modern movements to which it has had recourse in embodying western ideas and western methods, has made the attempt through its Government to become a great dairying and cattle-raising country; but, after spending $12,000,000 upon experiments, the Government of Japan has given up the attempt as a mistake, and to-day there is no better market in the world for our dairy products than Japan offers. So that Canada is in this position. She lays her hand on the mane of two great oceans which are highways and also vast store-houses of sources of wealth; and the North-west Territories, which are the heart and body of Canada, find that whatever way they turn, at the present time the largest and most paying markets for their products present themselves.

Now, there is no such agent, as my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. McMillan), who often spoke from this side of the House, and with great instruction to us all, knows for advancing the progress of a stock country as up-to-date dairying, and we want to become a stock-raising country second to none. The very first necessity of good dairying is a good sire, and the next step is to get a good cow, and the way to get a good cow is to have a good strain on both sides—a strain of great milk-producing record. That is what we need. Now, a cow that will produce 250 pounds of butter in a year will cost just as little to keep as a cow that may only give 200 or 150 or even as low as 100 pounds, but a cow producing 100 or 150 pounds of butter will not pay, whereas one producing 250 pounds will pay, and the man who is lucky enough to own fifty or 100 of such cows will have from his dairying process a good income.

The three essentials are breed, feed and trouble. The breed I have dwelt on. The choicest milk-producing foods can be produced in the North-west Territories, with a fruitfulness not equalled, I believe, by any part of the continent of America. We can produce corn for the purpose of ensilage, and the sunflower that we produce in the North-west Territories would fill the heart of an Ontario farmer with envy, so large is its disk and so rich in seeds. We can have wheat-bran 'sans pareil,' and the North-west can produce mangels and all the roots to a perfection of quality that cannot be surpassed and rarely equalled. I was speaking a moment ago about the cow. The cow in the North-west Territories can, I believe, be supported for much less than the cow in almost any other part of Canada. In most parts of Canada, I think, the cow which is properly treated will cost at least $30 a year, but successful stock men assure me that they can sustain their cows at much less cost. Now, in 1893, in pursuance of the policy that we had inaugurated a few years before, we had inspectors travelling all over Manitoba, and these dairy inspectors worked in Manitoba until 1895, when an inspector was appointed by the local government, and I wish to point out what the result of the dairying has been as a clear result of that policy, which we inaugurated, and which, I am happy to say, is being pursued with zealous imitateness and successful energy by the present Government. Sir, in the winter a meeting took place of the Manitoba Dairy Association, and in their report I find the following, to which I ask the attention of hon. members :

The increase of dairying from year to year has been almost phenomenal. It is estimated, from a reliable source, that 776,000 pounds of creamery butter were sold out of the product at an average price of 16.4 cents per pound, giving a total receipt for butter of $127,264. It is also estimated, from the same source, that 886,000 pounds of cheese were made, which sold at an average of 7 cents per pound, making a grand total of $189,284 for dairy produce. This estimate is, if anything, below the actual amount manufactured. The increase in the value of the output for creamery butter alone is $41,612.

I believe that in the North-west we can show, speaking comparatively, results as gratifying; and when the returns to a motion I have on the paper are made, I think it will be found that at the end of October we had produced something like 473,796 pounds of butter. There are creameries at a score of points in the North-west Territories, and at least two creameries—in Innisfail and Red Deer—where the experiment is being made of running all winter, and so far it has been successful and they are selling their butter—all they can make of it—at 25 cents per pound. Mark that as an indication of what can be done in the North-west Territories, that at the present time we are running two creameries in the winter, and I congratulate the Department of Agriculture on the fact. It shows this, that such is the character of our climate, especially in the west, in that part of the country where the North-west purrs in the winter to the chinook wind, there is no difficulty keeping our cows and getting milk from them and running creameries all winter. Far better work will no doubt be done henceforth, because there cannot be the least doubt that our people required to be educated. The farmers, at first, did not know how to take care of their cream and had to be trained. They are now trained; and even the professional butter-makers, the officers under Professor Robertson, they too require to be trained to the conditions of the country just as the best farmers that came up there from Ontario, but did not understand the peculiarities of the climate, required to be trained in order to make farming the complete success that it is now in the North-west. The cream gatherers themselves require to be trained.

Now, I should like, in order to show the House the progress stock-raising is making, to refer to one district in the North-west Territories, although not bearing directly on dairying, as a sample—I refer to Medicine Hat and Maple Creek. The value of their exports for the past year amounted to $178,000.

The value of the cattle exports was.....	$125,000
do do slaughtered.. . . .	33,000
do do dairy production.	20,000
do do hides.....	1,000
Total.....	$178,000

The number of cattle shipped out of the district was 33,850, and the number of killed 800, making in all 4,150 head of cattle. The average price obtained was $27.50, some of the steers having brought the first-rate price of $40 and more. For the year 1898, we shall have in Medicine Hat and Maple Creek, a much better choice. For instance, in Maple Creek we shall have a large creamery next summer, and instead of having $20,000 as a result, taking the value of the butter product, we shall have a much better showing.

In Medicine Hat and Maple Creek they are fully alive to the market I spoke of, the Klondike market. We have already sent thither 80 head of cattle, which, I may tell you, have sold at an enormous price, realizing a fortune for the enterprising man who took them up. Helped by the Department of Agriculture, helped by the suggestions of Professor Robertson, to whose originality, energy and determination to be up to date, no language can do more than justice at any rate, they will send butter from Maple Creek next year to the Klondike, to the Kootenay, and they will export to Japan and England, the butter being packed not in timber packages, but in tins, the patterns of which Professor Robertson brought from France and which are now being manufactured in Montreal and in St. Boniface, Manitoba. I have inspected the packages myself. The butter is hermetically sealed in the easiest possible manner without being touched by the hand or by any instrument that could injure it in the least. In these packages butter can be sent to the Klondike, to Kootenay or to England. It is not necessary that the butter should be in large and clumsy packages; it may be put up in pound packages. In consequence of this we anticipate a very great trade. On the 7th December last a convention took place in Regina attended by delegates from all points east of Moose Jaw. Many questions were discussed, some of which I desire to bring to the attention of the hon. Minister. The point which the delegates seemed to have most at heart, was that the Government might reduce the charge for the manufacture of the butter. At present the charge is four cents for manufacture and 1 cent for a sinking fund. Some delegates thought that could be lowered to advantage, for, while it may not exceed the cost at a small creamery, it does exceed the cost at a large creamery. Of course, even if the butter is made for less than four cents, in the end the advantage goes to the farmer, for, after his indebtedness is cleared off, if there is any surplus, the Government will undoubtedly hand it over to the patrons of the creamery. But I wish to tell the Minister, whose attention may not have been directed to this meeting, the arguments that were used there. One was that the price of wheat is so high that, unless the suggestion is adopted the attention of dairymen may be turned away from the dairy to wheat growing, and the dairy movement may thus be retarded. In regard to that, I confess I should be very sorry if any of the farmers of the North-west took so shortsighted a view as that. Nevertheless it is my duty to bring to the attention of the Minister this argument, which was used by men who, from the first, have taken the very greatest possible interest in dairying.—for instance, by my friend Mr. William Watson, of Moose Jaw, who was, I think, the first man outside of this House to suggest that the Government of the day might lend money fruitfully for the purpose of helping the dairies in the North-west. Another argument that was used was this—that the consequence of the operations of these dairies is, that, whereas formerly the farmer making his butter in his private dairy sold it for 7 cents a pound, he now sells it to the local dealers at 20 cents a pound. This is not merely because the system of dairying established in the North-west educated the farmer in the methods of butter making, educated the most of the farmers who can afford it to have a separator and a Babcock test, but by finding a market for the butter produced by a large number of farmers, has reduced the competition in the local centres. The result of this—I do not say that I endorse or approve of it—has been to excite a certain jealousy in the minds of some of the patrons of the creamery. If the farmers who are not patrons of the dairy get more for their butter in consequence of the dairy, we all including their brother farmers who are connected with the dairy, should rejoice. But the suggestion was made—this also by some of the best men in connection with dairying—that the dairy should also sell in the local centres. I bring before the Minister the ideas presented at this very interesting creamery parliament, one of the most interesting events that have taken place in the North-west. I think they made out a case that ought to be considered by the Minister whether he cannot, with due regard to the interests of the dairying industry lower the amount taken from the farmer for the cost of manufacturing the butter. When it was said—as I said myself—Supposing they were to lower it to 3½ cents or 3 cents, which was your contention, and in the three years the indebtedness was not paid, but there was a deficit, what then? The answer was this: Then let the Government take five years, and to that I ask the attention of the Minister. Now, Mr. Watson, of Moose Jaw, who was there, said he was sure that the Government would not be a loser at three cents. Another point to which I asked the special attention of the Minister was this. Mr. Watson said:

The Government should give them a detailed statement of the cost of every factory, hired labour, fuel, boxes, parchment paper, salt, oil, freight, commission, insurance, cost of machinery, &c., so that at the end of the term, when they came to take over the factories themselves, they might know how they stood. This would educate the several boards of directors and patrons, and enable them all the better to take up and continue the creameries after Professor Robertson ceased to operate them. It was essential that the creameries should pay well, especially if the high price of wheat continued, which might tempt many to neglect the creameries in favour of wheat growing. At the Moose Jaw factory they did not know the cost of anything—paper, prints, and so on.

I would suggest that certainly that should be done. I know that there is no one more alive than Professor Robertson to the advantage of educating the farmers to take hold of those creameries when the time comes that he withdraws from them. I am quite sure that this point has not been overlooked by him. But it may be, as Mr. Watson suggests, that enough has not been done to enable the farmers to become educated in running those creameries after the Government withdraws its hand. Now, at this convention we had some very important statements made, that will be gratifying to the House. Mr. John Hawkes, of White-wood, told us :

That he did not think there was a single farmer in his district that relied wholly upon grain.

So that in one great district the wise policy of mixed farming seems to have been carried out. Again, Mr. Hawkes says :

Their butter averages almost one pound to the inch, not quite. They were operating four months, and they made 46,871 pounds of butter.

Another suggestion of Mr. Hawkes is that the creamery should do everything it could to save the farmer labour. A suggestion of great importance was made by Mr. Watson that there should be a travelling separator.

He looked forward to the time when there would be a travelling separator as in Iowa. Such a separator, travelling twenty or thirty miles a day, separated 5,000 to 7,000 pounds of milk, and took the cream the same night to the creamery.

A committee was appointed during the day to take notes of the discussions, and formulate the opinions expressed in the resolutions. The committee was as follows :—

The president, William Watson, John Hawkes, L. G. Bell, J. R. Mitchell and Thomas Grayson, and they reported as follows :—

We are of opinion that all patrons should be charged the same ratio per pound of butter for hauling, irrespective of distance.

That in the interests of cleanliness, all butter-milk washings and refuse, where practicable, should be removed to a distance of at least half a mile from the creamery.

That cream haulers should be responsible for the condition of the cream delivered by them at the factories. This provision is intended to ensure adequate care in collecting the cream.

Patrons should understand that it is to their interest to send the cream in the best possible condition.

We recommend the universal adoption of separators, and we believe cream gathering would be preferable to hauling milk.

We believe experience proves that route hauling should, as a rule, be adopted in preference to individual hauling.

As representatives of the creameries of Assiniboia, we are of opinion that a less sum than four cents should be charged by the Government for the manufacture of the butter, and that a reduction to at least 3 cents a pound should be made, such reduction to apply to 1897, with its heavy initial expenses. Further, we are of opinion that this would conduce to a large increase of business, and be to the advantage of the dairy interests in general ; further, that if at the end of three years the Government are not fully reimbursed, they should continue in their occupancy of the creameries until such time as they are repaid.

I think that when a delegation composed of Mr. Hopkins, the president, from Moose Jaw, and of the names that I have read on that committee, representative men from nearly every point, and when they make a recommendation like that, it deserves the attention of the Minister. They recommended :

That some arrangement should be made at all the creameries for the supply of all creamery butter to meet the local demand.

That is the point I brought before the Minister. I expressed a certain doubt that was on my own mind at the time, and of that, I think, I spoke to some of my hon. friends. But it must be said that these gentlemen are the men interested, they are the farmers, and of course they could speak with much more authority than I could. In view of their character, I cannot but think that the Minister should also give great consideration to their suggestion.

We recommend that every patron should receive a weekly statement from the butter-maker of his butter test, either by entry in the patron's pass-book or in such other way as may be convenient.

That with a view to the directors' taking over the respective creameries at the end of the term, a detailed statement of all the costs and expenses of the respective creameries be furnished by the Government to the directors every year.

The report was submitted to the delegates, and was unanimously adopted.

Before concluding my remarks on this subject I wish to state to the Minister what was reported by the delegate from Grenfell, Mr. J. R. Mitchell, and it will gratify every hon. gentleman in this House who is interested in these matters. Mr. Mitchell said :

Their creamery had been quite a success. They were well satisfied with it. It has passed their highest expectations. They had 400 cows guaranteed, and before the season was out they had 700—

So that they had 300 more than was guaranteed before the season was out.

—and more would have come in if they could have got at their cream easily. They had five routes of an average of about twenty-eight miles each, and the average cost per mile was about seven cents. The average cost per pound of butter was 1.29 cents, the lowest (July) being 1.12 cents, and the highest (October) 1.60. Referring back to the routes, he would say that the longest route was thirty miles, the all-round trip. They paid by the trip, the highest being $2.75, and the lowest $1.15.

Now, Sir, I have exposed the views of the patrons and of the directors of the creameries in the North-west Territories, and I think I have shown the most gratifying condition of things in the North-west Territories. And you lose its significance if you regard it merely as a result. It is a result, and a most gratifying result of our policy, but the gratification that is to be derived from the result is small compared with the gratification that can be derived from it as a forecast, as an assurance of what during the present summer and during the summer of 1899, and in future will follow this policy, which when I first brought it forward in this House was received with so much scepticism by hon. members on both sides.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). Before the adoption of the motion, which I need hardly say I am very willing indeed should pass the House unanimously, I should like to say a few words in regard to this matter. In the first place, I would say to the hon. member that the information asked for in this motion will be brought down within a few weeks. All accounts of the North-west creameries have not yet been fully received, but the staff of the Department of Agriculture, the dairying branch, is now employed on those at hand, and the details of which have been almost completed; within a week or two these details will be absolutely complete, and so soon as the accounts have been copied they will be furnished to the House.

I should like to draw attention to a few of the matters to which the hon. gentleman has alluded to-day. First, I should like to say that the hon. member has evidently informed himself in regard to the information asked for in my department, and from the tenor of his remarks I am pleased to see that he endorses the policy of the department in the work it has been doing and is now doing, and that in his investigations there he has obtained a vast amount of information and opinions in regard to these matters which thoroughly meet his approbation and endorsement. I may say, in amplification of the remarks of the hon. gentleman, that the results which he has pointed out as having been obtained in the district of Assiniboia have been equally evident in the districts of Alberta and Saskatchewan. The work of establishing creameries in the North-west Territories is by no means local, but in consequence of the arrangements which we were able to carry out last year this benefit, which has been enormous to the people enjoying it, has been spread over the whole Territories, and the results have been uniformly and everywhere equally successful. I would just point out in regard to the hon. gentleman's explanation that this policy was outlined some years ago, that it is true the hon. gentleman did lay down a proposition which involved a somewhat similar policy to that which we are carrying out; but fortunately since that policy was laid down by the hon. gentleman, the Government and the department under my control have been able to amplify that policy very much indeed, and from an expenditure of $15,000 a year during the last two years we were able to run last season sixteen creameries and sixteen skimming stations in the North-west, thereby altogether benefiting thirty-two different localities in the Territories, and conferring on them the inestimable boon which the hon. gentleman has described to the House. Sir, this boon has been a very great one for more reasons than the hon. gentleman has pointed out. Before the Government took hold of those creameries in the North-west, the creamery industry, the dairying industry there had been to a certain extent discredited. Private individuals and corporations had embarked capital in creameries and cheese factories in various districts, and in doing so had invested considerable sums, probably a little beyond their means in many instances, with a result which was financially disastrous. The patrons, on whose patronage the success of the creameries were entirely dependent, had become thoroughly distrustful of the companies organized and carrying on creameries, and were afraid to send their milk there because they feared the butter resulting from the manufacture of the milk might be seized to pay the debts of the creameries, and they would not get a return for the supply of milk sent. As the result of this state of affairs many of the creameries had to stop manufacturing, and those continuing to manufacture were running in a comparatively small way and not paying expenses. This condition of affairs was not only disastrous to the people who had embarked money in the industry, it was not only disastrous to the companies and to the patrons, but was also casting discredit on the North-west as a field for the dairying industry, and those who came to the country were unfortunately impressed with the idea that there was not that room for skilful mixed farming or dairying which to-day has been thoroughly established by the experiments of the department during last season. This result is, I think, even more important than the result following any particular financial advantage to an individual company or corporation, or to any of the patrons, because it is an advantage which affects our whole North-west Territories, rendering it more attractive to immigrants entering the country by showing that they are in a suitable territory in which the ordinary methods and the higher methods of agriculture may be successfully introduced. This is going to be not only an advantage to the Territories and their inhabitants but a distinct advantage to the whole Dominion, and, therefore, I think it is a complete justification for asking this Parliament to meet the expenditure necessary to place on a sound footing and thoroughly establish this industry in the North-west Territories.

Sir, the hon. gentleman has alluded to several details to which I will now refer, because he illustrates some of the advantages derived and some of the arrangements which have been made in the Territories for carrying on this industry. Let me at the outset allude to the fact that at this very time there are two of the creameries in the North-west Territories being operated. Had the statement, that it was possible for creameries to run in the North-west Territories during the winter season been made a few years ago, it would have been received with ridicule by members of this House and the people of the country; but as a matter of fact two creameries in the Alberta district are running to-day supplying splendid specimens of winter butter for export. This shows how fully and completely the North-west Territories are suitable for dairying in all its branches. The hon. gentleman has spoken about our export of North-west butter. I should like to draw the attention of the House, in endorsement of what the hon. gentleman has said, to the eminently good quality of the products of those creameries. In the early part of the season we did not find a sufficient market in the North-west itself or in the adjoining province of British Columbia for the whole of the output of the creameries we were running there. We turned our attention, as was natural, to the English market, and a large quantity of butter made in the Territories in the earlier part of 1897 was exported to England. One particular shipment was sent from Prince Albert to Montreal in cold storage, and thence to England in cold storage, and it was sold upon the English market within two shillings of the price that the best Danish butter sold for on that day.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What quantity.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Within two shillings per 100 pounds of the market price for that day of the best Danish butter. This was a most extraordinary tribute to the excellence of the butter which our people are able to make in the North-west Territories. But before the middle of the season was reached we found that there was growing up a large demand for this butter in the western part of our own Territories, in connection with the construction of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, the increase of population in the mining regions of British Columbia, and so we did not send any more of this butter to the English market, because we found we could get a better price for it in these western districts. It was therefore due to the patrons of the creameries, that instead of sending the butter to England we should send it where we got the best prices. Had we known what was going to come, we would actually have done better not to have sent a single pound of butter to England this year. I point this out to show the immense advantage to the dairy interest and to all other interests in the North-west Territories, has been the stimulation of this western local market for their produce. Notwithstanding that fact, I believe we were justified in sending that butter in the early part of the season to England. It was important that our butter should secure a good reputation in England, and for this purpose it was advisable that we should send some of this butter there so that we should know everything in connection with it from the time it was made until it reached the consumer. In this connection I might point out that had it not been for the arrangement my department made, in providing for cold storage accommodation for the transport of our butter from the point of manufacture in Canada to the point of consumption in the British market, we could not have obtained these splendid results. As a matter of fact, the establishment of this chain of cold storage has this year enabled us to see our butter quoted on the English market at a higher price relatively, than it ever has before been quoted at.

I shall say a word or two in reply to the statement of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) in regard to the manufacturing price of butter in the Territories. It is true that we charge 4 cents a pound there, and this would be looked upon in Eastern Canada as rather a high price. But the cost of manufacturing there is greater than in Eastern Canada, and in order that we should actually pay the expenses we have to charge a higher price than we would down here for the same service. But there is another phase of this question to be dealt with. A large creamery doing a large business can afford to manufacture for a less price than a smaller creamery doing a small business. The facts are these: In several of the creameries in the North-west Territories, the four cents a pound charged for manufacturing has more than paid the expenses of manufacturing. In the majority of creameries there, however, it has not paid these expenses, and the dairy vote has been called upon to a considerable extent to make up these deficits. I would also point out to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin), and to the House, that in managing those creameries in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, not only do we have to pay the actual expenses of manufacturing so many pounds of butter in a particular creamery, but for the purpose of carrying on the business properly, we have had to have in the North-west Territories, two general inspectors during the whole season, and their salaries and travelling expenses have to be paid by the department. These expenses and salaries are not charged in the 4 cents a pound, to the individual creamery, nor to the individual pound of butter. It is, however, a necessary expense if these creameries are to be managed thoroughly and successfully. I can say in that connection, that the success of the North-west creameries has been largely due to the efficient and skilful inspection and supervision of the two gentlemen in charge there this summer.

Mr. DAVIN. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I venture to say, that if a fair share of the expenditure in connection with the general inspection, and the cost in connection with the establishment of these creameries had been charged pro rata to every creamery in not one of those creameries during the last season would 4 cents per pound have more than paid the total expenses of the creamery. But, so that there shall be no injustice and so that no individual creamery can complain that they are being charged higher than necessary, and that their money is being used to pay a deficit in other creameries; I would tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) and the House, that I have made an arrangement, by which any surplus which remains in any individual creamery—the surplus over the actual expense of the manufacturing at the cost of 4 cents per pound—that surplus will be credited to the individual creamery towards the extinction of their debt to the Government. Therefore, although we do charge a little more in individual instances than is necessary for the working expenses of that individual creamery, the surplus accrues to the benefit of the patrons of that creamery, just as much as though we reduced the actual cost per pound of manufacturing. In consequence of this, and in consequence of the payment of the one cent per pound towards the sinking fund, which we charge on every pound of butter manufactured there, I venture to say that if next year the success in some of the larger creameries is equal to the success this year, and with the expansion of business which we can fairly hope for, at the end of next year, several of these larger creameries will have extinguished absolutely the debt which they now have incurred towards the Government.

Mr. DAVIN. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I think, Sir, that that success will be of far greater benefit to these individuals and to the Territories generally, than would be the momentary advantage of having a half cent or a quarter cent less per pound charged them. I want to point out that if we can show—and I am satisfied we will be able to show it at the end of next season—that certain corporations in the North-west Territories had been able to incur a heavy debt—in some instances nearly $2,000 to the Government of Canada to place their business on a firm footing, and in two seasons have been able to extinguish that debt; it is one of the greatest boasts the farmer of the North-west Territories can make, and it is a benefit that will accrue not only to these individuals but to the whole dairy and agricultural interests of this country. If the constituents of the hon. gentleman who have passed that resolution will take these things into consideration, I think they will find that they fully justify us in not reducing the price of manufacturing in these particular instances at once, and that the course we have taken will result in greater benefit to them as well as to others. It would perhaps be unfortunate were we largely to reduce the cost of manufacturing, because when the Government ceased to run these creameries, private individuals might find that they would have to raise the price afterwards. That would be a most unfortunate occurrence, and would place those private persons, who are to-day in a position of partnership with the Government, at a great disadvantage in the future.

Now, I wish to refer to the question of the price and the selling of this dairy produce in the local market. The hon. gentleman has pointed out, what I can thoroughly endorse, that the export of the butter made in the Government creameries is an export which could not exist at all were it not that these creameries were put on their feet and run by the Government. I venture to say that while these creameries were being run by private enterprise, the product of them was not successfully placed for export. Private dairy butter in the North-west Territories, as in other parts of Canada, is not suitable for the export trade. I say this advisedly, although I well know that there is a considerable quantity of private dairy butter exported from Eastern Canada. But it is a well known fact that to-day the reputation of Canadian butter on the English and other foreign markets is entirely dependent on the export of the creamery butter; and that were dairy butter sent out from this country alone, or were the creamery butter no better than it, a favourable result would not have accrued to the reputation of our butter in those markets. The fact that this creamery butter is exported from the different localities in the North-west Territories relieves the local market from a considerable surplusage of butter. Were that butter placed on the local market, the price of all butter, creamery and dairy, would drop to a considerable extent, probably below the export price of the creamery butter. This would be a misfortune to the private dairymen, who are to some extent the object of the envy of the patrons, because it would reduce the price of their product; but it would in a short time eventuate in the price of all butter, creamery and dairy, being lowered in those local markets; and the result would be unfortunate for the whole country. The hon. gentleman evidently endorses this position, and would not advise me to flood these local markets with creamery butter which is suitable for export. It is true that in consequence of the fact that this creamery butter is exported, the dairy butter in the particular localities has been improved in price. I am very glad to find that this is the case.

I should be glad if the Government were able to run creameries all over the North-west Territories, so that there would be no private butter made in the country; but that is impossible with the means at my disposal, and I do not think this House or the country would endorse an attempt by the department to do that. What the department has tried to do, and I think successfully, has been to prove to the country at large that the dairy industry is an industry suitable to the North-west Territories, and one which, conducted on business principles, can be profitably and successfully established there. Having done that, we must leave it to the enterprise and business ability of the people of the North-west to continue to carry on the business for themselves. When that time comes, I have no doubt that a great many more creameries than now exist will be established, and the result will be an enormous new industry which will add immensely to the profit of farming in the North-west Territories, and consequently will accrue to the enormous profit of all the eastern parts of this country, where the manufacturers and the merchants look to the North-west for markets, and where the commercial lines of transportation look to the North-west for a demand for the goods they carry. At the same time that we are able to show the world that we have in the North-west Territories fields which can produce sufficient grain to supply the graineries of the whole world, to an extent which both in quantity and in quality is unlimited, we can also send out into the world this higher and more profitable product, for which there is an almost illimitable market in the old world, thereby enhancing the attractiveness of our North-west Territories to the incoming immigrant, and establishing a system of mixed farming, which I am sure, the hon. gentleman and others who have studied the conditions of agriculture in those territories believe is the true and permanent kind of farming to be carried on there.

The hon. gentleman has alluded to another matter about which I wish to say a word or two before sitting down; that is, the export trade to Japan and the East, and the trade with the mining sections of British Columbia and the Klondike. The hon. gentleman alluded to a new kind of package that was being used. Some time ago, long before I took the office I now occupy, my attention had been turned to the tropical trade in butter. That trade was largely in the hands of France, not because the French people made a special quality of butter, but because they had invented a machine by which packages could be sealed hermetically without the use of solder or heat; and they were thus able to put up butter in such a shape as to incur no risk of damage, and that gave them command of the tropical trade. After I came into office, one of the first things I did last year was to authorize Professor Robertson to visit Paris and find out all he could about that machine, and if possible obtain one, so that we might make experiments, first, with regard to the Japanese trade, which I had first in my mind, and also with regard to the West India trade. We obtained a machine, but it was brought out too late last season to send any butter to Japan or the West. It has, however, been used in Nova Scotia, and I have made arrangements for continuous shipments of butter to be made this winter to the West Indies and Bermuda. I have received a despatch in regard to the first shipment which states that there is a most satisfactory demand for the butter sent from Nova Scotia to the West Indies, and I believe that in the near future we shall have an opportunity of greatly extending that trade, and practically cutting out the butter trade of old France in those islands. The same kind of thing is possible for us in the east, and having paid considerable attention to the demand for our agricultural products in Japan, having read with the greatest interest the report of the commissioner sent by my hon. friend, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) to Japan last summer, I am satisfied that we have the opportunity of opening a great trade there also in these articles. At present, the taste of the Japanese has not been cultivated for butter or cheese, but still there is a fair demand, and the first shipments, made some five or six weeks ago, arrived in first-class condition. I may say that they were not sent in tins, as the tins were not ready, but in ordinary wooden tubs, and we got a cable despatch asking us to send as much more of that kind of butter as we can.

The moment our dairymen can overtake the demand for their products in the mining districts and the western districts and the local demand in the Territories, they will have an opening in the far east for the supply of millions and millions, where there is another illimitable market, even greater than any that may exist in the present market for our butter products in the old country.

I am glad indeed to endorse this motion and to have the opportunity of saying these few words in explanation of what I consider a most successful piece of work in the North-west Territories.

Mr. DAVIN. Before the motion is put, I wish just to say a few words more. It will have been observed that the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) twice emphasized the importance, from an immigration point, of the work done in connection with the creameries in the North-west Territories. It will be impossible to exaggerate, from any standpoint, the work done in connection with these creameries, but I merely want to refer to that from this point of view alone. It will be remembered that when I first brought forward a motion, in this House, for the purpose of encouraging the farmers of the North-west Territories to go into the business of scientific butter making, I proposed it should be regarded as a part of our immigration policy, and the reason I did so, was, first, because I knew there could be no aid to immigration more effective than that, and next, because I was open to the retort that it was not a very business-like proposal to suggest that the Government should go, to a certain extent, in conjunction with private individuals, into this business of carrying on dairying. It was to get rid of that difficulty that I suggested it should be regarded as part of our immigration policy.

I wish just to say a word or two more. My hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) was, I think, acting as Minister of Agriculture in 1895. That was one of the sessions I was pressing on the Government that $20,000 should be advanced by them for that purpose, and on that occasion, my hon. friend from York assured me that a vote for the money would be placed in the Estimates. I thought it would be brought down in the supplementaries, and telegraphed to that effect, but for some reason or another—although my hon. friend had endorsed the policy—the item did not appear. I suppose it was because money was scarce, but whatever the reason, it did not appear, but neither I nor anybody else could be more impressed than was my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) with the necessity of carrying out this policy, and in fact that policy was adopted by the late Government. I only regret that they did not jump at it when I first proposed it, and I am bound to say, as I have said before, that the hon. Minister of Agriculture deserves commendation for carrying out this policy of lending money to the farmers of the North-west Territories for this purpose. I make this statement because of a controversy that has arisen in the North-west Territories. The telegram that I sent was sent in good faith, in the belief that the item would appear in the Supplementary Estimates, but we know, that no matter what Government may be in power, it occasionally happens a Minister believes he can put a sum in the Estimates, which afterwards, for some reason or another, he finds it impossible to do. I am very much obliged to the House for having given me its attention when I brought before it the condition of the creameries in the North-west Territories, and I thank the hon. Minister for his readiness in agreeing to this motion, so that we can have still fuller information, because nothing can be so much, in my belief, in the interest of the North-west Territories, and indirectly of Manitoba and of all Canada, than that the people should understand how, in this respect as well as others, the North-west Territories are progressing.

Motion agreed to.

SUBSIDY FOR DAIRYING PURPOSES.

Mr. DAVIN moved :

That in the opinion of this House, it would be expedient to place $15,000 in the Estimates for dairying purposes in the North-west Territories.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). I have no objection at all to the motion, but I would ask the hon. gentleman to drop it, because I am making the necessary appropriation in the Estimates for carrying on the work.

Motion withdrawn.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Copies of all correspondence, charges, evidence and reports in connection with the case of Benjamin Palmer, formerly lighthouse keeper at Palmer's Point, King's County, N.B.—(Mr. Foster.)

Copies of all correspondence, advertisements for tenders and answers thereto, reports and Orders in Council, and a list of all permits, licenses or leases granted, containing names of the grantees and extent of territory given and conditions attached to each, the amount paid and to be paid therefor in respect of gold placer mining or gold dredging areas in the North-west Territories and the Yukon district.—(Mr. Foster.)

Copies of all correspondence, calls for tenders, tenders received, reports and Orders in Council, contracts entered into and all related papers in respect to the winter steamship service from St. John and Halifax to Great Britain since 1st July, 1897.—(Mr. Foster.)

Copies of all correspondence, calls for tenders, tenders received, reports and Orders in Council, permits, licenses or leases, with the names of the parties receiving them and the conditions attached thereto, and generally all papers in connection with the disposal of timber berths or areas in the North-west Territories, including the Yukon, since 1st July, 1897.—(Mr. Foster.)

Copies of all papers and correspondence respecting the enforcement of coasting laws of Canada on the Pacific or Atlantic coasts.—(Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper.)

Return showing names of commissioners appointed by the Government to inquire into the conduct of all employees of the Civil service in the province of Quebec since 23rd June, 1896, and the amount paid to each commissioner as salary or travelling expenses.—(Mr. Monk.)

Copies of all correspondence, estimates, tenders, reports and petitions addressed to the Government in regard to the construction of a wharf at Point Claire, in the County of Jacques Cartier.—(Mr. Monk.)

Copies of all correspondence, estimates, tenders, reports and petitions addressed to the Government concerning the yearly flooding of farm land at Ste. Geneviève, in the County of Jacques Cartier, consequent upon public works in the Ottawa River.—(Mr. Monk.)

Return showing the cost of "Hansard" for each year from and including 1890 to 1897—the return to cover the cost of reporting, transcribing, translating, printing, binding, circulating through the post office or express offices and all other expense connected with the present system of reporting and publishing the Debates of the House.—(Mr. Ellis.)

Reports, recommendations, &c., of the Council of the Montreal Bar, addressed to the Minister of Justice, concerning the judges of the province of Quebec.—(Mr. Bergeron.)

Return giving: (a.) The names of all civil servants who have been superannuated between the 13th of July, 1896, and the 1st of February, 1898;

(b.) The age of each servant so superannuated;

(c.) The years of service of each person so superannuated;

(d.) The amount per annum each person had been in receipt of;

(e.) The amount of superannuation each person is to receive per annum;

(f.) The names of the new appointees in the Civil Service since said 13th of July;

(g.) The age of each such new appointee;

(h.) The amount to be paid to each new appointee.—(Mr. Taylor.)

PREFERENTIAL DUTIES.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. With the consent of the House, I would beg leave to make an inquiry of the Government. I see that a very important announcement has been made in another place with regard to a very important subject, and I wish to ask the Government if that announcement may be regarded as authentic, because, I am sure, it will cause a great deal of gratification. That announcement is that, on the expiry of the Belgian and German treaties, the proposed reduction of 25 per cent will only apply to goods from the United Kingdom. I called the attention of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) to the subject, and he seemed to think that I would have to wait for that announcement until the budget speech was made, but as it has been made in another place and is of great importance, I wish simply to say that I hope the Government will be able to confirm the statement as authentic, and I only regret it has not been accompanied with the expression of the desire that the products of Canada should receive a preferential position in the United Kingdom. But apart from that, I think, certainly, speaking for myself, that it is the only course open to the Government under the pledges made, on what has taken place, and I wish to express the great gratification I felt on learning that announcement, and I hope the Government will be able to ratify it.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am more than pleased to hear that my hon. friend is gratified at what has been said in the other House. I am sorry to hear, however, that his happiness is not yet complete, and would hope that it had been complete. The only thing I can say at present, is that when the budget speech is made, I hope my hon. friend will have every reason to be even more than pleased and satisfied than he is to-day.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 6 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 15th February, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

DRUMMOND COUNTY RAILWAY— MOTION FOR INVESTIGATION.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved:

That a special committee of the House be appointed to inquire into the expenditure of the subsidies granted by the Parliament of Canada in aid of the construction of the Drummond County Railway and into all negotiations and transactions between the Government of Canada and any member or officer thereof, or any person in its behalf, and the Drummond County Railway Company, or any director, officer or person in the company's behalf, relating to the acquiring of the said railway by the Government; with power to send for papers, persons and records, and to report the evidence to this House, together with the opinion of the said committee thereupon.

He said: The reasons which compel the Government to make this motion will be understood by every one in this House, and I presume also appreciated by everybody. Last year the Government undertook to extend the Intercolonial Railway from the present terminus at Chaudière to Montreal. I am under the impression that this scheme had been engaging the attention of previous governments for some years past. The Government selected a route which had the advantage of being, by twenty miles, shorter than the route existing between Lévis and Montreal over the Grand Trunk Railway, and which had the further merit and advantage of avoiding the chain of mountains which are adjacent to the St. Francis River near Richmond. But, suspicious as to the dealings of the Government with the company in question—the Drummond County Railway Company—having been thrown out to the public, the Government deem it their duty to court every inquiry and to see that all charges may be properly ventilated.

I therefore beg to move the motion on the Order paper, and I propose further:

That the committee be composed of seven members, as follows:—Messrs. Lister, Carroll, Mc-Isaac, Morrison, Haggart, Borden and Powell.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Is that Mr. Borden of Halifax?

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Then that should be added.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the object of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) be to remove every cloud of suspicion in connection with this transaction, I may suggest that that object would be better attained if he were to embody in this resolution, substantially the resolution which was moved in another place upon this subject, and as notice has been given of such action being taken, it appears to me that it would be very unsatisfactory to the House and very unsatisfactory to the country, if the investigation in this House were so narrowed as to lead to the impression that a full and complete investigation into this subject is not desired. The imputations in connection with this matter, as my right hon. friend knows, did not emanate in this House but in another place, and action was taken there upon certain statements which were made. It therefore appears to me, that if my right hon. friend wishes this committee to subserve the purpose, and the very important purpose, to which he has drawn the attention of the House, he would do well to consider whether it would not be better for him to follow the course I have suggested.

If my right hon. friend is not disposed to take that suggestion, I would ask him to amend this motion by striking out the words "Parliament of Canada" in the second line, so as to enable the House to be in possession of very important facts which would be excluded if these words were retained. I do not intend to take up the time of the House any further than to make this suggestion to my right hon. friend, and I would be exceedingly glad if he would accept it.

The PRIME MINISTER. This committee has been moved for after very careful consideration, with a view exactly of having the truth, and the whole truth, come out, on all the allegations which have been made as to any wrong-doing which may have taken place in connection with this transaction. I have no objection at all, if the hon. gentleman makes a point of it, to accept that suggestion, and to strike out of the motion the words "by the Parliament of Canada."

Mr. FOSTER. Make it read, "by any government or municipality."

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). "All subsidies granted" surely embraces everything.

Mr. FOSTER. If you grant the first amendment, the second comes as a natural consequence.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In the fourth line, instead of saying, "between the Government of Canada," make it read, "between any government and any municipality."

The PRIME MINISTER. The charge is made against this Government, and it is this Government whose action should be inquired into.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No charge has been made in this House.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman led us to believe that the inquiry would cover everything, and stated that he desired that the full truth should be obtained. The suggestion made by the late Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) is that not only dealings with this Government, but dealings with any other government, should be inquired into.

The PRIME MINISTER. We have surely enough to answer for our own sins.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I think that the right hon. leader of the Government, the moment he brought in his resolution, laid fair ground for the request I am going to make; and the moment he admitted the first amendment, he laid a fair ground for making the whole resolution consistent with the spirit of the first amendment. The hon. gentleman, without any charge, so far as I know, having been made in this House at all, other than on a business basis, moves this resolution for the appointment of a committee to investigate the Drummond county deal, commonly so-called. Now, I imagine that my right hon. friend can only base that action on one of two things, if he wishes an open and full investigation, to which there shall be no bounds or restrictions, but in which the chief and only idea is to get at the whole truth. The hon. gentleman has reference, I suppose, to charges which have been made outside of this House—charges of a double nature: first, that from a business point of view this was an extravagant and intolerable bargain; and secondly, that there were circumstances in connection with the deal which were not what they should be. My hon. friend can only ask for this committee on one or both of these grounds. Now, the very moment he does that, if he wishes to have a clear and full investigation, he should not hamper it by restrictions. Consequently, the amendments which have been asked for are perfectly right and proper, and I think my hon. friend will concede that much. But the point I rose to make was this. The hon. gentleman is inviting an investigation into the proposition which was made by the Minister of Railways last year, when he asked for authority from this Parliament to enter into certain contracts with the Drummond County Railway Company and with the Grand Trunk Railway Company. If the charges which my hon. friend appoints this committee to investigate are true, there is no getting away from the fact that this Parliament and the country will not sanction the deal, and will not sanction the expenditure of one dollar of their money upon the deal. My hon. friend came to Parliament last year, and through his Minister of Railways, asked for authority to carry this deal through, and he did not get it. From these two things, there follows this—and it is the groundwork of the plea I wish to make before this House to-day—that until this committee have investigated this matter in a business and other point of view, and reported to this House that it is without stain, as regards the one point, and that it is a tolerable and reasonable proposition as regards the other, my hon. friend, by all rules of good conduct, of business, and of constitutional procedure, is estopped from going one step further towards the carrying out of that bargain for which he asked the authority of this House, and the authority for which he did not get. Yesterday, the Minister of Railways informed this House that he proposed to open these lines for traffic from Montreal over the Intercolonial Railway, with all the paraphernalia and expense attached thereto. That is a point which I think my hon. friend ought very seriously to consider. So far as I am concerned, I protest against the hon. gentleman involving this country in expense in carrying out a proposition for which he asked the authority of Parliament, and for which he did not get that authority; and if that were not enough to estop him and his Government, the very fact that to-day he has asked for a committee to make a solemn and thorough investigation of this transaction, and to see whether or not it is one that could be approved of by this country, certainly estops him from going one step further with the expenditure of the people's money without having received any authority by an Act of Parliament, which he must have to authorize it in perpetuity, until that investigation has been held and the result of the committee's work is put before this House, and the authority is given. That is the point I make. It is an appeal I make my hon. friend, whether he allows it or not, and it is an appeal which, I believe, will have weight with the public of this country.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The hon. gentleman has, of set purpose, deliberately attempted to mix up two altogether different and foreign questions. The hon. gentleman cannot have forgotten that he has knowledge of the charges having been made in this House, although he disclaims any such knowledge; and if he himself did not make charges, numbers of gentlemen sitting on his side did—thinly disguised, it may be—but which were clearly understood in this House and out of it to attach moral and legal turpitude to members of this Government in connection with this transaction. The Government of this country, although the hon. gentleman and his friends would not take the responsibility of making any formal charge in this House, do not propose to submit to the charges in silence, even as they are made. We propose, inasmuch as these charges were repeated by the hon. gentleman and his friends in other places, that, in so far as they affect the honesty and integrity of the Government and each individual member of it, they shall be fully investigated.

The Government drafted the resolution so broad that they thought it would meet with the approval of the other side, and the moment the hon. leader of the Opposition suggested that it should be further broadened by striking out the words of limitation "Parliament of Canada," so that it should embrace all subsidies from the provincial as well as this Government, we consent to the change. But now the hon. gentleman, not satisfied with the resolution as it stands, in its broadest sense, wants to have a business inquiry to ascertain whether it was apart from all question of wrong-doing or fraud, which he and his friends evidently now want to shirk—from a business standpoint a prudent bargain. Sir, the hon. gentleman says that we failed to carry our measure last year. We did not in this House, and although it was defeated in another place, the hon. gentleman knows that the Government took authority from both Houses to expend sufficient money to test the running of that road for twelve months. My hon. friend, the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) has the amplest authority to spend sufficient money in the leasing and running of that road for the full year in order to test whether the statements made from this side, with regard to its earning powers, were correct, or whether the fancies in which hon. gentlemen opposite indulged last year were based upon truth. My hon. friend behind me (Mr. Blair) proposes to carry out the instructions he received from the House in that regard, and the House will be in possession of the fullest evidence as to the business capacity and status of the road and everything connected with its commercial management, after the experiment has been made which my hon. friend asked the House to accede to, and which the both Houses did accede to last year. There is no connection between the charge of moral turpitude and wrong-doing and the business management of the road itself, or whether, as a commercial experiment, the transaction was a good or a bad one. That will be decided by the results of the yearly lease, and I think that when we have made the concession asked for by the hon. leader of the Opposition, we have made a concession which ought to satisfy every hon. gentleman who wants to see a most thorough investigation made into these charges by this House.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman proposes to limit the scope of the inquiry a great deal more than I would like to see it limited. The principal charge made by this side last session was that it was an improvident bargain.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. HAGGART. One of the reasons given was that this road had been offered for a far smaller sum than the present Government have paid for it. Would it not be a most improvident transaction, in the eyes of this House and country if, after the preceding Government were offered this road for one-half, or perhaps less than one-half the amount which this Government agreed to pay, they still committed themselves to that transaction? That is a fact which we will not be permitted to inquire into at all in this investigation. The only thing we are to inquire into is a charge which I have never heard made in this House—that part of the subsidies which were given to this road passed improperly into the hands of some members of the Government. The gravamen of the charge made from this side of the House was that the road could have been obtained at a price less than one which the Government have paid for it, and if you widen the scope of the inquiry and allow us to bring evidence to show what that road was offered to the late Government for, then the question may arise before the country: How is it that a road, which is not changed in character, assumes a value double the amount previously estimated when a new Government comes in and makes a bargain. That is the charge that was made on this side, that it was an improvident bargain.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Has the hon. gentleman read the resolution?

Mr. HAGGART. I have.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the hon. gentleman will read it, he will find that it is broad enough to cover the very point he is seeking to make.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman gives an interpretation to the resolution, Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

and is an authority upon legal points, perhaps, which we will have to accept in this House, and which we have accepted before. The resolution reads:

That a special committee of the House be appointed to inquire into the expenditure of the subsidies granted by the Parliament of Canada in aid of the construction of the Drummond County Railway and into all negotiations and transactions—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. HAGGART (reading)— —between the Government of Canada and any member or officer thereof.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. HAGGART. Does that refer to the late Government of Canada?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Certainly.

Mr. HAGGART. If it does, the resolution is broad enough to cover the question I propose. The principal object I had in rising was to see that it was broad enough to inquire into the question whether the expenditure was one that was justified, having in view the fact that an offer was made of this road for a much smaller sum than what the present Government has paid.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). You will remember, Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt, the debate which took place last year on that question of the purchase or lease of the Drummond County Railway. Many things were said but no evidence was adduced. My name and the names of my sons were mentioned. I challenged investigation. I challenged any hon. gentleman to make a specific charge. No specific charge was made in this House, but responsible men, men who were formerly Ministers of the Crown, men who know the English language, went out from this Parliament and made speeches. One of these gentlemen who made speeches is the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster). He went to Centre Toronto—where, I may say, he was not very successful—and after having declined to make charges against me in this House, he there spoke of me as follows: In the first place, he said, that I have sons. Yes, Mr. Speaker, kind Providence has blessed me with a family.

Mr. FOSTER. I take that back and leave it to be inferred that it is due to the gentleman himself and not to Providence.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I thank Providence for having given me sons and I hope that they will neither forget nor forgive my hon. friend for having dragged their young names into the political arena. They have a right to their reputation. They are just beginning life, and the hon. gentleman did not do a manly thing in accusing them of improper actions. I hope that some day or other they will enter this Chamber—one of them at any rate, and both if I can have my own way—when they will be able to answer my hon. friend or any other members who desire to criticise them. What did the hon. gentleman say. This is what he says :

And, Sir, just about the time that this Drummond County Railway business was going on, though Mr. Greenshields would not give anything to Mr. Tarte, he could put $30,000 into a paper to buy it, and give the title to Mr. Tarte's sons.

Well, Sir, I ask if it is possible to utter a more cruel slander against myself and against young men who, I say again, have a right to their reputation. I say that there is not one solitary word of truth in the statement that my hon. friend made. I insisted upon this investigation going on before my peers of the House of Commons. I challenge my hon. friend to make good the statement he has made. He cannot do so. He has uttered a slander; and, unless he takes back the statement he has made, I brand him as a man who states things which he cannot prove. And, in the province of Quebec, in all Canada, I am sure, it will be held that a man who says that which he does not and cannot know to be true, that of which he has no evidence, is bound to take it back or be branded as unworthy to occupy a seat in this House.

Mr. CASGRAIN. It will probably be interesting to the House now to get down to business. The proposition laid before the House by my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) is to enlarge the scope of this inquiry so that we shall be able to find out by the evidence of witnesses whether or not the bargain entered into by the Government with the Drummond County Railway was an improvident bargain. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) says we should not go into any such inquiry, because, as I understand him, this would be known after the Minister of Railways has operated this road for some time. After the hon. ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) spoke, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries said: I did not read the resolution rightly, but now, after reading it a second time, I see that it is wide enough in its scope to allow the committee to inquire into this state of facts also.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not at all. I said it was large enough to inquire into any transaction with the present or late Government. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) was referring to an offer made to the previous Government showing the road was less valuable than we said, and said that offer could not be taken in evidence under the terms of this inquiry. I pointed out, and he accepted my statement, that it could.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Very well; the proposal laid down by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries is that we should not go into the investigation to find out whether this is or is not an improvident bargain, because after operating the railway some time we shall find that out anyhow. But as a business proposition would it not be much better to have this inquired into by a committee rather than find it out after spending an enormous amount of money in operating the railway? A few witnesses could be brought here and they might convince the House that the bargain made last session was a very improvident one, and thus the fact would be established at very little cost. On this side of the House, so far as I know, there is not the least desire to limit the scope of the inquiry; all we ask is that it should be so large that it would include also, as has been stated, the terms of the resolution proposed in another place. Hon. gentlemen opposite, surely, have nothing to fear. The virtuous Minister of Public Works, whenever this Drummond County Railway is mentioned, flares up and gets into a terrible passion. He cannot control himself. I would ask my hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) to try and keep cool. If he cannot keep cool otherwise, he should take a dose of bromide of potassium, or of Mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup—or Abbey's effervescent salt, they say, is very good. Mr. Greenshields, I believe, belongs to the company which sells this salt, and, if the hon. Minister does not like to get a supply of it himself, he might send one of his sons. Hon. gentlemen on the other side seem to dread this inquiry much more than we do. If the inquiry is now moved for in this House, it is because the supporters of the Government have forced them to do it. It is common comment in the streets, you hear it every day, and especially since the Yukon deal has been before the country. Liberals everywhere say: We swallowed one deal, but we will not swallow the Yukon deal. But what, above all, was it that made this investigation necessary? It was the extraordinary speech made in this House last session by the Minister of Public Works. Why, Sir, charged, as he was, in the public press with being interested in the deal, he rose in this House and said that "La Patrie" newspaper, in which he writes every day, which is his organ, which, if report is true—I do not know whether it is true or not, and I do not state it as a fact—virtually belongs to him, was bought for his sons with a cheque for $30,000 furnished by the president of the Drummond County Railway.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I never said that in the House or outside of it.

Mr. CASGRAIN. "Hansard" is there to tell what the hon. Minister said, and if he reads "Hansard" he will find out what he said. He was probably so excited at the time that—

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Read it.

Mr. CASGRAIN—that he does not remember what he said, but this side of the House, and the whole House, and the press of the country understood him to say what I have just stated.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Read.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Now, take another point—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read, read.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must ask hon. gentlemen to keep order. The hon. member (Mr. Casgrain) must make his speech in his own way, so long as he observes the rules of the House.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Sir, I repeat that that is what was understood by the House, by the press of the country and by the whole country; and it was because of that speech that this investigation was brought on, and the hon. gentleman knows it. I am glad it is to be held, and I hope it will be thorough. Not only that, but he almost wrecked his party by that speech. Is it not extraordinary that a man should rise in this House and say that it is not he who owns the newspaper bought with this money, but his sons? We did not drag the names of his sons into this controversy. It was he who did it to serve his own purposes. And if to-day, we are obliged to speak of this subject, which is not an agreeable subject, it is not our fault, but the blame lies wholly upon the shoulders of the hon. Minister of Public Works himself.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

THE CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I move that to-morrow the House resolve itself into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:—

That it is expedient to grant and appropriate twenty-five thousand acres of land in the Northwest Territories for each mile of a railway from Stikine River to Teslin Lake, according to the terms of the contract relating to the said railway, copy of which contract has been laid before this House.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. CASGRAIN.

CANAL OFFICER GALBRAITH.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to ask a question of the Minister of Railways which, though of little moment to the House, is of considerable importance to the gentleman concerned. The hon. gentleman had an officer in the canal service at Port Colborne, more remotely at Maitland, named Thomas J. Galbraith. Mr. Galbraith informs me that his resignation as an officer of the Government was forwarded to the Minister of Railways and Canals, and I rise for the purpose of asking the hon. gentleman whether he has received the resignation, and if so, whether it has been acted upon? I may state that this is a matter of some little importance to the gentleman to whom I refer, which the Minister will understand when I inform him that Mr. Galbraith is a candidate for the representation of the constituency in the local legislature of the province of Ontario. The nomination is to be held in a week from Tuesday, and Mr. Galbraith is naturally anxious to know exactly his legal position before the day of nomination. I would therefore ask the hon. gentleman to look into the matter and to let us know exactly how the officer stands.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I recollect the fact that Mr. Galbraith forwarded me his resignation, though not accompanied by any explanation further than that he felt that the amount of salary which he was receiving was not sufficient to enable him to continue in the office. On receipt of the resignation, I handed it over to the Deputy Minister with instructions to put it through in the ordinary course. Now that the hon. gentleman has called my attention to the importance of having the resignation accepted in due form, I will see that it receives immediate attention.

INDIAN LANDS, QU'APPELLE VALLEY.

Mr. DAVIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to direct the attention of the Minister of the Interior to an important matter, and if necessary, I will conclude with a motion. Yesterday I received an answer from my right hon. friend to a question that was addressed to the Minister of the Interior, in regard to the surveying of land into the Indian reservation, and I gathered that whoever prepared that answer for the Government is under the impression that nothing has been done to interfere with the rights hitherto enjoyed by settlers in the Qu'Appelle Valley in respect of lands that are now claimed to be Indian lands. I have in my hand a newspaper published nearest to where these reserves are, and I have had letters of the same purport as the article I am about to read for the information of the Minister of the Interior. This article is from the "Vidette," of February 9, and is headed "Surveyed in." So far as I remember its politics in the past, it has been, I believe, a paper of Liberal leanings.

A few days ago it was announced officially that the land lying along the north side of the Qu'Appelle Valley, and opposite Muscowpetung's reserve, had been annexed to the already large tract of land held by the Muscowpetung Indians. This means that it has been surveyed into that reserve. To many it will appear as if this was a matter of very little moment. We have an abundance of land, why not let the Indians use it? This, together with the idea that we should treat the Indians "whiter" than the white is responsible for the fact that the Indians already own the best strips of land in the country, and for the ever-recurring aggression by the Indian Department upon contiguous land, we must protest against it and demand that the system be stopped. This is no reason why this land should be surveyed into the reserve mentioned. The Indians do not cultivate the land they have. For pasturing purposes they have all they need, and in the matter of hay it is a fact that right in this same block of reserves last year application was made by private individuals to buy the hay left standing after the Indians had cut all they wanted, but the department refused to sell it, and acres upon acres of splendid hay had to rot as a consequence. This is an almost yearly occurrence, showing that these new additions are not necessary for hay purposes.

Now, what is the result of this surveying in? White settlers will not be allowed to obtain hay permits on the annexed portion. No matter if the Indians have ten times more than they need and the whites nothing, the result will be the same—rot, for the whites can't touch it. As a consequence, the settlers will have to go back probably miles to obtain the hay necessary to their existence. It will benefit nobody and injure many.

An instance of the uselessness of this "surveying in" process was shown in the case where a coulée was surveyed into one of these same reserves two years ago. This coulée contained wood, and the Indians coveted it. It was "surveyed in," and although a lot of the wood was of good building dimensions it has all been chopped into firewood and sold. The Indians are no better off. There isn't a stick of it left, and the comfortable stables, &c., that could have been built out of it, had the settlers had a chance to use it, are conspicuous by their absence.

The Indian Department is guilty of a gross mismanagement in allowing this thing to continue. Settlers have gone in, knowing that these lands could be used by permit, and to withdraw that privilege on any other conditions than actual sale is breaking faith with them, and has caused, and is causing, a vast amount of discontent wherever practised.

