Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Where do I come in? The hon. gentleman appealed to me a moment ago in regard to that last clause.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. You do not come in at all.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would like to give my view, because he does not understand it, and it is a reflection on myself. I wish to answer a question that he was putting as if to myself, to show that he has misunderstood it. For instance, that resolution which the hon. gentleman says is not a statement of facts, is exactly covered by this subsection. Take the first part and the first paragraph, which charges that that resignation was made out in regular form, that certain witnesses saw it made, and their names are given. Now, then, take the statement of the Speaker that this declaration was tendered within the meaning of subsection 3, and you have the exact statement that that resignation, made out before witnesses in regular form, was delivered to the Speaker, and his tender within the meaning of subsection 3, is a delivery in the meaning of the whole section.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I thought I had made that point before, but at the risk of wearying the House, I will repeat myself. I stated before that if the hon. member for Champlain had stated that he had good reason to believe, and did believe, that Mr. Brunneau's resignation, as declared in the first paragraph, to have been written out, was delivered by him to the Speaker, and had stopped there, he would have made out a prima facie case. But I said that inasmuch as the hon. gentleman did not make that statement, there was a hiatus. He took the other course. I won't take the responsibility, he says, of making a statement that that resolution was tendered or delivered; I will recite certain facts declared to this House by the Speaker, and I will follow this up by a declaration of my legal opinion that this is a tender within the meaning of the Act. That is where the hon. gentleman stands to-day, and that is where the House stands. If he had taken the responsibility of stating: I have reason to believe, and do believe, that that resignation was written, and signed, and delivered to, and received by, the Speaker, then we would be bound to investigate. But he did not do so; therefore, that necessary ingredient is missing. Now, I will call the attention of the House to the importance I attach to that point, by reading the second section, which says:

Such member may address and cause to be delivered to the Speaker, a declaration of his intention to resign his seat, made in writing under his hand and seal, before two witnesses.

Now, it is quite evident that the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney), in reading that section, saw that that must be, not a technical delivery, not a technical delivery in the post office, because, as his argument went, although he did not state it in so many words, it irresistibly pointed out that if that letter had been burnt in the post office, or otherwise interrupted on its way, and never reached the Speaker, the Speaker could not have issued his warrant. It must have been an actual delivery which brought a knowledge of its contents to the Speaker's mind. Why do I say that? I say that because the latter part of the section puts it beyond any doubt. The first part says that he must "address and cause to be delivered"; and then it says that action shall be taken by the Speaker upon receiving such declaration. "The Speaker shall, upon receiving such declaration, forthwith address his warrant." The Speaker cannot forthwith address his warrant until he receives a declaration within the meaning of the Act, that is, he reads the declaration, informs his mind of its contents, and having the knowledge brought home to his mind of the intention of the member to resign his seat, the Speaker then issues his writ. I believe that position will be accepted by every one. So, there must be not only a technical delivery within the meaning of the Act, but there must be an actual receipt by the Speaker, imparting knowledge of the fact, and bringing to his mind a knowledge of the contents of the document itself. When these two things concur, the Speaker is fully informed of the facts. Then, I say, it would be too late for the Speaker to hand back the resignation or anything else of a like nature. So I say that until the Speaker has so received the resignation, it does not appear to me that his conduct is open to any animadversion or criticism for having delivered back to the member the letter which had been sent to him by the member, when the Speaker solemnly declares that he did not know the contents of it, and had no conversation with Mr. Bruneau about it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What reference does the hon. gentleman make to those words: "And an entry of the declaration so delivered to the Speaker shall be thereafter made in the Journals of the House"?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did not refer to it myself, but I will. I say the latter part of the section refers to the action which the Speaker is to take when the letter has been delivered to him. I say that action which the Speaker has to take plainly imports what the law meant by the word "delivered." It is not a technical delivery, it is such a delivery as enables him to do the act which the section points out. Now, the act which the section points out the Speaker is to do is to issue his warrant for a new writ, and the Speaker evidently could not issue his warrant for a new writ unless he had been informed that the member had resigned. So I say the conclusion is irresistible that there must be the delivery of a document to the hands of the Speaker, and a conveyance to his mind of the contents of the document, of the fact that the member has resigned, so that he may issue a new writ.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman goes this far—that if the envelope had remained on the Speaker's desk and the Speaker, for any improper reasons—putting the case outside of this case altogether—had simply declined to open that envelope, then the member could not resign.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not quite follow the hon. gentleman.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. As I understood the hon. gentleman he goes this far: What if this document, having reached the Speaker's room, by the design or neglect of the Speaker, had remained on his desk, then the member who had executed the declaration and sent it in through the mail to the Speaker's room, would remain a member, and his seat would not be voided.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Now, I ask the hon. gentleman himself—Does he think any good can follow from imagining cases of malfeasance on the part of a high officer, and drawing conclusions from them? I ask him this further question: Should we not be better engaged in discussing actual facts before us, than in discussing imaginary facts of what might happen under supposed circumstances? The facts of this case are that the letter was not allowed to remain for a week or a day, there was no malfeasance, there was no wrong-doing. The Speaker, before he opened his mail, was asked to deliver back to the gentleman the letter which he had sent to the Speaker, and he delivered it back. Therefore, the contents of the letter never came to the Speaker's mind, therefore he could not issue his warrant, and therefore, in my opinion, there is no vacancy.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It seems, so far as the most of the facts in this case are concerned, or rather so far as the inference from the statement of the facts put before the House, are concerned, that there is not much difference of opinion. In this case the statement made by the hon. member who has moved this resolution, declares that a resignation, duly executed within the terms of the statute, was sent by mail to the Speaker, and was received by the Speaker. There is no dispute about that, so far as I understand. If I gathered rightly what has fallen from the right hon. Prime Minister and from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the argument which is put forward to justify the denial of this committee is the fact which, it is said, can be gathered from the statement of the Speaker, that he had no knowledge of the contents of the document. I have not heard from any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House any argument other than that. I venture to suggest that the matter from that standpoint is not so plain as hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House would have us believe. I presume that my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries would not say, if a resignation properly executed and sent through the post, were received by the Speaker, and were accidentally dropped in the fire or otherwise destroyed before the Speaker had knowledge of its contents, that that would not be a good resignation. I do not suppose any hon. gentleman would controvert that proposition, or would contend that if a notice of resignation had been received by the Speaker, and had been abstracted from his possession before it was convenient for him to examine it, the seat of the member who so tendered his resignation would not become vacant. It is one question, it seems to me, as to whether an hon. member who sends in his resignation in the manner indicated has vacated his seat; it is another question altogether as to whether Mr. Speaker has received such a knowledge of that resignation as to justify him in deciding that a warrant shall be issued for a new election. In the case I have suggested it would be proper, if there were any discrepancy as to the facts, that the matter should be referred, as the hon. member now desires this case shall be referred, to the Committee on Privileges and Elections in order that it may be inquired into, and so I say, Mr. Speaker, that as all the evidence in this case is not before the House, the case should be inquired into by the committee. When under the provisions of this statute a resignation has been only executed, the statute does not provide any particular form in which it should be directed to you, Mr. Speaker, and it does not seem to indicate that the hon. Minister shall deliver the resignation himself to Mr. Speaker. The words of the statute are: "He shall cause to be delivered." This may be done either by post or by messenger; but when once a resignation is in the possession of Mr. Speaker, the case differs to some extent from the analogy that might be drawn from the case of an ordinary deed. A person to whom an ordinary deed is to be delivered may refuse acceptance. Mr. Speaker has no right to refuse the resignation of any hon. member; the member has the absolute right to resign and to tender his resignation. When once tendered, the knowledge of Mr. Speaker as to the contents of that resignation so tendered is immaterial; it is immaterial upon the question as to whether the member so resigning has vacated his seat. At all events, I would not suppose any hon. gentlemen opposite would venture to say that in a matter of that kind there was not a doubt sufficiently grave to justify the case being sent to the committee for inquiry. In this case it is admitted by the statement of the Speaker, coupled with the statement of the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution, that the resignation did come within the possession and control of Mr. Speaker. If Mr. Speaker were aware of the contents of that letter, he had no right to hand it back. The question is not affected by the fact that he handed it back, when he did not possess any such knowledge. It is to be presumed from the terms of his statement, although not so expressly stated, that Mr. Speaker knew nothing of the contents of the letter when he returned it. He merely says that he knew nothing of those contents from the hon. gentleman himself. Under these circumstances I think it is due not only to the House, but to you, Mr. Speaker, and also to the hon. member who sent in that resignation, that there should be an inquiry instituted before the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. QUINN. It is very much to be regretted that the right hon. Prime Minister has seen fit to avoid the investigation which the country expected and which the circumstances of the case called for. Hon. gentlemen have twitted the Opposition with splitting hairs on the question of the receipt of this document by Mr. Speaker; but I think if there is any hair-splitting at all, it has been done by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries based his whole argument, so far as I could understand it, and I should like the hon. gentleman to correct me if I have taken a wrong view of it, on his opinion that section 3 is a legal conclusion which my hon. friend has drawn from the statement of facts. Section 3 says:

That this declaration was tendered within the meaning of subsection 3 of section 5 of chapter 13 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, and yet the said Arthur Aimé Bruneau, Esquire, continues to sit in the House of Commons.

The Minister of Marine and Fisheries declared this was a legal conclusion which my hon. friend had reached from the consideration of the statement made by you, Mr. Speaker. If, however, this is not a legal conclusion drawn by my hon. friend, but a statement of facts, then the declaration of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries falls to the ground. I draw the attention of the House to the first part of the resolution, which reads as follows:—

François Arthur Marcotte, member of the House of Commons for the county of Champlain, having stated in his place that he was credibly informed and believed he could establish that Arthur Aimé Bruneau, Esquire, then member for the electoral district of Richelieu, in this House, did during the present session of Parliament declare, according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, his intention to resign his seat.

I stop there for a moment. Any member of the House has a right to resign his seat by giving in his place notice of his intention to resign. Let us suppose that my hon. friend who declared in this House that he desires to resign his seat is not heard by the Clerk of the House or by Mr. Speaker. Section 5 provides that a member may resign of giving notice of his intention to resign, and the entry thereof by the Clerk of the House. So it will be argued by my hon. friend that if Mr. Speaker did not hear the hon. gentleman make the declaration, he did not resign his seat, and no hon. member of the House had the right to ask that the question be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Such things might occur with respect to the Clerk of the House. I do not mean to suggest any dereliction of duty on his part, but he must sometimes feel bored and be wearied by the eloquence of hon. gentlemen, and especially of hon. gentlemen opposite, and while the Clerk was dreaming of pleasant things, an hon. member might tender his resignation, which might not be heard by the Clerk. Some days afterwards when reading the report of the proceedings of the House we might find that the official resignation of a member had been tendered, but not duly recorded on the Journals; and an hon. member would then rise and declare, as the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Marcotte) has declared, that the hon. member did tender his resignation. The Clerk of the House may make the statement; I did not hear him; but the hon. gentleman declaring would go further, and say: I heard that statement made. And I ask if the denial of the Clerk of the House, as to whether he heard this or not, is a fact, or whether the statement I have made is a fact. That is exactly a similar case as to what occurred here. The statement of the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Marcotte) is plain and clear: That the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau) did tender his resignation under subsection 3 of section 5 of the Act, and the only question that comes up for consideration by the Committee on Privileges and Elections is: Was that paper which the Speaker of this House handed back to the hon. member for Richelieu, that particular morning, the resignation of the hon. member, or was it not. If that were his resignation, surely no one will argue for one moment that, when it was in the hands of the Speaker, even though unopened, it had not been received by him. My hon. friend from Kent (Mr. McInerney) says, that it would be necessary that Mr. Speaker should have a knowledge of what that document contained, or that he must be in a position to have reasonable grounds to know what it contained. I do not go that far.

Mr. MCGREGOR. It does not suit you.

Mr. QUINN. I do not believe it is at all necessary to go that far. I am sorry to disagree with my hon. friend (Mr. McInerney), but I do not believe it is necessary, under the meaning of the Act, that the Speaker should have a knowledge of what that document contained. Let us suppose a case of this kind. A member is travelling in Europe, and he sends his resignation to the Speaker. In the course of his travels, he meets one of the members of the Government who tells him: My dear sir, you are imperilling the fate of our Government by sending your resignation. That document has reached the chamber of Mr. Speaker here, and it is waiting some months for him; but in the meantime, some months after the resignation has been sent to the Speaker, this hon. gentleman cables to the Speaker: I wish you not to open the letter which is in my handwriting, and which comes from such and such a particular place, but return it to me. Would any reasonable person argue that that document was not in the possession of the Speaker at the moment when he readdressed it to this member who asked him to return it? The actual delivery was the receiving of it by Mr. Speaker.

Whether it came to him by post or by messenger, the mere fact of the Speaker having that document in his hands is the receiving of that document. The fact that he returned it to the member who addressed it to him, or to any one else, does not change the nature of the document, and does not change the nature of the transaction as regards the receiving of the document. It does not make the slightest difference, whether Mr. Speaker had this document in his possession for a month, a week, or a day, or an hour; the act of receiving it was completed at the very moment Mr. Speaker took that document in his hand. The Act does not say that he must have it in his possession an hour, or a day, or any length of time, but the mere delivery of that document by the member who wishes to resign, and the mere receipt of it by the Speaker, is sufficient, under the statute, to constitute a resignation on the part of the member so tendering his resignation.

Mr. MCGREGOR. Without the Speaker reading it?

Mr. QUINN. Certainly, without the Speaker reading it. Hon. gentlemen opposite argue this question as if it were a matter of contract between the Speaker of this House and the supporters of the Government, as to whether they should remain as members of this House, and that, in order to complete the resignation, the mind of the Speaker and the mind of the person who wished to resign, must act in unison. I hold that no such thing is necessary. Mr. Speaker is no party to a contract between himself and a member who wishes to resign. Mr. Speaker occupies the position of being totally disinterested; he acts as holding the scales evenly between the two political parties, and as representing the country here, and the moment a member tenders his resignation and sends that in proper form to Mr. Speaker, then the Speaker is bound to accept it and bound to receive it, no matter in what form it may come. It is not a question of Mr. Speaker's knowledge, at all; the question to be submitted to the Committee on Privileges and Elections is this: Did the hon. member for Richelieu write out his resignation; was it witnessed by two hon. members of this House; did it actually get into the hands and was it received by the Speaker of this House? These are the questions.

It is said by the hon. Minister of Marine (Sir Louis Davies), that the hon. mover of the resolution (Mr. Marcotte) is bound by the statement of Mr. Speaker, and is bound to assume that every statement therein is correct, as regards the third declaration in this motion.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I said that the hon. gentleman is bound by the statement, in so far as he imported it into this resolution.

Mr. QUINN. I quite agree with the hon. Minister in that ; but here is what the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Marcotte) said as regards Mr. Speaker :

That the said declaration is, he believed he could establish, the document referred to in the following statement of His Honour the Speaker of the House of Commons on 14th March, 1898.

That is all he (Mr. Marcotte) says. He simply refers to the statement of Mr. Speaker in order to identify the document therein mentioned, as the document to which he has referred in his motion previously. It is not done for the purpose of basing any charge against the hon. member for Richelieu on the statement of Mr. Speaker, but it is merely for the purpose of identifying the document to which Mr. Speaker has referred in his statement, with the document to which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Marcotte) referred in his two previous declarations. Then the hon. gentleman goes on to say :

That this declaration—

That is, the declaration referred to in the section of the resolution immediately preceding the statement of Mr. Speaker.

That this declaration was tendered within the meaning of subsection 3 of section 5 of chapter 13 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, and yet the said Arthur Aimé Bruneau, Esquire, continues to sit in the House of Commons.

It was also stated by the Minister of Marine that it was absolutely necessary that Mr. Speaker must know what this document contained, or else it could not be charged that it had been received by him. I look upon it quite differently. I take it, that the fact of Mr. Speaker not having acted upon any resignation that might have been supposed to have been sent to him, established a fair subject of inquiry in this House, so that Mr. Speaker might explain that he had not received that document.

Mr. Speaker might explain to the House that he had not received the document, owing to absence from the city or some other cause. He might give that as a reason why he had not carried out the law—why he had not reported, according to subsection 2 of section 5, which declares that “the Speaker shall, upon receiving such declaration, forthwith address his warrant, under his hand and seal, to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, for the issue of a writ for the election of a new member in the place of the member so resigning, and a writ shall issue accordingly.” So that if the Speaker had failed to issue his warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, it might be inquired here why he had so failed, if it had been known to any hon. member that a resignation had been sent ; and then it would be the right of the Speaker to inform this House either that he had not received the document or that it had been withdrawn from him, as in this particular case. I take it that the explanation made to this House, by you, Sir, on the 14th of this month, is a perfectly reasonable, natural, and just explanation of the circumstances of the case as they occurred. But it is not of interest to this House to know whether you returned a letter to Mr. Bruneau on the morning of the 11th or any other morning. It is, however, of great interest to this House to know whether that document which you returned to him was his resignation of the seat he occupies in this House. It is of interest to this House to know whether or not it is within the power of the Speaker or of the Government to elect a man to represent a constituency in this House after he has resigned that position. That is the situation, fairly and plainly stated. It is of interest to this country, and is certainly of interest to this House, to know whether the paper which you returned on that morning was the resignation of the hon. member for Richelieu. If it was, then it will be for the Committee on Privileges and Elections to say whether the member is entitled to occupy a seat here after he has resigned that seat. I think, Sir, it would be a very severe comment on the proceedings of this House, on the dignity of this House, and on the fairness of the occupant of your Chair, if the people of this country were allowed to remain for one moment under the impression that a document had been returned to Mr. Bruneau which afterwards turned out to be the resignation of his seat in this House.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to approach this question animated by no other desire than to see that justice be done, not only to the hon. gentleman who presides over this House, but also to the hon. gentleman who represents the county of Richelieu. We are all interested in this matter, the country is interested in it, and it is a matter which does not call for any political animus or any political bias, but which calls for the best elements of right and justice in the heart and mind of every individual member of this House. I do not think that any one should advance technical reasons why this resolution should not carry. Why is it that hon. gentlemen are afraid of an investigation ? The very fact that an investigation is opposed, that hon. gentlemen are seemingly afraid to go into an investigation of this matter, arouses a suspicion, not only in the minds of hon. gentlemen here, but also, I venture to say, in the minds of the entire country. The entire country is anxious to know why this inquiry is being shut off. As has been stated, there are two ways by which a member of Parliament can resign his position : by announcing viva voce in the House his intention to resign, and thus bringing the fact to the eyes and ears of the Speaker, or by causing his declaration to be signed and sealed in the presence of two witnesses, and causing that to be delivered to the Speaker. I hold that the very moment a member of Parliament does that, and causes the document to be delivered to the Speaker, he has resigned. Then it is for the Speaker to issue his writ. That has to come to the knowledge of the Speaker before he can issue his writ; that goes without saying; but the fact of a resignation has become completed just as soon as the declaration signifying a member's intention to resign, has been signed and witnessed, and has been delivered to the Speaker. Now, what this resolution seeks to know is whether or not Mr. Bruneau's resignation was in that letter which was in the hands of the Speaker. If that resignation was in that letter, then I contend that the Speaker has a right to demand that resignation back again. That resignation, after it left the hands of the hon. member for Richelieu, was no longer his property. It belonged to the people of Canada; it belonged to the Speaker as the official representative of the people of Canada; it was in his possession, and it could not be delivered to anybody else. Suppose it is now brought to the Speaker's knowledge that that letter which he says he delivered back to the hon. member for Richelieu conveyed the resignation of that hon. member, then I contend that the Speaker has a right to demand that resignation back. That is one of the reasons why we want this committee. We want this committee in order to investigate whether that letter which was so handed back by the Speaker to the hon. member did or did not contain that resignation. I do not desire in the least to cast any reflections on your honour or your probity, Mr. Speaker; nor do I desire in the least to be bloodthirsty after the seat of the hon. member for Richelieu; but I contend that we have a right in this House to know what is right and what is wrong, and that the people of this country have a right to know what is right and what is wrong, in these matters.

After Recess.

Mr. MILLS. When you left the Chair, Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock, I was endeavouring to impress upon the House the fact that the public sentiment of the country would require this matter to be looked into regardless of any technical objection that may be raised to the motion itself. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) argued that a case was not put, because the motion did not contain the statement that the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau) had resigned his seat or an expression of the belief that he had resigned his seat. If you can make anything less than that out of the resolution, Sir, I cannot. The resolution reads in part, as follows:—

François Arthur Marcotte, member of the House of Commons for the county of Champlain, having stated in his place that he was credibly informed and believed he could establish that Arthur Aimé Bruneau, Esquire, then member for the electoral district of Richelieu in this House, did during the present session of Parliament declare, according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, his intention to resign his seat.

That is a specific declaration by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Marcotte):

That Joseph Godbout, Esquire, the member for the electoral district of Beauce, and John McMillan, Esquire, the member for the electoral district of the South Riding of Huron, were witnesses to the said declaration.

That the said declaration is, he believed he could establish, the document referred to in the following statement of His Honour the Speaker of the House of Commons, addressed to the House of Commons on 14th March, 1898.

Then he gives the specific statement of the Speaker, and ends up by saying:

That this declaration was tendered within the meaning of subsection 3 of section 5 of chapter 13 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, and yet the said Arthur Aimé Bruneau, Esquire, continues to sit in the House of Commons.

That is a specific, detailed statement of the case, as my hon. friend from Champlain (Mr. Marcotte) believes it to be, and it is beyond doubt a prima facie case. You cannot make anything else out of it. The hon. member was not required to swear to it, but he rose in his place and made that statement respecting another hon. member, and that constitutes a prima facie case, which makes it the bounden duty of this House to inquire into the facts.

I hardly consider it necessary to argue what is essential for a resignation. Yet if it were necessary, at this stage of the case, to make an argument of that sort, we could by the facts before us, which facts are admitted by the right hon. leader of the House, show clearly a resignation by the hon. member for Richelieu. All that is required by the statute, in order that a resignation may be complete, is simply this:

What have we here? We have the declaration of the hon. member for Richelieu of his intention to resign his seat, made in writing, under his hand and seal, and signed by himself before two witnesses—all of which facts are admitted. The statute provides that he may address and cause to be delivered such resignation to the Speaker. How did he cause that resignation to be delivered to the Speaker? He, as the Speaker has told us, addressed a letter to the Speaker, and it came through the ordinary course of mail. At least the frank of the hon. gentleman being upon the letter, it is to be presumed that the letter came from the post office, and having come from the post office, the hon. gentleman had made his final plunge beyond retraction. When he posted that letter, he resigned beyond retraction. That letter, once it was mailed, became, not the property of the Speaker, but of the people of Canada. The Speaker is a mere machine; the letter itself belonged to the people of Canada, it belonged to this House, and it had the frank of the hon. gentleman upon it. He made out his resignation, he addressed it to the Speaker, he put it in the post office, and thereby caused it to be delivered. Then what took place? I do not care anything about the knowledge of the Speaker at all. That knowledge comes in when he issues his writ. The member who has tendered his resignation, and has addressed it to the Speaker, and caused it to be so delivered, must be held to have vacated his seat. The statute says:

The member so tendering his resignation—

That is addressing it to the Speaker and causing it to be so delivered——shall be held to have vacated his seat, and shall cease to be a member of this House.

The knowledge of the Speaker has nothing whatever to do with it, so far as regards the final plunge of the hon. member when making his resignation as a member of this House. I take it that the Speaker is supposed to know what acts he is called upon to perform. In other words, he is supposed to know the law. Even common laymen, in the eyes of the law, are supposed to know the law, and the Speaker is supposed to know all the acts he is called upon to perform. He must of necessity know that there may be a dozen members—we have heard rumours of any number contemplating resigning their seats—who may want to resign; and how does he know that his box may not be flooded with letters of resignation, so that when a letter comes to him addressed in that way, I take it that it is his duty, before handing it back, to inquire of the hon. member: Is not this your resignation? Because we know there have been rumours in the newspapers for months that members intend resigning, until at last the thing came to a point, and one gentleman made the final plunge—and was caught. I would not advise a Conservative member to attempt any such thing. I would not advise a Conservative member to do precisely the same thing as the hon. member for Richelieu did, and run the chance of getting that letter back. But aside from all that, I may say here, in passing, that the Speaker in his statement, referred to the fact of newspapers making one report and another, and to a certain extent he gave as a reason for his statement the newspaper comments on this matter. Well, I wish to caution Mr. Speaker and this House that the newspapers will say a great deal more with reference to this matter, if this committee is not given. The newspapers will say it, and the people will think it and will say it, and will understand it too.

Then there is another thing. I wish to remind the right hon. leader of the House and also the hon. member for Richelieu, this is not the only place where this matter can be brought up. So, though, by their majority, they vote down this motion, that does not, necessarily, put an end to this transaction. What is the law with reference to that? Section 4 of this very chapter says:

If any person who is by this Act declared ineligible as a member of the House of Commons, or is declared incapable of sitting or voting therein, nevertheless sits or votes, he shall forfeit the sum of two thousand dollars for every day he sits or votes; and such sum may be recovered from him by any person who sues for the same, by action in any form allowed by law in the province in which the action is brought, and in any court having jurisdiction.

Well, it is a known fact that since this resignation was put in in the manner in which the hon. member for Champlain believes, the hon. member for Richelieu has sat in this House.

Mr. BERGERON. Not long.

Mr. MILLS. But he was here.

Mr. BERGERON. About half an hour.

Mr. MILLS. He was here, at all events, and, consequently, by voting down this resolution, hon. gentlemen must not think that they are voting this case entirely beyond the jurisdiction of courts other than the court of Parliament. Now, I rather think that, for the honour and decency of this House, and for the establishment of good precedents and for the elevating of that moral standard that the Liberals of this country all said that they were going to elevate and keep elevated, hon. members should do as the hon. member for Champlain has asked them and refer this matter so that further investigation can be had before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. A great many things could be said with reference to these resignations, but there is only one point to be considered here on this motion. Is there a prima facie case made out? Is it a proper case to go before the Committee on Privileges and Elections? If so, it is the duty of this House to send it there. I think, and a great many other hon. members think with me, that a prima facie case has been out, and that it is right and proper that this matter should be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. BERGERON. Last Friday when this question came before the House, the right hon. the Premier said that the matter had been laid before the law officers of the Government, so I expected when the matter came up to-day that the right hon. gentleman would give us the report of those officers. I do not know whether he would allow me to ask him now whether he got a report, and, if so, whether it was a written or a verbal report.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I have stated everything that I have to say in this matter.

Mr. BERGERON. Then we are at liberty to suppose that the law officers may have made a report, but that it has been filed along with that telegram to Lord Strathcona. It may have been against the Government contention. I am not surprised at the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite, for I have heard them upon similar questions when not in office and, of course, as in all other cases, their speeches of to-day are far different from those they delivered then. The right hon. Premier threw some aspersions upon the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron), because he seconded the motion of the hon. member for Champlain. When the motion was handed to you, Mr. Speaker, you looked for a seconder and, as is often done, you gave the name of the member who happened to catch your eye, in this case, the hon. member for West York.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Why not take him ?

Mr. BERGERON. That is not the question. I know what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Landerkin) means, and that is the reason I speak of it. We have seen it in the papers before. I say it was not the intention to ask the hon. member for West York to second the motion. There was no reason, as there was somebody to second it. Unfortunately, the seconder's name was not on the motion as written. I beg your attention to this question, Mr. Speaker, because I know it will come up later on. I did not see why the leader of the House should throw aspersions upon the hon. member for Three Rivers when that hon. gentleman seconded the motion. Years ago, Mr. Speaker, when you sat on this side of the House, you presented a motion like the one now before the Chair, directed against the hon. member for Three Rivers, and the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Laurier) of that day, threw no aspersions on you or upon those who supported your views. It seems to me that what the House and the country are interested in here is to find out the whole truth about the resignation of the hon. member for Richelieu. As has been said before—and I only mention en passant—it is important to us all, from the Speaker to the humblest member of the House, to know how we stand upon this question. As my hon. friend has just said, I would not advise any one on this side of the House to send in a resignation in that way.

The PRIME MINISTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. BERGERON. The right hon. gentleman says "hear, hear," and why should we give this advice ? The Speaker of the House is supposed to be entirely without feeling as between two parties, and I am sure that that is the case with you, Mr. Speaker. That is why I insist upon this point. I do not want it to go to the House or to the country that anybody here could be favoured by the Speaker ; and that is why I am convinced that a body like the Committee on Privileges and Elections—where hon. gentlemen opposite have a majority—would be the proper place to find out all the facts of this transaction. Of course, if the right hon. gentleman does not allow such a reference, it will not be made. But, if there is no investigation, what will remain in the public mind ? That we cannot prevent it. Why, it has been rumoured here already, and when I was in Montreal last Saturday I heard it there, that the hon. member for Richelieu twice or three times or oftener has sent his resignation to the Premier, and that he sent this one to the Speaker for the same reason that moved him in communicating with the Premier. He has told everybody what his reasons were, not confining his confidence to members of his own party. It was a question of patronage of course—we could never expect to find it a question of principle—a question of patronage at Sorel. The hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), who is smiling at me now, knows it well. If public rumour is true appointments were made there. People were appointed through the influence of the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Préfontaine), and there was a row. The hon. member for Richelieu, to use a vulgar word which I trust you will pardon me for using, Mr. Speaker, considering that it has been much used in political discussions of late—the hon. member kicked, and on the eve of an important vote, he sent in his resignation.

He sends his resignation to the right hon. the Premier, that is to say, he writes a letter to him, and begins by paying him a great many compliments—just as the Liberal clubs in Montreal always do when they want to secure expulsions from the Liberal party. He writes a letter to the Premier and says : It is impossible for me to support the party any longer, my conscience forbids me from remaining here. Why, Sir, the right hon. gentleman has received resignations like that very often, not only from the member for Richelieu, but from other members too. The right hon. gentleman, knowing the meaning of these resignations, sent him from January to December, takes no account of them, but when he sees that the member says : At the same time I am sending in my resignation to the Speaker—then the right hon. gentleman begins to think there may be something in it. Now, if rumour is true, it would seem as if the right hon. gentleman had shown the letter to somebody else, and had asked somebody else to see how far the resignation had gone. Now, we all know that what the Speaker says is perfectly correct. No one here would even doubt a word of his statement, but the Speaker does not say that he had not heard of the resignation of Mr. Bruneau. He says very truly that the member for Richelieu did not tell him what was in that letter. I believe that. The hon. member for Richelieu, I think, had been well prepared for the mission he was to accomplish when he went to the Speaker. He had been told not to be too talkative with the Speaker, and he was too intelligent to ask or to put questions. But we want to know more than what is contained in the Speaker's statement. We want to go before the committee so that we may be in a position to prove that the right hon. gentleman knew it, that the Minister of Public Works knew it, that the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) knew it, and that through these, in an unofficial way, the Speaker became acquainted with it, as the Minister of Marine and Fisheries said this afternoon. Why, he says whether the Speaker did know it or not, whether the Speaker had learned it from the mouth of these gentlemen, or had read it in the newspapers, it was all unofficial, but still in an unofficial way he knew that the member for Richelieu had offered his resignation. Well, if we could go before the committee we would be able to find out whether these things are true. Now, I think it is very important that we should do so. Hon. gentlemen opposite do not seem to attach much importance to this, but my right hon. friend later on would thank us for what we are doing, because he will have some more resignations. I have no doubt—of course, not in the same way, they will know better. The hon. member for Richelieu, at least, will not again send his resignation to the Speaker in this way. But the right hon. gentleman will have more resignations, they are hanging over his head, because I am convinced that it is impossible to grant what the member for Richelieu wants now, for instance; what the member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Bernier) wants, for instance; and what the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Préfontaine) wants, for instance. I know that, and so he may expect some other resignations. Therefore, he should grant us a committee of investigation, so that everything which will come out before that committee may be a lesson to other members who may wish to send in their resignations later on, that they may not be caught in the same way as the member for Richelieu was caught. Now, what will the people think of this? The law has been read, the right hon. gentleman has read it three or four times, others have read it. The resignation was written, there is no doubt about that. My hon. friend opposite said there was no prima facie case. But the resignation was written according to the statute which regulates the manner in which a member shall resign his seat. It was written in the presence of two members of this House, according to the law, and it was mailed, and the Speaker, in his declaration, says that he received it. He says: "So far as I knew, it had come to my office through the post office." The Speaker received it, and so everything is perfectly regular, all through it is perfectly regular. Now, under ordinary circumstances, that resignation was in the hands of the Speaker. So far as ordinary correspondence goes, that letter was in the hands of the Speaker. We all know that the moment we deposit a letter in the post office, we cannot get it back under any circumstances. I have seen people posting a letter and forgetting to put on a stamp, and though they did everything in their power to get it back, going into the post office and begging to have the letter returned that they might put a stamp on it and prevent it going to the dead letter office, still they were refused, they were told that the letter now belonged to the party to whom it was addressed. How much more so in the case of a document of this importance. I am, Sir, much surprised with the right hon. gentleman and his followers at taking this position. As has been suggested here, suppose that letter had been left under some papers in the Speaker's office for a week or ten days, would anybody then pretend that according to law the member for Richelieu had not resigned? Supposing the letter had been lost, dropped in the passage by the messenger who carried it to the Speaker's room, still, as a question of law, would not the resignation of the hon. member for Richelieu have been properly transmitted, even though it had not reached the Speaker? But more than this, the Speaker actually had it in his possession and gave it back. I understand very well, I have no doubt at all, that the Speaker attached no importance to that letter, that he did not know what it was, never having asked Mr. Bruneau what was in it, and Mr. Bruneau not having told him. Consequently, he attached no importance to the letter and gave it back. But he had the resignation in his hands, all the same. Now, any one can ask imaginary questions, says the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. The right hon. gentleman would have prevented all this play of the imagination if he had granted us a committee of investigation. Then we would have gone before that committee with the facts, but now we are left to suppositions, as somebody has said. We are all human, but we know how these things are done, at least we can guess. Suppose somebody had said to the Speaker: Mr. Speaker, I wish you would not open your mail to-night, wait until to-morrow afternoon. That might have been done, and would that have been regular? Would that not be something that should not have been done? Let us have a committee of investigation in order that all these things may be either proved or disproved. If they are not proved, so much the better for hon. gentlemen opposite and the hon. member for Richelieu. Now, we heard the speech of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and while he made it, he could not help laughing. I do not believe there has ever come before Parliament a case so plain and clear as this one. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is a great lawyer, and he makes great arguments; still, I saw him splitting hairs here to-day, and he could not help laughing. There was nothing at all in his arguments except that he paid some compliments to you, Mr. Speaker. I will be very glad to second anything the hon. gentleman has said in that regard, but let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I do not like to hear hon. members getting up and paying compliments to the Speaker. I have not seen it done before during many years, and I do not like it. I have seen four Speakers occupying that Chair before yourself, and I never before heard any one paying them compliments. I am sure, Mr. Speaker himself would prefer not to see that done. Therefore, putting aside these compliments to the Speaker, there was nothing at all in the arguments of the hon. Minister to show why a committee should not be granted. I ask the right hon. gentleman once more to give us the committee. Surely he can change his mind, he has done it before. There is no harm in that, when it is done for a good purpose. Let us have the committee of investigation, for it is a question of honour to the House and to Parliament. It is an important question for the Speaker, and it is a very important question to every one of us. There is no danger. The Government have a majority on that committee, and if we are not able to prove things that we believe are true, so much the better for the hon. gentlemen opposite and for the hon. member for Richelieu.

Mr. FLINT. The question before the House is not precisely as to whether the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau), as a matter of fact, has resigned his seat in this House, but as to whether there is contained in this statement submitted by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Marcotte), sufficient reason for referring the matter of the alleged resignation of the hon. member to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. We must take this statement as a whole, and must conclude that the whole case rests on this statement presented to the House; and we must ask whether, in that statement, there is sufficient case to go before a committee for investigation.

It is true, there are other courts having jurisdiction over this matter, and if any person sees fit to invoke the jurisdiction of another tribunal, of course that is a matter for the person himself to consider, and the matter will then be discussed from a strictly judicial standpoint. Now we are discussing the matter from a parliamentary standpoint, and I see no reason why, as a Parliament, and as members of Parliament, discussing the rights and privileges of fellow-members and of our constituents, our interpretation of the statute and the circumstances and merits of this case should not be what we call a liberal interpretation, in the direction of carrying out the intention, as indicated by the hon. member's conduct which has been called in question. As we are here without any direct precedents to guide us, we must be guided by reason and analogy. The terms of the statute refer to an intention on the part of the member to resign his seat. There is, first, the wish and intention to resign his seat, and that intention and wish must remain unchanged until by the operation of the law the seat becomes vacant. We must follow the wish and intention up to the point of controversy. It is true, we assume, for the sake of argument, that the statement of the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Marcotte) is true, that the resignation was written out, and there was an express wish and intention of the hon. member at that time to resign; that the letter was deposited in the post, and in due course of time was received, not by Mr. Speaker, not by the person to whom it was to be delivered, but at the office of Mr. Speaker, at a certain place within which it could have been delivered to Mr. Speaker. It was not delivered to Mr. Speaker, but the intention expressed was revoked by the action of the hon. member, the intention to resign his seat. The facts, as stated by Mr. Speaker—and it must be assumed that these are the facts on which the application is based—show that this was the case. His Honour stated that, before he had received this letter into his hands, before it had been delivered by any operation into the hands of Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asked him if he had received a letter. Mr. Speaker replied: I have not received any letter from you. He was then informed that he wished to get from Mr. Speaker a letter which he had written to him. At that moment the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau) revoked the wish and intention to resign, and from that moment it was impossible that the law vacating the seat could come into operation. It seems to me, as we are tracing the matter step by step, that this is the point in the controversy, and where hon. gentlemen opposite must meet the hon. member for Richelieu, if they wish to deprive him of his seat in this House. I contend that there is substantial ground on which the House can give a liberal interpretation to the action of the hon. member in wishing at that time to resign a position which he had received at the hands of the electors. The interpretation should be liberal on behalf of the constituents whom he was then representing, and is now representing, in this House, if my interpretation of the different stages of this proceeding is correct, a policy leading in the direction of liberality towards those whom the hon. gentleman represented, and as the representative of whom, in a moment of anger or passion, or from some other motive, he desired to withdraw. The hon. gentleman who last spoke referred to the position of the post office in the matter, and declared that, when the letter was delivered into the post, it was, by operation of law, delivered to Mr. Speaker. This contention cannot seriously prevail, because, although postal law constitutes a binding obligation on the postal authorities as between these two parties, that law does not change the property in the envelope and as regards its contents. So that, while, as between the Postmaster General and the hon. member for Richelieu, the hon. member could not reclaim that letter from the Postmaster General, he had the right and privilege of resuming property in the letter with the consent of the person to whom it was addressed, when it left the control of the Post Office Department. So there is nothing left in the complaint itself on which a committee of investigation could operate. The House is bound by the statement of this complaint, and the complaint, or so far as the only substantial part of it is concerned, and the statement of Mr. Speaker shows that the intention and wish of the hon. member for Richelieu had been fully and amply revoked before the document itself had been delivered to Mr. Speaker.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The right hon. leader of the Government twitted me, in his opening remarks, with having attempted to secure the honour of seconding this motion. My right hon. friend knows that, as a rule, I generally do not attempt to secure honours of this kind; but if I did interfere it was because I had been asked to second the motion, and you, Mr. Speaker—and I am not accusing Mr. Speaker of doing anything he should not have done—inserted the name of my hon. friend sitting to my right. I do not wish, at this stage of the discussion, to offer more than a few remarks on points that may probably not have been touched or noticed during the debate. I consider this a very important question. It is important, not because it is the case of the hon. gentleman who is sitting on the Government benches, and whom we are opposing, but because I consider the laws of this country have not been respected. I wish to discuss this subject without any party feeling, and merely from the standpoint of the existing law.

No man in this Parliament or outside of it will contend that the writer of a letter, the moment he puts it into the post office, has any control over it. We know well that it is the recipient of the letter who has all to do with it the moment it reaches him through the mail. If that were not so, what would be the use of Parliament passing stringent laws for the protection of letters in transit through the post office. The hon. the Speaker of the House has admitted that a letter was placed upon his desk, and he says in effect: in looking over my correspondence at the time when I generally open my letters, the hon. member for Richelieu came into my office and stated that he had written a letter which he wanted back. We have now before the House the declaration of the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Marcotte) that that very letter contained the resignation of the hon. gentleman from Richelieu, duly signed before two members of this House. Sir, let me draw your attention to this point. Acting in your capacity as Speaker of the House of Commons, acting in your capacity as the first commoner in the land, a letter addressed to the Speaker of this House is no longer his private property but becomes the property of the House of Commons and of the people of Canada. Let us suppose a case. Take the case of the Postmaster General of this country, a position occupied by an hon. gentleman who is absent from his seat to-night, and a position which I had the honour to occupy; and supposing a letter were addressed to the Postmaster General containing tenders for mail service; will you tell me, Mr. Speaker, that the Postmaster would not be liable to an action in damages if he returned a letter containing the lowest tender to the writer of that letter who asked him for it? Would he not be liable to an action for damages if he did not open that letter? I contend, Sir, that in his official capacity the Postmaster General had no right and no power not to open that letter, and I believe that the case is exactly the same under the present circumstances. If the Speaker of this House had opened that letter and taken communication of it, he could not have returned it to the hon. member (Mr. Bruneau), and does this Parliament think that the constituents of Richelieu can still recognize the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bruneau) as representing their views and their ideas, when he committed the formal act of calling two of his colleagues to witness his resignation and sending it to the Speaker. Will not the people of Richelieu and the people of the country believe, that all the circumstances should be sifted that led up to the tendering of this resignation. I claim that that letter was not addressed to the Speaker in his personal capacity, but was addressed to him as the presiding officer of this House, as the first commoner in the land, as the representative of this Parliament and as the guardian of our parliamentary usages. Under those circumstances, I hold that it was impossible for the Speaker to have returned that letter. You, Mr. Speaker, are responsible to Parliament, and it was to Parliament that you should have returned the letter, or made its contents known. The law of the land says that you, Mr. Speaker, should have taken this course.

Now, Sir, what is going to be the result of the refusal of the right hon. the leader of the Government to refer this matter to the proper committee. What is going to prevent any man in Canada who stands up for the rights of our parliamentary institutions, taking out an action against the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau) and claiming the severe damages which are inflicted upon a gentleman who sits in Parliament and is not a properly qualified member. Sir, everything that the right hon. gentleman wishes not to be disclosed before a parliamentary committee will be disclosed before a court of justice. You, Mr. Speaker, can be called as a witness before a court of justice—you have been so-called once before—and Mr. Speaker, the two hon. gentlemen who witnessed the resignation of the hon. member for Richelieu will be brought up as witnesses. The points that a committee could investigate will be investigated before a court of justice in Canada, and what shall be gained except the knowledge that parliamentary institutions have been violated. I would advise the right hon. the leader of the House—I am very much afraid he will not accept my advice though—to let this matter go before a parliamentary committee rather than leave it to be argued before a court of justice. Sir, under the law which regulates the transmission of letters through the post office, that letter was no longer within the jurisdiction of Mr. Speaker to return to the hon. member for Richelieu, who after getting two of his confreres to witness his resignation came to the Speaker and said: I made a mistake, and I am sorry for that mistake, and I want you to return the letter which I have written in a moment of haste. I do not at all accuse the Speaker of anything more than the fact that that letter was addressed to him as Speaker of the House of Commons. At that point I stand, and I say that unless we stand at that point it will be almost impossible ever to control the relations which exist between the Speaker of the House, not personally, but as representing the Commons, and the members who have dealings with him.

Mr. MONK. Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to add to what has been said that I think this is a question which might properly be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I listened attentively to the speech of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), and it seemed to me to be directed largely to an exoneration of your own conduct, Sir. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think we should emphasize the fact that nothing in this motion has the effect of calling your conduct in question in the slightest degree. But if we adopt the suggestion of the right hon. Prime Minister, it seems to me that we consecrate the principle that a member of this House desiring to place his resignation on record is dependent to a certain extent on the action which the Speaker himself may take upon that resignation—that the power to resign depends upon your action, Mr. Speaker; and I do not think that is at all the intention of the law. Again, if we adopt the suggestion of the right hon. Prime Minister, we consecrate the principle that a member having fulfilled all the requirements of the statute, has still the power to withdraw, unless you, Sir, have yourself taken some action upon his resignation; and I think that is a very false and a very dangerous principle for us to consecrate. Furthermore, it seems to me, we are consecrating the principle, and a very dangerous one, I submit, it is, that a member may put into operation the machinery indicated by the statute, in order to bring to bear upon the Government pressure for the satisfaction of his own personal desires. There is no doubt, Sir, that a case is very easily supposable of a member sending in his resignation in the same manner in which it was done in this case to you, Mr. Speaker, then letting it be known that he has taken that very important step, and then proceeding to exercise a pressure upon the Government in order to obtain that which may be unfair; thus placing the Government in the position of being obliged to meet the desires of an hon. member when under ordinary circumstances they would not do so; and, Sir, that is what to a very considerable extent, according to general rumour, has occurred in this instance. It was known throughout the House here on the evening on which the hon. member sent in his resignation, that he had done so; and the next day it was known, and was stated in the press all over the country, that he had done so, not because he desired to withdraw on account of ill-health or some similar motive, but because he was dissatisfied with the Government, because there were questions on which he did not agree with the Government, because the Government had failed to satisfy some of his legitimate desires. Well, Sir, it seems to me that if we pass over this circumstance, we are consecrating a very dangerous principle indeed—a principle which seems to me not only to have been provided against by the very terms of the statute, but to be against the very fundamental principles of free parliamentary government. There is a saying in my province that lawyers invariably disagree because they are always reading out of different kinds of books; but in this instance, we have the spectacle of lawyers disagreeing when reading out of the same book; and the laws contained in that book seem to me to be very clear. They seem to me to place the power of resigning entirely in the hands of the member himself without any co-operation of any kind on the part of the Speaker. I do not wish to go over the legal arguments which have already been made; but what seems to me to be required of a member desiring to resign is that he should put his resignation in writing, that he should give it authenticity by having it witnessed by two members, and that he should cause it to be delivered to the Speaker. I cannot say that I agree with the argument that it is necessary for the Speaker to take even the slight action, on the delivery of the document, of taking some cognizance of it, because that would require his co-operation; and it seems to me that the law has been in contemplation that a member should have the power to resign without any action whatever on the part of the Speaker. There is no doubt whatever that that delivery has taken place, and these things having occurred, what does the statute say? It says:

The member so tendering his resignation shall be held to have vacated his seat, and shall cease to be a member of this House.

Under these circumstances, it seems to me that it is competent for an hon. member who has caused his resignation to be made in the proper form and to be delivered to the Speaker, to accept at once, without any action on the part of the Speaker, any situation incompatible with his holding a seat in this House—for instance, to enter into a contract with the Government, which he would be forbidden to do as a member of this House; and, as has been already pointed out, if the Speaker mislays a document or if that document is not taken into communication by him at once, it makes no difference whatever; the seat becomes vacant by its very delivery. The subject, at any rate, it seems to me, from what has been said in this debate, is one that may fairly be discussed, and I think it is a subject on which we should have a report from the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

I would have refrained from even expressing these views had it not been that my hon. friend the member for Champlain (Mr. Marcotte) has been made an object of very unfair attack in respect to the action he has thought fit to take in this matter. It was stated in the organ of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) that that hon. gentleman had acted in this matter not of his own free will, but under the absolute control of a set of members alleged to be on this side of the House—and their names are given in this article—whose main object in life is the humiliation of the French-Canadian race; and remarks of a most insulting character, and most untrue, ridiculous and grotesque, are addressed to the hon. member.

Well, Sir, we who sit on this side as well as members on the other side have duties to perform. We act, and we speak in the fierce light of publicity, and must be prepared to accept a certain amount of criticism and even at times to be charged with being animated with party motives. But when it comes to an accusation of this gravity, when it comes to charging an hon. member with the low design of betraying his own nationality in a matter of this kind. I think we are really entitled to the protection of this House. At any rate that is my excuse for rising, namely, that I think the position taken by the hon. member for Champlain, as to whose patriotism nobody has any doubt whatever, is a fair and logical position, and one that commends itself to the attention of this House and country.

Mr. RUSSELL. I think, Mr. Speaker, that this is one of the questions we are bound to approach in rather a judicial than in a partisan spirit; and it seems to me that a good deal of what has been said on the other side has not been addressed to us in a judicial spirit at all or with the view of throwing light on the real question. In fact, there was an alarming vista disclosed to us of the hideous things which this committee would bring to light if this question were referred to it. For my part I would be very much more inclined to refer this matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, if the question were simply whether an hon. member had actually tendered his resignation and was or was not a member of the House, than I would be if this reference were to be the means of bringing to light all the secrets of the Liberal party which these hon. gentlemen tells us are so hideous and so revolting. And what would make me still more disinclined for a reference to the committee would be the misgiving that inquiries of that sort, set on foot for that particular purpose, are very apt to prove boomerangs and reveal instead the inner history of the machinations of the Liberal-Conservative party, as illustrated by the committee of inquiry now being held and concerning which our hon. friends opposite are not so keen as they were some time ago.

But speaking seriously, it seems to me that the preliminary question we have to consider is whether there are any facts which could be brought out by this committee that we do not know already—whether there is any essential question of fact as to which this House is in the dark, and to which it is necessary this House should have an answer before it can come to a conclusion. It seems to me that the matters of fact have been exhaustively stated in the recital of the resolution before the House and the statement made by the Speaker the other day. If that statement imports verity, and I think it should to this House—I for one should be sorry, indeed, by any vote or course of mine, to suggest that any statement, deliberately and seriously made by his honour the Speaker, presiding over this House, can import anything but absolute veracity—if we are justified in accepting the statement of the Speaker as declaring the whole truth and nothing but the truth, and in assuming that he was not committing any supressio veri, there is no fact necessary to be ascertained by us in order to enable us to come to a conclusion on the question before us.

That being the case, what is it that is asked for? If I understand the suggestions from the other side, this committee is asked for the very ungracious purpose of cross-examining the Speaker on the statement he has submitted. I for one am not prepared, by any vote I may give in this House, to suggest for a moment to the people of this Dominion that the Speaker is capable of making any statement which can be improved by cross-examination. The facts being admitted, the only questions remaining are legal ones which no committee can assist us in discussing. We have the same opportunity of ascertaining the law and applying it to questions of fact as any committee can possibly have. And as far as the question of law at issue is concerned, although I cannot say it is such an absolutely simple matter as one would like a matter of this sort to be, I am prepared, giving it the calmest judgment I can, to vote that there was not a complete resignation of the member for Richelieu, even admitting that he was willing and desirous, at one stage, of expressing his intention of resigning his seat in this House. The fair way to test that question is this. Let us suppose that this statute, instead of saying that a member could resign his seat by delivering a written declaration, signed by two witnesses, to his honour the Speaker, provided that a member of this House could resign his seat by going personally to the chambers of the Speaker and declaring to the Speaker his intention to resign. Suppose then that the member had gone to his honour the Speaker, and had declared to him his intention and desire to resign, and suppose that his honour had been unable to hear the declaration and had not heard it, but had known that some declaration was made, and had asked the hon. member to repeat it. And suppose that before the hon. member had the opportunity of repeating it, he had been taken kindly by the arm by one of his friends and persuaded not to do so but to revoke it as far as he was able; and suppose that, under such circumstance, instead of repeating the declaration he had made, he had told the Speaker that although he had come there with the intention of resigning his seat, circumstances had arisen which made him change his mind, and that he had no longer such intention. Could any one say that the seat was resigned, under the imaginary conditions I am putting and the law I have stated hypothetically as bearing on the question. No one would suggest for a moment that under such circumstances the resignation was complete. If that be correct, what more is a written declaration that the conveyance to a party of the substance of a verbal declaration. What is a written declaration? "It is," as has been well expressed by a distinguished writer on jurisprudence, "nothing but the dumb agent by which a verbal declaration is conveyed." This matter is not a new matter. It has perhaps being argued over in the courts almost more than any other subject of equal apparent simplicity. It is a matter which came before a very distinguished French tribunal in the old country, and I take from a very authoritative work on the subject of communications by letter, these words:

Bartolus, whom all authors have copied in this regard, has established upon law 4 'de donationibus,' a principle which puts this in the clearest light. A letter says he is for the absent to whom it is written what words are addressed to a person present, and he who sends a letter to another is considered as speaking to him as if he was present.

Then he quotes some Latin, which I will not stop to read, because I am afraid I might be asked to translate it. He proceeds:

Now it is certain that words addressed to a person present can only bind him who uttered them, so far as the person to whom they were addressed heard them before they were retracted. It is, therefore, the same of a letter written to an absent person. This letter, therefore, can only oblige its author so far as the absent person to whom it is written receives and reads it, things being still entire.

This is the necessary consequence of the very definition which the demandant gives of a letter missive. A letter missive is only a series of words fixed upon paper; but these words are addressed to an absent person. It is necessary, therefore, in order that they should have their effect, that the absent person to whom they are addressed should understand them. They are, therefore, without effect, so far as he to whom they were addressed has not understood them, as they would be without effect if being addressed to a person present that person was from a physical cause not in a condition to understand them. Now, how can an absent person understand the words that are addressed to him? Certainly he can only understand them by reading the letter which contains them.

Well, now, the logic, the moral, the common sense of that is, that until these words communicated through the post office, or by special messenger, reach the party to whom they are addressed—not merely until the physical material upon which they are written, had been received, but until the sense or import of the words has reached the mind—there has been no effective communication. Therefore, the person who makes such a communication is in exactly the same position, in point of common sense, as if he, being present and attempting to make the verbal communication, had not succeeded in doing so, and, before he had succeeded in doing, had retracted the message he had intended and endeavoured to deliver. I think that is a fair and reasonable statement and the essence of this whole case.

But then the suggestion is made: Surely, you are not going to leave the member dependent upon the contingency of whether the Speaker will or will not read the letters addressed to him. No, I am not. I think we may be materially assisted at this point by the law on an analogous case. Of course, it is impossible to state any theory upon this subject to which persons—I will not designate the character of such persons—may not raise objections, or concerning which they may not ask foolish questions. The question is: What if the Speaker refuses to read the letter? Can he thus prevent an effective communication? I think we shall be materially assisted by considering the well-known principles of English law with reference to offers and acceptances. It seems to me, that a person who tenders his resignation is much in the position of a person who undertakes to accept, through the mail, an offer that has been made to him. If my hon. friend on the other side, who knows all about horses, makes an offer to sell me a horse, and I post a letter accepting that offer, it is good English law—though I am told by those who know, that it is not good French law—that the moment I put my letter in the post office accepting the offer that has been made through the post office, that moment I have a complete contract to which I can hold the other party who has made the offer. That is, of course, supposing he had not withdrawn the offer in the meantime and before my offer was posted. I may have received his letter making the offer and may have decided to accept it, but, if I do not signify that acceptance, my having made up my mind on the subject is not sufficient. It seems to me, that a person in such a case as the present delivering his resignation, is in the same position as a person accepting an offer. One has a legal right to accept the offer, the other has a legal right to tender his resignation. I cannot see that they are not in practically the same position. One is a right which is given by statute, and the other is a right given by the offer of the party and the law of the land applicable to it. Having posted my letter of acceptance of the offer, the other party is bound. I believe it has been decided in the English courts of law, that, even if he never receives it, even if the letter altogether goes astray, the contract is still complete as against the other party.

But does that say that the person who sends a letter of acceptance cannot retract it, if he succeeds in getting retraction to the other party before he knows about the acceptance, and before communication of it has been perfectly made? Surely, it would not be good common sense to say otherwise. I know that some writers have said otherwise. I know that when Mr. Benjamin was dying of heart trouble, somewhere in the old country, some foolish editors did strive to show that that was the law; but no one thinks that that is the law to-day. Why cannot we accept this analogy, which seems to be a perfect one, and regard the resignation as binding upon the Speaker, upon the House and the country, that when the party who tenders his resignation tenders it in the way provided in the statute, he can insist upon it as his right and that his right to resign in this way is not dependent on the mere judgment or discretion, or mere dilatoriness of the Speaker. But, at the same time, if he changes his mind and chooses to retract, why is he not in a position exactly analogous to that of a person who accepts an offer made to him?

Now, it seems to me, further, that hon. gentlemen opposite have been confusing two distinct matters. The hon. members opposite have confused two different questions in this discussion. We are not concerned with the question who has the property in this letter. The property of that letter may have been the property of the Speaker or of this House, or it may be the property of this country, but it makes not the slightest difference whose property it is. We are not discussing the right of property at all, but we are asking: What is the effect of this attempted tender of resignation, of this attempt to make a communication which in point of fact never was made. That I submit is an entirely different question from any question relating to property which I suppose is settled, although I do not know that it is absolutely settled by the Post Office Act which, for certain purposes at all events makes a letter which is once mailed the property of the person to whom it is addressed. I will give the House authority for making a distinction of that sort, although it is a matter which is so obvious that it should not call for any authority. The same writer, to whom I have already referred, says:

Grant that you are the owner of the material of my letter from the moment when I committed it either to your carrier or to a public carrier who is the carrier of everybody, at the proper hour. That does not deprive my letter of the character of a dumb agent; it does not consequently prevent me from recalling it before you have received it.

He was only discussing the question of a case where it was not received. Had it been received and not read, the result would be the same as shown in another part of the judgment which I have already quoted.

Now, the other portions of that statute were so acutely commented upon that I do not feel disposed to make any further comment. "The member so tendering his resignation should be held to have vacated his seat." Reading these words literally you can make an apparently strong superficial argument like the argument in favour of the case put forward from the other side. But the moment you apply legal principles and the principles of jurisprudence to the interpretation of that statute the contention of the other side dissolves into thin air. Suppose the hon. gentleman who it is said tendered his resignation had in the same way tendered his quarter's rent, that it had gone sealed up in an envelope,—suppose he had sent that to the Speaker sealed up in an envelope, but before the Speaker had taken it into his possession, when it was lying on his table, suppose the sender had come to get back his letter, that he had got it and gone away with it, would anybody then say that he had tendered his rent, and that he was no longer indebted for the rent he had been owing? That is the kind of analogy by which great jurists like Lord Bramwell answered just such a question as we are wrestling with to-night. Now, I think we have also some help from the analogy of English legal cases. I have cited a French case on this question because of the fact that as everybody knows that the English courts have run a little off the track of strict logic and have delivered judgments on this subject which are not philosophical, although I do not admit that they afford any consolation to our friends opposite. I will cite an authority on the question of service through the post office of what is called mesue process. I do not know that it is a controlling authority on this question, but I think it has a close analogy to the kind of question the House is dealing with to-night. There it was decided in one case where a party with whom there had been a previous correspondence, was supposed to have received by mail mesue process addressed to him through the post office, and had been evidently evading the process of the court and was by that act committing contempt of court, that he must be held to have received service of the document so sent. When a similar case came before the court again, the court did not act upon the law that was decided in that case. As a matter of fact they did not adopt the law that was laid down in that case, but they said, when the case I have just mentioned was cited that a service by mail was insufficient, although the defendant was wilfully evading service and proposed to persevere in evading it and when the letter was offered to her by the postmaster refused to receive it.

I do not know any distinction between refusing to receive a letter and receiving it through the post office and immediately handing it back, and I do not think that any rational distinction can be made. I will read only one further authority:

Delivery of process sealed up in a letter, in the absence of the person to whom it is addressed, is no service, but from the time when the letter is opened.

I think the attempted tender of this resignation, sealed up in a letter, delivered to the Speaker, not read by the Speaker, of the purport of which the Speaker did not have knowledge, which was retracted before ever communication of its contents was made to the Speaker, was not an effective resignation of the seat of that hon. member.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose it is a little rash for a layman to meddle with this debate, which has belonged mostly to the lawyers. But when some of the lawyers talk such nonsense as some of them have talked on this, it gives a layman who lays claim to a little common sense, a chance to edge in. There have been several things which have been noteworthy, somewhat peculiar, in the attitude which the Government has assumed on this question. When this debate was put off from last Friday until to-day on the grounds that the Government wished to inform itself by getting an opinion from the law officers of the Crown, and after all the trouble had been taken, as of course we suppose it was taken, to get this opinion of the law officers of the Crown, the House has been looking with a good deal of anxiety to have that opinion given to it, so that it might have the benefit of the legal wisdom and lore possessed by the Government in the person of its law officers as well as of themselves. According to their own argument our minds on this side of the House need informing almost as much as they do on the other side. But not only have we not had any information of what the decision of the law officers of the Crown has been with reference to this question, but we have not had the law officers of the Crown in this House doing us the courtesy of giving us an opinion, and so helping to form our minds upon this largely legal question. Why is it that the only representative of the law department of the Government, who sits in this House and gets his salary from this country, is not here when a debate like this is going on, ready and prepared to give the House the benefit of his search and investigation, and his conclusions with reference to this matter? I do not think it is treating the House right, I do not think the Government is doing itself justice, I am quite sure that the Solicitor General is not at all doing himself and this House the justice which he should do both to himself and to the House. It may be said that the Ajax of the Government side, in point of law, has raised his spear and brandished it in front of the House. He does that often. But it does not have very much effect on this side of the House. His brandishments so far have been only brandishments, and his opinions have not gone far on this side of the water and have not gone very far on the other side of the water. While we have been glad to receive the crumbs that have fallen from the Government table, we should have liked to have had the benefit of the full table of the law officers of the Crown. And why should we not have had it?

Where has the hon. member for Richelieu been all this time? I should like a question of this kind to come up with respect to my own seat when I would not be in my place, doing my duty in the premises. Where is the hon. member for Richelieu? We have had many cases somewhat similar to this in the House affecting the seats of members of Parliament, and this is the first time I have ever known a member's seat attacked and the hon. gentleman to be outside of the House when he might just as well be inside the Chamber, at a time when his colleagues equally with himself were anxious that his name and his place should be kept, if he has a legal right to keep it, and when the House could have had the benefit of his statement, because he is the prime actor and prime mover and must have known and must know yet something about this question. Then we have not heard from those godfathers of the hon. member for Richelieu, the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Godbout), who sits opposite, and his Gaelic godfather, whom I do not see, but who is very likely present in the House. Did they sign the resignation of the hon. member for Richelieu, or did they not? They have not denied it, and I do not think they will deny it. But the point I wish to make is this: why is it that in a case of this kind, when an hon. member's seat is attacked, we have neither his facial presence nor his word of mouth, nor any sign or any intimation from him as to the facts of the case. There is another thing which is peculiar about this case. Can any one give any good reason why the Government should be averse to letting this matter, which even so partisan a partisan as the hon. member who has just taken his seat, lawyer though he be, has declared is not entirely void of doubt, go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which is the highest and most non-partisan committee we have struck from the members of the House, and whose judgment will be taken as a fair indication of the legal rights in the case. What has the Government to lose from allowing this matter to be discussed before the Committee on Privileges and Elections? If it had been reported that the seat of the hon. member for Richelieu was rightly held, that he properly occupied the seat, that would have been a triumph for the Government and a discomfiture for their opponents. If he had not the right to his seat, had the right hon. gentleman so far fallen from those high ideals he held up at the time he was leading Her Majesty's Opposition, that he wished to keep a man as a member who is not a member of this House. One of the two positions is correct. Either we are wrong and the seat is all right—that would have to be decided by the committee; or we are right and the member is wrong, and the hon. member for Richelieu has no right to his seat; in which case we would all be glad that justice was done, even though it came to a friend of our own.

There is another thing somewhat peculiar, and it is this. There is an attempt made to discredit the effort of my hon. friend who made this motion and the hon. member who seconded it, on two grounds, both of them unworthy, and equally unworthy, in my opinion. One is to turn the point of the attack by accusing hon.

members on this side of doubting the word of Mr. Speaker, or wishing to get Mr. Speaker in the witness-box so that we could cross-examine him. It is an unworthy attempt, and it is the reason, I believe, which is mainly responsible for the fact that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) stated when he rose to speak that at first he did not think he would have much objection to this case going to the committee, but when he began to think of the evil deeds with which the Government might be charged, he changed his ground; his broad judicial intellect warped like a pea on a hot griddle, for he thought it might cause a state of things that would be detrimental to the party, and so he was prepared to vote against the reference and depart from the path of right, the road of justice in this matter.

Mr. RUSSELL. Does the hon. member really think he is presenting what I said, or anything like it?

Mr. FOSTER. I well know the hon. gentleman's speech was a revised one, and I taxed my mental concentration to get the kernel of it, but I find it very difficult to do so, and I am giving just a running comment on what I understood the hon. gentleman to intimate.

Mr. RUSSELL. I noticed the hon. gentleman was suffering.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the hon. gentleman must rest in peace until he gets another opportunity. So far as I am concerned, I am bound to admit, and I do it cheerfully, that you, Mr. Speaker, stated nothing which you did not believe to be the truth in your statement made before the House the other day. I do not understand that any hon. member on this side of the House says anything differently; but I have just as good a right to analyse the statement of Mr. Speaker as I have the statement of any hon. member; we are all representatives of the people, and with all deference due to the high and official position, we must stand on the common ground of criticism. But if that was an unworthy motive, what can be said of that one which emanated from the hon. Minister of Public Works, who issues that paper, that costly, that precious paper—which he inherits from whom we know not—but for whom we know—who issues that paper to throw obliquely if possible, on the hon. member who made the motion, by trying to make it appear that it was an attack on a French member, forsooth. What is a French member, an Irish member, or an English member? They stand here because of certain rights under the law; and if they do not possess those rights, it makes no difference whether they are English, Scotch, Irish or French, their position should be inquired into and the rights of the case ought to be arrived at. I am not a lawyer, but I can consider what this matter means according to common sense.

What was the object Parliament had in view when it enacted that law? The object was evidently to give a means by which a member might hand in his resignation and cease to be a member. This under discussion is one of the ways by which he could do so; write his resignation, have it properly attested and deliver it or send it to Mr. Speaker. It seems to me that that is one action and is in itself complete. But the whole action is not complete until the constituency is placed in the position where it can replace the member who has resigned. What is the machinery by which that can be carried out? Under the law the machinery is Mr. Speaker. The member himself is competent to hand in his resignation without any co-operation of Mr. Speaker, and he does so. The Speaker himself, however, is the only machinery by which it is possible for the constituency to obtain the power to fill the vacancy and place a member in the position of the member who went out. Is it not a matter of plain common sense that what was intended was this, that when the hon. member for Richelieu wanted to resign he should be able to resign without any complication or embarrassment from his own side of the House, or from the leader. And so his resignation was complete the moment he had written his intention, had it witnessed as the law declared it should be witnessed, and sent it on its way to the Speaker; he had nothing more to do, and his seat became vacant when that was done. But before the constituency could be apprised of that, or given an opportunity to replace this man who went out, Mr. Speaker has to take cognizance of that, to issue his warrant and to make it possible for the election to be held. It seems to me, that each action is complete in itself, and that each action is entirely independent of the other, in so far as affecting each particular part of the act which is to be completed. Now, Sir, if that be true, let us ask what the converse would be, and if the hon. member for Richelieu could not resign until he has had a consultation with the Speaker. Why, that would not be admitted for a single moment. The Speaker and he had nothing in common, the Speaker and he are to have no co-operation, the Speaker and he are distinct, as they ought to be for the sake of the independence of Parliament; and, when the member resigning does his part, it is for the Speaker to do his part, and allow the constituency to send back their man. I am not a lawyer, but that is the common-sense view I take, and I believe that is the view that the country will take.

speaking to a friend in dumb language, so to say. Well, we knew that; I suppose the most of us knew that some time ago. I sit down and write a letter; I imagine my friend before me—or my enemy before me, it may be—and I just allow my thoughts to run through the point of the pen. There is this difference, Sir, between the tongue and the pen, that, when the pen has taken my thoughts and carried them away from me, they are set and fixed, and they cannot be unset and unfixed; the tongue, as it speaks, with a face before it, may make as many turns as it pleases, and may change the thoughts that may be expressed, as it pleases. But, Sir, it was never apprehended by the law, that a member who wished to resign had to go and talk to the Speaker, where he would have a chance to canvas things, and talk things over, and think things over; but the machinery was laid down by the law that he should write his resignation, and write the thought he had then—whatever thought he might have five minutes afterwards. Suppose we examine the case in the light of the contention of my hon. friend (Mr. Russell). Suppose the member penned that letter, and the moment it came to Mr. Speaker's hands, was just a verbal communication put through the dumb language of a letter, but the interpretation that that pen gave when the thought was in the mind of the member for Richelieu was the idea that was carried to the Speaker's mind; and, by the contention of hon. gentlemen opposite, if the Speaker had just happened to have opened that letter and to have read the contents, even though only one minute after it was penned, then, if the member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau) came into the Speaker's office, he could not possibly undo the thing which he had done. The expression of opinion at the time is what carries in the letter, and the expression of the resignation given at the moment, duly attested, remains fixed, and after it was despatched to the Speaker there was no possibility of it being recalled.

Now, Sir, I take another point. It was not simply J. D. Edgar who was acting in his office that morning, when these letters were there and were being turned over. It was the Speaker of the House of Commons who was there, and I say that, if the Speaker of the House of Commons had, knowing that that was a letter bearing the resignation of the hon. member for Richelieu, had given it back to him five thousand times without having read it, and without having had any communication of it to his mind, that would not alter the case one iota, and the plight of the member for Richelieu would be no better than if the Speaker had issued his warrant. His (Mr. Bruneau's) case would not be a bit better, I say, because it is laid down in the law that a certain process makes the resignation complete, and the other process, which is carried on by the Speaker, is what makes it effective so far as the constituency is concerned. The Speaker was not acting personally; his party views had no business to come in, as he declares they did not come in, and as I believe they did not come in. Had Mr. Speaker loved the member for Richelieu ever so much; had he been his own brother; had he loved his party ever so much more than a brother—his personal views and party predilections were all to be placed under foot: Mr. Speaker was then the trustee for Richelieu county and for the people of this country. And, as the trustee for that county and for the people of Canada, that resignation, once conveyed to Mr. Speaker's possession, robbed the member for Richelieu of any chance of ever getting it legally back, and should have made the Speaker, as I believe—and it is only my opinion—at this date, yes, even at this hour, it should have made him to think and to say: If I can find out that that letter which Mr. Bruneau took away from me, was his resignation, and that it was laid on my desk in my office, his resignation is complete. And so I believe it is, Mr. Speaker. It would be well, therefore, for the committee to take this matter up and to examine it, for there are several things that are not well known. Now, the weakest part of the case stated by my right hon. friend, and by his Minister of Marine and Fisheries, is this evident attempt to say that such a thing is so which is not so, on the face of it. They declared that they would not accept this motion. Why? Because the principal allegation of fact has been set at rest by the Speaker's own assertion. Will hon. gentlemen pause a moment while I read this declaration upon which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Marcotte) bases his motion? First:

François Arthur Marcotte, member of the House of Commons for the county of Champlain, having stated in his place that he was credibly informed and believed he could establish that Arthur Aimé Bruneau, Esquire, then member for the electoral district of Richelieu in this House, did during the present session of Parliament declare, according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, his intention to resign his seat.

That is his first statement, and what does he say in it? He says, he believes he could establish that Arthur Aimé Bruneau had handed in his resignation. My right hon. friend the leader of the House refuses to give him a chance to establish that. The hon. member (Mr. Marcotte) says, he is credibly informed that the hon. gentleman from Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau) has placed his resignation in the Speaker's hands, and that he could establish it. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), with that sense of justice which may be apparent to him, but is not to us, on this side of the House, and will not be, I think, to the people of the country, refuses to give him (Mr. Marcotte) a chance to make that allegation good. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Marcotte) further says:

That Joseph Godbout, Esquire, the member for the electoral district of Beauce, and John McMillan, Esquire, the member for the electoral district of the South Riding of Huron, were witnesses to the said declaration.

That needs no proof; that is generally accepted as being the case. Now, then, this is where Mr. Speaker's declaration comes in, and the Speaker's words are simply surplusage put into this resolution, and the resolution would be just as strong if they were not inserted at all. What are they put in for? Merely to say, that in this declaration of the Speaker a document is mentioned which he believes is the resignation of the member for Richelieu:

That the said declaration is, he believes he can establish, the document referred to in the following statement of His Honour the Speaker of the House of Commons.

That would have been just as strong as it is now if he had said: "That the said declaration is, he believes he can establish, the document referred to in a statement made by His Honour the Speaker of the House of Commons addressed to the House of Commons on March 14, 1898." What follows? That the words of the Speaker are not material to this resolution at all. The only thing affirmed is that the document which the Speaker mentioned to the members of the House of Commons is the document in question, the declaration of the hon. member for Richelieu. What is the next affirmation of the motion? That this declaration was tendered within the meaning of the Act; and then there is the resolution that this statement, including the statement of the Speaker, be sent to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Now, Sir, I think I have said enough to show that if hon. gentlemen opposite refuse this committee on the ground that that is the principal allegation—in fact, as they have stated, the only allegation—they are taking a very flimsy ground, and ground which will not commend itself to the good sense of this House or of the country. But let us go further. It is said that the Speaker declared that no resignation was in his hands from the member for Richelieu, so far as he knew. The Speaker said:

If I had received his resignation, I would have issued my warrant for a new election before now.

Granted that that is true; the whole point is as to what the Speaker would mean by the reception of a resignation from a member of this House. The Speaker may have taken the same view that hon. gentlemen on that side have taken, that he could not be said to have received a resignation until it had been communicated to his mind through his eyes from the writing on the paper on which it was placed. Hon. gentlemen opposite have taken that ground.

The Speaker himself might have taken that ground. Taking that ground he would be perfectly right in stating that he had not received a resignation in that sense. So that the statement of the Speaker proves nothing against the resignation being in the Speaker's hands until you know what the Speaker's view is of what a proper reception of a member's resignation is. So much with reference to that.

Now, Sir, I am not going to spend more time upon the question. I rose simply to give my own view, and that is a layman's view, of how this matter strikes me. It is a matter in which the whole House is interested. It is not a partisan matter. Nobody believes that it is peculiarly gratifying to a member of this House to rise and attack the seat of another member. It is not, and we on this side of the House would be very glad indeed to know that the hon. member for Richelieu had not sent in any resignation, and that consequently he now held his seat rightly and properly under the law of the land. But this is a duty which devolves upon a member of the Opposition, because no member on the Government side will ever be found attacking the seat of a brother member supporting the Government. It is the duty of the Opposition to watch these things, and it is the duty of the Opposition to see that these things are kept in proper legal position. Now, we on this side feel that the hon. member for Richelieu, having sent in his resignation, is no longer a member of this House, and we ask for a chance to have that question adjudicated upon by the Privileges and Elections Committee, which is the highest and best legal committee we can get in this House. Why should it not be done? There is no difficulty about the partisan business which my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Russell) spoke about, because hon. gentlemen opposite control the committee, so far as party votes go, if there are any party votes in that committee, by having a majority upon it. There is therefore no liability of any harm coming to their party or to the men concerned, because of the introduction of partisan topics. When a request like this is preferred, when ground like this is taken, when there is a grave doubt, even amongst the best of them on that side of the House, as to whether or not this has been a valid resignation, why is it that we cannot have a chance to settle the point? For it is of great moment that it should be settled. That question has been raised, and from this time out there will be two opinions in this House and throughout the country as to what makes a proper resignation, and it is better for the political life of this country in every respect that that point should be settled, and settled as quickly as possible. It is better for the political life of the country in another sense; for, if it becomes possible for members supporting a Government to kick and ask for concessions, and when they do not get them to kick again and again, to the length of putting their letter of resignation into the post office directed to the Speaker, and then in forming the leader of the party that if those concessions do not come the letter will be allowed to take its course, with the idea floating in their minds that if the right hon. leader of a Government caves in in time, that letter will be again fished out of the office of the Speaker, I want to know what will be the political life of this country, if that becomes a dominant idea, and if it becomes a fact carried out in practice. Surely it will not be for the better political life of this country. Hon. gentlemen opposite may laugh and gibe at this position; but there is another tribunal outside, and that is the great electorate, who watch these things, and who will ask two questions. The first question will be, did the member for Richelieu actually resign his seat? That is, did he conceive the idea and carry it out to the point that he thought he had resigned? All the great electorate will have to do will be to ask the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) whether the hon. member for Richelieu thought he had resigned or not. All they will have to do will be to ask that question of the hon. gentlemen who were his sponsors, and who knew and witnessed the resignation. All they will have to do will be to ask the question, and there is not a man on that side of the House or on any side of the House, but will say: "Mr. Bruneau did hand in his resignation, and came to the conclusion that he was no longer a member of this House." Common sense people outside, knowing that to be one view, will say, what right has he, then, to re-elect himself without going to his constituency? Is the machinery in Parliament between Speaker and members so loose that a man can get into a pet and resign, and boast about the corridors that he has resigned, and then fish out his resignation, take it back, and re-elect himself?

The common-sense people of this country will answer that question in a simple way. They will say: Yes, the fact is undoubted that the hon. member for Richelieu resigned and is no longer a member of this House. Then the question will be asked as to what kind of hocus pocus it is by which a member can re-elect himself—by which he can resign twenty times in a season, if he pleases, and twenty times plump himself right back into his seat again? And when the people get these two questions in their minds and can answer them, the personnel, the dignity and the honour of a representative institution like this is not helped, but is most liable to be greatly injured by the result which will take place. Hon. gentlemen have a duty to perform to the hon. member for Richelieu. The hon. member for Richelieu will, I suppose, come and sit in this House; but if he does, with the doubt over his power to sit here that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) has placed upon it to-night, he will sit here with the fear and the consciousness that he may be all the time rendering himself liable to the penalties which come upon a man for sitting unauthorized in this House. And if in the after event, it should happen that by process of law the penalties be exacted from the hon. member for Richelieu, what would be the responsibility of my right hon. friend and the party behind him? Is it not far better on all counts that the matter should be sifted by the Privileges and Elections Committee, so that if Mr. Bruneau is reported as being safe in his seat by that committee, then the House will have its answer and the country its answer from a high, dignified source. Otherwise you will have doubt and suspicion, and what is worse a feeling that things are not what they ought to be in the Parliament of Canada.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The question before the Chair turns so largely upon the construction of a statute, it is very natural that the gentlemen of the legal profession should give it particular attention, and perhaps there is good reason why lay members should refrain from saying very much about it. But when my hon. friend who has just preceded me (Mr. Foster) arose and expressed the desire to get away from the legal aspect of the question and approach it from the standpoint of common sense, I fully sympathized with him, although I regret to say that my view of the common-sense question does not exactly harmonize with his. I do think that on a question like this we may well ask: What will the great electorate think of it? And while it may be answered that in matters of this kind we are usually guided by parliamentary rule and precedent and statute, after all the great electorate are in the habit of getting away from these things and taking a broader view, which possibly may not always rest on statutory law or precedent; and in this case, seeing the wide divergence of opinion among legal gentlemen, the great electorate may be pardoned if they apply a little common sense to the question. My hon. friend who preceded me said he desired only to discuss the common-sense aspect of the matter, but proceeded nevertheless to discuss at some length its legal aspect. I do not desire to follow him in that line, because I am sure every point he made has already been dealt with, but let us simply take the facts of the case as they will present themselves to the great electorate—not merely the facts as developed before the House but the broadest view of the so-called facts set forth in the columns of newspapers which were read here to-day. Taking the facts as they are alleged—I do not state anything of my own knowledge but from what I have learned during this debate—we find that an hon. member of this House, being somewhat dissatisfied, makes up his mind to resign. He acts hastily, in a moment of excitement—I had almost said in a moment of weakness, but that would hardly suit the position. On the following morning he makes up his mind that he acted hastily and desires not to act on the intention of the preceding night. Surely that hon. member has the right to ask himself the question whether he has given effect to the intention that was in his mind last night, but is not in it any longer this morning. He is aware that by doing certain things that intention may be carried out beyond his reach; but that if not, it is within his power to retract or withdraw. If that be not so, then gentlemen will contend that if I were to sit down in my room and pen my resignation and lay it on the table, the mere penning of it and the witnessing of it by two witnesses, would constitute a resignation by me of my seat, even if I tore it up immediately. No such preposterous contention will commend itself to the common sense of the great electorate. They would never conclude that the intention was carried out.

Mr. SPROULE. But it reached the Speaker.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman will find no authority for saying that it is enough if the envelope reached the Speaker. It seems to me that the Speaker must receive the resignation not merely into his hands but into his mind. He must have such a knowledge of it as would enable him to do something based on that knowledge, as would enable him to make a record of it—such a record as the Speaker would require when the intention of a member sitting in the House was so stated that it might be recorded by the Clerk of the House—and in the absence of any intention so expressed as to reach the Speaker's mind and enable him to make record of it, or base some action on it, there can be no complete resignation. I do not wish to be drawn into a discussion of the legal aspect of the case, but to confine myself to what my hon. friend referred to as the common-sense view of the great electorate. I am disposed to go a little further than my hon. friends behind me on that point. It has been held that if the member had mailed that letter to the Speaker and if the Speaker had some reason to suspect what it contained, he would have done a great wrong in allowing the member to withdraw it. I am not prepared to adopt that view. I am not prepared to adopt the view that the Speaker in this House, in dealing with his brother members, should strain the law against them. If the case were one in which there is doubt, the Speaker has no right to put a forced construction upon the law for the purpose of turning out a member of Parliament. If there is a precedent, it is his duty to follow it, but there is none in this case. If the statute law is clear, it is equally his duty to apply it, but the statute law is not clear in this matter, as is evident by the debate. Hon. gentlemen opposite are not even agreed among themselves, and their contentions have been denied by hon. gentlemen on this side. Even though the Speaker had received the resignation, that is not enough. He must have the knowledge of it and not the knowledge that he might get it second-hand. Not the knowledge that might be conveyed to him by a third party, or that he might have picked by rumour, but only the knowledge that could be conveyed to him by the reading of the paper itself.

In the absence of a knowledge of the law by the great electorate—and I am sorry to say that the absence of knowledge is likely to continue, in view of the great difference of opinion we have had expressed on this question—I think the question which would present itself to the great electorate, would be: What would happen between private gentlemen in a case of this kind? We have been told that once a letter is posted, it goes beyond the control of the writer and becomes the property of the person to whom it is directed. We admit that it has passed beyond the control of the writer, and I grant you the writer could not go to the post office and get the letter, but that is not the case here. It has passed through the post office, it has passed beyond the control of the post office, and is in the hands of the person to whom it is addressed, but who has not yet taken communication of it. I submit that he has an undoubted right to give back the letter, if he wishes, to the person who wrote it. Therefore the right that does not exist between the person who wrote the letter and the officer of the postal department, may exist as between the person who wrote the letter and the person to whom it is addressed, but who has not received it in the legal sense of the word. Now, if I should have a difference with my hon. friend from York and should tonight write him a letter which, in the morning, I regretted, I should call upon my hon. friend in the morning and say: I wrote a letter to you last night, have you received it? No. Have you read your morning letters? No. I was wrong in writing the letter I did, and would rather have it back. I think that, in all probability, he would give me back the letter. I believe he would think that if there was anything in the letter that I did not, upon reflection, wish him to read, he would think it best to give me back the letter unopened.

Mr. FOSTER. Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) say that that would be a parallel case to a letter given to the Speaker of the House of Commons?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) dealt with that phase of the question and advanced the view that every letter addressed to the Speaker belongs to this House. We have no evidence at present to show whether that letter was addressed to the Hon. J. D. Edgar personally, or to the Speaker of the House of Commons officially.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is what we want a committee to find out.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. But in either case it would make no difference in my view. I am answering the point as it is raised. No doubt, Mr. Speaker receives a great many letters, but with every desire to defer to the wish of the House, I think he would hesitate to accept the rule that every letter that reaches him with his name on the back is the property of the House of Commons. He could not discover until he had opened it and found out whether it related to a private transaction or to a matter coming before him in his official capacity. And so, the whole thing turns upon the opening of the letter and the knowledge of its contents. Therefore the contention that the letter belongs of necessity to the House of Commons is one that I think will not bear examination. Going back to the point, and the only point that I desire to make, it seems to me that, where there are no precedents, as seems to be the case here, where there is no statute law that is clear and beyond discussion, the electorate will apply the same rules as they would apply between man and man. If a man writes a letter at night and desires to recall it before the person to whom it is addressed receives and takes communication of it, between gentlemen the letter would be returned unopened. That is what has happened in this case. That is common sense, and it ought to be sound law. It is what would take place between two private gentlemen, and in the absence of any clear law or established precedent to the contrary the same rule should apply in this case.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). I think it well to dwell for a few moments upon the peculiar grounds of defence adopted by the Government and its supporters. The right hon. the First Minister dealt with this matter, in a way very different from that adopted by the last speaker (Mr. Fielding). The right hon. the First Minister argued that there was no grounds upon which the House might satisfactorily refer this matter to the committee, that there was nothing to settle, there was no question of fact or law that could be profitably referred. That contention has been answered very satisfactorily on this side, notably by the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster). But it has been most satisfactorily answered from the other side of the House. I am sure that if anything were wanted to remove the last shadow of foundation which the Government might claim as support for their contention, that has been supplied by the hon. Finance Minister. He has given abundant matter, in the statements he has made—which may be accepted on his own side but cannot be accepted with authority here—upon which the committee might come to a determination. Therefore I say, that from his own side of the House, not only by the Finance Minister, but by the member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) in the course of his arguments, the argument of the First Minister has been completely knocked down and does not need any more attention. But I think some little attention might be paid to the argument of the hon. the First Minister, that in dealing with resignations of its members, the House is entirely limited in its action by the degree to which Mr. Speaker might get a knowledge of the contents or resignation placed in his hands. I maintain that this is a contention which neither this or any other Opposition can for a moment admit. What is the purpose of this strictly defined and limited mode of resignation set forth in our statutes? It is evident that it is to allow a member of this House to divest himself of his position, to relieve himself from the responsibility of being the trustee and representative of a constituency. It puts it absolutely in his power; and it is important, it is absolutely essential to any Opposition that is going to carry on the business of Opposition in this Parliament with a reasonable degree of efficiency that it should not be wholly in the power of the Government to do as they please in regard to resignations that come from their own side, while those from the other side are dealt with strictly on the line of the statutes. Now take this instance. It was well known that the hon. member for Richelieu had resigned the night before the division on the Yukon Bill. This was the common report and it is absolutely incredible that it should not have come to the knowledge of the Government; that the Ministers did not know that the hon. member for Richelieu had vacated his seat and acting on that belief had abstained from voting. Therefore I maintain that in the eyes of the country and of this House the fact that that gentleman could go to the office of Mr. Speaker and secure from him the return of the envelope which, unquestionably, contained his resignation, is a most suspicious circumstance and suggests wrong-doing; at any rate we have a combination of circumstance that the Opposition cannot afford to overlook. Not only for the good of the Opposition themselves, but for the good of Parliament generally the Opposition is bound to insist upon the prevention of such occurrences in the future. How can they prevent them? The only course is to insist upon sending this matter to the proper committee. And for what purpose? Why, to inquire into every circumstances in connection with the matter, to learn how far the Speaker has gone with propriety in this matter. We do not presume to question the word of Mr. Speaker, but we do question his conduct. It is our privilege, it is our right, it is our duty under certain circumstances, to canvass the Speaker's conduct, and under some circumstances even to condemn it. Does any one contend that Mr. Speaker cannot commit an error of judgment in discharge of the duties of his office? And we accuse him of nothing more. And is it in the interest of Parliament, if he has made an error that it should not be condemned?

There is another question of principle. This resignation was written and signed in the presence of witnesses and placed in the hands of the Speaker. There is no doubt that the envelope handed by the Speaker to the member for Richelieu was the precise envelope containing the resignation.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). No.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to my argument. Take the statement of Mr. Speaker. By whom were these letters turned over? By whom were they handled in the office of Mr. Speaker? Mr. Speaker states:

I turned the unopened letters over in his presence, and he pointed to one with his frank upon it.

Mr. Speaker was then in possession of that letter, it was in his hands, not in the hands of the member for Richelieu. Furthermore, it is plain, although not specifically stated by the Speaker, that that was the only letter of the member for Richelieu that was in his mail.

An hon. MEMBER. He does not say that.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). He does not say that, but it is so plainly implied that there is no doubt about it. The Speaker states there was one letter, he does not speak of more, with the superscription and frank of the member for Richelieu upon it, that letter was claimed by the member for Richelieu and was returned to him by the Speaker unopened, and most unquestionably that was the letter which contained the resignation. There can be no question that that was the only letter from the hon. member for Richelieu, the letter about which he was so solicitous that he went to the office of the Speaker and recovered possession of it. Therefore, the whole case is completely made out, and fulfils every condition of the statute. The member for Richelieu had made out his resignation in proper form, and placed it in possession of the Speaker, and the Speaker returned it to him unopened upon the request of the member for Richelieu. Now, from the standpoint of the country, to say nothing of the standpoint of hon. gentlemen opposite, would any reasonable man doubt for a moment that the members of the Government knew that the member for Richelieu had resigned, that his resignation in written form had passed into the hands of the Speaker, and that when the member for Richelieu went to the Speaker to recover possession of his letter, he did it with the full knowledge of the Government? It is incredible to think for instance, that Mr. Speaker would so far stretch the act that might be required of him by courtesy as to allow a member of this House to recover possession of such an important letter without some indication, no matter from what quarter derived, that it was most important that that letter should be returned to the member for Richelieu? We do not wish to find any fault with Mr. Speaker, as I said, we do not wish to condemn him at all; we simply wish to have this point settled, whether or not, in acting as he did in this matter, he has committed an error of judgment, whether he has done something which a Speaker should not do, either now or at any time in the future. Then, there is another point, the most material of all. This question affects the privileges of this Parliament, and the right of this House to say who shall sit within its walls. Let us assume that by sending this matter before the Committee on Privileges and Elections it can be proved, as I have no doubt it can be proved, conclusively on the evidence of this gentleman who wrote this resignation, and signed it, and who recovered possession of it from the Speaker, that the resignation was made out in every respect complying with the conditions of the statutes, was placed in the possession of Mr. Speaker, and was then recovered from him under these circumstances—I maintain, in that case, that the seat of the member for Richelieu is vacated, and that he can no longer legally sit in this House. That is an important question for the member for Richelieu and for this House; but it is even more important that this question should be settled for the future. It seems to me important that we should settle these two points: Whether the member for Richelieu did comply with all the requirements of the statute, and has consequently vacated his seat; and in the next place, whether the Speaker committed an error of judgment in allowing the member for Richelieu to do what he did. These are two points that it is important should be settled by the committee appointed for that purpose. Now, I will deal for a moment with the contention of the Finance Minister, who argued that this case is parallel with the case of private individuals writing letters to one another and recovering possession of them through common courtesy. I can very well understand that if some one had written me a letter in which he had used some uncomplimentary expression, and if I were in a benevolent mood, as would be very likely to be in the morning, I would rather return him his letter unopened than to come to an open rupture with one who may have been a friend. But this is entirely different. In this matter the correspondence comes to Mr. Speaker in his official capacity. It is not his property, it is the property of the House of Commons, there can be no question whatever about that. In this matter that gentleman was not dealing with his own private property, but was dealing with the property of this House, as a trustee for this House. Now, if the Finance Minister had advertised for tenders for some matters in connection with the Finance Department, if these tenders had been addressed to his deputy, would the Finance Minister justify his deputy if, after these tenders had been received in his office within a certain fixed time, he had returned a tender to one of the contractors unopened, and without a knowledge of its contents? Would the Finance Minister justify his deputy in such a case? Would he not feel—at any rate, if the deputy were one of those unfortunate men who are on the wrong side of politics—would he not feel very much like dismissing his deputy who had been capable of such conduct? I believe he would be a gone deputy in a very short time. The business of no department could be conducted in that manner with any satisfaction to the country. Now, it strikes me that such fine cobweb spinning as we have had from the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) in connection with this legal question, while it may be agreeable to listen to, because it is ingenious and very pleasant in a way, still I do not think it will help the people of the country to come to a rational conclusion as to the rights or wrongs of the subject. It seems to me that the parallel cases cited by the hon. member are all open to this same objection, that they deal with ordinary transactions between private parties, and not, as in this case, between a citizen on the one hand, and an officer of the House, a trustee representing the Parliament of Canada, on the other hand. There is always that difference; these cases are not on all fours at all. That horse transaction the hon. member for Halifax referred to, could not have occurred in these circumstances. Here the hon. member for Richelieu proposed to sell to Mr. Speaker the horse known as the municipality of Richelieu; he thought he was disposing of what was his own property in that matter, but it is a case in which a third party, the House of Commons has something to say. When these hon. gentlemen argue so strongly that this question is not one that is decided by the technical delivery into the hands of the Speaker of a missive, a dumb agent, as mentioned by the hon. member for Halifax, but by the degree of knowledge which the Speaker gets of the contents of that missive, then I maintain that these gentlemen have advanced arguments in favour of a committee so powerful that they do not require to be sustained from this side of the House. We have here a question that should properly be submitted to a committee, and I believe that I am not going beyond the facts, or the evidence, or the substance of the debate that has taken place, when I say that a case has been made out by these gentlemen who have spoken for the Government to-night why a committee should be struck, and why a full inquiry should be made, and why we should have a decision given on these two points, namely, as to how far the Speaker has acted within his right, or committed an error of judgment in taking the course he did, and how far it can be proven that the letter which passed into the hands of the Speaker and was returned to him, was really the precise missive containing the resignation of the member for Richelieu, and whether in that case the seat of the member for Richelieu is not now vacant. These are two important questions, and upon them this House differs very widely. Both these opinions are supported with great force, and there exists therefore abundant material for controversy, and upon which the committee could come to a decision.

Mr. SPROULE. I should like to say a few words before the vote is taken, because this question is very far reaching in its nature, concerning the important functions of Parliament and rights of members of this House elected by the people. The law, which is directory, is clear enough as to how a member may resign. There are two ways in which he may resign. The first is by making an announcement publicly in the House, and the resignation will be taken notice of by Mr. Speaker, and the fact will be entered in the Votes and Proceedings. The second way is by the member preparing a declaration in writing of his intention to resign, having it signed by two witnesses, and handed to Mr. Speaker. When the resignation is so made, signed and delivered, then I take it, that the member has discharged his full duty to Parliament and the country to relieve himself of the responsibility of sitting longer as a member of this House. The only question that would follow, would be as to the mode of delivery. There may be two modes of delivery: first, by messenger; second, through the mails. There is no question here as to the letter of resignation being delivered by a messenger. If there had been, there would have been an eye-witness, and the facts could have been arrived at by taking evidence under oath. The other method is by delivery through the mails. A letter, to be sent through the mail during the session and by a member of Parliament only requires to be franked by the member, and it appears in this case to have been done, because, Mr. Speaker, says:

I turned the unopened letters over in his presence, and he pointed to one with his frank upon it. I asked him if it was his writing on the address and frank. He assured me it was.

There was evidence that must have proved satisfactory. This letter was sent through the official channel to Mr. Speaker, and Mr. Speaker was then acting in his representative capacity, as discharging the duties of Parliament, and not as a representative of his views and desires. I take it, that there is no question of delivery, because the letter of resignation came through the mails, and because it came through the mails, there was no justification for its return. If Mr. Speaker had been aware that this letter related to his own private affairs, then action would have rested with himself, because the letter would have been his own property; but, as he only received it in the interest of Parliament, and as he was only the medium through which the functions of Parliament could be discharged, then he had no right to exercise a private judgment with respect to it, but he was called upon to discharge the functions of Parliament, as Mr. Speaker, and especially in view of the fact that the communication was sent through the official channel, namely, through the mail. Mr. Speaker said that he did not receive the letter:

I told him to wait, and I would look among my mail, for I had not yet opened my letters.

The Speaker said that he took up his mail. Therefore, his mail was delivered by a person who brought it to his office, this letter was franked by the member, and Mr. Speaker admits that he received it, whatever information it may have contained. The only question is, whether Mr. Speaker knew the contents of the letter or not. I do not attempt to argue that he knew them. Mr. Speaker himself, however, said:

He told me nothing of the contents and I asked him nothing, but handed him the letter unopened and he took it away with him.

Mr. Speaker did not, however, say that the information might not have been furnished him through another channel. When Mr. Speaker recognized the handwriting and the frank, and the letter was brought to him from the post office, he subsequently handed it back to the hon. member. I submit, that Mr. Speaker had no right to hand it back to the hon. gentleman, as he was only the medium through which the functions of Parliament were performed.

Mr. LISTER. Whose frank was on the letter?

Mr. SPROULE. The member's frank—Mr. Bruneau's frank. Mr. Speaker said, that Mr. Bruneau called and asked for the letter. We have, therefore, the evidence of Mr. Speaker, that this letter was sent through the ordinary channel and that it was not his private property. I again submit, that Mr. Speaker had no right to hand back the letter, because it was the property of Parliament, and did not belong to Mr. Speaker's own private business; that he had no right to deal privately with communications sent through him, when the member was addressing Parliament through the Chair. Thus, Mr. Speaker was only the medium through which the functions of Parliament could be discharged, and he had no right to exercise his own private opinion regarding a letter of resignation sent to him. He had no rights, other than those pertaining to the discharge of the constitutional duties of his office. As to the contents, it is admitted that, if Mr. Speaker were acquainted with the contents, the letter of resignation would have appeared in the Votes and Proceedings, and a warrant would have been issued for a new election. The hon. member refrained from voting on a question arising a few days subsequently, knowing that he had resigned, and that this resignation had been witnessed by two members, according to law, and that he would afterwards be amenable to the law, whatever the nature of the penalty might be, in view of his resignation addressed to the Speaker through the regular channel. Taking that view of the question, it is incumbent on this House to inquire further into this case in order that the committee may satisfy itself. We have instances of resignations and of members coming back afterwards and taking their seats in the House. In the local legislature of Ontario, the member for Algoma, Mr. Conmee, resigned; and placed his resignation in the hands of a certain party to hand to Mr. Speaker. The ground was taken that Mr. Speaker declared that the resignation had never been handed to him, and the party entrusted with the duty admitted that he had forgotten to hand it in. But the member had practically resigned; he subsequently ran at an election and was defeated, and afterwards came back to the legislature and took his seat. I do not think that should have been allowed; but, whatever justification there might be for his conduct, there is no ground that would justify this House in approving of the conduct of the hon. member who resigned in this case, and who subsequently returned and took his seat. Whatever object Mr. Speaker may have had in view when he did this, whether he did it unwittingly, innocently, or otherwise, I consider, for my part, that he did a great wrong to Parliament, and that he did not faithfully carry out the functions which Parliament expected him to discharge as Speaker of this House, when he did not present this communication to the representatives of the people here. The law provides that, when this letter was delivered to him—and I respectfully submit that there is no question but that it was delivered to him—the law provides that the inevitable result should follow, and that is a vacancy in this House, where a new member should be elected.

Mr. CLANCY. I recognize the difficulty of discussing a question of this kind without probably being somewhat misunderstood, but I deem it of such importance that no member need offer an apology for stating his views. I was much surprised to hear the contrary arguments addressed to the House by members of the Government. The Minister of Marine told us that there was no case made, that there was nothing to consider, and, therefore, this matter should not be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Now, it seems to me to be perfectly plain and beyond all doubt, that the member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau) addressed an unconditional resignation to the Speaker, not an intention to resign, but an absolute resignation; and it is also practically admitted, that that resignation reached the hands of the Speaker. No one will contend that, if the resignation, duly attested, reached the hands of the Speaker, the member for Richelieu had any right to recall it, nor will it be contended that Mr. Speaker had the right, under any circumstances, to give that document back. I do not pretend, nor is it in my mind, to, in the slightest sense, impute motives to Mr. Speaker in regard to his action; but supposing, from the purest motives, he handed back that resignation, the fact still remains that he was the custodian of that document, not for the purpose of accommodating the member who resigned, nor for the purpose of yielding to any question of courtesy, nor, as the Minister of Finance suggested, for the purpose of treating it as a private matter between gentlemen; but Mr. Speaker was the custodian of that resignation for the purpose of protecting the rights and privileges of this House. It does not make any difference that Mr. Speaker refused to act on it, that he had lost it, that it had been abstracted from his office, or that he had given it back. The mere fact of the Speaker receiving it, put it beyond all doubt that the seat for Richelieu became vacant. The only remaining question was the envelope delivered to the Speaker and asked for by the hon. member (Mr. Bruneau), the document containing the resignation. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bruneau) declared that it was his letter, and if the matter goes to the committee, we can trace out that the resignation came into the hands of Mr. Speaker and that Mr. Speaker returned it. The fact that the Speaker returned it does not alter the case, because, the moment the Speaker got it, no action on the part of the member for Richelieu could recall it or alter that fact. The Government cannot better the case by refusing to allow such an investigation. I am not anxious to hear any scandals that may be unpleasant to hon. gentlemen opposite, if any such exist; I know nothing about that, and I care very much less, but I do know, that, as members of this House, we are bound to vindicate the rights of Parliament, and we are justified in demanding that our rights and privileges shall be maintained. If we were to adopt the doctrine laid down by the Minister of Finance, what would follow as a consequence? He declares, without the slightest reservation, that if any member, from whatever reason, thinks proper to place his resignation in the hands of the Speaker, and notwithstanding that Mr. Speaker was informed that a letter containing the resignation was in his hands, it would be a right and proper thing for the member to ask Mr. Speaker to return that document to him, and that Mr. Speaker should not stand upon any technical grounds in refusing to give it back. If that doctrine were adopted, Mr. Speaker could no longer be looked upon as the guardian of the rights of this House. If that doctrine were adopted, an hon. member would tender his resignation half a dozen times during a session, and recall it as many times, because the Minister of Finance declares, that it is a case resting upon the code of honour between two private gentlemen. Such a thing would be impossible. I do not believe any hon. member on the other side of the House will advocate, that it was ever the intention of the statute that a member, having once tendered his resignation, had a right to recall it. I venture to say, that no such idea was present in the minds of those who framed the statute, and I venture to say, that no legal gentleman will pretend that Mr. Speaker, once being in possession of such a document, and having knowledge of its contents, would have any right to return it. If Mr. Speaker had no right to return a communication of which he knew the contents, so far as he was the guardian of the rights of the House. Then he would be equally in the same position if he did not know the contents, because any communication of the kind addressed to the Speaker of the House of Commons is not the private property of Mr. Speaker, but the property of the House of Commons and of the people of Canada. I do not intend to impute to Mr. Speaker any but the purest motives in what took place. But I submit it was returned without any authority whatever. It was demanded without any authority, and to have acceded to that demand under any circumstances was to have put it beyond all question that the whole thing was irregular and should be inquired into. Now, if by a majority of votes, this House will now declare that this has been a regular transaction, then I say we have put to an end all means of determining our rights in this House. There are two matters which we must not confuse. The one is that the statute lays down clearly the means by which an hon. member may resign his seat. Then there is the rule which we follow, which has become law by usage, for enforcing matters of this kind. We have no statute directing what this House should do in such a matter. The statute directs what course should be taken by a member, and it clearly indicates the course to be taken by Mr. Speaker; but we have no statute to guide the conduct of this House. Therefore we must be guided by the usage of Parliament, and if we depart from that, it will simply mean that no direction by a statute will have any force, because it will be disregarded by this House. I think nothing can be lost by hon. gentlemen opposite sending this matter to the committee; but I think much will be gained, because by that course you will remove any possibility of coming to a conclusion which must always remain a matter of suspicion. To have refused so reasonable a request seems to me to indicate that there is some reason behind the refusal which we have not yet heard. Hon. gentlemen have not given any reason so far, and the matter must go to the country and be viewed in that light, by every intelligent newspaper reader from one end of the country to the other. Is it possible that the reason was hinted at by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell)? I do not say that it was, but the suspicion will always be entertained in the minds of the people that some grave reason involving the state of affairs among hon. gentlemen opposite is behind all this, and that suspicion can only be removed by sending the matter to the committee, where all persons resting under suspicion will be cleared, as they have a right to be cleared.

Mr. McNEILL. It is not my intention to take part in this discussion. Some incidents of it I very much regret. But as my right hon. friend the Prime Minister has told the House that it was his intention and the intention of the Government to obtain an opinion from the law officers of the Crown, I think it would be only fair to this House, in order that we might get further information before we proceed to vote on this question, that we should learn from my right hon. friend what the opinion of the law officers on this subject is.

The PRIME MINISTER. I have no objection, but have great pleasure in telling my hon. friend that the opinion of the Minister of Justice is that there is no case whatever—that there is nothing to refer to the committee.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Mr. Speaker, I well know that the patience of the House must be pretty well exhausted by this long discussion; but I am going to intrude for a few moments on the further indulgence of the House while I point to one or two considerations, which it appears to me have not yet been strongly emphasized. I admit at once that the question is an important one—important to the hon. member for Richelieu, and that its determination, if it could be determined here once and for all, would be very much in his interest. But I do not admit that the question is of great importance either in a parliamentary sense or so far as it effects the general public interest. I think it is more important from the personal and individual standpoint of the hon. member whose seat is in question. It appears to me, Sir, that if it were possible, by sending this matter to the committee, to elicit any further material facts which would enable us to reach a more correct conclusion upon it, there would be a great deal of force in the appeal which hon. gentlemen opposite make for such a reference. But I apprehend that the House is in full possession of every material fact. There is no question but that the hon. member for Richelieu put his name to a declaration of intention to resign his seat as a member of this Parliament; there is no doubt, we will assume, that he caused that resignation or declaration, duly witnessed by the proper persons, under the statute, to be forwarded to the Speaker. I am willing to concede that that declaration reached the office of the Speaker, and that it might have been possible for the Speaker to have opened that declaration and to have read it. I admit all that, and when we admit and establish that, we admit and establish every solid and material fact that could be adduced if you referred this matter to a committee ten thousands times over. Now, I would like some hon. gentleman to tell me, on what ground is it alleged that a committee, a portion of this House, is more competent to pass a legal judgment upon the law and the facts, when the facts are all conceded and in full possession of the House. I have listened to the arguments addressed to the House by the gentlemen of the legal profession in the Opposition, and I have heard the arguments addressed to it by the legal gentlemen on this side. They have not agreed. Do I understand that these gentlemen have not had ample opportunity to express their views? They have not hesitated to declare them positively on both sides, and with all confidence as to their accuracy, and they have disagreed. They would also disagree in the committee. They are not going to agree in their legal views, because eight or ten of those who have spoken here to-day are constituted a committee, any more than they have agreed here, and they have declared themselves with full confidence one side against the other. Now, my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) has appealed to this House in that manner which is so common to him: "Why don't you sift this matter to the very bottom? Why don't you get this committee, which is the highest and the most free from partisanship of any committee of this House, to sift it to the bottom?" And my hon. friend turned it over and viewed it on both sides in such a way that you would infer that the moment a majority of that committee declared their view, he would accept it as a declaration of unquestioned law, and it would be accepted at large by the country, and even the courts would bow down to it.

Why, the thing would be just where it is to-day after your committee had sat upon it. The gentlemen on that committee who do not agree with the view which the First Minister has presented would so declare and so report, and I presume from the expressions of opinion which have been given on this question, the majority of that committee would sustain the view which the leader of the Government has propounded to the House. Does my hon. friend from the county of York (Mr. Foster) assume—with that plausibility which distinguishes him when he throws himself into his most convincing attitude and, after the manner of a man turning pancakes, lays down proposition on proposition—that he or any of the gentlemen who are associated with him are going to bow down in most humble submission to the report which the majority of that committee may render? We would not be a step in advance of where we are now after we had referred this to a committee; and since we can get no more facts, since, in all frankness and candour, we admit everything against the hon. member for Richelieu, why cannot this Parliament now dispose of the question just as well as if it had been referred to a committee and the committee had reported, and thus spare us a useless wrangle and controversy upon the report of that committee? My hon. friends opposite talk about the effect the report of this committee would have on the community at large? It would have no greater effect on the community than it would have upon the judgment of the House.

My hon. friend from York was not wise enough to adhere to the declaration with which he started out, when he said that he would not touch the law points because he was not a lawyer. He would have done well to adhere to that intention, because when he departed from it, he floundered and lost his footing and became utterly confused. What did he tell us? He pointed out the terrible position which the hon. member for Richelieu was in by having his seat threatened and a possible action at law, and subjection to penalty. And what remedy was he going to apply to relieve the hon. member from these terrible consequences? Why, he was going to get a report of this committee. That was going to relieve the hon. member for Richelieu from the dire consequences of his act in attempting to retain his seat. It is apparent the hon. gentleman does not know anything of law—and it was not expected that he would—when he proposed that remedy, yet he undertook to give an opinion ex cathedra on a question with which he apparently is not very well acquainted. If there is any doubt on the legal question—and there is none on the facts because they are admitted—the report would not help the hon. member for Richelieu a particle. He would stand, after this committee had incubated its report, in no better position than he is in to-day. The same action would lie against him as now. The decision of this committee and the House would not relieve him or put in any better legal status than he would be otherwise; the only difference between us is that we say it is not necessary to go to the committee because we know the facts, and what we want is the judgment of Parliament on the facts in its possession.

Let me say a word further on a point which I am presumptuous enough to think has not been touched upon in this discussion. The hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) and those who followed him on that side seemed, in my opinion, to view this question altogether from an erroneous standpoint. They all seemed to regard this statute as though it were a disqualifying or disabling statute, a statute which imposes penalties and presented their arguments as if they were dealing rather with the case in which a man had been violating the Independence of Parliament Act or had been guilty of some misconduct which affected his integrity as a member of Parliament or in some other way had sinned against the public weal. But I beg leave to submit that these hon. gentlemen have altogether misapprehended the case and approached it from an erroneous standpoint. The standpoint from which it ought to be presented is this, that the statute we are discussing is an enabling and not a disabling one. It enables a man to do what he otherwise would be unable to perform. It confers a privilege upon him and not upon Parliament; it operates for his benefit, and not for the benefit of the public; it operates for his protection, and not for the protection of Parliament; it is passed for the purpose of enabling a member of Parliament to do what he could not do if that statute were not in existence. How then are you going to interpret that statute? Are you going to interpret it at the mouth of the canon? Are you going to argue everything against the individual who is seeking the benefit of it? Not at all. That is not the way in which it ought to be interpreted. It ought to be interpreted from an entirely different standpoint. I therefore agree—and I would have stated the proposition if I had spoken earlier in the debate—in the view suggested by my hon. colleague the Finance Minister, who, although not a lawyer, struck the kernel of the whole question, when he said that you ought to give that statute the widest possible interpretation, in order to allow a member of Parliament, after he had taken a second thought with regard to his determination to resign, to recall that intention, and I claim that that statute can never be rightly interpreted or reasonably interpreted in the sense in which it is framed and to carry out the object for which it was enacted, unless you allow to a member of Parliament the very last possible moment of time to withdraw the resignation he has tendered. Remember, that the hon. gentleman has violated no law, he has infringed upon no privilege of Parliament, he has not assailed or touched upon the Independence of Parliament Act in any way, he has done nothing wrong, he is not subject to any penalties—but perhaps in a moment of haste, in a rash moment, he concluded to sever his connection with Parliament and sought to avail himself of the privilege allowed him by this statute and make out his resignation. It would be an unseemly view of the duty of Parliament to strain the interpretation of that statute in such a way as to refuse to a member of Parliament the privilege of taking a second thought with regard to such hasty action. I put that view, and I say that when you talk about public opinion, these gentlemen do not apprehend how broad public opinion and sentiment is. They fail to realize how large it is and how far from the narrow view they put forward. The public sentiment will hold that Parliament has done wisely. Who wants to see elections multiplied upon us. Who wants to see members vacate their seats? It is the duty of members to remain in their seats as long as Parliament lasts, and if in a hasty moment a gentleman has been led to take an unwise step, one which is not in accord with the sentiment of the people, he should be allowed the opportunity of reconsidering that action in the light of reflection.

I have just another word to add and it is an answer to the line of argument which the hon. member for York presented on this question. He found fault with the hon. Minister of Finance for the interpretation he put on the resolution of the hon. member for Champlain. Now, he says that you might entirely eliminate the citation in the resolution from the statement of Mr. Speaker; and, if you did that you would rob the hon. ex-Finance Minister's argument of its strength. I do not care whether that citation is incorporated in this resolution or not. If it were not incorporated, it would still be properly the property of the House, having been formally entered upon the records of Parliament. Let them eliminate it from the resolution. In order that it might be clear that there was no necessity for a committee to thresh out something concerning which we are not in doubt, to find facts which are in our possession, we should simply move an amendment to the resolution incorporating the statement of the Speaker as the evidence of the facts therein stated. Would it not then be completely in our possession? Would not the House be justified? It is for the House to say whether they would accept the statement which the chief officer of this House has given. If the House chooses to accept the statement made in that solemn and authoritative manner, as to the circumstances in which this letter came into his hands and afterwards left his hands, if the House chooses to accept it as evidence, we can without further evidence dispose of the question, and say that there is no good end to be served by referring to a committee a matter in which the facts are all known and determined and that can be dealt with by the whole House as it would have to be dealt with by the House in the last resort. Therefore, there is no reason why the motion of the hon. member (Mr. Marcotte) should pass.

Mr. POWELL. I do not intend to take up much time. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) and the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) seemed to have different methods of discussing this matter. The one pleaded for a judicial handling of the question, and the other exhibited the tactics of the advocate. My contentions are very simple. I may remind the Minister of Railways that he is treading on very dangerous ground indeed in criticising laymen and their powers of dealing with the matter of law. Why, that hon. gentleman, I remember, not very long ago was engaged in a very important case in the province of New Brunswick. The defence was taken by a layman who has never read a law book in his life. He was the editor of a newspaper. And he non-suited the hon. Minister and drove him out of court. The Minister then appealed to the court of appeal, and the doughty layman drove out of the court with costs also. Now, if the hon. Minister of Finance were as successful in his case before the House as that gentleman was in handling his case before the court, the Minister of Railways would be at a discount. With respect to the argument of the hon. member for Halifax, I have little to say. His whole argument proceeds upon a false assumption, upon a wrong view of the question before the House. He was discussing the case as it would be between private parties, and not as between a private party on the one hand and a public official on the other. Private parties can waive any rights that the law gives them—that is a well known principle of law; but a public man, standing in an official position and acting for the public is unable to waive any public rights as a private individual waive his rights. To my mind, the correct way of looking at this is to eliminate entirely the Speaker as a factor, so far as having power to act in the matter is concerned. The Speaker is entirely passive. When the hon. member for Halifax argues that the Speaker might return or retain this resignation, he is putting into the hands of Mr. Speaker a power which Parliament never for a moment intended to vest in him. If that were true, Mr. Speaker, by refusing to hand back a resignation when demanded, might deprive one member of his seat, while, in the case of another party, by handing it back, he would give him his seat. That is a state of affairs that the law does not contemplate. That is why I say that the law must be considered aside from the Speaker. His deafness, dumbness, blindness, idiocy or misconduct do not seem to me to be factors in the problem that can be considered. I quite believe that when a letter is delivered to Mr. Speaker that is the end of it. But the question with me is whether the law was complied with in this case with respect to delivery, by sending the letter through the post. I have some doubts upon that point, and I think it would be a proper matter to refer the matter to a special committee to search for precedents to guide us. There are features of this case which the Minister of Railways has not touched upon, one of these being the necessity of this search for precedents. I do not think that because an hon. gentleman is going to vote one way or another, his intellectual powers are obscured and he is unable to look into the precedents in the matter. Therefore, I would vote for a reference to a committee in order to get more light. One thing I am certain of, that if the law recognizes this way of placing a resignation in the hands of the Speaker, if the English language means anything, this resignation has been in the hands of the Speaker, and there has been delivery under the Act. But considering the authorities in relation to the serving of notices and the delivery of papers in elections, and in other public matters, there is doubt whether it can be said that the hon. member for Richelieu was following out the acts when he undertook to use the post office for the purpose of effecting delivery of his resignation. There is this doubt in my own mind. What would be the proper course would be to hand the document personally to the Speaker or have it handed by an agent. The doubt is whether the resignation having been sent as it was and the Speaker not having known the contents can be said to have had the resignation delivered to him. I am in doubt in the matter, and because I am in doubt, I would like to see the matter referred to a committee to search for precedents.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I rise with great reluctance to speak on this question. But the press of the country has made so much of this matter that I think it should be fully ventilated in this House. Not only the Conservative press but the independent press has gone into the question very fully and has in some cases said things about Mr. Speaker that this House should resent. If no other reason could be given why this matter should be referred to the committee than to prove that the accusation launched by the press against the First Commoner, the Speaker of this House were not true, I think this case should be referred to the committee.

The Committee on Privileges and Elections is instituted for the very purpose of going into questions of this kind, and I take it, that when such questions are referred to this committee, which is composed almost exclusively of legal gentlemen, that these gentlemen, after hearing the arguments and the evidence, and after having gone fully into the precedents which can be cited on both sides—these gentlemen, I say, will not make a report to this House upon which they will stake their reputations as lawyers, without being fully convinced that it is founded upon reason and law. Now, I put this question to myself: Why is it that the Government refuse so persistently to send this matter to the committee? It cannot be because the Government has no confidence in the committee, because the Government have a majority of eight members upon this committee; so that, if there was any fear that the committee would not do justice in arriving at their conclusion, the Government is fully protected by its majority. Now, when this resignation was sent, and attested by two hon. gentlemen in this House, it is said—I do not mean to say for an instant that this imputation is true, but it is reported all through the country—that the Speaker knew that this letter which was to be sent to him, contained the resignation of the member for Richelieu. It is further said—though I do not believe it, but the imputation is thrown out, and it should be disproved, if not true—that the Speaker, willing as he was to render a service to the Government, brought a certain pressure to bear upon the member for Richelieu, and after this pressure was so brought to bear, the member for Richelieu went and withdrew this letter from the Speaker's hands. Now, these are things that I think it is due to the Speaker of this House, it is due to the First Commoner, that they should be fully gone into and disproved, for the honour of the House, for the honour of the Speaker. So this is not only a question of law, but also a question of fact, and I take it to be a question for the decision of this House. It is a question in which the honour of this House is involved. It is also a question of grave precedence. From the researches which we have made, I think I can state that this is the first occasion upon which anything of this kind has ever happened, either in the English House of Commons or in this House. The facts are such that no precedent or judgment has yet been given upon identical facts with those which are now before this House. But it seems to me that the reading of the statute makes the case quite clear, and if any hon. gentlemen have any doubt about it, the place to have these doubts elucidated is in the committee. Now, the Minister of Railways and Canals, in his vigorous speech, a minute ago, asked: What other facts will the committee discover than those which are brought out before this House? Everybody knows that the reason why committees are constituted is, because questions of fact and sometimes questions of law, can be much better elucidated in a committee composed of a small number of members, than before a House composed of so large a number of members as this House. Not only that, but there is another most important matter which cannot be gone into before this House, and that is the matter of evidence. I repeat, that it is due to the Speaker that evidence should be taken upon the facts which I mentioned a moment ago. But the question of law seems to be this: A public officer, a member of Parliament—because I take it that a member of Parliament is a public officer, according to the sense in which that expression is used in the books—a public officer may resign in different ways. He may resign by expressing his intention verbally or in writing. The law sometimes states the manner in which he is to resign. He may resign simply by telling somebody that he resigns; and, more frequently, his resignation is not complete until it is accepted by the appointing body. Now, in this instance, we have a statute which is very plain. I think the point of difference between the two sides of the House is this: When was that resignation completed? Was it completed as soon as the member for Richelieu wrote out this document, had it attested before two witnesses, and delivered it to the Speaker? Or was it completed only upon the Speaker receiving the resignation, reading it, and, as it were, accepting it? I say that, according to the reading of the statute, it cannot be made clearer, it seems to me, that the moment the hon. gentleman wrote the resignation, had it attested before two witnesses, and delivered it by the only means through which it could be carried to the Speaker, from that very moment the document was no more his property, it did not belong to him, it became the property of the House of Commons, and nobody had a right to hand back that resignation. As soon as he parted with it, as soon as he delivered it to the mails of Her Majesty, or a messenger, to be delivered to Mr. Speaker, from that moment, I say, his resignation was complete. What does the statute say? After relating the manner in which the resignation is to be written and attested, subsection 3 says:

The member so tendering his resignation shall be held to have vacated his seat.

What does "tendering" mean, when it is employed in that way? Tendering his resignation means writing it, and signing it before two witnesses. As soon as that resignation is made before two witnesses, it is a tender of resignation, according to subsection 3 of section 5 of the statute, and from that moment the seat becomes vacant. I think that the hon. member for Halifax, when he quoted the French authority which he was kind enough to give us this afternoon, was quoting from an authority, not upon resignations of public officers, but upon contracts, if I understood him aright. I could not quite catch his words, because I must say that I did not quite hear him. But from what I heard, the authority which he read applied only to contracts, and not at all to resignations by public officers. I hold in my hand a compendium of the law which is known to every lawyer in the House, the "American and English Encyclopædia of Law." It is an authority, so far as the dictum of the author is supported by precedents and by judicial decisions. This is what he says, under the title "Resignations":

Resignation is the act of an officer by which he declines his office and renounces the further right to use it. To constitute a complete operative resignation, there must be an intention to relinquish a portion of the term of the office, accompanied by the act of relinquishment.

Well, what was done here? There was certainly an intention to relinquish a portion of the term, as shown by writing the letter attested by two witnesses, and this was accompanied by the act of relinquishment, when the member sent this letter to the Speaker. But that is not all. At common law, the office only becomes vacant, according to general rules, when the resignation is accepted by competent authority, that is, by the appointing authority. But this author goes on to say:

In America the above English rule which, on principle, seems to be the better doctrine, has been followed in perhaps the majority of cases; but there is also authority for the opposite view, that a public officer may resign at pleasure, without the assent of the appointing power,—

Of course, here the appointing power is not the Speaker, and it will not be contended that the hon. gentleman had to go before his electors to ask their permission to resign.

—and that, in the absence of any statute to the contrary, an absolute and unconditional resignation vacates an office from the time the resignation reaches the proper authority, without any acceptance, express or implied, on the part of the latter.

What was the proper authority here? The proper authority, under the statute, was the Speaker, and as soon as the resignation reached the Speaker, that resignation was complete, according to this authority; and, as I said a moment ago, this book is only an authority in so far as it quotes precedents to support the view that the author takes. What I am reading now is supported by numerous authorities, to be found at the foot of the page. If this question was referred to the committee, we would have occasion to refer to these authorities and to see whether this doctrine, as propounded by this authority, is really a doctrine which should be followed in this House. The authority goes on to say:

A resignation which has been accepted cannot be withdrawn, nor can a resignation which is intended to take effect immediately, and which has been delivered for that purpose to the officer authorized to receive it.

There are numerous precedents to support the view that a resignation that has been accepted cannot be withdrawn, and there are more authorities in favour of the view that when a resignation has been delivered to the officer authorized to receive it, it cannot be withdrawn. Here is what was decided by the United States Supreme Court at Washington, in the case of United States v. Wright:

There can be no doubt that a civil officer has a right to resign his office at pleasure, and it is not within the power of the executive to compel him to remain in office.

I do not know whether the Minister of Railways wants to keep the hon. member for Richelieu in the House, and desires further trouble in respect to the canal on which the hon. member wishes some of his friends or relatives appointed. I fail to see why the Minister desires to compel that hon. member to remain in his seat in this House. The court further said:

It is only necessary that the resignation should be received, to take effect, and this does not depend on the acceptance or rejection of the resignation by the President.

If report is true, and I do not say it is, Mr. Speaker had received word that the letter contained the resignation. This House wants to know whether Mr. Speaker is to be a lever between hon. gentlemen opposite and the Government as to the distribution of patronage among the party. Is it true that the resignation was received, and that Mr. Speaker knew the letter contained the resignation of the hon. member for Richelieu? There is another authority, supported by five or six of the best English precedents, to this effect:

When an unconditional resignation is transmitted to the proper officer with the intention that it shall operate as such, it amounts to a complete resignation, taking effect from the date of the transmission.

This decision is supported by Mechem's Public Officers, 417, Reg. v. Wigan, 14 Q.B. D. 903; 54 L.J.Q.B. 338; 38 Eng. Rep. 68; State v. Hause, 43 Ind. 105; 13 Am. Rep. 384. Why do the Government refuse to this side of the House, and to the hon. member for Champlain the privilege of bringing this case before the Privileges and Elections Committee, so that we may have the opportunity of examining these precedents, which are worthy of examination, and when by arbitrarily declining to refer this case to the committee hon. gentlemen opposite are thereby creating a precedent, which may prove to be a very dangerous precedent and which may some day be used in a manner which will prove detrimental to the state.

Mr. SPEAKER. In view of the conversation which occurred in the House at the early part of this debate, I should like to ask the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) if he was present in his place when the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Marcotte) placed his motion in my hands?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Certainly; I was in my seat.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman did not express his wish to second the motion. I do not want any misunderstanding.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. There is no misunderstanding. I was in my seat. When the motion was put, you, Mr. Speaker, selected my hon. friend to my right (Mr. Wallace) as seconder.

Mr. SPEAKER. I called for a seconder.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I was in my seat, and I assumed that my name would appear as seconder.

Mr. SPEAKER. I called on the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), and asked him if he seconded the motion. He did so by bowing his assent. I now wish to put the motion as it was understood.

Mr. WALLACE. I seconded the motion in that way.

Mr. SPEAKER. The journals, I believe, show that the motion was seconded by the member for West York. It is questionable whether I can change the journals, and I think the motion had better be allowed to remain as at present.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 90) respecting Detective Corporations and Mercantile Agencies.—(Mr. Sproule.)

SUPPRESSION OF COMBINES.

Mr. SPROULE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 89) to amend the Act for the prevention and suppression of combinations formed in restraint of trade. He said: In the old law before the Act could take effect, it had to be proven that trade was unduly restrained or unreasonably restrained. This amendment is for the purpose of striking out the words "unduly and unreasonably" in the old law.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE SAN JOSE SCALE.

Mr. CHARLTON. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to allude briefly to a matter which is of sufficient importance to engage for a few moments the attention of the House and of the Government, and I shall conclude my remarks with a motion. I refer to the measure recently passed in this House prohibiting the importation of nursery stock. The stages of that Bill were all taken in one day, and in consequence of the haste in passing that measure, the objections which have since been raised to it were unheard, and I deem it proper that some of those objections should be placed before the Minister of Agriculture who had primarily charge of the Bill, and before the Government, as well as before the House. I deprecated at the time the haste used in passing the Bill, and I think the outcome of the matter will convince the House that it would have been better to have given the matter more careful and extended consideration. It is found, upon examination into this matter and on receiving the representations presented here, that many of the nurserymen in Canada import very largely of American nursery stock; that those men have made their arrangements for the coming season of operations; that many of them have paid for that stock; that they were at the time the Bill passed within a few days of opening transactions connected with the importation of stock; and the Bill has disorganized business to a very large extent, and will inevitably inflict hardship and very large loss on men who have carried on business successfully for years, and who have been brought up by a round turn as regards the importation of nursery stock, and have not been given an opportunity to make different arrangements. It is found, on examination into this question of stock in New York and Michigan particularly, that it is sent out under the certificate of the state entomologist, that the stock is exempt from scale bug or other pest or enemy of fruit. I hold in my hand the form of a certificate issued in New York state, which is as follows:—

This is to certify that I have this 8th day of March examined the nursery stock of Hammond & Willard, grown at Geneva, county of Ontario, state of New York, and find no indication of the presence of San José scale, peach yellows, rosette, or other dangerous insects or plant diseases that might be transferred on nursery stock from the nursery to the orchard.

V. H. LOWE,
Entomologist.

New York Agr. Exp. Station,
Geneva, N.Y., 10th March, 1897.

It seems that the very greatest care, the utmost precaution is taken, under the laws of that state with respect to nursery stock, and we have no better law, and, in fact, we have not so good a system of inspection as prevails in that state in regard to this matter. I believe the law is substantially the same in Michigan as in New York. Our heavy nurserymen, I am led to suppose, those who asked that the Bill be passed, are themselves heavy importers of American nursery stock, and the majority of the nurserymen are represented as importing stock in the fall, keeping it in cold storage cellars, and at their leisure during the winter, when labour is cheap, putting it up ready for shipment. All this stock was brought in without the entomologist's certificate, and that safeguard, whatever it may be worth, is wanting in regard to the stock imported last fall. That is the information I have received. Stock is ready to be sent out to fill orders by the nurserymen, many of whom have asked for this new law. In one case, Brown Bros. brought in two car loads of American nursery stock on the eve of the passing of this new law, and afterwards they declared themselves in favour of the Bill prohibiting the importation of American nursery stock. The small nurserymen have agents engaged over the country soliciting orders during the season, and have secured those orders, and they have suddenly been brought up with a round turn by this Bill; and, unless there was great necessity for the passage of this measure, certainly a very great hardship has been inflicted on those dealers. The effect, it is natural to suppose, will be to boom nursery stock on hand, and thus furnish profit to the Canadian dealer; and those who have already imported American stock will be able to control the market, sell their stocks, culls and all, and inevitably will make a large profit. The effect on the planter, as regards the source of supply, will be, that the source will be more limited, and while the nurserymen will make increased profits, all the farmers and fruit planters will receive dearer and in many cases inferior stock or not obtain the stock they require. The Minister of Agriculture received an inquiry the other day, for I received a telegram to the same purport, from one of the large nurserymen, Chase Bros. Co., of Rochester. as follows:—

From Rochester, N.Y.

Can you secure postponement of action on San José Scale Bill and secure a hearing for us, looking to admission of nursery stock this spring which has been fumigated under direction of Canadian inspector, thereby making it absolutely safe. Wire answer.

CHASE BROS. CO.

What those gentlemen asked was simply an opportunity to place their representations before the Government to show the Government that the importation of their stock is perfectly safe and that the precautions taken rendered it entirely free from suspicion of having scale or other disease. I should imagine that the representations of these gentlemen should have been heard. In order to show the extent of this interest, as regards the Canadian nurseryman, I have here some telegrams and letters which present it. Mr. J. W. Johnston, of Campbellford, Ont., telegraphs:

The passage of San José Scale Bill will ruin Canadian nurserymen that import from States. My spring orders are paid for. Will they be allowed to come in?

I received a letter from G. H. Caughell, of Aylmer, as follows:—

I write you to congratulate you on your manliness in condemning that drastic and prohibitive Bill, and unjust especially at this time of the year. As both the American and Canadian nurserymen have paid their Canadian agents thousands of dollars in salaries and commission for the last year's canvassing, and now when we have our stock just bought and ready to ship, they who were elected on a free trade policy pass in a day an Act that is the next thing to robbery, as we cannot get our stock here. And it not only affects the nurserymen, but hundreds of agents, as they cannot get their balance due if the stock is not delivered, according to our contracts. And there will be thousands disappointed in not getting their stock to set. I have my trees bought at Geneva, N.Y., and just ordered them shipped yesterday, and don't know just what to do, as our dailies do not give the Bill, only a statement that the San José Scale Bill passed, and that the American stock was barred out of Canada. Is the Bill without any provisions or concessions, or can stock that has been examined by a state entomologist and found free from all diseases, and his certificate accompanies the invoice and box, be got through, or is it a dead stop? I say right here that such men are not worthy of being called our representatives, and am glad there were two that had brains enough to raise a voice against even their own colleagues and do the right. If it is just as the papers state it, it is worse than that barbarous seal-skin Act of the wily Americans. Will you please give me the information you see I want by the above, as I am in a dilemma, and your advice will be greatly appreciated at as early a reply as convenient.

Then I have another letter from Mr. R. Dickinson, of the Strathroy Nursery Company (Limited). It is as follows:—

Strathroy, 13th March, 1898.

John Charlton, Esq., M.P., Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—I notice your effort on the floor of the House to grant justice to men who have acted in good faith in the purchase of American fruit trees.

Our case is this: Last fall we purchased and paid for 16,000 seedling fruit stock to be brought in from France through the firm of Grening Bros., of Monroe, Mich., also 500 fruit trees. These trees are now at Monroe, Mich., and unless we can get them in it means the loss of hundreds of dollars directly, and a much greater loss indirectly, as we cannot get these trees from France for another year. Had we received any notice of the intention of the Government, we would have made other provision, and brought them in directly from France.

We are asking for simple justice. Grening Bros. are willing to have the stock inspected. They hold a clear bill of health from the state inspector. We are not asking the Government to repeal the Act, but to honour contracts made in good faith, subject to inspection if need be.

Hoping you will not cease your efforts till justice is done to men who have confidence in the integrity of the Government thus far, I remain,

Your obedient servant,

R. DICKINSON,

Secretary,

The Strathroy Nursery Co. (Limited).

I also received a letter from M. E. Gregg, of the Harriston Nurseries, who says:

Harriston, 19th March, 1898.

John Charlton, M.P.,

Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,—I am sorry to hear that the Bill re nursery stock is about to be passed; and as I have been paying about twenty men their commissions all season, and have invested all my money in the business and spent my life in the work, I find that I am completely ruined. I also inclose my order blank, showing that all my contracts read: "Supplying goods from Geneva, N.Y."

If the Bill was passed six months ago, it would have saved me as an importer a great amount; but, as it is, the Bill has been rushed through hardly two weeks before the delivery of stock, all contracts being made to a complete loss in this case.

I have also received certificates from Geneva, N.Y., certifying that the Government entomologist proves that no such thing as San José scale exists in the neighbourhood of Geneva, N.Y.

I am glad that you have taken the stand you have re this Bill.

Respectfully,

E. GRIGG.

I have also received a communication from Bowlby Bros. & Company, of Waterford, Ont. It is as follows:—

Waterford, Ont., 17th March, 1898.