We insist upon this practice being discontinued. It is creating a discontent which must result in retarding immigration into those districts; furthermore, that discontent is liable to find expression in a manner which may surprise the Government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, such an article as that could not be written by any editor at Indian Head contiguous to the Muscowpetung's reserve, and in the place where all that takes place in the Qu'Appelle Valley is patent to the residents of Indian Head, and such an article as that could not have been written unless there had been this surveying process of which he complains, and what I complain of is therefore that the department is misinformed as to what has been taking place. But how can I suppose that? I cannot suppose for one minute that the officers would go there and include in this Indian reserve land that the settlers hitherto had used, without having received instructions from the department. I do not know what explanation the Minister of the Interior can give in regard to this matter, but in order to afford him the fullest opportunity, I beg to move the adjournment of the House.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The answer given to the hon. gentleman yesterday is correct, so far as the information in the possession of the department goes, and so far as my personal knowledge and recollection go. I am perfectly certain that the statement made yesterday conveyed a correct idea of the facts; but it has been suggested that some one is under a misconception as to what is going, and for the hon. gentleman's satisfaction, I will endeavour to find out what has given rise to the report to which he has referred, and furnish him with the information at a subsequent date.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire, with the permission of the House, to say a word in personal explanation. I find that, in my absence from the Chamber on Friday, an hon. member of this House, the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), made use of these words:

I will read Mr. Chamberlain's utterances in London before the Canadian Club.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cannot, of course, reply to a former speech, and he must confine himself strictly to a personal explanation.

Mr. McNEILL. I have no intention of doing anything further than entering on a personal explanation. If I exceed that, I trust you, Mr. Speaker, will call me to order, for it is certainly not my intention to do so.

I will read Mr. Chamberlain's utterance in London before the Canadian Club on this question. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) read part of that speech, but he did not read it all, and the reason he did not read it all was because the balance did not suit and would not prove what he wanted. Thus hon. gentlemen opposite have got into the way of garbling speeches for the purpose of trying to make a point against the right hon. First Minister. Mr. Chamberlain dealt first with the problem that I have already presented to the House and then he goes on to say :

The hon. gentleman then read a passage of considerable length from Mr. Chamberlain's speech, and he then said :

The hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) read that length in his speech, but he did not read the rest, and so I will read the rest for him.

He then proceeded to read some other portions of the utterance of Mr. Chamberlain, and continued :

The hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) read the first part of that speech, but he did not read the second, simply because it did not suit his purpose.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to enter into any kind of discussion with the hon. member for North Wellington. I have no desire whatever to make this House a scene for the bandying of disagreeable words backwards and forwards across the floor. I simply wish to call attention to what the hon. gentleman has said, and I simply wish to put myself right with the House and the country, and to allow the House and the country to judge between me and the hon. member. I do not think that among those hon. members with whom I have had the privilege of sitting in this House for the last sixteen years, there are a great many who would rise in their places and say that I was capable of deliberate dishonesty. However, the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has accused me of deliberate dishonesty, and I feel that, however painful it may be to be obliged to allude to a matter of this kind, it is due to myself and to my constituents that I should put the matter right.

An hon. MEMBER. Sit down.

Mr. McNEILL. May I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to protect me from the rude interruptions of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. SPEAKER. I cannot say I heard any very great interruption. I was listening so closely to the hon. gentleman to hear his personal explanation. I really think that, having led up at such length, the hon. gentleman should now make the explanation.

Mr. McNEILL. I cannot make any explanation if hon. members are allowed rudely to interrupt me by telling me to sit down when addressing the Chair in a perfectly respectful manner, and in a manner not deserving of these rude interruptions. When I quoted from the speech delivered by Mr. Chamberlain at the Canadian Club, I quoted from that speech in order to prove one point, and I will tell the House what that point was. I will show what that point was by quoting from what I said, in order that there can be no mistake about it :

If hon. members will forgive me, perhaps it would be as well that I should read a few sentences from Mr. Chamberlain's speech, in order that the House and the country may see what gave rise to the change in the opinions of the Imperial authorities.

I was not referring at all to what Mr. Chamberlain's proposal was ; I was showing why Mr. Chamberlain had come to make a suggestion, and the quotation I made from Mr. Chamberlain's speech had reference to that, and to that alone, and had no reference at all to the subject to which the hon. member for North Wellington referred. Formerly I had referred to Mr. Chamberlain's suggestion, and had read a quotation with respect to that suggestion, not a quotation from Mr. Chamberlain, but a quotation from a speech delivered by the right hon. leader of the Government in London, Ont., and reported in the Toronto "Globe." If there was any garbling of Mr. Chamberlain's suggestion with respect to preferential trade made by me in the course of my address to the House, it could only have been in that portion of my speech in which I quoted from the right hon. gentleman leading the House. If there was any garbling, it was done by the right hon. gentleman, and not by me.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Is that a personal explanation ?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) must allow me to say, that in making a personal explanation it is manifestly out of order to raise another personal question. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) is an old and experienced member of this House, and the extreme length to which his explanation has gone, I really think would quite warrant me in saying that his personal explanation has now been made. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) wishes to make any distinct point that he did not garble, perhaps he could say so in a few words. The time of the House should not be taken up with these long explanations and arguments which are not personal explanations.

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Speaker, I will not intrude upon the time of the House, if you say I should not do so, further than to say this : that the hon. gentleman from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) quoted a passage from a speech of Mr. Chamberlain, which he said I read up to a certain point ; now, the hon. gentleman was in the House when I spoke, and I wish to say that I did not read one solitary word that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) said I read. I wish to say further—and I hope you will consider it a personal explanation, Mr. Speaker—that I did not quote one word from the speech of Mr. Chamberlain which the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) quoted from, nor did I refer to it at all. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) said he was quoting from Mr. Chamberlain's speech made at the Canada Club, while he was not quoting from that speech at all but from an entirely different speech.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) has, I am afraid, rather taken advantage of my permission to proceed as the latter part of his speech could hardly be called a personal explanation.

CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY COMPANY.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair) moved second reading of Bill (No. 6) to confirm an agreement between Her Majesty the Queen and Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, and to incorporate the Canadian Yukon Railway Company. He said: It is not my purpose to speak at length at this stage of the Bill, further than I deem it necessary to refer to the statements which were made by hon. gentlemen opposite in the debate which arose after my explanation on the first reading of the Bill. A great many of the members of this House, prominent and influential members of the Opposition, commented upon the explanatory observations which I then made, and I desire to avail myself of the present opportunity to refer to these statements, lest perhaps another equally favourable opportunity may not be afforded me. In the course of the remarks made by these hon. members, they succeeded in misstating what I had said, in attributing remarks to me which I did not utter, and in representing that the Bill which is before the House, and the contract which we were asking the House to confirm, contained clauses which were not to be found in either document. Any person who followed the speeches then delivered, and who heard the explanations which I made, would conclude that there was something very much resembling an organized and deliberate purpose upon the part of these hon. gentlemen to misrepresent me in every particular possible. I do not say that these gentlemen were moved by any such set design, but I do say, that if they had been so influenced, they could not have succeeded in a more marked degree than they did in attaining their object. It appeared to me that in discussing a business proposition before this House, as a deliberative assembly we ought to have been willing to have considered it in the light of the explanations which were actually made, and in the light of the material which was before Parliament. You had the full contract upon the Table of the House, you had the Bill with all its clauses fully explained—and I claim fairly explained to the House—and the gentlemen who spoke upon this Bill and referred to this contract had all that material, and the substantial portions of it published in the public press and brought before them several days before this discussion arose. I do feel, Mr. Speaker, that from the course which these hon. gentlemen pursued it is not an unreasonable inference to draw, that they had not the most unbounded faith in the strength of the objections which might be taken (if any) to the Bill, and so they found it necessary to resort to—I will admit if you like—an unintentional system of misquotation of my remarks almost from beginning to end.

Now, Sir, I intend before I sit down to take occasion to refer to the chief of many of these statements, but before I proceed to touch upon those particular matters, I wish to occupy the attention of the House for a few moments, while I pass hastily in review what appears to me to be the present state of the controversy in regard to this question. It is not denied, I understand, that it is imperatively necessary in the interests of Canada, in the interest of its business and of its governmental considerations, that there should be a railway constructed into that Yukon country. Not only is that not denied, but if I have followed successfully the speeches that were delivered by these leading gentlemen in Opposition, I take it that they admit that it is the duty of the Government—and that if Government had failed in this they would have failed in their duty—to have taken, and to take immediate means whereby that railway shall be assured. I go further, I think it is admitted by hon. gentlemen opposite, or was admitted, and I have confidence it will be admitted to-day, that not only is it necessary that a railway should be laid down in that country, but that it should be constructed without delay; that it is a work which demanded immediate attention, and that we would again fail in our duty if we did not avail ourselves of every possible means to ensure the earliest possible construction of that road. In other words, that we should see to it that a railway was laid down, whereby we might transfer the immense quantity of tonnage which the influx of population into that country will require, before the close of the coming season of navigation, and which railroad should connect the waters of the Pacific, or the navigable rivers which flow into the Pacific, with water navigation into the interior of that country. Now, Sir, I do not think I am overstating the propositions which will be admitted on the other side of the House, when I say, that those two essential and important propositions have received practically the unanimous consent of this House, as well as the universal assent and approval of the country.

If I am right in this assumption, then what remains? First, we will take the question of route. I admit that possibly there may be in the minds of members of this Parliament some doubt as to whether the Government has selected the most favourable route which they could have chosen for the purpose at this time; but I venture to say that the more the question is discussed and the more it is considered, the clearer will be the conclusion drawn by Parliament and drawn by hon. gentlemen opposite, that the Government have made the only possible selection, admitting that the railway must be built and admitting that it must be built at once. I shall state to the House why I think I am warranted in drawing that conclusion from the facts. What are the facts? There are only five routes which are known to us as presenting any possible advantages for the construction of a railway. When you look over all these routes and put them side by side, and examine their respective advantages and disadvantages, you will find that after all there is no choice—that the only railway you can lay down is the Stikine-Teslin Railway. A railway through the Chilkat Pass could not be built this year or in less than two years, and when it was built it would cost a great deal more money. I admitted that it presented commercial advantages greater perhaps than any of the other routes which have been before us: but the Chilkat route must be laid aside as not even possible of consideration when you admit that it is a question of urgent need and immediate action. And, mark you, I am speaking entirely outside of the question of international difficulties which might possibly arise in connection with these routes. What I have said with regard to the Chilkat route applies with equal force to every one of the three others: and the only route to which these objections will not apply is the route which the Government have chosen. Putting to one side altogether the question of international difficulties—such as customs regulations or bonding privileges or any of the other difficulties which might arise from crossing foreign territory—we find ourselves impelled necessarily to the conclusion that of all the routes the only one which remained for the Government to choose was the route which we have selected, and which is contracted for in this Bill. Now, taking up this question of international difficulties, how does it arise? Hon. gentlemen have attributed to me, during the course of my explanatory remarks the other day, a statement which I did not make, a statement which, so far from my having made it, is diametrically the contrary of the statement I did make. I will point out to the House wherein what I said has been either misconstrued or misrepresented. It was said by one gentleman, I think the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), that, in speaking of the Stikine-Teslin route, I had put it forward as an all-Canadian line—as having advantages over any other line because it was an all-Canadian route; but that I admitted that, even availing ourselves of the navigable waters of the Stikine River, we would be obliged, in order to reach the Stikine River terminus of the Teslin Lake Railway, to pay customs duties at Fort Wrangell. Now, Mr. Speaker, let me say that I am not depending on my own recollection of what I said; but I can refer hon. gentlemen to the official debates, if they care to verify the correctness of what I say, that no such statement was made by me. I stated then, what I still think, that at Fort Wrangell there will be no difficulty; and there are not likely, in my opinion, to be any serious obstacles raised against our use of that river for commercial purposes. I say that, because we have treaty rights in that river; and I am not willing to assume that the enlightened Government of the United States is going to violate its treaty obligations, and put itself outside the pale of civilized nations, as it would do if it took any such step. I think it is unwise for influential and prominent members of Parliament to put forward any such assumption in the debates of this House. I think it is unfair for us to refer in such terms to the Government of a country that lies alongside of us, whose people we know, with whom we must in the future have many relations, and with whom it is in our interest, as I think it is theirs, to remain on the most cordial and friendly relations. I do not think any question ought to be concluded in this House, or any argument presented in this House, on the assumption that the Government of that country will be found refusing to recognize their treaty obligations or refusing to treat this Government precisely on the same terms as we would have treated them in a like case, and as they would be treated by other civilized nations. I say this, because I want it distinctly understood that, in the view which I have taken and which the Government have taken with regard to the route we have selected, there is no question which really requires to be reconsidered by us in respect to this matter of treaty obligations or international relations or customs difficulties. I do not think that question is in this case at all, and I will tell the House why I think it is not. It would be, if there were any other route to which you could point where the same difficulties might not arise. It would be a question with respect to any of the four routes which we have discarded. I say that by none of those four routes could you reach your own territory without encountering customs obstacles from the United States; and that is a matter which we ought to weigh. But so far as these difficulties may arise, if they do arise, it appears to me they will arise to a tenfold greater degree, and in a much more serious manner, with respect to any one of the other four routes, than they can possibly arise with respect to the route which the Government have chosen. So that, if it is admitted that the railway must be built into the Yukon, and that it must be built at once, then I say there is no reason why we should regard any one of these routes as more favourable than the one we have selected; but there are many reasons why we should regard the Teslin Lake route as less objectionable in that respect than any one of the other four. I did not make the statement the other day with regard to what the United States Government might do, if we were obliged to tranship at Fort Wrangell which the hon. gentleman has attributed to me. I did say—and on reference to "Hansard," you will find it—that if one of our ships went to the pier at Fort Wrangell, and tied up there, and unloaded its freight on the wharf, no doubt we would be called on to pay customs duties; but, so far as the mere question of transshipment was concerned, I did not say that there would be any serious difficulty in the way. Therefore, I think it is a legitimate matter of complaint on my part against those gentlemen who heard what I did say, that they should attempt to bolster up their case by putting in my mouth statements which I did not utter. I take it that the Government, in dealing with this question, were bound to make such a selection of route as would furnish the surest guarantee in its power that we were providing an all-Canadian route. I think we would have failed to meet the just and reasonable expectations of the people if we had chosen any other route than the one we did. It may possibly be, as I have said, that the customs officers at Fort Wrangell may claim, under the regulations of the United States Government, that our transshipments should take place under their eyes. But supposing they should, what great hardship would there be in that? What great wrong would be done to us? That would be only the fair and reasonable exercise of precautions by the United States Government, that before foreign ships should be allowed to take advantage of the right to navigate the Stikine River, which they have under treaty, the United States authorities should, in order to protect themselves against smuggling, or any other frauds that might be committed by persons using that river, exercise this power of overseeing transshipment.

I went on then to point out that if the case were even more serious, the Government had in its power a means by which we could meet the reasonable demands of the people and provide an adequate and complete remedy to any such difficulties should they arise. What was that? I went on to point out that all we had to do was to utilize the railway we were now proposing should be built, by extending it to the south a distance of not over 200 miles, which, we are informed, would then secure entirely through our own territory, an all-Canadian line from the Pacific to the navigable waters of Teslin Lake. Now, I did state that, and in doing so, I think I made a fair statement of the positions in which the Government are. I assume that we are dealing with this question as a deliberative body, I assume that there must be a desire on the part of the hon. gentlemen opposite to deal with the facts as they exist and not to deal with what their imagination may suggest to them. Assuming this, I take it for granted that there will not be, on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite, any motion presented in this House or in committee, during our discussion of this Bill, which will declare that any other route than the one we have chosen was the proper route for the Government to have selected. I venture to predict that we shall have the House with us on that question. We have the country with us, I think, unquestionably, so far as these points are concerned; and I want now to come down to where the controversy really arises. We have the country with us on the question of the necessity for building the railway this year, and on the necessity of getting as long a time for open navigation on the waterways in the fall as possible for the purpose of transshipment, and we shall have the country with us, when fully informed, with regard to the propriety of the route we have chosen.

Then, what are the difficulties or the objections which are fairly debatable with respect to the Bill? They arise, it appears to me, solely and wholly upon and around the question as to whether, under the circumstances, we have been too liberal in the terms which we awarded to these contractors and whether the work ought to have been undertaken and carried through with less land subsidy than that which we have offered. That is the whole question, it does appear to me, and I think that if we approach the further discussion of this measure from that point of view, we will be confining ourselves to a matter which may fairly be open to debate. Now, it is just here that I wish to make some references, and I make them briefly, to the speeches that were made the other day. I find that the hon. gentleman who had the honour to fill the position which I am now occupying (Mr. Haggart) did not content himself simply with stating it once, but repeated that I had said that the goods must be transhipped and that when transhipped they must pay the American duties. I think the hon. gentleman repeated that statement three times, as will appear from reference to "Hansard." The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) fell exactly into the same error, and I am at a loss to see how, if he attempted to follow me in my remarks, he could fairly have committed it. He said:

The Minister of Railways and Canals had to confess that if transshipment took place at Fort Wrangell, the American duties would have to be paid, but he expected that out in the open sea they could not transfer goods from ocean steamers to flat bottom steamers, but would have to go up the Stikine River into American territory, where the American Government would not permit transshipment or business to take place.

My hon. friend from West York will not find in anything I then said, anything which will justify the words which he has attributed to me.

Mr. HAGGART. Will the hon. gentleman excuse me if I interrupt him. He charges me with having attributed to him the statement that the goods which were lightered at Fort Wrangell would have to pay customs duties, he is mistaken. What I said was that they were subject to the American customs regulations—which is entirely different.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman may have intended saying something other than what he did say.

Mr. HAGGART. That is just what I did say. If the hon. gentleman will show me that I said otherwise, then he is correct.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have a clipping here from "Hansard," and according to that the hon. gentleman said :

The Minister of Railways himself says that the goods must be transhipped, and when transhipped must pay duty.

If the hon. gentleman will follow up his speech, he will find that he repeated that statement at least twice. I do not think anything more erroneous could possibly have been said.

Mr. HAGGART. Is that in the "Hansard" ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, I have the clipping from "Hansard," and it is that I am now reading.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What is the page ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have not the page, but simply the clipping.

Mr. MONTAGUE. This is the statement as contained in "Hansard" :

The Americans insist upon making customs regulations in reference to that river, and he must also know that where the Americans have the common right of navigating our rivers we insist upon a similar right of regulating our customs, and have always insisted upon it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman must not read something else, and then say I am not quoting correctly.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What I said is this—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has the right to interrupt provided the hon. member who has the floor does not object.

Mr. MONTAGUE. He has no objection, and the hon. gentlemen behind him, who have raised the point of order, have no right to object. What I said was that the hon.

Mr. BLAIR.

gentleman had not given us the page of "Hansard" from which he quoted and that the quotation I gave was the declaration made by the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart).

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I was saying that the hon. gentleman must not read something else and then ask the House to infer that what I read is not in the "Hansard." I freely concede that the hon. gentleman may perhaps have intended to say something else, but did not succeed in carrying out his intention, and he did succeed—not only once but two or three times—in misrepresenting my position.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is a question of veracity—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Sit down.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will not, until ruled out of order by the Speaker, and no insult from any member on the other side will compel me to take my seat. Mr. Speaker, what I say is this—that the hon. gentleman has challenged the accuracy of a statement made on this side of the House. We have read the statement of the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart), and, if we are mistaken, I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) could very quickly and very easily set us right by giving us the page and line which he relies upon as his authority.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I cannot give the hon. gentleman the page. I am sorry to say, my secretary did not indicate the page ; but I have here a clipping which is marked as being from the speech of the hon. gentleman. I think the page and line can be found, and they will be found for the satisfaction of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman is speaking from a brief, as he was the other day.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman is not wise to jump at conclusions too hastily. I find that the hon. member for West York made a similar statement, as follows :—

The Minister of Railways had to confess that if transshipment took place at Fort Wrangell the American duty would have to be paid.

I cannot give the page of "Hansard" from which this is taken, but this is a clipping from the speech made by the hon. gentleman the other day. I complain of these misrepresentations—and these are samples of many—because, I think, they show an attempt to becloud and confuse the discussion. I think hon. gentlemen opposite would give better evidence of their confidence in their own case, if they relied upon the facts and not upon misrepresentations and misquotations.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. May I be permitted to suggest to my hon. friend (Mr. Blair), that when an hon. member on this side assures him that he has made a mistake in quoting him, and when he cannot find the statement in his speech, as reported in "Hansard," it is not competent for the hon. Minister to charge the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) with having made a misstatement.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think I have gone as far as the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) himself would think he was justified in going, when I admit that, so far as the statement made by the hon. member for South Lanark is concerned, I did not attribute to him any wilful misrepresentation.

Mr. HAGGART. I have read the whole speech, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) will not find in it the statements he attributes to me.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Minister of Railways misses the point. He has read certain words, which he attributes to the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart). His friends beside him have had plenty of time to find it, if it were there. Have they found it?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have not time myself to find it. As I have said, I read from a clipping made by my secretary, who, I think, is a careful man, and the words I have read are the exact words of the clipping.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Let me now come to another class of statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite, referring to the land grant and the value of the lands. The hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) made this statement, as it is given to me, and as I presume it will be found in "Hansard"—

Mr. MONTAGUE. I hear some hon. gentlemen on the other side say, "It is in Wallace's." I think the hon. Minister should now withdraw what he has sa'd.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I will withdraw it the very moment it appears to my satisfaction that it is not in "Hansard."

Mr. MONTAGUE. But the hon. gentlemen about him have told him.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have every confidence of the material which has been furnished me. The hon. member for South Lanark, referring to the question of the value of the lands, said :

Although many Government parties have been sent out to explore the country, I make the statement, that there has not yet been found in the whole of Alaska gold-bearing lands to the extent of 3,000,000 acres ; and the amount you are giving here is not to be judged in comparison with the extent of the whole country, but with the extent of the gold-bearing area, and I venture to say that it will be found to be equal to at least one-half of the whole gold-bearing area of that country.

Now, it does appear a very extraordinary thing that, in discussing the question whether this land grant was an excessive one, such a statement as I have read should be brought forward. Of course, the gold-bearing lands discovered in Alaska do not equal 3,000,000 acres. Has anybody been in a position to affirm that gold-bearing land to the extent of half a million acres, or even a hundred thousand acres, or even a thousand acres, exist in that Yukon territory? As I understand the statements made, they are, that the lands which may be found to contain, in some portion of their area, the precious metals, cover an area of about 125,000 square miles. But I apprehend that no person is insane enough to believe that Mr. Ogilvie or other gentlemen who are informed with regard to that country, pretend to say that all the lands within that area are gold-bearing lands. They simply say that, in their judgment, one could not point to any portion of the country within the area given and say, from its geological or other condition, that the precious metals will not be found in that locality. I suppose that, as a matter of fact, the whole gold-bearing area which has been discovered up to date would not amount to more than one hundred acres, if it were put in a compact area. Still, we find that it contains a great deal of gold. An argument founded upon such a statement as that I have given seems to me to be without force or reason, and cannot be used to discredit the statements I presented to the House. Then, again, the hon. gentleman said :

I think there is not a business man in the country who knows these facts, who, if he had 100,000 acres of gold land—not to speak of 3,750,000 acres—in a section of the country such as this is reported to be—because, after all, we are predicating all we are doing on the information we have at present with reference to that country—there is not a business man who could not raise, under these circumstances, three times the amount required to build this line. The hon. leader of the Government ought to be informed as to whether this is likely to turn out a paying speculation or not.

An argument altogether based upon the presumption that it is possible to go and point, and to learn—I suppose, by means of a divining rod or some other apparatus of that kind—just where gold is, is of no force. Just as though it were not a matter that must depend altogether upon exploration and prospecting. And in connection with such exploration and prospecting there may be thousands of places suspected of containing gold in which not a particle of gold will actually be found. You cannot speak of these numbers of acres, as the hon. gentleman spoke of them, basing his statements upon the presumption that these lands are of necessity gold-bearing lands. If they were gold-bearing lands, we would know how to deal with them. It is a matter of conjecture, as I stated, entirely a matter of chance. Now, some references were made to what is called the monopoly clause, in respect of which the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) misrepresented—though I do not say, intentionally—what I stated. This is what the hon. gentleman said:

He is going to have the tolls reduced 50 per cent in four years, but he does not know what they are to be in the first year.

Well, I stated to the House that so far as the question of tolls was concerned, it was not yet settled. It did not appear to be necessary for the Government to take up the subject of tolls and determine them at this stage. The Government, however, has reserved to itself the right to settle what the maximum tolls upon the road should be, and I take it that the Government will see that no unreasonable tolls are exacted. I notice it is assumed by some hon. gentlemen on the other side—I am not sure but that the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) was the gentleman who made this statement, but I am not going to attribute it to him positively; I can, however, say that it was made by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace)—that $100 per passenger would be a reasonable sum, would be even less than ought to be allowed for the carriage of a passenger over this railway. Well, according to the hon. gentleman's ideas, it appears to me that the company would find him a very desirable person to deal with in regulating the rates.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend is misquoting me. I never made any such calculation.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I say that I can attribute it with certainty to the hon. member for West York.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I rise to a point of order. I made a statement to this House, and an hon. gentleman behind the Minister deliberately contradicted me. I ask whether that is in order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. That is certainly out of order.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I suppose I am the member he refers to, but I did not contradict him. On the contrary, I said that he did not say it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I apologize to the hon. gentleman.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There was, however, one hon. gentleman on the other side of the House who did make a specific statement to that effect, and I will read what he did say as reported in the "Hansard."

Mr. BLAIR.

Mr. FOSTER. Name.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. member for West York.

When I place the rate at $100 per passenger and $50 per ton for freight, I am placing them much below the figures charged.

Now, I would suggest that the company could not get into better hands than those of the hon. member for West York; I think they would be apt to fare very much better if they were dealing with him in fixing the rates, than they would fare in the hands of the Government. It seems to me that, while we reserve the right further to consider the question, the rate suggested by this gentleman was altogether unreasonable, and was an excessive rate to allow for any such purpose. Then in the same connection that hon. gentleman represents that I stated to this House that, in my judgment, and from the information I had received, there would be at least 250,000 people using this railway during the present year; and upon the strength of that assumption, and according to the rate he was going to allow, and that he assumes the Government would allow as the minimum price of fares and tolls over this railroad, he apparently convinced himself that at least ten millions of money would be cleared by the company during the first year's operation. Well, it is no wonder that, with such an estimate, made by gentlemen of the vivid imagination of some of those who discussed this question, that there would be 250,000 people utilizing this railway during the present year, and at the rate of tolls charged that they assume the profit will be enormous. Now, Mr. Speaker, I surely could not have been so understood by the hon. gentleman, I made no such statement. I said that an estimate was put as high as 250,000 by persons who were connected with the transportation companies, as the number who would probably find their way into that country during this present year. I did not represent that I believed the number of people would use this railway if we built it; because people are already commencing to go in there, and before the railway is built a very large number will have gone in. But I spoke of 50,000 as being a not unreasonable estimate. I also said that the tonnage that would be required to supply that number could not find its way into the country except over a railway, and I pointed to that as a reason for the necessity of constructing the railway. That is the way I desired to put it. I think it cannot be claimed that in making the statement which I did to the House, I exaggerated the facts in any way, I think I endeavoured to put them fairly, and within reasonable limits. I think I have grounds for complaint that those hon. gentlemen opposite should have apparently been so unfortunate in criticising the statements that I did make to the House. With reference to what is called the monopoly clause, I want to say one word further. I did not fail to point out to the House that that clause in the contract gave full power to the Government to regulate and fix what they considered would be a reasonable toll. Yet during the course of the discussion, gentlemen speaking upon the subject assumed that there would be no check at all upon the charges that the railway would be allowed to make, and that there would be no maximum rates to which the company would be confined. That was an assumption which will be found running through a number of the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, there is nothing clearer, it appears to me, than the fact that we have reserved in this contract to ourselves the control of the rates. But we have to be careful how we fix them, we have to see to it that the rates are reasonable, and I think that I can safely say now on behalf of the Government, that if this contract is confirmed, we will not be likely to fix the rates at anything like the figure which the hon. member for West York thinks would be a very reasonable sum. Having this power in our hands, we will exercise it with care, and it will be found that no just reason for complaint will exist as to the arrangement we shall make.

Mr. MONTAGUE. May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? I understood him to say that the Government has not yet decided as to what the maximum rate will be.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The rates have not been before the Government, as I have already stated. Those rates are to be fixed by Order in Council, and the time has not yet arrived for the fixing of the rates, and therefore they have not been fixed.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It was only a suggestion, and I know I was completely out of order in making it. But the Government would facilitate the passage of the measure if the rates were considered, and the Government were willing to give an opinion on the subject.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman can rest fully assured that the Government will apply their very best judgment to this question, but they will not be much guided by the expression of opinion given by the hon. member for West York in relation to the tolls.

Mr. DAVIN. Did the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) say it was a reasonable amount?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, I took it so. That hon. gentleman said:

When I place the rates at $100 per passenger and $50 per ton for freight, I am placing them much below the figures charged.

The hon. gentleman based his argument on the assumption that $100 would be the rate the company would be allowed to charge for passengers and $50 a ton for freight. The rates once being fixed, as I think they will be fixed carefully and guardedly, it will be a proper thing after the road has been for a time in operation, when the business has been established, the country developed, and the promises realized in regard to it, that the rates should be reduced, and we have made provision for a reduction after the expiration of four years.

I do not propose to go into further details with respect to the particulars in which I think my statements have not been correctly understood or have been misrepresented. But I wish to offer an observation or two with respect to one charge that has been preferred, or perhaps what I might describe as an assumption which some hon. gentlemen opposite have put forward. It has been assumed that in the explanation I made I had been either unwilling or unable to answer the questions put to me, and I observe that the cue given by speakers on the other side of the House has been taken up by the press, and it has been assumed by the Opposition press on all sides that in introducing the Bill I had not informed myself with regard to some important matters upon which I had been interrogated by hon. gentlemen opposite. I have taken the trouble to look carefully over the report again to see just what were those questions I failed to answer, and from which inferences were drawn by hon. gentlemen opposite which I am free to say were entirely unwarranted. I was asked, in the first place, whether there was not an estimate of the cost of the proposed line of railway. I was asked by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) as to what was the estimated cost of the line. I stated to him that it was estimated to cost $25,000 per mile. Next I was asked by hon. gentlemen opposite whether I was prepared to say that estimate was relied upon by the Government, or something equivalent to that. I am prepared to say here, as in fact I stated at the time, that I did not consider we could place very much confidence on estimates made with respect to the cost of building a railway in that country. The cost of railway construction depends so largely upon climatic conditions, upon the distance it is necessary to carry supplies, materials and plants, and on a variety of conditions involving an unknown quantity that no one could make a very safe estimate as to the cost. I notice an estimate by our engineer in which he says the cost for such a line would be about $25,000 per mile, and I observe there are particulars in that estimate which I do not think I would be warranted in accepting as the cost of railway construction. I have no reflection to make on the engineer's estimate in that regard, but I know it is not a sufficiently large estimate for laying down rails there to place the cost at $250 per mile. That is the cost estimated in this country when every condition is favourable.

Mr. PRIOR. Is that not an estimate for a broad-gauge road?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It would be for a broad-gauge road, but there would be very little difference between the cost of laying down forty-five pound rails for a narrow-gauge and fifty-six pounds for a broad-gauge road. The estimate, if my memory serves me, is $250 per mile for laying down fifty-six pound rails on a broad-gauge road. When that statement is made that such a sum would suffice in that western country, hon. members do not take sufficiently into account the conditions which prevail—that, at all events, is my opinion. We have it that wages rule there somewhere in the neighbourhood of $15 per day, and the cost of supplies is very high; but even if the rate of wages is very much less than I have stated, $250 per mile would be quite inadequate. I would not therefore feel justified in pledging myself to that estimate as one that should be accepted. I observe further that $30 per ton is put down for the cost of rails as being an adequate sum. I cannot conceive that it is possible to purchase forty-five pound rails here or wherever they are manufactured, and pay the freight to lay them down in that distant region at a cost of $30 per ton. I should consider that the freight alone would amount to very nearly that amount; that is my judgment, whether it is right or wrong. So it is folly for hon. gentlemen opposite to assume that the railway can be built for anything like the amount they assume in their statements. Then I am told that I did not answer the question as to what was the area of gold-bearing lands. Who is able to answer that question? I should like to find the individual who would like to commit himself as to the dimensions of the gold-bearing area; if it is wholly problematical; there may be a little or may be much, but for any one to state what he believes to be the gold-bearing area would be simply to trifle with the judgment of Parliament and the country. Hon. members have had before them for a considerable time the statement that in the opinion of the officers of the Interior Department there are 125,000 square miles where-in gold may be found. No man, I think, can say any more than that; and when the hon. member for York asked me to state what was the area of the gold-bearing lands, I in reply acknowledged my want of information on the subject, and every other person, if he were frank, would make a like admission. Then, again, I am told that I did not state the value of the lands which are being granted to the contractors and that as I was absolutely wanting in knowledge, and was utterly unequipped to put the Bill before the House, because I did not give to the House a statement of the value of these lands. Could anything more absurd be suggested than that I should undertake, in my place in this House, to state the value of that acreage? I could not tell; I have not an idea of it; who has? I think I asked a very fair question when I asked the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) if he had any judgment on that matter. He told us he did not know; he could not have any judgment on it, and I have not any, I frankly acknowledge.

We may fairly complain that this question has been approached in a very unfair, and on the whole in a very improper way by hon. gentlemen opposite. They have undertaken to assume that the terms of this contract could not be defended, because they say—some of them like the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) only insinuates but others like the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) makes the bold declaration—that there has been dishonesty in this transaction and that it is founded in fraud. That is the spirit in which hon. gentlemen opposite have been approaching the consideration of this question. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) says:

There is no power that can convince the people of Ontario that there is not a heavy subscription coming out of this deal to be used in the Ontario provincial elections against the opponents of the Liberal party.

That is a bold statement. I was going to say it is a brazen statement, but as I do not want to use any offensive term, I will just call it a bold statement. We have all grades of suspicion, insinuations and charges made by hon. gentlemen opposite. Probably most of them are willing to assume the attitude which was claimed the other night by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) when he said, that the attitude of men in Opposition ought to be an attitude of suspicion.

Mr. MACLEAN. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean) set it out as a cardinal point of his doctrine and principle, that every man in Opposition ought to regard a Minister of the Crown as devoid of all principle and honour.

Mr. MACLEAN. I did not say that.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That practically is the principle which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean) does not hesitate to avow, and he is a leader of public opinion and the head of an influential, and I suppose he would claim, a very good family newspaper. The objections of the members of the Opposition seem to be based upon the assumption, that it was impossible for the Government to deal with this question in an honest way and with an honest desire to arrive at the best solution of the problem which they had to face. That is the spirit in which this subject has been approached by the Opposition. Is it to be wondered at, when such an idea influences hon. gentlemen opposite, that there is extreme difficulty in their discussing the question in a rational way and in a business-like spirit. If the question could be approached in a proper spirit, it would tend much more to the enlightenment of the country, and much more to our reaching wise and proper conclusions.

Now, Mr. Speaker, inquiry was made by the hon. leader of the Opposition, as to whether it was proposed to make any provision whereby this railway, if constructed and the contract confirmed, should be prevented from falling into the hands of foreigners. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) is anxious that Canadian interests shall be fully safeguarded, and that is a very reasonable desire on his part, and one with which this Government fully sympathizes. Their desire has been from the first to preserve Canadian interests at all hazards. There does appear, however, to be a very serious difficulty in the way of our providing that the owners of the stock of the company, when it shall be organized and this stock put upon the market, shall not be able to transfer that stock in the same manner and as freely as all other corporate stock is transferred. That, perhaps, would be an unfair thing to provide. We have never done it before, and in my opinion it would not be a precedent which it would be well for us to establish. But I do think, and it is the feeling of the Government, that we could incorporate in the Bill some reasonable clause which would prevent the possibility of this railroad falling under the control of foreigners. The Government would approve of our inserting a clause somewhat similar to that which was adopted when the Canadian Pacific Railway Bill was before Parliament, and which provided that the majority of the directors should be British subjects. When the Bill is in committee, if it is the feeling of the House that such a clause should be introduced, I do not think there would be any objection to its adoption.

There is another matter which we thought it would be well for us to incorporate in the Bill when it reached the committee stage, and I will mention it now so that it may be understood. We propose to insert a clause which will make the operation of the road obligatory upon the contractors, and after the transfer, obligatory upon the company. There may possibly be a question as to whether a sufficient implication arises from the existing clause to make that duty incumbent upon the company, but if there is any doubt as to that a clause can be inserted imposing that duty upon the company operating the road. With these observations, Mr. Speaker, I move the second reading of the Bill.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have listened with great interest to the speech which has just been delivered by the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), and I must say that I fail to find any very great additional light thrown upon the subject, beyond that which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) gave us on a former occasion; with the exception—and a very important exception it is—that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) recognizes the fact that this contract was entered into without taking that precaution which was taken when the Canadian Pacific Railway charter was granted by this House, and in which was inserted a provision making it necessary, that the majority of the directors of that company should be British subjects. That is a very material matter, and its omission by the Government from the contract goes to show the great precipitancy and haste with which the contract was drawn. I may say, Sir, that having made a few remarks—not exactly upon the subject itself—but in relation to it, I stated I would reserve for discussion on the Bill an expression of my views with regard to the very important question which is now before the House. We have had already, in the debate on the Address, a great deal of discussion on this question, which will render the duty of dealing with it now much less onerous than it would otherwise have been. But I may say that I agree with several of the points that have been submitted by the hon. Minister of Railways. I agree—and I do not think there is any member on this side of the House who differs in opinion with that hon. gentleman—as to the great importance of having this railway constructed. I believe, Sir, that no difference of sentiment will be found in this House upon the absolute necessity of everything being done that can be done by this Parliament to ensure not only that a railway shall be constructed into the Canadian Yukon, but that it shall be, as far as possible, an all-Canadian route. I had the pleasure of spending some six weeks in the province of British Columbia, during which time I gave the closest possible attention, as I stated on a former occasion in this House to this question; and I may say very frankly, that it is extremely difficult for gentlemen who do not give personal attention to matters of this kind, to grasp their importance in all its magnitude. We dealt last session, in the Railway Committee, and subsequently in this House with questions of this character; but I am free to say to the House that, although on that occasion I gave the best consideration in my power to the question of the two charters which were brought before us, I had known absolutely nothing on the subject. When I came to give attention to these important questions on the spot, during my visit to British Columbia, and had my attention drawn to the various means of obtaining access to that country, and when I was called upon to look at this matter in the light of making the development of that great Canadian gold field subservient to the business and trade and prosperity of Canada, I found that its magnitude had not been fully appreciated when we were dealing with the subject in the House last session. I may say frankly to the House, that I do not believe it is possible to overrate the importance to Canada of adopting every measure necessary to secure the trade of that region, which I believe will be something enormous. One would be afraid to venture to use figures in relation to it, because any calculation one would make would probably be regarded as extravagant. I believe it would be impossible to overrate the importance to Canada of securing, at the earliest possible moment, and as far as practicable, an all-Canadian route, so that that great trade shall accrue to the benefit of Canada, instead of benefiting a foreign country. In my judgment, from the first moment the great importance of that Canadian Yukon gold field attracted public attention, there has been a most determined effort on the part of the United States of America and of citizens of that country to grasp and turn to their own advantage all the enormous benefit that is to be derived from the furnishing of supplies to the people who go in there, and to provide for their transit into and out of the country. Therefore, when my attention was directed to this subject, I gave it the most careful consideration in my power, regarding it, not as a party question, but as one of vital importance to every Canadian; and having felt it my duty to examine the question, in the light of all the information I could get while on the Pacific coast, where I was receiving a great deal of attention, I came to the conclusion that the route by the Stikine River and Teslin Lake was, not only the best route, but the only available route for the construction of a railway during the present season. Having arrived at that conclusion, I felt it my duty, as the question was one far above and beyond party, to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), who had been giving it his personal attention, to the subject in an interview I had with him in Victoria; and I ventured to suggest to him, that if the Government of Canada would grapple with that question vigorously, and would undertake to secure the prompt construction of a railway from Stikine River to Lake Teslin, I believed they would receive the hearty support of the Parliament of Canada. I have seen no reason to change that opinion. As I told the hon. gentleman on that occasion, I was known to be strongly opposed to Government railways, as a rule. I pointed out to this House, last year, what had led me strongly to deprecate the construction of Government railways. But this I regarded as a case of exceptional character; and if the Government would take the matter up and promptly secure the construction of a railway that would open up communication at the earliest possible day, I believed that Parliament would take no exception to the course. Well, Sir, I confess that when I suddenly learned—because, as I have said to the House before, I did not know that the Government were in communication with any parties in regard to it—when I suddenly learned, when in Montreal on business of another description altogether, by an announcement in the "Herald," and by some speeches that were made at a banquet the night before by some of the hon. gentlemen opposite, that arrangements had been made for the construction of a railway from the Stikine River to Teslin Lake, I did not hesitate to express my gratification that a measure which I considered absolutely necessary to secure the enormous trade of that country to Canada, in connection with the development of the Canadian Yukon gold fields, was to be adopted, and I perhaps went further than one, under such circumstances, ought to have gone in expressing, not only my satisfaction, but the hope that the measure would be of such a character as would secure the support of Parliament. Having had my attention drawn, in the most pointed manner, to the great magnitude of this trade and the danger that I felt, under existing circumstances, was looming in the near future, of its being diverted away from Canada beyond recall, I expressed the satisfaction I felt that that subject had been taken up and that road provided for. I may say that a good many things have happened since, that a good deal of light has been thrown upon that subject, from that time down to the present, and that we approach it to-day with a fuller knowledge and are in a position to deal with that important measure in all its bearings in a way in which it was quite impossible, with the brief information that we then had at our disposal, to deal with it previously. If I formed a hasty opinion, if I expressed myself strongly on that occasion—but no more strongly than I felt—I did so in the light of all the information we had before us, which I glanced at hastily that morning; and I find that I am not alone in arriving at the conclusion that the character of that measure has been changed in the gravest and most important way by the information which has since been furnished the House. Under those circumstances, I feel it my duty to give to the House the grounds for the manner in which I view that question at present and the grounds for the opinions which I then entertained. It has been stated in the press that the question at present between the Opposition and the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches is a question between the Stikine route, as to which the contract has been made, and another and different route which is promoted by parties with whom Lord Rothschild was connected. I have no hesitation in saying at once that I entertain no such opinion. I have no hesitation in saying that I should oppose much more strenuously the expenditure of a dollar of public aid or any assistance whatever from the Government to the latter route than I would to this. I am not aware that any person on this side of the House has advocated that route. What I understand hon. gentlemen on this side to say is that the fact that a company with which Lord Rothschild was said to be associated was prepared to construct that railway for 5,000 acres of gold lands per mile, instead of 25,000, was the evidence, and the strongest evidence that could be given, that the amount given by this Government is an altogether extravagant grant. I said that although difficulties have presented themselves, difficulties that ought not to have presented themselves in connection with this Stikine route recently, notwithstanding these I do not hesitate to say that I infinitely prefer the route now under consideration to any route that crosses a foot of territory claimed by the United States, and all the other routes to which I have referred are open to that objection. From Pyramid Harbour down to Dyea and Skagway and Taku Inlet—not so much Taku Inlet but all the others; the Taku Inlet route is placed beyond consideration by the fact that glaciers render it absolutely dangerous for vessels to attempt to reach that inlet—but all the other routes from the Pacific coast are, in my judgment, infinitely more objectionable than the route now under consideration. There are other routes—all-Canadian routes. There is the projected route from Ashcroft by the old Telegraph trail away through to Telegraph Creek. There is the route through Edmonton, and also the route from Prince Albert, whose greater length would perhaps render it more objectionable. These are all Canadian routes, but not routes that can be made valuable to-day for the purpose of facilitating ingress into that country. It is on that ground that while I feel that the Edmonton, and the Prince Albert, and the Ashcroft routes will all furnish valuable trails, their long distance from the sea is against their practicability from a commercial and national point of view, as compared with the route chosen. They will be used for the important purpose of carrying cattle and supplies out of the great Northwest and the Peace River to this great Canadian Yukon gold field, and to a certain extent by persons proceeding from the eastern portion of Canada, but it is impossible to expect that they could be used for the purpose of rivalling the modes of ingress that now not only cross territory claimed by the United States but have had the effect of absolutely making Seattle and San Francisco the basis of supplies for the whole of that great Canadian Yukon.

Having said this much on the question of routes, I would draw attention, for a single moment, to the fact that I have not been alone in taking the view I have taken as to the result of additional light that has been thrown on this subject—a subject which has become one of immense importance and to which the attention of the House may be very fairly called. I hold in my hand the views of a portion of the press that only in extreme cases, cases of great importance, they ever venture to criticise the acts of hon. gentlemen opposite, and I would draw attention to the points on which they claim the information first given to the country with regard to this great question is entirely changed. I now refer to the "Daily Witness," of Montreal, which has the following article:—

THE GREAT YUKON BARGAIN.

The details of the bargain with the Mackenzie-Mann syndicate reveal objectionable features that do not appear in the information which came to light before the presentation of the contract to Parliament. It was not then known that the railway was to be a very narrow gauge one. It was not then realized, as seems to be admitted, that the Stikine is not navigable for sea craft, and that bulk must be broken in American waters, and there are, as we have pointed out, possibilities connected with the parcelling of the land grant which are interesting to contemplate.

There would seem, at all events, to be every probability that if there is really any great wealth in the country the syndicate will have no difficulty in reaping the first-fruits of it. It looks as though they would be likely to acquire for themselves or to make a profit on almost all the gold lands discovered up to the amount of their available grant. With the power of laying down a base line as may best suit their own advantage, and with the power of securing an uninterrupted territory of 24 miles long by 3 miles in breadth, it looks as though the syndicate could secure the best of the land without sharing on equal terms with the Government. * * * By getting their land through the syndicate, too, the miners, prospectors, or private companies would only have to pay a royalty of 1 per cent instead of one of 10 per cent.

Now, the basis of this contract, the very ground on which the hon. Minister of Railways claims the support of Parliament and the country for this measure is that if very valuable lands are given to the contractors, the Government will secure lands alongside equally valuable, because they have the alternative lot of three square miles. I will deal with that question too, but in the meantime I will—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That gentleman is evidently in error, is he not?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will endeavour to show my hon. friend that he is not in error. I will produce a diagram for the consideration of this House, which I believe will startle the hon. gentleman. It will deal with this important question, which lies at the root and foundation of the whole measure. There is just one sentence more:

By getting their land from the syndicate, too, the miners, prospectors, or private companies will only have to pay a royalty of 1 per cent instead of 10 per cent.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). What is the date of that?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is dated the 11th of February, after the contract was brought down. And, so in the case of the editor of this paper, having, on the first blush, given an enthusiastic endorsement to the scheme, he is obliged to qualify it by pointing out the reason of his change on facts revealed by the contract and the papers. I only draw attention to this because I think hon. members are entitled to the fullest explanation from me as to the reasons which have induced me to take the position that this contract is so improvident as not to entitle hon. gentlemen to ask the favourable judgment of this House upon it.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the House rose I had drawn its attention to the fact that the Montreal "Witness" had shown six important points in which the country had not been informed of the character of this contract until the contract and papers were laid before the House. I do not intend to speak longer on that point.

I have to deal now with another question of the greatest character—the question of private tender. If there is one point on which hon. gentlemen opposite placed themselves on record in the clearest manner during the time they sat on this side of the House, it was the gross impropriety of the Government of the country entering into a private contract with any parties for any purpose. And I can also say that, that the gentlemen who sit on this side of the House always agreed most cordially with the principle, making an exception only of cases of such urgency as to make it absolutely necessary in the public interest to pass by that important parliamentary principle of public tender and contract and adopt a private tender. But, the reasons must be of the strongest and clearest character. Well, Sir, the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, in introducing this Bill, of course, felt that this was a very important question and one to which he must address himself: and he appealed to this House to relieve the Government on that question and not to hold them responsible for the violation of the well established principle that all important matter should be submitted to public tender, upon the plea of urgency. I am sorry the hon. gentleman is not in his place, but I am not very much surprised. I must deal with him, however, as though he were present. A number of his ministerial colleagues are here, and their being here will make his absence of less importance. He disposed of that question and swept away every ground of excuse on the part of the present Government by almost his first sentence in introducing the Bill. This is what he said:

Hon. members of this House will recollect quite clearly that before the close of last session, evidence was pouring in upon us of the immense discoveries of gold that were taking place in the Yukon district, and returning parties from that remote region were bringing us the most fabulous accounts of its mineral deposits. * * *

It became clear to us that we should immediately address our attention to dealing with these problems in a manner which would be most efficient and most promotive of good government and the general welfare and prosperity of the country. Now, in obtaining information with regard to the probable influx of people into that country, we were led to believe that the number of people who would be likely to seek the Yukon region during the present year would be exceedingly large. I believe that agents of transportation companies, who have the means of acquiring accurate information and forming a pretty fair judgment, advised us—some of them did—that as many as 250,000 people would be wending their way into the Yukon country during the present year.

Now, Sir, I need not add another word to show that, according to the Minister of Railways and Canals, this Government, in July last, before this House rose, were in full possession, were in full knowledge, of the condition of things which then existed and which was likely to exist. They had before them the fact that there were enormous gold discoveries, and that an enormous influx of people would go into that country during the present year, and all that we have learned since, according to the declaration of the Minister of Railways on the floor of this House, the Government had before them. What did they do? Why, they were bound at once to ask this House then in session—for he says it was before the House rose—to clothe them with power to deal with the extraordinary and unexpected, but absolutely revealed, condition that then existed before the country. Is that reasonable, or is it not reasonable? They do not say that it was during the recess of Parliament, when the representatives of the people were not here to be consulted, but they say that they knew, that they had the whole thing before them, that parties well acquainted with the subject had estimated that 250,000 people would go into that country this year; in short, that there was then existing a condition of things of the gravest and most important character. Now, I say to those hon. gentlemen opposite that they failed, utterly failed, in the discharge of their duties to this House and to this country when, under those circumstances, they went to sleep, and instead of dealing with the great public emergency, as they ought to have dealt with it, they adopted a course of absolute do-nothing, leaving this Government and this country in a very unfortunate position. Why, Sir, is there a Canadian within the bounds of this wide Dominion who had not a blush of shame upon his face, when he found the United States Government proposing a vote of $200,000 to keep people from starving in Canada, and to obtain shelter, protection and food for a great number of people within the bounds of Canada? Why, Sir, it was a disgrace to this country, a disgrace brought upon this country by this Government. Now, with the knowledge which the Minister of Railways and Canals declared the Government possessed before this House rose, did they take any action? We find that Captain Walsh, a very able man, was appointed by the present Government, but altogether too late in the year to go into that country. With the knowledge which the Minister of Railways tells us they had before them, was it not their duty to take measures by which communication should be kept up with Dawson City, with the 6,000 or 7,000 people in it? Nothing was easier. At that time they had that information before them, everything was open and palpable, but they did nothing. They waited months and months, junketing about the country, first in one direction, then in another. I do not know if my hon. friend the First Minister is responsible for that, because he had other duties to perform, and was not here. But I say that his colleagues whom he left behind him, shamefully neglected their duties to this House and to this country. In July last, when this House was in session, was anything easier than for them to ask their friends in this House—and their opponents in this House would have joined them with perfect readiness in placing at their disposal any sum of money that was needed to protect Canada from the disgrace that has fallen upon it. Well, Sir, what did they do? Every person knows that all they had to do was to establish two posts between Teslin Lake and Dawson City, or between Tagish Lake and Dawson City, and provision those posts, as they could easily have done at the time; and then mail communication and personal communication with Dawson City could have been kept open with perfect ease throughout the entire year. And what has been the result? Captain Walsh was sent out, but too late to get into the country, and after wasting hundreds of thousands of the public money of this country in trying to get provisions and supplies over White Pass, he struggled on to Tagish Lake, and then made a desperate effort to get down when too late in the season. There is their officer and his mounted police, at an enormous expense to the people of this country, making a vain effort to get into that country, and they are not there yet. And what is worse, thousands of pounds' worth of provisions, and even valuable lives, have been lost in an ineffectual effort to get into that country. That is the position, Sir. Talk to me of urgency! talk of urgency in letting the contract on the 25th day of January in reference to this matter! Why, Sir, it is an insult to this House. Look at the public records, and you will find that these hon. gentlemen who appear to have no knowledge, no information, concerning that country, yet had in their hands, in the archives of the Government, Mr. Ogilvie's survey of 1887, describing the whole country, describing all these routes, describing everything; and he is a man whom they have shown that they regard, and properly regard, as entitled to their confidence, a man who, by every act of his since the hour that he was clothed with official power in that country, down to the present, has shown that he was worthy to be in the civil service of Canada. That man, Sir, had made a survey of this country, and he had given evidence that was then lying in their archives. They had no occasion to go to any further trouble, as they must have known, seeing, if they could see anything beyond their immediate surroundings, the absolute necessity of immediate action, but they remained asleep and allowed this country to drift into the position we now find it occupies, not only throughout this continent, but throughout the continent of Europe, the most humiliating position that it was ever placed in. Does not a blush of shame rise to the face of every Canadian, when he knows that throughout Europe, throughout the civilized world, people were reading of this wonderful thing, that the Government of a foreign country had absolutely to go to their Congress and get a large vote of money to keep people from starving in Canada? Why, Sir, it is calculated to bring contempt and disgrace upon the people of this country. But it was part of the design of that country alongside of us, from the first hour of these great gold discoveries down to the present hour, to take advantage of them, and they have succeeded until now in making all these things serve their own purposes, and contribute to the advantage of their own countrymen, instead of ours. That is the position. It was heralded all over the world that the gold discoveries were in Alaska. When the matter was investigated it was found that instead of being in Alaska they were in Canada, and all the Alaskans deserted their country to seek for gold within our territory. The gold discoveries in Alaska were so utterly insignificant compared with the rich gold fields of Canada, they rushed over the border and entered our country in order to enrich themselves. I believe this proposal was only an attempt, an attempt I am afraid that was too successful, on the part of the people of the United States and its government to take advantage of this pretense to get a large quantity of American goods into the Canadian Yukon gold fields without paying duty, when they saw no other means of doing it. That is my impression, and the very fact that not an ounce of food has reached that country, although we hear, from day to day, from our Yukon territory, and that there is no anxiety whatever in regard to the food question, goes to support my impression. But a government never committed a more gross dereliction of duty in the history of Canada than when, knowing, as the Minister of Railways and the Government did know in July all about the transportation problem, they allowed the opportunity to pass and Parliament to separate without giving them authority or means to deal with this question.

Well, Sir, what then? They employed Mr. Jennings, a civil engineer of the highest character and the highest standing. And in naming that gentleman I feel bound to say that I never witnessed such a spectacle as this House witnessed to-day, and I hope never to witness such a spectacle again. I ask the oldest member: Did you ever know a Minister of Railways lay on the Table of the House the report of an engineer, and then spend one hour in decrying him and seeking to prove that he did not know what he was writing about? When asked what authority the Government possessed for taking steps in regard to the railway contract, they brought down this report and laid it on the Table. Why did the Minister of Railways act in a manner that had never been followed before under any Government, spending a large portion of his speech in showing that his engineer knew nothing and that he could teach him the first principles of engineering? I may fairly compare my knowledge of the administration of the Department of Railways with that of the hon. gentleman who now occupies that position. I have spent years in that office and had an opportunity of learning that there is no man in the public service more entitled to the confidence and respect of the House and the country, or of the Government of the day than Mr. Jennings; and yet we had to listen to this tyro in the administration of the railway system telling the House that Mr. Jennings does not know what he is talking about, after he has placed Mr. Jennings's report on the Table of the House for our information. What is the meaning of it? The meaning is this, and I will explain it to the House. I may say that I never exchanged a word with Mr. Jennings except to shake hands with him in Victoria and ask him some casual questions, to which he replied: "You must excuse me, Sir Charles. I am a Government officer and cannot say a word on any of these matters, except to my Government." I quite recognized his position, and accepted the statement. But when the Minister of Railways has brought Mr. Jennings's report here, what is the reason he is denounced by the head of his own department? Because from cover to cover there is not a word or a line in the report that does not condemn the contract. Show me a single word in Mr. Jennings's report that does not condemn the contract, and then I will retract what I have said. Mr. Jennings has no desire to condemn the contract, he wants to give all the support he possibly can as an engineer to the Government under whom he serves; but he is an honest man and has a reputation to sustain that compels him to tell the plain, unvarnished truth when called upon by the Government for a report.

When did Mr. Jennings commence this work? The Minister has told the House that this was a vital question for the whole country. Hon. members will be astounded to learn from Mr. Jennings's report that he commenced the work on 25th September, at Stikine. That is late enough—that is bad enough. What was done during all the intervening period? July, August and September, three months gone and not a blow struck, not an attempt made on the part of this Government, knowing as they did, as the Minister of Railways has admitted, the great urgency of the case and the importance of immediate action; they slept for three months before they put an engineer in the field in order to get the information they required. But they did not require it. They had Mr. Ogilvie's report and survey, the accuracy of which has never been questioned, covering the whole ground and dealing with the whole question. The Minister of the Interior met Mr. Jennings on 25th October, a month afterwards. Does any man mean to tell me, does any intelligent man in this country believe that Mr. Jennings, coming on the steamer from Wrangell to Victoria with the Minister of the Interior, did not give him every particular with respect to this matter? Does any man mean to say that Mr. Jennings said: You must wait, Mr. Minister of the Interior, till I make my report, which will take some time. It passes belief. I know the Minister of the Interior well enough to be satisfied that before he had been three hours with Mr. Jennings he would be in possession of every fact and all the information. Mark, that was on 25th October.

On 1st November they came to Victoria, and I had there the pleasure of meeting them on that occasion.

When was this contract signed? The Minister of Railways tells us that the Government were compelled to violate that sacred principle recognized throughout the world that public contracts must be let by public tender, and only in case of most extreme urgency would the Government be justified in doing anything else. When, I repeat, was the contract let? On 25th October the engineer completed his work and the Minister was put in possession of all the facts, but the contract was not let until 25th January. Does the hon. gentleman mean to tell me that when they were in possession of all the facts and in possession of Mr. Jennings's report on the 25th October, they had not an opportunity of giving out the work by public tender and contract? It is an insult to the intelligence of this House and an insult to the intelligence of the country. I do not hesitate to say that Mackenzie & Mann are two of the most eminent contractors in Canada, their characters are the highest, they are men of great ability and resources, as every person knows, and they are well qualified to take charge of a public work; but there are scores of contractors as good as Mackenzie & Mann. Why did not those other contractors have a chance? If the Government did not wish to advertise, why did they not send out a leaflet or memorandum to a dozen of the great contractors in Canada to say: We are proposing to construct a railway from Stikine River to Teslin Lake; we want to know what is the smallest quantity of gold lands in the Canadian Yukon country you will take to do the work? It would not take long to write that out; it would not take long to put it in the post and place it in the hands of a score of the best contractors in Canada, and if the Government did that I will undertake to say that they would have a different story to tell now. But, Sir, that is not what the Government wanted. They wanted to put this contract into the hands of particular persons. That is perfectly evident. Why should they stake their reputation; why should they give the lie to all the declarations they have made in this House for twenty years, if they had not an object by secret and private tender to prevent the carrying out of that great principle for which they have fought and contended on the floor of the House. I want the Government to answer that; and, Sir, they have got to answer it to the intelligent people of this country. It is because for some reason best known to themselves—I will not make an insinuation because I am bound to believe that everything is honourable and straightforward, unless I know to the contrary, and I do not know anything to the contrary. That I say frankly, but I do say that the Government must answer to this House and answer to this country, why they should give this enormous territory of the gold lands of this country to Mann & Mackenzie for constructing this 150 miles of railway. I defy them to give an answer that will satisfy the honest, independent yeomanry and electorate of Canada. I say I defy them; I do not believe it is possible for them to do so. I have shown that in July last they knew they required that work to be done, if they knew anything, and I have shown that in October they had their engineer's report in their hands, or at least he was in communication with the Minister of the Interior, who could learn everything he wanted to know in the course of a few hours. Yes, the Government continued down to the 25th of January, in secret without any knowledge on the part of anybody—aye, more, dangling contractors upon their hands, and having them hovering about the office of the Minister of Railways and Canals, and negotiating with him month after month. They deluded and deceived these people, who at large cost to themselves were here in Ottawa for the purpose of seeing the Government with reference to the construction of this work; and these people woke up one fine morning to see they had been trifled with, and that this contract was handed over secretly and privately to Mackenzie & Mann. That is the condition of things and I do not believe hon. gentlemen opposite can justify it. If they can I shall be very glad to hear their justification.

But, Sir, what more? When this contract was signed, the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), whom I do not see in his place—as I said before I am not surprised at that, for of all the speeches that I ever heard before in this House, his speech on the introduction of this Bill was the most astounding—except the one he made to-day. It is only fair to him to say that he went one better to-day, but with that exception I have never seen such a spectacle. What must his colleagues have thought of him? There is a party in the United States of America—I am not very well versed in American politics, and I do not know quite what their principles were—but I know they were called Know-Nothings.

Mr. FOSTER. They are all dead.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, but there is one remaining, and he is here, and he is the Minister of Railways and Canals of Canada.

Mr. FOSTER. He is dead too.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He has not the vitality he formerly had, but he is here at all events, and I could not help thinking of that interesting body of American politicians when I heard the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) undertake to introduce this measure to the House. The Minister of Railways came back here to-day, and instead of giving us any information, which we were all hungering and thirsting to obtain with reference to this marvellous work, no wonder he spent a couple of hours or whatever time it was, talking about everything except this contract. He (Mr. Blair) had a long discussion with my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart), and he (Mr. Blair) could not be convinced that his clerk who had made out his speech for him it appears, did not correctly get everything down, and so he was prepared to swear for the clerk and against the "Hansard," and against everybody else, rather than to admit that he was making a very curious spectacle of himself. The Minister (Mr. Blair) is not here to-night, and I am afraid that poor clerk is being birched now for failing so signally in making out his speech for his august Minister. Let me read, for the information of the House a short but pithy extract from a very independent political journal in Canada with reference to the speech of the Minister of Railways (Mr Blair) in introducing the Bill. It says :

The Minister of Railways does not know the probable cost of the Yukon Railway ; he does not know if the Government engineers were ever asked for an estimate ; he does not know anything about the value per acre of the land the Government is giving away ; he does not know how far it is to Tagish Lake ; he does not know whether there will be any difficulty with the United States customs about making connections between his new railway and the Pacific Ocean ; he does not know anything about the rights of Canada at Fort Wrangell ; he does not know the position of the United States Government with regard to allowing Canada to tranship at Fort Wrangell. But, for all that, we notice, the Yukon Railway contract is made between Her Majesty the Queen, represented by the Hon. A. G. Blair, Minister of Railways and Canals.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Montreal "Star."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, the Montreal "Star," a journal that in the throes of the last general election was a supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite ; a journal that abandoned the support of hon. gentlemen opposite when these gentlemen forgot what they owed to themselves and the country. That is the paper to which I allude.

Sir, is it any wonder that after such a criticism as that, stung to the quick, the Minister of Railways and Canals comes into this House, and instead of talking about the Stikine and Lake Teslin Railway enters into a discussion in which he is all wrong about what hon. gentlemen on this side of the House had said, and the criticisms of that journal. Every man in this House

knows—none better than the gentlemen who sit behind the Minister of Railways and Canals—that every word of what the "Star" states is true, and that more profound ignorance never was exhibited on the floor of this House by any man who ever undertook to expound a Bill. Then, to make the spectacle utterly sublime, to make the spectacle surpass anything we had ever witnessed in this House, we find the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) taking up the rest of his time in denouncing the engineer upon whose report he asks us to adopt this contract. And why ? Because, as I have said, the Minister could not find a line in the whole report from "A" to "Z" but what condemns the contract and shows that this Government stand arraigned to-day before this Parliament, and before the people of Canada for having made a contract that no man in their ranks is able to justify. We have seen in this House a spectacle that it is not often our lot to witness. We have seen red-hot shot fired into the Government from this side of the House day after day and hour after hour, met by dumb silence. Why ? Because hon. gentlemen opposite had no answer, and because my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who is a great tactician, I admit, finding that the rank and file of his party were rising in revolt against this monstrous contract, passed the word amongst them, "silence," if any one speaks we will be ruined, if one man speaks he will be answered by the man alongside of him." I congratulate my right hon. friend upon observing these tactics in reference to that matter. But we did get a few words out of the mouth of a gentleman, who we believe has the Lieutenant Governorship of the Northwest Territories in his pocket. That is the only man in the whole party, who has a word to say in its favour. It is not for want of ability. We all recognize the ability and talent of hon. gentlemen opposite, and we know that whenever they have a semblance of a case, they will put it with all the force and all the tact in their power ; but it is only when they are brought face to face with a condition of facts for which they have no answer, that they are compelled to fall back on a policy of silence, in the hope that that will protect them. Was it or was it not right, I ask, that the people of Canada should expect this Government, before signing a contract by which they were giving 3,750,000 acres of rich gold lands to a company of contractors, to have made known to themselves what our rights at Wrangell were ? The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, that distinguished Know-nothing, who has signalized himself by the introduction of this Bill, and who has again signalized himself to-day by, if possible, greater ignorance of the measure he undertook to introduce to this House, can perhaps answer. Tell me, I ask the hon. gentleman, in the presence of this House, how you dared to put your signature—he did not put his signature, he got some one else to do it—to that contract without first knowing what the rights of the people of Canada were at Fort Wrangell? You admitted, in your speech on the introduction of the Bill, that you did not know anything about it.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman will please address the Chair.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He admitted, Mr. Speaker, that he did not know anything about it. It was vital. You were giving away 3,750,000 acres of the rich gold territory of Canada for the construction of a railway—what for? For the purpose of making an all-Canadian route. Were you, or were you not, bound in honour—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Was he, or was he not, bound in honour, I say, to ascertain before he signed that contract whether it would be of any good to us—whether we would be blocked at Fort Wrangell? Is that a reasonable question, or is it not? The hon. gentleman, when he was asked that question, on the introduction of the Bill, said, "I do not know." And so he said to any question of any importance that was presented to him, from the commencement to the end, "I do not know; I do not know anything." He was a Know-nothing. What more? Why, Sir, every person knows who knows anything about this subject—I have the evidence here under my hand—that at Fort Wrangell, under the treaty between Russia and Great Britain, we had an absolute right to free egress and ingress over the River Stikine, to and from the ocean, and that without any hindrance whatsoever. The United States bought that country, but they could not buy what Russia could not give. Unfortunately, by an oversight, that treaty was renewed with the United States of America, who knew that the people of Canada and every British subject in the Empire possessed an indefeasible right to go in and out of the River Stikine without let or hindrance of any kind whatever—these are the words of the treaty; and in the new treaty they provided that we had the right of free navigation of the Stikine River, subject to such regulations as might be found necessary.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Who was to blame for that?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, Sir, I will not go into that. There is an old classic adage which my hon. friend will understand without my calling it to his attention, that prevents a single word. But we were taken advantage of by the United States of America in the construction of the present treaty, and they are in a position to give us hindrance; and, therefore, I say this Government, before they gave away this gigantic territory of Canada to two contractors, were bound to ascertain whether we could use the road profitably after it was constructed. That is the position I take, and I think it is incontrovertible. I have the evidence of that, in the shape of a telegram which I have in my hand, headed "United States Action—the All-Canadian Route." I have told you that, from the first hour the United States found that these great mineral treasures, surpassing perhaps anything the world has ever seen, were on the eastern side of the boundary of Alaska, they have been working might and main, pulling every string; and this is one of the reasons why I agree with the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, that it was vital to Canada to get an all-Canadian route. We know what has happened whenever any of our people have had to cross an inch of their territory. What happened last year, when poor Canadians wanted to cross a strip of territory which nobody can say belongs to the United States—because it is disputed; and it is a most unfortunate condition of things that it is in dispute. When they approached the disputed territory, a poor Canadian was taken by the neck and was told, "You cannot take your horses there until you pay $30 a head." That is the way the Canadian was treated, and that is the way we may expect to be treated by that great republic so long as the public men of Canada are ready to rush to Washington and get down on their knees. I say the time has come when, in my judgment, Canada will be compelled, in vindication of its position, to assert in the clearest, most emphatic and distinct manner its independence of the United States of America. Thank God, Sir, we are independent of that country. We have a territory, we have resources, we have everything that makes us and our country the envy of the world. That is our position, and we are in no sense of the word dependent. But so long as a Government can be found in this country which, every few days, is prepared to send one of its numbers to Washington—I am glad to see the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) in his seat. I blushed with shame when I read in the "Globe," the other day, the statement that he had gone to Washington to go down on his knees again.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. That is not my habit, and I find it inconvenient at present.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am glad he does, and I hope he will never do it again. We have had too much of it. What have you got for it? Look at the history of the relations between the United States and Canada, and let me ask Canadians, what have we got by truckling to those people? We have got Alien Labour Bills, McKinley tariffs, Dingley tariffs, and now we have this measure at present before the Congress of the United States. After tolerably reasonable arrangements had been made, which were announced by the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) the other night, what follows?

The next day, Mr. Frye, a Senator of the United States, introduced a Bill into the United States Senate to adopt a policy by which if a Canadian vessel, in the enjoyment of her indefeasible right of navigation from the mouth of the Stikine River, should neglect at Fort Wrangell to pay a certain deference and respect to the United States authorities, what happens? Is she fined? No, but confiscated. That is the position. That is the result of all this abject humiliation which we have exhibited towards the United States. Sir, the time has come, I do not hesitate to say, when, if Canadian rights are to be maintained in Canada, we have got, as a Parliament and Government, to show that great republic that while we are ready to do everything men can do to maintain the most friendly and harmonious commercial and every other kind of relations with that great country, we are not prepared to sacrifice the indefeasible rights of Canadians at their bidding.

What reason have they for supposing that they can trample on us with impunity? Sir, my right hon. friend has given them the reason. When seeking the suffrages of the people, he followed me to Windsor, and there outbid me on this question, as he did on other questions in Quebec and Ontario. When I went there—I had been a good while out of the country, and if I saw Mr. Taylor, the hon. member for Gananoque in the House, I would have to apologize to him—but when I went there and they told me the position they were in, I said in the public hall at Windsor, in the presence of a large body of Americans: Gentlemen, you have stated to me that you are labouring under gross wrongs, that the rights and privileges we give to Americans on this side, are denied to you when you cross to the bordering republic, and I have no hesitation in saying that if I should be sustained at the polls, I will introduce a Bill into the House of Commons, unless those unfair labour laws are repealed in the United States, which will be word for word and line for line, the same as theirs. I will give them back a little of their own medicine. Sir, what happened? My right hon. friend followed me there and outbid me. He found that the heather was on fire, and he said that the moment he obtained power he would endeavour to have those laws changed, and if they were not changed, he would have a similar law passed by the Parliament of Canada to protect the rights and interests of Canadians. Well, Sir, after he did gain office, what did he do? He called to his aid that Machiavellian colleague of his, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

(Sir Louis Davies) and said to him: My dear friend, I want you to engineer this little matter for me. I have pledged myself personally and in every other way that I would retaliate on the United States and I am in a very tight place. And my right hon. friend got his colleague to emasculate the Bill and then put in a suspending clause. That suspending clause is in operation to-day, and so long as it is, the United States will say: Our rifles are met by pop-guns; we can fire away, and there is no danger of their hurting us. Sir, they know my hon. friend is not prepared to keep his word to the electors in this any more than in anything else. He has sacrificed the electors, and the result is our American neighbours go on, step by step, trampling on the rights of Canadians from day to day with perfect immunity. That is the condition of things, and that will have to be met. I do not hesitate to say, as a public man—and I take the responsibility in the face of the world—that my policy would be to treat the United States of America precisely as they treat us. In reference to alien labour laws, tariffs, mining laws and everything else, I would mete out to them the same treatment.

Look at Canada to-day, and what do you find? Why, you find the humiliating spectacle, that while no Canadian is permitted to cross the boundary of the United States and dig a pound of ore out of a mine or do a day's labour in the mine, much less than own one, you will find Americans coming into Canada and taking in the great district of Rossland and throughout British Columbia and now away in the Canadian Yukon gold fields—the best that can be found—with the freedom and audacity of full-fledged Canadian or British subjects. Is that fair or just or right? I asked my right hon. friend to lay on the Table of the House, if he could, a carefully prepared estimate from the best sources in his power of the amount of gold taken out of the Canadian Yukon gold fields, and by whom taken out. Let him lay such a statement on the Table, and I undertake to show that for every dollar a Canadian has got, an American has got $500. Is there a man in this country who will say that that is right, considering the laws that the Americans enforce against us, and the manner in which our people are treated when they go into the United States on a similar errand. I trust the day will come when this Government will see that they owe it to the independent character of Canada and our people to say to the American republic: Unless you change your system, we shall treat you as you do us. They could not complain. Imitation is the sincerest flattery, and I would flatter them in that way. I would copy, line for line and word for word, their laws in relation to tariff as far as I could. When they were putting up the McKinley and Dingley tariffs, I would not have taken off the duty of corn and let it free into this country to impoverish our farmers, nor would I have reduced the duty on iron so as to let the Americans come into Canada and take work out of the hands of Canadians, but I would adopt in tariff matters, mining, labour, and everything else in this country precisely the policy they adopt towards us. Could they complain? They could not with the slightest show of reason, but it is because we have submitted from day to day and from year to year these exactions and this injustice at their hands, and for that reason alone, that you have these regulations about the Stikine, of which I make no complaint, followed up by the Bill introduced into Congress that proposes to strike down those regulations and completely paralyze Canadian trade. What does the despatch from Washington say? It says they are going to use that Stikine question to secure for the American fishermen permanent bonding privileges, on the Atlantic coast. They have an eye all over the world for their own interests and have no hesitation in making use of every right which Canada is entitled to and can justly ask, to force from us some concession to which they have no right.

The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, who I am sorry was not here when I was paying him a little attention a short time ago, says he cannot tell of anything about the tolls to be charged on this proposed railway. What is the reason? This is not a private but a public matter. It is not a private matter between the Department of Railways and Canals and Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann. It may be that the Government are keeping this as a little string to pull whenever desirable. But that is not business. It is a public matter which this House has a right to know. Have not the thousands of Canadians, who want to go into that Canadian Yukon country, the right to know something about what tolls they will have to pay over this railway when it is built? Why do you hold over these contractors, in 'terrorem,' this means of pressing them? There is no reason for your doing so. The hon. gentleman as usual does not know. So far as I can learn, he does not know anything about the department over which he has undertaken to preside. If he did, he would know it was his first duty to this House and the country to make a fair, honest, candid statement of what he is prepared to do for Canadians who require to go over that road. Is not that reasonable? He says there has been no estimate made. Well, he is wrong as usual. There has been an estimate made. If he will look at the report of that distinguished engineer, Mr. Jennings, whom he took half an hour to-day to discredit, after asking us to pass a contract on the faith of his report, he will find that Mr. Jennings estimates the cost per ton at $50 to be carried over that railway. If he will look at page 24, he will find that an estimate has been made of the cost of the road. And mark you, Mr. Speaker, in this estimate, Mr. Jennings was speaking—not of a tramway, not of a narrow-gauge railway, not of a railway with second-class rails and engines and cars, bought for a song from the Lethbridge road—but of a first-class railway. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals said to us: Just think of the freight on these rails and these locomotives and other things that have to go in. He assumed they were coming from Europe, I suppose, or the United States of America where he is so fond of going when he wants railway supplies. The hon. gentleman does not seem to know anything about the contract, and he will be surprised when I tell him that the rails are second-hand rails of 28 pounds to the yard and require to be freighted only from Lethbridge to Vancouver and sent by steamer from Vancouver to Glenora. Mr. Jennings estimates that the cost of a railway—not a narrow-gauge railway with second-hand equipment, but a properly constructed railway with rails of 56 pounds to the yard—will be $3,200,000. It costs $3,957,000 for 208 miles, and I want to know from the hon. Minister why he is building the railway from Glenora. That is not the recommendation of Mr. Jennings. All the authority that we have in relation to this matter is Mr. Jennings's report. He never recommended a railway from Glenora to Teslin, but from Little Cañon, 96 miles from the sea, and 208 miles from there to Teslin Lake. What did he say? Perhaps I had better read it. It is very interesting, and I think it will be new to the Minister of Railways and Canals who, probably, has not seen it. What does the hon. Minister think of the engineer who he sent out, and about whom he had such a small opinion when he referred to him to-day?

At times the river is too low for speed with a reasonable cargo, or, the stream may be very high and the riffles—

What does that mean? I confess, I do not know. I must fall back upon the Minister of Railways and Canals to know what "riffles" are. What is a "riffle"?

—the riffles difficult to make headway against, with the additional danger—

Mark the word. We are going to entrust the lives of Canadians to this river.

—of drift trees or snags getting foul of the steering gear or wheel. The latter danger is most to be feared when the channel is contracted, such as in Little and Klootchman's Cañons, where, if any mishap occurred to the vessel's machinery, she would at once be carried against the rugged rock walls by the swift, swirling disturbed waters.

We have listened two days to the Minister of Railways and Canals and he never told us that.

The distance of 96 miles between Wrangell and Little Cañon can be made by a powerful steamer in one day, whereas by reason of the swift and difficult water above it takes two days more to reach Telegraph Creek, a further distance of only 54 miles, or 150 miles from the sea. Therefore, with these facts before one, it seems reasonable that on a route where safe and speedy transit is contemplated, it is advisable to commence the railway section well down the valley at a point to be determined on below the Little Cañon, and on the left bank of the river, 96 miles from the sea.

I am in the judgment of the House when I ask the Minister of Railways and Canals why he made a contract to build from Glenora or Telegraph Creek, when he had the declaration of his engineer, an able and experienced man, that the proper place to build from was 96 miles further down at a point that could be reached by a steamer in one day and the dangers and disasters of attempting to go beyond avoided. We have had no light upon that subject, we have had no explanation whatever. According to the engineer it would only cost $746,000 more to build from there than from Glenora. When you are going to give away a country as large as England to secure the building of this road why should you not require the contractors to spend this additional sum in order to get a safe and proper road where your own engineer stated it could be made. The estimated cost of that road from Glenora to Teslin Lake under this contract was $3,200,000. Mr. Jennings has actually ventured—I am afraid he will get into trouble—to make an estimate of the cost of carrying passengers and freight, and the Minister of Railways and Canals has placed it on the Table—I suppose he did not see it. Mr. Jennings estimated that for 12,000 passengers, a very small number compared with the 50,000 that the Minister was prepared to carry into that country, at five cents a mile—a very moderate charge of which I do not think any one will complain—there will be a revenue of $99,000.

The freight at $50 per ton amounts to $450,000. The gross earnings, Mr. Jennings estimates therefore for this company on this 150 miles of railway, are $494,000. Now, the Minister of Railways and Canals will find here an estimate made by a man who knows what he is doing—for I know him to be a man of the highest character and standing as an engineer—and his estimate proves that the working expenses will be only $55,000 a year, while the profits will be $494,000, about half a million a year of profits on 150 miles of railway.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). The engineer speaks of other deductions besides the working expenses.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Of course you cannot build a railway without paying interest on the money, you cannot carry on a railway without depreciation. But I am showing that on that 150 miles of tramway, running through that country, with second-hand rails, half a million dollars a year is a pretty fair profit, even if they did pay interest on the money. I did not require to refer to either depreciation or interest, for everybody knows these have to be borne by the contractors. But here is the fact that the cost is $3,200,000, and after deducting the working expenses on the utterly insignificant estimate, in my opinion, of what the real number would be, that is 12,000 people instead of 50,000 people who would go over the road, still you have half a million dollars profit. Now, under these circumstances, I think the House will begin to wonder what induced this Government to take the course they did. Can anybody understand why they should, under these circumstances, hand over 3,750,000 acres of rich gold lands to these contractors for building 150 miles of railway where it ought not to be built, a railway which is dangerous to get at, according to the engineer's statement, instead of going a little further down stream to the Little Cañon and building there? Can anybody explain what induced these gentlemen to make such a bargain? Why, you have only to take the report of the engineer to find that, having given them permission to enter upon the ground and build that railway, and levy these tolls, that ought to have been abundantly sufficient without giving them anything else, and the contractors would still have had a handsome and promising commercial enterprise. But, you say, it has to be built in a hurry. We are told there was urgency, urgency from July last, although the Government had the report in their hands of an able engineer who had made a thorough survey of all this country, they had the report in their hands in July last when they knew this had to be done.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. What was the date of Mr. Ogilvie's report?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. 1887.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. But the month?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Oh, I do not know; I am in the same position as the Minister of Railways and Canals.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Let me inform the hon. gentleman that Mr. Jennings's report was not made until the 25th of October, 1897.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am talking about Mr. Ogilvie's report, which you had in your possession since the Minister of Railways declared in this House the other day that everybody was excited in this country, and he foresaw what a tremendous rush of people there would be.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I did not say anything of the kind.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Why, I have read to the House the words of your speech. The hon. gentleman does not even know that. This is what he said :

Hon. members of this House will recollect quite clearly that before the close of last session evidence was pouring in upon us of the immense discoveries of gold that were taking place in the Yukon district, and returning parties from that remote region were bringing us the most fabulous accounts of its mineral deposits.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is something altogether different from what the hon. gentleman said.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What did I say ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. member stated that I said in my explanation the other day that the members of the House knew, before the close of last session, that crowds of people were then pouring in and would be pouring into the Yukon country, whereas I said nothing of the kind.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, I will read that to him also :

Now, in obtaining information with regard to the probable influx of people into that country, we were led to believe that the number of people who would be likely to seek the Yukon region during the present year would be exceedingly large.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Does the hon. member say that I stated the other day that that information was procured and was in the possession of the Government before the House prorogued last session ? Because that is what is now stated.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have shown the hon. gentleman the evidence of his declaration that before the House rose this excitement prevailed with reference to the Yukon country.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is one thing, but the hon. member has stated a totally different thing, and has put into my mouth a statement that I did not make.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman does not state the particular day on which these transportation people gave him this information. But at the same time he speaks of this wild excitement, he goes on to speak of the people that would be pouring into that country, and would be coming out of it. That was in July, therefore I have shown that the hon. gentleman's statement that there was any urgency is contradicted by his own evidence given to the House when he said he had before him, before the House rose, the data upon which he ought to have asked this House to clothe the Government with authority to deal with a matter of such urgency, and to advertise for tenders.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. member must not say that I said we had this information in our possession at the time the House prorogued last year, because we did not have it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I tell the hon. gentleman that he had the information in his hands before the 25th day of October, when Mr. Jennings made his report.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is a totally different thing.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Minister of the Interior had this information, and yet the contract was not made until the 25th of January. Therefore, there was abundant time for the Government to have asked for tenders, to have sent out a message to a score of contractors, if they could have taken no other way, in order to ascertain for how much of these valuable gold lands in the Canadian Yukon they would build this 150 miles of railway.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Does the hon. member say, even assuming that to be the case, that that is his justification for attributing to me a statement as made before the prorogation of Parliament last year, which I did not make ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is very apt to build mountains upon mole hills. The hon. gentleman, in the speech in which he told us of the public excitement, tells us also of the information which he had. But he does not give the date. Therefore, I am to assume, what everybody in this country with a head upon his shoulders would assume, that when he describes the fabulous wealth of that country, and the people that were pouring into it—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. What I did say, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will permit me, was that we set to work to procure information after prorogation, and the result was the information which I laid before the House the other day.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, I did not draw the dates to a week or to a month. But I say that no person on the Treasury benches can deny that they had the clearest information a Government could have, as to the probable great influx of people into that country.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. When ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Why, from the very day that you learned, before the House rose, what the Minister of Railways and Canals has told us in his speech.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Not at all. The hon. gentleman is stating what is entirely incorrect.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman had Mr. Ogilvie's report, dated July 27th. Does he deny that an officer of the highest character and standing in the service of this country gave him under that date the information which I have quoted?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I think that on the date mentioned the Government had no reason to expect a large influx of people into the Yukon country. When I speak of a large influx, I mean a large body of people such as could not be handled with existing resources.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman had no idea from the report of his officer and the evidence given of enormous gold discoveries that there would be a large influx of people, he was the only man who failed to entertain that idea. But the hon. Minister's own officer on 27th July, said:

News has gone to the coast; an unexampled influx is expected next spring.

I think the hon. gentlemen had better find some other grounds of controversy than the small points they have endeavoured to raise in respect to this matter, for such will only cover them with the greatest confusion.

But I do not intend to be turned aside from the argument that I wish to address to the House on this subject. I have already stated to the House that at one time I was Minister of Railways and Canals, and I may as well repeat it in the presence of the Minister of Railways. I have been for a long time a member of this House. I have stood here as Minister of Railways. I was in this House when that great man, for a great man he was, Alexander Mackenzie, filled the office of Minister of Public Works, which then included that of Minister of Railways and Canals; but to-day was the first time in my experience when a Minister of the Crown so far forgot himself as to lay a report of an engineer on the Table of the House and ask the House to accept that as evidence, and then stand up and decry that engineer and attack his report. That is a spectacle which remained for the hon. gentleman to exhibit: it has never been exhibited before and for the respect of Parliament I trust it will never be exhibited again. What more? Mr. Jennings has shown—and I have shown him to be a high authority—that the profit on the railway per annum will be half a million dollars, without anything else. What do those gentlemen do? They give to the contractors 3,750,000 acres of choice, picked gold lands over the Canadian Yukon gold field. I was amazed, I had no idea of that when I first saw a notice of the contract. I never dreamed that the contractors were to be permitted by the Government to select

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

3,750,000 acres of choice gold lands in the Canadian Yukon gold field.

Some little question was raised to-day about what Mr. Ogilvie said. I trust that the Minister of the Interior will not be driven, as the Minister of Railways has been driven, to decry his own officer in order to endeavour to bolster up a bad case. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) stated in the House the other day an important fact. The Minister of Railways, it appears, does not know anything about the gold fields, whether they are worth anything, he does not know whether gold deposits exist, or how far they are of value, or whether they have any value; but the hon. member for North Wellington told him the other day, on the authority of Mr. Ogilvie, that there were no less than 80,000,000 of acres of gold-bearing lands in the Canadian gold fields of the territory. Is that a good authority, or is it not? If it is, then I think the hon. Minister must not tell the House that he knows nothing of the Canadian gold fields, whether they are worth anything, or whether 3,750,000 acres of land will be merely a burden on the hands of the contractors who own them. I was amazed when I found this bargain had been made. I had no conception of it until this contract came down. And then what did I find? Did I find that the statement of the Minister of Railways which he ventured to make to the House was correct? The very reverse. He said that although they were giving the contractors this large territory of gold-bearing land, whatever the value was Canada would possess an equal value.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That we held alternate blocks.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman mean of equal value? If the hon. gentleman will refer to the arguments he used in favour of the contract he will find that the idea presented was that whatever value the contractors got, Canada would have an equal amount. An examination of the contract, however, discloses the startling fact, for it is a startling fact, that the gentlemen who made the contract have been too much for the Government, that the Minister of Railways and the Minister of the Interior have been dough in the hands of the contractors, that they moulded the Ministers to their own liking, and hon. members can see that such is the case if they read the contract. Read the clause that relates to the disposal of the gold lands, and what do we find? Clause 12 says:

12. The lands shall be selected by the contractors along base lines, and the base lines may be of two kinds:

1st. The contractors may take as a base line a line which will correspond with the general course of any lake, river, stream or watercourse, such line to be determined by survey, or approximate survey, to the satisfaction of the authorized agent of the Minister of the Interior, and to follow the general course of the lake, river, stream or watercourse for the required distance; and

2nd. The contractors may take as a base line a line commencing at any point located by them and running from such point due north, east, south or west. The land along a base line shall be divided into blocks, each block to extend 3 miles along the base line and to extend 3 miles backwards on each side of the base line. On each base line there shall be at least 8 of such blocks, but there may be more at the option of the contractors. These blocks shall be numbered from 1 up consecutively, the odd-numbered blocks shall be the property of the contractors, the even-numbered shall remain the property of the Government. The contractors shall take at least four blocks on each base line established by them for the purpose of selection but shall not be bound to take more, but they may take as many more as they desire and as circumstances permit. Thus, upon each base line so established there shall be laid out a tract not less than 24 miles along the course of said base line by 3 miles on each side thereof in width, making eight blocks of 3 miles by 6 miles. Provided that if in the selection of lands along any base line the courses thereof prevent rectangular blocks being laid out, such blocks shall be adjusted to the required angles, preserving as far as practicable, blocks of an area of 3 miles by 6. Any shortage or surplus of such area shall be adjusted by the prolongation or shortening of such base line.

That, I take, Sir, is the clause of the Government. But the contractors pushed in the last clause. It was perfectly obvious that they were too many altogether for the Government, and they got this clause put in which gives them a complete control of all the rich available gold land throughout the territory. This clause which I shall read is in complete antagonism with the whole basis laid down, which is, that there shall be alternate blocks, and that if the contractors got three square miles of valuable gold land the Government would get the next. I am right, am I not? I do not think the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) has read the contract or he would not give such a ready acquiescence. The clause says:

The contractors may also at their option select additional blocks lying on either end of any odd-numbered blocks, along the base line, but such additional blocks must be three miles square each, and they shall not exceed three in number on each end of each such odd-numbered blocks.

What is the result of that? It is perfectly startling when you come to examine it. It is inconceivable that any gentleman who knew anything about this business would have been guilty of such a complete sacrifice of the interests of Canada. I do not hesitate to say, that under these two clauses these contractors are in a position to go over the whole of the Canadian Yukon gold field, and get everything that is of any value and leave the Government practically nothing. I shall show the House upon what I base that statement. Here is a diagram, and I trust some means will be found of embodying it in the "Hansard" for it reveals the whole story. What is the fact? Mark, not the Government, but the contractors start the base line where they please. They run north or south or east or west, wherever they think it is in their interest they should run. Suppose they find that there is a valuable streak of rich alluvial gold-mining property for 24 miles, and they want it all themselves and do not want the Government to have any, what will they do? They will start the base line at a right angle with it, and they will give the Government the even-numbered sections, taking care that the odd-numbered sections they take are full of gold. They give the even-numbered section that has nothing in it to the Government.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, that is it, look at the diagram. They then put three blocks of three square miles each on the end of the gold streak in both directions, and they have got 24 miles of rich gold land three miles wide, and the land alongside has nothing on it. If gentlemen on that side of the House think that is justice to Canada, then they have not investigated the subject. Here is a memorandum based on the Mann-Mackenzie contract given in the Montreal "Star" of the 9th February, 1898, which states exactly the terms of the contract, as I have read them:

MEMORANDUM BASED ON THE MANN-MACKENZIE YUKON CONTRACT, AS GIVEN IN THE MONTREAL "STAR" OF FEB. 9, 1898.

By the terms contained in section 12 (2) it would appear that the Government stipulated for the reserve of alternate blocks on the base line in order to take an equal share with the contractors in any benefits arising from the minerals distributed in the neighbourhood of the locations selected by the contractors.

But, apparently at the instance of the contractors, a proviso was added to section 12 (2) of the contract, which proviso will enable the contractors to exclude the intervention of reserved Government alternate blocks in the mineral-bearing direction they may find yields remunerative returns.

The accompanying explanatory sketch is made roughly to a scale of $\frac{1}{4}$ inch to a mile.

Under article 12 (1 and 2) the contractors have the right to locate their base lines—of not less than 24 miles in length. The base lines are to be divided into lengths of 3 miles. Across the dividing points are drawn divisional lines 6 miles in length, forming 8 equal areas of 3 miles by 6 miles. Each of these is called a block, and the blocks are to be numbered consecutively from 1 to 8, or more if the contractors desire longer base lines.

The odd-numbered blocks—and at least 4 of these on a base line of 24—are compulsorily assigned to the contractors. The even-numbered blocks are reserved by the Government.

The central shaded portion of the accompanying sketch—extending 3 miles on each side of the base line—falls to the contractors.

The unshaded parts of the central portion are alone reserved by the Government.

So far the object the Government had in view in arranging for alternate block reserves is provided for by the contract.

But the proviso added to section 12 permits the contractors to select, if they wish, three additional blocks, each of three miles square, at each end of each odd-numbered block on the base line.

The additional lots which the contractors may at their option select are shown on the sketch. No provision is made in their case for the reserve of alternate blocks.

Assume, then, that the contractors have gained information—through their own prospectors or other channel, such as the opening up of claims—that along the line covered in the sketch by block III. and its 6 additional 3 miles square blocks, there is rich mineral-bearing land. All the contractors will then have to do to secure possession of it uninterrupted by alternately reserved lots, is to select a base line so that it shall cross the valuable site at an odd-numbered block.

The area which the contractors can thus secure, uninterrupted by alternately reserved blocks, is 24 miles in length by 3 in breadth (or 72 square miles)—sufficient, probably, to embrace all the valuable mineral-bearing land discoverable in one neighbourhood—and even to include the valleys of streams.

Moreover, as illustrated by the sketch, the terms of the contract permit the contractors to secure 4 such areas in connection with even the minimum base line of 24 miles in length—or in all 288 square miles in any district they may select.

The argument that the provision in the contract secures to the Government equal chances of equally rich land with the contractors is fallacious, for the proviso to section 12 enables the contractors to arrange for the choice of a base line so located that they may have no intervening reserved lots interrupting their selected mineral-bearing land.

Also, the enormous areas which the contract permits the contractors to secure in any part of the Yukon district is calculated to stay the immigration of gold-seekers.

Now, Sir, I submit that that is an unvarnished statement of facts, which proves conclusively that the Government have been completely outgeneralled by the contractors, and that the contractors are in a position in laying out their 3,750,000 square acres of gold-bearing country, with such information as they will command, to completely exclude the Government and to exclude the mining population from anything like a fair or just opportunity of competing with them.

I want to draw the attention of the House for a moment to another point, and that is that the Placer, Gulch, River, and Creek claims will average considerably less than one and a half acres in size. 3,750,000 acres will make 2,500,000 claims, for which prospectors must pay a rental of $15 a year each to the Government, or $37,500,000 a year rental. How does that strike hon. gentlemen?

THE MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If it were true, it would strike us very badly.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, I want to know whether it is true or not true, that you give 3,750,000 acres of gold-bearing lands to this company without one dollar of rent, and that you charge to every poor miner who, at the risk of his health and life, goes into that country to struggle for his family, $15 a year rental. I say that the rental on the gold claims you give to these contractors, if applied in the same way and at the same rate at which you apply it to poor individuals, will equal $37,500,000 per annum.

THE PRIME MINISTER. That goes with the statement about the wheat in Manitoba.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My right hon. friend will, I trust, remember that that is an old story, as unfounded as anything could possibly be. My right hon. friend will know that that was a calculation to which I never committed myself in the slightest degree. When I read it to the House, I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), "Have you seen that calculation?" And he said, "Yes." I simply read the arithmetical calculation, which was perfectly correct, but I never endorsed any expression that such an amount of wheat would be raised in the North-west Territories, and I think it is time my right hon. friend let that buried slander remain buried, as I do not think resurrecting it will be creditable to him or to anybody else. It has been too often refuted to require any further notice on my part. I do not say that amount would be realized to the contractors; but suppose one-half, suppose one-fourth, suppose one-tenth of it would be, is that nothing? Is $3,000,000 per annum nothing to give to these contractors? And that would not be one-tenth of this amount. I am giving the calculation arithmetically, and I say it is monstrous. It shows that these gentlemen did not examine this matter when they went into it. There is another thing. For every claim you give to the prospector, he has to take out a free miner's license at a cost of $10 a year; and, assuming that there is only one prospector to each license, though there may be half a dozen, and every one of them requires a mining license to work in the mines, on the 2,500,000 claims the Government would receive $25,000,000 per annum in licenses. My right hon. friend may think that this is a matter of amusement, and may be disposed to treat it jocularly; but I tell him that the intelligent people of Canada will not treat it jocularly. I say, the hardy miners, who have gone into that country at the risk of health and life, in the hope of bettering their condition, will not treat it jocularly, when they find that they and every person they employ will be obliged to pay $10 a year into the coffers of this country, while Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie are in possession of 3,750,000 acres of these lands without paying a single dollar. The hon. gentleman will find, I think, that the intelligence of this country is too great to laugh down any statement of that kind. What more, Sir? That would be the result, to say nothing of the royalty. That would be a concession to these contractors, as against the miners who occupy an equal space in the country, of no less than $62,500,000 a year. Suppose it amounted to only one-tenth of that, you still have a frightful exhibit, which I do not think will be regarded with amusement by the people who suffer from it. Well, Sir, what more? When you say to these poor men, who have perhaps mortgaged their farms, as many of them do, for the purpose of getting the outfit and the provisions necessary to last them a year, that, for every ounce of gold they take out of the bowels of the earth, after $2,500 have been deducted, they must pay the Government of Canada 10 per cent, what do you think will be the feelings of every one of these men—and there will be a hundred thousand of them at no distant day? What do you think will be the attitude of these men, who find that rich contractors can get 3,750,000 acres of this land without paying a royalty of more than 1 per cent on all the gold they take out, with all the other enormous advantages they enjoy while the poor individual struggling miner is compelled to yield up to the Government 10 per cent of all the gold he takes out? As I have said before, suppose that, with all his industry and the industry of the people he is able to employ, he takes out, in the course of a year, $22,500, what becomes of it? You deduct $2,500 under your mining laws, and you make him pay you $2,000 out of the remaining $20,000; and every person knows—it is the history of gold-mining throughout the world—that every pound of gold extracted from the bowels of the earth has cost a pound to take it out.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). What will Mackenzie & Mann be getting, if it costs them a pound for every pound of gold they will get?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may tell the hon. gentleman that the men who have been engaged in wringing the gold from the bowels of the earth, and have spent their lives in the work, have not had the soft spot that Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie have. Of course, men have made gigantic fortunes in gold-mining—hundreds of thousands of pounds sterling in a comparatively short time; but other men have lost it. But take the average production of gold-mining throughout the world, and it will be found that it has cost practically a pound of expenditure for every pound of gold that is got out.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I want to put this to the hon. gentleman. Suppose a poor miner, by his energy and industry, gets $22,500 of gold in a year, and spends $20,000 in doing it, the result is, that he has at the end of the year $500, and the Government has $2,000, for his year's toil and difficulty. That is an illustration, and one that is germane to the subject under discussion. I put this in all seriousness to the hon. gentleman. I say, that a more damning evidence of injustice to the poor miners of this country cannot be left on the records of this country than to maintain a royalty of 10 per cent against individual miners, and to allow these contractors off at 1 per cent.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). That is the way to despoil the Americans, those people you think so much of. Three-fourths of the miners are Americans, and you get it out of them.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not quite know what my hon. friend means. I dare say he thinks he does, but I do not. What I say is this, and I do not thank my hon. friend for endeavouring by interrupting me to change the current of my thought, when I am engaged fighting the battle of a class of men in this country who, almost above all others, are entitled to the respect and consideration of this House. Where is the Canadian, from one end of this great country to the other, more entitled to our sympathy and consideration than the man who leaves home and wife and children—everything that is dear to him—and goes out to that Yukon wilderness to struggle to better his condition. I say he is entitled to respect and consideration, and I say more. I say to the Government, in all seriousness, that a graver mistake they could not, in my judgment, make than endeavour to wring that ten per cent out of the individual miner, and I will tell you why. Sir, an act of injustice inflames the minds of everybody. And when these people learn that these contractors are only paying one per cent into the treasury of Canada while ten per cent is wrung out of their hard earnings, you will make of every miner that enters that country an enemy of the Canadian Government. These people will conspire to cheat and defraud the treasury, and they will feel that they are only doing justice to themselves when they adopt every means to prevent that flagrant wrong being done them, and the treasury of Canada will get less money at the end of the year out of this ten per cent than they would out of one per cent. In Nova Scotia the royalty is 2½ per cent, in Ontario I believe there is none, in British Columbia there is 1 per cent royalty on gold, and in the Yukon the Government propose to put on 10. I say that under the circumstances, to collect that revenue you will have to send out there a body of mounted police who will more than eat up all you will get out of these miners, and I trust, from the bottom of my heart that this matter will receive the attention from the Government which it deserves, and if this contract is to be forced through Parliament with all its injustice and extravagance, I trust that, at all events, this blot upon the transaction of charging the poor miner 10 per cent and these contractors only 1 per cent will be removed.

I do not intend to detain the House further than to say that while most anxious to see this all-Canadian route opened as promptly as possible and to see a course taken that will enable the development of this great gold field to proceed rapidly, while most anxious to witness the effects of that development of the trade and commerce of Canada, I believe the Government on this occasion have the opportunity, deeply interested as the American people are in this gold country—such as they never had before and probably never will again—of obtaining the revision of these unjust laws passed by the United States against Canadians, and I trust they will make use of that opportunity, and the result will be an entirely different condition of legislation in that great republic.

While feeling anxious to see an all-Canadian route open and while feeling that this was as near to an all-Canadian route as we could obtain this season, I hold the Government will be compelled to go a step further. I believe that, to get an all-Canadian route the Government must, directly or indirectly, on fair, honourable and just terms, secure the extension of the railway from Portland Channel or Observatory Inlet for 200 miles on to Telegraph Creek, and thus obtain from an ocean port in Canada an all-Canadian route that will be worthy of the name.

I thank hon. members for their indulgence. I had no idea of detaining them so long; but the question was of so grave importance, that I thought it would be an injustice to the House and to myself if I did not express my views.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. (Mr. Sifton.) Inasmuch as the administration of the Yukon district, of which so much has been said, has fallen largely to the charge of the department of which I am the head, it has been thought well that I should make some observations explanatory of the position of the Government and of the facts and circumstances leading up to the introduction of this Bill, although such explanation might possibly have come more properly, under other circumstances, from an older and more experienced member of the Government. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), who has just sat down, has been a long time in public life. He has told us a great many times, in the very short time I have been a member of the House, that he has been Minister of Railways and Canals, and that he has been High Commissioner. He has been at intervals Finance Minister and High Commissioner—in fact, we hardly knew, those who were not in the confidence of the Government, whether the hon. gentleman was inside or outside of the Government. Then he was for a very brief and much regretted period Premier of Canada. And now he occupies the responsible position of leader of the Opposition—at least, Mr. Speaker, he is the titular leader of the Opposition; but after the address to which we have listened to-night, coupled with what we have heard and seen during the last month or so there remains a very serious and grave doubt as to whether he is the leader of the Opposition or whether, to use a vernacular expression, the tail wags the dog or the dog wags the tail. The hon. gentleman I hope will not take offence if I make use of an old adage, and suggest that I may be permitted to quote Philip sober against Philip drunk, and to indicate to the hon. gentleman that it requires a much more lucid and coherent explanation than he has favoured us with to-night to explain the radical change in the views he entertained in regard to the contract which is now before this House. The hon. gentleman has favoured us with several expressions of this kind since I have been in the House—that he had never in the course of his parliamentary experience seen such an exhibition as this, that or the other. Will he say if he ever, in the whole course of his parliamentary experience, saw an old and experienced leader of a party dragooned in the light of day by the fag end of his party into abandoning his position upon a public question? I do not want the hon. gentleman to take offence at what I say, for the expression is only used because it is an adage and I do not coin it myself—but we heard Philip drunk to-night and now I ask the members to listen to Philip sober. The hon. leader of the Opposition was Philip sober when he was interviewed, and when he expressed his opinion in the "Mail and Empire" of January 28th—I suppose that is the date, as the interview is dated the 27th January. The authenticity of this interview is vouched for by my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean), the gentleman who in the Conservative party fills the role of private detective and regulator of the party leader. It appears that Sir Charles Tupper was asked by the correspondent of the "Mail and Empire" to state his view regarding the arrangements the Government had made. This is what he said:

He stated that the route chosen is the best that could have been selected. "When I was in the west," he said, "I made inquiries, and I reached the conclusion that Canada ought at the earliest possible moment to have communication with the Yukon. I impressed it upon the British Columbia Government that it should co-operate with the Dominion Government to insure the construction of a link between the Stikine River and Teslin Lake. At Winnipeg I declared that the undertaking was a necessity, and when I returned to Ottawa I went immediately to Mr. Sifton. I impressed upon him the absolute necessity of opening up the route to secure Canadian trade. I said to him: 'You heard my arguments against Government construction on the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. I am willing to withdraw all that if you will go ahead and give that country a railroad. As a matter of principle, I am opposed to Government construction, but here is a case in which I quite concede the country ought to be prepared, if necessary, to build the road in order to secure an all-Canadian route and to secure the trade of the Yukon for Canada.' "

The hon. gentleman was willing to change his opinion in the course of twelve months. I have no doubt he thought then that that was a rapid change, but it is nothing to the change that has taken place since then. He is acquiring greater rapidity in changing his opinions as time goes on, and if he does not get better control of the hon. member for East York, I fear he will be obliged to change more rapidly still.

As to the arrangements made with Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, Sir Charles Tupper said that they were men who had the capital, resources and energy to carry it out. They were probably the only men in Canada who could put the undertaking through in the time that it was specified.

The same hon. gentleman to-night stood up and held his hands up high and declared that this Government should have given to all the contractors in Canada an opportunity to tender for this work, and he demanded of the Minister of Railways and Canals and of the Government why it was that we did not give to every contractor in Canada such an opportunity. Yet he himself had declared on the 27th of last month that these contractors were the only ones who could do the work within the time. It is surely not necessary to follow in detail an address composed of criticisms of that kind. I will not weary the House by following the hon. gentleman's incoherent abuse of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals, but I may be allowed to refer to a few of the eccentricities of his address. Now, Sir, he considers that the Government ought to have acted with more promptness. But so many of his followers—if he has any, if they can be considered his followers, but at any rate some hon. gentlemen on the other side—think we have gone too fast. But the leader of the Opposition thinks the Government ought to have acted more promptly. This interview is a very valuable document, and it is very desirable that it shall very fully and completely be embalmed in "Hansard" immediately after the speech of the hon. gentleman.

Sir Charles considers that the Government ought to have acted with more promptness. That much valuable time had been lost, and if his suggestions had been acted upon, the project would be in an advanced state by now.

Of course, we know that if the hon. gentleman's suggestions were acted upon in all cases there would be no blot upon the Administration, everything would be done exactly as it ought to be done.

The fact that a trail was to be put through in six weeks, so that the distance between the Stikine River and Teslin Lake may be covered in three days, is in his judgment of great importance. He thinks shelters should be erected at suitable places for the accommodation of the flood of traffic that will go in.

The contract provides for them.

The completion of the road by September is slower work than might have been done had the question been grappled with earlier. Still, it will be of the utmost importance to Canadian interests.

It is difficult to understand how we could have gotten the ice out of the Stikine River by making the contract earlier, but the hon. gentleman seems to think so, and I am giving his opinion.

Sir Charles gives the Government credit for acting with such vigour as it has shown, and asserts that the opening of the Canadian route was strongly urged by him upon both Governments interested as the proper course to pursue. He does not anticipate any trouble with the United States in transferring cargoes from the ocean boats to river boats at Wrangell.

Neither did my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, and yet the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) spent nearly an hour in abusing the Minister of Railways and Canals for using an expression almost precisely similar to that used by himself in this interview.

If, however, such should happen, Canada has Fort Simpson to fall back upon which will be equally serviceable.

That will be interesting in the light of the criticism the hon. gentleman has addressed to this House to-night on the subject of this contract.

The hon. gentleman, when he rose this afternoon, evidently addressed himself to the task of getting out of the difficulty he was in, of turning his back upon this question, and of explaining the extraordinary change of attitude. He evidently felt very much oppressed by that task. But I notice that he addressed himself much more cheerfully to it this evening. Possibly the idea had just occurred to him that he could draw a red herring across the trail by indulging in an hour's abuse of the Minister of Railways and Canals, an idea which, apparently had not occurred to him in the afternoon. So, as the main reason why he changed his attitude upon this question, he said, that further light had come to him. And, as one of the other great authorities which had changed its opinion on account of the new light that had come, he quotes that very reputable and well known paper the Montreal "Witness." At least, he quotes part of it. I suppose it would not be kind for me to refer to the fact that sometimes the hon. gentleman does not quote the whole of a document which he submits to this House. In this particular case he has not quoted the whole, or even the material part, of the document which he was reading for the purpose of explaining the position he took before this House. Now let me read it :

The details of the bargain of the Mackenzie-Mann syndicate reveal objectionable features that do not appear in the information which came to light before the presentation of the contract to Parliament. It was not then known that the railway was to be a very narrow gauge one. It was not then realized, as it seems to be admitted, that the Stikine is not navigable for sea craft, and that bulk must be broken in American waters, and there are, as we have pointed out, possibilities connected with the parcelling of the land grant which are interesting to contemplate.

Will the hon. gentleman say that these were the reasons that caused him to change his opinion, and that the "Daily Witness," of Montreal, is in the same position as he is upon that question ?

An hon. MEMBER. Read on.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Well, we will read the balance of it :

We doubt, however, if a business man acting in his own interest would, even with all considerations fully before him, recall the bargain as a whole, if he could, much as he might wish he could alter many of its details. We doubt if any of the Government's critics would, were the case their own, recall the bargain.

The hon. gentleman quotes as a reason for changing his opinion, an article which approves of the contract, and states that it would not be recalled if it could be. Now let me—

Mr. DAVIN. Read all the article.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I trust that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) will not allow this debate to terminate without addressing the House on the subject, and he will have an opportunity of reading the article himself when he comes to speak. Another thing which the hon. gentleman did, and which I thought was somewhat beneath the dignity of a gentleman of his age, and position, and experience, was to make an attack upon my hon. friend the Minister of Railways which was totally unjustified by anything that was said by my hon. friend. He alleged, again and again, that the Minister of Railways had attacked the engineer of the Government, Mr. Jennings. Now, I listened to my hon. friend when he was speaking, and I think I know an attack when I hear it, and I think I can recognize whether a gentleman speaking of an engineer's report, is speaking in a hostile tone and attacking it ; and I assert most positively, and there is no man who listened to my hon. friend who will not assert with me, that there was nothing whatever in the words of the Minister of Railways to justify the statement that he made an attack upon the engineer's report, nothing whatever. Mr. Jennings made an estimate of the cost of a railway.

Mr. SIFTON.