My dear Mr. Charlton:

I noted your objections to the immediate passage of Mr. Fisher's San José Scale Bill. We are afraid the fruit-growers will raise the same objections to bringing in peaches, pears and plums. You know they have always done this, before any scale was ever heard of. What will they do now? There is one way, even if they prohibit, that canners might be allowed to import these fruits, and could be done without any danger of the scale spreading, even though there should be scale on the fruit, and that would be by selling no fruit, but canning the whole lot and burning the refuse. I wish you would find out whether the whole fruit trade will be stopped, and let us know.

Yours, &c.,

DR. ALFRED BOWLBY.

This gentleman is evidently afraid that the next move will be to deprive him of a supply of fruit. Mr. J. W. Johnston, of the Campbellford, Ontario, Nurseries, writes:

Campbellford, Ont.

Mr. Charlton, M.P.

Dear Sir,—My grievance re San José Scale Bill is, that I have purchased the nursery stock, for which I have paid, last February, and had it held in cold storage for me in Rochester and St. Louis, awaiting my order to ship it. It was paid for and shipped several days before San José Scale Bill was brought up. These two invoices of stock were packed and shipped to me at St. Louis and Rochester 15th February, 1898.

Yours truly,

J. W. JOHNSTON.

Then Mr. Johnston furnishes me with the following brief statement with which I will conclude the representations made, so far as they have passed through my hands in regard to this matter. He says:

I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that this San José Scale Bill has been brought up at this late date and rushed through in a hurry, ostensibly in the interests of Canadian fruit-growers, but really in the interests of two or three of the larger nursery firms in the western part of Canada, who raise more of some kinds of nursery stock than they find ready sale for, owing to the competition of the smaller local nurseries, who import much of the stock they sell, and are able to sell it at lower prices locally than the larger nurseries sell it for through their agents. Notice should have been given to opponents of the Bill, so that the Government could have heard both sides of the question. Most of those who import had their orders placed some time ago, and in some cases paid for, and stock packed and shipped. Some, viz., those who can afford it, import in the fall, so that they can put up their orders during the winter in cellars, when help is cheap, and ship these orders to their customers early in the spring. These larger nurseries did their importing last fall (for they also import from the same nurseries that I and others do, as I have seen myself). Nursery stock imported last fall is no safer than stock imported this spring, and I contend not so safe. As all the leading United States nurseries have had their stock inspected and certified, certificates granted showing their stock to be free from scale since last fall. If there is any scale on the uninspected stock imported last fall, it is now distributed through the thousands of orders awaiting shipment from the cellars of the importers of last fall. I see it stated that American nurseries supply eighty per cent of all the nursery stock planted in Canada annually. Shut out this eighty per cent and these few larger nurseries will have a boom this spring that will clean out everything they have in the shape of a tree, regardless of quality or variety, and to the ultimate detriment of the planter, who, when his trees begin to bear, will find he has everything but the right sorts, because the demand for trees caused everything to be sold when none could be imported.

The operation of this Bill will ruin the smaller nurseries and dealers who import most of their stock, because, as above stated, their orders are already placed and paid for. Are we to be crushed out for the benefit of a few stronger rivals? The San José scale can easily and effectually be destroyed on nursery stock by immersing it completely in kerosene emulsion. Not one scale can survive this treatment (proof ready). The Government could employ a competent party at each port of entry to immerse all imported stock, even though it be done at the expense of the importer, and thus do an injury to no one. Less than three per cent of the duties collected on imported nursery stock would effectually destroy all scale and other injurious pests as well, taking my own importations as an average on which to base my assertion. The high prices of fruit since last fall has caused a great demand among the farmers for trees this spring, and the importations would be very large. But now they cannot get the trees they ordered for planting. The duties that would have been collected on all these importations will also be a serious loss to the revenue of the country. American nurserymen are alive to the importance of having no scale in their nurseries. It would ruin their reputation at once. They would be boycotted by all dealers in nursery stock, the same as the New Jersey nurseries are, which spread the scale through western Canada and other places two or three years ago. It was not a New York nursery that spread the scale through western Canada, as was stated in the House when this San José Scale Bill was brought up. Referring to the United States San José Scale Bill not coming in force until June, it is to place trees handled this spring on the same footing as those handled last fall, as they are all the production of 1897. But their Bill coming in force next June will reach everything after last year's crop of trees, &c.

Now, Mr. Speaker, these gentlemen engaged in the nursery business who employ a great number of agents and are largely interested in the industry, represent that this law would ruin them. These representations show that these men were suddenly jumped upon, that this Bill passed through the House without their being accorded an opportunity to present their objections to it, or to present arguments which might have been, probably would have been considered quite sufficient to have warranted the Government in adopting other measures than the total prohibition of this stock. I believe now as I did when the Bill was under consideration, that proper precautions as to importations would have served the purpose just as well as total prohibition. If this Bill is not modified in its operation by Order in Council, then these nurserymen have a fair and just claim for compensation, because this is an ex post facto law in effect, which comes down upon them when their arrangements have been made, when their business is just about culminated in the delivery of the goods they contracted for, when their payment has been made to the parties from whom they purchased; and at one fell swoop the Government propose to wipe their business out of existence. This is a very drastic measure, the propriety of which I very seriously doubt; and if in the opinion of the House it is deemed necessary to enforce it, I believe these men have a just claim for compensation. I have felt it my duty to lay these facts before the House. Naturally, in consequence of the position I took on the Bill, I have received communications from some of these nurserymen, and I am thoroughly convinced that the reasons I assigned for urging delay and a more thorough consideration of the question were sound reasons.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must not refer to a past debate.

Mr. CHARLTON. I make these representations without reference to a past debate, although I have necessarily to refer to this Bill. I have placed them before the House, so that the House may be in possession of certain facts which it should have been in possession of before the Bill received the sanction of the House. I move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. McCLEARY. Mr. Speaker, before that motion is put, I want to say a word or two in reference to it. I sincerely hope the Minister of Agriculture will not listen to the voice of the charmer in the person of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). Since the Bill has become law, I have spent two or three days in the garden of Canada, the Niagara district, and I will say that no more popular measure has ever passed this Parliament. Beneficial results have already come from it to the fruit-growers as well as to the nurserymen of Canada. On the train yesterday morning I met a gentleman who was going to Grimsby to leave his order for 3,000 peach trees, although he has always hitherto bought his stock from the Rochester nursery. The hon. member for North Norfolk has certainly shown that there are people in the country who are interested in his actions in this House, because he has read to us letters of recommendation of character from his friends who are doing business with American nurserymen; and it is but natural to expect that they would feel aggrieved at such legislation as this being passed by this Parliament. Of course, we expect that; but had the advice of the hon. member been taken by the Government the other day, and had they allowed this Bill to stand over for two or three weeks, because he said there would be no nursery product imported into this country for two or three weeks, this country would have been flooded with nursery stock, as witness the telegram received by the Minister of Customs the other day from the port of Niagara Falls, asking him to allow certain cars of nursery stock to cross the line. The hon. member has instanced the case of Brown Brothers. That firm, as he knows very well, is but a branch of the American firm of Brown Brothers of Rochester, with nurseries at Fonthill. The hon. gentleman does not say anything about the Canadian industry as represented by the Morris, Stone and Wellington nursery, one of the largest in Canada, which has to compete with the producers of the cheap grades of stock on the other side of the river. Leaving aside the question of protection, it is only right that our fruit-growers should be protected in the substantial manner in which this Bill provides. I do not know what course the hon. member thinks the Government should take in this matter; but certainly a step backward cannot be taken—at least, I hope not. The hon. member tells us that he has a certificate of inspection from the entomologist in Rochester that the stock of the nurseries there is absolutely free from the San José scale. The only place in Canada where we have it to any extent is the Niagara district, and it has been from these very American nurseries that the stock has been imported. That is prima facie evidence that if this Act did not apply to any other district in the United States, it certainly should apply to that district, and prevent any further importation of that nursery stock, which injures the fruit-growers of our country. I sincerely hope the Government will stand by their guns in this regard, and let our people see that not only as a matter of protection to our fruit-growers with respect to their toil and the money they have invested, but as an assurance to the people who are not fruit-growers that this House deems it wise in this way to meet the legislation of our neighbours on the other side of the river.

Mr. CASEY. I am sorry to hear from my hon. friend (Mr. McCleary) his opinion that this pest prevails to any extent on the Niagara peninsula; I had hoped that it had not yet gained a footing anywhere in Canada. But the question raised by my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is no doubt a very serious one, although I did not agree with the stand he took at the time the Bill was before the House. The sole object of this measure is, of course, the protection of our fruit-trees and fruit-growers from the pest, and it cannot be treated as a protective measure in any other sense. When the hon. Minister of Agriculture took the responsibility of urging the course he did, I have no doubt he acted with a full sense of his responsibility, and under an overwhelming conviction that what he did was necessary; and with my limited knowledge of the question, I am quite prepared to take his statements on that point. But the fact remains that a great many people have made contracts, as my hon. friend from North Norfolk points out, and that a great many farmers and fruit-growers expected to get trees for this year's planting which they will not now be able to get. I think it is fair to ask the Minister if he has had full advice as to whether it is possible to disinfect trees that may be suspected of being infected with this pest, or what measure of relief could be given this year to those who have made contracts and who are now expecting trees, which contracts and expectations will no doubt be nullified by this Act. I am thoroughly with any measure to protect our fruit-growers from the foreign invasion of pests; but I hope the Minister will be able to give us some pointers as to whether any relief is practicable in the peculiar circumstances of the case, even if for this year only.

Mr. HUGHES. I am not going to take any part in this discussion. I heartily endorse the measure, but I have received letters from people in my constituency who ask whether the honey locust which is used for hedges comes under the operation of this Bill. It would be well that the Minister of Agriculture should let the country know his opinion on that point.

Mr. McMULLEN. I desire to add a word to what has been said on this question. I must express my sympathy for those of our people who have been accustomed from year to year to give orders for all kinds of fruit trees largely from the American side. Unquestionably they have been taken by surprise by the very sudden passage of this measure. I do not at all call in question the prudence of the action taken by the Minister of Agriculture. If it be possible to keep our country clear of a pest of this kind, any action tending in that direction is commendable; but on the other hand, there are a number of men who have been engaged many years in the business and who suddenly, without the slightest indication on the part of Parliament or from the Executive, find an unexpected stop put to their business. A good many men will in consequence be called upon to bear very serious loss. We know that when certain diseases strike our cattle—when hog cholera, for instance, breaks out in any place—a very heavy slaughter is ordered, and those subjected to loss are allowed compensation. This is a case in which the Government have deemed it prudent to take decided action in order to protect the country against this pest. While I agree that it is wise to do everything possible in this regard, at the same time I think some consideration should be given to the men who have their all invested in this business, who have made contracts and who would be virtually ruined by this measure. I do not think the country will find fault if some measure of relief be given in order to compensate them in some way. Suppose they were granted a certain percentage of their loss—that is those who can show that they actually have taken bona fide orders and spent money in order to get these orders. I do not think that those who are anxious to protect Canada from the pest would be so harsh as to say that these men should be called on to lose every dollar they have invested, through our law to keep the pest out of the country. If the Government hold to the measure—and I do not for a moment say that it is not opportune for them to do so—I think some consideration should be given those men engaged in the business and some reasonable compensation provided, so that they will not be ruined by the passage of the Act.

Mr. MACLEAN. I would like to point out that these men are in business and have taken no more risk than business men do when the tariff is changed. If you once open this door to compensation, what will you be involved in?

Mr. CASEY. The tariff does not prohibit importation.

Mr. BERGERON. You all voted for it, and what is the use of talking now?

Mr. SEMPLE. I hardly understood the real effect of the measure to prohibit nursery stock coming into this country at the time, it was put through so rapidly, but after giving the matter some consideration, I have come to the conclusion that those who have been engaged in the business for a number of years are certainly deserving of sympathy. I have no doubt that if the Government could see their way clear to devising something that would remove the difficulty to a certain extent, they would be doing an act of justice to which no one would object. The Government have discretion under the Bill, and I think they might use that discretion to enforce a rigid inspection of the stock, and there might then be a chance of allowing it to come across to fill orders taken, so that those who have their all invested in the business may be able to distribute their stock. I know very well the dealers who have been distributing stock for the last fifteen years in the county of Wellington. In fact in that county the trees from the Geneva nurseries are prized more than trees from the Canadian nurseries, they grow well, are true to name, and are nice trees, giving general satisfaction. These gentlemen have spent much money in paying agents going through different parts of the country, and cases of this kind are numerous throughout the country, so that I think if the Government would exercise discretion to see that this scale did not exist in the trees brought from the States, which have been ordered, it would be a very great benefit to a number of very deserving individuals.

Mr. McNEILL. I hope that, whatever the Government may do with regard to this matter, they will not decide to allow the stock to come into the country. I would very much prefer seeing the Government pay a hundred cents on the dollar on this prohibited stock than that they should permit it to come in under any inspection. We have heard already from the hon. Minister of Agriculture that the inspection of stock is, at the best, a very unsatisfactory protection to fruit-growers, and I hope that the Government will, on no consideration weaken on the policy they have adopted. I confess that the suggestion appealed very much to my own sense of justice, on the first blush of the matter that those who have been placed suddenly in this position should be compensated; but, on the other hand, when we remember how easy it is to introduce a principle of this kind, and how difficult it is to check the operation of it afterwards, it becomes a very serious question as to whether it might not open the door to a principle, the operation of which we would find it difficult afterwards to hold in proper subjection. I hope that the Government, at all events, whatever they do, will not dream of allowing the stock to come into this country. They have acted properly in keeping it out, and I give them every credit for their action.

Mr. SPROULE. It is quite clear from what has taken place that I was justified in inquiring of the hon. Minister of Agriculture, at the time, why this Bill had not been introduced earlier. It seems to me very strange that he should have delayed it until we had reached the season when fruit trees were being brought in instead of introducing it a month earlier. Had the Bill been introduced earlier in the session, no doubt it would have minimized the evil we hear these men complain of to-day. The law is in the right direction and should be sustained by Parliament, as I have no doubt it will be. The hon. member for North Norfolk spoke several times of trees coming from the other side, bearing certificates by entomologists that they were not affected in this way. From my knowledge of certificates, I pay very little attention to them. It seems to be an easy matter to get a certificate of that kind when wanted; and if the Minister of Agriculture were innocent enough to accept them as a guarantee for the purity of the fruit, his measure would be of very little avail to the fruit-growers of this country.

Mr. HENDERSON. I can assure the hon. Minister of Agriculture that, from my experiences since this Bill was passed, he need not have the slightest fear of any popular feeling against it. So far as I have been able to learn, the people of the country are quite in sympathy with it. The only objection I heard was that fruits were not excluded as well, such as apples, pears and peaches.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). I feel, Mr. Speaker, that I must necessarily refer to some of the remarks that have been made this afternoon with regard to this matter, for I appreciate very fully the importance of it and I also appreciate very much and feel very sorry for the loss which certain individuals will undoubtedly have to sustain in consequence of the passage of this Act. It is one of those unfortunate things we all regret that legislation of almost any kind, affecting a large country like ours, must necessarily tread upon the toes of some people. I realize, as I think I stated a few days ago, that when this Bill became law, no doubt some who have been acting in this country as agents for American houses and selling American stock would be hurt, and, perhaps, lose a little money. I believed then and believe still that in the interest of the country at large, even such a sacrifice as this to certain private interests had to be made. I have not learned from the country directly how the Bill has been received; I have not been away from Ottawa but have been immersed in the work of my office since the Bill became law. Therefore, I am glad to hear from hon. gentlemen who have been home since that time that the feeling in their respective neighbourhoods is as they have stated. It is the feeling I expected, as it is, in accordance with the feelings that were expressed in the large number of resolutions and letters, a number of which I have under my hand and some of which I will read before I sit down. It will be seen that these people impressed upon me the danger to our country's fruit-growing interests if a Bill of this kind was not passed. So I can understand the feeling of relief now that the Bill has been passed. I expressed on another occasion my belief that it was necessary that this Bill should be passed promptly without warning, that time should not be given to those engaged in the trade to render futile the passing of the Act. What would be the use of our Parliament passing an Act and at the same time taking special pains to see that the Act was made useless. Had we given warning to the people who wanted to import this stock from the United States that in a few weeks time they would be prevented from doing so, we should be offering a premium to them to provide against the disability we proposed to put upon them. It seems to me that the outcry that has been raised and that has been voiced by my hon. friend from North Norfolk—an outcry which I venture to say was not very widespread—justifies the action of Parliament. I had an opportunity to read a communication sent to a member of the House in which the writer complained that warning had not been given him so that he might prepare himself against the provisions of the Act—in other words, he complained that we had not given him an opportunity to get his stock into the country before the law prohibited him from getting it in. I can understand his feeling, looking at the matter from his point of view, his business point of view. I do not blame him for it; it is only an exhibition of human nature. But the interests of the country would have been sacrificed had that feeling been allowed to sway the Government and Parliament in the passing of the Act. As to the dangers of the pest, I will take the opportunity of reading one or two resolutions that have been sent to me—and I take them up hap-hazard out of a very large number. Here is one passed on the 22nd November, 1897, by the fruit-growers of Pelham and Thorold townships, meeting at Fonthill:

That we appreciate the efforts of Hon. Sidney Fisher, Minister of Agriculture, to check the spread of the San José scale; but in view of the increasing number of localities in which it has been found and the source of infestation has been nursery stock from the United States;

We also call your attention to the fact that so serious has the matter become in the United States that nearly all have passed inter-state laws making it almost prohibitory to ship nursery stock from one state to another.

In view of the above facts, we humbly pray that the Dominion Government, with an Act of legislation, prohibit importation of fruit and nursery stock into Canada, believing that this is the only safe course to protect the interests of the fruit-growers of Ontario.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. When did the hon. Minister (Mr. Fisher) receive that?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I cannot tell exactly, but it was some time in the early part of the winter. It was passed in a district which was and is occupied by the largest nurserymen in this country, the Niagara district. I have already explained, but I am glad of the opportunity afforded by the interruption to explain again, that so long as it seemed possible that this agitation was being carried on by nurserymen alone or by men who might be supposed to be largely influenced by the nurserymen, so long as there was a possibility of this being an agitation whose motive was self-interest, I hesitated to ask for the passage of such a drastic measure. But when I found, as I did about a month or six weeks ago, resolutions coming from purely fruit-growing sections, passed by associations of fruit-growers and not of nurserymen, organizations whose interests so far as the mercantile consideration was concerned were against the passing of this Bill rather than in favour of it, then I decided that it was in the interest of the country that this law should be passed. The reason why I did not ask for it at the very earliest day of this session was because it has been since the opening of the session that I have received the representations of those purely fruit-growing associations and from those purely fruit-growing neighbourhoods—for instance, in Nova Scotia and in the province of Quebec, where there are not enough nurseries, perhaps, to supply the demands of the fruit-growers, but where they have to send for stock to the nurseries in the province of Ontario whose proprietors were urging the passing of this Act. I, therefore, felt that the influence of the self-interest of these nurserymen to obtain protection for mercantile purposes rather than against the scale insect was practically eliminated, and then I felt that I was on safe ground in asking for the prohibition of the importation of this stock. And only then. As long as it could possibly have been held to be an agitation got up by men interested in the commercial aspect of this prohibition, I felt that I must receive their representations with the proverbial grain of salt, and must be careful before acting, to be fortified by the representations of others, who on the commercial side of the question were opposed to them. I did find that, and then I felt myself justified in proceeding in the course which I have taken and which Parliament, I am glad to say, has endorsed. Now, I shall read one or two statements on this subject. In the first place I shall read a remark or two written to me by Hon. John Dryden, the Minister of Agriculture of Ontario, who, as no doubt is well known to the Ontario members of this House, at the last session of the Ontario legislature had an Act passed for the purpose of inspecting the orchards and nurseries of the province of Ontario and trying to stamp out the disease in those sections where it had made some slight appearance. Mr. Dryden says:

I note what you say as to state entomologists inspecting nurseries. I have made diligent inquiry as to how this is done, and have come to the conclusion that it is no protection whatever. It appears to be a pretty general practice that those dealing in fruit trees on the other side are quite willing to dump off on Canadian fruit-growers such trees as would not readily sell in their own country. These sell at a lower rate, and I am told that parties have sent fruit trees into this country knowing them to be infested, taking advantage of our carelessness in allowing them to enter. It is impossible, in the course of a short letter, to say much about it; but I think when I say to you that, having studied its habits and effect, I have come to the conclusion that every precaution that it is possible to take must be taken immediately. I propose at once taking active measures towards uprooting all such trees as are infested at the present moment.

Our fruit men are becoming much excited over the difficulty, and in the House to-day statements were made that it was useless our dealing with it here, provided infested trees and fruit continue to be brought into the province.

That was the report made to me.

Mr. McCLEARY. Was that letter written before the passage of Mr. Dryden's Bill in the local legislature?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I think, judging from the date, it was just after the passage and during the discussion of that Bill in the local legislature. The letter is dated December 30. He says, the statements were made in the House that day. I have here another letter of Mr. Dryden's, from which I will read. He says, after speaking about some other matters:

I do not know that you will agree with me, but my judgment is that it would pay, at least for a few years, to prohibit the importation of fruit and ornamental trees altogether from the United States, until we see where we stand. The situation is too serious to be trifled with.

This letter was dated on the 20th of December, previous to the other one. Now, here is a statement which was made to me by Professor Alwood, of Virginia, who is the chairman, or president, of the Entomological Society of the United States, which deals with what they call practical or economic entomology:

I apprehend that you notice there is a disposition on the part of some parties to minimize the danger from this pest, but from my experience I cannot share any such sentiments. We shall try to push the federal inspection Bill through at the earliest possible date, and I will inform you of our progress in this matter later.

That was last fall. Now, here is another statement, originally from Professor Alwood, but one which I did not obtain until some time last fall. It is the report of a statement of Professor Alwood at the meeting of the Association of American Nurserymen, held in June last, but I did not get it until some time last fall:

At the present time, from my own record, I know that nineteen states on the Atlantic and adjacent states inland are infested with the San José scale. How the scale came into the eastern part of the United States it is not necessary to go into now, except to say that it came on nursery stock from California, and for five or six years it was spreading upon the eastern half of this continent in the nurseries and orchards before we had the first inkling that there was a San José scale this side of California, except in our cabinets. It is now four years since the first case was known, and it is only during the last eighteen months that we have begun fully to realize the extent of the dissemination of the San José scale in the east. I may say further that it is only within the last few weeks that we have had brought to our attention some of those alarming cases where the scale has existed right under the noses of specialists for years without having been detected. Now these cases, which I shall cite, are all arguments for the necessity of most thorough inspection laws, so that we shall be able, by the facts brought out by inspection, to provide such measures, whatever they may be, as will stop the further dissemination of this scale, as it has been heretofore widely disseminated.

The speaker stated that a law had been passed by the state of Virginia, provided for the appointment of inspectors and giving them almost absolute power in regard to treatment of infested premises, and stated that the first two days' work after his appointment as such inspector he had located ten cases where the scale had never been known before.

He went on to speak about inspection, and then he says:

I do not believe in treating nursery stock for the scale; I believe in burning it.

This was a direct condemnation of inspection, and against the possibility of any effectual inspection. Then he goes on further:

A case of scale was found to exist within a few steps of the door of the horticultural building of Cornell University—had been there for three years without having been detected, and was only found the other day by a man from the experiment station. The scale is adapting itself to different climatic conditions; it has been found in the mountainous regions of Virginia at a height of 2,000 feet; in western New York, and as far north as Canada. It infests all the deciduous fruit trees that belong to the rosaceæ; among trees it infests the black walnut, the American chestnut, the American and European lindens, the catalpa, cut-leaf birch, &c.

I will read that part of the report which speaks about fruit. Professor Alwood says, this:

There is at present no case on record where fruit has disseminated these scales, its spread generally taking place from branch to branch where the trees are planted closer together, and in one case at least the infection was carried from place to place by peach-gatherers, who had brushed up the scale with their garments.

This is pretty good proof as to the unlikelihood of the scale being introduced on fruit, and is one of the strong reasons why I was led to believe, in discussing the matter, that it was not necessary to exclude fruit to protect our orchards in this country. Now, I will give you a list of places where this insect has been found in the United States. I am reading from a list of states which include nearly all the states on our borders, and a great many others: Alabama, Connecticut, Georgia, Indiana, Maryland, Mississippi, New Jersey, Oregon, Rhode Island, Texas, Washington, Arizona, Delaware, Idaho, Kentucky, Michigan, Massachusetts, New Mexico, Ohio, South Carolina, Virginia, California, Florida, Illinois, Louisiana, Missouri, New York, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, West Virginia. That was last year. It has been found in some more states since that time. The nurseries in the following states are reported as being badly infested:—Massachusetts, Georgia, Mississippi, New York, Florida, Louisiana, Alabama, Missouri.

You see, then, that the spread of that pest has been very great in the United States, and when I say that twelve years ago only was this scale discovered in the little far-off Valley of San José, in Southern California, and that last year it was found in most of the states of the union and a number of the Northern States, where a few years ago it was believed it could not possibly exist, and that it has been found in our own country in a few instances, you can understand the tremendous danger of its introduction into this country, necessitating our taking even drastic measures to protect ourselves. Now, I may say a word or two in regard to the objections that have been brought forward. I think I have fairly answered the question as to why I did not introduce this Bill earlier in the session. I would have introduced it two or three weeks ago, had it not been that the House was occupied with the Yukon Bill. I had no opportunity until that debate was over of introducing it, though I was prepared to introduce it over two weeks ago, and would have done so, had it not been for that Bill. The people who are complaining say that they have had no warning. Now, as a matter of fact, during this past winter and autumn, every horticultural meeting, and a large number of agricultural meetings, all over Canada, have been discussing this question. It has been brought up at every provincial fruit-growers' meeting in the land, where it has been discussed, and resolutions have been passed asking this Parliament to prohibit the introduction of the scale, asking this Parliament to pass just such a law as we have passed. At institute meetings, in the province of Ontario, there have been frequent discussions in regard to this pest. I have in my possession a number of resolutions passed at such meetings, asking me to prepare a Bill prohibiting the introduction of this pest into the country. In face of this, it seems idle to suppose that these people have not had fair warning, and have not had the likelihood before them that action of this kind would be taken. The question has been discussed for over a year. As I pointed out, the other day, at the end of the last session of Parliament representations were made to me by farmers and the fruit interests in the country, asking that the House then, in the last days of the session, should pass a prohibitory law; and the question has been discussed in both the agricultural press and in the ordinary press of the country.

The "Horticulturist," the organ of the Provincial Fruit-Growers' Association of Ontario, a publication which must be taken by all those gentlemen interested in nursery work, who, if they keep up with the times, must read about these matters and know the discussions that have occurred on this question, published an article and resolutions asking that this legislation should be passed. It seems, therefore, idle to suppose that those men had not as much warning as the ordinary warning given in regard to legislation that may affect any industry in the country. Sir, I have been asked to make allusion to the question of inspection, as to whether it would be possible that some slight modification of the Bill might be brought about as regards the importation of nursery stock by its inspection here. I have followed very closely the discussion and arguments that have taken place on this question in the United States and Canada. I have come deliberately to the conclusion that any inspection would be futile, that if we were to allow carloads of stock to be brought in and try to inspect it at the frontier, we would have no sort of assurance that it would be protected from disease.

Mr. FOSTER. What about fumigation and inspection?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I am coming to that in a moment. On Tuesday, the very day the Bill was sanctioned by His Excellency the Governor General, two carloads of nursery stock were imported by Brown Bros. That stock arrived at the frontier and was entered on Friday, and consequently it was allowed to come in, orders going out from here on Friday night to have the Act put in force. Supposing the stock had to be inspected, supposing we undertook to inspect two carloads of nursery stock, it would be found that there were not less than 50,000, 60,000 or 100,000 plants. That is quite possible, for a great deal of the nursery stock is very small. Some years ago I imported a thousand trees, and they all went into a small box. A carload would take usually 100,000 individual plants of such stock, and very likely even more if small stock such as is imported for the purpose of grafting or budding. The inspector would have to be an expert if the inspection was to be any good. He would have to take up every individual plant and examine it with a magnifying glass. That would mean many days of work. The stock would have to be opened to the air, probably somewhat dried, then repacked and sent on to its destination; and I venture to say it would practically prohibit, if those regulations were carried out, just as much as the Bill passed the other day would prohibit. It would be practically impossible to carry out such inspection. Furthermore, in shipping nursery stock of this kind a large percentage is killed. Any one who has any knowledge of ordinary stock is aware that a pretty large percentage of the plants die. If the Government were to undertake to make any inspection, and any loss of that kind should occur, they would be held responsible, even though they carried out the system as well as possible.

Mr. McNEILL. What is the value of the stock ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I could obtain an estimate for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. McNEILL. Has the hon. gentleman considered the advisability of destroying the stock and paying for it ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The value of a carload of stock would depend on the nature of the plants, for nursery stock is variable as regards quality and size. I am informed, through one of my officers, that a gentleman imported a lot of nursery stock from the United States, which was delivered at as low a rate as from 2 cents to 3 cents a plant. I am disposed to consider that this is the kind of stock that Mr. Dryden indicated should not be allowed to be imported. If a buyer can purchase stock in the United States at from 2 cents to 3 cents per plant, he is getting the refuse of the United States nurseries, which the proprietors cannot sell to their own people, and it will very probably be infected with scale or some other disease. If buyers are getting stock at such prices, knowing as we do the average prices of nursery stock in this country and the United States, it is most extraordinary that they can obtain nursery stock at such prices unless there is some disease affecting it.

Mr. McNEILL. Will the hon. gentleman take into his consideration whether it is not desirable, in view of the great danger to the fruit-growing interest of the Dominion, to destroy any of that stock coming into the country, even though it may be necessary to compensate the parties who are paid for it ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. When I found those two carloads coming in, I telegraphed the Ontario Government to send an inspector there and let him do the best he could. I do not believe in the adequacy of inspection.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not believe in inspection.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I do not; but I telegraphed instructions that the inspector should do the best he could.

Mr. McNEILL. I would burn it all, and pay for it, if necessary.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The Ontario Government has that power, Mr. FISHER.

but I am not aware that any Dominion law authorizes it. I am dealing with the importation of nursery stock in the way I have indicated. And as we were aware that the provinces of Ontario, Nova Scotia and British Columbia had already passed laws for that purpose, I therefore thought it was not necessary for this Parliament to interfere in that regard.

I was speaking about inspection, and stating the reason why I did not consider any system of inspection we could possibly adopt or carry out would be effective without spending an enormous sum. I venture to say to-day that if we had allowed this stock to come in and attempted to inspect it at all effectively, it would be difficult to find men in Canada qualified and willing to undertake the work, unless they were paid enormous remuneration; reasonable salaries would not suffice. For that reason, I tell the House frankly that the more drastic remedy was the better one and the only safe one, and that it was in the interest of the country that the law was passed.

The question of compensation has come up. I am not prepared to speak on that at the moment, for it is a very serious question. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) pointed out how easily an enormous sum could be spent to secure very doubtful results. I am quite prepared to consider any suggestion or any details that may be suggested. More than that I cannot presume at this moment, and at this stage of the question, to say. I must state, however, that any such claims for compensation would have to show with great clearness and remarkable force that they were founded on any necessity. One gentleman who said he was going to be ruined by this law told a friend of mine yesterday that he would lose $62. I have no doubt that he is a comparatively poor man and that $62 is an important sum to him, and I can appreciate the loss it would be, but still when I hear that a man is going to be ruined by the loss of $62, I can hardly connect the two terms as being suitable in applying to the same case. When we come down to the investigation of the facts, I think we will find that the alarm raised as to the great pecuniary loss in consequence of this Bill is somewhat exaggerated, and that when the momentary excitement has calmed down it will be discovered that comparatively few people have been hurt, and very few, if any at all, seriously hurt, while I am satisfied that a great step has been taken in the necessary protection of a large industry in our country, and which step I believe Parliament was called upon to take.

Mr. FOSTER. Do not forget about the fumigation.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. There have been experiments tried in regard to the fumigation of this nursery stock with hydrocyanic acid. These experiments have been made in California with a certain amount of success, and I believe if the nursery stock is very thoroughly fumigated so that every individual plant is reached by the fumes of the acid the effect is all right. It is a somewhat expensive, very difficult and somewhat dangerous proceeding to use hydrocyanic acid, because it is a very strong poison and those using it incur a considerable danger. I have discussed this matter with the fruit-growers and entomologists and they have recommended me not to take it into consideration in framing this law. It is possible that fumigating chambers might be erected in certain places and that the stock might be very thoroughly fumigated, but I do not think it would be practically possible to fumigate all stock coming into the country, and allow it to come in free. That is the conclusion I arrived at after investigating this question of fumigation.

Mr. CHARLTON. What about the kerosene emulsion?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Mr. Fletcher reports that it is very doubtful if kerosene emulsion is effectual in killing this scale.

Mr. CHARLTON. The Cornell experiments seem to show that it has been effective.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes, but there have been disputes and differences of experience in regard to that. Mr. Fletcher recommends that where the scale exists there should be a thorough spraying and drenching with a solution of whale oil soap. I understand that kerosene emulsion is not by any means effective, and while it may hurt the scale it cannot be counted upon as an absolutely effective remedy. I may say in reply to the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Hughes), who spoke of the honey locust, that this pest infects all deciduous honey trees. The name of the honey locust is not included in the list I have, but it would come within the class of trees which I am told are infected with these scales. I may say that the Order in Council based upon this Act brings the Act into application as against the United States, Hawaii, Australia and Japan, those being the four places where we know at present of the existence of the San José scale. In accordance with the section of the Act which provides that certain classes of plants may be exempted, we passed an Order in Council exempting what are commonly known as greenhouse plants, and which with the exception of roses are apparently not affected by the scales. This exemption includes herbaceous perennials, not wood in their nature, all coniferous plants which are never attacked by the scale, and bulbs. I am advised by Professor Saunders and Professor Fletcher that these plants are not open to the scale and accordingly we have exempted them. I think, Mr. Speaker, I have explained this matter in such a way, that I hope the House will be satisfied with the action which has been taken, and I trust that as time goes on we will find that the alarm about certain interests being seriously hurt will be found not to be nearly so serious as has been represented in the House of Commons.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that the hon. Minister of Agriculture does not shut out every ray of hope that some relief will be afforded to those persons upon whom this law will press so very heavily. I have had communications from and personal interviews with men who will be very much affected indeed by its operations. With the efforts of the Government, and with the efforts of authority everywhere to suppress disease or prevent disaster, there must be a certain amount of sympathy, but the hon. Minister himself by his admission the other day in reference to this pest, shows us that there are difficulties to be overcome which cannot be coped with by any legislation. He pointed out the different ways in which this insect pest is spread by attaching itself to moving objects, such as the feet of birds, and by other means which pay no attention, either to the customs authorities or agricultural authorities or to boundary lines. The chief difficulty seems to be in regard to this insect, that it is so minute that it was not discovered until it had made considerable ravages, and now, as all men magnify their operations, the fruit-growers and the nurserymen to some extent have made the very most of this difficulty. I hope that the Minister will take into consideration, that by this action of the Department of Agriculture and of Parliament certain persons engaged in business in this country have been very seriously oppressed. The Minister now says that the expenditure will be so large that he cannot undertake to say that any redress will be given to those people, although he does not say that redress will not be given, and in that those who have suffered losses may find some hope. Take the case of men who having made all arrangements to carry on their business this year are now completely shut out by the operations of this Act. It must be taken into consideration that the documents issued by the Department of Agriculture and read by persons who are in this business, would naturally lead to the belief that there would be no active legislation against the San José scale this year, and so they were led to continue to place their orders in advance and to conduct their business in the usual way in which this business is conducted. Those persons have incurred large expenditure, and they must necessarily suffer great loss. I would call the attention of the House for a moment.

to the evidence given last year by Mr. James Fletcher before the Committee on Agriculture and Colonization over which the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Bain) presides. Mr. Fletcher went before the committee, and referring to this pest, he said :

There is some agitation in the west to have prohibitive legislation by Parliament, to prevent nursery stock, through which this scale was introduced, from being brought into the country. After watching the matter carefully in the United States, and the way it is developing here, I have not seen my way to advise the Minister to recommend that legislation. All I can say is, I have watched it very carefully before I came here, and I think I know of the three instances in which it has been introduced into Canada, to find if possible a remedy without interfering with the fruit-growers and the nurserymen. If our fruit-growers and nurserymen could grow all their stock, and would grow it, then legislation of this kind might be considered more seriously. We know that our Canadian nurserymen have not got this insect, but we know that they cannot supply fruit to their customers. They have to get it from the United States nurseries, and if we enact prohibitive legislation before it is possible for them to do without the importations, we are going to interfere with both of these businesses at once, and I did not see my way to advise the Minister to propose this legislation.

The Minister read a list of the states in which this insect appears; but these are some of the finest fruit-growing states in the American union. After all, this is the old fight of the agriculturist against the insect which preys on his crop. I would like also to call the attention of the House to the evidence of Mr. Craig, the horticulturist of the farm, on this matter :

It seems to me that it would not be a difficult matter for us to arrange through our customs-house officers, to stop any package of fruit trees coming into this country unaccompanied by a certificate from the state entomologist, saying that the nursery from which these trees came was free from San José scale.

Here is an officer of the department who thinks the evil might be met, or at any rate restricted in that way. An hon. friend asks me what I am driving at. I am endeavouring to show to his broad intellect that the people engaged in the fruit-growing business might fairly infer from the reports of the department that there would be no restrictive legislation, and that in view of such legislation they are entitled to consideration at the hands of the Minister with reference to compensation. Then the Minister himself made a report to Parliament this year, in which he said :

Among the newly introduced insect pests, the San José scale has attracted a large amount of attention. This is probably one of the most injurious insects known on fruit trees. The scales are small and not easily detected, especially in their earlier stages, and it is a very difficult insect to destroy. Much timely information has been disseminated regarding this insect enemy, and fruit-growers everywhere have been warned of the danger of the careless importation from infested districts, of trees by which this formidable foe may be brought into their orchards. Several visits have been made, and meetings of fruit-growers attended, by the entomologist, in the districts where this insect has been discovered, and advice has been given as to the best methods for the destruction of the invader.

In view of these reports, I think that the persons who made arrangements to import their stock were justified in doing so, and that the country is to some extent responsible to them for the loss which this legislation will inflict upon them. It is well known that every enemy that infests plants and trees can be met and destroyed by some chemical means or some appliance; it is a mere question of taking it in time. I regret very much that the Minister seems to think that no effort could be made to disinfect and destroy these insects at the frontier. I think the opinion of the authority of Cornell University is worth something. If we are to carry on all our business by stopping at the frontier everything that may have some germ of disease in it, we may as well stop immigration and importation altogether; we may as well close up our whole business at once. The proper way to deal with these matters is to grapple with the difficulties as they present themselves, in the way that men have to grapple with them everywhere. However, I did not rise to discuss the question, but to impress on the Minister's mind that something is due to the people to whom I have referred, who have incurred large expenditures in their business this year.

Mr. MCGREGOR. I think the Minister of Agriculture has acted fairly and well in this matter. I belong to the county of Essex, where we have five or six thousand acres in peaches, five or six thousand acres in grapes, and possibly twice as much in apples; and had the Minister of Agriculture not acted, and acted quickly, the damage in my county would have been great. But as he has acted so quickly, we are satisfied that the nurseries to the south of us will not send their trees to us, and our orchards will not be affected. My hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said that the Minister might have given longer time or more notice; but there is a great difference between this year and last year in regard to this pest. Last year it was not known in our county, while this year it is known, and there is no telling what would be the result a few years hence if we allowed the nurseries south of the boundary to send in their stock. I feel satisfied that the southern portion of Canada is going to be a great fruit-growing district, and that the northern and north-western sections of Canada are going to be great consumers of that fruit; and I think it is the duty of the Minister of Agriculture to do everything in his power to save that fruit, and to allow the people of this country to make the most of it. I was present at the committee last year when Professor Fletcher gave his evidence. He said that but three cases of the pest were known to the department—one in British Columbia, one in the county of Kent, and one in the Niagara district. He could now tell of a good many more. I am pleased that both the Government at Ottawa and the Ontario Government are doing everything in their power to stop this dreaded disease. It would be much better for us to pay for the shrubs and trees that have been imported and have them destroyed, than to allow them to be planted to the damage of the country. In my county we have orchards of forty, fifty and one hundred acres in peaches alone, and other large areas in grapes, and if the San José pest got into our orchards and vineyards, the loss to our people would be very great indeed, and we would feel that the Minister of Agriculture here and the Minister of Agriculture in Ontario had neglected their duty in allowing the pest to increase. I hope and trust that the Government will continue to act as positively as they are doing to-day, and I feel satisfied that the course they are taking will be of great benefit to this Canada of ours.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, the circumstances have changed so rapidly with respect to this pest that any evidence which we had before us a year ago is almost unavailing to-day. Take the correspondence which the Minister of Agriculture has had laid before him since the last meeting of this Parliament, and since Messrs. Fletcher and Craig gave their evidence. We know three times as much about this pest to-day as we did then.

My hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Ellis) said that no pest ever came amongst our fruit without some means being found of dealing with it. Well, I may tell the hon. gentleman that a germ came among our plum and pear trees in the western parts of Ontario which caused the black knot, and that, in consequence of this disease, these fruits almost entirely disappeared, despite everything that could be done to check it, after once it had been allowed to spread. Whereas, if this germ had been destroyed in its infancy, when first introduced, we might have stopped its ravages. We waited, however, too long, and the only remedy now is to cut down the trees infected and burn them. I believe that the hon. Minister deserves credit for the care he has taken and the amount of time he must have given to the examination of this very important matter; and let me say, further, that I am under the impression that we do not know yet how far this pest has spread. It has been stated that the trees might be inspected. Why, it is a very difficult matter to inspect a tree infected by a great many of these small insects, which can only be detected through a lens. Means should be taken, if possible, to stop the spread of these two carloads of trees which have been imported. It would be much better to have them destroyed, and I would be willing to vote an amount of money for that purpose rather than have them distributed throughout the country. The hon. Minister would have been derelict in his duty to the fruit-growers and farmers of Canada, if he had not taken the drastic measure he has. In my opinion, the loss that will be sustained by those who are dealing in this stock will be very small indeed, compared with the injury that would have been inflicted on the country if the large quantity of trees ordered had been allowed to come in and be distributed. This law will only have the effect of stimulating the nurserymen in Ontario and other provinces to supply the want that has been caused by the stoppage of these trees from other sources, and I believe that Canada is perfectly capable of supplying all the trees we require. I am of the opinion that every proper means should be taken to stop the influx of foreign products, the importation of which is calculated to injure our own stock through pests of any kind.

Mr. FOSTER. I think that we have had, in these last few minutes, sufficient satisfaction, on this side of the House, for our seventeen or eighteen years of propaganda in favour of the protection of our industries. I almost leaped from my seat, when I heard my hon. friend who has just spoken lay down the proposition, boldly and strongly, that, in this matter of nursery stock, he was in favour of keeping out the foreign trees—and even going further than nursery stock, and declaring that he would be in favour of keeping out all foreign products of a kind which we were able to raise ourselves. Why, Mr. Speaker, that is the rankest kind of protection.

Mr. McMILLAN. I did not say, all the foreign products, but only those that are going to injure the native products of this country.

Mr. FOSTER. That is all that the most ardent protectionists have been arguing for or want. Whatever Canada is able to produce for herself, let us keep the market for, by putting up a strong tariff against outside markets, and in this way you will develop the growth of supplies within our own territories. My hon. friend has reached the happy land at last. Here is my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who has been preaching free trade for eighteen years. His practice, fortunately, has disagreed with his precepts; and the result is, that this youthful member of his party has been won over and nurtured into stronger and stronger protectionist doctrine, until to-day he is a full-fledged protectionist. Now, I wonder what the hon. members for Manitoba and the North-west think about that next instalment, when one of their most forward members has to-day, by the statement he has made classed himself irrevocably in the ranks of the protectionists. One by one they are coming over, but two are still left of the old guard, and of these one is doubtful. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), the other night, betrayed a part of his old creed, his love for the American market, and thought we were getting on famously without it. One is left, and I believe will remain as long as life continues, an ardent free trader and a lover of the freest ingress of goods from the outside, especially when that outside source is the United States market.

Let me say, with reference to this matter, that the measure is a drastic one, and that, in my opinion, nothing else but a sudden and drastic measure would have at all coped with the evil. But there are some other considerations which, I think, my hon. friend ought to have taken into account. There is a wide divergence between this sudden prohibition, coming right in the midst of an active season, attacking the dealers after they had incurred all their initial expenses and had made their sales for the season in this country—taking them between the supply of our market and the getting of their goods from the other side—and a tariff revision. The position is a peculiar one, and it is established with regard to goods that have never been prohibited, and are considered useful articles of merchandise. Although a drastic measure had to be undertaken and the prohibition had to come suddenly, to be of effect at all, the question is, whether it is fair that the country should take the whole gain at the expense of some few individuals who make all the losses in the matter. That is a point my hon. friend should take into consideration. It is rather a dangerous thing to advocate compensation with regard to tariff changes which should be made, but there are tariff changes and tariff changes; and I think this is a case where the country might well ask itself whether all the benefit should come to the country at the expense, and the large expense, of a few individuals who are caught, as it were, between wind and water.

My hon. friend has also this to think of, that his measure, perhaps, will not be effective. This scale exists on the other side and has existed there, according to his contention, and there are in Canada to-day hundreds of thousands of American stock, which have been imported from the infected regions and are now stored up in the cellars and houses of the Canadian importers; and after this Bill has passed, that stock will be distributed throughout the country without inspection and with all its load of possible disease. So that my hon. friend has been able, by this measure of his, simply to stop the influx of a certain quantity of infected material, but has not been able to cover by a single article that larger amount of infected material which was successful in passing the customs before this law was passed, and which is stored up now in the warehouses and cellars of these distributors, and will be soon distributed all through the country. So that if there is any method by which, at a small cost, this distribution can be stopped, that method should be adopted. The cost is never excessive, because hundreds of thousands of these plants are bought at extremely low rates. My hon. friend thought that two or three cents a plant was an extremely low rate, but when he takes into consideration the immensely large scale on which the nurseries on the other side operate, and the consequent cheapness with which they can produce, he will see they may sell good stock at very low prices, and, consequently, two, or three, or four cents per plant is not indubitable proof that the plant is bad or the stock infected in any way. So that my hon. friend must, to be effective, follow this infected material which has come over the border during the last four or five weeks, and which is waiting distribution to the farmers and plant-growers of the country. I do not know that that can be done or not, but, if it can be done, now that he has started, he ought to make this law as effective as possible, and, if the distribution of the stock which has been brought over can be prevented, that should be done.

I wish to draw attention to another point. Here you have two men, both of whom have sent out their agents into the field. These agents have been at work six or eight weeks, and have made contracts for the sale of this nursery stock. These nurserymen in Canada have bought stock from the United States nurseries and paid for it. One of these nurserymen was successful in getting his stock across, and his business has not been interfered with. His sales have been implemented, and he reaps the profit. But the other man was too late; he did not get his stock across in time; he loses everything, and his whole season's business is gone.

The country has benefited, but why should the country take this benefit from an extraordinary Act passed for an extraordinary purpose and leave the individual who was unfortunate enough to be a few hours late to bear all the loss of it? I think that this is something my hon. friend (Mr. Fisher) should look into with a view, in this especial case, to having justice done.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE.
My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) would propose compensation, then?

Mr. FOSTER. I would propose a very careful consideration of this matter, not because I am in favour of the principle of compensation when tariff changes take place, but because of the peculiarity of the case. This is a case that might prove to be an exception and, at any rate, I think might well be earnestly considered. Another thing I think is apparent. Whilst all the good things that could be said of this legislation have been said—and none too good—I think it is apparent that my hon. friend was late in his legislation. He should have known as a practical man of business, about the season when these men are sending out their agents—that is within the last four or five weeks. He was advertised, and fully advertised of the insidious nature of this pest and of the fact that it threatened this country. I think he has not been as early with his legislation as he should have been. This measure should have been prepared and put through Parliament in the very earliest days of the session. If that had been done, the hon. gentleman would have caught the agents before they went into the field, and he would have caught this infected stock before more than a very small quantity had come into this country to be distributed. I believe in the legislation, I believe that you cannot follow this insidious San José scale by any method of inspection, and I am not sure that you could do it even by disinfection and fumigation. Prohibition is the real remedy, but it is a harsh remedy when applied to useful articles of common consumption. There are other considerations which the Government could take into account as to the compensation of individuals who are hurt by it. After all, $62 is not much to my hon. friend or to Klondike people, but to a poor man it is more than $62,000 to a rich man, and may go far to ruin him.

Motion to adjourn, negatived.

LIQUOR PERMITS FOR THE YUKON DISTRICT.

Mr. DAVIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask a simple question. Mr. A. W. Owen, writing in the "Citizen," says :

The only things that are plentiful in Dawson are whisky and cigars, and there is an abundance of that. Along the main street of the town nine shanties out of every ten are saloons and gambling dens. Some of these have dance halls attached, and these are the places that do the rushing business. The town is full of women, and they make more money than is good for them out of the miners that are fools enough, or, shall I say, drunk enough, to spend it on them.

I wish to ask the Minister of the Interior what is being done about that? We have been asking questions about permits going into that country, and information has come to me from responsible men in the Northwest Territories who assure me that permits has been issued from Ottawa.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). When?

Mr. DAVIN. Very recently. I would like to know what is being done about it.

The PRIME MINISTER. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) is not here, but I am in a position to know that no permits have been issued recently. I do not believe that any permits have been issued, but I am sure that recently none have been issued.

THE CATTLE TRADE.

Mr. HUGHES. Among those who are familiar with the harbour of Montreal in the summer season, what I am about to say will not excite any surprise. But I am satisfied that the facts I am about to lay before the House will be news to a great many. Every day vessels laden with cattle and other merchandise from Canada sail from the port of Montreal for Liverpool, for Glasgow, for Bristol, Southampton, Aberdeen, and a number of other ports in Scotland and England. But though there are large vessels leaving Montreal weekly for Ireland, not one of these vessels is allowed to carry a single head of cattle.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I fail to see in what way the question the hon. gentleman is bringing up can be considered a question of privilege.

Mr. HUGHES. I am bringing it up before the Orders of the Day are called.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. There has already been a motion to adjourn, and I do not think a similar motion can be made now, and it seems to me that the question is one that should not be raised without a motion.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). If my hon. friend (Mr. Hughes) wishes to put a question—

Mr. HUGHES. I wish to read an extract from a letter and lay certain facts before the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. HUGHES. Very well; I will bring the matter up another day.

FRANCHISE ACT.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 16) to repeal the Electoral Franchise Act and to further amend the Dominion Elections Act. He said: The object of this Bill is to repeal the Franchise Act of 1885 and to revert for the franchise for the polling divisions and also for the voters' lists to the condition of things existing previous to that time. The Bill is not a lengthy one. It provides in the first instance, for the repeal of the Franchise Act; then it provides that the franchise shall be in each province the franchise existing under the provincial law for the purposes of the provincial election—the words "provincial election" being defined in the Bill—and then it provides that the list of voters shall be the same as that in existence in the province. We then go on to provide that the polling divisions or subdivisions are to be the same as those that exist in the province. These are in effect, the enacting clauses. There are some other clauses which have for their object to repeal or amend certain provisions of the Dominion Election Act so as to make the Act conform with the conditions under the new Bill.

It will not be necessary for me to refer to the condition of things existing in 1885; it will not be necessary for me to show that at that time a radical change took place, that we then made a departure from the franchise as we had had it not only from the time of confederation but from a time long previous to that. The change made in 1885 has certainly not been productive of good results, and the law then passed has not met with the approval of the people of Canada. The proof that the law has not met with the approval of the people of Canada will be found in the fact that in 1890 and in 1891 legislation was introduced in this House for the purpose of repealing the law, and that the objections to it grew to such an extent that in 1894 it was found necessary by the Government of that time, presided over by a gentleman belonging to the great political party that brought about the change of 1885, to introduce a Bill which had for its object to revert to the same conditions as existed previous to 1885. When that Bill was introduced, Sir John Thompson made use of these words:

We propose important changes in the Franchise Act, and without making a speech upon them or giving reasons, I would briefly state that we propose to adopt as the basis of the franchise, the franchise of the various provinces of Canada.

Then when the Bill came up for the second reading, Sir John Thompson made use of these words:

The change is also proposed in this Bill which I indicated a few days ago, that the questions upon which so much difference has arisen in the past, as to the basis of the franchise, shall be adjusted by adopting the franchises of the several provinces. While I admit that this is a new departure, I deny what has been so widely asserted, that it is in any important or practical degree a surrender of any principle that we have contended for in times past. The number of differences which exist between the provincial franchises and the Dominion franchise as established by our own Act, are so few as not to be worth the contest and the expense which are involved in keeping them up, and the adoption of a general system which will apply both to the local and Dominion legislatures, has recommendations, as regards simplicity and facilities for economy which cannot exist under a dual system, such as we have been keeping up for the past few years.

Therefore we find that within ten years after the Act had been introduced, after we had had ten years' experience with the operation and the results produced by this Act, the leader of the Government at that time—I think he was then leader—found it necessary to say that the Act had been a failure, and that it was necessary to revert to the conditions existing previous to its introduction. Now, I have looked over the Act introduced by Sir John Thompson, and those who are curious enough to look into this matter will find that his Bill, No. 143 of 1894, shows clearly that the intention of the framer of the Bill when it was introduced, was to revert purely and simply to the provincial franchise, that is to say, to adopt the system of leaving its preparation to the people. But though that was clearly the intention of the framer of the Bill when it was introduced, we find that after he had adopted that principle, in obedience to some outside influence which it is impossible to gather at the present time, he grafted on to this principle the revising barrister. He adopts the principle of the provincial franchise, he says that for federal elections we shall use the voters' list of the several provinces, then he takes up the revising barrister and brings him into the Bill for the purpose of—what? It is impossible to say.

Mr. BERGERON. For the principle of uniformity.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The principle of uniformity—why it is impossible to imagine that the principle of uniformity can exist when you consider the variety of franchises in the provinces. The only possible intention must have been to provide that in case any province should disfranchise individuals for instance, the revising barrister should remedy such grievance, if any grievance really existed. It was to have some federal control over the franchise, not for the purpose of uniformity. Now that is what took place in 1894. The Bill was not passed, I believe it did not reach the committee stage. But in 1895 another Bill was introduced which was framed to some extent on the lines of that which is now submitted to the consideration of this House, that was the Bill introduced by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). That Bill met with considerable approval in the House, but at that time the hon. gentlemen who were then sitting on the Government side, were evidently more seriously engaged in other matters, and the conclusion to which they came was that in view of the then impending elections it was not wise to change the basis of the franchise. However, it seems to me that from 1894 the principle has been settled and established in this House that we should revert to the conditions existing previous to 1895 and adopt the principle of provincial franchises. Now, if we consider what has been the result to the country of the adoption of the Franchise Act in 1885, we find that from that date to

Mr. FITZPATRICK.

1895 during ten years, it cost this country $1,154,000.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). For three revisions.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. For four revisions, but in any case, that was the cost to the country. Now, if we consider the cost to individuals, to the members, to those who take part in the administration of public affairs, I am safe in saying that we may place that at another half a million dollars. I think it is, at all events, a very safe estimate, and those who have had more experience than I have would consider probably that it is a very low estimate, to conclude, after adding these two amounts together, that the total expense during those ten years has been in the vicinity of $1,500,000 at the very least. Now, under these circumstances we say that it is proper for us to revert to the conditions existing before 1885. We say that the Act of 1885 has not produced the results that were expected of it, and we say that the application of that Act has involved an expenditure out of all proportion to the benefits realized. We say furthermore, that the uniformity which it has been contended was secured by that Act, is not a principle which would justify us in setting aside that idea which we think ought to prevail, that we should put the franchise, not under the control of this House, but under the control of the electorate, under the control of the people who sent us here, put that as directly as possible under their control by placing it in the hands of the municipal councils. We say that uniformity is not desirable, because the conditions existing in this country are not the same throughout. So far as I am concerned as a citizen, speaking now as a member from the province of Quebec, I say it would be unfair to the people of that province, for instance, that we should endeavour to impose upon them universal suffrage. They are the best judges of what they require, they are the best judges of the conditions under which they wish their members to be chosen, they are the best judges of the principles which they wish to see applied, and also of the class of voters that are to select the men that are to come here to represent them. It may be that a desire exists in some provinces to extend the franchise so broadly that all men may have a right to participate in the elections; there may be a desire that all men, even those whose only asset in life is the vote they may dispose of as a marketable commodity in the elections, should occupy the same position as the man who has some stake in the country. I say that in the province of Quebec, at all events, our desire has been so far as our provincial franchise is concerned to have some regard to property, to the rights of education, to the rights of the artisan who contributes something to meet the public expenditures; and we can see no reason why those rights should be set at naught, and that we should yield to the desire that appears to exist elsewhere to impose upon our province that which the province has never been willing to accept, universal suffrage. Under these circumstances I move the second reading of the Bill.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that the hon. gentleman who has introduced this Bill has done so briefly, because I think it will be the less necessary that I should detain the House under the circumstances, for any considerable period. The hon. gentleman has based the introduction of this measure very largely upon the views of an hon. gentleman who held a very distinguished position in this House, Sir John Thompson; but I think he has entirely misapprehended the position that hon. gentleman took and the mature opinion at which he arrived. It is quite true that the Bill which was adopted by this House, giving us the franchise of 1885, admittedly proved to be a somewhat expensive measure; there can be no doubt it was found to be attended with a large amount of expense, so large an expense as to prevent the revision of the lists as frequently as it is desirable the lists should be revised. But the hon. gentleman could not say that the proposal was to revert to the system that was in operation before for many years, or in fact from confederation down to that period, because he knows that the policy of adopting the franchises of the provinces was absolutely necessary in the first instance. There were no means of creating a franchise until this Parliament had been elected and had assembled; and it was therefore essential to use the franchises of the various provinces. The policy was a matter of absolute necessity; it was not a matter of choice. But after mature consideration, and after the experience this House had of the franchise of the various provinces as the franchise of this Dominion Parliament, the House deliberately came to the conclusion that it was due to the character and independence of this Parliament that we should depart from this arrangement and have a franchise of our own. I need not at this moment go into the evidences that existed in regard to that point, further than to say that it was found that the right and power of the local legislatures to select a franchise, which was afterwards used by the Dominion, was in some cases certainly grossly abused; and so strongly was that abuse pursued, that in the province of Nova Scotia the legislature absolutely passed a franchise Act after the general election to have an effect upon the Dominion elections, although they never intended to use it and never did use it, for their own elections; and they repealed the Act before the local elections came on, showing they had absolutely the power to control the representation of this Parliament, by adopting a policy which they did not exercise themselves and never intended to exercise. One such illustration is sufficient to prove the absolute necessity of this Parliament, if it was going to occupy an independent position in the estimation of the country and the world adopting a franchise of its own. That led to the passage of the Act of 1885, and the experience of that law was that it was attended with very considerable expense, and a desire arose, and naturally arose, and which no doubt exists generally in the minds of hon. members, to endeavour to modify that Act in such a way as to prevent the very large expenditure it necessarily involved, and which led to the still worse effect of precluding the prevention of frequent revision of the electoral lists as was desired. The hon. gentleman said that that system to which he proposed to revert was one long anterior to confederation. I do not understand what the hon. Solicitor General means, because anterior to confederation there could be no possible analogy between the adoption of the franchises of the provinces and the election of members to this Parliament, and the subject we have now under consideration.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. By the making of the lists by the municipalities.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That question does not necessarily arise. Does this Parliament intend to avail itself of the expenditure made by the municipalities and provinces and take their lists?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Certainly.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then I think the hon. gentleman is enjoying the expenditure made by the provinces for provincial purposes to an extent which I do not think this Parliament would be justified in doing. But I find in this Bill the hon. gentleman provides, and I find he is obliged to provide, under certain circumstances which may arise for the independent creation of a franchise for the purposes of Dominion elections, such a measure of relief, and it is necessary because if he had not that power, he might be left in the position of having no franchise in a province when it is required, or of having a franchise so old as to make it very inadvisable that it should be used. The point I want to come to, therefore, is this: If this Parliament has the right, as this Bill assumes it has the right, to avail itself of the officials appointed by a province for the purpose of creating a franchise, if we have that right—and I will not for a moment dispute it except as a matter of common justice—then there is no reason why, without surrendering the position of being deprived of the power to pass that legislation upon which the representatives of this Parliament should be elected to sit here, we should not avail ourselves of those officials and their lists. If that was the position, we would have the power, without necessarily reverting to the franchises of the provinces for Dominion purposes, of using their lists. I think, therefore, that what any hon. member would feel was desirable was that this Parliament should have the means of legislating, should have power and control in respect to the franchise upon which hon. members are elected to sit in this Parliament. If that were the case, we should endeavour to avoid the only objection that was raised against the Act of 1885, or at all events the main objection raised, and that was in regard to the expense involved; and according to the present Bill the difficulty can be avoided just as well without surrendering our independent control of the franchise under which members of this Parliament are elected. I think, therefore, the measure provides a means of meeting the only substantial difficulty ever presented in regard to the Act of 1885. Sir John Thompson, no doubt, gave this subject a good deal of consideration; but it is impossible when you take all his statements in this House into consideration, not to arrive at the conclusion that while his purpose was not to adopt the franchises of the various provinces as the franchise for the election of members of this House, but his proposal was that the franchises of the provinces should be adopted as a basis upon which the officers of this Parliament should prepare a franchise for Dominion purposes.

If the matter is carefully investigated, it will be found that it did not go any further than that. I have alluded to one of the strongest evidences of the humiliating position in which this Parliament is placed, if we divested ourselves of all control over the franchise under which members to this House are elected. When we were discussing this measure last session, we had placed before us an illustration of the wretched occurrences which took place in connection with the administration of the franchise law in the province of Manitoba. Will any one in this House deny the existence of the monstrous frauds under which the elections were carried on, and are carried on, in the province of Manitoba? We had it pointed out here, last session, that, under the officials appointed, and under the law of the province of Manitoba—a law that we are invited by this Government to make the law for the election of members from that province to the Federal Parliament—a most disgraceful state of things existed. What occurred then is likely to occur to-morrow, if an election should take place, and it will doubtless occur, unless that law is changed. The Manitoba law provided for the revision of the lists, and it was proved before the officials appointed by the Manitoba Government to revise the lists, that in constituencies where parties were evenly balanced, whole batches of names were placed upon the lists—names of parties who had no existence, and who could not be found within the bounds of the province, nor anywhere else. The objectors to these names pointed out this clearly to these revising officers, who acted in the capacity of judges, and asked to have the names struck off the lists, but one of these officials said: No, I will not strike the names out, unless you have evidence that you have served each of those parties with a notice. Now, Sir, it was plain that these parties could not be served with notice, because they had no existence, and yet these spurious individuals were kept on the voters' lists so that on election day others could vote in their stead, and so change the result in these close constituencies. The evidence of that was placed before this House; the affidavits were read, and they could not be contradicted. Imagine, Sir, the humiliating position that every member of this House will occupy when such a thing as that is made possible in this Parliament. I have shown that, not only is it possible, but it has been done, and we have every reason to believe the same thing will be done to-morrow, if we adopt the franchise law of Manitoba—a law which we will adopt, if this Bill passes. Is there any man in this House who will not feel humiliated, when he finds he is sitting alongside a gentleman from that province who has been sent to this Parliament as a result of the most palpable and transparent fraud? This Parliament occupies a high position now, but it will occupy a low position, indeed, the moment the finger of scorn can be pointed at any of its members, and it can be established that he sits here as the result of such frauds as must bring to our minds the strongest possible feeling of repugnance.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) tells us he objects to uniformity, but why? He knows that, to-day, there is great uniformity in the franchises of the provinces of this Dominion. The province of British Columbia has universal suffrage; the North-west Territories have universal suffrage; the province of Manitoba has universal suffrage; the great province of Ontario has universal suffrage; the province of New Brunswick has universal suffrage, and the province of Prince Edward Island has universal suffrage. That narrows down the whole question of uniformity to the province of Quebec and the province of Nova Scotia. I do not intend at this moment to go into that question, further than to draw attention to the fact of how nearly we can approach to uniformity, if there is a disposition to do so, and how, under the proceedings contained in this Bill, we can obtain such lists by the municipal authorities in the various constituencies as to entirely avoid any very large expenditure. My hon. friend (Mr. Fitzpatrick) has provided, in certain cases which he sees may arise, just such machinery as would give us a franchise of our own, over which we would have control, and a franchise carried out under the authority of officers appointed by the Dominion Government. I am quite sure that no Government of this Dominion will ever, in the appointment of officials or in any other way, expose us to the humiliation of having these franchise matters dealt with as they have been dealt with by the government and legislature of the province of Manitoba. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) says that they will feel this a great hardship in the province of Quebec. I do not quite see why that should be. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), on a very recent occasion, paid that great province, which we all recognize as the most powerful portion of this Dominion, my right hon. friend paid that province—the province of Ontario, not the province of Quebec—the great compliment of saying that it was his right arm.

Mr. BERGERON. Which was paralyzed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, I shall not go into the question of what the vigour of that right arm is now; but, as I say, we all recognize the position the province of Ontario occupies in this Dominion, and if that great province, after long experience, finds that manhood suffrage is a proper qualification for its voters, I do not think that either the province of Nova Scotia, where there is a low property qualification, or the province of Quebec, where, I believe, the qualification is still lower, would have any very great reason to regret its franchise being placed on the same basis as that of the province of Ontario. I trust therefore that my hon. friend will find some better reason than that for avoiding what I feel is a matter of great importance to this House—to its character, its standing, its estimation in the eyes of its own members and in the eyes of the world; that is, the control of its own franchise such as the great parliament of England possesses, as well as the parliaments of France, Germany and other great countries. I hope it is still not too late for the Government to reconsider this matter, in the light of the remarks that have fallen from the introducer of the Bill, and in the light of the remarks which I have made, with the view of doing that which we all wish to do—avoiding any great expense in connection with the franchise of the country. This Dominion is quite able to bear a certain amount of expenditure for so important a purpose, and a reconsideration of the question may enable us to reach a common ground where we may have due and suitable control over our franchise, adopting for its basis what may be found to be most wise and most judicious, and what will not leave us in the humiliating position of being elected to sit here under franchises which are liable to be changed from day to day by provincial legislatures—in some cases very small legislatures—over which in that regard we exercise no control whatever. I will not detain the House further than to say that I hope still that it is not too late for the Government to reconsider the measure along that line, with a view of reaching a satisfactory solution of the question by the adoption of a policy that will commend itself not to one side of this House only, but to all of us sitting on either side, and enable us to preserve for the Parliament of Canada that independent position which I feel is absolutely necessary to command the respect either of our own country or of other countries that may be aware of the position we occupy.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, it is a mere truism to say that the question which has been introduced into the House by my hon. friend the Solicitor General in this Bill is one of the most important to which Parliament can give its attention. Of all the matters that can come before us, every one will acknowledge that this is the one which should command the most calm and judicial discussion on both sides of the House. It is at the very basis of our parliamentary institutions, these institutions of which we are legitimately proud; and I congratulate the House on the fact that the discussion has been commenced in so judicial and calm a temper, both by my hon. friend who introduced the Bill and by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. We are agreed on one fact—and I am glad to have it from the mouth of my hon. friend himself—that there should be a reform in the law which is now the Franchise Act of this Dominion. So far as my opinion goes, the only reform which ought to be satisfactory is to reform that Act absolutely out of existence. Those who were in this House in 1885, when the measure was introduced, will recollect quite well that it was supported by the Government of that day very reluctantly. Our experience is that it has been received less than cordially by the country. The record shows that it was never carried out in its entirety, either by the Government that introduced it or by the succeeding Governments. A fundamental principle of that Act is that there should be a revision of the lists every year. The reason of that is obvious. The lists ought always to be in such a condition that if the electorate is to be consulted, every man who by the law would be entitled to vote should be in a position to exercise that right. But what is the condition of things at the present time? There are by-elections coming off, and there are others that may come off at no distant date, and these elections have to take place on lists almost four years old. The Act has been in force since 1886, and under it we should have had twelve yearly revisions; but if my memory serves me, we have had only three, certainly not more than four. We had one in 1886, another in 1891, and another in 1894. The Act is a perfect terror to members on both sides of the House; it is an incubus even to those members who are responsible for its existence. My hon. friend the Solicitor General has stated that the three revisions which we have had have cost the country a million and a quarter of dollars. I venture to say that every penny of a similar amount has been expended, not by the Government, but in addition to the expenditure of the country, by members and candidates. Now, we have all come to the conclusion that the present Act has to be reformed in some way. But there is more than that. I am glad to have the statement of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition that he is not satisfied with that Act. In 1894 Sir John Thompson, who was at that time Prime Minister, himself introduced a Bill in this House, providing for another system. What the character of that measure was I will not say at present; I will revert to that later on. Let it be sufficient to have it admitted that the present law is unpopular with and unsatisfactory to both parties in this country, and that a reform has become absolutely necessary. Thus far we do not differ. As to what should be the character of that reform, what should be the nature of the franchise on which the members of this House should be elected, there we differ. There I take issue with my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. Our policy is that the franchise under which the members of this House should be elected is the franchise under which members of the local legislatures are elected. This is the position which we have taken from the beginning; this is the position we maintain at this moment. This policy my hon. friend controverts; but I think I shall be able to show that this is the only true policy for a system of government like ours. My hon. friend said a moment ago that this House should have the control of its franchise, such as the parliaments of Great Britain, France, and such other countries have. My hon. friend forgets that Great Britain is not a federated country; neither is France. I put the question to my hon. friend whether in a country like ours, a federated country, where there is a division of legislative powers between the federal authority and the provincial legislatures—whether or not the system we propose is not the very best that can be proposed. My hon. friend, however, opposes this policy, and his policy, if I understood him aright, is that we should have a franchise of our own, enacted by this Parliament. In support of that position, my hon. friend gave only one reason which in my judgment is at all worthy of attention. My hon. friend said a moment ago that Parliament should keep in its own hands the control of the franchise under which its members should be elected. This proposition I do not propose to controvert here and now, though it might be successfully controverted, at least by the authority of precedent. Under the American constitution which, in so far as the federation principle is concerned, is largely a prototype of our own, the regulation of the franchise for the election of members for Congress is not under the control of Congress; but is embodied in the constitution itself and is a fixed enactment, beyond and above the legislative powers of Congress. The proposition which I lay down at this moment is that under our system of a federative government, it is quite in the fitness of things and of good government that there should be only one franchise. Before I proceed on this point, however, though I do not intend to controvert the principle that this Parliament should regulate its own franchise, though I agree that it is perhaps better that our constitution should be in this respect what it is rather than follow the American constitution, and agreeing that we should keep in our own hands the regulation and the control of our own franchise, I wish to say to my hon. friend that when this Parliament declares, in the sovereignty of its powers, that it shall adopt the franchise of the provinces, it controls its own franchises just as effectively as if it were enacting one of its own.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes, just as effectively it exercises its sovereign power, Parliament can say, in the sovereignty of its power, that we shall have a franchise of our own, or in the sovereignty of its power it may decide that we shall take the franchises of the different provinces, and in either case Parliament exercises the sovereignty with which it is vested. Does my hon. friend pretend or will any hon. gentlemen on the other side pretend that in order to have the control of its own franchise, this Parliament is obliged to enact one for itself, even though it would be satisfied with the provincial franchise? Supposing that the franchises in the different provinces are satisfactory to the Dominion Parliament, if there is any logic in the contention we have heard this afternoon, although the provincial franchises should be absolutely as perfect and satisfactory as they could be, still we ought to adopt a different franchise simply to show that we have the control of what is our own. Sir, there is neither logic nor reason in that, and I am safe in saying, therefore, that this Parliament controls its own franchise just as effectively by adopting the provincial franchises as by making a franchise of its own. I now come to this proposition, which I lay down as a principle of good government, that under a federative government such as our own, it is better that there should be only one franchise as regards the provinces and the Dominion—the same franchise should serve to elect members of this House as to elect members of the local legislatures. The reason for that is that our system is a system of divided legislative powers. I recall principles which are familiar to all, but I have to do it to draw the conclusion I propose to draw. Our system is a system of divided legislative powers—divided between the central Government and the provincial legislatures, but whether it be the federal House of Commons or a provincial legislature, it is the same people who are represented in each. It is the people of the province of Quebec who are represented here in the Dominion Parliament and the same people who are represented in the legislature sitting in Quebec. It is the people of the province of Ontario who are represented here in the Dominion Parliament and the same people who are represented in the legislature sitting in Toronto. And so it is in the case of every other province; but, as we know very well, the powers which are confided by the people to their mandataries whether their representatives sit at Toronto or Quebec or Ottawa, are different. The powers which they give their representatives at Ottawa are of one class. They embrace those subjects which pertain to the nation, as a whole, whereas the powers they confide to their representatives in the local legislatures are powers which are only of a local or purely domestic character. These principles are well known, but still if kept well in mind, they will afford a solution of the question before us. Such being the case, I venture to state another proposition, which is this—that the regulation of the franchise is, above all things, a domestic matter which concerns and ought to be regulated by the local legislatures and not by this Parliament. If it be true that all the provinces are here represented—if it be true that the same people are represented, whether in this Parliament of the local legislatures, I lay it down as a principle, not admitting of successful contradiction, that the regulation of the franchise is one of those questions which, though not nominally delegated to the representatives of the local legislatures, still, by the very essence of things, ought to be regulated by the local legislatures and not by the Dominion Parliament. What is the reason? The reason is that the experience of all countries, governed by parliamentary institutions such as our own, shows us that the extension or the restriction of all franchises is a question which depends largely upon the conditions of the different communities where the franchises apply. It is a question of education, of customs, of circumstances; and in no two cases hardly do you find the same franchise apply. This I think we can show both by the authority of reason and precedent. Take the very case of the Canadian confederation. We have seven provinces in the Canadian confederation, and in no two of them do the franchises perfectly agree. We find in all the same principle; we find that in all the principle of sovereignty is largely democratic, it is almost universal manhood suffrage, still it is not universal. There are restrictions of education, of property qualification, of residence, payment of taxes, and so on. In the province of Ontario there is manhood suffrage and the qualification is a residence of nine months. In the province of British Columbia there is manhood suffrage and the qualification is a residence for twelve months. In the province of Quebec the principle is largely democratic as here in Ontario, but it is not yet absolute manhood suffrage. There are restrictions of property ownership. So it is in Nova Scotia and some other provinces. If we were to take—if the expression is pedantic, I do not intend to use it as such—the philosophic view of this question, I suppose all would admit that every one who contributes to the revenue, every one who pays his taxes, ought to have the right to vote. That I think is a sound principle, but it is not one which is acted upon even in the most democratic of all countries. For instance, in the American Republic if the principle that every one who is a taxpayer and pays his taxes ought to be a voter, the woman who earns her own bread, the spinster who toils, as many do, ought to be a voter. The young man not yet twenty-one years of age who goes into the bush and labours and toils for himself and therefore contributes to the revenue ought also to be a voter. Yet there is no country where a young man under twenty-one is a qualified voter. What does this prove? It proves what I have been contending for, namely, that the regulation of the franchise is largely a matter of custom or education or sentiment, if you please—even of prejudice—but after all it is a question, the determination of which had better be left to the different communities which are represented in the local legislatures. We have the authority of our own country in this respect. There is more. I quoted a moment ago the American constitution. There is a precedent there, an extreme one, I admit, but one which shows the truth of what I have been contending for. It is a matter of history that one of the questions debated with the greatest earnestness before the Continental Congress when they met to adopt the constitution of United States was this very question of the franchise—what should be the franchise adopted for members of Congress. After long and long debate, the question was decided in the way for which I have been contending, that is to say, it was decided that the suffrage by which members of the House of Representatives should be elected should be the same as for the state elections. Let me quote upon this subject from the letter of the constitution. Article 2 says:

The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several states; and the electors in each state shall have the qualification required—

site for electors of the most numerous branch of the state legislature.

My hon. friend spoke of the humiliation of having members of this Parliament elected under a franchise over which they had no control. Why, Sir, if there be humiliation, it is a humiliation which has been on the statute-book of the United States from the very beginning of their government, and I am not aware that the principle has ever been controverted in the American union. On the contrary, I shall show presently that all the discussions that have taken place, all the trouble which has arisen regarding this matter have been due to the attempts which have been made at one time in order to get over this provision.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

The PRIME MINISTER. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the question which is now engaging the attention of the House, I quoted the American constitution. I did not quote it as a precedent to be copied servilely, but as one worthy of close attention and examination. I stated that under the American constitution members of the House of Representatives are elected upon a franchise which is not regulated by themselves, which is not regulated by the American Congress, but is enacted by the state legislatures. This system has been in force for more than a hundred years. During that time, as we know, the American constitution has had to undergo many ordeals, but the system enacted under this section has been maintained with one exception, and that exception, as is well understood, is justified and explained if we reflect that it grew out of the circumstances following the civil war. After the close of the civil war, the leaders of the victorious party, the Republican party, thought that their work would not be complete unless that the African race, which had just been emancipated and brought to the plenitude of civil rights was also endowed with the plenitude of political rights, and to give expression to this thought, to give it absolute certainty, the 15th amendment of the American constitution was passed a few years after the close of the war. It read as follows:—

The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any state on account of race, colour, or previous condition of servitude.

The object of this amendment was very plain indeed. It was passed only after prolonged discussion, and the object was to give to the coloured race, which had just been emancipated, the same rights of suffrage that belonged to the white race. The object was that in any state, especially in the Southern States, where a white man had a right of suffrage a coloured man similarly situated should have the same privilege. Everybody will coincide that this was a noble thought, a most generous inspiration. But it is a matter of history, experience has shown, that though the thought was a noble one, though that inspiration was a generous one, still this amendment of the constitution, instead of producing the good results which were anticipated from it, has been productive of none but evil consequences.

They had taken that action, probably, in view of the fact that some members of the coloured race, or representatives of that race who had been emancipated, were equal in most respects to their white neighbours. We have a few coloured citizens in our country also. They are not many, but, wherever they are found, I think it may be truly said of them that they are equal in every particular to the other members of the community. But it was not so in the Southern States. Experience has shown that it was a mistake on the part of the white people to take millions of men out of the degradation of slavery and bondage and to give them an absolute right of citizenship. Experience has shown that the thousands whom it was the intention of Congress to bring to the polls, were not competent, after years of servitude, to exercise the great powers of the franchise with which they were clothed. They were driven to the polls by wicked, designing and corrupt men. They had no conception of the rights and prerogatives which had been placed in their hands. Many unhappy instances have been given, and many occurrences have taken place which showed their ignorance of their duty and their responsibility. We know that, under that law and under the amendment to that law, by reason of the privileges and prerogatives which were given to the emancipated race, the power of government passed into the hands of wicked and corrupt men, which brought the African population of the Southern States into the most lamentable condition. Under such circumstances, the white population of the Southern States, whether they belonged to the Democratic or Republican persuasion, found means and methods to take away from the African race the franchise which had been conferred upon them by Congress. In one state, for instance, they enacted a law, that no man should be an elector, unless he was a property owner; in another state they passed a law, that no man should be an elector, unless he had paid his taxes; in another state they passed a law, that no man should be an elector, unless he paid his taxes and brought his receipt to the poll; in another state they passed a law, that no man should be an elector, unless he could read and write. While in the terms of these enactments they applied to all races, in point of fact they applied particularly to the African race, and practically they took away from that race the right of suffrage which had been given to them by Congress.

Now, what is the conclusion which should be derived from this state of things? Why do I bring these examples to the attention of Parliament? Simply to show what I have been contending all along, that the right of suffrage is, above all things, a domestic right, to be determined according to the conditions of education, and of the particular circumstances which are to be found in each community. This is the reason why I have brought up this argument. I say this is an additional reason—an extreme case, I admit, but a case which shows forcibly the truth of the position which we, as a party, have taken upon this question, that in a country like ours, under a federal system of government, the only proper solution of this question is to place the right of suffrage in the hands of the local legislature. Now, Sir, it is remarkable, that for the first nineteen years since confederation, from 1867 to 1886, during which that system prevailed, all the elections which took place in this country, took place, not under a Dominion franchise, but under a provincial franchise. This was the franchise under which the elections of 1867, 1872, 1874, 1878 and 1882 took place. Surely, judging from the result of those elections, hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have no reason to complain of the franchise which then prevailed. Moreover, I am safe in asserting that, during the nineteen years this system prevailed, not a word of complaint was ever uttered against it. It gave universal satisfaction. But while it gave such universal satisfaction, it is also true that, during all those years, although, with the exception of five years, the Conservative party were in office all that time, the leaders of the Conservative party still harboured the thought of obtaining from this Parliament the enactment of a Dominion franchise. It is not known at the present time, because it has been forgotten, that the Franchise Act which was passed in 1885, had been introduced into this House by the Conservative party while they were in office, no less than seven times. It was introduced seven times, but it failed six times and was only carried on the seventh occasion, carried, as we know, after a tremendous struggle against it by the Liberal party; and we also know that it was carried with no cheerful disposition on the part of the Conservative party. The event has shown that, on that occasion, the good sense of the party was far better and far above the sense of the leaders of that party; events which have taken place during the last twelve years have shown that in the ranks and file of the Conservative party there was a better political intuition, more wisdom, than existed among the leaders of the party; and if the good sense of the rank and file of the party had prevailed, the Dominion Franchise Act never would have been enacted. They were satisfied with the provincial franchise, and we propose to revert to the provincial franchise to-day.

Now, what is one of the strongest reasons why we should revert to the provincial franchise? I have given to the House what I conceive are the theoretical reasons; let me now give what are the practical reasons. Of all such reasons, the most practical, in the view of men on both sides of the House, is that the provincial franchise in its operation is absolutely simple and inexpensive. In the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and for that matter in most of the provinces, the lists are prepared by the municipal councils. It is so in the province of Ontario; it is so in the province of Quebec, and it is so, I believe, in the province of Nova Scotia. If there be a system which is absolutely fair and inexpensive, just and equitable, it is the system whereby the preparation of the voters' lists is placed in the hands of the local councils. The local councils represent small bodies—villages, parishes and townships. They are composed of six or seven men, as a rule. They know each other, both parties are represented at the board. Every member of the council is familiar with the circumstances of every family in his constituency. He knows the number of children in each family, and circumstances of the head of the family. He knows who are qualified in any family to be electors, how many sons each farmer has, and he knows the means of every family. He is, therefore, absolutely competent to know who should be, and who should not be, a qualified elector. So far as my experience goes in the province of Quebec—and I believe it is the same in the province of Ontario—very few complaints, indeed, are ever made against the decisions given by the municipal councils under such circumstances. Sir, we propose to revert to the former system. The leader of the Opposition—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The PRIME MINISTER. I notice the Opposition has a new leader, and I hope he will allow me to offer him my congratulations.

Mr. MORIN. Merci.

The PRIME MINISTER. The former leader of the Opposition, the leader this afternoon, stated in answer to my hon. friend the Solicitor General, that Sir John Thompson had not reverted to the provincial franchise. The Solicitor General took issue with him at the time, and the assertion of my hon. friend is more than borne out by the facts. I have here the Bill introduced by Sir John Thompson, shortly before his lamented death, in the session of 1894. I call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to section 4, and they will plainly see that the principle for which we have contended, for which we contend now, is admitted, and explicitly admitted, and I shall show in a few minutes where the difference came. Here is the principle laid down in the 4th section:

Except as hereinafter otherwise provided, the qualification of voters at a Dominion election shall, in any province of Canada, be that established by the laws in force in such province on the first day of June in the year during which the lists for use at such election were prepared as the qualification of voters at a provincial election.

Nothing can be clearer than that. There was not by that system the uniformity for which the hon. gentlemen opposite contend. Later on Sir John Thompson introduced some modifications, some extensions, some restrictions of the qualification laid down in that section; but this is not material. The blemish in the Act introduced by Sir John Thompson, and it is to me an absolute and irredeemable blemish, was that while he adopted the provincial franchise, yet he retained the revising officer and the preparation of the list by the revising officer. I say this is the blemish in the Act. Here is section 5:

The Governor in Council may from time to time appoint a proper person to be called the revising officer.

Let me call attention to section 10, which says:

On, or as soon as possible after, the first day of June in each year, the revising officer shall obtain certified copies of the provincial voters' lists then in force and of the last assessment roll, and with all the information he can obtain from these sources and from the last list for a Dominion election, and from the municipal and other official list, records and proceedings, and from any other source which he has reason to believe reliable, and by means of solemn declarations made as hereinafter provided according to the Canada Evidence Act, 1893, shall prepare a list of voters.

These are the objections which we had at the time to the Bill of Sir John Thompson. It was far more logical according to our view, having adopted the principle of the provincial franchise, to also accept the voters' lists so prepared under the authority of the provincial legislature. On this side of the House we have an absolute hostility to the revising officer and the lists prepared by the revising officer. During the last twenty years we have suffered too much at the hands of revising officers, it has cost too much time and money to prepare lists, the system is indefensible and we propose to come back to the custom of former times and use lists prepared by the provincial councils in Ontario and Quebec. I place myself in the judgment of the House when I say that the lists so prepared in Ontario, with the exception of the lists in the cities, do not cost a cent to the provincial treasury; the lists in Quebec do not cost a cent to the provincial treasury; and those lists in Ontario and Quebec do not cost a cent to individual members. They are prepared by the municipal councils without any expenditure. I propose that we shall revert to that system. If we apply the principle of the provincial franchise, why should we not take at the same time the means and methods by which the principle is applied? An objection, however, has been raised this afternoon by the leader of the Opposition which has some force in it. The hon. gentleman stated he could not accept the provincial lists because the provincial legislature may abuse their legislative power. He stated the case of Nova Scotia, in which he said the legislature had passed a most obnoxious law. In so far as Nova Scotia is concerned the argument did not go very far; indeed he refuted his own argument because he stated at a later period that the legislature of that province had repealed the obnoxious law. Then the hon. gentleman cited the case of Manitoba. I am not familiar with the system of the province of Manitoba. I have heard it attacked, but I am not sure the attacks were always well grounded. But let us assume for an instant that the system of the legislature of Manitoba was unfair, as was stated by the hon. gentleman this afternoon. If so, it can be remedied just as the unfair system, according to the hon. gentleman, which prevailed in Nova Scotia, was remedied. But there is force, I admit, in that argument. I know there is force in the argument that a legislature can abuse its powers. We the Liberal party have known to our cost that the majority can abuse their legislative powers. It was an outrage, it was a scandalous abuse of the legislative power that the infamous Gerrymander Act was carried, whereby Ontario was cut and carved so that by clever manipulation it gave to the party then in power a clear majority of 20 seats over their opponents. This very Franchise Act was an abuse of power, whereby the revision of the lists was placed in the hands of henchmen of the Administration. True, there was some retributive justice, because hon. gentlemen opposite overreached themselves, and in their effort to make it an effective measure to suit their own ends, they made it cumbrous and costly to their own friends. In the face of all these statements, in the face of the arguments adduced we all agree that we must have reform of the law now in operation, and the only reform for which I contend is a reform which will reform out of existence the infamous Act known as the Franchise Act. I appeal to members of this House to discard party passions and legislate out of existence an Act which in operation has proved to be cumbrous, expensive, unjust and unfair, and I ask them to give a trial to a system which was in force nineteen years, and which proved not only sound in reason but convenient and inexpensive in practice.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON. At this stage of the debate I should like to say a word or two. There should be no difference of opinion on a question like this. No party has anything to lose by a system which will give a vote to every man who should vote and keep every man who should not vote off the list. I hold very strong views in connection with the present Franchise Act, and I think the First Minister in describing it as a perfect terror conveyed the impression I had entertained all along of the old Act. I think the Conservatives of Toronto who have had to fight a by-election on a four-years old list, have come around to my way of thinking. It is surely in the interest of all parties, of both political parties, to provide machinery for the making of a modern list at the smallest possible expense. It is not in the interests of the country that the system of preparing voters' lists should be so expensive as to keep the poor man out of Parliament, or to force him to come here under obligations to his rich friends, who provide funds to protect his interest in the revision of the lists. I rise to suggest that it is a pity to make a partisan fight over this question, and in that I agree thoroughly with the words of the right hon. the First Minister. There is no substantial cause for difference between the Conservatives and the Liberals on this subject, and if there is any substantial cause, I do not think that the position is so wide apart that it cannot be reconciled. It is in the interests of the country, and of both political parties that the present Act should be repealed and that the revising officer should be got rid of. The right hon. gentleman, the First Minister, has no more abhorrence, and I am sure the hon. members on the other side of the House have no more abhorrence in connection with the work of the revising barrister than have many of my hon. friends on this side. It is too bad that Parliament should be kept here week after week to fight this Act out on party lines, when the leaders on the Government side and the leaders of the Opposition could get together and in half a day's conference agree upon a law that would do justice to all, including those of our fellow-subjects who are disfranchised in thousands in every constituency where a by-election has to be fought upon a voters' list four years old.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I have listened with that pleasure which I am sure every hon. gentleman on this side of the House always feels when the right hon. the Prime Minister addresses us upon a subject which in this case he has admitted to be of the very greatest importance to the Parliament and to the people of Canada. I feel like commending those who have taken part in the debate thus far for the moderate tone of the language they have used to express their views upon the question now before the House. Ordinarily, and in years past, the mention of the Dominion Franchise Act operated a good deal like the proverbial red rag before the bull, but happily we are now approaching this subject in a different spirit, because as has been expressed on both sides of the House, the great object to be obtained by any legislation we may enact in this Parliament is the greatest good to the greatest number; and, Sir, that is to be found in providing a franchise Act which, while inexpensive, will be wide in its operation, and which shall furnish every facility for every honest voter to get his name upon the list.

If the House will permit me, I shall for a few moments refer to the history of this Franchise Act, and in doing so I may, in the first place, allude to the historical reference that has been made by the First Minister, in his comparison of the system in vogue in the United States with the system in this country. At the outset I may say that hon. gentlemen who make that comparison between the franchise of the two countries fundamentally make an error in forgetting that in the United States, especially during that period referred to by the right hon. gentleman, subsequent to the revolutionary war and down to the sitting of the constitutional convention in 1787—the state rights existing in that country were the subject of the most jealous solicitude on the part of the people. Consequently, in that constitutional convention of 1787, the outcome of which was the present constitution of the United States as modified by the amendments (and they have not been very many) which have taken place since that time, the franchise of the state, which it was there agreed upon should be the franchise for election to the House of Representatives, was to some extent the result of a compromise. The question that was debated there for weeks was, as to the particular mode of representation that should be permitted in the House of Representatives. It was contended by Pinkney and many other eminent members of that convention that the system of state delegation which now obtains in the United States Senate, and which then obtained in what was called the Continental Congress, should be the system of representation in the House of Representatives. That is, that each state should send a certain number to the federal house. A sort of a compromise, as nearly as I can read the proceedings of that convention, led to the adoption of the state franchise for the House of Representatives, and state delegations or state representatives for the Senate of that country.

Now, Sir, when the fathers of confederation were deliberating upon that written part of our constitution, they deliberately, and with the example of the United States before them, inserted in the 41st section of the British North America Act, the provision: that until the Parliament of Canada otherwise ordered, the provincial franchises

then in force should be the franchises of this Dominion House. Why did they do that? The spirit that prompted the members of the United States constitutional convention to enact as they did regarding the franchise was to preserve at all hazards the state rights, which were then of the utmost concern, and the jealous manner in which they guarded them, led to a condition of things which, even in the opinion of very great thinkers in the United States was worse than that which existed before the revolutionary war. It was felt that owing to that spirit, and the tenacity which the people of the United States adhered to state rights, and the trouble that ensued—and which was never ended until the conclusion of the civil war—it was felt that in framing the British North America Act we should avoid the errors they fell into and that we should strengthen rather than weaken the central authority. And to that end, and with that object in view, the fathers of confederation deliberately inserted in the British North America Act a provision that this Parliament was to enact a franchise which was to be the national franchise of the Dominion of Canada. There can be no question about that. If you will allow me, Sir, to go back to that period referred to by the right hon. the First Minister, where he alluded to the fact that the Franchise Bill was re-introduced into this House for several years before it was finally submitted and passed, I think the language of the then First Minister (Sir John A. Macdonald) is very explicit, and from it we find that it was introduced on all these different occasions in order that the principle of the measure might be well known to the people of Canada—and it was well known to the people of Canada by the time we got through with the discussion of 1885.

Reference has also been made by the right hon. gentleman to the fact that Sir John Thompson, when Premier of the Dominion of Canada, introduced a franchise measure. Now, whatever may have been the strict reading of the 6th section, to which he has alluded, I submit with all deference, that the view of Sir John Thompson in introducing that legislation, was to maintain that principle, which before confederation it was contended we should adopt in this House, which Sir John Macdonald did adopt in his Franchise Act of 1885, and which in my humble judgment this Parliament will err if they depart from. Sir John Thompson, in the debate of 1894—in a very brief discussion, I may say, because the Bill never reached the second stage—said:

We uphold the feature which I regard as the principal feature of the Franchise Act of 1885, and that is that the revision shall take place by officers under the control of this Parliament and of the Federal Government. The great principle which underlay the Franchise Act of 1885 was the control by this Parliament over matters connected with the franchise. It was contended that control should exist in two branches ; in the first place, as regards the laying down of the franchise itself, and, in the second place, as regards the administration of the law by which the franchise was carried out. We have arrived, after the experience of eight or nine years, at the conclusion which I have stated, that it is not worth the effort to keep up the divergencies that exist between the two sets of franchises.

I read the last sentence, lest I might be charged with not reading something that would bear against my argument. I do not consider it to be a matter of such very great importance, what particular difference there is between the franchises of the provinces and the franchise that now exists for this Parliament, because practically we have manhood suffrage existing all over Canada to-day. In the great province of Ontario, we have it. In the province of New Brunswick, I think, we almost have it. In the province of Nova Scotia we virtually have it, for the standard of property qualification there is so low that almost any person can get on the list. If he has not an income of $300 or $400, or does not possess property to the amount of $150 or $200, he is almost certain to rent a house at $20 a year, and that gives him a vote. In Manitoba and in the North-west Territories we have manhood suffrage. In the province of Prince Edward Island we have a very strange franchise ; in fact, we have none for the lower house, because any person who takes the oath at the poll can vote.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Oh, no. The franchise is a very plain one. It is residential manhood suffrage on the ground of taxes.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Have you a list made up ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No list.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Then, I am correct ; any person who takes the oath at the poll can vote.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He must pay his taxes.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Now, I wish to refer again briefly to the franchise laws in the United States, because there has never been an argument in this House on the subject of the franchise in which a comparison has not been made with those laws ; and I do not wonder at it, because at first sight they furnish a fair basis of comparison. In almost every state there is manhood suffrage. There is an educational test in some states ; but so far as I can learn, there is not a property qualification in any state of the union. In Massachusetts, I think, if a person owns property for one year that is taken as a substitute for a residential qualification of two years. That is the nearest approach to property qualification, but it is not property qualification. Where the state franchises are uniform throughout the whole country, it is very much easier to adopt them as a national franchise than it would be to adopt the provincial franchises in a country where those franchises all differ. I know that there are some gentlemen on the other side of the House who are opposed to what is called cumulative voting. The hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron), who always took a very deep interest in legislation appertaining to the franchise, spoke as follows when this Bill was introduced by the Solicitor General during the last session of this Parliament :

I have only glanced hastily over the Bill of my hon. friend, and I do not see in it any provision for one man one vote. If there is not such a provision in the Bill, the hon. gentleman ought to insert it. Let the man vote, and not the property he holds.

Now, I submit to that hon. gentleman and to other hon. gentlemen on that side, whose party in every province of this Dominion believe in the principle of one man one vote, in favour of which much can be said, that by this Bill you adopt cumulative voting in the great province of Quebec. For instance, in the city of Montreal, a man may have a vote in several constituencies. It used to be so in the city of Toronto that hundreds of men had votes in East York, North York, Peel and other surrounding constituencies. You cut off all these votes, so far as the representation of this House is concerned ; you cut off entirely the cumulative voting that existed in the city of Toronto, and you allow it in the province of Quebec and in any other province where cumulative voting exists. I do not say that by that you increase the representation of any province ; but I do mean to say that you increase the potentiality of the voter. You increase his influence in the particular district where he resides, and you multiply the voting power of any province where the real property qualification exists, against the province where the principle of one man one vote only exists. Another important fact, which has been alluded to by the hon. leader of the Opposition, and to which too much importance cannot be attached, is this. We have had experience of the provincial franchises for the representation of this Dominion in this House, and notwithstanding all that has been said in praise of them, I humbly submit that we have on record instances in which the hostility of legislatures to the party in power has not been such as to warrant us in divesting ourselves of the powers which Parliament has assumed. We know that in Nova Scotia one member of the provincial legislature was powerful enough to secure the passage of an Act in that legislature before a general election for the Dominion, by which a large number of voters who belonged to the Dominion service were disfranchised, and after the election they were enfranchised again. We have the authority of an hon. member of this House for that. We have another illustration in another province. We know that the provincial government of Ontario, a few years ago, was strong enough, and strongly enough attached to its friends of the federal party, to secure the passage of an Act in that legislature limiting the population of counties, by which the Conservative Government of the day was restricted in its ability to appoint junior judges. We know that immediately on the accession to power of hon. gentlemen opposite, that same government, as almost their first act, repealed that law, so as to enable this Government to appoint junior judges at their own sweet will. I submit that these illustrations justify us in assuming that a legislature will be tempted so to trifle with the franchise as to manipulate it for the advantage of their friends or otherwise. It is just as objectionable for a legislature to legislate in a hostile way as to legislate in a too friendly way. From all these considerations I conclude that this Parliament, having assumed the power of framing a national franchise for itself, it would be manifestly unwise for us now to go back upon that record. We cannot go back upon that record and revert to the condition that existed prior to the Act when we had no franchise at all and had necessarily to take the franchises that were then in force in the provinces. I would impress upon the Government, in concluding these remarks the necessity of endeavouring by some means, to retain the franchise in our own hands, and at the same time work it in as inexpensive a way as possible. I admit that the expense of the Dominion Franchise Act was unquestionably objectionable, and I know that the late Government intended to so legislate as to reduce that expense. I know that the late Sir John Thompson, in introducing his Bill of 1894, contemplated doing that, and I submit if the Government have the power, which they have taken to themselves in this Bill, to impose duties on the municipal officers of this country, they have the power to impose additional duties on them and to order them to make up from the provincial lists such a list as will be national in its character and uniform throughout the Dominion. Surely this Government possesses sufficient resources in itself to bring about that result, so that this Parliament will not divest itself of the right to make legislative enactments here regarding a subject which it was always intended should be controlled by this Parliament. I know we are all approaching this subject in as calm and judicial a spirit as we can bring to bear upon it, and for that reason I submit these remarks, hoping they may possibly be of some little use and possibly assist the Government in altering this Bill when it comes to be discussed in committee.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville).

Mr. SPROULE. I will not say but very few words on this question before the second reading of the Bill takes place, if it ever takes place, and my remarks will be principally directed in the way of a reply to some of those made by the right hon. leader of the Government in his defence of this measure. I cordially agree in his statement that this is one of the most important measures that has engaged the attention of this House for a long time, and it is because of its importance and the far-reaching consequence it will have that we ought to consider it most calmly and carefully. It is a question that deals with the right of the people to send their representatives here, and we have always regarded it as a most proper thing that the representatives of the people sent to this Parliament from the various provinces should be elected under the same law and the same franchise and the same qualification for voters, whatever that qualification might be. The right hon. leader of the Government says that the fact that every province in the Dominion has a different franchise of its own is no objection to this Bill. I have always regarded that as a most serious objection, one of the strongest we could possibly bring against adopting the provincial franchises. The fathers of confederation never contemplated that the provincial lists should be used for any length of time for electing members to this House. In the British North America Act, they only provided that these franchises should be used until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provided that provision was inserted for the purpose of electing the first Parliament, so that when elected and Parliament organized, Parliament could then deal with the question as it saw fit and lay down a proper franchise law, under which members should be elected to this House. Clause 41 of the British North America Act, says :

Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, all laws in force in the several provinces at the union relative to the following matters, or any of them, namely, the qualifications and disqualifications of persons to be elected to or to sit or vote as members of the House of Assembly or Legislative Assembly in the several provinces, the voters at elections of such members, the oaths to be taken by voters, the returning officers, their powers and duties, the proceedings at elections, the periods during which elections may be continued, the trial of controverted elections and proceedings incident thereto, the vacating of seats of members, and the execution of new writs, in case of seats vacated otherwise than by dissolution, shall respectively apply to elections of members to serve in the House of Commons, for the same several provinces.

If you take the various subjects that are included in that clause, you will find that almost every one of them has been dealt with by the House of Commons after it was organized. On every one of these subjects we legislated, and the last one was the franchise law. We took that up because we believed that the principle intended to be embodied in the Confederation Act was that this Parliament should control its own franchise, and we dealt with that question as we did with the various other questions on which the provincial laws governed us until we legislated upon them.

The right hon. leader of the Government cited the different franchises in the different states of the American Union as an argument in favour of this Parliament adopting the franchise of our provinces. I thought that if there was one argument more than another that condemned the principle embodied in this Bill, it was the one the right hon. gentleman then applied. In some of the states, they use what I think the right hon. gentleman called "artificial franchises," which were devised for the purpose of depriving the poor negro of the right to vote; and if I understood anything from his explanation, it was that these did great injustice to one class of the people. If that be the case, was it not rather an argument that we should not follow the same course here. As a matter of fact we have something of the same kind taking place in our various provinces. We have found in the provinces fancy franchises, adopted by the provincial legislatures, to the detriment of certain classes in the community, who were as well entitled to vote in the election of members to this House as any other class. And it was just because we found that evil becoming so great that it could not be tolerated any longer, that we took up the question in the Dominion Parliament and legislated as we did in 1886. The cases which the right hon. gentleman cited afford the very strongest argument why there should be one franchise law to control the election of members to this House in every province or territory of the Dominion. From 1867 to 1886, the right hon. gentleman said elections took place under the provincial lists, and not a word of dissatisfaction was heard. If that were the case, it would be a strong argument, but surely the right hon. gentleman's memory cannot be so short that he forgets the very strong objections and arguments that were used against the system then existing. Surely he does not forget that we found abuses creeping in at one time in one province and at another time in another province. Surely he does not forget that large classes of the community were disfranchised by the provincial legislatures, in order to minimize the votes that could be polled for the friends of the other party in the Dominion. Why, for instance, were the poor labourers down on the Intercolonial disfranchised, if not because it was supposed they might be friendly to the Conservative party and Government then in power at Ottawa, and be likely to vote for it? Why was it that in Ontario large classes were disfranchised? For the same purpose. And we found the same thing taking place in province after province, and so we were obliged to avail ourselves of the right given us by the British North America Act to adopt a franchise of our own and extend equal rights to all citizens in electing members to this House. So far from not hearing any expressions of dissatisfaction, we heard them from every quarter, from Ontario, from New Brunswick, from Nova Scotia—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). No, no; not from New Brunswick.

Mr. SPROULE. I can tell the hon. Minister (Mr. Blair), that he is mistaken. It is on record, and if he will look up "Hansard," he will see that it was referred to again and again, and many cases cited. I know what I am talking about as well as the hon. Minister of Railways, for I was through that fight.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. What was the objection?

Mr. SPROULE. It is so long since that I cannot state the specific objection off-hand, but I know that it was cited and is on record in "Hansard." I am as clear on that point as I am on anything I say to-night. We found the same objection in Ontario, not once, but several times. Therefore, there was an urgent necessity for this law. While we were working under the provincial law, from 1867 to 1885, these evils crept in, making it necessary to change the law. Had the hon. gentleman's friends, who controlled the provincial legislatures, done justice to the people, there would have been no necessity for this Franchise Act.

The hon. leader of the Government says, that the most practical reason for this Bill is, that the provincial lists are inexpensive—they do not cost the provincial treasury a cent. I admit that; it is not the provincial government that pays for them. But does the right hon. gentleman mean to imply that they do not cost anything? Following the hon. gentleman's argument to its logical conclusion, and it would seem that he was trying to make the impression on the public mind that we get something for nothing. But because the money is not taken out of the provincial treasury, is that proof that it does not come out of some one's pocket? It comes out of the treasuries of the various municipalities, that is, it is paid directly by the people, when the tax-gatherer goes around. It is as expensive to make the provincial lists, proportionately, as it is to make the Dominion lists. Because it is not paid out of the provincial treasury, is it to be said that it costs nothing?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It does not cost the country one-fifth as much as the Dominion lists.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman may speak with authority of affairs in his own province, but I can assure him that I know more about this matter, so far as my own province is concerned, than he does. I have gone into the calculation, and I know I am justified in saying that the provincial lists—and I have one here before me—cost the people practically as much, if not more, than the Dominion lists for the same locality, and it comes out of their pockets by direct taxation.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Will it cost them any less, if we have our own lists for the federal elections?

Mr. SPROULE. I am not saying that; I am replying to the argument of the leader of the Government, that because these lists cost nothing, we should adopt them. He says that nothing is taken out of the provincial treasury for these lists. But I say that the money is taken from the people directly. For the Dominion lists have to be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Funds, the greater part of which is made out of customs duties on imported goods and inland revenue taxes. Therefore, there is not the force in the hon. gentleman's reasons that he would lead the House to believe.

I admit that I am not enamoured with some features of the Dominion Franchise Act. No doubt it was troublesome. Still, there are many things that are troublesome and expensive, and yet we think it well to have them, and we may think it so in this case. If we cannot get the provincial governments, whether Conservative or Reform, to do the fair thing to all political parties, it becomes necessary for this Parliament to pass its own franchise law. The leader of the Government, in connection with this matter, spoke of the "infamous gerrymander Act" that was so repulsive to his friends. I thought: Surely, he has not lived in Ontario for any length of time. If ever there was a law, in the history of Canada, that was infamous and detestable, those terms might be applied to the two gerrymander Acts passed by the provincial legislature of Ontario. Go into my county, and you will find constituencies that were carved twice in order to defeat one man. Notwithstanding that the great majority of the people in the county are Conservatives, in the provincial election of 1894 they did not send a Conservative to the Parliament from the county. It is true, that the indignation against the provincial government was so great in the last general election that they sent three representatives on the Conservative side. The more honourable element of the Reform party know that their friends did not do right to the county in gerrymandering it twice to turn out one man, Mr. Creighton, who was one of the best representatives that our county ever had. They cut one constituency out in such shape that no person would recognize it who did not live in the county. It was changed twice in order to defeat the one man and to send two representatives out of three as Reformers, although the majority in the county were Conservatives. Hon. gentlemen opposite should not mention gerrymander without hanging their heads in shame, for we have had an experience in Ontario that is a discredit, a disgrace, to any political party. Under the Ontario gerrymander it was impossible to get a fair expression of the views of the people.

Now, I for one have always held the view that a redistribution Act should be made by judges, or by some other independent power than Parliament. I have never been enamoured of the Redistribution Act introduced by our own friends. I hold that we want to give fair-play to the people of the country and we want a fair distribution. I would be willing tomorrow to see all the constituencies of the Dominion arranged by the judges of the country, and it is my opinion that it would be done fairly. It should be done at least by some independent tribunal who are not at all influenced by party politics. It would probably be as well to adopt any franchise law and to keep it in perpetuity, that would give fair-play to all political parties, and would give no one party a chance over the other. I think that ought to be done. But I say that the history of the past justifies us in the contention that the provincial governments so far have not meted out fair-play to the two parties in the country. They have changed the franchise law from time to time expressly for the purpose of defeating the will of the majority of the people, there is no doubt of it whatever. Then, when it answered their purpose, they afterwards repealed their franchise law. When you look at the acts of the provincial government of Ontario before the Conservative party were defeated in the Dominion, what do we find with reference to judicial districts and the appointment of judges? They passed a law saying that no county that has not a population of over 80,000 shall have a junior judge. The administration of justice, they said, did not require it, and it is entailing an expense on the province, or on the country, that we can avoid. Now, some were uncharitable enough to say that it was because these judges were appointed from and by the other political party, that is to say, by the Conservative party, who were then in power. Then what did we see? After the Conservatives were defeated in the Dominion, at the very next session of the provincial legislature, they repealed that law, and again provided for the appointment of junior judges. I think no one will say that that was not an unfair thing. It was done for the purpose of defeating the will of the people, of benefiting a political party. Now, when they would do such an unfair thing as that, we are justified in the assumption that they would go further, they would commit an injustice with regard to the franchise laws for the purpose of strengthening their own friends. Therefore, I say, that notwithstanding that the old franchise law is an expensive one, I hold that is not a sufficient reason for abandoning it altogether. It should rather be our aim to devise some other means of retaining the same principle, but making its operation less expensive, while still keeping the franchise under our own control.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I wish to express my opinion upon this matter once more. I have expressed my opinion two or three times upon this Franchise Act, which was passed here in 1885. I have always called it, and I still see no reason why I should not continue to call it, the most iniquitous act which was ever placed upon the Statute-book of Canada. I use the word "iniquitous" advisedly, because we have now had experience of it for ten or twelve years, and that experience justifies me in characterizing it in this manner. I am certain, so far as certainty can go in the absence of actual knowledge, that that Act was brought in and passed through Parliament in 1885, not because of any necessity for a Dominion Franchise Act, but because the astute leader of the Conservative party at that time saw a necessity of providing some means by which he could legislate into the halls of this Parliament a number of his followers in the ensuing election. I regret that the Liberal party on that occasion did not allow that Act to pass in the form in which it was brought in, for if they had done so, the Act would so have disgusted the people of this country that it would have been repealed from the Statute-book long ago. But our friends sought to make it as little harmful as possible, and they spent no less than six weeks here battling with the Government with regard to that Franchise Act; and at the end of six weeks they did succeed in making it a good deal better and more acceptable than it was when it was first brought into the House. Now, that Act, in my opinion, and I think I may say in the opinion of a large number of hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, is one that is unjust, it is cumbrous, and it was never thoroughly understood, even by the revising barristers who had command of it for ten or twelve years. The method of preparing those lists was so costly as to entail an extraordinary expense not only upon the candidate and his friends, but upon the opposite party as well. I think, Mr. Speaker, if we could ascertain the real sentiments of hon. gentlemen opposite, they would agree with us in deploring the burden of the expense imposed upon them by that Franchise Act. I know very well that in the first place we had to contend against the prejudices of the revising barristers, who in nineteen cases out of twenty were in friendly relations with the party in power and they sought in the performance of their functions to give the benefit of a doubt always to their own party. Now, the expense attendant upon the four revisions that have taken place was truly extraordinary, and I am prepared to give you the figures which will show you that it is high time that this Franchise Act should be repealed, and that the country should be relieved of the tremendous outlay necessitated by its working. The first revision under this Act took place in 1886, and it cost this country no less than $416,000, all spent to enable the Conservative party in the ensuing election to send here members that never would have come if a true and a just list had been in existence. Then, in 1887, they sought to give us a revised list again, and they went to the length of spending $2,000. But their better sense got the control of them, and the list was not prepared until 1889. We find that in 1889 the list cost no less than $238,426, and that list was not required at that time at all. It was therefore an expenditure of money without any reasonable justification. No election was held upon that list, so that a quarter of a million of dollars was thrown away, as if money was as plentiful as water, for the purpose of getting up a list which was of no use whatever to the people of this country. Then the next revision was in 1891, and it cost this country no less than $226,749, almost another quarter of a million. In 1891 we had an election on that list. Then we had the list prepared again in 1894-95, which cost no less than $243,554, and that list was two years old when the election of 1896 was held upon it. It was so imperfect that hundreds and thousands of men who had no right to vote were upon the list, while hundreds and thousands of young men who were only eighteen years of age when the list was prepared and who would be twenty-one at the time the election came on, had no right to vote under this Franchise Act. Therefore a large number by that Act were actually disfranchised, and a large number voted who had no right to vote to return representatives to this Parliament. In the next place, $30,000 in various small items may be charged against these four revisions, making a total expenditure of no less than $1,156,000 for the four revisions. It would almost appear that we had so much money we did not know what to do with it, when we were willing to spend a million and a quarter of dollars for the purpose of making a list, and abandoning a list which had for seventeen or eighteen years given satisfaction, against which not a single petition had ever been presented from any part of the country setting forth that the list was not perfectly satisfactory ; and the change in the Act was not asked by the country but was introduced for political purposes by hon. gentlemen opposite to secure the ends they had in view. These items make an average expenditure of $285,000 for every revision. But that is only half the expense. Those members who have had experience can testify what the expense really is to the candidate or his friends. What is done ? The revising officer or his clerk proceeds to prepare what we call the primary list and he proceeds to examine the assessment roll and the last revised list, and his opponent has to appoint a representative, and the consequence is that the examination of these assessment rolls and gathering in the names and the making of declarations and so on costs at least $10 for every subdivision. That amounts to about $75,000. But that is not all. Now we have the primary list. The next step is to frame a final list. What are we to do ? We have to get printed declarations and subpoenas, we have to employ bailiffs to serve them, we have to send notices to parties, and pay postage and registration charges, all of which will amount to $10 for every polling subdivision. This would make a further amount of $75,000, and I think that estimate very low. But that is not all the expense. There are, in addition, the courts before which the final lists are brought. On an average there will be one court for every seven or eight subdivisions ; so 1,500 courts are held in Canada for the purpose of bringing these matters before the revising officers. The expense is extraordinary. First, we have to employ a lawyer to discuss the matter with the revising officer, because we find that he often arrives at a wrong construction of the Act, and we have to watch him and put him right in our interest. We have to subpoena the witnesses and pay their expenses at so much per day, we have to hire horses to bring the parties to court, and in this way each court costs no less than $20. If that be so, there is a cost of $30,000 more entailed. Putting these items together hon. gentlemen will find that it costs no less than $180,000 for one party to see the lists through revision, and if we multiply that amount by two we will reach the sum of $360,000 as the actual expense of putting the lists in proper shape. This expenditure for four revisions aggregates $1,444,000 spent by the political parties and candidate principally by the candidates. In order to show that my estimate is much lower than what it should be, I may state that it cost me in 1894-95 $13 to get one man's name off the list. He well knew he had no right to vote. He moved away from the section, and so I had to give him notice, subpoena him, pay his railway fare from his residence to the place where the court was held, and these items reached $13, although he had no right or title to have his name on the list, and the revising officer or his clerk should have known it. That is only a sample of the extraordinary expenses placed on candidates and their friends in connection with the preparation of the lists. We have been obliged to fight the lists all the way through. The friends of the late Government were manipulating the lists and obtaining the benefit of all doubts for their friends, and unless we had fought the lists from the beginning to the end, we would have had no representation in this House. When we add together these amounts of $1,444,000 and $1,156,000, we will find a total of $2,600,000 in connection with the four revisions. There is another item to which I desire to call attention : it is in connection with the session of 1885 when the Franchise Act was introduced. That session extended from four to six weeks longer than was necessary on account of the discussion on this Act. What was the result ? I think a round robbin was signed, or some effort in that way was made so as to secure for each member an additional indemnity of $500, which expenditure, when added to a like indemnity paid to the Senate, represents $150,000 spent as a result of the introduction of that Act, and it must be charged against that Act. Thus there has been at least an expenditure of $2,750,000 for four revisions, or an annual expenditure for all services by the Government, the candidates and their friends on both sides of no less than $687,000 for every revision made. Surely in the face of these facts, and they are facts, there is not an individual member, however much opposed to me in political views he may be, who would for one moment deny that some change is necessary in the law. It is very easy for hon. gentlemen opposite to say that some plan should be adopted which would involve less expense. I think Sir John Thompson consulted his friends as to what was best to be done, and after consultation, he and his friends could not come to a conclusion that a reduction of the expenditure could be arrived at, and Sir John Thompson abandoned his efforts, with the intention probably of bringing the subject up again when his supporters had got more wisdom or light in respect to this question. The only way I can conceive to secure retrenchment is to revert to the system which worked well in the past and was satisfactory to all those who utilized the provincial lists before the introduction of the present Act. What benefits are we going to derive from the adoption of the franchises of the different provinces. First, this large expense to which I have alluded will be wiped out. The hon. gentleman who last addressed the House said the expense of framing the local list was just as great as the list of the Dominion. The hon. gentleman knows better, for he is rather an intelligent man, and possesses a pretty good grasp of local, municipal and other affairs. He knows that the provincial system is comparatively inexpensive. How are those lists framed? The clerk of the municipality goes over the assessment roll, and makes a list of those entitled to vote, and that list is printed. It is true it is printed at the expense of the municipality. The clerk, however, receives no additional pay for its preparation. In that way we get a list, the expense of which is simply the printing, and when we compare that expense with the expense to which I refer, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) will see that he is mistaken in saying that the local lists are just as expensive as the Dominion lists.

Mr. SPROULE. Does the hon. gentleman not count as one of the items of expense the work of the assessor who goes around and takes down all the names? That must be included if you make a fair estimate of the cost.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) knows that the local lists are gotten up for various purposes, and they must be prepared whether we accept them or not.

Mr. SPROULE. They cost all the same.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). But do you not see they do not cost any more by our accepting them.

Mr. SPROULE. I did not say they did.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Therefore, the whole of this large expenditure is saved to the Dominion, without adding a single cent to the expenses of the municipalities. The hon. gentleman must know also, that we are more apt to get a pure list from the local authorities, because to a very large extent they are non-political. They are lists that are used for the election of municipal councillors, for the election of the municipal trustees, for the voting on money by-laws, for the voting on subsidies or bonuses to any industries in the town, and therefore the people are interested, irrespective of their political leanings, in having every person upon the list who is entitled to a vote. The court of revision which consists of about three out of the five members of the municipal council, is usually non-partisan. These gentlemen agree that every person in the municipality shall have an opportunity of expressing his views upon the different questions, and I hold that no particular partisanship attaches itself in any way to the compilation of these local lists.

Then we will have the great benefit of one man one vote, which in my opinion is the only true principle. Every hon. member in this House knows, that although perhaps it may not be according to law, one of the most costly things in our elections has been the paying of persons who come from outside to vote for us. We may represent to them that they should come to the constituency and vote in the interests of the country, and in the interests of the party; but for months and for months after a member is elected, those persons who come from a distance to vote for him, send in accounts for their expenses. I am not going to give myself away, but I can appeal to any gentleman who has ever run an election in this country, if he has not found bills coming in, to pay the expenses of those who travelled a distance to cast their vote for him. Now, that expense is going to be saved to the members of this House. There is another advantage from the system of one man one vote, and I may couple with that, residential voting. In the past the railway companies have taken a stand either for one political party or the other. I remember that in the election of 1891, the Canadian Pacific Railway strongly favoured the late Government, while the Grand Trunk Railway on the other hand took a stand to a very large extent in favour of the Liberal party. I know to my certain knowledge that thirteen voters were taken from the city of Toronto, on the Canadian Pacific Railway, to the town in which I live, to vote against me. I know to my certain knowledge that all they had to do was to throw up their caps and shout out for the Conservative party and that was all the ticket required of them. I know to my own knowledge that young men who had gone to British Columbia, the Northwest Territories and Manitoba, took the idea about election time that they would like to come home and see their mothers, and while they were seeing their mothers they took time to vote against the Liberal candidates, and got their railway transportation free for so doing. Now, under this Bill we will have one man one vote and we will have residential voting, and in that way we will reap the great advantage that all these things will be done away with in the future. I am certain that in advocating this Bill I am expressing the sentiments of gentlemen opposite, who at one time thought that the Dominion Franchise Act was a model of perfection. From their past experience, and on the account of the expense it has cost them, these gentlemen are getting wisdom, and so they are not so rabid as they used to be, and they are agreed upon securing some better franchise system.

There is another great advantage which will derive from the repeal of this Act, and one on which I place a good deal of importance. The young men of the great province of Ontario, that progressive province containing two millions and a quarter of progressive people; the young men of that province will in future have a right to vote for members in this House. I believe that a man who has attained his majority should have the right to vote whether he has any property or not; I believe that it is the man who should vote and not the property. But, we are told that probably this will throw too much power into the hands of the rabble. Now, Mr. Speaker, in my experience of life, and it has been considerable, I have found that the rabble is not always amongst the poor people. I have found as many of the rabble amongst the rich people; and I believe I can say I have found more of them amongst the rich than amongst the poor. A poor man has to work and earn his daily bread; he has to be up at seven o'clock in the morning, and consequently he has not so much time to spend in immoral conduct as a great many of the rich young men, who know not in the morning how to kill time during the day. Therefore in my opinion you will find a great deal more of the so-called rabble among those who possess property than among those who have to work for their living. Again, I hold that the young men should have the franchise because they pay largely towards the revenue of this country, and any person who pays tribute to our revenue should have a voice in saying how it should be expended. You know that many stylish young men probably purchase more imported and dutiable goods than any farmers and labourers, and others who have families around them, and consequently they pay more taxes. I believe that in consequence they should have a vote in sending a representative here to spend that money in the interests of the people. Then, I hold that young men are entitled to the franchise because of the rich inheritance we have in this country; and, Sir, it is a rich inheritance. We have vast timber limits and vast sources of wealth hidden below the ground; and all this wealth, in a sense, belongs more to the younger people of this country than to us older ones. We are stepping off the great platform of life, while they are just stepping on; and if you clothe them in the full habiliments of citizenship, national sentiments and aspirations will grow in their breasts, and they will take a greater interest in this country than they will if you keep from them the right of a voice in the affairs of the nation. Then, I believe that manhood suffrage would attract to this country a progressive class of people. In all countries there are two classes—a progressive class and a non-progressive class. The progressive class are those who look forward to taking an interest in the country; and, when they hear that Canada bestows the franchise on every young man who attains his majority, they are more likely to come to the country and assume the responsibilities of citizenship; and, when you place a responsibility on the shoulders of any man, his honour is at stake, and he exerts himself to discharge that responsibility to the best of his power. In view of all these things, I hail with pleasure the fact that we are going to return to the progressive Franchise Act which the local government has placed at the disposal of the people of Ontario. It is true, there are other parts of the Dominion where the people do not believe in manhood suffrage. By this Act they can go along upon their own lines, while we in the province of Ontario, where the two political parties agree in favour of manhood suffrage, can discharge our duties of citizenship in this way without affecting the representation of other provinces in this House.

Then, again, it is said that, if we broaden the franchise too much, we are not so safe as we are under a narrow franchise. The history of the world teaches us differently. Any one who reads the history of Rome, the history of Greece, the history of England, the history of the United States, yea, and the history of Canada, will find that, the broader the franchise became, the greater security there was to property and life, and the greater was the progress of the country. In England, less than one hundred years ago, two-thirds of the House of Commons was appointed by the aristocracy; but no person would say for a moment that property or life was more secure or that the progress of England was greater at that time than to-day. Ninety years ago, three peers of England appointed no less than twenty-six members of the House of Commons; 300 members of the House of Commons were elected by an average vote of 160 electors. The county vote of Scotland at that time was just 2,000, while 100,000 inhabitants of Edinburgh were controlled by fifty electors. But, as the foundations of the franchise became broadened, the superstructure became more secure; and so it is with us in this country. If we trust the people, we will not be disappointed. If we extend the franchise, those to whom we extend it will respond in an intelligent way. The progressive element of any country is largely in proportion to the extension of her franchise. With the widening of the franchise in England, great reforms came. It was after the widening of the franchise there that the Catholic Emancipation Act of 1828 was passed; and, when the people were trusted and their power was extended, they saw that the disabilities placed on one section of the people were unjust, and they were more just in the nation's affairs than were the few in whose hands the power had rested before. It was from the enfranchised people of England that the great constitutional reform of 1832 came. England began to expand and become much more progressive with the extension of the franchise than she had ever been before. It was from an enfranchised people that the demand came for free bread; and in 1846 Sir Robert Peel, Tory as he was, had to listen to that demand, had to give up his Tory proclivities, and give to the people free corn. It was from the sense of justice of an enfranchised people that the demand came for the disestablishment of the Church of England in Ireland, where the people felt that it was unjust to be taxed for a church to which they did not belong, and in whose tenets they did not believe. Thus, we find that, as the franchise was extended and the people were trusted, these great reforms came about. And who will fail to remember that, when the people demanded a still wider franchise, Mr. Disraeli, Tory of the Tories though he was, had to respond to that demand. The franchise had to be extended, and a larger amount of power placed in the hands of the people; so that, in 1885, he increased the electorate of the country by about 1,000,000 voters.

For these reasons, I think this Government are to be congratulated on having taken this early step to repeal the Dominion Franchise Act and to place on the Statute-book a method by which we can accomplish far more, with greater purity and less expense than before; and I hope that the members on the Opposition benches will assist us in carrying this measure through, and withdraw any partisan opposition to a measure which will be better adapted to promote the objects we have in view. For these reasons, it affords me much pleasure to support this measure in its different stages through the House.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, as I listened to the speech of the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald), I was reminded of Rip Van Winkle. The hon. gentleman commenced by giving us a history of the present Franchise Act and pointing out its great iniquities, and he continued by giving us a history of the extension of the franchise in England. Well, I do not think there was any necessity of doing either of these things. Nobody on this side of the House, so far, has undertaken to defend the present Franchise Act. On the contrary, those who have spoken hitherto have expressed a desire to have the Act remodelled or repealed, and a better Act put in its place. I was sorry to see that the hon. member could not help indulging in some partisan remarks, although he sympathizes with those of us on this side of the House who desire to treat this question from a non-partisan point of view.

I regret to say that he imputed motives to the revising barristers. The Conservatives, he said, always had the friendship of the revising barristers, and the Liberals had the prejudices and the political proclivities of these officials to contend against, so that they had a great deal harder work to do in order to get the lists properly made out than had the Conservatives. I am sure that no other hon. member on that side will take that ground. As far as I am concerned, the revising barrister in my constituency, although he was a Conservative before he was placed on the bench, gave no indication of it by his conduct as revising barrister. On the contrary, his sympathies all went the other way. He tried to be so impartial that he leaned a little to the Liberal side in almost every case. I do not blame him, in view of the remarks that have fallen from the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald), because no doubt he felt that even if he acted fairly, he would be charged with doing injustice unless he gave the Liberals the advantage.

The hon. member went on to say that he hailed this new Bill with great pleasure, and one of the reasons he gave was that the lists would be entirely non-partisan. I wish I could agree with him, but am unable to do so. From my little experience, I am not able to say that the lists, framed by municipal councils and assessors, are always non-partisan. On the contrary, we find that we have to look just as carefully after those lists as after the others. We find that not only have both parties to attend to the revision of these lists, but we have to watch very carefully to see that they are of a non-partisan character.

Another reason the hon. gentleman gave was that the young men would have the right to vote. Well, we on this side desire that they should, and I believe that the young men of Ontario owe to the Conservative party the fact that they have a vote to-day. Some years ago, the leader of the Opposition in the Ontario House made a motion to that effect, which was not carried at the time, but was opposed by the government, but what he then moved for has been given effect to since, just as that government has placed many things on the statutes which were proposed by the leader of the Opposition and resisted by them.

I am glad that in this question we agree with hon. gentlemen opposite on several points. On a great many questions we are not able to agree with these hon. gentlemen at all, but on this occasion we do agree with them on some points. We are, for instance, agreed that this is a most important question, and on this side we consider that it therefore ought to be very thoroughly discussed. I am not sure that hon. gentlemen opposite entertain the same opinion, because so far they have not acted up to it. In fact I was afraid a moment ago that they had entered into a conspiracy of silence, and concluded that probably the order had gone out that the question was not to be discussed. I am glad, however, that my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. Macdonald) has dissipated that idea by entering into the discussion. If this is an important measure, it certainly ought to be fairly discussed. It is all very well for these hon. gentlemen to come down and say: we have made up our minds and are going to submit to you a measure which is a perfect one, I believe that they will find it is not as perfect as it may be made by discussion, and I trust that hon. members on both sides will give it the benefit of a full discussion. For my part, I propose to discuss it entirely free from any party bias at all. I do not believe that there is any question that has ever come before this House at any session which is of more importance.

What is the object we should aim at accomplishing? It should be, in the first place, to make the Dominion Franchise Act so simple that it can be understood by everybody. I do not know whether it is because I am not a lawyer, but I have found that many Bills passed by this House are so complicated that not even the lawyers themselves can understand them. I know that I have often asked lawyers to give their opinion as to the meaning of clauses of Acts passed by this House, and they could not tell me what these clauses meant, and the House is aware that we often have to refer these matters to judges for interpretation, and the judges do not always agree. I hope that when endeavouring to pass a Franchise Act we shall try to make it so simple that everybody will know what it means. There are two essentials to a Franchise Act which we must all admit. These are that it should be simple and inexpensive. The hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) painted in graphic colours the large expense of the present Franchise Act. He talked about the hundreds of thousands of dollars, he even got into the millions, which this Act has cost the country and members of Parliament. No doubt it was expensive, and while I hold it is impossible to have any Act which will do away with all expense, because even the Act now proposed will not relieve members of Parliament from expense in looking after the revising of the lists and having the names of voters added and getting names struck off which have no right to be on, and so on, I want to see the Act as inexpensive as it possibly can be made and at the same time effective. But the most important thing is to have the Act effective—that is to have such an Act that every man who has a right to vote shall be on the list. That is a most difficult thing to accomplish, and I have no doubt that as we discuss the Bill, we will find there are a great many difficulties, but I hope that we shall be able to overcome them. It ought to be possible, if we approach this measure in a non-partisan spirit, for the Government and the Opposition to work out some sort of a Franchise Act which will have the qualities I have mentioned—which will be simple and inexpensive and above all be effective, so that every man who has the right to vote can easily have his name put on the lists.

I am now going to approach another part of the question, and that is the points on which we differ. Wherein do we differ? I hold that we differ on two points. The first is the control of the franchise. We find that the Government side of the House are willing to hand over the control of the lists to the provincial legislatures, or rather to the provincial governments, because it amounts to that practically. I was a little surprised to hear the right hon. First Minister say that when this Parliament adopts the provincial franchises it really controls its own franchise. He argued that by passing this Bill we would not surrender our control of the Dominion franchise, and in support of that argument he said that when this Parliament says it adopts a provincial franchise it controls that franchise. That is a very poor argument. I say that in adopting the provincial franchises, we surrender the control of our own. We do not retain the control, and I will show why. Suppose we hand the making of our franchise over to the different provinces, we do not retain our control, but lose it, and for this reason. Even if the franchises of the different provinces were acceptable to every member of this House, how long are these franchises going to remain as they are? Can we control them? No, the provinces may change their franchises every six months. A provincial government may bring down a new franchise and change the old one entirely, and in so doing it will be beyond our control, should we pass this Bill. By this Bill we do not say that we continue our control, but we say that our franchise must be those of the different provinces. It may be asked: Why do you object to giving up the control of our franchise? In a general way, I think it is objectionable to do so, because I think the Dominion Parliament should retain that control in its own hands. That is a principle which should be assented to by almost anybody who looked at this question from a non-partisan point of view. It appears very strange to me that any Parliament should be willing to hand over the control of its franchise to another set of parliaments altogether. The very statement of that proposition seems to me an argument against it. It looks to me like an absurdity, and for my part, I am opposed to doing that thing, and I hope that hon. members opposite, when they look at the matter impartially, will be opposed to it as well. There are reasons apart from the general principle why I am opposed to this. In the first place, we find that the provincial legislatures are sometimes very partisan. It is very difficult to find any government that do not look at their own interest and the interest of their party. And when parliaments in the different provinces are in sympathy with the party in power here, it need not surprise us if we find them trying to help their friends with their Franchise Acts. Or, if the party in power in the province were opposed to the Government here, a contrary course might be pursued. I think it unfortunate that the provincial legislatures should be put in that position of temptation, for I think it is a position of temptation. It may be said that that is a low view to take of it, and that there is no danger that any provincial parliament would descend so low as to use the franchise for partisan purposes. I should be glad to think so, but

I cannot. I understand that in Ontario, the local legislature disfranchised a good many Dominion officials so that they could not support the Conservative candidate in their constituencies. I have been told that in Nova Scotia men employed by the Government, working on the Intercolonial Railway were disfranchised for the same reason.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I hope my hon. friend (Mr. Craig) will permit me to interrupt him. I am sure he does not wish to misrepresent the situation. I must tell him that the statements made with regard to the disfranchising laws in Nova Scotia, as affecting the voting for the House of Commons are absolutely unfounded. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I knew he did not wish to misrepresent the matter.

Mr. CRAIG. I do not. I must leave to somebody else the task of answering the hon. Minister (Mr. Fielding). But I must say I have heard it stated, over and over again, in this House. I should be glad to know that it is not true. Still I hold that this temptation will exist for provincial legislatures to use the franchise for partisan purposes, and I do not wish to put them under that temptation. Another reason why I oppose this is because I want, and I think the Conservative party wants, a uniform franchise for the Dominion. What do we mean by that? We mean that electors for the Dominion Parliament wherever they may live throughout the Dominion shall stand on the same footing and have the same qualification. Now, the provincial franchises are not uniform. I was rather surprised at the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) saying that the reason he was in favour of this Bill was that it gave one man one vote. I suppose he did not know—perhaps he did know but overlooked the fact—that in the province of Quebec the law is not based on the principle of one man one vote.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I was speaking with reference to my own province.

Mr. CRAIG. I am using this as an argument in favour of the uniform franchise. I have no objection to the principle one man one vote; in fact, I am in favour of it. But I am told that this principle is not recognized in Quebec or in New Brunswick. In Ontario a man has one vote, but in Quebec he may have three or four. I do not think the people of the country will be satisfied to have such a difference.