If the hon. gentleman will read that estimate he will come to the same conclusion, in the light of his great railway experience of which we are so constantly reminded, as my hon. friend the Minister of Railways came to, as I come to, as anybody will come to who reads that report, and who endeavours to get any knowledge whatever of the actual cost of the work. He will come to the conclusion that that estimate was based on normal prices and normal conditions, and that abnormal prices and abnormal conditions such as will prevail in the execution of this contract, must be taken into account when the cost of the work which is going to be done by these contractors, is taken into consideration. That, it appears to me, is a fairly intelligible proposition, and it is a proposition which no intelligent man reading that report, can fail to grasp. That is the proposition which the Minister of Railways made this afternoon ; I make that proposition now, and I am not attacking Mr. Jennings, the engineer, who was employed by me for the purpose of making that report, and who has my complete confidence, and the complete confidence of every member of the Government. If the hon. gentleman will take the trouble to look at the report and see the prices that are figured on there, he will see that ordinary prices and ordinary cost of material are all that is figured on ; and extraordinary conditions, the extraordinary difficulties of getting freight up the Stikine River, the large number of special steamers that have to be purchased and employed by them for that purpose, all the difficulties that crowd upon contractors when they are forced to do their work --all these circumstances have to be taken into account ; and I am satisfied myself that one-half more at least than the price Mr. Jennings has placed there would not more than satisfy the increased cost that will be brought upon these contractors by reason of the extreme haste with which the work has to be pushed along. I have thought it necessary to mention that fact simply because of the unreasonable and, to my mind, the ridiculous attack that was made by the leader of the Opposition upon the Minister of Railways and Canals in connection with that phase of the question. Then my hon. friend spent a large portion of his time in endeavouring to play upon words, to attach a meaning to a casual sentence in my hon. friend's opening statement in connection with this Bill, that nobody had the slightest idea was intended to be conveyed by that sentence. There is no necessity for misrepresentation, there is no necessity for trying to twist things into what they do not mean, and what everybody knows they do not mean. We all know exactly what we knew last session about the Yukon country ; there is no dispute about it. If I recollect aright, the printed report was not brought down before the House prorogued, but at the request of some hon. members I had some copies made of the most interesting portion of Mr. Ogilvie's report, and my hon. friend the member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) particularly asked for a copy, and copies were given to him and given to others, and we know perfectly well what information was in our possession. We had the information of Mr. Ogilvie's report in which he says that there had been some extraordinarily rich finds of gold made, and that there was likely to be an influx of people. An influx of people would be understood by any intelligent man at that time, reading that report about a far-off and almost unknown district, a district that had attracted no attention whatever, a district that had not attracted the attention of the late Government sufficiently to induce them to provide the most ordinary facilities for the administration of law, until a change of Government took place, and this proper provision was made—I say that what any person would have understood by that, what I understood by it, what the hon. member for Lambton understood by it, what all the members who discussed the British Yukon Railway Bill understood by it, what the leader of the Opposition himself understood by it, was that there would probably be a few more hundreds of people going in, a few more hundreds of miners going into that district, than had gone in the previous year. This mining had been going on since 1886. In that year the Stewart River was prospected and worked, and ever since that time odd companies of miners have been working there. But will anybody in his senses undertake to say that when this Parliament prorogued we had any information whatever which led to the supposition that tens of thousands of people were going to the Klondike district last fall and the coming year? Why, nobody dreamed of such a thing. It is easy to be wise after the event, and if the hon. gentleman can prove events backwards, and hold people responsible for not knowing what is going to happen in the future, then he can hold his political opponents responsible for a great deal, and it would be a very convenient method of political argument. But I assert, Mr. Speaker, that there has not been one moment of delay in connection with any of the work devolving upon the Government of this country by the development of the Yukon district. I assert that the hon. gentleman can take the records of his party, he can look back over the history of the development of the great west, and he can find, time after time, when prompt action was required, no action was taken by the late Government, as a result of which they had two rebellions on their hands, and millions of dollars of the people's money were lost. Why, Sir, at the very earliest moment we could get any definite information, we acted; and I say no one in his sense would have been justified in taking the opinion of Mr. Ogilvie—who for two years had been in the Yukon district and totally shut out of the civilized world—as to there being likely to be an influx of people into that country, to mean that there would be a general and an unprecedented rush to that country. No one respects Mr. Ogilvie more than I do, but he would be the last man to expect a Minister of the Crown, in charge of the department in which he was employed, to take a cursory statement of that kind as an intimation that people from the whole world would flow into the Yukon district. How could he know? He had no communication with the outside world. The only people to whom he could be referring would be the few miners in the immediate neighbourhood of the Yukon on the Alaskan side, whom he might expect to come over and stake claims on the rich creek which he had reported as having been discovered, and in respect to which he reported that a couple of men had taken out gold to the value of so many dollars to a single pan. The report was very short. I read it over several times and discussed it with several members of the House, and we were in doubt as to whether it was even likely at that time that the discoveries would amount to anything or not. Yet it has been urged to-day that a responsible Minister of the Crown should have come down to Parliament and recommended an expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars on such a statement. It is the craziest thing a man ever dreamed of, and the leader of the Opposition would have been the first man to have denounced me for making such a recommendation and asking an appropriation before I knew exactly the purpose for which it was required. Even after the district became known as a gold-bearing region—and it did not become so known until the arrival of the first steamboat from Alaska, bearing a large quantity of gold, the arrival of which created great excitement—nothing definite was before the Government as to the richness of the discoveries or as to the discoveries being so extensive as to warrant any large or exorbitant expenditure in connection with the Yukon district. But prior to that time, some steps had been taken. I did not leave the matter in the same shape as it was left by hon. gentlemen opposite, who year after year neglected, so far as I know, to even read the reports of the officers they sent into that country. Prior to that time, I had taken steps to send there a gold commissioner, instructed and authorized to transact the business that would arise in connection with mining claims, with two assistants, this force being deemed amply sufficient for the work so far as we had any idea of it at that time. As the excitement increased, we took such further steps as seemed to be necessary. We adopted measures to increase the number of the mounted police and to have them selected and all necessary supplies forwarded as quickly as possible. But we did not realize, and I do not think the House will blame us for not realizing until the summer had nearly passed that there was going to be anything like the rush to that country which materialized last fall. We only saw what was going on around us, and what we could gather from our reading of the newspapers from day to day; and, not being desirous of taking steps of importance not justified by the facts, and not being desirous of making expenditures we could not justify, we only took the steps that were absolutely necessary at that time. Later on we found, on account of the totally unprecedented circumstances which had arisen, and which were likely to arise, we had to take further and much more extensive steps in connection with the protection and provisioning of that country, as to which I will take the liberty of giving some facts in a few moments. I have spoken only of this particular phase of the question for the purpose of showing that the hon. leader of the Opposition, in his utter desperation, in his desire to conceal from the House and the public the fact that he has been switched into line by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), has endeavoured to put a meaning on the words of the Minister of Railways which they do not bear, and to make an attack on the Government's position, in which they are impregnable and not open to attack. Then, the hon. gentleman proceeded to make an attack upon myself; and I do not know whether I like the hon. gentleman better when he attacks me or commends me, but, on the whole, I think I prefer the attack. My hon. friends around me are rather suspicious when the hon. gentleman commends me. The hon. gentleman said: "Why were steps not taken in regard to pushing forward this work when Mr. Jennings met the Minister of the Interior and came down with him on the "Quadra" from Wrangell to Vancouver. Will any man believe that Mr. Jennings did not communicate all the necessary information in regard to this route to the Minister of the Interior when they travelled together on the steamer?" Does any member believe that a Minister in his senses would take steps to have a railway constructed from Stikine River to Teslin Lake to get into the Yukon River by the Hootalinqua River, when he did not know whether that river was navigable or not? That, I presume, is the way in which the Minister of Railways, in the plenitude of his experience, would have proceeded.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Sir Charles Tupper), I mean. The hon. leader of the Opposition has given great attention to some parts of Mr. Jennings's report, and I recommend him to give some attention to some other portions. If the hon. gentleman will look at page 13, he will find a report dated January 6th, by Mr. Arthur St. Cyr. This report Mr. Jennings did not receive until a few days later, and I do not think I received Mr. Jennings's report until the 13th or 14th of the month. I could not have called for tenders for the construction of the work on Mr. Jennings's report because the report to which I have alluded, as necessary, was the report to be made by Mr. St. Cyr, who was sent by Mr. Jennings, under my special instructions, to ascertain whether Teslin Lake and Hootalinqua River were navigable or not. So, when we commenced our proceedings, we had an intelligent plan in our minds, and when we got our reports completed, we knew certain facts beyond a doubt, and that the route we selected was a route which would be a proper one for Parliament to adopt for the purpose of getting passengers and supplies into that country. We could not have known anything about it from Mr. Jennings's report, if there had been no report made as to the navigability of the waters below. This report was dated 6th January; it was sent to Mr. Jennings a day or two later, and it got into my hands about January 13th. The contract was signed on January 25th; and I think the House will agree with me, without any further discussion, that no additional answer whatever is required to the strictures of the hon. gentleman on the Government for not having proceeded with more speed. I do not know that it is necessary for me to make any more detailed reference to the remarks of the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) except to say that among the principal reasons, or alleged reasons, which he gave this afternoon for his change of mind, was that another offer had been made to construct a line of railway from Pyramid Harbour by way of Chilkat Pass and Fort Selkirk, for 5,000 acres a mile. That alleged offer, that mythical offer, seems to have had an extremely disturbing effect upon the mind of the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper). Well, it will probably have the effect of relieving the hon. gentleman's mind when I tell him that this alleged offer is a figment of the imagination of some of our newspaper friends, and that no such offer was ever made to this Government or to any member of the Government. Therefore, the comparison which has been made in the press, and to some extent in the House, between the project we are now discussing, and the offer alleged to have been made, is not at all in point, for as I have said no such offer was ever made. I desire to make that statement very clear, because in the most extraordinary way, a way that seem to me is not at all creditable to some of the newspapers which have taken it up, it was at once taken for granted that this offer had been made. When the Minister of Railways made his statement and nothing was said about any such offer having been made, it might have at least been taken for granted that the Government ought to have been interrogated on the subject, and some definite information secured, before it was assumed that such an offer had been made and refused.

Mr. SIFTON.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask my hon. friend a question ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. The Minister of Railways when speaking stated definitely that other persons were conferred with, that other contractors, or companies, or corporations were mentioned ; several of them. Now, my hon. friend (Mr. Sifton) is no doubt perfectly acquainted with all the steps in the negotiations. They appear to have been carried on by word of mouth, but at the same time I think he will agree that it is the right of the House to have a full explanation from him, as to all such parties who conferred, and what was the purport of their propositions, and what was the purport of the conferences that went on. It would be very gratifying to the House to have that knowledge.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. It is perfectly correct to say that there were verbal discussions, but it is not in any sense of the word correct to say that any offer was ever made to the Government for the construction of any railway on any of the routes mentioned, except what are described and set out in the papers laid on the Table this afternoon.

I would like to repeat that statement for the purpose of making it more definite if I can. I repeat that the papers which were laid on the Table this afternoon, contain all the offers of any kind whatever that were ever made to the Government in connection with the building of railways to the Yukon, so far as I am aware. I may say upon that point—not in material qualification of it, but simply for the purpose of avoiding even the slightest possible inaccuracy, that as the House will perfectly well understand, there were conferences and informal drafts of memoranda discussed between the Government and Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann when the negotiations were going on ; but there was nothing even then in the shape of a formal offer and from time to time these drafts were amended and changed until eventually the contract was agreed upon between the Government and these gentlemen. The proposals that were submitted, were made in the terms set forth in the letters, of which copies were laid on the Table of the House this afternoon, and the House is therefore in possession of the fullest information on the whole subject.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say just a few words in regard—not to the railway project—but to some circumstances leading up to an intelligent understanding of the subject with which the Government has had to deal. I said, and I repeat : that I do not think it can be laid to the charge of the Government that there was one moment's delay in connection with the administration of the affairs of the Yukon district that could possibly be avoided. Every step was taken just as promptly as it could be taken ; and it was taken under the very greatest difficulties and under the most disturbing and harassing circumstances. When it first became evident to the Government that special measures had to be taken in connection with this district, the House will understand that there was no officer in the Department of the Interior—with the exception possibly of Dr. Dawson who some years before had made a geological exploration trip through that district—there was no officer in the Department of the Interior available for the purpose of consultation who had a personal and accurate knowledge of that district. And, in the steps that were in the first instance taken and everything that was done until I met Mr. Ogilvie at Vancouver on the 1st of October, until that time, we had to depend upon the vaguest and most indefinite information. We had the survey, we had Mr. Ogilvie's report, but I can tell hon. gentlemen opposite, that as to information which would enable us to intelligently do the work which we had to do, these reports were not of very much assistance to us. For instance, we found it was absolutely impossible to find out definitely and positively at what time and at what period the lakes and the rivers in the lower part of the district were frozen. We found it was impossible to discover what the state of the Passes was likely to be at that time of the year, and all we could do was to send on our mounted police, let them take their supplies, send them over the Passes and let us know the result of their efforts. Reference was made by some hon. gentleman, whom I do not now remember, to the appointment of Major Walsh ; and with reference to that I may say that, although Major Walsh was appointed somewhere about the middle of August, he only accepted the post upon the express condition that he should not be asked to leave before the 15th of September. It is not a light thing for a man to accept a post involving the imminent risk of his life, involving the entire uprooting of all his business and social relations ; but Major Walsh loyally accepted the position which was tendered him by the Government. He has loyally done the work, done it in a manner beyond all praise, and for which this country will ever owe Major Walsh a debt of gratitude ; but he was justified in making the condition that he should not be asked to take his departure for the Yukon until the 15th of September. When the 15th of September came, we had reports to the mounted police officials here, showing that the officers who had consented to go through the White Pass with their supplies had been struggling in that pass amidst the rain and the mud and all the frightful difficulties which accumulated around them there; and they had almost utterly failed to get the supplies necessary for them across that pass. All they could think of doing was to get twenty men through, with the supplies necessary to take them to Dawson City. The remainder of the men were stuck in the pass. The Government approved of the suggestion that I should go out with Major Walsh, and take such steps as were necessary to overcome the difficulties. I went with Major Walsh; no time was lost; and from that time to this, without cessation, Major Walsh and his men have been labouring under difficulties of which the members of this House can have no possible conception, for the purpose of provisioning and keeping up the posts in the task of saving the lives of the unfortunate men who are constantly going out. While my hon. friend treats this question with that jocularly which he can assume so well, and with that fierce abusiveness which he can assume equally well, but neither of which was particularly adapted to the discussion of such important public business, I think the Dominion of Canada can afford to look with some degree of pride at the fact that from the summit of the mountains, where the provisional boundary line is marked, to the 141st meridian, there is no starvation, and that there is just as good law and order as there is upon the streets of the city of Ottawa—that the word of an officer of the Canadian Government in that district is law, even if it is sent by letter by a dog-driver to a man a hundred or a hundred and fifty miles away. That has not been done without some self-sacrifice and some effort. I take no credit for it, but I claim credit for the men who have overcome difficulties that have not been overcome, so far as I am aware, by any other men connected with the administration of the affairs of the Government of Canada. I believe, Sir, that our American friends are in a state of total helplessness in regard to their territory. General Alger, the Secretary of War, being sick, and unable to come here for the purpose of getting information, the War Department expressed themselves as almost totally without the requisite information to deal with the question they had to deal with—because they had almost the same state of affairs in their territory that we had in ours. General Alger telegraphed asking me to go to Washington for the purpose of giving them information, because he was lying sick in bed. My hon. friend taunts me with wanting to go to Washington. I saw nothing wrong in going to Washington to give United States officers information which would enable them to extend relief to starving people of the United States, and I would be willing again to go to Washington for that purpose if I thought it possible to effect thereby the saving of even one life in that district. Even the American press, particularly on the Pacific Coast, not too friendly to ourselves or even to myself, because they credit me, not altogether wrongly, with making pretty strong efforts to assist our friends in Victoria and Vancouver, and incidentally and indirectly the merchants and manufacturers of Canada generally in getting their share—and their share ought to be the whole—of the Klondike trade; the newspapers published on the Puget Sound, at Tacoma, at Seattle and at other places in the United States, without a single exception, give the strongest testimony to the fact that our officers, from Major Walsh's camp down to the summit of the mountains, where for the present the Canadian jurisdiction ceases, have been indefatigable and most successful in preventing starvation; and up to this time, so far as my information goes, not one single man has died of starvation on that terrible route. Somebody the other night—I think it was the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace)—in a sarcastic tone, wanted to know why Major Walsh was camped far from Dawson City. In the name of common sense, what would he be doing at Dawson City? We have forty mounted policemen and a sufficient staff of officers there to do the work. Major Walsh is at the place where he was told to stay, attending to the business he was sent to attend to; and when in his good judgment every provision has been made there for the purpose of meeting emergencies, then, and not till then, he will go on to Dawson City to do the work which is intended to be done there. I would not like to be here to have to explain that Major Walsh and his men had gone on and locked themselves up at Dawson City, and left the people to get out as they could, and perhaps starve on the way. Major Walsh is doing the work he was sent to do, and he is doing it, as I said before, in a manner beyond all praise; and, Sir, it is a pleasure to me, in the heat of a political discussion to be able to say one word here in commendation of the efforts of a man who, not impelled thereto by any financial necessity or by any desire for emolument, has thus sacrificed his own peace of mind, his safety and his convenience for the sake of doing what he believed to be his duty to his country.

Perhaps I have said enough on that subject. I want now to say just a few words to indicate what my conclusion was upon the possibilities of that country. I will not burden the House very long with it. The report which Mr. Ogilvie has made, and which embraces the results of the more recent discoveries of that district, is now in the hands of the members. In case the members of the House have not all had opportunity to follow its pages through, I will take the liberty of reading a short extract from it which gives a fairly comprehensive résumé of what may be expected, and what opinion ought to be held in regard to the future possibilities of that district. I read this because I think it is well that we should try to get an intelligent idea of what this country is, and I read it particularly for the benefit of the members of the Opposition; because the discussions which some of them have given us upon the possibilities of that region and the ease with which gold mines may be found indicate that they not only have not read this report, but that they have never read any account of any gold-bearing country in the world; and even if the members on this side of the House find it a little tiresome, I will request our hon. friends on the other side of the House to give it attention. Mr. Ogilvie says:

With these facts before us we may confidently assert that we have here a region situated in the North-west Territories upwards of 300 miles in length and 500 or more miles wide along the southern boundary, for this zone extends south-eastwards into British Columbia, and we may reasonably assume westward to and across the 141st meridian, for some of the streams heading on and near it, discharging into the Pacific Ocean west of Mount St. Elias, yield gold on their lower stretches, and we may reasonably assume the upper parts are gold-bearing, too. Farther inland gold has been found on the upper waters of the Tanana, near the head waters of the Forty-mile, and in 1873 and 1874 Harper and Harte found some gold on the south branch of White River, in the vicinity of the boundary line, all of which is a justification for this assumption. Thus we may conclude with reason that all that portion of the North-west Territory westward from the easterly limit of the Yukon water system to the 141st meridian, will prove more or less gold-bearing.

The westerly boundary of this region—the 141st meridian, or international boundary—is upwards of 300 miles in length; the southern boundary—the 60th parallel of latitude—is about 500 miles long, and the north-east boundary, and irregular line from the 60th parallel to the 141st meridian, in latitude 65° approximately, is upwards of 600 miles long. These three lines bound an area of about 125,000 square miles, over which gold is scattered more or less profusely.

At many of the points mentioned it will pay well for working even under present conditions, and at many others it will pay well when we have such facilities as we expect to have during the next year for entering and developing that region. Attention may be directed to the fact that the whole of that vast district owes its now world-wide reputation to the richness of 140 claims in the Klondike division. One hundred of these are on Bonanza Creek, and about 40 on Eldorado. To use a mining term, many of those claims are "world-beaters," and if the indications now known are worth anything at all they are worth from sixty to seventy millions of dollars in those two creeks.

Taking this division as a whole, including the three creeks named, affluent to Indian Creek, a district some 35 miles in length and 25 or more miles in width, if the indications can be relied on, there are one hundred million dollars in sight in that area. No one can guarantee this amount, but the prospects so far developed point to that sum pretty conclusively. This district is exceptionally rich.

I commend that to the attention of the hon. leader of the Opposition, who seems to think that these contractors will be able to walk in there and find these tracts lying around every mile or two.

Nothing has ever been found like it heretofore in that country, in fact, in very few countries has anything been found like it, and while we cannot confidently assert that other finds as valuable as it will be made, it is altogether improbable that gold is scattered over such a vast extent, and only rich at a point which is less than the 140th part of the total area.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Quite correct. The hon. gentlemen opposite, if they think they are easily found, will have the first chance.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, they have not.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. They can engage their prospectors and send them out there. There is nothing in this world to prevent these hon. gentlemen locating their claims right now, and they will have from now until the 15th of June to get their claims located before the railway company will have the privilege of making one location. I will talk to these hon. gentlemen about mining claims after a little while.

If we add to this part of the northern area of British Columbia, we increase it nearly two-fold, and the comparative area of the Klondike district is much lessened.

Thus says Mr. Ogilvie. Now, here is the opinion of a man who has been there for years, and who talks as a reasonable man should:

Taken all together, we have a vast field with fair prospects, as fair, it may be claimed, as any other equally extensive region in the world. The natural conditions are not as favourable as in many other parts, but time and enterprise will no doubt agreeably modify many of them, and the reward may be great.

That is a fair statement of the conclusion of Mr. Ogilvie and of the conclusion which anybody would come to who went into the matter carefully and endeavoured to collect the information that is now available.

Let me point out to the House now some of the difficulties of a territorial character under which the Government labour in dealing with this problem. I was somewhat surprised to hear the remarks which were made on this subject by the leader of the party which, we are told by the erudite and scholarly member for West Assinibola (Mr. Davin) so often, has the instinct of Government, whatever that may be, and which, he says, is possessed exclusively by hon. gentlemen on that side. One of the great proofs of that instinct, I should think, would be unanimity and loyalty. And when you see a party which displays so much harmony as that perfect accord which exists between the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) and his leader, and between another of its leading lights, the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) and his leader—when you find a party whose leading spirits are so intimate and perfectly united in brotherly love—when you find this perfect loyalty among them to one another, with no such thing, for instance, as setting a private detective on their leader's track to find out when he is interviewed by a newspaper reporter, you find a party undoubtedly possessed of the instinct of government. I do not pretend that this is altogether germane to the question; but the remarks of the hon. member for West Assiniboia about the instinct of government are really so amusing that it is difficult to refrain from adverting to them. I was somewhat surprised to find an hon. gentleman who leads the party that has this instinct of government to such an intense degree, proceeding to-night, in a manner which would not do credit to the most obscure stump-speaker that ever addressed a backwoods audience, to discuss, in the most unqualified terms, the most delicate international relations existing between the Government of this country and the Government of the United States. Why, I am astonished, Mr. Speaker, that an hon. gentleman who has been years in the public service of the country, does not seem to realize that speeches of that kind are calculated to lead to the direst calamities and difficulties between nations—speeches which inflame the public mind and the sentiments of people who do not know better, who do not know the responsibilities which rest upon members of the Government in difficulties of that kind. The United States Government are, upon the Pacific Coast, met with very great difficulties. They have a population there which is very much excited over the possibilities of the Klondike trade, and who, perhaps, are not too careful as to what the results may be from the measures which they are urging on their government. I should say, from the conversations I have had with members of the United States Government, that they realize the responsibilities that rest upon them as the government of a civilized country, and we, on our part, recognize the responsibilities that we are under as the Government of a civilized country, dealing with another civilized country in a civilized, decent and courteous way. So far as the Government of the United States is concerned, there has been no cause for complaint on the part of this Government with regard to the methods they have seen fit to adopt in connection with the affairs of this district. We have met with every courtesy at their hands, and, although they have difficulties—for political difficulties do not exist alone in our country—and cannot always do what they would like to do, I would venture to say, that the common sense of hon. members, not only on this side, but on the other side, will agree with me when I say that it was an act of the greatest possible friendliness on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to amend their regulations and provide such regulations at Dyea and Skagway as are calculated to facilitate and promote Canadian trade. I venture to say that this is one of the things which the Canadian people will remember, and which the dominant political party that represents our people will remember, with gratitude when discussing questions of this kind.

These regulations were changed, and our friends at the Coast now tell us that they are perfectly satisfactory with the additional arrangements that were made by the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) for the purpose of more effectually carrying them out and more effectually promoting their object. In addition to that, our mounted police have gone through United States waters and through United States territory without question. Every facility that could be given has been given to us; and, while at present, there remains some business to be done in connection with the Stikine River and the navigation thereof—as to which I shall speak at a later period—I say that we have had up to the present time, so far as the United States Cabinet is concerned, the most fair and reasonable and courteous treatment. It would not be a proper thing for me as a member of this Government to listen to the blatant statements, made in this House to-night without making this statement in justice and fairness to the Government of the United States.

Now, it is easy for gentlemen, especially for hon. gentlemen who write letters to newspapers over signatures other than their own, to minimize difficulties. But let me explain to the House the difficult position we were placed in with regard to this territory. If hon. gentlemen will refer to the map, they will see that Dyea and Skagway, at the entrance to this Yukon district, are nearly a thousand miles from Vancouver. And we could not send in an officer, we could not send a rifle or a revolver or a single charge of ammunition or a pound of provisions without the leave of the United States. It would have been an act of war for us to send our people and our officials with their arms and ammunition without at least the tacit leave of the United States. It certainly would have been such if we had gone through their territory or their waters after we had been forbidden to do so. We were in the position of having to provide for a vast territory a thousand miles from the nearest of our cities, and we could not get into it without going through the waters or the territories of the United States. And our hon. friend who leads the party with the instinct of government would have had us wave the bloody shirt and say we would have nothing to do with these grasping Yankees. He would have found that he did not own the territory in six months or so if he had followed that policy. His officers would have been starved to death. He would not have been able to assert his jurisdiction or to carry on the administration of the territory for six months. All that the authorities of the United States needed to do was to say they could not see their way clear to allow us to send troops or police through their territory, and we could not have complained much at that. We might say it was unkind or unfriendly, but that is all. And those who wished might have gone to the Yukon country, but we could not have got there to provide them with the benefits of government or to enforce any regulations. There would have been no trouble about mining regulations then. Whoever liked could have gone in; there would have been no law or order; the good name and the fair name of the Dominion of Canada would have been disgraced.

This was one of the difficulties we had to contend with; I say again that we have been treated, with regard to that point, with the utmost friendliness by the Government of the United States. I want my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Prior) with whom I think I have had some communication, and who, I think, has probably been influenced to some extent by the natural excitement in regard to the questions of trade upon the Coast, to understand that, while there is the strongest possible feeling in the Pacific Coast towns in regard to this question of trade, we have had no cause of complaint against the United States Government, because of their dealings with us upon this question. As my hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) said in his remarks upon the Address, there was something to explain in regard to issuing the regulations at Dyea and Skagway which I had promised would be forthcoming in a short time. It is quite true there was a delay, which delay has not been very fully explained. I do not know that I have any particular right to demand an explanation from the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States. When I was there he said that the regulations would be issued in such a way as to facilitate our trade in any reasonable way that we had a right to expect and that he thought he would be able to get them out in a short time. He was not able to get them out just as soon as he expected, but I have not felt that I was entitled to demand any explanation from him in connection with the matter. I did get a telegram from the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury to the effect that the delay was caused by the fact that he wished to consult the collector of customs in Alaska and get some information with regard to local matters which he thought he ought to understand before he issued the regulations.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Since the hon. gentleman has been good enough to refer to some remarks that I made, I would like to ask him what I suggested in my remarks should be answered, and which is not altogether what he seems to think. The question I wish him to have explained is, why he sent a telegram on the 3rd of January to the effect that regulations had been decided upon between the United States Government and himself by which these odious exactions would be removed.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. They have been removed.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. But this telegram on the 3rd of January was not a promise but a positive assurance to the people of the Coast that these regulations had been amended and changed.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The Secretary of the Treasury did assure me that he would at once issue regulations which would have the effect of doing away with the necessity of paying these fees, and I so telegraphed to the Board of Trade of Victoria, and, I think, that of Vancouver. The regulations were to have been drafted and issued at once. I had no doubt, when I sent that telegram, that they would be drafted and issued in a day or two, but it was put off from time to time. But, as I said, I did not feel that I had the right to demand an explanation, because the Washington authorities have treated us most courteously, and I presume that the delay was because the Secretary of the Treasury wanted to consult the collector of customs of Alaska before he had them sent up. That was a reasonable explanation, and I do not feel that I was justified in complaining. But from time to time, I did communicate with Washington for the purpose of inducing the issue of the regulations as fast as possible.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. With the permission of the hon. gentleman, I would like to ask him a question. I do not do it for a factious purpose. What I wished to reach was, if possible, a more definite explanation of that point. I never challenged the good faith of the hon. gentleman, but I did refer to the positive assurance which he made, undoubtedly on the assurance given to him at Washington on the 3rd of January. Then I asked an explanation, which I do not think the hon. gentleman has yet given, how it was that this positive assurance which he conveyed to the people of the Coast, was not observed. The hon. gentleman said the United States authorities observed the utmost good faith. I would venture to differ with him there. If his telegram was founded upon facts, they had given him a positive assurance that these exactions would be at once removed.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I think the hon. gentleman is drawing it very fine. I think if he were a member of a government and a member of another government stated that he would do a certain thing, and, finding that, as a matter of prudence, it would be necessary for him to get a little more information from some of his officials, he did not do it for a few days after the time he said he would, he would not consider that it was a violation of his promise, that it was an act of bad faith. I think the explanation is perfectly clear. Now I was adverting to the enormous difficulties under which the Government laboured in dealing with this question, and I had just referred to the difficulty which arose from the fact that in order to get into the country we had to go through United States territory.

Mr. PRIOR. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Does he say that there is no other route by which he can get into the Yukon country than by going through American territory?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I said we could not get in by any other way at that time. When I make a statement of that kind I assume that the hon. gentleman would make the qualification which any person would make in the light of the ordinary knowledge of geography which everybody has. We can get across by way of Edmonton. I started a party of police that way before I went west myself, and they just got across the summit of the mountains the other day. We could have started a party by way of Ashcroft or Kamloops, and they might possibly get through with their lives. But for all practical purposes, and that was the sense in which I was making the statement, the only way that we could get in was by going through American territory. Mr. Speaker, I am not in the best of health, and not equal to continuing the debate further to-night; and as I have a number of other matters to refer to, I will move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 16th February, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) presented the report of the Special Committee appointed to prepare and report lists of members to compose the Select Standing Committees of this House.

Mr. SIFTON.

The report was read as follows:—

JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved :

That a Message be sent to the Senate informing their Honours that this House will unite with them in the formation of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the subject of the Printing of Parliament, and that the members of the Select Standing Committee on Printing, viz. :— Messieurs Bergeron, Bouassa, Charlton, Dupont, Ellis, Foster, Gibson, Hughes, Landerkin, LaRivière, Macdonald (Huron), Maclean, McMullen, Montague, Oliver, Parmalee, Prefontaine, Richardson, Somerville, Sutherland, Taylor, and Tisdale will act as members on the part of this House on said Joint Committee on the Printing of Parliament.

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. MAXWELL moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 20) further to amend the Chinese Immigration Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. MAXWELL. Mr. Speaker, the explanation will be very short. The Bill is simply to raise the per capita tax from $50 to $500.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUPERIOR COURT AT MAGDALEN ISLANDS.

Mr. LEMIEUX asked,

1. Has the hon. Minister of Justice been informed that the autumn term of the Superior Court was not held in 1897, at the Magdalen Islands ?

2. If so, what cause prevented the holding of the said term ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I understand that we have received no such information.

MONTREAL CIRCUIT COURT.

Mr. LEMIEUX asked,

1. Is it the intention of the Government to appoint at an early day a third judge of the Circuit Court at Montreal ?

2. Have the Government been informed of the number of writs issued and cases heard and decided by that court during the year 1897 ?

3. If so, what is the number ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). This subject is now engaging the attention of the Government, and a solution will be given during the present session.

THE ELEVATOR MONOPOLY.

Mr. RUTHERFORD asked.

Whether the Government has taken, or is about to take, action to assist the farmers of Manitoba and the North-west in abolishing what is known as the elevator monopoly ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The Government are fully alive to the importance of the subject which is raised in this question. It is now engaging their attention, but they have not yet reached a conclusion.

WYEBRIDGE-WYEVALE POSTAL SERVICE.

Mr. BENNETT (by Mr. Taylor) asked,

Who is the present mail carrier between Wyebriidge and Wyevale ? When does the contract of present carrier expire, and for what length of time was his contract ? Was such contract given on public competition, after tenders being duly advertised ? Has the present contractor been notified that his contract will be cancelled before its expiry ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). William Edwards is the contractor operating the service mentioned, the contract being for four years, expiring on the 31st of December, 1899. It was awarded after public competition. The contract contains a clause enabling the Government to cancel it on three months' notice, and notice of the cancellation has been given in order to permit the Government to give a daily mail service to certain points, namely, Vasey and Elliot's Corners, instead of a tri-weekly service, which they now have.

POSTMASTERSHIP OF WAVERLY, ONT.

Mr. BENNETT (by Mr. Taylor) asked,

Has John Bannister been removed as postmaster of Waverly post office, Ont. ? Were there any complaints against the said Bannister ; if so, were such complaints in writing ? If the said Bannister was removed from the said office, was an inquiry made into his conduct as postmaster, and if so, was any report submitted to the department in writing, and if so, by whom ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). Mr. Bannister has been removed from the postmastership of Waverly, Ont. It was reported to the department in October last that Mr. Bannister had not given personal supervision to his office for nearly three years, but had left the management of it to his assistant. It was further stated that Mr. Bannister was not competent to discharge the duties of the office, which was and is a money order and savings bank office, satisfactorily. The report in question was made in writing by the post office inspector, who was personally cognizant of the facts.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS—SWEATING.

Mr. CLARKE (by Mr. Davin) asked,

1. In what contracts that have been awarded by the Government is there a clause prohibiting "sweating" ?
2. What is the amount of such contract ?
3. To whom have such contracts been awarded ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). In reply to the first question, I beg to say that in the contracts for the supply of clothing for the militia there is a clause prohibiting sweating. In reply to the second, the contractors are: L. H. Boisseau, Montreal, $29,601.50; Marsolais & Monday, $11,035. These two contracts are for the supply of militia clothing. There are two other contractors in the Post Office Department—Willis & Co. and the Ottawa Supply Co.—for the supply of mail bags for a term of four years, but the amount is not ascertainable, depending entirely on the quantity that the Government may order during the four years.

FIRST REGIMENT ILLINOIS NATIONAL GUARDS.

Mr. CLARKE asked,

Has the Government been asked to give permission to the First Regiment Illinois National Guards to visit Canada during the summer of 1898, bringing their arms with them? And if so, has the permission been given ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA (Mr. Borden). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say: The First Regiment of Infantry of the Illinois National Guards applied through the United States Secretary of State for permission to visit Canada, bearing arms, in July next, and by an Order in Council of the 24th December last, such permission was granted.

Mr. BENNETT.

CUSTOMS DUES AND OFFICIALS AT ST. HYACINTHE.

Mr. MONK asked,

1. What were the total receipts from customs dues at the port of entry of St. Hyacinthe, from 1st of July, 1896, to 1st of July, 1897 ?
2. How many customs officials were employed at said port of entry on 30th June, 1897 ?
3. How many officials have since been added at said port, and at what salary ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). I beg to give the hon. gentleman the following information asked for:—1. $48,157.47. 2. Two. 3. None.

THE FAST LINE NEGOTIATIONS.

Mr. IVES (by Mr. Taylor) asked,

1. What is the present state of the negotiations between the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Petersens, respecting the fast line ?
2. Is it the intention of the Government to give the proposed contractors further time to sign a contract, and what further time? How often has the time been extended already ?
3. Is there any definite date now fixed within which time the contract must be signed, and if so, what is the date fixed ?
4. What amount of money has been deposited by the Petersens with the Government in connection with this matter and under what circumstances, terms and conditions? Is this money liable to be forfeited to the Government, and under what circumstances ?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). In reply to the hon. gentleman I beg to say: 1. There are no negotiations going on at present between the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Petersens respecting the "fast line." 2. It is not the intention of the Government to give the contractors further time to sign a contract, nor has the time been extended already—in fact, the contract was signed on the 22nd day of March, 1897, and full copy of the text thereof was published in the "Return and Proceedings of the House of Commons" every day from 31st day of May until the 14th day of June, 1897, and in the Votes and Proceedings of the 14th and 15th days of June, 1897. 3. Is answered by the preceding. 4. The amount of money deposited by the Petersens with the Government was £10,000, with a guarantee to the satisfaction of the Minister for a further sum of £10,000, as per terms of section 13 of the contract in question. Section 14 of the contract provides for the forfeiture of the amount deposited and of the guarantee in the event of the contractors making default.

DUTIABLE IMPORTS.

Mr. FOSTER asked,

What was the value of the dutiable imports into Canada from 1st July to 31st December, 1897, and the amount of duty collected thereon, and similarly for the like period of 1896 ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The total value of dutiable goods entered for consumption and the duty collected thereon, during the six months from 1st July to 31st December in the years 1896 and 1897, is as follows:—

Year.	Entered for Consumption.	Duty Collected thereon.
1896	$31,989,671	$ 9,683,691 71
1897	35,045,087	10,365,682 35

FISHING LICENSES.

Mr. INGRAM asked,

What amount did the fishermen pay for a license to fish pound-nets in the waters of Lake Erie, situated opposite the counties of Essex, Kent and Elgin, for the year 1897 ?

What amount do the Government propose to charge this year for licenses to fish in the same waters ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The amount paid by the fishermen in the waters of these lakes opposite those counties was the usual amount paid, with the exception of the small piece of coast lying between Point Pelee and the entrance to the Detroit River, where, under special circumstances reported on by the Inspector of Fisheries for Ontario, exception was made last year and the amount for that year reduced one-half. Hon. members for the Counties of North and South Essex, Kent and Elgin waited upon me the first day this session met, and made strong representations in favour of a reduction or equalization of rates being made all along the waters of Lake Erie. I took a note of their representations and handed the same to the Commissioner of Fisheries, Mr. Prince, and as soon as I receive his report I shall be able to state exactly what will be done in the coming year.

IMMIGRATION TO THE YUKON.

Mr. McINNES asked,

Is it true that Major Walsh, Commissioner in the Yukon district, has issued instructions to the officers under him not to allow any one to enter the said district unless he has with him 1,000 pounds of provisions ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). In reply to the hon. gentleman I beg to say that although not definitely advised by Major Walsh, the Government have reason to believe that he issued an order requiring all persons entering the Yukon district to carry with them provisions for not less than six months. To avoid misunderstanding, the police stationed on the frontier were instructed, in the early part of this month, that they could do no more than advise people not to proceed to the interior with less than six months supplies; that there was no authority under which force could be employed.

INTERCOLONIAL EMPLOYEES.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked,

1. Have any reductions been made in the salaries of the employees of the Intercolonial Railway, passenger and freight department, since A. H. Harris was appointed general traffic manager ?

2. What are the names of such employees ?

3. What were their salaries before such reductions ?

4. What are their salaries now ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). In reply to the hon. gentleman I beg to say: 1. Yes, reductions have been made in the salaries of three of the employees of the passenger and freight departments since Mr. Harris was appointed general traffic manager. 2. The names of these three employees are N. Weatherston, P. O'Rourke and D. R. McDonald. 3. Before such reductions took place Mr. Weatherston, freight and passenger agent at Toronto received $104.16 a month; Mr. O'Rourke, travelling passenger agent, was paid at the rate of $65 a month, and Mr. McDonald, city agent at Quebec, received $91.66 a month. 4. Their salaries now are as follows:—Mr. Weatherston as travelling agent is paid $75 a month, Mr. O'Rourke as city ticket agent receives $50 a month, and Mr. McDonald as ticket agent, Quebec, is paid at the rate of $50 a month.

POSTMASTER AT COBOURG.

Mr. GUILLET asked,

1. Is the Government aware that the postmaster of Cobourg attended and occupied a seat on the platform of the Reform Convention of West Northumberland, held on the 29th January ultimo, which was called to choose a candidate to contest that riding in the present Ontario elections, and that he canvassed on behalf of one of the candidates and cast a ballot on that occasion ?

2. Is the Government aware that he since attended a committee meeting at Bewdley, county of Northumberland, in the interest of the Reform candidate chosen by said convention ?

3. Does the Government propose to make an impartial investigation into this conduct of the postmaster of Cobourg ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). The Government is not aware of the postmaster at Cobourg having attended either of the meetings referred to in the question.

QUESTION DROPPED.

On the question,

Has the Hon. J. Israel Tarte, a member of the Government, any knowledge of a reply being made to the document addressed to the Holy Father and signed by the said Hon. J. Israel Tarte and forty-four Senators and members of the House of Commons and was read by the hon. Minister of Public Works on the 30th March, 1897? If so, what is the nature of the reply? If not, does the hon. Minister of Public Works expect an answer? If not, why not?—(Mr. McDougall.

Mr. SPEAKER. This question is scarcely a proper question to put to the House, because it does not relate in any way to the business of the House or the business of the Government. Therefore, I think it should not be put.

Question dropped.

HAWAIIAN VESSELS.

Mr. DOMVILLE asked,

Whether there is any existing treaty under which vessels owned or registered in the kingdom of Hawaii have full navigation in Canadian waters, and would be liable to duty on hull or machinery?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). There is no treaty with Hawaii under which vessels of that country are entitled to coasting privileges in Canadian waters. Such vessels would only be liable to duty on hull and machinery on application for Canadian registry.

DISMISSAL OF MR. RORY McNEIL.

Mr. McDOUGALL asked,

1. Why was Mr. Rory McNeil, section foreman at West Bay Road, dismissed from the service of the Cape Breton division of the Intercolonial Railway?

2. Was his dismissal asked for by anybody; if so, by whom?

3. Was there any charge against him; if so, by whom, and was there any investigation?

4. Who was put in his place, and was he in the railway service before?

5. By whom recommended?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. Mr. Rory McNeil, section foreman, West Bay Road, was dismissed from the service of the railway on the ground of offensive partisanship. 2. His dismissal was asked for by Dr. McLennan, M.P. 3. A charge of offensive political partisanship was made against McNeil by Dr. A. McLennan, M.P. No investigation was made. 4. D. C. McDonald, trackman at McIntyre's Lake, who has been in the service of the railway since 1891, was put in McNeil's place. 5. D. C. McDonald was recommended for employment by Dr. Cameron in 1891.

HUDSON BAY EXPEDITION.

Mr. ROCHE asked,

1. Has the Government come to any decision on the basis of the report submitted by the commander of the late Hudson Bay expedition, as to the practicability of that route as a commercial enterprise?

Mr. MULOCK.

2. If so, what is the decision?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The report of the commissioner of the late Hudson Bay expedition was prepared some time ago, and is now being printed. I hope to have it in a short time to place in the hands of hon. members. The importance of the decision referred to in the question is so important as to require a good deal of consideration. I do not think that any hasty conclusion should be reached. But, at the earliest possible moment after the report is in the hands of the members and the Government have had an opportunity to consider it, a conclusion will be reached.

TRANSLATION OF MR. OGILVIE'S OFFICIAL GUIDE.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask the Government whether they intend to have Mr. Ogilvie's work on the gold-bearing lands of the Klondike and the Yukon, entitled "The Klondike Official Guide" translated immediately into French, so as to have it ready for distribution at the earliest possible moment among the French-speaking population of this country?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). (Translation.) It is the intention of the Government to have Mr. Ogilvie's work translated into French and published at the earliest possible moment, and I hope this work will, before long, be completed.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask a question on that point. Members receive a great many requests, I dare say, for the important information gained by Mr. Ogilvie during his many years in the Yukon. Now, when such an application is made to a member, I suppose all he has to do is to put his hand in his pocket and pay Mr. Rose 50 cents for the book and send the book to the applicant. Or is the Government going to give the public any results for the payment of the public money with reference to that?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The Government will have 10,000 copies of this pamphlet for free distribution. The Government think that this is a reasonable number to be provided for free distribution, and, if additional copies are required, it is reasonable that parties asking for them should buy them.

Mr. FOSTER. How is the distribution to be made?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. A certain number will be given to each member in a few days.

An hon. MEMBER. How many?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR
A considerable number; I cannot say exactly how many at present.

KINGSTON LOCOMOTIVE WORKS—
GANANOQUE DRILL SHED.

Mr. TAYLOR. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to make a few remarks with reference to questions I had on the paper, which were asked and answered during my absence on Monday. If necessary, I will conclude with a motion in order to put myself right. The first question I asked was as follows:—

Has an order been given by the Department of Railways and Canals, or Public Works, to the Kingston Locomotive Works, for locomotives, and if so, at what prices are those to be supplied?

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not quite understand what question the hon. gentleman is raising. As I understand him, it was with reference to a question which was answered the other day. Does the hon. gentleman propose to move the adjournment of the House on an important question?

Mr. TAYLOR. I explained, Mr. Speaker, that I was ready, if necessary, to put my remarks in order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I merely wished to know.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I understand that the hon. gentleman wants to move the adjournment of the House in order to discuss a question put by him the other day with reference to the drill shed at Gananoque.

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all.

The PRIME MINISTER. What is it, then?

Mr. TAYLOR. I wish to make a few observations with respect to a reply given by the Minister of Railways and Canals and the Minister of Militia to questions put in my name, which answers are not satisfactory, are not really answers to my questions, and I want to draw the attention of the Ministers to them.

The PRIME MINISTER. In so far, at all events, as the questions refer to the drill shed at Gananoque, which were answered by the Minister of Militia, I submit that the hon. gentleman is not in order, because he has given notice of motion, which appears on the paper as follows:—

Order of the House for copies of all correspondence between the mayor and corporation of Gananoque, or any other person, with the Government in reference to the removal of the drill shed at Gananoque. Also, all correspondence in reference to the sale or purchase of a new site. Also, all offers made by the president of the Agricultural Society of Gananoque, or any other person, offering to rent or sell a suitable building in which to store the arms and clothing; and also, all other correspondence with the Government dealing with this question.

This is the same subject that he proposes to make his remarks about, I understand, and it is not competent for him to move the adjournment of the House to discuss that question.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cannot, as the leader of the House points out, anticipate a question on the Order paper placed there by himself on a motion to adjourn. If there is another point which is not covered by a motion on the paper, a point of public importance, the hon. gentleman is in order to proceed as he proposes.

Mr. TAYLOR. I purpose, Mr. Speaker, to deal with the questions respecting the Kingston Locomotive Works. If in doing so, I put myself out of order, I hope you will draw my attention to it, and I will gladly resume my seat. I was reading the questions I had asked and had reached that part lettered "B"; the questions proceed as follows:—

(b.) Were tenders asked for from the Kingston Locomotive Works and other firms as to these locomotives?

(c.) To what parties have letters or telegrams been sent, announcing that such contract had been given to the Kingston Locomotive Works?

(d.) Has any member of the Government sent any such telegrams or letters to either Hon. Mr. Harty or the president of the Liberal Association at Kingston, and if so, at what date?

(e.) Was the purchase of such locomotive authorized by an Order in Council, and if so, what is the date of such Order in Council?

The answer I received was as follows:—

No order has yet been given by the Department of Railways and Canals to the Kingston Locomotive Works for locomotives. (b.) Tenders have not been recently asked from the Kingston Locomotive Works or other firms. It is the intention, however, of the department, as soon as specifications and plans for a new locomotive have been completed, to open negotiations with the Kingston Works on the subject of the building of some locomotives for the Intercolonial Railway, as the department desires and intends, so far as practicable, to give to a Canadian firm the preference in the manufacture of the locomotives which the Government may require. (c.) No such letter or telegram has been sent as is referred to in this sub-question. (d.) No such telegrams or letters have been sent by any member of the Government as is referred to in this sub-question. (e.) No purchase of locomotives has been authorized by Order in Council.

Now, if the hon. Minister will read the speech made by Mr. Harty, a member of the provincial government, which appears in that gentleman's newspaper organ at Kingston, the "Whig," on Tuesday, February 1st, he will read the following:

I think the workingmen have some knowledge of the interest I have taken in them for a number of years. I have never lost sight of the desirability of aiding the workingmen. Mayor Livingston suggested to me the manufacture of locomotives for the Intercolonial Railway, and that we do something to get the contract for Kingston. I wrote Mr. Blair (Minister of Railways and Canals), and have just received a telegram to-day. He says he intends giving Kingston Works the opportunity to build three locomotives for that railway, the specifications of which will be sent at once. My desire is to give home manufacturers the first preference, and I am glad the work is coming here.

I wrote Mr. Blair, the Minister of Railways and Canals, and have just received a telegram to-day.

He quotes the telegram here, word for word.

He says he intends giving the Kingston works an opportunity to build their locomotives for the railway, and the specifications of which will be sent down.

Then Mr. Harty adds :

My desire is to give home manufacturers the first preference, and I am glad the work is coming here.

Now, the same paper commenting on it editorially, says :

The assurance with which Mr. Harty closes his speech, given on the authority of the Minister of Railways, that an order had been given for locomotives to be built here, was a fitting termination to a speech that was encouraging throughout.

The "Globe" of the same date, 1st February, says, in reporting Mr. Harty's speech :

Before sitting down he read a telegram from the Hon. Mr. Blair announcing that the Kingston Locomotive Works had received an order to construct three locomotives for the Intercolonial Railway, an announcement that was greeted with great applause.

Now I will just leave it between the hon. Minister of Public Works of Ontario and the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals here, as to which answer was correct, the one he gave me the other day, or the statement made and the telegram read by the Hon. Mr. Harty on the first instant. I hope the work is coming to Kingston. I am sorry the contract is not let, and I hope the Minister will do as he agreed in that telegram that he sent in reply to me, in which he says that the specifications would go forward in a few days. I hope he will carry that out. Now in reference to the question the Prime Minister raised in answering the motion on the Order paper for papers, there is a statement made in the answer given to me that will not appear in the papers, but which is personal to myself, and I want to make a personal explanation. The question No. J on the paper reads as follows :—

Was the said C. E. Britton the defeated candidate for the House of Commons for the general elections of 1882 and 1887? Was the said J. B. Turner the defeated candidate for the House of Commons in the general election of 1891?

The Minister in reply to that question, says :

I have not inquired.

Mr. TAYLOR.

Now I think there are returns made to Parliament of all the general elections. He has the information, and I think, to treat me civilly, he should have turned up the Government returns and said, I find in the returns made to the Government the names of the gentlemen.

An hon. MEMBER. Did you know?

Mr. TAYLOR. I did know, but I wanted him to know, and I think the Minister should have answered the question respectfully. Further down he makes a personal reference to myself which I think is uncalled for, because the question was not on the paper at all. He says :

In view of said Taylor's presumably intimate knowledge of the matter, I respectfully refer the hon. member for South Leeds to the said George Taylor as to what information has been in his possession.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Order. The hon. gentleman is there speaking of the Gananoque question.

Mr. TAYLOR. No.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is that a question of which the hon. gentleman has given notice?

Mr. TAYLOR. No; this is a personal explanation.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman will be good enough not to confuse a personal explanation with his discussion on a motion. If it is a strictly personal explanation it must be done in a very few words. But he must not, in doing so, discuss in any way the subject of the motion.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am not discussing it, because the motion on the paper does not cover it, and this is a question that was not on the paper. The Minister went far out of his way to make an insinuation.

The PRIME MINISTER. Order. The hon. gentleman is now commenting upon an answer made to this question by the Minister of Militia and Defence, and that portion of the ground is covered by his motion, of which he has given notice.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not remember seeing the notice. Is it on the paper?

Mr. TAYLOR. It is not on the paper.

The PRIME MINISTER. It is on the Votes and Proceedings of this day.

Mr. SPEAKER. The notice that the hon. gentleman has put upon the paper seems only to cover correspondence and offers.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is all.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must be careful not to refer to any correspondence or any offer, but confine himself strictly to matters outside. I think the House would be disposed to allow him to make a personal explanation, but without making any personal reflections himself.

Mr. TAYLOR. I purpose keeping strictly within the rules of the House. The notice on the paper calls for correspondence and has no reference to the subject I am now discussing. The answer the Minister gave me referred to something that was not in the question, neither is it in my motion calling for papers. He said :

In view of the said Taylor's presumably intimate knowledge of the matter, I respectfully refer the hon. member for South Leeds to the said George Taylor for information as to what disposition Mr. J. B. Turner may have made of the purchase money received by him.

I claim, Mr. Speaker, that there is an insinuation here made by the Minister of Militia that Mr. Turner sold his property at a price to some person, and he refers to me as if I got a commission on it. Now if he insinuates by that reference to me that I received any commission, or that any person that I know, has received any, he states something that is unfounded. I have been in this House for some fifteen years, the records of the late Government are in the hands of the hon. gentleman, and I ask for the papers for the purpose of getting the correspondence brought down to this House. They can bring down everything they have got, and they will find no reference—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must not refer to correspondence.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am not referring to correspondence, but I am asking the Government to bring down all the papers they have in their possession, including communications from me to the late Government, and they will find that not a cent of the Government's money ever came from any contractor or anybody else into my hands. The Minister makes an insinuation here that I participated in the sale. He read a letter here. I ask for the correspondence. This will come down. I may just say that in the letter of Mr. Turner that he read here, and that was uncalled for, there is not the shadow of a truth, for I never recommended to the late Government or anybody else that this lot be sold for $6,000.

Mr. SPEAKER. What is the hon. gentleman's motion

Mr. TAYLOR. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

Mr. INGRAM. The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) was on his feet to address the House when we declared the motion carried. I also wish to make a few remarks on this very same question.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman from Kingston was really on his feet without my seeing him, of course I could not declare the motion carried. Was the hon. member on his feet when I declared the motion carried ?

Mr. BRITTON. I was, Mr. Speaker. I wanted to say a word or two in reference to this question, and to the answer that was given to the question in reference to locomotives to be made at Kingston, if there are any such. I think the answer agrees with my recollection of what took place at that meeting. There was no pretense whatever at that meeting, nor was there any statement of the tenor of the telegram to the effect that a contract had been given, but there was the statement that an opportunity would be given to the Kingston Locomotive Works to tender, or to offer for this work. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to go back a little on that question. This question of giving work to the Kingston Locomotive Works has never been, to the slightest extent, a political question, so far. As far back as the early part of last session, it was understood that the Government were about to get one or more locomotives from an American locomotive factory. I then interrogated the Minister of Railways on the subject, and wanted to know why, if locomotives were to be purchased for the Intercolonial Railway, they could not be manufactured and purchased in Canada on as favourable terms and containing as good work as locomotives obtained from the United States. The hon. Minister told me that possibly a locomotive from American works could be got cheaper than one in Canada, if they took into consideration that duty was not paid, but the Government would be willing to purchase Canadian locomotives so long as they were equally good and as cheap as locomotives purchased in the United States. I think that was a fair answer. I then wanted to know if an opportunity would be given to manufacturers of locomotives at Kingston to compete. The Minister replied : Certainly, whenever locomotives were required for the Intercolonial when the specifications were ready, and they were then being prepared, an opportunity would be given to the Kingston factory to compete for the work. The question on further discussion seemed to resolve itself into this, that possibly locomotives could be obtained cheaper in the United States than from Canadian locomotive works if the duty was not taken into consideration. The argument was advanced as between Canadian and American establishments, that the Dominion Government should not for one moment consider this question of duty, but act in such a manner as, if possible, to give the work to the Kingston establishment. I may say that my interest is wholly the interest of Kingston and Canadian manufacturers ; my object has nothing political in it, and those interested in the Kingston works are opposed to me politically ; but I preferred to promote the interests of Canadian manufacturers, and Kingston manufacturers particularly, to any question of politics whatever. In order therefore to impress upon the Minister of Railways the views held by myself and others that the question of duty should be considered, a deputation came here from Kingston and saw the Minister of Railways, and the hon. gentleman then said substantially what is stated in his telegram, and has always stood by that view, that so soon as the specifications were ready, if the Kingston establishment was able to do as good work as could be done in the United States establishments, it would have the opportunity to tender, and would have the preference. That was all that could be done. But there was delay in furnishing the specifications, and only comparatively recently have those specifications been received. The gentleman at Kingston became impatient, and the mayor, as representing the city, took the matter in hand, and inquired when the work would be given out. Let hon. members bear in mind that Mr. Harty was formerly the managing director of the works, and he was expected to see that all possible orders should come to the Kingston establishment. No doubt he wrote the Minister of Railways.

Mr. TAYLOR. Does the hon. gentleman state that the telegram printed in the "Whig" was the same as that read?

Mr. BRITTON. So far as I recollect it is; there is no difference whatever between the telegram in the report and that received—at all events in substance they are in perfect accord. This is an unfair attempt on the part of the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) to drag politics into a question of this kind. All parties, Conservatives and Reformers alike, are equally interested in having all work that can be done in Canada, performed here.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I agree in the main with the statement that has just fallen from the hon. gentleman who has taken his seat. But in his statement he has not presented the case in accordance with his own views. I understood him to say, and I think he repeated it twice, that the duty should not be taken into consideration. I hold that the duty should be taken into consideration, and that before the Minister of Railways decided between an American tender and a Canadian tender he should add the Canadian duty to the American article, and if, with that duty added, the Canadian article was lower than the American, the article produced here should have the preference.

Mr. BRITTON. It is evident I did not make myself understood, because that is my view, and it is the view we were attempting to impress on the Minister.

Mr. INGRAM. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) on Monday asked a question, and in his reply the Minister of Railways said:

Mr. BRITTON.

No such letter or telegram has been sent as is referred to in this sub-question.

An hon. MEMBER. Read the question.

Mr. INGRAM. The question was:

(c.) To what parties have letters or telegrams been sent, announcing that such contract had been given to the Kingston Locomotive Works?

I have read the answer given by the Minister at that time. Yet to-day we find the hon. member for Kingston stating that the question is not a political one and that the statement made by Mr. Harty was not for political purposes. The hon. member also stated that the men employed in Kingston Locomotive Works are opposed to him politically, and he approved of the statement made by Mr. Harty, that he had received a telegram from the Minister of Railways stating that an order would be given to the Kingston Locomotive Works for three locomotives. I ask the hon. gentleman or any other hon. member in the face of a provincial election taking place in Ontario to-day whether any one who knows Mr. Harty would consider he had any political object in making that statement in Kingston? It was done solely for political purposes and for the purpose of making votes. A telegram has been read here to-day, but I understand there were two telegrams. Not satisfied with sending the first, another was sent, to the following effect:

A further order will be given to the Kingston Locomotive Works.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Does the hon. gentleman say that a further telegram was sent by me, or any other telegram?

Mr. INGRAM. I said there were two telegrams read on that occasion purporting to come from the Minister of Railways. I have made that statement on two different occasions.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I never heard it stated.

Mr. INGRAM. It has been made frequently. This I hold is another proof that a change should be made in the provincial government. Hon gentlemen opposite are working hand and glove with their Ontario friends. There is more than cold justice in this telegram, for the hon. gentleman's supporters are going to receive more than justice if they send a supporter of the Ontario Government, and hon. gentlemen opposite, like the Minister of Railways, will only be too happy to send another telegram or anything else that will promote the election of their friends.

Mr. FOSTER. The Minister of Railways has now at least heard that two telegrams were sent. He has acknowledged that one was sent.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No. I have heard it so stated.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the hon. gentleman not acknowledged that one was sent?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I beg your pardon.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to ask the hon. gentleman whether Mr. Harty, in his statement at Kingston was telling the truth or a falsehood, when he said he had received a telegram from the Minister of Railways and Canals that an order for three locomotives would be given to the Kingston works. Now, will he (Mr. Blair) give an honest answer to that, Mr. Speaker?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), I must say, finds it difficult to ask a question without doing so in the most insolent and impertinent manner. I have known the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) for a great many years. I have known him since he and I were young men together.

Mr. FOSTER. A long while ago.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I find, Mr. Speaker, that the association of that hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) with gentlemen during all the intervening years has not produced any marked effect in removing the ill-breeding and the insolent and impertinent manner which distinguished him in former days.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) has gone too far. As the hon. gentleman's answer is in reply to a statement of the hon. gentleman from York (Mr. Foster), I would like to say that I was sorry to hear him (Mr. Foster) urge the hon. Minister (Mr. Blair) to give an honest answer.

Mr. FOSTER. Ought I have asked him to give a dishonest answer?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) knows quite well what I mean. I hope the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) will curb his accentuation in a case of that kind; but I distinctly think that the hon. Minister (Mr. Blair) should withdraw that statement about ill-breeding.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I bow at once to your ruling, Mr. Speaker. I do not think that the hon. gentleman from York (Mr. Foster), nor do I think that any other member of this House, has any justification for insinuating or imputing to me, that, in any answers which I have given to any questions, or in any statements I have made to the House, I have not given those answers and made those statements in an entirely honest, fair and frank manner.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I understand, Mr. Speaker, you called upon the hon. Minister (Mr. Blair) to take back the expression he used.

Mr. SPEAKER. I heard the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) say distinctly that he at once took it back. Did the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) say that?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). That is more than the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) did the other night, when he was asked to take something back.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), when he rose to his feet, stated that the Minister of Railways had now heard that there were two telegrams. I have not yet heard that there were two telegrams. I have heard a member of this House say that it is stated that there were two telegrams, but I have not yet heard any one say that Mr. Harty alleged that two telegrams were received by him from me on that occasion. So far as the receipt of a telegram is concerned, I unquestionably did, in answer to a courteous letter from Mr. Harty, state to him what my intentions and purposes were as head of the department with respect to affording to the Kingston works an opportunity of competing for the engines we intended to buy. I so stated to Mr. Harty, but I did not say to him that we had ordered, or that we had entered into a contract. I could not state that to him, because such was not the fact. We have not, to this day, given the Kingston works an order. We had entered into no contract with them, and I neither could state to Mr. Harty that I had done so, nor could I state to this House, in answer to the question, that I had written or telegraphed to Mr. Harty that the Kingston works had received an order. They have not received any order. I need not say to the House that the answer I gave to the question is absolutely, entirely and literally correct. I know nothing about any subsequent telegram. I do not recollect that any second telegram was invited from me, and I do not recollect I sent any such telegram. I do not think I did, and, in fact, I am quite positive that I did not. Beyond that I cannot go. I do recollect distinctly having sent the one telegram, the terms of which have been stated by the gentleman referred to, and I have not sent any other telegram in reference to that subject.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order. Already spoken.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not speak. I desire to read—

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understand that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) has only asked a question, and as to the manner of asking that question I have already referred.

Mr. FOSTER. I am sorry to see the extreme sensitiveness of hon. gentlemen opposite. They seem to be afraid that some information will come out.

The PRIME MINISTER. Is that speaking to the question?

Mr. FOSTER. Well, I propose that a little more information shall come out. Now, the fact is this, that, when the Minister of Railways was asked a question, the other day, with reference to the sending of a telegram to Mr. Harty about an order for engines or locomotives to the Kingston Locomotive Works, it is a fact that he gave the House the impression, he gave me the impression, that no such telegram had been sent.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You had no right to infer any such thing.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I must be allowed to make my own inferences. Whilst I am quite willing to give wide scope to my hon. friend (Mr. Blair), he must allow me to make my own inferences.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order. Sit down.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I cannot speak in such a hubbub as this.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Sit down.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not propose to sit down.

The PRIME MINISTER. Question, then.

Mr. FOSTER. I propose to speak to the question.

The PRIME MINISTER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to order. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) said he proposed to speak to the question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

The PRIME MINISTER. He has said so, in so many words. The hon. gentleman stated he has already spoken to the question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

The PRIME MINISTER. Hon. gentlemen are not supposed to forget what has passed but a moment ago. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) has spoken. He rose to his feet once more, and he said he was simply rising to put a question.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The right hon. gentleman is quite mistaken, and, if he will allow me, I will point out that he is entirely under a wrong impression. What occurred was this: My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) asked a question, and when he rose to speak, he was called to order. Mr. Speaker ruled that my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) was entitled to speak, because he had merely asked a question previously.

The PRIME MINISTER. It is quite the reverse.

Mr. SPEAKER. The statement of the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) is certainly my recollection of the ruling. The first time the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) asked a question, and as to the manner of asking it I made some observations. Then, the second time the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) got up, he said he wished to speak to the question. That is as I understand it.

The PRIME MINISTER. He has already spoken.

Mr. FOSTER. The right hon. the First Minister reiterates, in the face of the decision of the Speaker, that I have already spoken. I think he should have done that in a tone not sufficiently loud to have been heard by gentlemen on this side of the House, at least. It is not contributing to the dignity of the House, when the leader of the House, in a tone that can be heard all over the House, refuses to bow to the Speaker's ruling.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. Really, I must ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) to confine himself to the question, because the good feeling of the House, which I like to see preserved, will not be improved by criticisms of that kind. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) should confine himself to the question, and I hope hon. gentlemen on both sides will observe that rule.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will be as nice as I possibly can to the right hon. the leader of the Government and to the Minister of Railways and Canals. A few days ago, the Minister of Railways and Canals was asked a question with reference to an order to the Kingston Locomotive Works.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Read the question.

Mr. FOSTER. I will read the question. When I was interrupted by the Minister of Railways and Canals—I will not say rudely interrupted—I was going on to say that the Minister of Railways and Canals was asked a question in certain terms, and it would require a pretty nice following of the question in connection with the answer, for any one in this House not to infer, as I certainly inferred, that what the hon. gentleman's answer carried was a denial that any telegram was sent with reference to an order in any way for locomotives in Kingston. I was going on to state that my opinion was that his denial did take that scope, when the hon. gentleman interrupted me. When you read the question, and look at the tense in which it was asked, whether any contract had been given, the hon. gentleman's answer was strictly correct, so far that his telegram did not state that a contract had been given or that an order had been given. It was only a promise that an order should be given.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It was not even that.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, the answer is :

No such letter or telegram has been sent as is referred to in this sub-question.

And the sub-question is :

To what parties have letters or telegrams been sent, announcing that such contract had been given to the Kingston Locomotive Works ?

And the first question, of which this was a sub-question, was :

Has any order been given by the Department of Railways and Canals, or Public Works, to the Kingston Locomotive Works, for locomotives, and if so, at what prices are those to be supplied ?

Technically, the hon. gentleman may say that his answer is a true answer, so far as the question asked is concerned ; but it was not an undue inference for a person to draw who simply heard the question asked and answered, that what the hon. gentleman meant to do was to deny that any order or any promise of an order had been given. The hon. gentleman, in answering another question, was so anxious that the House should be in full possession of all the facts which could bear upon it, that he took up the time of the House in giving answers to a question which was not asked. He was very much concerned that the House should have not only an answer to the question that was asked, but all the facts in the case ; and so, after answering a question of mine as to new appointments on the Intercolonial Railway, he went on to give information which I had not asked for, to show that though new appointments had been made, there had been savings in other directions, so that the public chest was not a loser. If the hon. gentleman had been just as anxious—not more anxious, but just as anxious—that all the truth should come out in this instance, he would have stated that although no contract had been given, he had sent a telegram to Mr. Harty telling him that an order would be given to the Kingston Locomotive Works. That was just the point my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) wanted to bring out. The hon. Minister is justified in hinging his answer technically on the question that was asked ; but he might have treated the House with a good deal more openness and have explained the whole matter with a great deal more broad truth, if he had stated what was actually the fact, namely, that a telegram had been sent, promising that an order for three locomotives should be given to the Kingston Locomotive Works. This brings out one thing which it is well for the House to emphasize, that is, that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, in his position in this House, handling to a certain extent the moneys of the whole country, which is made up of Liberals and Conservatives, is willing, from a Dominion point of view, to league himself with a man engaged in a provincial election contest—using the power of the Dominion Government and the power of the treasury of the people of the Dominion in order to help a partisan in a provincial election. Ah, but, some one says, this had no political significance. It had not ? Let us see. Here is a very significant sentence, which was uttered at the very end of Mr. Harty's speech, after the information was detailed :

I think the workingmen have some knowledge of the interest I have taken in them for a number of years.

What was the purpose of that ?

I have never lost sight of the desirability of aiding the workingmen.

What was the purpose of that ?

Mayor Livingston suggested to me the manufacture of locomotives for the Intercolonial Railway, and that we do something to get the contract for Kingston. I wrote to Mr. Blair—

For what purpose ? That the workingmen might see who their benefactors were, and pay them back on the election day on the 1st of March.

I wrote to Mr. Blair, Minister of Railways and Canals, and have just received a telegram to-day. He says he intends giving Kingston Works the opportunity to build three locomotives for that railway, the specifications of which will be sent at once. My desire is to give home manufacturers—

And the workingmen—that is a parenthesis—

—the first preference, and I am glad the work is coming here. The battle has now commenced, and all who are in sympathy with me must work.

That is the battle note which was uttered on the obliging Minister's telegram—that the workingmen of whom Mr. Harty declared himself to be such a great friend, would have the work upon three locomotives through his influence with his good friend the Minister of Railways and Canals at Ottawa. There is a direct linking together of this Government and a partisan election in the province of Ontario against all the old-time principles, without doubt, but according to the new Liberal policy.

Now, Sir, with reference to the Minister of Railways and Canals and his polite reference to myself, which I am very happy to say, without interference on my part, brought to me the kindly and powerful protection of you, Mr. Speaker, I have known Mr. Blair before he became—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not out of order. I have known Mr. Blair before he became Minister of Railways and Canals in this House, and I have known him since; and I am not going to rise in this House at any time and endeavour to throw a slur either upon his family or upon himself by instituting any comparison at all in regard to breeding generally, or any investigation as to the hon. gentleman's own breeding. I take it that there are gentlemen on both sides of this House, and that ladies and gentlemen listen to members on both sides of this House; and I think that the action and the words of any member on either side of the House can be very well judged by the House, and will be taken as a fair indication of what his breeding was in early youth, or how it, as it may have been improved or otherwise, may be rated at the present time.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

UNITED STATES OCCUPATION OF DYE AND SKAGWAY.

Mr. PRIOR. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask the right hon. First Minister whether his attention has been called to certain paragraphs that have appeared in the press, both in the United States and in Canada, to the effect that the United States Government are about to send two companies of troops to be permanently stationed at Dyea and Skagway, at the head of the Lynn Canal. That is, as you know, in disputed territory. It is a highway to the Yukon country, and the reason given in these papers is, that there are a large number of disorderly characters assembled there at present, and that troops are required to prevent any riotous proceedings taking place. I also wish to ask the right hon. gentleman whether his Government has seen fit to let the United States Government know that they have no objection to these troops being sent there, but that such permission must not be considered as an admission on the part of Canada that our claim to that territory has been withdrawn. We saw, in times past, how the sending of troops to San Juan affected the argument before the arbitration, and I, for one, would not like to see the same thing occur again with regard to Dyea and Skagway.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The Government has not been informed of the intention to which my hon. friend has just referred. The Government did not know it was the intention of the American Government to send their troops to Dyea and Skagway. My hon. friend is aware that, although this is disputed territory, it has been in the possession of the United States ever since they acquired this country from the Russian Government in 1867, and, so far as my information goes, I am not aware that any protest has ever been raised by any Government against the occupation of Dyea and Skagway by the United States. It is only in recent years that the attention of the public has been drawn to it. I may say to my hon. friend, that the importance of having a delimitation or settlement of the boundary between Canada and the United States in that region is at this moment engaging our attention.

BONDING PRIVILEGES ON THE STIKINE RIVER.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to invite the attention of my right hon. friend and his colleagues on the Treasury benches to a very important movement in the Senate of the United States. An amendment to the Bill now before the Senate is proposed by an hon. Senator, which provides that bonding privileges on British goods going into the Stikine River or coming out shall only go into effect upon the proclamation by the President of the United States, and the same Bill provides that, in consideration of privileges of that kind being extended to us, the American fishermen shall practically have advantages which the Treaty of 1818 denies to them. My right hon. friend is aware that an endeavour was made in 1888 to dispose of the differences between the United States and Canada with regard to the Atlantic fisheries, and he is aware that the plenipotentiaries of Great Britain and the United States jointly signed a treaty, which was sent by Mr. Cleveland to the Senate, with a strong recommendation for its adoption, as a fair and honourable solution of that question. My right hon. friend also knows that that treaty was rejected by the Senate, but when it was agreed to, the plenipotentiaries of Great Britain submitted a modus vivendi which they offered to the United States, to go into operation pending the consideration of that question by the Senate, in order to meet the case before it was finally dealt with. That modus vivendi was also accepted in the most effusive manner by the President of the United States. He recommended it to the consideration of the Senate, as one which gave the Government of the United States great satisfaction. My right hon. friend is also aware that this House passed a law giving effect to that modus vivendi, and that practically it has been in operation from that time down to the present, and my right hon. friend is now aware that the Republican President who succeeded President Cleveland, President Harrison, in his inaugural address, referred to that modus vivendi voluntarily offered by the plenipotentiaries of Great Britain—and which passed into law by Act of this Parliament and has been in operation ever since—as having removed all friction between the United States and Canada from that time. I draw attention to that and to the fact that it is now proposed to introduce a provision into an Act of Congress which is entirely at variance with those proceedings that have taken place, and which provides that all the rights that are admitted by the United States to belong to Canada with regard to the Atlantic fisheries shall be yielded, or that there shall be no bonding privileges allowed. I draw attention to this, at this moment, because, taken in connection with the Bill before this House, it is a question of the utmost importance. I hope that my hon. friend will see its gravity and take every means in his power to prevent from going into effect a measure of that kind, which is entirely fatal to the Bill now before us.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). My attention has certainly been drawn to the Bill to which my hon. friend has just referred, and I suppose the attention of every Canadian who takes an interest in the affairs of his country. But we are all obliged to remember at this moment that the Bill is not law, and I cannot, for my part, entertain the idea that the American authorities, legislative or executive, would have any intention of sanctioning any law which, in any manner, would deviate from their treaty obligations. Moreover, all this, I think, is perhaps anticipating the debate now going on, because my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) will refer at length to this point again.

CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY COMPANY.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr Blair for the second reading of Bill (No. 6) an Act to confirm an agreement between Her Majesty the Queen and Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, and to incorporate the Canadian Yukon Railway Company.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I had the honour, last evening, of drawing the attention of the House to the remarkable change of front which has taken place on the part of the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), and I need not further advert to that fact at present. I also consumed some time referring to a few of the statements which the hon. gentleman had made, and a few of the criticisms which he had addressed to my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair). The hon. leader of the Opposition made a great many extraordinary statements in criticism of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals. He went so far as to use an expression which, I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, can hardly be considered parliamentary or a proper expression in the mouth of the leader of a great party, a baronet, an ex-High Commissioner, an ex-Prime Minister, an ex-Minister of Railways and Canals, and various other offices. He designated my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals as a "Know-nothing." Surely my hon. friend was somewhat lost to a sense of what is due to his own dignity and the dignity of this House, when he made use of that expression.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I ask leave to interrupt my hon friend for one single moment to ask him whether he thinks that was a greater violation of parliamentary decorum than for one of his colleagues to call a gentleman on his side of the House "Ananias."

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. If my hon. friend will have any one who suggests that epithet on his side of the House, of course we cannot help it; the truth will come out some time. It would be quite impossible for us, at any rate, to prevent impressions of that kind being formed. But I do not suppose my hon. friend will take the position that, because some gentleman on this side intimated that there was a possible resemblance between Ananias and some gentleman on that side of the House, he is to be relieved for all time to come from all sense of decency and of the importance of maintaining parliamentary decorum.

What I was seeking to call the hon. gentleman's attention to in connection with my remarks on that subject was that while he was addressing his gentle criticism to my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals, he was adverting most strongly to the fact that the Government had presumed to come down to Parliament and ask for the subsidizing of a line of railway, and yet was not able to state either by speech in Parliament or in the Bill specifically what the rates for freight and passengers on this railway should be. That is a criticism that is very strongly and very repeatedly addressed to this side of the House by my hon. friend, it is a criticism that has been in the air, and has been seen in the press and heard in this House, and it has been heard a number of times while this question has been under consideration. Now the party of which the hon. gentleman is the titular leader was in control of the railway legislation of this Parliament from 1878 to 1896. I would like the combined wisdom of the gentlemen on that side of the House, before this discussion is through, to be addressed to meeting this challenge that I now make: For them to produce the case of a single railway Bill presented to this House since 1878 which stated the rates which were to be charged upon that railway. If they cannot do that let them produce a single case in which, since 1878, the Minister of Railways when he brought down a Bill for the subsidizing of a railway stated in this House what were to be the specific passenger rates upon that railway. Will they produce one single case in which they did what they have demanded and re-demanded we should do in regard to this particular railway?

Mr. MACLEAN. What about the two cent passenger rate Bill ?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Are you the leader of the Opposition ?

Mr. MACLEAN. The challenge was to any member on this side.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Now, I do not intend to follow the windings of my hon. friend's (Sir Charles Tupper's) attempt to give the reasons for his change of front, or to offer any further criticisms on his remarks at the present moment.

I was endeavouring, last evening when the debate adjourned, to explain the position in which the Government was placed respecting the difficulties arising out of the administration of the Yukon district, to the end that we might give to the House and the country a fair idea of the reasons which impelled the Government to the action which they have taken and to recommend the course which they have recommended to Parliament. I pointed out that the facts were unprecedented in this respect—that we had to accept responsibility for the government and administration of a distant and almost inaccessible country, and that the only mode of access to the country (practically speaking, although not absolutely so from a geographical standpoint) was through territory which was in the possession of the United States, and which, according to international usage, it was not competent for this Government to take possession of or to exercise jurisdiction over without negotiations and the consent of the United States Government. I wish the House to take special note of the difficulties caused by that one fact when considering the criticisms addressed to us from the other side of the House based on the fact that we have not taken such action as would undoubtedly have brought about strained relations between the Government of Canada and the Government of United States. I might say, that the suggestion which was brought to the attention of the right hon. the First Minister in connection with the Stikine River, that this Government should take steps to prevent certain action being taken at Washington, comes very strangely indeed from an hon. gentleman who a night or two ago denounced most furiously and in the most unqualified terms the idea of any member of this Government having anything to do with the Government at Washington. This only shows the absolutely incoherent and inconsequential nature of the criticisms addressed to the Government.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend perhaps will allow me to say that he has entirely misinterpreted my words if he thought that I proposed that this Government should put itself in communication with the American Government in any other way than through the Imperial Government and the British Ambassador at Washington.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I am quite satisfied to let the hon. gentleman's explanation stand. I was pointing out the difficulties we were under with respect to that territory, and wish to state the further fact that up to that time we were dependent, for the very supplies which our officers in the Yukon district received, upon the American transportation companies which were doing business in the United States territory of Alaska. It will at once be seen by the House that that is a most important consideration. These supplies had to pass through nearly 1,600 miles of American territory before they reached the places where our supplies had to be delivered. We might have anticipated—in fact we did anticipate—what actually happened later on, that one of the boats containing supplies, some of which, I believe, were actually ordered for our own officers in the Yukon district, was held up in United States territory and provisions taken off, and our post was left short in consequence.

I only call attention to these facts to show to the House the difficult position in which the Government was placed. Then, Sir, let me call attention to this fact, that notwithstanding the warning which was addressed to the people of the United States last summer in regard to the almost absolute certainty of starvation, if any very large number of people went into the Yukon district, a considerable number of people did go, and a very large expense has been incurred by this Government for the purpose of preventing the starvation which might have followed had not such expense been incurred. Now this is the fact which the House will have to take into consideration. There are at the present time thousands of people upon the way, and thousands more who are making their preparations to go into this district; and if, for the purpose of averting the danger of starvation of two or three thousand people of a surplus population, we have to go to enormous expense, what, Sir, would be the condition of affairs if 40,000 or 50,000 people should struggle through those mountains and find themselves at the end of the summer four or five hundred miles down in the northern part of the district, unable to return, and without a sufficient supply of provisions to take them through the winter? It is only necessary to state the proposition in order that the House may be seized of the fact that we have before us, and of the possibility of one of the most appalling catastrophes the world has ever seen, outside of what takes place in a state of war. We have therefore to consider that no matter what warnings are addressed to the people, no matter what this Government or the United States Government may do or attempt to do, immense numbers of people will find their way into that territory, and if provision is not made for taking in supplies, these people will go in without sufficient supplies. We have this further to take into consideration, that the officers and men we have sent up there, the officers and men that we intend to send, would be, under such circumstances, surrounded as the officials of the United States at Fort Yukon are surrounded to-day, if the last accounts we have received can be relied upon. Our officers would be surrounded as they are by thousands of starving people, armed men, accustomed to a somewhat lawless method of life; and the inevitable result of that state of affairs would be that the authority of this Government in that district would be overthrown, and the further result would be that it would be quite impossible for this Government to re-assert and to re-establish its authority until a railroad was built and a proper system of transportation provided so that our forces and our supplies could be taken in. Let me make that clear to the House. If it should happen that 40,000 or 50,000 people should be there next fall without sufficient supplies, and our officers were left in the midst of those people, and those people felt and knew that this Government had had time to provide for proper means of transportation and had not taken the necessary and requisite steps for so doing, it would be impossible that the moral authority which our officers now exert over those people, could be retained under such circumstances. We would be face to face with the fact that 200 or 300 of our officers would be surrounded by starving thousands of armed men, of alien men, not citizens of Canada, but citizens of foreign countries, and these men would have possession of the Yukon district instead of the Government of Canada having control over it. So, Sir, we have before us the great danger of the authority of this Government being overridden, being destroyed, and the Government of that district being, theoretically, if not actually, taken out of our hands by reason of the fact that we would have failed to meet the responsibility of the case, and failed to make adequate provision for what we foresaw, and what we knew ought to have been provided for. Now, Sir, so much for the national aspect of the question. There is also another aspect. We know that for many years past upon this continent there has never been so great a movement of population to any one place as seems to be imminent at the present time in what is known as the movement to the Klondike district. It seems almost inconceivable to us to hear and read the estimates regarding the number of persons likely to go into that district. I saw the other day in the New York "Herald" a statement like this:

The statement that a quarter of a million gold-seekers will go from Seattle alone this year, seems to be well founded, in view of the "Herald's" despatches to the effect that 7,000 have sailed in the last eight days, and that 1,000 are arriving there daily.

It is such facts as these that we have to deal with. We are told, too, that the transportation agencies in Europe are booking tens of thousands of people for the Pacific Coast, and that the immediate object of these people is to procure transportation to the Klondike district. We know, too, that the officers of the Canadian railways have made immense preparations for this trade; and, while no person can say exactly how much of it will materialize, everything points to the fact that the greatest rush that has been seen for many years upon this continent will take place during the next few months towards the Klondike district. It has been estimated, and the estimate does not seem to be an unreasonable or extravagant one, that from $50,000,000 to $75,000,000 will be spent in outfitting and in transportation by these people; and it does not require any lengthened argument on my part to show that a volume of trade of $50,000,000 or $75,000,000 is a thing to which the Government of this country should devote a large amount of attention when it is possible to secure it for Canadian merchants and Canadian manufacturers. The possibilities of trade, therefore, were very carefully considered by the Government in connection with this question, and we have done all that we could to make reasonable arrangements with our friends in the United States in order that the passage of goods through the Dyea and Skagway routes might not interfere with the work of our merchants. But this we know, Mr. Speaker, that there are 10,000 or 12,000 men at Dyea and Skagway now. We know that these people now there cannot get over these passes probably in the next three months, and that it is an almost absolute certainty that within two or three weeks there will be more people at those two places than can get over the passes between now and next fall; and as a result of this we have the fact that means of access to that country, in the course of a couple of weeks, will be practically shut off so far as those places are concerned. Therefore, it seemed to the Government as most essential that another and better method of access to the country should be provided, so that immediately it is seen that the method of access to the country by Dyea and Skagway is shut off, we will be able to divert the stream of traffic along our Canadian route, and our Canadian merchants and manufacturers will benefit by that traffic being so diverted by reason of the fact that the purchase of goods will necessarily be made in Canada. Now, Sir, these are some of the considerations which have led the Government to regard this question as one of such serious and great urgency as to justify us in taking a very strong stand in reference to it, and in dealing with it in a way which has been described, and very properly described, as unusual. Not so unusual, however, in point of speed, in point of what may be called hurry, as to offend the experienced parliamentarian who presides over the destinies of the Opposition, because the only fault that that hon. gentleman found with us was that we had not moved fast enough. It is, Mr. Speaker, sometimes desirable that we should see ourselves as others see us, and if the House will permit me, I will just read a short extract from one of the best known and ablest commercial papers in the United States, as an indication of what our rivals for this great trade are thinking of our action in this connection. It is always a good thing to know what your opponent is doing, and while we are on the most friendly terms with the Cabinet of the United States, we know they are doing everything they can to secure this trade for their people, and they know we are doing everything we possibly can to secure this trade for our people. This is what one of their most reliable organs, the New York "Commercial Advertiser," in its edition of February 4, under the heading "The Klondike Railway," says:

The Canadian Government is sedulously following up its policy of securing all the benefits of Klondike wealth for itself. Having exacted royalties from American miners, having appropriated a proportion of the gold-bearing soil for itself—

That is a most outrageous thing for Canada to do, to appropriate a little bit of its own territory for itself —and having imposed a heavy duty on supplies brought into the country by Americans, Canada has now chartered a railway to enable its citizens to reach the gold fields without entering American territory, and thus to cut down the profits of American transportation and supply companies.

I wonder whether our supplies would be allowed to go into the United States without paying duty

The projected railway does not make an all-rail route to the Klondike, and it will, no doubt, be long before there is one. The road is to start on the coast just south of the southern boundary of Alaska, and traverse Dominion territory until it reaches navigable water flowing down through the Klondike region. It will be many years before there will be any settlements in the northern part of British Columbia to enable the building of a railway to connect the Canadian Pacific with the new Klondike road, and by the time there are, the Klondike gold will very likely be exhausted and the Klondike railway abandoned.

That, of course, is a matter of opinion.

The thrifty Canadian Government is not risking any money on the projected road. The contractors clamoured for a subsidy and insisted that they could not be expected to construct the road without one. But Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his colleagues stood firm, and all that the contractors receive from the Government is a land grant along the route. The bargain is pronounced to be the best one which Canada ever drove in a railway negotiation,—

Mr. SIFTON.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to ask the hon. gentleman—

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I will address a few remarks to the hon. gentleman in a few minutes, and I think I can satisfy him. This is a sentence that will grieve the hon. gentleman:

—as the land will never be worth anything without the railroad, and cannot prove very valuable with it, unless some unexpected mineral resources are discovered.

This is a comment on the action of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. I am sure they will like to know the estimation in which their party is held by our American friends, as compared with the opinion entertained by them of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House.

The new railway will be a short one, to be sure, but to get it built without spending a cent of the public moneys upon it—

I cannot expect the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) to agree with this.

—is a great contrast to the prodigality with which Sir John Macdonald subsidized the Canadian Pacific, and indicates sincerity in the denunciation by Laurier and his party of the supposed corrupt relations between the Canadian Pacific and the Macdonald Government.

I commend this latter portion to the attention of the House.

An Ottawa Government organ exultantly remarks that Canada now has the key to the gold fields in her own hands, and can deal with the Americans as she sees fit. This boast might have been withheld until the road was finished. Physical obstacles or excessive cost may prevent the contractors from building it at all under the terms of the contract.

Hon. gentlemen opposite think this is a trifling matter, but others do not think it so trifling.

The same journal says that Americans have made far too large a share of the profits of the Yukon, both in the transportation business, the outfitting and the mining itself. This is true, because they have had the enterprise to secure it.

I have read these extracts to show how the matter is looked at by people who are taking the largest interest in it on the other side of the line, how it is looked at by the men who are going to suffer from the railway being put through, which will involve loss of their trade, and by which we will be able to add the trade of the Yukon to the general trade of the Dominion.

If the House will not consider it a task too wearisome, I will try and offer a few remarks in regard to the various routes by which the Yukon can be reached, with the view of affording the House a little information on the subject, which possibly I have had a better opportunity of acquiring than have members of the House generally. First, we have the route by way of the Yukon River. That route involves an ocean passage from a Pacific Coast port to St. Michael's, at the mouth of the Yukon River, on the coast of Alaska. From St. Michael's by a river steamboat, the passenger goes to Dawson City through the United States territory of Alaska, a distance of about 1,600 miles. The Yukon is a river that, during the early portion of the season, contains sufficient water to float river steamboats carrying freight to the amount of about 500 tons. Those steamboats make one trip, fully loaded, from St. Michael's to Dawson City and return. They generally are able to make a second trip, but very seldom fully loaded. That is the information we have from the transportation companies on that river. The boats go up and down twice in the season, and make no more than two trips in the course of the year, and on the second trip, on account of low water, they are not able to take a boat-load. There are two companies doing business on that river, the North American Transportation Company, and the Alaska Commercial Company; and those are the only companies we can rely on actually to get freight up that river. Other people are building boats and intend to take them up the river next spring, but there is no certainty of those boats reaching Dawson City. The great difficulty arises from—and I need only mention the difficulty to realize the fact that a similar difficulty is met with in navigating all western rivers, and of course it applies to a river 1,600 miles long—the shoals and obstructions, which remove any certainty of boats getting up the river unless conducted by experienced men, knowing fully the navigation of the river. Some of the boats under construction may get up, but there is no assurance that they will get as far as Dawson City next season. There is also the danger connected with that route, as regards getting provisions and supplies up the river, that it may not be made available for Canadian use. There are gold developments on the American side of the line, and these may lead the Americans to use their transportation facilities for the benefit of their own people, and we are liable to be told that the supplies carried are needed for their own settlements, and thus left without any facilities. Now, the combined transportation facilities of the two companies upon the Yukon route, next year, will be about 40,000 tons for all purposes whatever.

Mr. FOSTER. This year?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Yes, this year; next season. It will be about 40,000 tons, and it would be a very liberal estimate on our part to assume that one-half of the tonnage of these companies would be devoted to the carriage of provisions and supplies to the Canadian side.

We may therefore say that we can probably count on somewhat in the neighbourhood of 20,000 tons of supplies of all kinds; remember not provisions alone, but supplies and outfits of all kinds coming in by the Yukon route. That is the very outside limit of what we can reasonably expect to come by that route during the next season.

Then there is the Dyea route. When I was at Dyea there was no method of getting supplies over the Chilkoot Pass, except by packing them on men's backs. We are now informed that a portion of the distance has been spanned by a small tramway, that another portion has been spanned by a wire cable, and that small quantities of supplies can be taken over in that way. The cost at the present time is said to be 15 cents a pound, but the capacity for taking supplies over by that route is very, very limited, and only a small amount could be transported over that pass during the season. On the Skagway trail the only method of transferring supplies is by packing on horses' and on men's backs.

Then there is the Taku route. That is the route by way of Taku Inlet, and it is best known by reason of the fact that the most active glacier on the Pacific Coast is in the immediate neighbourhood of the harbour. The harbour is a very poor one, generally filled with icebergs, as it was when I was there. This route is totally impracticable without a railway, and, like the other routes that I have spoken of, terminates in the strip of American territory which runs along the coast.

Then, Mr. Speaker, there is the Stikine route, and that is the route which has been decided upon by the Government after a full and careful and deliberate consideration. The House is now in possession of the report of Mr. Jennings, a very competent and reliable engineer who was sent up there last fall for the purpose of making an investigation. I need not say to the House that Mr. Jennings did not make what could be called a survey of a railway route, for he had no time to do anything of that kind. He took a couple of professional assistants up there with him, and he had authority to take general direction of all the operations and explorations. Mr. St. Cyr, a surveyor in the employ of the Department of the Interior, was then on the ground to assist in the work, and Mr. Jennings took with him a number of labourers and others. His instructions were not to make a survey of a railway route in the ordinary sense of the word, but an exploration of the country so as to give the Government all the information in regard to a wagon road, an electric railway or any method of transportation that the Government might consider desirable or feasible through the particular districts that were placed in his charge for the time being. Mr. Jennings went there and he has now made his report, which is in the hands of the members of the House. He was instructed at the same time to despatch a reliable officer, and he subsequently did despatch Mr. St. Cyr, who is a very reliable explorer, for some years in the employ of the Department of the Interior, and who went down from the head of Teslin Lake, through the Teslin Lake, and through the Hootalinqua River, for the purpose of ascertaining beyond a doubt particulars as to the navigability of the Hootalinqua River and Teslin Lake.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Can the hon. gentleman say at what period of the year Mr. St. Cyr went there?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. He went down late in the fall; I think he got through before the ice formed on the river. It was just about the time the ice was forming that he got to the junction of the Lewes and Hootalinqua rivers. We were in doubt as to whether that officer would be able to get down, because from the reports we had we thought that in all probability the ice would be formed upon the lake and upon the river before he could get there. However, we discovered, very much to our satisfaction, that our anticipation with regard to the earliness of the date that these waters froze over was entirely erroneous, and it is now known that these waters do not freeze over so early in the fall as was generally understood. Mr. St. Cyr therefore made a report, which will be found incorporated in Mr. Jennings's printed report, and in that report the particulars respecting the navigability of Teslin Lake and the Hootalinqua River are given. The members of this House will see beyond a doubt from Mr. St. Cyr's report—and I may say that he is a most reliable and experienced officer—that there is no doubt whatever about the navigability of the Hootalinqua River.

I am dwelling upon these facts because the Government do not expect the members of the House to rush into this matter blindfolded. We wish to give to the House, and we wish to call to the particular attention of the House, all the details of the information which are necessary in order to enable an intelligent judgment to be formed upon the project which we are submitting. The navigability of these waters was, of course, a prime consideration, and no steps whatever could be taken towards making definite arrangements for the construction of this road until the report of Mr. St. Cyr was in my hands, so that I could say to my colleagues: We can now consider the construction of a railway from Stikine River to Teslin Lake, because we have ascertained that the waters beyond are navigable. We have now got that information, in authentic and definite form.

From the Stikine River to the junction of the Hootalinqua and the Lewes rivers the waters are navigable; from there to Dawson City the waters are navigable for scows and canoes without interruption, and with the exception of one short space in the river, known as the Five Fingers, the waters are continuously navigable. We have not had a survey made of the Five Fingers Rapids—we have had no opportunity of doing so—but we have such information from some of our officers and other persons who have passed down that river, that we think we are justified in saying to Parliament that a very few thousand dollars will suffice to blow up the boulders which form the obstruction at the Five Fingers Rapids. It will cost perhaps $5,000, and certainly not more than $10,000, and the waters will then be navigable all the way from the head of Teslin Lake to Dawson City. Then, we shall have an uninterrupted water route open from the 15th or 20th of May or thereabouts—that is the best information we have—until about the 1st of November. We shall have a continuous water route from Teslin Lake down to Dawson City during that period of the year. The railway from the Stikine River to Teslin Lake will furnish the link in providing for through transportation. The Stikine River is a navigable river; I do not think anybody ever supposed that it was navigable for ocean steamers, but it is sufficiently navigable for the purposes of this traffic. This is what Mr. Jennings says about it on page 7 of his report:

The Stikine River is usually navigable for powerful steamboats of suitable design to Glenora or Telegraph Creek, a distance of 150 miles, between the 1st of May and a date sometimes well on in October—

I may say that I was at the Stikine River myself and went a short distance up the river and made careful inquiries about the dates when the ice formed in the fall; and the information I received was to the effect that it was generally very late in October——dependent of course on the openness of the season and the amount of rain and snowfall. Its width varies from half a mile on the lower river to 500 feet above. The depth is generally good and the channel is remarkably free from snags, sunken rocks or boulders, but at Little and Klootchman Cañons, respectively 96 and 106 miles from the sea, during high water periods when many drift trees are running, it is with considerable risk that the passage through these contracted reaches are made and delays are common, as drift-wood is liable to become foul of the rudders or wheel. The first 50 miles, or to the Great Glacier, is very good water with a moderate current not exceeding three miles per hour, while from this point upwards the channel becomes somewhat tortuous and contracted, with an increasing general rate of current varying from three to eight miles per hour; however, the exceptionally swift sections are few and usually not more than half a mile in length.

A powerful river steamer should be able to make the Little Cañon in one day's run from the mouth of the river, and the Glenora or Telegraph Creek on the second day.

Mr. Jennings makes that report after having gone up this identical river, over this identical course, in a small steamer ; so that he is making the report, so far as this phase of the question is concerned, from absolute personal knowledge.

The sum of $5,000 could be advantageously spent in removing snags and boulders and in placing permanent cables for use in the heavy water, principally above the Little Cañon.

I may say that the Government contemplate asking the House for authority to spend a small sum of money, whatever may be necessary, for the purpose of removing the snags spoken of, and improving the navigation of the Stikine River. That matter is now before the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), and is receiving his best attention. Of course, the House is aware that from the mouth of the Stikine River to Vancouver or Victoria the route is by ocean steamer. I am giving these details to the House so that the House will be cognizant of the route to be followed when this railway shall be completed, and the facilities for traffic which it will afford. I calculate that the average trip from Vancouver or Victoria to Wrangell will occupy certainly not more than three days, and probably will be accomplished in two days, when better facilities for making the trip are completed, and when the steamers run on quick time, as they will no doubt do during the coming season. From Wrangell to Telegraph Creek the trip should be made in two days ; from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake by the railway in one day ; and from Teslin Lake to Dawson City by steamboat in seven days. So that we shall have by September next the possibility of reaching Dawson City from Victoria or Vancouver in thirteen days. I think, Mr. Speaker, if that desirable object is attained, the House will consider that the Government have succeeded in overcoming very great obstacles, and have brought about a very satisfactory result.

Then, Sir, this is to be remembered, that Dawson City is the extreme north-western town or large settlement in the Yukon district, not far from the boundary line ; and the first boat that goes up the Yukon River only reaches Dawson City about the middle of July. It is only between the middle of July and about two months later that there is any interchange of traffic at Dawson City by the Yukon River, and one cannot order freight which can possibly reach Dawson City by the Yukon after the first of September. About the 1st of September last we gave an order for freight to be sent to Dawson City by the Yukon River, and it never got there, and it is not there yet. So that that route is practically useless for modern commercial purposes. Though it has been used by the North American Transportation Co. and the Alaska Commercial Co., they have taken plenty of time to get in their supplies, making their arrangements a year or six months ahead ; but it is a route which is perfectly useless for modern commercial purposes, when large quantities of supplies have to be sent in on short notice. The route which we contemplate opening up will enable us to start on the 15th of May from Victoria or Vancouver, and in thirteen days to land people and provisions in Dawson City ; and from that time till late in the season, generally till from the 15th to the 30th of October, that traffic can be carried on.

There is not very much difference of opinion as to the route which the Canadian Government have selected being the best possible route for the purpose of reaching the Yukon district. Everybody who knows anything about it agrees with the Government on that point. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, although he has altered his opinion on a great many matters in connection with the contract, has not altered his opinion in regard to the Stikine route. He still thinks it is the best route. I venture to say that every member from British Columbia—men who know perhaps the most about the subject, if not personally, yet by hearsay from meeting men who do know personally—will be of the same opinion. The members of the Government of British Columbia, whom I met in Victoria, and with whom I discussed the question casually, expressed an unqualified opinion in favour of the Stikine route. So that we are in this position, that the route which the railway is to follow is the route endorsed by everybody who knows anything at all about the question. That appears to me to be a very important consideration for the House to bear in mind in considering the question now before it.

There is another phase of the question to which I wish to draw attention. Our friends of the Opposition, while they are not able to say that the Stikine route is not the right route, are still so utterly averse to honestly and fairly giving the Government credit for being right, when they know that the Government is right, that they have raised some questions about the action of the Government in connection with transshipment and the rights we have in respect to the navigation of the Stikine River. I showed last night that the Minister of Railways and Canals had practically said only the same thing that the leader of the Opposition had said. The leader of the Opposition no doubt was making a wise and statesmanlike remark when he made that statement ; but the Minister of Railways was apparently saying a most outrageous thing when he made the same statement. It seems to depend largely on who makes the statement, whether it is wise or statesmanlike. We have heard a great deal in regard to our rights on the Stikine River. I think I can give our hon. friends some light upon that subject. The boundary between the Yukon district and the territory of Alaska was settled many years ago by a treaty between Russia and Great Britain. At that time, the territory of Alaska was the property of the Russian Crown, and a treaty was made between Great Britain and Russia, known as the Anglo-Russian treaty of 1825, a copy of which I have in my hand. I am going to call attention to this little circumstance to show with what justification the great Conservative party claim to have the instinct of Government. And let the House understand this clearly, that when the United States purchased Alaska from Russia, they became subrogated in the rights of Russia, and could by no possibility have any additional rights or any right different from or in addition to those possessed by Russia.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Or sovereignty.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Or sovereignty. They took exactly what Russia possessed. And what the subjects of Great Britain possessed, under the Anglo-Russian treaty of 1825, as against Russia, they possessed as against the United States and all others. Article 6 of this treaty provides :

It is understood that the subjects of His Britannic Majesty, from whatever quarter they may arrive, whether from the ocean or the interior of the continent, shall for ever enjoy the right of navigating freely and without any hindrance whatever, all the rivers and streams which, in their course towards the Pacific Ocean, may cross the line of demarcation upon the line of coast described in article 3 of the present convention.

That was the law as it stood upon that point until the Washington treaty—the work of our hon. friends who possess in such a distinguished degree the instinct of government—was made. We had by treaty, not the mere right of navigation, not a limited right, not a right for the purposes of commerce only, but a right for all purposes—a proprietary, a complete right—with Russia and the subjects of the Russian Government, an absolutely equal right to—not the Stikine, or Yukon, or Porcupine rivers—but all the rivers that come down and cross the line of demarcation provided in the other articles of the treaty. That was the position we would be in to-day if it had not been for the statesmanship of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. HAGGART. Does that treaty with Russia apply to the Yukon or Porcupine ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I shall talk about the Yukon and Porcupine later. Will the hon. gentleman endeavour to address his great intellect to one subject at a time ? I am talking about the rivers that cross the line of demarcation, with special reference to the Stikine River, which is of the utmost importance to us at present.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman said distinctly the Yukon and the Porcupine Rivers.

Mr. SIFTON.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. We will get to them afterwards. These hon. gentlemen are getting very restless. They know what is coming, and they do not like it. Now, will the House take cognizance of the fact that the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty possessed, under this treaty with Russia, a proprietary right, for all purposes whatever, in the Stikine River until that right was interfered with by the statesmanship of our friends on the other side. These gentlemen apparently had never read this treaty. They did not know what it contained, they had not the remotest conception of what they were doing when they put this clause in the Washington treaty, which they have been boasting about ever since the question of the Stikine River came up.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman permit me to ask him one question, and that is, whether it was not a great Liberal statesman, the present Marquis of Ripon, who was at the head of that joint commission, and who ought to have had all the knowledge from the Foreign Office in England bearing on the subject ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I admire the statesmanship of the great leader of the Conservative party, who, when his former leader made a most inexcusable blunder with regard to a Canadian matter, about which he should have instructed the Marquis of Ripon, seeks to throw the blame for his ignorance upon the Imperial officers, who should have received the requisite information from the officers of the Canadian Government. We are indebted to the sublime statesmanship of our friends on the other side for the curtailing, to a very great extent, of the privileges which we did enjoy on the Stikine River. Instead of this article which gave us an unrestricted proprietary right in the Stikine River, we have now the following :—

The navigation of the rivers Yukon, Porcupine and Stikine ascending and descending from, to and into the sea shall for ever remain free and open for the purposes of commerce to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty and the citizens of the United States, subject to any law and regulations of either country, within its own territory, not inconsistent with such privilege of free navigation.

If they had understood what they were doing, they would not have put in the word "Stikine," but have applied the provision—the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart) will take note of the fact—to the Yukon and Porcupine to which it ought to have applied, if the Yukon and Porcupine were not covered by the Russian treaty, leaving out the word "Stikine," which they put in simply because they did not know the contents of this treaty. I do not need to explain to members of this House, who are experienced in public matters and many of whom have, time and again, year after year. discussed similar matters, the difference between an absolute proprietary right to a river and the privilege of its free navigation for purposes of commerce. Free navigation for purposes of commerce is a very valuable privilege, and we are going to make use of it to the utmost possible extent, but it is not of the same value, by any means, as the proprietary right which we would have had if these hon. gentlemen had let alone at the time what they did not understand.

Coming away from the question of that treaty and coming down to the position in which we are now placed—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I rise merely for information, and would ask the hon. gentleman if I am right in understanding him to argue that our rights under the treaty between Russia and Great Britain were curtailed by this provision of the Washington treaty?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I should say yes. If the hon. gentleman desires to dispute that, I think I will be able to satisfy him.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not wish to argue it, but wish to have the hon. gentleman's statement.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. (Reading.) "The navigation of the rivers Yukon and Porcupine and Stikine, ascending and descending from, to and into the sea." Every word of this clause is important. That is, we have the right to get in and out by the sea, not simply from the mouth of the river—because a point might arise there—but we have a right to go to the sea wherever it shall be. Let me finish the reading of the text:

Shall for ever—
not a limited period—

—remain free and open, for the purposes of commerce, to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty and the citizens of the United States, subject to any laws and regulations of either country, within its own territory, not inconsistent with such privilege of navigation.

Now, my hon. friend has to-day called the attention of the House to the fact, that certain legislation was pending before the Congress of the United States which would have the effect of curtailing the privileges of the Canadian people on the Stikine River. No legislation that can emanate from the Congress of the United States can repeal a treaty solemnly entered into by that country without violation of good faith, and this Government does not consider that it would be in any way justified for one instant in entertaining the idea that the United States would contemplate violating a treaty that they made with Great Britain. Why, Sir, the United States is a civilized country, and no civilized country deliberately violates the treaties it has made. The only thing that could deprive the people of Canada, the subjects of Her Majesty, of the privileges which exist at the present time of the free navigation of the Stikine River, would be the voluntary abandonment of that privilege under another treaty, or a state of war between the two countries—and that, of course, would justify the abrogation of all treaties existing at that time. So that we consider ourselves in a perfectly impregnable position in regard to the navigation of the Stikine River. We have treaty rights there which cannot be taken away without our consent. Our friends of the United States Congress may pass a Bill, but not one that will violate the treaty which they have made with Great Britain. We may be perfectly certain of that; and it would be a most puerile thing, in my judgment—I give my opinion for what it may be worth—for this Government, whenever any irresponsible member of the United States Congress introduces a Bill, which, perhaps, would not have the slightest possible chance of being accepted by both branches of Congress or of receiving the signature of the President—a member who, perhaps, does not know what was in the treaty—to assume that the United States contemplated doing a thing which no civilized country would do, that is to say, to violate a solemn treaty. I have here a copy of a Bill to which the attention of the House has been called on two or three occasions, and which has been made a subject of discussion in the press of late. It is not yet law, and I do not know whether it ever will be law, but, in any event, it does not affect the question before us, because it is only United States legislation provided for the purpose of aiding the Government of the United States to carry out this treaty in a way that may be necessary for the protection of the revenue of the United States. The clause which has been referred to, is as follows:—

The master of any foreign vessel, laden or in ballast, arriving, whether by sea or otherwise, in the waters of the United States from any foreign territory adjacent to the northern, north-eastern, or north-western frontiers of the United States, shall report at the office of any collector of the customs which shall be nearest to the point at which such vessels may enter such waters;—

That is a perfectly proper thing—to have the vessel report when it enters.

—and such vessel shall not transfer her cargo or passengers to another vessel, or proceed farther inland, either to unload or take in cargo, without a special permit from such collector, or deputy collector, issued under and in accordance with such general or special regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, from time to time prescribe. This section shall also apply to trade with or through Alaska.

Now, my hon. friend the Minister of Customs tells me that the procedure under this Act will, in no substantial respect, differ from our own procedure upon the St. Lawrence, the free navigation of which the United States have under identically the same treaty. It is not calculated in any way to interfere with or prevent the exercise of our right of navigation for the purposes of the commerce which we intend to build up. The only question of importance is the question of transshipment. That is a question upon which we can give no positive statement, because, although the matter has been brought to the attention of the United States Government, they have not yet expressed an opinion on the subject. It is a question which, if disputed, must be decided either by negotiation or by reference to a competent tribunal. But it must be evident that it is utterly out of the question for the Government of Canada, under the extraordinary circumstances in which we were placed, to think of opening up diplomatic negotiation and waiting until we got a question of that kind settled, before we proceeded to deal with the building of the railway. It would be a ridiculous proposition to go to the Government of the country which is now getting the largest portion of the trade which we seek to take away by constructing a railway, and, before starting to construct a railway, to try to get them to agree to something which would have the effect of taking the trade all away from them. They might possibly say that we were entitled to the privilege of transshipment; but, under the extraordinary circumstances, it would probably take us some time to get them to say so. Under the circumstances, the negotiations might be prolonged for several years. In the meantime, I fear, our people would grow somewhat impatient for transportation facilities to the Yukon district. And the miners, the poor men, for whom hon. gentlemen opposite expressed such sympathy, if they were waiting for something to eat until we made a treaty with the United States, might be sad and hungry before that treaty was signed. If it had been absolutely necessary to get the privilege of transshipment before we could make use of the road, it would be a different thing. But it is not. I can quote my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition again, who says in his interview—I have not the extract with me, but I quote his statement substantially—that, if the transshipment at Wrangell is not permitted, we can make use of Port Simpson, which will be equally serviceable.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, no; I never said anything of the kind.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. It is always cheaper to take our goods by large ocean steamboats. When you use a little steamboat, carrying 150 or 200 tons, your transport becomes expensive. I do not pretend that it is equally serviceable to tranship at Port Simpson.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend did not hear me say that I had never said that Port Simpson was equally available. I never said that. But I did point out—and I made the statement with a view to prevent our being interfered with in the navigation of the Stikine—that, if vexatious exactions were made, we had Port Simpson to fall back upon. But I never said it was equally available, because I knew that there was a portion of the route between Port Simpson and the mouth of the Stikine that was subject to heavy weather, and that occasionally delay might be caused.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I accept the hon. gentleman's statement that he did not say it was equally serviceable. He was so reported, but I presume it is a mistake. I desire, however, to point out to the House that while it is not as convenient for us to tranship at Port Simpson, yet we can tranship at Port Simpson and have a good and effective route. I made a careful examination of that subject myself when I was there. Mr. Ogilvie and myself went ashore at Port Simpson and examined the Hudson Bay Company's steamship, the "Caledonia," which was last year navigating the Stikine River, and was then pulled up at Port Simpson. The fact that the "Caledonia" was at Port Simpson proved conclusively that a boat of that quality could cross the intervening waters, because she was there and had so crossed. Inquiry demonstrated the fact that, with the exception of a very few days in the year, it is possible for a river boat constructed especially for the navigation of the Stikine River, to cross the waters between Port Simpson and Wrangell. As transshipment can take place at Port Simpson, we will have a Canadian route without any possibility of being interfered with by any regulations that may be made. It has been suggested to me to-day—I merely mention the suggestion for what it may be worth—that it is quite possible to get over the difficulty with regard to breaking bulk, if such a difficulty should be raised, by taking large barges built specially for the navigation of the Stikine, and towing them across from Port Simpson to Wrangell, and then sending them up the river. That might, no doubt, be done, and it might be a method of getting over the difficulty which might arise by reason of the increase in freight. But I mention this for the purpose of showing the House that, beyond the possibility of a doubt, this is an all-Canadian route, and a practicable all-Canadian route. We can make an all-Canadian route throughout, and that is what the Government have endeavoured to achieve. We have not come down here with a proposition that we knew nothing about, but we are prepared to give details, and are prepared to prove that the route is a practicable route, and an all-Canadian route. My hon. friend will excuse me if I justify the remark that I made, which I do not do at all with the object of showing that he is not correct in his statement—I loyally accept his explanation that he did not make the statement—but he was reported in the "Mail and Empire," in a despatch dated at Ottawa, January 27th, as saying :

Sir Charles gives the Government credit for acting with such vigour as it has shown, and asserts that the opening of the Canadian route, strongly urged by him upon both Governments interested is the proper course to pursue. He does not anticipate any trouble with the United States in transferring cargoes from ocean to river, boats at Wrangel. If, however, such should happen, Canada has Port Simpson to fall back upon, which will be equally serviceable.