The right hon. Premier says that it is better to have the same franchise for members of provincial parliament and members of the Dominion Parliament. I would just ask this question: Would the provincial governments and parliaments allow the Dominion to make their franchise? I do not think they would. If they would, I think it would be far better that we should make a franchise for the provincial parliaments than that we should allow the provincial parliaments to make a franchise for us. If the provincial parliament should say: No, we will not allow the Dominion to make our franchise. I think we have an equal right to refuse to allow them to make our franchise. I think all the members of this House should come here upon the same footing and to that end they should be elected on the same franchise. I am sure that hon. members opposite, if they express their views without reference to party, will agree that we ought to retain control of our franchise as a Dominion, and we ought to have that franchise uniform. If these two points are granted, I do not see much difference between the two sides of the House. We are quite willing to have a new franchise Bill; I am, for my part. I want a Bill that will be simple, inexpensive and efficient; I want a Bill to control our own franchise and to make a uniform franchise throughout the country. I think this could be done. Of course it cannot be done if the Government are going to adhere to this Bill and refuse to change or accept suggestions, leaving those who cannot support it simply to vote against it. I shall be bound to vote against it if they take that position.

I have not spoken from a party point of view. I have not consulted any one about the views I should express. I think my views are such as will commend themselves to thinking and reasonable men all over the country. I am in favour of one man one vote; but if we have that principle in Ontario, I want to have it in Quebec and New Brunswick as well. I hope that before we get through this discussion—which I trust will be thorough—we shall be able to frame a Bill which will be to the advantage of the people of the country generally.

Mr. McMULLEN. I desire to say a few words in reply to the address which has been delivered by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Craig). In the first place, he admits that the Act should either be revised or be repealed. He frankly confesses that the operation of the Act that has been in force in this Dominion for a number of years, is not by any means satisfactory, and he is willing to consent, either to repeal that Act or so to revise it as to bring it into a position where he thinks it would be satisfactory. Now, he says the revising barristers discharge their duties impartially. Well, I have heard of cases where the revising barristers did give the wink to their own men to hand in the names of all those that they desired to be put upon the list; and I know that in cases where the Reformers asked to be put on, they had to be very careful that the declarations were all drawn up in accordance with the provisions of the Act; but, when the Conservatives started to put on their men, they did not require to make any declaration at all. I know one case where a revising barrister actually said to his own friends: Send me in any names you want added, just give me the list with the qualification, and I will put them on—and in every single case they were put on. The lists were loaded up in many cases. Young men were put on, seventeen, eighteen and nineteen years of age, and, in order to purge the list of such names, the Reform candidate had to spend a great deal of money; he had to pay a man to go around and serve subpoenas for witnesses to attend, and was put to enormous expense to try and wipe off the list names that never should have been put on, and that would not have been put on had the revising barrister discharged his duty faithfully, if he had treated both parties alike. Now, I am not complaining of that official in my own constituency; he has discharged his duties fairly well. But I do know that in some ridings they took the course that I have just outlined, very much to the inconvenience and expense of those who were compelled to take steps to get those names off the list. Now, my hon. friend says that the list will be a partisan list, and I was rather surprised to hear him say that the local government will make the lists. Surely, my hon. friend knows better than that. Had he thought for a moment, he would not have made that statement. The local government establish the standard of qualification merely, that is all they do. The municipal officers, including the reeve, appoint the assessor, the assessor goes through the municipality and makes out his assessment roll. After that is done, a revision is held, and held before the council, with the reeve and other members of the council present. Every elector in the township has a right to appear and to object to any names that are on the list, and to ask that any others be added to the list, so as to make it as perfect as possible. If the reeve and the council, however, should discharge their duties in a partisan way, if they leave off those that ought to be on, or put on those that should not be put on, there is an appeal to the county judge, just the same as there is at present to the revising barrister. The revising barrister takes the place of the county judge. There is an appeal now under the present law. I refer more particularly to Ontario, where there is an appeal to the county judge. The court of last appeal has been virtually the creation of hon. gentlemen opposite, they made the court of last appeal themselves, the judge who sits there was appointed by them; so that virtually the last tribunal before which they will have to go to perfect any municipal list, is a tribunal of their own making. I cannot see, therefore, how they can find any objection to that tribunal. From the way my hon. friend spoke, you would fancy that the Ontario Government made the list, that it is prepared by their own officials, and that they have every opportunity of making a partisan list. Surely, the hon. gentleman did not intend to present the case with that face on it, because that is not at all the case. Then again, he said that the young men were indebted to the Conservative party for the right to vote in this country. Well, I challenge that statement. It was Sir Oliver Mowat, when he was leader of the Ontario Government, who introduced the Act that gave to the young men of this country of the age of twenty-one years the right to vote, and also gave the right to farmers' sons. If he consults the statutes, he will find that that is the case. Then, again, my hon. friend refers to the evidence of silence on this side of the House in the matter of discussing this Bill. Well, Sir, I sat in the House in 1885, when the Franchise Act we are now about to repeal was under consideration. I can well remember that at that time the word must have gone around that the hon. gentlemen who then sat on this side of the House, should keep silence; for, from Wednesday night we discussed that one provision of the Bill, all Wednesday night, all Thursday, all Thursday night, all Friday, all Friday night, and all Saturday up to 12 o'clock at night. The Speaker, or his substitute were continually in the Chair, and during all that time those who sat on the Opposition side continually spoke on one provision of the Bill, while the hon. gentlemen who were then sitting on the Government side, never broke silence in this Chamber. Now, what is the provision we wanted? The leader of the Government at that time demanded that the Government should reserve the right to appoint the revising officers. In England, the revising officers do the work, but under very different conditions. The courts in England appoint the revising officers, and not the Government at all. But the Government here wanted to retain the right to appoint the revising officers. We opposed that on the grounds that the judges should be, ex officio, the revising officers. The leader of the Government at that time positively refused to accept any such amendment to the Bill, and in order to secure that measure of justice that we felt would be secure if we got the last appeal before the county judge, and as we felt that that was the only hope we had of securing anything like fair-play, we fought it for three days and for three nights. The result was, that, on Monday, when we were fresh and ready to begin the fight the next week, the leader of the Government felt that Saturday night would be again reached without any progress being made with the Bill, and so he came down and agreed to accept county judges, where they were willing to act. But, notwithstanding that, I must admit that, to a certain extent, we did get fooled by the then leader of the Government, because the leader of the Government immediately appointed a whole batch of barristers as junior judges, so that we were thrown back on the position we occupied before, but we got the opportunity of pleading before junior judges in place of revising barristers who were virtually appointed to do the work. Ever since the passage of this Act we have been under a franchise measure which has proved most harassing, annoying and expensive, particularly to the Reform party. We have had to fight to get our friends on the list and to get our opponents off at every revision, and I believe some hon. gentlemen opposite have had considerable inconvenience also. I dare say that hon. gentlemen opposite, when they found we were paying lawyers to go round and appear before the judges, for the purpose of getting the lists perfected, were called to contribute their share in a like way, and the result was expensive, and hon. gentlemen have session after session pressed on their own friends that they should amend this measure. Under the present system the preparation of the Ontario list could not be carried out in a more fair way than that adopted. The members of the council of a municipality are not all Tories or Grits. Conservatives are elected as reeves and deputy reeves even in Reform townships and the reverse, the reason being that those men had discharged their duties faithfully. The result is that when they come to revise the voters' lists their object is to have all their friends, whether Conservatives or Reformers, who are entitled to vote, placed on the list, and municipal councils take very little stock in the prospect of a Dominion or a local election. They look after themselves, and endeavour to see that every man entitled to vote is placed on the list. I should like to know any reason why the reeves and members of municipal councils are not in a better position to judge who should and who should not be on the revised list than any barrister or judge. There is no court you could devise that is more likely to adjust equitably and fairly the voters' lists of a municipality than the municipal council itself. They will adjust it fairly and carry out their duty in the interest of the municipality without regard to either Tories or Grits. In that respect they will be found to fairly discharge the duties devolving on them in almost every instance.

My hon. friends opposite have said that a uniform franchise is desirable and that it should prevail throughout the Dominion. If the hon. gentleman who made that contention had sat in the House when the Franchise Act, now about to be repealed, was introduced, he would remember that the leader of the House gave as a reason for the introduction of the Bill that he wanted to establish a uniform franchise; but after the discussion had continued during several days and we reached the clause regulating the qualification, he rose and moved that Prince Edward Island and British Columbia should have manhood suffrage, a different franchise from that enjoyed by all the other provinces. The first impression was that the reason the Act should be uniform was that it should have general application, but when it reached the committee stage, as I have said, it was changed so as to give manhood suffrage to Prince Edward Island and British Columbia, leaving the rest of the provinces to continue under their old franchises. This law has been unquestionably an exceedingly costly one in its operation. I do not wish to go over the items mentioned by the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) or to give a shower bath of figures to show the extravagant cost of the Act, but every hon. member who has taken an interest in the four revisions has come to the conclusion that the Act is an exceedingly costly one and that an effort should be made to reduce the expense. It has been stated, and I think it has been stated by the Solicitor General, that the Act had not accomplished the object in view. I think it accomplished the object sought to be obtained, to a considerable extent. In its action it certainly militated against the interest of the Reform party, and that was the primary motive in introducing the Bill and enacting it into law. In that sense it has accomplished a great deal; it put us to enormous inconvenience and cost and it kept off the voters' lists a great many names that would otherwise have appeared there. Another proposed amendment of the Act will be of decided advantage. Under the new Bill the Government are going to establish the same polling subdivisions as have been established under the local Act. I can well remember that in some townships people were in great doubt as to where they should vote. The municipal elections would be held in a certain division; the provincial election might involve a change, and when it came to a Dominion election other polling places might be decided on and the result has been that many people visited the wrong polls and sometimes they lost their votes. I have known cases of that kind. Under the present Bill there will be the same polling subdivisions for the Dominion elections as for the local. Men who went to the poll at the last election will know that their vote will be recorded at the same poll at the next election. My hon. friend from Brockville (Mr. Wood) made very much the same speech to-night as he delivered a year ago when a change was proposed in the Act. To-night he attempted to make a mountain out of a mole-hill. The hon. gentleman said that in the province of Quebec men might have more votes than one; that if a man lived in Montreal and owned property he might be able to vote in more than one place, and in Toronto a voter would only be able to record one vote. If that is the case it is a matter of little consequence to the people of Ontario, because the province of Quebec can only have sixty-five representatives, and if the province chooses to give a man the right to vote in several places on the ground that he holds property there. It has a right to do so whether Ontario adopts that system or not. This Bill will not conflict with any of the provinces. I hope, however, that we shall always have the one man one vote principle, because in the past, as outlined by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Macdonald), very great expense has been incurred in bringing in men from great distances for the purpose of making votes for both sides. Much has been said with respect to the action of Nova Scotia, and I am very glad the hon. Finance Minister corrected a false impression entertained by many members of the House with respect with what they were pleased to call the disfranchisement of the electors of that province.

Mr. MILLS. Notwithstanding the denial I say they were disfranchised.

Mr. McMULLEN. Under what Act—

Mr. MILLS. I say that the electors of Nova Scotia were disfranchised in batches from voting in the local elections.

Mr. McMULLEN. Will my hon. friend (Mr. Mills) keep his seat. Although he ought to know the law of Nova Scotia, I will give him a little information and I will challenge him to say I am wrong. In the province of Nova Scotia no man was disfranchised by any provincial Act to vote at the Dominion elections. Is that right or is it not?

Mr. MILLS. No one ever said to the contrary.

Mr. McMULLEN. We are not dealing with the local franchise, we are dealing with the Dominion franchise.

Mr. MILLS. You are trying to make the local franchise the Dominion franchise now.

Mr. McMULLEN. My hon. friend (Mr. Mills) thought I was not posted with regard to his province, but he would secure more credit by keeping his seat than by interrupting me, because I had the honour of setting him right. I say there is no law that has disfranchised any elector in the province of Nova Scotia from recording his vote in the Dominion election.

Mr. MILLS. It would though if this Bill passes.

Mr. McMULLEN. Now, Sir, there is no intention of parting with the power we in this House exercise over the franchise. We are merely in the meantime adopting the franchise of the provinces, and if at any time the provinces alter their franchises, or interfere with the rights of the people to vote in the election of members to this House, there is nothing at all to prevent us remedying any injustice in that respect. My hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) could not help having a shot at the Ontario Government for gerrymandering, as he said the province of Ontario.

Mr. McMULLEN.

Mr. SPROULE. Hear, hear, and I shall do it ever.

Mr. McMULLEN. If there is any man in this House who should feel grateful to the gerrymander, it is my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule).

Mr. SPROULE. In what way?

Mr. McMULLEN. He would not have a seat in this House were it not for the Dominion gerrymander.

Mr. SPROULE. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) allow me to say—

Mr. McMULLEN. If my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) will sit down I will explain it to him.

Mr. SPROULE. Will he allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McMULLEN. In 1882—

Mr. SPROULE. He dare not let me ask him a question, because he knows—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. McMULLEN. My hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) had better keep cool and I will explain the whole matter to him. In 1882 he so arranged his own riding that he would have a perpetual seat as long as he lived, and he threw out a township that would give a majority against him and made for himself a little hive. He is here to-day on that account, and he ought to be thankful to the gerrymander.

Mr. SPROULE. What township was it?

Mr. McMULLEN. Hon. gentlemen opposite may say what they like about the Ontario Government, but they never broke county boundaries as did the Conservatives in the Dominion Parliament. I have the honour of representing a portion of three counties as the result of their gerrymander. I have part of Dufferin, a part of Wellington and part of Perth in my constituency, and although I never thought of demanding three indemnities I really think I have a good case for claiming it. Now, Sir, I do not think that my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) has made out of his fling at the Ontario Government.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) what township did they take out of my county? Did they take out a township that gave a majority against me or a majority for me?

Mr. McMULLEN. I have not in my recollection all the townships in the hon. member's riding, but I say there was a change made in the constituency that perpetuated his holding a seat in this House.

Mr. FOSTER. You did not answer the question.

Mr. McMULLEN. There is no doubt about it. South Grey was altered and there was a certain portion taken from his riding and put into South Grey which endangered the election of my hon. friend (Dr. Landerkin). The change was made to try and kill Dr. Landerkin, and another township that I have no doubt suited my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) was put into his riding. The doctor from South Grey was made to carry a load of Tories from the riding of the doctor from East Grey.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. McMULLEN. Do not laugh until I get through. An addition of Tories was put in the constituency of my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) from the north part of the riding so as to make him safe.

Mr. SPROULE. There was nothing added to my riding at all, but there was one township taken out that gave me 190 majority, and therefore it could not make a safe riding for me. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) should get up and apologize.

Mr. McMULLEN. We will settle that question when we introduce a Bill to abolish the miserable Gerrymander Act. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) will have to fight for his life when the Bill is brought in to abolish the gerrymander.

Mr. MILLS. Elevate the moral standard.

Mr. McMULLEN. I congratulate the House and the country upon the introduction of this Bill which will abolish the Dominion Franchise Act, that annoying and expensive measure which has disfranchised a great many of the electors of this country. I hope that the Bill now introduced will be fair and honest, and that it will give every man in this country an opportunity of recording his vote. I have no doubt that the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) will possibly try to find some objections to the measure, but he would not carry out his duty as a member in Opposition if he did not try to do that. It is about time that the Franchise Act should be abolished, and this Bill will do it.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) now give the name of that township?

Mr. BENNETT. A week or ten days ago when the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) broke silence and came out from his tent where he had been sulking for a considerable time, it was attributed to him that he was to be translated to the Lieutenant-Governorship of the North-west Territories. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) has again not broken silence for some time, and now it must be clearly apparent to the House that in the dire extremity in which the Government are in the Senate, it is within the range of possibility that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) is to be elevated to that sphere where he has so long wished to go. The hon. gentleman owes a duty to that House, and that is to go over there and apologize for all the unkind things he has said of those who have the honour of being members of that House. I had the pleasure the other evening of attending a meeting in the county of Russell, which this same worthy and valiant gentleman attended. The meeting was held in the interest of the Conservative candidate, and I opened and discussed matters for upwards of an hour. The hon. gentleman was then afforded an opportunity of replying. He did so for an hour or three-quarters of an hour, and then excused himself to the audience on the ground that he had a pressing engagement elsewhere, and left. I can only say that his statements to-night with reference to the riding of East Grey were nothing compared with the Munchausen stories he indulged in on that occasion. The hon. gentleman can never have read sacred lore. He never could have heard of the fate of Ananias. I am sure; but I would commend to his perusal the chapter of Holy Writ which deals with Ananias and the horrible fate that overtook him, for he should feel that in these days the same fate might come to such high mortals as himself.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the question before the House to-night is whether or not we should interfere with the existing privileges which we have under the Franchise Act of this Dominion. I presume that we should view that question from three different points; first, on the question of principle; next, on the very high ground, to secure an honest and fair list; and, in the third place, the least of all, on the matter of expense and cost to the country.

On the question of principle, I contend that it is in the best interests of the Dominion as a whole that there should be a uniform franchise list, and that it should not be delegated to the different provinces from time to time and at all times to provide for those provinces such franchises and such lists as they might desire for the election of Dominion representatives. Take, in the first place, the case of Prince Edward Island. If there is a province in the whole Dominion where the Conservative party may expect the most unmanly and most dishonest treatment, it is the province of Prince Edward Island. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) yesterday assailed me on the ground that I had acted in an unmanly manner in this House. All I can say is that I hope and trust that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will have nothing to do with the revision of the lists in Prince Edward Island, because I shudder to think what will be the fate of the Conservatives there if he has. I have little doubt that his guiding hand was in the deal consummated there a little while ago.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have not been in the legislature for fifteen years back.

Mr. BENNETT. Certainly not, but the hon. gentleman was in close touch with his companion in the toils there; I have no doubt of that.

Mr. FOSTER. He had a finger in the pie.

Mr. BENNETT. I have no doubt he had a whole hand in the pie. It was pretty small politics, and that is the reason why I think the hon. gentleman was mixed up in it. What did they do in the Island of Prince Edward? The legislature found a franchise law that had been in existence for years, and under that they disintituled all Government officials from voting in the province; but as soon as the Liberal party came into power, they gave Dominion officials the right to vote after having but a little time before prevented them. I think that must have been one of the crowning efforts of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and probably he feels very proud of it. Then, there is the province of Manitoba. Last session we heard of the irregularities and outrages practised there, and I will be bound to say that the representation from Manitoba in this House will be worthy of performing any iniquities quite on a par with some of the others. Why, Sir, it is simply disgraceful that the Dominion of Canada, in the election of its members to this House, should be placed under the thumb of these local legislatures. I am surprised to see the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) and the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) in their unctuous, pious manner, getting up and declaiming about gerrymanders in the province of Ontario. Take the case of the hon. member for East Huron. If there is a man in the House who should be ashamed to speak of a gerrymander, it is that hon. gentleman. He comes from a county where the Ontario Government tortured and twisted, not constituencies to give them a party advantage, but where they cut up the very townships and drove the voters this way and that way to gain a party advantage. But at last they have been overtaken in their iniquity, and we have the satisfaction of having redeemed from them two of the constituencies which they cut and carved in that way. The hon. member for North Wellington says that in this Franchise Bill we are going to have an honourable Bill; and before he sat down he told the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) that the day would come when he would see a gerrymander that would gerrymander him out of the House. I would be sorry to leave the honour of this House to the hon. member for North Wellington.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman is saying what is not true. I did not say so.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman should withdraw that statement.

Mr. McMULLEN. I withdraw the statement, but I simply say in explanation that the hon. gentleman, in supposing that I used those words, is stating what I did not say, and what is not true.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman appeals to me to be the judge whether it is true or not. I can only tell him that he had better not appeal to me, for judgment will go against him on that score. However, actions speak louder than words, and if the hon. gentleman is not translated to the Senate by that time, we will expect him to give a fair Bill to this House, but I shall be doubtful of his actions. Then, we come to the other ground, that this Bill is going to afford to the people of this Dominion the privilege of one man one vote. That is utterly misleading and untrue, because it does nothing of the kind. In the Island of Prince Edward a man may have a vote in four or five different divisions, so that that principle will not be enforced in that province. So in the province of New Brunswick. But it is in that charming province of Nova Scotia that we may expect fair-play and the purest motives carried out on strictly impartial lines. The hon. Minister of Finance got indignant at the idea that there had ever been anything wrong there. The hon. gentleman knows that the local legislature of that province passed an Act which prevented any employee of the Dominion Government from voting in local elections. Is that not correct?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That does not happen to be the point we are discussing. That is correct, but it is not the statement which has been repeatedly made in this House. The statement that has been made is that we prevented them voting in Dominion elections, and that is not true.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman only meets the statement by saying that he cut the throats of his political enemies for the local house.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not suppose this House wants to be troubled with the local affairs of the province of Nova Scotia. If it were necessary, I could show that most of the statements made in that respect are entirely unwarranted.

Mr. BENNETT. Evidently the hon. gentleman is not proud of what he had the honour of doing down there.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am proud of it.

Mr. BENNETT. Then, I can only say that if the hon. Minister is proud of the fact that he disfranchised hundreds of men, he and I have different opinions of what manliness and honour consist.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Will the hon. gentleman permit me to state that I do not propose at any time to allow him to be the judge of what is manly or honourable?

Mr. BENNETT. What does the hon. gentleman propose under this Bill? He says that, having struck down hundreds of voters in the province of Nova Scotia, having prevented their voting in the local elections—

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I did not say anything of the sort.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman assents to this, that hundreds of voters have been struck down in his province.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman says I struck them down. The thing occurred years before I was in politics, and some of the hon. gentlemen over there were parties to it.

Mr. BENNETT. Then, the hon. gentleman takes this ground, that he saw a wrong committed, as he claims, when he came into power, and he refused to right that wrong, but allowed it to be continued. I do not know whether the thief is worse than the receiver, but the hon. gentleman admits, not only that the wrong was done—

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I have not said it was wrong. I have said it was right, and I can prove it was; and if it were necessary to go into the politics of Nova Scotia—I do not think it is—I can prove to most of the members of this House that it was right.

Mr. BENNETT. Do the hon. gentleman and those behind him applaud the sentiment of depriving men working on a railway from the right to vote because a number of them were employees on the Intercolonial?

Mr. CAMPBELL. What do the people of Nova Scotia think about it?

Mr. BENNETT. I can tell the hon. gentleman from Kent one thing they thought: They thought the duty should be taken off flour, as was promised them by this Government—

Mr. MILLS. It was promised them at Annapolis by the Minister of Finance.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. member for Annapolis has interrupted and stated in his interruption that I said at Annapolis that this Government would take the duty off flour. I tell the hon. gentleman that he is mistaken. I made no such promise.

Mr. MILLS. I have the type-written stenographic report of the hon. gentleman's speech, and can produce it.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I can only say that the hon. gentleman will find no speech I ever made containing the statement, in any authorized report, that the duty would be taken off flour. I have condemned the duty on flour, as I have condemned the duty on other things, but I never said that we could take the duty off flour and leave it on other things in which our province is interested.

Mr. BENNETT. We can take this lesson from the statement of the hon. Minister, that the hon. member for Annapolis should have had a written promise from the Minister of Finance, such as was obtained from the right hon. leader of the Government by one of his prominent supporters. When the hon. member for Annapolis gets a promise of anything, he should get it in writing.

Mr. FOSTER. And then he will not get it fulfilled.

Mr. BENNETT. And then he will not get it fulfilled, unless the circumstance or exigencies require its fulfilment. But really, Mr. Speaker, I must ask your protection from these interruptions by the Minister of Finance.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. You will get it by not making incorrect statements about the Minister of Finance.

Mr. BENNETT. Where did we find the hon. Minister? We found him at this point, that he told the House that, in the province of Nova Scotia, they have had the satisfaction of depriving hundreds of people from the right to vote because they are employees of the Dominion Government, and now the Minister of Finance is going to do—what? He is going to apply that provincial law to the Dominion elections.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. BENNETT. Some of those back benchers say, "No, no." They rarely ever say anything more than that. Why, is not the provincial Act of Nova Scotia going to be a part of this Act? Certainly, it is.

Mr. McMULLEN. You do not understand it at all.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. member for North Wellington says I do not understand it. All I can say is this: That hon. gentleman spent half an hour telling the House that we were going to have the pure and salutary Act of the province of Ontario in force in the Dominion elections. If so, are we not also going to have the pure and salutary Franchise Act of Nova Scotia enforced, too? Certainly, we are. And here we see at once that these hon. gentlemen rely on their being able, by this new Franchise Act, to cripple their opponents through the influence of the local legislatures. That is the object of the Bill before the House. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) was always, in the last Parliament, wont to say, in reference to any Government measure: Never mind, the Bill will go through, thanks to the brute majority. I am not going to say that it is a brute majority which rules in this House, as the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce used to characterize the majority in the other House, but I say that this Bill will go through, and that when it does wherever these hon. gentlemen have a friendly local Cabinet, they will do everything in their power to make it as infamous in its operation as possible. What do we find to-day? We find that, in Nova Scotia, there is a Franchise Act that is grossly unfair. We find that in Manitoba there is a system of registration which no words of mine can condemn too strongly as being a disgrace and an outrage on public decency. We find in Prince Edward Island the principle of one man one vote entirely disregarded, and the same thing in New Brunswick.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. What is that about New Brunswick?

Mr. BENNETT. In New Brunswick, one man can vote in every county in which he has property, so that if he is the owner of property in three or four different counties, he has three or four different votes. These hon. gentlemen talk of uniformity—why, there is not a semblance of uniformity in these franchises.

To come down to some of the statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite on the question of principle, they say that we are going to have lists which will be revised by fair-minded judges, and not by revising barristers. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) made a charge of outrageous conduct on the part of some revising barrister. But he did not dare to name the offending barrister, and, for fear that he might be accused of doing an injustice to the revising barrister in his own riding, he at once said that that gentleman was perfectly fair and impartial. And I venture to say, that if the hon. gentleman were brought to task, he could not name the revising barrister to whom he attributed wrong-doing. That is the kind of unmanly artifice to which the hon. gentleman resorted to discredit the Franchise Act. I give him the opportunity now, if he chooses to name the revising barrister who, he said, acted in an outrageous partisan manner. But the hon. gentleman will not venture to reply. The fact is, that the great bulk of the revising barristers in Ontario are county court judges. They are the very same men who will have to revise the lists under this Bill. And when hon. gentlemen opposite throw mud in this way at the revising barristers under the present law, they are only showing up their own lack of good faith, because the same men will be revising barristers, should the Bill now before the House become law.

Then, we are promised simplicity of lists, and there are to be no costs at all to the country. We are to have no costs, comparatively speaking, because we are going to take the provincial lists. I was amused at the figures in which the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) indulged, but I have heard that hon. gentleman romance so often about figures that I would have been disappointed if he had not made a mistake of some few millions, or hundreds of thousands of dollars. What is the fact with regard to the revision of the local lists? One would imagine, to hear these hon. gentlemen, that the revision of the local lists in the province of Ontario was one of the most honest performances ever heard of. In the innocence of their hearts, these hon. gentlemen tell us, the township council appoints an assessor, that assessor makes up the list: the clerk then posts it up, and that is accepted, with perhaps a few changes made by the judge. But what is the history of the Liberal party in the province of Ontario? What is their history in the county of Simcoe? Let me read an extract from a newspaper to show how these hon. gentlemen resorted to every disgraceful manoeuvre in order to stuff the voters' lists in that riding, and I am bound to say, from what I know of other parts of the province, that in these other parts things are not a bit better conducted:

Judge Ardagh found a pretty piece of work cut out for him when he came last Monday to hold the voters' lists court for the township of Orillia. The net results of His Honour's labours, assisted by the representatives of both political parties, is as follows: The Conservatives had fifty names put on and forty-one struck off.

On inquiry into the matter, it transpired that a number of these men whose names were struck off the list, never existed at all. They were simply names the assessor placed on the list. And I must tell the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) that some near and dear relatives of his were mixed up in that affair. What was the result? We had to appeal to the judge, and this newspaper comment will show the effect of the judges' finding in the case:

Considering all the circumstances, Assessor Regan and his friends must feel that Judge Ardagh was more than moderate last Monday. The wholesale attempt to stuff the voters' lists was a most unblushing piece of villainy, deserving a severe punishment. Mr. Gunn's claim that there was no evidence of the rascality having been perpetrated in the interest of any particular party was a delicious piece of humour, which readers unacquainted with the learned gentleman's propensity to joke, even on the most solemn occasions, might well fail to understand or to appreciate. That Regan was not alone in the systematic attempts to rob Conservatives of their votes and confer the franchise on unqualified Liberals, existant and non-existent, there is said to be ample evidence to prove, and in that case the matter should not be allowed to rest here. Honest Reformers will be as anxious to see justice done, and the sacredness of the ballot vindicated, as their political opponents. This would appear to be the more necessary, in view of the fact that Orillia township is not the only municipality in the riding where such work appears to have been attempted.

Why, Sir, we found wherever there was a Liberal assessor in the riding the same disgraceful tactics had been resorted to ; as a result, we had to go into the courts. Hon. gentlemen would have us believe that it is a matter of no trouble whatever, that the laws are so good and so well administered that one had no trouble to make the lists right. Let me read some clippings from the newspapers with regard to these appeals. The Penetanguishene "Herald," of the 23rd September, 1897, says :

When the judge comes here to hold the voters' list court of revision, he will find his work cut out for him and lots of it. The Liberals have about ninety appeals, and the Conservatives somewhere over one hundred.

The Orillia "Times" of September 9th, 1897, says :

There are over three hundred appeals against the voters' list in the township of Tay.

Then we come down to the Midland voters' list. The Orillia "Times" of 23rd September, says :

His Honour Judge Ardagh held his court of revision of the voters' list for Midland on Tuesday. The Liberals added forty names and struck off eleven. Conservative additions, sixty, and none struck off.

Then, coming down to the township of Orillia where this outrageous conduct has been carried on, on more than one occasion, I read :

The court of revision will have its hands full when it deals with the revision of the Orillia voters' lists before the county judge. There have been lodged 288 appeals for alleged wrongful omissions and insertions. Of these, 175 are against Conservatives, and 113 against Reformers.

Now Sir, I would be bound to say that if you go to other parts of the province and examine the preparation of the local lists, you will find what we found in East Simcoe. Instead of the lists being perfect, we had 1,400 appeals in that riding alone. It is absurd for hon. gentlemen opposite to talk of the simplicity of the local lists. Every man acquainted with the subject knows that the greatest frauds have been perpetrated in connection with them, and the reason is that the preparation of the list assists in the carrying out of such frauds. The hon. gentleman says that there is no cost, and I understood the hon. the First Minister to say that no cost was borne by the province. I will give him credit for not being informed upon the subject, that he has been misled by the hon. member for North Wellington or somebody else. If you will consult the public accounts, you will see that hundreds of thousands of dollars are paid to the county judges in connection with the revision of the lists.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. How much was paid ?

Mr. BENNETT. I will give the hon. gentleman (Mr. Somerville) the benefit of the information. I have some little hope of his conversion some day or other. It may be far away. I remember that hon. gentleman declaimed vigorously against the grant to build a certain post office in the province of Quebec last session, but that this session millions and millions of acres of land in the North-west were voted away by him. I will be courteous to the hon. gentleman and give him the information he wants. He will find on page 427 of the Public Accounts of Ontario that the amount paid the county judges in respect of the revision of voters' lists was $7,668. But the payment by the province directly to the judges is not the sole expense. I would refer the hon. gentleman to the Revised Statutes of Ontario. These hon. gentlemen would lead the House to believe there is an arrangement by which the clerk of the township does all this work for nothing. Either they must be grossly ignorant or they must be trying deliberately to mislead the House. I am inclined to the opinion that their difficulty is ignorance. If they will hunt up the Revised Statutes of Ontario they will find that there is provision made for the payment of the township clerks of a certain amount in respect of these appeals under the Franchise Act. There is not only the fee to the clerk of the court, but provision is made that all the notices—which, under the Dominion Act may be delivered cheaply by mail—must be served personally by a constable, and the township has to bear the cost. Before the hon. member for North Wellington leaves the Chamber. I hope he will allow me to tell him that the city of Stratford alone was put to an expense of $600 for the revision of the voters' list for the last election. And what was our experience in our own riding ? With these monstrous appeals that we were forced to make against Grit assessors. Grit township councils and Grit clerks who refused to carry out the law loyally and properly, there was a charge of about $50 to the ordinary municipality, while one was put to a cost of over $100 to rectify the wrong-doing of these gentlemen. When they will deliberately stuff the voters' lists and put the municipalities to an immense cost to have these lists made correct, what will they do in the bigger game when the Dominion issues are at stake? One shudders to think what, under their cunning hands, will be the result in the voters' list in every riding of this Dominion when it comes to a prospect of giving up the loaves and fishes at Ottawa. Take the ordinary riding and the cost of revising the voters' list under the Dominion Act will amount to about $1,000. Take an average of $50 for every municipality—and that is a small average—it will cost all the municipalities on the average riding $600 to revise the provincial lists. Then there is the payment that the province has to make to the judge. Taking the two together, it will cost as much for the thorough revision of the local lists as to-day it costs for the revision of the Dominion lists. The only difference is that, instead of the Dominion bearing the cost as they do at present, the municipalities will have to bear it. Why, Sir, I see in a local print in Ottawa the statement that at a meeting of the city council objection was taken by the council to the large expense entailed upon the city for registration. Then the hon. gentlemen talk about a fresh list. Why, they know this very well, or else ignorance pervades their minds on this question, that there is no registration in the cities every year; and as a result, if an election comes on in a riding where there is a city, my hon. friend from East Toronto, for instance, would find that he would have a list a good deal staler than he has now under the Dominion list, because there would not have been a revision for local elections, consequently the list in the city might be three or four years old. Now we find that the principle of having the elections conducted on the same franchise all over the Dominion is utterly at variance with having these local franchises adopted. We find, too, that it is within the power of men in these local legislatures to devise any iniquity they may conceive in their minds, and in turn apply it here to the Dominion Act, and judging from what these hon. gentlemen have done in the past, and if the pardonable pride, as it is deemed by him to be, of the Finance Minister has been gratified here as it has been gratified in Nova Scotia, we must shudder to think of the kind of lists on which the next Dominion elections will take place if this Bill is carried into effect. But they say that we are going to have an honest list. Well, I will show you a sample of an honest list under the Ontario Act. I hold in my hand a local list in the riding of East Simcoe, and I call the attention of my hon. friend from East Toronto to this fact, that that local list has on one page 37 names written in, not printed at all, because under the local Act the list is first printed and afterwards it is revised by the judge, and after it is revised by the judge then these names are all written in the list, and the list is then left in the office of the clerk of the peace. What is the result? Exposed as the list is, changes are made there by persons, and we found in the riding of East Simcoe in the recent election and in North Simcoe—and I do not blame the clerk of the peace for doing so—we found there names that we never knew as having been placed on by the judge, and we found the names of substantial farmers through which a pen had been run. Are these the kind of lists we are to have for the next Dominion elections, lists printed and posted up in the office of the clerk of the peace, accessible to every person who goes in there, and when a man goes in and runs his pen through the name of a voter, that voter is disfranchised and dispossessed of the right of voting? The hon. gentleman cannot contradict it. That must be the result of the adoption of the voters' list in the province of Ontario. Now, I say that when a man goes up to poll his vote we should have a clean and clear printed list showing the names of all the parties entitled to vote, not a list malformed, a maimed list like this, with a host of names written in, with a stroke of the pen run through other names, and a man who has a right to vote prevented from voting simply because a pen has been run through his name. Yet that is the Bill that these hon. gentlemen are going to force upon the people, and they cannot force any other Bill upon them if they carry out the provisions of the list as they are applicable there to-day. Now, there is another and a very commendable phase in favour of the present Dominion voters' list. The Dominion list, when printed to-day, is a final and conclusive list. If a voter's name appears on the list he has a right to vote, there is no power to dispossess a person from voting. If your name is not on that list then you cannot vote. But the adoption of the local voters' list, or the adoption rather of this Bill, means this, that these hon. gentlemen are going to incorporate into this Act as appears by section 18, the form of oath that is provided in the local elections. Now there is a commendable feature about the Dominion Franchise Act, it is that any voter presenting himself to record his vote and who is entitled to vote, if objection is taken, there is a form of oath prescribed if he takes which he is permitted to vote, and all that is required in that oath is that he shall be 21 years of age and a British subject, and has not been bribed or bribed any person else. But if you take the form of oath that is provided for the local, it is altogether of a different nature, and the result is that under the form of oath that these gentlemen are introducing into this Bill—and when the Bill goes to committee, as I suppose it will, I trust that form of oath may be eliminated—but under that form of oath provided in the local election, the door is open for any kind of fraud being perpetrated. But here is another thing strongly to be urged against these local lists. After these lists are corrected, after these 200 or 300 corrections are made in a township, as is often the case, after thousands of changes are made all over the different ridings, what have you then in your hands? You have been able to get only a few scanty voters' lists that are printed in the township, and you of necessity are forced to go or to send to the office of the clerk of the peace, and have your lists corrected. I fancy the demur that would be made by every hon. gentleman who wanted the voters' lists, if instead of having, as he has to-day, a perfectly clean and proper voters' list, he found himself obliged to go to the clerk of the township, and either pay him for doing the work of correcting the list, or do it himself. Under the present Dominion Act you can get any number of lists here at Ottawa, a certain number being first allowed by virtue of your being a member of the House, and afterwards upon payment. But with the local lists you can do nothing of the sort. A scanty number of lists is first prepared, and after those lists have been distributed according to the statute, you can only obtain a limited number. The result is that when you obtain a limited number, you have got to go to all this expense and all this trouble of preparing and correcting these lists. Now, Sir, I am in favour as much as any hon. gentleman on the opposite side of the House, of reducing the cost of the revision of the voters' lists; but I do contend that there should be some guarantee given to the people, first, that they are going to have an honest list, and that the electors of the Dominion as a whole shall not be at the caprice and will of designing local politicians spread through the different provinces, as they have been in the past, and whose only aim has been, in pursuance of the small parish politics in which they indulge, to secure a party advantage. In the next place we are entitled to have, when we come to an election, a properly prepared voters' list, and not a voters' list with numerous names written in as these lists have them written in, and with numerous names struck, under a system which affords every facility for manipulating and for tinkering with the voters' lists. Why, Sir, I knew in one township, in the riding of East Simcoe, in the local elections, a man who has voted for years, the owner of a splendid farm, who, when he went to the polling place, found that his name was struck off the voters' list, at least it did not appear upon the poll book where it should have been. There is a point to which I wish to call the attention of the hon. gentlemen, that when you go to vote under the local Franchise Act which these gentlemen propose to bring into force, there is no printed list displayed at all, the list there is not a list with the names written in, written in by the clerk of the peace or by some clerk in his office, and what is the result? The printed list first in his hands runs all the chances of being tampered and tinkered with, and after it has been tampered and tinkered with, as we know that has been done, then this clerk, or whoever prepares it, may make a mistake by not copying correctly, and the result is a most mutilated list is presented. I have never seen a local election take place yet but that some man did not find on going to vote that his name was not on the list at all.

An hon. member informed me to-day of a case where, owing to an error on the part of the Clerk of the Peace a large number of names had been left off the list altogether, and the consequence was that these gentlemen were debarred from voting. Is the House going to adopt a franchise list such as that of Ontario—I am not acquainted with the lists in the other provinces—where there is a system as defective as a system can be made, a system which is open to the grossest outrage and has had the greatest outrages perpetrated under it; for if the House is going to adopt that system, those who may be candidates at the next general elections will have a very poor chance of fighting in a fair field, but they will certainly be playing against loaded dice, and a very bad kind at that. When this Bill reaches the committee stage, I trust the Government will not show a partisan spirit, but will be true to their declarations that they are going to eschew everything of that kind and place on the Statute-book an Act with honesty emblazoned on the face of it. If they do so, they will raise a monument a great deal more lasting than any monument they have hitherto erected. I appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite, and I will appeal to them when the Bill is in committee, to endeavour to have this Act so amended that it will at least give resemblance of fair-play and not adopt an iniquitous, unfair list, the gross and outrageous list that prevails in Ontario to-day, and which has prevailed for a number of years.

Mr. FLINT. After the very extraordinary line of argument taken by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), I could scarcely be expected to follow in a discussion of the peculiar local conditions which he referred to. The principle of this measure alone should now be debated. If the representatives of each province entered into minute particulars in regard to local matters, and dwelt on personal matters, indulging in personal statements, which no one was in a position to question or dispute in regard to squabbles in certain small communities over the local lists, of course the debate would be so long and tedious that no sound conclusion could be reached as regards the principle of this Bill. Many of the points alluded to by the hon. gentleman would more properly come up in committee, where questions of detail would be sifted. We have heard from this hon. gentleman and others who have attacked this Bill allusion to the operation of the Franchise Act in some of the provinces, and not only during this discussion, but in other discussions we have had Nova Scotia alluded to and a line of statement and argument adopted which very seriously misrepresented the condition of affairs in that province. The hon. gentleman spoke of electors being disqualified to vote in that province, and alluded in the most contemptuous and severe terms he could use to the crime, the unmanliness, the general wickedness of disqualifying any persons whatever in Nova Scotia or anywhere else. If any weight whatever is to be attached to that line of argument, it applies not only to Nova Scotia, but to all the provinces and to the Dominion itself, and to every country which has a franchise law and a voters' list, because there does not exist in the Dominion and never has existed in any country a voters' list where a large number of people who might fairly and reasonably be considered as suitable to hold the franchise, were not disqualified. Disqualification exists as to some persons as naturally and as reasonably as qualification exists as to other persons, and it is no argument for any hon. member to sneer at the legislature of his province or of the Dominion itself if, for reasons suitable to the legislature or the Dominion, it sees fit in endeavouring to protect its rights to disqualify a certain class of persons. The Dominion Act, which is belauded by hon. gentlemen opposite, has disqualified many persons who might be qualified to vote, but whom Parliament has seen fit to disqualify; and yet there is nothing wrong or unconstitutional in creating those disqualifications. Our own Franchise Act disfranchises the judges of every court and a large number of persons for reasons which at the time appeared to be sufficient. The Franchise Act of every province has disqualified a large number of persons for reasons that seemed to the various legislatures adequate. When hon. gentlemen from other provinces, inadequately informed as to the circumstances of the case and of the reasons that actuated the legislature of Nova Scotia in depriving certain persons of the right to vote in local elections, raised this issue, they were travelling beyond the record which should be followed in this discussion, and dealing with matters on which they are improperly informed. It is true that the province of Nova Scotia has for many years, I believe since confederation, or at all events since an early date, deprived of the right to vote at local elections quite a number of voters. I have always contended and I contend now, that the reasons which actuated that legislature were perfectly sound and based on the principles of public policy, but it is not fit to import a discussion of these reasons into the debate here, because none of them apply to this Franchise Act. Whether it is right or wrong, prudent or imprudent, reasonable or unreasonable for Nova Scotia to act as it did, cannot possibly operate as regards any discussion of this measure in this Parliament, because no one proposes to disqualify this class from voting at Dominion elections. I may state in a general way that the Local Act of Nova Scotia disqualifies from voting employees of the customs service, post office, inland revenue, Government railways and works.

Mr. MILLS. In some counties about 250 persons.

Mr. FLINT. No matter how many are disqualified. The legislature of Nova Scotia to protect itself in provincial affairs, saw fit to so act, and it had good and substantial reasons for its action, to disqualify those persons from voting. I will not import those reasons into this discussion, but if this was the provincial legislature, I would be perfectly willing, as is any hon. member on this side of the House representing Nova Scotia, to enter the lists with the hon. gentleman and discuss the propriety of the action taken. The people of Nova Scotia at election after election, time and again have supported and consecrated the principle embodied in that legislation.

Mr. BERGERON. What are they going to do now?

Mr. FLINT. It is not contended that those disqualifications should apply to elections for the Dominion Parliament. The reasons why that should apply to the provincial legislatures will not operate as regards the Dominion Parliament, and if it is not already provided in the Bill that this particular disqualification should cease to exist, I for one would be perfectly willing, when the Bill is in committee, to remove these disqualifications for a Dominion election. But, Sir, I would not vote as a member of the local legislature or as a citizen of Nova Scotia to remove these disqualifications in the provincial franchise.

Mr. BERGERON. There is no more cause for this disqualification; the Liberals are in power here.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Leave us in Nova Scotia to settle that matter.

Mr. FLINT. The argument of the hon. gentleman in reference to disqualifications in certain provinces need not apply to disqualifications under the Franchise Act, as it applies to the Dominion. Judging from the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite, one would think that there is something essentially sacred, in regard to the franchise, that it should be absolutely uniform. Of course, our present franchise is more uniform than the franchises of the various provinces would be, as compared with each other; but our Dominion franchise has never been absolutely uniform, because persons who might be qualified in one province might possibly not be qualified in another. This sacred principle of uniformity, now invoked by hon. gentlemen opposite, did not exist during the first nineteen years of confederation when the discrepancy in the franchises of the different provinces was much greater than at the present time. During these nineteen years, the larger portion of which the Conservatives held the reins of power, they never were tired of praising the magnitude and greatness of the country, the wisdom of the legislation adopted, and the high character of the Parliament which was elected under these various franchises. During these nineteen years, we heard very little complaint as to any evil which arose from a lack of uniformity. As has been pointed out, it was with a great deal of reluctance, and only after the strongest pressure on the part of political adherents that the gentlemen then governing the country brought into operation the existing Franchise Act. After all, so far as this discussion has gone, we have found but very few points of difference between the advocates of the present Bill and the leaders upon the opposite side of the House. We find that this Bill, in its main features, follows the lines of a Bill introduced by a former leader of a Conservative Government in Canada. We find also, that the leader of the Opposition has united with other gentlemen supporting him in condemning in strong terms the present Dominion Franchise Act. The points of agreement, in reference to this question, between the two sides, are numerous. It is admitted that the present Franchise Act has been unduly expensive, and although it may have secured a certain measure of uniformity, yet it has been an egregious failure all round. The expense of its administration has been so great that at least not half of the number of revisions which ought to take place, in a normal condition of things and under a reasonable Franchise Act, have been had. No Franchise Act should remain on the statutes of the Dominion which did not allow of a revision at frequent intervals, but on account of the expense to the Dominion Treasury and to individual candidates, the revision of the lists under the present Act has been postponed from time to time, until a great national scandal has arisen, by which almost every one of our important elections, where great issues were placed before the people, have had to be decided upon lists which did not represent the real voting elements of the community. This has been most unjust to that large class of ambitious voters who, although qualified according to law, were not entitled to vote, because of the want of revision. The first revision of the Franchise Act cost $493,644; the second revision cost $235,000; the third revision cost $225,000; the fourth revision cost $240,000; in all, about $1,200,000; and yet an election that is being held at the present time is actually held upon lists about four years old. In this very case, owing to deaths and removals from the county, as well as the large number of new voters who are qualified and are not upon the lists, not more than 60 or 70 per cent of the possible voters are able to exercise the franchise. It is admitted by all that the present Franchise Act must be repealed, if we are to have a Parliament representing the wishes and desires of the actual electors of the country. How is that to be accomplished? None of the hon. gentlemen opposite have yet pointed out a way out of the difficulty, other than that adopted by the Government, namely, to accept the lists prepared by the local authorities, and to make use of them for future elections to the Parliament of Canada. It has been pointed out, with good reason, that the local legislatures are more familiar with the domestic relations and concerns of the people than the Dominion Parliament can be. Here our members come from the various provinces, and it is very difficult, if not absolutely impossible, for the representatives from one province to understand the peculiar local circumstances of the people in another province; and, while the franchise may be technically and literally nearly uniform, yet, as a matter of fact, it may not operate in the same way in the different provinces. The advantage of accepting the local franchise is, in the first place, economy. No hon. gentleman has seriously ventured to attack that phase of the problem.

If we can save the Dominion of Canada on each revision of the voters' lists from $200,000 to $300,000, certainly it is worth making a vigorous attempt to accomplish, unless the results are shown in some way to be disastrous to the best interests of the country. I understood one hon. gentleman opposite to say that no economy is served by accepting the local lists. Of course, the hon. gentleman meant that no saving is caused to the various municipalities; but as regards the Dominion, no increased expenditure is created, and as regards the municipalities no increased expenditure is created either. We simply accept as the franchise for the Dominion Parliament the franchises of the various provinces as we had them nineteen years previous to 1885. The line of attack taken by some hon. gentlemen would necessarily if followed throughout this discussion, lead to violent arguments as to the local politics of the various provinces of the Dominion, because charges and counter-charges may be made as regards the conduct of the various local administrations, and the various local oppositions; and all the small politics of the provinces would be imported into a discussion which ought to be entirely foreign to such subjects. We have already had imported into this discussion a vigorous debate as to the so-called gerrymander in the province of Ontario. Language of an extraordinarily violent character was used by my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) and by other hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House on that subject. Certainly no hon. member can attempt to follow in that discussion without a great deal of research and inquiry that ought to be unnecessary. But I would call the attention of the House to one peculiar feature of this discussion. Although my hon. friends have discussed that matter with a great deal of warmth, we have just passed through a local Ontario election, in which a great many members of this House took part, and yet I failed to find, in all the discussions that took place in that election, any reference to the so-called gerrymander.

Mr. SPROULE. It is well seen that you had no part in the contest, or you would not say that.

Mr. FLINT. I have looked over the Conservative handbook of the campaign, and the subject of the gerrymander was scarcely alluded to in it, except in passing terms. At any rate, it is a subject which has two sides, and those who defended the re-arrangement of the boundaries had a good deal to say in defence of it. But what I deprecate is the bringing of that into this discussion.

Mr. SPROULE. It was your leader who introduced it.

Mr. FLINT. Because this Parliament is not the sphere, and has not the materials for its discussion, and nine-tenths of the members, apart from those from the province of Ontario, would not be able to understand it without a great deal of research which they ought not to be called upon to make. Another argument advanced by hon. gentlemen against the proposition to accept the provincial lists is that Parliament should not give up its control of the franchise. I do not understand that by adopting the provincial lists as the mode of electing representatives to this Parliament, this Parliament parts with one iota of its control of the franchise. In the main, as has been pointed out, and as a review of the statutes of the various provinces would show, the franchises of the provinces are not so far apart as we would be led to suppose from the remarks of some hon. gentlemen. For instance, the difference between the present Dominion franchise and the franchise of Nova Scotia is so slight as practically to amount to nothing; and the franchise in almost all the provinces, except Nova Scotia, are practically the same. But if, after the adoption of the provincial lists this Parliament should find that one of the provinces had created machinery for a local list which was unsatisfactory to this Parliament, this Parliament would have complete control over the matter, and could rectify that by the passage of an amendment to the law, as easily as it can control its own franchise at the present time. Therefore, this bugbear disappears. We find, then, the matter reduced to a very simple proposition—as to whether the great economy, the great simplicity and the general benefit of the new Act are not far greater than the expense, the disadvantages and the uncertainties which were in the Act under which Parliament is at present existing. I think all the arguments point in the direction in which the hon. Solicitor General's Bill goes. But it has been argued that in the various provinces certain acts of impropriety have taken place. No doubt, under the operation of any law some acts of impropriety might take place. No doubt under the operation of the present franchise law many things have taken place in various sections of the country which a calm and unprejudiced observer could not approve of; and no doubt in the provinces, here and there, have taken place, if we could investigate them judicially, things which a person in a proper frame of mind would not approve of. No doubt attempts have been made to put persons on the lists who should not be there or to keep persons off the lists who should be there; but these things are failures which are common to any law, and common to human nature; and if when we get into committee on this Bill any gentleman can suggest a clause by which these things could be diminished or reduced to a minimum, no doubt the Government would be glad to receive any suggestions along that line. But we know that the local lists are made up by the appointees of the various municipal councils, who are not always men belonging to one party, but who are more varied in their political feelings than would be the appointees of the Administration here. The appointees of the Administration, unless some of them were judges, would naturally be individuals of one political stripe; but we know that the municipal lists are made up, not by gentlemen of one political stripe, but by gentlemen representing all shades of political opinion in the country. Where the municipal council is largely of one political faith, no doubt the revisors would be men of the same political faith; but these men are responsible to the community in which they live, they are men of character and standing in the community, they are acquainted with all the circumstances and they are amenable to the local public opinion of the community in which they reside. Viewing human nature as we know it, taking the average character of the yeoman and farmer and gentleman throughout the various provinces, who are selected to carry out this work, we have every reason to believe that they will act with all the impartiality one can possibly expect of human nature. Therefore, I contend that, under the operation of this law, we will have lists which will represent fairly all the voting element of the community. The officials appointed to carry out the law will be in close touch with the community in which they live, and be particularly sensitive to the influence of public opinion, and thus more likely to act fairly in the public interest than those appointed under the present system. I think the Government has done wisely in bringing down this measure, and have no doubt that the Government and hon. members on this side will be most happy to receive suggestions from hon. gentlemen opposite in matters of detail, so as to make the Bill as workable and as fair and honest as possible. Once this Bill becomes law, the day of these extravagant costs heaped upon the Government and the candidates and members of Parliament will have passed away. These heavy costs are a barrier at present, which serves to keep out of Parliament men of worth but of modest means, who otherwise would present themselves for election, and it especially keeps back numbers of young and enthusiastic politicians throughout the country from coming forward in the public interest. I believe that this measure will tend to purify and clear the political atmosphere more than any other which has been brought forward since the present Franchise Act became law. It will put an end to the embarrassment now placed upon the Government, through its being compelled to select revising barristers from among its strongest partisans. I am not here to make any charge against the revising barristers throughout the country, but we know that charges have been made and have, in some instances, been supported by what appears to be very strong evidence of a partisan and tyrannical abuse of power. It is an unfortunate thing that any class of men appointed by the Government to discharge quasi judicial functions of the highest character should be open to the charge of partisanship and should be subjected to the suspicion on the part of the electorate that their appointment was simply the paying off of political obligations. We know what pressure must have been exercised on the Government who appoint these officers, and we know that no one could obtain the position of revising barrister who was not known to be a strong partisan. This, however, will be done away with. Every municipal council will appoint its local representatives in the smallest localities, who will be amenable to public criticism and opinion, and the result I believe will be a much healthier political atmosphere than we have enjoyed for a long time. I trust that this measure will speedily become law, and I venture to predict that it will be a long time before any hon. member will advocate its repeal and a return to the present Franchise Act, which appears scarcely to have a friend on either side of the House.

Mr. MILLS moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12.05 a.m. (Wednesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 23rd March, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

DISMISSAL ON INTERCOLONIAL—A. STEWART.

Mr. POWELL asked,

1. Was A. Stewart dismissed from the position of tankman on the Intercolonial Railway at Spring Hill, Nova Scotia? If so, why was he dismissed, and who made the charges (if any) against him?

2. How long had Stewart been in the service of the Intercolonial Railway previous to his dismissal? Who has been appointed to fill the position of tankman at Spring Hill in room of Stewart?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Mr. A. Stewart was dismissed from the position of tankman on the Intercolonial Railway at Spring Hill Junction, N.S. He was dismissed upon the statement and representation of the member for Cumberland County for having taken an active and offensive part in the elections. He had been in the service of the Intercolonial Railway between twenty-four and twenty-five years. Mr. H. A. McKenzie has been appointed to fill the position of tankman at Spring Hill Junction, in place of Stewart.

INTERCOLONIAL STATION AT WESTVILLE, N.S.

Mr. BELL asked.

Has the Minister of Railways and Canals taken into consideration the matter of improving and extending the accommodation for the public at the Intercolonial station at Westville, Nova Scotia?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The accommodation at the Westville station of the Intercolonial Railway has been considered, but so far it has not been found that further accommodation is absolutely necessary for the traffic at present.

REVISION OF STATUTES.

Mr. BRITTON asked,

1. Have persons been appointed for revision and consolidation of Dominion statutes ?
2. If so, who are they ?
3. If not, is it the intention of the Government, during the present session, to make provision for such revision and consolidation ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). This is a question which is now engaging the attention of the Government. I cannot tell the hon. member at present whether the Government will be able to make provision this session or not.

IMPORTATION OF HORSES FOR FEEDING.

Mr. McCLEARY asked,

1. Has the Government or the Department of Customs made regulation making it obligatory on the part of Canadian farmers who bring temporarily into this country horses for feeding purposes, to take out a license for which a tax is levied ?
2. If so, what is the tax or charge on each person who takes out such a license ?
3. What number of licenses have been taken out since the month of August, 1897, and the amount received for the same ?
4. If such regulation has been made, what was the object in making such ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). 1. Horses brought into Canada for feeding, are subject to duty unless the premises of the importers have been approved as a "Bonded Warehouse" and security furnished, if required, for compliance with customs laws and regulations. 2. The warehouse fee for the premises of each applicant is $10 for six months. 3. Ten applications have been received and approved for warehouses for feeding and pasturage since 1st August, 1897. 4. The object in making regulations for the warehousing of horses for feeding and pasturage (as established 24th June, 1897), was to authorize the entry of horses for this purpose under general rules, without payment of duty—general regulations not having been previously in force, permitting this to be done.

DISMISSAL OF FRANCOIS CORBEIL.

Mr. BERGERON asked,

1. Has François Corbeil, formerly wharfinger on the Lachine Canal, been dismissed ?
2. If so, when and why ?
3. Has an investigation been asked by Corbeil or anybody else
4. Was an investigation granted ? If not, why not ?
5. Was Corbeil replaced ?
6. How many applications has the Government received to replace Corbeil ?

Mr. BLAIR.

7. Who are the applicants, and by whom were they recommended ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. Mr. François Corbeil, formerly wharfinger on the Lachine Canal, was dismissed. 2. He was dismissed by an Order in Council of the 19th of June, 1897, because he was addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors to excess. 3 and 4. No investigation was asked. 5. When Mr. Corbeil was dismissed, he was not replaced, as it was considered one wharfinger was all that was needed. 6 and 7. There was one application, which of course was not acted on as the position was not to be filled.

Mr. BERGERON. By whom was the recommendation made ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I must decline to state the names of gentlemen who make recommendations in these cases.

INSPECTION OF STEAMBOATS—REMISSION OF PENALTIES.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked,

1. Has the opinion of the Minister of Justice been obtained respecting the right of the Crown to remit penalties imposed under the provisions of the Act relating to the inspection of steamboats ?
2. If so, what was the opinion and when was it given ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I am not aware that the opinion of the Minister of Justice has been formally asked by my department in reference to the commutation of fines imposed for infraction of the Steamboat Inspection Act ; but the question was raised by the Auditor General last November. I gather from the letter he wrote me that he took objection, and referred the matter to the Department of Justice, because he wrote "the whole question has been affected by a recent opinion given by the Department of Justice." According to this opinion, any offence against the sections of an Act under which penalties are incurred is subject to the exercise of the prerogative of mercy ; and a pardon by the Crown would carry with it a remission of the penalty. Mr. Lash with whom I consulted, concurs in this ruling. Under these circumstances the commutation or refund of a fine that is recommended by the Treasury Board and sanctioned and ordered by the Governor in Council will not in the future be questioned in this office on the point of authority."

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman see any impropriety in putting the question formally to the Department of Justice and obtaining an opinion on it ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I see no objection whatever. I put it informally before, and I will put it formally now.

DREDGE "PRINCE EDWARD."

Mr. MACDONALD (King's) asked,

1. How many are employed on the dredge "Prince Edward," as caretakers or otherwise? What are their names, and amount of salary of each?

2. How many were employed during the winter of 1896-97?

3. If more are now employed, why?

4. Was John R. Macdonald relieved of his duties as captain in the fall of 1896 on the ground that only one person was required on board during the winter?

5. How many cubic yards were removed by dredge "Prince Edward" during the season of 1896 and 1897, respectively, and the cost per cubic yard each season?

6. The number of days the dredge "Prince Edward" was doing actual work in each month during the seasons of 1896 and 1897, respectively?

7. The cost of repairs for the dredge "Prince Edward" for the years ending 31st December, 1896 and 1897, respectively?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). I think the hon. gentleman should move for a return covering these questions, otherwise I shall not be able to bring down the information.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAY.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's) asked,

Was the curve recently straightened at North Wiltshire, on the Prince Edward Island Railway, the sharpest curve on said road? What is the amount expended by the Government to date on the straightening of the curve at North Wiltshire, on Prince Edward Island Railway, and is further expenditure necessary in connection therewith?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The curve recently straightened at North Wiltshire on the Prince Edward Island Railway, is the sharpest curve on the road between the two main centres, Charlottetown and Summerside, on which the largest traffic is carried. The amount expended up to the 21st March, 1898, on the straightening of the curve at North Wiltshire on the Prince Edward Island Railway is about $8,000. Further expenditure is necessary in connection therewith.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—EASTERN EXTENSION.

Mr. BELL (Pictou) asked,

Is it proposed by the Department of Railways to place a dining car on the eastern extension of the Intercolonial, between Truro and Mulgrave?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). It is not the intention.

DUCK LAKE INDIAN INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan) asked,

What was the cost of the maintenance of the Indian Industrial School at Duck Lake, Saskatchewan, for the last fiscal year? How many pupils are there in the school? What is the cost to the Government, per capita, per annum?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The cost of maintenance of the Indian school at Duck Lake for the last fiscal year was $4,030.80. According to the last reports there were seventy-two pupils in the school, but the average attendance for the last fiscal year was fifty-three. The per capita cost per annum for the last fiscal year was $76.05.

MONCTON STATION—PLUMBING AND HEATING CONTRACT.

Mr. POWELL asked,

1. Was the plumbing and heating for the new Moncton station included in Messrs. Rhodes, Curry & Co.'s contract for building; and, if so, were the heating and plumbing withdrawn from the contract, and why? And what sum, if any, was deducted on account of such plumbing and heating being withdrawn from the amount to be paid to them?

2. If the said plumbing and heating were withdrawn from Messrs. Rhodes, Curry & Co.'s contract, were tenders afterwards called for the heating and plumbing of said station building? If so, who were asked to tender, and what were the different amounts of the tenders received?

3. Was T. H. Doody, of St. John's, one of the parties who tendered for the said plumbing and heating? If so, what was the amount of his tender, and was his tender accepted; and, if his tender was accepted, did he perform any part of the work tendered for, and what has been paid, or to be paid, to him for the work so done by him? Why was the work taken off Mr. Doody's hands?

4. After the work was taken off Mr. Doody's hands, were tenders for the said heating and plumbing again called for? If so, who was asked to tender, and what were the respective amounts of their tenders?

5. Did Messrs. Arnoldi & Ewart, of Ottawa, make a report on the plumbing and heating of the new Moncton station, as provided for in the original plans and specifications for the station? If so, what was the estimate of cost?

6. Were Messrs. Estano & Sons, of Moncton, asked to tender, or given an opportunity to tender for the plumbing and heating of the Moncton station; and if not, why not?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. The plumbing and heating for the new Moncton station were included in Messrs. Rhodes, Curry & Company's contract, the sum of six thousand and seventy dollars ($6,070) being included therein to cover that item. It was found that the specification was very defective, and the plumbing and heating work was therefore withdrawn from the contract, and an improved specification prepared, which increased the quantity and quality of plumbing work and material generally and, also, included the heating and fire protection, as well as the gutters and down pipes and gas fittings, &c., for the entire building, which had been omitted from the previous specification. 2. Yes, tenders were afterwards called for upon the amended specification for the plumbing and heating and fire protection, gutters, down pipes and gas fittings, &c., of said station building. Messrs. Rhodes, Curry & Co., Amherst, Mr. James Doody, St. John, Longard Bros., Halifax, and Thomas Campbell, St. John, were asked to tender. The amounts of the tenders were :

Rhodes, Curry & Co., Amherst.....	$11,516
James H. Doody, St. John.....	11,516
Longard Bros., Halifax.....	11,691
Thomas Campbell, St. John.....	11,375

3. Mr. James H. Doody, of St. John, was one of the persons who tendered for the said plumbing and heating. His tender amounted to $11,516. His tender was accepted and he performed part of the work. He has been paid $1,519.65. The work was taken off Mr. Doody's hands and contract rescinded as soon as it came to my knowledge that invitation for tenders had been limited to the persons above mentioned. 4. After the work was taken off Mr. Doody's hands, tenders were again called for. Messrs. Longard Bros., R. Longueil, J. B. Naylor & Son, A. E. Craig, Halifax, N.S., Messrs. John Ritchie & Co., Dartmouth, N.S., Messrs. J. H. Doody, O'Brien & Brown, Jas. Boyle, J. McManus, P. Campbell & Co., Frank McManus, W. Kiley, G. & E. Blake, J. E. Fitzgerald, Doyle & Lambert, St. John, N.B., Messrs. Lemerech & Co., Kitchen & Shea, Fredericton, N.B., C. O. Rowe and Wm. Watson, Moncton, N.B., were asked to tender. The respective amount of their tenders were :

Jas. H. Doody, St. John.....	$ 9,550 00
Doyle & Lambert do	8,293 00
P. Campbell & Co. do	8,350 00
W. Kiley do	10,500 00
Frs. E. McManus do	8,277 00
Wm. Watson, Moncton.....	10,400 00
Kitchen & Shea, Fredericton.....	9,797 42
J. E. Fitzgerald, St. John.....	10,000 00

5. Messrs. Arnoldi & Ewart, of Ottawa, did make a report to the department on the plumbing and heating of the new Moncton station, as provided for in the original plans and specifications for the station. They estimated the cost with certain improvements at $8,108. 6. Messrs. Estano & Sons, Moncton, were not asked to tender for the plumbing and heating of the Moncton station. I understand their names were not brought to the notice of the department.

FIRE AT WEST BLOCK.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

1. What was the date of the fire in the West Block by which a portion of the roof was destroyed and the building otherwise damaged ?

Mr. BLAIR.

2. What is the departmental estimate of the loss caused by fire and water ?

3. What work, if any has been done in the way of restoring the roof ?

4. Has any work been let by contract ? If so, will copies of the contract be laid before the House ?

5. When is it expected the new roof will be placed on the building ?

6. What work is still to be done before the building is fully restored ?

7. Is it true that the iron for the roof has been purchased in Belgium ? If so, did the Government permit this class of material to be entered without payment of duty ?

8. Has any material used in the restoration of the building been admitted duty free ? If so, what ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. The 11th February, 1897. 2. $200,000. This covers the repairs to allow the departments to move back to the Buildings, the expenses in connection with the fire proper as well as the reconstruction of the roof and offices. 3. The whole of the ceilings in the basement, ground floor and first floor have been re-plastered on metallic lathing and the woodwork of these floors, damaged by fire and water, has been repaired and the walls of the offices, corridors, &c., have been re-painted and the whole of the offices have been occupied. A fire-proof floor has been constructed over the entire attic with steel joists and porous terra cotta. All the damage to the stone work and brick work of the towers, chimneys and walls have been taken down and new stones cut and put in place, with the exception of a few chimneys which it will take about from four or five weeks to complete. 4. The construction of the iron roof has been let by contract, the balance of the work has been and is being done by day labour under the direct supervision of the present chief architect. No objection to produce contract for iron roof. 5. Part of the new iron roof has been delivered and it is expected that the iron work will all be in position in two months. 6. The iron roof has to be placed in position, also the fire-proofing of iron roof, the covering of the roof with copper and the plastering, finishing of the offices. 7. We have not been informed as to the place where the iron has been purchased by the contractors. To the second part of the question the answer is "No." 8. Yes. The Ohio stone which was purchased direct by the department was admitted duty free. No other material had a free entry.

DRUG SUPPLY FOR MOUNTED POLICE.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

Did W. J. Fleming & Co. tender last year for the supply of drugs to the North-west Mounted Police at Prince Albert and Battleford ? Was their tender from 100 to 200 per cent higher than their competitors ? Has the drug supply for the police at Prince Albert and Battleford been given this year to W. J. Fleming & Co. without tender ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). 1. W. J. Fleming tendered, unsuccessfully, last year for the supply of drugs required by the North-west Mounted Police at Prince Albert, not Battleford. 2. His tender was not from 100 to 200 per cent higher than other competitors. 3. The drug supply for the police at Prince Albert and Battleford this year has not been given to W. J. Fleming without tender.

MOUNTED POLICE—DR. BAIN.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

Did Hugh W. Bain, Esq., M.D., act for many years as surgeon to the North-west Mounted Police at Prince Albert? Has he been dismissed? If so, when and why? If dismissed, has a successor been appointed? If so, on whose recommendation?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Hugh M., not Hugh W. Bain, M.D., was employed professionally in connection with the North-west Mounted Police at Prince Albert from 1885 until the 31st January, 1898, when his services were discontinued, as being no longer required. A successor has been appointed, on the recommendation of the member representing the constituency in the House of Commons.

LAKE TEMISCAMINGUE RAILWAY.

Mr. POUPORE (by Mr. Taylor) asked,

Does the Lake Temiscamingue Railway, which runs from Mattawa to Gordon Creek and Kipewa, come under the operation of the Railway Act with respect to the fixing of passenger and traffic rates?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The railway mentioned does not come under the operation of the Railway Act.

ELECTION IN MACDONALD—COST OF PROSECUTIONS.

Mr. ROCHE asked,

What amount of costs or expenses, if any, have been paid or incurred by the Dominion Government in connection with the prosecutions arising out of the general elections of 1896, in the constituency of Macdonald?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). It is impossible to give the hon. gentleman the information which he asks. The expenditure in regard to these prosecutions was not divided between county and county.

HUDSON BAY EXPEDITION—MR. JAMES FISHER.

Mr. ROCHE asked,

What was the amount allowed by the Dominion Government to Mr. James Fisher, the representative of the Manitoba Government, on the recent Hudson Bay expedition? When will his report be given to the public?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The amount to be allowed Mr. Fisher has not yet been submitted to or approved of by Council. His report has not yet been received; I expect it very shortly.

PRINTING BUREAU—MR. H. T. SMITH.

Mr. COPP asked,

Is H. T. Smith an employee of the Printing Bureau? If so, when was he employed, what are his duties, and what is his salary?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). H. T. Smith is an employee of the Printing Bureau. He was appointed in 1889. He has charge of the franchise lists and assists Dr. Dawson, the Queen's Printer. His salary is $1,100.

WOOD ISLAND (P.E.I.) BREAKWATER.

Mr. MARTIN asked,

1. Has the Government received any petition from the inhabitants of Wood Islands, in Prince Edward Island, or a copy of any resolution passed at a public meeting of the people of Wood Islands and neighbourhood, in the said province, asking for the dredging of the Wood Island harbour, and extending the western block of the breakwater at Wood Islands?

2. If so, what action, if any, does the Government intend to take in the premises?

3. Is the Government aware that the entrance to the breakwater at Wood Islands is being gradually filled in with sand, and that the extension of the western block is absolutely necessary?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. Yes, a petition was received. 2. The matter is under consideration. 3. The department is informed that an extension of the breakwater is not advisable until the dredging of the approach to the western breakwater is done, and may not then be found necessary.

ENCOURAGEMENT OF THE BUTTER TRADE.

Mr. REID moved:

That the production of cheese in Canada has reached a very high and most satisfactory point, and any expenditure for the further development of this product alone might be detrimental to the best interests of our dairy industry as a whole.

That Great Britain imports immense quantities of fine butter from foreign countries, of which Canada as one of her most important colonies at present furnishes a very small portion.

That proper cold storage transportation facilities have been provided by our Government.

That the governments of other countries have expended large sums of money in fostering their butter industry by means of bonuses, &c., with the result that their butter industry has prospered and assumed large proportions, as is shown by the official returns of butter imported by Great Britain.

That Canada is specially adapted for and has so many natural advantages for the finest butter.

That whereas a large export butter trade would benefit not only the farmers as a whole, but the millions of money it would yearly bring into the country would do incalculable good to the whole community.

That, in view of the foregoing facts, our Government should take immediate steps to do something more to assist in the development of our butter trade, and this House is of the opinion that the Government should place in the Estimates for the present session an amount to be paid to the farmers direct by way of a bonus of one cent per pound on a specified quantity of our finest fresh creamery butter to be exported to Great Britain while fresh and in condition to secure a reputation for itself and establish a lasting demand, and that this bonus be continued for three consecutive years. This bonus to be increased at the discretion of the Government on butter made during the winter months. All such butter to be subject to a rigid Government inspection.

That this bonus be paid to only those farmers who will furnish for export regular supplies.

He said: Mr. Speaker, at the last session of this House I had on the Order paper the same motion that I am moving to-day; but at the request of the leader of the Government, it was allowed to stand over, and I was unable to obtain an expression of the opinion of the House upon the subject before the close of the session. I therefore wish to move it to-day, for the purpose of obtaining now an expression of the opinion of the House upon the subject. I wish to refer first to the growth of our cheese industry in Canada. A number of years ago the farmers of this country depended for their living entirely upon the hay, grain and other products of their farms; I refer more particularly to the farmers of the older provinces, that is, Ontario, Quebec and the maritime provinces. But owing to the opening up and development of Manitoba and the North-west, the farmers of those new provinces have been able to produce hay, grain and other products of the soil so much more cheaply, that they have taken away almost entirely the opportunities of the farmers of the older provinces of making a living from these sources; and the farmers of these older provinces have necessarily had to turn their attention to some other means of making a livelihood. The Government that was in power at that time sent men to the mother country to look into its cheese trade, for the mother country was importing very large quantities of cheese, and it appeared to the Government that no other country was better adapted to the production of cheese than Canada. The result was that that Government adopted the policy of assisting in every way possible the development of our cheese industry; and with their assistance, our cheese industry has developed to such an extent that I am proud to say that at the present time Canada supplies at least 60 per cent of the total quantity of cheese imported into England. I claim that this is a wonderful advancement for our Canadian farmers, and I move this motion to-day with the view of making an effort also to obtain a portion of the great butter market that Great Britain affords. If we had a large butter industry in Canada, along with our cheese industry, I believe that we would be able to keep up our reputation for cheese, and also keep our farmers employed during the winter months. In advancing the cheese industry, I believe we lost sight altogether of the butter industry. At the present time the farmers make cheese during the summer months only. Their cows are allowed to dry up in the fall and remain so during the whole winter. I claim that if the farmers go into winter dairying, and the cheese factories are built in such a way that either butter or cheese can be manufactured in them, they will be able to make cheese in summer, if cheese will pay better than butter, and during the winter they will be able to make butter; or they will be able to make butter in the summer if they find that it pays better than cheese. Now, England imports annually 340,000,000 pounds of butter; and of this enormous quantity Canada supplies only 10,000,000 pounds. I will state the other countries from which this enormous quantity of butter is imported. The United States, which is not nearly so well adapted for the dairying industry as our own country, owing to its much milder climate, supplies 15,000,000 pounds. We should be able to take a large portion of that trade from that country. Denmark supplies the enormous quantity of 137,000,000 pounds. Holland 26,000,000 pounds. France 52,000,000 pounds. Germany 12,000,000 pounds. Sweden 36,000,000 pounds, the Australian colonies 30,000,000 pounds, and other countries, including Canada, 30,000,000 pounds. I believe that every member of this House will agree with me that not one of these countries is in any better position to manufacture or supply butter for the English market than Canada; and if they are able to supply such enormous quantities, why should not we in Canada be able to supply more than we are now doing? I can quote precedents in support of granting a bonus to the farmers. In the province of Quebec, the province from which the hon. Minister of Agriculture comes, the local government give a bonus to the farmers. The hon. Minister of Agriculture knows that that bonus was given, although I think he took the stand last session that it did not increase the quantity of butter made. Yet in 1890, at the time that bonus was commenced, there were only 111 creameries in that province, turning out 2,779,000 pounds of butter, and four years afterwards there were 400 creameries, which turned out 10,413,131 pounds. I do not see what better evidence we want that that bonus was a great help to the farmers of the province of Quebec. No bonus was given in the province of Ontario, and that province last year exported only 587,000 pounds of butter, although it is the richest farming province in the Dominion. I claim that the farmers of the province of Ontario require some encouragement, and I am now making an earnest appeal on their behalf, as well as on behalf of the farmers of the whole Dominion. Last year the hon. Minister of Agriculture, in contending that a bonus was of no help to the farmers, read a resolution that was passed by the Board of Trade of Montreal. That resolution was as follows :—

Outside of one instance, there had not been a pound of butter manufactured in this province as a result of the bonus. It appeared that the persons here who manufactured butter from cream and milk sent from Ontario, got quite a goodly portion of the bonus, and by this means they had built quite a little business at, as he claimed, the expense of the legislature.

I should like to ask the hon. Minister, how many farmers were at that meeting of the board of trade. The hon. gentleman also gave, as another instance of the failure of the bonus to accomplish its purpose, a motion moved at the same meeting by Mr. Hodgson, a well-known butter and cheese buyer in Montreal :

That a committee be appointed to draft a resolution strongly advising the discontinuance of the system of granting bonuses to creameries, and also the advisability of applying whatever money has been voted for that purpose to the increasing and improving of refrigeration accommodation, both by water and land.

This Mr. Hodgson is not a farmer. He has not the interests of the farmers at heart, but is looking out for himself, and he knows well that, if this bonus were continued and the farmers were compelled to export directly, as they would be, he would lose his business. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that he should have moved this resolution. Then, there was another resolution in amendment, moved by Mr. Ayer :

That this association, having heard that the province of Quebec proposes the discontinuing the bonus to creameries, heartily concurs in the same, and recommends that any further grants be given towards the increasing of refrigeration accommodation.

Mr. Ayer is also an exporter. The hon. Minister of Agriculture did not give one instance of a single farmer who was opposed to the bonus system. It is true, that the province of Quebec discontinued the bonus to the butter business, but the evidence I have given of the growth of the industry shows that it was a great boon to the farmers of that province ; and if the hon. Minister of Agriculture would give a similar boon to the farmers of this Dominion for the same length of time, it is altogether likely that this Government would also be, at the expiration of a similar period, in a position to discontinue it, because that industry would have grown in the interval to such an extent that it could afford to dispense with Government assistance.

To show, further, how this bonus system is of great benefit to the farmers, let me read a brief statement from the Minister of Agriculture, which he made last year, in his remarks on this question :

I wish to point out, in the first place, that one Australian colony, Victoria, for six years, did give a bonus for the export of butter. During that period the butter exports from Victoria very considerably increased, as I find from the figures under my hand. But immediately upon the cessation of the bounties, the export of butter from the colony to Great Britain dropped enormously, showing that the stimulus was not sufficient to encourage and to create a proper and legitimate trade.

In the first part of that statement, the hon. Minister of Agriculture admits that the bonus did make the butter industry in Victoria grow very enormously. If it should do that here for a number of years, would not that be of great importance to our farmers ? In the last part of his remarks, the hon. Minister says that the industry did not increase, but went back. True, it may have fallen off a little, but I think the hon. Minister will agree with me that it did not fall off to what it was when the bonus was first established. The hon. Minister takes credit for the establishment of the cold storage system to England, but, having done that, which, I believe, is of great help to the farmers, I hope he will also take into consideration this resolution, so that he may be able to obtain produce for shipment in this cold storage. I would also request that this bonus should be paid direct to the farmers, so that no middlemen may get it. For instance, when a creamery is started, the bonus should be paid directly to the farmers or the treasurer of that factory, and not to any middlemen, and in this way the farmers will get the full direct benefit. If there is anything in the world that would encourage the farmers, it would be a bonus of this kind, for the simple reason that they would then know, no matter what the price of their butter might be, that they would get probably sufficient to pay for the making of the butter, and thus be encouraged to take hold of that industry. For the last eighteen years, this Government has been promising to do the farmers some good. For the last eighteen years, before they obtained office, they were preaching that our farmers were in a state of poverty, and promising that, as soon as they attained power, they would do something for their benefit. But I have failed, since this Government came into power, to see that they have done anything for the improvement of the condition of the farmers, or that would be of any benefit to them. If I have overlooked anything that the Government have done in that regard, I would like the hon. Minister to inform me of it. The Government, however, has not hesitated to make enormous expenditure on other matters. These hon. gentlemen blamed us for our large expenditure on railways, but I think the record of this Government, in its short term of office, surpasses in this regard that of any Government that has been in power since confederation. The right hon. leader of the Government, when in Montreal, in 1897, told a meeting of the farmers there that the hon. Minister of Agriculture was the best friend they had. I hope that, in this matter, the right hon. gentleman will use his influence on that hon. Minister to obtain this little favour from him which I am asking for the farming community. This is no party matter, but one that interests every farmer throughout the Dominion, and I hope that it will be considered apart from politics. It is in this spirit that I move this motion, and I trust that it will be accepted by hon. gentlemen opposite in a similar spirit. I may add, that many members have said that they would like this resolution to apply also to dairy-made butter. If the Government had an inspector, so that no butter could pass except that equal to creamery-made, I would not object to include that in the resolution. But I earnestly urge the Government to place an amount, be it ever so small in the Estimates of the present session, so that this project may be given a fair trial, and the farmers given an opportunity to see how it would work.

Mr. MOORE. I shall detain the House only a few minutes in discussing the motion so ably presented by the hon. member for South Grenville (Mr. Reid). In concluding his remarks that hon. gentleman referred to what seems to me an important omission, to call attention to which was my main object when I decided to speak upon this subject. I think it would be very unfair for the Government to grant a bonus only to creamery-made butter and exclude the dairy-made, particularly when we consider that 80 per cent of the butter made in Canada is made in the dairy instead of being made by the creamery process. The bonus should not be confined to creamery butter at any rate until the farmers generally have an opportunity to send their milk to creameries. I am glad that the farmers have so able an advocate in the hon. gentleman from South Grenville. We must all agree as to the importance to the country of the agricultural interest. It is the most important industry in this country, and needs the greatest encouragement that it is possible for the Government to give. When we consider that one-third of the traffic upon our railways, one-third of the traffic upon our canals and one-third of the traffic by our ships is in carrying the produce of the farmers, we cannot close our eyes to their claims or feel that those claims can be in any way slighted. I think that those who have followed the trend of events in this country in connection with this industry will find that the encouragement given to the farmer in the production of cheese has been the means of greatly increasing the production, and not only that, but of improving the quality of that which is now being produced in this country. It was said by an old Grecian philosopher that hope of reward is the main-spring of human action. I think that if anything in this country can be held to exemplify that saying it is to be found in results of the encouragement given to the manufacture of cheese. The returns show that in 1890 between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000 worth of cheese was exported from this country. But within the last two or three years this has increased to about $15,000,000. I attribute the increase in the production of cheese in this country to the encouragement given by the various governments, Dominion and provincial, in prizes and in various other ways.

The resolution proposed suggests the importance of considering whether we have not gone as far as it is prudent to go in the manufacture of cheese. The United States people are turning their attention more to the manufacture of cheese, and now the market in England is being fully supplied. I think it would be imprudent for the agriculturists of this country to increase to any great extent the manufacture of cheese. They should rather turn their attention to the increase in the production of butter. The proposal now before the House that the matter should be taken up by the Government and a small bonus given to encourage the farmers in the manufacture of butter, in my opinion, is wise. We find that Australia sent to Great Britain in 1896 $6,000,000 worth of butter, the United States $612,000, Sweden $6,680,000, Denmark $28,000,000, Germany $3,500,000, Holland $4,045,000, France $11,000,000, other countries $3,000,000—in all $65,000,000 worth of butter imported into Great Britain from other countries in a single year. We should have a larger share of this trade. We have a country well adapted to the manufacture of butter. We have as good cows, as good pastures, as good water, and, I think, as skilful people in this country as are to be found in any country of the world. All we have to do is to devote our energy and skill to the making of a first-class article, and there is a market open in England for all that it is possible for this country to send. I rose mainly to call attention to the omission in this resolution to which the hon. mover has referred. I should be very glad if the suggestion which I made to the hon. gentleman could be carried out, in which case the resolution would read:

That in view of the foregoing facts, our Government should take immediate steps to do something more to assist in the development of our butter trade, and this House is of the opinion that the Government should place in the Estimates for the present session an amount to be paid to the farmers direct by way of a bonus of one cent per pound on a specified quantity of our finest fresh creamery and dairy butter to be exported to Great Britain.

And so on. I cannot see any reason whatever why dairy butter that has passed a rigid inspection by the Government inspector, should be excluded from the benefit of this bonus. I think the manufacturers of dairy butter, who make 80 per cent of our entire butter product, would not appreciate the partiality of the Government if the Government were to confine its assistance entirely to creamery-made butter. I would suggest that this addition be made to the resolution, in which case I should be most happy to vote for it if it comes to a vote.

Mr. DAVIN. I consider the motion of my hon. friend is entirely on the lines of those countries on the continent of Europe who first made the export of butter a really scientific part of their trade policy. It was by encouragement on the part of the Government of Denmark that the butter exported from that country to Great Britain obtained such a vogue and proved so eminently successful. My hon. friend who introduced this motion has gone so fully into it and made a case so clear, that it is not necessary for me to say further than that I gladly support his motion.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). Before this motion is put, I would like to say a word or two. The hon. member who has introduced this motion has, as we are all aware, introduced an exactly similar motion last year; and the remarks he has made to-day follow very much the line of the remarks which he made last year. I do not know that I have much to add to-day to what I said when I answered him on that occasion. However, as he has gone over, to a certain extent, some of those points, I will just refer to them, so that the facts of the case may go on record in this session's "Hansard." In the first place, I would say that the experience of the province of Quebec, in regard to giving a bonus for the export butter trade, was not such as to encourage me to hope any great results from a similar policy on the part of the Dominion Government. In the province of Quebec, the local government, for one year, did this, and the result was, that certain shippers in the city of Montreal got practically the whole of the bonus. I never was able to discover, intimately acquainted as I am with the dairy trade in the province of Quebec, that the farmers who supplied that butter got any better price for it than they did for the butter which was not exported. So far as I could make out, from the provincial records, this money practically aided only a few shippers in the city of Montreal, but did not in any way increase the amount of butter exported, and did not reach the pockets of the farmers who actually made the butter. Now, I know that the hon. gentleman has no desire to have such a thing occur as a consequence of this motion; but I can assure him that, according to my own judgment, the same results would probably occur, were any bonus arrangement to be made. I would point out to him that his statement of the exports of butter from the great province of Ontario is not quite fair to that province. The butter which is exported from the province of Ontario is credited to the port of Montreal in our export trade returns. There is a very much larger quantity of butter exported to Great Britain from the province of Ontario than appears in the figures the hon. gentleman read here this afternoon. As a matter of fact, the export butter trade of the province of Ontario, as the export butter trade of the whole Dominion, has been progressing in the most satisfactory manner. The increase this year, since the hon. gentleman made his motion last session, has been almost, if not quite, as satisfactory as the increases in the few years preceding to which I alluded in my remarks on this question last session. At that time I was able to say that our butter export had doubled each successive year for three years. It has not quite doubled during the last year, that is to say, the increase has not been quite as great as it was the year before, but we sent about two-thirds as much more out this year. I think, considering the enormously increased volume of trade, that such an increase as that was an actual increase on the year before, and a comparative increase not so very far short; and when you consider that the volume of trade was so much greater, I think the increase was equally satisfactory. I may point out to the hon. gentleman and to those who may, at first sight, be rather disposed to favour the course he suggests, that we are doing a great deal to encourage the export butter trade already. The cold storage system, which I have been able to put on a satisfactory basis, I think, during the last season, has contributed very much to the surety and to the advantage of the export butter trade. Our butter in England has, up to a recent period, been looked upon somewhat with suspicion, owing to the fact that it was a little off flavour by the time it reached Great Britain. I have in my department to-day letters from large importers in England, letters from a great number of people in that country engaged in the butter trade, and statements which have been made to me personally by my own officials who went over to England last summer, that the reputation of our butter in England has completely changed for the better. This last season, the butter which was sent forward from Canada to England in cold storage, arrived there in almost perfect condition, and those who handled it are full of praises of the quality, and fine texture, and fine flavour of Canadian butter. They say that, if we can send butter forward of that quality, so that it may arrive there in that condition, they would be able to give us an unlimited market, and all we have to do is to make the butter and send it forward. Under these circumstances, it seems to me that all our people have to do is, to provide machinery for manufacturing and exporting it, and they will have an abundant market there for all they can make. We do not need to do like the Australian colonies, who, a few years ago, paid a bonus for exporting butter to England at a time when their butter had no reputation in England, at a time when their butter was not known in England at all. We, to-day, have a sure position in the English market; we, to-day, have a very large and increasing butter trade with the English consumers, and, under these circumstances, without any further action on the part of the Government of Canada, we can simply go on increasing our export to the utmost capacity of the productive powers of this country at the present time. Allusion was made to the splendid position which our cheese holds to-day. I need not go over the familiar figures. Everybody in the country is aware of the fact that to-day Canada is pre-eminent in the cheese trade, that to-day there is one industry, at all events, in which Canada stands at the head of all the world, and that is the cheese trade. We make the best cheese that is produced in the world, and we send out the largest quantity of cheese that any country sends to Great Britain, so much so that we practically control the cheese market in that country. Now, Sir, that trade was created without any bonus, that trade was created by the good business methods of the men who were concerned in it. They were able, with great rapidity and with entire success, to accomplish a splendid result for this country. It was, perhaps, easier to accomplish that result in cheese than in butter, because cheese was not so likely to deteriorate rapidly in the transport between Canada and Great Britain, and therefore they could do that without the cold storage facilities and the transportation facilities which butter requires. These facilities are now at the command of the butter exporters, and I am satisfied, knowing as I do that in Canada we have every facility for making the best butter product in the whole world, that we have the pastures, the water, the herds and animals necessary, and, above all, the people required to make the best quality product that can be manufactured anywhere. I, therefore, feel assured that our people, having now the transportation facilities necessary, having secured an assured position and reputation in the English market, which they enjoy to-day, will be able to increase their output and sell their butter just as rapidly as they can supply it for export. Under these circumstances I do not see it is necessary to give this artificial stimulus proposed—I can call it nothing else—at a time when after it has been given in other directions, it has not proved successful on the whole. The cheese trade has done without it, and our exports have increased, our exports of wheat and grain have done without it; our exports of butter are progressing splendidly and I do not think it would be wise policy, in the interest of the butter trade itself and of our farming population and in the interest of our dairymen, to undertake to give this artificial stimulant. Reference has been made to what Denmark has done for her butter trade in England. We all know that Denmark has leaped suddenly into the very first place among the exporters of butter to Great Britain. Denmark never gave a bonus of any kind whatever for the export of her butter to that market. She spent money in other ways, among others in providing facilities for exportation, in teaching her people at home how to make good butter—just as we have been doing—and providing officials in England to guard and watch the trade there. I think quite likely that we will have to do something of that kind, and to-day I have under consideration the advisability of more largely watching our trade there than I did last year in connection with my cold storage transportation work. I want it to be clearly understood that Denmark never gave any bonus for butter exportation to Great Britain. The countries which did so were the Australian colonies. They did it for a short time, found it did not work and then gave it up, and to-day I understand no colony in Australia is giving a bonus, and as a matter of fact, although for a year or so during which that bonus was being given by one of the colonies, the export was stimulated, the Government found that a lot of butter was sent forward that was not even produced there. They found the arrangement was not working satisfactorily, and they stopped giving the bonus. The butter export immediately dropped, showing that what had been an apparent success by reason of giving the bonus had been artificially stimulated and had not been profitable or successful. Under these circumstances and with this knowledge I do not feel it would be at all advisable to pass such a resolution as that now before the House. I think no one could pretend for a moment or would desire to pretend that, personally I have not had the greatest interest and desire to promote the dairy interest of the country and to increase the exportation of our dairy products. I am myself a dairyman; my own farming has always been on that line, and if there was any particular branch of agriculture in which I was more interested, it is the butter-making industry; but I am satisfied that we can increase and improve and stimulate our butter-making industry by other methods, which are not of the hot-bed variety such as that of granting a bonus, and that we have not to-day the necessity of stimulating them because they are going ahead themselves in a most marvellous and successful manner, and the work we have done on other lines has been more successful than the artificial stimulus would have been, and therefore we had better go ahead on the line which we have followed so successfully and by which we have been able to accomplish such remarkable results. I would therefore suggest that this motion should not be passed, and that the Government should not be hampered by any desire expressed by the House to adopt this particular form of encouraging and helping the dairying industry.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I want to say only a word as to the motion placed on the Table by the hon. member for Grenville and a word or two in reply to, or perhaps in compliment to what has been stated by the hon. Minister of Agriculture. I am sure the farmers of Canada owe their gratitude to the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid) for bringing this subject before the House and presenting it in such an able manner as the hon. gentleman presented it this afternoon; and I am somewhat sorry that the hon. Minister of Agriculture has not turned a more sympathetic ear to the appeal of my hon. friend in behalf of the dairymen of Canada than his speech to the House this afternoon would indicate. The hon. gentleman declared that the bonus that had been granted by the province of Quebec had not been successful owing to the fact that a very small part of the money had gone to the farmers themselves in the form of increased prices. I take it that the object of my hon. friend in asking that this bonus be granted is not that the farmers may obtain a small increase in the price of their butter, but it is mainly that the reputation of our products should be established in England, that our markets should be wide and untrammelled, and by that means still greater encouragement given in the direction of creameries for winter butter-making and the use of them during the summer as cheese factories. The same explanation applies largely to the remarks the hon. Minister of Agriculture made in regard to Australia. But leaving these two points out of the question entirely, I think the Minister of Agriculture will not deny that to some extent at least, though the progress made was not all we could desire, the effort which was made a few years ago to encourage the shipment of creamery butter to Great Britain by aid from the public treasury was to a certain extent responsible for the increased demand for Canadian butter in Great Britain and of the enhanced reputation that butter enjoys at the present time. Whether the hon. gentleman yields to the request of the hon. member for Grenville or not, and I take it from the speech that the hon. gentleman has no such intention, I trust the hon. gentleman will take the step which he has just broadly hinted at so as to secure a more careful inspection and regulation of our dairying trade in Great Britain itself. What I mean to say is this. At the present time there is a very large quantity of Canadian butter, and the same remarks applies to other products of Canada as well, perhaps excluding cheese, which at the present time is sold upon the markets of Great Britain without Canada receiving credit for it. We are all delighted to hear that, because we are all Canadians and we all thoroughly rejoice at the prosperity of our agriculturists even though we do not belong to that class ourselves. But I venture to say, that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) if he had gone into the subject further, would have been compelled to admit that even these butter dealers from whom the compliments with regard to Canadian butter have come, have in many cases placed upon the British market Canadian butter without crediting Canada with its production; in other words, they are selling it in many cases under false pretenses and selling it as French or as Danish or as English butter.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Might I remind the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) that last session we passed an Act requiring that all Canadian butter and cheese going forth to a foreign market would have marked on it the name "Canadian." Of course, when it is retailed and cut out of the tinnet we cannot enforce that, but when it is exported it is all marked "Canadian."

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am aware that it is all marked, and if honestly dealt with on the other side of the water, of course we are protected; but take the case of Canadian cheese. I know myself that Canadian cheese is exhibited in many of the grocery establishments of London but it is sold as British cheese, and the cheese-makers of Great Britain get credit for the splendid quality of cheese which is being produced by the Canadian factories. The same applies to butter, notwithstanding our Act of last session as regards the marking of it. The point I wish to come to is this, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) trod upon the threshold of it when he made the suggestion to the House, and which was merely a suggestion as he did not name any plan. My idea is, that this Government which is spending large sums of money in other directions; spending, I may say, much larger sums of money than we on this side ever expected they would spend; spending sums which announce to the country that they are an exceedingly generous Government; my idea is that a Government so generous; a Government which counts millions with very great ease and spends them with as much ease, could afford very well to spend a sum of money for the establishment of depots in some of the leading cities of Great Britain where Canadian products would be placed upon sale as Canadian products. We should then, by reason of these depots not only secure an enhanced price for the products of Canadian farms and Canadian dairies, but we would in the very best and the most substantial manner possible secure a reputation for ourselves which would last so long as the quality of our products would last upon Canadian soil. I sincerely trust that my hon. friend (Mr. Fisher) will look into the question of arranging some such system of selling Canadian products in Great Britain, a system which will without doubt have the effect of giving us the advertisement, as well as the increased price which the better condition of our products justifies at the present time.

Mr. McMULLEN. Although hon. gentlemen opposite occupied the Treasury benches for eighteen years, it is a singular thing that they never took such a lively interest in the farmer as they do now. I am prepared to offer any assistance possible to encourage the farmers of this Dominion, and to encourage any industry that may be for the well-being of the farming community. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) has just made the suggestion, that in view of the large amount of money spent by this Government, they ought to contribute towards an expenditure in the direction indicated by the resolution. That hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) was Minister of Agriculture for a considerable time, and yet the thought never struck him then, that it would be in the interest of the farmers to inaugurate a system of this kind. I would be glad to see the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) do everything he can to bring before the English consumers the butter and cheese of Canada, and I believe from the action he has already taken in securing cold storage, we have clear evidence of his desire to do everything in his power to secure better prices and better markets for the farm products of this country. It is rather amusing, that although hon. gentlemen opposite were in power for eighteen years the thought never struck them to establish agencies in England as has been suggested by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague).

Mr. MONTAGUE. Oh, yes, we did.

Mr. McMULLEN. I acknowledge that on one occasion, just a very short time before a general election, it was thought it would be a good thing to act in that direction and that possibly it would secure the votes of the farmers of Canada. They bought a certain quantity of butter, they sent it home, the country contributed a considerable amount of money to handle it, but we have never learned down to the present day that any very great good resulted from that experiment.

Mr. MONTAGUE.

I am glad to know that the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) who is himself a practical farmer and thoroughly acquainted with the dairying question, is doing everything he can to encourage the butter and cheese industry. I am proud to see that our cheese has attained such a distinguished place in the English market and I am glad also that our butter is fast gaining ground there. I quite concur in the statement of the resolution, that Canada is well adapted to the production of the best quality of butter. We have the climate, we have the grasses, we have the water and climate, we have all the conditions necessary to produce good butter and cheese, and I can quite see that the future prosperity—more particularly of the older provinces of this Dominion—depends very largely upon the farmers adopting the business of dairying rather than following the old lines. It is well that we should encourage our farmers in that direction, and in my opinion if the business of butter and cheese-producing is to continue to increase as it has since the present Government came into power, Canada will occupy a high position in the English market, and these two products, even without any subsidy, will take the first place. If I thought that such a bounty was necessary I would gladly support it. The interest of the farmers of Canada were neglected and badly neglected for eighteen years, but they are going to be attended to now. This Government will do everything they can to encourage the farmers of Canada. There is, however, one feature of this resolution that I cannot agree with. My hon. friend (Mr. Reid) proposes to confine it entirely to those who can supply butter all the year round. The bonus is not to be given to any factory that will not be able to furnish regular supplies for export. That cannot be done unless the factories can be carried on both winter and summer. In some sections of the country it might be possible to do that. I dare say that in the Morrisburg section, where my hon. friend lives, and where they have carried dairying to a high state of perfection, that could be done; but in other sections of the country it could not be done. If every factory that is producing butter were to be allowed to participate in the advantage offered to the extent to which it would be able to do so, and if the bonus were not to be confined to those factories which would be able to furnish a supply weekly or monthly the year round, I would have no objection to it. I have no objection to hon. gentlemen opposite urging on the Government the duty they owe to the farming community, and the efforts they should put forth in their interest. If the Government continue on the line they have commenced, by offering encouragement in the form of cold storage, both in refrigerator cars and in steamers; and if in addition to that they endeavour to place on the English market, under the eye of our own men, and in the most advantageous way, the products of Canada in both butter, cheese and meat, I look forward hopefully to a very large développement of our trade in all these lines in the English market.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me to be rather unfortunate that the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) cannot approach any subject in this House without introducing party. He says he is very much in favour of helping the farmers, but at the same time he is entirely opposed to the proposition before the House. He goes on to say that it is very amusing and a very singular thing that members on this side of the House should make any proposition looking in the direction of helping the farmers. Why, Sir, I would ask the hon. gentleman who it was that inaugurated the cold storage system for the benefit of the farmers of this country. I would ask him who it was employed a dairy commissioner to instruct the farmers, and to seek to have the cheese industry raised to its present proud condition. I might at the same time ask who it was encouraged the manufacture and exportation of butter. If we looked into this matter, we would find that these things were not done, or at any rate not begun, as the hon. gentleman insinuated was the case, by the Liberal party; but that they were begun and put on a sound footing by the Conservative party; and many of these propositions were ridiculed and opposed by the Liberal party. I would not have alluded to this at all had it not been for the remark of the hon. member for North Wellington; because, as the mover of this motion said, this matter should not be treated as a party question. It is a question that we should approach entirely in a non-partisan spirit; and I think that every member who has spoken on it has so treated it except the hon. member for North Wellington; and so far as I have done so, I have only done it in reply to what he said.

Now, we all agree that the farmers of this country should be encouraged in every way possible. I do not say that the Conservative party have a monopoly of that desire. I believe that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have the same desire; and I give them the credit of that. We are all, independent of party, proud of the position our cheese industry and export has attained; but there is no doubt that our butter industry has not attained to an equally proud position. If it is true that 340,000,000 pounds of butter are imported yearly by Great Britain, and that of that enormous quantity Canada sends only 10,000,000 pounds, I think there is great need for the matter being looked into and considered by the Government; and any means that will encourage the manufacture and export of good butter should receive their careful attention. I am very glad that the statements made as an introduction to this resolution can be made in reference to Canada. We have a cold storage system, inaugurated as I said by the Conservative party. We have a country that is especially adapted, by the possession of many natural advantages to the production of the finest butter. I think it is well that this matter has been brought before the House and the country, and perhaps before Great Britain, at this time, in order that the fact may be made prominent that we have a country that can make as fine butter as any country in the world, not excepting Denmark itself, where very fine butter is produced. There is no doubt that the proposed bonus would necessitate an expenditure of public money; but I hold that this money would be repaid many times over. The money would not go to the farmers alone. They would receive it, but it would be expended in our own country. They would spend in Canada, not only the bonus, but the increased returns from the export of butter which this bonus would bring about. I believe it would result in many thousands of dollars extra being brought into this country, to the great advantage not only of the farmers, but of every part of the community; because I hold that if the farmers prosper, every class in the community will prosper as well. This bonus, at first, would not, I believe, be a very large sum after all, because the bonus of 1 cent a pound is not to be given indiscriminately, but is to be confined to a specified quantity of the finest fresh creamery butter manufactured. It is an open question whether dairy butter should not be included. I am not sufficiently familiar with the butter trade to pronounce an opinion upon that question. Even if a bonus were given on all the butter exported, it would amount to only $100,000; but a large portion of the butter exported would not come up to the necessary standard, because the butter is to be subjected to a rigid inspection by a Government inspector.

I am a strong supporter of this measure, because I believe in its object, which is to raise the standard of quality of the butter made in this country. No object could be more important. A great deal of the butter manufactured in this country is of an inferior quality. What does that mean? It means a great loss not only to the farmers, but to the whole country. It means a great waste of good material and labour which could be as well turned into good butter as bad butter; and if, by giving this small bonus, we can induce our farmers to make butter of a better quality, I maintain that we would be justified in doing so. I do not know that any of the arguments offered by the Minister of Agriculture against this proposition are strong arguments. As the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) said, we are spending large amounts of money—I am not saying they are too large—at the present time; but I think the country would justify us in granting a bonus of this kind if the result aimed at would be attained. The Minister of Agriculture does not seem to think it would, but we think it would. I would like to hear an expression of opinion from the practical men on the other side of the House, the men who make butter and know something of the business, whether they think this bonus of 1 cent a pound would result in raising the standard of butter made in the country. The Minister of Agriculture made a most important statement when he said that the market for first-class butter in Great Britain is practically unlimited; so that if our farmers can be induced to make a first-class quality of butter, they need not fear but that they will get a first-class market and a first class price. The great difficulty is the poor quality of butter which is sent to England. Not only does it not command as high a price as good butter, but it prevents the good butter sent over from commanding as high a price as it would if the standard were raised all over the country.

I do not need to say any more on this question, but it does seem to me one of the most important that could engage the attention of Parliament. Butter is an article of large consumption in England, as you can see by the fact that 340,000,000 pounds are imported by Great Britain per annum, of which only 10,000,000 pounds come from Canada. All the conditions are favourable for the expansion of our trade in that respect with the mother country. There is no doubt that in Great Britain there is a strong sentiment in favour of giving Canada, as the most important colony, every preference; and if our butter is equally as good, I am sure it will obtain the preference in that market.

Mr. SPROULE. I would be inclined to allow this motion to pass without saying anything, were it not for the remarks of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) who, I regret to say, has exhibited to-day the same disposition which he invariably displayed, inside the House or outside, when any question is brought up by any member of the Conservative party in the interests of the agricultural community of this country. That hon. gentleman seems absolutely incapable of viewing anything except through his own political spectacles, and through those spectacles he can by no possibility see good in anything his opponents may do or propose to do, or anything wrong in whatever his own friends may propose or perform. Everything done by his friends is right and proper, and they alone can do anything good.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Hear, hear.

Mr. CRAIG.

Mr. SPROULE. I commend his faith and allegiance to the right hon. leader of his party. They are qualities required not only to make a good politician but a very loyal member of a party. He was not so loyal some time ago, but he seems to be coming back again to his natural element and disposition. I would like to ask that hon. gentleman if his memory is so short that he forgets what has been done by the Conservative party for our farmers. He says that the Conservative party was in power eighteen years, and during all that time never did anything for the benefit of the farming community. Will the hon. gentleman tell us who it was established the Experimental Farm? Was it the Reform party? I think not. If my memory is correct, it was established by the Conservative party and Conservative Government, and on that point by none was their conduct more severely criticised than by the hon. member for North Wellington. His plea then was that the agricultural farm was established for the purpose of making political capital with the farmers rather than of doing them any good. Will the hon. gentleman tell us who it was that started the dairy branch and appointed a dairy commissioner whose duty it was to devise ways and means by which our farmers could make more money out of their products than they had been doing previously? Who was it sent that commissioner to England and Germany and other countries to study the wants of these markets and find out how best we could supply them? It was the Conservative Government, but the hon. member for North Wellington seems to have forgotten that. He has a very short memory with regard to some things and a very long memory with regard to others. Who was it that first voted money for the introduction of the Canadian butter trade in England if it was not the Conservative party? Why, Mr. Speaker, only a few years ago the Conservative Government brought down a vote of $20,000 for the purpose of introducing the butter trade into the old country, by indemnifying those who would supply that article regularly at stated periods during the season for shipment to England, so that the English consumer might be practically convinced that we do make an article here which is suited to his requirements and of which we can furnish an unlimited supply. Who did that? It was not the Reform party but the Conservative party. And when that very thing was being done, the hon. member for North Wellington condemned it most strongly as money wasted.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman is getting excited. What is the mistake?

Mr. McMULLEN. That I opposed the proposition I did nothing of the kind.

Mr. SPROULE. I could not hear what the hon. gentleman said. Will he be good enough to repeat it? The hon. gentleman will not repeat it, and evidently does not want what he said to be heard. I have seen the hon. gentleman from time to time, when excited, making statements that are not justified by the facts. I gave an instance last night of a statement he made which had no foundation whatever but which is clearly contradicted by the records. I am justified therefore in saying that he very often does not confine himself strictly to the facts, and I cannot presume any reason except a desire to make political capital for his friends at the expense of his opponents and at the sacrifice of the truth. I repeat that the introduction of Canadian butter into the English market was accomplished by the Conservative party. That party voted $20,000 for that purpose, and spent that money for that purpose, and it is because of the work done by them, that our butter stands to-day higher in the English market than it ever did before. We were the party which voted the first expenditure to establish that trade, and to us is due the credit for the success which has attended its establishment. Who was it that first provided cold storage? The hon. gentleman says that it was his friends who introduced it. But no one can successfully deny that the plan was arranged for and matured before the late Government left office, and the best compliment that can be paid to the present Government is that they carried out the arrangement which was made by the late Government just before leaving office. The hon. Minister of Agriculture, to whom I give credit for doing his best in the interests of the farmers, will admit that in this cold storage business, he simply carried out the programme outlined by his predecessors. But because that policy has resulted in great success, the hon. member for North Wellington wants to give the whole credit of it to his own friends. Who was it that first proposed the establishment of Canadian agencies in England, if not the Conservative party and Government. That policy was outlined by the Conservatives, and had the late Government remained in power much longer, the then Minister of Agriculture intended to establish these agencies in England for the purpose of advertising our goods and putting them before the English consumers in a healthy condition. Our intention was to have our goods brought over in good condition by means of the cold storage system, and then have our agencies established over there so that Canadian products would not be misrepresented or sold under some other name. Yet although these things were all done by the Conservative Government and party, the hon. gentleman has the assurance to state that they did nothing. He surely ought to have a sufficient sense of justice to give credit to his predecessors for the establishment of a trade which has been so successful. We believe that there is room for continued development of that trade to a very considerable extent, and anything which the Minister of Agriculture can propose in that view we would be inclined to support in every possible way. Whether the means proposed by this resolution is the best or not, I am not prepared to say. There are some things about it I like and some I do not, but the farmers of Canada certainly should give credit to the hon. gentleman who has introduced this resolution for endeavouring to obtain something which will stimulate and develop trade in one of the most important lines of agricultural products. We have only a small portion of that trade yet and ought to assist its development in every possible way. While England imports 300,000,000 pounds of butter we do not send her one-thirtieth of that. We send her very much less than 10,000,000 pounds, and Germany sends her 137,000,000 pounds. There is nothing to prevent Canada supplying just as much as Germany. Our butter is every bit as good, and when the English people are educated to appreciate its quality, they will give us the preference, and we all know that there is a very strong sentiment in the mother country to give Canada every favour possible and every preference over Germany. Therefore if there is any way in which we can stimulate that trade, we ought to do so. I can only say that the aim of the Conservative party was to assist the farmers of this country in every way that lay in their power. Everything they did in relation to agriculture is an evidence of that. And what they did resulted in great good. But it was only a commencement of a work which would require years to bring to perfection. What they did has been of great advantage to the country already and will prove of even greater value in the future. So far as the present Government carries out the objects of their predecessors, I shall be glad to support them, and I am confident that, in saying this, I speak the sentiments of other hon. members on this side. At any rate, we shall not be like the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), but will give the Government credit for wisely directed efforts, instead of condemning them and saying that they did nothing.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I agree with a good deal that has been said on this question, but I cannot agree with the conclusion of the motion. I do not think that it is required that this Government should give a bonus for the exportation of butter. It is admitted and it is a fact, that Canada is especially adapted for the production of butter. It is also admitted that our butter trade with England is increasing by leaps and bounds, and that the dealers in England are loud in their praises of Canadian butter. In my opinion, the Government have taken wise steps to encourage the extension of this trade, by improving the facilities of transportation. The cold storage system, in my opinion, has been of enormous advantage to the farmers of this country, by helping forward this trade. But in providing a system of shipment by means of which this butter can be delivered in the best possible condition, I think that the Government has done what it was called upon to do, and does not need to go very much further. It might be a wise step for the Government to employ some person in England to look after the butter sent to that market, and give the trade generally a little more attention than has been given to it in the past, but so far as commerce is concerned, I think the Government had better let business men manage their own affairs. Having the natural advantage that we have, and our butter having the reputation it has in England, the trade becomes a profitable one and can take care of itself without any artificial stimulus being given by this House to its extension. As the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) has stated—a statement which has not been contradicted—only one country, the Australian colonies, ever adopted this system of bonusing the export of butter, and, after a few years of trial, they found that it was not a success, and have discontinued the system. As we have got along so well hitherto, as our butter trade is not languishing, but is going ahead rapidly, it seems to me that nothing further is required. If the Government is going into the bonusing business, there are a hundred industries in Canada that would be as much entitled to this assistance as the butter-making industry. We have in this country great facilities for the raising of cattle, of which an enormous number are exported to the old country. A bonus might be given with a view to having these cattle killed on this side, the meat canned here and exported in that form to the old country. This industry would give employment to an enormous number of men, and be of great benefit to the people generally. Then, there is the canning industry, which is of great importance to the people of Canada. You might as well ask that a bonus be given for the promotion and extension of that business. And so I might go through the list, naming a hundred different lines of manufacture which the Government would be as well entitled to bonus as the butter-making industry. Business men can be trusted to send their products to the best market. Therefore, I do not think that this motion should be adopted. But, as there would be no harm in looking further into the matter, and as, in that case, it would be well that further opportunity for discussion should be afforded, I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. HENDERSON. I confess that I have been somewhat surprised at what hon. gentleman on the other side have said with respect to the resolution moved by my hon. friend from South Grenville (Mr. Reid). While I was surprised by the statement made by the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), I have been much more surprised by the statements made by the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) and the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), gentlemen who represent rich agricultural districts in my own province, districts that are largely interested in this butter trade, and that would be much benefited by any measure that would promote the exportation of our butter to Great Britain. The hon. member for North Wellington has endeavoured to answer the arguments from this side by stating that, though in power for eighteen years, the late Government took no steps in this direction. The hon. member's sight seems to have been somewhat affected by his long sitting in the dark, cold shades of Opposition, so much so that he is unable to see where anything can be done to benefit the farmers whom he represents in this House. He told us that the late Government took no steps toward the establishment of a system of cold storage. His memory must have failed him for a moment, for I am sure that, on reflection, he will recollect that, as has been so well pointed out by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), the very system of cold storage adopted by this Government received its inception at the hands of the former Government, being, in this respect, like the greater part of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, including the National Policy, which has been so largely adopted by these hon. gentlemen. We were also told, in answer to the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), that no steps were taken by the former Government toward disposing of this article through depots established in Great Britain. Now, I remember quite well, that that was part of the policy of the hon. member for Haldimand when he was Minister of Agriculture. We have been told that other industries have been carried on without any stimulus from the Government—the cheese and cattle industries being especially mentioned.

Butter, possibly, of all the articles produced upon the farm, is one of the most sensitive, one of the most difficult to send to a foreign market without destroying its quality; consequently, there is greater need for assistance to those who undertake to export that article. It is very strange indeed that hon. members opposite, who seem to be a unit at this time in opposing a measure which is well calculated to benefit the agriculturists of the country, who have a policy on that question, even if they have no policy on any other question, seem to have taken up a position contrary to the interests of the farmers in this particular direction. They have been stimulating the iron industry by granting a bonus, they have been stimulating the cotton industry by placing upon the Statute-book a very heavy tariff in favour of the cotton manufacturer, and also giving a large protection to the woollen manufacturer, and to many other industries. Therefore, it seems strange to me that out of the large expenditure which the Government have at their disposal, they are not disposed to grant the little assistance that is asked for to stimulate the export of butter from Canada. To my mind, one of the great advantages that will be derived from giving effect to the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid) will be, in the first place, that it will stimulate the production of butter in this country. Now, that means a great deal. It not only means that a larger quantity of butter will be produced, but that the farmers' stock will be improved, and its quantity will be increased. Not only the quantity of his stock and the quality of his stock will be improved and increased, but the farm itself will be improved as a consequence of the larger number and better stock the farmer will keep upon his farm. The export trade will be encouraged, and that will be the means of bringing a greater revenue back to the farmer. His market will be enlarged and his revenue increased by stimulating this industry in the way proposed. But there is another benefit which, I think, will follow, and that is that the home market will be relieved. Now, those of us living in the smaller towns and villages, know something of the immense quantities of butter that are brought into the country stores and sold at a price too low to be profitable for the farmer, and bought by the merchant at a price too high to enable him to make any profit out of it. So I say that if we can by any means stimulate the export trade of butter to any other country, and thus relieve the home market of a large amount of butter that is thrown upon it at the present time, we would be doing a great deal not only to furnish a more profitable market for a great number of our farmers, but to relieve from loss many who are now handling butter in an imperfect way, in a way which neither brings returns to the producer nor to the man who handles it. I shall have much pleasure in supporting this resolution. I hope the Government will allow it to pass, and that an effort will be made along the lines pointed out by this resolution. I trust also that in this matter dairy butter will be included with creamery butter in receiving assistance from the Government.

Mr. FROST. Our friends on the opposite side appear to have taken a very sudden interest in the farming community, and particularly in the dairy industry in this country, and that at a time when the farming industries are more prosperous than they have been for many years previous under a Conservative Administration. In looking over the production of cheese and butter, we find to-day, as my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. Campbell) has stated, that the cheese industry has gone forward by leaps and bounds. I would like to ask hon. gentlemen opposite what the condition of the butter industry was when they lost the reins of power, after the efforts which they claimed to have put forth in the way of cold storage, the appointment of a dairy commissioner, the establishment of experimental farms, and other things which they pretend to say were in the interest of the farmers. Now, it can easily be seen that if the butter industry is to be bonused at the rate of a cent a pound, there will be no end to the demands which will be made for like assistance to other products of the farm which we shall be asked to bonus in the same manner. Take the cold storage arrangement, take the transportation facilities which this Government have been establishing during the past year, these will do more for the butter industry, towards increasing the price of butter in England and putting that trade on a permanent basis than all the bonusing which this Government could possibly undertake for all time to come. This resolution asks us to place a bonus of 1 cent a pound upon butter exports for the purpose of encouraging that industry. This looks to me like a piece of folly, and therefore, so far as I am personally concerned, I cannot see my way clear to support it. I believe that the means which this Government are taking to increase our dairy products have produced excellent results throughout this country, and have already done a great deal to increase the prosperity of the farmer. If prices have been rising steadily for butter and for cheese, and for all products of the farms, I think these results must be attributed to the excellent policy which this Government has carried out in the way of increasing the transportation facilities and establishing a market in England, so that we have to-day one of the greatest markets there for our butter. Our butter is competing with Danish butter, with Australian butter, and with all butter coming from any other country into Great Britain. If we are to increase our export of butter we must increase it by increasing the number of cattle, we must increase it by augmenting our population, by enlarging our farming operations, and also by a decrease in the export of cheese, which to-day has become one of the most beneficial industries that we have in the Dominion of Canada. You cannot produce more butter than is being produced to-day, even if you bonus it to the extent of a cent a pound, for the simple reason that it can only be done by having more people, by raising more cattle, by having more farmers than we have now, and if we are really producing all that can be produced with our present population, in what way can you increase the butter industry by a bonus? I say that already we are doing as large a trade in dairy products as any other country in the world according to population. Therefore, taking these things into consideration, there can be no possible utility in placing a bonus of 1 cent a pound upon butter. Now, the hon. gentleman says here that such butter should be subjected to a rigid Government inspection. The hon. gentleman must know that there is a rigid inspection at the present time of butter and cheese at all our ports. The Government are doing everything in their power to increase and to multiply this trade. The fact that cold storage depots have been established throughout the country, that bonuses have been granted for cold storage at all our creameries and all our cheese factories, are evidences that this Government are dealing with this matter in a very practicable way, that they are pushing it ahead, and that the farmers are to-day realizing a better price than they have done for many years before. Under these circumstances, to protect an industry of this kind, to protect the butter industry in the country, looks to me like folly, and therefore I do not feel inclined to support the motion of the hon. member for Grenville. After listening to the speeches on the other side, especially the speech of the ex-Minister of Agriculture, and knowing what he did during the term he occupied that position, I am satisfied he does not believe in this system, and therefore, for my part, I am opposed to this resolution, and when it comes up, I shall vote against it.

Mr. TAYLOR. I heartily approve of the motion made by the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid). I have met with several surprises during the course of this debate. The first was when the Minister of Agriculture stated that the Government could not see their way clear to accept the motion, and therefore they would vote it down; although the hon. gentleman did not say so, he put up an hon. friend who moved the adjournment of the debate, which means the shelving of the resolution for this year. But I advise the hon. member for Grenville to vote on the question of the adjournment of the debate, to test the feeling of the House, because such amendment means the killing of the resolution. I was surprised at the action of the hon. member for Leeds and Grenville, a constituency which adjoins that which I have the honour to represent, and also with the position taken by my hon. friend representing a portion of the united counties of Leeds and Grenville, one of the largest agricultural counties in the province and one of the most important dairying counties. I think this Government, after having come in on the promises pledged up to the hilt to do everything for the farmers by giving them free agricultural implements and removing the duty on everything the farmers require, should have jumped at this opportunity to render some assistance to the farmers; because it is well known, and the farmers know it, that hon. gentlemen opposite may not remove the duties on any article to the consumer, and have absolutely reduced the duty on one of the articles they produced, namely, corn. They have taken the duty off corn in order to injure our farmers; and the Government should have been willing to give a bonus to the producers of butter to compensate them for the increased duty on tobacco, which our farmers use largely. The action of the Government in regard to the tobacco duties is about the only thing they have done in the way of changing the tariff. The hon. member for Leeds stated that the farmers are prosperous.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. What about binding twine and barbed wire?

Mr. TAYLOR. The late Government practically reduced the duty on binding twine and barbed wire.

Mr. FROST. No.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. member for North Leeds says the farmers are more prosperous now, under the régime of the present Government of which he is a blind follower and supporter, than they were formerly. I ask the hon. gentleman why they are more prosperous. What has the Government done for them?

Mr. FROST. They have adopted a better policy; they favour transportation and cold storage, and they have generally a better policy for the farmers.

Mr. TAYLOR. What has the Government done in the way of transportation? Have they reduced the rates for the farmers?

Mr. FROST. Certainly.

Mr. TAYLOR. Not in any particular. Have they reduced the rates on the Government railways; have they established a fast line of steamers? They simply took up the policy of the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) when he was Minister of Agriculture; they found the whole scheme of cold storage prepared and in a pigeon-hole, and they adopted it because they were of the opinion that it was a better policy than they could submit. The Minister of Agriculture saw it was the right policy, and he adopted it in its entirety. What has this Government done, I ask, to benefit the farmers? Have they reduced the tariff upon agricultural implements, as they promised to do? Do they not tax everything used, both necessities and luxuries? They have adopted our policy which brought prosperity to our farmers, that is the National Policy; and that was the policy which, when dull times struck almost every other country in the world, enabled Canadian farmers to maintain their position, because we were able to manufacture for ourselves. I have been making a comparison of the imports for home consumption during the last full year under the present Government with the imports during a similar period under the late Government, and I have found that the agricultural implements imported are about of the same value as formerly. We would have brought them in from abroad if the duty had been lower. Manufacturers of agricultural implements also obtained reduced duties on the raw products.

Mr. DAVIN. And they got the drawback.

Mr. TAYLOR. They got the drawback, of course. Were the farmers able to purchase agricultural implements cheaper last year than previously?

Mr. FROST. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR. I know the prices paid by the farmers, but I do not know what prices the hon. gentleman gives his agents; but the prices for agricultural implements paid for by the farmers were the same this year, last year and the year preceding.

Mr. FROST. Have you bought any?

Mr. TAYLOR. I made inquiries from the farmers, and I found no reduction. I hope the hon. mover of this motion will divide the House on the motion to adjourn, because it is a simple trick to shelve the question.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, I think it is a trick.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. TAYLOR. If it is out of order to say it is a trick, perhaps I may say it is a political trick.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. It is an expression which should not be used in Parliament.

Mr. TAYLOR. If you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, think it is an expression which should not be used, I cheerfully withdraw it. I strongly urge on my hon. friend to divide the House on the motion to adjourn the debate, because it will prove to the farmers who are in favour of giving them some relief from the excessive duties which hon. gentlemen have imposed on them, in contradiction to the promises and pledges made when they appealed to the country for support.

Mr. McMILLAN. I fail to see what the duty on agricultural implements has to do with the bounty proposed to be given to the butter-makers. I congratulate the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid) in bringing the question before the House; I believe he has done it in a proper spirit and has not done it with any improper feeling. The cheese industry has been referred to, in connection with the great improvements which have been made. The province of Ontario was first to properly manufacture cheese in Canada, and it established a standard in the English market. One of the means adopted by the Ontario Government was the employment of experts who went from factory to factory giving lessons in cheese-making, and from that day the cheese industry has gone ahead by leaps and bounds.

The Ontario Government sent Professor Arnold all over the province to instruct the farmers in this business, and the result was that within 12 months Canadian cheese took a higher standard than American cheese in the English market. We have three dairy schools in the province of Ontario in which our young men and our young women, our farmers' wives and farmers' daughters, and the farmers themselves if they wish, can get the best information possible with respect to the making of butter. They are not only shown how butter should be made, but they have got to roll up their sleeves and practice the whole process from the separating of the cream to the packing of the butter for the market, so that they are thoroughly instructed. Money spent in that direction is money well spent. The action of the Dominion Government in sending out dairy instructors is also in the right direction, but the late Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague) had better have held his tongue when he spoke about the increased credit of our butter on the English market on account of the action taken by him two years ago. What are the facts with respect to that? That butter was purchased at 21 cents per pound, and let me ask whether the farmers who produced the butter or the dairies of the country reaped the benefit? No, Sir, they did not; it all went to the butter dealers. Not only that, but the inspection of the butter was so loosely carried on, that although it was in January the experiment was made, butter manufactured in the month of June and the month of July previously was sent over to England as fresh butter, and it only realized 14.38 cents when the market price in England for good butter at the time was 17, 18 and 19 cents. That experiment injured the character of our Canadian butter on the English market instead of benefiting it. To-day Canadian butter stands high on the English market. Canadian farmers are improving the quality of their butter rapidly, and nothing ever did more good in that direction than the system of cold storage inaugurated by the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher). To-day many of our farmers are obtaining instruction from the Department of Agriculture as to the method of erecting cold storage in connection with their dairies at home. All these things are in the right direction. If anything further is necessary to be done, I believe it will be essential that the Min-

Minister of Agriculture should send an agent to the old country to see that our Canadian products are put upon the English market at as early a date as possible, and that they are sold as Canadian. Denmark never gave a bounty upon the butter exported from that country, but Denmark did send agents to Britain to see that all Danish products were sold under the Danish brand, and not palmed off as belonging to another country. I believe that our Minister (Mr. Fisher) should send one or two expert commissioners to England as did the authorities of Denmark, and that could be done at a comparatively small cost. Upon last year's export of butter from Canada it would take $104,000 to pay one cent per pound, and if that export increases during the next three years as rapidly as it has increased, it would then take three or four hundred thousand dollars to pay this bonus. I hold that one-tenth of that money spent in sending expert commissioners to Britain, will be of greater benefit to the farmers than giving it as a bonus.

Perhaps the ex-Minister of Finance will tell me again that I am a protectionist. Well, I say that we farmers want protection, but the protection we want is that the Government shall ensure that our products shall be placed upon the British market as Canadian products and in good condition, and we want no protection in the shape of any bonus. I am opposed to bonuses almost of every kind except under very special circumstances, and the farmers of Canada to-day as a whole do not ask for bonuses; but I do ask that the Government shall take measures so that our products shall be sold as Canadian, and shall reach the English market in first-class condition. If the Government do this, I, as a farmer, have no fear of the result.

Mr. BRODER. If we are to judge from the discussion to-day, this question seems to have grown in importance in the estimation of the House since last session. My position is this: I hold that it is necessary to send our butter to the English market, fresh and continuously. The farmer is naturally a holder of his product just as a speculator is, and unless you can induce him to ship his butter fresh and continuously, Canadian butter will never take the first rank in England. I say that this Government has to do something to induce the farmer to sell his butter to the shipper while it is fresh, so that it may reach the point of consumption in good condition through the medium of the cold storage system. The attitude taken by hon. gentlemen opposite on this question is strange to me. They seem to suppose that anything you put into cold storage will be kept in good condition. Now, it is my experience, and I think it is the experience generally, that freezing anything will not make it good; the article must be fresh and then with the assistance of these facilities it can be made to reach the market in proper condition. A great many hon. gentlemen have referred to the fact that our Canadian cheese has taken the most prominent place in the markets of Great Britain. That is very true, but any person looking into the matter as it stands to-day must admit, that the cheese industry of this country started out under very much more favourable auspices in finding a place in the English market, than our butter can possibly do now. The conditions are very different. We find that all the butter producing countries are shipping to the English market at the present time $65,000,000 worth a year, and generally speaking that is butter of very good quality; so good that under present conditions it is impossible for Canadian butter, by reason of its quality alone, to displace that importation. Therefore you must do something to displace the butter of other countries in the English market in order to give Canadian butter a foothold. The time was, not many years ago, when you could send butter to London or to Liverpool or to Bristol, or to those large centres, under very different conditions from those which now exist. You could send butter which was very much more heavily salted and a good deal coarser in its texture to the Liverpool market, than you could to the London market, and we had to pay particular attention to the fact that in shipping to London it was necessary to send the freshest butter we had in Canada. The lines were so closely drawn that there were certain divisions in the city of London to which you could send comparatively coarser butter and find a market for it, but you could not cross that line and sell butter unless you had the very finest article. The English people are becoming more fastidious every day, and it is necessary to cater to their tastes if we are going to take first place in the market.

There is another important matter which has been overlooked in the discussion so far, and that is, that if you look closely into the cheese question you will find that we supply to a very great extent a very large percentage of all the cheese that is shipped to the English market to-day, and the question which now faces the cheese industry is, whether or not we have reached the paying limit of our cheese export to the English people. What I mean is this: That if we increase our product of cheese in Canada, the question is whether or not we will have to take a less price for it in order to dispose of it on the English market. It is important that we should keep these two industries more equally balanced in this country, in order to secure for the farmer a paying price in future in the English market. We ship now something like 10,000,000 pounds of butter to the English market. A cent a pound on that is $100,000. Any person with any knowledge of the English market, or with any experience of the butter or cheese trade, particularly the butter trade, knows that the question of quality has a great deal to do with the price—that you can perhaps get from 3 to 4 cents a pound more for a fine quality of butter than you can for a comparatively inferior quality. Therefore, if we can induce our people to ship a good quality of butter, fresh and in good condition, to the English market, and have it understood that it has to undergo a close Government inspection—if we can do all that at a cost of 1 cent a pound, and the butter realizes from 2 to 3 cents a pound more in the English market, then that is a paying speculation, and the cent a pound is a small consideration. This country has lost, not millions of dollars, but hundreds of millions of dollars, because the quality of the butter sent to the English market was not what it ought to be. We have not only lost money, but we have lost our foothold in that market, and it will be a difficult thing to displace the people who have that market to-day. The people of this country must wake up to the fact that, in order to maintain a hold on the English market, they must not only ship an article of finest quality, but they must ship continuously. A retail merchant in England, who goes to the large centres and buys his weekly supply, may find a good quality of Canadian butter this week. He puts it on his counter, and obtains customers for it. He goes back next week, and if he cannot find any Canadian butter up to the standard of what he got the week before, and has to go elsewhere to find what suits the tastes of his customers, the Canadian butter loses the trade. We have a law that our butter and cheese must be branded; but that law will be a dead letter and will have no effect, unless you have concurrent legislation in England requiring the retail dealer to place it as such on his counter. Unless that is done, the object of the law is lost, because the retail merchant in England, who finds that a certain article meets the tastes of his customers, will call the article on his counter by that name, and sell it to his customers as such. The Government have only gone part of the way in this matter. They should, if possible, bring about concurrent legislation in England to secure the recognition of our product as Canadian on the retailer's counter, as well as in the wholesaler's warehouse. Some people suggest that we should go to England and sell our own products on the market. If there is anything we ought to avoid doing, it is interfering with the business interests of that country in that respect; because the moment you go there as a retailer, every retailer in the country will do what he can to prevent you selling, and he will soon drive you out of the market altogether. What we want to do is to meet the conditions of the market which we find there. When this question is before the House, it ought to be dealt with, not in a party spirit, but in the spirit that seeks to promote this trade, and to do what is best for the farmers of the country; and, when you do what is best for the farmers, you do what is in the interest of the country at large. The Minister of Agriculture raised the objection that it was not the farmer who benefited by the bonus given in the province of Quebec. I say it is possible, however, for the Government to so arrange the machinery for the payment of the bonus that it will reach the proper individual. My hon. friend from Huron said that it was the factory that would get the bonus; but he must not forget that the patrons of the factory get the proceeds of the sales, less the price of manufacturing, and in that way the benefit must ultimately reach the pocket of the farmer who sends his milk to the factory. This is worthy of a trial, at any rate, at the hands of this House, and especially at the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite, who professed such affection for the farmer during the last eighteen years. They are growing cold in their love for that gentleman now: he is no longer a factor in their political calculations; while the hard-hearted iron man gets a bonus on his iron he is not in favour of this bonus to the farmer. The hon. member from Huron is only in favour of a bonus under special circumstances, but those special circumstances are always those his friends wish voted in this House. Hon. gentlemen opposite ought to deal with this question on broad principles, as representing a large portion of the community, with the view of enhancing the value of the products of this country, and thus promoting the interests of the country generally.

Mr. BAIN. I cannot help thinking that the gentleman who framed this resolution must have felt the difficulties of his situation. It was patent that, when the old Government attempted to encourage the farmers by offering to purchase their butter and ship it to England, their project was a conspicuous failure. This document has a little clause appended to the end of it that indicates that the gentleman who framed it had thought the matter out very carefully, because, when hon. gentlemen opposite talk about the interest of the farmer of Canada, that little clause limits the bonus to those purely dairy districts which produce butter, and nothing else. Now, I do not want our hon. friends opposite to run away with the idea that to tax all the rest of the farmers of Canada for the benefit of those limited areas that make butter is a benefit to the farmers at large. I am with any system that will give Canadian butter a better standing on the English market; but, speaking for the general industry of butter and cheese-making and farming in Ontario, I have to say, that if this resolution were adopted and put into force, it would apply to a very limited section of that province. I do not want any one to run away with the idea that this resolution includes, in any broad sense, the term "farmer." What are the facts in connection with the butter industry, which we have been trying to develop? So far as western Ontario goes, the facts are simply these, that our cheese industry succeeded and developed, to a large extent, because we put on the English market an article of uniformly good quality that suited the taste of the English consumer, and he bought that article. We want to do the same thing with our butter. But the trouble with the cheese industry was the tendency of the farmers to prolong the cheese-making season at both ends of the year, until a part of the time was devoted to producing cheese that did not grade No. 1. Here is where the development of the creamery industry in combination with the cheese factory business was likely to be a benefit to the people of Ontario, and here is just where the resolution proposed by my hon. friend, while it seems to do everything, really does nothing because it provides that it shall be a continuous supply. Now, to my mind what we want to develop, especially in a cheese district, is a continuation of the winter manufacture of butter in connection with the making of cheese; and I wish to point to this one fact, that one or two men in western Ontario to-day have, by their private energy, successfully accomplished that without any aid or support from this Government or any bonus from anybody else. They simply went on to the English market, and when their cheese season should stop, they stopped, and they went at the manufacture of butter and supplied a grade of butter that suited the particular locality in England to which they wanted to ship. It is for the development of our resources in those directions that attention should be devoted, and not to building up limits of sections of our people at the expense of the others, while we are calling it aid to the farmers at large. I think that every Minister of Agriculture, if he spoke his sentiments, that has tried to deal with this question, would admit at once that the difficulties were greater to overcome than the results were likely to justify, and while I am willing to give credit to my hon. friend for his zealous interests in the dairy districts where the object is butter making pure and simple, I do not want this House to run away with the idea that his resolution is one which will benefit the farmers of Canada at large. It is perfectly true that the dairy industry, in places where circumstances make it the exclusive business, is entitled to great consideration on the part of this Government, just as much as the coal, iron or any other industry that my hon. friend sneeringly remarked was being assisted by the Government of the day. That is not the way we should meet these questions. I think we can afford to deal with all these interests on their merits, without indulging in sneers as to what may or may not have been done, or imputing motives as the reasons that may have led to the doing of certain things. But I do say that to ask this House to endorse this proposition on the idea that it is going to build up the farming industry of Canada, is to ask something that the position will not justify; and, therefore, while my hon. friend, who probably represents a purely dairy district, may have the right to look at the question from that standpoint, I think we ought to ask ourselves whether there is not a broader view to take of this question, and whether the efforts that the Government are making now—began by their predecessor, I say frankly and fairly—are not all we have the right to expect. Above all others, butter is an article that requires to be handled in the best possible condition and put on the market in the best possible condition, but the facilities we are offering now are, to my mind, all that this Government should be asked to provide at present, in order to secure for the butter of Canada the most favourable consideration that can be got for it in the English market. I agree with the hon. gentleman who last spoke, that just in proportion as you put a high grade article on that market in larger quantities, you will have to submit in time to the reduced prices. We may just as well realize that fact first as last, but it is equally true that it is utterly futile to put butter or fruit or cheese or any other article of Canadian produce on the English market, which is not a first-class article and is not in first-class condition. If I could impress on our people one thing above every other, it would be to try to produce a first-class article, and as regards butter, the Government are doing what they can to get that article on to the English market in first-class condition so that it may compete successfully and secure for itself an excellent place. I think that is as far as we can fairly ask the Government now to go.

Mr. POPE. This is a subject of great importance and one that should not be dealt with lightly, and I am rather sorry that the adjournment of the debate was moved. We can well afford to spend some considerable time in discussing one of the greatest sources of revenue to the greatest number of the people of Canada. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Bain) was frank enough—and I was glad to hear him say so—to acknowledge that the foundation of the advancement and progress which has been made in the dairy industry was laid by the Government that preceded the present one. The hon. gentleman said he was afraid that the encouragement by bonus of the manufacture and export of butter would limit itself to small districts. I do not think that any one who looks at the figures of the exports of cheese from this country and the figures of consumption in England will fail to realize that we are exporting to-day nearly all the cheese it is possible for us to export to that country, and that the future increases of the dairy business of Canada must be in the direction of butter-making, so that any assistance given by this House to encourage the development of the butter-making industry is bound to prove an assistance to the cheese industry, furnishing, as it will, another avenue for the use of milk and thus relieve the congestion of the market which is bound to take place if we do not open other channels for the use of the increasing quantities of milk produced in Canada. It is evident that we have not yet reached the limit of increase in the production of milk, and the Minister of Agriculture is called upon to face the situation. It is acknowledged by hon. gentlemen opposite who have not spoken from political feeling, who have been earnest and sincere in dealing with the question, that the quality of the article we produce is a very important factor in the increase of trade. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat spoke of two instances in western Ontario that came under his notice, in which the owners of factories succeeded in establishing a remunerative trade in the export of butter to England. I admit that there are odd instances of that kind, but while two or three instances of that character may be quoted, any hon. gentleman in this House who is acquainted with any dairy section of Canada can give dozens of instances to the contrary. What you require in order to carry the dairy industry to a successful issue is to have a quantity of milk guaranteed for winter purposes, and to do that you require to have a large number of cows, controlled by a few farmers who will enter into the full spirit of the business. I know for myself that while we should manufacture butter at $3\frac{1}{2}$ to 4 cents at the outside per pound for the benefit of our patrons who bring the milk. I know that for a number of years in my district the manufacture of butter at my factory costs 5 and 6 cents, and then the quantity of milk was so small it ran up to 7 cents in order to establish a winter dairy in the section in which I live. You cannot get men to throw away two or three cents a pound on their butter, and you cannot establish winter dairies if the patron has to pay six or even five cents a pound for manufacturing the butter. That does not leave him a sufficient margin. In sections where the cattle are not gathered together in large stables the cost of manufacturing is too high, and I know of no other way than this by which the industry can be put on a proper footing in the more sparsely settled districts or among the smaller farmers where the manufacture of cheese has not been carried on for years and where large herds of cattle do not exist. The poorer farmers or those living in the newer districts though less fortunate than some others are as much entitled to the consideration of this Government as are more fortunate men. So

I feel that I am within my right and that I am performing my duty when I lay stress upon this point and ask the House and the Government to take into serious consideration the motion of my hon. friend from Grenville. In these districts which are less advanced in dairying, some sort of encouragement should be given to the people in starting. We are making now all the cheese we can export, and with an increasing quantity of milk year after year we must find some means of disposing of it in some part of the world: and, under existing conditions, I know of no better way than that proposed by my hon. friend. There are objectionable features in connection of the bonusing of any kind of business. But my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. McMillan) acknowledged that there were certain circumstances under which such a course would be advisable, and I think we find those special conditions in this case. It might not apply to the hon. gentleman's district or even to the particular section in which I am living. But I know that there are parts of my constituency, and of every dairying constituency, where, if the increase of milk is to continue to the advantage of the farmer, you must encourage winter dairying: and I know of no better way to do it than through the granting of this bonus by the Government.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

ONTARIO AND RAINY RIVER RAILWAY.

Mr. HENDERSON (for Mr. Tisdale) moved that the House resolve itself into committee on Bill (No. 32) respecting the Ontario and Rainy River Railway Company.

Mr. MACLEAN. In connection with this Bill, I desire to move what I consider a very important amendment. This railway which it is proposed shall run from Port Arthur to Winnipeg is, to my mind, the most important railway under the consideration of the Canadian people to-day. It is intended that this road shall open up that portion of new Ontario which is known as the Rainy River district, which appears to be one of the richest mineral sections in the country. This is a section of country that it will pay to open up for the development of its mining resources, it is a section of country that will well pay to open up for the development of its agricultural resources. But above all it is important because it is a country which offers a new line of railway communication between the province of Ontario and the east and the province of Manitoba and the great west. So important does this railway appear in the eyes of the public that it has been very largely subsidized by various legislatures in this country. At the present moment it has received for 205 miles a bonus from the province of Ontario of $615,000. The first portion of the Port Arthur and Duluth Railway, which is to be used in connection with the Ontario and Rainy River Railway, has received a bonus from the province of Ontario of $28,000. And, for the first eighty miles of this railway, this House has already voted a bonus of $512,000. The road, therefore, has to-day bonuses to the total amount of $1,155,000. It is to be further bonused by the province of Ontario, I have no doubt it will receive a much larger bonus from this Dominion, and we know that it is to receive a bonus from the government of the province of Manitoba. The mere fact that this railway is to receive all these bonuses from the Dominion and from the two provincial legislatures goes to show the importance with which it is regarded. It is regarded not only as important because of the agricultural and mineral resources of the country it will open up, but because of its superlative importance in the fact that it is a connecting link between the east and the west and will be a rival of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

The Canadian Pacific Railway, as we all know now, is charged with being a monopoly, it is charged with imposing on the people of the west and of the east undue traffic rates. The cry has been for years and years, that we must have a line that is a rival of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Ontario and Rainy River Railway, if properly handled and controlled by this Parliament, will give that rival line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, will give the merchants and manufacturers of the east a cheap means of communication to the west, and, most of all, will give the farmers of Manitoba, and the prairies, and the province of British Columbia, an opportunity to relieve themselves from that monopoly which the Canadian Pacific Railway now imposes upon them. This portion of country lying between Port Arthur and Winnipeg is really the key to the whole transportation situation. The only railroad that is there now, the Canadian Pacific Railway, is overtaxed. It is hardly able to carry the produce of the west to the east, or from one point to another, and there is need for a rival road, not only to handle the business, but to give the people relief from the charges of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Unless we take steps now, when this Bill is going through the House, unless we take steps now, when the province of Manitoba proposes further to subsidize this railway, the opportunity will be lost, and what is likely to happen is this, that this railway, which is so largely subsidized by the Dominion and by the province, will pass into the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and, instead of being a rival of the Canadian Pacific Railway, it will strengthen that road in its monopoly. Therefore, it is incumbent upon this Parliament, and it is incumbent on the Government of the day, to see that such a provision is put into this Bill as will secure the public hereafter, and that, Mr. Speaker, is the main intention of the amendment which I propose to-night. I am not here in favour of any sweeping proposition looking to the nationalization of railways, although I believe that must eventually come, and I believe that is the opinion of a great many members of this House. The Minister of Railways and Canals actually expressed himself in this House, the other day, as in favour of the ultimate nationalization of the railways in this country; but I am not proposing anything so radical as that. All I say is, that, when the Dominion and the province are giving so much money to this railway as they are giving it to-day, the giving of the money and the granting of the legislation required by the railway ought to be contingent on the public being protected in regard to the rates charged on that railway, and in regard to running rights given over that railway to other lines. Now, I especially call the attention of my hon. friends who come from Manitoba and the North-west Territories to this fact, that the only relief that can come to them in regard to railway rates, as the only relief that can come to us of the east in regard to railway rates, is through both the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Government's system being brought into the province of Manitoba and, if necessary, extended still further west. To my mind, the only solution of these transportation problems lies somewhat in that direction. We must not only have running rates, but we must make provision for the Grand Trunk and Canadian Government railways getting into the North-west. Now, that is not a difficult thing to do. The Canadian Government railway system is to-day at Montreal. By obtaining running rights over the Canada Atlantic Railway and the Ottawa and Parry Sound roads, it can easily be brought to Parry Sound, and there it can have connection with lake steamers to Port Arthur, and then the Grand Trunk Railway or Canadian Government system can be brought on into Winnipeg. Now, to-day, when we are giving this legislation, when we are giving all this money, is not this the time to make provision in this Bill that the Canadian Government railway and the Grand Trunk Railway shall have running rights over this Ontario and Rainy River road? This road is being built almost exclusively by public money. So far as I can make out, if it is bonused throughout as it has been bonused, it will be to the extent of over $9,000 a mile, and if the people have $9,000 a mile in a railroad 425 miles long, surely they ought to dictate the terms on which that railway shall be administered, and dictate the terms as to what railways shall be allowed to run over it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What is your amendment?

Mr. MACLEAN. My amendment, in substance, is, that the Grand Trunk Railway, the Canadian Government system and the Canadian Pacific Railway shall have running rights over it; that the tariff charges shall come under the supervision of the Government; that a two-cent passenger rate shall obtain on it, and that provision shall be made for a fixed rate on a specified number of items mentioned in the amendment. I may say, that this amendment, in regard to running rights and in regard to Government supervision of rates, is taken from the provisions put by the Government in their Crow's Nest Pass Bill of last year. Another reason why I object to this Bill going through to-night without some declaration from the Government, and why I urge that the Bill ought to stand over, is this: That the province of Manitoba, as I mentioned before, proposes introducing legislation for granting aid to this railway, but granting aid to this railway on specified terms. I believe it is Mr. Greenway's intention to vote a subsidy to this railway, but in the Bill granting the subsidy, he is making provisions for a specified charge on a number of articles which he names. For instance, the great grievance in the North-west to-day, so far as the Canadian Pacific Railway and its outlet to Port Arthur are concerned, touches wheat. The rate to-day for wheat from Winnipeg to Port Arthur is 17½ cents; I believe it is Mr. Greenway's intention to make an agreement with the Rainy River Railway that the rate shall be 10 cents per 100 pounds. That is a great reduction, but if that reduction is to be secured, Mr. Greenway proposes to secure it by incorporating it in the Bill. If he can incorporate it in his Bill, why can we not incorporate it in our Bill here? I urge on this House to-day that we should not allow this Rainy River Bill to go through unless we get the same terms as the province of Manitoba is getting, and we ought to hesitate before we do anything until such time as we have their Bill before us. Now, to show still further the importance of this railway, I say it is an essential part of a transcontinental system. It is no great trouble now to secure another transcontinental system in this country that will be a rival to the Canadian Pacific Railway road, if we move at the right time to make provision in all the Bills that happen to be going through this House. We know that to-day the Government of this country control a railway that runs from Halifax to Montreal, we know that we can extend that railway to Parry Sound at very small cost, to the benefit of the people of this country. We know that, if we once get to Winnipeg, as we ought to by this Rainy River Railway, it is no trouble to have a connection between Winnipeg and Lethbridge, where the Crow's Nest Pass Railway begins. And we have received, by the legislation of last year, control over the Crow's Nest Pass Railway as regards running rights over that railway for other roads. If we to-day secure ourselves so far as the Rainy River Railway is concerned, the people will have in a very few years a transcontinental system a rival of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and by that way, if by no other, we will compel that great monopoly to reduce its rates.

I am not in favour of any further aggrandizement of the Canadian Pacific Railway, except on terms the most stringent and severe. I say now that I would have no objection to this railway, the Rainy River Railway, falling into the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway, if it fell into their hands on terms that would secure the people in regard to rates and running rights; but until that end is secured, I object to any further aggrandizement of the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is at the present time too great, it is almost greater than the Parliament and people of Canada, and we should take some means to check it; we should take our stand and try to secure terms from it, or otherwise it will override everything in this Dominion.

If I may consider this proposition from an Ontario point of view, and if people ask me why is that province so greatly interested in that road, I simply reply that the manufacturers of Ontario have a deep interest in that road as regards getting their goods into the North-west at low freight rates. The farmers and fruit-growers of Ontario have a deep interest in securing lower rates to Manitoba. We have been told time and again that the people there would consume much larger quantities of Ontario fruit if they could get lower rates, and we know that to-day Chicago, St. Paul and all those cities west of the great lakes enjoy a large measure of that traffic of Manitoba and the western provinces simply because they enjoy better railway rates, and it is in the interest of the manufacturers, merchants and farmers of Ontario and Quebec that they should get lower rates to the province of Manitoba; and that it is possible to do so is proved by the fact that Mr. Greenway is stated to have made an agreement, and I believe he has done so, by which the freight rates will be cut down on wheat from 17½ cents to 10 cents. If he can get it, surely this Parliament can secure it, and now is the time to obtain it in connection with this Bill. Another change I propose in the Bill is to introduce into it the 2 cent rate per mile for passengers. This railway is 450 miles long and will receive $5,000,000 of the public money, so that it will practically be almost entirely built from public money, and this fact gives Parliament the opportunity of imposing on that road the task of transporting passengers at the rate of 2 cents per mile. Railways all over are to-day carrying people for 1 cent per mile, and are making money. The companies never had their cars filled as they are to-day, and there is some talk among the companies of continuing the present low rates because the receipts are so large. But at all events, in this particular instance, where this road has been built with public money, when we have other railways saying that they cannot afford to carry passengers at 2 cents per mile on account of the very heavy cost of constructing the roads, we have the right to say in this case at least: You shall not charge more than 2 cents per mile to passengers travelling over it. The traffic between Port Arthur and Winnipeg promises to increase. The great transcontinental passenger traffic must pass over one of those roads, and the Rainy River Company can well afford to make the experiment and give passenger transportation at 2 cents per mile. We have even been told that if we wish to bring about such a reform, it is necessary to introduce a general law so as to impose this rate not on one company only, but on all companies. That is not the way to accomplish it. We must make the experiment with one road, and afterwards all the others will come in, and this is instanced by the case of the New York Central and Hudson River Railway, one of the greatest railways in the United States. The maximum rate over the New York Central is 2 cents per mile. How was it attained? Not by any sweeping declaration on the part of the management, or by any law enacted by the state of New York; but at a certain period in the history of the New York Central the company desired to acquire a very short road, over which there was a passenger rate of 2 cents per mile, a road not exceeding fifty miles in length, and this great corporation was so anxious to get control of that piece of road that on receiving the consent of the legislature to acquire it, they agreed to a passenger rate of 2 cents per mile over their entire system. Some people will say that there is a large population in the state of New York, to which I reply that they have a larger number of competing roads, and the competition for passengers is quite as keen as it is here, and the number of passengers carried per mile does not exceed that in Canada. But the people of the state have secured this 2 cent rate, and we can secure to the people of Canada a 2 cent rate if we place such clause in all Bills coming before Parliament. And this is no imposition on the railway companies. Railway passenger transportation rates have not changed for the last twenty or thirty years. Freight rates are being constantly cut in two, and in some cases where formerly $4 was charged, only 50 cents is now charged; these rates, I repeat, are cut time and again, and we should now do something to cut down the passenger rates and give our people relief from the excessive charges made by the railway corporations in that direction. The amendment which I propose to move in committee, I desire to read, and to offer a few comments on it. The first two clauses in this amendment I have taken out of the Government Bill of last session in regard to Crow's Nest Pass Railway. If the Government saw fit to insert that amendment and make it applicable to the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, which has been almost entirely built with Government money, it is the duty of the Government and this House to insert a like amendment in the Rainy River Railway Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman, I understand, is not proposing this amendment at this stage, but is indicating the amendment that he will move in committee.

Mr. MACLEAN. I am explaining the amendment that I propose to move in committee.

Mr. SPEAKER. I presume the hon. gentleman will not at that time repeat his explanations.

Mr. MACLEAN. I will not go over my explanations again in the committee. The first clause of my amendment is as follows:—

3. That running powers over the said railway and all its branches and connections, or any portions thereof, and all lines of railway now or hereafter owned or leased by or operated on account of the company between Lake Superior and the city of Winnipeg, and the necessary use of its tracks, stations and station grounds are hereby expressly conferred on the Grand Trunk Railway, the Canadian Government Railway system, the Canadian Pacific Railway, or any other road designated by the Railway Committee of the Privy Council or the Parliament of Canada, upon such terms as such committee or the Parliament of Canada may determine, and according to the provisions of the Railway Act, and of such other general Acts relating to railways as are from time to time passed by Parliament, but nothing herein shall be held to imply that such running powers might not be so granted without the special provisions herein contained.

I have put in the words "Parliament of Canada." The next portion of the amendment is as follows:—

That so soon as the said railway or any portion of it is opened for traffic, the rates and tolls on the railway, and on any other railway or steamers used in connection therewith and now or hereafter owned or leased by or operated on account of the company, shall be first approved by the Governor in Council, or by a railway commission, if and when such commission is established by law, and shall at all times thereafter and from time to time be subject to revision and control in the manner aforesaid.

Then there is the clause in regard to the 2 cent per mile passenger rate, and I also intend to specify the maximum freight to be charged on certain articles.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Railways, representing the Government, has made several statements on different occasions in this House. I believe he says that some kind of railway reform must come, and I believe he has already told us that in his opinion at least nationalization of the railways must come. But whenever we have had the practical issue before us, the Minister has contented himself by saying that hereafter he will establish a railway commission and make some provision for protecting the public against railway monopoly. Now is the time to do it, now is the time to lock the stable door before the steed is stolen. It is the duty of the Government to make this provision to-day for the protection of the public. I see my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) over there. He had a great fit of railway reform some time ago. I hope he has it yet, and that he presses it on his fellow Ministers. I must ask the Postmaster General now to assist me in having inserted in this Bill a provision somewhat similar to that which the Government inserted in the Crow's Nest Pass Railway Bill. The people of British Columbia, the people of the North-west and the people of Ontario are all in favour of some kind of railway reform. You cannot make a sweeping reform all at once, but you can make a start by tackling each railway company as it comes for favours to this Parliament. I agree that you must have a strong railway commission in this country, and I hope a Bill will be introduced next session to establish one, but in the meantime let us check these railway monopolists. Let us make an experiment in the interests of the people and if that experiment be successful then let us extend it. I urge upon this House and upon this Government, that under no consideration should this railway Bill be allowed to pass except on terms, and these terms should not be defined until such time as we have the proposed measure of the Manitoba legislature before us. I am led to believe that the railway rates will be regulated by the Manitoba legislature, and that the public will be protected, but, Sir, I propose to protect the public in two ways, and that is the difference between my amendment and what the Manitoba Government proposed, namely: I propose to specify the rates that shall be charged on this railway, and I propose also that this railway shall be compelled to give common trackage to all railways that desire to pass over it. I hope that this amendment will meet with the approval of the Government and the House, and I trust that hon. gentlemen will express their opinions on this effort of mine in the direction of railway reform and in the direction of giving to the people of Canada some returns for the immense sums of money which year after year in the past they have been called upon to vote to these railway companies without any return. We have bonused the duplication of many railway lines in this country for the sake of competition, but the result was that the big companies gobbled them up and there was no competition and no good result. To-day, Canada has to bear the expense of maintaining thousands of miles of unnecessary railways and they have received no benefit in return for it. Let us teach the railway companies that they must give common running rights over their roads. In that respect, Sir, I believe the Grand Trunk Railway is more progressive than any other road in the country. It has given the Canadian Pacific Railway common rights from Hamilton to Toronto; it has given its Air Line over to the Wabash Railway, a great transcontinental system in the States, and the Wabash cars run over the Grand Trunk Railway to-day with the same facility as do its own cars. I believe, Sir, that the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Grand Trunk Railway and the Government railways should in the same way be given running privileges over the Rainy River road, so that the public may derive some substantial benefit from it. If you do not compel them to do it they will never do it.

Mr. CASEY. The Grand Trunk Railway and the Intercolonial Railway have to get to Port Arthur first.

Mr. MACLEAN. The Grand Trunk Railway to-day touches the Georgian Bay and Lake Huron, and they can put on a line of steamers to Port Arthur to-morrow if they wish. That being the case, the Grand Trunk Railway could have this right over the Ontario and Rainy River, and at the proper stage in the consideration of this Bill I shall make a motion embodying that principle.

Mr. CASEY. As my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean) wishes to bring on a debate on this whole question, it would, I think, be advisable that this Bill should stand over for the present in view of the absence of the mover of the Bill and the Minister of Railways, so that they may have an opportunity of combatting the arguments presented to the House.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). I agree with a great deal of what the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) has said in reference to this matter. So far as the west is concerned, I believe this to be the most important railway legislation that has come before the House since I have had the honour to be a member. It is important for the reason that it refers to a road running from Winnipeg to Port Arthur, which is the keystone of the whole railway situation in the west. At the present time the Canadian Pacific Railway runs from the city of Winnipeg to Port Arthur and connects with the great lakes, and we know that therein lies the whole trouble in regard to freight rates. We are giving a charter to another company to build a road there, and no doubt they will ask for a large subsidy of $6,400 per mile, so that the Government should do something to ensure, in the interests of the people not only of the west, but the people of the east as well—that this company shall be compelled to grant us reasonable freight rates. It has been pointed out that we have built miles of railroads as competing lines, but that we have been disappointed in our desires, and if something is not done now while this Bill is before us we will meet with the same disappointment again. I believe that Parliament should force this company to guarantee us a fair rate on the grain and other produce we export out of the country, as well as on the goods which we import. The hon. member for York (Mr. Maclean) has not mentioned the rates he should like to have inserted in this amendment, but I understand that the Greenway Government is making an arrangement for 10 cents a hundred on wheat. That is a fair price, and it can be carried for that rate, as has been shown by the reduction which the Canadian Pacific Railway made this year between Fort William and Montreal, where they now carry for less than 10 cents. We should insert in this Bill a schedule of rates for live stock and wheat which we export, as well as for the other commodities which we bring into the country. It costs a lot of money to build a railroad through that section of the country, and if we get this road built now we may not expect to get another in the near future, so that now is the time to safeguard the interests of the public. The cost of building railroads in the west is a very small matter. They can be built anywhere across the prairie for about $8,000 a mile. We should take advantage of this opportunity and keep control of this road, otherwise, when we reach the city of Winnipeg we go as it were into a funnel, and the people who control these roads, unless regulated, will have us in their grasp. We expect that this road, if it is going to be built, will be a competing road; but we would like to be assured of that. Another matter I would like to say a few words on is the last portion of section 1 of this Bill, which reads as follows:—

And if the railway is not then completed, then the powers granted to the company shall cease and be null and void as respects so much of the railway as then remains uncompleted.

I do not know what the meaning of that section is. When a railway company comes to this House and gets a charter to build a railway from one point to another, and gets a large subsidy of money to aid in the building of that road, there should be some means of forcing it to complete the railway. As I understand this section, a company may come here and get a charter to build a road from one point to another, and on the strength of that they obtain a subsidy, and when they build the road for half the distance, if they find that it does not pay them to go any further, they can stop there, and all the Government can do is to cancel their charter for the balance of the road. As an illustration of that, I may mention that the Manitoba and North-western Railway Company got a charter from this House to build a railway from Portage la Prairie to the north branch of the Saskatchewan River, and in aid of the building of that road they got a subsidy of 6,400 acres a mile of the choicest land in the North-west. This same clause is in their charter; but when they got to the boundary of the province of Manitoba, passing through a country which is thickly settled, and where the road is likely to pay, they stopped. They got their land grant as far as they went, but they went no further. The Government has power to cancel the charter for the remainder of the distance; but what good does that do the settlers? When a railway corporation enters into a contract with Parliament to build a railway to a certain point, and are granted public money for the building of that railway, some means should be taken to force them to carry out that contract. I would suggest that one good way of doing this would be for the Government to take a first mortgage on the railway as security to the people for their outlay. The Government would hold that mortgage, there would be no interest charged on it, and as soon as the railway company had fulfilled their contract and built the road, the mortgage would be released. That would be a safeguard to the people for the carrying out of the contract. Now, I consider the amendment that has been moved by the hon. member for East York a step in the right direction. The Government also took a step in the right direction when in the contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway for the construction of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway they secured a great many concessions in freight rates over the Canadian Pacific Railway, for the people in the west and also for the people in the east, and also retained running powers over that road for I believe all railway companies, and also kept control of the tolls on the road. The same thing should be done in this case. In the first place, I think running powers should be granted, I am not going to say to the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Pacific Railway alone, but to any railway company that wants to run over this road. The Government should also keep control of the tolls and they should also, I think, keep control over the bonding power of the company. The worst feature of the whole railroad policy of the Government in the west has been the power that has been granted to the people who have built these railways to bond them for any amount they like. As an instance of this, I will mention the Qu'Appelle, Long Lake and Saskatchewan Railway, which runs to the town of Prince Albert. That railway did not cost its promoters more than $2,500,000 to build, but it has been bonded for $3,800,000. There is a discrepancy of $1,300,000, and we do not know what has been done with that money. I heard one hon. member say that it had been put into electric railways in eastern parts of this country; but the settlers to-day have to pay interest on the whole $3,800,000—not only on what the railway cost, but on the $1,300,000 besides, which we do not know what has become of. I think that is something that should not be allowed to continue; it is something that the Government should grapple with at once, and put a stop to. These three suggestions should, I think, be carried out: keep running powers over the road, keep control of the tolls, and keep control of the bonding power of the company. If these things were done, I do not think we would have any more difficulty with the railway question.

Now, I am going to refer to some rates that are charged by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in the west. The Canadian Pacific Railway carries coal oil from Petrolea to the city of Winnipeg for 64 cents per hundred pounds; that is a distance of close on 1,500 miles. They charge 65 cents per hundred pounds for carrying coal oil from the city of Winnipeg to the town of Prince Albert, where I live, a distance of 600 miles. So that they charge us in the west just double the rates they charge the people of the east. Another peculiar feature is this. Add the 64 cents which is charged between Petrolea and Winnipeg to the 65 cents that is charged between Winnipeg and Prince Albert, and you will get $1.29 as the sum of the two local rates; but if I want to ship from Petrolea to Prince Albert and take a through rate they will charge $1.37. I think it is time that steps were taken to stop this sort of thing. I am not going to take up the time of the House further than to say that I have much pleasure in supporting the amendment of the hon. member for East York.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Speaker, this appears to me to be a suitable time to make what remarks I intend to make on this amendment. In my judgment the time has come for a new departure from the principle heretofore followed in granting charters to railways. We have followed one principle for a long time in this Parliament, that is, granting charters with large powers, giving subsidies for the building of railways, and requiring very little in return from the railway companies, so far as Parliament could control them. While we have been doing that and expecting to realize certain advantages from the expenditure of the money belonging to all the people, our experience has proven that we do not receive those advantages which we expected when we granted that money and those powers. We did that sometimes for the purpose of getting a railway built through a section of country where there was not railway communication. That is all very well. It is essential that there should be railways in the west, and we have granted large bonuses for the building of those railways; but no sooner are they built than we find the companies frequently charging exorbitant freight rates—rates that make it impossible for either the cultivator of the soil or the person who sends produce over those railways to get a fair return for his labour. In almost every instance the freight seems to be taxed for carriage to the utmost extent that it will bear, and we have such examples as that cited in a committee of this House a few years ago of a railway from Calgary to Edmonton, a distance of 75 miles, charging 75 cents a hundred for carrying freight that distance.

It was said that the gentleman who had this freight to forward went to the old Hudson Bay freighters—the half-breeds of that country—who had been carrying on the freighting business before the railway was built, and they agreed to carry the freight at 65 cents a hundred pounds. Look at the situation of the settler in that country. We had given a large bonus for the purpose of providing him with convenient and reasonably cheap transportation, but after railways were built aided by our bonuses, he was no better off than before, except that by the railway his freight would be carried a little quicker. That being the case, it suggests to us the advisability of obtaining some control over the railways which would prevent that experience from occurring in the future. We have been attempting to open up the country, in the first place, with railways, and when we found that the freight charges were so exorbitant that the people received very little return for the very heavy expenditure the country had made, we have been endeavouring to secure competition. This Parliament has often been called on to grant charters for other railways; perhaps over the same lines, and to give additional subsidies in order that competition might be created. But no sooner would another railway be built than it would be gobbled up by the first company, or both roads would be controlled by the one management, the freight rates would continue just as heavy, and the people be deprived of the benefits they expected to receive in return for the large expenditure which the country has made. We have had example after example of this kind of thing, and yet we continue to follow the same practice. We continue to subsidize other corporations to build railways over routes already occupied, in order to secure competition, and after the competing railway is built, we fail to achieve our object. That suggests to us the great necessity of taking some new departure; and the new departure we should take will be found in the amendment proposed to this railway Bill. By that amendment we say to the railway company which asks us for a charter: in return for our giving you that charter, in return for our giving you a large subsidy, in return for our giving you many privileges such as expropriating land and building your line through a section already traversed by another railway, we insist on securing from you, for the benefit of the public, the obligation to allow any other company to run its trains over your line, on the payment to you of a fair compensation in return. This we insist upon in order to secure in the interests of the people, the competition which we desire to secure by giving you your charter, and in order to prevent you from following the dog-in-the-manger policy which other railways have adopted. I do not see why any railway company which obtains its charter from this Parliament, and has been subsidized by both this Government and the local governments, should object to a condition of this kind. We know that hitherto every effort of Parliament to secure from the railway companies the consideration which the public demand and are entitled to receive has proved of no avail, and therefore we ought to devise some new method of obtaining for the public that redress which they expect from Parliament. I do not see any means more likely to accomplish the object we have in view than the provision contained in the amendment proposed to this Bill. This amendment, if adopted, will prevent the necessity of our subsidizing some other railway through this section at some future time in order to get competition. But if we give a charter to this road, without attaching to it some provision to secure that competition which its construction is intended to give and which the public look to us to obtain, the same result will follow in this case that has followed in the others. The same result will follow as did the construction of the Northern Pacific, which was subsidized and chartered by the Manitoba Government in order to provide competition with the Canadian Pacific Railway, but which, instead of securing that competition, resulted in an arrangement between the two roads to work together and charge the same freight rates. It is true there has been some reduction, but there has not been the competition which the public looked for as the result of the great sacrifice of public money the province had made. It therefore, in view of these facts, becomes all the more urgent for us to try and make some new departure that will secure in perpetuity to the people this right beyond danger of disturbance. It appears to me specially important to do this in connection with this Rainy River Railway. This railway is intended to be a link connecting the great waterways of the eastern part of the Dominion with the great wheat fields of the west. For three or four hundred miles it will run through a country which will furnish very little local traffic, so that it will have to depend very largely on the through trade from east to west to give some return for the investment.

Mr. SPEAKER. I wish to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that the hour for the consideration of Private Bills has expired.

BETTER OBSERVANCE OF THE LORD'S DAY.

Mr. CHARLTON. I move, seconded by Mr. McMullen, the third reading of Bill (No. 2) to secure the better observance of the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday, as a day of rest.

Mr. MACLEAN. I beg to move, seconded by Mr. LaRivière :

That the Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to Committee of the Whole with instructions to strike out subsection (c) of clause 1.

The object of my motion is to get the Bill once more in committee and improve in its details. This section that I propose to strike out was not in the original Bill. It strikes a blow at the freedom of the press, at personal liberty and at certain business interests in this country. I do not think that in this day, in the Dominion of Canada, we ought to establish a censorship of the press or interfere with personal liberty or the right of private opinion, as this Bill would do. I have received letters from prominent newsdealers in different parts of the country, who say that if this Bill is passed, it will prohibit them from selling over their counters the Sunday edition of the New York "Tribune," the New York "Herald," the Chicago "Record," the Chicago "Tribune," and all the other respectable Sunday papers printed in the United States. And not only that, but I believe that, if carried out strictly, it will stop the sale of the Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday editions of any paper in the United States or elsewhere that publishes a Sunday edition. As the measure is incomplete, and works great injustice, particularly so far as this clause is concerned. I move this resolution.

Motion agreed to, and the House again resolved itself into committee.

On subsection c, section 1,

Mr. MACLEAN. Now that the House has got back into committee, I hope it will recover its sense and deal with this question as it ought to deal with it. I stated, on a previous occasion, that we have already sufficient laws to deal with this question. In Ontario, we have a law to stop vending on Sunday, and that law is enforced. I directed the attention of the House to an elaborate judgment given by a magistrate at Meriton, where a carbide company had worked some of its men on Sunday. The case lasted ten or twelve days. The Sabbath Observance Society of Ontario sent their solicitor to the trial, and he succeeded in establishing the case and securing a conviction. And in the neighbourhood of the city of Toronto, yesterday, one of the magistrates tried a case involving a breach of the Sunday law, and a conviction was secured. I believe that, if the members from Ontario were polled to-night, they would unanimously declare that the law in the province of Ontario is sufficient to stop vending of all kinds on the Sabbath day in that province. And we have had the testimony of members from the province of Quebec that they have in that province a law which has effectually stopped all kinds of vending on the Sabbath. We have had members from the maritime provinces declaring that there is a law to stop Sunday vending there. And in the province of British Columbia they respect the Sunday law, for their newspapers do not work on Sunday, but publish on Saturday and give Sunday to their employees. So the people, from ocean to ocean, do observe the laws of their respective provinces on this subject, and so there is no need for this law. I have been further told that the Minister of Justice holds that this law is unconstitutional. Above all, it is unnecessary, and the provinces can do, and, as a matter of fact, have done, all that is necessary in the matter. I do hope that the House will now see its way to deal with this question in the way that it ought to be dealt with. There is no need for the law, and, as has been pointed out, it is an attack upon the press of this country. Surely we are not going to put the power in the hands of a police magistrate to punish people for selling a Sunday newspaper. Such an enactment is unknown to British jurisprudence, and only in Canada has such a law been proposed. In order that we may deal with the question as it ought to be dealt with, I beg to move that the committee rise.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Before this motion is carried I wish to say a few words explaining my position in regard to the vote I have just given. I am in favour of the observance of the Lord's Day just as much as any other man who votes for this Bill, but I do not think it is necessary to exclude the sale of papers bearing the title of Sunday newspapers—and I speak now especially for the province of Ontario—in order to preserve the proper observance of the Lord's Day. I have had the pleasure of reading a great many Sunday papers published on the other side of the line, and some of the best literary, scientific and historical papers that are published in the city of New York and other cities of the United States, are Sunday newspapers. You cannot find any fault with them in any respect. They are not printed on Sundays, they are not sold on Sundays, they come into this country and are sold at the end of the week. Now if this Bill is passed, it will punish the person who sells these newspapers, which are printed on a week day and sent into this country and sold on a week day, and which contains some of the best literary matter that is to be found in any publication. I do not think it is in the interest of the people of this country that this kind of literature should be kept out. Some of these papers contain a great deal of valuable instruction, and it ought to be no infraction of the law to buy them in the middle of the week and read them any day of the week, or on Sunday if people choose to do so. There is nothing in them that would debase any person who chooses to read them. Of course there are exceptions. There are some Sunday newspapers published on the other side the reading of which would not be conducive to the welfare of the people of this country, and I think the Postmaster General has power already to stop the circulation of that class of papers. I do not think this Bill meets the requirements of this country in any respect. In the province of British Columbia they respect the Sabbath Day, because they do not require printers to work on Sunday to produce a Monday newspaper; but this will prevent the people of British Columbia from getting out a paper on Saturday that is to be sold or read on Sunday. I think the Bill in its present shape will work an injury to the people of this country instead of a benefit, and therefore I oppose it. I am as willing as any other man to do anything I can to promote the observance of the Lord's Day, and I do not think any one has any reason to find fault with the manner in which the Lord's Day is kept in Ontario. There are in fact no Sunday newspapers of any kind sold on the streets of the cities and towns of this country on the Lord's Day. If any Sunday newspapers are sold, they are sold on Saturday or on Monday, so that there is actually no sale made on Sunday. Therefore, I see no necessity for this Bill. While I am, as I said, entirely in favour of the observance of the Lord's Day, I do not believe in this kind of humbug, and I, for one, am prepared to vote against it. I have voted for such things, but I am not going to do it any more.

Mr. WALLACE. I would like to have some explanation from the author of this Bill as to what the facts really are. Most of the work done on the daily papers published on Monday morning is done by the employees on some portion of Sunday, principally Sunday night; and I want to know from the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), whether he is aware of that fact. If he is, and if he is anxious to prevent work being done on Sunday, then I think he should direct his energies towards preventing newspaper offices from performing any kind of work on Sunday. The proposal he makes in this Bill does not, according to my mind, meet the case. Now, here is a newspaper published on Friday or on Saturday, it is sold on Saturday or on Friday, and the hon. member for North Norfolk proposes that that should be illegal. The only point I can see in it is that he is going to prevent people from reading this newspaper on Sunday because it is called a Sunday newspaper, and people may be induced to read it on Sunday. Well, Sir, if the people choose to read any sort of book on Sunday, I do not think that the hon. member for Norfolk can introduce any law in this House that will prevent them from doing so, neither can he prevent them from reading any newspaper that they may choose to read. For my part I would prevent the importation of those Sunday newspapers from the United States, and a large proportion of the Monday newspapers also. When I was Controller of Customs I had occasion to exclude certain newspapers that were objectionable. I think we might fairly extend the powers of the officers of the Post Office Department, and of the Customs Department as well, so as to enable them to exclude some of those United States newspapers. I believe that those sensational papers, with blood-curdling pictures, and some of them perhaps immoral, should be prevented from coming into this country at all. But that is not the proposal made by the hon. member for North Norfolk. The effect of his Bill is, whether it is his proposal or not, that a newspaper having the word Sunday upon it, shall neither be printed in this country nor offered for sale on any day of the week when it is lawful to sell goods or newspapers. That in itself is an arbitrary interference. If the member for Norfolk finds that certain work is being performed on Sunday that should not be performed on that day, I would be willing to make a careful examination into any proposal to prevent, where it is possible without injuring public interests, such work being done on the Lord's Day. But I am not prepared to support a proposal that a newspaper published in Canada on a lawful day of the week, and sold in Canada on a lawful day of the week, merely because it has the name Sunday upon it, shall not be sold, and that the sale or the printing of it shall be an offence punishable by fines and penalties. It is for that reason that I voted that the House should now go into committee to consider this matter. If the member for North Norfolk has a reasonable proposition to substitute for that, I think this House will be disposed to give it a fair consideration; but this proposal is in itself objectionable, and should meet with the condemnation of the House.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), is actuated by the purest and most patriotic motives in trying to enact into law the Bill that is before the House. The evil that has crept into the United States and has been perpetuated there, was initiated at the time of the civil war. Up to that time there were no Sunday newspapers in the United States; but at the time of the civil war it was a common thing for the people to buy the Sunday issue of a newspaper when they were going into their church door. During the war the people got accustomed to buying and reading the Sunday papers giving news of the war, and from that time down to the present the evil of Sunday papers has been perpetuated, and in fact is growing rather than diminishing. The religious denominations on the other side have expressed their views very clearly in regard to this matter, and most of the religious denominations on our side of the line have expressed in unmistakable terms their opposition to literature of this kind being brought into Canada and circulated in our homes.

I believe it is an evil, and I believe so conscientiously, and I hope to vote in accordance with my conscientious convictions. A paper printed as a Sunday issue carries with it a candid conviction to the home that as it is a paper printed on Sunday, it is a proper paper to be read on that day. I have seen papers published both in the United States and here as Sunday papers which, according to my conscientious convictions, did not contain proper reading matter either for the family or the home on Sunday, and I believe it is the desire of my esteemed friend the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to put a stop to issues of that kind. He may possibly be asking the House to adopt a law similar to an Act in force in some of the provinces at the present time, and I do not know as to that point; but it is a proper object on his part to try and carry out what he conscientiously believes to be right and which experience has shown to be in accordance with the feeling in Ontario. I entertain the same convictions, and I therefore support the Bill, and earnestly hope the committee will not consent to throw it out in the summary way proposed by the hon. member for East York. That hon. gentleman makes no pretensions with respect to the observance of Sunday. That hon. gentleman, as we all know, was one of the loudest advocates of Sunday cars, and one of the loudest advocates of Sunday newspapers. Next he will be one of the loudest advocates of baseball games on Sunday. No doubt if a Bill were introduced providing for baseball games or horse-racing on the Lord's Day, he would support it.

Mr. MACLEAN. Does the hon. gentleman know that money earns interest on Sunday?

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not find fault with the hon. gentleman. He has the right to hold those views, if he holds them conscientiously; but the fact shows that his religious teaching during his youth was sadly neglected.

Mr. BERTRAM. It was not my intention to have said one word on this question. I thought it better to allow every hon. member to vote on a question of this nature without any observation from myself; but I must say, on listening to the debate that has taken place for some considerable time in connection with this Bill, I almost felt as if I was listening to the debate on the Sunday car question in Toronto over again. I desire to say to the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) that no one is more anxious or desirous of having one day's rest in the week than I am, but I believe we cannot make men morally good or make them better citizens or raise people to a higher level by Act of Parliament. That must be done by education in its highest and best sense. There is one argument that does not commend itself to my judgment. We are told that if we do not adopt this Bill we shall have some such trouble on this question as they have in the United States. We heard the same prophecy in regard to the introduction of Sunday cars in Toronto. We were told that if there were Sunday cars we should have lawlessness and Sunday desecrations; these things however did not follow.

Mr. MACLEAN. Open beer gardens.

Mr. BERTRAM. Some of the best men in Toronto supported the running of street cars, not because they thought it would injure the city, but because they thought it would materially and morally benefit the city. I desire to say that so far as the Canadian people are concerned, they are capable of conducting themselves on Sunday or any other day without regard to the people of any other country, and I have no fear of the adoption here of any of the special vices said to prevail in the United States, because I have faith in the character of Canadian people as people knowing how to appreciate Sunday as a day of rest. This proposed law is entirely unnecessary. We have already in Ontario a Sunday law, and further restrictions of this kind, instead of making people better, have actually the opposite effect, and I do not believe in them. I shall always vote against restrictive legislation of this kind, which instead of making the people more moral, has the opposite tendency. I wish it, however, to be distinctly understood that in thus stating my position, I am at the same time not in favour of Sunday labour. I should be glad indeed that if there were only five working days in the week instead of six, and I believe it is necessary for the human frame and intellect as well as for man's moral nature that there should be complete cessation from labour on one day in the week. But some things are necessary under our present civilization. Hon. gentlemen might as well tell me that the waterworks in some cities should not be in operation on Sunday. Then everybody would have to secure their water supply by going to the lake or elsewhere with a pail; but men have to be employed at the waterworks for the purpose of meeting the wants and requirements of the civilization we enjoy. Such legislation as is now proposed, is, therefore, injurious and not beneficial. I prefer to have faith in the people and trust to the people, and I am satisfied if we do that we shall find the people conducting themselves properly, and we should see that we do not apply fines and imprisonment to what is not a criminal offence. We should be very careful before we imprison any one for such an offence on Sunday, as this Bill provides for. I hope the committee will reject the Bill, simply on the ground that it is entirely unnecessary.

Mr. CASGRAIN. There is no doubt the Bill before the House is contrary to the sentiment of the large majority of the people in the province of Quebec. We have our own way of keeping Sunday, and I think Sunday is kept in that province just as well as in any other part of the Dominion. We have a law against selling anything on Sunday, which is contained in the Consolidated Statutes of the province, and the article is as follows:—

Except the sale, at church doors of country parishes on Sunday, of the effects arising from public gatherings, for the benefit of churches, or those destined for pious purposes, no shop-keeper, pedlar, hawker, or other person shall sell or retail any goods, wares or merchandise during Sunday under a penalty not exceeding $20 for the first offence, and not less than $20 or more than $40 for every subsequent offence.

We in the province of Quebec have always considered that law amply sufficient for securing the observance of Sunday. There is some doubt as to the constitutionality of the Bill now before the committee. I do not know whether I am quite right, but I take it that this matter falls within subparagraph 16 of paragraph 92 of the British North America Act, which leaves all matters of a merely local or private nature to the legislatures of the provinces. In Quebec we have legislated on the subject. The constitutionality of that Act has never been called in question, and I do not see why, by general legislation on a subject of this kind, the large majority of the people of the province should be subjected to a law of which they do not approve and which they have no wish to see adopted by this Parliament. I observe the Solicitor General in his seat, and perhaps he will enlighten the committee as to whether this subject comes within the sphere of legislation of the federal Parliament or not.

An hon. MEMBER. He did so before.

Mr. CLARKE. I desire to say two or three words on this question. I am strongly in favour of enacting a law for the purpose of keeping out of the country blackguard and loose newspapers printed on the other side or elsewhere, newspapers containing lewd pictures, which have a tendency to corrupt the minds of the people and to degrade and weaken the moral fibre. I have examined the Bill of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and I cannot find one single line that will accomplish the object I have stated. If the Bill can be amended in that direction, I will give it my most hearty support. I am not in favour, however, of keeping out such eminently respectable journals as the London "Observer," "The News of the World" and the "Weekly Times." These are valuable papers from a literary standpoint; they are dated Sunday; they are read by hundreds of people in the Dominion of Canada, and if the Bill of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) becomes law, the sale of them would be prohibited and many of us would not have the advantage of reading them as we do now. There is only one secular paper I know of printed in the province of Ontario, dated Sunday, and it is due to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean) who is a member of this House, and who is connected with the publication of that paper, to say—and I say it fearlessly and challenge contradiction—that that newspaper may be taken into any Canadian home and read with profit any day in the week. It is dated Sunday, but it is printed on Friday or on Saturday, so that there is no Sunday work done on it. Those who desire to get a summary of the news of the week can find it cleanly and well set out in that paper, and if they desire to get a summary of the religious news of the week they can find it well prepared in that paper always. If the hon. member (Mr. Charlton) would prepare a Bill to keep out the scores of yellow journals which are published in the United States, such a Bill would have my support. The Bill which we are asked to send for a third reading now, does not contain any provision of that kind, but on the contrary, it will militate against a class of journals which disseminate a vast amount of useful information in the country at the present time. For that reason I must vote that the committee rise, unless some assurance is given us that the legislation which I believe is necessary shall be proposed by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton).

Mr. BOSTOCK. The intention of this Bill as I understand it is to prevent to some extent labour on Sunday. In the province of British Columbia whence I come we have newspapers issued on Sunday but not on Monday. The great part of the work on these Sunday newspapers is done on Saturday night and they are published late on Saturday night or the first thing on Sunday morning. If this Bill becomes law we shall be prevented from publishing these newspapers on Sunday, or else we can publish newspapers only on five days in the week, or, in the other alternative, we must publish on Monday morning and compel the editorial staff, the compositors, and the pressmen to work all Sunday evening, which they do not do at present. In the province of British Columbia the result will be to make these people work on Sunday and deprive them of the Sabbath as a day of rest. This custom of issuing a paper on Sunday morning and no paper on Monday morning, is one which has been in vogue in our province for a long time, and it has been found most convenient by the people. We, in British Columbia are as law-abiding and respectable as are those in any other part of the Dominion of Canada and we are as anxious to have the Sabbath observed as are the people of any other province. We have found the system of publishing our newspapers suitable to our requirements, and it will be a great hardship to us if we are compelled by this law to forego it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. As the mover of the amendment which is now under discussion I wish to say a word or two. When this Bill was up on various occasions in the House, I saw, as well as did gentlemen on both sides, that it contained a very great number of weaknesses. When it came before the House this session and was being considered in committee, I took occasion to point out to the promoter (Mr. Charlton) what I regarded as a very great defect in the Bill, and my opinion on that question was supported by no less an authority than the present Minister of Justice (the Hon. David Mills) who when he gave that opinion was a member for Bothwell. I urged upon the Government that they should give very serious consideration to the opinion of their own Minister of Justice as regards, not only the constitutionality of the Act, but also as regards the advisability of supporting a Bill which according to the opinion of the present Minister of Justice interfered in a matter into which this House had no right to go, it being purely a civil and municipal right. But, I was answered upon that question by the Prime Minister, who urged that Sir John Thompson, the late Minister of Justice, had supported the contention of the hon. member (Mr. Charlton), and the Premier urged that the opinion of Sir John Thompson was quite sufficient for him. So, for the time being the House was in the mood of throwing away altogether the constitutionality or unconstitutionality, or the fitness or unfitness of the Act, and it assented to the principle laid down by the Prime Minister according to the opinion of Sir John Thompson. Then I came to the discussion of the principle of the Bill itself, and it will be remembered that I pointed out as strongly as I could, that the Bill was ineffective in preventing the greater evil in connection with Sunday newspapers. I then said that in my opinion a respectable Sunday newspaper might be issued without injuring the morals of the people or destroying the moral sentiment of the country to any extent whatever. I pointed out upon the other hand, that the Bill of the hon. member (Mr.

Charlton) did not prevent the importation into Canada of the class of literature to which my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Clarke) has alluded, namely, that class of journals purporting to be issued on Sunday, receiving, in the language of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), a sort of certificate of character by reason of the fact that Sunday was their day of publication, and sold broadcast through Canada as Sunday newspapers imported from the United States; papers, which I say in this House and am prepared to say out of this House, are not fit to enter into the home of any Canadian citizen. And, Sir, as the spirit of the House seemed to be that this Bill should be passed, I was anxious with others that if the Bill should pass and be operative at all, it should be operative against the greater nuisance; the importation of that class of immoral and unclean literature which is brought into Canada by the means I mentioned. And I have no hesitation in saying to-night, that it was to prevent that that I moved the resolution which was contained in that amendment, and which is now the subject of discussion. I hope I am too broad and have too much appreciation of the rights and liberties of the people of Canada, and too much appreciation, too, of their hard common sense, to say that the better class of newspapers which come in here should be excluded because they happen to be dated on the Sabbath Day. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke) has alluded to the London papers, and I mentioned one paper which is published near my own home. I stated that the Buffalo "Express" was a journal which was creditable to its publishers, which contained very excellent literary material, and which could do no harm in any Canadian home, so long as it did not endeavour to lead our people into republicanism, which we do not need to discuss in this House, since we well know the thorough founding of our people in British principles. It was not my intention to prevent newspapers of this kind coming into Canada; but I did try, and those who supported me tried, to get at the pernicious literature which has already been referred to, and which ought to be prevented from coming into this country. Now, Sir, we are at a pass in connection with this Bill at which, I think, the hon. member for North Norfolk should pause and very seriously consider his course. We have come to this, that, so far as the prevention of the real nuisance is concerned, his Bill, without this clause, is of no use at all, and with this clause his Bill is a sort of return to the blue laws which, I am free to confess, I do not believe would receive sympathy or support in the country. For instance, I do not think any man could be fined with the approval of the public for selling a copy of the London "Times" upon a week day in a city of Canada, because it happened to be printed on a Sabbath Day.

I conceive that to be an impossible condition of affairs in Canada. Such being the case, although I was the mover of that amendment, I am free to confess that there is a difficulty there which, in our haste the other night, we did not see, and which, it appears to me, would make this clause almost useless for the purpose for which it was intended; and I am one who, if I see that a clause which I asked to be added to a Bill is inoperative, will immediately retrace my steps. It is true, some little threat has been made in the papers, that, if I should happen to be a candidate in one of the cities of Canada, the gentlemen who are opposed to the operation of this law would knife me when the contest came on. Well, Sir, I throw that back as a dirty, base insinuation, and I say to the men who wrote it, and to the men who published it, that, when the time comes when I shall appeal to the people, either in my present constituency or in any other constituency in Canada, I shall be prepared, on every occasion, to defend my course in this House on its merits, appealing to no one class or another specially, and this much is certain: no miserable threat will compel me to take a course which I do not think is consistent or just as regards the interests of the people of Canada. I am anxious, I repeat, to see this class of pernicious literature shut out of the country. I believe now that the clause which I moved will go further than that, and will shut out a class of literature which I did not intend to shut out, which the hon. member for North Norfolk does not intend to shut out, which no man in this House would desire to shut out. Therefore, I think the hon. member for North Norfolk should pause and very seriously consider whether he should not remodel his Bill, possibly giving wider powers to the Postmaster General and the Minister of Customs, as regards excluding the class of literature which has been referred to. But this much is certain, that, without this clause, this Bill is no good at all, and with it, I am free to confess, after hearing the statements of members, after seeing the class of literature which is published on Sunday, in various parts of the world, that this amendment goes a good deal further than I ever intended it to go, and further, I believe, than the hon. member for North Norfolk himself intended it to go.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have listened carefully to the remarks that have been made by various speakers on the question now before the Chair. I have to say, at the outset, that the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) attempts to place before this committee a motion which the House did not direct this committee to consider. The House directed the committee to consider the question of setting aside subsection "c." That action was taken on the motion of my hon. friend from East York, and directly on the House resolving itself into Committee of the Whole to consider that question, my hon. friend rises, without pausing to consider the question which the committee has the mandate of the House to consider, and asks for the assassination of the Bill by the rising of the committee. Now, I suppose that the speeches in this committee have been directed to the whole broad question, and not to the question that was properly and legitimately before the Chair, that is, the amendment of subsection "c"; and it may be necessary and proper for me at this moment to deal briefly with the arguments of various kinds that have been presented to-night with reference to the Sunday newspaper matter. My hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Montague), who moved the amendment the other night, gets up now and tells us, that he hardly comprehended the scope of that amendment, which he now finds goes further than he intended it should go, and, in fact, calls for action which he can scarcely approve of at the present moment. He tells us, moreover, that he has doubts to-night about the constitutionality of the Bill itself, or the constitutionality of action with regard to this matter by this House at all. Well, this question of constitutionality has been so often brought up in this House, and these objections have been so often set aside, the highest judicial authorities of Canada have so often pronounced that this question of constitutionality is one that need not be considered, because the constitutional power does rest in this Parliament to deal with this question, that it seems to me we waste our time in considering that point, and I can hardly comprehend how, in view of this well-known fact, hon. members will recur again and again to this phase of the question, unless their design be to waste time and befog the main question before the House by these side issues. The Bill is one of a broad and general character. It may be that we have laws in the various provinces that will meet, partially or entirely, the evil that this Bill proposes to remove. It is said that we have such a law in the province of Quebec, but evidently it does not meet the evil or is not applied, because in Montreal there is a regularly published Sunday newspaper, called the "Sunday Sun."

Mr. CASGRAIN. The paper is printed on Saturday, and all the work is done on Saturday.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am not able to contradict the hon. gentleman, but it is ostensibly a Sunday paper, and so far as its moral influence is concerned, it is what it professes to be, a desecration of the Lord's Day. My hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Montague) says that the Sunday newspapers of the United States are of most deleterious character, that their influence, which is wide reaching, is entirely unhealthy and demoralizing and lamentable in every respect. I agree with the hon. gentleman, but he tells us that there are Sunday papers which are quite unobjectionable. He spoke of the London "Times." Well, if I am not misinformed there is no Sunday "Times," or other newspapers published in London on Sunday. I know that the New York "Herald" attempted to publish a Sunday edition in London, but the attempt ended in a disastrous failure. I speak under correction, but it is my belief that there is no such thing as a Sunday journal published in the city of London. There is no Sunday distribution of the mail in that city, and there is no city on the face of the globe where the Sabbath is so strictly observed, where there is such a total cessation of labour in the Post Office Department and in connection with literary pursuits, as in the commercial metropolis of the world. I ask this House to deal with this evil because it is one which is far-reaching in its consequence. The question of suppressing it is one that ought not to be beset, in its consideration, by the kind of tactics that characterizes the conduct of hon. members, who approach or pretend to approach the discussion of this Bill. Sir, the Bill before the House was called into existence by the fact that we have an object lesson in the nation right at our elbows, in a nation where those of us who have examined the circumstances know that the Sabbath was observed thirty-five years ago just as well as it is in Canada to-day. That nation permitted the introduction of the Sunday newspaper, the evil at first attracted little attention, these papers were just as respectable as that highly respectable sheet published by my hon. friend the member for East York (Mr. Maclean)—probably more so because they gave a little religious homily at first.

Mr. MACLEAN. I will let the hon. gentleman write a religious article for my Sunday newspaper, if he likes.

Mr. CHARLTON. I will put it in some other paper. The evil was at first one of moderate magnitude, but the time came when suddenly—almost in a year—every daily newspaper in the United States was obliged to bow the knee to this Baal and issue a Sunday edition. We may be just on the eve of a similar experience here because when a Sunday newspaper has established itself, it has certain advantages which may compel every other newspaper in the city to follow suit, and it is not impossible that such papers as the Toronto "Globe" and "Mail and Empire," and other highly respectable papers will be compelled to follow the example of the Toronto "World," if that paper should acquire a little more influence than it possesses at present and continue to issue what is ostensibly a Sunday edition. Looking at the demoralizing influences social, political, moral and religious, of the Sunday newspapers in the United States, looking at the fact that that influence has dragged that nation down from a high moral and religious position, from the position of one of the most truly Sabbatarian nations in the world, from the position of a nation that refused to open its centennial exposition on Sunday in 1876, to the position in which it stands to-day—I say, looking at the gradual deterioration of religious and moral sentiment in that country, looking at the deterioration of literary taste in that country, looking at the fact that the yellow journal and the sensational press has largely usurped the place of good literature, and that the tastes of the people are becoming trivial and superficial, and immoral, and that the moral stamina, which is so desirable in the people, no longer exists among the masses—looking at all these facts, whoever will take into consideration the scope of these forces, the natural tendency of these forces, the ultimate result of these forces, must realize that we are called upon to meet in Canada an element of disintegration, an element that will drag down the people of this country if we do not grapple with it; and it is on the broad ground that for the good of the country, for the benefit of future generations, for the purpose of rendering more stable our institutions, religious and political, for the purpose of enabling this country to avoid the mistakes that have been made by the great nation to the south, for the purpose of making this a greater, nobler, more virtuous country, the inhabitants of which will possess more moral and physical and religious stamina—it is for these reasons that this Bill is urged.

Hon. members refused to look at it upon these broad grounds, and carp and cavil at little features here and there. It is unnecessary, they say, it is an interference with the liberty of the subject, it is an interference with the literary liberty of the country, men should be allowed to read what kind of literature they please. Well, Mr. Speaker, we are professedly a Christian nation, we recognize the obligatory character of the divine law. We profess to recognize that the Decalogue is binding upon this people—the Decalogue which prohibits murder, which prohibits unchastity, perjury, theft. All these are divine requirements, and the civil law supplements them and makes them crimes. That same Decalogue requires the observance of the Sabbath, and while it might not be proper for us to legislate on this as a religious matter, while we do not legislate on any of these through religious motives or avowedly for the purpose of compelling people to entertain religious views, yet we do these things as a state, as a legislature, as a people for the purpose of laying broad and securely the foundations of society. We punish the murderer, we punish the thief, we punish the seducer, we punish the perjurer. We do these things for the good of society, to establish society upon a sure and permanent basis. And this is the reason that warrants this House in their taking action to cut off what promises to be an abuse, and is calculated to weaken the state, make life and property less secure, and make the future of the state darker and more uncertain. It is on this ground that this Bill asks that this great, this crying evil which exists in the nation to the south of us, be shut out of this country. There may be some good Sunday papers; there are certainly many bad ones. There are papers published on certain other days of the week that it is proper to keep out of the country; but these yellow journals, the sensational press, the whole brood of objectionable newspapers have been in the United States, and will be here, if we have them, the natural progeny of the Sunday newspaper. The Sunday newspaper is a violation of the Divine law; the man who publishes it knows it, if he has sense; and, if that newspaper is published in violation of that law, the publisher of that newspaper will be the natural enemy of every moral and religious restraint, he will be the enemy of Sunday observance; he will be the friend of Sunday cars, of Sunday saloons, and of every debasing influence that will stand as an ally to this Satanic press.

My hon. friend from Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram) says you cannot make people moral by legislation. No, but you can have salutary legislation, calculated to restrain immorality, and you can buttress and promote the moral sense of the country by laws. Though you cannot legislate that a man shall be a good man and make him so by that legislation, you can, by legislation, surround him with influences that are calculated to make him and his children better. If you remove those legislative influences, you leave him to drift aimlessly and helplessly down a course in which he might be arrested by wise laws. My hon. friend from Centre Toronto says that he has no fear of American vices being planted in the soil of Canada, that we are proof against these things. We were not born subject to original sin, I suppose; we have not the natural tendency that influences the depraved human heart; we are, fortunately, exempt from all the influences calculated to drag Yankees or other people down. American vices cannot find a foothold in Canada, even if the means by which those vices are propagated in the United States find a foothold here. I say, on the contrary, the influences that debase popular sentiment and national life in the United States will do the same thing here, and I assert that, having before our eyes in the United States an example of the influence of a degrading institution, whether the Sunday press or anything else, if we establish that institution here, the result will be the same. But my hon. friend (Mr. Bertram) congratulates himself that we are not likely to fall into temptation, that we are not amenable to the things that influence other people. Why, it is sheer nonsense. These things are the same in one country as in another, and if the Sunday press, which at first gave little indication of what it would grow to be, but which is condemned to-day, alike by Protestant and Catholic clergymen, has produced such effects as we know it has, how can we avoid the same results here, except by preventing the cause?

So, I stand by the principles of this Bill; I believe in them thoroughly; I have advocated them year after year. I do not advocate the adoption of this Bill for the purpose of curtailing conscientious or religious or literary liberty. It stands upon a higher and broader ground. Sunday newspapers are unnecessary. One day's rest in seven is necessary, and the Sunday newspaper keeps us rolling on the same secular rut. It is a means of secularizing the Sabbath. It prevents people from being drawn aside from the cares that are consuming their very life. We need rest in this busy age even more than did the people of three thousand years ago, more than the people of a thousand years ago. The very life we lead, the high pressure under which we live makes this one day's rest in seven an absolutely necessary and essential thing. The Sunday newspaper interferes with it, and it is a most important influence, calculated to degrade the national life and produce the whole brood of evils that we see exemplified in the experience of a nation that had not the wisdom to pass a law such as is here proposed. I sat in Chicago as one of two vice-presidents of the Sunday Rest Congress, Archbishop Ireland being the other. We had read before that congress a paper from Cardinal McCloskey, and had one of the most magnificent addresses on the subject of Sabbath observance from Archbishop Ireland that I ever heard. Both of these prelates were unsparing in their denunciation of the Sunday press of the United States, as an influence that is debasing, corrupt and weakening the life of the nation.

Now, Sir, I am prepared to stand by the judgment of this House upon this measure. But I must say that I felt pained to-night, when the vote was being taken, at the evidence of want of appreciation, to say the least, of the serious character of the question that was being decided. This is not a thing for jokes, for levity; it is a very serious question. And there is an element of the population of this country that will consider it a serious question. That element has not spoken very pronouncedly upon the matter, but it is a large element, and it does not want this American Anti-Christ introduced here. These people do not look with a great deal of favour upon the one or two publishers who want it brought in. The amendment to the Bill which you have just read, Mr. Chairman, was offered by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague). It reads:

Sells or employs or procures any person to sell upon any day of the week any paper, whether published in Canada or elsewhere, issued or purporting to be issued on Sunday.

Now, so far as the actual issuing of a paper upon Sunday is concerned, the prohibition is all right. It might, perhaps, be claimed that a paper dated and nominally issued on Sunday, but really issued on some other day, ought not to come under that clause. But let the publisher issue his newspaper honestly. If it is published on Saturday, let him date it on Saturday, and if it is issued on Sunday, let him so state it.

We have on the border here, brought in from Detroit into Windsor and the towns along the line, brought in from Buffalo and sold all along the lines of railway, American Sunday newspapers, some of them fairly respectable and some of them not respectable. But all are undergoing the process of deterioration, the process of evolution will bring them down to the regular stamp of the yellow sensational journal. They are all going there, evolution will fetch them all there, the Toronto "World" and the rest. Now we want to guard against these things and this proposal is calculated to do it. If the committee choose to cut out this amendment, subsection "c," the Bill is still a good one. The Bill still provides, I think, an efficient and effectual remedy for the evils I am complaining of. It was drafted by the Minister of Justice last year and it was submitted to the Solicitor General of this House, and met with the approval of both those gentlemen. Talk about the Bill being insufficient and a weak Bill, is talk made for a purpose. The Bill is sufficient, in my opinion, the Bill is a strong Bill; and it does not matter so much to me whether subsection "c" is eliminated from the Bill or not. But at all events, I shall ask that the committee confine itself in its action now to the question whether it will eliminate section "c" and then if they do not do this, I shall ask power from the House to do something else.

Mr. MACLEAN. If the hon. gentleman has any necessity of being informed that we do not need a law to protect us against American institutions, he has had that in his own experience. He tried to politicalise this country on American lines, and failed. The good sense of the people saved this country, and it required no law for that purpose. If his Bill here to-night means anything it is a proposition to establish a censorship of the press of this country. He proposes to establish a censorship which is based on the date on which the paper is printed, and not on the contents of the paper. If he does intend to establish a censorship, let it be based on reasonable and sound lines, on lines that concern the contents of these papers, and not the date alone. It is an absurdity when you attempt to legislate in that direction. The hon. gentleman says that America is so and so because they have Sunday papers; the moment before that he said England is so and so, and it has not Sunday papers. But England has no Sunday papers and it has no such law as he proposes to put on the Statute-book here—that answers the hon. gentleman. The Canadian people and the English people are different from the American people. They are protected in regard to their Sunday by substantial and sufficient Sunday laws; and I want none of this cant, none of this hypocrisy, and none of this attempt to govern the people of Canada by putting them all in the Criminal Code, as this man who professes to be a Liberal now proposes to do.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. It appears to me that the promoter of this Bill loses sight of the fact that in the province of Ontario and in all the other provinces, we have already laws for the observance of the Sabbath; that being the case, I cannot see what good is to be obtained by having legislation here of a similar character. If it can be shown by the promoter of this Bill that the laws of the provinces are not sufficient to maintain the observance of the Sabbath, then I say it is right for this House to pass such by the promoter of this Bill that the laws there, which are strict and which are in force, as they are throughout the province of Ontario, so far as I know, I cannot see what is to be gained by the passage of this legislation here. Furthermore, the hon. gentleman is losing sight of the fact, as he did in a former session, although I voted for his Bill on that occasion, but more as a personal matter than anything else—he loses sight of the fact that he is not striking at the root of the evil at all. If he wants to prohibit labour being performed on Sunday he must stop the work of the printers, the writers, the reporters, the pressmen, and the whole staff of any newspaper office who are engaged in getting out a Monday newspaper. The Toronto "Globe," the Toronto "Mail," the Toronto "World," the Ottawa "Citizen," the Montreal "Gazette," and all these newspapers published on Monday morning, must have their whole staff at work on Sunday to get these newspapers out.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). From 8 o'clock in the evening.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Anyway, they have to work on Sunday. Now to be consistent, the promoter of this Bill, if he wants to stop labour and to preserve the Sabbath for the workingman, must enact a law that will prevent these men from working on Sunday to get out a Monday newspaper.

Mr. MACLEAN. And that must be a provincial law.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Just so; I contend that we have already sufficient laws in the province of Ontario to preserve the Sabbath, and I think they have in all the other provinces too. I do not see the necessity for this legislation, as I said before. And I want to emphasize the fact, some of the best literary journals published in the United States are dated on Sunday. The Sunday New York "Tribune" and the Sunday New York "Sun" are printed on Saturday. These papers are all printed on Saturday, they are not printed on the Sabbath at all, they are not sold on the Sabbath at all, they are sold on the week days, so that there is no breaking of the Sabbath law at all by the publication, or circulation or sale of these Sunday papers in Canada or in the United States, so far as I know—at all events not in Canada. There are no Sunday newspapers sold in Canada on the Lord's Day. They are sold in the middle of the week or towards the end of the week, and they are printed in the middle of the week, and not on Sunday at all. This whole thing is merely sentiment, and I think a sentiment ought not to be put into law just for the sake of the sentiment itself, especially when it is not shown that it is going to accomplish any good purpose. I believe that in Ontario, and in every province of the Dominion we have good Sabbath observance laws that are maintained at the present time, and I do not think that anything is going to be accomplished by the passage of this Bill, unless the hon. gentleman inserts a clause to prevent printers from working on Sunday. It is the Monday newspaper that breaks the Sabbath, and not the Sunday newspaper.

Mr. OSLER. As an individual and as a member of this House, I object entirely to grandmotherly legislation of this kind. Surely, if the people of Canada need to be educated as to what they should read or what they should not read, they are not to be educated up to a high moral tone by being prevented from reading what is evil. I think the people of this country do not need to be educated as to what they should read and what they should not read. The newspapers printed on Sunday do not educate the people of this country, they do not educate the people of the United States. The people of the United States demand that newspapers shall be printed of a class that are printed on Sunday, and that is why they are printed. In Canada there is no such demand, and no such newspapers can be printed in Canada as are printed in the United States. We have a moral tone here which is far and away above the moral tone they have to the south of us, in my opinion. I do not believe that a newspaper printed on Sunday here in Canada, of a character such as those printed on the other side would pay the cost of wages for one week with its circulation for a year. I object entirely to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) coming here to lecture us as if he had a power of attorney from the Almighty to say how we shall observe the Sabbath. I think we are just as much entitled to judge how we shall keep the Sabbath as he is. I do not wish to be dictated to by any member of this House, or by anybody else, as to what I shall read or what I shall not read on Sunday. I want my children and those for whom I have any responsibility, to read what is useful and what is profitable for them, and I try to teach them to avoid what is unprofitable. I think that our moral teachers in Canada are quite able to set us the pace and to educate us as to what we should read. We are going back in any such legislation as this to the blue laws, and I consider that one of the causes of the low moral tone of the people to the south of us is the rebound from the blue laws under which they suffered so long. We have had no such laws in Canada. I think the child who has gone out into the world and met the evil fearlessly and has overcome it, will make a better and a stronger man than the child who has always been shut up away from the evil, so far as that could be done. Are we going to be told in this Parliament that we should not read certain newspapers because we are not able to stand their contents and because they will corrupt our morals? Our morals should be corrupted if we cannot stand any of these yellow newspapers. One reason I object to staying in New York over Sunday is that the whole of the hotels and streets, tramways and elevated railways seem to be loaded down with these Sunday newspapers. We have no such condition existing here; and if we had, we could not stop it by Act of Parliament. I take that position without any reserve. If you prohibit a thing you make a boy or a girl all the more anxious to get it, and by enacting a prohibitory law you will make the people more anxious to get these Sunday newspapers, and you will do more damage by your prohibition than if you let them in freely. I am against all attempts to establish morality by Act of Parliament, and I refuse to take any man's view as to what I shall do or shall not do as regards my mode of thought and mode of life.

Mr. ERB. I am as anxious as the hon. member for North Norfolk can be to have Sunday properly observed and our people not exposed to the immoral literature to which he has referred and which is published in the United States. But I think section 1 of chapter 246 of the Revised Statutes of Ontario, 1897, covers the case fully with respect to selling or purchasing newspapers on Sunday in this province. Then, if our postal regulations and customs regulations are not ample and sufficient to prevent that immoral literature coming in from the United States, I think we had better amend our customs and postal laws in order to exclude that class of literature, whether published on Sunday or week day, or whether called Sunday newspapers or otherwise. These are the views I hold on this question, and I think the Bill entirely unnecessary.

Mr. CRAIG. The object of the Bill of the hon. member for North Norfolk, at least his object is to prevent Sunday newspapers being sold in this country, and by the term Sunday newspapers I think he means newspapers which purport to be published on Sunday, whether they are so published or not. That is, no doubt, the hon. gentleman's view, as in all he has stated on this question, the hon. gentleman has denounced papers called Sunday newspapers and published in the United States. On this point I have great sympathy with the hon. member for North Norfolk. I think it would be a good thing if we passed a law to prevent newspapers called Sunday papers from being sold in this country on Sunday or any other day. The amendment of the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) is the only part of the Bill that reaches the object. The other part would not have the effect sought to be accomplished by the hon. member for North Norfolk, and which I will help him to accomplish, and that is to prevent papers calling themselves Sunday newspapers being sold in this country. It is true, no doubt, as the hon. member for North Brant has stated, that some of these papers published in the United States on Sunday are good papers; but we will all admit that most of the Sunday newspapers have not the best tendency, and a great many of them contain much matter which will tend to lower the moral standard. I have listened attentively to the remarks made by the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram). While there is some truth in the statement that you cannot make men moral by Act of Parliament, yet you can keep men moral by Act of Parliament in a great measure, and you can remove the temptation from young men and women by legislation. While we may say generally that you cannot make men moral by Act of Parliament, yet a great many laws tending to morality are passed for that purpose. I believe this Bill, if it should accomplish the object of preventing Sunday newspapers coming in from the United States and prevent newspapers calling themselves Sunday papers being published here, would have a good effect. I was rather surprised to hear the very broad sentiments expressed by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler), when he said he does not believe in the prohibition of any newspaper. I do not believe any one will go so far as to say that if a man cannot stand the yellow papers, he has not much moral stamina. I do not agree with such a sentiment. It may be true as regards people of mature age; but when these newspapers fall into the hands of boys and girls they have a degrading influence on those who happen to read them. I am not discussing such a paper as the London "Times," but the yellow papers coming here from the United States. It is very well to talk of the London "Times" and papers of that class, but we must take the general class. It may be there are some good papers, but it will be admitted by all hon. members that the great majority of the Sunday papers coming in from the United States are not papers of a very high moral tone, and for that reason I am prepared to support this Bill and am prepared to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Haldimand the other day, because I think it is an essential feature of the Bill. I am opposed to moving the House into committee for the purpose of immediately proposing a resolution that the committee rise, because as the hon. member for North Norfolk has said, we went into committee to consider certain matters.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). With a great deal of what has fallen from the lips of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) every one agrees. We are all extremely anxious to see the moral character of the people raised to a very high standard indeed, and I am also sure we all agree as to the necessity of keeping our homes sacred against the pernicious influence of improper literature. But with what are we called on to deal? Let us get down to the Bill. We are called on to declare the sale of newspapers on Sunday to be a crime. Why should it be a crime to sell a newspaper on Sunday if it is not a crime to sell any other article of commerce? If it be a crime to sell a newspaper on Sunday, why do you make a distinction between what we would call an ordinary, every day newspaper and a religious newspaper? What is the object of the sale? It is the newspaper. If the character of the newspaper can be weighed in the matter, if character is to be made an essential element, I say we have the right to deal with the matter now. If we want to prevent these imported newspapers reaching our homes and being circulated, we have the right to deal with the matter. We have the right now, and the law enables us to do it. All we have to do is to read the Criminal Code, and it will be found to meet the case that we have been talking about. All this desire to shut the door against the yellow newspapers will be found covered by hon. members if they read the Criminal Code, and the section applying to the subject. Section 179 says:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment, who knowingly, without lawful justification or excuse publicly sells or exposes for sale or to public view any obscene book or other printed or written matter, or any picture, photograph, model or other objects tending to corrupt morals.

What more do hon. members want? It seems to me we are encroaching—I say it with all deference and respect to the opinion of the late Sir John Thompson—upon the rights of the local legislatures, which alone have the right to deal with this question so far as the right of Sunday sales of newspapers or any other article of commerce is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Brodeur). The question is that I do now leave the Chair.

Mr. CHARLTON. I rise to a question of order. That is not the question this House is considering.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Brodeur). Yes, the motion has been made by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), that I do now leave the Chair.

Mr. CHARLTON. The House directed that we should go into committee on subsection 2.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Brodeur). That is perfectly true, but at the same time after we got into committee a motion was made that I do now leave the Chair, and I have put the question.

Mr. CHARLTON. I regret to say that I consider this irregular and a breach of the direction of the House. I shall feel myself called upon to move at the earliest possible date, if this motion is carried, that this Bill be restored to the Order paper. We shall fight this thing on a different basis from this mode of assassination.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). We should meet this question like men and let us meet it now. It is a subterfuge to move that the committee rise; the question will come before us again.

An hon. MEMBER. All right.

Mr. FRASER. The manly way is to vote for or against the Bill, and I am against this motion. I am not in sympathy with laws that attempt to make men moral.

Mr. MACLEAN. Oh.

Mr. FRASER. I believe that morality is never achieved by Act of Parliament, but you are not going to stop this Bill by simply moving that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. MACLEAN. There is no reporting progress about it.

Mr. FRASER. Neither is this Bill going to be killed by abusing the introducer. The question is the Bill and not the introducer, and nothing will be gained by abusing the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton). It is not a dignified way to meet a Bill like this by throwing taunts at the hon. gentleman. If hon. gentlemen in this House think that this legislation should not be passed let them have the courage to say so, but do not let them try to remove it from the scene for the present as if it was a nightmare of some kind. I am ready to vote now.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We all want to vote.

Mr. FRASER. I object to the motion to rise and report progress.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fraser) is mistaken. There is no reporting progress at all in this motion.

Mr. FRASER. What is the motion?

Mr. MACLEAN. It is to rise and kill the Bill.

Mr. FRASER. That is still worse. If we want to kill the Bill let us kill by a straight vote.

Mr. MACLEAN. There are several ways of killing a cat.

Mr. FRASER. Whatever my views might be on the straight question, I shall certainly vote against this motion.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I do not wish the statement made by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) to go uncontradicted; that any hon. member who has spoken on this Bill has taunted the hon. mover (Mr. Charlton).

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I do not think that statement is correct. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) was not in the House; he came in late; he does not know what he is talking about.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. There was no taunt thrown at the hon. member for North Norfolk.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes, there was.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Well, I have been here all the time and I did not hear it, and so far as I am concerned I want it to be understood that I have the highest respect for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton), but I think he is making a mistake in this legislation. If the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) would sit in his place in the House he would know what is going on.

Mr. FRASER. I suppose that if a member is not here all the time, when he is here he is capable of forming an opinion. The member for Toronto (Mr. Osler) did taunt the hon. member for North Norfolk, and if the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Somerville) is deaf and did not hear, I cannot help that. The hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Osler) spoke of this legislation as grandmotherly legislation.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. That was said on the other side.

Mr. FRASER. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Somerville) mean to say that words said on that side of the House are not worth attention. If the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Somerville) did not hear he must have been sleeping as is his usual custom in the House. It is better not to be here at all than to be asleep. The hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Osler) was to say the least of it rather profane when he spoke of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) as being here with a brief from the Almighty. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Somerville) does not seem to have heard that.

Mr. McCLURE. I am inclined to agree largely with the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser). I do not believe in Sunday newspapers and I do not believe in this Bill. The only thing I see in favour of the Bill is some of the opposition to it. Neither do I believe in assassination, and I believe that the members of this House who are opposed to this Bill should say so manfully.

Mr. MACLEAN. That is what we are doing now.

Mr. McCLURE. I am prepared when the question comes up to vote against the Bill, but I will not vote to assassinate it in this way.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Brodeur). The question is that I do now leave the Chair.

BETTER OBSERVANCE OF THE LORD'S DAY.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker : As a continuation of the proceedings on Bill No. 2, I shall move to have that Bill reinstated upon the Order paper. I mentioned that intention last night, for the reason that an expression of this House on this Bill has not yet been taken in a due and proper manner. Had a vote of this House been recorded adverse to this Bill I should have bowed to the decision of my peers in Parliament, but such has not been the case. Last night a motion was made to go into committee to deal with a certain subsection of the Bill, and when that motion carried and the House went into committee, the mover of that motion, instead of proceeding to deal legitimately with the subject that the House delegated to the committee, moved that the committee rise, with the object of destroying the Bill. That motion was put to the vote and carried. There is no record of that vote. I repeat that I am quite willing to abide by the decision of this House, but I desire that the hon. gentlemen should come out of the woods and put their names on record, so that we might know who and where they are, and where they belong. This is not the first occasion that this sort of tactics has been resorted to. It is not the first occasion that I have had reason to complain of the assassination of a Bill, instead of meeting it openly and fairly, and either voting it down or carrying it by an open vote of the House. I prefer to attempt again to get an expression from this House, so that the country may know who favour the Bill by their votes and who not. I think I am entitled to that degree of fair-play, and I never shall surrender until I get it, if I live long enough to carry out my intention.

The Bill, of course, is one that I thoroughly believe is necessary for the good of this country. It is a Bill which many of my friends believe is not necessary. I have no quarrel with any member of this House, because he does not agree with me, but I have quarrel with any member of the House who has not the courage to go on record and let the country see where he stands. So long as the Bill is settled in the way it was last night, by a standing vote without a record, so long the country will be in ignorance of the character of the opposition to the Bill in this House, and the constituencies of the various members will be unable to relegate the responsibility where it belongs. I maintain that it is not a high-minded and honourable course to pursue with reference to any great public measure, and that is the chief reason I have for making the motion which I now present to the House, moved by myself and seconded by my esteemed friend (Mr. Scriver) :

That this House will, on Monday next, resolve itself again into a Committee of the Whole to consider further the Bill (No. 2) entitled An Act to secure the better observance of the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday, as a day of rest.

Mr. MACLEAN. I merely wish to say that it is one of the time-honoured rights of Parliament to deal with a Bill in the way in which this Bill was dealt with last night. Any number of Bills have been dealt with in this way by the British Parliament, by this Parliament and by every British legislature in the world. The hon. gentleman has attacked and called dishonourable this time-honoured right of Parliament; and if for no other reason I intend to vote in vindication of the rights of Parliament in this matter.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I wish to say a word with regard to the proposal to reinstate this Bill. I voted against it last night in the House and in the committee. I did not then state all the reasons why I voted against it. We have the assurance of the Solicitor General, and we can see for ourselves, that the Dominion law, the Criminal Code, provides for the punishment of any infractions of the Lord's Day. We know that the statutes of the province of Ontario and of all the other provinces of the Dominion provide for the observance of the Lord's Day. We have the law in force now, not only in the Dominion but in all the provinces, to the same effect as the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) wishes now to enact by this Bill. Now, I have been a member of this House for a good many years, and I have been for ten or twelve years supporting the hon. member for North Norfolk in his endeavour to promote this kind of legislation, and I find now that I cannot longer continue to do so, for various reasons. You know, the Liberal party is in power now. We made a great many pledges, not only in this House but in the country, that we were going to do a great many things when we got into power. One of the things we were chiefly interested in was economy; yet I find that for the last ten or twelve years we have been expending a large amount of money for this useless legislation, as I consider it, because we have devoted about two days every session during that time to its consideration. This useless legislation has cost this country about $5,000 or $6,000 every session, and I think it is time now that we should put a stop to it. I am not sure but we have spent enough in the last ten or twelve years on this Bill to pay the salary of the Governor General, $50,000, for a whole year. We have spent enough in that time, Mr. Speaker, to pay your salary for twelve or fourteen years; and we can now see that there is no use of continuing to spend money in promoting legislation which is already of the Dominion Statute-book, and on the statute-books of the various provinces. This is the reason why I oppose the reinstating of this Bill on the Orders of the House. I think we have been fooling long enough with this measure. It may be said by the promoter of this Bill that it is not a proper thing to defeat the Bill on a motion that the committee rise; but when legislation is proposed in the House that is useless and that incurs unnecessary expenditure, I think it is proper to stop it by any means within the scope of Parliament.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the vote is taken, I wish to state why I am going to vote against the motion. We have already, this session as in previous sessions, had this Bill before the House. It has had two or three days of legitimate discussion. There is other business to be done quite as important as this. The House has expressed its idea on the Bill, and I am of opinion that it should remain that way.

Mr. HENDERSON. I wish to say that I supported this Bill in all its previous stages during the present session, as well as a Bill of the same kind on former occasions. But to my mind the sentiment of this House was fully shown last night to be opposed to the Bill, and I, for one, am against taking up any more of the time of the House upon it during this session. I think the hon. gentleman who is promoting the Bill has had sufficient time allotted for its consideration, and whatever his purpose may be in bringing it forward, I realize that he has accomplished as much at any rate as he expected when he introduced it. For these reasons I will vote against the motion.

House divided on motion of Mr. Charlton :

Motion negatived.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) did not vote.

Mr. TAYLOR. I have a standing pair with the chief whip of the Government, who is not in his place.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Is it premature to ask my right hon. friend what action the Government propose to take on this defeat?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I propose to leave the Sabbath to the laws of the provinces.

Mr. BERGERON. He did not vote that way.

The PRIME MINISTER. I bow to the will of the majority.

HARBOUR OF ST. JOHN.

Mr. ELLIS moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 101) respecting the harbour of St. John, N.B.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ellis) please explain the object of this Bill?

Mr. ELLIS. It is a private Bill, but I may say, that as a result of the amalgamation of the two cities, Portland and St. John, it has become necessary to bring the Portland portion of the harbour, Indian Town harbour, and the St. John harbour under one management.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

MISSAQUASH COMMISSIONERS OF SEWERS.

Mr. LOGAN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 103) to confirm certain public Acts of the legislatures of the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, so far as they relate to the Missaquash Commissioners of Sewers. He said: I may state that this Bill has reference to marsh lands which lie partly in the province of Nova Scotia and partly in the province of New Brunswick. By statute of Nova Scotia, chapter 42, power is given for the appointment of commissioners and, by chapter 115 of the Consolidated Statutes of the province of New Brunswick, similar power is given, and these commissioners are given power to reclaim lands. This Bill is designed to give power to improve certain marshes and to confirm Acts of the two provinces with regard to marsh lands that lie partly in one province and partly in the other.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

TERRITORIAL EXHIBITION—ACCOUNT OF P. LAMONT.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

Whether the account of P. Lamont for $93 is included in the Territorial Exhibition account and will be included in the Exhibition item in the Estimates? If not, why not?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). Mr. P. Lamont's account amounted to $93.70, and $10 of it was paid, leaving a balance of $83.70 still due. This amount is in the approved accounts and will be paid to Mr. Lamont when a revote is made, which, I hope, will be made this year.

THE PRINTING BUREAU.

Mr. COPP asked,

Who is the superintendent of the Printing Bureau? When was he employed? What profession or calling did he follow previous to his appointment? Is he a practical printer? What are his duties? What is his salary? What were the total number of persons employed in the Printing Bureau, both inside and outside, on June 23rd, 1896? What changes, if any, have been made or taken place since said date? What was the total expenditure of said Printing Bureau for the years ending 30th June, 1895, 1896, 1897?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). There is no superintendent of the Printing Bureau. The superintendent of printing is Mr. William McMahon. He was first appointed on July 11, 1888, under the statute of first organization. He occupied for 17 years previous to his appointment a similar position to his present one with the contractors for Government printing. He was chief managing clerk with the contractors when the Bureau was organized. He is not a compositor but he has had the management of a printing office for 28 years, during which time he has been supervising the printing of the Canadian Government either under the contractors or at the Bureau. His duties are the management of the operatives and the superintendence of the manufacturing branch of the Bureau; including printing, stereotyping, binding, manufacture of blank books, and the manufacture of everything made in the building. The total number of persons employed in the Printing Bureau on June 23, 1896, was 416. The only changes made have been the usual suspensions of hands at the close of sessions of Parliament and their re-engagement when preparation is made for the assembling of Parliament. The number of hands varies in proportion to the work.

Mr. LOGAN.

Among the clerks one second-class clerk resigned last year. The post was abolished and his work was divided among others. Among the packers and carters four vacancies occurred by death or resignation. These were filled up and one new packer was added. The total expenditure of the Printing Bureau, including purchases of all kinds, for the years ending June 30th, in 1895, was $675,607; in 1896, was $612,415; in 1897, was $618,070; of which the details are printed in the annual report of the department.

SCHOOL LANDS IN MANITOBA.

Mr. LaRIVIERE asked,

When have sales been held of school lands in the province of Manitoba? What acreage of lands sold, and the price per acre? What is the total amount realized? What interest has been allowed, or added to, the amount thus realized? What charges or expenses have been debited to the school lands account? What sums have been paid over to the Provincial Government of Manitoba from the school lands fund, with the dates of said payments?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. Auction sales of school lands in Manitoba were held in 1882-83, 1883-84, 1886-87, 1887-88, 1888-89, 1891-92 and 1892-93. 2. 87,642.93 acres were disposed of at these sales; but, through cancellation of sales, 3,195.77 acres reverted, making an area of 84,451.16 acres actually disposed of, up to the 31st December last. The average price per acre was $7.68. 3. $650,960.71 is the amount for which the land actually disposed of was sold. The amount received up to the 31st December, 1897, was $512,186.05. 4. Interest at 6 per cent, amounting to $76,355.81, is included in this amount. 5. The School Lands Fund has been debited with a loan of $30,000, made in 1879 and 1884 to the province of Manitoba, and with the expenses of management, consisting of inspection expenses, commission on sales, advertising, clerical assistance and printing and stationery, which amounted to $28,940.73. 6. The following sums have been paid to the Provincial Government of Manitoba from the School Lands Fund, on account of interest:—

Mr. SPEAKER. I would take advantage of the last two questions that have been asked, to suggest to hon. members that, when a question consists of a number of subsections, it would be much more convenient to number them, or to letter them, so that each subsection could be made to correspond with a similar designation in the answer.

MILITIA PROMOTIONS.

Mr. MONK asked,

1. How many field officers of the active militia have been promoted to the command of corps since 1st September, 1897, without their being in possession of equitation certificates? Were such promotions made in accordance with Militia General Orders?

2. How many officers have been promoted to field rank, and how many officers appointed adjutants of corps of the active militia since 1st September, 1897, without their being in possession of certificates of equitation? Were such promotions and appointments made in accordance with Militia General Orders?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I have received from Colonel Aylmer, the Adjutant General, on behalf of the General Officer Commanding, the following statement:—

1. Four. Two were made in accordance with Militia General Orders. The remaining two were, through inadvertence, passed during the first two weeks the new regulations were in force. These two officers have been called upon to obtain the necessary certificate. One has already done so; the other will without delay.

2. Six. Two were in accordance with Militia General Orders. In two cases officers were given their brevet majority, which they were entitled to and would have received before the regulations came into force, if they had made application. In another case, an officer was given brevet majority as a special case. The remaining case was owing to a clerical error. In all these cases steps have been taken to have the provisions of the General Order carried out.

LIQUOR PERMITS FOR THE KLONDIKE.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

Has a permit, or have permits to take liquor into the Klondike district been given to William Chambers, clerk of the County Court, Oak Lake? If so, for what quantity?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). A permit to take 1,000 gallons of liquor into the Yukon district has been granted to William Chambers, of Oak Lake, Manitoba.

Mr. DAVIN. What date?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The hon. gentleman did not ask the date; I have not got it.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

Has a permit been given to one or more persons hitherto living in Brandon, to take liquor into the Klondike district? If so, for what quantity?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. No permits to take liquor into the Yukon district have been issued to any person, or persons, hitherto living in Brandon, Manitoba.

Mr. CRAIG. A few days ago, I asked a question about permits for taking whisky into the Yukon district. Is the hon. gentleman able to answer it to-day?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I have had prepared this return, showing the liquor permits granted by the Lieutenant-Governor of the Northwest Territories for the Yukon district, since January 1st, 1897:

THE FRANCHISE ACT.

Mr. CASGRAIN. (Translation.) Before the Orders of the day are called, I would like to call the attention of my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) to the fact that the French copy of the schedule of the Bill to amend the Franchise Act has not yet been printed and distributed. The English copy of that schedule, which is a very important paper, has already been distributed with the Bill. We wish to have it translated into French and printed. A great many hon. gentlemen want that paper very particularly. That schedule contains not only a list of some provincial statutes, but also a certain number of enactments in force in the various provinces of the Dominion. Now, it is desirable that that paper should be immediately translated into French, printed and distributed.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick.) (Translation.) I cannot understand the reason why that schedule was not translated into French and printed, as it is embodied in the Bill now before the House. Now, the Bill having been translated into French, the schedule should likewise have been translated.

Mr. BERGERON. (Translation.) That matter should be attended to without delay.

CATTLE SHIPMENTS TO THE UNITED KINGDOM.

Mr. HUGHES. I take this opportunity, as it is the only one, perhaps, of which I shall be able to avail myself, to bring before the House the question which I intended to submit the other day, when I found myself out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman proposes to put himself in order, I suppose.

Mr. HUGHES. Yes, I shall conclude my remarks with a motion. Under the British cattle regulations no cattle can be landed in Dublin, Belfast or Cork, in Ireland, and this restriction specially interferes with the cattle trade of Canada, and therefore I take the liberty of bringing it to the notice of the House. A number of vessels sail from Montreal every day in the week carrying cattle for ports in Scotland and England. Other large ones sail regularly from Montreal to Ireland, but those vessels are not allowed to carry cattle, and therefore we are handicapped as regards that trade. Our shippers also find during the shipping season a shortage of space, there is a lack of adequate storage accommodation in the summer particularly, and the cattle rates are thereby increased. If it could be brought about that our cattle could be taken to ports in Ireland, to Belfast, Dublin and Cork on these fine steamers, the same as they are carried to English and Scotch ports, I am satisfied it would make a very great difference in the rates our shippers are obliged to pay on cattle going across the ocean. I have a letter here to show the extent of the trade between Canadian ports and Irish ports, from which I shall read the following extract:—

In view of the traffic in Canadian cattle coming eventually to Ireland, we are at present negotiating for another very large steamer, which will carry over 9,000 tons, and if we could get permission to carry cattle she would be regularly employed in the Canadian trade.

For your information we inclose a comparative statements of the imports into Ireland by our lines during 1896-97. We are now running a regular winter line from St. John, under the subsidy arrangement, and are bringing forward immense quantities of Canadian products that never before came to Ireland. Five steamers have already been loaded and sailed this season, and we contemplate making a total of ten sailings before the end of April. Canadian flour is imported here now to a very large extent, while two years ago it was hardly known. Large quantities of rye and other grain are coming forward, and whereas last year we had almost entirely to depend upon wood goods from St. John, this season we are almost independent of wood, and our boats are entirely filled with general cargo of Canadian produce.

The steamship line referred to is the Ulster Steamship Company, the vessels of which run from St. John in the winter and from Montreal in the summer. I am satisfied from the vast carrying capacity of those vessels that if they were allowed to carry cattle to Ireland, it would result in a great benefit to Dublin, Belfast and Cork, and would also benefit our Canadian farmers by leading to a reduction of freight rates across the Atlantic. I draw the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to this subject, and I make the ordinary motion that the House do now adjourn.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). I desire to say a few words on this subject, not that I take any exception to the hon. gentleman's remarks, for they are such as will commend themselves to the House and the country. The condition of affairs, however, in regard to the question of landing our Canadian cattle at Belfast is one not so easy to overcome. We had considerable correspondence with the department in England, both before I came into office and since in reference to the establishment of abattoirs and cattle yards at Belfast for the landing of Canadian cattle. Representations were made to the Home Government, and they considered the question of the establishment of such yards, and referred the matter to the Government officials in Ireland, and they reported adversely. First, on the ground that there would be danger of the introduction of cattle disease into Ireland, Ireland at the present time being apparently more free from cattle disease than England or Scotland. Further, they pointed out that this was not a question as regards Canada alone, but by their regulations if cattle were allowed to come in from abroad, there would be no distinction made as between the cattle of one country and another, and if the Government established cattle yards for cattle brought in from abroad, they would be unable to discriminate and allow the cattle of one country to be there and not cattle of another country. So long as these countries are scheduled, our animals are prohibited altogether. At present in the whole country, speaking from memory, I think there are only four places where foreign cattle are allowed to be landed, namely, Deptford, for the London market; Bristol, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow; and the Imperial authorities seem to object to enlarging the number of those places, first, on general principles; second, on the ground that when you come to the particular case of Canadian cattle, if they allowed Canadian cattle to come in, they must also allow the cattle of foreign countries, and in the particular case referred to, the matter was referred to the Imperial authorities in Ireland, and they reported against the proposal. The firm whose letter the hon. gentleman has just read have a line of steamers running from Montreal to Liverpool, and they made the generous offer to the Imperial authorities to provide the necessary accommodation and secure the perfect banishment of the cattle to such yards if they were established, and I am sure it is only because of the general policy of the Imperial Government that they are halting in meeting the views of those gentlemen. I will take occasion to again urge our High Commissioner in England, Lord Strathcona, to make representations to the Imperial Government, and I hope that, in view of certain events which have occurred recently, the Imperial Government will be more willing to extend a privilege which would be for the benefit of the Canadian trade; and knowing, as I do, the kind expressions uttered by the Ministers, especially the Secretary for the Colonies, I yet hope we may be able to secure the privilege which we were not able to procure when the correspondence under my hand originally took place.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The importance of this subject has been put before the House by the two hon. gentlemen who have spoken, and I shall not attempt to refer to it except to endorse the statement of the Minister as to the difficulty we have always found in securing the privilege to which my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Hughes) alluded. I rise for the purpose of asking the Minister of Agriculture: What efforts have been made during the past year to secure the repeal of the statute which prohibits Canadian stockers from the fields of Great Britain and Ireland? When the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) announced to us that he had removed the quarantine restrictions as against the importation of American cattle, he was pleased to tell the House that he had not abandoned the hope of eventually securing the removal of the embargo against Canadian cattle in Great Britain. I hope the hon. gentleman has been endeavouring to bring to bear such influence as will finally succeed in that direction, and I should be glad if he will tell me, not only what efforts have been made but with what success his efforts have been met. There can be to my mind no more important question so far as the farming and stock-raising interests of Canada are concerned, and I sincerely hope that we have not a Government in power that will give up the agitation which was so long continued by their predecessors, which was so well fought by the present leader of the Opposition, and in which Canadians are so much interested. I sincerely hope we have not a Government in power that have given up that fight and have abandoned the hope of securing these advantages for us in the markets of Great Britain. I am sure the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) agrees with me, that the contention made by the British Board of Agriculture did not have a leg to stand on in regard to the unhealthy condition of Canadian herds, and if it had no foundation when the Conservative Government were fighting that point with the British Board of Agriculture, it certainly has less foundation now, since a couple of years have passed by and since the health of Canadian herds has continued to be successfully established and maintained in the meanwhile. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) is now in a rather better position than even we were to fight that point out with the British Board of Agriculture, and to win success for Canada.

I should like to ask him, too, whether the British Board of Agriculture has been advised that the ninety days quarantine against the importation of American cattle has been removed by this Government, and whether any opinion has been expressed by the British authorities on that point, and as regards its bearing on the contention Canada has been making for the removal of the embargo on our cattle.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). If I may claim the indulgence of the House I shall be glad to answer the questions of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague). In the first place I may say that the correspondence in regard to the Belfast Lairages shows that the contention of the British Government at the time when our cattle were scheduled, did have some influence with them in refusing to allow these cattle yards to be established in Belfast.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Quite so.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. They did not put that forward as by any means the only reason, but the question of convenience and the question of foreign cattle being obliged to come in as well as Canadian, have been the chief ground of their objection. I can assure the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) that I have not forgotten the position of affairs in regard to our cattle landing in England. Although I have not had any official correspondence with the Imperial authorities urging them to remove that embargo, I have had a good deal of conversation with Lord Strathcona, our High Commissioner, and he has informed me that he did not consider that last summer was a particularly favourable juncture for urging upon the Imperial authorities any action in this matter. I allowed myself to be largely guided by his opinion, because I thought that he was more familiar with political affairs in the old country, and more familiar with the personnel of the Government than I was; and not having had myself an opportunity of visiting England or discussing these matters with the authorities, I allowed myself to a great extent to be guided by his opinion. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) and the House will concur with me that the opinion of Lord Strathcona is one which may be fairly entitled to all respect. I may say further, that just recently the chief quarantine officer, Dr. McEachran, had to go to England on private business, and I asked him to inquire with regard to that matter. Dr. McEachran had several communications, which were entirely informal, with the veterinary authorities in England, and he also had communication with the Right Hon. Walter Long, President of the Board of Agriculture. That gentleman said that he thought it was quite impossible for us to hope for the removal of the embargo now.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Did he state his grounds?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No; he just said in a general way, that he thought it was an impossible thing at the present time. Dr. McEachran had conversations with gentlemen who are connected with the veterinary profession, amongst others. Professor Brown, one of the chief veterinarians, and Professor Brown said (I now quote from memory) that the veterinary profession in England had never really believed there was any disease in Canada, but that unfortunately we had got it from the United States and we had thereby forced them to pass this regrettable regulation scheduling our cattle. That of course was not an official declaration or communication in any way. I regret to say, I fear that at the present time, judging from what I have heard, there is not much prospect of our being able shortly to have the embargo done away with. I can appreciate the feelings of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague), I can assure him that I entertain the same, and I believe it would be very desirable if we could secure the removal of that embargo. We would then not only have the present advantages of having our cattle slaughtered at the port of landing, but where it is desirable we would be able to send them into the country, and export a class of stock which at the present time we cannot send to England.

By reason of the arrangement I was able to make last year we have got a market for that stock in the United States; a market which has proven itself to be so advantageous that—speaking again from memory, but sufficiently accurate for my purpose—that last October, when I was attending a meeting of agriculturists in the western part of Ontario, I was able to state to them, that while, during the years the quarantine existed against us in the United States less than 6,000 head of cattle had been sold into the United States; in the eight months since that quarantine had been taken off up to the date at which I was speaking, over 78,000 head of cattle had been sold to the United States from Canada. You can thus see what an enormous advantage that export of stockers has been to our markets, not only because we have been able to sell these animals, but because in consequence of their sale the market here has been relieved of a surplus, by which relief the live stock which is held in Canada has appreciated considerably in value. I believe that was one of the chief reasons why during the past summer, Canadian beef cattle on the whole were at a fair price. But, Sir, I am still satisfied, that if we can get entry into the old country for our stockers we would have two strings to our bow, and be so much better off. I can assure the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) that if there is anything in my power I can do I will be only too glad to do it to accomplish that end.

As to whether any remark was made by the English authorities upon the opening of our cattle market to the United States, and which would militate against our obtaining an entry into England, I may say that in the conversations which took place through Lord Strathcona and Dr. McEachran, they found that no such objection was raised, and the British authorities did not interpose that as any further reason why we should not be able to secure consideration.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture just another question, and I hope I am not intruding on your generosity, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER. The generosity of the House.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The generosity of the House, which is expressed through you, Sir. I should like to ask the hon. Minister of Agriculture, whether or not, at the time the Prime Minister was in England, discussing with the Colonial Secretary the question of the preferential tariff, an opportunity was taken of trying to secure the removal of this obnoxious legislation. It appears to me that, instead of the time not being opportune, the time was most opportune; because, if I am correctly informed of the sentiment in Great Britain, from personal observation, as well as from the opinion of those in high places, I am quite convinced, as I believe this House is convinced, that the sentiment in Great Britain which goes to the support of the Act which prevents Canadian stockers going into Great Britain, is a sentiment of protection as regards the cattle industry, rather than one of consideration for the health of their herds; so that, I take it, the best opportunity that ever occurred for asking for its removal was at the time this Government was giving preferential tariff treatment to Great Britain.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. If I may trespass on the forbearance of the House—

Mr. SPEAKER. I hope the hon. gentleman will be very short, because this is out of order.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Certainly. In the first place, I may say that the communications and negotiations between the right hon. Prime Minister and the Colonial Secretary were entirely confidential in their character, and, therefore, cannot be divulged. But I would further say to the hon. gentleman, that, as we gave the preferential tariff advantages to England without making any bargain, I do not think any bargaining of that kind would have been at all opportune.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, I can assure the hon. Minister that the people of the North-west Territories would have been well pleased, if the Prime Minister had bargained in order to get our cattle relieved of this embargo. I am very glad, however, to hear from the Minister that he does not intend to relax his efforts in trying to get rid of this objectionable legislation, and the people of the North-west will be very much obliged to my hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Montague) for bringing the matter to his attention in the manner he has done.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

THE PROHIBITION PLEBISCITE.

Mr. CRAIG. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to ask the Premier when the Bill providing for taking the plebiscite on the question of prohibition will be introduced.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). As soon as we have cleared the deck of the legislation which is now before the House, the Bill will be introduced forthwith.

JAPANESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. DAVIN. I wish to mention a matter of great importance, of Imperial importance, of which I have given the Prime Minister notice. I have seen a letter from a high Japanese official, stating that a high Japanese diplomatic officer has telegraphed to his Government that the Government of Canada intends to pass a Bill imposing a tax of $500 on each Japanese coming into this country. As things are at present, looking at the Imperial position and the advantage to England of friendship with the England of those eastern seas, inhabited by the Anglo-Saxons of the yellow races, I think it would be important that the Japanese Government should know what is the attitude of the Government of Canada in regard to the rumour which this official has set afloat.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I may tell my hon. friend, that I have received a communication from the Japanese Consul at Vancouver, and I hope he will be satisfied with the answer which I have sent to him. I think the hon. gentleman can feel assured that the answer I gave was satisfactory. With regard to the other branch of his question, I can tell the hon.

gentleman, that the Government have no intention of introducing any such legislation at all.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—THE LUMBER SCHEDULE.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would be very much obliged, if the colleagues of the Minister of Railways would suggest to him the propriety of bringing down and laying on the Table the last lumber schedule of the Intercolonial Railway. There have been several tariffs arranged. I understand, this year; and, as a great number of inquiries have been made with regard to it, it would be useful, if he would lay the last schedule on the Table at the next meeting of the House.

ENCOURAGEMENT OF THE BUTTER TRADE.

House resumed consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Reid in favour of granting a bonus for the encouragement of the export trade in butter.

Mr. POPE. Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair, yesterday, for dinner, I was pointing out the importance of the question then under consideration. I fear that my appreciation of this question is not fully shared by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, for I fancy that, when the adjournment of the debate was moved, they did not then thoroughly understand the position the resolution would occupy on the Order paper to-day, or possibly it would not now occupy the favourable position it does. Those hon. gentlemen have expressed their deep interest in the agricultural portion of our population. The hon. member for North Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Frost) delivered a speech yesterday in which he assured us that he was in every way very sympathetic with the interests of the farming community; but he did not think it was necessary that a bonus of a cent a pound, or any inducement, should be offered to the butter industry of this country. Well, I am sure that, when the members of this House know the very comfortable position which that hon. gentleman occupies, under the tariff of this country, when they realize that he is drawing, day by day, a revenue because those features of the tariff which affect his business as a manufacturer of agricultural implements have been left undisturbed, it will not lend special weight to the remarks made by that hon. gentleman. Hon. gentlemen opposite, when they were on this side of the House, claimed for years that they were the true friends of the farmers of this country. They advertised themselves as such by their speeches in this House and throughout the country, and they declared that, when they came into power, the great agricultural interests of the country would receive the consideration which they had never received before ; that the duties on the articles which were so essential to the prosperity of the farmers of this country would be removed ; that they would no longer be weighed down by the oppression of a high tariff, that free trade throughout the length and breadth of the country would take the place of the sinful, wicked tariff of the Conservative party. Well, we have seen, I believe, the duties somewhat lowered upon wheat, we have seen the duties somewhat lowered upon flour, but when it comes to agricultural implements, the interests of which industry are buoyed up by my hon. friend from Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Frost) we do not find any reduction. What special benefit or gain would come to the wheat and flour-producing people of Canada by the removal of the duties it is difficult, of course, for hon. gentlemen on this side to understand, but we are bound, I suppose, to accept it as a part of the wise policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. They have, however, the advantage over us of being able to argue that the statements they made during the last seventeen or eighteen years were then in the interests of the people of this country, but that since the change which has taken place by their crossing from this side of the House to the other—not more than twenty feet between the two sides, the chairs practically cushioned the same, but the salary attached to some of the front seats larger—these statements must be completely reversed. It must be the larger salary connected with the hon. gentlemen opposite who sit on the front benches and formulate a policy for their sheep-like following that makes the policy which for seventeen years they denounced in Opposition a perfectly sound policy when it comes to be handled by them in office.

The hon. Minister of Agriculture never was a warm friend of the butter-producing interests of this country. But I must do him the justice of saying that he was not hypocritical, he did not blind his constituents to the fact. In that particular, the hon. gentleman was always fair. We find in a speech delivered by him a few years ago, that he put himself on record on that question. He then assured the farmers and the people of Canada that he was not blinded to the greater interests of Canada, and was not going to do anything for the sake of fostering the dairy industry of any particular locality or of Canada as a whole. We find that in a debate which took place in this House he used those words :

But anxious as I am to see the agricultural interests, and especially the dairy interest, of the country carefully guarded—and I say this as representing one of the greatest dairy counties in this Dominion, a county according to the last census which made the second greatest amount of butter of any county in the Dominion—still I do not wish to see the dairy interest guarded at the expense of any other interest in the Dominion.

Mr. POPE.

There we find the hon. gentleman declaring frankly that, so far as he was concerned, the dairy interest of Canada need never look to him as a special friend.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE.
Give the date of that.

Mr. POPE. The session of 1886, vol. 1, pages 549 and 550.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE.
Hear, hear.

Mr. POPE. A little further on, at page 550, we find this warning recorded coming from the hon. gentleman :

I do not see why the production of these articles—that is, oleomargarine and butterine—should be forbidden in this country, and if it does work an inconvenience to the dairymen of the country, their true remedy would be to manufacture a still better article of butter.

The hon. gentleman went so far as to put himself on record in favour of substituting oleomargarine and butterine for butter in this country. We have therefore no right to expect from him, if he is still true to his policy on record, any great assistance in the development of the dairy interests of Canada. But perhaps the hon. gentleman has changed in that particular, as these hon. gentlemen have changed in every other particular, and possibly to-day he is prepared to reverse the policy he formerly advocated. But I thought, when I heard the hon. gentleman in his own constituency during the last election, that he was still of the same opinion. We were there discussing the question of cold storage and the fast line of steamers, and the hon. gentleman was arguing to his constituents against the introduction of cold storage and the establishment of the fast line. I notice that he looks somewhat astonished. Sir, whenever you call these hon. gentlemen back to any record of theirs, they always look astonished. That seems to be their only answer. In fact, the other night some of them objected because we were referring to the past, and voiced their objection by a chorus of "oh, ohs." That was their only answer when hon. gentlemen on this side dared, for the sake of comparison, ask them for a moment to consider seriously the policy they had formerly laid down on the floor of this House, and offered to the people for criticism and consideration. But despite their "oh, ohs," we propose to call these hon. gentlemen to account, by contrasting the pledges they made in the past with their conduct in the present. If they have not carried out these pledges, they have to take the consequences and receive the censure that is due to every political organization, no matter what its name may be, that stands up seriously before the electorate and makes solemn promises and pledges and then fails to carry them out when the people have given it the opportunity of doing so. We have the right to call upon them to stand still and mark time until the people of Canada can give their record serious consideration.

The hon. gentleman has taken considerable credit to himself and has been given a good deal of credit by certain people for the establishment of the cold storage system in this country, so far as it has gone, but it is a matter of record, to be found in the Estimates and the reports of this country, that the establishment of cold storage is not due to these hon. gentlemen. I am bound to say that I feel ashamed of the little progress which has been made in that system under the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite. When I saw that he was to be Minister of Agriculture, and that the introduction of that system was therefore to be entrusted in his hands, I knew that we would have to wait for his conversion to the project, I knew we would have to give him some time to change the position which he then held on that question. What are the facts? Take any of the countries that export agricultural products to England, take Australia, New Zealand, South America, take any portion of the known globe, and you will find that we are the only country exporting to Great Britain which has not to-day a perfect system of cold storage. That we, who stand better in the financial market, who are the largest exporters of agricultural products of all kinds, and the greatest producers of certain classes of products that can only be forwarded safely and profitably under a system of cold storage, should be the only portion of the known globe which is in the condition I have stated, which has not a first-class, well-equipped cold storage system between this country and England, is a fact which reflects no credit on the hon. gentleman.

He has spent two years' time trying to bore a three-inch hole with a gimlet. The hon. Minister has been experimenting, with the result, as we find, that he has been trifling away the money of the country and accomplishing very little. If he wants to have a system of cold storage transportation between Canada and England, why does he not go to one of the well-established lines that are running now from the four corners of the globe to deliver goods in the British market, lines whose very crews understand the operation of the cold storage system, whose owners have studied the scientific as well as the practical side of the question? Why does he not get some of these vessels to ply between Canada and England? Give them sufficient encouragement, and let us have, not in some future year but this season, as we ought to have had last season, a well-equipped first-class line of steamers plying from the ports of Canada to the ports of Great Britain. Instead of this, we have a few cold-storage boxes. We are practising experiments in a thing that has grown gray-headed with actual use in other parts of the world. But the hon. Minister says that it is progress, that it is advancement in keeping with the greatest colony of Great Britain with the greatest agricultural exporting portion of the globe—that we should be spending our time and money experimenting with ice-boxes when every portion of the colonies has a first-class line of steamers plying from its ports to Great Britain. This is the Minister's estimate of progress. Well, Sir, the hon. Minister has given us some other evidences that he is not thoroughly in sympathy with the dairy interests of this country. We used to have by the bagfull reports that we circulated among our farmers, educating them in the latest experimental knowledge upon agricultural affairs. But of late we have seen these reports only in very limited quantities, they are not obtainable by large quantities.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE.
What is that?

Mr. POPE. The annual report, if that is what you call it—the experimental farm reports. You know where the experimental farm is, out here at the outskirts of the city. They publish a report for that farm, and we used to get those reports in large quantities so that we could distribute them to every farmer in our constituencies if we wished. Since the hon. gentleman became Minister of Agriculture, we find that the number of these valuable books of information that we receive is reduced to a very few, if, indeed, we get any beyond the supply for the members of Parliament themselves.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Rose prints them now.

Mr. POPE. I do not know whether her name is Rose or Dennis. But I am bound to say that these books were generally and closely read, and it is only right that the results of the work of these experimental farms which have been established throughout Canada should be made known to the agriculturists of the country. When we take into account the lack of agricultural education in our schools—though I am glad to see improvement in that respect by the provincial authorities—when we consider that a large portion of our farmers in every province are to-day tilling the soil and engaging in dairying and other agricultural pursuits without any special preparation for their business, the establishment of these experimental farms by the Government that preceded the present Government is seen to have been an exceedingly wise step. But, in order that the results of these experiments might be known to the people who could use this knowledge to their own benefit and to the benefit of the country, in order that we might get some good from the large amount of money expended year after year, the circulation of these reports throughout the length and breadth of the land was necessary. So, I trust that when the hon. Minister wakens up to the fact that these reports are much appreciated and that they are of great benefit to the agriculturists of this country, the circulation of these reports in as large quantities as before will be resumed. I know that these reports are read. I know that the land is prepared according to the directions there given by hundreds and thousands of farmers throughout Canada. The hon. Minister should be alive to his opportunities in this respect. But if I remember well, when these farms were established the hon. gentleman expressed the opinion that to have experimental farms in the various provinces was unnecessary and that all the work should be done from one central point. I know that he has found that, in this particular, as in many other particulars, his judgment was not good, that he was not standing then upon solid ground. He has found that Canada is large, that it has not only great variety of soil but also great variety of climate and conditions that must be taken into consideration. So we find that when he is entrusted with the administration of the department that he was criticising the various experimental farms maintained in the different provinces, so far as I know, just as they were established by the Government that preceded this—proving conclusively that the hon. Minister, like many other hon. gentlemen, was mistaken in those early days and that to carry out these experiments effectively the special conditions of Manitoba and British Columbia and other parts of the country had to be considered. If the establishment of these farms is a good idea, it is better that the report giving the result of their experiments should be distributed throughout the length and breadth of the country to everybody who is interested in farming and who wishes that information. Now, I know that the hon. gentleman could not expect me to say less on that point than I have said. I would feel very reluctant to say anything that would in the slightest degree hurt the hon. gentleman's feelings. But as he is on record, by that record he must stand, and if the duty of pointing out the inconsistencies of the position occupied by the hon. gentleman falls upon me, I discharge that duty as a public man should, that the people may be in a position to judge of the inconsistent positions taken by hon. gentlemen opposite.

In regard to the question particularly under consideration, I know that hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House hold views different from those expressed by myself. But I do feel, Sir, that the time has arrived when we have to take into serious consideration the disposition of the surplus milk of this country. It is no longer possible for us to blind our eyes to the fact that we are producing in this country all the cheese that anybody is ready to buy of us.

Mr. POPE.

We are also aware of the fact that the quantities of milk to be produced in Canada will be larger and larger every year, and it is essential to open our eyes to the fact that we have too much of one product in the world's market, and we should have some consideration for those people who are producing that article. Now, the Minister of Agriculture has an army of well-trained scientific and practical men at his service, and he is in a better position than any other hon. gentleman in this House to offer us a suggestion. But when he offers us nothing, when he says: I see no way clear to provide a market for the surplus milk of the farmers that is crowding into a market already glutted; I do not feel it my duty, as administrator of the Department of Agriculture, to step forward and offer any assistance to these farmers—then, I say, that we have to find some solution ourselves of these problems, and I think one solution is found in the resolution offered by my hon. friend on this occasion. I think the hon. Minister should offer us some substitute—not oleomargarine, or substitutes of that kind—but he should offer us some suggestion worthy of consideration, as to where he is going to place this surplus milk, what he is going to do for those settlements in Canada which are unlike the North-west, produce beef in quantities for exportation, like New Zealand and Australia, who bring their meat products into the market of Great Britain to drive ours out. Under these circumstances, I say, these people have no other alternative than to place themselves in the ranks of the dairymen. But they are inexperienced in that business; they are inexperienced in the production of milk, and they are not in a position of people in those parts of the country who have long been manufacturing butter and cheese. Therefore, I say, these people should have a right to the serious consideration of the hon. gentleman. I know of no other method but by a bonus of reaching these people, no way of inducing first-class men to go among them and introduce a new system, which will take three or four years to change the conditions, to change the practice of having cows calve in spring, and cause them to calve in the autumn, in order to bring about the best results of dairying. I say that, where all that has to be done, you have no right to expect a good butter-maker to go there, and establish a factory, and take the chances of success. It will take him at least three years to convert that community into a dairying community, and it will also entail a temporary loss upon those farmers. But it is necessary that these people should receive some consideration. I am bound to say that I fully appreciate the work of the department in sending lecturers to speak to these people, but still, these lecturers have established no factory, they have left behind them no plant in operation. Now, the hon.

gentleman has gone to the North-west, and he has put in some factories there; he has established factories throughout that section of the country for the making of butter and cheese. Does he not call that an essential operation? This proposition was objected to by some of his supporters, because it had a sectional character, and now we have the very Act of the hon. gentleman himself, which, of course, he knows is sectional. I do not object to the principle as being sectional, I do not object to the principle of his introducing dairying into that section of the country; but I say that there are parts of the province of Quebec, there are outlying portions of the province of Ontario, and there are many parts in the east, which have no future at all except in the dairy business, and these need that sectional consideration of the Government just as much as any portion of the North-west Territories. In that respect, I think the hon. gentleman might have expended some of that money in the east, in the good dairy sections, in sections which must be absolutely devoted to dairying, and which have no future outside of dairy farming. They can never produce wheat to compete with the wheat lands of the west, they can never produce beef to compete with the ranching sections of the North-west Territories, and, year after year, they find themselves compelled to abandon their former methods of farming and go to dairying. I say, those sections of the older provinces, those sections that are well populated, those sections where the people have been for generations trying to eke out a living from their farming operations, should have commended themselves, first of all, to the consideration of the hon. gentleman. The virgin soil of the west produces wheat and flour second to none in the world, and produces beef better and easier than it can be produced in any other portion of this Dominion, and I think they might well have been left for future consideration as respects encouragement given to dairying. So I think the hon. gentleman has laid himself open to criticism in that regard, and it is a question, to my mind, whether he has really done the people of the North-west a particular benefit, under all the circumstances.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Ask the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin).

Mr. POPE. The hon. member for Assiniboia paid the hon. gentleman a compliment, the other day, for having expended a great deal of money in his vicinity. I do not believe the hon. member for Assiniboia is above appreciating the expenditure of public money in his section of the country; I believe he is thoroughly practical in that respect. But I started out by saying, that I do not seriously object to it. At the same time, I think it is open to criticism, from the fact that the hon. Minister has passed by the older provinces of the Dominion, which are obliged to get their living out of dairying alone; he passes by those sections, and offers them, not only a competition in the beef and in the wheat that they do produce, but, by the result of his action, he is going to offer them competition in dairying, as well. Now, I do not believe that many portions of the older provinces of Canada will appreciate the expenditure the hon. gentleman has made in the North-west, and the hon. gentleman will find that criticisms will be made upon his policy by others, as well as myself, criticisms more severe and more practical than any that I have made on this occasion.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down, in one sentence of his remarks, said that I could not expect him to say less than a certain thing. I can assure the hon. gentleman that, knowing his manner of speech, both in the House of Commons and elsewhere—because I have known him ever since he made his political début, some eight or nine years ago—

Mr. FOSTER. Has not the hon. gentleman already spoken?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Excuse me, there is a new question before the House since I spoke.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The Minister has already spoken on the motion, but since that time there has been a motion to adjourn moved. The hon. gentleman has a right to speak.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. member need not think he can save himself from the remarks I shall make. The hon. gentleman is well known to me and his manner of speech, both in this House and elsewhere, is well known to me, and known to those who have followed his course in public life, that not only did I expect him to say what he said last, but I wondered that the hon. gentleman did not say more. The hon. gentleman's manner of speech and the substance of his speech are well known to me and known to all those who have been acquainted with him since he entered public life. The hon. gentleman came into the House to try and fill the shoes of his father, who was well known, and the present member for Compton could not fill those shoes as he thought he could. The hon. gentleman went back to the old stories, I will not call it the old history of 1888 when the subject of oleomargarine was up in this House, and he undertook to quote from a speech delivered by me on that occasion, a speech thoroughly threshed out in the county of Brome in 1889, when the hon. gentleman's myrmidons in all the eastern townships came into the county and tried to defeat me, after the assertion had been made by the hon. gentleman's father that I had made such statements on the floor of Parliament that I never would come back into the House.

In spite of the hon. gentleman's action and that of his party I came back to Parliament with a majority of 379, the largest majority secured by any member for Brome in any election. That question was threshed out, and the hon. gentleman knows and the country knows the stand I took on that and other questions since that time. Although the hon. member came into my county in 1896, what was the result? He held two meetings. I met him at each, and I gained the largest majority that I ever received in any election, except in 1887, and although he and all the strength of the Conservative party were thrown into the contest in an effort to defeat me, which they had only succeeded in doing in 1891, by what means I will not say, I was elected by a majority of 333 against the strongest man in the eastern townships who could contest the county of Brome. The hon. gentleman may try to throw accusations across the House, but I tell the hon. gentleman and the party with which he is associated that they cannot do away with my record before the House and the country and before my own county, and I am prepared not only in any county and in the country, but also on the floor of Parliament, to discuss with the hon. gentleman every utterance I have ever made on the floor of Parliament or elsewhere. The hon. gentleman after going over old stories, which, I repeat, I will not call history, because they are not history, began to say a few words on the question before the House, which he at last reached. The hon. gentleman did not endorse the proposition to give a bonus for butter-making just now. He did not go into the details, but wanted to know where would we find a market for our butter. Already there is a good market for milk prepared into the highest form of production into which it can be converted, namely, butter, in the English market, and it does not require artificial stimulus, in the shape of a bonus, to make a reputation for our butter on the English market, because that reputation is already made, and largely made by reason of the transportation facilities which my system of cold storage has established for the export trade. The hon. gentleman spoke about cold storage, and said I had adopted the principle of my predecessor in office. I grant that my predecessor made a small step in the direction of cold storage; that he adopted what was considered at that time an effective cold storage system. But the world moves, and we have progressed into something better and more efficient in respect to cold storage, in the form of mechanical cold storage, by which system we have been able to afford proper transportation for butter to England. The system of cold storage which my predecessor was trying was insulation by ice to keep the products perfectly cold. The system was not effective, it was not expected to be effective, it was only tentative. I have been able to accomplish much by the adoption of mechanical cold storage, which is in existence, not, as the hon. gentleman said, in old boxes crossing the Atlantic, but in the best steamers leaving the ports of Canada. The hon. gentleman no doubt was making allusion to cold storage on the fast line, and he again referred to what I said in my campaign in regard to cold storage. He did not say, however, that I had opposed cold storage. I never opposed cold storage. I believe that what the late Minister of Agriculture was doing was a good thing. I knew what he was doing and I endorsed it, and I proposed to go further as soon as I came in to office. At the present time instead of cold storage by which to-day our goods have been carried to England in old boxes, we are carrying them in the largest vessels equipped with cold storage, the largest and best vessels of the Elder-Dempster Line, the largest and best of the Allan Line, the Dominion Line and the Reford Line, all of which are fitted up in consequence of our work done last year, and the inducements which Parliament enabled me to hold out to those companies. That is not the fast line, which I hope we yet will procure; but they are good freight boats, and they are doing splendid work, and we are improving the reputation of our butter in England to such an extent that any such proposition as the one now before the House is not needed to make a reputation for our product. The hon. gentleman has spoken in general terms of the dairying interest, and has referred to the North-west Territories and the work I have done there. The hon. gentleman himself has practically endorsed my work there. He is aware that the work was fully explained in this House. The hon. gentleman and his colleagues did not dare to raise their voices or say a word in opposition; they endorsed that work, although they had not the courage, when they were in office, to undertake it and carry it out. Now that it is completed, they are trying to take away from me the credit of having done it. The hon. gentleman says that the action of the Government will be criticised in the eastern part of the Dominion because, forsooth, it will compete with the dairying interest in the east. The hon. gentleman does not know what he is talking about. He has not found out, although the people of the country generally know, that the butter made in the North-west last summer almost all went to the west and did not come east, where our eastern butter is sold.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Pope), if he knows anything about farming and about the dairying industry, ought to know that if any poor butter is sent from Canada to England, it will injure the reputation of all Canadian butter. He knows that if we can establish the dairy industry in any corner of the Dominion of Canada, that will be of the greatest advantage to the dairy interests in every quarter of Canada. The hon. gentleman's friends have boasted in Prince Edward Island of what they had done for the dairying interests in that province, but did the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pope) go through the province of Quebec and tell the farmers that the late Government was hurting their dairying interests when they tried to establish dairying in Prince Edward Island? Not a bit of it. His political friends went to the province of Prince Edward Island and boasted of what they were doing, and on the floor of this House not a voice was raised against the work which Prof. Robertson had done so well in Prince Edward Island. The result of that work in the island province is that to-day the dairy industry there is able to stand on its own feet, and does not ask for or want help from the Dominion Government. It was because I believed that the work could be carried on in the North-west Territories, and that the same results could be accomplished as in Prince Edward Island, that I introduced a measure which has been endorsed by this House unanimously. I have no doubt whatever that there are parts of the older provinces where the dairy industry is not so far advanced as in other parts; but if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pope) knew what he was talking about he would know that in the older provinces the local governments are doing the teaching in dairy work. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pope) knew about the constitution of the country sufficiently, he would know that everything in connection with education is the special business of the local legislatures, and not of the Dominion Parliament; and while it is perfectly right for us here to encourage a new industry in any part of Canada, we would be stepping outside of our sphere if we undertook to conduct teaching in the different provinces of the Dominion. We in this Parliament, however, stand in the position towards the North-west Territories of a provincial legislature towards its province, and we have to do for the North-west Territories a good deal of what the different local legislatures do for themselves. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Pope) branched off from the subject before the House to speak about the experimental farms, and here again I am rather surprised—I do not know that I ought to have been, because I know that the hon. gentleman often speaks without thinking and without going to the bottom of the subject he is addressing himself to—but still, I am surprised that he does not know that the reports of the farms are distributed straight from the farm, and that last year and the year before over 50,000 copies of the farm reports were sent to the farmers of this country.

Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.) Would the hon. gentleman state on what basis they are distributed and by whom?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I shall. There is a list made out at the farm of all those whose names are sent in; that list is kept permanently, and all the publications of the farms are sent to these people.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the hon. gentleman repeat that?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. There is a list kept on the farms, a permanent list, a mailing list, as it is called.

Mr. MONTAGUE. By whom is that supplied?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That has been gradually accumulating at the farm. It is supplied by the names of everybody who makes an application to the farm being put upon the list. It is made up by any one sending a name to the farm to have it put on the list.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Have the members of the House been asked to add to that list?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The members of the House can at any time send a name. They have been notified over and over again that there is that list, that they can send names to that list, and any persons who wish to have their names put on the list can do so.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am quite aware of that, but I do not think, so far as I am concerned—I speak for myself and I fancy I speak for other members who represent farming constituencies—that we have been specifically told that we should be given a certain number of copies of the report, and instead of having copies of these reports distributed by ourselves that we should send to the officers of the department the names of those to whom we wish these reports sent.

Mr. McMULLEN. When I was in Opposition I received from Prof. Saunders an invitation to send the names of any persons I wished these reports sent to, and he would send them from the farm.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I never got any such invitation.

Mr. WALLACE. These names that Prof. Saunders asked the members to send in were the names of persons to receive the bulletins, and not the experimental farm reports at all.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Quite so.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague) should know that the course I am outlining is the one that was carried on when the hon. gentleman and his predecessors were in office. I have made no change in it; I did not think that any change was necessary, and I did not think that that could be very much improved on. I know perfectly well that dozens, I may say hundreds of lists on different occasions and in different seasons have been received by the officers of the farms from members of the House of Commons asking for certain literature to be sent to certain people. Invariably these requests have been acceded to, and whenever any such name is given to the farm, that name is put upon the list. The list has been accumulating for years. It has been accumulating to such an extent that this year I ordered it to be gone over so that the names of dead people, the names of those whose reports had been sent back, the names of people who apparently had paid no attention to the reports and bulletins they had received by acknowledging the receipt of them or asking for more, might be struck off.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the hon. gentleman permit me to interrupt him for a moment, because I think this is a most important question.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Quite so, but it is entirely outside the question we are discussing.

Mr. MONTAGUE. So far as the members of the House are concerned, what I understood is this: That the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) has stated that instead of the members being supplied with the copies of these reports to distribute to their constituents, the agriculturists of the various provinces, that these were now being supplied by the department itself through the officers of the farm; and then immediately succeeding that statement, if such statement was made—I confess I was not listening very carefully at the moment—

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I do not think so.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then no such statement was made?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Not in the sense you seem to have understood it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then what I want to inquire is this: The list of farmers, the hon. gentleman says, to whom these reports are now sent is the same list which was in existence when we were in power, but which, of course, has been added to from year to year. Now, then, I tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) that in addition to that list, thousands and thousands of those reports were scattered by the hands of the various members of this House—

Mr. TAYLOR. On both sides.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Upon both sides of the House. I want to say that if the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have received notice that instead of circulating these reports from the House by their own hands, they should send in a list of names of the farmers and have them distributed in that way, if that has been done with regard to the hon. gentlemen opposite, it certainly had not been done in the case of hon. members on this side.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No such notice was received by us.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If that has been done with regard to hon. gentlemen opposite, it has not been done to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and if, as it appears, it has not been done to hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, then no such information, I take it, has been given to the members of this House, and my hon. friend from Compton (Mr. Pope) had a perfect right to find fault with the statement.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have made no change in the arrangement since I came into office with regard to the distribution of these reports and bulletins. I have been informed by Prof. Saunders that he has a list, which he told me last year numbered over 57,000 names.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What list is that?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That is the mailing list of the experimental farm. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) would be kind enough to sit down until I finish my statement he will understand.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What publications are sent?