Of course, I accept my hon. friend's declaration that he did not make that statement; I only read it for the purpose of showing that I was not recklessly putting into my hon. friend's mouth a statement which I had not seen.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I do not intend to weary the House with references to newspaper criticisms of this contract, but I have in my hand a couple of criticisms from a journal which, so far as I have been able to observe, has endeavoured, although adverse to the contract, apparently, to be fair in its criticism—I refer to the "Evening Journal" of Ottawa. I think the criticisms of that newspaper, although mistaken, have not been intentionally unfair, and therefore I think it reasonable and proper to refer to a couple which I find in the "Journal" of the 16th inst., that is to-day. One reads as follows :—

Mr. Sifton stated in the House of Commons yesterday that the statement that the Rothschilds had offered to build a road by the Dalton trail for 5,000 acres per mile was a newspaper figment. Sir Louis Davies said in the House last Thursday that the Government had been in negotiation with the Rothschilds about a railway. Mr. Sifton's statement therefore, must mean simply that no formal figure was named to the Government by the Rothschild representatives. Messrs. Hamilton Smith and Henry Bratnobar, representatives of the Rothschilds, stated in Montreal that their principals "proposed" to build by the Dalton trail for 5,000 acres per mile. Evidently, even if the figure did not reach the Government, it was the figure the Rothschilds were prepared to abide by; and in view of the fact that the Government made a private agreement with other people, ignoring the principle of disposing of public franchises by open competition, Mr. Sifton's statement about what the Government was or was not offered is not weighty as a dismissal of the Rothschild figure.

I wish to say in reference to that article, that no proposal, in writing or verbal, direct or indirect, in any way, shape, form or manner, came to the Government from Messrs. Hamilton, Smith and Henry Bratnobar, representing, or assuming to represent, the Rothschilds, for the building of any railway in that country. It is comparatively easy, after other men have deposited a quarter of a million dollars and assumed a responsibility for the expenditure of several million dollars, for other gentlemen to make statements about what their principals would have been prepared to do. These gentlemen, apparently, have been in Canada for some time, but they have not seen, nor so far as I am aware, have they ever even waited upon the Government, nor had themselves introduced to the Government, so far as I know, until after this contract had been signed. I also wish to point out that there is no inconsistency or inaccuracy in the statement made by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies). As I said, I do not think the "Journal" is desirous of misrepresenting the Government, and therefore I think it is only fair that it should be set right. On page 395 of the "Hansard" my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries said, in reference to a statement made by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke) :

The hon. gentleman will permit me to say, as I did not catch the name he mentioned, that the gentleman who does represent the Rothschilds in this country had the question put to him, whether he would make a tender to the Government, and after considering the whole question and examining all the information the Government could place before him, and cabling to his principals at home, he wrote to the Government that after the fullest consideration he declined to touch it at all.

That is very clear; but that gentleman was not Mr. Hamilton Smith nor Mr. Bratnobar; that gentleman was Mr. Kersey. I desire also to say that although in his written proposal, which has been laid before Parliament, he did not state that he represented the Rothschilds, yet he furnished to the Government the names of persons whom he assumed to represent, and amongst those names which he furnished to the Government were the Rothschilds firm, as well as several other leading financial people in Europe. The Government could hardly be expected to imagine that, when a gentleman was here representing the Rothschilds and negotiating with us, somebody else in Montreal, who had not introduced himself, was also representing the Rothschilds. That will dispose of the idea that we had any other or any better offer than the one we have laid before the House.

I was adverting to the question of the Stikine route when you, Mr. Speaker, left the Chair at six o'clock, and I want to say just a word or two, particularly to my friends in the North-west and British Columbia, in relation to the route, the all-Canadian route, to the Yukon country from the North-west, which I presume every patriotic Canadian would be very pleased to see opened up by the construction of a railway. I have seen an intimation that there was opposition to this project in Manitoba, the North-west, and also to a certain extent in some parts of Ontario, which was alleged to exist on the ground that it was not a route all through Canadian territory, but was hostile to or in substitution of a railway by way of the North-west Territories. Now, if my hon. friends will take the map which accompanies Mr. Ogilvie's report they will see that one of the strongest points in favour of the Stikine route is that it is the continuation of, the natural complement to a route from the North-west to Peace River and thence to the Yukon; that it is the shortest, the best and in fact the only way of striking that country and getting in there. I am not in a position to speak of this route with absolute definiteness and correctness, because the Government have had no opportunity of obtaining exact and full information in regard to the route on that general line. But we know that the Peace River pierces the mountains, that there is a practical through route that way, and we know it is the only practicable route for many hundreds of miles north of the Yellow Head Pass, and that the Yellow Head Pass would be too far south for the purpose. That at all events is my opinion, and as the matter appears to me at the present moment—from a cursory examination—it would be too far south. Peace River valley will bring us to Halfway River, and from Talchudy Lake we reach Stikine River and Telegraph Creek and go forward on this line to the navigable waters of Teslin Lake and the Hootalinqua River. So we have not only an all-Canadian route, but a complement route from the North-west, and the only possible route we can make use of from that portion of the country. That is a point to which I wish to direct particularly the attention of members from the North-west. I refer to it in this general way, and if hon. members will take the map and study it for themselves, they will see at once that this conclusion is absolutely correct. I shall now speak of the advantages of this route. The Cassiar and Cariboo districts of British Columbia are very rich. They have been retarded in their development only by lack of railway facilities. I was told by a gentleman who is manager of a company now seeking to operate in the Omenica country that there is a great stretch of mineral lands in that district and in Cassiar, and, while there is not the richness of Bonanza Creek, there is sufficient mineral to admit of profitable and successful operations being carried on with suitable mining machinery. With proper transportation and mining facilities this company would carry on extensive works and make a profit on its capital. These districts, I say, have been held back by reason of the lack of transportation facilities. But the railway project now proposed to be undertaken would open up the Cassiar district almost completely, and go far towards satisfying the demand for railway facilities there; it would develop the country north, and, in addition to furnishing the Cassiar district with railway facilities, we would secure the natural complement of the enterprise by extending the railway down to Alice at the head of Observatory Inlet, and to an ocean port. Thus the road would traverse the northern part of British Columbia, opening and developing the rich districts of that province, and afterwards reach and develop the Yukon country, and thus it would develop those communities to which the people of the North-west Territories would be able to send their cattle and horses and in which they would find a market for their agricultural produce.

Mr. PRIOR. In what direction does the hon. Minister say the railway will be continued?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. It is contemplated to extend it from Telegraph Creek down to Alice Inlet, at the extension of Observatory Inlet, which will be seen marked on the map. The distance is about 200 miles; and although we have no engineer's report on that territory, we have made pretty careful inquiries from Hudson Bay officers and others who have special knowledge regarding it, and we are assured that without doubt it is a practicable route for a road between those two points.

I have adverted to this matter in connection with the enterprise in order that members of the House, from the west particularly, may see that in considering this matter we have not lost sight of their interests. Members from Manitoba and the North-west know very well and thoroughly understand that in any project of this kind I at least will be most sedulous in looking after the interests of Manitoba and the North-west, the fertile districts of which I hope to see settled by a very much larger population than is there at the present time and affording a much larger and more profitable market for the merchants and manufacturers of the east.

This, therefore, is the scheme we have laid before the House for its approval. In addition to possessing these advantages, it is in every sense the only available and practicable route at the present time to meet the absolute necessities of the occasion; and I leave the subject with this statement as to the project, that when this railway has been completed it will be practically the only route that will carry the ordinary commerce connected with the Yukon country. The St. Michael's route can never do anything more than a small transportation business; the routes by Dyea and Skagway are impracticable—they are practicable only until the railway is built. The result of carrying out the proposed project will be that an immense volume of trade, which we hope to see going into that country, will be forced over the Stikine route, and instead of the thousands of miners, whom we are told by the New York "Herald" are arriving daily at Seattle, preparing to go north by American steamboats and by American routes, they will find themselves forced in their own interest to come to Victoria, Vancouver and other points in British Columbia, and there obtain their goods and outfits, take their passage on Canadian boats and travel by Canadian channels up to the Yukon district. This will be the result, we hope, and I see no reason to doubt that the hope is well founded in view of the policy we have submitted to the House. At the risk of being wearisome I will read some clauses from the contract, especially with the view of converting members of the Opposition. I have myself found, from the short experience I had in legislation before I came to this House, that it is a very common thing for even careful and systematic and intelligent members of the House, in the rush of business, not to give a very careful and thorough reading to Bills which come before Parliament. Therefore, so as to avoid any misconceptions, I shall take the liberty of reading the terms of this contract; and it will only take me a few minutes. It says:

1. The contractors covenant with the Government to lay out, construct, equip, and fully complete a line of railway with proper terminal facilities from the navigable waters of the Stikine River in British Columbia, at or near the mouth of Telegraph Creek, Glenora, or the mouth of Clear Water River, thence running northward to the navigable waters of Teslin Lake, a distance of about one hundred and fifty miles, more or less, on or before the first day of September, A.D. 1898, the said railway when fully completed to be of the general standard and gauge of the Kaslo and Slocan Railway in British Columbia and according to the specifications to be approved by the Minister of Railways.

Provided also, that the said railway shall be the property of the contractors but shall be subject to inspection and approval by an engineer to be named by the Minister of Railways and Canals before being accepted as complete by the Government.

Provided further, that for the purposes of the season of 1898 and of complying with the requirements of this contract in respect to the completion of the line on or before the said first of September, it shall be sufficient if, on or before that date, the contractors have the rails laid in such a manner as will permit of regular and efficient operation of the railway, although the whole work be not fully completed, and if the said railway be sufficiently equipped for such operation. Provided also, that the location of said railway between the points mentioned shall be such as the contractors may decide upon without filing plans thereof prior to completion, provided that the grant of land hereby contracted for shall not be made upon a larger mileage than the Minister of Railways considers reasonably necessary for traversing the distance between the terminal points.

2. The Government shall submit to Parliament at its next ensuing session a measure for the necessary Act confirming this agreement and authorizing the Government and the contractors to perform and carry out the same, also incorporating the contractors and such others as may become shareholders into a company under the name of the Canadian Yukon Railway Company or other name approved by the contractors (herein after referred to as the contractors' company) with power to acquire and perform and carry out this agreement, and with all necessary provisions in that behalf, and with all necessary powers to build and operate a railway above mentioned and an extension thereof northward to Dawson City or thereabouts and an extension southward to a point in British Columbia to be designated by the Government and capable of being made an ocean port, also a line of railway from the waters of Lynn Canal to Port Selkirk or thereabouts by way of Chilkat Pass, also branch lines of railway from any points on the company's railways to any property owned by the company, also lines of railway from any navigable waters to any property owned by the company: Provided that the power to build said lines from Lynn Canal to Port Selkirk and said branch lines and said lines from navigable waters shall not be exercised without the consent of the Governor General in Council.

I am reading this to show that a lot of things which have been imputed to this contract, are not in it at all, that they are not contemplated by the contract, and that they never were contemplated by the Government. The House will at once see that this clause which provides for these extensions, does not at all contemplate that any bonus should be given for them. They are mere charter powers for the construction of a line of railway which any company might get on application to Parliament in the usual way, and they do not contemplate any additions to the bonus or assessments given by the Government. It is stipulated further, that the power hereinafter provided for can only be exercised upon the authority of the Governor General in Council being given. The contract continues, to say:

The said Act of incorporation also to give the company full and sufficient powers to build and otherwise acquire and operate docks, wharfs and lines of steam and other vessels in connection with its railways and property, also telegraph and telephone lines, also to carry on mining and smelting operations and such other powers as may be necessary for the due operating and conduct of all business connected with and incidental to the development and working of the lands (to be granted by the Government as hereinafter provided) and the minerals therein, including power to issue land grant bonds and bonds secured by the company's undertakings.

3. Upon the incorporation of said company and upon the assignment by the contractors to such company of this agreement and upon the said company covenanting with the Government to carry out the same, and upon the said railway from Stikine River to Teslin Lake being completed and accepted as aforesaid, the contractors shall then but not before be relieved from personal responsibility hereunder and the company shall be thereafter deemed to be the parties of the second part hereto in lieu of the contractors and shall be bound as such, and be entitled to their rights hereunder.

I wish to call the attention of Parliament to this fact, that for the first time, so far as I am aware, in the railway history of this Dominion, the Government has, in making this contract, secured not only the liability of the company, which may be worth absolutely nothing, but the personal liability of the men themselves who are going into the work, and in this particular case the personal liability amounts to a very large sum. In addition to that, of course, there is the $250,000 deposit, which, I think, also is a departure in the railway history of Canada. The contract continues :

4. For five years from the first of September, 1898, no line of railway shall be authorized by Parliament to be constructed—

This, of course, is subject to the ratification of Parliament, the Government making the agreement to be binding if Parliament ratifies it.

4. For five years from the first of September, 1898, no line of railway shall be authorized by Parliament to be constructed from Lynn Canal or thereabouts or from any point at or near the international boundary between Canada and Alaska into the Yukon district, and for five years from said date no aid in land or money shall be granted to any person or company other than the contractors and the contractors' company to assist in building any such railway.

The House will see that this clause does not say that any aid in land or money shall be granted to the contractors or the contractors' company ; but it says that nobody else shall be permitted to build there. Now, the reading of that clause will at once dissipate the idea that there has been any monopoly granted to this company. There is no monopoly whatever. This company gets a charter to build from the Stikine River to Teslin Lake. There is no monopoly in that charter. The Legislature of British Columbia can give another charter to-morrow, or this House could give another charter. We do not bind ourselves not to give another charter ; we do not say anything about it, and, by the way, there is another charter in existence at the present time, namely, the Cassiar Central. This latter charter does not specifically name this route, but it is wide enough, as any lawyer in this House who reads the charter will agree with me, to justify any one else taking that charter, and going on, and building over the same route. There is nothing in this clause which, by any possible stretch of imagination, can be called a monopoly. As I have said, other people can get charters, and there is actually another charter in existence at this present moment. But what we do say is this : We say that nature or bad management has given somebody else the advantage over us by putting the ocean a little nearer to their territory than to ours, and that this Parliament is not going to help out that discrimination against Canadian trade and Canadian enterprise by granting another charter. We submit that to Parliament as a view which we think the representatives of the Canadian people should see proper to endorse. The contract continues to say :

5. The contractors and the contractors' company shall be entitled to receive in preference to any other person or company during ten years from the said first of September, 1898, such aid or assistance in land or money as the Government may be authorized and may see fit to grant in aid of a line of railway from the Stikine River to an ocean port in British Columbia, provided that the contractors or contractors' company are willing to undertake the construction of the same at once and completion thereof within a reasonable time upon receiving notice thereof from the Government.

The meaning of that is this—not that anybody else is prohibited from building a line of railway there ; not that we will not give a charter to anybody else ; but that, if the Government decides that it is in the interest of Canada to have a railway built from Telegraph Creek to Observatory Inlet, and is willing to give so much land and so much money to assist in the construction of that road within ten years, we shall give this company the first chance to build it. That is what that means, and that is all it means, and the consent of Parliament would, of course, be necessary before we could give assistance to this company or to any other. But the point I wish to make is that it does not prohibit anybody else. All it says is that these people, having gone in as pioneers and built the first railway and opened up the trade, if there is to be an extension of the railway to the south, they are to have the first chance to go on and build it. Now, I submit to the House that if this clause were not in the contract at all, and if two years from to-day it were proposed by the Government of Canada to have a railway built from the Stikine River down to Observatory Inlet, and another company came here and asked for assistance for that purpose, and this company came for the same purpose, this House would not wait half a minute to decide to which company to give it. This House would at once decide to give it to the company which was on the ground and in operation. What possible sense would there be in having one company with a railway extending for 150 miles and another company with a railway extending for another 150 miles ? Such a proposition would not be considered by this House as a reasonable business proposition.

6. The tolls to be collected by the contractors or contractors' company upon the line of railway hereby contracted for between Stikine River and Teslin Lake shall be first fixed by the Governor General in Council, and the tolls so fixed shall not be liable to reduction until the said railway has been in operation for four years, but such tolls shall be reduced by the Governor in Council by twenty-five per cent from and after such four years, and after the said railway has been in operation seven years they shall be reduced by twenty-five per cent off the tolls previously reduced, but after the said railway has been ten years in operation the tolls shall be subject to the general railway laws of Canada in that behalf.

A great deal of fault has been found because we did not come down to Parliament and state what the rates would be. I called the attention of the House and my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition this afternoon to the fact that such a thing never was heard of before—that in all the railway legislation of Canada, so far as I know, no Act of Parliament ever fixed the rates of any railway, and no Government ever stated in advance what the rates of any railway would be. It is time enough to fix the rates when the railway is prepared to go into operation. The law of Canada is that no railway company can fix its rates until they are first approved of by the Governor in Council; and this is precisely the law in regard to this company, except that it provides for an automatic reduction of the rates after the first tariff shall have been fixed. I am quite free to say that, although I do not anticipate that any member of the Government would think of authorizing such a wild tariff as was suggested by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) the other night, yet the rates upon this railway will be higher, considerably higher, much higher, than the rates upon an ordinary railway in a settled country. The chances which people take in building a railway into a mining country, of their property and the trade being destroyed owing to the mining district becoming exhausted, must be taken into consideration in a case of this kind; and I would not for one instant lead the House to suppose that the rates the Government would authorize would be no higher than those on an ordinary railway in a settled country; but I do not think they will go anywhere near the figures of the hon. member for West York.

7. The land granted to the contractors or contractors' company hereunder shall be free from taxation for ten years from the granting thereof, except municipal taxation by an incorporated city, town or village within the Yukon provisional district.

I think the exception in this case is as great as the exemption. I think municipal taxation outside of incorporated towns or cities is not likely to materialize in ten years, so that the exemption amounts practically to nothing.

8. The contractors shall immediately construct a practicable sleigh road from the mouth of Stikine River to Teslin Lake, and shall provide suitable shelters or stopping places for travellers at intervals of not more than twenty-five miles along such road, such road and stopping places to be available for use at the earliest possible moment, and in any event not later than six weeks from the execution of this agreement.

9. The contractors or the contractors' company shall provide or arrange with others to provide steamboat transport of freight and passengers between the terminus of said railway on Teslin Lake or other terminus northerly thereof and Dawson City to and fro.

The next clause refers to the deposit of $250,000, which I need not read, and I need say no more in regard to it than that the deposit is in the hands of the Government.

11. In aid of the construction of said line of railway from Stikine River to Teslin Lake the Government shall grant to the contractors for each mile of said railway twenty-five thousand acres of land to be selected as hereinafter mentioned from the Yukon provisional district and from that part of the North-west Territories of Canada lying west of the Mackenzie River and Liard River and north of the 60th parallel of latitude, such land to be and become vested in the contractors upon the said railway being completed and accepted as complete by the Government, and upon the said land being selected as hereinafter set forth.

Mr. HAGGART. Will the penalties apply to clauses 8 and 9, or has the hon. gentleman any idea whether clause 8 will be complied with or not?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The $250,000 deposit refers only to the construction of the railway. It does not apply to the construction of the sleigh road. But for that we have the covenant of the contractors, which, as the hon. gentleman is perfectly aware, is just as good as the deposit.

12. The lands shall be selected by the contractors along base lines, and the base lines may be of two kinds:

1st. The contractors may take as a base line a line which will correspond with the general course of any lake, river, stream or watercourse, such line to be determined by survey or approximate survey to the satisfaction of the authorized agent of the Minister of the Interior, and to follow the general course of the lake, river, stream or watercourse for the required distance; and

2nd. The contractors may take as a base line a line commencing at any point located by them and running from such point due north, east, south or west. The land along a base line shall be divided into blocks, each block to extend three miles along the base line and to extend three miles backwards on each side of the base line. On each base line there shall be at least eight of such blocks, but there may be more at the option of the contractors. These blocks shall be numbered from one up consecutively; the odd-numbered blocks shall be the property of the contractors; the even-numbered shall remain the property of the Government. The contractors shall take at least four blocks on each base line established by them for the purpose of selection, but shall not be bound to take more—but they may take as many more as they desire and as circumstances permit. Thus upon each base line so established there shall be laid out a tract not less than twenty-four miles along the course of said base line by three miles on each side thereof in width, making eight blocks of three miles by six miles. Provided that if in the selections of lands along any base line the courses thereof prevent rectangular blocks being laid out, such blocks shall be adjusted to the required angles, preserving as far as practicable blocks of an area of three miles by six. Any shortage or surplus of such area shall be adjusted by the prolongation or shortening of such base line.

The contractors may also at their option select additional blocks lying on either end of any odd-numbered block along a base line, but such additional blocks must be three miles square each and they shall not exceed three in number on each end of each such odd-numbered block.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I shall refer to that later.

13. The contractors shall make selection of one-half of the lands to which they become entitled under this contract within three years from the first day of September, 1898, and of the remainder within six years from that date.

14. No portion of the beds of the rivers Yukon, Lewes or Hootalinqua, or of the lakes Teslin, Bennett, Tagish, Labarge or Marsh (said lakes and rivers forming continuous watercourses), or of the banks thereof for twenty-five feet on each side of the ordinary high-water mark shall pass to the contractors under any selection of lands made under the agreement.

I may say that that clause is one which was discussed a long time between the contractors and the Government, and the contractors thought they were being unfairly treated in not being allowed free selection along these rivers, because it is well known—contrary to the statements made in this House—that there are very profitable deposits, especially along the Hootalinqua, which might be immediately made available.

15. The free rights of passage and use along navigable or floatable streams within the lands selected by the contractors shall not be impeded by them, and if any stream be diverted by them, from its natural channel an equally convenient navigable or floatable channel shall be provided in lieu, and the Gold Commissioner of the district shall decide any dispute which may arise as to whether such equally convenient channel has been provided, and from his decision there shall be an appeal to the Governor General in Council.

16. Any and all mining claims actually held and recorded pursuant to Government regulations by a free miner or free miners, and being within a block of land taken or selected by the contractors hereunder, shall be excepted from the grant and shall not pass to the contractors, provided that such claims have been so actually held and recorded prior to the base line, along or with reference to which such block is taken, being actually run and marked on the ground by the contractors.

17. There shall be payable to and reserved by the Government a royalty of one per cent upon all gold mined by placer or alluvial or hydraulic mining upon the lands selected hereunder, and if and so long as any royalty up to one per cent is levied by the Government upon all gold got by quartz mining in Government land in the Yukon district a royalty of an equal amount up to one per cent, but no more shall be payable to and reserved by the Government upon all gold got by quartz mining in the land selected hereunder.

18. So soon as any ten continuous miles of said railway between Stikine River and Teslin Lake have been completed and in running order, and certified so to be by an officer named by the

Mr. SIFTON.

Minister of Railways in that behalf, the contractors may select ninety-two thousand one hundred and sixty acres, or two blocks of land hereunder, and thereupon such blocks shall be reserved by the Government from sale or location or free miners' claims, and upon the completion from time to time in a similar way of any other ten miles, the contractors shall have a similar right to select ninety-two thousand one hundred and sixty acres, or two blocks, which shall thereupon be similarly reserved, and upon the completion of the said railway and acceptance thereof by the Government as completed, the blocks so reserved shall be granted to the contractors. All free miners' claims being excepted, as provided by clause 16 hereof.

19. In case any land is excepted out of blocks taken by contractors on account of free miners' claims or otherwise, the quantity so excepted shall not be counted in the acreage of lands to which the contractors are entitled hereunder.

20. The contractors shall upon application sell to actual settlers for farming purposes, at prices to be fixed by the Governor General in Council, any arable lands forming part of those selected hereunder. Provided, however, that upon such sale all minerals and the right to mine same shall be reserved, and this clause shall not extend to lands suitable for village or town sites.

That clause was specially put in because there are a few places where men occupy small tracts of land, which might not perhaps be designated as farm but as grazing lands, and in such cases would be entitled to have their land at reasonable prices.

21. So soon as the contractors notify the Minister of Railways and Canals to send an engineer to inspect and approve of any ten miles of the line of railway hereby contracted for, such engineer shall be sent without delay to make such inspection, and shall thereafter remain ready to inspect such each ten miles until the whole line is completed.

22. The grants of lands selected by the contractors hereunder shall be in fee simple, and shall include all precious metals and all minerals whatever, reserving only the royalties above provided for.

23. Provision shall be made in the Act incorporating the contractors' company against any discrimination by such company in operating its railways between customers, whether by discriminating rates or treatment or otherwise, or by means of its steamships or other connections or otherwise.

That clause was inserted in order that the company may not unfairly discriminate against any steamboat or transportation company and drive it off the route. The next clause relates to the use of water for hydraulic and placer mining.

What I desire to call the attention of the House particularly to with reference to this contract—which I have perhaps read at wearisome length—is this, that, in the first place, there is no monopoly of any kind whatever. In the next place, these people put up their $250,000 to build a railway by the 1st of next September, and I venture to say there is not another man in Canada who would contract to build it by that time. If there is, I never heard of him. I did not even hear, in the midst of all the remarkably rash assertions which we have had from the other side of the House, it insinuated that there is in Canada to-day one single man who is prepared to put his money into a contract to build that road by the 1st of September. If there is, we have had no intimation of it. They have said almost everything that could be said on the other side, but they have not intimated that any man would undertake that work and carry it out on the terms proposed.

Mr. OSLER. What forfeiture is there other than that if the road is not built by that day—

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. There is a forfeiture of $250,000 now in the hands of the Finance Minister, and there is the personal responsibility of Mackenzie & Mann, under a signed contract, which renders them liable to the full extent of their means, whatever these may be.

Mr. OSLER. Suppose they do not build the road by that day?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. They lose the $250,000 and are liable to damage.

Mr. OSLER. They do not forfeit their charter if they only build the road within a year from next September.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. They pay damages.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What damages?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. That would be decided in the ordinary way in which damages are decided. We make a contract, but we cannot be at the same time court and jury to decide upon the breach of a contract that may or may not take place. The hon. gentlemen need not get restless. The fact is this, that notwithstanding all the criticism that has been made, the vital point of this contract, which is that it provides for a railway by the 1st of September, has not been met in any shape or form. There has not been any information that any man in Canada would sign that contract to-day if it were offered to him. Least of all, I think, would my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Osler) risk his good money in the scheme.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me—

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I would prefer that my hon. friend would not interrupt me.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Certainly then I shall not.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. These hon. gentlemen are not asking anything germane to the point. There are lots of lawyers to give an opinion as to what the contract means. I take it to be pretty clear. What I further desire to say is that having made that deposit, having entered into that obligation, my judgment is that that obligation means, under the extraordinary circumstances existing, an expenditure probably in the neighbourhood of $1,000,000. Having taken that risk, these gentlemen have no right to locate a single acre of land until they have ten miles of that railway in operation. It is inconceivable that they should have ten miles in operation before the 15th of June; and, from now until then, any portion of that country can be taken up by any of the thousands of people who are going in. If it is easy to find Bonanzas and Eldorados, as the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) seems to think, if it is only a question of getting up to the Yukon district and walking right in and finding beds of gold, why do not some of our hon. friends do it? There is nothing to prevent them. My hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, is the president of a company which, I see he has said in an address delivered by him in London, has secured a capital of £70,000 sterling for doing work. If it is an easy thing and a sure thing—if anybody who can command capital has only to send prospectors to that country to plant their stakes on Bonanzas and Eldorados, why does not my hon. friend do it? He has the capital and has been working for several months in connection with this matter already. We all know that when a man talks that way about a mining country, he is talking utter nonsense. We know that in the aggregate it takes more money to find and take out gold than the gold amounts to after it is taken out.

The total amount of money spent in taking gold out of placer-mining regions throughout the world, so far as known, is far in excess of what has been taken out. My hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) said that himself in the course of his speech. He possibly made the statement inadvertently. Far from this company having any outrageous advantages given to it, it is taking the whole responsibility, putting up the money, risking its millions, as well as its $250,000 deposit, and risking all this upon a land grant—and the whole world has practically months to go through and take up claims before the contractors will make their selection. I need not say that this point was strongly contested by the contractors, that they protested bitterly against being put in that position, and it was only after long and wearisome negotiations that the Government got them to agree to this provision of the agreement; and then, finally, only by inserting the clause providing that they might make some selection after they had ten miles of the railway in operation. After they have ten miles in operation, they can take two blocks, that is, they can place claims in not more than two localities. After they have ten miles more in operation, they can take two blocks more, and so on. And, while this is going on, the two hundred and fifty thousand people who, we are told, are coming from all over the world into that country, are spreading over that vast territory, prospecting and picking out their claims beforehand and taking everything that is considered by them of much value. I cannot conceive of anything more perfectly clear than that the advantage in this contract is practically on the side of the Government. For my part, if I had any money—which Providence has never blessed me with so far—I would not care to risk it in a transaction of that kind. Now, I have just called attention to this method of selection in order that the House will see how utterly false the propositions are which are being advanced by the other side of the House, based upon some of the paper calculations which do not find any justification within the four corners of the contract.

I want to refer for a minute or two to some statements made on the subject of the standard of this railway. My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) is going to follow me, I believe. I want to give him some things to start his remarks on. On page 224 of the "Hansard" he delivered himself upon this contract in words which I shall quote. He said:

I know the standard of the Kaslo-Slocan Railway—

I do not think he does.

—as well as the hon. gentleman does. It is a road built among mountains, twisting around a hill with a curvature perhaps fifty times greater than anything that will be necessary on this road.

I am reading just to show how utterly reckless are the criticisms of this contract; and to expose the fact that, even a gentleman whom we have respected as a practical man of business, who was at the head of the Railway Department, and who, one would think, should speak with some degree of caution about a matter of business, especially an important matter of business, did not take the trouble of gaining the slightest bit of information on the subject he was talking about.

We know nothing about this road—

We don't? If the hon. gentleman had read the report of the department he presided over, he would have found out a good deal about this road. It is all there. The hon. gentleman's name is not appended to that report, but it is the report for the year during which he was Minister of Railways, and the slight accident of the change of Government at the end of the year is the only reason why his name does not appear there.

—for they have not the report of the engineer, which, I suppose, the hon. gentleman will lay on the Table of the House before another stage of this Bill is taken. The standard of the road, he says, is to be that of the Kaslo and Slocan Railway. What kind of a road is that? A narrow gauge road, with rails twenty-seven or thirty pounds to the yard.

Mr. SIFTON.

That is not the case. In the report of the department for the last year during which he presided over it, he will find it stated that the weight of the rails is forty-five pounds to the yard, and not twenty-seven or thirty pounds, as he says. Again, he says:

At any rate, the road—

That is this road (the Yukon road).

—is only going to be a temporary road, as the hon. leader of the Government stated the other evening—a narrow gauge road built upon any gradients and with any curvature the contractors may think fit, as long as it comes within the specifications of that mountain road built by the Canadian Pacific Railway from Kaslo to Slocan.

The road was not built by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the hon. gentleman was reminded of this by the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) continued:

It was an independent road, but it was afterwards obtained by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

It was not obtained by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Even that casual observation was not correct. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company did not obtain it or control it; that company never had anything to do with the road, and has not now. For the hon. gentleman's information, I may say that it was the Great Northern Railway Company that had to do with the construction of that road, although it was built and is now being operated, and has always been operated, by an independent company. The hon. gentleman goes on:

But perhaps I am mistaken on that point. I did not know who the possessor of the road was but I have been over it and I know what its character is.

Then, why did he not tell us? He told us the very reverse of its character. Now, I will give the standard of the Kaslo and Slocan: Length of line, 31.8 miles; weight of steel rails, 45 pounds; radius of sharpest curve, 193 feet; number of feet per mile, heaviest grade, 171.6. I am reading this to obviate the necessity of the hon. gentleman reading the report of the department he presided over. Such an unaccustomed labour it would be unfair to exact from him. If any hon. gentleman will figure this out, he will find that this grade is a trifle over 3 per cent. And, of course, the heaviest grade on the road we are proposing to have constructed in this district cannot be heavier. The cost of this tramway, as the hon. gentleman calls it, was $22,800 a mile. This is a rather unpleasant commentary on the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite who talk of its costing $22,800 a mile to build a tramway. That was in a part of British Columbia, where the cost of building a railway—

Mr. PRIOR. If you had ever been out on that line you would find it a very different country.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I have been over it, and over this tramway. I rode over it thirty-one miles in less than an hour, and any one who knows anything about a railway knows that you cannot run thirty-one miles an hour over a tramway. It is a railroad, and it is a good railroad, too.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It is through the best timber in the world.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. It goes through a magnificently timbered belt, and is a difficult country in which to build a railroad, but not an extraordinarily difficult country, not anything like as expensive a country, taking all things into consideration, as the country from the Stikine River to Teslin Lake. There is perhaps more expense of a certain kind, that is to say, there may be a little more rock cutting; but I venture to state that there is no part of the road from the Stikine River to Teslin Lake which will be built for $22,800 a mile. Now, my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) does know all about the standard of the Kaslo and Slocan Railway. That is the standard of the road which we are going to build.

I want to speak to the House a moment in regard to the question of the weight of the rails. The weight of the rails upon this railway, before it can be accepted by the Government and before the company can get a title to an acre of land, must be forty-five pounds, according to the standard. It is yet unsettled between the company and the Government as to whether forty-five pound rails should be laid upon the road this coming summer. If it is shown to the Government to be physically impossible to get in forty-five pound rails by the river, or enough of them, then we propose to let the company put down twenty-eight pound rails temporarily until they can get forty-five pound rails up the river, allowing traffic to go on in the meantime. That is the only advantage given to the contractors in the way of enabling them to get the road into operation by the 1st of September. It is not an advantage financially on the total operation, because anybody can see it would be much better for them to put forty-five pound rails in at once than to put down twenty-eight pound rails, and then have to take them up and substitute heavier ones.

Now, just one word about the other propositions that were made to the Government. When I opened my remarks this evening I think I made it clear that there were no other offers made to the Government than those which had been laid upon the Table of the House. The House is in full possession of everything that the Government is in possession of with respect to this matter, and I apprehend that the members of the House have familiarized themselves fairly well with the contents of these documents. I will not weary the House, therefore, with reading them at length. The last two letters are those to which I desire to call the attention of the House. The only gentleman whom we know as the representative of the Rothschilds is Mr. H. Maitland Kersey, lately agent of the White Star Steamship Line in the City of New York, and now engaged in financing a company for the purpose of putting steamboats upon the Yukon route between various points which I have spoken of to-night at length. As the papers upon the Table of the House will show, Mr. Kersey first made a proposition a considerable time ago for the construction of a railway from the Stikine River to Teslin Lake, in which he asked for a bonus of $6,000 a mile. The time, the 1st of September, of course, was not mentioned at all, and I need not say that Mr. Kersey had no intention whatever of even suggesting that he could build a road by that time in the proposal which he laid before us. It was intimated to him that the Government would not give a cash bonus for this railway at all, and that discussion on that question might therefore be dispensed with. Mr. Kersey came back, after having made full financial arrangements in London, and on the 21st of January he asked for an interview with me. I saw him in the presence of my hon. friend the Minister of Militia, and my hon. friend the member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell). These gentlemen were both acquainted with Mr. Kersey, and I met him in company with them. I informed him that we were prepared to give a liberal amount of land. Mr. Kersey knew that 20,000 or 25,000 acres of land per mile was under discussion; and I informed him that we were prepared to give a liberal amount of land aggregating something in that neighbourhood; that we wanted the road in operation, if not finally completed, by the 1st of September; and that we wanted $250,000 in cash deposited as a guarantee that the work should be accomplished. He placed in my hands, on the morning of the 22nd of January, this letter:

Ottawa, 22nd January, 1898.

Dear Mr. Sifton,—With reference to our conversation of last evening, I communicated fully by cable last night both to Devonshire House and Chatsworth the ideas of the Government as I understand them with regard to the construction of a railway between Glenora and Teslin. Saturday, as you are aware, is a difficult day to transact business in London, but as I had already prepared my friends for the message which was sent last night, I have every hope of receiving an answer at any moment, and that I shall be able to lay before you a definite and favourable proposition for the construction of the work within a few hours.

I may say that Mr. Kersey, before going to England, had put in the proposition for the construction of this railway. It was no new thing with him, he was not taken unawares, he knew all about it, and had discussed it fully with his principals in London :

I advised London that the Government requested a definite decision to-day, but that in any event they would not wait after Monday. I should, therefore, be in the position to either make you a definite offer not later than Monday or to withdraw entirely in favour of other applicants. I am now having the proposal drafted on the lines of my cable so as to save every possible moment. As I advised you yesterday, we have a fleet of boats building on the coast, including two steamers and numerous small boats on Teslin Lake itself, the engines and boilers for these boats and a saw-mill being sent in over the snow, and I have further a full equipment of men, sleighs, &c., under an experienced man who knows the trail, waiting in Victoria at the present moment for news to come of the taking of the ice on the Stikine River, in order that they may proceed to open up the trail.

I understand that we should have to guarantee the construction of the road by the 1st of September, putting up a deposit, and I have so advised London.

Thanking you for your courteous attention, I am, yours faithfully,

H. MAITLAND KERSEY.

Next I have a letter dated January 23rd, 1898. I think January 23rd was Sunday, but this letter probably reached my hands on Monday morning.

Sir.—With reference to the offer which I made to you on behalf of my syndicate in early December, and to the conversation which I had the pleasure of having with you on Friday last, in relation to the construction of a wagon road and railway from Glenora to Teslin Lake, I have to advise you, after consultation with London, that we deem it inadvisable to make a further offer to the Government which would of necessity involve a guarantee of the completion of the line by the 1st of September next, and which offer would have to be based on a land grant, unaccompanied by any cash subsidy.

I have to thank you for so kindly postponing action to enable me to communicate with my friends in England, and have the honour to remain,

Your obedient servant,

H. MAITLAND KERSEY.

I think that pretty well disposes of the figment that we had better offers lying around which we could have accepted, or that anybody was willing to make a better offer than that which was made to us. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) is not in his place, because I expect that the hon. gentleman will favour us with an eloquent denunciation of this contract before the discussion is through. But we have the advantage, the very great advantage, of our enemy having written a book, or rather a letter to the newspapers, and I will trouble the House with a short discussion of some of the views of a gentleman who signs himself "Onlooker." The hon. member for East York knows who "Onlooker" is, and I am justified by what took place in this House a few evenings ago in concluding that although the hand is the hand of "Onlooker, the voice is the voice of the hon. member for York. There are two or three things in connection with the hon. gentleman's criticisms of this contract which indicate that even the hon. gentleman's facility in not accurately stating facts has been somewhat outdone in this particular effort. I must say to the hon. gentleman that out in the wild and woolly west from which I come, it is not considered very good form for a leading statesman to anticipate discussion by Parliament of an important question by abusing his political opponents in a newspaper. Of course if the hon. gentleman thinks otherwise, he can exercise his privilege. I will now refer to "Onlooker's" letter in the "Citizen," of January 29.

Mr. LANDERKIN. They have had a great deal of experience with anonymous letters.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Yes, my hon. friend is correct. The great Conservative party is rich in such experience. I take it that this view presented in the "Citizen" is the view of that combination which is now the Conservative party in this House—that is to say it will be the official view. We had the view of the leader of the Opposition, his private view when he was first interviewed, and it was favourable to this contract in all its details, and it can scarcely be supposed that he seriously attempts to get out of that position; he practically approved of the contract, but the hon. members for East York, York and West York have been too much for the hon. gentleman and he had to change his view. I presume this statement by "Onlooker" will go down to history as the attitude of the Conservative party on this question, and that is the reason why I want to discuss it. I will not read the whole of the article, for if I did so I am afraid the House would never forgive me. The hon. gentleman in a certain part of his letter, in the fourth column, makes a statement—and if the hon. gentleman is going to indulge in literary efforts he must make his contributions shorter; for, although he can make members sit here and listen to him for three or four hours at a time, he cannot make people read lengthy articles in newspapers. Referring to the profits to be derived from the road, the hon. gentleman wrote :

Vary this calculation as you may, cut it down or increase the estimate, and it shows you that no more paying franchise could be obtained than the bare privilege of building and operating this road.

I am not going to criticise these observations at length, but I am going to show how entirely absurd is the position taken in this article, which will, I presume, be the position of the Opposition. The statement is made, it has been made in this House, and has been argued that it is a great privilege to allow the contractors to build the railway on account of the enormous profits. There is a provincial charter in existence at the present time, held by the Cassiar Central Company, for the building of a line of railway over this route. It contains a provision for a land grant, a lease of lands with mineral rights, to the extent of 10,240 acres per mile in the Cassiar district, subject to certain conditions. The provisions are not so favourable to the Cassiar Central Company as are these proposed by this Government, and therefore that company has not been able to get any money to build the road. If we made the same conditions we would not have our railway built. So we have a railway charter in existence covering the same territory as that by our projected railway and the company has the liberal concession of 10,240 acres of land per mile under lease for thirty-five years, which is practically a deed as regards the mineral rights. That grant is subject to certain conditions in respect to payment of royalties; but I need not go into that point fully. If hon. members will look at the charter in the British Columbia statutes they will see the conditions set out, and that there is a liberal concession given to the company for building the road. The gentlemen composing the company have been in England for a year and have not been able to secure, so far as my knowledge goes, one dollar, and certainly they have not been able to build a single foot of the road. The proof of the pudding is in the eating; and if the charter is there, not only a charter but a large and liberal concession, and nobody of men can be got to build the railway, in the name of common sense what is the use of making a statement of that kind and sending it all over Canada? Is there to be no sense in statements made by public men? Here is an hon. gentleman who, for years and years, has been a member of the House, who has been Finance Minister, who has occupied the responsible position of leader of the House, and who in an anonymous letter, in an article not even over his own name, has made a statement which he knows and which every man knows to be absolutely and entirely false. Is there any justification for that sort of action?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I was about to direct the attention of the hon. gentleman to the use of the word false. We do not approve of the use of that word in the House.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I bow most deferentially to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and if I have said anything contrary to the usage of the House I very cheerfully withdraw it. The House, I hope, however, will not forget that this clause is in the hon. gentleman's letter. Here is another point in the letter:

For a coast and boundary line of over 1,000 miles not a rail shall for five years be laid to compete with Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie. No matter what eligible passes may be discovered, no matter what citizen may wish to build and engage in lawful transport, there stands the flaming sword of the Government flashing in the monetary defense of Mann & Mackenzie. The mere statement of this monstrous proposition instantly condemns it.

The hon. gentleman says that the mere statement of a proposition, which is in effect that this Government proposes to defend Canadian trade, is enough to condemn it. This hon. gentleman who, hour after hour, and week after week, last session lectured and denounced the Government because Canadian trade was suffering, gets up here and says that the mere statement of the fact that the Government of Canada proposes to protect Canadian trade is enough to condemn the Government's policy in regard to this road.

Now, Sir, I bring this forward for the purpose of showing that the position of the Opposition on this point is, that we, in endeavouring to protect Canadian trade, are wrong. That is a point I want this House to take note of, and that is a point I want the country to take note of. I want the country to note that we on this side are endeavouring to protect that trade from invasion, and that our friends in the Opposition are not in favour of that policy. That is clear. Again, he says:

Worse still, if worse there could be. The Government have undertaken to bind Parliament for ten years to a preference for Mann & Mackenzie for any railway between Stikine River and any ocean port in British Columbia.

That is the most ingenious way of creating a false impression that could possibly be imagined; but I need not criticise that statement, because there is something later on which will need comment.

Promising aid to them and prohibition to all others.

I would like my hon. friends on the other side of the House to take note of the fact that I have requested, and this Government have requested the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) and the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart), and the combined force of the intellects of gentlemen on the other side of the House, to set to work and show wherein that contract provides any prohibition to anybody else. He goes on:

And they have an exclusive option and monopoly of this all-rail route for ten years from September 1, 1898.

There is not one single word of truth in that statement.

Now, I am going to say a few words about the selection of the land, and I will place these words in connection with the statement here, which has been repeated time and again in this House throughout the discussion, and which, I suppose, we will hear again:

These lands will not be taken haphazard, but will be selected on placer creeks and quartz leads as a powerful and active company knows so well how to do. It is difficult to estimate the value of this tremendous concession. One gulch such as the Bonanza or Eldorado creeks would bring in with a minimum outlay scores of millions of dollars.

The hon. gentleman forgets that there were men tramping up and down those streams year after year since 1882, and in all that time they only found one Bonanza and one Eldorado. Let me ask, is there any method by which this wonderful company can apply the X rays to the whole of the Yukon district and pick out Bonanzas and Eldorados. If there is, I am not aware of it. But the hon. gentleman makes the statement, and he indicates that there is the clearest probability that these contractors will find an abundance of gold.

How many such finds may become the property of those two gentlemen?

If there is any such probability of many of them being found, I would recommend the hon. gentleman to hire a few prospectors and send them out, because he has the first chance; he has several months' start of the railway company.

I want to say another thing, too, in reference to the observation of my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Osler) when he said that if this land grant were taken to London, England, it could be sold—substantially, this is what he said—for more than the 25,000,000 acres of land granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway would bring or was worth. Now, I suppose that the value of the land granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway would not be inaccurately or exorbitantly estimated at $50,000,000. I would like to make a proposition to my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Osler). I may say that I have not the authority of an Order in Council for making it, but I would make the suggestion, and possibly we could make a contract of the kind I am going to propose, if the House would approve of it. This railway company has no authority to get any territory at all until they have built some ten miles of railway. Several months will elapse before that is done, and there is nothing in this contract or in this Bill to prevent the Government from now giving the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) the same privilege of selecting 3,750,000 acres of land on practically the same conditions as the land grant is given to the contractors. I would like the hon. gentleman (Mr. Osler) to think it over for a while, and let the Government know if he is prepared, on behalf of himself or the gentlemen he represents, to put up $50,000,000 in case we give him that same privilege, and if so, he can go in ahead of the railway company and take up the lands. I am not sure but that the House would sanction the proposal, and also sanction the passage of a

Mr. SIFTON.

Bill to pay the hon. gentleman (Mr. Osler) a liberal commission on the transaction, and indemnify him against the operation of the Independence of Parliament Act.

A few words now with reference to this question of selection. There are to be 3,750,000 acres of land. The gold is found in that territory in the beds of the water-courses, and I am told by Mr. Ogilvie—whom I asked for the special purpose of getting the information in an authoritative way—that the average width of the soil, where there is any possibility of finding gold—I am not speaking of rock ledges now, but of placer gold—the average width is not more than 300 feet. Now, if this company wants to get any gold-bearing territory at all, it is compelled to take its base line by following the general course of the stream, and to take this in blocks six miles wide and running across the supposed gold-bearing area. This map, which I here produce, is on the scale of one mile to the inch, and it shows the size of a block twenty-four miles long, such as that provided for in the contract. The company's blocks being six miles wide, that line represents the possible territory in which the company has any chance of finding gold: it represents 300 feet. They come along and follow the general line of the water-course, the average width of the soil in which it is possible to find placer gold being not more than 300 feet. The territory which they take, is 31,680 feet wide, and the soil in which they have a chance of finding gold is only an average of 300 feet. They, therefore, have a chance of getting territory 300 feet wide out of 31,680 feet. That is the way in which they must select their land, and that is the amount of territory which they have any chance of finding gold in. Now, their total grant is 3,750,000 acres, and the possible territory in which they can find anything—I am not speaking of quartz ledges now, for I will discuss that later on—is the one-one-hundred-and-fifth part of that. Out of their grant of 3,750,000 acres, they have 35,714 acres in which they have a possible chance of finding anything; not a certainty, remember—nothing more than a mere probability. Does anybody imagine that you can walk up and down the water courses and find gold in paying quantities in all of them? You can find the colour of gold; you can find that all over the North-west, in places where it does not pay at all. But these gentlemen have a possible chance of finding something that pays in 35,714 acres out of the 3,750,000 acres—equal to a piece of territory less than ten miles by six miles in extent. That is the effect of the method of selection which we have provided that these gentlemen must adopt.

Now, as to the rich lodes and ledges which my hon. friend writes about. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) is, I understand, the president or the manager of a gold mining company. I am told that the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) is also the president of a gold mining company. I can take either of these gentlemen to as rich a mining district as there is in the world, the Slocan district, in the neighbourhood of the town of Sandon, and if they will talk there, as I have done, to experienced mining men—for instance, to Mr. Macdonald, one of the owners of the Payne mine, which pays a dividend of $85,000 a month—they will find that these men of experience will tell them that there is no doubt whatever that in the neighbourhood of Sandon there are many ledges as rich as those which are exposed. Why does not my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition or my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance get a few of them? Why does not everybody who wants to get rich in a short time get a few of them? Because the experience of every mining country in the world is that it costs a great deal more in the aggregate to develop these ledges than they are worth. Yet by what process of reasoning do hon. gentlemen apply to the men who are getting this land grant a rule that applies to no other mining country in the world? If they find rich ledges, they will find them only after they have won them by spending their time and money; and anybody else in the world, under our present mining regulations, has just as good a chance of going there and finding these rich ledges as the men who are building this railway. Why, I say, apply a different rule to this company from what has been applied to other companies? The hon. leader of the Opposition the other night made a statement which is perfectly true; he made it inadvertently; he did not intend to make it, and he tried to correct it after he did make it; but it is true just the same: that it costs more to take the gold out than the gold is worth after it is taken out.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If my hon. friend will allow me to tell him he has no foundation whatever for saying that I attempted in any way to qualify or withdraw that statement. I did make it, and I made it without the slightest qualification.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I gathered that from the hon. gentleman's remarks. If he did not so intend, my inference is not correct. But he made the statement, and I say the statement is true; and I think I can prove it so far as the placer districts of Cassiar and Cariboo in British Columbia are concerned, which are in every respect the same in nature and in kind as the Klondike district. I have here a table which shows that in these districts from 1858 to 1880 inclusive, there was taken out $45,140,889 in gold, which the House will agree with me was a very respectable production. Now, analyse the figures for a few minutes. I find that during that time the highest amount that was taken out in any one year, on the average, was $1,222 per man, and the lowest was $403 per man; and we all know that even the highest amount did not represent the wages and living expenses of the men who were working in those mines or anything like them. If you look down the table you will find these figures: for 1858, $173 per man; for 1859, $403; for 1860, $506; for 1861, $634; for 1862, $517; for 1863, $482; for 1864, $849; for 1865, $813; for 1866, $893; for 1867, $814; and so on till it goes down to $518. This is the average amount of gold taken out per man per annum for the whole mining population; and every member of this House knows that these figures do not at all represent the wages and expenses of the men actually engaged in mining operations in those districts. Now, what I want to know is, by what process of reasoning is it argued that the same rule will not apply to the members of this company when they go to work to mine their railway land grant? There is no possible analogy which can be drawn from any mining operation in the world which will not lead to the inevitable conclusion that if these gentlemen send out a large number of prospectors and undertake to work their land grant for placer mining, they will spend more money than they will ever get out of the land grant.

I want to say on that point that I think they will make money out of their land grant, and I will tell you why I think so. Not because I think they will succeed in making any rich discoveries such as those that have been spoken of; because I cannot conceive of any reason why the same rule that applied in the very same kind of district in British Columbia will not apply in the Klondike district, especially when the expense and trouble of getting there are very much greater than they are in the other case. But in the Klondike district there are long stretches of territory where at the present time a man could take out $4, $6 or $8 a day. There are large stretches of sand-bars of that kind which it will not pay the placer miner to stay and work for any length of time. But this company can take such districts, which would be unproductive if worked in the ordinary way, and they can apply to them the results of science and the latest improved methods of machinery, and make them profitable. In doing this they would employ a large number of men, and a large quantity of machinery and supplies, which would be furnished through the ordinary channels of Canadian trade; and this is one of the reasons why I think this contract should commend itself to the judgment of the members of this House.

Now, I have taken longer than I intended to take in the discussion of these matters. But I have one word more to say in regard to some statements contained in the letter of "Onlooker"; and I think it would be a mistake if the House failed to understand what the position of the great Conservative party is upon another phase of this question. Here is the statement of "Onlooker":

Is Canadian trade to the Yukon dependent on this particular method of contract-giving, with its peculiar attaching conditions? Have I not read in the same paper that gave the news of this deal that a United States commercial company had placed orders to the amount of $170,000 in Vancouver for Yukon goods? Are there not scores of able transportation companies advertising for and now actually beginning the transport of people and supplies from Canada to the Klondike, and some of them over this very route? Is there not besides the Edmonton route, the Ashcroft route, the Skagway route, and the Dyea route, for all of which Canadians are outfitting parties in every quarter of Canada? Was the future of all trade to the Yukon from Canada bound up with this particular scheme?

Now, here we have as clearly as the hon. gentleman will dare to state it, the intimation of his opinion that the position of the Yukon trade at present does not warrant any extraordinary effort on the part of the Government to secure it. We have here the intimation that we were getting $170,000 of trade, and that surely if we were getting that amount, we ought to be satisfied. It ought to be nothing to us that our friends down on the Puget Sound were getting millions, we ought to be satisfied—being a poor and small community—with getting $170,000, and let the millions go to our friends on the other side of the line. That is the position which the Conservative party is taking in connection with this contract, and that is the point I want the House to understand, and which I think the hon. gentleman will have to explain to the manufacturers and merchants and wholesale men of the Dominion when he comes to explain the attitude he has taken upon this contract.

As to the difficulty of carrying out the undertaking by the contractors, I just wish to quote briefly an article from the "Victoria Colonist" which is a paper that generally opposes this Government, and a paper on the Pacific Coast which probably has a more accurate knowledge of the undertaking than any newspaper, ordinarily speaking, in this part of Canada. The "Victoria Colonist" says:

Hon. Clifford Sifton has declared that the task of constructing the Stikine-Teslin Railway is almost superhuman. This is strong language, but not too strong. Few people can grasp the magnitude of what Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann have undertaken. We believe they will succeed, but only those who have made actual calculations of what must be done in order that the 150 miles of railway may be completed by September 1, can have any idea of the magnitude of the undertaking. The actual work of building the road is not a very serious matter. If the contractors were given two years in which to do the work they would accomplish it without any very great difficulty; but it is to be remembered that they have practically only four months, and that during this short period everything used in constructing the railway, except the right of way and the ballast, must be taken up the Stikine River. This is what will make the undertaking exceptionally difficult, and if the contractors can manage to carry out their bargain they will deserve the first place among railway builders. We venture to say that no men ever before undertook to build 150 miles of railway under such circumstances in the same length of time. Fortunately, both the contractors are men who have energy and experience to assist them in their tremendous undertaking, and the facts that they have put up a very substantial guarantee shows that they believe themselves able to do what they are attempting.

That is the opinion of a paper published on the Pacific Coast which usually opposes the administration of this Government. Now, I have simply referred to that to show that we who entered into this contract are not the only persons who attach great importance to the magnitude of the undertaking which these contractors are attempting.