Mr. CAMPBELL. If you sit down he will tell you.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman from Kent (Mr. Campbell) is not asked; he knows nothing about it.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) will allow me to finish, he will understand; if he interrupts before I finish he cannot understand. To these names every publication of the farm is sent, except certain special publications, such as particular bulletins on particular subjects; for instance, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) asked me the other day to have something prepared about tobacco. I have taken steps to do so, but that document will not be sent to all the names on the list, and it will be sent only to those to whom we think it would be valuable. Special bulletins are sometimes made out with regard to particular fruit sections or particular fruit subjects, and these are not sent to the whole list; but the farm reports and all the farm bulletins are sent to these 50,000 odd names. These lists are not made up by me or by any official, but are the result of the accretions of names sent in for the farm literature. Everybody who makes application for that literature has his name placed on the list, and it is sent to him, whether his name is recommended by a member of Parliament or not; and any member of Parliament may send in as many names now as when the hon. gentleman was in office.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then, I understand from what the hon. gentleman says that he proposes to confine the distribution to the names on this list, instead of making it through the members of the House.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No. I have told the hon. gentleman that I have not made any change in the system that was in vogue when he was in office; that is to say, if a member of Parliament asked for any reports, he would receive what reports he asked for; but there was no system of sending so many hundreds or thousands of these reports to the member of the House for distribution. There never has been such a system. I would ask the ex-Minister of Agriculture if, during his term of office, he ordered a number of the reports to be sent to each member for distribution? I know that when I was a member of the House, I never received the farm reports in bundles by the hundred. That has never been the practice, so far as I am aware.

Mr. WILSON. I have sent out hundreds myself.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I suppose you asked for them.

Mr. SCRIVER. A large number were voted by the Committee on Agriculture.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Now we are coming to another point altogether. Sometimes the Committee on Agriculture of this House ordered a certain number of thousands of copies of the farm report for distribution. Hon. gentlemen opposite are perhaps confusing two things. There are the farm reports, and there is the evidence of the various officers of the farm given before the Committee on Agriculture, and that committee orders the report of that evidence to be printed and distributed to the members of the House. But I think hon. gentlemen opposite will find that they are mistaken in thinking that at any time a certain fixed number of the farm reports or farm bulletins have been sent to the members of the House for ordinary distribution. I speak subject to correction, for I never made special inquiry at the farm to find out.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think the hon. gentleman will find that a certain number of the bulletins, not a very large number, were sent to each member of the House.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. If that is the hon. gentleman's remembrance of the practice during his tenure of office, I will look into the matter. But I want to reply to another matter which the hon. ex-

Minister of Agriculture has alluded to. I want to say this emphatically and clearly: I have made no difference whatever between the members on one side of the House and those on the other side. No member on this side has received any information or intimation, or has been consulted in any way, more than the members on the other side. The hon. ex-Minister of Agriculture will, I hope, understand this and listen to it and take it in.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am very obtuse, but I will try to take it in.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I am very glad the hon. gentleman will; but he does not seem to be paying much attention when I am replying to him as politely as I can. The hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope), wandering away from the subject at issue, began to talk about the experimental farm, and among other things said that I had objected to something in connection with that farm. I am not going to rake over old records or old "Hansards"; but if he or any other hon. gentleman chooses to consult the "Hansard" of that date, he will find that I was a member of a committee appointed to inquire into the agricultural industry, the chairman of which was Mr. Gigault, and that I endorsed the report of that committee in favour of the establishment of these farms; and when Mr. Carling, then Minister of Agriculture, stated that he was going to establish these farms, I arose in my place in the House and endorsed the proposition, and from that day to this I have always taken a deep interest in the success of the farms, whether I have been in the House or out of the House. I believe these farms are doing a good work, and it is by reason of the distribution of the reports and bulletins that the farmers of this country are reaping the benefit of the good work they are doing. I have nothing further to say on the matter. I spoke on the main motion as fully and clearly as I could, and nothing that has been said leads me to change my view. I am satisfied that the butter industry of this country is advancing by leaps and bounds, and it is advancing in a sure and stable way, and that without resorting to any such method as is now proposed—a method which has been more or less discredited in other countries, and which was tried in the province of Quebec but without success. I think it would be unwise for the House to adopt this resolution, and unwise for the people of this country to pin their faith to any such artificial stimulus to the great industry of butter-making.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker, on the present occasion we are discussing the advisability of granting a bonus for the manufacture of the finest fresh creamery butter. The hon. Minister of Agriculture, in the course of his remarks, said that the butter industry at the present time was of such a good basis that it did not require any stimulus of that kind. I may say, in reply to that, that when the present Government is granting a bonus to the cheese industry of the North-west at the present time, notwithstanding the fact that the cheese industry of this country is in a very flourishing condition—

Mr. DAVIN. To butter, not to cheese.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) The fact that the late Government undertook to foster the cheese industry in the province to Prince Edward Island, has resulted in that province taking a foremost place in that industry. That province is making cheese which I think is second to none manufactured in Canada, and I think I am safe in saying that according to its area and population, it manufactures more than any other portion of Canada. That was brought about by the action of the late Government in coming to the assistance of the cheese industry. I believe that the same results could now be accomplished by the Government granting a bonus in accordance with the terms of this resolution to the butter industry, not only to the people of Prince Edward Island, but to the people of Canada generally. We know that the butter industry is away behind the cheese industry, which is now on its feet and can look after itself. The people of Prince Edward Island are now beginning to turn their attention to the making of butter, and I think that, if the Government were to promote that industry in a small way, by granting a bonus, such as is recommended in this resolution, it would go very far to give that industry the same start that was formerly given the cheese industry. Our people are also giving their attention to the hog-raising industry, which is, I believe, even greater than the cheese or butter industry, and the development of which will develop these latter industries.

But I got on my feet, Mr. Speaker, more particularly to refer to the distribution of the reports and bulletins from the experimental farm. I am informed from my province, that there are certain gentlemen down there who have taken to themselves the whole credit for the distribution of these reports. I have always understood, as the hon. Minister has just told us, that there was a permanent list at the experimental farm of names to whom these reports and bulletins should be sent. That used to be the case, and I am glad to see that the hon. Minister has continued that practice. The names on that list used to be furnished by members of Parliament, but any individual applying could also have his name inserted. The list was not confined to any particular party. At any rate, any names that were handed in by me were not restricted to either party. These reports were distributed for the general improvement of the people, and I am very glad, indeed, to hear that the hon. Minister is continuing that very good system and keeping up the list.

There is another matter, in connection with the cheese and butter business, that is of as much importance, in my opinion, as a bonus, and that is the providing of cold storage facilities for shipment to the English market. I trust, that the Government will see their way clear to have some one of the various lines of steamers now plying between Canada and England, call at the province of Prince Edward Island, during the summer months at least, in order that the people of that province may have some small share of the benefits to be obtained from the cold storage system, which is so necessary to bring across the Atlantic our butter and cheese products. I hope that the Government will not overlook this very important matter to the people of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. McNEILL. Perhaps I may be allowed to say a word on this subject, because I think I was the first member of this House to bring up this question of the importance of obtaining a market for our butter in England. I remember very well, a good many years ago, bringing up this question, but my attempt at the time to attract the attention of the House was not very successful, for I was ruled out of order, and no more came of it at that time. I wish to say to my hon. friend opposite, that, for my part, I am quite satisfied that, since he has occupied the position of Minister of Agriculture, he has been doing all that he thought best to promote the dairy interest of this country. I think he has done a great deal in that direction, and I give him credit for what he has done. I regret, however, that on this occasion he is not prepared to go the length of this resolution. I think it is most important something should be done to direct the attention of our farmers in Canada to the fact that they ought now rather to turn their attention to the making of butter than to the making of cheese. I think we have got almost to the limit of our profitable production of cheese in this country, and there is only one way in which we can successfully secure the English market for our butter. We have got to compete with other great butter-producing countries, Denmark especially, and the only way we can do that successfully is, to follow a practice in the production of our butter similar to that which we pursued in the production of our cheese, namely, by producing our butter through creameries and in large quantities. The individual farmer can never expect to produce butter successfully to compete in the English market. I do not say, that there may not be exceptions to the rule, but, as a rule, we must expect that it will be creamery butter which will secure the English market for us, and in order to induce the production of creamery butter, I believe it would be most beneficial to give some slight bonus, such as is proposed in this resolution. I do not know why it is my hon. friend is so much opposed to the principle of a bonus. Certainly it has proved most effectual in the case of these countries which have adopted it. It proved most effective in the case of Denmark.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Denmark never gave a bonus.

Mr. McNEILL. They gave a bonus, unless I am mistaken, when the industry was in its infancy, but they are not giving any now because it is not necessary.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. They never gave a bonus.

Mr. McNEILL. I think my hon. friend is mistaken.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. When this question came up last year, I asked Professor Robertson to give me a memo. of what the other countries had done, and he did so. In that memo. he gave what Denmark had done, and there was no mention of any bonus.

Mr. McNEILL. I think my hon. friend will find that, while Denmark does not give a bonus now, she did at the outset, and my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Haggart) supports me in this. Denmark did give a bonus in the beginning, but, having secured the market, there is no necessity for her giving one now. But even supposing Denmark did not give a bonus originally, Denmark had no such competitor in the English market, when she commenced her attack upon it, as we have now in the person of Denmark and other competitors who are filling the English market with foreign butter. So that, although a bonus might not have been necessary in the case of Denmark—although I maintain, she did adopt that means—it may be very necessary for us now. Anything the Government can do in the direction of encouraging the butter industry, ought to be done. It is most important for our farmers that we should secure the English market for our butter, and I believe that, by giving a slight bonus of this kind, a tremendous impetus will be given the butter interest of this country, and I would ask my hon. friend to reconsider his decision, and, if possible, to come to the conclusion suggested in the resolution.

Mr. FEATHERSTON. I have sympathy with any movement for the betterment of the butter industry of this country, but I do not know that I am in sympathy with a proposal to grant bonuses to any particular branch of production; I think that that would probably be a move in the wrong direction. At the same time, I do not want to throw away any opportunities to help forward our dairying interests. I know that our cheese industry has developed very greatly within recent years. It is true that this year the market was low. But what was the cause of that? It was that we had an over-production. We have had very heavy grass crops, and our cattle have had any amount of feed. Therefore they produced more milk last year than I have ever known in any one season since I first had anything to do with live stock business. This is the great reason, I am satisfied, why our cheese industry has fallen off as it has. When one industry experiences a falling off, we should all like to increase in some other line of production. If we can make our butter industry a paying industry in this country it would be very acceptable not only to the farmers and to those engaged in commerce, but also to our financial institutions, for nothing gives tone to the financial institutions like enhanced riches coming from increase of exportation of our own products. I do not wish to take up much time in discussing this matter now before the House. It has been stated here that the Quebec Government gave a bonus for the production of butter in that province. But I have been informed that the farmers did not get the benefit of that bonus, but that it went to the merchants of Montreal. I do not wish to support any proposal that will not yield benefits direct to the farmers. I do not think I can see my way clear to supporting such a motion as this, because I think this trade will regulate itself just as other agricultural interests do. I regard the dairy interest as one of the greatest value to the country, not only for the direct returns it brings to the country but because it encourages the people to go into the raising of pork. Any one engaged in the dairy industry can with the refuse of the dairy, raise a certain number of hogs that will give quite a return besides the direct return in manufacture of butter and cheese.

After Recess.

Mr. FEATHERSTON. When you left the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I was pointing out the advantage of the dairying industry especially in the encouragement it gave to the pork trade. The pork trade has become one of the greatest industries we have. I am only sorry to say that the trade has suffered a little of late by reason of the action of the Opposition in the local legislature last session and also during the recent campaign. They talked a great deal about diseases amongst our swine, and all this was carried, no doubt, by our rivals in the United States to buyers in England and so we found the people there prejudiced to a certain extent against our pork. This resulted in a reduction in the price of our swine of from 50 cents to 75 cents per cwt. about the beginning of January. We usually expect an increase in prices, but on account of this agitation, there has been a decrease. I am sorry that the Opposition was so short-sighted as to take up this as a part of their policy.

The hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope) stated that the Grits were great advocates of the agricultural industries and were much agitated over the interests of the farmers of this country. I agree with him; the present Government have shown themselves the friends of the agriculturists. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) has been particularly active in advancing their interests. He went to Washington and was successful in securing the abrogation of the obnoxious quarantine regulations then existing between Canada and the United States. The result has been that we have had a large number of our cattle shipped through the United States. This trade has been on the boom ever since these quarantine regulations were removed. This season we shipped to Great Britain from the port of Montreal 106,000 head of fat cattle, and through American ports and markets about 100,000 head. Besides that we have shipped through the ports of St. John, Halifax, Portland and Boston, since the close of river navigation over 20,000 head of cattle. Thus we show a total export of about 226,000 head. I am satisfied that this is double the average of the exports of cattle from Canada to other countries for the last five years. The reason for the increase of our exports was that the prices have been better. And how were these prices increased? I will give you the quotations from the "Mail and Empire"—and I suppose that no person on the other side will doubt its accuracy—showing prices last year and this year. The prices were increased through the competition in this country caused by the opening of the American markets. Last summer I was buying stock in the west, and I was met in every section by American buyers, who could buy cattle for from $\frac{1}{4}$ to $\frac{1}{2}$ cent per pound more than we could give shipping by Canadian ports. I found that this was due to the fact that cattle could be shipped cheaper by Boston. Then, as our cattle went into the market with American cattle the butchers in England were deceived in thinking that they were buying the best corn-fed American cattle, as our grass-fed cattle were inferior to theirs. Thus cattle sent by American ports realized from $\frac{1}{4}$ d. to $\frac{3}{4}$ d. more than we could get by Canadian ports. I have just said that I would quote figures from the "Mail and Empire." I give the figures showing the price of export cattle at Toronto, which is the Chicago of Canada in the cattle trade, more cattle being bought and sold in Toronto in one day, I suppose, than in all the rest of the markets of Canada in a week. On the 27th of January, 1897, the price of export cattle for Great Britain was from $3\frac{1}{4}$ to $3\frac{3}{4}$ cents per pound. On January

Mr. FEATHERSTON.

28th, in the corresponding week of this present year, the price was 4, $4\frac{1}{4}$ and $4\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound. Now, the average weight of export cattle is a little over 1,300 pounds, that is under the average for this time of year, so that the advantage over last year's prices of, say, 75 cents per hundred, will amount in round figures to about \$10 per head more than the farmers have been getting for their cattle than they got a year ago. Now we will take butchers' cattle in the same market. On the 27th January, 1897, they brought $2\frac{1}{2}$ to 3 cents and $3\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound. The "Mail and Empire's" report on that day, says that no loads brought more than $2\frac{3}{4}$ cents, that is $2\frac{3}{4}$ cents for full loads, extra cattle averaged $3\frac{1}{2}$. I remember selling cattle myself in January of last year for \$3.15 per hundred, which I call choice, first-class cattle for butchers' trade. A man this year was complaining that the Liberal Government had not brought about the good times that we had promised because he was only getting 4 cents for good choice heifers in the Toronto market on the first market week of January in this year. I asked him if he could get 4 cents, and he said: Yes, he could get 4 cents and that is all he could get. I told him that I sold just as good a year ago on the same market for \$3.15 per hundred. On January 28, 1898, butchers' cattle on the Toronto market sold for $3\frac{1}{2}$ cents to $3\frac{3}{4}$ cents per pound. Now, butchers' cattle will average about 1,050 pounds, that is a very fair average. Now, if we gain 75 cents per hundred pounds, that makes about \$7.50 to \$7.80 per head, which represents the net gain to the farmer for feeding what cattle have been sold this year, compared with what he sold last year. I have stated that the average gain on export cattle is about \$10 per head. We will take a lower average, say \$9 per head. Now, we exported from Montreal, St. John, Halifax and American ports and markets 226,000 head of cattle, at an average, say of \$9 per head. That is below the figures I quoted a while ago, and which I feel quit safe in quoting now. That will make a sum total of \$2,034,000, which represents the increased price the farmers have got for their cattle this year as compared with last year. Now let us see the increased gain in butchers' cattle which have been consumed in Canada. We consume in the different markets of Canada at least 250,000 head, to say nothing of the smaller numbers that are killed throughout the country for private purposes. Take the basis of \$7.50 per head on those 250,000 and we have \$1,875,000 of net gain to the farmer. Those two sums added together make a total, in round numbers, of over four million dollars which represents the benefit to the farmers of this country through the exertions of this Government in obtaining the removal of the quarantine regulations between Canada and the United States, which removal has led to the prosperity we have been enjoying in the cattle trade. Now the motion introduced by the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid) is in the interests of the butter-makers, or men who are in the dairy business. We have that dairy business in the west, where we are interested in it to a considerable extent. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) mentioned here the other night that the milkmen of the country surrounding Toronto have had a grievance. They have had a grievance that has been existing for a good while. That grievance is that they are now supplying milk to the people in Toronto in cans supposed to be 8-gallon cans which really hold $8\frac{1}{2}$ to 9 gallons, and they have been asking for redress. The hon. member was very anxious that the Minister of Inland Revenue should take this question up. Last fall the farmers had a meeting in Toronto at which were present the hon. member for West York and the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean). They passed a motion requesting these two hon. gentlemen and myself to interview this Government, and ask that a regulation be made providing that milk cans should be supplied, measured and stamped, so as to hold about 8 gallons, or a little over, so that the buyer would not get less than his 8 gallons. They were quite willing to give a quart over, but they did not wish to be obliged to give $8\frac{1}{2}$ to 9 gallons for an 8-gallon sale. Well, I remember in the year 1892-93 when the farmers had a meeting there. They wanted this question taken up, and they wanted the Government to inspect these cans, to insist upon an 8-gallon can and no more, as that was the basis of the sales they were making to the milk dealers in the city of Toronto. In the year 1893 a delegation came down here to meet the then Controller of Inland Revenue, and he promised them redress, he promised that this thing would be attended to and that they would get what they were asking. They did not get it, and they have been complaining year after year. At last the then Controller of Inland Revenue (Mr. Wood) with the then Controller of Customs (Mr. Wallace), went to Toronto and had a meeting with these farmers. I do not know how they managed it, but somehow or other their friends let them out of the hole by accepting a proposition that every person should sell milk by weight at so much per pound. Now, I never heard since of any person selling a can of milk in that way, and this abuse has been going on ever since, to the detriment of the farmers in that locality. But I am now pleased to see that the Controller of Inland Revenue intends to deal with this question. I hope he will make the necessary regulations that these people are asking for, and that they will no longer be obliged to deliver $8\frac{1}{2}$ or 9 gallons of milk for the price of 8 gallons. By doing so I am satisfied he will confer a great favour on the farmers in that part of the country. I am sure that the people to-day are satisfied with the action of the Government in respect to their treatment of the agricultural interests of this country.

Mr. STENSON. I have the honour to represent a constituency which is largely interested in the dairy industry, and I think it is my duty to give expression to my opinion with regard to the question that is now before the House. It matters little to me whether the mover of a resolution in this House belongs to the Opposition or is a supporter of the Government, so long as the object of that measure is to promote the welfare of the farming community, and particularly that portion of the farming community that are engaged in dairying. I will give credit to the mover of this resolution that we are now discussing, for sincerity. I have not the slightest doubt that his object is good, his intentions are of the very best. I will also give credit for sincerity to those who are of his opinion. I think they are acting in what they think is the best interests of the farming community, and particularly of those who are engaged in dairying. But on this important subject we are allowed to disagree, our opinions cannot be all the same, and on this resolution I must say that I cannot agree with the mover of it, that I do not think it will attain the object, namely, that of encouraging the dairying interest. Did I think so, I would give it my most hearty support; but I do not think so, and I will state a few of the reasons on which I base my opinion. Some reasons have been stated already, and I will not go over them again, but I will leave them altogether outside of the few remarks which I intend to make on this subject, and here I allude to those remarks which are more of a personal nature than of a public nature, and more of an attack on certain members of the Government and on certain members who do not agree with some hon. members on the Opposition side of the House.

To adopt this resolution would be to give certain advantages to but a very small portion of the farmers of this country, to but a very small portion of those interested in the dairying industry, and even those few whom we might suppose would profit, would not get the direct benefit of this vote. I am on principle opposed to bonuses of all kinds. It has been stated here that the cheese industry has now reached almost the utmost limit, and it would be unwise and perhaps dangerous for us in Canada to go increasing our products of cheese. We have so far succeeded in capturing the English market for cheese that we have now almost control of that market; at least we hold the best position on that market held by any exporter of cheese. But has this object been attained by bonuses? I do not believe anyone can say it was the bonusing system which brought our cheese to the high position it holds in the English market to-day. Our cheese holds that position because the farmers went into the production of cheese and took means to produce the best cheese that can be made, that is the cheese that suits the English market.

Why does not our butter hold the same position in that market as our cheese occupies? I believe the principal reason is that our manufacturers have not proper facilities for transporting their butter to the English market in first-class condition. We had not cold storage and our farmers were not educated up to making first-class butter, although I contend that we are now making butter of a grade as good as any in the world, but when first-rate it declines in quality before it arrives on the market, for lack of proper transportation facilities. Again, the farmers were not educated up to taking care of the butter on its way from the factory to the cars. Further, when the butter was placed on the cars they were not provided with cold storage; on these cars the butter again suffered. When our butter was sent to England and cold storage was not afforded, the butter could not reach the English market in the same condition it left the factory. For that reason our butter did not sell in that market for the price it would have realized so as to encourage our butter industry. But this state of things is now going to disappear, thanks to the energy of the Minister of Agriculture. I do not want to detract from the credit due to the hon. gentleman's predecessors. I believe they did their utmost, so far as circumstances allowed, to encourage dairying; but that does not take away from the present Minister the merit due to him, and I was glad to hear some hon. gentlemen on the Opposition side give the credit due to him. He is doing his utmost, and is succeeding well; and it is painful to hear hon. members not only finding fault and criticise, but actually abuse the Minister, while he is doing his utmost, and succeeding, to promote the interests of the farmers. Were this money the House is asked to appropriate for bonusing likely to attain the object intended to be attained by the mover, I certainly would support the motion; but I have not only doubts, but I am perfectly satisfied that it would not attain that object, because the greater portion, not to say the whole, would go into the pockets of the speculators and not into the pockets of the farmers. On the other hand, let this amount be applied, not to granting bonuses, but to furnishing the necessary transportation facilities to place our butter on the English market in first-class condition, and then we will have done more to obtain a market for our butter and encourage our dairying industry than by the means offered in this resolution. More than that. In speaking to our farmers during the past season I told them that it would be in their interest, as I thought, to have agents appointed in the English market to receive our dairy products and dispose of them there. I hold that if, instead of a grant being made in the direction suggested by the mover, the money was appropriated to provide proper facilities for transporting in first-class condition our butter to the English market, and employing qualified agents to receive and dispose of the butter, that would be spending the money to better advantage than by bonusing a portion of our butter production. When the English people get to know the quality of our butter when we deliver it to them in the perfect state as when produced here, then we will not require to bonus this butter to get the highest prices, and when our butter commands the highest prices in the English market our farmers will not want any bonus granted for the purpose. Our farmers are not looking for bonuses or for favours; they want fair-play, and the expenditure of money to place them in a position to enable them to compete with foreign producers and put them on a footing with foreign dairymen. We have to contend with other dairying countries towards which we stand at great disadvantage. One disadvantage is the distance which separates us from the English market. The Danes have an advantage in that respect. But the moment we have cold storage and can send our butter to the English market in good condition, that disadvantage will disappear and we will stand on an equal footing with the Danes. We may require a little schooling for our farmers to get them educated to manufacture a quality of butter even better than they produce at present. I admit that in many sections of the country, my own for example, which is a dairying county, our farmers have something to learn. But, Mr. Speaker, they are learning, and they are learning every year, and every month, and every day. They are improving in their methods; they are improving in the making of their butter; they are improving in the care of their stock, both summer and winter, and they are also taking more care in the transportation of their butter to the railway depots. When we provide cold storage cars, then we will be sure that this butter will get to the English market in good condition; the English people will soon find that Canadians can make as good butter as the Danes or any people in the world, and they will buy Canadian butter for the highest price. All this will entail the expenditure of money by the Government. The farmers cannot provide cold storage themselves, and, therefore, the Government is doing a wise thing in providing it for them. Let the Government add to this expense for cold storage the salaries of agents in the old country, men who will be well qualified to look after our agricultural products, men who will see that it gets on the English market in proper form, and that the farmers will get a full price without having to sell it through the hands of middlemen. Our export of agricultural products has now become of sufficient importance for the Government to have agents in England to represent that industry, and I trust that the Government will see its way to appoint these agents in the near future.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is another way in which the expenditure of money by the Government can help our dairy interests, and in connection with which the vote for agricultural purposes can be more beneficially employed than by paying bonuses. It is my opinion, that we should look after the sanitary condition of our dairy herds, and if that is done, the farmers will reap a great benefit from it. Let the Government look after the health of our stock, let them attend to our dairying interests in a proper manner, let us have proper cold storage transportation, let us have men to look after our interests in England, and when we have all that, we want no bonuses. As I have already said, if the money which would be spent in bonuses, is applied in the directions I have intimated, it will redound much more to the benefit of Canadian agriculturists.

Mr. MACLEAN. It is not my intention to offer any harsh criticism on the Minister of Agriculture, or on the present policy of the Government, in regard to his department. It is more or less a policy of protection; it is more or less a policy of the encouragement of our native industries, especially of our agricultural products. In adopting this policy of protection, the Government think they are following a conservative policy, and so, in some way, they are ashamed of it, and hon. gentlemen like the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Stenson) get up and say that they do not believe in bonuses. But what is the providing of cold storage but the giving of Government aid to encourage a native industry; what is the appointment of agents in England but something in the same direction, and what would be Government oversight of our herds but encouragement and protection for the dairy industry? The competition in agricultural products is so keen to-day, that if we wish to be in the race, we must do what other people are doing. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Stenson) says that we now control the British market for our cheese; but he must know that the Americans, as well as the farming countries of Europe, are preparing to adopt such legislation as will compel us to share that market with them. They see that once you have the seed, every one can grow the plant, and so they intend to follow our example in giving Government encouragement to their cheese industry. The British West India Islands have been ruined by the bonuses given to sugar by European countries, and so the English Government, by some kind of protection or Government relief, are coming to the aid of the sugar-growers of the British West India Islands, and in that way they are adopting the principle of protection. The bonus or bounty system is the most direct and, to my mind, the best system of protection; and, if we find that other countries are adopting it, we must follow suit, if we intend to hold the market. I have been struck with an article which I read the other day, in the "North American Review," and which was written by the Right Hon. Horace Plunkett, Chairman of the Recess Committee and President of the Royal Agricultural Society. That committee is one of the most important that has sat in England for many years. It was designed to investigate the lack of progress in Ireland, as compared with the other British Isles. It held a number of sessions, and the committee sent its representatives all over Europe to make inquiries and comparisons. One of its findings was this:

The Irish difficulty is well known to be rather economic than political, and it is more so to-day than ever.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the real trouble in Ireland; it is not a political, but an economic grievance. The agricultural industries in Ireland are seriously depressed, her manufacturing industries have been depressed, and they have now come to see that the grievances of Ireland are economical, and not political. The Right Hon. Mr. Plunkett says:

We instituted an inquiry into the means by which the Government could best promote the development of our agricultural and industrial resources.

They sent their commissioners to France, to Belgium, to Holland, to Denmark, to Wurttemberg, to Bavaria, to Austria, to Hungary and to Switzerland, and they found that the reason the farmers of all these countries could beat the British agriculturist out of his own market was because the governments of all these countries, by bonusing or some system of protection, had brought their farmers to such a condition that they could compete with the English and Irish farmers in their own markets. That was the finding of this important committee; that was the finding of these members of the British Parliament, who were committed to free trade. Here is a recommendation that was made by this committee. Mr. Plunkett says:

We recommend that a department of Government should be specially created with a Minister directly responsible to Parliament at its head; the department to be adequately endowed from the Imperial treasury, so as to administer state aid to agriculture and industries in Ireland, upon principles which were fully described. I need only say here that the scheme in its main features was taken from the institutions of the countries to which our investigations were extended, and modified to meet the requirements of our own case.

This committee waited on the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and here is an account of the interview:

The Chief Secretary, after describing the gathering as one of the most notable deputations which had ever come to lay its case before the Irish Government, and knowing the remarkable growth of public opinion in favour of the policy embodied in its Bill of last session, expressed his heartfelt sympathy with the case which was presented, and his earnest desire, which is well known, to proceed with a policy of agricultural and industrial development at the earliest possible moment.

There is an Irish Secretary of an English free trade Government admitting that the agricultural depression in Ireland and England was due to the competition of those countries, and stating his intention to set up in free-trade England a department for the encouragement of the agricultural interests of the country. If many English industries are being ruined by the competition of countries which have adopted the bonus system, we may have to adopt it here in order to keep our markets. We may have to go the pace which other countries are taking for the purpose of depriving us of the cheese market in England. We do not hold that market by any inherent quality of our cheese, but only because up to the present time we have been able to get there ahead of the others; but when they adopt our method, and follow our plan, they will be our equals, and they may dispossess us of the market. A thing has happened very recently with regard to agriculture to which I wish to direct the attention of the Minister of Agriculture. That is with regard to the shipment of live stock from Canada to Great Britain. It is a fact that to-day the South American countries promise to beat us out of the live stock market which we now have in England. They can raise and finish their bullocks for less than we can, they can ship them to England at almost the same rates that we can, and I am told by large stock-dealers of Toronto that a large amount of capital is being transferred to South America to develop the export trade of cattle from Argentina. So that it becomes the duty of this Government, especially the duty of the Minister of Agriculture, if he finds that other countries are beating our country in the markets of Europe, to adopt some means for retaining those markets—to adopt, if necessary, a national policy. The National Policy has been denounced time after time as something not to be adopted by this country. But the mother country has adopted a national policy in some respects. What are the British quarantine regulations but a system of protection adopted to keep out our cattle and meats? The same thing has happened in Germany. Germany is one of the most progressive countries to-day, but it has a strong agrarian party, as it is called there, whose fundamental principle is the protection of native products against the food products of other countries. Now, if we find all other countries adopting such a policy, we must adopt it in this country. Some hon. gentlemen who have spoken say that they do not believe in bonuses. I say that all these measures are bonuses, either directly or indirectly; and once you adopt the principle, you need have no hesitation in carrying it out in every direction. I am glad to see that hon. gentlemen opposite are coming more and more to this idea of protection. My hon. friend from Huron, when the other day made his new confession of faith, gave us a statement of the creed of protection which I must say I have never heard better stated; and the speech of the hon. gentleman who preceded me, if it means anything, means that in his opinion it is now time for the Liberal party of this country to adopt protection, if not by a bonus system, then by the adoption of cold storage, the appointment of agents in the old country, the inspection of our dairy herds, and I do not know what. But, Mr. Speaker, that is protection, and nothing but protection. That is a departure by these hon. gentlemen from their former creed, and the adoption of what has always been the policy of the Conservative party; and it would be far better for the Government candidly to admit this policy. They have adopted a great many planks of the policy of the Conservative party, and they should now adopt this one of agricultural protection. I am convinced that the Minister of Agriculture will be forced to adopt this very measure in regard to butter before long. I believe he is in a quandary to-night; I believe he does not like the division that is about to take place on this question; and I believe that our hon. friends opposite who represent agricultural constituencies do not like to have to vote against this resolution in favour of agricultural protection. I have no hesitation, Mr. Speaker, in voting for this measure of agricultural protection. I give the Minister of Agriculture credit for the steps he has taken already to encourage agriculture in this country; but I hope, now that he has made the break, that he will come out boldly and squarely in favour of what will keep the Government in the estimation of the people of Canada, that is, the writing on their party standard of every encouragement to the agricultural interests of this country.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, as I represent an agricultural constituency, and as the question before the House is one relating particularly to agriculture, I wish to say a word or two in regard to the resolution, which upon its face is strongly in favour of an important branch of agricultural industry. I am, Mr. Speaker, a national policy man; I am in favour of a national policy. But it does not necessarily follow that a national policy always means a policy of high tariff or a bonus. I am in favour of whatever will be found for the good of the Canadian nation or any branch of that Canadian nation, whether it is one form or another—whether it is, if you like, in the form of a high tariff or a bonus. If I believe it is for the benefit of the Canadian nation, it will have my support, irrespective of what particular name you call it by. So that I have no prejudice whatever against the motion before the House. It is merely a question as to the best way in which the public funds of this country can be used to aid the dairy industry; and I will not spend time in arguing the point, more than to follow what was said by an hon. member on the other side of the House, who pointed out very clearly that the Government at present were using the public funds of this country in certain ways for the purpose of promoting the dairy industry, and who gave it as his opinion that those methods were more to the advantage of that industry and of the country at large than the method proposed in the resolution before the House. That is the ground I take, and upon that ground I shall vote against the resolution, believing that the public funds of this country can be used to better advantage along the lines which have been inaugurated by the present Minister of Agriculture than by adopting this new proposition. After a time, if it shall appear that the methods of the Minister of Agriculture have proven failures, and something new is needed, then I shall be prepared to support this or other measures that will appear likely to lead to success. But at the present stage, I am not prepared to condemn by my vote for this resolution the efforts that have been put forward in the last two years for the advancement of the dairy industry throughout the Dominion—efforts which, in my humble opinion, have been well directed, and which, as far as they have gone, have been highly successful.

I say this is in the hope and belief that the measure now in hand will be, as the circumstances require and admit, further expanded for the general benefit of the community.

I wish to say a word of explanation in reply to a charge which fell from the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope). That hon. gentleman declared that the Minister of Agriculture was open to severe criticism for having expended public money in advancing the dairy industry in the North-west in preference to the dairy industry in the eastern provinces. In the first place, if I am not mistaken, a very considerable portion of the public money of the Dominion was expended to advance the dairy industry in the eastern provinces, that is to say, in the old settled provinces, and particularly the province of Prince Edward Island, before any money was used for that purpose in the Territories. But in reply to the contention that inasmuch as there is a larger and an older established population in the eastern provinces, therefore these provinces are entitled to greater consideration than the newly settled districts of the North-west, I would like to say that it is because the conditions are so different in the North-west as to render the ordinary co-operation, which is so essential, and which is practicable in the eastern provinces, almost impracticable in the west, the Government was justified in coming to the assistance of the western settler. All things being equal, I would certainly say that the eastern provinces have the prior claim, but what I want to point out is that the conditions here are not similar to what they are with us, and that it was to compensate for the lack of advantages in the Territories, which are not lacking in the eastern provinces, that the Government came to our assistance in this matter of creameries. Let me point out further that in the Territories, at any rate in the district I represent, the assistance of the Government was not directed to the establishment of new creameries. The Government did not spend the public money in that district to supply that which the inhabitants were lacking in enterprise to supply themselves. The people of the district which I represent had gone into the dairy industry, they had spent very large sums of their own money in trying to put that industry on its feet, they had struggled two, three or four years against disadvantageous conditions, due mainly to the scattered nature of the settlements, which again was caused by the land policy pursued in years past. By reason mainly of the scattered nature of the settlements, these enterprises were practically failures, so that in going into that country the Government did not undertake to supply new enterprises to the people but came in to protect the people against certain conditions which they did not calculate upon when they started these industries, and for which they were not responsible. I would say further that the action of the Government in that country has been, so far as the district I mention is concerned, fairly satisfactory; and putting it on no other grounds, as a means of bringing about contentment and prosperity to the settler and thereby inducing further settlement and development, it has been the most successful policy by far of the Dominion Government under the present administration. Had the conditions in the west been as they are in the east, where the settlements are close together, where capital is abundant, and had the people themselves lacked the enterprise to go into this industry, then the Government might not have been justified in going into the North-west, but the conditions were not favourable, the people out there had the enterprise, they had sunk their money, and the Government merely came in to supplement conditions for which the people were not responsible and against which it was necessary to provide, in order that the industry might be a success. The action of the Government has been a success in that part of the country, and this part will reap its share of the profits.

Mr. SEMPLE. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to make a few remarks on this motion. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), gave the keynote when he said that a bonus was the best kind of protection. I must say that the local governments and the Dominion Governments have done all that could be reasonably expected. They have endeavoured to educate the farmers, so as to enable them to make the best kind of butter and cheese. This education has been carried on all over the Dominion. In the province of Ontario there are places of instruction where lessons in dairying are given, so that every one who wishes to avail himself of it, has the opportunity of being instructed in that industry without any cost. That, however, the Government did not consider sufficient, but they also sent travelling dairies to all the principal places in the different constituencies, in order to give object lessons, showing the best method of making butter. I consider that of late years, the Government has acted very generously towards the agricultural community. They have established the cold storage system so that butter and cheese may be placed on the British market to the best advantage, and, as has been stated by an hon. gentleman, this will be supplemented in due time by the appointment of agents at the distributing points in Great Britain, who will see that the produce of this country is put on the British market in the best condition and where it will command the best prices. Now, I shall read a part of the resolution of the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid) so that I may stick to my text. The part of the resolution that relates to butter, reads as follows:—

That whereas a large export butter trade would benefit not only the farmers as a whole, but the millions of money it would yearly bring into the country would do incalculable good to the whole community.

That, in view of the foregoing facts, our Government should take immediate steps to do something more to assist in the development of our butter trade, and this House is of the opinion that the Government should place in the Estimates for the present session an amount to be paid to the farmers direct by way of a bonus of one cent per pound on a specified quantity of our finest fresh creamery butter to be exported to Great Britain while fresh and in condition to secure a reputation for itself and establish a lasting demand, and that this bonus be continued for three consecutive years. This bonus to be increased at the discretion of the Government on butter made during the winter months. All such butter to be subject to a rigid Government inspection.

That this bonus be paid to only those farmers who will furnish for export regular supplies. So that you see, Mr. Speaker, this bonus is only to be given to a certain number. If one class of farmers make butter for export, another make butter for the local market, another raise cattle for export, another raise horses, another sheep and another hogs, I want to know what is the reason why any one of these others is not as much entitled to a bonus as those producing butter for export. I do not believe that, if this bonus were granted, farmers who are raising cattle for export would make a change and adopt the making of butter for the British market. Under this proposal, for a thousand pounds of butter exported, the bonus, at 1 cent a pound, would be $10. Do you think, for that small amount, any farmer would change the kind of farming he has been engaged in and go into the production of butter for the British market? I certainly think not. And if the change were made, and no more money realized than there is at present, what would be the use of it? For my part, if bonuses are to be granted, I think it would be better to give a bonus to those who are raising excellent cattle for the British market, for we know that that is a much more important industry than butter. The income to the country from the cattle trade is about $7,000,000 a year. It seems to me these bonuses are not needed at all. It reminds me of a cattle dealer I once knew, who used to say that he was always willing to spend 25 or 50 cents, if he could make $4 or $5 on a deal. There has been pretense, in years gone by, that the farmers were protected, but that was mainly as an excuse for the protection of other industries, and most of the money came out of the farmers' pockets.

Mr. COCHRANE. We have that all changed now, of course.

Mr. SEMPLE. Let me read, for the benefit of the hon. gentleman, showing that a very large amount of money was received for the sale of butter even before the National Policy came into existence. I find this table in the Year-book. It gives the receipts from the sale of butter from 1874 to 1896. In 1874 the amount realized by the sale of butter was $2,620,305; in 1875, $2,337,124; in 1876, $2,540,894; in 1877, $3,073,409; in 1878, $2,382,237. I do not intend to go through this whole list; suffice it to say, that in 1896 the amount received for butter was $1,052,089. In 1897 the income from this source was more than double that amount, being $2,283,481. In 1891, the year in which the largest amount was received for the sale of butter, the receipts amounted to $3,573,034. So, you see, butter is by no means an infant industry. It has flourished without any protection, and, with the advantage of the cold storage and of the methods of education that have been adopted, it will flourish in the future. The farmers, as a class, I think, are satisfied. The Government has really done them justice in the amount of money they have expended on the dairies and creameries in the North-west and Manitoba, and other expenditures for the farmers. With wise use of the advantages that are afforded, I believe the farmers will make a better show in the future in the production of butter for the British market.

Now, I wish to say a word with regard to another question which has been brought up, and upon which, though a little aside from the subject before the House, I trust I may be permitted to speak for a moment. I refer to the reports issued by the Experimental Farm. There has been no change made since the present Minister of Agriculture assumed office. When questioned, today, he did not understand exactly the state of affairs. He had a vacation from this House for a few years and had not followed the working of the Committee on Agriculture and Colonization. But that committee has been doing good work. Farmers of both political parties have met and studied diligently and earnestly what was for the best interests of the farmers. I can remember, on many occasions, when the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) was chairman of the committee, when the committee recommended that a certain number of reports be procured, he wished the number to be cut down, because he thought the Government would not consent to print as many as the committee required. And so the matter was compromised, and as many as was considered absolutely necessary were supplied. I remember receiving a communication from the Experimental Farm, giving a list of those receiving farm reports and bulletins, and asking me to cut off the names of those who were no longer there and to add the names of those who should receive these papers. I did so, and sent back the list with about two hundred names.

Mr. WILSON. When did the hon. gentleman (Mr. Semple) receive that?

Mr. SEMPLE. That would be about four years ago. I must say, that, whether I was in Opposition or supporting the Government, as I am now, I was justly treated in the matter of these farm reports. The Government at no time, so far as I know, made any difference between parties in this respect.

Mr. COCHRANE. Are you getting reports now?

Mr. SEMPLE. I have not had any of late. We will have a meeting of the Agriculture Committee and learn exactly how things stand.

Mr. SNETSINGER. I have been glad to hear the discussion of this subject, particularly by my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher). I am inclined to think that this proposal is not so much to benefit the farmers as it is to catch votes. Though I come from an agricultural county, I have heard nothing of this proposal. There is no feeling in the country in favour of this bonus business. I do not think the farmers require it. The fact is, we were manufacturing cheese, in our section, and we are now turning our attention, for the simple reason that cheese is very low and butter is very high. I have no doubt that the province of Ontario generally is going more into the manufacture of butter. As to the action of the Minister of Agriculture, I hope he will see his way clear to the establishment of more dairy schools, particularly in the province of Ontario. I think that, between Montreal and Kingston, on the St. Lawrence River, we ought to have one school. These schools are doing great service for the country.

Our people have not asked for this bonus, and I do not think they want it. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) has spoken with regard to bonuses, he says that England is going to introduce the system of bonuses. Well, they have never had it yet. If he looks into the newspapers he will find that there was a meeting recently held in Belgium for the purpose of bringing together all countries that have been giving bonuses on sugar, with the object of doing away with that system altogether. There is no doubt in my mind that they will do away altogether with bonuses in regard to the sugar duties. It is too late for us to begin now to give a bonus on butter. I cannot see what good object the mover of this motion can have, unless he is seeking to make political capital out of it. There is no reason why we should give a bonus on butter at the present time. The county of Stormont, which I have the honour to represent, makes a great deal of butter, and I say now that our butter stands as high in the English market as any other butter in the world. No other country in the world can produce better butter than the clover leaf butter made in the county of Stormont. There is no trouble in making first-class butter in this country which will command the highest price in the English market. The hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope) says that because the farmers in the North-west can raise wheat to advantage, they have no need to go into butter making. There is no common sense in that. The fact is the North-west is a very good dairy country, and there is no reason why they should not go into the making of butter and cheese as well as raising wheat. I think the Minister of Agriculture has been wise in taking the course he did in establishing dairy schools in that section of the country. I was up there last summer, and I found them making magnificent cheese and magnificent butter, and I think it is in the interest of the whole Dominion that these factories should be established in that country. Although I come from an agricultural county, I have no desire that this bounty business should go on, nor do I think that my constituents have any such desire. The people are not asking for it. I have no doubt that if this question were put to a vote to-morrow the farmers of Canada would be found opposed to it themselves. This question has been discussed over and over again in past years, and I think it is now brought up again simply to catch votes and not in the interest of the farmer.

Mr. SPROULE. I wish to make a brief explanation with regard to the distribution of the report of the Agricultural Committee, and that of the Experimental Farm, as there seems to be some misunderstanding about it on both sides of the House. From year to year in the Agriculture Committee we usually made a recommendation to the House that a certain number of reports should be printed for distribution amongst the members, and also a number of reports of the Experimental Farm. One year we sent in a recommendation that the House should print 150,000 of the one report and 50,000 of the other. But we usually found considerable difficulty in getting the House to agree to so large an expenditure for that purpose. For several years we recommended a smaller number, and they were distributed to the members of both sides of the House to be sent to their constituents. But we found that there was going on at the same time a distribution from the Farm, we found that some of our constituents, when we sent them these reports, had been getting others from the Farm, in other words, they were getting duplicated reports. That was brought up in committee, and it was considered a waste of money that two reports of the same kind should be sent to the same party. I was instructed to make inquiry as to how the distribution was made at the Farm. I ascertained that some years ago when farmers' institutes were started in Ontario, an arrangement was entered into between the Agricultural Department here and the Ontario Government, that all members of the farmers' institutes should be supplied with the Farm Report and all the other bulletins that were issued from the farm. That was done for the purpose of inducing parties to join the farmers' institutes. The farmers' institutes sent the names in to the provincial government, and they were forwarded down here and put on our list. Of course it became a very extensive list, because, while additional names were going on every year, there were few being struck off. We found the distribution from the Farm was very large, especially of the Farm Report. Then the question was brought up in our committee as to how we could best distribute the report and avoid its being duplicated as had been the case. The sense of a large number of the members of that committee was that the distribution should be made by the members, but there were others who strongly opposed it, and who thought that it was imposing work upon them which might as well be done by the farm manager through his clerks. I was requested to furnish a list of the names that we were supplying, with a view of devising some means by which the distribution would be more evenly divided, and avoid the duplication which had been going on. It was finally decided that the superintendent of the Experimental Farm, Mr. Saunders, should send to each member a list of those in his own constituency who were being supplied from the Farm, so that he might revise it and strike off the names of those who were dead, of others who had moved away, and of others who had changed their occupation and therefore did not require the report. That was done, I think, three years ago, if my memory is correct. I know the superintendent sent me a list of the names to whom this report was sent, also the list for my constituency, and I revised the list and sent it back. I know a number of other members did the same. It was contemplated then that that should be repeated every two or three years, so that the list would be kept up to date, and that the farm manager should make the distribution from his office instead of it being made here. But it was still considered advisable that a number of the reports of the Agricultural Committee should be distributed amongst the members so that they could send them to others who applied for them. However, in 1896 our session was so disorganized that a report which was sent down by that committee was never adopted in this House. Therefore the report was not printed. Last year the committee did not send down a recommendation to this House to print any number, and therefore it was again overlooked or omitted, consequently we have had no distribution for the last two years. But I have no doubt the committee will take it up this year, and as usual send in their recommendation on that line. Now, this is the mode of distribution to-day, and these are the reasons why the members do not get the number of copies that they used to get a few years ago. I have always thought that it would be the better plan for the members to receive those copies, because they are in touch with the electorate themselves and let the members distribute them. But I know, as chairman of that committee, that many complaints were made to me that the reports were not distributed from the Farm, and that work was imposed upon the members that might as well be done by the clerks at the Farm. For that reason it was recommended that the distribution should be made from the Farm, except that of the extra copies which were recommended to be published by that committee and distributed to the members.

Mr. ROGERS. As we have heard speeches from a number of representatives of the two great political parties in this House on this subject, I think it right that the House should also hear from the third great party. I am myself not only a representative of an agricultural county, but a representative of an organization that is supposed to be entirely agricultural. Now, Sir, I must say that all our meetings and gatherings, at no time has there been any mention made of the idea of bonusing any of our farm products. We are against the principle of Government paper or Government bonuses being given to any interest. Last year when this matter was brought before the House, I expressed my opposition to the principle, and I am of the same opinion still. We are opposed to bonuses of any kind, and to be consistent we must, of course, oppose a bonus of the kind asked for in the motion of the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid). All the farmers want is a fair field and no favour. We do not ask that bonuses should be given to farmers, who pay nine-tenths of the taxes. The farmers do not seek special favours. They have in the past held their own with the agricultural class in any other land. This is shown by the standard attained by our wheat, cheese and dairying products; they have got to the top in competition with their rivals. It is an old story to speak about the success of our cheese in England. The manufacturers of that product did not obtain any Government paper or aid of any kind in bringing that product up to its present standard. The hon. member for North Perth (Mr. McLaren), who largely aided to bring our cheese manufacture to such perfection, never received a bonus, and what he has accomplished surely can be reached by others. Our farmers are not lacking in intelligence; they are becoming more acquainted with the scientific methods of farming and dairying, and are adopting them. If a Government bonus is to be asked at all, it should cover all lines of our exports. Our poultry and egg industry requires aid more than our butter industry. There is great scope for our poultry industry in the English market, and if the Government wants to grant any concession, let them give a bonus on exports of poultry and eggs. The influence of such a bonus would be felt along every concession line; but let me repeat that the farmers do not believe in the bonus system. The last clause of this motion states that the bonus is to be paid only to farmers who furnished for export regular supplies. There is a very small percentage of the farmers who would be able to attempt to do this, and it would be hardly fair to have nine-tenths of the farmers taxed while only one in ten thousand of the farmers produced butter for export, and were able to receive any of this bonus. It would be something like robbing Peter to pay Paul. I repeat that farmers are opposed in principle to granting bonuses. They believe that every industry should stand on its own merits, as that of farming is prepared to do, and that no exception should be made of any class of the people. In order to be consistent, I must vote against this resolution, which has within it the principle of granting bonuses.

Mr. CAMPBELL. When I moved the adjournment of this debate yesterday, I did so for the purpose of allowing some hon. members the opportunity of addressing the House. But the debate has now occupied the greater portion of to-day, and the subject has been so thoroughly discussed in all its phases that I do not see any necessity for further adjournment. I therefore ask permission of the House to withdraw my motion for the adjournment of the debate.

Motion to adjourn debate withdrawn.

Mr. REID. Before the resolution is put to the House, I should like to offer a few remarks in answer to statements made by some hon. gentlemen opposite. I am glad indeed that the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) has seen his way clear to withdraw his motion for adjournment. I was anxious to have a vote taken on the main resolution, so that we could obtain an expression of opinion upon it from each hon. member. As to the statement made by the hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Snettinger), whom I do not see in his seat at the present moment, that I framed this resolution for the purpose of catching votes, I wish to tell that hon. gentleman that before I placed this resolution on the paper last year, I consulted some of the leading farmers in my constituency—in fact, they approached me and said something should be done on this line in the interest of the farmers. I consulted the leading farmers, both Liberals and Conservatives, in my constituency and in the constituency where I asked information from the farmers. I never met one, Liberal or Conservative, who told me that it was a wrong system to bonus the butter industry of the Dominion. Backed up by the farmers of my constituency, I felt it was my duty to place such a motion on the paper, and in doing so I plainly stated that I did not wish to make it a party question, and that I hoped no hon. member would treat it as such. I was very sorry indeed to see that the Minister of Agriculture made it a party question, and the Government are treating it as a Government question, and thus hon. members on the other side of the House, those whom I believe would have supported this resolution, are forced under the circumstances to oppose it. The hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan), who is a leading farmer and in whose judgment I have the greatest confidence, was a little wrong in some of his statements. He told the House that the reason why our butter trade on the other side of the water was not a success was mainly on account of some fault on the part of the inspectors.

That, however, is not the main point I wish to bring up. If the hon. gentleman observes the dairy market prices, he will agree with me that dairy-made butter does not bring nearly as high a price in the cities of the Dominion as does creamery butter. I believe it will be the unanimous opinion of this House that creamery butter will always bring a high price, and therefore our farmers should engage in that industry at the very earliest possible moment and thus secure the highest price for their butter.

The hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMullan) and the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Rogers), both of them leading farmers, tell us that they object to this resolution because they are opposed to the bonus system. That need not worry the hon. gentlemen because last session they both voted for a bonus on iron. They have a precedent for supporting this resolution, for they were not against giving a bonus to the iron industry last year. And if they were willing to give a bounty to the iron industry, why are they not willing to give a bonus or a bounty to their fellow-farmers who are striving to make a living. The hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Semple) gave a statement to show that the butter trade had increased, and I believe he told us that in the year 1874, the value of the butter exported to England was $2,620,305, while in 1897 the value of the butter exported, according to his figures, was $2,283,481. Now, according to the arithmetic I learned at school, I cannot see how there was any increase in that, for if it is properly figured out it will be seen that there was a decrease of $400,000 in the 23 years. In 1874, as we know, there was but a small quantity of cheese exported, while our Trade and Navigation Returns show that last year we sent to England an enormous quantity. England does not import as great a number of pounds of cheese as it does of butter, and yet Canada has 60 per cent of the English cheese trade and less than one-fortieth of the butter trade. I find in the daily paper to-day, that last week the total exports of cheese from Montreal amounted to 19,867 boxes, while there were only 497 boxes of butter sent. Why, let me ask, should there not have been as many packages of butter as of cheese exported? I thought at first that the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Featherston) would support this resolution because he told us that if he thought this money would go directly to the farmers he would favour it. Now, if the hon. gentleman read the resolution he would find that I have made that point very plain, and that the bonus should be paid directly to the farmer. If the Government were to place an amount in the Estimates for that purpose they could very easily arrange the details as to how it could be paid, and in consequence the hon. member (Mr. Featherston) had a very lame excuse for not supporting the motion. The hon. member for North Leeds and

Mr. REID.

Grenville (Mr. Frost) told us that the Government granted a bonus for cold storage depots at all our creameries and cheese factories, and if that be true, it is evident that the Government is dealing with this matter in a very practical way. I would like to ask the hon. Minister if that statement of the hon. gentleman is correct?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. According to the scheme I explained to the House last year, we are granting a small bonus to every creamery that establishes a proper refrigerator and which complies with the conditions which the department lays down. We are not granting that bonus to cheese factories, because they do not require refrigeration as do the butter factories.

Mr. REID. What is the bonus?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It is a bonus of $50 for the first year, when they have shown to the inspector that they have established a proper refrigerator, and $25 for each of the two succeeding years, making in all $100, provided they build and maintain the refrigerator for three years.

Mr. REID. I am very much obliged to the hon. Minister for the explanation, but I may point out that this amount is but a comparatively small item.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. A refrigerator such as we expect, could be built for about $400, and we give them $100 towards the cost.

Mr. REID. Therefore, the Government have already adopted the system of bonus-ing, although it is on a very small scale. In my constituency the majority of my electors are farmers; they are the backbone of the constituency, and I feel that anything I can do in the interests of the farmers I am going to do it whether on this side of the House or whether I am on the other. Hon. gentlemen may remember that when I sat as a supporter of the Conservative Government I was the first to ask in this House that the Government should adopt some means of branding cheese. The Government took the matter in hand and they did adopt a plan. That idea originated with the farmers of my constituency who asked me to take that course in Parliament, and this resolution now before the House originated in a similar way. It is hardly fair, on account of my now being in Opposition, that the hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Snettinger) should attribute to me a certain motive for placing this resolution on the Order paper. I can assure the hon. gentleman that if my party were in power to-day I would have put the same resolution on the Order paper as stands in my name to-night.

We have heard, from the hon. member from Frontenac (Mr. Rogers), that he belongs to the third party. For my part, since the hon. gentleman has been a member of this House, I have failed to see where there has been any third party, so far as he is concerned. I have not seen where the hon. gentleman has recorded a single, solitary vote, other than with the Government, though he has been opposed to the tariff and to bonuses of every kind. When any question of this kind has come up, he has stood up, like a little man, and recorded his vote with the party in power. The hon. gentleman, in the last local election, if I remember rightly, supported the Liberal candidate. The gentleman who ran in Frontenac was previously a Patron, but in the last election he accepted the Liberal nomination and was the candidate of the Hon. Mr. Hardy; and the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Rogers) fought for that man and did all he could for his election. The hon. gentleman, therefore, cannot hold out to the country that there is any third party in this House. He will have to give some better evidence than he has given since he has been in this House, to make the country believe that he is independent of party. If I were in the hon. gentleman's position, I would stand up honestly and squarely before this House and show my colours, and not call myself a third-party man. Any man has a right to take what stand he likes, and I admire any man, even though he is a Liberal, who fights for his party. I am a Conservative, and I will stand up for my party. But I do not admire a man who professes to belong to a third party, but who always votes with the party in power.

With regard to the distribution of the Experimental Farm reports, which has been alluded to in this debate, I may say to the Minister of Agriculture, that I took great pleasure in distributing those reports and the report of the Minister of Agriculture. The members of this House always got a large number of those reports, and I made it a point, when distributing them, to send them to every farming elector in my county, so far as they would go, irrespective of party. If they are to be distributed in the way the Minister says, I can only get very few of them; at least, he would not take the list I would give him. It would require some 2,000 or 3,000 to supply the farmers of the constituency I represent, and it would be hardly fair to pick out one farmer here and one farmer there for the purpose. I may say, that every one of the farmers who received these reports was glad to receive them, whether Liberal or Conservative. I think the Government should try to give every member a sufficient number of these reports to enable him to supply every household farmer in the constituency he represents. I believe that nothing has done more good to the farmers than the reports of the Experimental Farm. I have heard farmers in my county express themselves to that effect; and I sincerely hope that the Mini-ter will see his way clear to continue in the future the system which we had in the past.

I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, to have detained the House so long at this late hour; but I wish it to be thoroughly understood that, in bringing this matter up, I have not done it in any party spirit, and I am sorry that it will be treated as a party question. I brought it up, as I said before, at the request of both Liberals and Conservatives in my county, and, no matter what the consequences may be, I shall have done my duty in the matter.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend complains of the conduct of the Government, lectures the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Rogers) severely for his conduct, and generally seems to feel aggrieved at the action of the members of the House. I wish to say a few words with regard to the distribution of the reports, because my hon. friend must admit that he and other members who have discussed the matter, are altogether mistaken, in trying to blame the Minister of Agriculture, or the Government, for the way in which these reports have been distributed.

Mr. REID. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I have not blamed the Minister for the system of distribution. The hon. Minister explained to us, that the system of distributing them to every member had not been carried out, and I simply urged the Minister to see his way clear to give them to the members. I am not finding fault with him.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The whole gist of the discussion was, that the system of distributing the reports was changed, and insinuations were made that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) was mistaken, and that the statement of the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague) was correct. As the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) pointed out, and as every member of this House ought to know, especially the members of the Committee on Agriculture, the reports distributed to the members were not at all under the control of the Government or the Department of Agriculture, or the Experimental Farm, but they were ordered by the House, on a resolution adopted by the committee and reported to and adopted by the House, and an appropriation was made to provide for the printing of a certain number of reports to be distributed to the members. Since 1890, I think, the Committee on Agriculture has taken no action in that respect; no reports have been printed for that purpose, and, therefore, none have been distributed in that way; and it is most unfair to try to create an impression in the country that the Minister or the Department of Agriculture had made a change or dealt unfairly in the matter. The explanation given by the Minister of Agriculture was correct, and the ex-Minister of Agriculture was clearly mistaken or misinformed. My hon. friend from South Grenville (Mr. Reid) undertook to deliver a long and severe lecture to the hon. member for Frontenac, who represents the Patrons in this House, for the action he has taken on this question. I am sure, that the hon. member for Frontenac, and the farmers of the country, especially those who belong to the organization which he represents, will feel that he is more entitled, and more likely, to take his instructions from the farmers, and from that organization, than from my hon. friend; and he has frankly stated to the House, that, at no meeting in any section of Canada, did the Patron organization, or the farmers, adopt any resolution or even argue in favour of the principle expressed in this resolution.

I am sure that instead of being derelict to his duty as the representative of the farmers, he is quite the opposite in opposing the motion of my hon. friend. As he has pointed out, the farmers are opposed on principle to this system of bonusing private enterprises. Speaking for myself, I may say that I am in favour of any method that may be adopted which, I believe to be in the interest of the country. I do not believe in being wedded to any particular method or system, if by adopting some other method we will be acting more in the interest of the farmers of Canada, and I do not see why my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Rogers) should be at all blamed for the position he has taken on this question. On the contrary, he is representing the sentiment of the whole farming community; and one reason why I oppose this motion is that I do not believe the farmers of this country are in favour of it. They certainly have not expressed their opinion in any public way that I have heard of in favour of such a method being adopted. On the contrary, I believe with my hon. friend from Frontenac that our farmers have found that in the various lines they have taken up they have been able to hold their own without the aid of Government bounties. I must take particular exception to the statement made by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), when he said that the position of the cheese trade in British America was due to the encouragement and assistance given it by the Government.

Mr. MACLEAN. I did not say so.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I looked at the "Hansard," and those were the words my hon. friend used.

Mr. MACLEAN. What I said was that we now have the British market, but that other countries, desirous of pushing their own goods there, would adopt the same system of Government encouragement, and in that way become our competitors and probably compel us to divide that market with them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I must accept the hon. gentleman's correction, but I thought I understood him thoroughly. If he will look up "Hansard," I think he will find that he is somewhat mistaken, but perhaps he did not intend to convey the impression which, it seems to me, his words did convey to the House. The hon. gentleman represents a constituency which might be called the banner cheese-producing county in Canada, and the farmers there have not asked at any time, nor do they ask the Government now, for any assistance such as is proposed here. With regard to this matter, I am of the opinion expressed by many other members, that the Government have been moving in the right direction. I believe that the Government and Parliament can do more to assist this industry by the educational system than by any other means. That is the system which has been adopted; and if the hon. member for Grenville had proposed some improvement in that direction, I believe he would have received the unanimous support of the House. I need not go into this question in detail, because every member of the House knows well what efforts have been made by the former Government, and especially the present Government, in that direction. If any money is to be expended specially to encourage the butter industry, I believe that it should be expended on an educational system such as we have at present and on improving our transportation facilities. The adoption of the cold storage system and the reduction of freights will do more to benefit the butter industry than any bonus we could grant. I agree also with my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Rogers) that if this bonus system be adopted, as proposed in this resolution, it would only be of benefit to a very few, and not to the great mass of the farmers, even among those who produce butter. For these reasons, I am opposed to this resolution, and without making any further remarks, I beg to move the following amendment:—

That all the words after "That" in the first line of the said motion be struck out, and the following added instead thereof:—

This House views with satisfaction the great progress which has been made in the butter-making branch of the dairy industry, as shown by the great and regular increase of our export trade in butter and the high reputation which the Canadian product has made, especially during last season, since the establishment of complete cold storage transportation, and believes that the course already pursued by the Government, if continued on the same lines, will result in still greater benefits to the farmers of our Dominion.

Mr. MARTIN. On this question, which is so important to a large class in this Dominion, I feel compelled to give expression to my views as representing a constituency in one of the most eastern provinces of the Dominion. It is a matter of surprise that a country which occupies the very proud position we do as an exporter of cheese, should occupy such an obscure position in the export trade of butter. I therefore think that anything this Parliament can do to place Canada in a better position as regards the butter export trade cannot fail to be to great profit and advantage of our agricultural community. In taking this course, Canada would be but following the precedents set by other countries. Hon. members opposite object to a bonus, but I do not suppose that the bonus proposed in this resolution is at all intended to be a finality or to continue for any considerable length of time. Other countries, Denmark, for instance, have a strong foothold in the English market, and if Canada wishes to obtain a share of this market, we must do something, and I think we cannot do better than act on the lines of the legislation proposed by my hon. friend from Grenville (Mr. Reid). It seems to me that after Canada has gone to a large expense in establishing the cold storage system, and is prepared to incur heavy expenditure for the establishing of a fast steamship line, it is only logical that we should take one more step in order to obtain satisfactory results from our expenditure, and that is to develop our export trade in butter. The hon. Minister of Agriculture has perhaps very justly taken some credit to himself for what has already been done, but so far as I can see, he has done nothing so far except to carry out the programme of his predecessor, and if he wants to obtain credit for himself for initiating something, he had better introduce some measure that will entitle him to such credit on the lines of this resolution or in some other way. The hon. Minister referred to the expenditure that has been made in the province of Prince Edward Island in order to establish cheese factories there, and he also referred to the Experimental Farm.

In every other province, if I mistake not, experimental farms exist. But Prince Edward Island is an exception. However, the late Government, seeing that Prince Edward Island had not the same advantages in this respect as other provinces have by having an experimental farm, did something to assist the cheese factories in that province. I am sorry that the present Minister of Agriculture has deprived us of that advantage.

The hon. Minister of Agriculture has said that the cheese industry in Prince Edward Island is on a good footing. I say that the cheese industry there is only in its infancy and that the product could be doubled in a short time if proper encouragement were given. A serious blow was given to the industry by the present Minister of Agriculture when he withdrew the patronage which the late Government gave. Prince Edward Island suffers under still another disadvantage. When cold storage was proposed, men who had an eye to the welfare of the province, subscribed money for cold storage in Charlottetown, the capital of the province, but the Minister of Agriculture withdrew what he was doing for the other provinces and nothing was done to provide Prince Edward Island with steamship facilities. I hope that this will be provided for this session. The sums subscribed by private individuals last year for the erection of cold storage warehouses for Charlottetown are likely to be withdrawn unless the Minister of Agriculture comes down with a scheme to have steamers call during the season. In that case Prince Edward Island will not get the advantages conferred on other parts of the Dominion either in the manufacture of cheese or in the manufacture of butter. I am not wedded to the bonus system, though I support this resolution. I do not suppose that the mover of it expects the system to continue for a long period of years, I think that the $100,000 or $200,000 that it would cost could be spent in this way to advantage. Hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that seven-tenths of the taxes come out of the farmers. I do not think that this bonus, which is for the benefit of the farmers will take a very large slice out of the farmers' contributions. I would prefer that, in place of this bonus of one cent per pound, the Government should open depots in the large centres of Great Britain where our butter could be sold as Canadian butter. But in the event of that alternative not being carried out, I cheerfully support this resolution, and if the result will be to place Canada in the same proud position in the British markets in regard to butter as it now holds with regard to cheese, no one who is at all interested in the welfare of Canada will begrudge the expenditure.

Mr. ERB. Coming, as I do, from a constituency largely engaged in the manufacture of butter and cheese, I desire to say a few words on the subject of this resolution. The riding of South Perth which I have the honour to represent has a large number of cheese factories many of which have been in operation for many years and have been a source of profit to the farmers in that locality. During the last few years many of these factories have been engaged during the winter months in the manufacture of butter, the summer being devoted to the manufacture of cheese. The dairymen who are engaged in this line of production are wideawake and enterprising business men. In many instances the farmers themselves have formed joint stock companies, have put up buildings, and engaged skilled cheese and butter makers—men who have spent years in acquiring all the knowledge obtainable with regard to their line of work—and have supplied these men with the most modern and improved appliances for the manufacture of cheese and butter. At least one man in our district has been in the habit of going to England every year to study the requirements of the British market, and the farmers in our locality get the benefit of the information he gathers on his trips. I need hardly say that the gentleman to whom I refer is the Hon. Thomas Ballantyne, a man to whom, I think, the farmers of Ontario are very largely indebted for the present satisfactory state of the cheese industry in this country. The results from these factories have been so encouraging that during the past year there has been established at the town of St. Mary's a large butter-making factory, with a number of separating stations in the surrounding country. The farmers take their milk to these separating stations, and after the cream is separated, the milk is returned to their homes, while the cream is carried to the central station at St. Mary's, where it is ripened and churned into butter. The product of this factory, to a large extent, has been sent to the British market. So that the export trade in butter to Great Britain has already passed beyond the experimental stage, and I can see no reason why the Government should seek to encourage it further by means of a bonus. Particularly do I object to the resolution now before the House, because if this principle were carried into practice, very few of the farmers of Ontario would receive any benefit from this bonus. Hon. members will notice that the last clause of the resolution reads :

That this bonus be paid to only those farmers who will furnish for export regular supplies.

Now, any one who is acquainted with the production of butter or cheese knows that very few farmers are in a position to bind themselves during a whole year to furnish regular supplies. The production of milk depends upon a great many conditions which are altogether beyond the farmers' control. Consequently few farmers would be benefited because they could not furnish regular supplies. For this reason I am opposed to the resolution.

If this resolution were adopted, it would simply mean that a large portion of the population of Canada would be taxing themselves indirectly for the benefit of a very few, a principle which I cannot approve. For that reason I shall feel it my duty to oppose this resolution.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not intend to say anything upon this subject which has been already so fully debated, but I think it would be wrong to allow the course which has been adopted by the hon. gentlemen opposite to pass unchallenged. My hon. friend from Grenville (Mr. Reid) has submitted a proposition to the House that asks the Government to take immediate steps to do something more to assist the development of the butter trade. He does not deny that something has been already done, but he proposes that something more should be done, and that he defines as a proposition—

Mr. ERB.

“ That the Government should place in the Estimates for the present session an amount to be paid to the farmers direct by way of a bonus of one cent per pound on a specified quantity of our finest fresh creamery butter to be exported to Great Britain while fresh and in condition to secure a reputation for itself and establish a lasting demand, and that this bonus be continued for three consecutive years. This bonus to be increased at the discretion of the Government on butter made during the winter months. All such butter to be subject to a rigid Government inspection.

That this bonus be paid only to those farmers who will furnish for export regular supplies.

Now, nothing could be more clear, nothing could be more plain than the statement proposed in this resolution. If hon. gentlemen opposite are opposed to that resolution, why should they be afraid to vote it down? Sir, the course that has been taken by hon. gentlemen opposite who are opposing this resolution, shows that they believe it will commend itself to the independent judgment of the great agricultural interests of this country. We all know what has been accomplished in this direction, we all know what the cheese industry has done for Canada. We all know that from feeble beginnings it has grown up until it has become one of the most important industries, one of the most important articles of trade of the Dominion of Canada. We know that our cheese has acquired a pre-eminent position in the markets of Great Britain. Now, why should we not in addition seek to place our butter in the same unrivalled position in the English market that our cheese now occupies? There is no country in the world that is in a position to compete with Canada in the production of the finest quality of butter, as it has been proved to a demonstration that there is no country in the world that is in a position successfully to compete with Canada in regard to cheese. We all know what an enormous industry this has become, and what its vast importance is to the great agricultural interests of the Dominion of Canada. Well, Sir, if that be the case in regard to cheese, why are these hon. gentlemen opposite afraid to take such measures as will put our butter industry on the same ground, and bring it to the same high position that the cheese industry now occupies? The very fact that Canada has been able to do what she has done in regard to cheese, shows that we have the climate, we have the soil, we have all the necessary conditions to enable us to acquire the same high position in regard to butter that our cheese now occupies, and that without losing a jot or tittle of the advantage which our cheese now holds. Is there any reason why, seeing we have accomplished so much in one branch of industry, we should not take measures to accomplish the same thing for another branch of industry, especially in view of the enormous capabilities that Canada possesses for producing the highest quality of butter? Although hon. gentlemen opposite are not willing to accept this proposal of my hon. friend from Grenville, they know that he is voicing the sentiment of the great agricultural classes of this country. Although the Minister of Agriculture has done his best to prevent this resolution from receiving the support of this House, to prevent the butter industry of Canada from attaining the same pre-eminent position that the cheese industry now occupies, having determined that this resolution should not be adopted, he is still afraid of it. Why is he afraid of it? If he is right, if the butter industry does not require any support, if this resolution is uncalled for, if this is not a wise course to pursue why does not the hon. gentleman have the courage to ask those behind him to vote down this resolution proposed by my hon. friend? It is simply because that hon. gentleman knows, and those who sit behind him know that the sentiment propounded to this House by the hon. member for Grenville will be endorsed by the overwhelming majority of the great agricultural interests of Canada. Then what is done? Why, Sir, the miserable subterfuge is resorted to of attempting to get rid of this resolution by a side wind. Instead of meeting it in a manly fashion, by voting it down, they move the adjournment of the debate, well knowing that if they could put it at the bottom of the list they could prevent its being brought up again this session, and this House would have no opportunity to pass upon it at all. Well, Sir, that game has been checkmated and prevented. Then what do they do? Why they propose a resolution that every man on this side will vote for, they propose a resolution which, if offered to the House as a substantive proposition, would receive the support of every hon. gentleman on this side. There is not a man on this side of the House who is fighting in behalf of the great agricultural interests, as they have always fought for them, who would not be delighted, if the Government had proposed this as a substantive proposition, to vote for it. But what is the reason that this House is asked to give a negative to a proposition that every hon. gentleman on this side of the House is in favour of? Why, Sir, once more—I hope it is not unparliamentary for me to use the term—they have resorted to a miserable subterfuge to get rid of a resolution that they know will be sustained by the agricultural interests of Canada from one end of the country to the other. There is not a gentleman in this House who would not be delighted to vote for this resolution if put before us in any other light but as a means of preventing this additional aid and support being given to the butter industry. There is no hon. gentleman on either side of this House who is not willing to stand for that great interest in Canada that is of such vital importance to the progress and prosperity of the whole Dominion. There was not an hon. gentleman on either side of the House who should not be prepared to vote for that motion and vote for it in connection with the resolution now proposed. Is there a word in this motion inconsistent with the resolution of the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid)? Not a word. We all admit that both the past Government and the present Government have done a great deal for the butter industry. I am not going into that, as it has been reiterated again and again, and admitted on both sides of the House, that this industry has received a certain amount of attention; but, when we look at the utter insignificance of the success that has been achieved, compared with what we believe Canada can achieve in the butter industry every one must see that the amendment is one proposed for the purpose of killing the resolution, and has no other object, and that it affords a poor shield to protect hon. gentlemen opposite from the indignation which will be excited among agriculturists in Canada. Indignation will be felt by any intelligent farmer, I care not in what province he lives, because, knowing the capabilities of Canada to maintain an unrivalled butter industry, he cannot fail to see through this transparent gauze, and those who profess to endorse the measures taken, well and wisely, by the past Government and the present Government. I give them full credit for what they have done; I give the Minister of Agriculture full credit for having followed in the footsteps of his predecessors, for he has done so at considerable personal sacrifice on his own part, because, following so closely on the footsteps of his predecessor, he was obliged to run counter to the views expressed by himself in Opposition, and he became a humble follower of the Conservative party, which had taken up the butter industry. That fact has been established to-day beyond controversy. The hon. gentleman knows that one of the strong points in favour of a fast Atlantic service was, not only cold storage, but rapid means of transit, by which butter of the highest and finest grade could be delivered on the market of Great Britain. Yet the hon. gentleman did all he could to prevent that fast Atlantic project being carried out, one which is of so much importance to the agriculturists. He pledged himself, in the face of the people, against it; yet he is now supporting the fast Atlantic service and the cold storage system, and, in fact, he is wisely and judiciously availing himself of the services of a man placed in this department by the Conservative party, and whose guidance he recognizes. So I give the hon. gentleman full credit, and I say that, not only has he done what was his duty as a Minister, because in the past he committed himself to a different view, but in the face of that inconsistency, he has taken hold of those great questions and followed humbly and earnestly in the footsteps of his predecessors. Why cannot the hon. gentleman go a step further? Admitting, as he does, that he owes so much to the Conservative party and to the policy they have propounded, and that he owes so much in respect to this butter industry and everything connected with his department, to the Conservatives, why is the hon. gentleman afraid to go a little further and adopt the wise measure propounded by the hon. member for Grenville, so as to meet the wishes of the great agricultural industry in this country? While admitting that a great deal has been done by the past and the present Government, I ask this Government, why such an insignificant appropriation of public money is made for the purpose of doing that for the butter industry which would be of enormous advantage, not to the agriculturists alone, but to every one interested in the progress and prosperity of Canada. This is an unworthy means to adopt. It shows that hon. gentlemen opposite are as unequal to meet this question in a fair and manly way, by the adoption of any parliamentary procedure, as they have been unable to maintain their position in the debate that has taken place. They have been left without a leg under them, and they know it. They know more than that. They know that, at this moment, they stand in dread of the indignation that will be felt by the agricultural population of this Dominion. How do they attempt to shield themselves? With this flimsy gauze, that every farmer, however humble his position may be, if he possesses a particle of intelligence, will see through; and they will denounce this motion as an altogether unworthy means of meeting a proposition that, after long debate, the House became satisfied should commend itself to the minds of the agriculturists, and their condemnation of the position of hostility taken by the Government to this measure will be justified.

Hon. gentlemen opposite talk about the agricultural interests of this country. What have they done to promote those interests, except when necessity compelled them to walk in the footsteps of their predecessors? Did they remove the duty on flour in the interest of the agriculturists? Was the reduction of the duty on wheat in the interest of the agriculturist? Was there a farmer in Canada that wanted either one or the other? They know that these changes were made in antagonism to the farmers. Was the free importation of corn from the United States done for the benefit of the farmers, a change which led to an enormous quantity of corn coming into the country and striking down the farmers on poor lands who are raising coarse grains, and who are no longer in a position to compete with free corn? Hon. gentlemen opposite stand before the country, rightly and properly charged with having done nothing to promote the agricultural interest in any shape or form, except where the Minister of Agriculture humbly followed in the steps of his predecessor and availed himself of the great abilities of the gentleman brought into the public service by the preceding Government. I will not, at this late hour, exhausted as this subject has been by the discussion which has taken place, offer any further remarks, except to express the hope that every friend of the agriculturists will stand by the resolution, and vote against this flimsy pretext to cover the retreat of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). Representing an agricultural county, which possesses dairying resources, I desire to offer a few observations. In view of the discussion that has taken place, and in view of the character of the resolution before the House, a silent vote on my part might be construed into an expression of sympathy with that resolution. The position taken by the supporters of this resolution seems to be, that there are shipped to the English market tons and tons of fresh Canadian creamery butter without a market, and ask the Government of Canada to come to the rescue of the manufacturer of this fine, fresh creamery butter, and ask that a bounty be given to the manufacturers in order to assist them to get the people of England to buy this "fine, fresh creamery butter." Coming, as I do, from a county that is not so favoured from a dairying point of view, as the counties of gentlemen who support this resolution, I feel that it is not to encourage the English people to buy fresh creamery butter that we should devote our money; but if the Government have money to devote to the advancement of this branch of agriculture, I would submit that they should supply it to the manufacture of creamery butter to suit the English market. In view of the fact that Great Britain imported 340,000,000 pounds of butter last year, and that the people of Canada only supplied 10,000,000 pounds of that amount, it is clear to me that the position taken by the supporters of this resolution is entirely erroneous. In my opinion the Government should devote this money to assisting scattered settlements throughout the Dominion to manufacture butter to suit the English market. I repeat, as has been already said, that when a proper quality of butter is manufactured for that market, the trade will take care of itself. The leader of the Opposition who has just spoken in favour of this resolution represents a neighbouring county to mine, and I hope to see him using his great abilities and his great influence in this House to secure for the people of Cape Breton assistance towards the manufacture of creamery butter. There are tons upon tons of ordinary dairy-made butter in the shops of the mining towns in the county which that hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) represents, and it is displaced by this very creamery butter which he so eloquently seeks help to market to-night. The miners look for this finer manufactured butter, and they are just as fastidious in this respect as the other British consumers in the old land, so that the ordinary dairy-made butter of our farmers has no market. I therefore say that I shall have much pleasure in supporting the amendment, and I shall naturally expect the assistance of the leader of the Opposition to help his county and mine, neighbouring counties as they are, to claim from the Minister of Agriculture a certain appropriation to assist the people of Cape Breton to manufacture butter that will equal in quality this fine Ontario creamery butter that he is so much in sympathy with tonight.

Mr. DAVIN. That is the resolution of my hon. friend (Mr. Reid).

Mr. MACLENNAN (Inverness). It is evident that the old fashioned dairy system of making butter is a thing of the past. The same is true of the cheese industry, for who to-day would think of putting the old fashioned dairy-made cheese on the English market. Why, it would not be purchased at all, but our cheese manufactured in the systematic way and by the proper machinery has been brought to the highest standard of excellence, and is fit for any market in the world. Until such time as the farmers of Canada will be able to manufacture butter in the same systematic manner as they now manufacture cheese, dairying in Canada will be a failure. It is a very unfair condition of things that the people of the counties of the island of Cape Breton should be called upon to assist in paying millions for cold storage for the promotion of an industry in which they do not share. The same holds true as regards their proportion of the $100,000 that went last year and previous years to assist dairying in the North-west Territories. We do not find fault with this, however, but we do expect that this system will be carried out from one locality to another throughout the whole Dominion until the manufacture of creamery butter will be a general industry in Canada. I may say that I look on the system of sending around lecturers both by the Dominion and local Governments as a rather useless expenditure of money to a very great degree, especially in cases where the conditions are unfavourable for demonstrating the process of manufacturing. The Ontario Government sends around what is called a traveling dairy, and this I look upon as a most useful institution, because a lecture can be demonstrated on the spot, and the farmers given practical lessons in the manufacture of creamery butter. But to send lecturers to farmers who never saw a creamery is a clear waste of time and money. But when the time comes when the Government will be in a position to extend their creamery system of manufacturing butter to that fine portion of the Dominion from which I come, and which the hon. leader of the Opposition represents in common with me, I hope that I shall be able to claim his able assistance in urging the Government to make an appropriation to assist this very valuable industry.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I observe that hon. gentlemen opposite cheer that speech; but the concluding sentence would seem to indicate that if the hon. member is consistent, he is going to support the motion of my hon. friend from Grenville, for he wants an appropriation, and he calls on the leader of the Opposition to assist him in getting assistance for his farmers. What is that but the proposition of my hon. friend?

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). It is to assist in manufacturing butter, not in selling it. The sale will take care of itself if it is properly manufactured.

Mr. DAVIN. That is a very fine distinction. If you assist people who make butter to sell it, it makes very little difference what you call it; you are assisting the man who makes the butter. I say that the leader of the Opposition has not characterized too strongly the amendment that has been moved. We heard a speech of great length from my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture in reply to the speech of the hon. gentleman who proposed the resolution, and what was the character of that speech? It was a carefully reasoned argument in direct opposition to the motion of the hon. member for Grenville. The hon. Minister pointed out that a bonus of this sort had been unsuccessful in Québec—that it had not gone to the men for whom it was intended, but had gone to the middlemen; and yet, although the Minister of Agriculture argued against the resolution, the Government are afraid to record their votes against it. This is an exhibition of cowardice such as we have never had before in a Government of Canada.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. DAVIN. Is it out of order? I did not know it was unparliamentary. I will withdraw it, then, and will say an exhibition of timidity—an hon. friend says extreme timidity. I would say prudent timidity or calculated timidity; but whatever it is, it is too diaphanous altogether, and the farmers of Canada will so regard it. My hon. friend was on too high a wing of eloquence to allow me to interrupt him in order to ask a question; but I will ask him now, as he has not left the House. He said, in the course of his speech, that the dairy butter was displacing the farmers' butter made in his constituency.

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). My argument is this, that creamery butter is now displacing ordinary dairy-made butter, and I contend that therefore creamery butter does not need a bonus for its sale.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, all I can say is that our experience in the North-west is this, that the more we have developed creamery butter and dairy butter there, the better market we get for the farmers' own home-made butter. I do not understand how it is that the hon. gentleman makes out the displacement he speaks of.

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). Did you send any of the dairy-made butter to England?

Mr. DAVIN. Do you send any to England?

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). No, for the simple reason that we have not got it. We do not send any dairy-made butter, and we are sorry that we have not got the creamery-made butter.

Mr. DAVIN. Still, I am in precisely the same position of not understanding the hon. gentleman's argument.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). That is not his fault.

Mr. DAVIN. I dare say it is not. I dare say it is my obtuseness. But we find in the North-west that the more we have developed the creamery and dairy-made butter, the more we have developed skill in the manufacture of the butter for export, the better market we have for the farmers' home-made butter; and it must be the same thing elsewhere. If by means of creameries or dairies or anything else, you raise the skill of the farmers in making butter, you will not only get a better market for that butter away from the home market, but you will at the same time improve the market for the ordinary home-made butter produced by the farmer. But it was not for that I rose. I did not intend to speak on this motion, because before there was an amendment moved, I had expressed my adherence to the position of the hon. member for Grenville. But while I have been away from the House I understand that the motion proposed by the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Campbell) to adjourn the debate has been withdrawn, and why? Because the Government saw that they had put their foot in it. By moving that motion they had placed themselves in antagonism to the resolution moved by my hon. friend from Grenville, who in it represents the opinion of the farmers of Canada—not simply those of Ontario, but also those of Cape Breton. We had the Minister of Agriculture arguing against the position taken by the mover of that resolution, and we had his henchman behind him moving the adjournment of the debate in the hope that they would get rid of the resolution and prevent an expression of opinion on it by this House. I am sorry that the mover of the motion to adjourn was allowed to withdraw it, and that the Government were not forced to vote and show their real position on this question. No wonder the "Farmers' Sun," in Toronto, says that the farmers have been betrayed. No wonder it points to the broken promises of hon. gentlemen, and says: These are the men who put honeyed words and sunny ways before you, but now that they are in power, they forget their honeyed words and sunny ways, and the farmers of Canada are betrayed. The amendment that has been moved will not deceive them. I have no hesitation in voting against it. There is not a farmer in the country who does not know what that amendment means—that the Government that is so mean that it will not support the motion of the hon. member for Grenville is still meaner to try to hide the position it has taken. It will not deceive the farmers at all. It will only emphasize the position that is made clearer and clearer to the farmers of this country that in the men who are in power they have only hollow-professed friends, and the hearts of the people are not with them.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Representing as I do one of the best agricultural sections of Ontario, I wish to say that an injustice will be done to the farmers I represent if the resolution moved by the hon. member for Grenville is carried. The last clause of that resolution states:

That this bonus be paid to only those farmers who will furnish for export regular supplies.

I wish to say that in my constituency, there is a number of cheese factories which are now beginning to make butter for export in the fall of the year, after the cheese-making season is finished; and if this resolution should carry, the men who are making cheese during the cheese-making season and then turning their cheese factories into creameries in the winter season, would not benefit by this bonus at all. I have just read in the Brantford "Expositor" of March 23rd, a report of a meeting held by the farmers of the village of St. George, which is in the centre of my constituency, and where a large cheese industry is carried on. This cheese factory they have turned into a creamery during the winter season, and I wish to point out that injustice would be done to the farmers of my constituency if this motion should be carried.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Has my hon. friend not overlooked the fact that the bonus is to be increased at the discretion of the Government, on butter made during the winter months, so that it will suit his case exactly.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The last clause says:

This bonus to be paid only to those farmers who will furnish for export regular supplies.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. During the winter?

Mr. SOMERVILLE. It does not say so. If this motion should carry, the cheese and butter factory at St. George, in my constituency, will not get a cent of benefit from this bonus, and therefore I am inclined to oppose the motion. There was a meeting held at St. George on the 23rd of March, which is thus reported in the Brantford "Expositor":

There was a largely attended meeting of the patrons of the cheese factory at the Public Library Hall on Friday forenoon, all anxious to learn the success of the year. The year has been one of gratifying success. At the close of the cheese season in the fall this was mentioned. The creamery which was then started was well patronized, and as the demand for butter at high price still keeps up it was decided to continue the manufacture of butter until about the first of May. It is found that making butter in this way puts more money into the farmers' pockets than the manufacture of cheese, hence the gratification at its continuance for a few weeks longer is general.

It must be perfectly evident that any hon. member who votes for this resolution, will not be voting in the interests of the farmers of this country, at least of the farmers who engage in the manufacture of cheese and butter. I know it will be an injury to the farmers in my constituency, and I am satisfied that there are many other constituencies in Ontario and the other provinces where cheese and butter-making is carried on in the same factories at different seasons of the year. It will be an injustice to these people, and this resolution is not in the interest of the farmers of my constituency, at all events.

Mr. McMILLAN. There are one or two statements made by the hon. leader of the Opposition which I cannot let pass. They show to what length men will go when they talk of questions concerning which they are perfectly ignorant. The hon. gentleman asked us if it was a benefit to the farmers to reduce the duty on wheat. Take the prices in wheat in Ontario this last winter. Every one who has examined them knows well that the price of wheat in Ontario is 10 or 12 cents a bushel lower than it is in the border towns of the United States. Take Detroit and Buffalo, and you will find that fall wheat is selling there 10 cents a bushel higher than it is in Toronto. Would it then injure our farmer to remove that duty and increase the prices? The hon. gentleman told us also that it as an injury to the farmers to allow corn to come in free. Why, in Toronto to-day you can sell oats at 34 cents to 35 cents a bushel, and purchase American corn at 32 cents. You can purchase 56 pounds of the best feed you can get for animals, with what you will get by selling 34 pounds of oats, and have a little residue left. If it is in this way that the farmers of the country are to be injured, I would like them to be injured in this way all the time.

I would say to the hon. gentleman who has introduced this resolution that he has not been paying strict attention to the farmers in his locality, or he would have told them that if they put up cold storage in their creameries, the Minister of Agriculture has adopted a scheme whereby they are assisted in putting up these creameries. I am a shareholder in a creamery to-day that put up cold storage this last year, and the butter-maker tells me, and so does the salesman, that on account of that cold storage they were able to get one or two cents a pound more for their butter than they could without cold storage. If hon. gentlemen who are so anxious for the interest of the farmers had been paying that strict attention to their interests that they should, they would have paid attention to what has been done and have asked the farmers to avail themselves of these advantages which the Government has placed within their reach, and which will do more to give our butter a footing on the British market than anything that could possibly be done. A year ago butter was shipped from Indian Head, where they had no cold storage, and some was shipped also from Prince Albert where they had cold storage. Everything else was equal, but the butter from Prince Albert realized nine shillings to ten shillings per hundred more than the other, which shows that the Government has taken the best means possible to advance that industry. Let me give an example of what can be done in order to place our goods upon the English market. A gentleman of my acquaintance had tried, time and again, to get some of the larger distributing houses in London to accept Canadian eggs on trial, but without success. After thinking the matter over fairly, he had a nice little package of Canadian eggs put up, and went across to visit that firm again in London. He had arranged to have his little package of eggs arrive just as he reached the firm, and he made a present of the package to the head of the firm. The head of the firm was unwilling to accept but in the end took the gift, and a couple of days after my friend got a letter asking if these eggs were a fair sample of what he could put on the British market. We do not want to establish shops to sell our own goods, but we want agents who will persistently take them to the best distributing houses in Britain and if necessary make them occasionally a small present of a few pounds of butter to show what Canadian butter really is and thus have it introduced on the market. There has been nothing done which has been a greater benefit to the butter industry than the establishment of a cold storage system.

Hon. gentlemen opposite say that our cheese business has had no competition when it was established. That, Mr. Speaker, is a fallacy. The United States had control of the British market for cheese, they took the lead for years in that market against Canada, until we had a thorough educational system at work among our cheese-makers, which ended in our driving the Americans out of the British markets and in our getting a cent and a half to two cents a pound more for our cheese. That was the result of the commission we sent over to England, but there was not one cent of a bonus paid to those who manufactured the cheese.

Let me tell the leader of the Opposition that I am acquainted with the great agricultural industry, of the province of Ontario at least, much better than he is. Within the last five years I have been over the whole province, except in Muskoka, amongst the farmers. This last winter I was out six weeks, and at every point this great dairying interest was discussed. Not one word did I hear about the farmers getting a bonus, but they were all hoping to have cold storage placed within their reach. Those hon. gentlemen who are very derelict in their duty who did not inform their constituents that the Government had provided a system of cold storage, and I think the Government will be very far wrong in going further than they have, until the farmers show that they are going to avail themselves of all the advantages placed within their reach, which they have not done up to the present.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). I always listen with a great deal of interest to my hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan), because he is generally accurate in his figures and speaks with exact knowledge. But I find the figures he has given to-night are not in consonance with those given in to-day's "Mail and Empire." I understood him to say that there was a difference in red winter wheat of 12 cents between Toronto and Buffalo.

Mr. McMILLAN. I said there had been during the winter.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). There is no difference to-day; it is 83 cents in each place. I understood him to say that he could buy American corn at 32 cents in Toronto.

Mr. McMILLAN. Let me say that we ourselves have bought not less than four car loads of corn which we got at from 31½ cents to 32 cents. Just last week we got some of it.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). American corn is quoted to-day at 37 cents on track, by the car load. This is only 17 per cent of an error on the hon. gentleman's part. I observe that the prices can scarcely be attributed to the change of tariff, because this paper which may be in error, but is not likely to be so, quotes Canadian corn at Chatham at 31 cents and American corn at 37 cents.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. What paper is that?

Mr. BELL (Pictou). The "Mail and Empire."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). I presume that the "Globe" quotations are the same. I would be obliged if some hon. member opposite would look them up. As I have said, I always listen with great pleasure to my hon. friend from South Huron, because he always speaks from precise knowledge, and is usually very accurate. I am sorry to say that his remarks on this occasion are not quite so reliable as they usually are. I would like to say a few words upon the points touched upon by my hon. friend from Inverness (Mr. McLennan). We are very much interested in the manufacture of butter in the lower provinces. The probability is that the larger part of the farmers of the lower provinces will, at an early day, devote themselves to dairy farming. We have a climate that is very well suited for that industry. We have good grass and pure water, the probability is that our farmers will devote themselves largely to dairy products, particularly the manufacture of butter. I was inclined to think that my hon. friend from Inverness was, perhaps, not giving the Opposition leader credit for as much assistance as he should in the course of his observations. As I understood my hon. friend, he was exceedingly anxious that the dairy butter in his county should be relieved from the competition of the creamery butter produced in Ontario. As nearly as I can understand the purport of this resolution, its object is to accomplish this very thing, that is, to take away creamery butter from Canada and find a market for it in Great Britain. If the hon. gentleman is really anxious to relieve the dairy-made butter from the present competition, I think he should join us in supporting the resolution of the hon. member for South Grenville (Mr. Reid).

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). My contention was that the market already exists in Great Britain for creamery butter without the assistance proposed in this resolution.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). I presume that no one will dispute that. The market is there, but the difficulty is we are not enjoying that market. We are told, and I think that there can be no doubt about the fact, that 400,000,000 pounds of butter is imported into Great Britain, to which Canada sends 10,000,000 pounds. If we were able to supply that market, we should be in an enviable position. We produce a great deal of creamery butter that does not go to Great Britain. The object of the hon. member for Grenville is, as I understand, to raise the standard of butter throughout Canada, to place it in such advantageous terms of competition that it will capture the British market. That is a good work in which, as I cannot but think, my hon. friend from Inverness would be glad to join us. The hon. gentleman must know that we can capture that market only gradually. We sell only one-fortieth of the total quantity imported into Great Britain. The fact that we do even so well as that we owe, we can say quite frankly, to the efforts of the present Government in establishing the cold storage system. This resolution does not deny the merits of the present Government; it only asks that they go further and that, in addition to giving the advantage of cold storage, they should grant a bonus of one cent a pound on butter exported to Great Britain and thus stimulate the production of high class butter and stimulate the efforts of those whose business it is to place it on the British market. There may be some better way of obtaining this object, but this is the best way that has occurred to the mover of the resolution. It seems to me that if the hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Somerville) was really in earnest in wishing well to this resolution, he would not condemn it because it did not quite suit the locality in which his supporters are. I think it would have been more consistent in him and would have been better for his constituents if he had come with us, and while accepting the principles of the resolution tried to amend it so as to suit the people of his county. His idea was that this bonus of one cent per pound would go only to those who could guarantee a regular supply for a whole year. But this is not the way we understand it on this side. The farmer should guarantee a regular supply but there is not a word in the resolution to say that no arrangement would be made with any farmer or creamery that would not guarantee a regular supply for a year. The hon. member could have offered an amendment to the effect that one who would guarantee a regular supply for six months or for four months should be included. I think that we on this side could have accepted it, and the hon. gentleman would have been able to join with us in supporting this resolution. I have been anxious to see something of this kind done. I do not know that this is the best thing that could be done, but it is the best thing that has been suggested, and those who wish well to the dairying interests should join the hon. member for Grenville on the main question and then seek such changes in this resolution as would obviate any defects that may appear in it.

Dairying must necessarily be the great interest with the farmers in the lower provinces. There are a variety of reasons for this, but it is too late to enter into them to-night. I am sure, knowing the fine county represented by my hon. friend from Inverness, knowing its great fertility of soil, its fine grasses and excellent water supply, I am sure that it should be what it has been in the past, one of the greatest butter producing counties. The hon. member for Inverness would do a great deal to assist his friends in that county by helping them to produce better dairy butter, or to turn from that to the production of creamery butter. But by joining with the hon. member for Grenville he could probably procure assistance to tide them over the difficulty that would attend the transitions from one mode of production to another. I am glad I have the opportunity to vote for this resolution. No objection can be raised to this manner of assisting this industry. It cannot be objectionable to the gentlemen on the other side, for they are all committed to the system of bounties. With sound common sense, as I believe, they heartily supported the bounties for the production of iron.

Well, in its own way, perhaps, iron is one of the most important products of this or any country, but in regard to the enormous extent to which the trade may be developed, and the amount of money which it will bring into the country, I do not think that it is at all more important than butter. But there is another most important point. Any person who is familiar with agricultural matters, who is familiar with the development of that industry that is taking place, is aware of the fact that, if you can induce the body of farmers of any county, or any country, to elevate their profession, and to pass from producing the coarser and cheaper products, or producing them in a slipshod way, to producing them of a higher quality and in a more economical way, you elevate thereby the whole mass of the farmers, you dignify their business, and you improve them in every respect. Whenever you induce a farmer to improve his methods and the quality of his products, you elevate that farmer, not only as a farmer, but as a citizen. Therefore, this is a most commendable object, and it is one in which the Government should join heartily. It is not, of course, for us on this side to dictate to the Government in what way they shall spend the revenue of the country, because they have to find the money for the appropriation, and they might fall back upon that plea, and refuse to be dictated to. But I do feel, with the leader of the Opposition, that, in endeavouring to side-track this resolution, as they did twice, first of all, by the amendment moved by the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell), and secondly, by the amendment moved by the Government Whip, the Government are endeavouring to avoid a direct vote upon an issue which can never be made anything else than a direct issue between the two parties in this House. Their object in doing that, I cannot conceive. One thing is clear, that their course will defeat itself. There is no question but that a vote in support of the amendment moved from the other side of the House must be regarded as a vote against this very laudable resolution moved by the hon. member for Grenville.

Mr. CLANCY. I would have been content to allow this vote to be taken without saying anything, if hon. gentlemen opposite had not given a distinct challenge to this side of the House. I am sorry to see that the Minister of Agriculture and his friends do not feel themselves sufficiently strong in the position they took during the course of this debate, to have voted upon that question without resorting to what seems to me a very extraordinary and not at all a creditable amendment. I have never witnessed a more extraordinary spectacle in this House than the course of the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell). I do not know whether he was the parent of the trick himself, or whether he was put up at the instance of some one else, but he has played a part that is not very creditable under the circumstances. The purpose for which the hon. gentleman moved the adjournment of the debate is now disclosed. The hon. gentleman rose afterwards, quite out of order, and asked that that motion might be withdrawn. Now, what was the palpable object of withdrawing that motion? Evidently, as this debate went on, and as hon. gentlemen felt themselves in a position where they could not defend their acts before the country, they wished to hide themselves behind what has been properly characterized, this evening, as a miserable subterfuge.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The expression that an hon. gentleman has been guilty of a subterfuge, is not in order. I find in Blackmore's "Speakers' Decisions," at page 132, that it has been decided by Speaker Brand, in England, that it is unparliamentary to say that a member has sheltered himself behind a miserable subterfuge. The expression is not in order.

Mr. CLANCY. I readily withdraw the expression, in accordance with your ruling. But I wish to say that I used no such expression. I did not charge the hon. gentlemen with resorting to a miserable subterfuge. I said the amendment was a subterfuge, and I said it had been characterized as such. So that my readiness to withdraw any unparliamentary expression in no sense involves a withdrawal by me of an expression that the amendment is a subterfuge.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. You cannot withdraw the resolution.

Mr. CLANCY. No, I cannot withdraw the resolution; but I should judge that my hon. friend would like an opportunity of withdrawing what he said a few moments ago, to which I shall pay some attention. Now, the hon. gentlemen have succeeded in turning this into a party question. Without a single exception, they have risen in their places and discovered, all of a sudden, that no encouragement should be given to a particular class or interest in this country. We even see the representative of the Patrons joining in this crusade against the farmers. In the past, we have been accustomed to hear them declare that the farmers are a down-trodden set of people, and I am not sure but that the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Rogers) has shed bitter and salty tears, over the woes of the farmers. But now he says they only want a fair field and no favour. He has discovered suddenly that the farmers have become a very independent class. I fancy that, if the hon. gentleman were to use that kind of logic in his riding, we would not see anything more of him here.

Mr. COCHRANE. He won't come back again.

Mr. CLANCY. I think he is quite sure of that himself. Now, there was no need of making this a party question. The hon. member who moved this resolution did so in a most temperate speech; he said nothing of a character to provoke hon. gentlemen opposite to rise in defence of their past or present acts. It was a moderate speech of a business kind, and his resolution should have been allowed to go through without criticism. The Minister of Agriculture and his friends take the ground that only a few persons can profit by this proposition, and that, therefore, the masses of the people are opposed to it. Now, the object of giving encouragement to any industry to make it more prosperous, and the only ground of giving such encouragement is, that such industry is not keeping pace with others. Of the 400,000,000 pounds of butter imported into England, Canada only supplies 10,000,000 pounds. What does that mean? It means that the butter industry in Canada is not keeping abreast with the other industries, that it is not taking its place in the English market that it should take. It means that we must give some special encouragement, for a time at least, to that industry, until it can take the place which belongs to it in the English market. That has been the idea held in giving a bonus for the encouragement of any industry in this country. Why not follow it, although the mass of the people cannot be benefited? I should like to ask the hon. member for North Brant whether the masses benefit from the bonus given for the purpose of encouraging the iron industry? I should like to ask the hon. member why he presented this argument, which is the stock argument of hon. gentlemen opposite? It is utterly impossible to encourage any single industry when an argument might not be used quite as effectively as in the present case. Hon. gentlemen opposite felt the difficulty of their position, and have had to recede from it as indicated by the motion moved this evening. It is extraordinary that if hon. gentlemen have been sincere in their speeches, their declaration should not commend themselves to the people, and why should they be obliged to resort to this motion? We could have no better condemnation of their position than that to be found in the speech of the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. McLennan). What did he say? He said it was an evil to encourage the manufacture of a good article to take the place of a bad article, and yet he told the leader of the Opposition that it would be better if they had more encouragement given to the people of his province. For what purpose? In order to raise the standard of that article in Nova Scotia; in order to enable it to compete with the superior butter manufactured in other portions of the Dominion. Could any more absurd argument be offered to support hon. gentlemen opposite. Does not the hon. gentleman advocate, in the strongest terms, the principle that we should improve the quality of butter so as to be able to compete with the foreign trade. Hon. gentlemen opposite occupy an inconsistent position, of which there is no better evidence than the motion made in amendment.

I desire to say a word or two in reply to the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan). The hon. gentleman is always listened to with a good deal of interest. There is no doubt as to the hon. gentleman's honesty, but as regards his judgment and sincerity, I do not see where they lie. The hon. gentleman rose with apparently a good deal of knowledge and a great deal of assertion. The hon. gentleman stated that wheat was higher in Canada than in the United States and that it was in consequence of the duty having been lowered. No doubt the hon. gentleman travelled around his county during the last contest and declared that wheat was lower in Canada than in the United States when the late Government were in power, and it was in consequence of their policy. Hon. gentlemen opposite have constantly declared that wheat was higher on the other side of the line in consequence of the policy of the Liberal Government. The hon. gentleman was not satisfied with that statement, but he informed the House that the remission of duty on corn had been a great boon. He is, however, well aware that the importation of large quantities of corn in the province of Ontario has reduced the price of his own wheat. The hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) is a practical miller, and what has been his experience? They have thus reduced the value of the coarse grains, and have reduced the price of mill feed sent to Toronto and the maritime provinces, and the price has been lowered because it has been displaced by corn coming in from the United States. Nothing has had a greater tendency to lower the price of wheat than to bring in corn and other grains from the United States to come into competition with our coarse grains. Yet the hon. gentleman sought to show how little the leader of the Opposition knew about these matters and how much the hon. member himself knew. The hon. gentleman also spoke about oats. The hon. gentleman is perfectly well aware that the high price of oats was not owing to the local demand. He is too shrewd and keen a farmer to be imposed on by such palpable nonsense. The high price is due to the export trade. If it were not for the export trade, oats would not be worth 20 cents a bushel. Does any one imagine that for the local demand in Canada oats would realize 31 cents or 33 cents, when independent of the export trade the price has been as low as 20 cents, and even 15 cents. That I know has been the case. The hon. gentleman should know that when the export trade in oats was dull last year the price fell to 15 cents throughout Ontario. Only white oats were sold, and for milling purposes, as I have said, the price was from 15 cents to 18 cents, and the result occurred not in consequence of the importation of American corn alone, but because of the low prices of other coarse grains, and in consequence of there being no export demand. I hope the hon. gentleman who poses as the friend of the farmers will consider these facts; but he does not speak for the farmers, because if he did, I would say God help the farmers. We have come to the rather strange condition of affairs that an hon. gentleman should rise in his place and declare opposite reasons have effected the market. We have a splendid exhibition to-night of the record of inconsistency on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite. This is not the first time that hon. gentlemen opposite have been guilty of adopting such a course. We would only be guilty of a piece of acting if we were to pretend that we were at all shocked by the position taken by these hon. gentlemen. It is in keeping with their past record, and what we may expect for the future. But the hon. gentlemen cannot hope to escape the consequences of preparing and submitting such an amendment for the purpose of escaping from voting on the fair proposition contained in the motion submitted by the hon. member for Grenville. The farmers are not so dull as to be deceived by it; and if hon. gentlemen opposite feel inclined to vote for this palpable fraud, the people will understand and be able to judge of the action the hon. gentlemen have taken. We could have no better exhibition than we had in the speeches of the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. McLennan) and the hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Somerville). I have always listened to that gentleman (Mr. Somerville) with pleasure, as he is usually explicit and his arguments sound; but I cannot congratulate him on the position he takes to-night. He says that this motion would be an injury to the farmers in his county, and his reason is, that during certain months in the year the farmers are engaged entirely in the manufacture of cheese, and that in other seasons they turn their cheese factories into creameries for the manufacture of butter, which, no doubt, would be of high grade and come under the terms of this motion. If these farmers can successfully make cheese during a certain period, is it not a great boon to offer them a cent a pound upon the high-grade butter produced in these same factories in the winter months for export? The statement of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Somerville) is not consistent with his record in this House. Indeed, the latter part of his argument was a complete answer to his own contention. We are now content to leave this matter, not in the hands of the House, because the amendment which is proposed, and will likely pass, is a sham; but I say we are willing to leave it to the people of this Dominion to judge of the arguments and the action of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. McMILLAN. I rise to substantiate what I stated about wheat. I went to the Reading Room, and I got to-day's "Globe," and it shows that white wheat in Toronto is from 77 to 83½ cents; red wheat, from 85 to 87 cents; while in Buffalo, red wheat No. 2 is 99 cents; No. 1 white, 93½ cents; No. 2 white, 95 cents; which shows conclusively that the statements I made are correct.

Mr. SPROULE and Mr. TAYLOR rose.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) has the floor.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh.

Mr. SPROULE. I always hear the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) groan, whenever anything is said in this House in favour of the farmers; but if there is any man in Parliament who ought to be interested in that class of the community, it is the hon. gentleman (Mr. Campbell), because he lives on their product from the beginning of the year to the end. No man is more ready than the hon. member (Mr. Campbell) to attempt to decry any member of this House when he has a word to say in favour of the farmers, and I think it comes with very bad grace from him. I wish to say a few words with regard to the conduct of the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell), and his political friends, in respect to this resolution. His first action was to move that this debate should be adjourned, in order to kill the motion for this session, and to prevent this House from saying:

That the Government should take steps to do something more to assist in the development of the butter trade.

That is the sum and substance of the motion. We all admit that the Government has made a reasonable effort to help the dairying interest, but was there anything wrong in saying that they should do something more? We on this side of the House believe that the industry is of such importance to Canada that the Government cannot afford to stand still, and we so believe that they should do something more to help it along. Gentlemen opposite did not seem to like that, and so the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) was put to move the adjournment of the debate, in order that no expression of opinion might be taken on the motion, and in order that the Government might be left to make no further effort to help our farmers. This resolution was either right or wrong in the opinion of hon. gentlemen supporting the Government. If it was right, why did they not let it pass, and if it was wrong, why had they not the courage to vote it down. They dare not vote it down, because they know that, in doing so, they would not be in harmony with the views of the farmers of this country. They dare not say that the motion was wrong, and so, in a roundabout way, they first tried to kill it by moving the adjournment of the debate so that it would be put down at the bottom of the Order paper and could not possibly be reached again this session; and, when we on this side of the House prevented them attaining that object, then they asked to have the motion to adjourn the debate withdrawn. That was unanimously consented to by gentlemen on this side, in the hopes that the Government had changed their mind and were willing to allow the motion to pass. However, their courage was not up to that point, and now we find that gentlemen opposite withdrew the motion to adjourn for the purpose of substituting an amendment which is intended to deceive the farmers of the country. That amendment expresses the conviction of hon. gentlemen opposite, that everything that was necessary to be done has been done by the Government, and that, in their honest judgment, nothing more should be done. Hon. gentlemen opposite moved in amendment, that these words of the original motion be struck out:

That our Government should take steps to do something to assist the development of the butter trade.

And they substitute the following words:—

This House views with satisfaction the great progress which has been made in the butter-making branch of the dairy industry, as shown in the great and regular increase of our export trade in butter and the high reputation which the Canadian product has made, especially during last season, since the establishment of complete cold storage transportation, and believes that the course already pursued by the Government, if continued on the same lines, will result in still greater benefits to the farmers of our Dominion.

Every farmer who reads that resolution will see that these hon. gentlemen opposite either do not believe that all has been done which could be done, or else that they are wanting in courage. If these hon. gentlemen are not in favour of doing more for the butter industry, then they should have manfully said so to the farmers, and justified their opinion by giving reasons. All the arguments which they adduced to establish the correctness of their contention that everything was done that could be done, and that nothing more was necessary—all these arguments, they knew, will not be sufficient to satisfy the farmers of the country, and, therefore, they have resort to other means for preventing a straight vote on the motion before the House. Which horn of the dilemma are the hon. gentlemen willing to hang themselves on? For instance, the hon. gentleman from Kent (Mr. Campbell), who professes so much love for the farmers, what explanation can he give, when he goes back to the farmers of his county, for his two efforts in this House to prevent a fair expression of the views of Parliament on this question? An hon. gentleman behind me says, that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Campbell) never expects to go back to his constituents. I can readily believe that, from his conduct here to-night, because, if he did expect to go back, he would not have taken this course. I believe that the farmers in his constituency are too intelligent not to see through his aim in making a motion to adjourn and afterwards withdrawing it—first, for the purpose of burking the expression of this House, and, second, for the purpose of evading it in another way that cannot be seen by the people of this country.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE.
Order.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the hon. gentleman calling order for?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE.
Because the hon. gentleman speaks of burking the question.

Mr. SPROULE. I say deliberately burking the question, and so far as I understand rules of debate, I am quite in order. I say it is for that deliberate purpose, and hon. gentlemen know that it was for that purpose and no other. I want the farmers of the country to understand the means adopted by the Government for preventing the expression of this House that although the Government have done much—and we are willing to give them credit for what they have done—still this House thinks that they should do more to assist the development of the export butter trade. I want the farmers of this country to know that they are afraid to meet that question, and, therefore, they have resorted to this unfair means of preventing the expression of the House on this important question in which the great agricultural classes of this country are so much interested.

Mr. TAYLOR. Just a word in reference to a statement of the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan). That hon. gentleman stated that oats could be sold in Toronto to-day at 34 cents a bushel of 34 pounds, and that corn could be purchased at 32 cents a bushel of 5⁹ pounds, and he tried to show that that was a great benefit to the farmers of this country. It is perhaps a benefit to the hon. gentleman, who is a feeder and not a farmer. I find by the report of the Department of Trade and Commerce that in 1896 we imported into Canada 3,017,630 bushels of corn, and in 1897 we imported 4,163,069 bushels. Corn was put on the free list last session, which went into operation perhaps in March, and this report is made up to the 30th of June, so that practically in about three months of the year we increased our import of corn from the United States by 1,145,439 bushels. Perhaps when we get the returns for the whole year, the increase will amount to four or five million bushels. What does this mean? It means the displacement of over 2,000,000 bushels of Canadian grown oats by American corn. This year we had an export demand for oats; but we would have had two export demands had it not been for the importation of free American corn. Manitoba and the North-west had a failure in oats, and a demand sprang up there in the fall of the year for oats at 40 or 50 cents a bushel; but it was soon found that corn could be imported at much better advantage than oats could be brought from Ontario. Many of us in the grain business commenced shipping oats to Manitoba at the prices that were paid there at the outset, but the importation of corn stopped that trade. Had it not been for that the farmers of Ontario would have received two or three cents a bushel more for their oats. My hon. friend says that he purchased four car loads of American corn for feeding purposes. Had the corn not been free of duty, he would have had to go to his Canadian neighbours and purchase oats. I take it that the importation of American corn is a great injury, taking it year in and year out. This year we had a surplus of oats and a large foreign demand. Had it not been for that, they could not have paid this year in this country, taking into consideration the fact that we had free corn. My hon. friend also stated that he had travelled in every county of Ontario and had lectured to the farmers' institutes, and that he had not heard a single word in favour of a bonus on butter; the question had not been mooted. The Ontario Government profess to be great friends of the farmers, and they voted last year $13,000 for farmers' institutes, but I find that in the disbursement of that sum $11,000 went to gentlemen like the hon. member for South Huron who went around the country to instruct the farmers, and only $2,000 went direct to the institutes. I presume that my hon. friend got a large portion of that $11,000 for his expenses in travelling around and instructing the farmers of this country on the advantage of free corn.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will I inform the hon. gentleman what I got? $2.50 a day is the fee you get.

Mr. TAYLOR. And your expenses ?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, and your expenses.

Mr. TAYLOR. And the farmers of this country got very little benefit from it. My hon. friend quoted the "Globe," of to-day as giving the figures of the Buffalo market. I have the "Globe" here, and I cannot find a quotation of the Buffalo market in it. The figures he quoted were those of the Detroit market.

Mr. McMILLAN. I quoted the figures of the Buffalo market, and they are in the "Globe."

Mr. TAYLOR. If my hon. friend had quoted the Toronto market, and not the farmers' market—

Mr. McMILLAN. I did quote the farmers' market.

Mr. TAYLOR. If the hon. gentleman had quoted the Toronto market, he would have read these figures :

The market is steady at 84c. for red winter north and west ; Manitoba wheat is steady at $1.10 for No. 1 hard, North Bay, and $1.06 Midland.

These are the grains that compare with the same grains quoted at Buffalo, Chicago and Toledo.

Mr. McMILLAN. We do not raise any No. 1 hard in the province of Ontario. We only raise red and white winter wheat. No. 1 hard refers entirely to North-west wheat.

Mr. TAYLOR. North-west wheat is the wheat quoted in Buffalo and Chicago.

As Mr. Speaker was about to put the question—

Mr. SPROULE. I beg to call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that the second of this motion is not in the House.

The House divided on amendment of Mr. Sutherland to adjourn debate.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I want to ask the First Minister—unfortunately the Minister of Finance is not here—with reference to the Public Accounts Committee. I have had no notice of a meeting of that committee since the formal organization meeting, and I think it is very necessary that we should have a meeting at the earliest opportunity.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Certainly. The committee will be called, on the expression of the wish of my hon. friend, if he will let it be known what day would be convenient to him.

Mr. FOSTER. It will have to be a day on which there is no other important committee meeting.

PRINCE ALBERT MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). I wish to call the attention of the Government and of the House to a telegram which I have just received from the mayor of Prince Albert. It is as follows:

Only one mail in two weeks. Train in Regina. Insist on them moving. Weather fine.

T. C. BAKER.

This sort of thing has been going on in connection with the Qu'Appelle, Long Lake and Saskatchewan Railway every winter for a long time. These people receive from the Government $80,000 a year for carrying mails and supplies—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is making a speech, which he cannot do, unless he intends to make a motion.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). I will conclude with a motion. I was saying that this thing is taking place every winter, and I think it is only just to the people of that district that the railway company should be compelled to fulfil their agreement with the Government. We do not object to a train being cancelled occasionally, but it has come to this, that when there is a very small storm these people cancel their trains, because they find it cheaper than to run them; they can save money. The people of my district do not intend to put up with this sort of treatment any longer. I brought the matter to the attention of this House last session, and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's attention was also called to it, and they had all summer to put up snow fences. They have rotary snow-ploughs, and they can open that road if they like. It is not right to ask a town of 2,000 inhabitants and a large district with a population of about 15,000, to submit to the inconvenience of having only one train in two weeks. I beg to move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. DAVIN. With regard to this matter, of course it must be a great inconvenience to a town of the size of Prince Albert not to have postal communication or railway communication with the outside world, whenever it occurs; but I am under the impression—I may be wrong—that the grievance is not as great as my hon. friend states it to be, and I believe it is better not to overstate your case. I know that there are times when the Prince Albert train does not arrive in time, or has to be cancelled in consequence of a heavy snow blockade; but it is very seldom that this occurs. The statement of my hon. friend is very instructive, however, as bearing on a late burning subject of discussion, because this is a broad gauge railway, with an engine capable of running on the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and going from one divisional point to another, yet when a heavy snow-storm occurs there is occasionally a blockade. What usually happens is that the train is late. If, as the telegram states, the weather is fine, I am perfectly certain that the Government will not have to trouble themselves much about insisting on moving, because my experience is that when a train has been cancelled in this way, the very minute the weather permits, the Prince Albert train is set to work. It is right, however, that my hon. friend should insist on the Ministry attending at once to this, for if my impression is wrong and these things are of frequent occurrence, the Government should bring the company quickly to book especially in view of the fact that we are paying a large subsidy, but I say my impression is that it has not occurred as frequently as my hon. friend states. I am not, however, as much in the way of business as my hon. friend, and am not so much interested in the railways keeping time, and consequently I may be wrong.

Mr. GIBSON. I hardly expected the hon. gentleman would have become an apologist for the non-delivery of the mails by the Canadian Pacific Railway during eleven long days. He must be aware that the people of Prince Albert are living in a very important section of country, and the regular delivery of the mails is just as important to them as it is to the residents of Regina. I have been over that line, and if the Canadian Pacific Railway can keep their main line clear from the Atlantic to the Pacific from day to day, with the very few exceptions when storms occur that baffle the skill and ability of the railway companies with all the facilities at their hand, it cannot be because of the storms but because of the inattention of the Canadian Pacific Railway that the line is not kept regularly open between Prince Albert and Regina. If the Canadian Pacific Railway gave that line a quarter of the attention which they do their main line, we would not have this complaint brought forward to-day by the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis). I am glad the hon. Postmaster General is here because this is a matter in which every one of the Dominion is interested. It is not a local matter. No doubt the people of Prince Albert are in communication with every part of the world, and it is only proper that a question of this kind should be dealt with by Parliament, more especially as we give a large bonus to the road for carrying the mails. I am sure it would not be asking too much of the Canadian Pacific Railway or any railway company, that rather than delay Her Majesty's mails for eleven days, they should have them forwarded by a courier.

Mr. MACLEAN. I would like to ask the Postmaster General if when the Canadian Pacific Railway fail to give the mail service during eleven days which they are paid to supply, their pay was stopped? That is one way in which the company could be brought to time. If they do not perform the service deduct a suitable amount, or they should be put under bonds and have so much deducted from their grant if they do not perform the service.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Before the motion is disposed of, I should like to take the opportunity of calling the attention of the Government to a matter of very considerable importance to a portion of the constituency I have the honour to represent, and I do it now in order that the Minister of Railways and Canals may have the matter before him before the Estimates for his department for the coming year are being considered.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question before the House is the failure of the Canadian Pacific Railway to run their trains on this railway in the North-west, and I am afraid the hon. member cannot bring any other matter up on this motion. The discussion must be limited to the question raised by the member who moved the motion.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). I have heard for the first time, this moment, of the interruption of the mail service to Prince Albert. My hon. friend who made the motion informs me that he only a few moments ago learned by telegram himself of the failure of the service, owing, I understand, to the road being blocked by snow. I will exercise whatever power the department has to have the service re-established at the earliest possible moment. Regarding the inquiry of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) as to whether in the case of interruption of the mail service, there will be a deduction of the allowance, that would depend upon the nature of the contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway in regard to this particular service. As yet I have never had to deal with such a case as a railway failing to carry out its contract to carry the mails, but I admit that it would be only proper, in case of such failure, that the company should be docked a ratable proportion or even more. In fact I think it would be only wise that the contract, or the Order in Council regulating the contract, should provide for the imposition of a fine upon railways that neglect, without reason at least, to perform so necessary a branch of the public service. All I can say with regard to particular grievances is that they will receive as prompt and effective attention as I can give them.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to say in reply to some remarks that fell from the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Gibson), in criticism of what was said by my hon. friend from East Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), that the hon. member for Welland evidently misunderstood my hon. friend, because the hon. member for Assiniboia was not apologizing by any means for the Canadian Pacific Railway but only stating that, from his knowledge of the way they carried on their operations, they would get their trains through at the earliest possible moment. He also said it was a serious thing that the mails should be detained so long and he regretted the delay just as much as did his hon. friend from Saskatchewan, and in no sense did he apologize for the conduct of the Canadian Pacific Railway or their management of the road.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I understood that this thing has gone on for years, so that there is no need for an apology. This is not the first time this is brought up in the House, and I am glad it is brought up now because I think railway companies should be dealt with seriously in cases of this kind. I know that an ordinary courier, who has to work his way through the snow-storms and carry a shovel with him, and sometimes bring along an extra man to help him through the snow banks, has to be on time, and if not he is quickly brought to book. If that be right in his case, as it is, there are ten reasons to every one why a railway company which receives a very large subsidy should be held just as strictly to its contract. What I understood my hon. friend from Saskatchewan wants (Mr. Davis) was that he had to bring this up again and again. No doubt it can be dealt with very quickly by the hon. Minister, and thus he will prevent such delay being a cause of complaint from year to year.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) says that this question is brought up before the House again and again, but the hon. Postmaster General told us that this was the first time he ever heard of such a case.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). This year.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. He did not say this year.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I said that this is the first time I ever heard of the failure of this particular service.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved that from this day until the end of the session, Government orders have precedence on Thursdays after questions.

Mr. FOSTER. Might I ask the hon. gentleman when the Budget speech will take place?

The PRIME MINISTER. Without absolutely pledging my hon. colleague the Minister of Finance, I understand from him that he will be able to bring down the Estimates on Monday, and if this motion carries, his intention is to bring down the Budget on Thursday next. Of course, possibly the course of events may change his mind, but that is his present intention.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is rather early in the session to take so much of the time of the House from private members. There has been very little opportunity given private members so far in consequence of the motions previously carried to go on discussing certain questions de die in diem. I would suggest that it would be better to apply for the Thursday after next.

The PRIME MINISTER. I do not think I can accept the statement of my hon. friend that the private members have not had the opportunity of bringing up the different questions of which they have given notice. On Thursday last we went through the whole of the Order paper on public Bills and orders. We disposed of a few, I think, but most of the members were not ready. They had the opportunity to go on as the different orders were called. Now, with regard to the notices of motion, I think we have gone over the paper two or three times already, and it must be remembered that we still have Monday and also Wednesday afternoon for notices of motion until Wednesday is taken by the Government. Under these circumstances, I think I must insist upon the motion, and I hope I shall have the approval of my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) in securing precedence of Government business on Thursday next. I would remind the hon. gentleman that this is the 25th of March and we have been sitting since the 3rd of February.

Mr. CASEY. What the right hon. leader of the House has said as to our having gone over the Public Bills and Orders the other day has a certain weight, but it must not be forgotten that some of the Public Bills and Orders are standing, not because the members who are promoting them are not ready to go on, but because the Government are not ready to have the Bills considered. That is the case with the first item on the list, a very important Bill, of which I have charge, in the interests of the railway employees, and which has been allowed to stand from time to time to suit the convenience of the hon. Minister of Railways. I am not complaining that he has not had time to consider it before now. I think his time has been fully taken up with other matters. But I do not think that this Bill or other Bills in the same position should suffer simply because the time of the House hitherto has been taken up with one great question. I would urge most strongly upon the Premier that he should accept the suggestion of the leader of the Opposition, that those in charge of Public Bills and Orders should have at least another Thursday. There is time enough to deal with notices of motions on Mondays and Wednesday afternoons, but the Public Bills and Orders will have only Wednesday evening, and I claim that that is not long enough to give to these measures, many of which are very important in the public interest. The discussion of them may suffice to inform the Government as to what legislation should be introduced by them in the future, even if pending Bills do not carry. Their discussion is of the greatest public importance as a means of informing the Government as to public opinion on these subjects. I submit that to decide now that we should only have Wednesday evening for those items, is going rather too far. It means practically for the whole session that, with the exception of one Thursday, we shall have had no opportunity but on Wednesday evenings for this purpose, because, up to date, Thursdays have been taken up with the great subject that was before us; and Wednesday evening and a good part of Thursday thus far, has been taken up with a Bill introduced by one private member. So that, with the exception of one, private members will not have had a chance to discuss a Bill except on Wednesday night. I would urge very strongly, in the interest of the friends of the Government and others, that the suggestion of the leader of the Opposition should be acceded to.

Mr. MACLEAN. Before the right hon. the First Minister asked us to consent to this motion, he should tell the House whether he intends to take up, as a Government measure, a very important Bill now standing on the Public Bills and Orders—the Bill relating to insolvency. That question ought to be settled. The people are looking for some kind of legislation in regard to insolvency. I believe that, on the whole, the Bill that has been introduced is a fairly good measure and worthy the attention of the House. But if it is the intention of the Government not to bring up this question on their own account, but to leave it to the House to deal with, there would be no opportunity of reaching a conclusion with regard to it, or of having a Bill upon the subject passed this session, if the motion of the leader of the House is adopted.

Mr. McMULLEN. The leader of the Government stated that the Bills were gone over last Thursday. I must confess, that I was not here last Thursday, when these Bills were called, and I think a great many hon. gentlemen on both sides were absent. It was the day before the election in Russell county, and a very large number of members were absent. I had a kind of assurance that the Bills which stand in my name would not be up before half-past ten, but I found, when I got back, that they had been called. I have never had an opportunity to move the second reading of these Bills, and I hope the Government will consent to give reasonable opportunity for this purpose. A very large portion of the time has been taken up by the Yukon Bill—four weeks. I would suggest that, if the Government should decide to take Thursday, the right hon. leader of the House should consent to a resolution, that the order for Wednesday be made the order for Thursday. That would give Wednesday for Public Bills and Orders.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope my right hon. friend will not press this motion. I do not think that it is a reasonable one at this stage of the session, considering what has gone before, and considering the present state of the Order paper. We have given precedence to a Government measure, and it has had the boards for between two and three weeks of steady discussion, and has kept back Public Bills and Orders and notices of motion standing in the name of private members. We are within a few days, it seems, of entering upon the discussion upon the Budget. I have always contended that it was not a good plan to carry on the Budget debate in sections; and, though my hon. friend, then on this side of the House, on one or two occasions would not subscribe to that idea, I think it has been found the most convenient way to go on with the Budget debate from day to day until you finish it. That gives the Government control of the time during which discussion is carried on. Now, what time have we had, up to the present, for private measures, notices of motion, and so on? The right hon. gentleman says that we went through the notices of motion twice. But it will be in the recollection of my hon. friend, that all but a few were caused to stand, not at the instance of the Government very often, but at the instance of private members, whether they had the idea they wanted to block the getting of the information, or whether they really wanted to discuss the questions, I do not know. But, in any case, we could not get the information, of course, because the agreement was, that only motions not calling for debate, should be taken up. Some of them were allowed to stand at the instance of the Government. We have not overmuch insisted upon having returns and information during the three sessions of the House under hon. gentlemen opposite. But there is a great deal of information that we want this year, and my right hon. friend will find it to the advantage of the rapid progress of business to give us time for the presenting of these motions sooner, rather than later. For, if it is not given to us now, we must press for it later, and that might cause a grievance, as it would appear to cause a lengthening of the session.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am quite willing, Mr. Speaker, to accept the suggestion of my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster). I will agree very willingly that we should not take Thursday, but the following Thursday, if the House will agree that, after entering on the Budget debate, we should proceed with it day by day until it is finished. If that be the sense of the House, I would be willing to agree to it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I understand my hon. friend will leave next Thursday open on the understanding that we take the Budget.

The PRIME MINISTER. We will proceed with the Budget from day to day until completed.

Mr. FOSTER. But my hon. friend is not going to move that the Thursday after be taken? Then we will withdraw the motion and let it be for consultation.

The PRIME MINISTER. I have no objection, because the next Thursday, I think, will be Holy Thursday. Practically that will mean that we take Thursday until Easter. But in the meantime we will have the Budget speech next Friday, and proceed with it from day to day until completed.

Mr. FOSTER. I shall be satisfied.

Mr. SPROULE. That would be hardly fair, because there are thirty-five items on the Order paper by private members already to be considered. During the early part of the session the time was entirely taken up by a Government measure, and private members have had no opportunity to deal with their measures. Now, we are going to have only one day to dispose of whatever Bills we can dispose of on this Order paper, including the Insolvency Bill. After that day is taken, then the Government want to take their business day in and day out until the end of the session. I do not think this is allowing private members any rights at all in this House in regard to private legislation.

The PRIME MINISTER. I hope I shall meet the desires of my hon. friend by withdrawing this motion, and it will be understood that when we take the Budget speech, we will proceed with it from day to day until it is completed.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

CLAIMS OF MANITOBA AGAINST THE DOMINION.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the Government to a motion I made last session for a return, which motion was carried, but it has not been complied with. On the 2nd instant, I called the attention of the Government to this same subject, when the Minister of Trade and Commerce informed me that he was not aware that such a return had ever been brought in, and that he would look into the case. He took note of it. The return is for:

Copies of all memorials, statements and other documents from the Government of the province of Manitoba in relation to an unsettled claim resulting from that province being charged with the whole cost of the erection of public buildings, with copies of all correspondence in connection therewith.

This matter is now before the legislature of Manitoba, and I am informed that it will be the subject of an item in the Budget. Therefore, I think we ought to be put in possession of all the documents in connection therewith.

FLOODS ON THE GRAND RIVER.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I desire to call the attention of the Government to a certain matter, and I was proceeding to do so a little while ago when it was discovered that I was out of order. I do it, as I said then, in order that the matter may be before the Minister of Railways and Canals when his estimates are being prepared for the coming year.

The PRIME MINISTER. Order. If the hon. gentleman desires to get the information from the Minister of Railways and Canals by means of a question, he can do so. But I understand that the hon. gentleman wants to raise a debate.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I was proceeding to explain my question, and to put myself in order it may be necessary to move the adjournment of the House, which my hon. friend knows I can do. The Minister of Railways and Canals has, no doubt, noticed in the public press accounts of the serious floods which have taken place at various points along the Grand River during the present spring. It is quite true that these floods during this spring have taken place at points where no Government works exist, and where, therefore, the assistance of the Railway Department could hardly be invoked for the purpose of prevention. But there is one point at which, considering the annually increasing volume of the spring freshets and the great danger which is likely to result, and to which the attention of the Minister ought to be called, in my judgment, at the earliest possible moment, and where I think it is absolutely necessary for him to take preventive measures. I refer to the point where the Grand River is dammed for the purpose of feeding the Welland Canal feeders. At this point, it is true, no flood took place during the present spring, but that is accounted for by the fact that the municipal council and private citizens, at considerable cost constructed a temporary embankment to hold the waters in, which otherwise would have flowed over the vicinity and done a great deal of damage. But even with this hard work being done night and day by the citizens and employees of the town, the vicinity was in imminent danger of a very serious flood. It is not for me to suggest what means should be taken by the Minister of Railways and Canals, because he has those officers in his department and in his employment who will be better able to do that than I can possibly do. Whether the bank should be heightened, or whether the waste weir accommodation should be increased or both plans resorted to, this much is certain, that something should be done by the department to prevent the danger which has been very much increased during the past two or three seasons, as those who are residents along the course of that river will bear me out in saying. The hon. gentleman has in charge, immediately on the spot, a very competent, painstaking and intelligent man, Mr. Scott, who does his best to prevent damage being done. He has also his officers on the Welland Canal, to whom he might refer the matter. What I am very anxious for him to do is that he should secure a report upon the condition of affairs at that point, in such a way that he would be able to take it up and consider it, with the view of meeting any suggestion for prevention which these gentlemen might make, in the Estimates of the present session. The hon. gentleman is not acquainted with the district, but I may tell him that a few years ago a very serious flood took place, and great damage was done to private as well as to public property. The Government of the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie and the Government of Sir John A. Macdonald found it necessary to pay large sums in indemnity for the losses which were then sustained. At that time preventive measures were taken, but these have now become entirely inadequate on account of the natural causes which I need not discuss, and which the hon. gentleman understands quite well. What I now urge him to do is to ask his officers to examine into this matter at once, to get a report upon it, and to act, as I believe he will act, in the interests not only of the vicinity, but in the interest of the Dominion treasury as well.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). As the hon. gentleman has thought upon the subject, may I ask him what he would suggest in a general way?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Either the waste weir accommodation ought to be increased, because the damage is done by high water, which is caused by the dam, or the containing banks ought to be heightened. Perhaps both ought to be done, but certainly something ought to be done if damage is to be prevented.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I may say to the hon. gentleman that I will communicate with the superintendent, Mr. Scott, at once on the matter.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

POSTMASTER GENERAL'S REPORT.

Mr. GILLIES. I wish to ask the Postmaster General when we may expect his report to be laid on the Table.

Mr. MONTAGUE.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). It is in the hands of the printer. I think I will be able to lay it on the Table in a day or two.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Finance to the fact that we have not had a meeting of that important committee called the Public Accounts Committee. I think that he, as Finance Minister, should advise the chairman of that committee to call a meeting at the earliest possible opportunity.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Now that my hon. friend has called my attention to it, a meeting will be called at an early day.

JAPANESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. McINNES. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would ask the right hon. the Premier if he would be good enough, as soon as possible, to lay upon the Table of the House the correspondence between himself and the Japanese consul at Vancouver relative to Bill No. 70.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Certainly, that will be done.

EDMONTON BRIDGE.

Mr. DAVIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), when the return I moved for in regard to the Edmonton bridge will be laid on the Table?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). I will be glad indeed to bring it down as soon as possible; in a day or two, I hope.

THE WEST BLOCK.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask the Minister a question, too?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. In passing up and down by the West Block I notice a number of workmen taking off the face of the building and then building it up again. It is an important thing, to my mind, and I want to ask the Minister how far he proposes to go on with that, and why he is going on with it at all.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There was a part of the wall which had been rebuilt a few years ago. The older members of the House will remember that about fifteen or twenty years ago there was a kind of second wall there, and that wall was removed and the removal caused the wall of the building itself to tumble. Upon the report of my chief architect I was obliged to rebuild the part which is now being rebuilt. There is not much more than the space which is now uncovered to do.

Mr. FOSTER. With reference to that, has the hon. gentleman a report from his engineer that he could lay on the Table of the House.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have no objection whatever, but I may say that I have no written report. The chief architect called on me and told me that he had discovered that part of that wall was in danger and that we had to rebuild it.

MR. OGILVIE'S REPORT—FRENCH TRANSLATION.

Mr. BERGERON. I would like to ask the right hon. the Premier when he expects that the report of Mr. Ogilvie on the Klondike will be translated into French. My hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) asked about it some time ago, but nothing has been done yet.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I stated at the time I was questioned by the hon. member (Mr. Casgrain) that the translation was very far advanced. The translation is made under the orders of Hunter, Rose & Co. I required to have the translation sent to me and to some others, to find out whether it was correct or not. We found it very correct. When the hon. member (Mr. Casgrain) questioned me, it was more than three-quarters done, and I presume at this time the report is in the hands of the printer and will be soon ready.

LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR OF NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. May I ask the right hon. gentleman, who is the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories at the present time?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Mackintosh.

THE FRENCH LANGUAGE IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. MONK. (Translation). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would call the attention of the Government to a matter of public policy. I refer to the printing in the French language, of the Ordinances made by the Government of the North-west Territories. Under the constitution those ordinances should be promulgated in both languages. This is the state of things I wish to point out, as stated in an article of the newspaper "L'Ouest Canadien," published at Edmonton. It is taken from the issue of that paper of the 17th of March, instant, and it was sent to me in order that I might bring before the House the grievance referred to. Here it is:

IS THE USE OF THE FRENCH LANGUAGE OFFICIAL IN THE TERRITORIES?

Whether the use of the French language ought to be absolutely struck out from our Statute-book is a question which is more important than ever, and ought to occupy a large share of the public attention. Since 1892, the government who are at the head of affairs in the Territories have deemed it fit to do away with the printing of the Ordinances of the legislature in the French language, in defiance of our rights.

Under the North-west Territories Act, 43 Vic., ch. 50, section 140, it is enacted that "Either the French or the English language may be used by any person in the debates of the Council or Legislative Assembly of the Territories, and in the proceedings before the courts; and both those languages shall be used in the records and journals of the said Council or Assembly; and all ordinances made under this Act shall be printed in both languages.

Under Act 54-55 Vic., ch. 22, section 110, of the North-west Territories Act, was repealed and replaced by the following:

"Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the Legislative Assembly of the Territories, and in the proceedings before the courts; and both those languages shall be used in the records and journals of such Assembly; and all ordinances made under the Act shall be printed in both those languages: Provided, however, that after the next general election of the Legislative Assembly, such Assembly may by ordinance or otherwise, regulate its proceedings, and the manner of recording or publishing the same; and the regulations so made shall be embodied in a proclamation which shall be forthwith made and published by the Lieutenant-Governor in conformity with the law, and thereafter shall have full force and effect."

We therefore, have the imprescriptible and undeniable right of having those ordinances translated into our beautiful French language, the mother tongue of all those pioneers of the North-west, who first discovered the prairies of the far West, and have marked their passage by choosing the sites of mostly all the important cities of our country and of the neighbouring Republic. Those discoverers of the West were fellow-countrymen of ours; and it was our "coureurs de bois," our traders and our missionaries who first opened up to civilization those immense prairies till then unexplored, and who first called the attention of our country to the possibilities of those fertile plains which were to become the granary of Canada.

The article goes on the same strain, but I need not quote the whole article. Let it suffice to call the attention of the Government to the grievance complained of. I think it is the duty of the Government to tell us whether they are aware of the existence of that grievance and whether they propose to take any steps to remedy the same.

I do not think I need apologize for bringing up this matter before the House. But let me tell the House that the grievance complained of was brought to my attention by interested parties who live in the Territories and are therefore entitled to the redress they ask for.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). (Translation). Mr. Speaker, as stated by the hon. gentleman himself, the grievance brought to the attention of the Government goes as far back as the year 1892, that is to say, the enactments relating to the French language, in the North-west, have not been in force during the years 1892, 1893, 1894, 1895 and 1896. I may tell the hon. gentleman that this is the first time this grievance is brought to the attention of the Government. As the hon. gentleman knows, the North-west Territories now enjoy responsible government, a government responsible to the people of the North-west Territories, and I do not know how far we have jurisdiction to remove any grievance complained of. It is a matter which I shall have to bring to the attention of the Minister of Justice.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTION.

On the Order for third reading of Bill (No. 39) respecting the inspection of steamboats and the examination and licensing of engineers employed on them,

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). My hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has given notice that on the third reading of this Bill he would move that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole to consider two amendments; one to strike out subsection 2 of section 4, and the other to amend clause 14, so as to make it read more in accordance with what he thinks is in accordance with the object of the section. I have no objection to either of the amendments and so far as the first is concerned, the House will remember it had reference to the clause prohibiting inspectors of boilers from engaging in any other business. That clause was qualified with the statement that they could not do so unless with the assent of the Minister. My hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) thinks that the clause had better be struck out altogether, and the law left as it stood before. I have no objection to that. The Bill is purely a departmental one and we ought have no difficulty in agreeing, so that if my hon. friend thinks it would work better as it was before, I am quite willing. The amendment he suggested in section 14 is of importance. I thought, and the law clerks thought, that it would meet the views of hon. gentlemen, but as it does not, I move:

That the order for the third reading of Bill (No. 39) be discharged, and that the House do resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on said Bill for the purpose of considering these two amendments.

Motion agreed to, and the House again resolved itself into committee.

Mr. MONK.

(In the Committee.)

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I move that subsection 2 of section 4 be struck out of the Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. In clause 14 of the Bill, after the words "may be" in the fourteenth line, I move that the words be inserted "whenever the law requires these officers to possess certificates."

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. To make the amendment complete you will have to repeat the words "and such owner, master, mate or engineer, as the case may be."

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Very well.

Mr. BRITTON. May I ask the Minister if it is the intention to make any change in regard to the inspection of American steamboats? You will notice that the first part of section 37 refers to steamboats in Canada, and then the latter part of the section refers to every passenger steamboat. Is it the intention to make inspection compulsory on American steamboats carrying passengers in Canada?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is the intention.

Mr. BRITTON. The intention is to compel American steamboats to be inspected here too, and to pay the fee?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. BRITTON. Is it reciprocal legislation; is that the way they have it in the States?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes; the point was this: When our steamboats crossed the lakes and went to an American port, they did not accept our inspection and they insisted that our steamboats should be inspected in the United States. The practice has been for American steamboats to come over here with their own certificate of inspection and they did not get one from us. They would start out on excursions from Canadian lake towns carrying four or five hundred passengers, without any certificate from us. Our steamboat owners complained of it as an injustice to them, and I simply made the law reciprocal.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Bill reported, as amended, and read the third time, and passed.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fitzpatrick for second reading of Bill (No. 16) to repeal the Electoral Franchise Act and to further amend the Dominion Elections Act.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, on the last day of the discussion on this Bill, a matter came up incidentally on which I desire to set myself right before the House and the country. It came up with reference to an interruption made while the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) was speaking by the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell), and it was with regard to the duties on flour. The hon. member for Simcoe made the statement that the Government promised to relieve the country from the duty on flour.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman must have mistaken the item; we are on the item to resume the adjourned debate on the Franchise Bill.

Mr. MILLS. I have not mistaken the item, Mr. Speaker. I wish to set myself right on a matter that came up incidentally in the debate.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.
On an interruption.

Mr. SPEAKER. It must have been very much out of order.

Mr. FOSTER. It was very likely made by the Finance Minister.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). No doubt it came from the other side.

Mr. MILLS. The Minister of Finance upon my stating it was promised by him at Annapolis, rose and stated as follows:—

The hon. member for Annapolis has interrupted and stated in his interruption that I said at Annapolis that this Government would take the duty off flour. I tell the hon. gentleman that he is mistaken. I made no such promise.

I said: I have the type-written stenographic report of the hon. gentleman's speech, and can produce it.

I think it is only proper that I should put myself right with respect to this matter, and in explanation I desire to state that during the first session of Parliament in 1896, while I was attending to my duties here, the county of Annapolis was invaded, as it were, by the Prime Minister of Nova Scotia, and by the Attorney General. The then Premier is now Minister of Finance in the Government here. A series of meetings was held in my county in the interest of the Attorney General of Nova Scotia, who had decided to oppose me in the coming contest. As soon as I heard of this movement I was determined to learn what those people were saying behind my back, and so I sent a telegram to a gentleman, who is within the hearing of my voice at the present, to employ for me a shorthand reporter to follow those gentlemen over the county and take down everything they said. As a result of that telegram I have here the type-written report of their speeches certified to by shorthand reporter Devine, of St. John, and signed by him. This is what the present Minister of Finance said with regard to flour at Bridgetown, in the county of Annapolis, on February 26, 1896:

Supposing I have two barrels of flour before me, one comes from Ontario and the other from the United States. The Conservatives would say, buy the Ontario flour. We say that too. We say, buy the Ontario flour if you want it, but what Conservatives say is, buy the Ontario flour whether you want it or not. We admit there should be restrictions in trade. If anything is made here reasonably good, we say buy it here. Do everything that will help your neighbours, but do it of your own free will, because you want to do it, and because you believe that you are getting a fair value for your money. But if an Act of Parliament is passed to make you do it, then I say you are strange persons if you do it at all. If a man has a hardware store, and he is selling powder, and he sees fit to put a barrel of it on the sidewalk, and a boy comes along with a cigarette and drops a spark in, probably there would not be any powder there long, so the law puts restrictions upon the sale of certain things—as, for instance, the sale of intoxicating liquors, because it is admitted that the free, unrestrained traffic of liquor is dangerous, and therefore the law says you shall only sell it under certain circumstances. All this is necessary for the good of society. They lay it down that you shall only interfere with a man's personal liberty when it is necessary for the good of society. Is it necessary for the good of society to interfere with your liberty with reference to the purchase of that Ontario flour? Surely you can be trusted to decide which of these two barrels of flour you want. Certainly, if the Ontario flour suits you you will buy it, and you do not need an Act of Parliament to make you, either.

We, the Liberal party, have confidence in you, and we say we think you have good enough judgment to know which barrel of flour you want, but they say you are not capable to judge for yourself, and so we will pass an Act of Parliament and fine you 75 cents if you do not buy that flour.

Free trade allows you to do that which you believe to be for your own interest in every matter which does not interfere with the liberty of your neighbour, and protection makes you buy something that you would not buy if you were left to your own free will.

That is what I call and what I ask this House to regard, and what the people did regard at the time as an implied promise on the part of the Premier of Nova Scotia and by Mr. Longley of their intention. They asserted time and time again in speeches I have here, to preach the good old free trade doctrine. The people so understood it and so regarded it, and in order to show that they so regarded it, I will simply state this: There was a little child at Annapolis, whose father sat on the platform at one of the meetings. That child was saying its prayers one day, and it said: "God bless papa, God bless mamma, and God bless Sir Wilfrid, and make him a good man, for he is not doing as well as papa thought he would."

With respect to the question before the House, the new Franchise Bill, which has been introduced by the Solicitor General, he has given a few reasons why he introduced this Bill. The main reason was the fact that Sir John Thompson had introduced a somewhat similar Bill. The right hon. leader of the House advocates that every one should approach this question with calmness, with judiciousness, with an absence of anything like partisanship. When the leaders of the Liberal party ask us to approach matters which they are bringing before the people, in such a spirit as that, it always raises my suspicions. It always makes me think that it is something like the soft, velvety, caressing paw that hides the sharp and vicious claw; and I rather think that simile will apply to this Bill in this case. The present Dominion Franchise Act may have its imperfections, but it has good qualities as well.

An hon. MEMBER. Where?

Mr. MILLS. It has uniformity, for one thing; and, for another thing, under it we have had honesty and purity.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MILLS. We have had honesty of revision. The hon. leader of the House has said that that Act was a terror to his people, that it was hostile to his side of the House. The reason why it was such a terror to them was, that for the most part the revisions were carried on by judges, and judges are always a terror to that side of the House. There have been charges with reference to revising barristers and revising officers, but no one has dared to come on the floor of this House and name one revising barrister, or one revising officer, who did not do his duty. There was this great thing about the Franchise Act which I admired more than anything else in connection with it, that, when we went to the revision courts, we had justice done. Will the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), or the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Copp) tell me that justice was not done in the revision courts of those counties? They dare not do it. Even-handed justice was done there; and I thoroughly believe that even-handed justice was done in all the revision courts throughout Nova Scotia. That is one of the reasons why I admire the old Act—because of its uniformity and its purity. The hon. Solicitor General says that the Act of 1885 has not been productive of good results. That may be—not good results for them; not good results for the members of the present Government, because the revision was conducted squarely and fearlessly. It may have cost a considerable amount of money, and no doubt it did, and that is one of the chief objections I have to it. It was a new Act, and, therefore, it must, of necessity, cost a large amount of money to get it thoroughly before the people. But the people were commencing to understand the Act, the barristers were commencing to understand it, and the laymen were commencing to understand it; and it might have been amended so that the cost of its administration, particularly the cost of the revisers, could be reduced to a minimum. Objection has also been made to it because of the cost of working it to the political parties. We shall have precisely the same cost now, and more, if this Bill is put through. It will cost the political parties more to work under the Franchise Acts of the different provinces than it did to work under the Dominion Franchise Act.

Mr. MILLS.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. It will not have to be done twice, though.

Mr. MILLS. It will have to be done thoroughly, and it cannot be done thoroughly unless it is done twice. The hon. Solicitor General also says that, since 1894, the principle has been settled and established in this House that we should revert to the conditions existing previous to 1885. I take exception to that entirely. It has not been settled and established in this House, nor anywhere else, that we should revert to the conditions as they existed before 1885. Sir John Thompson brought his Bill before the House, but it did not become law, and before it would have become law, he would have met with a great many objections, and there would have been a great many amendments to that Bill suggested. I believe, however, that in the main the ideas of Sir John Thompson were correct. His Bill was not to adopt the franchises of the different provinces; it was to have control of our own franchise, and to adopt the lists of the different provinces as a basis in making up our list. That was, in short, Sir John Thompson's Bill. This Bill is different from that altogether. Now, let us for a moment make a comparison between the Act of 1885 and the present Bill. As I have said, the principal item of cost in the revision under the Dominion Franchise Act was the cost of the revising barristers. There was also the cost to the different political parties; but the very same cost will have to be undergone now. So that need not be taken into consideration at all. The cost of the provincial lists is to be borne, in the first instance, by the different municipalities, but still that is a tax on this country. In answer to that, it is said that this cost has to be undergone now, so that it will not be any additional cost. There is some force in that answer. In the province of Nova Scotia we have certain revisers, who are appointed by the municipal council to revise the lists. These revisers are not the proper men to look after this matter. It is a most important matter, and it ought to be looked after judiciously and calmly, whether it is approached by this House in that spirit or not. But is the manner in which the lists are prepared in the province of Nova Scotia, a judicial and calm, a fair and square manner? I do not think so. I will give you some idea of how it is done. For instance, in the county of Annapolis, there is quite a large majority of Liberals in the municipal council. They divided the electoral district of Annapolis into different revising districts. There are seven revising districts, and in each district there are three revisers. How are these three revisers appointed? Did they make a semblance of giving the Tories a chance? They appoint a good, square, honest man, a Tory, not a partisan, but a man who would give an advantage to no one—a thoroughly honest man. The other two are ward heelers. The consequence is—what? The Franchise Act to the letter for the Tories, and universal suffrage for the Grits. That is the way it is worked in Annapolis county. Take every one of these seven districts, I know the men well, and that will apply to nearly all of them, and some of their transactions are of the vilest kind of partisanship. Then there is an appeal. An appeal to whom? An appeal to the sheriff. Who is the sheriff? When the new law was enacted whereby the sheriff became responsible, not to the judges of the Supreme Court in Nova Scotia, but to the Government of Nova Scotia, the Attorney General of Nova Scotia said, in referring to these sheriffs: We will have eighteen good men and true. And they are, Mr. Speaker, eighteen good men and true partisans—good, honest men, some of them. Sheriff Gates is as honest a man as ever lived, but he is a political partisan—not a trained man, not acquainted with the niceties of the law, which the revising officer, under the Franchise Act, is required to know. He is not learned in the law, he is always in doubt; and being ignorant of the law and being always in doubt, he gives his party the benefit of the doubt always. Consequently, the Liberal party gets the advantage very largely and unfairly. I do not object to their getting an advantage squarely, but I object to their getting one unfairly, and these appeals, which are brought before these different sheriffs, are tried and adjudicated upon just in accordance with the dictates of the ward heelers. It is far different under the Dominion Franchise Act. But let me first refer to another point. The sheriff holds only one court in the county, and any appeal to him from the revisers has to come from every portion of the county to that court in the shire town, whereas the revising barrister or the revising judge, in the case of the county of Annapolis, held something like six or seven different courts. He went to the people, but in the case of the sheriffs' courts the people have to go to the sheriff, thereby making the expense of an appeal to him a very expensive affair. Then, there is the matter of purity with reference to these revision courts. In the case of a judge, even-handed justice is dealt out to all. No one dares say otherwise, whereas in the case of these revisers and in the case of the sheriff, to whom appeals are made, it is not even-handed justice. I do not accuse some of these revisers of being men who are thoroughly dishonest, but men who are thoroughly honest in business are often thoroughly dishonest in politics. I will give you an instance of the absolute dishonesty of some of these revisers. It is a case which actually occurred in the county of Annapolis. I do not make charges here against men without proving what I say, and I would like the members of the Government and supporters of the Government to do the same. We have charges thrown out broadcast by hon. gentlemen opposite against the revising barristers; but not one revising barrister's name have I heard mentioned in this House. The case I refer to is one that occurred in the court of Judge Savary, and I will show you the connection in a few minutes between this and the revisers' court. This is the case:

FORM 5—SON OF PROPERTY OWNER (BY ELECTOR ON BEHALF OF ANOTHER PERSON).

DOMINION OF CANADA,
County of Annapolis:
To wit:

In the matter of Voters for Dominion Election purposes for the Electoral District of Annapolis, and in the matter of the "Electoral Franchise" Acts and amendments thereto:

I, E. H. Armstrong, of the polling district, No. 6, in the county of Annapolis, do solemnly declare that I am an elector in the electoral district of Annapolis, and that William Irvine, of the district, No. 6, of Granville, in the county of Annapolis, whose post office address is Granville Ferry, is of the full age of twenty-one years; and is not by said Acts nor by any law of the Dominion of Canada disqualified or prevented from voting at an election for a member to serve in the House of Commons of Canada; and that he is a British subject by birth, and I claim that the said William Irvine is entitled to have his name added to the voters' list for the municipality of Annapolis, in the said electoral district, under the Electoral Franchise Act and amendments thereto, and his qualification is:

That the said William Irvine, merchant, is the son of Hugh Irvine, of the district, No. 6, of Granville Ferry, in the county of Annapolis, who is the occupant and owner of house and land in the said electoral district, which is of the value of $300, and he is and has been resident upon such property, in said electoral district, continuously.....with his father, being owner for one year next before the date of this declaration, except during.....months of said year in all.

The foregoing allegations of fact are true to my personal knowledge, and I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true, and by virtue of the Act respecting extra-judicial oaths.

E. H. ARMSTRONG,
(Signature of Elector.)

Declared before me at Granville, in the county of Annapolis, this 21st day of July, 1891.

D. J. RIORDAN,
(Justice of the Peace),
County of Annapolis.

To His Honour Judge Savary,
Revising Officer for the Electoral District of Annapolis.

That was a solemn declaration and a specimen of several that were handed in to His Honour Judge Savary at the revisers' court of Granville in July, 1891. I do not know that I can explain the matter any better than by reading the editorial comments on it:

The above is a specimen of several of the "solemn declarations" by which His Honour Judge Savary was induced to put names on the preliminary lists for polling districts Nos. 6 and 7. If E. H. Armstrong really signed it and made a solemn declaration of its truth before a J. P., and any essential statement in it is untrue, as, for instance, that the proposed voter was twenty-one years old, then he is guilty of perjury, and liable under chapter 156, Revised Statutes of Canada, to fourteen years in the penitentiary. If, on the other hand, E. H. Armstrong never signed it and never made solemn declaration of its truth before a J. P., then the person who put his name to it, and wilfully used it as a means of getting a name on the list, is liable to one or the other of two penalties: 1st, by chapter 165, Revised Statutes of Canada, section 36, to seven years imprisonment for forging and uttering an "instrument made evidence by an Act of Parliament," or, 2nd, by section 39, same chapter, to three years' imprisonment for forging and uttering a "solemn declaration" made before a justice of the peace.

Endorsed on the above document is the following memo.:—"Admitted by D. J. Riordan to be a forgery by himself. (Sgd.) A. W. S." "A. W. S." being the initials of A. W. Savary.

It is also noticeable that the words: "or according to my information and belief the ground for which is as follows," are erased in the above document.

In other words, D. J. Riordan, the justice of the peace, a man that was appointed by this local government of Nova Scotia, one of the henchmen of the Attorney General, admitted, in cross-examination—

Mr. COPP. I would ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills), what paper he was reading from.

Mr. MILLS. I am reading from the Annapolis "Spectator," which was published on October 30th, 1891. This Daniel J. Riordan—and he admitted to me, at the reviser's court, that the hon. the Attorney General of the province had employed him to look after the lists and get on as many names as he possibly could, and paid him so much a name for doing it. He also admitted, as this article states, under my cross-examination before the judge, that he had signed the name of E. H. Armstrong to that declaration. It was also admitted, that several of the men whose names were sought to be put on the list, were not twenty-one years of age. Therefore, he was not only forging a document, but was forging an untrue document.

These facts together with the fact that William Irvine, the citizen sought to be made a voter, is not yet 21 years of age, as stated by his father, Hugh M. Irvine, who was compelled to attend the court under a subpoena to give testimony on that point, clearly shows that this instrument, purporting on the face of it to be the solemn declaration of E. H. Armstrong, was wilfully used as an instrument a means of getting on the voters' list William Irvine, who in law is still an infant and not entitled to vote. Do honest Liberals countenance such fraud? Three magistrates, D. J. Riordan, Esq., E. H. Armstrong, Esq.—

That is another magistrate.

—and Hugh M. Irvine, Esq., the "new creations" of the Attorney General, are more or less connected with the matter.

Is it true that D. J. Riordan committed a forgery? Or did E. H. Armstrong actually make a solemn declaration to what Hugh M. Irvine, going to the court under a subpoena, says is not the fact?

Armstrong has not been heard from at all. The Attorney General—

The Attorney General, by the way, was there.

—at the revision court asked judgment to be deferred, on one or two names as, he said, "he was expecting Esquire Armstrong."

But Esquire Armstrong never turned up.

Why was Esquire Armstrong so prominent by his absence? Surely the young and rising magistrate, so courteous, so brave, so impartial in his conduct whenever sitting in judgment as a local reviser of districts 6 and 7, did not know of any wrong being committed by his brother justice, D. J. Riordan, nor surely did he absent himself for fear of being asked a few questions, such as: Did you solemnly declare before Riordan, J.P., that William Irvine was 21 years old? And that Bernard Amberman is 21 years old? Your name is to both declarations; did you sign them or did you authorize Riordan to sign for you? If you authorized Riordan to sign for you, did you know, Esquire Armstrong, that you were authorizing your name to be subscribed to a lie? Surely this must be mere suspicion; but, if true, then "Esquire" Armstrong and "Esquire" Riordan are co-partners in the fraud, the penalties for which have been noted above.

Whoever wrote the name "Harvey W. Messenger" to the paper filed with the revising officer for the purpose of qualifying him as a voter on income wrote the name of "Robert Mills" to a paper purporting to be a solemn declaration of the young man declaring that "I am son of Robert Mills 1st, and that I am of the full age of 21 years." We are assured that Robert Mills second, is still under age.

Which was the fact, and his name was not allowed to go on the list.

The same pen and the same hand evidently, in our opinion, wrote the name of "Frank Armstrong" to a similar declaration. All these five declarations appear on the face of them to be declared before "D. J. Riordan, Justice of the Peace, county of Annapolis." At the reviser's court His Honour Judge Savary shared the same opinion, and as Riordan admitted the frauds in three cases, of Messenger, Irvine and Mills, His Honour cancelled all five applications, and his memo. appears on them endorsed as follows:—Entry on preliminary list cancelled. (Sd. A. W. S.)

Now, who is Esquire Armstrong, and who is Esquire Riordan? Will you be surprised to know that they were the local revisers, and are now. In sections in Annapolis county in the polling sections 6, 7 and 21, the revisers are Elwood H. Armstrong and Daniel J. Riordan.

Mr. Armstrong, I think, is a thoroughly good, honest business man, but, when it comes to politics, he will stoop to the lowest thing and then excuse himself on the ground that it is politics. James Reid is an honest man, and a good sound Tory, and always has been, and, I believe, always will be.

Mr. Riordan was brought before the grand jury of the county. One of the Attorney General's eighteen good men and true, the late Sheriff Morse, another political partisan of the Attorney General, was then sheriff. He used his influence with the grand jury, and the grand jury, notwithstanding that these facts were solidly proven, excused him, because anything is excusable in politics, and so they did not bring in a true Bill against Riordan. And so Riordan goes unwhipped of justice, and he and Armstrong are the revisers of the local list. That is a specimen of what this Bill asks this House to adopt. If this Act is passed, we shall be giving the control of our lists to just such men as these, just such men as Messrs. Armstrong and Riordan, instead of having them before men who are trained in legal points and who can understand legal points and give good decisions respecting the law. As I said before, when these appeals come before the sheriff, the sheriff, not being trained, not knowing anything about the law, cannot be expected to decide in accordance with the law.

He is always in doubt with reference to these matters, and in a great many of these instances where the franchise is intricate, you can easily raise doubts as to whether this man or that man should be placed upon the list; and the sheriff being always in doubt, always gives the benefit of the doubt to his own party. Therefore, I say, this is a most impure manner of revising the electoral lists for this Dominion. Annapolis County is not alone in that matter. What have we in the county of Pictou which has particular reference in this matter to the local contest? I will not make general charges, but I will give the names. I will read now from the "Colonial Standard," Pictou, N.S., Tuesday, May 11, 1897:

In the matter of the Queen vs. Macdonald.

Before Justice Roy, at New Glasgow, Tuesday, May 4th, 1897.

Mr. Justice Roy is a creation of the local government of Nova Scotia, a Grit partisan and a magistrate.

The following is a copy of the information:—

Canada,
Province of Nova Scotia,
County of Pictou.

The information and complaint of John McGillivray, of New Glasgow, in the county of Pictou, barrister; George Gray, of Stellarton, in the county of Pictou, accountant, taken this twenty-first day of April, A.D. 1897, before the undersigned James Roy, one of Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the county of Pictou, who saith that Edward M. McDonald, of Pictou, in the county of Pictou, barrister, did, at Pictou, in the county of Pictou, on or about the 29th day of May, 1897, fraudulently alter an affidavit sworn to by George Gray, dated the 29th day of March, 1897, by inserting in said affidavit after it had been sworn to the words: "That due application to add their names to the list of electors of section No. 25, Stellarton, was made to the revisers thereof, and was duly heard and considered by said revisers thereof, and was refused by them," with intent to deceive the sheriff of Pictou County and induce him to add names to the electoral list whilst hearing and determining appeals from decisions of revisers under the Franchise Act of Nova Scotia, and the said Edward M. McDonald, did thereby commit forgery.

Taken and subscribed before me the day and year first above written, at New Glasgow, in the county of Pictou.

Signed, GEO. GRAY,
JOHN MCGILLIVRAY,
JAMES ROY, J.P.,
Pictou County.

The following is a copy of the affidavit as it left Mr. Gray's hands:—

I, George Gray, of Stellarton, in the county of Pictou, do swear:

1. That I have a personal knowledge of the facts herein deposed to.

2. That

JAMES BLAIR,
RICHARD DAVIS, Jr.,
REUBAN DUNBAR,

of Stellarton, in the county of Pictou, are British subjects of the full age of twenty-one years.

8. That they are residents of polling section No. 25, town of Stellarton, in the county of Pictou. That they each derive an income of at least $250 in money or money's worth or from some profession, calling, office or trade, or from some investment, and had so derived such income and had been such residents for at least one year next before the first day of January last past, except temporary absence not exceeding four months, and that I fully believe that they have a legal right under the laws respecting the election of members of the House of Assembly to have their names placed on the list of electors for polling district No. — town of Stellarton, in the county of Pictou, in virtue of such residence and income.

(Signed) DON. GRAY, J.P.

Sworn before me at Stellarton, in the county of Pictou, this twenty-ninth day of March, A.D. 1897.

(Signed) DON. GRAY, J.P.

The following is a copy of the same affidavit when it reached the sheriff:—

I, George Gray, of Stellarton, in the county of Pictou, do swear:

1. That I have a personal knowledge of the facts herein deposed to.

2. That

JAMES BLAIR,
RICHARD DAVIS, Jr.,
REUBAN DUNBAR,

of Stellarton, in the county of Pictou, are British subjects of the full age of twenty-one years.

8. That they are residents of polling section No. 25, town of Stellarton, in the county of Pictou. That they each derive an income of at least $250 in money or money's worth or from some profession, calling, office or trade, or from some investment, and had so derived such income and had been such residents for at least one year next before the first day of January last past, except temporary absence not exceeding four months, and that I fully believe that they have a legal right under the laws respecting the election of members of the House of Assembly to have their names placed on the list of electors for polling district No. — town of Stellarton, in the county of Pictou, in virtue of such residence and income.

It is the very same that I have read with this addition :

That due application to add their names to the list of electors of section N. 25, Stellarton, was made to the revisers thereof, and was duly heard and considered by said revisers, and refused by them.

That was added to this declaration, a matter which made the declaration of some value, as it would not have been of any value if that had not been added. By that being added, the declaration was made to conform with the law, the law saying that these appeals can be taken to the sheriff when it has been shown that they have been before the revisers. Therefore, in order to make the sheriff take any cognizance whatever of these appeals, it was necessary that the section which was added to that affidavit should be placed in that declaration so that it could be a valuable declaration for the purpose.

J. Sim Harris, High Sheriff ; Donald Gray, J.P. ; George Gray and C. E. Tanner were called by the prosecution. Mr. McDonald gave evidence in his own behalf. The full evidence is as follows.

This is the evidence of Mr. McDonald, the accused, with reference to that, and in justice to him I think it will be necessary, although I do not relish the job, to read the whole of it, because I do not believe in reading a portion of anything and leaving out the rest, I do not believe in suppressing the truth in any way.

And this deponent, J. S. Harris, upon his oath, saith as follows :—

I am sheriff of the county of Pictou and was at my office in the month of March last for the purpose of hearing appeals from revisers, Franchise Act, Nova Scotia. I received affidavits made by Geo. Gray, of Stellarton (document produced). These names were added upon these affidavits. These affidavits are in same condition as when I received them. When brought to me by Mr. McKay's clerk in E. M. McDonald's office. His name is James McKay, I think, clerk in McDonald & Ives' office. Received affidavits about or very near 6 o'clock in the evening of 31st March. There were 20 or 30 others. I received them with a number of others, among the last. Sometime about 25th March was taking evidence,—sworn testimony of people coming before me, and it took quite a lot of time to get through with it that way, as there was quite a lot of names to be added to the list.

Mr. Tanner, who appeared for Conservatives, proposed, as he and Mr. McDonald had to go to the country to canvass, that I would receive affidavits. It was understood they were to be in accordance with law. Agreement was they would not object to affidavit from either side if regular. They were not coming back again. It was an agreement which suited me very well, as I was busy conducting it. More or less of Mr. McDonald's handwriting goes through my hands. Admitted (by Mr. McDonald's counsel) that clause in each of affidavits is in handwriting of Mr. McDonald.

(Sgd.) J. SIM HARRIS.

And this deponent, Donald Gray, upon his oath, saith as follows :—

I reside in Stellarton,—J.P., Pictou—stipendiary town of Stellarton. Document sworn to before me by George Gray in the court-house at Stellarton. That clause was not in at the time they were sworn to. No other alteration made. Clause in handwriting of Mr. E. M. McDonald not in at time of being sworn to.

(Sgd.) DONALD GRAY.

There is the man before whom the declaration was signed testifying that this clause was not in the declaration when it was signed ; but when it came before him the clause which made it a valuable document appeared therein, and the handwriting of the clause was acknowledged to be the handwriting of Mr. McDonald :

And the deponent, George Gray, upon his oath, saith as follows :—

I am the George Gray who made the affidavit. (Letter produced.) I mailed that to Mr. McDonald. (Marked J. R., No. 4.) Produced under notice. (A marked J. R.) I received a reply, but have not got it. I cannot find it. I searched diligently but failed to find it. About the 23rd of March, two days after the close of revisers' court, a number of my friends in Stellarton interviewed me and expressed regret that they found their names were not on electoral roll. They informed me they had been told that by an application to the sheriff they could have their names added. None of them had applied to the revisers. I made inquiry as to whether this was correct or not,—not having applied to revisers,—of several parties whom I supposed would be likely to know. The opinion I got was,—no two agreed. Some thought they could, others not unless applied to revisers. In order to settle the matter, I said I would send their names to Mr. E. M. McDonald, which I did accordingly, expecting if they could be put on he would attend to it. I received a reply—I think the following mail—stating unless applied to revisers they could not be put on.

I then told these parties they were misinformed and could not have their names added. The impression on my mind was I had written to Mr. McDonald, but I failed to find any record that I had done so. I dropped the correspondence at that time, and on the 27th, Saturday, in conversation with Mr. McDonald by the telephone,—in reference to a private matter,—he said something about sending forms to me. On the following Monday, when I came to the office, I found there an envelope from Mr. McDonald's office containing blank forms. These affidavits are some of them. He said (blank forms marked F. R. No. 5) to get the parties to fill up the affidavits properly and return them to him by noon on Monday. I filled up these affidavits, as many of the parties lived a distance away. I could not write them all in time to return them, so I selected ten of whom I was sure, and returned them. I am accountant in Acadia office, and know of their affairs sufficiently well to make the declaration, and filled them up, as they were, with the exception of the clause in Mr. McDonald's handwriting. I did not authorize any one to insert it. On Saturday night, 17th April, I first had knowledge this clause was inserted. The statement is not true, so far as I know. I appeared before revisers with other names, but these names were not among them. I am not aware those were before the reviser, although I heard repeatedly one had applied and been refused. On Saturday, 17th April, about 10 p.m., when I became aware that clause was in the affidavits, I immediately wrote to Mr. McDonald and the sheriff. In my letter to Mr. McDonald I stated the like was the case, that the clause was in the affidavit which was not there when I signed them. I mailed affidavits on 29th March, Monday. They would get the letter I wrote 17th of April on Monday, 19th of April. I should say about ten o'clock that morning of the 19th, Mr. McDonald called me up by telephone. He said he was much surprised to learn from Mr. Tanner there had been a mistake about adding these names, and he asked me if I would kindly see the parties, and have them not to go to the booth to vote, as they were not entitled to it. This I done. He seemed to be very much exercised and surprised about it. He said the clause was entirely a mistake. He assumed the responsibility. He said, "You have nothing to do with it," or words to that effect.

Cross-examined.—I have added hundreds of names for both parties. I remember two particular occasions in which I added names when the Dominion Franchise Act first came into force. (Objected to by Mr. McGillivray.) I, in company with another official of our office, made application for hundreds of names, irrespective of party. I also added a number when the local franchise was extended to house and income. I notified these men not to vote. I think I can safely say they did not. My reason is, I was presiding officer where five of the men should vote, and they did not vote, and the presiding officer where the others should vote told me they did not vote.

To Mr. McGillivray,—I was informed by John McQuarrie and W. G. Miller, on the 17th April, they—produced a copy of the affidavits—this was the time I discovered this clause. That is what induced me to write Mr. McDonald and the sheriff. After that Mr. McDonald requested me to get the men not to vote. Sheriff did not request me to get the men not to vote.

(Sgd.) GEO. GRAY.

And this deponent, Angus McKay, upon his oath, saith as follows:—

I live at Stellarton. I was one of the revisers last year for section 25. Joseph Clish and Duncan H. Gillis were the others. Admitted none of these parties named in affidavit, had applied to revisers or had these cases considered,—witness—say this is correct.

And this deponent, Edward M. McDonald, upon his oath, saith as follows:—

I had very little to do with the revision of the lists, much less than usual—and not until sheriff began to hold his court. Then our friends from different part of the county communicated with me in regard to getting their names on. The general opinion seemed to be that they could get their names on, even although had not been before the revisers. I was, therefore, particular to tell people who applied to me, that unless application had been made to revisers they could not be considered by the sheriff. When I received the letter, No. 4, from Mr. Gray, on the 24th of March, I was writing him some private business, and I stated to Mr. Gray if these names had not been before the revisers and considered by them they could not be considered by the sheriff. At the date of writing him, 24th March, I presumed that any names added by the sheriff would have to appear before him and give evidence. That had always been the course adopted. I may say I know none of these parties named by Mr. Gray. I knew fewer men in Stellarton than anywhere else in the county, speaking generally. To this letter I wrote Mr. Gray. I received no reply whatever. No information of any kind as to whether these names had been before the revisers. On the 25th and 26th I was away from home. Passing through Stellarton, I met some of my political friends at station. Some mentioned to me two Conservative revisers in Stellarton had left names of our friends off. No specific names were mentioned, but I heard these complaints from two or three people. I was very much preoccupied. Engaged with other matters. On 27th, Saturday, Mr. Gray was speaking to me over the telephone. I told him I would send him up some forms, so that if any names in Stellarton that could be put on could have the declaration made. The agreement of the sheriff spoke of had been made in the meantime. (Forms shown.) I may say three kinds of forms,—these two and some type-written especially for sheriff's court. I did not myself inclose forms to Mr. Gray on Saturday. Mr. Tanner and I were before the sheriff. I left the office at noon for an engagement. I told boy in office to send election forms to Mr. Gray. I see he inclosed a form of William McDonald, of Blue Mountains, which has not been filled. I paid very little attention to it on account of other pressing matters. On Monday afternoon, 29th, while busy in the office, I received forms from several people. Some from eastern part of county. Quite a collection of forms. These I had just received I placed with them. Monday night not in office. Tuesday morning I was away from home. Tuesday afternoon I was about the street. Tuesday evening I was at a political meeting in Pictou, and had nothing to do with the lists. Wednesday morning I was very busy, and what I might call an exciting day with me. It was the day of the Liberal convention. I had not decided then whether to accept, if nominated, to contest the county. I was a little late in reaching the office that morning. Arrived about ten o'clock. When getting there my office was filled with people from various parts of the county, who desired to see me on various matters; patronage, political and private business, and so on. I may say the crowd kept the same until time to go to the convention, at two o'clock. I could not take time to get my lunch. Among the people there were several who wanted to see about getting names on the list, mostly from West Pictou, western part of the county. Several I told, having discovered they had not been before the revisers, they could not get their names on. Others I told to come back later on and I would endeavour to have papers completed for them. I found I would not have time to do so without being interrupted, and I got filling them up, while talking to the people who were in. I found on Wednesday morning the only forms remaining were those long ones and other printed ones, and the result was that in those printed forms I had to fill in the clause for them. A great number of forms there I had not sent to the sheriff. I have no conscious recollection of filling in those papers that appear to be in my handwriting. I must have done so during the confusion and hurry, and trying to do two things at once, as the clauses in one contains a very indistinct statement. Also, in looking at the papers in sheriff's office, I saw a great many discrepancies in papers. I was unable to go to lunch that day. Leaving those papers uncompleted and telling my partner in some of them to see they were looked after. I was at convention till five, when by accident I went to office with a gentleman on business. I noticed all those forms had not been sent to the sheriff. I told Mr. McKay to take them to the sheriff, and then I came to New Glasgow. That was the last day, 31st March, I had no time to look over them, owing to circumstances, and they were taken up by clerk without my inspection. I may say I heard nothing in regard to these names until Saturday before election. My friend, Mr. Tanner, came to me and said some mistake about these names that had been put on in Stellarton. He said the revisers there had made a declaration, in which they said the names had been put on without going before them. I said to him, if that was so I would see those persons would not vote. I expressed my regret and surprise that anything had been wrong. Mr. Tanner left me. I heard in Westville Mr. Gray was coming out there that night. I could not meet him. He left for home. I went to Pictou that night, and went to office very early Monday morning, about nine o'clock, and called up Mr. Gray. He had not come to office. I did not know then about affidavits. Before getting him on the telephone, I received his letter there. I learned about additions to affidavits for the first time, and then conversation with him was practically what he says took place. I told him at all hazards to see these men would not vote. I met Mr. Tanner on the street, and told him I instructed my friends in Stellarton to see those men should not vote. I say it would be impossible for me to do this thing, as owing to my intimacy with Mr. Tanner, extending over nine years, we can rely on each other. I would not wilfully break my word with him, and also that I had instructed my friends in the matter. To the contrary, the moment I found any mistake was made, I took the earliest and most complete precautions to see we would not profit by it. On that morning I had to fill in similar applications. All the papers, including the papers in question, were piled on my desk. I can't tell how many. Sheriff told me thirty-five or thirty-seven in all, in this pile on my desk.

Cross-examined.—Some were signed by myself. None had the clause complained of without being written in. It might have been that some of them I had sworn to myself, and thus would write clause myself afterwards. If your mind was thoroughly occupied a mistake might be made. I can't say what must have been done. I have no recollection of it. I can't say how it was done. Ordinarily, a person writing, they would have to write with his hand over them. A person might do so unconsciously. Three lines written in. I may have or not written them consecutively. Affidavits before sheriff are not according to statutes. It was arrangement between Mr. Tanner and me. Sheriff, say on 25th, I presumed, through not hearing from Mr. Gray, the men had been before the revisers, or until I saw Mr. Tanner, who had the declarations from the revisers. I presumed Gray would not have sent the affidavits unless they were not true. I had no presumption on that point, as I do not recollect of looking up the affidavit.

(Sgd.) E. M. McDONALD.

That is the evidence in full of Mr. McDonald with respect to that matter. Briefly summed up the case is this. A local election was on. Lists were being prepared on which to run that election. Parties had been before the revisers, the revisers were making up their lists, appeals were being made to the sheriff and in order to make appeals to the sheriff that would be considered by him, it was necessary to put in the declaration of appeal, that the parties whose names it was sought to be put on the list by the sheriff had already been before the reviser and had already been refused. These declarations had been made, some by one party and some by another, but in all of them, when the declarations were signed and attested to, they were without the vital clause. But when they came before the sheriff the vital clause was in, and so the sheriff went to work and put the names on. This shows the distinction between the working of the two Franchise Acts; the one being under the revising barrister in the Dominion Act, and the other being a partisan sheriff under the local Act, not understanding the law, but doing just exactly what the party heelers would tell him. The sheriff put these names upon the list, and when the election came on, behold, these names that had no right in the world to be there, were upon the list. If it had not been so carefully looked after by the Conservatives in the district, it would have escaped notice altogether, and thereby the great fraud which had been perpetrated would have been carried into effect, and these men who had no right to vote would have voted. This fraud, however, was immediately brought home to Mr. McDonald, and he at once saw the trap that he was in, and in order to calm down the feelings, as it were, of the Conservatives, he went to these parties who, so far as the lists were concerned had a perfect right to vote, and got them to abstain from voting. I bring these matters forward, not for the purpose of parading these delinquencies of people before the country, but for the good purpose of meeting the charges that hon. gentlemen supporting the Government have made time and again about the iniquities of the revising barristers, when they do not dare to mention one single act of iniquity on the part of these revising barristers. I have shown you, Mr. Speaker, acts of the greatest iniquity perpetrated by the local revisers, not only in the county of Annapolis, but also in the county of Pictou, and I know perfectly that there are many hon. gentlemen here who have experienced similar cases to these. Therefore, I say that this Bill is opening the avenue to impropriety, to fraud, to forgery and to perjury, whereas under the revision in the Dominion Franchise Act all that is largely guarded against. There is not the slightest doubt that fraud prevails everywhere; I believe every individual is tarred with the same old stick that tarred Adam, but it is proper for this Parliament to place such safeguards in our laws as will keep down the old Adam, and prevent these frauds and iniquities to a great extent. The present Bill does not provide for these safeguards, and therefore I say that the Dominion Franchise Act is in that regard far in advance of the Bill before the House. The present Dominion Franchise Act could have been amended in a great many ways and it could have been made workable. It was workable, the people were understanding it; the revisions were being made with very little expense; the greatest expense was entailed by the salaries of the judges and the revising barristers, and these could have been easily kept down by amending the Act. Had Sir John Thompson gone on with his Bill, he would have been pressed to adopt an amendment something like the following, in order to have made that Franchise Act less expensive. This is an amendment that would have been proposed :

Mr. MILLS.

AN ACT TO AMEND THE ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT.

Be it enacted by the Governor General, the Senate and House of Commons, as follows :—

Subsection 1 of section 15 of the said Act is repealed and the following is substituted therefor :—

15. Between the first day of June and the first day of July in each year the revising officer shall cause the list of voters to be compared with the last assessment rolls and with all the information that he can obtain from that source, and from any provincial, municipal and other official lists, records and proceedings, shall prepare two supplementary lists, one to be entitled "Names proposed to be added and corrections to be made," in like form as the original lists, being form B in the schedule to this Act, except that the heading or title thereof shall be briefly "Revision of Voters' Lists—189—: Names proposed to be added, polling district No. — (giving number and local designation, if any)," and also that the list of post offices with their reference numbers, geographical description of polling district, and explanation of abbreviations shall not be repeated therein. But amendments in or additions to the list of post offices, and reference numbers, shall be noted thus: List of post offices, with their reference numbers as in the original list (to be amended as follows), and the other list in the following form, which shall be designated Form I :—

FORM I.

Revision of Voters' Lists, 189—. Names proposed to be removed. Polling district No. — (giving number and local designation, if any). Names in full (No. of voters on last revised list). Cause of Removal.
Abbreviations—C—Ceased to be qualified; D—Dead; Tr.—Transferred.

.....(Signature)
Revising Officer.

(Dated) July 189..

Subsection 2 of the said section is amended by striking from line 3 the word "are" between the word "Act" and the word "entitled" and substituting therefor the words "seem to him to be prima facie."

Subsection 3 is amended by inserting between the word "Act" and the word "according" in the third line thereof, the words "in his opinion."

Subsections 5 and 6 are repeated.

Section 17 is amended by striking out from line 2 thereof the words "and certified," and from lines 8 and 9 the words "on which shall be shown the names removed as hereinbefore provided."

Subsection 1 of section 19 is amended by striking out the word "five" in the second line thereof, and substituting the word "six."

Subsection 2 of section 19 is amended by striking from the second and third lines thereof the words "or either of the supplementary lists," and by striking out from the 10th and 11th lines thereof the words "or on the supplementary list containing the names proposed to be added," and by adding to said section the words "but no such notice shall be necessary in the case of any whose name is on the list of names proposed to be added or removed provided for by section 15, as hereby amended."

Subsection 4 of section 20 is amended by striking from the 2nd line thereof the words "or supplementary list."

Subsection 6 of section 21 is amended by striking from the 4th line thereof the word "December" and substituting therefor the word "October."

Form C in the schedule shall be amended by striking out from the 10th and 11th lines thereof the words "or on the supplementary list relating thereto," and from line 22 the words "or on the supplementary list," and by adding thereto the words "the original list, and lists of names which the revising officer proposed of his own motion to add and strike off respectively are herewith posted up and exhibited."

If that amendment had been made to the original Act, it would have made the Act very workable. The matter has received considerable attention, not only by myself, but by a gentleman who has spent considerable time in studying the Franchise Act, and who prepared the best amendment possible to make the revision of the preliminary lists workable. Now, there is a uniformity in the present Act which the Bill before the House does not contain. In fact, the hon. Solicitor General in so many words admitted its lack of uniformity. He admitted it thoroughly and emphatically. But the matter of uniformity is something in which we are all interested. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) was very particular about uniformity in his Bill (No. 39), which was before the committee to-day. He gives it as the only excuse for bringing that Bill before the House that it provides for uniformity. These are his words :

I frankly admit that the only ground on which the change was made, and it was made on the very urgent representation of the present chairman of the board, who believed that his presence at the different examinations would ensure uniformity, which the present system does not.

So that uniformity has been considered by the Government in that case, and it should be considered in this; but what is the reason it is not considered? Because the exigencies of the case did not permit of its being considered. Because partisan exigencies overrule all other considerations in this matter, but did not affect the Bill of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Now, what are some of the incongruities of the provincial Acts? In the addenda to the Bill we have set out the different qualifications of voters in the different provinces. There is quite a distinction between the franchise and the disqualifications. The franchise is one thing, and the disqualifications are quite another thing. The franchise provides what names shall be placed on the list; the disqualifications disqualify certain persons whose names are on the list from voting. That is a very important distinction to keep in mind. One of the grossest incongruities exists in the province of Nova Scotia. In that province we have a new Franchise Act, which is largely upon the line of the present Dominion Act. There is very little difference between the two, the difference being merely with regard to income voters. In the local Act income voters must have an income of $250, while in the Dominion Act the amount is $300. I think that is the only difference, so far as the franchise is concerned. But there is a disqualification clause which makes the Nova Scotia Act most obnoxious. The hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) tells us that that does not come within the present Bill. Well, either the hon. member wishes to misrepresent the facts to this House or he has never read the Bill, or he does not understand the Queen's English—one of the three; because it is a fact that the disqualification clause of the Nova Scotia Act is within the four corners of this Bill. The fifth clause of the Bill says:

For the purposes of any Dominion election held within the limits of a province, except as hereinafter otherwise provided, the qualifications necessary to entitle any person to vote thereat shall be those established by the laws of that province as necessary to entitle such person to vote in the same part of the province at a provincial election.

It goes on further to say that the provincial voters' lists shall be adopted. If it had simply said that and nothing more, then I would say that the hon. member for Yarmouth was right; but it does not stop there, but brings in the disqualifying clause of the Nova Scotia Act. Now, what is this disqualifying clause? It is set forth in the addenda to this Bill. It is this:

Revised Statutes, chap. 4, sec. 67.

Any one who within fifteen days before the election was an employee, or in the receipt of wages or emoluments of any kind as such employee, in the post office, the customs house, the Inland Revenue Department, the lighthouse service, on the Government railroads, in the Crown Lands Office, or the local public works or mines, but nothing in section to extend to contractors to furnish materials for Government railroads, or to perform any other specific contract in respect of the same, or to any person who may have been employed by the day temporarily to repair railroads, or to any postmaster, post office keeper, way office keeper or mail courier.

Mr. MILLS.

That is the disqualifying clause, which is, I contend, the greatest blot that can possibly be put upon the law book of any province. When was that enacted? It was enacted in 1871. Some hon. gentlemen who support the Government say that it was a manly and fair thing and a proper thing under the circumstances to do, and the hon. Minister of Finance got up in his place the other night and said he was proud of it. First he said that he had nothing to do with placing it upon the Statute-book, but that it belonged to some of the hon. gentlemen on this side. To be sure, in 1871 the hon. Finance Minister was writing in the office of the Halifax "Chronicle," a paper supporting the party that put this most obnoxious law upon the Statute-book, and consequently he, as a legislator, had nothing whatever to do with it. But he had to do with it afterwards, and he not only retained it, but supported it, and the very same ideas that permeated the hearts and the breasts of the men who had placed that Act upon the statute-book in 1871 were handed down in succession to the present Finance Minister, who was then the Premier of Nova Scotia, and caused him not only to retain that most obnoxious law but to defend it. This matter was brought up in 1871, in the province of Nova Scotia, by a Bill to secure the independence of the House of Assembly. I want you, Mr. Speaker, to distinctly understand that there is quite a difference between this Bill and the Franchise Act of Nova Scotia. They are two different things altogether. Mr. Purdy, a Conservative member at that time, said:

That the Bill was one which would strike down a very large number of respectable people in his county. He had yet to hear the first argument to show that it was criminal to be appointed by any Government to carry out the laws of the country, or that such an appointment should be a reason for disfranchising men who were born with the inherent rights of citizens. It was recognized by our laws that if a man held a certain amount of property he was entitled to vote, and he did not know upon what principle the Government intended to disfranchise such voters, because they discharged the duties devolving upon them under a law legally and properly passed. It was due to the House that the Government should explain why they sought to disfranchise decent, respectable, honest men for no other reason than that they were employed by a Government, which was recognized by the House and country. If it was the case that this province did not recognize Dominion laws, there might be good reason for disfranchising the servants of the Dominion Government.

What do you suppose the Attorney General of that day stated was the reason this Act should be placed on the Statute-book. He said:

The simple reason for passing the present Bill was that the servant was always under the authority of his master. The man who paid another wages had a right to control his actions as a general rule, and this applied more particularly to persons in subordinate situations, such as the officers in the customs-house and railway departments and the other departments mentioned in the Bill. It was for the protection of those men that the Act was passed. It was assumed those men were Nova Scotians, and would not wish to be driven to the hustings to vote for Canadian interests against the interests of their own country. The Bill was intended to protect them from the tyranny of their masters. When the hon. member for Cumberland came into the House, he was the greatest anti-Confederate in the country. He could not live under Canadian thralldom, and it nearly broke his heart during the first session. He was not now so badly affected towards Canada after all. He had received an office under Canada.

Perhaps some hon. gentlemen who were so thoroughly imbued with those ideas which were handed down to them in 1882, 1883 and 1886, having since accepted office under Canada, are not so imbued with the ideas they entertained in those years. The Attorney General of that day continued :

That hon. gentleman would now be very sorry to vote against the Canadian Government, because it would take away his own employment.

Think of the Attorney General in the legislature of Nova Scotia talking about Canada as if it were a foreign country. He then went on to say :

The power of taxing this country had been given to the Canadians, and so far as taxation was concerned the people of this country were absolutely helpless. The only liberty left to this country was what was left to this legislature in the regulating of the local affairs of the province. It was not a very extensive power, but was all the more dear on that account.

Therefore, it was in the interest of the country that this House should be swept clear of all Canadian influence. Before the session closed such laws should be passed that every person who had the smell of Canada upon him would be excluded from this House. The members of this House would be taught that they could not serve two masters.

Those were the feelings and the sentiments under which this bastard—because it was a prostitution of the best sentiments of patriotic men—law was placed upon the statute-book of the province of Nova Scotia. Mr. Townsend, who is now Judge Townsend of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, rose in his place and did his best to prevent the passage of this Act, but the Government had a majority in the House and they passed the Bill. Here is another quotation which I shall read in order to show the feeling that prevailed then :

Now we are striving to shield ourselves against a power that is ruling us with a rod of iron, that refused to deal fairly with us financially or otherwise, and makes appointments at variance with our ideas. In adopting this measure we are therefore only carrying out what the people sent us here in 1867 to mature. We were sent here in 1867 to legislate on pure anti-Confederate principles, and to show that the people were dissatisfied at the revenues being transferred to the Canadian Government. We are, therefore, in 1871, but carrying out these principles to the full extent.

But they were not all of that stripe, they were not all of that opinion in 1871 and 1872 in Nova Scotia. After that Bill was passed, on came the elections of 1872, and the people saw the iniquity that was worked by reason of the passage of that Act. Batches of three hundred and four hundred in each county were stopped from going to the polls and voting at the local elections in 1872, and when the House met in that year of course there was great indignation. Mr. Allison, the member for Hants, in the local at that time, and who sat in this House in 1886, moved the second reading of a Bill for the repeal of the obnoxious law. Mr. Flynn, member for Halifax, moved that the Bill be deferred for three months. In other words, he moved for three months hoist. I shall just read what Mr. Blanchard said—the Hon. Hiram Blanchard, a bluff, hearty, genial, patriotic gentleman, a man whose heart was as warm as his intentions were honest. He said :

That the Attorney General should have himself refrained from attributing motives when he complained so strongly of want of charity in the Opposition.

Mr. Blanchard was opposing the three months hoist to this Bill for the repeal of this obnoxious Act.

No party, unless they were "deceived and seduced by the instigation of the devil," would have put such an Act on the Statute-book with a view to taking away the franchise from men as good as any who sat in the House. He believed the Act to be a cunningly devised contrivance to let officials who were favourable to the Government vote, and to take the franchise from those who were unfriendly to them. Why were the inspectors of fisheries and the takers of the census omitted from the statute? Because the Dominion Government were soft enough to allow the members hostile to them in this country to nominate their own creatures to those offices.

And I call the attention of the right hon. leader of the Opposition to this matter, because he was thoroughly conversant with those things at that time, and I rather think that he was instrumental in allowing some of these men to appoint their own officials, even in the county of Annapolis, at that time against the wishes of the good Liberal-Conservatives and patriotic Tories of that day.

An effort was made to repeal this Bill in 1882. I refer to this not because I wish to lengthen this debate, but because the question has been thrown across the floor: Why did not you repeal the Act when you were in power, because you have been in power since 1871? In 1882, Mr. Blair moved the second reading of a Bill to repeal chapter 3 of the Acts of 1871 and chapter 15 of the Acts of 1872, which Acts had disfranchised Dominion officials. He was opposed by Mr. Campbell and Mr. Kenny, of Yarmouth, and was supported by Mr.

Townsend, now Judge Townsend, and also by Mr. Pugh, of Halifax. The motion for the second reading of the Bill was then put and carried, 28 for and 7 against. I am reading from the "Debates of the Assembly and the Council of the Province of Nova Scotia." But there was a legislative council in which there was a large Liberal majority. The Bill was sent to the legislative council, but was there thrown out, and these Acts were not taken from the Statute-book where they remain to this day.

Now, what were the feelings of the people who placed those Acts upon the Statute-book? They were feelings hostile to the best interests of this country; they were feelings of anti-federalism; they were feelings of secession; they were feelings of rebellion; they were feelings that could not animate the breast of any patriotic man. And those feelings were kept alive down to the time when the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) became Premier of the Government of Nova Scotia. He saw this feeling among the people and went one better. He not only agitated against these Dominion officials, but he even ran an election in 1886 upon the issue of repeal. He came before the country and said: It is time that we should break from our thralldom, that we should cut ourselves free from Canada, that Nova Scotia should be alone as she used to be. They went to the country in 1886 and carried the province on the repeal cry. That was about the time I came into politics. I battled against that cry in every way I possibly could and I am on record as holding that repeal cry in contempt. But Mr. Fielding, then Prime Minister of Nova Scotia, now Minister of Finance of this Dominion, saw fit to run the election upon that question. And not only that, but they came before the country in 1887, when the Dominion elections were run and that was the real issue before the country at that time. In order to give you an idea of what the Prime Minister of Nova Scotia of that day, now the Minister of Finance of the Dominion, thought in 1886, here is an extract from the speech that he made in the county of Annapolis in June, 1886:

I believe that the people in Nova Scotia are in favour of separation from the Dominion of Canada. I believe they were in favour of it in June last.

The 16th June was the day they ran the local election and ran it on the issue of repeal.

I believe they were in favour of it on the 16th June last, because many a man who took little interest in it on the 15th June last and looked upon it as a hopeless question discovered that the clouds had rolled away. When the smoke of the battlefield had cleared away, and the verdict of the people was on record, that repeal was a practical work-a-day question, and many a man who was indifferent on the 15th June will not be indifferent when the next opportunity presents itself.

He and the Attorney General had come down to Annapolis and were holding meetings preparatory to the Dominion election campaign which they expected would soon take place. Again, he said:

The people are in earnest in this matter, and the politician who fails to keep faith with them will have every reason to regret that he ever came forward to take part in the agitation.

These are the words of the present Minister of Finance in 1886. The Halifax "Chronicle," which was largely controlled by the Prime Minister of Nova Scotia at that time said, in its issue of the 18th June:

At any rate the government of Nova Scotia will be untrue to their pledges if they do not fulfil, as far as constitutional methods will permit, the wishes of the people so unanimously expressed at the polls on the fifteenth. The demand for repeal must and will be placed before the Government and Parliament of Great Britain.

These were the feelings that animated the Prime Minister of Nova Scotia and his press at the time when the elections of 1887 were being brought on. So far as I was concerned, I came before the people in that election on the National Policy, pure and simple. The repeal issue was brought up, but I ignored it and held it in utter and supreme contempt and stigmatized the agitators for repeal as nothing more or less than a pack of demagogues, charlatan politicians, who were working against the best interests of Nova Scotia, and of our country, Canada, as well. I fought that cry from stump to stump with the Attorney General of Nova Scotia, with the Prime Minister of Nova Scotia to help him as occasion required. And what was the result? We had a majority in Nova Scotia, and we buried that repeal question almost in oblivion. But not so in the opinion of the present Minister of Finance. Notwithstanding the results of the election of 1887, we find him in 1888 still expressing himself on this pet idea of his. What is it? I am quoting from the Assembly Debates of 1888, page 369:

If I believed there was no possible way out of this union—

He wanted to get out of the union quick.

—I should hardly speak as I do. I do not agree with those who say that if the people express a firm determination to separate from Canada their wish cannot be accomplished.

Then referring to those who say that repeal is utterly impossible, for that is what we endeavoured to teach from every stump in the country, Mr. Fielding says:

If I entertained such ideas as that, I should not be loyal. I have no admiration for loyalty of that kind. True loyalty is founded on justice, it cannot thrive on injustice. It is because I have faith in the ability of a people to obtain justice under the British system, because I believe that the will of the people of Nova Scotia in this matter, if firmly and persistently declared, must prevail that I remain a loyal British subject and join with others in singing "God save the Queen."

That was Mr. Fielding, after 1887, after they got their quietus at the polls. And we have the father of repeal, James A. Frasier, counting noses after 1887. And who does he count among the repeal candidates who ran in the Dominion elections in 1887? This is what Mr. Frasier said with reference to that :

One Liberal was elected in the province of Nova Scotia who was not a repealer.

That was Mr. Flynn, of Richmond, who was elected in 1887.

On the other hand we lost as repealers, Messrs. Ray, of Annapolis, Mackay, of Queen's, Currie, of Windsor, and Fuller, of Halifax, most of them by very small majorities, so small that we take it for granted that in the coming fight, whenever that comes, sooner or later we are going to win all these counties. Then we get the following repealers :—Lovitt—

The present Senator Lovitt in the other House.

—Eisenhaur,—

Who sat in this House in 1887.

—Robertson,—

Who also sat in this House in 1887, and is now a member of Parliament in the province of Nova Scotia.

—the Hon. Mr. Jones (a voice, Borden) ; yes, Borden—I had forgotten Borden.

So the Minister of Militia and Defence was also reckoned as a repealer in 1888. So we have in this Ministry no less than two ardent repealers, who are ready and willing to go to the foot of the Throne to dismember this Canada of ours, to break up confederation, to place Nova Scotia where she was before 1867. Now, in 1888, this matter was again brought up in the House, on an attempt to repeal this obnoxious Act, because the Conservatives all down the line were determined to get rid of that Act if they possibly could. It was brought up, and Mr. Fielding again expressed himself on the floor of the House in 1888, lauding this Act. We remember that no later than the other evening the Finance Minister rose in this House and stated that he was proud of it, he was proud of what he had done in Nova Scotia with reference to disfranchising all those officials. If he was proud in Nova Scotia of disfranchising those officials, there is no doubt but he is also proud of having been an ardent repealer. Now, what did some of the other provinces do with reference to their franchise? In Prince Edward Island, after discussing how this disfranchising of Dominion officials had worked so beneficially for the Liberals in the local affairs of Nova Scotia, they also took the matter up. Mr.

Peters, the Prime Minister of Prince Edward Island in 1893, placed an Act upon the Statute-book disfranchising Dominion officials. On introducing the Act in 1893, "respecting the election of members of the legislature by providing that persons in the employment of the Government of Canada shall not be entitled to vote at elections of members of either branch of the legislature of this province," Mr. Peters, among other things, said this :

We should not brook any interference from the authorities at Ottawa.

Fighting on the lines of their co-Liberals in Nova Scotia.

If the Dominion Parliament choose to come down and say : We want to reciprocate, and take away from the local officials their voice in Dominion politics, let them come down and pass an Act and I for one will say, all right.

Therefore, we have not only one province in Canada disqualifying Dominion officials, but two provinces. These Acts and these disqualifications are incorporated in this Bill now before the House, notwithstanding the assertion of the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) to the contrary, when he told the House the other night that they could not be found within the four corners of the Bill. Now, it is absolutely necessary that we should have a complete control of our franchise. We have no control, if the provisions of this Act are carried out. I say this notwithstanding the assertion of the right hon. leader of the Government. He stated the other night, that we had perfect control from the fact that we had delegated that control to the provinces. Well, if giving away control over a matter is a control over that matter, why then we have a control over the franchise in this Bill. But this Bill gives absolute control to the local legislatures and to the municipal councils, so far as the present provisions of the Bill are concerned. There is nothing in the world to prevent any local House or any local legislature from changing the franchise as often as they please ; then, by virtue of this Bill in its present shape, it becomes the law which regulates our Dominion franchise. The franchise has not been extended to women in Canada. It may be extended to women in the province of Nova Scotia, it may be extended to women in British Columbia, it may be extended to women in any other province, and not extended in the other provinces ; in that case we would have the incongruity of a Parliament partly sent here by women and partly not. If we followed out the idea of amending this Bill so as to retain control of our franchise, I think it would be a beneficial act to this country. I do not think that Sir John Thompson had the idea that we should give up entirely our control of the franchise. He had the idea that we should still have our revision, that we should still have our judge, that we should still have revising officers, that we should still have control of the franchise so far as relates to the Federal Parliament. It should be based upon provincial lists as furnished by the municipalities in the different provinces, and based on all the other information that could be obtained by the revising officers throughout the Dominion of Canada—that was the intention of Sir John Thompson, as I gathered from conversations with him, and also from his speeches that have been recorded in "Hansard." Now, I think that the consideration of any Franchise Act is always an important duty for the country concerned. Our franchise is the fountain spring, the reservoir from which must flow the governing power of Canada, and should be put under the immediate and absolute control of this Parliament. To delegate such control to the legislative assemblies of the different provinces is a retrograde step, for which no combination of circumstances can afford a reasonable excuse. Our franchise, the great source of the people's legislative power, like those reservoirs that give nourishment, health, life and vigour to many of our towns and all our cities, should, like them, be well guarded from polluting influences, which is not, by any means, an element in the Bill before the House.

I object to this Bill, because it does not, in the carrying out of its provisions, accomplish what is claimed by the Government in the matter of expense, purity of franchise and general utility. It surrenders to the different provinces powers, duties, responsibilities and privileges which are peculiarly our own. It provides for no uniformity of franchise. It consigns the greatest safeguard of our liberty to the tender mercies of the narrow-minded, demagogic local politician and ward-heeler. It will bring into the Dominion arena, and will cause this Parliament to endorse abuses and frauds that smell to heaven in their vileness, aye, in their criminality.

After Recess.

ONTARIO AND RAINY RIVER RAILWAY COMPANY.

On the motion of Mr. Henderson (for Mr. Tisdale) that the House resolve itself into committee on Bill (No. 32) respecting the Ontario and Rainy River Company.

Mr. SPROULE. When this Bill was under consideration last Wednesday evening, I was pointing out the importance of our taking a new departure in the matter of controlling railways. I had given some history of the result which has followed our bonussing of railways in the past—giving bonuses, in the first place, to build railways in sections of the country where there were no railway facilities, and then to build other railways for the purpose of obtaining competing lines and thus reducing freight rates. I had endeavoured to show that, notwithstanding the fact that the Parliament of Canada and the Ontario legislature had subsidized many lines intended to be competing lines, in the view of securing better transportation facilities, it afterwards turned out that the competing railways and the original lines became merged under the one management, or came to an understanding with regard to freight rates, so that the people were deprived of the advantages which the Dominion and the province had made heavy sacrifices in money to obtain. We have thus reached that point when we find we are unable to give the people what they had expected in return for the expenditure of public money, and we are forced to consider what other means we should adopt, when dealing with railway charters and railway subsidies, to obtain the much-needed competition and reduction on railway rates. It has become absolutely necessary for Parliament to do something to secure the rights of the people as against the great railway corporations. I spoke also of the importance of this link, connecting, as it will, the illimitable wheat fields of the west and the great waterways of the east, traversing that section of country, extending about 434 miles, between Port Arthur and Winnipeg. This link will not only connect the eastern system of railways, as they may be reached from the waterways of Lake Superior and the other lakes, but it also will be a connecting link between the railway systems of the east and the west. I pointed to the fact that it will pass through a section of country which is not in itself an inviting field for railway construction, and through which one track was already built that had cost a great deal of money. What can be the object of building a second track, except for the purpose of giving the people in that great western country better transportation facilities than they have received from the Canadian Pacific Railway, and furnishing competition to that line? This line is also intended to enable the western farmer to reach the great waterways of Ontario and Quebec, so that, when he reaches Port Arthur, he may be able to secure the cheapest and best transportation towards the sea, either by water or other railways. For that reason, it becomes a very important link, first, because it is through a section of country through which few railways are likely to be built, and through which it is very costly to build railways; and, second, because it will be a long time before we can possibly expect another railway line through the same territory. Therefore, if we do not secure, by some amendment to this charter, to the people in perpetuity the right of other railways to run over this line and the prevention of its amalgamating with some other company, the people in the west will have to wait a long time before they will have another opportunity like the present of getting competition.

I have often heard it said, both in this House and outside, that no sooner will this road be built, than it will come under the control, if not under the name and management of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the people of the west will be just as much without competition as they are now. I am justified in believing, from the rumours I hear from time to time, that, somehow or other, the Canadian Pacific Railway will either own or control that road, and that they have, as far as possible, prevented the building of that link of railway connecting the waterways at Port Arthur with Manitoba and the west. They have prevented, as long as possible the building of that railway, and the present extension of charter which is asked, justifies me, I believe, in coming to the conclusion that it is the object of the Canadian Pacific Railway, provided the charter is passed, as proposed, to hold it seven years in the future without commencing to build the line. Why? Because the clause providing for the extension in the original draft of the Bill did not provide that the railway shall be commenced, but that it shall be finished in seven years. It had been, in the original charter, given two years to commence, but the two years passed without any beginning having been made, and now seven years have passed, and still the line is not commenced. It is true, there was a short portion built, known as the Port Arthur, Duluth and Western Railway, which will be a portion of this line; but the Rainy River road not a mile is built, although it is seven years since they got their charter.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). They only received their subsidy from the Dominion last session, which was a late session.

Mr. SPROULE. I know that; but as long ago as 1895, they received a subsidy from the provincial government of $115,000 for 35 miles.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They built 80 miles.

Mr. SPROULE. Not of this road, but of the Port Arthur, Western and Duluth. In 1895, they got $115,000 from the provincial government.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). The hon. gentleman must admit that there are two separate charters. The charter for the road running to Duluth, to which the hon. gentleman refers, is not the Rainy River charter, at all.

Mr. SPROULE. I am talking of the two combined, because the Duluth road will be a portion of this one.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). It may, or may not.

Mr. SPROULE. What does the hon. gentleman want? He is anxious to get this road built, and, when others are trying to have it built, he wants to obstruct it. I say that this road was given a provincial subsidy, in 1895, of $115,000, and in 1897 of $258,000, and in 1898, $420,000. And the other road was subsidized in 1892 for $28,000. And then, in 1897, the Dominion Government gave what will be $512,000 as a subsidy for this road. That is, they gave $3,200 a mile, if the road cost $15,000 a mile or less, but if it cost over that the subsidy would be double, which will be $6,400 a mile.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Not exactly that. The hon. member (Mr. Sproule) surely will not make a statement that way. If the cost is over $15,000 a mile, the company gets 50 per cent of the cost over that amount, but not to exceed $6,400 a mile.

Mr. SPROULE. I was going to say that this vote was not a specific one of $6,400 a mile, but from the information we have as to the cost of the road, and I think the Minister will agree with me, that from the information he has, the bonus is likely to be $6,400 a mile by reason of the cost of the road.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I should not be surprised. I think it likely that you are right.

Mr. SPROULE. If that be correct, there has been voted already for this road $1,115,000. The bonuses commenced in 1894, and now we have reached 1898 and none of the road is built yet. Now, I would ask: Does it not look as if somebody held that road in the interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway, not to build it, but to hold it back as long as possible, until Parliament will not wait longer, when they will begin construction, but go on as slowly as possible?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It is only seven months since that double subsidy or since any Dominion subsidy was voted.

Mr. SPROULE. I said it was in 1897, that is, at the last session of Parliament. At any rate a beginning has not been made. They asked in this charter seven years to finish the road, saying nothing about the beginning. And they asked under their old charter seven years and allowed that time to pass without doing anything. I am justified, therefore, in saying that they aim at the same thing in this. If they were given seven years to finish the road, saying nothing about the commencement, the people, trusting in the general Railway Act, which provides that such works shall be commenced within two years, they would not commence, but would try to keep the charter alive and the subsidy with it. Does it not look as if this road was controlled by some others who did not intend to build it as long as they could possibly hold back? And when we come to inquire who are the men who own that road, we are told they are Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann; and we know the relations that exist between Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann and the Canadian Pacific Railway, the various lines in which they are interested and the various contracts that they have carried out for the Canadian Pacific and how they work into each other's hands to serve their own purposes. All this goes to show that it is not their intention to build this road and make it, when completed, a competing line with the Canadian Pacific Railway. We, very properly I think, amended that charter in such a way as to compel them to commence the road this year, and within two years to finish eighty miles. I have no doubt that if this charter goes through, they will be compelled to make a better showing in the next couple of years than they have made in the last four or five. But even if the road is built, the people are face to face with a dilemma. Are the people in the east and the people in the west going to obtain competition through the building of this road? We are afraid they will not, and for that reason we seek to have this amendment to the charter made. I believe I am justified in giving weight to the opinion prevalent throughout the country that there is a distinct understanding between Mackenzie & Mann and the Canadian Pacific Railway to stave off the building of this road as long as possible, and, when it must be built, to manage it under one head. If so, what advantage will the people have further than the opening up of the mining country through which this road will run? The province of Manitoba paid a large sum to have competition with the Canadian Pacific Railway in the west. They got the Northern Pacific Railway in, but it did not accomplish what they wanted, because the two companies arranged their freight rates so that they are practically one. The Premier of the province is trying to get another outlet, running from the boundary of the province to meet this road, and he hopes when that is accomplished to have a competing line with the Canadian Pacific Railway from the boundary to Port Arthur, where it reaches the lake. If this is done and proper control over the freight rates secured, it is a guarantee to the producer of the west that he will have more justice done to him in the future than he has had in the past. It will be a guarantee to the manufacturers and shippers of the east they will have competition in these two lines, and so have better terms in the transportation of goods. But that can be secured only by inserting in this charter a clause to compel them to give running powers to other roads. The only available road so far as I know, is the Grand Trunk. If you keep this road independent from Port Arthur to Winnipeg, you leave it open to every road in the older provinces that can reach the lakes. Then, in the west the building of railways is comparatively cheap, and we already have several roads built there which, if connected, would make practically a through line by which communication could be carried entirely independent of both the Canadian Pacific and the Northern Pacific in that country.

If that be the case, it becomes all the more important for us to guarantee to the people the right to use this railway. Suppose Mr. Greenway succeeds in what he is doing. I saw an intimation the other day in the "Globe" that he expected to announce in the forthcoming session of the Manitoba legislature that he had made a contract for a railway extending from Winnipeg to the boundary line, and he intended it to connect with this line of railway to Port Arthur, he intends to have a very cheap freight rate. I forget the exact figures, but I think he intends to secure and believes he can secure a freight rate of 10 cents per cwt. on grain between Winnipeg and Port Arthur and other rates equally cheap. If that be the case, one can understand how his efforts will be entirely nullified if this railway is left uncontrolled to such an extent that it may be under the wing of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and so Mr. Greenway cannot take advantage of it. And so, what I have held with regard to this Bill is that it should be kept back until an announcement is made in the Manitoba legislature as to this matter. Then, if Mr. Greenway is able to secure cheap freight rates such as he has intimated he could secure, we should be justified in prescribing about the same rates in this Bill and keep this road open so as to secure competition for all time in this link of railway. This done, we shall have done more than we have ever done before in securing the rights of the people in connection with a great railway.

It is for that reason that this amendment is proposed. To my mind, it is an important one. As I said before, we are justified in controlling railway charters to that extent because our efforts in the past have signally failed in securing to the people the rights which we thought they were entitled to, in view of the great expenditure of money belonging to the people that we make to railways every year. I say we have failed hitherto, and therefore we are entitled to devise some new way by which we can secure to the people not only competition in railway lines, but fair freight rates, and also the right of the Government to control these freight rates. It is proposed that this railway should be, comparatively speaking, an independent link, or that we should tack on an amendment similar to that which we tacked on to the Crow's Nest Pass Railway charter. I do not think the Canadian Pacific Railway would object to it, I am quite sure the Grand Trunk Railway hopes to use that line in the future, if it is available. I do not think that any other railway corporation that intends to reach either the lakes in the east or Manitoba in the west, would object to it. This amendment provides :

That running powers over the said railway and all its branches and connections, or any portions thereof, and all lines of railway now hereafter owned or leased by or operated on account of the company between Lake Superior and the city of Winnipeg, and the necessary use of its tracks, stations and station grounds, are hereby expressly conferred on the Grand Trunk Railway, the Canadian Government Railway System, the Canadian Pacific Railway, or any other road designated by the Railway Committee of the Privy Council or the Parliament of Canada, upon such terms as such Committee or the Parliament of Canada may determine, and according to the provisions of the Railway Act, and of such other general Acts relating to railways as are from time to time passed by Parliament, but nothing herein shall be held to imply that such running powers might not be so granted without the special provisions herein contained.

That so soon as the said railway or any portion of it is opened for traffic, the rates and tolls on the railway, and on any other railway or steamers used in connection therewith and now or hereafter owned or leased by or operated on account of the company, shall be first approved by the Governor in Council, or by a railway commission, if and when such commission is established by law, and shall at all times thereafter and from time to time be subject to revision and control in the manner aforesaid.

Now, that may appear to some harsh, but the Canadian Pacific Railway allowed that to be tacked on to their Bill for the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, and I have the authority for saying so of Sir William Van Horne, who said in the committee the other day that, as he understood it, it gave the Government the right to control freight rates on every portion of their railway system. I think that is a very important admission. It was an important admission to this extent, because I think the Government felt that they have no right to interfere with the freight rates of the Canadian Pacific Railway until their earnings show that they are realizing 10 per cent or more upon the money invested in building that railway. But saying nothing about this 10 per cent, Sir William Van Horne admitted that the Government, by that clause, had taken to themselves the right to control freight rates. I say there cannot be any serious objection to taking that right here, if it applies to that great railway system, there cannot be any serious objection to tacking it on to this road, that is only a short road, but a very important connecting link. Then, I say they cannot object to it, even if we go further, and specify what the freight rates should be. If Mr. Greenway succeeds in securing connection with the road in the west where he specifies freight rates over the same ground—because this must be a portion of that line—I say, then, this House is justified in passing this amendment. But while I would not like to go quite so far as the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), and say just exactly what the freight rates should be, or that the passenger rate should be 2 cents a mile, still I think that the other requirements might fairly be made upon them, and this amendment which it is proposed to make to the Bill, ought to be adopted by this House. In view of these things, I support it. I think this Parliament ought to support it, I think the Minister of Railways and Canals ought to support it, and what is more, I think before we pass this Bill, he ought to tell us that he is prepared to assist in granting this charter in such a way as to prevent the possibility of that link of railway coming either under the control of the Canadian Pacific Railway, or under the control of men who are interested in the management of that railway. I think he should do that in the interest of this country and for the information of this House. I hope this amendment will be adopted by the House. I know that the country expects it. I know if we allow this, our golden opportunity to pass away, it may be a long time before we can have another chance to secure in perpetuity competition to the people of that great western country as well as to those who use the line from this end in sending goods out there. It will be a long time before we can have the advantage which we can secure in this charter to-day. If we are giving so much money for it, that is a stronger ground why we should exercise the greater control over it, and why we should keep it independent. Then, I believe the time has arrived when we ought to tack on to every railway charter that comes before this House, some provision that every railway company that requires to use or run cars over such railway, should have the privilege of doing so. If the traffic becomes so great that it is necessary to build another line, they can easily double-track the road. But why should the country go to the expense of building two roads at a cost of $25,000 a mile for each, if the track for one will carry all the traffic that is taken over the two? Why not save the extra cost of building one road and secure the right of passing over the one? Then, if the traffic becomes too great for one road, it would be cheaper to double-track one line and use the two tracks than to build two lines. But by building two lines, unless we pass this amendment, we do not secure competition, we do not secure the right to other railways, that may reach either end of this line, to run their cars, their freight and their passenger travel over that road as they ought to have. This, I think, we ought to secure, and I for one am in favour of it. I ask this House to pass this amendment for that special purpose, and let us show to the railway corporations of this country that while we grant them great powers and give them large subsidies to build lines for the accommodation and convenience of the people, we cannot afford to allow them to control the rates just as they like after these lines are built, but that we take to ourselves such powers as are desirable and necessary in the interest of the great transporting people to use those railways after they are built.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hour for private Bills having expired, we will now proceed to the consideration of the motion for the second reading of the Franchise Bill.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fitzpatrick for second reading of Bill (No. 16), to repeal the Electoral Franchise Act and to further amend the Dominion Elections Act.

Mr. McNEILL. I shall take up the time of the House but for a few minutes in the observations which I am about to make on this measure. I may be allowed perhaps to say, in the first place, that it is gratifying to any one who was present and who took part in the prolonged and acrimonious debates upon the Franchise Bill of 1885, to find that the leaders on both sides of the House on this occasion have approached this discussion in so friendly and judicial a spirit as they have evinced. The subject with which we are dealing, Mr. Speaker, is one which is not only of the first importance to the country, but it is one which affects the individual rights of members of this House, and it affects those rights in a manner as to which members are apt to be very sensitive, and, therefore, I think we may congratulate ourselves upon the fact that so much good feeling and good temper has been displayed in this discussion. After all, the difference between the two sides of the House narrows itself down to a very small compass, I think. The difference of opinion seems to be confined to a difference on this point: as to the authority which shall regulate the qualification of the electors. I think we all agree that the Act of 1885 proved to be far too expensive in its operation. I think Liberals and Conservatives alike agree upon that point, and it was to give effect to the strong feeling in that regard which existed on this side of the House that Sir John Thompson introduced the measure to which reference has been made more than once during this discussion. Sir John Thompson's sudden death, and the death within the period of some three years of three such leaders as Sir John Thompson himself, Sir John Abbott and Sir John A. Macdonald had the effect of breaking, as it were, the continuity of the Conservative policy in this regard; and the overshadowing interest of the Manitoba school question came in to produce the same effect and bring about the same results. The consequence was that nothing further was done by this side of the House before the election of 1896. In fact, if these hon. gentlemen will throw their minds back, they will see it was impossible that anything could be done. Therefore, as I have said, the two parties are agreed on that point, so far as the desire on each side of the House is concerned, to reduce the expense of the operation of the existing law; and the only difference between us seems to be this, that the Government maintain that the provincial legislatures should not only hold in their hands the power to determine the electors for the provincial legislatures, but that they should also be empowered to determine and to dictate who shall be the electors for members of this House. There seems to be the only difference between the two parties. That is the position of the Government. We say that would be an unjust arrangement. We say we do not wish to interfere with the powers of the provincial legislatures to arrange their own franchise; and say that the provincial legislatures ought not to be empowered to interfere with our franchise, and in so far as they do interfere, to deprive this House of its constitutional right to regulate its own franchise. That being the difference, so far as I am personally concerned, I should be very glad to leave that issue to the country and let it decide between the two parties, provided it ever goes so far, but I hope still that some arrangement may be made.

I listened with very great interest to the speech of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government. The speech was a very interesting speech, and if I may be permitted to say so, it was a very able presentation of the case from the Government point of view. So far as I could gather, the right hon. gentleman alleged three main reasons why we should adopt this policy: first, because it was the policy adopted by the republic to the south of us; second, because it was philosophical; and third, because, under a federal constitution, it was the only proper course that could be adopted. So far as the first reason is concerned, it was sufficiently dealt with by my hon. friend from Brockville (Mr. Wood), who pointed out that the central principle of our constitution in this regard is diametrically the opposite to that adopted by the United States. Their principle was state rights, as it was called. Our principle is the supremacy of this Parliament. Their principle was, as I have said, state rights, and the framers of the constitution of the Dominion, after the most careful consideration, after having seen what the effect of the principle of state rights in the United States had been, determined they would avoid the danger into which that principle in the constitution of the United States had led the republic, and they adopted, as I have said, the very opposite principle, that of the supremacy of the Dominion Parliament. This proposal made by hon. gentlemen opposite is inconsistent with the supremacy of this Parliament, and is inconsistent even with the independence of this House. The acceptance of the principle of state rights by the people of the United States had the result of bringing about a great civil war, one of the greatest civil wars the world has ever seen; and I do not think even the persuasive oratory of the right hon. leader of the Government will induce the people of Canada to imitate the American constitution in this regard.

Then as to the question of its being philosophical to adopt this principle, I will say that in the first place, I am afraid I am not a good enough philosopher to accept philosophically a proposition which asks this House to denude itself of so important a privilege as the selection of those who are to elect the members of this House. I would call the attention of the right hon. leader of the House if he were in his place—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). You are not asked absolutely to denude yourself.

Mr. McNEILL. I consider that you do denude yourself when you hand this matter over to each provincial legislature to deal with. You may get back the power some day; but I will refer to that point later on. With regard to the philosophical aspect, I call attention to the fact that in all the world there is no more philosophical people than the Germans. If the hon. gentleman wants to deal with philosophers let him go to Germany; if he wants to meet with philosophers, let him go to the country of philosophers par excellence. Now, what do we find with regard to Germany? The German Empire is a great confederation also, but the philosophical Germans do not agree with the franchise views of the right hon. gentleman; they agree with our views. This brings me to the third contention of the Prime Minister, which is, that under a federal constitution, we are obliged to adopt the proposal of the Government in this regard. We find, in the case of Germany, that the German states have, as the provinces have in Canada, their own separate franchise. We find that in Bavaria, for example, the franchise requires, that an elector must be twenty-five years of age, and he must have paid direct taxes for six months previous to the election. In Baden, every citizen not convicted of crime nor receiving parish relief, may vote for a deputy elector; that is to say, for one of a certain body of electors who vote directly for a candidate for the legislature. In Prussia, every Prussian twenty-five years old, and who is qualified to vote at municipal elections in his place of domicile, can vote for a deputy elector. In Brunswick, we find that twenty-one of the members of what, perhaps, I might call the House of Commons there, are elected by those who pay the highest amount of taxes; three are elected by the Protestant clergy; ten are elected by the towns, and ten are elected by the rural districts. Those are some examples of the divergence of franchise which exist among the states of the German Federation. Now, according to the principle laid down by the right hon. gentleman, each of these states ought to send members to the Reichstag upon the basis of these several franchises. But that is not so at all; the Germans, who are sufficiently philosophic to suit even the right hon. the leader of the Government, have utterly repudiated any such idea. They have one franchise for their federal House of Commons, and that is, that a man shall be a German and shall be twenty-one years of age. Therefore, the very opposite of the principle laid down by the right hon. gentleman is accepted in the great German federation. The statesmen who have built up that grand empire, have examined this constitution of the United States, and they, as the statesmen who framed our federal constitution, have repudiated the principle which is now recommended to this House by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Sir, I do not want to prolong my remarks on this subject. I say that any fair-minded man will, in my judgment, admit that, just so soon as the provincial legislatures are empowered to assail the seats of members of this House by striking from the voters' lists a number of their friends and supporters, just so soon this House ceases to be an independent legislative body. The proposal which is made by hon. gentlemen opposite is simply that proposal; it is a proposal to clothe the provincial legislatures with that power. Against that we protest. That power was entrusted to the local legislatures for some years, in the hope that they would not abuse it. They did abuse the power, and this House, in defence of its privileges and its liberty, took that power from the provincial legislatures. It is proposed now to give that power back to them, and I say that, by giving it back to them, we simply place this House of Commons of Canada under the heel of the provincial machine politician and wire-puller. Such legislation as this is, in my humble judgment, derogatory to the dignity of this House, and absolutely inconsistent with the independence of the Commons of Canada.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to occupy the attention of the House for any great length of time, but I desire to make a few remarks upon this Bill. In the first place, I am heartily glad to learn from the Government that, whatever else may happen, the present Dominion Franchise Act is to be destroyed and wiped out. It is in evidence to-day that, for once at any rate, the Liberal party were right. Hon. gentlemen opposite are slow to admit that it is possible for this party ever to be right; but to-night we have evidence that, for once, the Liberal party was right when it fought the introduction of this Act into the legislation of Canada; because there is not in Canada at the present moment a man who values his reputation who will stand up and defend the Dominion Franchise Act. They may say that there are some good things in it; they may say that there are some good points about it that they like; but to defend the principles of the Act is an utter impossibility. A good deal has been said about the cost of the Dominion Franchise Act. That certainly is an objection that appeals with force to every man in this country, but, to my mind, that is not the only objection, nor the chief objection, that can be urged against the law that has governed the franchise of this country since the year 1885. I know something about the workings of that Act. We have been told, in the course of this debate, a good deal about the frauds that have been perpetrated in connection with the provincial franchises. I do not deny it; I never knew a Franchise Act in this world under which frauds would not be attempted to be perpetrated, if one could only find the rascals to make the attempt; but what I say is this, that the facilities for perpetrating frauds are much greater under the Dominion Franchise Act than they are under any provincial franchise law that I know of.

Mr. WILSON. How is that?

Mr. McCLURE. I will tell the hon. gentleman how. The challenge has been thrown across the floor here to name any revising barrister or judge who acted unfairly. I cannot accept that challenge. I have not a word to say against the revising officers who have revised the lists that I know anything about. But I say that an angel from heaven, with all the skill that is supposed to be possessed by a Philadelphia lawyer, could not prepare a just list under the Dominion Franchise Act. The worst feature of that Act to my mind is this, that it afforded the amplest facilities for loading up the lists with the names of men who were not qualified to vote, and it afforded no facilities for purifying the list when once those names were put on, except facilities which were so expensive that you could not avail yourself of them. The effect of the Act was that in towns and cities, you could get any body you liked upon the list; but in sparsely-settled portions of the country, hundreds of qualified voters would go without votes unless somebody who was not bound to do it, upon whom no duty rested to do it, but who, possibly for some political advantage or from pure patriotism, would go and hunt them up and get from them applications to be placed on the list. Hon. gentlemen have quoted specific cases of fraud under the Franchise Acts of the various provinces. What happens under the Dominion Franchise Act? In the very town in which I live, when the list was revised the last time, the Conservative committee went and got on the list all the names they could of the qualified, responsible, respectable voters. They did nothing more than their right and duty in that. But did the thing stop there? When that was gone, somebody—I do not know who, for everybody has repudiated responsibility for the Act—hired a young fellow without character or reputation, and paid him, according to his own testimony, twenty-five cents for every name he could get on the list. He went and gathered up the names, and swore to their qualifications in batches, and they were put on the list. I do not blame the revising barrister for that. He had the affidavit of an elector, he was bound to accept it, and those names went on the list by hundreds; and we were placed in the position of either leaving them on or applying the expensive machinery of the Act to get them off. Having the sworn testimony of an elector that they were qualified to vote, it was necessary, under the Act, for somebody to come forward and swear that they were not qualified. That is a very difficult thing to do. You might get a dozen people to say: "I do not know this man; I do not think he is qualified, but I do not know." But there is the oath of an elector that he is qualified. This thing happened, not once or twice, but scores of times under the Dominion Franchise Act. That could happen only in towns and cities; but throughout the country, where electors are scattered over large areas, there would be scores of young men who were not posted in the laws of the country, and were not advised as to the workings of the Franchise Act; and unless somebody went out and hunted them up and got their names placed on the list, they would not be there. I grant at once that the Act is as fair to one party as to the other; and I am bound to say that having it we made the best of it we could; and in the county of Colchester, we made it our duty to see that these men were hunted out of the woods. But is that the way a Franchise Act should be prepared in this country? Should the burden be thrown upon people to go and hunt voters in the woods and have their names put upon the list? We ought to have a law that gives to a man a vote as a natural right, and not something that is conferred upon him as a favour. Instead of this, what do we propose to substitute? The local lists, on which men are elected to the various legislatures of this Dominion. I am told at the outset, and I have heard it frequently stated by Liberals and Conservatives alike: "But after all there is something to be said in favour of this Parliament controlling its own franchise." I have frequently heard that statement, but I have seldom heard anybody go any further, and tell us what that something is. The hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig), I think it was, the other day said that he would oppose this Bill because he believed it was right for this Parliament to retain control of its own franchise, and then he proceeded to give reasons, and what were the reasons? First, he said: "I think it is a good thing for this Parliament to retain control of its own franchise, because it is a good thing for this Parliament to keep the control in its own hands." That was as far as he could go, and that is as far as anybody can go; because, in the first place, there is nothing in this Bill inconsistent with the idea that this Parliament should keep control of its own franchise. I ask hon. gentlemen, what is the difference between saying that the voters' lists shall be prepared by men appointed by us because they are county court judges, and saying that the lists shall be prepared by revising officers appointed by the municipal councils? In principle, what is the difference? And when we come to look at the list—I speak from the standpoint of my own province mainly—I ask any man from the province of Nova Scotia, whatever his politics may be, to go into any district of his own county, and take the Dominion list and place it side by side with the provincial list, and I challenge him to say whether that provincial list is not a better and truer representation of the voting strength of that district than the Dominion list. There is absolutely no doubt about it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. And so in Ontario.

Mr. BENNETT. Not at all.

Mr. McCLURE. Take an illustration of it. I had the misfortune or good fortune to run an election in my county on the same day on which the local members were elected. I had to be elected on a Dominion franchise list two or three years old, while the local candidates were elected on the local list which was made up two or three months before the election. The result was that in every district there were scores of young men between the ages of twenty-one and twenty-three who had the privilege of voting for the local candidate, but who could not vote for the Dominion candidate, and not only young men, but men of all ages and all classes. Not only that, but in very many cases the very men who were voting on the Dominion franchise had actually lost their qualification. It was held by men who had to stand idly by and see men vote on the qualification which they possessed. I could name scores of cases in the province of Nova Scotia in which under the Dominion Franchise Act no less than three men have been qualified on one piece of property worth $150. Is that fair legislation? Under the Dominion Franchise Act one man can be qualified as the owner; he can rent the property to another man, who will go on the list as the tenant; somebody else will be in occupation of it, and he will go on as the occupant. Three men will be voting on a single qualification, and as the list is prepared only once in a long while, all three may be living in the United States, and may come back on election day and vote, while the man who really owns the property may not have a vote at all. That is a sample of the way the Act works. From beginning to end, from ridge-pole to cellar it is full of difficulties in the way of securing a just and fair franchise list; and to-day it is an outrage and disgrace that when two or three by-elections are being held, there is not a young man in these constituencies between the ages of twenty-one and twenty-four who will have a right to vote, and hon. gentlemen opposite are to blame for disqualifying them. We have had many tears shed in this House and outside of it over the disqualifying of Dominion officials. What shall we say about the disqualifying of the young men of this country at every election held since this Act was enacted, for we have never had an election when the list was not two or three years old.

They disqualified the young men of this country by scores, and they qualified men who had no right to vote, to take their places. And yet they weep over the poor railway man. Oh, they say, there will be terrible frauds if you adopt the provincial lists. I was somewhat surprised to hear the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) this afternoon undertake to tell us that fearful frauds have been committed in the making of the provincial lists in the province of Nova Scotia. To hear him talk you would think that the Conservatives down in Nova Scotia must be a very poor mealy-mouthed, simple set to run an election. He told us that on the board of revisers, one would be a Tory, and of course an honest man, and the other would be Grits, and of course rascals. The philosophy of the hon. gentleman seems to be that a Grit may be honest in some things, but is bound to be dishonest in elections.

Mr. BENNETT. Hear, hear.

Mr. McCLURE. I do not wonder that the hon. member for Simcoe cheers that statement, because his idea is that honesty has nothing to do with politics.

Mr. BENNETT. If the hon. gentleman wants my estimate of him, I shall judge him that way.

Mr. McCLURE. I have never thought of getting the hon. gentleman's estimate of myself, and I trust I will never sink so low as to be worthy of getting it. The hon. gentleman for Annapolis knows that he could not sustain his statement successfully in Nova Scotia. The proof is to be found in the lists themselves, and I ask that hon. gentleman to take the list in his own county and compare it with the Dominion list, and I tell him here—and he cannot dispute the statement—that the local list is much fairer than the Dominion one in his own county. And that is true of every county in the province. The hon. gentleman cited a long extract from a newspaper to show that some fraud had been perpetrated in Pictou. But what did it all amount to? It amounted to this that somebody had tried improperly to get three or four names on the Pictou list, but owing to the fact that we have a franchise law, which could not be made an engine for fraud, he did not succeed in getting them on. But had it been the Dominion Act, he would have got them on very easily and it would have been very difficult to get them off afterwards. An attempted fraud proves nothing. You will find lots of people to attempt frauds under any law. The question is, do they succeed, and the test is the list that is finally prepared. Is that a fair list or not?

But it is a great humiliation, these hon. gentlemen tell us, for this Parliament to be elected on lists prepared by the local legislatures. Why do not the hon. gentlemen know that the men who send them here are the very men who send representatives to the local legislatures. Is there any humiliation in that? The hon. gentleman who last spoke referred to the United States, and thought he had discovered a great answer to the right hon. First Minister when he said that the constitution of the United States was directly the reverse of ours. I think he strained his argument a little far. I know that in some respects it is the opposite of ours, but it is not fair to say that it is directly the reverse. At any rate there is no difference in this respect, that we have a federal Parliament and local legislatures just as they have a federal Parliament and state legislatures. There is a difference between the powers of our local legislatures and the powers of their state legislatures, but not as regards the separate existence of these two legislatures. And in the United States they accept the principle that the state legislatures should control the franchise for the election of members to the federal Congress.

The hon. gentleman would prefer, however, that we went to Germany instead of to the United States. Well, I am willing to go to Germany for philosophy and learning, but not for the laws that protect the liberty of the people, not for the laws that give to the people the right to govern themselves. I would rather take those from a better source than Germany. Great respect as we have for the German Empire, I have never before heard that it is the source from which we should receive inspiration when framing legislation to protect the rights and liberties of the subjects of this country.

The hon. gentlemen have a great deal to say about the disfranchisement of Dominion officials. I do not know that that has anything particular to do with this discussion. I am aware that the hon. gentlemen have asserted that this Bill will disqualify Dominion officials in the province of Nova Scotia. The hon. member for Annapolis seems to forget that there is a vast difference between a Franchise Act and an election Act. The Franchise Act of the province of Nova Scotia does not disqualify Dominion officials. Every Dominion official in Nova Scotia, who has the requisite qualification, is upon the lists that are adopted by this Act, and these are the same lists that are used in the municipal elections in that province. In municipal elections all these Dominion officials vote, and the only reason why they do not vote in the provincial elections is because of the provision in the election law declaring that a voter must not have been in the employ of the Dominion Government within fifteen days before the election, and the oath can be put to him on that point. I am bound to say, in all frankness, that there is a section in this Act which might be construed as giving the right to put such an oath to an elector, but that clearly never was the intention of the Act; and for my part I would most heartily support any amendment which would remove the obscurity and make it plain, as was evidently the intention of the Act, that these officials should vote in the province of Nova Scotia. At the same time, I am not here to apologize for the Act of Nova Scotia in disqualifying the Dominion officials. I know a good deal more about these officials in that province than some hon. gentlemen. I have known them in my county, and I am bound to say that in the length and breadth of the province of Nova Scotia there is not a class of men who command my respect more than the railway employees of this country. I know the men working on the Intercolonial well. They have been political opponents of mine, they have gone to the polls and voted against me, but I have not an unkind word to speak of them, and although time and again I have been urged to use my influence to secure their dismissal, I have always refused to do so. But let me tell you, Sir, that while they are a noble, intelligent class of men, there are no men on the face of the earth who have been treated more like slaves by hon. gentlemen opposite than the employees of the Intercolonial, and it was as much for the protection of those men themselves as the protection of the legislature that that law was passed. I have met the men themselves, and man after man, by scores, they have told me that they were compelled to vote as they did. Not compelled by the Government—oh, no. The Government would be very careful to issue no order, but indirectly those orders went all the same. I know that the president of the Liberal-Conservative association of the town of Truro went to more than one voter who was suspected of being doubtful, in his allegiance to the Conservatives, and told him that if he was not seen at the committee meeting on a certain night he would know what was the matter, and on whom he had to depend for his bread and butter. They did go and were submitted to a cross-examination, and given to understand that if they dared to vote against the Conservative candidate, they did it at the risk of their office. The hon. leader of the Opposition will indignantly deny that; he will be horrified to think that such things went on under his Administration. But they did; and if he did not know it, he was recreant to his duty as a public man in not knowing that he was keeping in the Government employ men who became the slave-drivers of the free and independent electors of this country. That is why the local legislature disfranchised these men for their own protection, in order that they might not be placed in the humiliating position of having to cast their votes in a certain way whether they wished to do so or not. There is ample justification for that disqualification. I do not say whether it should apply under this Bill or not. It is not proposed here and does not enter into the discussion. Now, as I said at the outset, the best feature, to my mind, of this Bill is that it will do away with the Dominion Franchise Act. I am gratified, in the second place, to know that we are going to go back to the provincial lists. I am gratified because I think we shall then have a fair list. I do not wish to have imposed upon hon. gentlemen opposite or upon myself the necessity of spending time and money to prevent the young men of this country from being disfranchised by a law which is unjust in its provisions, unworkable in its details and most expensive to the people. The provincial lists fairly and honestly represent the voting strength of the country. How are they prepared? In the province of Nova Scotia every municipal council divides the county in to revising districts and three revisers are appointed for each district. These men are not all partisans, at least, they are not all partisans on one side. The hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) seemed to think it was sufficient to say that a man was a Grit to prove that he was unfair. It will be impossible for the hon. gentleman to get out of it that way, because the Government that he supported appointed revising barristers in the province of Nova Scotia, and I have yet to learn that they appointed a single Grit among them. I do not make the charge against these men that they were unfair. I will not descend to such a depth as to say that a man must necessarily be unfair because he is a Conservative. It is not a charge against a man as to fairness that he belongs to this party or that; the proof is in his actions. It is not to be forgotten that revisers of the local list appointed by the municipal councils are composed of both Liberals and Conservatives. I think there is not a municipal council in Nova Scotia but has a fair representation of both parties. In my county, as long as I can remember, the council has been about equally divided, and the revising officers appointed have been men of both political parties. Yet not a complaint has come from either as to the manner in which the lists are prepared. And, so far as I know, the same thing is true of every county in Nova Scotia. The qualification for the franchise is practically the same under the Dominion Act as under the provincial law, so the change will make little difference in that respect. In reference to going back to the provincial lists, I think there is a good deal to be said in favour of the idea that the provinces should control the franchise and not this Dominion Parliament. I am glad to notice that as years go by, this Dominion is becoming more and more consolidated into a common nationality. I am glad to know that in no period of the country's history has this movement towards consolidation of the people of this Dominion gone forward with greater strides than during the years since this Liberal Government came into power. But I am not blind to the fact that great progress as we have made toward the day when we shall be no longer Nova Scotians or Manitobans, but all Canadians, I am nevertheless bound to admit—and it is not to our discredit—that there are local differences and even national differences in this country. I am not ashamed to say that, proud as I am to be a Canadian there is in my heart a feeling of greater pride in the fact that I am a Nova Scotian. It is nothing disloyal to this Dominion to say that I hold Nova Scotia to have the first place in my heart. There being these local differences, is it right, is it wise, is it expedient, to attempt to force upon this Dominion a franchise common to all the provinces? Do not think that I am attempting to create differences between the various classes of people in this Dominion. The best way to weld the people of these various provinces together is to give them to understand that they have the right to stand by their local institutions, to declare that it shall no longer be a crime for a man to be proud of his province and its institutions. Therefore, there is much to be said in favour of giving to the people of the several provinces a right to say who shall represent them in this Parliament—for that is what it means in the end. If this Parliament undertakes to say: We will control the franchise ourselves, it is saying in effect: We will say to the people of each province that they must send to represent them here only such men as we choose to select; that is, we will select the electors who send the representatives here, which is the same thing. I say that that is working backwards. We should say to the provinces: Send to represent you in this Parliament such men as you choose, and to that end, you shall have the right to select the voters and to do it as you please. This talk about fraud in the preparation of the lists is pure moonshine. There is fraud even under the Divine law, and under any other kind of law, but the law is not to blame; the blame must fall upon the rascal who is behind the fraud. You should frame the law so as to remove the facilities for fraud, and there your duty is at an end. That is not what the Dominion Franchise Act did, for it opened wide the gates for fraud, and closed them against the punishment of the perpetrators of the frauds.

So I say I have great pleasure in supporting this Bill. I believe the hon. gentleman who last spoke said that we were surrendering our rights, that this Parliament would lose its independence—I think that was the word he used—if it went back to the old lists. Then this Parliament must have had no independence before the Franchise Act was adopted. Will the hon. gentleman say that that is the case? This Parliament had a species of independence under that Franchise Act, which I trust it will never have again. It had independence of public opinion, which was no credit to it. For years men have sat in this Parliament as representatives of the people, who, if a fair list had been prepared, would never have been elected, men whom the people would never have sent here if they had had an opportunity to vote against them. That is the kind of independence that we do not want.

Mr. CLANCY. Is that on your side?

Mr. McCLURE. It may have been on my side, or it may have been on the other. It does not matter so far as the principle is concerned which side was left at home. I am not here to discuss the matter on the narrow ground of party alone. I hold that the people have a right to be properly represented in Parliament and they cannot be so represented if the voters' list does not represent the full voting strength of the country. I, therefore, most cordially support this Bill. I believe it is a long step in the right direction, a long step when it destroys the iniquity of the Franchise Act, and a still longer step when it restores to the rightful owners the right to control the franchise laws of this country and to declare who shall elect men for this Parliament.

Mr. ROCHE. I had thought that the Bill which was up for discussion was the Bill introduced by the Solicitor General, rather than the Dominion Act of 1885; but the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. McClure) has devoted the principal portion of his remarks to a discussion of the old Dominion Act, which had a thorough threshing out at the time it was placed upon the Statute-book. Although the hon. gentleman, by his camp-meeting style of oratory, seems to invite retaliation, still, I am inclined to take a charitable view and to attribute that to the fact that, though he is very respectable personally, he is apt to lose his head and be carried away by his own eloquence, and, therefore, gives utterance to many things that he really does not believe in himself. This, at any rate, is the charitable view that I take of his performance. I also think that the reputation of the hon. gentleman for fair-mindedness can very well be called into question, when we consider that he is an ardent admirer and warm follower of the Finance Minister, who, in this House the other night, gloried in the fact of having been a party to seeing Dominion officials disfranchised by the wholesale. I think, if that is an evidence of the hon. gentleman's fairness, we may properly take his other remarks 'cum grano salis.' Thus far, hon. gentlemen from the other provinces have seen fit to discuss this Bill from the point of view of their particular province, so I may possibly be pardoned, if I follow in the same strain, and tell the House something of the iniquities of the beautiful Act which we have in Manitoba. To those who come from other provinces than Manitoba, where the franchises may be in some respects suitable to those provinces, and which may contain elements of fairness approved of by all irrespective of party, the adoption of this proposed Bill, to be sure, may not prove so very objectionable. But from any Conservative coming from Manitoba, a province whose erratic legislation during the last ten years has on more than one occasion set all the world wondering, to any one who has had any experience of the partisan character of the local Election Act of that province, and of the outrageous conduct of the partisan officials who manufacture the lists in the interest of that party, I say, the adoption of this proposed Act may well be viewed with alarm. Not only is the main principle which is involved in this proposed Act most pernicious in its character, by which this Parliament is called upon to surrender the control of its own franchise and to delegate this to the provinces, but, so far as Manitoba is concerned, the substitution of the Provincial Act means handicapping the Conservative party of that province, and subjecting them to a great expenditure of time, labour and money, and even then they will not be placed upon an equal footing with their opponents, or in a position that any man having implanted within his bosom the first elements of fair-play, can approve of. It is not my purpose, at this juncture, to enter into an elaborate defence of the present Dominion Franchise Act. I recognize that it has features that can quite easily be improved on. That it is too cumbersome and expensive in its operation, I readily admit; that a more simple, less expensive and more satisfactory Act may be placed upon the statutes is no doubt true and desirable. But, in my view, the Government will make a very great mistake in adopting this hybrid system under which each province in the Dominion will have a separate basis of representation in this House, differing from its sister provinces no two being alike in this respect. With all due deference to the opinions of hon. gentlemen opposite, I claim that, in compiling an Act for the Dominion, great respect should be paid to the principle of uniformity, and the complicated condition of affairs and confusion avoided, which is bound to be entailed by the adoption of this Bill. The hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches need not be so particular to pass this Bill merely for the purpose of keeping faith with the electors, merely for the sake of fulfilling their ante-election promises, they have already proved recreant to so many of their pledges in the past, that if they violate another one, it will make very little difference, though, no doubt, it will come as a great surprise to the people—the shock may be more than they can stand, under the circumstances—to see them attempt the fulfilment of one of those pledges, and that one not of primary importance. That the present Act on the statute is not an ideal one, we readily admit. But it can be improved on without resorting to a measure that means handing over the control of the basis of representation in this House to provincial politicians to be made subservient to their political ends, which will undoubtedly be the case if those in charge of political affairs throughout the other provinces of the Dominion are of the same calibre as our Lilliputian statesmen of the province of Manitoba. I, therefore, as a member of this House, protest strongly against the adoption of this proposed Bill, especially on the ground that it provides for the substitution of the provincial lists, prepared by provincial officials, instead of lists under the control and direct supervision of officials appointed by this Government. Does the Government know the nature of the Act that they are asking us to substitute for this Dominion Act, so far as the province of Manitoba is concerned? Are they aware of the manner in which the local officials enforce the provisions of the provincial Act which they propose to adopt? Are they at all aware that this Act of Manitoba was condemned at the time it was placed upon the statutes of that province, by no less an authority than the Toronto "Globe," the mouthpiece and family Bible of the Liberal party? That Act must surely have been a very vicious one, when it received condemnation from such a source. Still, that paper pointed out to the Greenway Government that, in enacting such legislation, they were but placing a stumbling block in the way of the Liberals of this House, and called upon them to halt before making a mistake which they would regret for all time to come. Is the Ministry aware of the fact that Mr. Fisher, that old-time Liberal, the gentleman who represented the province of Manitoba on the late Hudson Bay expedition, and for a year or two was president of the Provincial Liberal Association of that province, roundly denounced the Act in that historic observation of his as being a "monstrosity of monstrosities?" If not, I tell these hon. gentlemen so now, in order that they may have an opportunity afforded them to make a thorough research into the operations of that Act, which has been admitted by all independent and fair-minded men to be most unjust, unfair and unworthy of any enlightened and civilized people, inasmuch as it places the Opposition entirely at the mercy of the Government of the day. Why, Sir, the partisan officials who have compiled the lists in that province, have vied with each other in their endeavours to see which of them could disfranchise the greater number of their political opponents.

The names of hundreds of old-time Conservatives, men who had voted at municipal, provincial and Dominion elections for ten or twelve years, aye, and more, were designedly left off those lists in the hope that either the absence of their names would not be noticed in time to send in appeals, or that they would not take the trouble to be present or to be represented at the courts of revision. Affidavits sent in by Conservatives to those officials were ignored, and the mere ipse dixit of the Liberal candidates accepted instead. Now, the old Act that was passed in Manitoba in 1886, by the Norquay Government, provided that the lists should be compiled by officers termed enumerators, but they were to be, as far as practicable, municipal clerks, not compulsory, but wherever feasible. That Act, however, was condemned by the then Liberal Opposition, led by Mr. Greenway. He took the position that, in all cases, the municipal clerks should be the proper officers to compile those lists. He roundly denounced, and gave voice to the sentiment of his party at the time the Act was being passed, in these words :

He (Mr. Greenway) was in favour of having the voters' lists prepared by municipal clerks, and maintained that this could be easily done, as the greater part of the work was complete when the lists for municipal elections were prepared. He objected to the Government taking in themselves the appointment of enumerators. They might appoint partisans, who might put obstacles in the way, in order to exclude from the lists names to which they objected. The greatest freedom should be allowed, and there should not be any taint of suspicion as to the manner in which the lists were prepared. * * * If a partisan enumerator were appointed, how easy it would be for him to ignore certain information which he might obtain in reference to certain individuals whom he might wish to exclude.

So the House will see that Mr. Greenway objected in toto to the Government taking unto itself the appointment of officers to prepare the lists. Mr. Martin, a colleague of Mr. Greenway at that time, moved on the third reading :

That the said Bill be not read a third time, but that it be recommitted to a committee of the whole House, with instructions to amend the Bill by striking out clause No. 14, which provides for the appointment of enumerators, and substituting therefor a clause providing for clerks of municipalities making up the voters' lists.

Every Liberal in the House voted for that motion. In the elections that took place in the following December, from every hustings, and by every Liberal candidate, this principle was laid down, that, with the Liberals in power, an Act would be passed providing for the preparation of the lists by the municipal clerks and their revision by the judges. In January, 1888, Mr. Greenway was called on to form his Cabinet, and in the session of 1889 he, in a moment of honesty, moments which I regret to say are with that hon. gentleman too few and far between, did enact legislation embodying those two features. That Act received the unanimous endorsement of every member of the House, Grit and Tory alike. The municipal clerks, who were appointed yearly by the municipal councils, and who were independent of the government, were to compile the lists. Those clerks were not all of the same political persuasion, and, if they attempted to stuff the lists in the interests of either political party, they ran the risk of losing their positions after the next municipal elections. Self-interest alone, therefore, would compel those officers to do their duty in an impartial manner. But how long, think you, Mr. Speaker, did Mr. Greenway allow that Act to grace the statutes of the province of Manitoba? Only one year. At the very next session of the legislature, he, knowing that was too honest an Act to suit his purpose, fearing an untrammelled verdict from the people he desired to barricade himself behind a partisan election Act, repealed his own Act of the previous session without having given an opportunity to test its practicability at a general election, wiped it off the statutes, and substituted in lieu of the same an Act embodying the very features formerly condemned in the Norquay Act and in the Dominion Act. Yes, and features far more vicious than any contained in either of those Acts. Could duplicity go further? What did this substitute Act of his provide? It provided for the compilation of the lists, not by municipal clerks, but by officers termed "registration clerks," another name for enumerators, and their revision by either judges or barristers of three years' standing, whereas previously judges only could revise the lists; and now we see a host of partisan Liberal lawyers, in return for party services, sent out to the various constituencies to act as revising officers at the several courts of revision. Now, what was one of the principal objections urged by the Liberals in this House against the adoption of the present Dominion Franchise Act in 1885? I will quote to the House the objection of the Hon. Edward Blake, leader of that party :

For the discharge of a duty, the most delicate in the world, that of establishing the lists by which it is to be decided whether the Government are to continue in power or not, the Government takes the power of selecting men, and undoubtedly they will select safe men. * * * The proposal (of the leader of the Government) is to put these revising lists into the hands of his own nominees. * * * He is, in fact, proposing a scheme by which he can take control of the polls. The lists are to be made right for the Conservatives, and the Liberals will have to fight against them. * * * The revising officers will be selected as political men for a political and particular purpose.

If that objection was a valid one when applied to the Dominion Act, with how much more force does it apply to the Act which

It is intended to substitute in lieu of that Act, as far as the province of Manitoba is concerned. For, bear in mind, judges, or barristers of five years' standing, compiled and revised the Dominion lists, whereas the provincial lists are compiled by officers appointed by the government, nominees of the Liberal candidates, whether elected or defeated, whose principal qualification for the position is, that they are political partisans, and, as a matter of fact, the lists are prepared under the direct supervision of the Liberal members, or candidates, in almost every constituency. Men have been selected as registration clerks, in many instances, not from amongst the better class of our citizens, not because the people, irrespective of politics, had confidence in their integrity, but simply because they could be depended on to take every possible party advantage in the interest of the government candidates, and I must say, in that respect, they earned the gratitude of those candidates, many of whom owe their seats in the legislature to the scandalous manipulation of those lists in the interests of the Liberal party. I need not deal in generalities. I am in a position to give examples of specific cases; I have in my possession affidavits and declarations from leading men in one-third of the constituencies in the province, all telling the same story of partisanship, duplicity and fraud, which I will not weary the House by reading, as some of this information has been given to the House before. Suffice it to say that, in North Winnipeg alone, 400 names were left off the lists; the entire Hebrew vote, to the number of 250, was omitted, because it generally went Conservative, while the Icelandic vote, which goes with our Liberal friends, was put on without any personal application on their part. Out of 30 employees in one establishment, 27 were Conservative and 3 Liberal. Strange to say, the 27 were left off and the 3 put on, and that without any formal application; the registration clerk admitting, at the court of revision, that he took those 3 names off an old scrutineer's book.

The fact of the matter is that they had been marked as having voted for the Liberal candidate at the preceding election; that was evidence enough for him that they were entitled to vote; and the twenty-seven Conservative voters who were marked as having previously voted Conservative were deemed to be worthy of disfranchisement. In the constituency of South Brandon the elections were held upon the unrevised lists; no court of revision was held in that constituency at all, and the reason of that is, that the Liberal Government of the province absolutely refused to allow the printing of those lists to be done within the constituency, much against the protest of the local Liberal member, I will do him that justice. There was a sore head in the Liberal party, a man who was on strike, who happened to be in the printing business, and he lived in the distant town of Emerson, away outside the constituency, miles and miles. To appease his wrath the government transferred to him the job of printing the voters' lists, with the result that those lists were not returned in time to have the appeals sent in, and so the elections had to be held on the unrevised lists. Bad as the lists were after they had passed through the hands of the revising officer, they were ten times worse when they had no revision at all. On the other hand, in the city of Brandon a court of revision was held before the lists were printed and distributed, and the people had no opportunity of seeing whether their names were on the lists or not; it was all a farce. Again, in the constituency of Dennis, out of 1,405 names on the list, 249 were proved to be fictitious, a very fair proportion and one which if maintained on the same average in the different constituencies of the province, it is no wonder Mr. Greenway enjoys such a large numerical support in the legislature at the present day. These are but a few examples of the practices which prevailed generally throughout the length and breadth of that province. Is it any wonder, therefore, that with such a state of affairs, which I have no hesitation in describing as disgraceful in any civilized community, that the Conservatives of that province view with alarm the substitution of provincial lists, prepared by officials who take a delight in disfranchising their political opponents by the wholesale. Is it to be wondered at, that handicapped as the Conservatives were in Manitoba in that respect, fighting against such tremendous odds, that they are so numerically weak in the legislature at the present moment. The wonder is indeed that they have not been legislated out of the local parliament entirely. Well, Sir, I am happy to say that the strength of the Conservative party in the legislature is no criterion at all of the strength of that party in the country, as will very soon be evidenced.

The franchise, Mr. Speaker, is the basis of constitutional freedom, and if we are going to have stuffed lists prepared by partisan officials, the liberty of the subject is gone. If we are going to legislate afresh upon this Franchise Bill, for decency's sake let us not put an Act on the Statute-book that will be ten times more vicious in principle than the one we repeal. What is the use of enacting fresh legislation unless we can improve on the old. I therefore protest and protest strongly against the adoption of this Bill, because of that principle which is involved of submitting the control of the franchise to these two-penny ha'penny politicians whose area of vision is so circumscribed that they cannot see beyond their own political barn-yard. I say, Sir, that this is a most pernicious principle and we in the province of Manitoba have experienced it to our regret and sorrow, fighting as we did against the tremendous odds that we have there. The result is that we cannot hope for fair-play under the Manitoba Election Act as it exists at the present. I do not see in their places to-night any of the Manitoba members. They have not yet spoken on the Bill, but I know they cannot defend the Manitoba provincial franchise on any ground.

Mr. ROCHE. I refer to the Manitoba members on the other side of the House. I am sure they will not attempt any real argument in favour of adopting the Manitoba provincial lists for this Parliament, because they know in their inmost souls that what I am telling is the truth. The other day, the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Rutherford) pointed out to us with a great gusto that the very best evidence that the people of Manitoba approved of the railway policy of the Greenway Government was the fact that Mr. Greenway enjoyed such a large majority in the local legislature. I say that no more erroneous deduction could be drawn. Any gentleman who is acquainted with the true condition of political affairs in that province, and who is willing to be fair will have to admit, that even with the school question as a powerful lever in the hands of that government at the last election, Mr. Greenway would have been defeated had it not been for the scandalous manipulation of those lists in the interests of the Liberal candidates. Even the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) is not in the House to-night, but I am inclined to be very charitable to him, because no doubt he is preparing the mourning for the death of that Yukon first-born of his, which we expect to occur next Tuesday. However, I see by the provision of this Bill the North-west Territories are exempted from its operation, and now I ask the Government to place Manitoba in the same category as the North-west Territories, at least until such time as they can bring pressure to bear on their Liberal confreres of Manitoba to get them to wipe off the statutes of that province an Act that is now a disgrace to it, and for it, substitute a fair Act; a Franchise Act in the widest and truest sense of the term; an Act that will give a Conservative in that province, an equal say in its affairs with his Liberal fellowman.

Mr. HEYD. I do not propose to occupy a great deal of the time of the House, as this Bill has been pretty well discussed in all its bearings. There is one thing which strikes us with singular significance, and that is the different spirit which is manifested to-night by hon. gentlemen opposite, compared with that which they manifested some thirteen years ago. To-night this Dominion Franchise Act is dying a natural death; some thirteen years ago, it was ushered in by the Conservative Government with a blare of trumpets, but its glory has departed now and even its best friends are willing to see it die. This proves that thirteen years ago the Conservatives were most terribly mistaken, that all the prognostications made as to the benefits it would confer have turned out to be false, and to-day the Dominion Franchise Act has proven itself to be a lamentable failure. Therefore to-night, half the labour on this side of the House has been removed, because that fact is admitted by gentlemen on the other side. The only thing that our friends opposite still adhered to, is the principle of uniformity. Just why that word "uniformity" has such a singular attraction for them I cannot understand, and yet one speaker after another clings on to a uniformity of franchise.

Now, Sir, there is no use concealing our thoughts with words. The word "uniformity" when applied to the franchise, means a franchise law that shall be uniform throughout the length and breadth of this land. Can we have uniformity; that is the first question. Is it possible to conceive of a condition of affairs where we can have that uniformity, unless the Dominion Parliament itself prepares the lists. There is no possible way in which the combined wisdom of this House can devise a scheme for maintaining a uniform Franchise Act, unless this House itself prepares the lists, and if we do so, how can we economize, and how can we get rid of this vast amount of labour that is associated with this word "uniformity." I myself, if it did not cost too much, would rather see a uniform franchise, but I am willing to abandon uniformity if it is going to be too large a drain on the Treasury of this Dominion. It has been proven by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House—and I presume it will not be denied by our friends on the other side of the House—that the preparation of the lists for one single election, to the country and to the candidates and those interested in the result, amounted to at least $600,000. I take it that will be admitted, because it is easily capable of being substantiated. And, when we take into consideration the amount of time and days labour lost by those interested in the result, $600,000 does not represent the actual outlay. If we can save all that outlay and all that labour by sacrificing uniformity, I believe it would be a good exchange. Can we get a fresh list; a list that is always ready and open for use for an election in this country, and still have uniformity. I say you cannot devise any other scheme that will give us a fresh list, that will not require the preparation of a list every year in order to make it useful; because we can never tell when there will be a dissolution of the House, and if we cannot have a fresh list, we must have the old list on which there are hundreds of names which should not be there, and hundreds of names are off that should be on. What is the character of the Dominion list which we have to-day? I will take my own constituency as an illustration. I suppose that everybody will admit that the last election that took place there was of sufficient importance to induce the two candidates to bring out every possible vote, and every effort was made to bring out that vote. Yet in South Brant in that election out of 8,726 votes, only 5,280 voted; so that there were 3,446 persons unrepresented on the voters' list, or only about 60 per cent of those whose names were on the voters' list voted. And yet we have been told by the eminent leader of the Opposition that even the graveyards of Brantford gave up their dead on that day. That shows that there is something wrong with the Franchise Act, because if the graveyards gave up their dead, the names of the dead in the graveyards must have been on the list. Such a condition of things is deplorable. I do not need to refer to South Brant alone. We will take East Simcoe, which I presume is more of a rural constituency and likely to have fewer changes. Out of 11,010 only 6,393 voted; so that there were 4,617 names on the list the owners of which could not be found or induced to vote.

Mr. BENNETT. Is not the hon. gentleman aware that under the Dominion voters' list every man who owns property in different divisions is assessed there, and his name consequently appears several times? Is not that an explanation of the fact that there were a great many duplicate names? The hon. gentleman must know that.

Mr. HEYD. I know this, that the judge who prepares the list is supposed not to duplicate names, but is to exercise his intelligence to secure a perfect list. I do not think it would be a proper thing in the city of Brantford, for instance, where I have property in five different wards, that my name should be down five times.

Mr. BENNETT. You appear five times.

Mr. HEYD. No, I only appear once, because we make it our business to see that the lists are as pure as they can be made. In Bothwell, out of 8,284 names on the list, only 5,202 voted, or 3,082 names were on the list of persons who did not vote. I allude to that to show that there is a chance for a tremendous amount of personation, and this gives rise to a great deal of the scandal that has been associated with these voters' lists. If the Dominion Parliament should insist on uniformity, it is almost impossible to get rid of that aspect of the matter unless we make a list every year, and if we make it every year, it means an expenditure, to be very moderate, of $300,000 or $400,000 a year. Therefore, in order to secure a fresh list with the greatest economy, I am willing to forego what our friends opposite desire so much—uniformity. What need we care whether we have a uniform franchise of that kind or not? I presume that when confederation was established, the object was to provide for the representation of each province by a certain number of members in this House. I understand that Quebec was taken as the basis, and that sixty-five members constitute the representation of that province in this House. I as a resident of Ontario do not care one whit how Quebec elects her members, unless she has a greater numerical strength in this House than her population entitles her to. What do the people of Manitoba care how the people of Nova Scotia elect their representatives. Or what do the people of Prince Edward Island care how the people of British Columbia do it? As long as each of these provinces has only in this House the number of representatives that its population entitles it to. We are making entirely too much of this word uniformity, because it costs us too much. It gives us old lists instead of new lists.

Now, my hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett)—and if there is any man who can put a black complexion on a thing, he can—alluded to the voters' lists of Ontario. I do not think he made a good argument; but I want to defend our lists a little from the aspersions he cast upon them, and I propose briefly to allude to one or two extracts he made from the papers in his constituency, which I think show that those lists were prepared fairly, and not, as he led us to suppose, for the purposes of fraud. Take this extract that he gave:

When the judge comes here to hold the voters' list court of revision, he will find his work cut out for him, and lots of it. The Liberals have about ninety appeals, and the Conservatives somewhere over one hundred.

There are over three hundred appeals against the voters' list in the township of Tay.

There is nothing said there with respect to the political complexion of the three hundred, and I am forced to drop them out. Take his next extract:

His Honour Judge Ardagh held his court of revision of the voters' list for Midland on Tuesday. The Liberals added forty names and struck off eleven. Conservative additions, sixty, and none struck off.

In other words, there were eleven Conservatives on that list that should not be there, sixty Conservatives were off that should be on, and forty Liberals were off that should be on. Take the next one, showing outrageous conduct, to use the language of my hon. friend:

The court of revision will have its hands full when it deals with the revision of the Orillia voters' lists before the county judge. There have been lodged 288 appeals for alleged wrongful omissions and insertions. Of these, 175 are against Conservatives, and 113 against Reformers.

The result, according to these extracts, is that there are 316 Grit appeals against

Conservatives and only 273 Conservative appeals against Grits; showing in that respect that unfair play cannot be alleged against the Liberals of that section of the country. But aside from that, we must take for granted that where the municipalities prepare the lists, as they do in Ontario, there must be a certain amount of politics. A Conservative city naturally has Conservative assessors, and a Liberal city naturally has Liberal assessors. It may be in some cases that they are predisposed to favour their own friends; but as a general rule I am inclined to think the assessors act fairly, and there is nothing to be said against the manner in which they discharge their duty. But the hon. member for East Simcoe has told us that the law provides machinery to purge these lists and make them effective. That is done by municipal candidates and their friends; and after they, and gentlemen who are aspiring for positions in the legislature have spent their time and money to get a perfect list, and it has left the judge's hand as a perfect list, what is there wrong in our picking it up at that stage and saving about $600,000 by adopting it for electing the members for this House? Our friends opposite say this list costs money. Certainly it costs money. But, having spent so much money, with the result of our obtaining very imperfect lists, is it not time for us to take the advantage of lists that will cost us nothing, and that are much superior to the ones we have under the present Act? Is there any fault found with the local lists? We have had a very close election in Ontario within the past few weeks, and the political parties are very well divided there; but, notwithstanding the fact that four Conservatives were elected in Toronto, the Liberals there are not complaining that the lists were improperly made. These lists were prepared in Toronto by Conservative assessors, controlled by Conservative councils. The Liberals had to fight against great odds in order to get their names on the lists, but do you hear any whining from the four candidates defeated, that the lists were unfair? Do you hear any complaints from the men who were defeated in Hamilton, against the fouling of the lists? Nowhere will you find a word said in Ontario against stuffed lists. That complaint is only made in this House to decry the attempt on the part of the Government to adopt this provincial system. Can you find, during the last contest that took place in Ontario, a single condition such as the one described by Mr. Howland, in the speech which he made on the night of his defeat by our friend Mr. Bertram? He said:

We have taken the opinion of the electorate of 1894, or such fragments of it as could be got together on this occasion. I am sure there is no one here, there is no person who is in a position to judge in this city who was not satisfied from the general colour of public sentiment and opinion that had the election rested upon voters' lists taken within this year, or even somewhat less recently, instead of lists that were nearly four years old, we would have had a splendid victory.

Our hon. friends opposite will not controvert this statement of Mr. Howland, that he lost his seat in this House owing to the faulty Dominion lists. If we are to believe Mr. Howland, he was defeated because we used the Dominion lists, the list of four years ago, and, had we used the local lists, he would have been the representative in Centre Toronto, instead of our hon. friend Mr. Bertram. If charges like that are being made against these Dominion lists by our friends in Opposition, surely none of us will be willing to continue such a system.

Hon. gentlemen opposite talk of uniformity. If we can have fresh lists, without the terrible burden and expense imposed on us by the present law, I am quite willing to adopt uniformity, but you cannot have uniformity unless you are prepared to pay the expense. These local lists will cost us practically nothing, and we will have fresh lists, made up to date, and not have to hold elections on lists several years old.

There is another thing I would urge in favour of this Bill. While I personally do not care what the qualification of the voter in Nova Scotia is, I think it will have a tendency to bring about this uniformity. As soon as the people in the various provinces learn that there is a difference in the qualifications, will they not think the matter over and try to devise the very best scheme possible, and I look forward with a considerable degree of hope to the various provinces arriving, in a very short period of time, at one standard of political development, and agreeing to accept the best political system in existence in any one of the provinces. At present, I think the one we have in Ontario represents exactly the political development of the people there. I think that our friends in the province of Quebec know better than we in Ontario what best answers their requirements; and, as long as the people of Quebec are satisfied with their provincial lists, I am certainly not going to interfere with them; and, as long as we are satisfied in Ontario, I do not think the people of British Columbia need particularly care. So long as one province does not get an advantage over another in the number of its representatives, what need any of us care what basis each adopts for its lists, particularly if we can save hundreds of thousands of dollars, and at the same time save ourselves an unlimited amount of trouble? For these reasons, not that I am particularly struck upon the Ontario franchise, I am prepared to accept this Bill. There are a few features in the Ontario franchise that I like. I like the one man one vote principle. I like the provision that kills the absentee vote. Those who have anything to do with the absentee vote in cities, know what labour is involved in getting that vote together. They know what it costs them to foot the bill, or to assist in footing it. The provincial lists will do away entirely with that. We do not give the slightest attention to the names of the men on the lists in Ontario, because the Ontario Act requires that a man should be a resident of the municipality three months before the writ was issued, so that all we have to do is to go over the lists and take down the names of those who are absent more than three months, give them to our scrutineers, and, when the man comes up to vote, the oath is put to him. He will not take it, because he knows the consequence of taking a false oath. This measure will relieve us of a terrible amount of labour; I have gone through several campaigns, and have assisted in the preparation of the lists, and I would rather assist in the preparation of five provincial lists than one Dominion. There is five times as much labour and expense in carrying on a Dominion than a provincial contest. The labour multiplied on every hand under our present Franchise Act, and facilities for wrong-doing are everywhere to be found. The opportunities for stuffing the polls and personating many be imagined from the fact that only about 60 per cent of the people on the lists vote. No wonder, then, the charge is made, that at the Dominion election time the graveyards give up their dead. There is no necessity for the graveyards giving up their dead in provincial elections, because they cannot vote. If absent from the municipality more than three months, that settles the matter, and the dead will not rise again until the trumpet sounds.