I propose to say only a few words more with regard to one or two points brought before the House during this discussion. The term "Land Monopoly" has been thrown across this House. I think it was my hon. friend from Gananoque (Mr. Taylor), or perhaps it was the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), who suggested that the men from the North-west could not be expected to support a land monopoly. I wonder that any man on that side of the House should have the assurance to talk of land monopoly. If the hon. gentlemen would like to look at a map, I will show them one that represents the fertile belt from the Rocky Mountains to the Red River and Lake Winnipeg. I will show them on that map the land monopoly of the North-west as it exists to-day. There it is. (Exhibiting map.) I live in the North-west—but let me explain the map first. Here, on this map, are the Red River and Lake Winnipeg, and there are the Rocky Mountains. This portion shows all the fertile belt, and of this fertile belt the hon. gentlemen opposite contracted to give away so much that they did not have enough there but had to go outside it. On all that enormous territory, every odd-numbered section—67,000,000 acres—has been reserved from settlement, and reserved for the benefit of the railway companies. Sixty-seven million acres—the whole fertile belt and much that is not is now a land monopoly reserved for the benefit of railway companies. Do hon. gentlemen opposite think it is the white portions of this map that show the land reserved? No, it is the black part. We mourn over that in the North-west, and therefore I had it marked in black on the map. I want the House to understand that that is the result of the land administration of our friends opposite, who claim to have the instinct of government. We have 67,000,000 acres of land in Manitoba and the North-west Territories reserved from settlement. On that 67,000,000 of acres, I, as the Minister of the Interior to-day, cannot give a man a homestead entry. Nor can I sell a single acre of it, although there are millions of acres of that land that never have been and never will be or can be earned by any railway company whatever. But, Sir, they are reserved by Order in Council, the good faith of the Dominion is pledged to that for ever, and no Government can interfere with that reserve until the bond is literally fulfilled to the very last letter. That is the position these hon. gentlemen have put us in. I wonder that any member on that side can have the colossal assurance to talk to any member from Manitoba or the North-west about land monopolies.

Do not let us run away with terms. What is a land monopoly? We have it in the North-west. We have there millions of acres owned by corporations—owned in part by a corporation which my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Osler) represents. And let me say, I do not blame him for that, but I thought, when he stood up the other day and said he was going to oppose this contract at every stage and every chance he got, he was not quite so bitter when the Calgary and Edmonton Bill was before the House. I did not then hear, away in the far North-west, that any tenders were called for when that road was contemplated. We all knew in the North-west that the cash subsidy to the Calgary and Edmonton Railway was enough to build the road and provide a very snug sum to go into the pockets of the promoters, as it ultimately did; but I did not hear that the hon. gentlemen who then composed the Government called for any tenders or permitted anybody else to have any share in that enterprise except our hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Osler). What we have in the shape of a land monopoly is this. We have millions of acres in that country owned by railway companies, and these companies are not required to do any work or spend any money. They sit down; they toil not neither do they spin. But the farmers toil and the farmers spin.

The farmers do their work: they cultivate their land and make their roads and bridges and pay their taxes and improve their land. And land goes up in value for the benefit of the railway companies. That is what takes place under the land-monopoly policy of our friends on the other side of the House. That is what is taking place now. And I tell the hon. gentlemen that there is no man sitting in this House to-day who realizes now, or who will live to realize the baneful effects of that policy upon the finest agricultural territory that the world has ever seen.

We propose, for the purpose of getting a great and valuable public work constructed under the most extraordinarily difficult circumstances, to give a land grant. Is it a land grant to which value will be given by the labour of other people or by the expenditure of other people's money? No, Sir, but a land grant which is not worth a dollar, except as it is made valuable by the expenditure and the work of the men who get it. Let the hon. gentlemen rest with that and explain to this House the coherence and logic of the position they take on this subject. I apprehend that if any man goes up and discovers a valuable claim, he will register it for himself and not for the railway company, and the company can find their own claims and register them for themselves, and they are in no respect better off for the labour the miner has performed.

I have detained the House longer than I anticipated. I look for great things from the construction of this railway; I look for great things because of the fact that I think it will largely promote Canadian trade. I think that if it is promptly and vigorously carried through, as I have no doubt it will be, it will have the effect of drawing to Canada within the next six months trade to the extent, perhaps, of twenty or twenty-five millions of dollars, that being a moderate estimate. I think it will conduce to the honour and dignity of Canada in making that country safe to us from a national standpoint. It will remove the danger of the country being not in the hands of our officers, but in the hands of an alien population who would contemn the authority of this Government. These things I look upon as important. Let my hon. friends opposite understand that if this railway project is obstructed, if it is stopped here or elsewhere, and if that territory passes from the control of Canada by reason of there being no railway communication, the people of Canada will hold them to a bitter account for it.

I have no more to say. As the Minister who has been called upon to give the most attention to this subject, I have tried to place the House in possession of the facts as well as I could. I look upon this as one step in the development of the great West which I represent, by the too great favour of the people, in this House and in this Government. And, if, in some small measure, the benefits which I have anticipated are realized, I shall only be too grateful and happy to have had some part in bringing about such very happy results.

Mr. HAGGART moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 17th February, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved :

That a select committee composed of Messieurs Bain, Borden (Halifax), Bourassa, Sir Adolphe Caron, Clarke, Sir Louis Davies, Davin, Flint, Foster, Fraser (Guysborough), Sir Wilfrid Laurier, McNeill, Monk, Powell, Russell and Scriver be appointed to assist Mr. Speaker in the direction of the Library of Parliament so far as the interests of this House are concerned, and to act as members of a joint committee of both Houses on the Library ; and that a message be sent to the Senate acquainting their Honours therewith.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 21) to amend the Railway Act with respect to the shipment of grain.—(Mr. Richardson.)

Mr. SPEAKER. I would like to mention to hon. members, that it would a good deal facilitate the proceedings of the Chair, if they would put the name of the seconder on any motion for the introduction of a Bill which they send up, as in the present condition of affairs the Chair has to pick out a seconder, and that is not quite regular.

CHEVALIER DROLET'S DREDGING LEASE.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

What privileges, if any, have been granted to Chevalier Drolet or any company represented by him, to dredge for gold in any of the rivers of the North-west Territories ? If any privileges have been granted to Chevalier Drolet or any company represented by him, at what rental have they been given, and for what term of years ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say that a lease has been issued in favour of Chevalier Drolet to dredge for minerals other than coal in thirty miles of the submerged bed of the North Saskatchewan River, upon the terms set out in the published regulations. The rental is $50 per year for each five miles, and the lease is for twenty years.

WHARF AT CHINA POINT, P.E.I.

Mr. MARTIN asked,

1. Is the Government aware that part of the wharf at China Point, in the province of Prince Edward Island, has floated up the river, and that the shipping at the wharf has practically terminated, owing to its bad condition ?

Mr. SIFTON.

2. Does the Government propose to repair the wharf, in order to be ready for the spring shipping ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say that the department has been informed that the head of the wharf at China Point, which had been considerably weakened by the action of the Tere do worm, has been carried away, and that the cost of repairing that damage is placed at $2,500. 2. The department has no appropriation now at its disposal for the repairs in question.

MOUNT ELGIN INSTITUTE.

Mr. HEYD asked,

1. When and under whose auspices was the Mount Elgin Institute established, and who manages, controls or conducts the same ?

2. From what source did the money come to erect the buildings, and how have the funds to carry on the work of the institution been raised ?

3. Were the original buildings destroyed by fire ? If so, when ?

4. Has it been rebuilt ; if so, when ; and what was the cost ?

5. Was the whole or any portion of the cost taken from the funds of the several bands of Indians in Ontario ? If so, how much ; and what was taken from the fund of each band ?

6. If such funds were taken was it done with the consent of the council of each band ? Was there an Order in Council authorizing the taking of money from the Indian funds for such purposes ? If so, what is the date of such order ?

7. How were the amounts each band was to pay arrived at ?

8. How many pupils were in attendance when rebuilt ?

9. How many from the Six Nation Indians on the reserve ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say : 1. The Mount Elgin Institute buildings were completed in 1851, and the management of the school was entrusted to the Wesleyan Methodist Society, under whose auspices it is still conducted. 2. From contributions by the following bands of Indians to a fund called the Indian School Fund :—Chippewas of Sarnia and Walpole Island ; Chippewas of the Thames ; Chippewas of Rama, Beausoleil, and Snake Island ; Chippewas of Saugeen ; Moravians of the Thames ; Mississaugas of the Credit ; Mississaugas of Rice and Mud Lakes ; Mississaugas of Alnwick. These contributions ceased on the 30th of June, 1862, when the unexpended balance was $38,203.74, since which time the funds to carry on the work of the institution have been provided by parliamentary grant and the said Indian School Fund. 3. No. 4. No, but a new building was completed in 1896. Exact cost is not known to the department, but $19,000 was contributed from Indian funds, and $2,500 was appropriated by Parliament. The Methodist Church contributed something, but the amount is not known.

5. The amount contributed from Indian funds was taken from the several bands of Indians in Ontario, as follows:—

Chippewas of Walpole Island....	$ 3,602 80
Chippewas of Sarnia.....	2,500 15
Mississaugas of the Credit.....	2,915 04
Chippewas of Beausoleil.....	429 90
Chippewas of Nawash.....	1,407 25
Chippewas of Saugeen.....	1,520 70
Chippewas of Rama.....	33 15
Moravians of the Thames.....	1,290 70
Mississaugas of Alnwick.....	313 35
Chippewas of the Thames	1,584 90
Parry Island Indians.....	115 50
Six Nations	3,286 56
	$19,000 00

6. The funds were taken without the consent of the councils of the bands. There were Orders in Council authorizing the taking of the money. The Orders in Council are dated 12th June, 1893, and 17th January, 1895. 7. The amounts to be paid by each band were levied in proportion to the average number of pupils in attendance from that band during a period of five years. 8. Eighty-six pupils were in attendance in 1892, when the new building was commenced. 9. Nine.

CHANGES IN CAPE BRETON COUNTY—MARINE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. McDOUGALL asked,

What changes have been made in the officials and employees of the Department of Marine, in the county of Cape Breton, since June, 1896?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I shall be very happy to give the hon. gentleman all the information he seeks, but the slightest reflection will convince him that the manner in which he seeks to obtain it is inconvenient and contrary to the usual practice. In this and succeeding questions the hon. gentleman asks for long lists of names in all the different departments of the Government in the county or in the district of Cape Breton. Another gentleman will probably ask similar questions with regard to the province of Ontario, another with regard to Nova Scotia, and so on. It is practically impossible that this information can be given in the form of answers to questions. But, if the hon. gentleman will put it in the form of a motion, I promise him that the information shall be brought down promptly.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I did not know that the list was so long.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understand the hon. gentleman withdraws questions from No. 8 to No. 12, inclusive?

Mr. McDOUGALL. Shall I be permitted to move for the information now, with the consent of the House?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Oh, no. Put a notice on the Order paper.

FISHERMAN BOUNTY APPLICATIONS AT GABARUS.

Mr. McDOUGALL asked,

Who was authorized to take fisherman bounty applications at Gabarus, in the county of Cape Breton, for the last fishing season? When were such applications taken? Has the bounty been paid?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The person authorized to take the fishery bounty applications at Gabarus for the last fishing season is Mr. Joseph McPherson, fishery overseer, North Sydney, Cape Breton. The applications were taken in January, 1898. The bounty has not been paid, but the checks are being prepared as in other counties.

CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY—COMMUNICATION OF MR. HAMILTON SMITH.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask my right hon. friend the leader of the Government if he will be good enough to lay upon the Table of the House a communication from Mr. Hamilton Smith, a gentleman who represents a large number of the most eminent capitalists and financiers in the city of London, and who, I understand, has laid a proposal before the hon. gentleman that bears immediately upon this question of railway construction that we now have under consideration.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). If my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) is aware that Mr. Hamilton Smith has made any proposition to the Government he is almost as well informed as myself, because it is only two days ago since I received a communication from Mr. Hamilton Smith. There will be no objection at all to laying the communication upon the Table of the House.

CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY COMPANY.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Blair for the second reading of Bill (No. 6) an Act to confirm an agreement between Her Majesty the Queen and Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, and to incorporate the Canadian Yukon Railway Company.

Mr. HAGGART. Mr. Speaker, in rising to address the House in reference to the Bill to form a company and to confirm a contract entered into by the Government for the construction of a line of road in the Yukon region, I regret that the information I am possessed of is not as full as I should like to have made it for the purpose of this discussion. I learn from the remarks of the leader of the Opposition that another offer has been made to the Government. I am glad that it is the intention of the Government to bring down that communication, and I hope this information will be laid on the Table before another stage of this Bill is taken up. I would ask also that the map to accompany the report of Mr. Jennings, which the Minister said would be down in a very short time, should be laid before the House very soon. It is almost impossible for one to learn anything from Mr. Jennings's report without that map. The names mentioned in Mr. Jennings's report are not given on any map of the district that I know of. I hope full information will be brought down before another stage of the Bill is entered on or the resolution now before the House is proceeded with. Before answering the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), I may be pardoned if I refer to some remarks made by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair). That hon. gentleman made a speech the other evening in support of the Bill, founding a good deal of that speech upon some observations that he said had been made by me in the few remarks I made on the first reading of the Bill.

The hon. gentleman must have found by this time that he was entirely mistaken. A couple of days have expired since then, and the hon. gentleman has not had the courtesy to correct the observations which he made. The other part of his speech was in reference to some remarks made by my hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Montague), which remarks he criticised. I remember perfectly well when I was delivering the speech, and I never made such a foolish remark as to say that according to the American regulations we would have to pay custom duty in using the Stikine River for the purpose of arriving at the proposed termination of the railway. The hon. gentleman asserted again and again that I made that statement. I remember perfectly well what I said in reference to the customs regulations. I corrected the hon. gentleman at the time, and if he had treated me with the courtesy with which I have always been treated by other members of the House, he would have accepted my correction and my statement of what I had said. The hon. gentleman also criticised rather severely some remarks I made in reference to the extent of the gold-bearing regions given in this concession to Mackenzie & Mann. According to the report of Dr. Dawson, who is at the head of the Geological Survey, the total area of gold-bearing land in Yukon is about 120,000 square miles. I also quoted from Mr. Ogilvie upon the subject, in which he gave a somewhat similar area. I stated that the land to be granted for the purpose of assisting the construction of this railway was 5,700 square miles; and my argument was that only about 5 per cent of the whole gold-bearing country, according to Dr. Dawson and Mr. Ogilvie, could be profitably worked, the amount these contractors might select would practically cover the whole of that profitable or workable area. The Minister of Railways was perfectly right. He said it was absurd to suppose that such large areas of gold could be workable in that country. But I will refer him to his friend the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), who answered my remarks, and who said that the ex-Minister of Railways had made an absurd statement in saying that there was only 5,800 square miles of workable gold-bearing land in that country, whereas we have the reports of Mr. Ogilvie and Dr. Dawson to the effect that there are 120,000 square miles of gold-bearing land. I leave the Minister of Railways and the hon. member for North Wellington to settle the question between them.

The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Morrison) also made some remarks with reference to my statement as to the character of the road which was selected as the standard for this Yukon railway. He was sorry to see the ignorance displayed by a gentleman who had been a long time at the head of the Railway Department, and regretted that he was not better informed upon the subject in hand. What was the alleged fault I committed in speaking of the railway running from Kaslo to Slocan? He says I might as well have spoken of a road running from Montreal to Ontario, because Kaslo was nearly as big a country as Ontario. The hon. gentleman must remember that sometimes he himself makes a slip of the tongue as well as others. There is a place they call Slocan a very few miles from the end of the railway. I stated that I was over the railway and was well acquainted with the gradients and character of the road, and I thank the hon. Minister of the Interior for furnishing me with definite information last night which I intend to give to the House in regard to the character of the road which is adopted as the standard for the road the Government asks the House to authorize the contractors to build. The hon. Minister of the Interior, speaking of the Kaslo and Slocan road, said that the ex-Minister of Railways ought to be perfectly informed upon the question. Perhaps he ought to be informed upon the question. I never pretended, when I was Minister of Railways, to know all the particulars of all the roads in the country. I might as well ask the Postmaster General to be able at any time to repeat off-hand the names of the post offices throughout the country, or the details of the contracts entered into by the department for all the post offices. I have not such an acquaintance, I do not even yet know all the peculiarities of the different railways in the country sufficiently to be able to tell off-hand the gradients, or the curvatures, or the length of every road, and I do not think that any Minister of Railways would be able to do so. But as I said before, I thank the Minister of the Interior for the information he gave me. I stated that it was a narrow-gauge road, I stated that it was a mountain road, I stated that the gradients were such as were to be found on no other road in Canada, and I stated that the curvatures were such as could only be found on a mountain road. What are the facts? The Minister of the Interior said last night that if I looked up the reports in my department when I was Minister of Railways, I would find it was a road thirty-one miles long, with maximum gradients of 171 feet to the mile. Now, I tell this House that that is the greatest gradient on any railroad in Canada except on an electric railroad, and except on one part of the Canadian Pacific Railway in the Rocky Mountains. The greatest curvature is 193 feet radius, that is only a 3 per cent curvature. What curvature does 193 feet radius make? It makes a 29 degree curvature. Now, Sir, that is the maximum curvature on any railway in the country except on one small railway. That is the character of the road, three feet wide, forty-five pound rails to the yard, maximum gradient of 171 feet to the mile, and a curvature of which the radius is 193 feet, or a 29 to 30 degree curve. That is the road which is to be the standard for the road now under discussion. You can build such a road anywhere in this country, you can trail it round with a 30 degree curve, you can follow the undulations of the ground, and in most parts of the world you cannot lay down rails with more than a maximum gradient of 171 feet. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries, referring to a remark I made the other evening in speaking upon this subject, says I made a mistake in reference to the weight of the rails on the Kaslo and Slocan Railway. My information was obtained from a newspaper clipping, in which I saw they had purchased the rails from the Galt road for the purpose of laying them down in the Yukon district and made an agreement with the Canadian Pacific Railway to take those rails quickly to the coast. The Minister of Marine arose to contradict my statement and said the standard required was the one on the Kaslo and Slocan Railway, and the company had to place rails on that road equal to 45 pounds to the yard. What do we find in the statement of the Minister of the Interior yesterday. It appears he required them to do so finally, but allowed the company in the meantime to put down rails 27 or 28 pounds to the yard, that the road may be constructed for a year with those rails and subsequently they will have to replace them with 45 pound rails, the hon. Minister arguing that this was on account of the difficulty of getting rails of that character into the country, that it was impossible to get 45 pound rails there in time, and necessity or urgency arose from the fact that the Government required the road to be completed before 1st September next. I will state boldly here that they could obtain 45 pound steel rails quicker than they would be able to take these rails over to the coast and then to the locality where they would be required; that there are parties prepared to contract for the speedy delivery of 45 pound rails; that the Minister of Railways is entirely mistaken in his statement as to the cost of rails delivered, and that Mr. Jennings is perfectly correct in his estimate that such rails could be delivered at the terminus of the road for $30 per ton and that a contract could be entered into at that sum. So there was no necessity for allowing the contractors to utilize old rails for the purpose of completing the contract. Now I will ask the Minister if the Government will allow the contractors to complete the road with 27 or 28 pound rails, and whether they will be allowed to draw subsidies on each section of ten miles as constructed?

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. HAGGART. I have not received an answer from any responsible party to my question.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I can tell the hon. gentleman they will not.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman makes the statement that those parties will not be able to earn one cent of the subsidy until one year after the work is completed.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I say so, and the hon. gentleman could have ascertained that fact if he had read the contract.

Mr. HAGGART. Then the hon. gentleman admits my assertion.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Oh, oh.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman may laugh if he likes. My statement was perfectly correct, and the hon. gentleman could not contradict it. My argument was that the contractors would be allowed, by the statement made by the Minister of the Interior last night, to put on this line 28 pound rails; that they would be allowed to use them for one year; that the road is not to be completed till 1st September next, and if the contractors are to be allowed to use those rails, then according to the hon. Minister's statement the contractors will not be able to obtain one cent of subsidy until one year from 1st September next. What has the Minister of Marine to say to that; is not that statement perfectly correct? The House ought to have had that statement made last night by the Minister of the Interior—the statement that none of the subsidies in that section of the country will be earned, nor will the contractors be entitled to any of them for a couple of years.

I will now drop the Minister of Railways and the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) and offer a few remarks in reply to the speech delivered by the Minister of the Interior yesterday. I am a very poor hand at paying compliments, because I am inclined to look upon a compliment as indicating insincerity on the part of the speaker, and I think the party receiving the compliment generally looks upon it in that light. As regards the hon. gentleman, I must say that I was forcibly impressed with his argument. I was forcibly impressed with his style in the House. But as a member of twenty-five years' standing—if I may be pardoned for alluding to the fact, because I noticed that my leader last evening got a thrashing from an hon. gentleman because he stated he had been twenty-five years in Parliament and for a certain time had occupied the position of Minister of Railways—I may be permitted to say that the speech was just a little lengthy, that a speech is not exactly like a kiss and is not to be measured altogether by its length, that if the hon. gentleman had observed brevity to a greater degree it would have improved it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I congratulate the hon. gentleman on hitting his leader so deftly.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman endeavoured to present an argument in support of the proposition before the House. He did it well; he made the best of what was a very bad case. The hon. gentleman presented a marked contrast to the hon. Minister who introduced the Bill. We had not much argument from the Minister of Railways, but the House had an argument from the Minister of the Interior in support of the proposal. For the purpose of advocating the Bill the hon. Minister divided it under several heads. He first described the business that was to be done in that country; next he sought to show how, if the Government did not build the road, we might lose part of the business; he put in the plea of urgency as one of the reasons for entering into the contract, and he gave the House a description of the different routes that might be followed for the purpose of entering that country, and he also dealt with other points. Those three first points I will deal with consecutively as did the Minister of the Interior.

The Minister criticised the leader of the Opposition for over half an hour in the opening of his speech last evening as regards my hon. friend's conduct outside of the House and his opinions in the House, in which he endeavoured to show how the leader of the Opposition changed his opinion from day to day and expressed different opinions outside the House and inside the Chamber, and he read several extracts from newspapers for the purpose of confirming his position. In all the clippings from the newspapers by the hon. gentleman in respect to the leader of the Opposition there was but one single point made, and I will explain it and deal with it. My leader admitted the urgency of the case, the great number of people who were going to the country next season, he approved of the hon. gentleman's selection of the route, he approved of the giving of the contract—provided it was given by tender or tenders were asked—to the parties to whom it was given. My hon. friend stated in an interview in Toronto that the parties who received the contract were perhaps the only contractors in the country who would be able to construct the road in the time specified.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I wish to observe on that point that the qualification about calling for tenders does not appear in the interview with the hon. gentleman. I do not think the hon. gentleman will see it if he reads the interview.

Mr. HAGGART. In the interview what the leader of the Opposition said was that Mackenzie & Mann were contractors and the only contractors in Canada who would be able to do the work in time. The leader of the Opposition spoke before he had seen the contract. He supposed that the road was to be built according to gradients commonly used in the country. He did not know it was to be a tramway, and had he known of the character of the Kaslo-Slocan with gradients of 171 feet to the mile and curvatures of nearly 30 degrees, no doubt the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) would have had a different opinion about it. There are one hundred contractors in the country who are capable of building such a road as that within the required time. We heard enough from the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) upon that question, and upon the question of Phillip drunk and Phillip sober, and the instinct of government that belongs to the Tory party in Canada. In my opinion the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) dwelt too much on that for his own good.

I believe perhaps that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) has made a moderate estimate as to the trade which will be done with the Yukon country this season. He was perhaps a little high in estimating that 20,000 tons can be carried in by the Yukon steamers, but from all I can hear, it seems to be a fact that forty thousand tons of supplies will be required for that country, and so we may safely rely on that estimate. The hon. gentleman is right when he says that a single steamer can navigate the Yukon for only about two trips in the year. The average freight which one of these steamers takes, is from 125 to 130 tons, and although sometimes they make a second trip, yet they cannot carry as large a quantity of freight as on the first trip on account of the lower water which exists in the summer and fall. If we are correct in estimating that 20,000 tons can be taken in via the Yukon River, then other means will be required to take 20,000 tons over into our territory. On that point the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) argued that if we are to retain the trade of the Yukon we must provide sufficient means for its transport. Well, Sir, the members on this side of the House, as well as the members on the other side, are perfectly united on the point that there is a necessity for the building of a railway somewhere or another into that country, and that being so there remains only the question as to the choice of routes. It being the opinion of every person in Canada that a railway should be built, then it was the duty of the Government of Canada to devise such a scheme as would be in the best interests of the country. I agree with the Minister of the Interior that there was urgency for the construction of such a road, but I do not agree with him that the urgency was such as to justify the Government in adopting the course they did, and not ask for tenders. In fact, Sir, I entirely disagree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) in that regard. As I have already stated, tenders might be obtained for the construction of a road without advertising for them, because invitations could have been sent to different parties to compete, and there would be no loss of time. It is hardly necessary to say that such competition would enure to the benefit of the country.

Let me discuss for a moment the different routes available for entering the Yukon country, and in doing so I will adopt the statement of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) that there are six possible routes. One of these is by the Yukon River, another from Pyramid Harbour up the Chilkat River, making a connection with the Lewes River at the foot of Five Finger Rapids, and thence to Dawson City. Now, without taking into consideration the navigation laws, without taking into consideration that we may pass through a foreign country, which I deny if my reading of the treaties is correct; then there is no doubt that the best route, commercially, is from Pyramid Harbour to the foot of Five Finger Rapids, and thence by navigation on the Lewes River to Dawson City. I may state that there is fair navigation on the Lewes River. The distance from Pyramid Harbour to the point I mention is in the neighbourhood of 285 miles. Mr. Jennings in his report makes it 245 miles, but I believe the actual survey gives it as 285 miles. For the first 53 miles from Pyramid Harbour there is a pretty steep grade until you get to the Plateau, but from that point to the Five Finger Rapids it is perfectly easy to construct a line of railway, and if I correctly understood the question put by my leader this afternoon the Government have had an offer for the building of a road over that very route.

In my opinion this is the best route, commercially speaking, to reach the Yukon country, and indeed there can hardly be any question about it. Provided we have the bonding privilege of passing through the United States assured us, and providing that Pyramid Harbour is not in United States territory—and after a careful reading of the treaty and a comparison with the maps I believe it is in Canadian territory—then this route is the best one that could be adopted. But, presuming that Pyramid Harbour is in the United States, if arrangements could be made either by reciprocal legislation or by treaty between Great Britain and the United States, there is no doubt that the proper route would be from Pyramid Harbour to the Five Finger Rapids. I do not believe that this admits of argument. Now there is an objection to this route, and that objection is, that the bonding privilege, or the right which we have of crossing over alleged American territory might be taken away from us at any date. That may be sufficient justification to the Government to drop that particular route, but to me it would not be sufficient justification, because I believe that it is more in the interest of the people of the United States to retain the existing bonding arrangements, than it is in the interest of Canadians. There is only one way by which the Americans can get from Pyramid Harbour up to the gold fields which they may rightly suppose in that part of the Yukon opposite Dawson City may be in their own territory, and the only way in which they can reach that territory by railway, after passing the fringe upon the coast, is by running nearly the whole distance through Canadian territory. We, therefore, have the whip hand on them with regard to that particular route, and it is consequently to their advantage and interest to allow us the bonding privilege through their territory. It is perhaps to our interest, too, that we should make reciprocal arrangements with them for allowing goods to be bonded through our territory into theirs. I will tell you why it is in the interest of the United States to continue the bonding privileges. One of the best traffics the trans-continental lines of the United States have is the traffic in teas and silks from China to Great Britain and Europe, which pass in bond through the United States. That traffic is of more value to them than any concession in reference to the Yukon region or any other part of Canada. Therefore, I cannot but think that the United States Government would be a consenting party to a reciprocal arrangement in reference to the bonding privilege, either by legislation or by treaty, for the purpose of having the railway constructed by that particular route.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Does

my hon. friend happen to have the figures which will show what is the total value of that trade which he speaks of in tea and silks from China and Japan through the United States to Great Britain and Europe?

Mr. HAGGART. I have not the figures. The statement was made by the President of the United States or some high official, in a conversation with some gentleman—I may be misinformed, but I have been told that he said: "It is no use of talking of abolishing the bonding privileges, because the volume of trade to us is greatly in excess of anything Canada receives."

There are two other routes for a railway which the hon. gentleman spoke of. There is the one from Skagway, and another from Dyea through the Chilkoot Pass, both of which are shorter and better routes than the one proposed for getting into our territory. But they are not equal to the route from Pyramid Harbour, which passes over the old Dalton trail. Then, there is the route from Taku Inlet, which is near the Lynn Canal.

One of the arguments of the hon. gentleman was the urgency of this matter, because he was not able to make the contract for a long time. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition pointed out that the hon. Minister had Mr. Jennings's report on the 25th of October. But what was the use of Mr. Jennings's report, the hon. Minister asks, when we had no information in reference to the navigation of the Hootalinqua River from Teslin Lake to Lewes River? The hon. gentleman might have had the information, because it was in his department; or, if it was not in his department, he might very easily have got it. Dr. Dawson went up to that country in 1887, and wrote a report, particularly bearing upon the navigation of the rivers. He himself travelled on the Stikine River from Fort Wrangel up to Glenora or Telegraph Creek, and gave information in his report as to the depth of the water in that river and as to the kind of steamer which would be required to navigate it; and the hon. gentleman had the most thorough information in regard to this. Dr. Dawson also speaks of the Hootalinqua River from Teslin Lake to Lewes River. He speaks of travelling on his way back up the river from Fort Selkirk to the stream that debouches from Lake Labarge into the Lewes River.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Does the hon. gentleman say that Dr. Dawson says he went up the Hootalinqua River?

Mr. HAGGART. I did not say anything of the kind: I was very careful in my observations. I said that Dr. Dawson travelled up the river from Fort Selkirk to the stream that debouches into the Lewes River from Lake Labarge. He actually travelled over that, and spoke of it as if he had been over the ground. That part from where Lake Labarge debouches into the Lewes River up to Teslin Lake he speaks of from hearsay. He interviewed some miners in that section of the country, and gave their statements in reference to the navigation of that route. But in regard to that the hon. gentleman could have had the report of an officer of the Geological Survey of Washington, a Mr. Hayes, who went from Teslin Lake the whole distance down the Lewes River, and gives an accurate account of the whole route, in which he confirms the information given by the miners to Dr. Dawson in 1887. He said he found the information which Dr. Dawson had got from those miners to be wonderfully correct. The hon. gentleman might have had this information, for the officers of his department must have been acquainted with Mr. Hayes's report. He had thus at his command full information of the whole system of navigation from Teslin Lake to Fort Selkirk; and what does Mr. Jennings say in reference to the question? He says that Mr. St. Cyr reports to him that, after examining that particular part of the country, he found that Mr. Hayes was absolutely correct. Therefore, the hon. Minister's reason for waiting from the time he got the information on the 25th of October before letting the contract for this work fall to the ground, for he had the information in his department, or he might have had it from Dr. Dawson as fully as he got it from Mr. St. Cyr.

Then, the Minister shelters himself for having let this contract, behind his officer, because, he says, he did not get the information from the officer who was sent for the purpose of examining the route, until the 6th of January. I suppose the Minister got the information from Mr. Jennings, the officer in charge of that work, the moment Mr. St. Cyr came down to Victoria; because that information was of such importance that it would be the duty of Mr. Jennings if the Minister was not at hand, to telegraph at once that the route was fit for navigation. If the hon. Minister, and his department, had exercised due diligence, he could have had all the information on the 25th of October which he subsequently obtained, to enable him to construct the road or let the contract.

The hon. gentleman talks of Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann as if they were the only men in the country who could build that road. I know both of these gentlemen, and they are both capable and efficient men for constructing the road. I differ entirely with my leader in the remark he made some time ago in Toronto in this respect. I believe there are a dozen men in the country just as capable of building the road as Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I never said to the contrary.

Mr. HAGGART. My right hon. leader says he never said to the contrary. I believe that it was possible for the Minister of Railways to have had competition for the construction of that road, and he is finding out now that he not only could have got that road built on much better terms, but could have got a road built which would be of much more advantage to this country. I refer to the road from Pyramid Harbour, 288 miles, down to the foot of Five Finger Rapids. He could have had that road built for a grant of land much less than the amount given to Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann. But I object to the principle of giving any land in a mining district, whether a few acres per mile or 25,000 acres. I hold to the argument which I made in the introduction of the Bill, that 100,000 acres of selected gold lands in the country would have been as good an inducement to the contractors to undertake the work as the selection of 5,000 square miles in the country. There is not a legislature in any civilized country which reserves the placer mining from the people. You could not enforce such legislation. Set a mining population into the country, let there be 200,000 or 250,000 miners in it, and all the forces of the British Empire would not prevent them mining on the reserved lands. They would compel the Government of this country to re-purchase the bargain made with Mann & Mackenzie, and the Government would have to do this at a far greater sacrifice than the bargain called for.

The next question which the hon. gentleman touched upon is a very important one, namely, whether this route, which we intend to use, is free from international complications. The hon. gentleman told us very cavalierly that, under the Treaty of Washington, we gave away the rights which we possessed under the Anglo-Russian treaty of 1825. He said that under the latter treaty we had the greatest possible rights that could be enjoyed with reference to the navigation of these streams. I admit that you cannot use words in the English language which could give a greater right to the user of rivers in a foreign country than what is contained in the Anglo-Russian treaty of 1825. That treaty, of course, was abrogated by the Crimean war. It was afterwards partly renewed by the Treaty of Paris of 1856, and there was a subsequent treaty regarding this and other subjects, the Treaty of St. Petersburg of 1859. The hon. gentleman made an attack, in this connection, upon the party I have had the honour of supporting for a number of years. Canada had, he said, the greatest possible rights in those rivers, and the party now on this side of the House gave those rights away—or a portion of them—by the Treaty of Washington. Where is the hon. gentleman's authority on the law? Is it the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies)? The hon. gentleman argued that all the obligations which Russia was under to Great Britain were retained by Great Britain, as against the United States, when the transfer was made by Russia to the United States.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I have made no observation as yet about it at all.

Mr. HAGGART. My hon. friend did interlard a remark. He said something with reference to it, but that was the argument of the Minister of the Interior. What are the facts? By her treaty with the United States, Russia gave to the United States this country. The question then arises whether, in transferring that country to the United States, the servitude or rights of any other country attach to the transfer. If the hon. gentleman will read the speech of Mr. Sumner, in introducing the treaty between Russia and the United States, in 1867, he will find that Mr. Sumner took an entirely different view. He took the view that when one country parts with its sovereignty to another country, all the servitudes or rights limiting that sovereignty which a third country might previously have enjoyed disappear. If the hon. gentleman will follow also the debates on the Washington treaty, he will find that Mr. John Hilliard Cameron took precisely the same view, namely, that the servitudes end with the transfer of a country. The same question arose lately with regard to Madagascar. The French Government which acquired Madagascar claimed that all the treaty rights which Great Britain and the United States had in that country before the conquest have disappeared—that the acquisition by France of the sovereignty of that country put an end to these rights. The contention of Mr. Sumner was exactly the same when he introduced, in 1867, his Bill in the United States Congress. It, however, always has been the contention of the United States that the people at the source of a river have the right to navigate the whole of that river. Therefore, while the right of having Sitka as a free port, the right of navigating the different rivers or arms of the sea in the country, ended with the transfer, still, as the United States have always contended in reference to the Mississippi, when the state of Louisiana on its west bank belonged to Spain, and have always contended with reference to the St. Lawrence River, the parties living at the source of a river are entitled to its free navigation. Therefore, they abandoned the contention that Great Britain lost any of her rights to the free user of rivers from this country to the sea. They were willing to concede that. I might quote from the speech of Mr. Sumner, as it will be found in Vol. 11 of his works, page 67:

Thus, we have three stipulations on the part of Russia—one, opening the seas and gulfs and havens on the Russian coast to British subjects; the second making Sitka a free port to British subjects; and the third making the particular rivers which flow into the Russian possessions for ever free to British navigation. Did the United States succeed to these stipulations? Among these, I may make a distinction in favour of the last which, by its language, is declared to be for ever, and may have been in the nature of an equivalent settlement of boundaries between the two powers, but whatever its term or its origin, it is obvious that it is nothing but a declaration of public law—

That was always the contention of the Americans, that the right of people living at the source of a river to its free navigation was public law—

—as always expounded by the United States, and now recognized on the continent of Europe.

The two other stipulations are different in character. They are not declared to be for ever, and do not stand on any principle of public law, even subsisting now, they cannot be for ever. I doubt if they are subsisting now. In seceding to Russian possessions, it does not follow that the United States succeeded to any ancient obligations assumed by Russia; and if, according to a phrase of common law, there were covenants running with the land, that these stipulations are in the nature of servitudes, they depend for their duration on the sovereignty of Russia, and are personal or national rather than territorial. So, at least, I am inclined to believe, but it is hardly probable to speculate on a point of so little practical value.

However, he admits—and I will ask the hon. gentleman to remember this—that the nation at the sources of a river have the most complete right to the user of those rivers. Irrespective of any treaty or arrangement made with any country, the American Government are of opinion, and have always contended, that we have virtually the right of free using of these rivers as fully as we had under the original treaty. And I will ask the hon. gentleman to insist upon that in his negotiations with that country. We live at the sources of the river, and the Americans have always admitted the right of user in such cases. And it is very doubtful if we have not the right under the treaty with Russia. If the contention is correct that these servitudes pass with the transfer of the territory, being an obligation of the territory, then we have as great rights as there possibly can be both by the treaty and by the declaration of the principal statesman of the United States as to the user of these waters. I should be sorry to see the American Government assume an entirely different attitude. I put a different interpretation on the Bills introduced in Congress. I think they are merely to enable Secretary Gage or the President of the United States to make arrangements with the Government of Canada for the settlement of pending questions. I hope it is so. I think it is to the interest of the United States to do so, and, if it is to their interest, I have no doubt that they will do it. If that is done and arrangements of that kind are made, this road is entirely useless as a commercial project for the purpose of reaching that territory. However, the hon. gentllemen depend for approval of their proposal upon the plea that it is entirely through British territory.

Reverting to the question of international law, the House will remember the attack which the Minister of the Interior made upon the Government which was in power when the Washington Treaty was ratified for parting with our rights. Under the Washington Treaty we have the right to navigate the Yukon, Porcupine and Stikine rivers. But the hon. gentleman says that we had the free right to navigate the Stikine by the treaty with Russia, and that the Treaty of Washington, limiting that right to navigation for commercial purposes, was actually an infraction of our rights with regard to that river. But from Lord Carnarvon's despatch we find that the law officers of the Crown and the British authorities took an entirely different view with regard to navigation of this river. If the sovereignty of this country passed by the transfer of the property of Alaska from Russia to the United States, then we had no rights to navigate the Stikine, the Yukon or the Porcupine rivers, but this right we derive from the Washington Treaty. As hon. gentlemen opposite will probably quote in reply Lord Carnarvon's report upon the subject, I will read it myself as I think it supports my contention. A very interesting case came up a few years ago in reference to a prisoner named Martin. His case came to trial, and he was convicted before Judge Crease, one of the judges of British Columbia. The judgment depended upon the interpretation of the Russian and Washington treaties. Judge Crease held that the Washington Treaty was only an extension of the treaty between Russia and Great Britain, the Russian Treaty being still in force and the Washington Treaty being an extension of it. Hon. Edward Blake, who was Minister of Justice at the time, of course supported that contention, although he criticised very severely the action of Sir John Macdonald who had negotiated the Washington Treaty. However, the subject was finally referred to the British authorities, and this despatch came out:

With reference to my despatch—

This is on the 16th August, 1877—

—and the previous correspondence on the same subject, I have now the honour to communicate to you the views of Her Majesty's Government, adopted after consultation with the law officers of the Crown, with reference to the case of Peter Martin, for whose release an application has been made to the Government of the United States. If the rights of free navigation depend upon the 26th article of the Treaty of Washington, which expressly states that navigation should be opened for the purpose of commerce, Her Majesty's Government are of opinion that a prisoner cannot lawfully be conveyed to Alaska by the Stikine River.

My contention is, although I may be wrong in my argument, that according to the opinion of the law officers of the Crown the treaties were all done away with and the only rights we have to the Porcupine and Stikine River are by the Treaty of Washington. Then, because we are obliged to tranship, we are also subject to all the customs regulations that the American Government may make in reference to vessels transshipping at Fort Wrangel. We are in as bad a position at Fort Wrangel in getting at this railway from Glenora to Teslin Lake, indeed I contend we are in a worse position, than if we landed on American territory for the same purpose.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The hon. gentleman surely does not desire to put himself on record as contending that they can make any regulation inconsistent with the free navigation of the Stikine River, contrary to the very words of the treaty.

Mr. HAGGART. I do not say anything of the kind, and do not intend to. The hon. gentleman knows that I did not mean that. They may make their customs regulations so obnoxious, so onerous, or so troublesome, that I think it might be better, for the purpose of getting sooner into that country, for you to land your goods at once at a United States port and travel through American territory for the purpose of reaching your railroad.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We had better understand one another here, as this is rather important. The hon. gentleman concedes that we have by treaty a right to the free navigation, for all purposes of commerce, of the River Stikine, subject to such regulations as are necessary in that regard, but not subject to any regulations which are inconsistent with the free commercial navigation of the river. So that the free navigation of the river is absolutely secured to us by treaty, and no regulation inconsistent with it can be made.

Mr. HAGGART. Does the hon. gentleman not see the distinction? Does the hon. gentleman not see that a vessel going up from Victoria and which is incapable of navigating the river to the commencement of the railway, will be obliged to lighter or transfer her cargo into a lighter vessel, and is that one of the rights which you will have? Will you have the right in order to navigate the Stikine River, to transfer from a vessel to a lighter? Have you that right now? Then, if you cannot navigate by ocean steamer to the commencement of the road unless by lightering your cargo into another vessel, you can only do this by permission of the United States authorities, and they may absolutely refuse it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman is taking very serious international ground, and I am very sorry for it.

Mr. HAGGART. I only take the ground that the London "Times" takes in reference to this same matter. In an editorial concerning the building of this road, and pointing out the troublesome regulations that may be made for vessels passing through the Stikine River, the "Times" hopes that the Government of Canada have made arrangements with the United States authorities for the purpose of allowing them to go through their territory. The Minister of the Interior, in discussing this point the other evening, intimated that they could secure the right by negotiation. But negotiations may take four or five years, and he says they are going to build a road and negotiate afterwards. What a pretty position we would be in if we were obliged to negotiate after the road was built. Suppose the United States Government refused the privilege to lighter in that river, what a pretty position will we be in if we have to take four or five years to negotiate. Hon. gentlemen see the difficulty of the position, and they have been inventing expedients for the purpose of getting over it. They say an ocean steamer can transfer. Where? At Port Simpson. It can lighter there, and the smaller vessel can go up to Fort Wrangel, where there would be no necessity of lightering. I see by the papers that the contractors have an island somewhere in British territory, and they think they can get over the difficulty by lightering on this island. Now, any one acquainted with that country knows well that it is impossible for such vessels as can go up the Stikine River to navigate at all times of the year the waters between Port Simpson and Wrangel, through the Dixon Channel. Sometimes coasting vessels have to lay at Port Simpson six or seven days before they can pass through the Dixon Channel, they have to pass through sixty miles of this channel before they can reach the broad ocean of the Pacific. And this is the reason why the Government ask us to support a scheme on national grounds, namely, because it is an all-Canadian route that does not pass through American territory, because it is the only line of road between the 141st meridian and Portland Channel which would be available for the purposes of commerce. I do not know what view the American Government may take of it, I do not know whether they will admit our contention that these rivers should be open to the navigation of British subjects. But I know that the law officers of the Crown, unfortunately, hold a different opinion. The opinion of the law officers of the Crown, expressed by Lord Carnarvon, is that Fort Wrangel is in American territory, that the mouth of the Stikine is in American territory, and that you have no right, except for commercial purposes, to pass up that river, and that even though you had the right for commercial purposes, you have no right whatever to lighter a vessel. That has always been our contention in this country in reference to the St. Lawrence. We ask no more privileges from the Americans than those which we give them. Negotiations may be undertaken in consequence of which they may permit us to enjoy that right, but they will only do so if we give them reciprocal advantages, and it is only by treaty with them that we will be able to reach this road, or this tramway, for the construction of which we are giving away the immense heritage of the people. Now, the hon. gentleman, for the purpose of obtaining the support of his friends in the North-west Territories, tells them that this road is not only to be a benefit to the people of British Columbia, but is to be part of a main line of road that is to pass through the Peace River district for the purpose of making a general terminus at Port Simpson. This is not only to be a benefit to the people of British Columbia to enable them to get goods into the Yukon territory, but it is to be an immense advantage to the people of the North-west. The people of the North-west are naturally in favour of a direct route from Edmonton into that country, but they are to be pacified by obtaining connection with this line of road, so that they will have an ocean terminus at Port Simpson, where they can lay off at the Canadian end of the road and proceed by water on their journey up to Dawson City. What kind of a road are they going to get? They are going to get a road with 171 feet gradients, 30 degree curvature and three feet wide. Is that the kind of road that will satisfy the people of the North-west for the purpose of reaching the sea? Is this the kind of sop that the hon. gentleman expects will induce the people of the North-west to support his scheme? Now, in proposing this scheme, the hon. gentlemen have violated the doctrines they have always preached in this country, that is, that all public undertakings of this kind should be let by tender. They have violated that doctrine, and their plea is urgency. There was no urgency at all. The Minister had information already in his department, which was confirmed by the report of Mr. Jennings, in reference to this road. There was no urgency. Why did he not give to the people of this country an opportunity to tender for the building of this road. Why did the hon. gentleman not give other contractors an opportunity to tender, or why did he not employ Mr. Jennings, his own engineer, who went into that country and explored the different routes? Why, if it were necessary, was the Government not prepared to pay the full amount for the construction of the road, for the people are in favour of railway construction there?

Mr. HAGGART.

They would, indeed, much rather pay out money for the purpose of building that road than enter into any such bargain as hon. gentlemen opposite have made. Let the people on the coast and in the North-west understand that the people of Canada, almost to a man, are in favour of railway construction in the western country, that we are willing to go further than the Government in regard to this matter, that we are willing to incur the risk of the Yukon being a gold-mining country, and not gamble away this part of the people's heritage. We are willing, if necessary, and if we have not full rights on the Stikine River, or failed to get customs regulations satisfactory to us or bonding powers from the United States authorities for the purpose of building what would be a commercial road from Pyramid Harbour into that country, to extend the road to a British port, to Port Simpson, for the purpose of getting into that country. We are willing to vote the people's money for the purpose of building such a road and take the risk of undertaking its operation. But we are not willing to grant half the country, a gold-bearing country, to contractors, no matter how respectable they may be, and to give away the people's heritage for the purpose of building a road.

How would the Government enforce regulations for preventing miners from working on land which was assigned to Mackenzie & Mann? It would be impossible to do so. No country allows anything of that kind to be done. Look at what Australia did in regard to the building of a railway. There were some valuable mines discovered at Coolgardie, in Western Australia. The government advertised for offers for building a railway and the terms required. One firm asked a franchise to cover the use of the road for two or three years. This was given to them for a period of fifteen months. They built the road in six months, and the profits of operating it during the nine months were sufficient to cover their expenditure, and the people of Western Australia thus obtained a road to which the only subsidy given was a monopoly to a company for fifteen months, and, after it had been constructed and operated during that term, the country acquired possession of it for nothing. Did hon. members ever hear of a country where the government took from the people the right of free mining, placer mining, and locked up an immense tract of land? Such action was never done by any government on the face of the globe. The only exception in all the mines of the United States was when the Mexican Government gave to General Fremont 30,000 acres. He had a right to it by the treaty which conveyed California to the United States. He had a proprietary right over the land and minerals, but outside of that case no one can show that a single acre belonging to the United States Government was excluded from appropriation by any miner for mining purposes. This is a most extraordinary concession, and should not be granted to any company for the purpose of allowing them to carry out an undertaking of this kind. And such an undertaking! The Minister of the Interior, last night, said: Does not the blush of shame appear on the faces of Conservatives when they look at the map of the North-west, where 69,000,000 of acres, including those in Manitoba, have been reserved from poor settlers as subsidies to railway companies? It was evident, however, that his heart warmed to his fellow-citizens in the North-west and Manitoba when he thought of settlers being deprived of lands and of huge tracts being locked up in monopolies. What are the facts? The people were anxious and clamouring from one section to another to have railways built. The policy of the Government, and the policy of the Opposition, was to have railways constructed. What benefit have those land grants proved to the roads? Have the companies made fortunes out of them? No; but the hon. gentleman was having a slap at his leader, when he made this statement. His leader stated that only 28,000,000 of acres had been granted, and the total quantity that was under promise or might be earned by railway companies was 38,000,000. He was having a further slap at his leader, because the hon. gentleman belonged to a Government which, in 1874, placed on the Statute-book, for the purpose of constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway, an offer to the people of the world to come and build this railway in sections and the Government would give 20,000 acres per mile for construction. This puts me in mind of a speech which the leader of the Opposition delivered in Montreal at one time, after Mr. Blake had been addressing an audience there. The meeting addressed by the leader of the Opposition was held in the same hall, and a huge map, showing land grants in the North-west and Manitoba, used by Mr. Blake, hung on the wall. The leader of the Opposition pointed to the map and followed the terms of the statute and with his pen extended the boundaries to indicate those which Mr. Mackenzie and his Government intended to grant. They offered 50,000,000 acres of land for building the road. If hon. gentlemen opposite had been in power, there would not have been 28,000,000 acres granted, because they were prepared to grant 50,000,000 acres for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway alone. Yet the Minister of the Interior rises in his place and rebukes members of it who have been a long number of years here, who know all the circumstances of these transactions, who are well acquainted with the policy of the party opposite, who know they were prepared to offer 50,000,000 acres of land for the Canadian Pacific Railway, and who have offered and have granted $10,000 per mile, and, in the case of the Canada Central, $12,000 per mile, for railway construction. In regard to land grants in the North-west, it must be remembered that those were not grants of gold-bearing lands. If it was such an objectionable, such an infamous and monstrous act, for the Conservative party to do, why are hon. gentlemen opposite following in their footsteps, and why are they now prepared to grant 25,000 acres of gold-bearing lands per mile for the purpose of building a road in the Yukon country?

Let me now analyse the contract. I may be pardoned, as was the Minister of the Interior, for reading some provisions of the contract. The hon. gentleman was somewhat in error in regard to fixing the rates. Whoever saw a rate fixed in a railway charter? There is a by-law passed by the railway corporation and it is approved by the Governor in Council, but the Minister (Mr. Sifton) forgot to tell the House that the Governor in Council may the next day make a reduction of one-half or one-quarter, and so the Governor in Council have the sole control over the matter. But that is not so in this case. We want to know what rates are fixed by this contract, and we want to know that they are not inordinate rates. The people of the country should know what they are to pay on that line, and the rates should be embodied in the contract. There is to be a reduction of 25 per cent in four years and 25 per cent more at the end of seven years, but the rate on which the reduction is to be made is to be fixed by the Minister of the Interior, because he is the Minister of Railways in reference to this particular matter before the House. Did you notice the cheers which greeted the Minister of the Interior the other night, and did you notice the dumbfounded looks of hon. gentlemen opposite when the Minister of Railways was on his feet. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) evidently has not his heart in the work. He did not even sign the contract, but left it to the Minister of Inland Revenue, who was at the time acting Minister of Railways. The Minister of the Interior is the father of the scheme.

We protest against this monopoly clause in the contract and the Minister of the Interior tells us in reply that it is harmless. Well, if it is harmless, what is it there for. No one denies that the provincial authorities have a right to charter a railway in their province, but every one knows that they have no right to charter a railway which runs to the international boundary to connect with a foreign railway. This charter provides that the only railway which could enter into competition with this particular railway we are discussing shall not be built, and so the contract prohibits all opposition to this Mann-Mackenzie line, and gives it a complete monopoly. There is at present a charter granted by the provincial authorities from Glenora, but the provincial authorities have no right to grant a charter to any line making connection at the international boundary. I therefore say that this charter gives the Mann-Mackenzie line a complete monopoly. They have not only this immense quantity of land granted for building a road of the standard of the Kaslo-Slocan, but they have a monopoly for five years, and a safeguard from all competition from the Pacific Coast. It is true that a charter may be granted to a railway to enter the Yukon from the west, but as regards the Pacific Coast trade, no road can be chartered.

Now, with reference to some other particulars in connection with this contract. They have the land grant and they have the power of issuing bonds on it and on the undertaking to the extent of $10,000,000. Besides that, as I read the contract, they have the right of issuing bonds on each mile of the road which is constructed to the extent of $25,000, and if they do not issue bonds on the road to the extent of $25,000 per mile, the difference between the deficit and the $25,000 is added to the $10,000,000. There is the whole scheme laid bare. They have not to expend any money for the purpose of building boats for connection with Fort Wrangel, or from Teslin Lake to Dawson City. They may make arrangements with any parties for the building of these boats, or they may hire these boats, or they may give other parties a share of the earnings of these boats, without trespassing at all upon their capital. They can issue bonds enough for the purpose of building the road on the road itself, and they can issue on the undertaking $10,000,000, plus the difference between the bonds which they issue for the building of the railway and the $25,000 per mile. The Bill says:

8. The capital stock of the company shall be ten millions of dollars, divided into shares of one hundred dollars each: Provided, however, that if the directors by by-law limit the issue of securities under section 17 hereof to a sum less than $25,000 per mile for the line of railway between the Stikine River and Teslin Lake, the said capital stock may by such by-law be increased by an amount not greater than the difference between $25,000 per mile of the said line and the sum so limited for the said issue.

Again, clause 17 provides:

17. The company may, pursuant to section 93 of the Railway Act, issue bonds, debentures, debenture stock and other securities to an amount not exceeding in all $25,000 per mile of its lines of railway and extensions and branch and other lines, but such securities shall be issued only in proportion to the length of railway constructed or under contract to be constructed; such securities may be issued from time to time separately with respect to any one or more specified lines of railway, extensions, branches or other lines, or as to all combined; and any franchise, undertaking, tolls, income, rents, revenues, real or personal property excepted by special or general reference from the mortgages, which the company is hereby authorized to give under section 94 of the Railway Act, securing such bonds, debenture, debenture stock or other securities, shall be also accepted out of the preferential claims, and charge created by section 95 of the said Act.

There is another clause which allows the contractors to make arrangements with any person or company for the purpose of building boats to connect with this line of railway, and the contractors are not obliged to lay out one copper of their capital in that connection. It is evident from the whole proceeding that these gentlemen who have got the contract are in for a big arrangement. They have the right to build the road upon the security of the road itself. They have the right of issuing bonds up to $25,000 a mile, but they can issue $10,000,000 bonds upon the lands which they receive for the purpose of building this road. I have heard it argued both ways by hon. gentlemen opposite. One of them stated, and my leader took the same ground, that for every pound of gold taken out of the country a pound would be expended.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. HAGGART. I understood the hon. gentleman to say something of that kind.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What I said was this. I spoke of what was shown by the history of gold mining in the world, without any reference to this contract at all. I was speaking in reference to the position of the individual miners in that country, and I said that it must not be forgotten that the history of the world showed that for every pound of gold produced, a pound had been expended to get it. That was my statement. It was a statement which I did not offer an opinion upon; it is an historical statement. But to say that it would cost Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie a pound for every pound of gold they took out is an entirely different story. I said nothing of that kind.

Mr. HAGGART. Then I was mistaken in regard to the hon. gentleman. Perhaps it was the hon. Minister of the Interior, who made the statement that for every pound of gold taken out of the country it would probably cost a pound of gold to take it out. Why are we going to all this trouble and expense in building this railway and opening up that country, if no money is to come out of the country? But we expect that money will come out of these gold mines; we expect that there will be a large surplus over the expense. That is the reason we are entering into the undertaking. That is the only justification for it. That would be the only justification which the Government of the country could have for entering into enterprises for the purpose of bringing people and provisions into the country. If nothing is to be made out of the country, and if it is to cost as much to take a pound of gold out as the pound of gold is worth after you get it, I do not understand the reason for undertaking it at all.