Some hon. gentlemen opposite lay stress on the pretended loss of dignity which this Parliament will suffer, in delegating its rights in this respect to the provinces. But in doing this, we are sacrificing nothing. The provinces take the list prepared by the municipalities and in doing so make no sacrifice of their dignity. They take those lists because they answer their purposes and cost nothing, and for the same reason we should take advantage of the provincial lists. In doing so we shall not be sacrificing a wit of our dignity, but will be saving a lot of the people's money and saving ourselves an immense amount of labour. For these reasons, I propose to support the efforts made by our friends on this side to put through this Bill.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. I do not propose to take up much of the time of the House this evening in discussing this Franchise Bill; but, after the remark of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Roche), I feel that I would be recreant to my duty, if I did not attempt to correct some of the erroneous impressions which he has endeavoured to convey in connection with the Franchise Act. It takes some hardihood for a member of the Opposition, a supporter of that party which is responsible for the present Dominion Franchise Act, to find fault with an Act which is intended to furnish a list of the people qualified to vote. The Manitoba Act has come in for a great deal of abuse on the part of the Opposition to the Greenway Government in that province, and, no doubt, the echoes of that abuse have reached us down here in Ottawa, and been heard on the floor of this House. As a matter of fact, however, the Manitoba Franchise Act is infinitely superior, in almost every respect, to the Act which has so long disgraced the statutes of this Dominion. If any one will take the trouble to compare the Dominion lists of any electoral division in Manitoba with the local lists of that same division, he will see at once the infinite superiority of the local lists over the Dominion lists for both local and Dominion purposes.

I have in my possession lists of the Dominion and local lists covering the same ground that I am willing to show to any hon. member and point out to him the remarkable differences in favour of the Manitoba lists. As a matter of fact, the complaints that have from time to time been brought against these lists are entirely without foundation. I doubt if there is any fairer system of compiling voters' lists in any province in the Dominion than the system in use in the province of Manitoba. While these complaints have been rife in newspapers before the elections, when we have brought the men making the charges face to face with those whom they were accusing, it was always found that the difficulty was in other lists in some far distant part of the province, the lists in the vicinity of the place in which these gentlemen making the accusations lived being almost invariably found to be correct. I was elected twice to the local legislature of Manitoba, and in my constituency I never had the slightest complaint from my Conservative friends of unfairness of the registration clerk in making up these lists. The Conservatives in that constituency and in all the constituencies in that neighbourhood, appeared to be perfectly satisfied with the list; and, as I said, it was always at some far distant point that these terrible things were done to which the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Roche) has referred. Now, the Manitoba list is a good list in many ways. It is a new list before each election. According to the law, the lieutenant-governor in council issues a proclamation appointing a registration clerk. These clerks are selected, as a rule, because they are men of probity who are well known in their several communities, and who have the respect of the people. They take an oath of office, which is a very stringent oath. Within two days of their appointment they must put in the local newspapers an advertisement setting forth the fact that they have been appointed, and giving the people notice of the facilities afforded for registering their names. The registration clerk has thirty days during which application for registration of voters can be made. Men can register themselves personally or any one can apply by declaration to have men with whom they are acquainted placed upon the list. The law provides that the registration clerks shall obtain certified copies of the last preceding voters' list in the electoral division for the municipal, legislative and Dominion parliamentary purposes, and with such copies and such information as he can obtain from the assessment rolls, inquiries or otherwise and such applications as he shall receive, and so on, he shall enter thereupon the names of all persons who are entitled to have their names entered upon the voters' list. Now, the registration clerk is probably a partisan. We find in this Dominion, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, almost all our citizens are partisans. It has been often said that we ought to have municipal officers as registration clerks. Well, Sir, the municipal officers, as a rule, are partisans, they are allied with one party or the other. Moreover, while under a system where only such persons are registered as are on the assessment roll, there is no doubt that the municipal officers would be suitable men to compile the list. But when you bear in mind that we have manhood suffrage in Manitoba, that we have one man one vote, and consequently a large number of our voters are not entered upon the assessment roll in the municipality, it is easy to see that municipal officers have no advantage over other men in compiling a list of that kind. It is true that in some cases men are left off the list. It is true that the Conservative party, who have been in Opposition in Manitoba for the last ten years, have been direlict in looking after this important matter, in looking after men, many of whom are labouring men working on farms and so on, who are not entered on the assessment roll or the municipal voters' list; and they have found, when the lists were made up that their Liberal friends had been more active and have secured more declarations of names to be added to the list. If the Conservatives did not get names upon the lists, it was nobody's fault except the Conservatives themselves in not sending in the names of their friends, although every facility is afforded under the law of Manitoba to do so.

When the list is made up, it remains open for thirty days after the proclamation, that is, it remains open until midnight of that day fixed, and after that it is closed. The reviser next undertakes his courts of revision. Now, these courts of revision cannot take place for at least six weeks after the closing of the lists, and, within that interval it is in the power of any one who has any complaint to make about the list to apply for amendment of the list to the court of revision. These lists are put up all over the country. They are sent to every candidate, county court office, to every post office, to every school-house, and to every municipal office, and the clerk also mails fifteen copies to every member of the local assembly and to every defeated candidate, and one to every mayor, reeve, councillor and alderman in the constituency. He is bound also to furnish copies to the public at not more than 20 cents each. In the six weeks' interval there is ample opportunity for every man who has been left off the list in one of these small constituencies—for the constituencies in Manitoba for the legislature are not very large—there is plenty of time for any one who feels himself aggrieved by being left off the list to have his name put on. My hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Roche) alluded to the fact that prominent Conservatives have been left off the list. He used the word "designedly," and said that these names were left off the list designedly. If they were thus left off, there was a remedy at hand. But, it is a remarkable fact, that in every constituency a large number of prominent Liberals who had been living in the constituency for years and whose names were on the assessment roll were sometimes left off the list also, and I do not think he would accuse the registration clerk of designedly leaving off the names of these prominent Liberals. We all know that there is no list that is perfect. It is entirely impossible to get a list that is perfect. When the hon. gentleman says that names are designedly left off, I think he is going too far, and I do not think he will accuse the registration clerk in his own district—

Mr. ROCHE. If the hon. gentleman will permit me, that is exactly what I mean to do. I have sent in affidavits to establish that. It is admitted that he left off names on the ipse dixit of the Liberal candidate.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. The hon. gentleman reminds me of an incident in the constituency of Lakeside in the general election of 1892. Affidavits of applications are ordinarily sent in asking for additional names to be put on the lists. I remember a number of applications came into the clerk in Lakeside in 1892. They were declared before a commissioner in the usual way and stated what purported to be the facts with regard to several applications for registration.

It so happened that one or two of those men were near neighbours of the registration clerk himself; and in looking at the declarations he saw at once that they were false. At that time it was necessary for a man to be six months in the province of Manitoba and one month in the electoral division, and this man, on looking at the affidavits, saw that none of the men to whom they referred had been six months in Manitoba, had not been three months in Manitoba. The registration clerk himself, knowing that these declarations were untrue, decided not to place the parties upon the list. I do not think that any sensible man would blame him for taking that stand, because the Act empowers him to act in that way. Now that may cover the case to which the hon. gentleman refers.

Mr. ROCHE. Not at all. There is the court of revision.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Where is the complaint? The court of revision was there for that purpose, and the complaint at once falls to the ground. Now the revising officers to whom the hon. gentleman devoted particular attention, are county court judges, or barristers of not less than three years standing. The hon. gentleman complains that they are not all county court judges. Well, as a matter of fact, we have not got county court judges enough to go around. In the province of Manitoba there are only a limited number of county court judges, and the courts of revision there just before a general election, as the whole thing is done within three months, come very close together, and county court judges cannot possibly cover the ground. But they are given all the work that they can do, and reputable men, of high standing in the legal profession, are selected to go out and act as revisers in the other constituencies. I do not think that there is a case on record where a revising officer has not acted in a fair and impartial way at the court of revision. In the constituency where I live, we have the same man acting as reviser for the local lists, and he also acts as revising barrister for the Dominion lists. Judge Ryan, a man in whom every one has confidence, and a man who has given the greatest satisfaction in that capacity. Now the safeguards which surround the court of revision are very satisfactory. No one has any fault to find with them, as a rule there is no difficulty for any one who feels himself aggrieved by having his name left off the list, in having it put on. As a matter of fact they have at courts of revision no difficulty whatever in rectifying such errors as may have crept into the lists through the impossibility, under a manhood suffrage Act, of the registration clerk being personally acquainted with every man in the constituency. In a new country like Manitoba, we have a large transient population. Young men, farmers' sons and others, come up from Ontario, they work there during the summer, and they often go home for the winter, and sometimes they remain during the winter; and it is very difficult for a registration clerk to decide, without intimate personal knowledge of each individual, whether he is qualified to be placed upon the list. When a member of either party takes the trouble to look that man up and ascertain his whereabouts, find his record, and get a declaration stating the facts, the registration clerk in no case refuses such declaration, providing he has not what he may consider indisputable proof of its being false. The hon. member for Marquette alluded in terms far from complimentary to the present Government in Manitoba. He alluded to their "erratic legislation during the past ten years which made the world wonder." I fancy that some of the legislation of that body made the hon. gentleman, among other denizens of this world, do a little wondering, and they have not got over their wonderment yet. The erratic legislation of that province, as he terms it, has been such that during the past ten years its effects have been felt all through that province in the increased prosperity and freedom from litigation of the people who reside there. There is no doubt whatever that any hon. gentleman who is conversant with the facts, knows that the legislation of that province during the last ten years has been such as almost to deprive the lawyers of a living; the erratic legislation of that country has been such as almost to drive sheriffs and bailiffs out of the business. There is little or no legal work or litigation going on at the present time, simply because of the wise and prudent legislation on behalf of the farmers and settlers in that country, which has been placed upon the Statute-books of that province during the last ten years. If the hon. gentleman were to compare the legislation of the last ten years with that of the decade which preceded it, he will find a remarkable difference in favour of the present Administration. The hon. gentleman alluded to the fact that Mr. Greenway redeemed his ante-election pledge by passing an Act in 1889 which only remained on the Statute-book for one year. That Act provided for the making up of the lists by municipal clerks. As he says, there was no general election held upon that Act, but there were one or two by-elections held upon it, and it was found that the lists made up by the municipal clerks in these elections were so bad that it was utterly impossible to keep that Act upon the Statute-book. They were the worst lists we ever had in the province of Manitoba, either before or after Mr. Greenway's accession to office, and I am sure that is saying a great deal, because the lists previous to the advent of the Greenway Government to power, were bad enough in all conscience. The cases to which he alluded where whole nationalities were left off the lists, are rather remarkable. I did not catch which nationality it was that was left off in North Winnipeg, perhaps the hon. gentleman will tell us.

Mr. ROCHE. The Hebrew voters.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Well, as a rule you don't catch a Hebrew asleep, and I fancy that these Hebrews must all have been asleep for three months if they were left off the lists in North Winnipeg, because they had every opportunity to be put on. There was first, a month's proclamation during which the list was being made up, and then there were six weeks following the proclamation of the revising officer, and during the whole of that time it was surely possible for some good Conservatives to go around and wake his Hebrew friends up, and get their names put upon the list. I think these grievances to which the hon. gentleman alludes, if they were all ventilated, would be found to have as little basis as this one. He says that the Icelandic vote was all upon the list. The reason of that is that the Icelander is a strong Liberal. He comes from Iceland with strong Liberal proclivities, and he is wide-awake, he is not asleep when the list is being made up, and he invariably sees that his name is put upon the list. I am sure that no sleeping Icelanders are found. Then the hon. gentleman talks about the printing of the lists being sent from one constituency to another. Well, the argument I used in regard to the revising officers applies also in the case of the printing offices. These small printing offices throughout the rural constituency, as is well known, are not capable of printing more than one or at the outside two lists in the short time that is afforded them, and the lists have to be sent in some cases outside of the constituency in order that they may be printed, and it may have happened that a little delay was occasioned in one or two instances on that ground. But during the whole time I have lived in Manitoba and since the Greenway Administration came into office we have heard complaints in respect to this Act; but having looked into the grievances and having had them properly aired on the floor of the legislature and elsewhere, they have turned out to be nightmares of the imagination in a great many cases. The system of preparing lists in Manitoba is a fair and equitable system, and I have heard very little reason for complaint against it. The hon. gentleman has stated that the strength of the Greenway Government in the legislature is not at all indicative of its strength in the province. The hon. gentleman probably knows a good deal about that sort of thing, more than the rest of us; but it is a rather remarkable fact that we have had two general elections in Manitoba since Mr. Greenway's Cabinet came into power, and his opponents have diminished in numbers and become smaller, and I may say beautifully less.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is due to the effect of a bad voters' list.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. I must say that it does not reflect favourably on the Conservative party in Manitoba when they have ample opportunity of taking their share in the preparation of the lists, and fail to do so. As a matter of fact ever since 1887 and

Mr. RUTHERFORD.

1888, when the Conservatives in Manitoba realized that the Norquay Government was a corrupt Administration, a large number of them have been supporting Mr. Greenway. It is well known in Manitoba that Mr. Greenway owes his power and strength not only to the Liberal voters but also to the Conservatives, who are well satisfied with his administration of provincial affairs. The hon. gentleman has suggested that as the North-west Territories were being left out of the operation of this Act, Manitoba should also be left out. That is a suggestion almost worthy of the source from which it springs. I like to hear a man coming from Manitoba suggesting that the privileges we have obtained in that province should be cast aside, and we should return to the system which is found necessary in less civilized and less educated portions of the Dominion to the west. The hon. gentleman need have no fear in regard to the working of the Manitoba Franchise Act as regards the elections of the Dominion. The hon. gentleman will find, if he will take the local lists for Marquette, which he represents and for the local constituencies embraced in that large Dominion constituency, that they will be infinitely more satisfactory to him or to any other man as an honest expression of popular opinion than the lists which have so long disgraced the Dominion Statute-book. The hon. gentleman will find names on the Dominion lists of men who were dead when the lists were made up; he will find names repeated and repeated, names repeated three or four times on the same page, and that the names of many men who are fully entitled to be on the list have been omitted. If the hon. gentleman will take the last list, and look at the names of the young men on the local list, which was made up only twelve months after the Dominion lists, he will find scores of names that are on the local and not on the Dominion lists. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Heyd) alluded to the fact that in the Conservative press he had been taunted with the insinuation that the graveyards had given up their dead. We all know about that insinuation. I want to inform the hon. gentleman that the Grits have not a monopoly of the cemeteries, because it will be found that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the so-called graveyard voters do not support the Liberal party. I have now briefly dealt with the arguments of the hon. member for Marquette. I hope he will reconsider his opinion in regard to the provincial voters' lists. I am sure the more he learns about that list, the better he will like it, and the more thoroughly he goes into an extensive examination of the trumped-up charges against that list, the more he will be satisfied that the provincial law is a fair and satisfactory law and that the lists prepared under it are infinitely to be preferred to those made up under this infamous law, which I am glad the leaders of political parties are willing to have wiped from the Statute-book of the Dominion.

Mr. MOORE. At this late hour I rise with very much hesitation to place my views on record on this very important Bill which is now before us and to which our attention is directed. That it is an important measure will be admitted when we consider that it will affect the political status of the rights and liberties of every elector from one end of the country to the other. I have listened with considerable interest to the speeches made during the evening from the other side of the House, and I desire to offer a few remarks in regard to some of those speeches to which I entertain objection. I not only object to the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McClure), but also the spirit in which his statements were made. It would seem, in his opinion, that there is not an honest Conservative in the Dominion. I cannot believe that human nature is very different in a Conservative from what it is in a Liberal, and I cannot but believe that both parties contain honest and respectable men. The hon. gentleman challenged any member to stand up in his seat and state that he is in favour of the principles of the Franchise Act. Although we may not agree in regard to its details, although we may have some differences as to the manner in which it operates, although we may have objections regarding the expenditure that has been made in carrying out that Act, yet I can stand here and declare that the principle of the Franchise Act, which has been in force twelve years, has been good, and was designed to act in the interests of the electors of this country. What are the principles of the present Franchise Act? As I can understand them, from reading the discussions which took place from 1883 until that Bill was passed, the principles of that measure are, that this House should have control of the franchise, the control over making up the electoral lists and uniformity in the qualifications of voters throughout the various provinces of the Dominion. I do not believe there are many hon. gentlemen in this House, on either side, who will not admit that uniformity is a desirable thing, and that this Parliament should maintain control over the franchise under which this House of Commons is constituted. I was somewhat amused at the vigour with which the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McClure) handled the Conservative party, and it struck me that he was somewhat in the position of the old lady in a Presbyterian church which was feeling very badly about the wrangling among its members, and who came to the conclusion that she and the minister were the only two in the church who would be saved, and she sometimes had her doubts about the minister. One would conclude, from the language of the hon. gentleman (Mr. McClure), that he and the Liberal party were the only ones in this country who would be saved, and some might say that he had reason to have doubts about the Liberal party. I heard one time, of an old gentleman who was upon his death-bed. He had two wives, who were both buried, and, when he came to direct how his body should be laid, he wanted to be placed between his two wives; but he said he liked Mary the better, and consequently he would like the undertaker to twist his neck in her direction. It would appear, from the manner in which the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McClure) has spoken of the Conservative party, that when he dies, he would like to have his neck twisted not a little towards the Liberals.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Rutherford) who last spoke, told us how perfect the voters' lists were in Manitoba and how impartial was the manner in which the franchise law was administered there. He treated the question in a fluent and familiar manner, and I am certain he spoke as he thought; but no matter how perfect the Manitoba lists may be, they do not guard against the defects of the lack of uniformity and the control of the franchise by this Parliament. Both of these important principles being sacrificed in the Bill now presented to this House. It is the lack of uniformity we complain of, and the lack of control by this House over the most sacred right which the constitution confers upon the electors of Canada. The franchise is a sacred right, and it should be exercised by those who are placed in possession of it, as a sacred trust. The electoral franchise, the vital principle in a representative Government was secured after a long and persistent struggle. The agitation at last gave Canada a responsible Government, and she can now boast of as great a measure of civil, political and religious freedom as is enjoyed by any country in the world.

I maintain that it should be considered as a sacred right and a sacred privilege which should not be used for mercenary purposes, and which should be devoted only to the object of conserving the best interests of the country in which we live. One of the fundamental principles of responsible government, one of the fundamental principles of this Government ought to be, that every man should stand upon an equal footing before the law. If we apply this principle to the Bill before us, we will find that every man does not stand upon the same footing under this Bill which is now submitted to Parliament. In Ontario, there is manhood suffrage, and a man can vote without any property qualification whatever; in the province of Quebec, there is a property qualification of $300 in the cities, and of $200 in other municipalities; in Nova Scotia, the qualification is $150 real estate, $300 personal and real estate, or an income of $250; in New Brunswick the qualification is personal property to the amount of $400, real estate to the amount of $100 ; in Prince Edward Island, the qualification is an income of $6 a year or performance of the statute labour ; in Manitoba, there is manhood suffrage ; in British Columbia, there is a property qualification, and in all the different provinces the qualification varies in the amount of property necessary to enable a man to vote, and also in the length of residence required in the several provinces. If we adopt these different franchises for the Dominion Parliament, the members from the different provinces will sit in this House as the result of these varied franchises and under different qualifications. The great objection which has been raised by the hon. members opposite to the Dominion Franchise Act is the expense, and I have heard hon. gentlemen opposite treat that question in a manner which has been astonishing to me. I was surprised when I heard the Solicitor General, in introducing this Bill, make the statement, that the Dominion Franchise Act cost, for the four revisions under it, $1,154,000, and then he added half a million dollars more in order to swell the figures to over $1,500,000. I have taken the trouble to look at the Auditor General's Report, and I found that the cost of making out the lists in 1885-86 was $159,882.85 ; in 1886-87, the cost was $193,858.44 ; in 1889-90, the cost was $233,078.35, and in 1894-95, the cost was $239,963.33. The total cost of the revision of the lists since 1885, on the four occasions, was $826,782.97, or, during the twelve years of the operation of the Act, the cost per year was $68,898, and this cost, I may say, could be easily reduced 50 per cent.

It is not to be assumed by hon. members of this House that because it has been an expensive operation in the past, it must of necessity be an expensive operation in the future. There is no difficulty whatever in finding honest and competent men to make up these lists for one-half of what that work has cost in the past. I am in favour of reducing expenditure, but at the same time keeping the lists under the control of this House. We are told by some hon. gentlemen that under this Bill the preparation of the lists will cost nothing, that this duty will be imposed on the officials of the different municipalities, the secretaries of the municipal councils, who will be compelled to make up the lists free of cost. What would be the result ? I think I have some knowledge of municipal matters, from an experience of the last twenty-five years, and I think that the first thing that would be done after this Bill passed, would be that each of the secretaries of the municipal councils who would be required to make up these lists would say, 'I have greater responsibilities put upon me and greater duties to perform, and I must ask for an increase of salary.' Under the circumstances, I think each of these secretaries would require at least an addition of $25 a year. Assuming that there are 2,500 municipalities in the Dominion of Canada that would amount to $625,000. The Government might save that, but the country would not save it. The poor people of the municipalities would be taxed by a direct tax to make up this $625,000 a year. Is it an honourable thing for the members of this House to impose upon the municipalities a burden like that, and to shirk it themselves ? I do not think they would like it to go out to the country that they are shirking this burden and throwing it upon the shoulders of the poor taxpayers throughout the length and breadth of this country. Although I do not wish to be severe upon the hon. gentlemen who take the other view of this question, I think perhaps there may be a little insincerity in their plea of economy. I remember in 1885, when this Bill was discussed in this Parliament, it was opposed very strenuously by the then Opposition. The discussion of the question began on March 18th, and the session was protracted by the Opposition discussing this matter till June 6th. The result was that the members of this House received an indemnity of $1,500, instead of $1,000, increasing the cost by the opposition they made to this Bill by $500 to each member. There are 213 members of this House and 78 senators, and the extra cost of printing and clerks brought up the total extra cost on that occasion to $250,000. That amount would go very far towards making up the lists if they were made in an economical manner. on the principle of retaining their control in the hands of this Parliament, and maintaining the principle of uniformity. I remember also reading not many years ago about a discussion that went on in this House for a long time over a Bill by which a minority in one province were claiming rights under the constitution which were denied to them by some hon. gentlemen opposite. I think that owing to the protracted discussion on that important question and the length that session was increased, cost the people of Canada $150,000 extra. I remember also that last session hon. gentlemen opposite put corn on the free list, and I would like to call attention for a moment to the loss which this country will sustain year by year in consequence of that move.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman ought to confine himself to something like a discussion of the Bill before the House.

Mr. MOORE. I am only referring to that to show that in one case hon. gentlemen are economical and in the other case they have not been economical.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I am afraid a discussion of corn on this question of the franchise would not be in order, and

I would ask the hon. gentleman to confine his remarks as much as possible to the question under discussion.

Mr. MOORE. I will then leave the discussion of that point, that the Government have not shown a great deal of consistency in the matter of economy. I think the Government are capable of devising means by which the cost will be so much reduced as to take away wholly the objections which are urged against the present Franchise Act, while leaving to this House the control of the franchise under which its members are elected. There is another phase of this question to which I would call attention for a moment. That is, that by taking the provincial lists and making them the basis of the Dominion franchise, you throw a political fire-brand, as it were, into every municipality in this country. The result will be that the issues in the municipal elections will be the issues between the different parties in the Federal Parliament. If there is anything that should be avoided in this country it is the introduction of political issues into municipal councils. We have had a great deal of difficulty in our country in avoiding that, and I am quite certain from the experience I have had in municipal matters that if the provincial lists are taken instead of the federal lists, every municipal election will be run on the political issues that exist between the two parties in this House to the great injury of local municipal matters, to which the work of municipal officers should be confined. I need not weary the patience of this House any longer. I think I have said sufficient to put on record my views in opposition to the present measure and in favour of such amendments to the present laws as will make it workable in an economical manner, preserve uniformity, and keep the control of the franchise of this Dominion in the hands of the Government.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 28th March, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

APPOINTMENTS OF NEW SENATORS.

Mr. GILLIES. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the right hon. First Minister to the following despatch, which I find in the public press of the country:—

Ottawa, 25th March, 1898.—(Special.)—The Cabinet is considering a proposal to appoint six Senators at large, in accordance with section 26 of the British North America Act, to help the Yukon Bill on its precarious way through the Red Chamber. The appointments would be required to be sanctioned by the Imperial Government, and to that end negotiations are said now to be in progress. There are two vacancies, so that the Administration may appoint eight supporters of the Yukon Bill before the division.

I wish to ask the right hon. First Minister if there is any truth in this report.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I must tell my hon. friend that if he believes all the yarns published in the newspapers, I cannot help him.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is not an answer.

The PRIME MINISTER. It is to such a question.

GENERAL INSPECTION ACT.

Mr. PENNY moved for leave to withdraw Bill (No. 85) to amend chapter 99 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, being the General Inspection Act.

Mr. SPEAKER. The more regular course would be to wait until the order is called for the second reading of this Bill, and then move to discharge the order and to withdraw the Bill. It is not regular to move for its discharge now.

Mr. PENNY. I bow to your decision, Mr. Speaker.

THE ONTARIO AND RAINY RIVER RAILWAY COMPANY.

The House resumed consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Henderson that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee on Bill (No. 32) respecting the Ontario and Rainy River Railway Company.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. The debate on this small Bill has taken quite a wide scope, and if it be really the intention of the mover of the amendment proposed to press his amendment, I regret that he should have raised such an important question on this Bill. The Bill is merely for the revival of the charter of a railway company which was incorporated some years ago and whose charter is now expired. This company intends to build a short road, of about 80 miles, to fill in the gap that now exists between the Port Arthur, Duluth and Western Railway and the proposed road to be constructed from Winnipeg to the south-eastern portion of the province of Manitoba. It is not a trunk line, but merely a local line of a few miles, intended perhaps to become a part and parcel of the road running from Port Arthur to Winnipeg, which will be a very important road when constructed. While perhaps it is well for this House to consider the advisability of assuring some facilities for freight and traffic over this road, I think it would be unfair to attach to this small link obligations that should more properly be imposed on the trunk line, such as the one that is to be constructed between Port Arthur and Winnipeg. My hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) intends to move that freight rates on this road shall be specific and that the fares shall be restricted to 2 cents a mile. And, as an example of the propriety of such action, he cites the case of the New York Central road being compelled to adopt that restriction because a part of the road of that great line had been thus restricted by the local legislature of the state. But there is a vast difference between the position of the New York Central Railway, running through a thickly populated district, and a road running through a portion of the Lake of the Woods country, having to cross the lake at different points upon islands and traversing a district with practically no population. I believe that it is the duty of this House, when granting subsidies to railway companies, to impose certain obligations upon these companies in order to protect the public interest. But in this case we are not asked to vote a subsidy to this road; we are merely asked for the extension of this charter and to give the company facilities so that this road may be constructed; and these facilities will be impaired if we attach to this charter any such restrictions as those my hon. friend from East York proposes to move after this Bill shall have reached committee.

My hon. friend (Mr. Maclean) has treated this case as if we were now asked to incorporate a road from Port Arthur to Winnipeg. He has spoken about a subsidy having already been granted to the Port Arthur, Duluth and Western. He has also spoken of a probable subsidy that the legislature of Manitoba may be called upon to vote for the Manitoba and South-eastern. But, Sir, these questions are not before this House. We are not aware of the intention of the Manitoba Government. It is only upon hearsay that we know that the subsidy will be granted, and we do not legislate in this House upon hearsay. So, it would be improper, I contend, for us to impose upon this small road any conditions that will prevent its construction, because in that way we may prevent the construction of a trunk line between Port Arthur and Winnipeg. The province of Manitoba is looking for a new road to connect with the great lakes. We desire the construction of that road, and we are ready to make some sacrifices in order to secure its construction. But my hon. friend from East York says: If you pass this Act, you will facilitate the building of a road which will be merely a branch of the Canadian Pacific. That is another supposition, Mr. Speaker. The fact that it is reported that Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann are at the bottom of this enterprise, that they are the promoters of the construction of this road, does not justify us in assuming that these gentlemen represent the Canadian Pacific Railway. But, be that as it may, whether the road is built by Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, or even by the Canadian Pacific Railway, I say let us have the road, and when the legislature of Manitoba is called upon to assist the construction of the Winnipeg and South-eastern, which will be part of the trunk line I referred to, it will be for the legislature to dictate the conditions upon which that subsidy shall be granted, and upon that legislature will rest the responsibility for whatever action may be taken by this company in constructing that road. Therefore, I say we are merely asking today for the revival of that charter that the company had, and this is not the proper occasion for us to impose upon this company any such regulations as those suggested by my hon. friend from East York.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, I desire to point out that there is already in the proposed Bill a clause which covers the case entirely and renders unnecessary the suggestion of my hon. friend from East York. I read clause 4 of the Bill as passed by the Railway Committee of this House. It reads as follows:—

4. Any Act hereafter passed for the purpose of controlling railway companies incorporated by or subject to Parliament as to the issuing of stock or bonds, and as to rates or tolls and the regulation thereof, and as to running powers over or other rights in connection with the railway of any company by any other company, and the exercise of powers conferred upon railway companies, shall apply to the company from the time such Act goes into effect; but this section shall not be construed to imply that such Act would not apply to the company without the enactment of this section.

Well, Sir, by this section the power rests with the Government under the General Railway Act to fix the rates and to give running powers over this line to any other company which wishes to avail itself of these privileges. I will not object that other companies should have running powers over that line.

Under such circumstances I say it would be but fair to confine ourselves to allowing this company to revive its charter, and if, later on, this House or any other House should be called upon to grant subsidies for the construction of that road, then it will rest with such House to restrict or to fix the conditions upon which such aid should be granted. During the course of this debate references have been made to the exorbitant freight rates that have been charged by railway companies in Canada. Well,

Sir, I think it is a great mistake that this House should be the echo of all the complaints that are made against our railways in general, be it the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Grand Trunk Railway or any other railway. I think that our railways in Canada are national concerns, and they have a right to be protected by this Parliament.

Mr. MACLEAN. What about the people?

Mr. LaRIVIERE. The people, Sir, are just as you educate them. If you tell them that they are robbed, they will believe it, even though it is not the case. Every session we have acts of one kind or another, merely in order to suit the convenience of a class of people who would like to ride on railways without paying their fare. I am convinced, after looking into this particular case, that this House should not single out this line of railway and attach to it any such restrictions as are proposed by my hon. friend. If we want to nationalize our railways and put them under the direct control of this Parliament, let that be the subject of general legislation. But while other Bills are going through this House to which we attach no restrictions, and to the contents of which we pay no attention, why should we make an exception in this case, a road which, as I said before, is merely a small link of a trunk line, and which in no way will affect the two ends of it, even if this amendment should be accepted by the House. The restrictions that are proposed by my hon. friend will only apply to about 80 miles of the road, while that part from Port Arthur to the end of the road on the one side, and from Winnipeg to the end of the road on the other side, will not be affected at all by the legislation that we are asked to enact to-day. I therefore hope that my hon. friend will keep his amendment, and make it part of a more general provision that will apply to all roads, instead of restricting it to this short line.

Mr. OLIVER. With reference to the remark of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière), that members who from session to session trouble the House in regard to railroad questions, are actuated by a desire to ride free upon the railroads. I would like to say, as one of the members who have troubled the House from time to time on this question, and who proposes, as long as he is a member, to continue to trouble the House from time to time on it, that it does not appear to me that those who are antagonizing the railroads, are so likely to secure personal advantage, as those who are supporting railroads on this question. It would seem to me that members of this House who stand up from time to time and support the interests of the railroad companies against the interests of their constituents, are rather more likely to be bidding for free transportation than members who are opposing those companies in the interests of their constituents. In regard to the line in question, I desire to take issue with the hon. gentleman when he says, that it is only a local line, that an exception should not be made in regard to it, and that this kind of regulation should not be applied to this line, inasmuch as it is a local line, but should only be applied to it in a general way when we come to deal with the question in a general way. I would say that in my humble estimation this is not merely a local line; the construction of this line and its regulation after construction, is not only a local question. If this road is built without the proposed restriction, it will be too late when we come to deal with the matter in a general way, to provide those restrictions in regard to this road which are absolutely necessary to the welfare and prosperity, not only of the constituency which the hon. gentleman represents, but also of the other constituencies extending to the Rocky Mountains. I will here say that it is too late to lock the stable after the steed is stolen. This is the last chance that the North-west Territories and Manitoba have of securing relief from railroad monopoly—that is to say the last chance in sight. It is the last chance, it appears to me, that the manufacturing and the commercial interests of eastern Canada will have to put themselves in a position to compete advantageously for the Manitoba and the North-west market, with the manufacturing and commercial interests of the eastern, central and western States, which at the present time are crowding the manufacturing and commercial interests of eastern Canada, to a certain extent, out of their legitimate market in the west, and are thereby hampering and strangling those interests in eastern Canada. So I say it is within the duty of any member of this House, when he sees and knows, and can prove, that the interests of both western and eastern Canada are being injured by the condition of affairs at present existing, I say it is his duty to find out the position of affairs and to suggest a remedy. Now, I say this remedy is the proper public control of this road about to be built between Lake Superior and the Red River, by the public money of this Dominion and of the several provinces. I believe that what the people pay for they should control; that if the people pay for a railroad they should have the benefit of that road. I am here to say, Mr. Speaker, that the people are not receiving a fair share of benefit from the railroads of this country, for the construction of which they have paid their good money, and are paying it every day. I am perfectly willing to agree that there are local interests connected with this road. There are mines that require to be developed, that will be developed provided this road is built, and provided it is properly controlled. But I absolutely deny the proposition that the mere construction of a road in any part of this Dominion necessarily means the development of either the mineral or agricultural interests of the country affected. We in the North-west Territories have altogether too much reason to know that this is not a fact, to consider it necessary to argue it for a minute. So I say, that even if the province of Ontario has only a direct local interest in the building of a certain section of this road for the purpose of developing its mining interests in the Rainy River districts, even the province of Ontario, in so far only as its local interests are concerned, is deeply interested in having this road properly controlled in respect to its rates and its management. This is especially the case when the province of Ontario is willing to contribute from its funds to the extent which it has declared its willingness to contribute on behalf of this road, and when the Dominion of Canada, of which the province of Ontario forms such an important part, is also willing to contribute towards the construction of this road for the benefit that it is expected will flow from its construction to all ends of the Dominion; and particularly if the province of Manitoba is also willing to sanction a bonus towards the construction of this road for the sake of the benefits that it is supposed will accrue to the province of Manitoba. When we find the Dominion and two of its great provinces entering into a combination to furnish funds for the construction of certain portions of this road, that is all this House and the country require to show that it is more than a matter of local interest, and it should be dealt with on broader lines than if it were a matter simply of local interest.

I am strongly in favour of the suggestion of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) in demanding that there shall be given running powers over this road to other railway companies, and that this Government shall have the right to control the rates of this road. But I wish to point out to the House that the mere assertion of a right to control does not necessarily mean effective control; but when you say the Government of Canada shall have the right to control the rates on this road, and shall have the right to control the granting of running powers to other companies over the road, your assertion of control does not mean anything unless terms can be secured in respect to the rates and running powers which will be beneficial to the people; an assertion of control does not mean anything unless the conditions are such that, in the nature of things, effective control can be given. In all matters of control in regard to the running of railways comes in the broad question of the right of capital to earn a return on the investment; and I say when you are dealing with a railway and assume to control the rates over that road, it is not within the right, if it is within the power, of this Parliament, to control those rates irrespective of proper and reasonable earnings on the capital for which this road has been pledged. So that unless you provide something more than the mere assertion of the right of control, which I suppose in this day and generation no one will question, you are practically not one step nearer securing for eastern and western Canada those reduced freight rates which are necessary for their increased prosperity, than you were before this provision was inserted in the charter. Any legislation, then, in regard to railways which does not take into consideration a provision in some way against the over-capitalization of the railroad or providing some way that there shall be a clear understanding from the very beginning of the granting of the charter that the country shall not be compelled to pay interest on more than a certain amount of money—unless that is inserted in the charter and there is an understanding from the very beginning—you are compelled to allow the road to earn dividends on the capital invested in it. I do not think that the people of the country are aware of the load of debt which they are carrying in regard to the railways of the Dominion; for let it be remembered that for the railways the people of the Dominion are paying interest, from year to year, on the capital invested and as a matter of fact are taxed with this tremendous burden. The people of Canada, and I as a citizen of the Dominion, do not wish to be understood for an instant as desiring in any way to avoid the giving of a profitable return on any capital that is legitimately and properly invested in the interests of this Dominion. We want capital for the development of Canada. Then, we must treat that capital honestly; we must be willing that the capital shall earn its proper dividend. So I say, when you put simply a provision in a railway charter stating that the Government shall have the right to regulate rates, you do not thereby get away from the necessity of allowing the railway to charge such rates as will give a proper return on the capital invested in it; unless you have an understanding at the very beginning of the granting of a charter.

In proof of what I say, let me read a few figures. I have been looking into the returns of the Railway Department for the last year. I find in these returns that the Canadian Pacific Railway is credited with 3,436 miles of road; that the paid-up shares of that company are $65,000,000; that the preferential shares are $8,370,666; that bonds have been issued to the amount of $102,887,717; that the Dominion Government have granted aid to the amount of $25,080,000; that the province of Manitoba has granted aid to the amount of $277,377; that the province of British Columbia has granted aid to the amount of $37,500; that municipalities have granted aid to the amount of $497,500; that the total amount of money so invested in the Canadian Pacific Railway upon which the people of Canada have to pay interest directly or indirectly, is $202,110,760. I find that the total cost of the railway, 3,436 miles, as stated in the return, was $162,544,853, and that the country is paying interest on $39,565,910, which is not represented in the construction of the road; that as a matter of fact, Canada is not only bearing the interest on the total cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but is paying interest on $40,000,000 more than the railway cost; that when we talk of controlling the rates on the Canadian Pacific Railway, we are compelled to take into consideration the fact that those rates are entitled to be so adjusted as to pay earnings on $40,000,000 more than the total cost of the road. More than that. I do not find it in the railway returns, but hon. gentlemen will bear me out when I say that over and above the cost as laid down must be considered the cost of the sections between Winnipeg and Thunder Bay and the first section of the road in British Columbia, both of which were constructed at the cost of the Dominion and handed over to the Canadian Pacific Railway as part of the company's grant. The cost of those sections amounted to about $40,000,000. So that instead of paying interest on $40,000,000 more than the Canadian Pacific Railway cost, we are paying interest on $80,000,000; and then we wonder that the rates on the Canadian Pacific Railway are high, and we still hope to control those rates by merely inserting a clause in a new Act providing that we shall have control of them! I hold that no clause inserted in any Railway Act now or at any future time has any right to control the earning power of those $80,000,000 any more than the capital invested in any other part of the road. Admitting that we have the right of control, we are still $80,000,000 away from getting where we ought to be in the matter of rates over the Canadian Pacific Railway.

But there are other cases. The Calgary and Edmonton road is 295 miles long. I find from the railway returns that bonds have been issued in regard to that railway to the amount of $5,458,940 bearing 6 per cent interest; I find that the share capital of that company paid up is $1,000,000; I find that the subsidy granted annually by this Parliament to that road is $80,000, which if capitalized will amount to $1,000,000; or in other words, the Calgary and Edmonton Railway stands to this country as $7,458,940, and the cost of the railway as set forth in that return is $3,717,882. Therefore in the case of this railway 295 miles in length, this country is paying interest on $3,741,062 more than that railroad cost. That is to say, for every dollar that that railway cost this country is paying interest on two dollars.

Now, Mr. Speaker, do we reach the end we desire to reach by merely inserting a clause in the General Railway Act providing for the control of rates over the Calgary and Edmonton road? I say, Sir, that so long as we have to pay interest on two dollars for every dollar that railway cost, so long we cannot get these rates down to the basis they should be on, in order to give to the people of the Dominion a fair return for the money they have invested in that road. But there are others. The Qu'Appelle, Long Lake and Saskatchewan Railway is something like 250 miles in length. The share capital paid up of that railway company is $201,000; the bonds issued are $3,809,140 and that railway receives $80,000 a year subsidy which capitalized will reach, roughly, $1,000,000; so that that railway stands to this country as $5,010,140, and I find that the cost of the road is $2,539,600; or in other words, we are paying interest in regard to that railway on $2,470,540 for which we have received no value. Again we are paying on that road, as on the Calgary and Edmonton road, interest on two dollars for every dollar invested. And there are still others; but I will not trouble the House to refer to them. The point I make is this: That the question of railway rates in this country is tied up with the question of the bonding of the railroad, of the power to raise money upon the railroad; and that we must go to the root of the evil and cut off the right to bond these roads for more money than is actually used in constructing them. Until we do that our legislation is only a matter of form, there is no substance to it. And in regard to this Rainy River road it is of the last degree of importance to both eastern and western Canada that we shall have the very lowest rates in order that we of the west may get our grain and products to the east at the lowest cost, and in order that those in the east shall be able to compete in the markets of the west with their rivals across the line, rivals who are getting the benefit of the very lowest railway rates and to whom these lowest rates are given by virtue of the existence of this very Canadian Pacific Railway, for which the people of Canada are paying interest on $80,000,000 more than it cost. In order to get that benefit of rates which will enable this eastern country to compete against such unfavourable influences, it is necessary that it should be provided in this charter we are discussing now, that we should not be compelled to pay interest on one dollar more than the road actually cost. In support of my contention, Mr. Speaker, I beg to move, in addition to the amendment of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), and with his consent, the following:—

Mr. SPEAKER. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) permit me to say that there is no amendment before the House. The motion is that I do now leave the Chair. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) when speaking on that motion read an amendment which he said he proposed to move when the House resolved itself into committee. We are not in committee yet, and so the motion before the House is that I do now leave the Chair. When the House resolves itself into committee, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) will have an opportunity to move his amendment.

Mr. OLIVER. In order to get my views before the House as fully as possible, I shall take the liberty of following the example of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), and I shall simply read now to the House, the amendment which I propose to move in committee. It is as follows:—

During the construction of the said railway, the company hereby incorporated shall from time to time deposit with the Minister of Railways as each mile is completed ready for traffic, a statement of the actual cost of the said mile of road, giving such particulars as to the several items of cost as shall be required from time to time by the Governor in Council.

The railway company shall from time to time as required by Order in Council deposit with the Minister of Railways a statement of the earnings of the railway and the expense of carrying it on, including repairs and improvements, for each year or part of year, during which the railway is operated, in such form, and giving such particulars as may be required from time to time by the Governor in Council.

The Governor in Council may, from time to time, fix rates, terms and conditions for the carriage of freight and passengers over the railway of the company, or for the passage of cars or trains other than those of the company over the said railway.

Provided that when the earnings of the railway over and above operating expenses, and cost of repairs and improvements, which improvements must be sanctioned by the Minister of Railways, amounts to over six per cent on the actual cost of construction, less any aid granted by Canada, or by any province or municipality, the Governor in Council may make such reductions in the rates for the carriage of passengers or freight, or for the passage of cars or trains, other than those of the company over its tracks, as may be necessary to bring the net earnings within six per cent on the above mentioned net cost.

Provided always that the rates specified in section — of this Act shall govern until a reduction becomes necessary as above herein provided.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose that your ruling prevents a general expression of opinion on the motion now before the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. I had no such intention. I merely pointed out that the hon. member (Mr. Oliver) was moving an amendment to an amendment, which amendment is not yet before the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I had not an opportunity of being present in the Committee on Railways and Canals when this Bill was being discussed, and I rise now for the purpose of asking my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) whether this notice of motion which he has read to the House received the consideration of that committee. As we all know, the Committee on Railways and Canals is a very large committee and it is selected with a great deal of care from gentlemen on both sides of the House who are supposed to give attention to questions of that kind. It relieves the House of a great deal of trouble, and it saves a great deal of the time of Parliament to have a very large and influential committee of that kind to deal with questions so important as those that are brought before it. I wish to ask now, whether the intended motion of the hon. member (Mr. Oliver), as well as the intended motion of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), were discussed before the Railway Committee. No person could listen to the notice of motion which my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver) has just read without feeling that it is a very intricate motion, and that it involves a number of serious and important considerations; and, therefore, I say, if it has not been dealt with by the Committee on Railways and Canals before being brought here, it ought to be dealt with by that committee. Of course, I understand that any member of this House, whether he is on that committee or not, has a perfect right, when the House goes into committee on a Bill, to raise these important questions and have them discussed; but I think it would be interesting for the House to know whether this subject has received the attention of the Railway Committee, because I am inclined to think that the decision arrived at by that committee on a question of this kind would have very great weight with the House when the question is brought up here. I do not mean to say that this House might not overrule the decision of the committee; but, as a general principle, I am sure that the Minister of Railways and gentlemen sitting on both sides of the House will recognize it as a sound one, that it is extremely dangerous for the House, in dealing with the great railway interests of the country, to adopt any conclusion without due consideration on the part of so influential and important a committee as the Committee on Railways. I am not speaking merely with regard to this Bill, but I am speaking of suddenly adopting, with reference to any Bill that may be brought before the House, some decision which does not apply to the general railway system of the country, and which has not received careful consideration and approval by the Railway Committee.

Mr. OLIVER.

Mr. MACLEAN. Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has spoken.

Mr. MACLEAN. The hon. gentleman who preceded me has asked a question, and I wish simply to answer it. I brought up my proposed amendment in the Railway Committee, and I was told there that it was a broad question, which ought to be brought up in the House. The House is the place to settle this issue, which involves the whole transportation question; and it is in order to get the expression of the members upon it that I have brought it up in the House, and I think it ought to be dealt with here and now.

Mr. DAVIN. I am sorry to see that the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) is after his manner not in his place, while a subject is being discussed of the greatest possible interest to Manitoba and the North-west Territories. In regard to this Rainy River Railway, I do not see what is the use of building it unless we go into the question of its rates, because I hold that it is a waste of capital to go on duplicating railways. It was long ago found in England, where railways were, owing to the density of the population, greatly multiplied, that competition was impossible in the case of railways. We find that when the railways do compete, what they do is not to compete on business grounds, but to engage in a war of rates, which they sometimes cut down so low that it is impossible for them to continue them without disaster. Unless we are to leave the railways which we charter free to do as they please, we must make regulations in this House to control their rates, because to look to competition is perfectly vain. I will call the attention of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) to a paragraph in a book on transportation problems by Mr. Hadley, in which the author says:

It is to the credit of English statesmen that they did not deceive themselves in this respect. They learned more in a few years from the workings of a few miles of railroad than the general public has learned from all the railroads of the world in half a century. They recognized that competition could not be relied upon or aimed at with any hope of success.

He refers to the fact, that as early as 1836, Mr. Morrison delivered a remarkable speech, which will be found in the "Hansard" of that year, and goes on:

In the years 1839-1845, several attempts were made to secure railroad legislation, Mr. Gladstone taking an active part in these matters. Beyond a declaration of the right to revise rates, and even to purchase the railroads for state management in the remote future, nothing was actually accomplished.

Now, Sir, I cannot be surprised that any hon. gentleman interested in the country generally, and interested in the North-west Territories particularly, should desire that this railroad, which is ostensibly a competing line with the Canadian Pacific Railway, should, if built, be made a real competing line. If it is not to be made a real competing line, it should not be built at all; because, where you have two lines paralleling each other, and they make arrangements to pool the rates, which is the usual course with railways, it is a waste of capital, and there is no reason why this House should give $6,400 a mile to build a railway through a country which is practically served at the present moment. I agree with my hon. friend from Provencher (Mr. LaRivière), who states that this railroad has no connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway. I find in the "Globe," of March 10th, an authoritative statement that this railway is to be built having a view to some political action of Mr. Greenway. This writer says that this railway is one by means of which Mr. Greenway is to give competition to the Canadian Pacific Railway; and, taking up the statement that Mr. Mackenzie, who is running the railway, is in the confidence of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and may one day turn it over to the Canadian Pacific Railway, this writer assures us, on the authority of the "Globe," which the Ministry will, of course, take for granted, that it has no connection at all with the Canadian Pacific Railway. We may, therefore, assume that it is intended to be a competing line with the Canadian Pacific Railway; and here are the sums which have been voted for it: in 1895, $115,000; in 1897, $258,000; and in 1898, $420,000. The other road was subsidized in 1892 for $28,000, and in 1897 the Dominion Government gave what will be $512,000, as a subsidy for this road, and they will give nearly twice as much after certain conditions have been fulfilled. This writer in the "Globe" goes on to indicate how this is going to be a competing line as regards the Canadian Pacific Railway. He says that Mr. Mackenzie also owns the Dauphin Railway, and he explains how this railway will meet the Dauphin Railway; Mr. Mackenzie owns the Hudson Bay Railway also, and he shows that in that way we are going to have competition. The Dauphin Railway has already been subsidized by this Parliament to the extent of 6,400 acres a mile, and a cash subsidy of $40,000 a year for twenty years.

The present Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) in 1896, when a colleague of Mr. Greenway, brought in a Bill guaranteeing the principal and interest of their bonds, to the extent of $8,000 a mile. Is it not a pity that the Minister of the Interior is not in his place to throw some light on the subject? This absence of Ministers from their seats is a thing we have often to complain of, and it would seem as if the right hon. Prime Minister and his colleagues were under the impression, following out the tenor of a remark made by the right hon. gentleman the other day, that there is some analogy between this House and the Congress of Representatives. But, Sir, there is no analogy between them. The Government of this country is a committee of this Parliament, through which we govern the country, and they are bound to be in their places and to give us information when we are discussing important questions of this kind.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.
They are above Parliament.

Mr. DAVIN. They evidently think they are: and of course they will be above Parliament, so long as there is a majority in this House with which they can do what they please. But so long as that is the case, the Opposition are bound to be all the more alert, because there is an air about this particular legislation, and much of the legislation before this Parliament this session, which suggests the necessity of the greatest watchfulness on the part of the Opposition. We have to be watchful, or else the interests, especially of the farmers of the North-west, will be allowed to go by the board. We ought to have a declaration of Government policy on this question. We ought to have a declaration from the Minister of Railways what the Government intend to do. If we are going to build this railway, as a Parliament, we ought to insist on a guarantee that it will really be a competing line. What is the object of this amendment of my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean)? It is pretty much what has already been declared by this House in the case of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway and accepted by the Government. When we go into committee, we shall have an opportunity of discussing clauses of this Bill, and I certainly think that we should see, before incurring the expense of building this line, that we have such guarantees as will make it an effective competing line in the interests of the North-west Territories and Manitoba.

Motion agreed to, and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MACLEAN. I did think that before we got into committee, we would have had some statement from the hon. Minister of Railways declaring what action the Government intend to take on the amendment I have proposed. I take it that this amendment is the most important one made this session with regard to railway legislation. It is exactly on the lines of the clause embodied in the Crow's Nest Pass Railway Act, and which, we were told in the Railway Committee the other day by the Minister of Railways, and especially by Sir William Van Horne, would be effective in controlling the rates of that railway when built. If that be the case, we ought to have a declaration from the Government to-day whether they intend to embody a similar clause in this railway Bill. My hon. friend from Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) said this was only a little railway and did not amount to much. In my opinion, it is the most important railway Bill before the people to-day. The Yukon Railway is nothing compared with it. This road, when once built, if control is kept in the hands of the Government, will effectually settle the question of competition with regard to the great North-west. We have also been told by the Minister of Railways that he intends to give the Grand Trunk Railway running powers over this road, if they desire it. Well, Mr. Chairman, I am in a position to say that the Grand Trunk Railway do intend asking these powers, not only as regards this railway, but every other railway that will hereafter be constructed in the North-west with the aid of this Parliament. This is the most important declaration of railway policy ever made in Canada since the Canadian Pacific Railway was built, namely, that the Grand Trunk Railway now intend to go into the North-west and become a competitor of the Canadian Pacific Railway. If that be the case, why not make a provision to-day to give the Government system of railways also running rights over this road. This is not a trivial railway, as the hon. member for Provencher said, but the most important proposition laid before Parliament since the Canadian Pacific Railway was built. It has been said that my amendment will amount to nothing, because what it calls for is practically covered by what is known as the "model clause." But if the model clause is sufficient, how is it the Government had no confidence in it when the Crow's Nest line was being chartered, and inserted a special provision in that Act? I think it is better to make the provision as specific as possible and name the railways which are to have running rights over this line. We are asked why should we specify the rates that ought to be charged. I may answer by putting another question. Why is it that Mr. Greenway proposes to specify the rates in his Bill? We know that he has a Bill before the Manitoba legislature, and according to the "Globe," the whole keynote of his legislation will be that the railway aided by Manitoba shall impose such rates as it specifies. If Mr. Greenway is successful in getting a ten cent rate on grain from Winnipeg to Port Arthur, why can we not incorporate such a rate in this Bill as well? The hon. member for Provencher asked why should we interfere with a small Bill and make the experiment on this small railway. I reply that the only way in which you can get at these railways is by attacking them one at a time. We are not discriminating against this new road, but are laying the ground which will bring all the other roads into line. My experience is that it is too sweeping a proposition to attack all the railways at once. But if you take them up one at a time, you will do something towards making progress to a settlement of the whole question and effectively protecting the public interest. The hon. gentleman says it is only hearsay evidence we have of Mr. Greenway's intentions. But surely the Government will not say that the article of the "Globe," the other day, was not an official declaration, and that it is not Mr. Greenway's intention to secure specified rates in the Bill he proposes to bring down.

Mr. DAVIN.

Another question that the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) raised was in connection with the over-bonding of these railways. It is possible, unless the public interests are protected, to so bond and stock railways that the traffic carried over them simply cannot pay the interest upon the obligations; and it is the duty of Parliament, I take it, somewhat on the lines proposed by the hon. gentleman, to protect the public interest in matters of this kind. I must join with the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) in protesting against the absence of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) from the House to-day. The hon. Minister knew that this discussion was coming up, and he knew that the North-west had a vital interest in this question. He knew that his old colleague, Mr. Greenway, was introducing legislation and fixing specific rates in that legislation, and he, as a representative of the North-west, ought to secure the same rates here, in the Dominion legislature.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. He was here, but went away.

Mr. MACLEAN. If he were here and went away, that does not improve it; it is not to the hon. gentleman's credit, unless he has strong business reasons for it, that he is not in his place to-day to say what the views of the people of the North-west are with regard to this proposition. And, later on in the discussion, I may take the opportunity to say something further with regard to this amendment of mine. But I wish to point out now, that the clause I propose to put in this Bill is the clause that the Government said it was in the public interest to enact with regard to the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, on the ground that the Crow's Nest Pass Railway was largely subsidized by Canada. On the same ground, the clause should be put in this Bill, because this is a road that will be built almost entirely with public money. Moreover, it is a road that commands the situation between Port Arthur and Winnipeg, and, if it is built with public money, it ought to be controlled entirely by the people of Canada, in whose interest it is built.

On section 1,

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). I just wish to draw the attention of the House to something I was speaking of the other night—the last section of this clause:

And if the railway is not then completed, then the powers granted to the company shall cease and be null and void as respects so much of the railway as then remains uncompleted.

I think this is a very important clause, indeed. Now, I have noticed that, in every railway charter passed by this House for years and years, this same provision appears, and I know that we in the west have suffered by this clause being inserted in that way. This company will, doubtless, ask for a bonus from the Dominion Government to build the road. They are already getting a bonus from the Ontario Government and one from the Manitoba Government. If they enter into an agreement with this Government to build the road from Port Arthur to Winnipeg, or any other point, there should be some means to compel them, in consideration of this bonus, to carry out the contract in the interest of the people. The very fact that they prepare to build from Port Arthur to Winnipeg, arouses the sympathy of many hon. members, and they are prepared, on account of having a competing line, to vote for a cash bonus, because it is supposed that the road is actually to be built from Port Arthur to Winnipeg. But supposing, when they have built half way, they should then strike some good mining locations, and make the road pay well up to that point, but see no profit in building further, they will undoubtedly stop construction. The Government can do nothing except cancel the balance of the charter, so far as it relates to the uncompleted portion of the road. I claim that, if the people of this country put money into a railway, there should be provision in the Bill to compel the parties to carry out the contract and complete the whole of the road. I pointed out last night the case of the Manitoba and North-western. These parties got a charter to build the line from Portage la Prairie to the Saskatchewan River, close to the town of Prince Albert, and received from this country a large land grant of 6,400 acres per mile. As soon as they got to the boundary of the province of Manitoba, up to which point the country was thickly settled and the land grant valuable, they stopped construction. So the road has remained for several years, and the Government has no means to force them to complete the road to the banks of the Saskatchewan. All the Government can do under this clause is to cancel the balance of their charter, as is provided here, and no other company could be got to complete the road as there would be no outlet. The fact that these people stopped the construction of this road at Yorkton, has kept thousands and thousands of people out of that country and has been the means of causing several hundreds of the best settlers we ever had in the North-west Territories to leave the country. As these people get public money to build this road, there should be some means to compel them to fulfil their contract. Now, this proposed road, the Rainy River road, is, I take it, to be a competing road. I was never in favour of duplicating roads, because I do not believe you can get real competition unless you put in the charter provisions to compel them to carry freight at certain prices. Otherwise, the old road and the new one will make a deal, and the result is that the people will suffer. In this case, we have the Canadian Pacific running from Winnipeg to the head of Lake Superior. But under the terms of their charter, I believe, the Government have no control over the road and no control over the rates. For that reason, the Government of the province of Manitoba, also the Government of the province of Ontario and this House propose to subsidize another road to give the people of the west relief. But, I submit, we should see to it that we give substantial relief, because, if we do not provide against it, these parties will pool and charge high freight rates, and the people will be no better off. If some provision could be made, as in the case of the Crow's Nest Pass, to give the Government control of the rates and also to give running power to other companies over this road, we should have protection; for then the Government would be in a position, if extortionate rates were charged, to force the company to do what is right. But, if the Bill is passed as proposed here, I do not see that we are going to be in any better position than we were before, even though we have given millions of public money to build the road. I regard this as a very important road, because it is a link in another transcontinental line. At the present time we have the Intercolonial coming into the city of Montreal, and I submit, that the Bill providing for that was the best piece of legislation passed last session, notwithstanding all that was said against it. Montreal is the great commercial centre of this country, and, if the Intercolonial is to pay, it must get into Montreal. Moreover, this gives a connection with the Canada Atlantic Railway and the Ottawa, Arnprior and Parry Sound Railway, so that we have an independent road, practically, to the great lakes.

We have heard a great deal about the reduction in rates made by the Canadian Pacific Railway in carrying wheat from Fort William to the city of Montreal, but we have not looked into the reasons why that reduction was made. But it is easy to see what the reasons are, because they saw independent elevators were going up on Parry Sound, and if they waited until spring to remove that wheat, in all likelihood a great deal of it would find its way into those elevators and the Canadian Pacific Railway would not get it; so they reduced the rates in order to move it before navigation opened. Now, I say we have a through competing line from the seaboard to Parry Sound. If we get this Rainy River road built we are going to have a competing line to the city of Winnipeg, and after that we have the Manitoba and North-western Railway which will run through the most fertile portion of the North-west Territories, and that will be built or should be built in a very short time on to Edmonton and the Yellow Head Pass, which will give us a competing line to the mountains and later to the Pacific Coast. Now this link under discussion runs through a country where it is very expensive to build a railway, and if a Government subsidy is given to that link the Government should see that the west is safeguarded. There is no trouble about the prairie country; we can construct our roads very cheaply there and there will be no trouble in that respect. I think the Government should take this into consideration, and should see that when we are giving so large an amount of money for the construction of this road, they should not do it without safeguarding the people of the west. I have not seen Mr. Greenway's Bill, but I understand that he is bringing in a Bill to provide that a certain rate will be charged for grain, cattle, and all kinds of produce we ship out, and for everything we bring into the country; and I submit that something should be put into this charter to protect us in that way.

Mr. MACLEAN. Apparently there is no opposition to this Bill on the part of hon. members, and if the Government are favourable, it should go right through.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. You are the only opposition to the Bill.

Mr. MACLEAN. Only to the amendment. In the meantime I wish to point out that this railway has been bonused for several years, and why has it not been commenced yet? Not because it has not had a bonus from the province of Ontario, and not because it did not get large bonuses from this Parliament last year. But it may be that there is an arrangement with a certain railway that it shall not be built, and that the people of the North-west shall not get this competition which has been promised them. That is a matter that could be arranged. As we are dealing with this clause, we ought to see not only that the road is begun now, but that it be completed at the earliest possible date if it is to give the relief that has been promised to the people of the North-west.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I want to point out to my hon. friend who has been discussing this clause, and to the House, that probably no railway Bill ever passed the committee or the House with the limited restriction that there is in this Bill. The conditions are that they shall commence to work on or before the 1st of August next of this year, and complete the first 80 miles which has been bonused within two years. Now in a country such as this road passes through where it is expensive to build a road, the House will see that this is a very limited restriction. Further, the clause provides that the whole road is to be built within four years. I cannot understand any hon. gentleman taking exception to this clause, because I believe I am safe in saying that no railway, or no work of this kind, ever passed this House with so limited a restriction placed in the Bill by the Railway Committee.

Mr. DAVIN. Would my hon. friend say what is the force of the arrangement that the road should be built within four years ?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not think that the ex-Minister of Railways, the Minister of Railways and Canals, and the House, should take any serious notice of this factious opposition. We know that there are serious matters that require careful consideration, and it has always been considered that if a charter became null and void it was a sufficient reason why the balance of the road should not be built, and I do not know any other penalty that could be put upon them that would likely be so effective as that one. I am surprised at my hon. friend from York (Mr. Maclean), discussing an amendment that has never been brought before the House, and complaining that the Government and its supporters have not expressed any view upon it. It has not reached that stage where an amendment could be proposed. It is true that the hon. gentleman gave notice that on the third reading he proposed to do such a thing, but we have never reached the stage where the amendment that is being discussed has ever been proposed, or has been practically before the committee or the House. I am sure that after the committee understands how this clause was amended by the Railway Committee they will agree that it could not be more restrictive than it is. I think it was the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) who moved this restrictive amendment, and it was adopted in committee for the reason that it was desirable that this work should be prosecuted, because the whole province of Ontario, especially, was deeply interested in it. The manufacturers and merchants of that province are deeply interested in the opening up of this district. It is a mining and agricultural district, and they have been endeavouring for a long time to procure transportation facilities between it and the east. The people of the country appreciate the great importance of this work, and are anxious to have it carried on, and I believe that the contractors, or the company, accepted this limited restriction that is placed in this clause.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. The hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) has referred to the proposal of the Manitoba legislature to bonus this road. Well, I can say that this Bill is to incorporate a road which is entirely within the limits of the province of Ontario, and the province of Manitoba has no power and no authority at all to bonus this road. I say it is a mistake for this House to drag in these outside considerations when we are discussing a Bill for only a small road which begins, I may say, nowhere and ends nowhere. It is said :

Why was not this road built before ? Well, it was not built before, because the Port Arthur, Duluth and Western road was not built before, and because there was no possibility of seeing a road built in Manitoba to meet this road at the other end. Now, it is known that the province of Manitoba intends to secure the construction of a road from Winnipeg to the Lake of the Woods. But the province of Manitoba has nothing to say with regard to the construction of the Ontario and Rainy River Railway, and cannot bonus the same, because it is without the limits of that province.

Mr. CASEY. It is highly proper to discuss the clauses of this Bill in committee, but the whole discussion on the matter has taken a range that seems to me to be utterly irrelevant to the question at issue, not only irrelevant to the clause which my hon. friend suggests, but irrelevant to the whole Bill. Hon. gentlemen have strayed off into a discussion of general railway questions, how railways should be controlled by the Government, how they overcharge the public, and all this sort of thing, as if that was at all germane to the question before the House. What is the question before the House on this Bill ? It is a question simply of extending the time for the completion of a railway which was chartered a few years ago, and which has received bonuses from this Government and from the Government of Ontario. Circumstances have prevented the building of the road hitherto. It is now asked that the time be extended for two years as regards a portion of the road and four years as regards the balance. What reasonable man can see any connection between such a Bill and a question of freight rates, a 2 cent per mile passenger rate, and matters of that kind ? There is absolutely no connection whatever. If this had been a Bill chartering a railway company, there might have been something germane in the contention of the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver), that some railways were given too large borrowing powers. There is, however, nothing in the present Bill in regard to bonding or borrowing powers, and they are not referred to. This is simply a Bill to extend the time for the completion of a road ; and I regard the determined effort made by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) to delay the progress of this Bill by irrelevant discussion as indicating something unfriendly on his part towards the construction of this road. I am very sorry to see that an Ontario member should take a course which can have no effect except that of injuring the prospects of a railway from which Ontario hopes to derive so much benefit. If the hon. gentleman wants to have railways regulated by a railway commission, let him introduce a resolution or Bill to that effect, and it will be discussed. If he desires a 2 cent rate on railways, let him introduce a general measure to that effect. What I want to urge is that hon. members should limit themselves as regards discussion to the clauses as they come up, and let them decide whether the extension of time asked for is proper or not; and we do not want to waste more time in discussing general railway law, which has nothing to do with this private Bill. I want again to protest against the introduction of general principles or general legislation into the consideration of a private Bill.

Mr. BERGERON. I am afraid we are losing time in the discussion of matters that are not germane to the question. The Bill now before the committee has been considered by the Committee on Railways and Canals, and no amendment can be moved, except that of the hon. member for East York, because notice has not been given of other amendments. What we are discussing is the amendment of the hon. member for East York. The member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) moved a motion, which I understand the chairman ruled out of order, and we have no right to discuss it. I only rise for the purpose of pointing out that we are losing time in discussing other amendments.

Mr. FOSTER. I suggest to the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) that he reserve his amendment for the third reading of the Bill. It will consume a great deal of time if we undertake to discuss a principle in committee, as debate is practically unlimited, and the principle can scarcely be said to be germane to any particular clause. I think it is within the right of my hon. friend to discuss the principle of running powers or rates of fare, but we would certainly make much better progress with business if we were to go through the clauses of the Bill, and if my hon. friend moved his amendment on the third reading.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). I beg to move in amendment—

Mr. BERGERON. No amendment has been given notice of.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). My hon. friend can move his amendment on the third reading.

On section 4,

Mr. MACLEAN. I intend that my amendment shall take the place of the 4th section. I again wish to say that I desire as much as any hon. member to see the railway built at the earliest possible moment; but I desire that Government control should be exercised over the road, and the rates should be regulated as it is proposed to regulate the rates and connections of this railway in Manitoba. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) has repeated that this is only a local road. It is an integral part of a transcontinental system. It will run from Lake Superior to the boundary line, and is within the jurisdiction of this Parliament. If it were a local line, it would be dealt with by the province of Ontario. It is a railway that will be rival of the one transcontinental railway we possess to-day; it is a railway which, if care is taken to give running powers over it for the Grand Trunk and the Government system of railways, will secure the much-desired competition in the North-west.

Mr. JAMESON. I am opposed to the amendment because this is not a proper time to bring it before the House. I hold that if the company were asking for a bonus or a concession it would be proper to bring up the amendment at this time. I know the district well. You go by the Port Arthur, Duluth and Western twenty miles west of Lake Superior, and then strike this road. Then you strike a portion of the through route, which may have to go through the United States unless a very expensive bridge is built. Then you strike the Winnipeg and South-eastern Railway to Winnipeg. If it became possible to unite all those charters and make these roads one system, we would have a competitive route to Winnipeg; but at present we are dealing with links in the chain from Lake Superior to Winnipeg. If it should become possible to combine these charters to Winnipeg, then this railway would occupy a very different position from that occupied by the Canadian Pacific Railway. It would be under the provisions of the Railway Act, by which the Government in Council can regulate the rates. There would be no difficulty, if the Governor in Council exercised the power conferred, to control the rates on this road and ensure their reasonableness; and this would do away with the necessity of the present amendment. The next question is that of running powers; and I understand it is the intention of the Government that a clause to that effect will be embodied in every charter where a subsidy is given, that the railway shall be subject to future legislation as to running powers. The following clause is embodied in all the charters which have been granted, and in cases where subsidies may be given to railways hereafter:—

Any Act hereafter passed for the purpose of controlling railway companies incorporated by or subject to Parliament as to the issuing of stock or bonds, and as to rates or tolls and the regulation thereof, and as to running powers over or other rights in connection with the railway of any company by any other company, and the exercise of powers conferred upon railway companies, shall apply to the company from the time such Act goes into effect; but this section shall not be construed to imply that such Act would not apply to the company without the enactment of this section.

We have, therefore, in this section the provision which it is proposed by the amendment to provide; that is to say, the rates will be controlled by the Government, and running powers may be granted to any other railway. We have, then, only to consider the other portions of the amendment, the first of which is, that there shall be a 2 cents a mile rate. Now, Sir, I think that would be entirely unreasonable in this case. A 2-cent rate may be all right in the state of New York, but it is less than the rate which is provided for in the very populous states of Minnesota and Dakota, where there is a 3-cent rate. I do not think it would be reasonable to insert a 2-cent rate in this charter, which is for a line through a country where there is a very sparse population. This whole matter is in such a condition that I think it would be wise for this Parliament to wait until they see what is proposed to be done by the legislature of Manitoba. It is announced, I believe, that on Thursday next Mr. Greenway will state what proposition he intends to make with regard to a through line between Winnipeg and Lake Superior, and we in this Parliament should pause until we know something of the intentions of the Manitoba legislature and until we have before us the exact terms of the bargain that is to be made at Winnipeg.

Mr. MACLEAN. I am quite willing that this Bill should stand until we see what is being done by the legislature of Manitoba.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. JAMESON. I contend, that it will be plenty of time for us to discuss this matter when the question of a bonus comes up. I understand that this company is asking for a certain bonus, and when they ask for that bonus, and when there is something to set off against the concessions which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean) is demanding, then we should consider this matter. At present, I do not see that the railway company is demanding anything from us in this Bill. If we were giving any quid pro, then it might be reasonable to make demands upon them; but by this Bill the railway company is merely asking for a reasonable extension of time. They are to begin the railway in August; they are to build 80 miles in two years, and 164 miles in four years, and any one who knows the nature of the country through which the road passes, will agree that that is a very reasonable time in which to complete that railway. I would be quite willing to discuss a motion as to what concession the railway company ought to give when they come before us for a bonus, which, I believe, they intend to ask; but, as the matter at present stands, I intend to vote against the amendment.

Mr. CASEY. I have again to urge that, in the case of a private Bill, it is not proper to insert provisions of this kind. This question was considered before the Railway Committee by men who are accustomed to deal with railway legislation, and the idea was scouted there, and this amendment thrown out. It would be a most irregular and monstrous idea, to jump upon one particular railway out of the number that are chartered here every session, and say that, because the member for East York (Mr. Maclean) wills it, we must put a restrictive clause in the charter of this particular railway.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Do you refer to the running powers?

Mr. CASEY. I am speaking of the restrictive clause as to rates just now; I will speak about the running powers later on. I am prepared to assist any hon. member in impressing on the Government the necessity of regulating railways under the general law, but I will assist nobody in piecemeal, invidious, personal legislation of this kind, in which they try to attach clauses to a private Bill of one particular company, and leave without any restriction the charter of another railway company. Now, as to the running powers, the right to give running powers is, I believe, already conferred on the Government by the Railway Act without any special provision being enacted, but to make it quite certain, the Minister of Railways has added a clause, which is already in this Bill, declaring specifically that this railway shall be subject to any general legislation on that point that may be passed, as well as being subject to the powers of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. I say, Sir, that the clause already in the Bill is perfectly sufficient security as to running powers, and it is every bit as good as, and better than, the clause suggested by the member for East York (Mr. Maclean). That hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean) talks about the Grand Trunk Railway and the Intercolonial getting running powers over his road, but if he will show us how the several hundred miles between the Grand Trunk Railway and the Intercolonial Railway and the end of this road are to be bridged over, it will give more reality to his proposition. Of course, they may get there some time, and if they ever do, then, under the clause of this Bill as it has been drafted, they will be entitled to ask the Government to give them running powers, and the Government cannot refuse to give them running powers over that road, if the general law of the land requires it. I think, Sir, that is sufficient to say on the subject. Let us have general legislation, if necessary, for this purpose, but let us avoid this nagging attempt to choke off—that is what it amounts to—by irrelevant talk one particular privilege which this company is asking for, the privilege of an extension of time to complete this very necessary work.

Mr. MACLEAN. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Jameson) says: Wait until the bonus comes before us. I have been long enough in this House to know how its business is conducted, and I know that these bonuses are brought down at the very last hours of the session, when there is no opportunity given members to discuss them, and when members are sent home, so as not to be here. Under these circumstances, I have seen these railway bonuses jollied along. I have been jollied along too much in connection with railway questions in this House, and I intend to stand up for my rights here, and to maintain my position. If I can to-day discuss this question and bring certain facts before the House, then, Sir, I intend to bring these facts before the House on this question. If the political friends of the hon. gentleman from Winnipeg have any platform in Manitoba, it is, that they are in favour of railway reform and the regulation of railways; but now that gentleman comes down here and says he is not in favour of this railway reform, and he is willing to leave this question to be dealt with by the general Railway Act. Why did not the Government leave it to the general Railway Act, when they built the Crow's Nest Pass road?

Mr. CASEY. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean) allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MACLEAN. No, I don't wish it. I am making my point, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey) can speak afterwards. When the Crow's Nest Pass Railway was dealt with, there was a specific clause inserted in their Bill giving running powers to whatever railways so requesting to go over it. I merely ask that the same clause should be inserted in this Bill. This is not a petty private Bill, as has been said here, but it is a great public Bill, on which the Government ought to declare their policy in regard to these matters, and on which they should take the House into their confidence. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Jameson) says that Mr. Greenway proposes to bring down a Bill and to insert specified freight rates in it. I presume that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jameson) can tell the House a good deal about that, if he wishes to do so. That Manitoba Bill is to be brought before the legislature next Thursday, and let this Bill stand until next Thursday, and we will have the provincial law before us. If the Manitoba legislature can regulate these railway rates, why cannot the Dominion Parliament do the same? I say again, that I want to see this railroad built. I believe it will open up a most valuable mineral section in the province of Ontario. We wish to get into that country this year; we thought the bonus granted last year would have the railway there to-day, but it has not. If the first 80 miles of that road are completed in two years, so much the better for Ontario and the opening up of that country. We not only want a road built in the interests of Ontario, but we want it built in the interests of the whole of Canada, and we want running rights retained on that railway and specified in the Act of Parliament in the interest of the Grand Trunk Railway, in the interest of the Government System of Railways, and in the interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway, if they desire to run that road. If there is any man who ought to be ashamed of himself when he goes back to his constituency, it is the member for Winnipeg (Mr. Jameson), on account of the confession he made here to-day, that he will only protect his province at the tail end of the session, when this bonus is going through. Did he do so last session, when the bonus was going through? Did he raise his voice against that bonus going through without conditions? He sat here and saw this bonus voted and legislation granted, and the railroads got everything, but the people, who have to pay the traffic rates, got nothing, and were not protected in any sense whatever. He condemns the 2-cent a mile clause.

If there is any agitation in the western states which correspond in their standing and industry to our western provinces, it is for cheaper transportation rates. It is true, there will be no great local passenger traffic on this road; but a great transcontinental traffic will pass over it, and it is in the interest of the transcontinental traffic that I wish to provide for the rate of 2 cents a mile; and if that rate is established with regard to this road, it will become the ruling rate over the whole system, which was the result in the case of the New York Central, when a 2-cent rate was fixed for 50 miles. This railway, which has received so much from the public, ought to give the public a reduction in passenger rates. I have told the House before that passenger rates are the one thing that have not been reduced in this country in the last forty or fifty years. All other rates have been reduced; and the proof that a reduction in rates would be in the public interest is found in the fact that to-day, when the railways are running at reduced rates, the trains are crowded. Nobody could get a lower berth in the car I came down in last night. The railways are admitting by their own acts that they can carry people profitably for a cent a mile. When I come and propose that this road should give the public a 2-cent passenger rate, the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) says, you are interfering with one railway and not with another. If he will introduce a general Bill, I will support it; but every time I introduce such a Bill I am told that I am interfering with vested interests. Here is a railway that has no vested interests, but which has received large public subsidies, and I ask that it should make some return to the public in the shape of reduced passenger rates.

Mr. CASEY. What I wished to remind the hon. gentleman of was simply that when he said all this on the motion to go into committee, he promised that he would not repeat it in committee.

Mr. HUGHES. I am glad to see that the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) has returned to his normal condition, and is advocating cheaper rates. But when the Grand Trunk Railway and Canadian Pacific Railway recently undertook to give the people cheaper rates, we found the hon. gentleman getting up and demanding that the Canadian Pacific Railway should be granted running rights to North Bay in order that the former high rates might be restored. Now the hon. gentleman is back again advocating a 2-cent rate on this road. He charges the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Jameson) with not contending that these restrictive clauses should be placed in this Bill last session. This road does not go to Winnipeg, and any amalgamation that may be about to take place, or that has taken place, is entirely subsequent to last session. It will be in the memory of the members of this House that a couple of sessions ago, when a Bill was before this House to give the people of the North-west competing rates, and when the road was to run to the city of Duluth, the hon. member for East York did not stand up in this House and demand that any restrictive clauses should be placed in the Bill to limit the freight or passenger rates. That road was to run to an American port; but this road is to run to a Canadian port, and, forsooth, this opposition is brought up to it. Reference has been made to the Crow's Nest Pass Railway; but when that Bill was before the House, it was stated that there was room for only one railway track in the Crow's Nest Pass between the precipice and the water, and that is one reason why the restrictive clause was inserted. Reference was also made to the Dauphin road, and certain gentlemen have been referred to as having been concerned in it. I want to tell the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) and the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) that it was the Liberal-Conservative party in this House that granted that railway 6,400 acres a mile and $40,000 a year, and not the Manitoba Government.

Mr. DAVIN. The Manitoba Government granted $8,000 a mile.

Mr. HUGHES. No. The Manitoba Government simply guaranteed the bonds. It was the Conservative party in this House that voted the subsidies to that railway, and both the hon. member for East York and the hon. member for Western Assiniboia supported as I did. I must say I admire the members from the North-west Territories for the way in which on every occasion they stand up in this House and shout that they must have cheaper rates of transportation. I tell these hon. gentlemen that they have cheaper rates to-day than the town of Lindsay has. You can lay down goods from Liverpool at Port Arthur or Winnipeg cheaper than you can lay them down at the town of Lindsay, over a thousand miles this side. When this question of freight rates is gone into, a commission must be appointed that will deal with the matter throughout the length and breadth of Ontario as well as in the North-west, and will see that no long haul rate shall be less than the short haul rates. While I admire these gentlemen for standing up for their rights, I must remind them there are other parts of the country where the people have taxed themselves for railways, while the people of the North-west have never taxed themselves a dollar. The people of the province of Ontario have burdened themselves to grant municipal and provincial bonuses to railways, and yet they are charged higher rates than the gentlemen from the North-west who are taking up the time of this House in howling about the high rates they are charged. They have no more ground of complaint on that subject than the people of Ontario. Let this matter not be brought up on a Bill with regard to one railway, but let it be referred to a commission to be settled on broad and statesmanlike lines. If the Grand Trunk wants to get into the North-west, I say God-speed to it. It has a line to North Bay; let it extend that line to the North-west over Canadian territory, and I will support a bonus to it; but I will not be a party to assisting the Grand Trunk or any other railway to run through American territory, to build up American cities and help to develop American railways. I will support any proposition that will give us another line north of Lake Superior. That country is rich in minerals, there are spots found to be valuable for agricultural purposes, and there is ample room for another road there that will give us a competing route to the North-west. Clause 4 of this Bill amply provides for the future, and I am satisfied that it will meet with the approval of the House. Reference was made by my hon. friend from Winnipeg to the possibility of this road connecting with the Manitoba and South-eastern, and running south of the Lake of the Woods. I trust that no Government will ever permit it to run through American territory. A crossing can be made at the narrows of the Lake of the Woods, and in that way it can be kept an all-Canadian route.

Mr. OLIVER. I would like to congratulate the hon. member who has just sat down on the erudition of his speech; but I think it would have been more suitable for the "Cavan blazers" than for this House. In regard to the contribution of the North-west to this country in the matter of railway construction, I do not think it is necessary to discuss that question on that Bill.

Let me correct the hon. gentleman in his impression that this road benefits the North-west particularly or solely. I have always understood that the interest of the east in the western country lies in the development of the west. That is why the North-west was bought and that is why it was paid for, and without that development eastern Canada is not getting value for its money; whereas with that development it is, by the expansion of its manufactures and commerce. If the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Hughes) cannot see the matter in that light, it is his misfortune and not our fault.

If it is proven that the control we ask for over this road is necessary in order that the agricultural interests of the North-west may thrive—and that is proven—then it is evident that eastern Canada has an interest in our obtaining control over the rates. There is no division possible between the interests of eastern and those of western Canada in the matter of railway rates. The interest of eastern Canada lies in the development of the west and anything that will develop the west is in the interest of the east. It is not we who are asking for this road. We would rather not see it built this year or next year or the year after, unless it is built under such conditions that it will benefit the people of the country for which it is built. It is those who are clamouring for this legislation—possibly with an idea of building the road, or possibly with the idea of preventing its construction—who are bringing this question before the House, and not we. What I say is that when the Dominion is paying a large amount of money to obtain a certain object, it is our duty to see that that object will be obtained by the legislation we are granting. We are not asking for anything, but we are simply using our humble endeavours to point out that this Dominion is going to lose the money it will put into the road unless the charter is guarded by certain conditions.

With regard to the 2-cent passenger rate mentioned in the amendment of the hon. member for East York, let me say that at present the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway are carrying passengers all over this continent at a cent a mile. You can get a ticket to Vancouver for $25, which is less than a cent a mile. I know, of my own knowledge, that for years the Canadian Pacific Railway has been carrying people from the States to the North-west and back for a cent a mile. If it is possible to carry passengers at a profit—and I never heard that they were carrying them at a loss—at a cent a mile, if it is possible to carry foreigners in and out of that country at a cent a mile, I do not think we are asking anything unreasonable when asking for a 2-cent rate as a condition of our paying one-half, if not the whole of the cost of the railway. I think it is pretty nearly time the people of Canada got something for the money they have put into railways. As far as the game has gone, instead of our people getting the benefit, they have been put at a disadvantage by both the Grand Trunk Railway and Canadian Pacific Railway as compared with their competitors in the United States. It is notorious that freight is hauled from Chicago to Montreal cheaper than from Windsor to Montreal over the Grand Trunk Railway, and it is notorious that like conditions prevail over the Canadian Pacific Railway. The losses which these companies make in the operation of their branches in the United States are paid out of their earnings on the Canadian lines, so that we have not only to pay for the running of our roads in our own country but for the losses incurred by these companies in the country that is competing with us. That is not a state of affairs which is in the interests of the people of this country. It seems to me it is hardly in order to quibble as to whether this matter should be dealt with to-day, or to-morrow, or the next day. It seems that when millions are at stake and that people are put to these disadvantages, as compared with their competitors, almost any time would be proper to bring this matter before the House. Instead of this being a question which should necessarily be dealt with only in a general way, it seems to me that the proper time to deal with it is when we are asked to give a charter to a railway that will affect in a general way the whole of the Dominion. Although the legislation will not be general, its effect will be, and that is why we wish it to be dealt with on this particular occasion. We are told that we should wait until this company asks for a bonus. I say it will be then too late, because then the only question will be whether we should grant or refuse the bonus. But now is the time at which to make the conditions on which we will be willing to grant a bonus when they apply for one. It is our privilege now to make the conditions, but if we grant this company the privileges they ask, we will not afterwards be in a position to make conditions. We will only then be in the position of refusing or granting the bonus, because we will have previously consented to the conditions on which the company obtained its charter. It is for that reason the matter should be attended to at this particular stage. I am in favour of the motion of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), but I desire to make an addition to it, and I ask you, Mr. Chairman, if I will be in order in moving to do so now?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bain). Have you given notice?

Mr. OLIVER. I have not.

The CHAIRMAN. You will have to give notice.

Mr. OLIVER. Might I ask further, Mr. Chairman, if your ruling is that no amendment can be made to this Bill in committee at this time without notice?

The CHAIRMAN. Not without notice.

Mr. OLIVER. I feel tempted to ask what this committee is sitting for. I beg now to give notice that, on the third reading of the Bill, I will move the resolution which I read some time ago in the House, following the amendment of the hon. member for East York.

Mr. HUGHES. I would just take the liberty of correcting a statement made by the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver), with regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway charging foreigners less than Canadians. He drew the inference that the rates from the United States into the North-west were less than those in Canada. In reply, I would point out that for many years the Canadian Pacific Railway have carried people from the district which I have the honour to represent, to the North-west and back for less than a cent a mile. They have regular excursions at all times in the year, especially in the fall season and the spring, when settlers are moving, and on these excursions the rates are less than a cent per mile.

Mr. DAVIN. Less than a cent?

Mr. HUGHES. Yes, $28 is the rate, and it is a good deal more than 2,800 miles there and back. There is another point which I wish to refer to. The hon. gentleman sought to cast a slur on the people of the township of Cavan. My hon. friend from East Durham (Mr. Craig) is not in his place or he would certainly take the hon. gentleman to task. But I venture to tell the hon. gentleman that he will not make use of similar language to the good people of the township of Cavan, who are settled in his riding in the North-west Territories, during the coming elections.

Mr. OLIVER. The statement made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes) that the Canadian Pacific Railway is carrying people at the present moment at 1 cent per mile, I will ask the committee to regard as a very strong support of my assertion that 2 cents a mile is a reasonable rate.

Mr. MACLEAN. I think that the Government should tell us whether they have received communication from the Grand Trunk that that road desired to have running rights over this railway. I think also that we should wait before taking action upon this question until we see what legislation is proposed by the province of Manitoba. Our great North-west has not been built up and settled as our people thought it would be built up and settled. We are not getting the return to-day that we expected from our large investment in the Canadian Pacific Railway. The answer that is made to the complaint that development is slow is that high railway rates are the cause of slow progress in the great North-west. If that is so, we must do something to relieve the North-west. As the hon. gentleman said, the whole interest that Ontario has in the North-west is that it be built up and give us a large market for our products. If high railway rates are keeping the country back, some relief should be given, and the question of how that relief should be given is the most important feature of this discussion. We know now that trade that Montreal and Toronto ought to have with the North-west is drifting to some of the cities of the western states, the reason given being that dealers in those cities can send to the North-west, even sometimes pay the duty, and still sell at lower prices, because they get better freight rates. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Jameson) said that we should take no action, but should leave this matter to the future. Why did the hon. gentleman bring up his proposal for a railway commission? Why did he declare in this House that the time had come for the appointment of a commission and Government regulation of railways, and make a great speech and set himself up before the people of the North-west and eastern Canada as well in favour of such a course? Why, what reason can he have but that there is a railway grievance? Now he says that there is no grievance, that no legislation is necessary, and all he wants is to have this Bill railroaded through. There is a railway grievance in this country and a railway commission is required. We are promised that a commission will be forthcoming, but let us, in the meantime, make as perfect as possible those Bills that come before us. My hon. friend from North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) is willing that another road should be built from North Bay through that inhospitable region to Port Arthur. If he is willing, let it be built, but I hope that it will not be built with public money. The Grand Trunk is already at Georgian Bay, and by putting on a line of steamers, can be at Port Arthur to-morrow. If they are allowed to run their cars on the Rainy River Railway, we have competition already provided from the wheat fields of the west to the seaboard. The same is true of the Canadian Government Railway System. That system can be at Parry Sound to-morrow, and by a line of freight steamers it can be at Port Arthur as soon thereafter as it pleases, and, if it has running rights over the Rainy River road into the North-west, there you have a third competing line. In this way the relief to the North-west will come, the development of that great country will come and the trade for the eastern provinces will come. I again ask the Minister of Railways whether he has heard from the Grand Trunk in regard to that company obtaining running rights over this road, or over any other road we are asked to charter in the North-west.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Mr. Chairman, I beg leave to move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again. I present this motion because I think that we should wait until we hear what Mr. Greenway is doing with reference to the South-eastern Railway. It is of the utmost importance for the consideration of this question that we should know what Mr. Greenway is going to do. As far as I can understand, this road will form part of a through line from Lake Superior to Winnipeg, and points further west and north-west, so that it is important we should know all the facts we have to deal with. I understand that they control the South-eastern road from Winnipeg to where it joins this road, is in the hands of the promoters of this Bill, and if that is the case, we may be reasonably sure that Mr. Greenway will attach certain conditions to it by any legislation that he may propose. When we know what the conditions are, we shall be better able to judge whether the propositions made by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) are reasonable or not. I am very anxious that this road shall be built, and built at the earliest possible moment. I would be the last one to throw the slightest obstacle in the way so as to prevent its construction within four years. I think it should be constructed within the next two years, but if it is necessary to give them four years to complete it I am willing to do that. At the same time, we should know exactly where we stand and should be assured that this road is not going to be kept on the tenterhooks as it has been for some years, possibly at the request of some other road that does not wish to have it built, does not wish to have it come into competition with it, it will, to a certain extent, no doubt, as a through line, come into competition with the Canadian Pacific Railway. I am quite prepared to wait and see what Mr. Greenway is willing to do, and then I think we shall be in a better position to say whether the amendment offered by the hon. member for East York would be in the interest of the public or not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I hope that this amendment will not carry or any other amendment that has been proposed. I do not see how the action taken by the Manitoba Government, no matter what it may be, can be germane to this question or affect it in the slightest possible degree. Substantially, the amendment that refers to running powers over the road is contained in the Railway Act, which has obtained due consideration. Moreover, clause 4 of the Bill provides that any future legislation that Parliament may pass respecting the Government control of railway companies shall apply to this company. Then, as to the other parts of the amendment, they can have only one effect, and that is to destroy this project. I leave it to any member of the House who will give it serious consideration to say if there is any other object to be gained by this proposal. Hon. members may talk about the benefit to the country, but the practical result of this amendment is to destroy the project and prevent the work from going on. No company could finance the road under such conditions. As to the insinuations that have been thrown out regarding the delay that has taken place since this road was chartered, I believe that the gentlemen living in Port Arthur and through that district have made as honest efforts to build this road, have spent as much time and money in this project as any citizens of Canada in their honest efforts to carry out this road to completion. I think then, that the insinuations are very unfair. Any person who knows the facts knows of the sacrifices that have been made by the men who hold the charter, of the time they have given and the money they have spent—in fact, some of them are poorer to-day because of the expense they have undertaken in attempting to carry out this work for the benefit of the district in which they live. Now that they have made arrangements with wealthy contractors, as stated in the Railway Committee, to have the road built through and are willing to accept the proposition, unreasonable though it seems, to start construction before the 1st of August next and complete eighty miles within two years, some hon. gentlemen rise to bring in some proposition not at all germane to the question. This is an ordinary charter that ought to be granted in accordance with the precedents we have set and in accordance with the Railway Act. Every hon. gentleman is quite within his right in moving amendments. But let not this road be singled out, but let these provisions apply to all alike. It looks like an attack upon the scheme for the purpose of destroying it, though it is one of the most important enterprises we have to develop the north-west portion of this province.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). I rise to repudiate the statement of the hon. member for North Oxford, so far as I am concerned. I deny, in toto, that I have any other object than the completion of this road at the earliest possible moment. It comes with bad grace from the hon. member for Oxford to rise up and lecture people who have a right to give their opinion upon this matter. I say, he has no right to impute motives to people who think proper to make a statement in the interest of the company.

Mr. OLIVER. We are all in sympathy with the pathetic appeal of the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) on behalf of the capitalists who have been struggling so hard to build this road. Certainly, we would like to see them succeed; we don't want them to lose their money; but I will suggest that that is not exactly what we are here for. We are not here to look so much after the interests of those capitalists who are going to build the road, as we are for the purpose of looking after the interests of the people who are going to contribute $9,000 a mile for the construction of a road which will cost $15,000 a mile; that is to say, we are here representing the people, who are going to give the greater part of the cost of the road. I think the contractors will be able to look after their own interests. I think that, so far as the history of this country has gone yet, these gentlemen have been, on the average, moderately successful—with the help, probably, of this House; but, anyway, they have fairly well succeeded. I do not think the same measure of success has been attained by the people of the country, with whose money those roads have been built, or on whose security the money has been raised to build the roads. We wish to start right here on this road, and suggest ways and means for protecting the interests of the people, who are going to contribute the greater part of the cost of the road; and any imputation of motives, or a desire to drop the construction of the road, I think, can be fairly resented by any member of this House who simply desires to protect the interests of those who are paying their good money.

Mr. MACLEAN. For the instruction of the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), I will have to read an article from the "Globe" newspaper, which was, to all intents and purposes, an inspired article, outlining the policy of the Government. If we cannot get a declaration of the policy of the Government, if the Minister will not even tell us whether the Grand Trunk Railway has made application for running rights over this road, or any other company—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have not heard of any.

Mr. MACLEAN. I know that they intend to do so. But to give the hon. gentleman the information he desires, I want to read this inspired article in the "Globe" newspaper:

MANITOBA'S NEW OUTLET.

While the Canadian Pacific Railway has secured for itself this profitable field—

That is, the province of British Columbia.

—its grasp of another important portion of its traffic is unquestionably loosening.

I want to see it loosened, then.

There has long been a feeling in the province of Manitoba against the Canadian Pacific Railway, because of alleged excessive rates charged for carrying grain to the east, and especially to Fort William, during the season of navigation. An attempt was made some years ago to secure railway competition by subsidizing the Northern Pacific Railway to extend its lines from the American border northward into Manitoba. That extension failed of its purpose, although not altogether useless. Mr. Greenway and his associates cast about for another means of securing cheaper freights to Lake Superior, and for some time negotiations were conducted with a view to securing a railway from Winnipeg to Duluth. Not a little opposition was aroused in eastern Canada to this proposal, as one little calculated to bind the provinces closer together. Mr. Greenway was urged to secure his competing line through Canada instead of diverting trade to the ports of the United States. The belief is, that arrangements have been practically completed compassing this end.

Now, that is what I wish the committee to take notice of. "The belief is, that arrangements have been practically completed compassing this end." Well, I say, delay this legislation until we know what these arrangements are. Hon. gentlemen know what they are. I think it is their duty now to take this House into their confidence, and tell us what these arrangements are which their inspired organ says have been made.

The Ontario and Rainy River Railway, the charter of which is controlled by Mr. William Mackenzie, of Toronto, is projected to run from a point on the Port Arthur, Duluth and Western (a short line running out of, Port Arthur) through the gold fields of the Lake of the Woods region to a point on the boundary of Manitoba. It will be met there by the Manitoba and South-eastern Railway, the charter of which is controlled by Mr. Mackenzie, and which, if built, will earn a Dominion land grant. These two lines will give a new grain route from Manitoba to Lake Superior.

Does my hon. friend from Provencher hear that? It is not a small local road, then, but it is a great railway that will give a new grain route from Manitoba to Lake Superior. Does the hon. member from Winnipeg know that? If it will do that, now is the time to have that new grain road regulated in the people's interest, and not leave it until the tail end of the session.

A STRONG COMBINATION.

It may be asked what advantage it will be for Mr. Mackenzie and Mr. Greenway to arrange for a line to Lake Superior from Winnipeg, so long as the Canadian Pacific Railway holds the interior lines from which the grain must come to Winnipeg. The position is really simple. Between Winnipeg and Portage la Prairie there is a line called the Northern Pacific and Manitoba Railway, the charter of which contains a clause reserving to the Manitoba Government the right to grant running powers. From Portage la Prairie to Gladstone by the Manitoba and Northwestern Railway a similar arrangement can be made. At Gladstone the Dauphin Railway, built and controlled by Mr. Mackenzie, is reached, and it runs to Lake Winnipegosis. With the cooperation of the Manitoba Government, therefore, and the granting of necessary running powers over the links mentioned, Mr. Mackenzie can secure a continuous line from Port Arthur to Lake Winnipegosis.

That is the line that is before the House. Now is the time when this Parliament has an opportunity to regulate these rates and protect the public interest.

This, however, is not all, for he is understood to have a considerable interest in the Hudson's Bay Railway, which would really be an extension of the Dauphin Railway, the construction of the latter road being the first stage of a road from Manitoba to the bay. These railway-building projects are set forth here to show that the Canadian Pacific Railway's hold of Manitoba will be greatly lessened by the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway's hold of Manitoba South-eastern by Mr. Mackenzie and his associates.

Here is another inspired statement, that this is a great railway, a road that is giving relief to the whole North-west, not a petty road; and if it is this great road, now is the time to regulate it.

The time for commencing the Ontario and Rainy River Railway was extended to-day by the Railway Committee of the House of Commons, and in the course of the debate it was asserted that the Ontario and Rainy River charter had fallen into the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

That is the very thing I do not wish to see, and the people of this country do not wish to see. Above all things, they do not wish to see this Rainy River Railway fall into the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and there ought to be a protecting clause put into this Bill here to-day. The Government should refuse to regrant that subsidy this session, unless a strong clause is put in that on no grounds can this railway fall into the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is by railway rates on traffic between the Red River and Port Arthur that the Canadian Pacific Railway roads control the North-west transportation. Unless some protecting clause is inserted when we regrant this bonus, after they spend this $9,000 of public money per mile on 435 miles, it is possible for the Canadian Pacific Railway to get control of this railway. Yet hon. gentlemen here, on both sides of the House, are willing to see this Bill go through without even putting in a provision that the Canadian Pacific Railway cannot gobble up this railway, which is to cost the people of this country $9,000 per mile.

Your correspondent is in a position to state that this assertion is absolutely untrue—

Where did he get this information? Did he get it from the Government, or from Sir William Van Horne?

—and that it is the intention of the holders of the Ontario and Rainy River charter to build and operate in competition with the Canadian Pacific Railway.

There is a most important statement, namely, that the men who control the Ontario and Rainy River road intend to build it, and that they intend to get the Manitoba charter extended to Lake Winnipegosis; and yet in face of that fact, we are taking no means to regulate the rates; we are sinking our money, but we are not saying how our money shall be expended. Now is the time when we should secure legislation and obtain the protection of the public. Let us not leave it to the end of the session when bonuses are going through the House, but let us do this work now. Further, the "Globe" says:

Mr. MACLEAN.

This, notwithstanding the cordial relations existing between Mr. Mackenzie and the management of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

The "Globe" stated that the most cordial relations exist between this firm of contractors and this railway, which aspires to be a transcontinental railway; and yet this House declares that it will not afford any protection in the public interest. I think after what has occurred this afternoon, after this statement made by the "Globe," which to all intents and purposes is inspired, a statement which definitely sets out that a certain railway will be a rival road to the Canadian Pacific Railway and proposes to give the North-west reduced transportation rates, it is the duty of the Government on this occasion to state what their policy is in respect to the Ontario and Rainy River Railway. I give them credit for a desire to carry out railway reform; but if they thought it necessary to put two special clauses in the Act respecting the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, I see no reason why they should not insert similar clauses in this Bill. If they could only secure efficacy by inserting these clauses in the Crow's Nest Pass Act, what objection can there be to inserting them in the present Bill? Some hon. members have said that the ordinary clause is sufficient. It was not so considered in regard to the Crow's Nest Pass road. If it was not sufficient there, it is not sufficient here. I am not trying to embarrass the railway company or the contractors; but after all the experience the people have had and the House has had, now is the time to shut the stable door and not allow the horse to be stolen before the door is shut. In the face of the statements made to-day the Government are bound to hold back this Bill until they learn what is the intention of the Manitoba Government. The people of Manitoba have a grievance, it is a substantial grievance and their experience is acute, and they are not satisfied any longer to have the running powers of railways under provincial control. They want in the bond a statement that the rates of freight shall be specified, and they are going to obtain a 10 cent per 100 lbs. rate from Red River to Lake Superior. If so, why should we not be equally alert, and why should our people look for protection to a local Act passed by the legislature of Manitoba? If for no other reason, the Government should hold this Bill over until we know what Manitoba intends to do in connection with this proposition. It is not an unreasonable proposal, it is one in the public interest, and it is a move on the part of the Government and this Parliament in the direction of railway reform. Railway reform has to come in this country. A most important statement in respect to railway construction is contained in the current number of the "Atlantic Monthly," which is one of the most influential high-class magazines in the United States. The article to which I refer deals with the general railway question. It is so important that when speaking to our librarian to-day, he told me he had ordered twelve extra copies of the magazine so that members could have an opportunity of reading it, and I hope members will read it. If there is a newspaper in the United States of high standing it is the New York "Evening Post": it is a most influential journal and is the friend of the great financial corporations of the United States; but in its issue of Saturday night it had to summarize this article which appeared in the "Atlantic Monthly," and I propose to read a short extract from the article as published in the New York "Evening Post," to show the importance of Government regulating the power of railways. The article is headed, "The power of railway magnates," and says:

It lies in the theory of modern society that men should succeed or fail according to their abilities. As a matter of fact, a railway manager has it within his power, through the manipulation of rates, to make or destroy, to determine which persons in the community and which communities in the state shall attain commercial success, and which shall struggle in vain for its attainment. * * * Suppose, for example, that one cattle dealer in Chicago is selected by a pool of railways to control the shipment of meats from Chicago to the seaboard, and that, in order to secure him this control, he receives a rate 10 per cent less than the rates charged other dealers, it is evident that the favoured shipper will quickly destroy the business of other shippers by bidding more for cattle than they can afford to bid. Admitting that the discrimination is not approved by common law, what remedy has the small shipper which is sufficiently speedy in its action to rescue the business which he observes to be slipping from him? He has no remedy, and for this reason it is essential that discriminations of the sort referred to should be made a statutory misdemeanour, and that some special method of procedure more rapid in its operation than an ordinary court should be established to cause the railways to desist from their wrong-doings.

The statement made in this article is, that the people have no remedy at the present time, and that discriminations should be made a statutory misdemeanour in the different states. If any people are acquainted with such a situation, surely they are the people in our North-west. The Canadian Pacific Company is in a position to-day in the North-west to make one grain buyer rich and drive all the others out of the business. The company have taken up the stock industry carried on by one firm and have made it impossible for other dealers to compete. It is impossible for individuals to protect their own rights, and therefore it is necessary to have a court to compel these railway companies to treat all the people equally. This article goes on further to say:

The merchant, the manufacturer, and the farmer, working under conditions of industrial liberty, do not seem to require any particular supervision on the part of the state, for competition is adequate to ensure relative justice as between custom as well as the sale of goods at a fair price. But in the railway industry, competition does not work so beneficial a result. On the contrary, such is its nature that it imposes upon railway managers the necessity of disregarding equity between customers, and of fixing rates without considering fairness, whether judged from the point of view of cost or of social results. Were this not true there would be no railway problem.

But what, it will be asked, is there peculiar about the business of transportation which renders it superior to the satisfactory control of competition? * * * The railway industry is an extensive, and not an intensive industry. It conforms to the law of "increasing" returns rather than to the law of "constant" or of "diminishing" returns. This being the case, ability to perform a unit of service chiefly depends more upon the quantity of business transacted than upon attention to minute details. Another way of saying the same thing is that the expenses incident to the operations of a railway do not increase in proportion to the increase in the volume of traffic. As an industrial fact, this does not pertain to the business of the manufacturer, the merchant or the farmer; but is peculiar to the business of transportation, and it is adequate, when properly understood, to explain why all advanced peoples, without regard to the form of government they may have adopted, or the social theories they may entertain, have surrounded the administration of railways with peculiar legal restrictions. The necessity of some sort of government control lies in the nature of the business itself.

That article is by Prof. C. H. Adams, an admitted authority on the transportation problem. If his statement be correct, there must be some state control over the railways; and why cannot we have it here? Why cannot Parliament and the Government in the present case wait a reasonable time until they ascertain what the Manitoba Government are going to do in the way of railway legislation, and then let us have similar legislation enacted here; and if it were once settled that freight rates should be laid down and running rights given to competing railways, an important step would be taken towards the solution of the transportation problem. I am not asking for anything very radical; I am only asking something in the line of railway reform, and Canada is in a much better position than perhaps any other country in the world to grant railway reform. We have not gone too far in granting privileges here; we still have a state railway of our own and we have undoubted powers over other railways. The powers of this Parliament are much greater than the power of the Congress of the United States in regard to railways. The Interstate Railway Commission of the United States has been almost ruined because Congress had not the authority to give extensive powers to such a railway commission, but this Parliament is seized of full control over the railways and can regulate them not only on a general basis but in special railway Acts as they come before us. It is to that end and that end alone that I have raised this question. The only feasible way to get this railway reform is to tackle each railway Bill as it comes up and have a clause inserted in it to protect the public. I appeal to the right hon. gentleman who leads the House, if I am asking for an unfair thing in the position I am taking. The motion of the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood), a supporter of the Government, is, that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again, so that we may receive information, which we will have in a few days, as to the action of the Manitoba Government.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bain). The question is now on section 4 of the Bill, and the amendment of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean).

Mr. MACLEAN. Seeing the decision of the House, I will withdraw this amendment, on the understanding that the House is now in possession of notice that I will move to incorporate this amendment when the third reading of the Bill comes up.

Section 4 agreed to.

Bill reported without amendment.

And Mr. Speaker having taken the Chair :

Mr. SPEAKER. When shall the Bill be read the third time ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Now.

Mr. MACLEAN. Not now. I wish to move an amendment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. You can settle that now.

Mr. MACLEAN. No, we will not settle it now. There are gentlemen who wish to speak on this question, who are not in the House to-day ; I can name half a dozen.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question is : When shall this Bill be read the third time ? That is the question I shall put to the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Now.

Mr. MACLEAN. Not now.

The PRIME MINISTER. Now.

Mr. MACLEAN.

Mr. SPEAKER. Those in favour of reading this Bill now, will please say "aye."

Mr. MACLEAN. Have I the floor, Mr. Speaker ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question before the House is : Whether the third reading shall be now or at a later sitting ? Those in favour of it being read now, please say "yea."

Mr. MACLEAN. I ask that it be not read now.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have asked for the "ayes" and "nays" on the question. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean) will have the right to vote on that question. The hon. gentleman cannot at this stage interrupt when the yeas and nays are being taken. Those in favour of the Bill being read now, will please say "yea," and those against please say "nay."

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the yeas have it.

Mr. MACLEAN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will have to divide the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. Five members have not risen to call for a division.

Mr. MACLEAN. There are five members who will rise.

And five members having risen,

Mr. SPEAKER. Call in the members.

Mr. FOSTER. This seems a very unusual proceeding.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question to be voted on is : Whether the third reading of this Bill shall be proposed now, or shall be proposed at the next sitting of the House. This is not a motion for the third reading, but only as to whether the third reading of the Bill shall be proposed now, and that question it is within the will of the House to settle.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, is it too late to rise to a point of order on the question ?

Mr. SPEAKER. I think it is. The members have been called in.

Mr. FOSTER. A very important point of order arises here ; it differs from our ordinary practice.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is too late now.

Mr. FOSTER. I should like to have a reason assigned for it at least.

Mr. SPEAKER. The reason assigned is : That after a Bill has been reported from the committee without amendment, the next question is : When shall the third reading of that Bill take place ? That is the question which I propose to the House now. I quite admit that there never has been to my knowledge a division on that question before; but the question has been raised now, and I shall settle it by taking a division and calling the yeas and nays. Then the question of the third reading of the Bill will come up afterwards.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, if you will allow me one word; we are venturing on a new rule of procedure entirely, and the House is precluded from discussing it.

Mr. SPEAKER. The House is precluded now from any further discussion.

Mr. FOSTER. That is decidedly unfair.

Mr. SPEAKER. I shall refer presently to the statement of the hon. member (Mr. Foster).

Mr. FOSTER. Very well.

Mr. SPEAKER. Those in favour of further considering this Bill now, will please rise.

House divided:

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. member for Montcalm (Mr. Dugas) has not voted.

Mr. DUGAS. I am paired with the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay); otherwise I would have voted against the motion.

Mr. HUGHES. The hon. member for London (Mr. Beatty) voted, and the vote was not recorded.

Mr. BEATTY. I voted for the motion.

Mr. MACLEAN. There was no motion.

Mr. SPEAKER. Did the hon. member vote "yea" or "nay"?

Mr. BEATTY. I voted nay.

Mr. SPEAKER. I declare it carried that the third reading of the Bill be proceeded with now.

Mr. SPEAKER. Before I call the order for the third reading—it will then be after six o'clock—and in order that there may be no possible misunderstanding as to the course I have taken, I wish to read—Rule 47 of the House of Commons provides:

All amendments made in committee shall be reported by the Chairman to the House, which shall receive the same forthwith. After report the Bill shall be open to debate and amendment before it is ordered for a third reading. But when a Bill is reported without amendment, it is forthwith ordered to be read a third time, at such time as may be appointed by the House.

Accordingly when a Bill is reported without amendment, the Speaker puts the question: "When shall the Bill be read a third time?"

I did that.

The Bill is either read a third time immediately, or on a future day, as the House may decide.

The House decided. The only way of eliciting the decision of the House that I am aware of is by a vote on the question, whether the Bill shall be read now and not at a future day. So that the next order of proceeding, when we assemble again, will be the motion for the third reading of this Bill.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I rise with some hesitation to submit to the Chair the great importance of having the question of order which arose just before six o'clock, a little more fully discussed. I need not express the confidence that I always feel in the desire of the Chair to deal with all these matters with the strictest possible impartiality. I have no hesitation in saying that no gentleman in this House, on either side of it, is more anxious than I am to be able on all occasions to support the Chair in the most cordial and hearty manner. But I rise for the purpose of asking your permission to have discussed a point of order which has presented itself, I believe, for the first time since confederation. I believe there has been no occasion since confederation, at all events, so far as I am aware—and I have been for a large part of that time a member of the House—on which it has been found necessary to make a decision such as has just taken place. The question having arisen, therefore, for the first time in over thirty years, and having come very suddenly upon the Chair and upon the House, while feeling the most perfect confidence in the desire of the Chair to make a just and proper decision, I would like to ask if you would have any objection to having the question of order upon that point examined with a little care by gentlemen on both sides of the House, in order that any doubt that might arise on the part of any members of this House might be dispelled.

Mr. SPEAKER. With reference to the observations of the hon. leader of the Opposition, I can only say that I shall be most pleased to have the assistance of the distinguished and experienced members of this House in settling this or any other point of order. Of course, if the question is taken up now, it will have to be with the unanimous consent of the House, which I have no doubt will be freely given. The question is undoubtedly, from one point of view, an entirely new one. At least, the mode of disposition of the question is new; and if any suggestion had been made to me before the question was put to the House, I should certainly have invited the fullest discussion of the question of order, which I hope we shall have now.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, there would be no very great difficulty in raising the question at a later stage, when Your Honour would put the question as to the third reading. It seems to me that the point of order might even then be raised, although it would be the same as if taken before.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am not quite sure that it could. The ruling of the House stands. I think it would be better to consider it now.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am quite satisfied as to that, and if there be no objection, I would call attention to two rules which appear to relate to this subject. Your Honour called attention to Rule 47, and there are one or two authorities mentioned in Dr. Bourinot's book under the heading of Rule 43. These two rules, it may be contended, are to provide against the inexpediency, to say the least of it, of a majority in any Parliament unduly hastening legislation. The general purport and object of these rules seems to be that there shall be abundant time afforded, by preventing a Bill taking its stages too quickly, for all possible or reasonable objections to be considered. Rule 43 of the Commons provides:

Every Bill shall receive three several readings on different days, previously to being passed. On urgent or extraordinary occasions, a Bill may be read twice or thrice, or advanced two or more stages in one day.

And the rule to which Your Honour referred was Rule 47:

All amendments made in committee shall be reported by the Chairman to the House, which shall receive the same forthwith. After report, the Bill shall be open to debate and amendment before it is ordered for a third reading. But when a Bill is reported without amendment, it is forthwith ordered to be read a third time at such time as may be appointed by the House.

It will be admitted by parliamentarians, I think that we must have regard to the construction which these rules have received at the hands of this House, or at the hands of the Parliament from which these rules are taken, rather than to any technical or literal construction of the language of the rules themselves. I think that the object which I have attributed to these rules is a fair one, and the question is, what has been the practice of Parliament in regard, for instance, to this question of urgency, and in regard to the construction of the words, "at such time as may be appointed by the House"? Reading them together, particularly in view of the practice hitherto obtaining in this House, I contend that the construction is that while the House has the power to order such time as it pleases, yet that time cannot be and has not been on the same day on which the stage of the Bill has been taken. That is to say, to give any meaning or effect to these two rules, the language of which expressly states that a Bill may not take more than one stage at one sitting of the House, the true construction of the words in Rule 47 as to the Bill being reported and being read a third time at such time as may be appointed by the House, is that when you put the question as to what time it is the pleasure of the House that the third reading shall take place, that means at what time after this sitting of the House; and that has been the practice observed, I think, without exception. The exceptions in any other regard are mentioned in Dr. Bourinot's book, and I have the references under my hand. Unfortunately, even on that occasion there was no discussion whatever, though a Bill was reported and went to its third reading at the one sitting, being read a third time on division; but there is no suggestion that any point was taken or any objection made regarding the third reading taking place on that occasion. It is unnecessary, I am sure, for those who intend to follow this point to occupy any considerable time.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. What would you think are the three stages ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am much obliged to the hon. gentleman. Here we have on the Order paper this last stage :

Further consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Henderson, that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 32) respecting the Ontario and Rainy River Railway Company.

I would say that a stage was completed when that order, as it stands, was exhausted by the report of the committee. The next stage would be denoted on the Order paper of the next sitting, and that would be "the third reading of the Bill," or "consideration of the amendments proposed in committee."

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Is not the first reading the first stage, and the second reading the second stage ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think the authorities are to the effect that each reading is a stage—the first reading is the first stage ; the second reading is the second stage, and the third reading is the third stage. The order on the Order paper to-day would be the completion of the second stage ; and perhaps, to meet the objection which the hon. gentleman suggests, I might say that this is all the second stage before the third is reached. That is, the three stages are the three readings, and the second stage is not exhausted until the Bill is ready for the third reading. Of course, that is merely an opinion, off-hand, but I think it is reasonable.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would draw the hon. gentleman's attention to the language of Rule 43. In that there is no mention of stages, but only of readings. "Every Bill shall receive three separate readings."

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is a stronger point than I have suggested. Three readings must take place before the Bill passes.

Mr. SPEAKER. As a matter of fact, the second reading took place a long time ago.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The second reading of that Bill is not, perhaps, technically completed until the Bill stands for its third reading. The second reading is not merely the Bill as it came to the committee, but the Bill as it is really read after having gone through the committee and been put in shape for its third reading. I admit that the technical construction of those two rules might go far against the interpretation I am putting upon them, but I venture to say that, in the construction of these rules of procedure, both the English authorities and our own pay a great deal of attention to the uniform practice which obtains in Parliament, as indicating the construction put by Parliament itself upon these rules. The Speaker has read, and therefore I need not read the comments in Dr. Bourinot's book on Rule 47, except to show that that rule does not carry one very far when it says :

But when a Bill is reported without amendment, it is forthwith ordered to be read a third time, at such time as may be appointed by the House.

If my construction be correct, that would be on some day other than the day on which that particular stage had been taken I shall go on to pages 636 and 637 of Dr. Bourinot's work. Commenting on Rule 43, he says :

As a rule, Bills in the English Commons pass through their various stages with an interval of a day or two between each.

I call again attention to the expressions "readings" and "stages." The words seemed to be employed indiscriminately in the rule and in the comments, which would seem to indicate that in parliamentary practice they mean one and the same thing.

If a Bill is amended in committee, it will not be considered immediately and read a third time on the same day except under exceptional circumstances.

In this case there was no amendment in committee.

Towards the close of the session, however, Bills which have not been amended in committee are frequently allowed to be read a third time forthwith.

It was in this connection I cited the case in 1879, of the Bill of the Marine Electric Telegraph Company, which was actually on the Sunday considered in committee, not amended, read the third time on division, and passed. The reason was, that this occurred towards the close of the session, when the case was one of urgency ; and there is no record in "Hausard" that any member called attention to the fact and objected to the Bill being read the third time. Dr. Bourinot, in this connection, says :

"It was at the option of any hon. member," said Mr. Speaker Denison on one occasion, "if he thought it inconvenient or improper, to interfere ; but if the body of the House was satisfied that there was no objection, then it had not been unfrequent that a Bill, if it had passed through committee without amendment or objection, should be read a third time and passed on the same day." On the same occasion the mover of the Bill stated that he had given notice on a previous day that he should ask to be allowed to pass the Bill through all its stages on that evening. In fact, in England, as in this country, when urgency can be shown, the House will allow a Bill to pass through several stages (except money Bills, of course), on one day ; but such occasions seldom arise, and the wise practice is to give full consideration to every measure.

What I would urge is not the technical view, but the view the authorities seem to place upon this, and that is the unwisdom of hastening, against the objection of any men in this House, a Bill through these different stages, the reason being obvious. We should adhere to that practice, except towards the last days of the session, when a case of urgency may arise, and in that case only should that practice be departed from.

The PRIME MINISTER. There can be no objection to a discussion on the point of order which was raised this afternoon, though I do not see any very solid ground for raising a point of order. Rule 43 seems to me to state the case absolutely and clearly. It says that two readings of a Bill cannot take place on the same day, but it does not say that a reading and any other stage which is not a reading, cannot take place on the same day. If a Bill is read the second time, and then considered in Committee of the Whole and reported by the committee on the one day, it cannot be read the third time on that day. But if a Bill is read to-day the second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole, and if the Committee of the Whole do not report to-day, but sit again and report on the following day, there is no rule to prevent the Bill being read the third time on the day when it is so reported. The only thing which the rule prevents is reading the Bill twice on the same day. If the Bill is not reported by the Committee of the Whole on the day when it receives its second reading, but is reported only the following day, is there any reason at all why it should not receive its third reading that same day? That would not be two readings on the one day. And now take the language of the comment upon Rule 47:

Accordingly, when a Bill is reported without amendment, the Speaker puts the question: "When shall the Bill be read a third time?"

My hon. friend says that this means another day. It may or it may not. If the Bill has been read a second time upon the same day, objection can be taken that the Bill cannot be read a third time as that would be contrary to Rule 43. But if it is not, the question is put: "When shall the Bill be read a third time?"

The Bill is either read immediately, or on a future day, as the House may decide.

So far, I think the point of order is not well taken. But I agree with one remark made by my hon. friend—that there should be no undue haste in pressing a Bill to its third reading, but that ample time should be given for the consideration for every measure. But there may be exception to this rule. The reason I pressed that this measure should have its third reading was that it had been before the House several times and had made no progress; it had been talked out once or twice before during the hour allowed for private Bills on Wednesdays and Fridays. This being a day devoted for private Bills I thought it advisable to press this one forward.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will my hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) allow me to say that so far from being against the Bill, I am in favour of it on its merits and would have voted for it.

The PRIME MINISTER. I was about to say that I understood that several members of the Opposition were in favour of the Bill and wanted it pressed forward. And when Mr. Speaker put the question: "When shall the Bill be read the third time," I noticed no expression on the part of leading members of the Opposition to have it postponed to another day, and, for my part, I pressed to have it read the third time immediately. Then Mr. Speaker had nothing to do, in my judgment, but to put the question: "Shall the Bill now be read the third time," and that question had to be decided accordingly. It is the first time we have divided upon a question of that nature I admit. Still, though it is the first time, I believe that Mr. Speaker could not have acted in any other manner than he did. But if it be the sense of the House that the Speaker should look into the authorities, I am sure we shall, for our part, be glad to have his opinion.

Mr. SPEAKER. I shall be glad to have the assistance and advice of other experienced members of the House on this point while it is before the House. I propose to reserve it for further consideration, but I shall be glad of any suggestions that hon. members may offer.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I do not rise to prolong the debate, but to call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that I entertained much the same opinion when on the other side of the House as he has expressed, and not once, but many times—I will not say how many, but I think not less than a score—when your predecessor was in the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I raised the point and was invariably overruled. I would just like to call the attention of my hon. friend to the rule he has referred to, and he will see that the practice is not, perhaps, that which is generally accepted by members of Parliament.

Our rules do not provide that there must of necessity be three several readings of a Bill on three several days. That matter is left to be ordered by the House, the House being the sole judge.

Mr. SPEAKER. That is in cases of urgency.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is what I mean. Under ordinary circumstances, every Bill shall have three readings on three several days. But that may be dispensed with, not by application of the mover, not by the ruling of the Speaker, but by the determination of the House. If, in the judgment of the House, any urgent or extraordinary case arises, it may direct by majority vote that a Bill shall be read three times on the same day.

Mr. SPEAKER. Not without debate.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No. It is the general rule that each Bill be read three times on three several days, but that rule may be overruled by the judgment of the House that the occasion is urgent or extraordinary, and a majority of one may determine that a Bill shall be read three times in one day. But the point I rose to call attention to is the one covered by Rule 47. When a Bill has been considered in committee and reported to the Speaker with amendments, the question whether that Bill shall be read the third time now or to-morrow is not one that admits of debate. There is no principle to be discussed, and it must forthwith be decided. The rule reads:

All amendments made in committee shall be reported by the Chairman to the House, which shall receive the same forthwith. After report, the Bill shall be open to debate and amendment, before it is ordered for a third reading.

So that whenever a Bill comes from a Committee of the Whole amended the question when it shall be read a third time with the amendments made in a committee is a question that may be debated by the House as to whether it shall be read now, next day or a week hence. Why? Because amendments may have been made in committee the object or principle, or purport or scope of which the House may have an opportunity of discussing and deciding upon. Therefore it is open to the House to debate whether it shall read the Bill a third time now or not. The House may want to consider, in view of the amendments, whether it is desirable to read the Bill the third time at once or give time for the consideration of the amendments. But I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that if no amendments are made in committee, it is not open to the House to discuss whether you shall proceed to the third reading or whether the third reading shall be postponed.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Can they do that without discussion?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They cannot discuss it, but can decide it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Where does the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) get his authority for that?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman will see that my argument is contained within the four corners of the section, the first part of which I have already read. There is an express provision that a Bill amended in committee shall be open to debate and amendment before it is ordered for the third reading.

But when a Bill is reported without amendment, it is forthwith ordered to be read a third time at such time as may be appointed by the House.

I cannot conceive of language being used more clear or definite. I need not say to any lawyer what "forthwith" means, we have had hundreds and thousands of decisions in the law courts upon the meaning of "forthwith." The House may appoint its time for the third reading as it sees fit, but it shall forthwith make the order. The rule appears to my mind as beyond any reasonable controversy that, if a Bill is reported from committee without amendment, when the question is put whether it shall be read a third time to-morrow it is not open to discussion.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has not dealt with the point in regard to the Speaker appointing a time for the third reading. There is nothing in the rule which says that the House shall not discuss what time the third reading shall take place.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No. If I move to discuss it a fortnight from now, the question might come up in a fortnight and be discussed.

Mr. HAGGART. I may perhaps be permitted, as I have heard discussions on this point several times in the House, to give an opinion on this subject. Rule 43 states:

Every Bill so received shall receive three several readings on different days, previously to being passed. On urgent or extraordinary occasions, a Bill may be read twice or thrice, or advanced two or more stages in one day.

If I remember rightly, Speaker White decided that the committee was one stage.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No. I raised that point a dozen times, I thought as the hon. member did that the committee was a stage, but he ruled it was not.

Mr. HAGGART. The reason given is that on urgent and extraordinary occasions the Bill may be read twice or thrice, or advanced two or more stages on one day. The reasons why that is included in the rule are found in May. There were disputes as to the validity of a Bill, and to its taking different stages on the same day. That point was never decided by the courts, and I hold that this clause was intended for that purpose, to remove all doubts as to the validity of a Bill after passing this House and receiving the sanction of the Crown. The only point that was allowed to be discussed at the time was as to the expediency of reading a Bill immediately, or reading it at a future time. An amendment may be moved to that motion; I think that the later practice in this House and in the House of Commons in England allows greater latitude than that. You can not only discuss the expediency of a motion as to whether a Bill should be read immediately a third time or at a future time, but you can go into the principle of the Bill on that motion. Surely some urgency must be shown why it should be read a third time immediately, that should be shown in debate, and then the Speaker, according to this interpretation, should judge of the urgency of the occasion for its being read immediately, and then put the motion. The question of urgency is one for the Speaker himself to decide, whether the urgency of the occasion is sufficient to put the question to the House. It is to be settled by the great body of the House, the House is to judge of the urgency of the occasion :

"It was at the option of the hon. member," said Mr. Speaker Denison on one occasion, "if he thought it inconvenient or improper, to interfere; but if the body of the House was satisfied that there was no objection, then it had not been unfrequent that a Bill, if it had passed through committee without amendment or objection, should be read a third time and passed on the same day."

I looked up the authority on that question. I saw Mr. Speaker Denison's decision on the question. A gentleman had given notice that he intended to read a Bill a third time that day. He asked the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he had any reasons for objecting to the Bill, and he said he had. Upon that objection Mr. Speaker ruled that the Bill should not be proceeded with, although the Speaker, in his observations upon the question, said that it had been customary when there was urgency of an extraordinary occasion, to read the Bill once or twice upon the same day when the body of the House consented.

Mr. SPEAKER. Would it not mean that the Speaker should have discretion, or might decide what the opinion of the body of the House is, without acting on his own opinion.

Mr. HAGGART. It is for the Speaker to decide upon the urgency before putting the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER. As expressed by the body of the House.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). On the last question that has just been raised by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart), I beg to draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to a decision that has just been placed in my hands by the Prime Minister, and which seems to dispose entirely of the argument of the hon. gentleman :

Mr. HAGGART.

It is the practice of the House, occasionally, particularly at the end of a session, to take two stages of a Bill at one sitting on the ground of urgency.

The question of urgency is the point.

The question of urgency is a matter for the judgment of the House.

The Speaker has nothing to do with it. That disposes of the argument of the hon. member for Lanark, it seems to me, as to the construction to be put upon Rule 47. Rule 47 reads :

All amendments made in committee shall be reported by the Chairman to the House, which shall receive the same forthwith. After report, the Bill shall be open to debate and amendment, before it is ordered for a third reading. But when a Bill is reported without amendment, it is forthwith ordered to be read a third time at such time as may be appointed by the House.

The House is to determine the time when the Bill is to be read. The question must be put by the Speaker to the House and the House must decide what time is to be appointed. But how is the House to decide it ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Whether tomorrow or a week hence ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Is it to be decided by the Prime Minister or by the leader of the Opposition ? The sense of the House is to be taken by the Speaker putting the question. The question must be put by the Speaker, and in what form is the question to be put ? The Speaker must ask the House for its opinion. How is the Speaker to proceed ? The only thing the Speaker can do is to adopt the proceeding pointed out by Dr. Bourinot, that is to say, to put the question in accordance with the terms of the rule. The Speaker must put the question so as to ascertain what the House means to do, he must put the question in the terms which he adopted this afternoon ; that is to say, When shall the Bill be read the third time ? so that the House may decide the point. It was impossible for the Speaker to do otherwise than to put the question in the form which he put it, so as to ascertain what time the House would appoint for the Bill to be read.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Authorities are not agreed.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The whole thing turns, it seems to me, upon the construction of the very plain language in Rule 47.

Mr. DAVIN. Here is an authority that I will give the hon. gentleman. He will find it in the English "Hansard," 184, page 2107

On motion that the Bill be read now the third time,

Mr. DARBY GRIFFITH asked whether more notice ought not to have been given when it was intended to pass a Bill through all its stages than the mere motion of a member of the Government? He was only desirous that the House should be on its guard against any infraction of its rules.

Mr. SPEAKER said that in the last days of the session it was not unfrequent that Bills should pass through the House in this manner. It was at the option of any hon. member, if he thought it inconvenient or improper, to interfere; but if the body of the House was satisfied that there was no objection, then it had not been unfrequent that a Bill, if it had passed through committee without amendment or objection, should be read a third time and passed in the same day.

That is an authority for the hon. gentleman. There is another question that surely is raised here, and that is, whether the time that the Bill be read the third time is not debatable?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, that is acknowledged.

Mr. DAVIN. We have not had an opportunity.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The Bill is not debatable, nor the principle of the Bill.

Mr. DAVIN. The time when it was to be read the third time is debatable, and yet the Speaker shut us off to-day from discussing it.

Mr. SPEAKER. With respect to the last statement made by the hon. gentleman, that the Speaker shut the House off from discussing the question of time, I may say that the Speaker cannot wait for ever until hon. members rise to speak to the question when put. Time was given to any hon. member to rise. But after the question had been put, after the yeas and nays had been called for, then the Speaker did not allow and could not allow discussion. I hope the hon. gentleman will not raise another question. No attempt was made to shut out discussion at the right time. I am very much indebted to the House for the benefit of the discussion, and I assure hon. members I will give the question the very best consideration within my power, and will place my views before them on the subject.

Mr. HUGHES. I beg to move the third reading of the Bill respecting the Ontario and Rainy River Railway.

Mr. MACLEAN. After this discussion on the constitutional issue, I think the House should for a short time return to the real and substantial issue involved in this Bill; and in order to test the feeling of the House, I propose that the Bill shall not now be read the third time, but that it be referred back to the committee for the purpose of inserting the amendment of which I have given notice. I might call the attention of the House to this: that my desire to secure some kind of Government regulation of this railway and my desire to protect the people of the North-west in respect to tolls that may be charged over this road has been prompted by a very large extent by the expression of public opinion in the North-west; and especially have I been strengthened in that position since I read the debate that took place in this House in 1887. Hon. gentlemen who were members of the House in that year will remember that the great issue before the people at that time was the disallowance by the Federal Parliament of the Manitoba Act looking to railway competition, and if there was any party in this country that sought to make a record on that question it was the party of hon. gentlemen opposite. They came here session after session and belabored the then Government for its refusal to grant Manitoba relief. The Government of the day had disallowed the Manitoba Bill, and the members from the province came down here, man after man, and denounced the Conservative party for having disallowed the Bill; and the discussion that took place on that occasion is well worthy of being recalled on this.

On May 26, 1887, the question was raised by Mr. Watson, who came from the province of Manitoba. He came down specially charged by the people of that province to secure them relief from the grievances of the monopoly of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The hon. gentleman made a very long speech on that occasion, and I intend to read a few extracts from it, because what existed at that time exists to-day. At that time hon. gentlemen opposite, who were then on this side of the House, argued that Parliament should do something to protect the interests of the people of the North-west. Mr. Watson in opening his speech, said among other things, this:

On this particular question of railway construction in Manitoba, we have to-day a unanimous legislature, the members of which feel that, though they may differ on other questions relating to provincial or federal affairs, they are united as to the necessity of railway competition in the interest of the people of that province.

I hope hon. gentlemen who come from Manitoba are still in favour of railway competition, and if they are, they must be satisfied that the only way to secure it is to adopt some such measure as I propose to-day. Mr. Watson went on further to say:

The action of the Government has been the means of ruining certain portions of the province, and from the evidence presented within the last few days of the fact that the President of the Canadian Pacific Railway is in a position to intimidate and coerce the people of the city of Winnipeg and the province of Manitoba, it is evidently time this House took action in the matter.

They were threatened with coercion in those days, and denounced the Conservatives because they kept them under such burdens, and they appealed to Parliament to give them relief. Now that hon. gentlemen are in power, I ask them to adopt measures that will give the North-west relief and keep the control of those railways in the hands of Parliament, but hon. gentlemen opposite do not seem willing to adopt that course. Mr. Watson went on to say :

But a railroad which is built entirely by the public money of Canada ought to benefit the people of Canada, and this road has not had the desired effect, and has not accomplished the object which was stated to the country it would accomplish when the contract was let. We were informed at that time that by letting this contract to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the company would use their best endeavours to have that country settled.

Here is another passage in Mr. Watson's speech, to which I specially call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite, because it involves the very principle I am now suggesting, namely, that the way to afford relief to the North-west is to introduce the Grand Trunk Railway into that country. He said :

We have no wish to divert trade into American channels. We wish to have competition in that country; we wish to have another great Canadian railway there, namely, the Grand Trunk. The people of the east are clamouring for connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, because they have been subjected to a Grand Trunk monopoly. We in the west have been suffering from a Canadian Pacific Railway monopoly, and we want to have the Grand Trunk Railway as a competing line—a road which I do not suppose any one will say is an American railway. I believe its stock is owned entirely by British capitalists.

Then Mr. Watson went on to say :

I believe with competition that country would grow rapidly, and the manufacturers in the east would be better served than they are to-day. I am satisfied that such is the case from conversations I have had with manufacturers in the east, who tell me that they want competition for their freights into the North-west Territories. But we are obliged to ship our wheat by a monopoly railway; and I say that to-day the Canadian Pacific Railway is in a position to make more money out of the carrying of farmers' wheat from the province of Manitoba to Port Arthur than the farmers are in a position to make from growing it. The rates charged by the Canadian Pacific Railway on wheat carried out of that country are so exorbitant that to-day the farmers are questioning whether it will pay them to produce that fine quality of wheat which our country is capable of producing. Coming to the question of population, we find that it has increased very slowly.

That is the charge of the people of the North-west when they were here objecting to the disallowance. It is the charge that is being made to-day; that the North-west is not being filled up, that these lands up there are not being settled, and the reason given for that is, that they have not railway competition. The members who made this charge that the country had not been settled, were mainly the Liberals of Canada. Now they have an opportunity to give the North-west protection from railway monopolies, and I do not see that they are taking any advantage of that opportunity. On the question of lumber in which the people of the North-west are largely interested, Mr. Watson said :

On green lumber the rate by the Canadian Pacific Railway from Rat Portage to Winnipeg—a distance of 123 miles—is $4.50 per thousand feet, while the rate by the Canadian Pacific Railway from Ottawa to Montreal—a distance of 120 miles—is $1 per thousand feet.

Then he quotes a lot of figures, and says :

This comparison shows that these rates are not fair to the west.