These are some of my reasons for opposing this Bill. I oppose it because, if this is to be a commercial road, the route selected from the Stikine River is not the best possible route. I think the Government should have taken into consideration the question of extending the road into undisputed British territory, so that it would be in every respect an all-Canadian line. I think that the risk, the gambling, of the undertaking, should not be left to private individuals at all. We have reports upon that country; the Government are fully informed in regard to it. The Minister of the Interior quoted the opinion of Mr. Ogilvie as to the probable yield of gold in the different creeks. If my memory serves me rightly—I perhaps exaggerate the figures, because I had some difficulty in hearing him—he said that Mr. Ogilvie estimated that a couple of creeks, at a moderate estimate, would yield $60,000,000, and that other creeks might possibly produce $100,000,000. It is because of these reports that we are asked to enter into this undertaking. The Government should have come down here and asked Parliament for a sum of money for the purpose of building that road, and they should have retained the gold lands of the country for the people of the country—for the honest miners, who, without much capital, can work the mines for the benefit of themselves and their families. That chance ought not to be given to the millionaires or sold in foreign countries; and, by the by, I have heard it reported that licenses have been issued for dredging gold in the rivers of that country, for which up to yesterday the Government have received $72,000; that large tracts of land or long stretches of rivers, ten, fifteen, twenty or thirty miles in extent, have been granted to dredging companies; that the right of dredging for gold in that country has been openly hawked about in the streets of Ottawa, and offered to foreign corporations; that speculations are being made out of dredging licenses which were obtained from the Government within the last two or three days. I oppose this Bill because it gives a monopoly of 5,000 odd square miles of that country to private individuals. I say it ought to be open to every poor man in this country to take up mining claims. The statement of my leader was correct, that not only will these men have half the gold mines in the country, but by their right of selection they will virtually have very near the whole of them. They can place a base line so that the cross line will run along the line of a creek, and they can add three three-mile sections to their odd-numbered section on each side of the base line, and in that way get possession of every creek in the country. Divide the 5,000 odd miles by the number of miles in the different tracts they are allowed to lay out, and you will find that they have the right of selection in eighty different localities in the country. The Minister of the Interior says that the breadth of the streams is only three hundred feet, and the length three or four or perhaps five miles; and these men have the right of taking up twenty-four miles along every stream. They can locate their land so as to do so, and this will give them the virtual control of the whole placer mining of the country. The hon. Minister says that a prospector can go into that country and locate a claim, and that these people cannot interfere with him. But the poor fellow who goes into the country to locate a claim for placer mining can only do so to the extent of an acre or an acre and a half; and when he goes to the registry office to register his claim, what is to prevent these people who have this contract, having a person at the registry office to watch every claim that is registered, and then sending their officer to the place for the purpose of locating it for themselves? If they find that twenty or thirty or fifty acres have been taken up, this does not diminish their claim at all, because, under the provisions of the contract, they can not only cover the particular locality, but these twenty or thirty or fifty acres can be added to their claim.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman does not believe a word of that, because he knows that five miners can register on the spot.

Mr. HAGGART. I have not seen the regulations in reference to that.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They have been published and distributed for a long time.

Mr. HAGGART. Suppose they do register on the spot; suppose there are a dozen or twenty miners, and suppose that every miner locates twenty or thirty acres. They will not be taking up every claim along a river. How can they register on the spot? Are there four or five hundred registry offices throughout the country? or, is there a sort of miners' meeting, as in the Australian colonies, in which the miners have a council?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). Yes.

Mr. HAGGART. I am glad to find out that in that particular the Government have followed the Australian mining laws. If they follow the Australian mining law further, they will find that all regulations with regard to mining and with regard to how much they can take out and all disputes should be decided by the miners themselves with the right of appeal to a certain court or perhaps to the legislature. The people of the country, I contend are the rightful owners of the country. If 150,000 or 200,000 miners go out to that country, they have the right to the ownership of the soil and everything else. They are not to be debarred from working on the alternate claims because the Government, for the purpose of building a little tramway road, which will be of hardly any use for getting in or out of the country, have chosen to deprive them of the heritage that should be theirs. I object to the scheme on this and other grounds. I say there is no justification for it. I say it is an improvident bargain.

Supposing Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann do not finish this road by the first of September next, will they not still retain their charter? Is the $250,000 mentioned in the contract liquidated damages? We have the statement of the Minister of the Interior that we have the personal liability besides of the contractors. I say, Mr. Speaker, we have no such thing. The hon. gentleman is a lawyer, and he knows that, under the contract, the utmost amount of damages we can claim for non-fulfilment is $250,000. And these damages are not even liquidated damages, so that we could only get out of that $250,000 the amount we could prove the Government had lost by the default on the part of the contractors. The Government do not cancel the charter if the contractors fail to finish the road in the time provided. There is no such provision. The contractors own the road, and they need not build it by the first September. They may build it only five years later, and the utmost forfeiture they can be called on to pay—and, as I said, that is not liquidated damages—will be $250,000.

This whole contract, from beginning to end, seems to have been forced on the Government by some one who had hypnotized it or had complete control over it, and who consequently made the contract most favourable to himself in the expectation that the devoted followers of the Government would give it in the end their support. The contractors took all they possibly could in their arrangement with the Government, relying on the force behind the Government for the carrying out of the scheme. I predicted, when I first read over the contract, that no such bargain would ever be passed by the Parliament of Canada. I stated that any man who would support such an infamous scheme would be called strictly to account by his constituents. I believe that no greater error ever was committed by hon. gentlemen opposite. I am amazed that such a foolish arrangement could have been even contemplated by gentlemen with the intelligence and experience of those leading the Government. I enter my protest against the whole thing. I believe that the people, when they thoroughly understand its true inwardness, will have none of it. I do not believe that the Parliament of Canada will ever pass such an outrageous measure, but will object to the scheme in toto. I shall have the opportunity, when this Bill is in committee, of discussing its different details, because I am unable at present to give a thorough examination to the report of Mr. Jennings without the map which is attached to it, and there are other papers which I have in my possession which I propose to discuss. I shall therefore reserve further remarks until the other stages of the Bill.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). The hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Haggart) made allusion, Mr. Speaker, to a number of small points, and to these I propose to address myself a few minutes before entering into the discussion of the main question. I would, in the first place, take up the point which the hon. gentleman attempted to make, almost at the end of his speech, when he spoke about the monopoly of gold-bearing lands. The hon. gentleman said that free miners were going to be entirely excluded from the opportunity of registering their claims, because Mann & Mackenzie would have agents at the different registry offices to intercept and anticipate them. But my hon. colleague (Mr. Sifton) set the hon. gentleman right on that point by informing him that here, as in Australia, free miners, when they have struck a rich lode or claim, can register their claims on the spot just as soon as there are five of them to hold a miner's meeting. The hon. gentleman evidently had not read the regulations in this discussion. His argument fell entirely to the ground when he was informed that we had, in that respect at all events, followed the Australian regulations, and that free miners need not register in Dawson City or headquarters, but without going to the gold commissioner and without allowing Mann & Mackenzie or any of their prospectors to know anything about the strike they had made, can themselves register their claims, and these would be held inviolate against the allotments under this contract.

The hon. gentleman made much ado about the people of this country being the rightful owners of the land and about this Government having taken those lands out of the hands of the people of Canada. He spoke of the miners up there as though they were the whole people of Canada. He spoke about the thousands who are going this coming season into the Yukon territory. But the great majority of them—probably 99 out of 100 are at present—will be foreigners, not Canadians at all—men who will never dream of registering as Canadian citizens. The hon. gentleman and his colleagues in the House, yesterday and the day before, told us that the Americans were swarming in there and that the American people were going to throw obstacles in our way of governing the country. Well, it is on behalf of these very same men that the hon. gentleman comes here and pleads against the rest of the people—the five million Canadians who live in the eastern part of Canada, and who, I venture to say, have some interest in that far off territory, and some right to reap profit out of the treasure found there.

The hon. gentleman spoke also very strongly indeed, not only of the amount of land which the contractors are going to receive under this contract, but also of their getting it immediately. The hon. member does not seem to have noticed that, according to the contract, the contractors, or the company who takes the place of the contractors, could get no title to their lands, no fee simple to the property until the road is finished and has been accepted by the Government engineer.

Mr. HAGGART. Is not the hon. gentleman mistaken? I thought they got it as they completed each ten-mile section.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That shows that the hon. gentleman has not read the provisions of the contract. If the hon. member will allow me a moment, I will explain the matter to him, and, if necessary, I will read these features of the contract. The contract provides as follows:—

11. In aid of the construction of said line of railway from Stikine River to Teslin Lake the Government shall grant to the contractors for each mile of said railway twenty-five thousand acres of land to be selected as hereinafter mentioned from the Yukon provisional district and from that part of the North-west Territories of Canada lying west of the Mackenzie River and Liard River and north of the 60th parallel of latitude, such land—

And I beg the hon. gentleman to mark these words:

—to become vested in the contractors upon the said railway being completed and accepted as complete by the Government, and upon the said land being selected as hereinafter set forth.

Mr. HAGGART. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to read him a clause? Section 18 says:

18. So soon as any ten continuous miles of said railway between Stikine River and Teslin Lake have been completed and in running order, and certified so to be by an officer named by the Minister of Railways in that behalf, the contractors may select ninety-two thousand one hundred and sixty acres.

And this land is reserved from sale. The hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) has not read that clause evidently.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. member does not seem to be able to appreciate the difference between the selection of land and getting the fee simple.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. But it is reserved from sale. Nobody else can touch it.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. If I may be allowed, I should like to point out that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) was contending, first, that this land was to be taken possession of by the company and everybody else shut out, and second, that this land would belong to the company, and even if they did not complete the road they would have still the possession of the land, and thus we had no security for the completion of the road but $250,000 deposited. The hon. member knows perfectly well, although they might select the land they would not own it. And let me call the hon. gentleman's attention to this—that they are allowed to select only 92,000 acres for every ten miles out of the 250,000 acres for each ten miles of the road to which they will be entitled when the road is completed. That is to say, they are allowed to select about two-fifths of their land grant only until the road is finished. So that when the hon. gentleman speaks of the country being locked up and miners kept out of it, he is wrong to the extent of three-fifths of his whole calculation. And, as I am reminded—a point I made a few moments ago, but which I had better reiterate here so that there may be no misconception on the part of the House—although the contractors are allowed, when they have completed ten miles, to select 92,000 acres of the land they cannot and do not get any title to that land until the whole road is completed and accepted by the Government.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. But they shut out every miner from that 92,000 acres.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. They do to that extent. But what advantage is that to them until they have finished their road? How can they get their money out of this land? Does the hon. member suppose that Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann are going to mine in that country the same way that free miners or placer miners do? The only way they will be likely to get their return for the risk they are taking and the outlay of capital that they are obliged to make is by disposing of their lands to companies and others who wish to work that land for gold; and they cannot dispose of it until they get a fee simple title. It would be too risky for them to undertake—even if they were disposed to do so—to invest large amounts of capital upon that land until they have a free and absolute title to the land, nor will anybody buy until they have that title to transfer. They may give options to those who will agree to purchase when they get a title, but nobody will take possession of the land and accept it from the company until the company is in a position to give a title which is absolute, and they cannot get that title until the road is completed to the satisfaction of the Government.

There are one or two other things which the hon. member has adverted to which I desire to touch upon briefly. I was struck with the remark he made in opening his speech when he referred to my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair). It is true that the hon. Minister of Railways did the other night, attribute a remark made by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) to the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart). I do not know that it matters very much which of these hon. gentlemen, friends, neighbours and acquaintances as they are, working together as they do under all circumstances, made this remark. But the remark, whoever made it, attributed to the ex-Minister of Railways words he was able to show clearly he had not used. But the ex-Minister of Railways to-day made a serious reflection upon his friend from West York in saying that he, at all events, would not think of making such a foolish remark. I leave it these two hon. gentlemen to decide between themselves as to the foolishness of this remark and the mistake which was made.

Mr. WALLACE. What was the remark ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I will read it for the benefit of the hon. member for West York as it appears in the report of his speech in "Hansard." The hon. member for West York was alluding to the contract for the all-Canadian route, and contended that the route by Wrangel was not an all-Canadian route in the true sense of the term. He said :

Their own people say that with regard to this contract. The Minister of Railways himself says the goods must be transhipped, and when transhipped, must pay duty.

That is what the hon. member for West York said, which the Minister of Railways incorrectly attributed to the ex-Minister of Railways. Now, there is one other point that I would like to allude to in regard to the remarks of the ex-Minister of Railways, and I regret extremely to have to comment unfavourably on the statement of a gentleman who has held office in this country, and who occupies his high position in this House ; I wish to refer to his remarks with regard to our relations with the United States. The Government of the United States, the Cabinet of the United States, have certainly dealt with the Government of Canada in matters connected with this Yukon territory in the most friendly and considerate spirit. We have had negotiations with them, it is true. The Minister of the Interior went down to Washington, as he explained, at the request of a member of the Washington Cabinet, to discuss the necessary regulations, and those regulations have been amended in view of the information which was given to the Cabinet at Washington by the Minister of the Interior. I regret to find that the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat seems disposed to attribute to the Government of the United States, and to the people of that country at large, a certain spirit which is indicated, perhaps, to some extent, in the action of individual members of Congress, who have introduced Bills into that body, and which, interpreted in a narrow spirit, interpreted in a hostile spirit, interpreted as a desire to strike at our trade and to create unfriendly feeling between our neighbours and ourselves, might contribute to that result. But at the same time, I fancy that most of those Bills, if they are carefully examined, will really be found to contain only conditions and legislation which are perfectly legitimate on the part of the Congress of the United States, and which, if interpreted in the spirit which we have found to actuate the present Cabinet of the United States, will not interpose undue restrictions upon the carriage of Canadian goods into our territory through either the Stikine or the other route. As I said before, I regret that the ex-Minister should in this way confuse the responsibility of the Government of the United States with that of certain members of Congress who have introduced these Bills. But at the same time, the hon. gentleman showed that he really did not believe in that view of the question when he dealt with the advantages of the Lynn Canal route as opposed to those of the Stikine-Teslin Lake route. The hon. gentleman said he was quite ready to take the risk of being stopped from going through the territory which is now in the hands of the American people, because he is ready to adopt a route through the Lynn Canal into the Yukon district instead of going round by the Stikine River and Teslin Lake. The hon. gentleman was apparently quite ready to accept the delay, and enter into negotiations with the United States for reciprocal arrangements by which we would be able to get the full advantage of the Lynn Canal routes, one or the other of them. As he described them, I understood him to mean the Chilkat route over the Dalton trail into the Yukon territory, although in another part of his speech he professed to believe in a hostile feeling on the part of the United States against us. Certainly if he was sincere in his latter statement, sincere in his fear of what the United States might do in consequence of their feeling against us, he was placing himself in a very extraordinary position, when he assumed that by reciprocal arrangements we will be able to come to an agreement with the United States Government by which we may take our goods through the Lynn Canal and over the territory which they now hold and occupy, into the Yukon country. Would the hon. gentleman like to wait to enable us to get a railway into the Yukon territory until such reciprocal arrangements are made ? Would the hon. gentleman undertake to say that such an arrangement could be made with what he believes himself to be a hos-

Mr. FISHER.

the people, with a Government, as he professes to believe, which is inimical to Canadian trade? Would he like to wait until those negotiations have been carried through before proceeding with the railway? Does he not know well the history of previous negotiations? Is he not aware that international negotiations of this kind require a long time, and that the result is always doubtful until the very end? Under these circumstances, the contention he made in regard to the Lynn Canal routes is quite untenable, and I would strongly advise him to agree with the leader of the Opposition in his emphatic declaration, made on the floor of Parliament as well as elsewhere, that the Stikine-Teslin route is the only available one for carrying on Canadian trade with the Yukon. However, I am not at all surprised to find that the ex-Minister of Railways does not agree with the leader of the Opposition. We are accustomed to hear very different opinions expressed by members of the Opposition in this House; we are quite accustomed to find that one expresses one opinion and another immediately afterwards expresses a diametrically opposite opinion; nay, more, we find that some members of the Opposition express one opinion one time and another opinion two days afterwards, so that we can hardly expect that each and all the members of the Opposition will express the same opinion on a question even of this magnitude. Still, I would advise the ex-Minister of Railways, now being shown to have taken a position entirely untenable to accept the opinion of the leader of the Opposition, which is absolutely tenable, and which is the position the Government is taking in this contract.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). Mr. Speaker, before you left the Chair this evening I had, I think, taken up the two main points which the hon. ex-Minister of Railways had brought against this contract, and if I might be permitted, before proceeding to touch with other branches, I would just direct the attention of the House to these two points. The first which he emphasized was this, that the railway company would be able to obtain possession of a very large area of gold-bearing land and shut out from all that land the free miner. That was effectively disposed of when the hon. gentleman himself proved that his argument was based on a false premise; when he appreciated and understood that he had misread, if he had read at all, the contract, and he accepted the fact, which is an indubitable fact, that until the railway company or organization have absolutely completed their whole railway and that railway has been accepted by the Government engineers, the company do not obtain title to one single acre of that land. By that the hon. gentleman's contention falls entirely and absolutely to the ground. The next point which I dealt with before six o'clock was the hon. gentleman's contention that we had no guarantee or security for the completion of the railway, that the contractors or company to take their place might go in and build as much of the railway as they saw fit, and the most we could call from them would be the forfeiture of their deposit of a quarter of a million of dollars. The forfeiture of a quarter of a million of dollars is no light thing for ordinary individuals in this country or elsewhere, and I should like to draw the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that while that clause is in this contract, it was not in contracts made by the hon. gentleman's colleagues on the other side of the House. I proved that that was in no sense the only guarantee we had for the completion of the railway by the same fact that I have just quoted, namely, that until the railway is completed the contractors or company who may acquire the contract obtain no title to their lands until the completion of the railway, and we thereby have the most absolute and entire security for the completion of the road. Until the railway is completed the contractors or company cannot sell one single acre of their land. They have no security if they themselves make investments in that land for its working, and, therefore, it is impossible for them to deal with or handle any portion of that land grant until they have completed the railway. I wanted to emphasize these two points, because I thought they were the essentials of the argument of the hon. gentleman, so much as I could make out his argument.

Before proceeding, there is one other point to which I wish to allude. I notice in the "Journal" this evening a statement, which is not a statement of fact, and which I was surprised to see in the "Journal," because it is generally well informed on public questions and is generally disposed to take a fair view of public questions. It appears on the editorial page and is headed: "The Kersey Offer." It says:

It appears that H. Maitland Kersey, on behalf of a syndicate, offered to build the Stikine-Teslin Railway for $6,000 a mile cash bonus, or taking the distance at 165 miles, a total of $990,000.

That is not a fair or an accurate statement of Mr. Maitland Kersey's offer. I have Mr. Maitland Kersey's offer under my hand; it has been on the Table of the House for some days, open to the inspection of the Press Gallery and anybody. As a matter of fact Mr. Maitland Kersey did not offer to build the Stikine-Teslin Railway for $6,000 per mile. In the first place, the offer was for a road over the Chilkat Pass. The offer says :

The syndicate, however, is prepared to undertaken the construction of a wagon road, to be followed by a railway if required, and to devise all possible means of transportation for the requirements of miners and others who will be anxious to reach this country in the spring.

It is understood that the Government of the Dominion and British Columbia will both assist in this development.

It is proposed, therefore, that the Dominion Government should be asked to give the sum of $1,000 per mile towards the construction of a wagon road and not less than $6,000 per mile towards the construction of a railroad, presupposing that the Government of British Columbia will further assist in the work.

The syndicate has made direct proposals to the Government of British Columbia.

- This shows as a matter of fact that this offer, if it can be called an offer, was made presupposing that the British Columbia Government would assist them. More than that. We have the after fact, that this offer was withdrawn by Mr. Maitland Kersey when he had communicated with his principals in England, because they were not prepared to make an offer at all—an offer at all, let me point out, which was contingent on the construction of the road before 1st September. When that offer by Mr. Kersey was made, the offer quoted by the "Journal" to-night and the offer which I hold in my hand, there was nothing in it stipulating as to the time when the railway should be built; on the contrary, there is distinct evidence in the offer that Mr. Kersey had no expectation of building the railway during the year 1898. Having put this matter right, I should like now to proceed to address myself to the main part of my argument.

First, I would refer again to another, and I think unfortunate statement which the ex-Minister of Railways made to the House. It was to the effect that it was impossible for the Government of Canada to enforce law and order in the Yukon territory; it was to the effect that if we were to give alternate sections to this railway company we would not be able to prevent free miners on the adjoining Government sections by force going on and working the lands of the railway company. The hon. gentleman has not read the whole of the regulations regarding mining in the Yukon territories; but in those regulations which—and they are entirely apart and independent of this contract—the Government have issued for mining in the Yukon territory, there are reserved to the Government certain claims, alternate lots of ten claims, and yet the hon. gentleman deliberately stated what can fairly be taken by the people, if the statement should ever be reported to the miners of the territory, as a distinct invitation from an hon. gentleman occupying a prominent position in Parliament, that lawlessness and disregard for law may be exercised and may exist in our territory. Sir, it is most unfortunate; it is a direct slap, not at the individuals or personnel of the Government, but against the constitutional government of the country to declare here that it is impossible for the Government to maintain law and order within the borders of our Dominion. I am glad and proud to be able to say for my country that if that condition should ever occur, it would be the first time the Government has been defied with impunity, or that they have not been able to maintain law and order even in the furthest sections of this country. The broad question I think resolves itself into this, as regards the contract—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Before the hon. gentleman proceeds, will he be kind enough to indicate the clause on which he relies, that the contractors' deposit will be forfeited if the road is not built on 1st September next.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I rely on the fact that the deposit is made for the purpose of fulfilling the contract, which requires that the road shall be built within that time, and there is a distinct clause stating that until the road is built and accepted by the Government engineers the company shall not have any title to the lands.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I understand the hon. gentleman's argument, but it is clause 10 he refers to. Is there any other clause he relies on?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have not looked over the contract particularly as to that. I contend that this contract is based upon two broad principles, which, I believe, will commend themselves to the House, to Parliament, and to the country. The first is: that we should have an all-Canadian route into that territory; and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) has dealt at considerable length with the possibilities, and I might say also, the advantages of the route known as the Chilkat route, commencing at Pyramid Harbour. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) laboured a good deal to prove that the international complications in connection with that route were of no consequence, or were not likely to arise, and that, even if they were to arise, Canada would have an absolutely strong case in regard to them. Well, I prefer to take the opinion of the hon. gentleman's leader (Sir Charles Tupper), who has distinctly laid down the proposition, that this Teslin-Stikine route is the route which is in the interests of the country, as well as the only one immediately available. Not being a lawyer, and not being versed in legal lore, I shall not undertake to deal with intricate points of international law. I much prefer to leave that to those who have been trained in that profession, and I must confess that the attempt of the hon.

gentleman (Mr. Haggart) to elucidate these intricate points was not of such a nature as to tempt me to try it. It is better for men not trained in the law to leave the consideration of matters of this kind to those whose province it is to deal with them. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) said, that if reciprocal arrangements could be made, the route through the Chilkat Pass, starting from territory which is now in the possession of the United States—although we Canadians pretend and affirm that it is properly our territory—if reciprocal arrangements could be made, he says, that route would be equally available with the route now proposed. Let me ask: Would the hon. gentleman wait until such arrangements could be made? Is he prepared to say that there is no urgency for the construction of a railway into the Yukon territory? Is he prepared to say that, even should there be no international complications, the route through the Chilkat Pass could be made available for the inrush of the miners who are going to the Yukon early this season, could be available for the transport of the supplies necessary for these miners, and could be available to provide against the possible—indeed, I might say, certain—starvation which would exist almost universally in that country next fall and next winter, if no railway connection is immediately established? Is the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) prepared to say that there is no urgency for these things to be guarded against, and is he prepared to wait until we could make reciprocal arrangements with the United States, so as to insure the carriage of our goods across the Chilkat Pass? I know very well that the hon. gentleman is not prepared to do anything of the kind. I know very well that, if he personally wished to make such a motion in this House, very few, if any, of his political friends would follow him. I know that these gentlemen on the other side of the House would prefer to follow the leader of the Opposition, who has distinctly and emphatically declared his dissent from the proposition of the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart).

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) spoke about the urgency of this railroad contract. I will not go into details, with which my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior dealt so ably last night, but I do wish to speak for a few moments on a point which has not before been alluded to. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) contended that the hon. the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) was in full possession of all the necessary knowledge about the Hootalingua River, as well as about the Stikine River, to have entered into a contract for the building of the railroad much earlier in the season than the contract was actually made. To prove this, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) quoted Dr. Dawson as having given in his report, in the year 1887-88, all the information that is necessary to show that there was good navigation on the Hootalingua River from the head of Teslin Lake down to Dawson City. The hon. gentleman left it to be supposed that, upon that evidence contained in Dr. Dawson's report, if he (Mr. Haggart) were Minister of Railways, he would have been prepared to have entered into a contract to construct this Teslin-Stikine Railway, and would have risked, on that information, all that is involved in the completion of this contract and the pledging of this country to the construction of that chain of communication between the Pacific Ocean and Dawson City. Now, what is the information given in the report of Dr. Dawson? It is simply hearsay information—absolutely hearsay information. Dr. Dawson did not go up or down the Hootalingua River, and Dr. Dawson was not on Teslin Lake. Dr. Dawson, it is true, passed the mouth of the Hootalingua River on the Lewes River, and he made a stop there for a couple of days for the purpose of measuring the volume of water that came down the Hootalingua River and comparing it with the volume of water that came down the Lewes River at the junction. During the few days that Dr. Dawson was there, he conversed with some miners who had travelled somewhat on the Hootalingua River, and these miners gave the information, that they believed the Hootalingua River was as good for navigation purposes as the Lewes, and they did not think there was any interruption between Teslin Lake and the junction of the Hootalingua and Lewes rivers. Will the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) undertake to say that, if he had been in office, he would have undertaken the construction of this road and the giving of this contract on such evidence as that? Well, judging from the reckless way in which the hon. member (Mr. Haggart) spoke the other day about his information as to the Kaslo-Slocan Railway, and judging from the way in which he spoke about this contract to-night, when it was shown that he had not even read the contract or did not understand its terms, if he did read it—judging from this, it is possible the hon. gentleman would have done that, but it is not the office of a business Government, and certainly it is not the office of this Government, to make a contract of such importance as this on mere hearsay evidence.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question for information? I understood the Minister of the Interior to refer to Mr. St. Cyr's report as the one upon which the statement is made that Teslin Lake and the Hootalingua River are navigable for these river steamers. May I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher), at this stage of his argument, if that is the only report on which the Government make the statement that these waters are navigable?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. the Minister of the Interior informs me, that, except the information from Dr. Dawson and reports of an entirely and absolutely unofficial or unauthenticated nature, there were no reports until Mr. St. Cyr brought down his report and it was in the Minister's hand. Therefore, the delay which was complained of in regard to taking steps to enter into this contract, was a delay which was unavoidable, unless we had been prepared to do what the ex-Minister of Railways seems to think we would have been justified in doing, and which he probably would have done, had he an opportunity of doing so.

There was one other thing the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals referred to. He said he understood that there was an American report upon the Hootalinqua River. As a matter of fact, no American engineer has ever examined the Hootalinqua River. There was, I understand, in one of the documents at Washington, a report of some American gentleman who had been in that country. But would the hon. gentleman undertake to say that we were to go to the unofficial information contained in American reports, and base upon that a contract entered into by the Government of Canada? Would the hon. gentleman, who has such an opinion of the American nation and the American people and the American congressmen as he expressed here to-night, and as his friends around him have frequently expressed, undertake to base the letting of a contract like this upon American unofficial reports which he had no opportunity of gauging the value of? The hon. gentleman, when he comes to think of it, must realize that until the Minister of the Interior had the report of his own official, he was not in a position to go on and enter upon a contract for the building of that railway.

There is just one other matter I would like to speak about—the question of international complications. I do not wish to touch upon it from the legal standpoint, but from the practical, common-sense standpoint. In the first place, I do not suppose for a moment that the American Government is capable of undertaking to destroy the effect of an international treaty by customs regulations. I do not acknowledge for one moment the possibility that men in the position of Cabinet Ministers of the United States, men who are the responsible heads of a great Christian country, are going to take that ground or attempt to do so. But, Sir, supposing for a moment that they do; supposing for a moment that there are difficulties raised at Wrangel, we have in our own hands the means of overcoming those difficulties. We have, a few miles south of Fort Wrangel, Fort Simpson, where if necessary we can tranship into lighters, and tow those lighters from Fort Simpson up the Stikine River, and I believe there is another feasible proposition, which is that such lighters can be constructed somewhat after the form of the whaleback vessels which are used on the great lakes, so that a string of these lighters could be towed from Victoria or Vancouver all the way up the inside channels without any transshipment or stoppage, or anything more than entering the first American port they would come to—Fort Wrangel. The hon. gentleman shakes his head, and says it is impossible. But that is a proposition which I have discussed with some practical men. They say it is perfectly feasible, and I would not be at all surprised to find that before this railway is far proceeded with the materials for its construction will be carried up to Glenora in the way I have pointed out.

Mr. PRIOR. If the hon. gentleman means to intimate that I shook my head, I did not shake my head.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I suppose then that it was at what an hon. gentleman beside him was saying, and not at me. I say we first lay down the broad principle that this had to be an all-Canadian route. I have just tried to show that it is an all-Canadian route, and that even if complications and difficulties which we have no reason to anticipate should arise at Fort Wrangel, those difficulties could be overcome. If by any reason we found that the Stikine River during its open season could not carry the necessary freight and afford the necessary facilities for passenger traffic into that country, we have provided in this contract for the continuation of the railway southward to Portland Canal, where we have a Canadian ocean port open all the year round.

Mr. PRIOR. Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Some gentlemen understood him to say that lighters and barges could be towed from Victoria or Vancouver to Glenora; or did he say, as I understood him, that they could be towed as far as Wrangel, and then transhipped?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The first explanation the hon. gentleman gave was the correct one.

Mr. PRIOR. Then I do shake my head.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. What I say is this, that it is quite possible for barges or lighters constructed somewhat after the plan of the whalebacks that are used on the great lakes, though smaller in size and capacity, with a light draft and a large freight-carrying capacity, to be loaded at Vancouver or at Victoria and taken in tow of an ocean steamer to the mouth of the Stikine River, and afterwards by a river steamer up the Stikine River to Glenora or Telegraph Creek.

Mr. PRIOR. I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I do not think there is any vessel which it would be safe to tow all the year round from Vancouver or Victoria, of such a draft that it could go up the Stikine River. It has to pass the Dixon Entrance, which is generally rough, receiving the whole sweep of the Pacific Ocean.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman has given away his whole case, because he says he does not think barges could be constructed to go up the Stikine River all the year round.

Mr. PRIOR. I did not say that.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I know the hon. gentleman did not say that, but he said something the legitimate conclusion of which was that, if what he said was true. The hon. gentleman said that it was impossible that such barges could be constructed that they could be taken up the channel, inside the Prince of Wales Island and the other islands along the coast. But this arrangement is not one for the winter or stormy season. It is one for the summer season when navigation on the Stikine River is possible, and it is only when the navigation on the Stikine River is possible that such an arrangement would apply.

Mr. PRIOR. If the hon. gentleman will pardon me, there is not inland navigation all the way from Vancouver or Victoria to Wrangel. You have to pass the Dixon Entrance, which is twenty-four or twenty-five miles wide, and very rough and dangerous to navigation. What I say is that no vessels could be built with little enough draft to go up the Stikine River, and yet fit to pass the Dixon Entrance.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman has been at Fort Wrangel or not.

Mr. PRIOR. Yes, twenty-five years ago.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. But I am just as well acquainted with the islands there as any one else who has the means of studying the geography of the country by the maps. I pointed out that this had been done on the great lakes, Superior and Michigan, for years, and while such large barges as are used there could not be navigated on the Stikine River, still the same principle could be applied. An hon. gentleman beside me has put this memorandum into my hand, stating that the tug "Lorne" towed a barge the other day from Victoria to Wrangel.

Mr. PRIOR. Yes, I know that.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman then acknowledges that what I have outlined is possible.

Mr. PRIOR. Sometimes they can when it is fine weather, but they often have to lay off six or seven days waiting for fine weather.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It depends on the season of the year. However, my hon. friend will have an opportunity of discussing this when his turn comes to speak, and if he will allow me, I will now go on with my argument. I have laid down the proposition that this is really an all-Canadian route, and that such was one of the main objects the Government had in view on entering into this contract. Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, Mr. Kersey and others, who made offers, all offered to build roads from the Lynn Canal, but the Government would not listen to any such offer. The Government insisted that the route should be an all-Canadian one. Do hon. gentlemen take ground against that? Are they prepared to come forward and say that they would support a route which is not an all-Canadian route. If they are not, let them admit that the whole House is unanimous upon this point, that the route, in order to be satisfactory to the people of Canada, must be an all-Canadian route. If they are not prepared to take that ground, if they wish to take issue with us on this point, I challenge them now to declare to the country that the Conservative party is prepared to favour a contract for a road whose terminus would be in American territory.

There is one other main proposition which we laid down and adhered to. That was that we would give no money subsidy for this railroad. The hon. gentleman who preceded me (Mr. Haggart) said that he would prefer five times over that the Government should build the road with the people's money.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. An hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." I take him at his word. If that is the position which the Conservative party are going to take in this country, let us have it clearly understood and let us take up the question and debate it fairly and squarely. So far, with the exception of the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart), no hon. gentleman on that side, who has spoken, has taken that position. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition did not take it fairly and squarely in his speech of the other night; but if these hon. gentlemen are prepared to take that position, I am ready to face it and deal with it on its merits. But I repeat—and I say it with full confidence that the people of Canada will endorse my statement—that the people of this eastern part of Canada are not prepared to consent that a large increase of public debt, to the extent of $5,000,000, should be saddled on this country for the purpose of building that road to the Yukon territory. The ordinary taxpayers of the country, as was so well said by my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr.

Rogers) the other night, the farmers of this country are not prepared to submit to additional taxation for the purpose of opening up these gold fields. They do not care so much whether a few miles more or less of gold-bearing lands up there are devoted for the purpose of opening up and giving value to the rest of the country, but they would protest most strenuously against any large increase of debt being incurred for this purpose and a large increase of taxation being imposed on the country to meet the interest on that debt.

Hon. gentlemen opposite and their organs and friends throughout the country make calculations as to the enormous value of the lands we are giving for the building of this road. But my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) showed clearly last night what a small proportion of the lands we are giving can really be gold-bearing, that is, for placer mining. He pointed out that supposing the contractors took a strip right along the axis of a river, as is explained in the contract, supposing they should project a base line along the axis of the river, on the average the amount of placer mining which is possible in that six mile strip is only about 300 feet. He showed that supposing the contractors were able to take the whole of their lands, with that three hundred feet strip in the middle of each section, they then would only have one-one hundred and fifth part of that land gold-bearing. Supposing they and by their own prospectors or by the discoveries of some free miners that there is a good deposit of gold in the bed of a stream, and they wish to make the axis of this stream their base line, it is a well known fact—I heard Mr. Ogilvie the other night state it emphatically—that as a general rule, in one stream there are only perhaps two or three miles which are rich in good gold. The rich portion of any individual stream does not extend, as a rule, to any great length. Even on Bonanza and Eldorado Creek, the actual gold found is got out of only about six miles, at the outside, of their length. The company are allowed to fix their stake at the end of their base line. That base line is to continue for 24 miles. They cannot take less than a whole block, starting from the original point—24 miles long and six miles wide. What is the result? Of that they have the first three miles, then the Government have the next three miles, and so on. Supposing they were to find a very rich lode in that territory. They might have three miles of it; but to get that three miles, they would not only have to take that three miles by six, but three other blocks, each of them three by six, further up the stream, away from and outside that rich mine; and according to Mr. Ogilvie's statement, the chances are greatly indeed against their finding any valuable mine at all in these other three blocks. What does this mean? When they take a block of twenty-four miles long and six wide, they take altogether $2,160 acres, or nearly the subsidy for four miles. Of that amount, one-half would belong to the Government and one-half would be theirs; so that to get one single location which would be very rich, they have to take 46,000 acres, and as to the other sections beyond that, in that same block, according to Mr. Ogilvie's statement and those of prospectors, the chances are against their being exceptionally rich at all. The whole of the contractor's land grant would require 83 such lots—that is to say, 83 lots 24 miles long and six miles wide. They have therefore only actually 83 chances to get rich mines, and a large proportion, probably nearly all the rest of the land they take, will be simply the average gold bearing land in that territory. And when they do take that, they have to take alternate blocks, and every free miner has just the same chance as the company to get a gold mining privilege and a rich location.

And so, in spite of the calculations of the immense value of the land which is being given to them, the value is comparatively small. My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) showed that, so far as the width is concerned—the width of six miles—only 300 feet, or 1-105th part, was likely to be good, and I have shown that, on the length along the centre of the base line, they have to take one-half of the twenty-four miles in length, or alternate blocks aggregating 46,000 acres, to secure to themselves any particular part which they may have found to be exceedingly rich.

Now, there is another point brought up by the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Before the hon. Minister passes on, may I ask him a question? I do not wish to interrupt him: I ask for information. I would like to know what interpretation the Government puts upon the second paragraph of subsection 2 of section 12 of the contract.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I was just going to take up that point. That is the question as to the selection of side pieces or side blocks three miles square on the ends of the company's alternate blocks in the first original sections in the first original block. First, I must confess that the graphic picture drawn by the leader of the Opposition of the dangers of this particular section appealed to my amusement, rather than to my reason. The hon. gentleman has missed one very important point of the contract. He drew a wonderful picture, showing that the company could have twenty-four miles in length by three in width; they would arrange to have that in the valley of a river, taking in, perhaps, a whole gold-bearing river twenty-four miles long. Now, the contract lays down that the base lines may be run in two ways. First, they may follow the axis of the river. In that case the twenty-four mile strip described must run at right angles and must follow up the mountains and into the back country, where there is no more placer mining. The extra nine miles on one side and the extra nine miles on the other side gives them no more of the valley of that river than they had in the six-mile section. The hon. gentleman understands that, and will admit that that is the case.

Mr. CASGRAIN. That is true.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Ah, says the leader of the Opposition, these are clever men. Instead of taking their base line along the river bank, they are going to turn it at right angles and take twenty-four miles up and down the valley of the river, and thus they will have a splendid gold section, three miles in width and twenty-four miles long, wherever they may find a rich gold river. But the hon. gentleman forgot another important part of the section to which he was alluding.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The controlling part.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The controlling part, as my hon. friend says. I said that there were two ways in which the base lines could be laid down. One is along the axis of the river. I am sure the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casgrain) follows my argument and sees that it has force where that kind of base line is taken. Now, take the other way. You get a base line running otherwise than along the axis of a river. The hon. gentleman has forgotten that in this section the following is laid down :—

The contractors may take as a base line a line commencing at any point located by them, and running from such point due north, east, south or west.

Now, suppose they carry out what the hon. leader of the Opposition so graphically describes, and instead of running a base line along the axis of a river, they run it north, south, east or west by the compass. Now, if they hope to get a section twenty-four miles long by three miles wide along a river under their absolute control, they must find a river whose line runs for twenty-four miles exactly north and south, or exactly east and west, and they must take care to lay down their base line in such a way that by starting from that point in a direct line north, south, east or west, they can secure this tract on the river. Well, Sir, it is barely possible that the picture drawn from imagination by the leader of the Opposition may be found true. We know that the imagination of the hon. gentleman is always fertile. It may be, that in that country, where the rivers are tortuous, where they are diverted from a straight course every mile or two, that a river might be found whose line would be due north and south, or east and west, for twenty-four miles, without going outside of the three-mile strip. But such a thing is most extremely unlikely. And, as one of my hon. friends suggests, suppose one or two of such rivers were to be found there, it would be of no great benefit to the contractors except through another fortuitous circumstance—that the river happened to be a gold-bearing one of extreme richness, such as the Klondike, the Bonanza or the Eldorado. But I will go further, and tell the hon. gentleman that the matter is one which has been under the consideration of the Government. As he knows perfectly well, the Government laid down the principle of alternate sections in this land grant, the Government getting the alternate sections. It was understood by the contractors that was the principle of the land grant. And when the Government saw that it was possible that the section could be so interpreted that there was even a theoretical possibility—not that we believed that it is of any value or that the imaginary picture of the leader of the Opposition was at all likely to be realized—that it might result as stated, then, so that the principle of alternate blocks and sections should be maintained in every line of the contract, as we believe it to be a right principle in giving land grants, Mr. Mackenzie to-day agreed that the same principle should be applied to their outside sections as was applied to the main block of land in the middle.

But instead of what the hon. gentleman chooses to take as a possible difficulty, this is the kind of thing which will occur if the land grant is divided, that is to say, that against and next to one of the sections given to the company in the main block, the Government will have the first three square miles section, the company the next and the Government the next.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Has the amended clause been drawn?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It has not, but the contractors, knowing well that the principle of alternate sections was the principle of the grant in the contract, are perfectly willing to abide by that principle, but this amendment will be made to remove any possible objection, any possible doubt as to the arrangement which might be made, showing that there was no intention on the part of the Government, and there was no intention on the part of the contractors, to try and whip the devil round the post in the way the leader of the Opposition tried to show was possible.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Is it proposed to lay the amended contract immediately on the Table of the House?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It will be amended in committee.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will it be convenient for the Government, to-morrow or on Monday, to mention what the proposed amendment will be, as it is rather an important matter?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have given it in substance. I think the House understands it fully, and it will be drawn up in such a way that there can be no doubt as to its interpretation, and it will give effect to the idea that I have described. Now, Sir, there is another point I wish to allude to. I have tried to dispose of the contention that this land grant is so enormously valuable—not that I wish in any wise to minimize the value of the land grant. I am satisfied that the contractors, or the company that may succeed the contractors, have got a very valuable asset in the land which we have given them for the building of this railway, but I do not for one moment pretend that in getting such a contract as this signed by gentlemen of the standing of Mackenzie & Mann, the Government is not justified, nay more, that it is not proper and right for the Government to give a valuable consideration for such a valuable work. Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, and the company who may take their place, will have an enormously valuable asset in the land grant which is given to them by this contract, and it is only by reason of that fact that they will be able to carry out the contract, it is only by reason of the fact that they are getting something in return for what they are giving that anybody in this country would presume to endorse this contract. Sir, what is the real value of this land grant? The Minister of the Interior showed us last night that the land grant was not so very valuable for placer mining purposes, that is to say, the land that would be available for placer mining purposes was comparatively of small extent. I have shown here to-night that they would have to take a very large amount of land for each particular place and location which they had found to be particularly rich, and which they wanted to make sure of getting control of. But there are other things in this land grant which I think are of immense value, and will accrue to the pecuniary success of the company, and I hope they will, after placer mining has come to an end in the Yukon territory. We know perfectly well by the history of gold mining throughout the world, that when large placer finds are first made, they are worked to immense advantage, particularly by poor men. We know that to that stage of mining there succeeds hydraulic mining, and we know that in successful hydraulic mining there is necessarily a large outlay of capital, and it is only by means of large companies with large capital at their disposal that successful hydraulic mining can be carried on. Successful hydraulic mining is carried on in river beds and on the banks of rivers where the return of gold is not sufficient to make placer mining successful, or largely successful. By means of capital invested, by means of the machinery employed, by means of the large number of workmen that can be employed under one control and management, mud or sand or earth or gravel, which can be washed out by means of hydraulic mining, and which are of a much lower paying grade than earth which is worked out in placer mining, can still be made profitable. This, then, will occur. Much of this section of country we have described will be such as placer miners, or free miners, will never think of going into, or if they do, will perhaps try and leave after disposing of their claim and their property successfully, and the hydraulic miner who will go in there will build up a permanent and large industry for the benefit of the people of Canada. Moreover, we believe, and we hope, that the hillsides and the mountains from which grains of gold that are now found in the valleys of the streams came down, can be profitably worked in the future in the way of quartz mining. When these gentlemen have obtained the title to their land, they will no doubt be able to dispose of sections of that land where, by reason of scientific investigation, quartz lodes have been found and a sufficient quantity of gold to justify quartz mining; and then those who will rent privileges from them will be able to establish there quartz mining which will continue from year to year, and which will be a permanent source of income and revenue to the people of this country. Sir, for these reasons, I believe that while the people of Canada in giving this land grant have not given a thing which is of such large value at the present moment, still the men who are getting it are going to be able to make a fairly good thing out of it, and are going to create and continue there a profitable industry which will for years and years to come be a source of income and revenue and profit to the whole of the people of Canada. Now, Sir, a good deal has been said about the extent of this land grant, and independently altogether of its intrinsic value. My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior last night spoke about land grants generally, and the ex-Minister of Railways this afternoon tried to belittle and to ridicule what he said. As a matter of fact, every statement that the Minister of the Interior made last night was absolutely correct to the closest figure. The contention of the ex-Minister of Railways was, after all, that although he and his friends had given such enormous quantities of the fertile belts of Canada to railroad corporations, Mr. Mackenzie and Mr. Mackenzie's Government were prepared to have given a little more. I do not know that that has very much to do with this transaction. However, I propose for a moment to show to this House, first of all the map that the Minister of the Interior showed last night, the map which shows the amount of fertile land in Manitoba and the North-west Territories which has been given by hon. gentlemen opposite to various railway companies in the Dominion of Canada. In the map which I am going to show the portion coloured black is that covered by the grants of land to railway companies. In that portion the alternate sections are available for the railway companies, the others still remain in the hands of the Government. But in consequence of that, it is only the parts that are not coloured black at all that are available for continuous settlement to immigrants coming into this country. Here, Mr. Speaker, is the map which I wish to show again for one moment, and I want hon. gentlemen opposite to take full cognizance of it.

Mr. DAVIN. Is not one-half of that portion coloured black, open to settlement?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have just explained that.

Mr. DAVIN. That map therefore gives a very wrong impression.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Surely the impression is this, that although half of that land that is marked black is open for settlement, or continuous settlement, it is not so, because there are alternate blocks shut up and closed, held by the monopolies which hon. gentlemen opposite have created, for increase in value by the toil and sweat of the men who go in there and settle on adjoining Government lands. Here is the monopoly.

Mr. DAVIN. Let me ask another question of the hon. gentleman. Would not the policy of Mr. Mackenzie have covered the North-west still blacker than that?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman is talking about past history. I am talking about actual facts in the settlement of our country, about the condition of affairs which immigrants coming in from foreign lands find in our North-west Territories; and I am pointing out a fact which, as the hon. gentleman knows well, is one of the most important factors which has interfered with immigration into the North-west Territories, which has prevented the settlement of that country to the extent that I and all Canadians had hoped for, but which, under the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, did not take place, and has not yet taken place in that territory. Hon. gentlemen see on this map the quantity of land that has been locked up by the monopolies given by hon. gentlemen opposite. I wish hon. gentlemen to look at the map carefully. Now if I may be allowed I will show a similar map of the Yukon district. On this map which I now show to the House, hon. members will see one small black patch, and that includes the land granted under the contract, the land grant which has been so much dilated upon by hon. gentlemen in their speeches. This land, hon. gentlemen will observe, covers not more than a square inch on the map.

Mr. DAVIN. Does all the map indicate land that is gold-bearing land, if it does not, is not the map a perfect fraud?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. If the hon. gentleman will stop a moment, I will explain the matter.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Are the two maps of the same scale?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. A map can be compared with itself, if not with another map. A part is the same scale as the whole map. Perhaps the hon. gentleman does not know what a scale is. All this is what is called by Mr. Ogilvie the gold-bearing country, and the small black patch in the middle of it is the extent of the area, according to scale, given to the Yukon Railway Company as the whole of their land grant, and not only so, but it represents the only cost to the people of Canada of the building of the road. An hon. gentleman opposite, the leader of the Opposition, stated a little while ago, and it was repeated to-day, that for every pound of gold taken out about one pound is expended; and the natural question was put to him from this side of the House: If that is the case, what are Mackenzie & Mann getting?

Mr. DAVIN. Oh, nothing.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I should like to tell the hon. gentleman what they are getting. If there is one thing more apparent than another at the present time in this whole question, it is the tremendous speculative frenzy which is actuating people all over the civilized world in respect to the Klondike. At the present moment thousands and tens of thousands of people in the different parts of the world have their faces turned to the Klondike. There are innumerable corporations and companies formed to deal with the various phases of that migration. There are transportation companies, companies for quartz mining, dredging, placer mining and hydraulic mining. All these companies tend to show that there exists to-day a perfect frenzy of speculation abroad in regard to the Klondike. While the leader of the Opposition said, that for every pound of gold taken out—and it is a well known fact—a pound is spent, and while such is the case as regards the whole production of gold, there are certain individuals and companies which obtain ten, fifty or a hundred times the amount of gold expended in mining it. It is due to that fact and to the speculative fever prevailing in the world at large that people go to seek gold in the Yukon or any other territory. Were the plain facts to be, as the leader of the Opposition stated, that every pound of gold coming out of the earth took one pound of gold to mine it, and that rule prevailed in respect to every individual pound, no one would think of going to Klondike or elsewhere to conduct mining operations. In some cases, however, men secure one hundred, two hundred or three hundred times the value in gold of the amount expended in obtaining it, and every one trusts and believes that he is going to be the lucky man who will get the large return, and that his neighbours and others will lose a corresponding amount to enable him to get that return. It is only and solely due to this speculative fever that the contractors are going to be able to make anything out of the contract. If it were not for that, they would have to put their own money into the building of the road and trust to the future to get a return. But in consequence of this fact, that there is a speculative fever and that speculation is natural to most men, that indeed men are willing and anxious to go into speculation, the contracting company may be able to get out of the land a good return for the risk they have undertaken and the work they are doing. Emphatically I hope that they will. I should be glad to have it known that in Canada men possessing experience, capacity and ability to undertake great operations are welcome in this country and will have an opportunity of doing good work for the Government. I am the more glad to know, in this case at all events, that we were able to find men who did not have to come to Canada but were themselves Canadians, that we found in Canada two gentlemen who, on the confession of hon. gentlemen opposite, and on the confession of business men throughout the country, are well able to carry out this work to a successful conclusion, and that we could not get any better men or perhaps as able men to carry it out, even if we travelled to the other end of the earth to find them. I have consumed a little more time than I had intended with my remarks; but I have attempted to keep to certain great points, which I will now recapitulate. The points I wish to emphasize are these. In the first place, the Government look to making an all-Canadian route. We took that as the principle which we thought necessary to maintain and make the essence of the contract. We have succeeded in doing that, and hon. gentlemen opposite, however they may have talked around it indirectly, have not dared yet to say that their party or they themselves as a body are against that particular feature of the contract. The next proposition adopted and laid down as a principle and made the essence of the contract, is that the Klondike shall pay for the railway; that the people of eastern Canada, the workmen, and the shopkeepers and the other classes, should not have placed on their shoulders an additional burden or debt in consequence of the building of the railway and development of the Klondike. Those two features are sufficient to recommend the contract to the members of this House, to the Parliament of Canada, and to the people of this country. I take my seat in the full assurance, that the moment this contract is fully understood—as I am satisfied now, after the clear and lucid explanation of the Minister of the Interior last night, it is and will be understood—the moment it is understood throughout the length and breadth of this country, the Opposition will be obliged to fall into line and support it, because the people of Canada will demand of their representatives that they should do so, and the people will endorse the Government for the action they have taken in this matter.

Mr. OSLER. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that in this House I shall always be found giving credit to whom credit is due, and, in beginning my remarks on this Yukon contract, I want to bear testimony without any reserve to my admiration for the great work that the Minister of the Interior has done in trying to find out from the first what was necessary to accomplish that which we all desire, namely, to secure for Canadians the control of the trade of the Yukon. It is creditable to himself, and creditable to the Government, that he has devoted months of his time to this matter, and that he has given to us what I will accept without any question the best route, so far as we know at present, by which we can obtain an entrance to this gold-bearing territory. I find no fault with the suggestion that it is absolutely necessary for the rest of Canada to obtain communication with that country as rapidly as possible. The fault I have to find with the Government, and with the Minister of the Interior, who, I believe, has been the mainstay of this contract, is, the conditions upon which he proposes to attain the end in view.

Last night, when I heard the Minister of the Interior attacking me indirectly through my business relations, I thought that something I had said the other evening must have hit him hard, or he would not have gone out of his way to attack old contracts, old negotiations and old agreements in connection with the building of roads in the North-west. Very many allusions have been made to the building of the two roads with which I have been more or less connected; namely, the Qu'Appelle-Long Lake Road and the Calgary and Edmonton. I state here, without any fear of contradiction, that no two roads ever bonused by the Government of Canada, and no two roads ever undertaken, fulfilled their contract with the Government from beginning to end as did the Qu'Appelle and Long Lake and the Calgary and Edmonton roads. Without a single default in any agreement with the Government, these roads were built and the contracts fulfilled. Gentlemen on the Government benches are fond of saying that wild statements have been made on this side of the House, but no wilder statement has ever been made than the statements made by the members of the Government as to the profits and moneys made out of those two roads. The Minister of the Interior ought to be the last man to make any such statement, because he has in his department a copy of every document relating to the financial transactions of these roads. So far from the promoters of the road having made money, I believe that, from first to last, one and all of them have lost money. Speaking for myself and the connection I had with them, I personally have lost money and I am poorer to-day for having had anything to do with either of these two roads. These roads were bonused by large land grants. It was found, for many years after these grants were made, that it was impossible to finance upon them. There is a report of a committee dated June 5th, 1888, showing that it cost the Government at that time $72,755 a year to give these northern territories mail and military service. The Government gave a subsidy of $80,000 a year for twenty years for the building of each of these roads, but that subsidy was not enough to pay for interest on the bonds on the cost of the road. The land had to be sold to get a sufficient sum of money to pay 6 per cent interest on the bonds of the road for six years. In the case of the Qu'Appelle and Long Lake Road, the Government retained one-third of the land grant in consideration of this $80,000 a year, and the Government still retains it. The remainder of these lands were sold for about $1,000,000, and that $1,000,000, in addition to the $80,000 a year, was required to pay the interest for six years on the bonds issued to build the road.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). I would like to ask how much they received for the sale of bonds on the Regina, Long Lake and Saskatchewan Railway?

Mr. OSLER. They received from the proceeds of the sale of bonds $2,539,000, and they received from the proceeds of the land grant sale about $980,000. These agreements are, I think, all in the possession of the Government here, and they may be seen at any time.

Mr. DAVIS. Will you tell me the estimated cost of that road?

Mr. OSLER. The contractors were paid $10,000 a mile, cash, to build that road. That may be a little more than it would cost now, but at that time it was thought to be a very reasonable sum, and for four or five years before that contractors had been dealing with the Government and had not been able to come to any terms on which they would undertake the contract.

The same price was offered to other contractors, but they would not take it, and Mr. James Ross and his associates took up the contract at $10,000 a mile, and I think they made a contractor's profit out of it. I had no interest, directly or indirectly, in their contract, but I know they received that amount of money in cash. I believe the Government have all the documents in connection with the transaction, but if they have not, I shall be very glad to give them duplicates at any moment.

The Calgary and Edmonton road cost, in cash, $12,600 a mile and a portion of the land grant. The Government now retain 407,000 acres of the land grant, as security for the $80,000 a year, and the balance of the land grant was paid, part to the contractor, and most of it was sold to realize $1,436,000 required to pay the interest on the bonds for six years. Both of these roads were operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway. The roads practically paid their running expenses, and running expenses only.