Mr. Watson continued to say :

Now, it might be interesting to the House to give an approximate estimate of what a farmer in Manitoba contributes to the Canadian Pacific Railway for shipping his crop, not to Montreal, but from a central point in the province of Manitoba, say the town of Portage la Prairie to Port Arthur, a distance of about 500 miles. For carrying wheat that distance the company charge 30 cents per 100 pounds, which amounts to a very large percentage of the farmer's crop.

They were charged 30 cents per 100 pounds in 1887; they are now charged 17½ cents per 100 pounds. There is a proposition before the House to make the charge 10 cents per 100 pounds, but if that proposition is to be obtained it is to be secured by an Act of the Manitoba legislature under a deal which is supposed to be going on between the Government of Manitoba and the owners of this railway that is chartered by that province. It shows the importance of having these things specified in the law. There was a grievance in 1887 when the charge was 30 cents per 100 pounds, and that same grievance exists to-day, only the charge is less; but any reduction that has taken place has been the result of legislation. That being so, why not adopt that system now and put in this Bill some specific regulation in regard to these rates. Mr. Watson in his speech quoted what took place in the legislature of Manitoba, as follows :—

Mr. Kirchhoffer, who moved the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, said Mr. Van Horne had promised the building of an extension of the Souris branch. Lately, on being reminded of that promise, he treated Mr. Kirchhoffer to a lecture on the attitude of the province with respect to disallowance, and further intimated that not one foot of branch lines would be built here until the question of taxation of Canadian Pacific property was settled. Mr. Kirchhoffer closed his address as follows :—
“Let us be true to ourselves by patriotic firmness, let us succeed in removing the disabilities under which we labour, let this grinding monopoly, which is squeezing our hearts' blood out of us be broken up, and free trade in railways be established within our borders.

That was the cry in Manitoba in 1887: it is still the cry to-day. Mr. Watson went further, and said:

It is in the interest of the whole Dominion that the province of Manitoba should be allowed free competition in railways.

And he went on to read a great deal about the public opinion in that province as expressed at a meeting in Winnipeg, and as expressed in the legislature. I wish to read one or two of these opinions:

Mr. Kenneth Mackenzie said there could be no two opinions on the question either in Winnipeg or throughout the province. We had a right to build a railway, and if the Canadian Pacific Railway was going to act in such a manner as indicated by Sir George, it was just as well that we knew it at once. It was time this province ceased to be a pack-horse for the rest of the Dominion.

At a meeting at St. Laurent the people there declared, that the one thing the province wished was competition in railways, and in Morris the people declared through one of their speakers:

I am heartily in accord with the decision of the Provincial Government to build a line to the boundary in order to relieve the suffering province from the curse of monopoly.

At a meeting in Brandon, this resolution was passed:

Whereas, competition in railway carriage between Manitoba and the North-west Territories and other provinces of this Dominion is essentially necessary to the natural development of the inter-provincial trade, the fostering of Canadian manufactures, both in the eastern provinces and in Manitoba, the encouragement of foreign capital to seek investment in the development of the North-west, the encouragement of immigration and natural progress of the province generally, all of which would be of great advantage both directly and indirectly to every portion of the Dominion.

That is the very thing to-day. We seek to increase trade between the provinces, to build up the North-west and to build up the manufactures in the east. Here is another statement in the speech of Mr. Watson:

One great reason why we should have this competition, and why we should have connection with the Grand Trunk is the fact that the Grand Trunk runs through almost every constituency in Ontario and down to the lower provinces. We occupy the peculiar position in Manitoba of having four lines of railway tapping at our door for admission. The greatest immigrant agents that a country can have, as a rule, are the railway companies. The Grand Trunk to-day is an immigration agent for the western states, because they have no interest in our territory to the west, and you will find in their offices immigration pamphlets for North Dakota, Cheyenne and Minnesota. The Grand Trunk Company state they have no interest in carrying passengers to the North-west. If we had railway competition our country would fill up more rapidly. I would not like to prophesy, as the Minister of Finance did, in 1884, that we should have a large immigration there in a very short time, but I believe that the population would double in two years.

Do hon. gentlemen from the North-west know that what Mr. Watson said I believe to be true to-day, and it is truer now than it was then, namely, that if the Grand Trunk had entrance into Manitoba and the North-west it would bring to them more settlers than any other railway line in this country. Mr. Watson continued:

The price we receive for our grain is not sufficient to induce farmers to raise larger quantities of it, as they would did not the Canadian Pacific Railway charge exorbitant rates for freight.

And so the debate went on, and one of the speakers who denounced the action of the Conservative party at that time, in disallowing these Bills was Sir Richard Cartwright, now Minister of Trade and Commerce. That hon. gentleman said:

I say the true policy, if they could have risen to the level of the situation and understood their duty to the country, in the way of developing the North-west, was to encourage all roads which were willing to go in there. I say that this policy of attempting to exclude the North-west absolutely and entirely from all connection with the country to the south is a policy which could have but one of two results.

He continued:

Sir, the fact of the matter is this: that at this present moment one of the main reasons why immigration will not go to Manitoba, and why men are deserting Manitoba, though possibly the feeling may be overstrained, is the persistence of the Government in preserving this very monopoly.

He further says:

I say there is but one thing the hon. gentleman can do which would be of the slightest real service to the people of this country, and that is to contribute, as far as he can, to fill up this country. * * * The very best thing the Government can do is to allow these people to construct railways, under existing circumstances.

There was another very high authority, a man who championed the rights of the North-west in this House, the Hon. Edward Blake, he made a speech on the occasion and denounced the Conservative party for keeping the people of the North-west in the bonds of railway monopoly. He said:

The facts are that you have there some six score thousands of whites, who are struggling, who are discontented, and who are calling on you to-day for relief, who are asking you to-day for the liberty to live and to prosper.

And again:

That is the question of that portion of their policy which involves the keeping of the North-west in bondage to one railway company. Now it is time that the truth should be heard and should prevail in this matter, and the truth is that the North-west requires relief in order to its having a chance, a fair and reasonable chance to succeed.

Mr. Blake at that time proposed that the real relief for the people of the North-west was by competition to Thunder Bay, and he quoted from a former speech of his, in which he said :

We are bound, in my opinion, by the most obvious duty to our country, to see that the singular advantages which the Thunder Bay road gives, of taking down the wheat of the North-west to the seaboard, and taking up the manufactures of the east to the North-west at moderate rates, shall be used not to give still larger profits to a railway company, but to secure cheap transports to the public, whose money has paid for that road, and who will have, for generations, to bear the burden of the interest due to it. * * * You not merely do secure, but you prevent designedly, the possibility of competition, and the hon. Minister seems rather to congratulate himself that he has secured a consolidation of interests with the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway Company, so that this very line of railway to Thunder Bay, which the people of the North-west were looking for, and hoping for, and praying for, is closed to them as a means of relief, and the syndicate is to control every gateway to the North-west.

Mr. Blake at that time was most anxious that the railway should be controlled by the people, and in the interests of the people of the North-west. He went on further to say:

We offered amendments with respect to the Sault line, with respect to the monopoly clause, with respect to controlling immigration and with respect to these avenues west and south of the North-west, those gateways, one then constructed and another almost constructed from Winnipeg to Pembina, and from Selkirk to Port Arthur, and the right to keep them open by the Government and give running powers to other corporations should be preserved.

There is the question of running powers outlined by Mr. Blake, who at that time claimed that they should be maintained for all the railways that demanded them. Mr. Watson, in his closing speech in the debate, said :

Do away with this policy of disallowance, and give us free competition in railways, and allow the Grand Trunk to be an immigration agent for that country as well as the Canadian Pacific Railway, and in the very near future you will see the country filled up with a good class of people, happy and contented.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think the House will see, from these quotations, that the members from the North-west in 1887 came here and made out a good case. They succeeded eventually in having the railway disallowance removed, and in that way they brought considerable relief to their country. Another opportunity has presented itself to-day in connection with this Bill, and I ask the House to adopt my amendment, in order to protect the interests of both the people of the North-west and the people of the east.

Mr. MACLEAN.

As I told the House this afternoon, I have made no radical proposition. I ask the Minister of Railways to say why he put a similar clause to this in the Crow's Nest Pass Bill, while he refuses to put it in this Bill. The Crow's Nest Pass Railway got a bonus of over $3,000,000. This road, before it is completed, will have Government bonuses of over $4,000,000. If the people were protected in the case of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, I cannot, for the life of me, see why they cannot be protected in connection with this railway. The only practical legislation here in regard to railways seems to be to grant them bonuses. As to protecting the rights of the people, nothing is done. Picking up to-night's paper, I read the following in regard to the object of a deputation which has just come to this city :—

Thos. Marks, Col. Ray and other Port Arthur citizens saw the Government yesterday and urged that the maximum bonus of $6,400 per mile should be granted to the Ontario and Rainy River Railway. It will be remembered that last session an Act was passed providing that this amount might be given to any railway costing over a certain sum per mile which had previously been voted the minimum subsidy of $3,200 per mile.

Here are these men asking that this railway shall be given $6,400 a mile. If it is necessary to give this road this much money I am willing, so far as I am concerned, that it should get it; but it should get it only on terms, and when the money is given, the terms should be made. The Minister of Railways announced, a few days ago, that he was willing that the Grand Trunk Railway should be given running rights over this road. What objection, then, has he to incorporate that in the Bill, as it is incorporated in my proposal? What objection has he, in view of the fact that his own political friends, in 1887, stated in this House that the thing that would build up the North-west would be to introduce the Grand Trunk Railway into that country? I cannot see, for the life of me, why there should be any objection to the insertion of my amendment in the Bill. Its words are exactly the words used in the Crow's Nest Pass Bill, that running rights over this railway shall be given to the Grand Trunk Railway, the Canadian Government Railway system, the Canadian Pacific Railway, and to any other railway, and it also provides for the Government regulation of rates. How can hon. gentlemen opposite, in view of the declarations made by the members of the Liberal party in 1887, refuse to adopt this reasonable proposition? It is a very plain and simple amendment, and it is in the line of railway progress. In answer to those gentlemen who urge that any proposal in regard to railway reform in this country must be sweeping and general in its nature, and must be brought about by some Government elected upon that question as one of its cardinal principles, I would say, it is true, we are promised a railway commission, and the sooner that comes the better; but in the meantime, let us take every reasonable and proper step to protect the country from monopoly and secure competing lines, if the country demands them; and especially, if we grant to a railway company large sums of public money, let us provide that the railway shall give running powers, and not pass into the hands of any monopoly. I pointed out, this afternoon, that there is no provision that this railway, to which we are giving $9,000 a mile, shall not pass into the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway. We want a line of railway through that country, not merely for the purpose of opening up the mining districts, but for the purpose of competition; and, if it will not afford us competition, we are throwing our money away, and it would be far better to put it into a more remunerative project. I again appeal to the House, especially to hon. gentlemen opposite, to have this proposal of mine incorporated in the measure now before the House. I therefore beg to move:

That the Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee to add the following clauses to said Bill:—

3. That running powers over the said railway and all its branches and connections, or any portions thereof, and all lines of railway now hereafter owned or leased by or operated on account of the company between Lake Superior and the city of Winnipeg, and the necessary use of its tracks, stations and station grounds are hereby expressly conferred on the Grand Trunk Railway, the Canadian Government Railway system, the Canadian Pacific Railway, or any other road designated by the Railway Committee of the Privy Council or the Parliament of Canada upon such terms as such committee or the Parliament of Canada may determine, and according to the provisions of the Railway Act, and of such other general Acts relating to railways as are from time to time passed by Parliament, but nothing herein shall be held to imply that such running powers might not be so granted without the special provisions herein contained.

That so soon as the said railway or any portion of it is opened for traffic, the rates and tolls on the railway, and on any other railway or steamers used in connection therewith and now or hereafter owned or leased by or operated on account of the company, shall be first approved by the Governor in Council, or by a railway commission, if and when such commission is established by law, and shall at all times thereafter and from time to time be subject to revision and control in the manner aforesaid.

That two cents shall be the maximum passenger rate per mile over the said railway or any of its connections between Lake Superior and Winnipeg.

That the maximum freight charged on the articles hereunder mentioned shall be as follows between Winnipeg and Port Arthur:—

	Cents.
Grain of all kinds, per hundred pounds..
Live stock	do	..
Agricultural implements	do	..
Iron of all kinds	do	..
Meats of all kinds	do	..

and rates pro rata from any shorter hauls over said railway.

Mr. SPEAKER. There is a number of blanks in that motion.

Mr. MACLEAN. I will fill them in when we get into committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Before the motion is put I would like to say a few words on the question. It has been pointed out that clause 4 of the Bill under discussion covers the ground very fully and does away with the necessity of the amendment which my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) has moved. With the permission of the House I shall read the clause:

Any Act hereafter passed for the purpose of controlling railway companies incorporated by or subject to Parliament as to the issuing of stock or bonds, and as to rates or tolls and the regulation thereof, and as to running powers over or other rights in connection with the railway of any company by any other company, and the exercise of powers conferred upon railway companies, shall apply to the company from the time such Act goes into effect; but this section shall not be construed to imply that such Act would not apply to the company without the enactment of this section.

The last paragraph of that clause is considerably involved and rather difficult to understand, but as regards the clause itself, it seems to me that it would be much better in the interest of the people to put a provision in the Bill at the present time, instead of depending upon any future legislation, giving us power to extend running privileges over that road to the Grand Trunk Railway, the Government system of railways, and the Canadian Pacific Railway. We established a precedent for that when granting a charter to the Crow's Nest Pass Railway last session. In that Act we inserted a clause providing that, on application being made, running powers would be given over the line to any railway, by the Governor General in Council. Following that precedent, might it not be better to put a similar clause into this Bill and have the matter settled. Aid is to be given, I understand, this session to this road. It is always a safe thing, when making your bargain, to exact what conditions you desire. It is all very well to say that some future legislation will be passed at some indefinite period, which will control this company, but in the meantime the company will have secured a subsidy in the vicinity of $9,000 a mile, and it seems to me now is the proper time to make our conditions. A man who is selling a horse does not say to the man who is buying it: You shall give me something else at some future time, but exacts his pound of flesh when making the bargain. While this clause I have read indicates that something may be done, it gives us no assurance that anything will be done, and I would urge the Government to consent to this amendment requiring running powers to be given the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Grand Trunk Railway and the Government system of railways.

I may say, in connection with the entire road from Manitoba to Lake Superior, that one of the great difficulties which the Manitoba Government has had to contend against is the fact that if they did give any considerable amount of aid—and it was promised to give a very large subsidy to a competing line to Lake Superior—they could not ensure to the people of Manitoba the absolute independence of the railway to say Duluth, a point in the United States; and I am free to say that it was that fact that they could not ensure the independence of the road nor absolutely secure running powers to any other road, that made it practically impossible for Mr. Greenway to carry out the deal which he had with an American syndicate to construct a railway to the town of Duluth. We have now before Parliament a proposition to build a railway from Fort William to Winnipeg and the west, and thus extend to the wheat raisers of Manitoba and the territories the benefit of railway competition, and it seems to me that this will be the only competing road that will ever be built through that country, because the construction of railways there is a very difficult and expensive operation. What guarantee has the country that even if we give $9,000 per mile to this line, it will not fall into the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway, as almost all other railway lines in that country have? But if we place this clause in the charter, extending running powers to the Canadian Pacific Railway, Grand Trunk Railway and the Government line of railways, it seems to me that that will accomplish all we ask for. We will then absolutely control the road, so that even if it should pass into the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Governor General in Council or the railway commission will have power to extend running facilities to competing lines, and that will preserve to that country for all time a competing road to the Canadian Pacific Railway from the head of the great chain of lakes to the wheat fields of Manitoba and the North-west. This, I apprehend, will probably be the last opportunity this House will ever have of absolutely protecting the farmers of Manitoba and the North-west, and it is our bounden duty to prevent this line falling into the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Canadian Pacific Railway has already a sufficiently strong grip on that country, and I believe I voice the opinion of ninety-nine one-hundredths of the people of Manitoba and the Territories, when I declare that the time has come to meet the Canadian Pacific Railway and at every step we take protect and safeguard the interests of Manitoba and the North-west.

We are not sure then we are going to have a railway commission. I had fondly hoped that we should have had such a commission this session, but from hints dropped we may take it for granted that we are not going to have a commission this session. I feel that if we are not going to have a railway commission to control the Canadian Pacific Railway and these other railways to relieve the settlers of Manitoba and the North-west Territories from the elevator monopoly and the grain combine, it is absolutely necessary to meet these companies at every step and safeguard the public interest by legislation whenever we have the opportunity. I do not know that I would go the entire length of the amendment my hon. friend from East York has moved. For instance, I do not know that I would agree to declare for a 2-cent rate for that country. But I feel with my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver) with regard to that matter—that if the books of the company are exposed to Government inspection at stated times, and it is found that they are making more than 6 per cent on the absolute cost of the railway, then the rates should be lowered. I am against watered stock and against giving the companies power to bond the roads to such large amounts as to be practically ruinous to the people in making it necessary to charge such high rates to meet the fixed and other charges of the road. I would not favour the 2-cent rate if it made it impossible, or even extremely difficult, for the company to float its bonds and thus be hampered by its operations.

Now, with regard to the grain rate, I understand from conversations I have had with members to whom the hon. member for East York has spoken, that he proposes to fix the grain rate at 10 cents per cwt. from Winnipeg to Fort William. I can say that for the last year or two I have made a study of grain rates. When Mr. Greenway announced that he had practically completed arrangements with an American syndicate to build a road from Winnipeg to Duluth, it was stated to be one of the conditions that a rate of 10 cents per cwt. on wheat from Winnipeg to the head waters of Lake Superior was secured. We in the west who have fought so long against the high rate the Canadian Pacific Railway have charged—as high, if I heard my hon. friend reading correctly, as 30 cents per cwt.—have had the satisfaction of seeing the rate reduced to 17½ cents per cwt. We claim that this is still much too high, and the people of the North-west and Manitoba have been persistent in their agitation to secure a reduction to, say, 12½ cents per cwt. The Board of Trade of Winnipeg and other bodies made persistent representations to the Canadian Pacific Railway, the agitation was continued in other ways in hope that by the present time we should have secured this rate of 12½ cents per cwt. One of the conditions of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway is that we are to secure, by virtue of the aid which the Dominion has voted to that enterprise, a reduction of $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents this year and $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents in the coming fall, making a reduction of 3 cents, leaving the charge at $14\frac{1}{2}$ cents in 1899. But our people feel that that is not low enough. Long before Mr. Greenway announced this rate of 10 cents per cwt., our people were contending for a reduction to $12\frac{1}{2}$ cents per cwt., which they thought would be ample. But, though no definite announcement has been made, we have been led to believe, and though I have no definite information on the subject myself, I believe that Mr. Greenway has an arrangement—I do not know how far it has advanced—with the Rainy River people, whoever they are, which will secure a wheat rate of 10 cents per cwt. from Winnipeg to Lake Superior. If that is so, I cannot see how any injury will be done by making that rate a condition of the present charter. I said a moment ago that I had made a study of what it would cost to carry wheat from Winnipeg to Lake Superior. When Mr. Greenway made his announcement that he would secure a rate of 10 cents per cwt. a discussion arose and many people declared it absolutely impossible to carry wheat at that rate. A number of us who were interested, obtained figures from railway corporations, and found that wheat was actually carried in some cases for 10 cents per cwt. for equal distances, and even lower in one or two cases. There seems to me no reason at all why it could not be carried at that rate in this case. Let us see what the Canadian Pacific Railway itself has done with regard to that point. The rate from Winnipeg to Fort William, as I have said, is $17\frac{1}{2}$ cents, and the distance something like 400 miles. But what is their rate from Fort William to Montreal, a distance of about 1,400 miles? Until a recent date their rate was 28 cents per cwt., but a few months ago they cut it to 20 cents per cwt. So they are actually carrying wheat 1,400 miles for 20 cents a hundred. You will easily see that if with this they have been able to pay such handsome dividends as they have been doing, surely they can carry wheat from Winnipeg to Fort William for 10 cents per cwt.

With regard to rates on other classes of freight which my hon. friend has inserted in his motion, I am not in a position to speak, but I understand that, in any bargain which the Manitoba Government may make, they will make an effort, not only to secure a reasonable rate on wheat, but also a low rate on coal, and I hope, on fruit, and probably some other things. Now, I do not wish to play the demagogue in this House or anywhere else, but, as representing an agricultural constituency, I would be very glad, indeed, to see introduced into this Bill a provision, for example, like that put into the Crow's Nest Pass Bill, for carrying agricultural implements at reduced rates. Also, it would be a great boon to the people of Manitoba and the North-west Territories, if they could secure a low rate on fruit. Fruit is one of the great necessities of that country. Apart from a few wild fruits that are native to that country, the people are absolutely deprived of fruit, except what has been brought in from other ports, and fruit has always been very expensive. I heard of one case, for the truth of which I cannot vouch, but I will give it for what it is worth—of a farmer who gave a bushel of wheat for one pound of bananas. The story serves to illustrate how very expensive fruit is to the people of that country. They grow scarcely anything beyond the wild fruits, except of course such small fruits as currants and gooseberries. They have no apples, no peaches, no bananas, no oranges, nor fruits of that kind. If we could secure a low rate on fruit, it would be a great boon to the people of that country, and I should be very glad if the Government could see its way clear to insert a clause providing for low rates on that line of products. Now, let me illustrate the advantage of inserting such a clause as is asked for by the hon. member for East York, which will give running powers to other railways over this proposed line. When the Manitoba Government introduced the Northern Pacific and Manitoba system into that country some years ago, we had looked for great things in the matter of competition. We secured considerable reductions all along the line; I think I am safe in saying that the average reduction was at least 25 per cent below the freights then charged, and we secured a reduction on the grain rate from Winnipeg to Fort William, from 21 to 19 cents per hundred. Three cents reduction on the output of wheat in that country, as the House can figure it out for themselves, represents a saving to the farmers of that country of about $500,000 a year. We looked for more, but unfortunately the Canadian Pacific Railway, which is perhaps the most shrewdly managed corporation on this continent, seems to have been able to suggest reasons to the Northern Pacific Company why active competition should not be carried on, and the result seems to have been an agreement whereby they both charge equal rates. But the introduction of that system did secure a considerable and satisfactory reduction of rates at the time. But, in connection with that contract, the Manitoba Government had just such a clause inserted as we ask should be inserted here. The government in Manitoba, by virtue of the aid which it gave to that corporation, has power to grant running powers to any other line of railway which may enter that country, and that is where a great advantage to the people of the west will be derived from the introduction of this Rainy River Railway system. When that system reaches Winnipeg, they can secure running powers from the Manitoba Government over what is known as the Portage Branch, belonging to the Northern Pacific and Manitoba Railway, a branch extending from Winnipeg to Portage la Prairie, and it can also secure running powers from Winnipeg down to Emerson, the point at the boundary reached by the Northern Pacific and Manitoba Railway. From Morris, a point midway between Winnipeg and the international boundary, it can secure running powers over what is known as the Morris and Brandon Branch, tapping one of the best wheat-producing districts in the province of Manitoba. By virtue, I say, of these running powers, we can have this competition that is so desirable, extended to a very considerable portion of the province of Manitoba. I think the distance is 25 miles from Portage la Prairie to Gladstone, and, if we construct this link, or secure running powers over the Manitoba and the North-western Railway, we can connect the Northern Pacific and Portage Branch with what is known as the Dauphin Railway system, controlled by Mackenzie & Mann. By building that link, or securing running powers from the Manitoba and Northwestern Railway, we would be able to extend competition to the north-western portion of Manitoba, a very rich portion of the province indeed, not so good a wheat-producing country as southern Manitoba, but an excellent grazing country, and likewise a very good grain-producing country. I think I need go no further in this connection. I think the members of the House will understand the desirability of making our protection complete. This is the time of all times when we should exact the concessions we so much desire in that country. While clause 4 indicates that some possible legislation may be passed in the indefinite future, the danger is, that in the meantime the company will issue its bonds and will go on under its fixed charters, and we will not be able to pass any legislation that will be of any benefit in protecting the people in this respect. If Manitoba and the North-west are to be protected, are to have competition in that country, it is absolutely essential that the independence of this Ontario and Rainy River Railway should be insured to the people of that country. It is probable that we never can give aid to any other railroad in that country, because it costs too much, and we have the Manitoba Government, the Ontario Government and the Dominion Government combining to give sufficient aid to build a competing railroad in that country that is so much needed. Now is the time to see that a clause is inserted that will preserve the independence of that railway for all time to come. I trust, Mr. Speaker, the Government will see that such precautions are taken, for they mean considerable to the people of the North-west.

Mr. MACLEAN. With the consent of the House, I will withdraw the 2-cent clause, so as to make the issue before the House the one relating to Government control of running rights and Government regulation of rates.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I have been exceedingly reluctant to make any remarks upon this Bill at its present stage, not because I felt any reluctance in making an explicit declaration of my own views, and of what I thought were the views of the Government, upon the general question which hon. gentlemen have been discussing, but for the reason that this whole subject has been thoroughly threshed out, over and over again, before the very large Railway Committee of this House. I do think that my hon. friend for East York (Mr. Maclean) owes something to this House. I think it is due to hon. members here who are interested in pushing the business of the country with all reasonable speed, that he should not take every convenient opportunity of raising the same discussion, of forcing the same argument, and compelling the same explanations at every stage which it is possible for the Bill to take. The hon. member for East York, before the Railway Committee, ventilated his views precisely as he has ventilated them here. Upon that occasion, I stated to the hon. gentleman that personally, and I think the Government were of the same view, I in the fullest degree sympathized with the desire of the people of that country that the amplest control should be retained and exercised by Parliament over all these railway corporations. Not only with respect to the subject of running rights by other companies over the line of the particular railway corporation then seeking a charter, but in respect also to the issuing of its bonds and watering of its stock, and also to the rates and tolls which it might impose in respect to its franchise. I stated to the hon. gentleman who has moved this amendment, that his amendment was not going to carry us one step further than the law on the Statute-book and the amendment which was added as the 4th section of the Bill. I stated to the hon. gentleman, and I think to the entire satisfaction of the committee, because it was pushed no further at that time, the reasons why I felt warranted in putting that view before that large committee. The hon. gentleman is not moved in his present action, in my opinion, with a desire to effect a remedy for some existing grievance, but in order that he may appear before the country at large as the sole and only champion in regard to railway rates. The hon. gentleman's whole conduct, I am sorry to say is the outcome of pretense. He surely knows that he does not monopolize all the interest shown by members of Parliament on this important question. He knows perfectly well that if a question arises in this Parliament in which the impropriety of excessive rates imposed by a company comes up, the members of this Parliament would deal with the question almost as a unit, and not deal with it in the interest of the railway companies concerned, but in the interest of the people at large, having also proper regard for those considerations which arise in connection with railway venture, where men have invested their money, as well as in any other undertaking in which capital has been invested. I say, therefore, I am not willing that the hon. gentleman should appear before this House or spread himself before the country as having more sympathy than other hon. members with railway interests in the North-west, for I notice he is taking the North-west under his capacious wing, and his heart is now beginning to bleed for the North-west; that he is not the only one who feels sympathy with the North-west, and he is not the only member of this House. If any practicable remedy is available, something which judgment, discretion and wisdom would suggest as an adequate remedy, who would be found supporting it in Parliament. As I have said, there would be a unity of sentiment on that question when it properly arose.

Let us see where the hon. gentleman is on this proposition. I do not think he has used this House quite fairly—though he probably did not so intend to treat the House—because three or four hours ago when the House was in committee on the Bill, the hon. gentleman declined to move his amendment, and announced that he would bring it up on the third reading; and yet the hon. gentleman is now giving notice that he will move that the House resolve itself back into committee, where it was three or four hours ago, in order to take up a question, of which it was fully seized then, with which it could have dealt as effectively then as now. But he did not choose to do so, for what reason I cannot conceive. The hon. gentleman should consult with some discreet friend, if there is any one willing to consult with him, in order to avoid making himself, I will not say ridiculous, but in order to avoid acting in such a way as a person would not act who was dealing with a business question in a business way. The hon. gentleman said: Why does not the Minister of Railways consent to incorporate in this Bill the same provisions as were inserted in the Crow's Nest Pass Railway Bill? I explained to the hon. gentleman in committee the reasons, and he is the only one who did not appear to be able to comprehend the explanation, and I stated that there was no analogy between the Crow's Nest Pass Railway Bill and this proposed legislation. Wherein does the difference lie? Last year we were dealing with an exceptional case, the case of a railway company to which we were giving more than the ordinary subsidy; we were dealing with a corporation which by law had the right, free entirely from the control of Parliament, to maintain its rates until it realized a certain fixed percentage as its dividend. For that reason, in order that we might get the company into a contractual relation with us on this question, and to induce the company to forego some of the rights they possessed under the former contract and under the law, a very large subsidy was given, and we entered into a contract with them, one clause of which provided that there should be a certain percentage of reduction in the existing rates, and there were other clauses touching the question of running rights. That was a case of contract. This is not a case of contract. We had to get the Canadian Pacific Railway into the contractual relation with the Government and secure their assent to reduce those rates before we were able to pass legislation to reduce such rates. The law last session made this contract legal, and it was in consideration of a large subsidy, given to the Crow's Nest Pass road, that the contract between the Government and the company was entered into. There is no analogy between that case and this. If Parliament desires to annex any conditions to the legislation proposed in regard to this company, we may do so. This course is quite open to any hon. member to propose. It appears the desire of the company is that Parliament should grant them a subsidy of a fixed amount rather than a subsidy under the general Act, which involves conditions that, they say, precludes the company from successfully financing their undertaking. If they come to Parliament or if the Government move this House to grant the request of the company, then it will be quite open to Parliament to say that it will annex as a condition of that grant thus and so in the agreement. There is no analogy between the cases referred to, and there is no hon. member, except the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), who does not see the difference between the case of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway and the application of the company now before the House.

The hon. gentleman says: Why do you not agree that the Grand Trunk Company shall have running rights over this road? The hon. gentleman insisted on my answering a question as to whether the Grand Trunk Company have not applied for running rights over the road. I looked at the hon. gentleman seriously—I thought he was perpetrating a joke. I could not think that he seriously meant, when he thus asked the question, that I would answer such an inquiry. When he asked a second time, I answered, no. I said the Grand Trunk had not made application to me nor to my department, nor, so far as I was aware, to any member of the Government, asking for running rights over this road. Imagine the general manager communicating such request to me at this stage. General Manager Hays would conclude that I would regard him as bordering on an insane condition if he asked the Government to grant him running rights over the line of a company, which has not struck the first blow for the construction of their road and might never build the railway, so that there could be running rights over it. If the Grand Trunk Railway have it in their mind that hereafter when this road is built, it would be an advantage to them to get running rights over it, I apprehend they will make the application; but they will wait until the time comes, and when, if the application is granted, it can be acted upon. They will not jump while this thing is in the air; while it is a mere matter of contingency as to whether the road will have existence or not. There is ample time. They have two years to build the eighty miles according to the clause adopted in the amendment, and if the Grand Trunk Railway want running rights over the eighty miles, it will be time enough two years hence to apply for them. I will assure this House as I assured the committee, that so far as I am concerned, so far as the Government is concerned, the moment the Grand Trunk Railway Company asks for running rights over this road they will get them.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) is under a misconception with regard to the meaning of the fourth clause of this Bill, and as to the state of the law bearing on that question. The fourth clause, you will remember, is the clause which provides that any Act which may hereafter be passed by Parliament relating to the governmental control of railways shall apply to and shall govern and control this company, for any of these purposes enumerated in the clause. Why was that clause put there? I will tell you why. It was not put there because I as a lawyer felt that it was legally and absolutely necessary to put it there; but it was put there at my suggestion in the Railway Committee, because I thought it would be expedient to give notice to anybody and everybody who might be thinking of investing in any of these undertakings which were incorporated by Parliament that Parliament retained its control in all these particulars over that undertaking. That clause was inserted more by way of notice and warning than anything else. But, Mr. Speaker, if we have the right to impose on one company the burden of submitting to running rights by another company over its roads, we do not have it so much by this section as we have it by the general Railway Act, which in this respect applies to all railway companies that are incorporated by Parliament. If I were to be called upon to give a professional opinion upon the question, I would say that in the absence of that fourth clause from the Bill, there would be no doubt as to the right of Parliament to pass any Act of a general character for the governmental control of railways; and that the railways would become by reason of the passing of that Act, subject in these respects to the control of Parliament. It appears to me that my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) is under the misapprehension, that it is necessary to incorporate in this particular Act, a provision that these companies will have the right to use these tracks and run over these other roads, in order that that right may be sure. That is not really so, and I think that those hon. members who are not professional gentlemen, who have not had experience in the drafting of Acts and the meaning of these laws, must yield their judgment on these points to those who have had that experience. My opinion on this matter is, I believe, concurred in by all and I venture to say that there is no legal gentleman upon either side of the House who will express any doubt upon that question. We do not want to make this legislation ridiculous, by inserting provisions, which when they are read by courts or read by persons who are learned in the law, will show that they are senseless, and useless and that they could not have been passed upon by persons who have had experience in respect to these matters. It appears to me therefore that there is no reason whatever for the introduction of the amendment of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean). I will take the first clause of it, that which relates to the question of running rights, and I say there is no reason whatever why this clause should be incorporated in this Bill, any further than it is already incorporated in the fourth section. How much stronger are you going to make the power of Parliament, how much stronger are you going to guarantee the right of the Grand Trunk Railway to use this track by naming it in the Act, than it is under the general clause, that Parliament may give, or a railway commission if it is constituted may give the Governor General in Council may give running rights to any company. That provision in the General Railway Act includes all companies that may apply for it, and if it did not, why this very section in the amendment would be defective because it only names specifically three railways, and who is going to assume that there may not be other railway companies than those named which will be in existence some day in the future. A great many years go to make up the future; and twenty years hence, thirty years hence, fifty years hence; there may be half a dozen other trunk lines of railway that might want to use these very tracks, and if this clause which is found in the Railway Act, and which is repeated in section 4 of this very Bill; if this clause is inefficient because it does not enumerate the railways; then this clause in the amendment of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean) is inefficient, because in so far as any specific mention is made, it is limited to these three railways.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) allow me to ask him: if the clause in the General Railway Act provides that the Governor in Council shall fix or control the rates on which running powers shall be granted to another railway company over this line ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, the Railway Act says that the Governor in Council or the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, may fix or determine the terms upon which these rights are exercised.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then the Governor in Council would be able to control the rates ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The Act says the Governor in Council may control the rates. Unquestionably the General Railway Act says that, and so far as any general legislation can go—outside of the advantage which might accrue from the constitution of a railway commission—we have gone already by existing legislation. I confess to you that I myself am not very much enamoured of the sufficiency of the machinery, of the sufficiency of the power, which can be exercised by the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, or by the Governor General in Council. But this amendment does not help that. This amendment which is now being moved does not enhance the advantages, either one way or the other, which would accrue from the constitution of a railway commission. I say that if we adopt this amendment it would not be creditable legislation. I venture to say there is not a legal gentleman in this House who has had this proposed amendment before him, who has advised the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean) that it is a proper amendment to move, or that it would be a creditable amendment if it were adopted into legislation. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean) probably has jumped at this; it serves for a purpose. I am bound to say that after all the explanations the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean has had made to him, I think he ought to have accepted them, and I believe I am warranted in saying that his purpose has not been so much to get effective legislation on the Statute-book, as to pose before the country as the only advocate of the people's rights in these particulars. The hon. gentleman has said, why does not the Minister of Railways consent to a clause being inserted in this Bill that this railway shall not pass into the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway? Well, Mr. Speaker, I will tell you why. Not that I would not very much regret seeing this railway, if it becomes, as is hoped, an important trunk line in the future, pass under the control of the Canadian Pacific Railway; but I am not at this moment really able to advise this House as to what kind of words or what sort of a section could be framed which would prevent the Canadian Pacific Railway from acquiring this road. I wonder how you would go to work to do it. Would you say that the persons who shall invest their money in this enterprise shall not sell their stock or their bonds to anybody who might be acting in the interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway? The only way you could do that would be to say that they shall never sell their stock or bonds at all—that the stock or bonds shall never pass out of the hands of the people who invest in them, and that no person who is, or is likely to be, directly or indirectly subject to the control of the Canadian Pacific Railway shall invest a dollar in this enterprise. Would you not make yourself entirely ridiculous by inserting any such clause in the Bill? If the hon. gentleman cannot come any nearer to a solution than that, he will have to leave things as they are, and run the possible risk of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company buying up those interests. You will have to submit to that contingency, so far as I can see; and no provision that we can incorporate in any law is capable of avoiding it. I would be as averse to the Canadian Pacific Railway getting control of this railway as the hon. gentleman. I am willing to give them fair-play; I think they are entitled to fair-play; but I do not like to see them picking up every little railroad that may be constructed in Canada any more than the hon. gentleman does. The only difference between him and myself in this matter is that the hon. gentleman will plunge blindly and propose utterly valueless and useless legislation. He will not consult anybody who knows what is the proper thing to do—

Mr. MACLEAN. The hon. gentleman has just said that he does not know. To whom would I go, then, to get this information?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am speaking in a general way. I do not know just how to frame a clause such as the hon. gentleman calls upon me to have inserted in this Bill—I freely confess it; and I would like to hear some gentleman of larger experience in Parliament suggest to me how it can be done. Now, let us look at this amendment. The 2 cents a mile proposal is, I understand, to be dropped. Then, after the clauses which refer to running powers and the general subject of tolls, it goes on to say:

That the maximum freight charged on the articles hereunder mentioned shall be as follows between Winnipeg and Port Arthur.

Just imagine a proposal to incorporate in a Bill chartering a company to build 200 miles of railway provisions which relate to the lines of other companies which are not embodied in the Bill at all.

Mr. MACLEAN. The "Globe" says they are the one company.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Surely my hon. friend is not going to ask us to legislate on the strength of some assertion of a newspaper on the subject. This company, I understand, ask for powers to build a line from Port Arthur, or more properly from a point thirty miles from Port Arthur, on the Port Arthur and Duluth Railway, to Fort Frances, a distance of 200 miles and 200 miles away from Winnipeg, and the hon. gentleman is solemnly and calmly asking Parliament to incorporate in the Act a provision that the maximum freight charged on the articles carried by this railway between points away beyond and outside their authority, and beyond the line they are authorized to build, shall be so and so, and rates pro rata for any shorter hauls over the said railway. I do not see that it is necessary for us to take up any more time on this question, unless my hon. friend will persist in talking and discussing it over and over again. I explained all this to the Railway Committee, as many hon. gentlemen know; and I do trust that the hon. gentleman will now admit that everything in the way of affording protection to the people of that country has been done as far as it can be done at this time and in the present condition of things. Later, after this road is built, if another company comes to the Government—not simply those named in this amendment, but any company—and applies to the Government for the right to run its engines and trains and carry freight over this line, the Government will be ready, I presume, no matter what party is in power, to grant those rights. They will always be ready, as they have been in the past, to regulate as far as possible the rates of freight and tolls that shall be charged; and with that assurance, I think the ground is amply covered. Certainly it is very much more creditably and scientifically covered than it would be by adopting the amendment of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Speaker, before the question is put, I propose to say a few words. I have listened very attentively to the hon. Minister of Railways, and according to him there are no grievances in this country, or so far as the North-west is concerned, with regard to railways and freight rates and tariffs; or if there are any, there is no remedy for them. I do not agree with the hon. gentleman's propositions at all. I think that there are difficulties, that there are grievances, and I think that this House is the proper place to come to to have those grievances investigated and remedied, if remedies can be provided. More than that, Mr. Speaker, I think we are going too fast in the matter of subsidizing railways. We were told at the beginning of the session, in connection with the building of the Yukon Railway, that the Government were going to give a subsidy of mineral lands, and not a dollar of cash; and the reason stated was that this country had gone to the full extent of its resources in granting cash subsidies to railways, and that we could not vote another dollar for that purpose in the future. I have been astonished myself at that, after what we saw last session, when the Government gave large bonuses for the construction of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, more than double what the company were willing to build it for, and when we saw how liberally they were purchasing the right of way from Lévis to Montreal to have the Intercolonial Railway extended to that city; and when we also saw that a large list of railway subsidies came down to Parliament, though too late to be investigated by Parliament, because by the time they came down most of the members had got their notice to draw their own subsidies and return to their homes.

The Parliament of Canada at last session was not only asked to vote liberal bonuses but asked to establish a new principle. Some years ago the principle was laid down that bonuses should only be given to such railways as opened up new countries. The Government had an estimate carefully made of the cost of steel rails, fish plates, bolts and other steel and iron appliances, and came to the conclusion that these would cost $3,200 per mile, and decided to give that amount per mile to roads which would open up new sections of country. It is true that principle was extended, perhaps rightly, but in my opinion too far, and the subsidy given to roads that did not open up new sections. It was given sometimes to roads that traversed old sections but not very well provided with railway facilities. But last session we were confronted with a new era in railway building. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) announced that the former subsidy of $3,200 per mile would be doubled in the case of railways, whose construction cost more than $15,000 per mile. What means he would take to ascertain the actual cost of construction we do not know. I think the Government should have proceeded in the opposite direction, and I believe the time has now come when the Government should reconsider their decision and put a stop to this bonusing of railways. It is about time to take a rest, for a few years at any rate, in railway building, and let settlement proceed along the lines of railways already built. We have increased enormously our public debt. I remember well the eloquence with which hon. gentlemen opposite, when on this side, used to declaim against the enormous increase of the public debt for railway building and development of the country. There was truth in their complaint, but now we find them doubling the former subsidy and giving $6,400 per mile—a totally indefensible proposition in nine cases out of ten.

What necessity has been proved that a subsidy should be given this Rainy River Railway at all? We have a road already from Fort William to Winnipeg. What does this road propose? It proposes two things. One is to go to certain mineral areas, which are pretty well served to-day by water communication. All those mines are what are called free milling ores. That does not require carriage because the milling is done on the spot, and it does not require much carriage to carry $100,000 worth of gold. And there is but very little proof that there are valuable mines in that country. So far nothing has been developed to justify the building of a railway through that country at all. There are three mines there which, I am told, have been productive and profitable, but those are almost within a stone's throw of the Canadian Pacific Railway. There is no justification for the construction of a railway through the country for mining purposes. It is proposed to give the company $6,400 per mile. The Government gave a bonus, I think, for 80 miles in the dying hours of last session, and the province of Ontario also in the dying hours of its last session voted that same company $3,000 per mile, and they are going to get, we are told, a large bonus from Manitoba, making in all more money than will be required to build the road. These gentlemen will have money enough given them by the Parliament of Canada and the local legislatures to build that road from one end to another. Then what do they propose to do? They propose to run the line according to their own sweet will. The hon. Minister of Railways told us to-night that he was perfectly powerless, that he cannot suggest any way of control. We say to him: put in the clause moved by the hon. member for East York, which, I am told, is the same as that embodied in the Crow's Nest Pass Railway Act. But the Minister of Railways says, no, and those gentlemen behind him say, no, and the reason they give is that clause No. 4 is quite sufficient. If that clause in the Railway Act is quite sufficient, how comes it that it was not sufficient for the Crow's Nest Railway? The Crow's Nest Railway clause seems an effective one, and my hon. friend from East York proposes to insert a similar clause in this Bill. Clause 4 in the Bill is not sufficient. It was not sufficient in the case of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, and neither is it sufficient in the case of this company.

I waited with a good deal of interest this evening to hear some more evidence from the members from Manitoba and the North-west Territories of their desire to have competition, to have those grievances remedied which we have heard so much about from these hon. gentlemen, both inside and outside this House. I remember that when these gentlemen came down a year and a half ago from the North-west, they had two great difficulties then. They said there were two octopuses with their coils around the people of the North-west, which prevented their development. One was this iniquitous tariff, which was crushing the vitals out of the people of Manitoba and the Territories. Well, Mr. Speaker, we know what happened. Another session was held and those hon. gentlemen had to swallow up their convictions, they had to go back on their record, on their pledges and promises, and adopt the very thing in the tariff that they had, in season and out of season, from one year's end to another, been condemning from one end of the country to another.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is getting away from the subject.

Mr. WALLACE. I was saying there were two octopuses which these people declaimed against. One was the Canadian Pacific Railway and the other the tariff. I am done with the tariff and am now going to refer to the railway.

Then they said: It is not the tariff that troubles us so much; that is only a little grievance; our great grievance is the railway monopoly. Why, I have heard the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) grow eloquent when he told about the difficulties they had, the enormous freight rates they had to pay, rates that were prohibitory on many articles. They had declared to the people in the North-west that they would have reductions made in the tariff for the benefit of the people of the North-west. But now there is a competing line offered on which this Parliament can impose conditions and fix rates because the people are giving sufficient to build the road. We should have the right to dictate rates even if they were building the road with their own money. How much more so, when the people are providing the money. The rate that it is proposed to fix is based upon the rate of one-half cent per ton per mile which has been found profitable in Pennsylvania, where immense quantities of coal and other freights have been carried at these rates, and even lower.

Then, as to the question of running rights. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) said that the Grand Trunk would not think of asking at this stage to have running rights over this railway. I would like to know at what stage such a request should be made, if not just when the charter rights are being granted and bonuses being given to the railroad? I do not see the Minister of Railways here, because, as usual, when important business connected with his department is coming up, the Minister of Railways is absent. I have had occasion to call attention to that matter before. He gets up and makes a speech, and then goes home, perhaps; at any rate, disappears from the House. I think we ought to adjourn, or at least suspend proceedings for an hour or so, that he can be sent for, so that he can hear the discussion on this matter. The hon. Minister says it would be absurd to consider for a moment that Mr. Hays, of the Grand Trunk should wish to have running power secured at this stage of the proceedings.

But what does Mr. Hays himself say? He says:

I agree with you that such a provision is desirable, and will make formal application that a clause reserving such running powers, in favour of the Grand Trunk, be inserted in all new charters which may be granted to new companies for constructing railways in the Northwest, thus including the Rainy River Railway.

So, they are making application to have running powers over this road. And now is the time when we can reasonably provide for such running powers and fix a tariff of rates which has been found profitable even on roads which were built entirely with the money of those who own them.

I am glad that the mover has proposed to withdraw the clause relating to the 2-cent rate. I think that the people of this country require rather reasonable freight rates than reduction of passenger rates. The interest of the people will be best served by reduction in freights, so that production of the farm, the mine and other industries may be moved to the point of consumption at the lowest possible expense.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of Railways tried to belittle the hon. member for East York and others who have taken a hand in this agitation. He said the hon. member for East York was not the only champion of the people. I think it is small business of the hon. Minister to speak in that way. It is time that somebody took up the cause of the people, for we find that gentlemen who have been posing for years as champions of the farmers of the Northwest, and of producers generally, are absent on this occasion, or, if here, they roar as gently as sucking doves. Why? Because, in my opinion, they have been got at in some way by somebody. It would be an interesting problem to find out who has got at them. Where is the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin)?

Mr. DAVIN. East Assiniboia.

Mr. WALLACE. I beg the pardon of the hon. member for West Assiniboia. He is here, as he always is, championing the rights of the people. Where is the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) and many others? We did hear the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), but I, for one, did not recognize his voice. His constituents will not recognize him when they read his gentle speech, so different from his filibustering style of a year or two ago, when he first came to this Parliament.

I believe the time has come to reduce the subsidies, not to increase them. The time has arrived when this road will have to be justified; the Minister has not done it yet. He proposes to give double the subsidy ordinarily given to railroads of that kind.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I made no promise on the subject.

Mr. WALLACE.

Mr. WALLACE. The money was voted for 80 miles to the Ontario and Rainy River Railroad. He says now he was not called upon to justify it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I beg your pardon. I thought the hon. gentleman said I had made some promise that the subsidy would be a double subsidy. I did not say that.

Mr. WALLACE. I said I understood there was a double subsidy intended to be given for the first 80 miles.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There was, if the road cost enough to earn it, they would get the double subsidy.

Mr. DAVIN. I understand, they are asking now for the double subsidy.

Mr. MACLEAN. How many miles are there?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Including the 80, about 200.

Mr. WALLACE. About 35 miles of the Duluth and Western are already built. Are they asking a subsidy for that?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There are 200 miles in addition to what is already built.

Mr. GILLIES. What is the whole length of the road proposed to be subsidized, from Fort William to Winnipeg?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We are not subsidizing it to Winnipeg.

Mr. WALLACE. The Minister is not subsidizing to Winnipeg, but I understand the road is to be built on to Winnipeg. As I pointed out a few minutes ago, there are not mines in that country sufficient to justify the Government in building a road into it at all. It may be, there is great mineral wealth there, but it has not been developed.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). There are mountains of ore right through where this railway is going. There are smelting works all over the country.

Mr. WALLACE. I am glad for that information. We all knew that there are mountains of ore, but it has not yet been determined whether that ore is worth working.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). We know, as a matter of fact, it is.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the hon. gentleman tell me one case that has been demonstrated to be worth anything?

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). We have had samples of ore from that section of the country, and it has proved most satisfactory.

Mr. WALLACE. I have heard about samples before. But I want the hon. gentleman to tell us of one mine that has proved by actual experience to be a mine that can be profitably worked.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). I mean, iron ore.

Mr. WALLACE. On that 35 miles they have got any amount of iron ore. They do not need to travel a hundred miles more for iron ore.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). There is no iron ore on the first 35 miles of that road. At the end of the Duluth and Western there is, but that is in American territory.

Mr. WALLACE. We have abundance of iron ore along Lake Superior, and at a dozen different points there are places where it can be loaded on vessels cheaply, and where you don't require to build a railroad to reach it. But I was referring more particularly to the precious metals, and to opening up a railway for the purpose of reaching gold and silver or copper mines. This railway can only be justified as a through line from Port Arthur, or Fort William, to Winnipeg, and I presume, that is the intention. He says they are asking for a bonus for 200 miles, and I think it is understood that they are going to utilize the 35 miles of this road already built, and they are asking for a subsidy for 200 miles additional. The hon. gentlemen now tell us that the resources of this country have been taxed to the utmost, and that we are not in a position to give a dollar more for railway construction where they claim it is of vital importance, such as the Yukon Railway. Still, they propose to give, with the aid of the provinces, $12,400, or thereabouts, per mile. The Minister of Railways and Canals intends that they are to get $6,400 per mile from this Government.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I said, that if an application was made to the Government by this company for a fixed subsidy of $6,400, it would be entertained. If the matter was brought to Parliament, then it would be open to us to annex to that grant any condition which Parliament might think proper. But I neither directly or indirectly made any statement as to whether the Government would make any such application to Parliament, or whether Parliament would be asked to make a grant.

Mr. WALLACE. What I understood the Minister to say was, that if they demonstrated that that road had cost $15,000 a mile, they would be entitled to the $6,400.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. What I stated was, that if they expended, under the Subsidy Act of last year, enough money, over and above the $15,000 a mile, to earn the $6,400, they would get it.

Mr. WALLACE. That is practically what I said. Now, if they demonstrated that they have expended this money, then they will be entitled to $6,400 a mile. Very well; they will probably be able to demonstrate to the complete satisfaction of the Minister, that they are entitled to the $6,400 a mile. Then, the province of Ontario has voted them $3,000 per mile; that makes $9,400.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). That shows the importance of the road.

Mr. WALLACE. It showed that an election was coming on.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). That was last year, before the election.

Mr. WALLACE. It was this year the money was voted.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). It was voted last year.

Mr. MACLEAN. But there was a substantial subsidy passed this last session.

Mr. WALLACE. There was a subsidy passed by the local legislature of Ontario this year for the Rainy River road. Yet in the face of that fact the Minister of Railways contends there is no analogy between the Crow's Nest Pass road and the Rainy River road. The hon. gentleman stated that the Crow's Nest Pass road received a subsidy equivalent to $11,000 per mile; I say that the Rainy River road will get over $12,000 per mile. It will receive $6,400 per mile from the Dominion, $3,000 per mile have been voted by the Ontario Government, and $3,000 will be voted by the Greenway Government, which is going before the people and which are to have the satisfaction of making an agreement with this company by which the road will receive only 10 cents per 100 pounds from Winnipeg to Port Arthur.

Mr. DYMENT. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that Manitoba is going to subsidize a portion of a road that is in Ontario?

Mr. WALLACE. I said that the road would not be completed unless it was extended from Port Arthur to Winnipeg.

Mr. DYMENT. The hon. gentleman said the road would be subsidized to an extent of over $12,000 a mile.

Mr. WALLACE. So it will be.

Mr. DYMENT. The hon. gentleman said that the road received $6,400 per mile from the Dominion and $3,000 per mile from Ontario. Does the hon. gentleman mean that in addition to these amounts, the Manitoba Government will subsidize a portion of the road?

Mr. WALLACE. A government that was willing to subsidize a road, three-fourths of which was in the United States, will do something for a road in Ontario if they had any patriotism. The hon. gentleman for Algoma need not worry about it. The Dominion and the Ontario Government are giving as much, if not more to this road than was given to the Crow's Nest Pass road; yet the Minister says there is no analogy between the two cases. I have demonstrated to the satisfaction of the House, at all events to this side of it, that the subsidy which ultimately will be given to the Rainy River road will be larger than that given to the Crow's Nest Pass road, though no one will say that the cost of the former will be anything like the cost of the latter. For these reasons I think the proposal of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) is a very moderate one. We are practically building the road and we should have control over it. We are not obtaining any control according to the terms stated by the Minister of Railways, who informed the House that clause 4 is quite sufficient. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) has indicated that the granting of clause 4 is a very magnanimous act.

Mr. RICHARDSON. No; on the contrary, I said that clause 4 was not any good at all.

Mr. WALLACE. I did not apparently understand the hon. gentleman. I understood him to say that there was great merit in clause 4, and I am glad to hear him repudiate it, because in my opinion the clause is very mild. The Minister of Railways further stated that Parliament was helpless so far as preventing a monopoly; that if the Canadian Pacific Railway chose to come in and own this railway, Parliament had no power to prevent it. Surely we are not completely handicapped, surely we can hedge our legislation around with restrictions in order that the intention of Parliament may be carried out. Of course there are many things Parliament cannot do. But in this case the Dominion is building the railway with public money, and if we seek to gain effective control over it, this Parliament has the power to insert in the Bill restrictions to carry out its view. When an honest effort is being made to assume such control, the Minister announces that we cannot do thus and so. When an effort is being made to control this road, the Government should welcome the efforts of hon. members who seek to assist in this laudable undertaking; but when hon. members find fault, as the hon. member for Algoma and some other hon. gentlemen have done, their actions show that they are not in earnest in their endeavours to place restrictions on the railways, and to show that the Parliament of Canada representing the people are superior to any railway corporation or to all the railway corporations combined.

Mr. DYMENT. I did not intend to detain the House on this question, but the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) said that I was not sincere in my advocacy of the road. If there ever was an insincere speech delivered it was that made by the hon. member. The hon. gentleman stated that the road could be built with subsidies. He knows perfectly well that a large portion of the road will run through a country where it is as hard to build a road as in any part of the Dominion, and that the Government of which he was a member granted a subsidy to a railway larger than this united subsidy given by both Dominion and Ontario Governments. As to the contention that the road could be built out of the subsidies, that is arrant nonsense, to say the least of it. But what I should like to contradict principally is the contention that this road is not needed unless it goes through to Winnipeg, because there is not a paying mine in that district. It is not so much on account of the mining industry that the road should be built as on account of the agricultural land that it will open up. We have from 3,000,000 to 4,000,000 acres in the Rainy River district, the like of which is not in the Dominion of Canada, and I do not except the North-west of which we hear so much. It appears to me as if the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), for some unaccountable reason, wants to kill this Bill. He was backed up the other night by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), and he made some most ridiculous statements also. One of his reasons for not going on with the Bill now was that the Ontario Government had bonused the road for $3,000 per mile two or three years since, and that the work had not been commenced. He surely would not expect that a road of this magnitude and running as it does through a territory in which it is difficult to construct a railway, would be commenced on a subsidy of $3,000 a mile. It was absolutely impossible to do anything until this Government took action, and that was not until very late in the last session. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) also went on to say that this charter was in the interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Well, I have the most absolute assurance that the Canadian Pacific Railway has nothing whatever to do with it, or never will have anything to do with it, so that the statements made by the hon. gentleman are quite imaginary and suppositious. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) also suggests that we should do nothing in this Parliament until the Manitoba Government took action in the matter. I see no reason why we should wait for that. We can go on with our part and get these eighty miles already subsidized built, and in due course it would be continued to the boundary, and then the Manitoba Government could deal with it as they see fit. I hope the members of the House will not be lured away by these false arguments of the hon. member for York (Mr. Maclean) and the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), because I am sure that their action is taken only for the purpose of killing the Bill, and not for the sake of the farmers of the North-west. I trust that hon. gentlemen will see that their designs are frustrated.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I will take but a minute or so of the time of the House. I cannot, for the life of me, see how my hon. friend (Mr. Dymont) could say that this amendment of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean) would not be in the interests of the farmers of the North-west Territories, and I cannot for the life of me understand the cogency of the arguments made in the very able speech of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways. The argument of that hon. gentleman was that they were giving the very large subsidy of $11,000 a mile for the building of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, and that he said was one reason why there was no analogy between the Crow's Nest Pass Railway and this road. Well, Sir, that is only a question of degree. Supposing we were subsidizing this line for a much smaller amount—my hon. friend from York (Mr. Wallace) has shown that it is being subsidized with pretty nearly, if not more than $11,000 a mile—but supposing the subsidy was less, will any man say that the argument of degree has any cogency whatever? If it was a useful thing to put that clause in the Crow's Nest Pass charter, and which is almost 'ipsisima verba' the language of the amendment of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), surely it would be a useful thing to insert it in the Rainy River Railway Bill.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). The Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) said that we were getting certain considerations from the Canadian Pacific Railway that are not being obtained from this road, because this road has no existence yet, and therefore it was a matter of contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. DAVIN. I was coming to that. The Minister (Mr. Blair) said further that they were making a matter of contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway, but, Sir, that argument again has no cogency, because of the powers that we are giving to this company are ever to fructify, then we are making a preliminary contract with that company now. And, Sir, the statement made that the general clause in the Railway Act and clause 4 of this Bill would fulfil all the purposes that it is desirable in the interests of the community should be guarded, that I venture to say is thrown completely on one side by the usefulness that is claimed for the clause in the Crow's Nest Pass Railway charter. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think it would be a very desirable thing indeed to set a precedent—in fact, a precedent has already been set by the qualification that has already been mentioned by my hon. friend—it would be a very useful thing to set the precedent when passing Bills giving powers to corporations such as we are doing now, that this House would itself safeguard the interest of the public and not depend on the Railway Committee. We know very well that the Railway Committee is a small body, and it is presumably more peccable than a large body like this House; it is certainly easier to get at, and the corporation desiring to get at it has a smaller surface to work on than it would have in this House. Besides, its deliberations are not in public; our deliberations in this House are in public, and I myself think that the sooner the better this Parliament determines when a Bill is before it to safeguard the interests of the public and not place it in the hands of the Railway Committee. I listened with great interest to the speech of the Minister of Railways; it was an able speech, it was a plausible speech; but the moment you analyse it, it does not seem to me that it carries any cogency. There has been a very good reason given by my hon. friend (Mr. Dymont) why we should now do what we are asked to do by this amendment. He tells us that there are thousands of acres of the finest farm lands in the world in the Rainy River district, and if so we are going to have farmers there, and if those farmers are to have all the commodities they require, we want that they should get them under as favourable circumstances as the people at one end or other of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. Here we have certain advantages particularized in this Crow's Nest Pass Railway charter, and I do not see why we should not have the same done in the Bill now before the House. I am bound to say I have heard nothing that has tended to alter my opinion that no harm whatever can be done by accepting the amendment as amended by my hon. friend; nothing, in fact, but good can come of it.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). I had a good deal of sympathy with the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), but after the able, clear and explicit explanation given by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair), I believe we are perfectly safe in leaving the matter in the hands of the Government. What surprised me a good deal was that my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) got the assistance of his colleague from West York (Mr. Wallace), and the burden of that gentleman's argument was that this road was not required at all. That circumstance leads me to believe that my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) is not really and truly sincere in wanting this road built. I feel aggrieved to think that my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean), who to some extent led me in this matter, should have the design of burking this whole project, because I believe that it is of the utmost importance that that road should be built and at the earliest possible moment. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) said that there were no mines in that country, and that it had not been demonstrated that his railway was necessary.

When I mention the fact that the smelting works in Hamilton are looking anxiously and waiting for the early completion of this road in order to get the quantity and quality of ore required for the manufacture of iron in Hamilton, I am quite satisfied that the hon. gentleman will realize that there is some importance to be attached to its construction. I simply rose to express my surprise at the way in which the hon. member for East York applauded and supported the statement made by the hon. member for West York to the effect that there was no necessity for that road being built at all, as we had one road now from Port Arthur through to Winnipeg. I am sorry that the hon. member for East York has put himself in the position of obstructing the building of the road rather than urging its early completion.

Mr. BRITTON. Mr. Speaker, I do not think any one can have heard this discussion without coming to the conclusion that those who have been pressing for this amendment do not really desire the passage of the Bill at all. It is one of the most simple Bills that has been presented to the House. It is in no sense a Government measure, and I do not understand the arguments we have heard on the other side of the House on the assumption that it is such a private Bill. It is quite true, if we ever come to the time when the road is to be subsidized, then it will be the duty of the Government to take every precaution that the subsidy shall not be given unless all the rights of other companies are preserved, as the Minister of Railways has indicated. Now, what is there in this Bill? In the first place, the company were incorporated as long ago as 1891. Now, they are asking for an extension of time for the completion of the road, for power to bridge the Rainy River, and for power to construct a road from some point on the Port Arthur and Western Railway to some point on the boundary between Ontario and Manitoba. That is all this company are asking. The Bill is a private Bill, brought in the interest of this company and for these purposes. The Government have said that it was part of their policy that this clause 4 shall be inserted in all future railway Bills, for the reason that will commend itself to any member of the House who thinks about it. It is not because the Railway Act is not sufficient in itself to protect the interests of the public, but it is, that no company which hereafter gets any rights from this Parliament shall be in a position to say that subsequent legislation is not applicable to them, or that they have acquired certain vested rights which a subsequent Act of Parliament ought not to interfere with. This is a notice to them, as the Minister has said, that any future legislation must apply to them. That being the case, and looking at the Railway Act itself, we have everything which this amendment seeks to obtain for the public from this company. The Government have the right to regulate the tolls, both as to passengers and freight; they have the right to grant running powers to other companies over this road; and, as has been said, if the time comes for a subsidy to be granted, then is the time to protect other roads by the contract granting the subsidy to the company; and that is just the difference between this railway and the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. The Crow's Nest Pass Railway, in which hon. gentlemen have said this clause was inserted, was the contract itself. That Bill provided for the payment of the subsidy to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the building of the road. Therefore there is all the difference between asking for that clause to be put in now, when the subsidy is not under consideration, when there is no contract before the House for building the road, and asking to have the rights of the public protected when the subsidy comes to be dealt with.

Mr. MACLEAN. Does the hon. gentleman know that a subsidy was voted last session?

Mr. BRITTON. Quite so. The subsidy is voted, but the subsidy is not to be paid over. It depends on a great many conditions before it is paid over.

Mr. DAVIN. How shall we pass on it in this House?

Mr. BRITTON. We are not asked to pass on it in this House. That is a matter to be dealt with before the subsidy is paid. The Railway Act protects this country against anything this company can do. The mere fact that they have been voted a subsidy is a very different thing from saying that they are entitled to the money. It is when they are entitled to the money that further protection can be provided if there is a necessity for it.

Mr. MACLEAN. Give the money first.

Mr. BRITTON. No, I do not say that. I say, before the money is given, and when the company is in a position to say that it has earned the money which has been voted, it is time then to see that the Railway Act is complied with and that the powers sought to be inserted in this Bill are provided for. Everybody admits that the Railway Act applies to this company. Does the hon. ex-Minister of Railways say that it does not?

Mr. COCHRANE. It also applied to the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, yet the Government made other conditions.

Mr. BRITTON. There is no harm in that.

Mr. COCHRANE. Then it would not be any harm to make the same provision in this Bill.

Mr. BRITTON. There is no harm in making the provision before the money is paid over or in putting clause 4 in this Bill. But I do not think that clause adds to it much more than to give any other company notice that they are to be subject to any future legislation in reference to railroads.

Amendment negatived, and Bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. member for Montcalm has not voted. The hon. member for King's, N.B., and the hon. member for Antigonish were not in the House when the motion was put.

Mr. DUGAS. I am paired with the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay). Otherwise I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I was in the House when the question was put.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must have been within the precincts of the Chambers and not in the galleries.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I was in my seat when the vote was taken.

Mr. SPEAKER. Was the hon. member in this Chamber when the whole question was put ?

Mr. DOMVILLE. I could not tell, because I could not hear all that was said.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman is in doubt I think we had better strike out his name.

Mr. McISAAC. I did not hear the whole question read.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 99) to incorporate the Lake Champlain and River St. Lawrence Ship Canal Company.—(Mr. Préfontaine.)

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY—THE ESTIMATES.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message as follows :—

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, Estimates of sums required for the services of the Dominion for the year ending on the 30th June, 1899, and in accordance with the provisions of "The British North America Act, 1867," the Governor General recommends these Estimates to the House of Commons.

Government House,
Ottawa, 1898.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE moved :

That the Message and Estimates be referred to the Committee of Supply.

Motion agreed to.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. To prevent misapprehension, I wish to say that our expectation is that the Budget speech will be delivered Tuesday week, and not on Friday as seems to have been expected from some remarks of the right hon. First Minister. We hope on Tuesday week to deliver the Budget speech, unless something happens to change the date.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. HAGGART. What does the right hon. gentleman propose taking up to-morrow ?

The PRIME MINISTER. To take up the Franchise Act.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 29th March, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

LIEUTENANT-GOVERNORSHIP OF THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the hon. leader of the House if the statement is well founded that the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) is to be the Governor of the North-west Territories?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). If it were well founded, it would be made official. As it is not made official, it is not well founded so far.

DRUMMOND COUNTY RAILWAY.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) as to an item which has been made public for the information of the people generally through some evidence, if I remember well, taken before a committee. It is to the effect that an entirely new arrangement has been made between the Government and the Grand Trunk and Drummond County railways respectively by which the terms which were submitted last year have been very materially altered. It is rather odd if this has been done, that nothing has been laid on the Table of the House and that we first get the information through the public press. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether the statement is true, and if so, whether he will lay on the Table for the information of the representatives of the people, the amended arrangement.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I can assure the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) that no evidence has been received by a committee examining into the Drummond County matter which tends to show that an entirely new arrangement has been made between the Government and either of these companies. The investigation which has been there conducted led to a request from the committee that the temporary agreement which had been entered into should be laid on the table of the committee and put in evidence. I saw no particular objection to that course being pursued. All the papers that they asked for I thought might be very properly tendered to them. I apprehend that that fact would not be a proper basis upon which to ground a charge that the House had been slighted. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) now desires that the temporary arrangement which was entered into and any modifications that have been made in the previous understanding with these companies be laid on the Table, I would have no objection to producing those papers. They are really now in everybody's possession, and there is no reason for not producing them here if the hon. gentleman desires.

Mr. FOSTER. It would be advantageous as conveying information to the House, and is what ought to be done.

TESLIN LAKE SLEIGH ROAD.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask the First Minister if the statement made in another place by a member of the Cabinet that the Government had determined to build a wagon road from a port in British Columbia over the Teslin route for soldiers, militia or the mounted police, is true?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I stated some time ago in this House that the Government intended to ask for an appropriation to survey a route from Observatory Inlet to Glenora. What would be the policy of the Government in case of a certain event which may take place in another House, and which we expect to take place. I am not in a position to say. The matter would have to be considered de novo. I am not aware that such a statement was made as referred to by my hon. friend.

Mr. FOSTER. No arrangement has been made for building a wagon road?

The PRIME MINISTER. No.

OPENING OF THE CANALS.

Mr. QUINN. I desire to ask the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) whether a date has been fixed for the opening of the Welland and St. Lawrence canals to Montreal. I understand that the Corn Exchange and the Board of Trade of Montreal have made representations to the Department of Railways and Canals that it would be to the advantage of the country generally if these canals were opened at an earlier date than usual. Information has been received that ships are already laden ready to come through as soon as it is known that the river and canals are open for navigation and that these vessels can get return cargoes. My object in rising is, as much as anything else, to impress upon the Minister the necessity of an early opening of the canals. I have here a letter from the Corn Exchange of Montreal, intimating that they are very anxious to have the canals opened about the 15th of April if at all possible. I would ask the hon. Minister if a decision has been arrived at as to the day the canals will be opened?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I have been in receipt of the usual anxious inquiries from the merchants and transportation companies as to the date the canals will be opened.

These gentlemen are all exceedingly anxious that the canals should be opened at the earliest possible day; you cannot get them open too early to suit the people who are interested in canal transportation. But it has not been possible for me to name any particular date when the canals can be opened. That will depend entirely upon circumstances over which we have practically no control. Every year these gentlemen urge us most strongly to open the canals earlier than the preceding year. But we have to keep in mind some important considerations which are not present always in the mind of those gentlemen. We are required to make repairs in order that the canals may not break down during the season, that there may not be any complete block in the use of the canals during the season of navigation. We have got to be careful to avoid the possibility of that contingency occurring, and therefore we can only make those necessary repairs late in the close season, during the period between the close of one season and the opening of another season, and we have got to take the necessary time to make those repairs thoroughly. If we were to do otherwise, and neglect those repairs to meet the wishes of the board of trade and others interested in canal traffic, we would incur the very serious danger of having canal navigation absolutely blocked for a considerable period during the season. I am thoroughly convinced, and so are the officers of my department, of the importance of having the canals open as soon as possible, and every effort will be made to that end. That is all the assurance that I can give to the hon. gentleman, and all the assurance I have been able to give to the board of trade. I have not been able to say to them that on any particular day we can rely with confidence that the canal will be open.

RAILWAY POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. DAVIN. I should like to ask the Minister of Railways and Canals what is the railway policy of the Government, and in order to put myself right, I will conclude with a motion. I am in a state of bewilderment as to the policy of the Government in this respect. Last session the hon. gentleman laid down certain lines of railway policy, and I want to know whether that is the policy to-day. The words of the Minister of Railways and Canals in another place, to which I cannot refer, are still ringing in my ear, and in the ears of many hon. members. Now, I want to call the attention of the House to the policy as laid down here last session when the Minister of Railways and Canals was presenting his Crow's Nest Pass Railway Bill. This is what he said:

The supposition is but natural that the whole valley of Boundary Creek will be some time one continuous line of city life. Well, now, what does such an ultimate accomplishment depend upon? Why, it depends solely upon there being transportation facilities afforded, and railway construction, and means by which people who are willing to go in and develop that country may get in supplies, and fuel, and carry the products of their mines out of the country. It only depends upon that, and it does seem to me a serious question whether it is not the duty of Parliament to lend every possible aid, without delay, in order that we may come into possession of this valuable territory. Because the committee must not lose sight of the fact that this important section of the country lies immediately adjacent to the boundary of the United States, it is not very far from an extensive trunk line of railway. It will not take many miles of railway to be laid down in order to penetrate into that Boundary Creek section. Now, the people on the southern side of the border are liable to do in respect of that boundary country what they have almost done in respect of the Kootenay district. They are liable, by building a section of railway into that country, to get possession of it from a business and a trade point of view, and they are liable to divert the trade away from our own country, from the east and from the coast, and carry it to the south of the line. To my own personal knowledge, they have been doing this with respect to Kootenay. Why, Mr. Chairman, it is a fact which only requires to be known, I think, to make a grave impression upon the minds of this House and of the public generally, that the people of the United States belonging to the state of Washington, appreciating the advantages of the possession of British Columbia and of the valuable minerals which are there undeveloped, built a railway up into the Kootenay country and got possession of the business and the trade of that country, and have built up the city of Spokane wholly cut of the business which has originated in the province of British Columbia. To-day the city of Spokane is a flourishing city of 35,000 people. You go into that city and get into conversation with business men and they will tell you that the business prosperity and growth of that place from a little village of seven or eight thousand inhabitants a few years ago has been due to the development which has taken place in British Columbia. These people were there and they took advantage of that trade. I say that it is a matter of considerable importance for the committee to discuss as to whether we will retain possession of this country from a business point of view, or whether we will let the people to the south of us take that trade from under our eyes and become possessed of it in the sense in which the conditions of business will tend to the transfer of that trade in that direction.

I have here been quoting the words of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals, who last year laid it down that it was a wrong thing to insert in the charter of a railway any clause limiting its powers. Well, I want to know what is the policy of the Government to-day. There is the policy stated last year on which millions of dollars were voted by this House, it was because of that policy that millions of dollars were voted for the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. Now I should like to hear from the Minister of Railways and Canals whether he adheres to these words of his last year, or whether he has changed his mind, for it is desirable that we should know what is the policy of the Government in regard to railway building in this country. I beg to move the adjournment of the House.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fitzpatrick for the second reading of Bill (No. 16) to repeal the Electoral Franchise Act and to further amend the Dominion Elections Act.

Mr. BOURASSA. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I do not pretend to be able to throw much new light on the question now under consideration, but I deem it my duty to make known to the House the sentiment prevailing in the province of Quebec with regard to the Franchise Act.

The Bill introduced by the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) to repeal the Franchise Act of 1885 is admittedly the most popular measure that has ever been devised by the present Government. I may say that it is the most important legislation that has ever engaged the attention of Parliament, provided we do not consider the intrinsic value of a legislation only from the standpoint of the public expenditures involved. For one not to admit that a law amending the franchise is one of the most momentous measures, both from a political and a social standpoint, which a Parliament can debate and place on the Statute-book, would be ignoring the most essential mechanism of our parliamentary system and institutions. In fact, the right of suffrage is at the very basis of our parliamentary institutions, as it determines which is the class of citizens who will have the right of making their voice heard and their will obeyed, through their representatives, in the councils of the nation, and as it gives those who rank among the electors of the country a portion of the national sovereignty.

The precursors of the French revolution saw, or fancied they saw, in manhood suffrage a remedy for all the evils the old society was heir to, and a barrier against abuses and corruption of every description. I do not intend here and now to controvert the principles advanced by Rousseau and by his adepts of all shades, amongst whom we find to-day although, perhaps, they may not be aware of it, the hon. leader of the Opposition, and several other hon. gentlemen opposite. But facts are stubborn things, and the records of one hundred years have already given the lie to and shown the utter fallacy of the theories advocated by the philosophers of the eighteenth century, and they show that those brilliant Utopias, when actually applied, can only lead peoples to the failure of liberty. Now, those reformers of 1789 who were in earnest, found in the conditions of the times, a plea and even a ground in support of their system, which cannot be invoked in the present state of things.

Let us review, for one moment, the political and social position of France, at the end of the eighteenth century. What are the facts? Royalty was now holding an absolute sway; the public lands, wealth and offices were being monopolized by a few members of the nobility and by a few powerful officers, the privileges of whom increased in the inverse ratio of their charges; the lower nobility were being crushed down and impoverished for the benefit of the *grande*s of the court; the liberties of the communes and of the provinces, no longer the powerful bodies they were in the middle ages, were now being gradually and systematically taken away from them. It is easy to understand how right-minded men, anxious to better the condition of the people, as also ambitious men impatient to emerge from their obscurity and to sway in their turn, have sought in universal suffrage the surest means of drowning the privileged classes in the mass. Now, it had never occurred to some of them, while it was part of the scheme of others that, by conferring indiscriminately on all citizens the right of vote, without having prepared them beforehand to exercise the great powers of the franchise with which they were invested and without even being initiated into the knowledge of its prerogatives, they were merely handing over the government of the commonwealth into the hands of millions of sovereigns who no longer knew how to govern their own commune. Since then, the good sense of the nation has grown sounder and wild democracy itself has been baptized by the church, to use the expression of a celebrated monk of our times. But in the very cause of the danger, in popular suffrage itself, an antidote has been found against its extreme consequences. The majority of civilized nations in Europe, taught by the grievous crises attending the delivery of political liberty in France, have treaded with more prudence and caution in the footsteps of the French people. And now it may be said that, while England has taught the world the science of self-government, France has stirred up in the breasts of men the instinct of democratical liberty. May the true and noble tendencies of the two great nations that gave birth to our people, ever harmonize in this land of ours and be reflected in our laws and our institutions. Now, should our political and social position warrant us in sharing the blind optimism of the levelling philosophers of the eighteenth century, and in promulgating, in the matter of suffrage, absolute equality? Far from it. We are actually enjoying as large an amount of individual and corporative freedom as may be desirable, nor are there to be found in any portion of the country those abnormal agglomerations of proletaires crushed down by a few privileged citizens. On the contrary, our five million inhabitants are scattered throughout the half of a continent. Our national domain, with its immense wealth and possibilities, requires life-giving capital, property owners who will occupy and till the ground, thrifty and intelligent workmen whose labour will give paying returns. Can there be a sounder and more patriotic policy than that of dividing the national sovereignty between those useful citizens who contribute by their capital, their property and their labour towards the wealth and prosperity of the country, while excluding parasites and hangers-on of every description? For my part, I would be in favour of giving the right of suffrage to all those who need it and use it for the good government of the country, and denying it to all those who make it a matter of vile barter. Now, I must say that I was greatly surprised to hear, at the very outset of the session, the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) advocating universal suffrage and suggesting its adoption in our country. Several other hon. gentlemen opposite, I see, have also given expression to the same views in the course of this debate. Have, then, the hon. gentlemen opposite come to such a pass, after having boasted for sixty years past, of being the pillars of order and good government? Have the last champions of the great Conservative party in Quebec reached such a depth, after having, for over half a century, held up to public execration, the red flag, and preached the holy war against the subversive tenets of the Liberal party? Are we, then, to agree with sceptics that all parties are, by the very essence of things, Conservative when in power and Liberal when in opposition? It may, perhaps, be objected that the majority of the provinces, with the exception of Quebec, have adopted manhood suffrage and that, when inveighing against that policy I am also declaiming against the policy of several Liberal administrations. I have given expression to what I believe to be the prevailing sentiment in my own province in that regard, a feeling which is also shared by several political men in the other provinces, who have grown rather cool, I think, with respect to manhood suffrage. However, I respect the contrary opinion which seems to be shared in by the majority of my fellow-countrymen in the English-speaking provinces, and I believe this difference in opinion may be accounted for by the difference in our mental constitution. The Anglo Saxon race may adopt, without great inconvenience, political measures, apparently very radical, which they enforce with judgment and moderation; while the French people, who are more logical and more impetuous, cannot, with impunity, go beyond certain limits. Let, therefore, the provinces of Ontario and Manitoba adopt the franchise which suits them best, but I also claim for the province of Quebec the right of choosing the system which suits her best. Now, that variety of mental constitutions and ideas offers, I think, the best answer to the strongest of all the objections raised against the Bill introduced by the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), and as to which both parties seem to have taken a position which tallies perfectly with their instincts and traditions. I mean the uniformity of the Dominion franchise which is swept away under the provincial control. This objection is seemingly logical, because as the powers delegated by the people to their representatives in the Dominion Parliament extend to the whole nation, and as the laws enacted here apply to the whole country, those powers ought to issue from the same elements, that is to say, from electors having uniform qualifications throughout the various provinces of the Dominion. As I said, there seems to be logic and reason in this objection. But we must bear in mind that the only logical policy in the government of peoples consists in giving to each people such a constitution as is best adapted to their wants and in applying that constitution according to its fundamental spirit. Now, the principle of the British North America Act, by which we are governed, is essentially a provincial and decentralizing principle. The federal power is but the necessary cement that gives cohesiveness to the various materials entering into its structure. I am quite aware of the fact that the Conservative party did never make a secret of their centralizing and federative tendencies. Only the other day we heard the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) telling us that, in his opinion, this Parliament was the supreme authority and, therefore, that we should have a uniform franchise for the election of the representatives to whom the people delegates the power of exercising that supreme authority. I know that it has ever been the policy of the Conservative party to advocate the principle of centralization, and perhaps also to lead us to legislative union. The Franchise Act was not a solitary nor inconspicuous instance of their attempts in that direction. The Conservative Administrations that have succeeded each other have always done their best to take away from the provinces the control of a portion of their legislative power, as shown by the License Act, which was enacted by a Conservative Government with a view to depriving the provinces of a considerable portion of their revenue. We have another instance of the same policy in the Streams Act, by which a Conservative Government sought to deprive the province of Ontario of a considerable portion of her territory. I could cite many other instances to show that ever since confederation, and prior to it, the Conservative party have always favoured centralization, if they did not openly make it a plank of their political platform. The Liberal party, on the other hand, has always championed provincial freedom and autonomy, and the Bill now under discussion is a fresh evidence of their sincerity in that respect. Each province, as we all know, has the right exclusively to enact laws concerning its civil and religious government, public instruction and the administration of her territory; now, I ask, on what ground would such a province be denied the right of sending here, representatives chosen by the very same voters who are entrusted with the care of her own destinies, in order to protect her interests in the framing of the general laws of the country?

Now, as is often the case in a deliberative body such as this House is, hon. gentlemen opposite have wandered from the real ground of debate and have indulged in considerations which are more or less germane to the matter under discussion. They have spoken of the abuses of power perpetrated by the provincial governments in connection with the preparation of the voters' lists or, rather, in the framing of their Franchise Acts, as the voters' lists are under the control of the municipal authorities, the most competent to deal fairly with the matter. The hon. gentlemen may think that this criticism is a sufficient justification of their attitude, in setting up as reformers of abuses, but I must confess that I am very little affected by such a plea. Now so long as they have not devised a system of franchise that is absolutely above criticism, in theory and in practice, I shall hold firm to the belief that the provincial and municipal system is the most economical, the most equitable system, and the one that meets best the wants and tendencies of our parliamentary institutions. Moreover, the few blemishes that have been pointed out in that system arise from the fact that our provincial laws, as all our other laws, are applied by men liable to err. The disadvantages complained of do not arise from the system itself but from the enforcing of it. These drawbacks, however, sink into insignificance when compared with the abuses of every description that have been creeping in under the Franchise Act of 1885.

I agree that the hon. gentlemen must not have a very vivid recollection of the enforcement of that law, having never been called upon to watch its operation, as they had in the revising barrister a devoted friend who spared them the trouble of attending to the preparation of the voters' lists. But in our case, it was quite a different matter, because we had to go through our several constituencies and to do the work for which that Government official was paid for, so that we know fully the value of that Act of 1885.

By repealing that iniquitous Act we are purely and simply doing away with a law that was inimical to the freedom and autonomy of our provinces; we are implementing a formal and sacred pledge given to the electorate, while, at the same time, blotting out from the Statute-book an Act that constituted one of the most unpardonable attempts ever made against the constitution by the Conservative party.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me, Sir, that this is such an important measure that both sides of the House should approach it in a calm spirit, for it is of too much importance to import any heat into this discussion. No party advantage should be sought in dealing with a Bill of this kind. So far, I am glad to say, that judicial spirit in dealing with the measure has been fairly well maintained, and I trust that such will characterize the debate on this Bill through its various stages. For my own part, I propose to take that course throughout, because I must repeat what I said at the outset that no party advantage should be gained by dealing with this Bill. Now, Sir, the present Franchise Bill that has been in operation for some years, is one that has been on trial to a very large extent, and time and experience alone could point out the weak points of that Bill. Those are the only means which we have of determining whether any Act passed by this House has met the expectations of hon. gentlemen who were parties to its enactment. I say that the Franchise Bill has been on trial, and if it has not met the expectations of all those who engaged in framing it, of all those who were strong supporters of it at that time, and if it has accomplished anything more than was expected by those who on that occasion gave it a very honest opposition, it is not at all to be expected that even they should not adhere to the ground that was taken by them when this Bill was introduced. Now, Sir, we have had several years experience of the operation of that Act. No one can pretend that it is without some defects. I do not think it has been urged from any side that some changes should not be made to the Bill. As I said before, time has pointed out some weak points in it, there is no doubt about that; but time has pointed out with equal clearness that there were many strong points in the Bill that the House should not be disposed to give up. I think I can fairly challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to say that there has not been a single move, there has not been any demand whatever in the country for the repeal of this Franchise Bill. True, hon. gentlemen have passed resolutions, and they have introduced Bills, in doing which they were clearly within their right, and they have made very strong speeches in the country. They have endeavoured by every means. I will say constitutional means, to excite public opinion strongly against this Bill. But, Sir, after a trial of something like twelve years of the Franchise Bill, not a single petition has been presented to this House asking for its repeal. Hon. gentlemen must clearly see that all their efforts have not resulted in any demand coming up from the people of the Dominion of Canada asking for a repeal of that Act. Now if that be the case, it seems to me that our course is very clear. But we have other evidence besides the evidence that there is no demand for a repeal of that Act. We have had two elections take place upon these lists, one in 1887 and the other in 1891. Upon both those occasions hon. gentlemen opposite made the Franchise Bill one of their test questions, indeed I may say that hon. gentlemen went to the country more especially upon that question as one upon which the elections should turn. In 1887 hon. gentlemen were unsuccessful before the people; in 1891 they were equally unsuccessful before the people. As for the election of 1896, I do not think that any hon. gentleman will go so far as to say that they can claim a verdict upon that question as a result of those elections. The truth is that hon. gentlemen gained that election simply by a fluke. So conscious are they of that fact that since they have been in office they have not attempted to repeal one single act that they had condemned so strongly, they do not attempt to redeem a single pledge they had made to the people. It is quite plain, from what has occurred, that hon. gentlemen opposite were then either insincere in their professions, or else they have found since they came into office, that if they carried them out, they would be running counter to public opinion in this country. It is true, the Liberal party out of office made a pledge that the franchise would be repealed, but that pledge of theirs was not any more solemn than their pledge that every vestige of protection would be wiped away. Two years' experience has shown that they have no intention to do that; indeed, the country seems to take it for granted that the Liberals are not to be held responsible for their pledges. Whatever concern that may be to the Liberal party, it is of great concern to the people of Canada, because if they have proven false to their pledges, the country has benefited by it, and we have not had the disturbance in trade and commerce which would have followed on any attempt on their part to keep faith. No doubt, it is to be heralded from one end of Canada to the other, that this repeal of the Franchise Act is to be a sort of redeemer for all the broken pledges of hon. gentlemen opposite, and if that be so, it would have been more consistent had these gentlemen tried to redeem their character in some other direction. But the great difficulty which meets the Liberal party now is, that, from the very outset, they have in an almost insane and unreasoning way, given opposition to the Dominion Franchise Act, and consequently nothing can appease their wrath but the total repeal of that measure. In fact, the Prime Minister stated that nothing but a complete repeal of the Act would be a fair compensation for the wrongs suffered by the people of Canada for so many years. Hon. gentlemen opposite have taken a not very creditable course in this House and in the country in their opposition to this law. They sought to back up their objections to it by holding up the judges of this country as blind tools in the hands of the Conservatives, and they charged these judges with revising the list in the interests of that political party. The hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) declared, the other evening, that the great difficulty of the Liberal party in that revision was, that they had to watch the revising officers, and, translated into plain English, that statement means that the judges of this country who acted as revising officers, were false to their sworn obligations. I am glad to say, Sir, that the members of the judiciary of Canada are above any such false aspersions, for we know that if they err at all, it is an error of judgment, and not one arising from venal motives. I say, Sir, that there was no foundation for the imputations which the Liberals made against our judiciary, and which imputations were made for the sole purpose of backing up their statements that the Franchise Act was bad from the beginning. I am prepared to admit that the franchise law has many faults, but it never had the fault of being any political advantage to one party or the other in this country. Any statements to the contrary are absolutely destitute of truth, and yet such statements have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite to gain paltry party advantages. After all the outcry made by the Liberal party against the Dominion Franchise Act for years and years, the people of the country have shown, by the general elections of 1887 and 1891, that they upheld the Conservative party in passing that law, and even to-day there has not been a single petition presented to this House in support of the course taken by hon. gentlemen opposite in proposing to repeal that Act. In view of the denunciation of the judges and the revising officers by the Liberal party, it is a very curious thing that these very gentlemen opposite, under their proposed Bill, place the final revision of the lists under the control of these same judges. Nothing could more clearly demonstrate the slanders that hon. gentlemen opposite have set afloat. I do not say, Sir, that all the Liberal members engaged in this warfare against the judges and the revising officers, but I am sorry to say that a great number of hon. gentlemen opposite were guilty of that offence. Even the other day, the right hon. the First Minister declared here, that these lists were a terror to the people. If they were a terror to the people because of the expense, the hon. gentleman did not say so; and so he left it to be inferred that there was some other ground for the terror which these lists inspired. Hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that this is the most infamous Act ever placed on the Statute-books, that the people are chafing under it, and that, for that reason, the Act ought to be wiped out in toto.

Mr. CASEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey) says, "Hear, hear." Well, I congratulate hon. gentlemen opposite on the improvement in their morals; I congratulate them on their change of heart. I congratulate them that they are now attempting to undo the harm they have done in the past and that they are now proposing under this Bill to give the revision of the lists to these very same county court judges whom they denounced, because, in forty-nine cases out of fifty the final revision of the list will be entrusted, under the authority of the municipal council, to the county court judges.

Therefore, the slander put forth was practically against the judges of the land, and surely could not be assumed to have been made against persons who might have been appointed revising officers, and I do not think they have been attacked any more than the judges. I do not think any hon. member will pretend to say that in this Act, as it stands to-day, there is a particle of party advantage in it. It is not, I repeat, a matter of party advantage we have to consider, but it is one of public utility. It is a question which we can afford to consider with respect to the general safety of the Parliament of Canada, and with a view to secure the vote of every British subject who has not been disqualified under the Act of any legislature; we can afford to consider the Bill on that ground, and I hope before a conclusion is arrived at we will meet on that common ground and frame a Bill on the lines I have indicated.

I come now to the question of expense, because that question as connected with the revision of the lists is practically all that divides the two political parties at this time. If hon. gentlemen opposite were desirous of perfecting a measure rather than of clamouring for the repeal of the present Act, if they were prepared to consider this subject on common ground, then the issue would be narrowed down to a question of expense. The hon. First Minister, in discussing the matter, stated, as an offset against the great cost involved by the revisions which took place at considerable intervals and which nevertheless involved an extremely large expense, that the cost would be entirely removed by handing over the preparation of the lists to the municipal and provincial authorities. The hon. gentleman went so far as to use the following words, which are very strong words, and to which much weight must be attached:—

I place myself in the judgment of the House when I say that the lists so prepared in Ontario, with the exception of the lists in the cities, do not cost a cent to the provincial treasury; the lists in Quebec do not cost a cent to the provincial treasury; and those lists in Ontario and Quebec do not cost a cent to individual members. They are prepared by the municipal councils without any expenditure.

I do not accuse the hon. gentleman of having deliberately made a statement of that kind, I do not believe he would do such a thing; but the hon. gentleman has spoken without that information which he should have possessed in order to guide him in making so strong a statement, that the revision would not cost the province one cent and would not cost the candidates a cent, but the whole work would be done by the municipal authorities. What is the fact in this connection? The list is prepared by the municipal councils throughout Ontario—and I am only speaking for that province. These municipal lists in nine cases out of ten are prepared for the purpose of municipal elections, and if any revision takes place it must be made by a county judge, and for the purpose of purging the list of all the inequalities and faults that will occur in lists prepared for municipal purposes. No one could say that lists prepared by the councils, if left at that stage and there was no provision made to go beyond that, would be non-partisan. Every hon. member who has had experience in Ontario is aware that the lists always take their colouring and political complexion from the clerks, assessors and councils, and those lists are loaded up in every case in this province with the names of persons who have no right to appear on the lists and have no vote. There are hundreds and thousands of men left off under such circumstances, while people possessing the right to vote should have their names on the lists. The preliminary revision of the lists by the municipal council is of the most loose description, and is only a very small measure towards the preparation of provincial or Dominion lists. No pretense is made to revise this municipal list except on the eve of an election. This is because it involves a very large charge to the candidates; and my own experience has been, and I have been engaged in revising the lists both under the Dominion franchise and under the provincial Act, that no hon. member who has placed the lists side by side with lists prepared under the present Franchise Act, would say that the cost to the candidates of revising the provincial lists could be made one farthing less than revising the Dominion lists. I am leaving outside the question as to whether the province or the Dominion should pay the expense, and I am dealing with the subject entirely from the position of the candidate who is undertaking to revise the lists. Suppose we have a provincial election. If the provincial and the Dominion election do not take place on the same year and on the same list, what follows? The Dominion member or candidate must in every case revise the provincial list, should the Dominion franchise, being based on the municipal lists, he must revise the list the same as if no election had taken place and as if no list had been revised by the candidates for the local legislature.

It is perfectly idle to contend that either a municipal revision, which is a mere preliminary revision, or a revision for the provincial elections, is sufficient to take the place of the revision necessary for the Dominion elections. In every case we must have a revision for the Dominion as well as for the local elections, unless they take place in the same year, which is a most unlikely and a most undesirable thing. Hon. gentlemen in power here and those in power in the province of Ontario are pulling the strings together pretty well now. I do not know how long that will last; but the right arm of the hon. First Minister would no doubt think it a proper thing to bring on the provincial elections at the same time as the Dominion elections. In that case they could use the same lists; but otherwise they could not. With regard to the expense upon the candidates, the local candidates must bear the cost of their own revision, and even if this Bill becomes law, the Dominion candidates will have to bear the cost of revising the lists on their own account just as much as if the Dominion Franchise Act was in force. What happens? Whenever there is a revision of the lists, the judges must be paid, the clerks must be paid, other expenses must be provided for, and in the long run there is not one dollar saved to either the provincial or Dominion candidates. We have therefore to come down to the narrow question as to the sums to be paid to the judges and revisers, and the other expenses, and who should pay them. I do not know whether hon. gentlemen seek shelter under the suggestion that there is something to be gained by unloading the expense upon the municipalities. I do not think that is an expense which the people of Ontario are prepared to take upon themselves; and I do not see any reason why the Federal Parliament of Canada should not bear a fair share of the cost of revising the lists. The question of cost appears now to be the only possible ground of contention between the two political parties, and upon that ground it seems to me that we could meet and get a reasonable Bill, the provisions of which would give no party advantage. We were told by the right hon. First Minister that the cardinal principle of this Bill was to take the revision of the lists out of the hands of those desperate revising officers, and place it entirely under the control of the municipalities. The right hon. gentleman must know that, in view of the varied franchises in all the provinces, particularly those in the province of Ontario to-day, if that be the cardinal principle, it is violated on the very threshold. The cities and county towns of the province are to-day under the Registration Act, which means that one-fourth of the whole voting population of Ontario are absolutely beyond the control of the municipalities. I can hardly believe that hon. gentlemen opposite took that into consideration when they made the statement that the revision was to be under municipal control. But that cardinal principle is violated further than that. If the provincial lists be more than one year old, this Bill provides that Dominion machinery may be initiated under the authority of the Parliament of Canada to secure a revision. Hon. gentlemen know perfectly well that they are unable, under the existing laws of the province of Ontario, to put in motion any municipal machinery for the revision of the lists, and therefore they must provide machinery for making up their own lists. It is most likely to happen at any time that the local lists shall be more than one year old, as the scope of the Registration Act is being constantly extended. In fact, there is a provision on the Statute-book to-day that the Registration Act may be extended to all the cities, towns and villages of the province of Ontario; and when that is done, it practically means that in all such cases the lists will be more than a year old, and the greater part of the revision will have to take place under the authority of the federal Act, and not under the authority of the municipalities or the province. Now, there are strong reasons against handing over the control of the federal franchise—to the provincial authorities. We commit ourselves, by an act of that kind, to a franchise that we absolutely know nothing about. We commit ourselves to a franchise which will vary in each province, and will take the insane course of handing over to the provinces the complete control of the Dominion franchise. The franchise adopted by each province—no matter how inconsistent these franchises may be with each other—will form an integral part of the Dominion franchise. Whether it be one that would commend itself to this Parliament or not, and whether it be good or bad, we will have to abide by the consequences.

I submit moreover that this is a dangerous power to place in the hands of the local legislatures. We have striking examples given us of what erratic and mischievous courses these legislatures may follow in order to gain a party advantage at an election. The hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) has shown us what has taken place in the province of Nova Scotia, and we have had most striking instances of the abuses which have arisen in the province of Manitoba out of the franchise adopted in that province—a franchise based upon the sole ground of party advantage. We are asked to make this Parliament the mere creature of the local legislatures in this most important matter.

One of the strong reasons against this measure is the fact that it will have the effect of disfranchising a very large number of people who ought to have the right to vote at Dominion elections. Take the province of Ontario, for instance. The franchise of that province differs materially from that of every other province, particularly in this respect that residence is there made a special qualification. To be entitled to be put on the list, the applicant must, as a first essential, have resided in the province one year, and within the particular electoral district for at least three months. Apply this rule to the cities of Hull and Ottawa. A man might be eleven months a resident of the city of Ottawa, and it would be impossible to have his name put upon the list, but a similar rule would not apply when he crossed the provincial line into the province of Quebec, unless a similar Act should be passed by that province. Although a man may be a resident of Canada, although he may have every right one can imagine to entitle him to vote, although he may own half a million dollars worth of property in the city of Ottawa, if he were not a whole year in the province he would, under this Bill, have no right to vote in a Dominion election; and having changed his residence, neither would he have any right to vote in the province of Quebec. My hon. friend the Solicitor General must see the necessity of protecting that class of persons, which is very numerous. The means of travel, the disposition of our people to change about a good deal, point to the necessity of protecting that class of people from disfranchisement. This measure would operate in every case against a person coming into the province of Ontario from any one of the other provinces, unless he had been a resident of Ontario at least a year.

There is another reason which I do not think my hon. friend the Solicitor General can have taken into consideration. The constituencies for the Dominion elections are not now, and never can be, the same as those for provincial purposes. That is perfectly obvious from the fact that there ought not to be so many constituencies represented in a provincial legislature as in the Dominion Parliament from any one province. Consequently, by this Bill you will disfranchise a very considerable number of voters. Let me put a case to the hon. gentleman. Take three local municipalities, A, B and C. These may be all in a single electoral division for the Dominion and in different electoral divisions for the local. Take, for instance, the riding I have the honour to represent, in that riding there are three local municipalities, which are in three separate electoral districts for the provincial elections, but which are all in the one electoral district for Dominion purposes, so that any change of residence from one to the other might have the effect of disfranchising those who make the change. By this means a very considerable number of persons, who possess all the qualifications, would be unable to vote at a Dominion election, owing to their names being excluded from the provincial lists.

It was stated the other evening by an hon. member, as one of the difficulties in connection with the Dominion franchise, that owing to the revision in some cases only taking place at very great intervals, a large number of persons were disfranchised, and consequently the number of votes polled in the Dominion elections showed a smaller percentage of the total number of voters than was the case in the local election. I took the trouble to look into that matter, and I found the reverse to be the case. I compared the Dominion election of 1891 with the provincial election of 1890, in the province of Ontario, the former of which took place in March and the latter in June. I found that the number of votes on the Dominion lists for the province of Ontario in 1891 was 553,904, and that the number polled was 371,105, or 65 per cent of the entire lists. Then I took the provincial votes cast at the elections of 1890, as compared with the number on the provincial lists, and I found that whereas the number on the lists was 528,902 the number polled was 339,287, or 62½ per cent of the total vote as against 67 per cent polled at the Dominion elections.

Mr. CASEY. What was the percentage?

Mr. CLANCY. The percentage of votes cast compared with those on the lists in the Dominion elections was 67 per cent, and in the local election only 62½, taking the list of 1891 for the Dominion and the list of 1890 for the province. There were 25,002 more names on the Dominion lists than on the provincial lists, and there were polled on the provincial list 31,818 less than on the Dominion lists, showing, first, that there was a greater number on the Dominion list than upon the local, and next, that a greater percentage of those cast their vote. That arose from causes that must be perfectly apparent to hon. gentlemen. It was largely due to the fact that persons changed about their local residences, and local residence being the essence of qualification in Ontario, many persons lost their right to vote from the fact that they had changed their residence from one riding to another. I am perfectly well persuaded that that accounts for the smaller vote always being obtained under what is called one man one vote, in the province of Ontario, than would have been the case, had the local residence not been, as I said, the basis of the right to vote. Now, that would affect persons already on the list, and it would affect those to be placed upon the list as being entitled to vote. It would also raise that other question, which is of serious consequence—that where there are three local ridings, as I have pointed out, in a Dominion riding, a number of people must be disfranchised—and I want my hon. friend to keep that in mind—if they go from one local constituency to another, even though they remain in the same Dominion electoral district. That is a very serious consequence of a Bill of this kind. I think my hon. friend will see, if he looks into what I have pointed out, that it is utterly unworkable, so far as the province of Ontario is concerned, unless he is disposed—and I do not think he is disposed—to disfranchise a large number of people in the province of Ontario who otherwise would have the right to vote. Surely, no hon. gentleman would take the ground that we can afford to pass a Bill of that kind, having the effects that I have pointed out—and I have endeavoured to do it without heat, with a view to making this, if possible, a good Bill.

Now, it does seem to me, that the House will hardly agree with the ground taken by the right hon. the First Minister and others on that side, that the franchise is of such a domestic character that it should be under the control of the municipal councils and of the province. It seems to me, that the true basis on which you can fix a franchise is, to take into consideration the conditions of the people and the subject coming under the control of the legislative bodies to be elected, whether Dominion or local. I do not think you can safely disregard that. It is not disregarded with respect to even municipal franchises. We find that it is not so domestic in its character that you can lay down one uniform rule. Under the Municipal Act, the city has one basis of franchise, towns another, incorporated villages another, and local or rural municipalities another. The reason is, as is perfectly obvious, that the conditions are not the same and that the basis of the franchise must be always suited to the conditions of the people and the subjects that come under their control. While there is a difference in the basis of the franchise, they go further, proving that there is nothing domestic about it. The same franchise is not given for voting a money by-law as for electing a municipal council. No one would say we must lay down that rule either with regard to the province or with regard to the Dominion, and, to my mind, there are rights that would forbid the idea of making the franchise the same for the Dominion as for the province. Suppose that we had a question of direct taxation arising in this country. That may not arise in the time of hon. members present, but we are here discussing a question of principle. No one would think that we should give the same franchise for voting on a question of direct taxation as for the purpose of electing members to this House. The power of direct taxation is an extraordinary power and one which involves serious consequences. This has been taken notice of and acted upon by the municipalities, as I have stated, that in voting for money by-laws and by-laws having a money consideration, they have limited the franchise to those having property in fee or upon long leases. In questions of taxation, you must go back to the principle of giving adequate power to those who are to bear the burden. This may be a rather remote case, but it shows the danger that would result from assenting to the principles that hon. gentlemen opposite have stated.

Now, Sir, no one has denied, not even the right hon. the First Minister, that the principle of federal control of the franchise for election to this House is a sound principle. But the excuse they give for departing from this good rule is: While we place it in the hands of the provincial authorities, we still retain control. It seems to me, that is simply a contradiction in terms. That it should be placed absolutely—I was going to say, irrevocably—in the hands of the provincial authorities, and that we still retain control, I suppose, by the fact that we retain power to repeal the Act. But that seems to me an unsound and far-fetched argument. If hon. gentlemen are disposed to place the control with the provinces, they must have decided that they can do so without danger. To fall back upon the argument, that if they find themselves mistaken, they can retrace their steps after the harm is done, is a very strange and very faulty argument by which to justify any legislation, and especially legislation having such serious consequences as this. I do not say that everything that has been urged against the Franchise Act has not been urged without some ground. I can assent, for instance, to the view that it is necessary for this House to make the revision of the lists cheaper. But when it is proposed to repeal the Franchise Act in order to make the lists cheaper, the argument seems to me very weak indeed. Though I have listened with great interest to the speeches on this subject, I have failed to hear one hon. gentleman prove that it was necessary to repeal the Franchise Act in order to reach the end desired, the cheapening of the lists. The allegation of partiality on the part of the judges seems to me to be unfair and without foundation. We are too prone, on both sides, on occasions of this kind, to have very great and very unwarranted dread of what the judges may do because of their political leanings. I am sure that, in all the election trials that have taken place, and in what we see of the records through appeals, we have found the judges throughout Canada entirely free from partisanship. I doubt whether there is an hon. gentleman in this House—and I never heard one outside—who could say, that, so far as our judges are concerned, even in a case that may involve the seat of a member for whom, on political grounds, they have the strongest sympathy, they have ever departed from their duty.

I remember very well when this Franchise Act was passed, and when the appointment of revising officers took place; I remember well the case of the appointment of a county judge in the county in which I live. He was a strong Liberal, an extremely strong Liberal; in fact he was known more particularly by his strong partisan feeling in favour of the Liberal party. There was a great dread on the part of the Conservatives that if this judge were made a revising officer they would not have fair-play. Pressure was brought to bear upon Sir John A. Macdonald not to make the appointment on the ground that the judge was an extreme partisan and therefore could not divorce himself from his extreme leanings in the revision of the list. Sir John A. Macdonald refused to make the change, he carried out the uniform practice under the Bill of making the judges revising officers, and what has transpired? No one who then entertained that fear would not be glad to-day to make a public declaration that no fairer man ever existed. While he had strong partisan feelings, he never forgot that he was a judge, and he never forgot to discharge his duties without the slightest partiality. Now I think that obtains generally from one end of Canada to the other. The statements made in vilification of the revising officers, both inside and outside this House, have been without foundation, and I am glad that an opportunity is now afforded hon. gentlemen of retracing their steps and of withdrawing to a large extent what they have said. In proposing to-day to hand over the control of the revision of the lists to these men, they offer a complete vindication of those men. Now I say in conclusion that it is absolutely necessary for the Federal Parliament to have its own franchise. The interests of this country are too great to take a step that may involve so serious consequences. While there might have been years ago safety in employing the lists made under the control of the provinces, experience has shown that that cannot be done now, experience has shown that the provinces have taken advantage of the control of their own lists to disfranchise Dominion officials whenever they thought they could serve their party interests by so doing. In view of the changing conditions, it is always best to make the franchise in this country depend upon existing conditions, to depend upon the great subjects to be dealt with, and for that reason we should control our own franchise. I repeat that there is no ground of contention at this moment except that of expense. But the machinery to be instituted will not be cheaper to any of the candidates. There may be a saving effected, and I hope there will be, with regard to the sums that are to be paid to the revising officer. We must revise the lists just as often, and with just as much expense to the candidates, whether this Bill becomes law or not. It will make no difference, so far as they are concerned, whether the Dominion or the province will bear the greater portion of the sum to be paid for revision, as that will depend much upon the machinery employed. We cannot afford, for the purpose of cheapening the cost of the list, to surrender any of the great advantages which the Federal Parliament enjoys by retaining control of the franchise and the preparation of its own lists.

Mr. CASEY. I have listened with some attention to the hon. gentleman who has just sat down in the hope that he could solve a question that has been puzzling me since this debate began. That question is, Why in the world should an Opposition object to the repeal of the present Franchise Act? I do not know that the hon. gentleman has given me much light on the subject, though I may be able to refer to a hint or two that he has given me, before I close. But it seems to me, as a general proposition, a very strange thing that an Opposition should object to the repeal of an Act which gives such vast powers to a Government as the present franchise law does.

It might seem strange, on the other hand, that a Government should seek to divest itself of these great powers and privileges. My hon. friend does not see any party advantage in it. I think, Sir, those of us who for eighteen years were dragged under the harrow of that Act, were able to see where party advantage came in. It is asserted that our conduct has been marked by a bitter attack on the good faith of the judges of this country who acted as revising officers. It must be remembered that not all the revising officers were judges; it must be remembered, further, that all the revising officers, whether judges or not, employed a revising officer's clerk, who did what some would call the routine and what others might call the dirty work, of the job. It is no use to attempt, as my hon. friend has done, to compare the duties of a judge under the Provincial Franchise Act sitting to hear appeals against a list which has been made by the municipal authorities, with the duties of a judge acting as revising officer in compiling the lists 'de novo,' as he does under the Dominion Franchise Act. The revising officer appointed his clerk, who was always a man thoroughly in the interest of the party then in power, to do the practical work of getting the list ready. No need to go over all the steps which were to be taken. Everybody remembers what facilities the revising officer's clerk had for doing work that had to be done, on the other side, at the expense of the candidate. The result was that, as a matter of fact, the expense of preparing the list was on one side borne by the Government of the day and the people of the country, and on the other side borne by the individual candidate and his supporters. There is one vast advantage. Even supposing the revising officer himself to have been reasonably impartial when the actual question of admitting or rejecting a vote came before him, it was in the preliminary work of compiling the list and putting men on, whom the other side had to appeal at great cost to get off, leaving men off whom the other side had to appeal at great cost to put on—it was in these preliminary measures that the party in power had a vast advantage under that Act; and how great it was, many of us know to our cost.

The hon. gentleman says that this Act was sustained by the electorate of the country because, in 1887, when, as he correctly says, it was a leading issue, the Government was sustained. Does that prove anything? Sir, if you pack a jury and then appeal to that jury to say whether they were fairly constituted, what answer are you going to get from the jury? If you have a Franchise Act which packs the electorate of this country in favour of a particular party and Government, what answer are you going to get from that electorate when you appeal to them at the polls? The fact that the electorate voted on lists, packed as they were, to sustain the Government that passed that law, shows nothing in favour of the law, but is one of its severest condemnations. In 1891 the election was fought on other lines, not chiefly on this, as the hon. gentleman said, though this was one of the issues, but the same packing of the electorate continued then, and continued in 1896.

Why should we as a Government and a party wish to surrender these great advantages when we come into power? It may seem to be asking the House to believe a great deal, but we ask the House to believe that those who have suffered so long from the injustice of the Franchise Act do not wish to inflict that injustice on others.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CASEY. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to be bound by some idea of consistency to stand up for a system that would oppress them. We propose to avoid the expense of correcting the lists, and we know what hon. gentlemen opposite would suffer if we chose to use this machine as it was used before. I do not say that poor, weak human nature does not urge some of us to press on the Government the propriety of retaining the old Franchise Act for a few years and giving hon. gentlemen opposite a dose of their own medicine. I believe that to be the inward feelings of a good many unregenerate hearts on this side of the House; but, having seen in Opposition that the Act was unfair and unjust, we have sufficient sense of consistency to compel us to stand by the promise we made in Opposition, and repeal this iniquity. When we were fighting this law by private subscription to raise funds necessary to correct the lists, we knew what power the other side possessed. We had no rich contractors at our back, we had no appointments to make.

An hon. MEMBER. You are all right now.

Mr. CASEY. An hon. gentleman says we are all right now.

An hon. MEMBER. What about the Yukon?

Mr. CASEY. No doubt the Government might now obtain favours from contractors. If we had contractors at our back who were prepared to advance funds, we would be in better shape to run elections than we have been for eighteen years. With all those funds supposed to be available, the powers given to us by the Franchise Act, the advantage of being able to raise money without putting our hands in our own pockets, as the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) has said—what could we not do to hon. gentlemen opposite at the next elections? We could make them a corporal's guard. But consistency, propriety and a sense of justice have compelled the Government, aided by their supporters, to throw aside the Act and revert to the old constitutional law of Canada. New-comers into Dominion politics, like the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) may forget that we have carried on elections for this Parliament under provincial franchises for a much greater number of years than we have carried on elections under the Dominion franchise. The wisdom of the fathers of confederation thought that difficulties might arise from the attempt to arrange and carry out a uniform system for the whole Dominion. They provided that in the meantime the provincial franchise should be used. From 1867 to 1885 it was used, and used to the satisfaction of every one concerned. In 1885, for a party purpose, which was thoroughly carried out by the event, a change was made to a uniform Dominion franchise, and the change involved the one element which I think is fatal to a franchise of that kind. My own theoretical preference is for a uniform Dominion franchise, if it could be obtained without most serious disadvantage. But no such franchise can be obtained unless we place the compiling of the lists in the hands of Dominion officials.

Mr. CLANCY. Is not the hon. gentleman raising the question for himself of a uniform franchise?

Mr. CASEY. My theoretical, individual and personal opinion—I do not think I can make it clearer to the hon. gentleman—would be in favour of a uniform franchise for the Dominion, if it could be had without serious disadvantage. As the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) has pointed out, no such franchise can be enforced except under the direction of Dominion officials, for we cannot compel municipal authorities to frame lists at our dictation, and this is the radical defect of a uniform system, and one reason that made me give up the idea as one that is not practicable. You cannot secure it without having Dominion officials to compile the lists, and whenever you have those officials, you have Government interference and the evils we have complained of under the present system. The question of expense I will come to later. I should be very glad to see, if possible, a system of uniform manhood suffrage, one man one vote, registration up to the last day possible before the elections; but for the reasons I have pointed out, I believe such a system to be thoroughly impracticable without bringing in the worst evils of which we have complained under the present system.

Defects have been alleged in certain of the provincial systems in the preparation of the voters' lists. If there is some discrepancy, whose fault is it? It is the fault of the electors of the particular province. How are the defects to be cured? By the action of the electors when found out. What will cure them? The very fact that these lists are going to be used for Dominion as well as provincial purposes will go far towards effecting a cure. The fact that the Ontario lists were used for Dominion elections led to a great improvement in the method of compiling the provincial lists in that province. If there were defects, they would be much more likely to be pointed out and removed when there were two sets of candidates, the candidates for the local legislature and the candidates for the Dominion Parliament to look after them.

I do not propose to follow the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) in all his attacks on the franchise of Ontario. Such an attack comes with all the less grace from the hon. gentleman, because he is largely responsible for that system as a former ornament of the Opposition in that legislature; and I have yet to learn that for some years back the Opposition in that legislature proposed any material change in the Franchise Act of Ontario, pointing in the direction which the hon. gentleman has advocated.

Mr. CLANCY. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will pardon me for a moment. I made no attack on the provincial franchise. I simply pointed out that it could not be made applicable to this Bill.

Mr. CASEY. I did not so consider the hon. gentleman's remarks. I considered that the hon. gentleman made a distinct attack on the system of Ontario. He alleged that it disfranchised a great many people, that a great many voters did not get their names on the lists, and that its adoption would be unfair to candidates at Dominion elections.

Mr. CASEY.

Mr. CLANCY. No, I did not say so.

Mr. CASEY. I took notes of his words to that effect, and I find fault with the hon. gentleman because he did not urge these points in the Ontario House. But coming to the question of expense, I must refer to the very disingenuous attempt on his part to misrepresent the position taken by the right hon. Premier in comparing the expense under a Dominion and a provincial franchise system. The right hon. gentleman stated that the provincial lists of Ontario cost nothing to the provincial treasury, nor to individuals. I think my hon. friend is perfectly correct. Nothing is paid by the Government for the preparation of the lists, the individual pays nothing, except such an amount as he is called upon to pay as a taxpayer in a municipality.

But my hon. friend (Mr. Clancy) sought to make it appear that the Prime Minister said it cost the candidate nothing to have these lists revised. Nobody said anything of the kind. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) was putting up a man of straw and knocking him down; nobody ever pretended that it would not cost the candidate something to have the voters' lists revised on the eve of an election. What the Prime Minister did maintain, and what is glaringly true is this: that whereas every revision of the Dominion lists has cost the country something over a quarter million dollars, the annual compilation and revision of the voters' lists used for provincial purposes cost the province as a province nothing, and cost the voters of the country nothing, except the small cost incident to both parties when an election is just in view. That cost is not for the revision of the lists, it is not for the making of the lists; it is merely in connection with appeals made to the judge from the revised lists, and whatever cost there may be in that respect falls equally on both parties, Conservatives and Liberals alike. There is no such state of things as exists under the Dominion law, where the list is packed in advance in favour of one party, and where all the expense of revising it has to fall on the other.

Mr. BENNETT. May I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey): Are the county court judges paid special fees by the province of Ontario for revising these local lists?

Mr. CASEY. I really must ask a legal friend whether there is any fee paid to the judge for revision.

Mr. BENNETT. You said there was not.

An hon. MEMBER. They are paid.

Mr. CASEY. The sitting of the court for two or three days may cost a few dollars to the province, but I was speaking of the compiling of the list in the ordinary way, which costs neither the provincial government nor the individual voter anything. Of course, if there is litigation about a voters' list or anything else, it will cost the province something.

The cost to the municipalities of the getting up of these lists has been urged by some speakers against this Bill. That is entirely beside the question, because that cost is incurred annually by the municipalities for their own purposes. It does not cost us anything if we choose to use the same lists, and it does not matter whether it costs the municipalities $100,000 or $1,000,000; that is their own business if they choose to go to that expense in compiling the lists. What we have to decide is: whether we shall use these ready-made lists prepared in the fairest manner known to us, or whether we ourselves shall proceed to prepare lists of our own, imperfect and partial in their nature.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) thought he made a point when he urged that the registration which takes place in the cities and towns of Ontario was a process of a very different kind from the municipal compilation of lists, on which so much stress has been laid. Now, Sir, I do not see that there is any difference in the system. This registration does not supersede the municipal compilation of the lists in Ontario, except in regard to two classes of voters, namely, those whose qualifications are "income" or "manhood suffrage." That registration is specially intended for those who claim to be registered under the manhood suffrage clause, and it is to enable the lists to be made up to date. The registration is conducted by certain named officials not appointed specially for that purpose by the Government of the day, and there is no partiality in the constitution of the board. It has not been complained of by anybody as an unfair arrangement; its working appears to have been fair to both parties, and I do not think either party can claim to have benefited specially by the result, in the cities and towns. One of the best features of the provincial Act, and one of the best features in the proposed Dominion Bill, is, that under that system we shall have a registration which will bring down the voters' lists in our cities and towns to the latest possible moment before a poll is taken.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) makes another difficulty out of the fact that the constituencies are different for the federal and for the local Parliaments. I do not see any trouble in that. The constituencies are as a rule composed of municipalities—at this moment I do not know of any municipality which is split in two, and part in one constituency and part in another—and the lists being made for municipalities, the fact that these municipalities are differently distributed between different constituencies creates no trouble in using the municipal lists. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) urges that this proposed law will disfranchise a great many people on the ground of residence, and so on. Well, Sir, I know it will do one thing; it will prevent what we have seen year after year in Dominion elections, namely, the importation by hundreds and thousands into Canada of people who have gone to live in the western states years ago, but whose names still remain on the Dominion lists, and who have been brought into the various constituencies simply for the purpose of voting for their party at election times. It will very properly prevent that. It was one of the greatest grievances in the past that the party with money, the party that could obtain passes from the railways, the party in power, in short, had the great advantage of being able to import a number of non-resident voters who had no further interest in the country, but who were simply drawn up like so many soldiers sent to battle to fire their one shot at the enemy and then retire. This very fact, that the non-resident vote will be disfranchised goes a long way to explain the alleged difference in the numbers on the provincial and Dominion lists. It is highly probable that two lists, even under the same franchise, the one including votes of non-residents, and the other on the principle of one man one vote, and giving no vote to non-residents; it is highly probable that as between these two lists, the stricter one as respects the question of residence would have a smaller number of names on it. But when it comes down to the real voting power of the country, to the representation of men who have the right to vote, I say that the list which only includes the residents and which only allows a man to vote once where he has a residence; that list more truly represents the real voting power and the public opinion of the country. On all these points, the proposed Bill will be a distinct improvement over the Dominion Franchise Act. But, Sir, even were I not satisfied that the provincial list of my own province is in all respects superior to the Dominion lists; even then, from the point of view of provincial rights and for the sake of preventing governmental interference with the compilation of the lists, I would vote, as I am going to vote, for the Bill proposed by the Government.

Mr. POUPORE. Mr. Speaker, I propose to say a few words on the question before the House, and to define my position in regard to this Bill. During my election in the county of Pontiac in the election of 1896, I found that a number of responsible electors were by some means or other left off the voters' list. I had a great deal of trouble to explain this to my friends—in fact I could not successfully explain it to them—but I did offer the explanation that there was no intention on the part of the revising officer, or on the part of any one I knew connected with the revision of the list to leave their names off. I then promised positively, that, on the very first occasion which presented itself in this House of repealing the Franchise Act, I would vote for its repeal. I purpose keeping that promise. I have never, to my knowledge, made any promise during an election that I did not fulfil after I was elected. I do not wish, by expressing myself in this way, to convey the idea that I approve fully of the Bill now before the House. I can see very many objections to it; but I must declare that it is certainly an improvement upon the Franchise Act, which it proposes to abolish. There are many difficulties in the way of providing a perfect franchise law; but, after all, Mr. Speaker, what is it we should seek for when we are preparing a list of the electors of this Dominion? Is it not that those who are entitled to vote in any constituency in Canada should have their names upon that list? And is there any means more easy or more suitable for finding out who are the real, genuine voters in any municipality than to go to the secretary-treasurer of that municipality? I am quite aware that it is impossible to introduce a Franchise Bill into this House which will meet the requirements of the different provinces of the Dominion. In the province of Quebec, in which I represent a county, if we take the municipal lists, prepared by the secretary-treasurers of the municipalities, we can rely upon it that we have in those lists the names of the good, law-abiding citizens of the county who are entitled to vote by virtue of the property qualification or whatever qualification the law requires. Now, it does occur to me, that, in constituting this House of Commons, we should see to it that the people who are sent here shall be sent by the bona fide electors of Canada, and not by a lot of men who are imported for the purpose of voting. The representatives of the people in this House of Commons ought to be sent here by the men who have the property qualification or whatever qualification may be necessary to entitle them to vote.

I wish to point out another feature of this matter, which is this. The Government of the day have the responsibility of introducing a Franchise Bill. They feel that it is necessary to abolish the existing Franchise Act. I approve of them for doing so, and I shall support them so far. They now introduce a Franchise Bill prepared by the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), which, I think, is, on the whole, a fairly good measure. But there is one serious objection to it. Every member of this House should be careful to see that the Parliament of Canada does not divest itself of the control of the Dominion franchise. Let us avail ourselves of the information we may receive from the secretaries of the different municipalities in the preparation of the lists; but let the House of Commons of Canada, by some means, control the preparation of that list. I think that ought to be done, and I think it can be done; and when this House resolves itself into committee to discuss the different clauses of the Bill, I hope we may be able to induce the hon. Solicitor General to insert some clause that will reserve to the Commons of Canada that power which belongs to it. As regards the different clauses of the Bill, I may say that I know very little about them.

Mr. BENNETT. That is true.

Mr. POUPORE. I must confess that the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) is right, for once.

Mr. BENNETT. I am sure you do, or you would not approve of it.

Mr. POUPORE. I view this measure as one which should not be considered a partisan measure. I look upon it as a measure introduced by the Government of the day, which is alone responsible to Canada for the introduction of the Bill. It is our function and our right to amend and criticise it, but I think that criticism should not go to the extent of party criticism. I think we should assist the Government of the day in preparing such a Bill as will afford the honest elector to record his vote when an election comes round by the easiest and cheapest means, and I know of no means so inexpensive and so easy for securing a proper list of the electors, as to take the list prepared by the municipal secretary of every municipality for the purpose of the municipal government of that municipality. In that way you get, not the bogus voter, but the solid, responsible citizen of the country, to express his opinion when election day comes round. The consequence is, that you have elected to this House, not a party man, but a man who represents the intelligence of the county from which he comes. Unfortunately, I must say, I have observed, since I have had the honour of a seat in this House, that partyism is brought into the discussion of every question that comes up. I suppose this is one of the things belonging to partyism: but I must say, that I am not sufficiently partisan to look upon every question that is brought up with the eyes of a partisan. I feel that it is my duty to consider a measure upon its merits; and, if the measure deserves my support, my party ties must disappear. I feel that I have a duty to perform to my county and also to the country I live in. With regard to this Franchise Bill, I do not know how it affects the province of Ontario; but, speaking from what I know of my native province of Quebec, I do not think you can find half a dozen intelligent electors in any county who will say that they approve of the present Franchise Act. On the contrary, from my experience, and with all the means I have had of informing myself on the subject, I can say that the unanimous desire is that the Dominion Franchise Act should be abolished. The late Sir John Thompson, some years before his death, introduced, or foreshadowed, a measure very much on the principle of the present Bill.

Mr. DAVIN. Not at all.

Mr. POUPORE. Perhaps not. Still the abolition of the Franchise Act was the end aimed at.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. POUPORE. Or a modification, if you will. It was, at all events, a complete modification of the existing Franchise Act. That hon. gentleman, whose opinion was regarded by both sides of the House as of considerable weight, saw that the franchise law for the Dominion was not a success. If some five or six years ago, he saw that the Franchise Act of 1885 was not working properly, that it costs this country too much, that it was time a change was made, do you not think, Sir, that this Government is going outside its duty when introducing a Bill to repeal the Franchise Act and give us what I hope will be an improvement on that measure. If the responsibility rested with the Opposition for the introduction of this Franchise Bill, I would say that we would require to exert ourselves and see that we brought in a good and proper Bill, but when we find that the Government has introduced a Bill, our duty is to try and make that as good as we can from our standpoint and let the Government assume the responsibility for the measure when passed.

I do not propose to detain the House longer. I simply rose to explain my position on this Bill. I am not certain whether an amendment is to be proposed or not; but if there should be one, I would be sorry because, as I have already said, I promised in my county on every occasion, and more particularly on nomination, that I would vote for the repeal of the Franchise Act on the very first occasion that presented itself and as this is the first occasion I wish to inform the House that I shall vote for the Bill.

Mr. ROGERS. It is not necessary for me to say very much on this subject because it is quite evident that, in the opinion, of the great majority of the people, the present Franchise law is expensive, cumbersome and impracticable. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) complained that there had been no protests against the present law and no petition for a change. It seems to me that a stronger protest from the great body of the farmers of Ontario we could not have than in the platform laid down in 1891 by the Patrons of Industry, one of the principal planks of which was the repeal of the present Act. I have never heard of that plank being opposed at any public meeting, and as the platform I have mentioned was subscribed to by 300,000 to 400,000 farmers of Ontario, that constitutes a very practical protest against the continuance of this Act.

I do not pretend to approve of all the features of the Ontario franchise law. I do not believe in its method of registration, nor do I believe in the principle of manhood suffrage. I cannot find any sound, substantial reason in favour of universal or manhood suffrage, especially in view of the fact that every man in the country to-day who takes an interest in public affairs, ought certainly to be able to become possessed of the qualifications required. I know that a great many support that principle on the ground of economy, but it seems to me that if we adopt it, we may be paying too dear for our whistle and be acting on the principle of penny wise and pound foolish. However, as the prevailing sentiment of the people seems to agree in that direction, I suppose we shall have to submit to it. As I have said, both in Ontario and Quebec the qualifications required for the possession of the franchise are so low as really to make the franchise practically universal suffrage—the qualifications consisting in the payment of a small rental of $20 or the earning of an annual salary of $300. Surely any man who takes any interest in the country at all can qualify himself to that extent. The system of registration in Ontario has been denounced, and properly so, by many, and I do hope at some future day to see it repealed. I know that many supporters of that Government have expressed their dissatisfaction with it and their desire for its appeal.

In the framing of the lists our great object should be, as the late Minister of Justice stated, to have them controlled by non-partisan officials. In my opinion the municipal officers, as a rule, throughout the province of Ontario at least, are non-partisan and best qualified to say who should and who should not be on the voters' lists. There should be no unfair play tolerated on either side, and I am proud to say that at present there is very much less of that bitter partisan spirit among the farmers than used to exist. I claim, and I think I may claim fairly, that to the Patrons of Industry, more than to any other organization, is due the growth of that feeling and the instilling into the people a greater spirit of independence and non-partisanship and consequently greater clearness and calmness of judgment as to what measures and policies are in the best interests of the country. The people look at things in a broader and more philosophic spirit than they did in the past, and therefore we are entitled to put more confidence in the impartial preparation of the voters' lists by the municipal officers.

In my opinion there is another step forward which we might well take. It is one which I have advocated frequently in private, but which has not yet taken any firm hold on the public. In fact I do not know of its having been brought before any governing body before, except on one occasion, when it was mentioned in the Ontario legislature, I think, by Mr. Bethune. We have now practically manhood or universal suffrage, and I believe that our next step should be compulsory voting. That might have some drawbacks, and I do not pretend to say that there is more need for a compulsory voting under manhood suffrage than under property qualification. In my little experience, the poor man is not the easiest to bribe, but I do believe that one of the best preventives against the curse of bribery would be to compel men to register their votes. You may say, Sir, that that would be an arbitrary measure, but I cannot see it in that light. I would not impose a fine or imprisonment or any similar punishment for the neglect to vote, but I put the matter in this light. We know that there is no right which men more jealously guard than their right to vote. If you try to take the franchise away from a man, he will fight for it and if necessary shed his blood for it. What arbitrary exercise of power therefore would it be to compel him to come forward and exercise a right which, in theory, he values so dearly, and the taking away of which he would resist by force of arms if necessary. He enjoys the advantages and privileges of the laws of our country and the benefit of our institutions, and why should he not bear his share of the responsibility and cast his ballot? If he does not think it worth while to do so, then I say disfranchise him for two or three years until he is brought to his senses and takes an interest in the affairs of his country. I hold that this is a feasible thing. We know, of course, that many things might be said against it. It may be that a man is prevented from voting from sickness or pressure of business calling him away from home. But that can be provided for by allowing a citizen, in such a case, to make a simple affidavit before a justice of the peace or the revising officer that circumstances over which he had no control prevented him from being present and voting. Then, a man may say: I cannot vote for any of the candidates in the field, as I do not regard any of them as worthy of my confidence. But compulsory voting would be an incentive to every man to make sure of having a good candidate in the field. Men would then come to the convention and use their influence in favour of getting good men. But if, as is possible, even then, no candidate met with the citizen's approval he could, what I do not believe in or approve in myself—go to the polls and cast a blank ballot.

Mr. DAVIN. What form of compulsion would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Rogers) use?

Mr. ROGERS. Disfranchisement for two or three years. Another reform that we should bring about is the establishment of an educational franchise qualification for voters. I would not put such a law in force at once, as there are many who have not had the advantages of education and cannot help it that they are illiterate. But no man should be put on the voters' list who cannot read or write. Let an Act be passed providing that three years after the time of its passing this educational test shall be applied. It is a most humiliating thing that one should reach the age of manhood and not be able to read or write, and many a man refrains from casting his vote because he does not wish to acknowledge his lack of education. To pass such a law would really be no hardship, because—I speak for the province of Ontario—we have compulsory education. Every child from the age of seven to the age of fourteen in that province must attend school for at least four months in the year. Free schools are provided and the children have the right to take advantage of them. I do hope that before this Bill comes before the committee these suggestions will be considered. If not adopted now we should move towards their adoption in the near future. The Bill can be improved from time to time, but, even if we cannot have them adopted at once, these points are well worth discussing. I had not intended speaking so long, but my excuse is the importance of the subject. As this Bill is in accordance with the platform of the Patrons of Industry, so far as it goes, I have pleasure in supporting it, and I am glad to see that there is so little opposition to it.

Mr. DAVIN. Before the hon. gentleman sits down, will he allow me to ask him a question? Why should the hon. gentleman, who is in favour of compulsory voting and an educational test for the franchise, support a Bill which puts the power to decide who shall be electors in the hands of other bodies?

Mr. ROGERS. I say that I am in favour of these things personally and would be glad to see them carried out. But I accept this Bill as the lesser of two evils, and hope that the reforms I have advocated will be taken up soon.

Mr. STENSON. I have taken down as well as I could follow them, the main objections to the present Bill made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy). They are as follows:—Municipal lists are only preliminary in Ontario and are not really the electoral lists, and judges and clerks must be paid to have these lists revised. The lists are revised only on the eve of local elections. Then this Bill is brought in by the Liberals without having been asked for by the people. The question of expense, I think, has to be considered; the hon. member for Bothwell is of the opinion that there will not be one dollar of difference in expense by adopting the provincial lists as compared with the expense in the preparation of the federal lists. Then, again, he says that the constituencies have not all the same limits for the provincial and for the federal Houses and therefore the law cannot apply. Well, now, Mr. Speaker, I will not pretend to say that these arguments do not apply to the province of Ontario, but I do contend, and I think I shall be able to prove it in a few words, that none of them apply in the province of Quebec. In the province of Quebec, where I have had some considerable experience in preparing the electoral lists during my tenure of office as mayor of a municipality, I have found that the preparation of these lists did not cost one cent to the province nor did it cost more than a mere trifle to the municipality itself. There were no judges to be paid and no clerk to be paid for the revision of the lists. When the municipality prepares its valuation rolls, the electoral lists are prepared at the same time. Every year this valuation roll in each municipality is revised in the month of March, and when it is being revised these electoral lists are also revised by the members of the municipal council, presided over by the mayor, and with no officer either from the provincial government or from the Federal Government or from any other body to interfere with the preparation of these lists. And it is obligatory on each municipality of the province to prepare a list not only for the municipal elections, but for the provincial elections of the whole province of Quebec. This is done without expense to the province. The secretary-treasurer of each municipality has to put into the possession of the county secretary and of the provincial secretary a copy of each one of these lists without any charge. Therefore, the lists are confirmed and legalized. Now, I have never heard any objection made by any one to the preparation of these lists. They are not prepared by partisans, for my experience of municipal life in the province of Quebec is that municipal government is carried on without any political partisanship entering into the formation of its councils. I myself have had the honour of being the head of a council. The council was composed of seven members, of whom five were Conservatives. Yet I was elected by the Conservatives as their mayor, and never did there enter into the debates in council and never was anything done on political or party ground.

Mr. BERGERON. That is a model county.

Mr. STENSON. It is; it has been improving, until it now has a Liberal representative. That county was represented at the board by fourteen mayors of the fourteen municipalities constituting the county, and out of that county board, composed of fourteen mayors, I was the only Liberal mayor, and still I was elected warden of the county and president of that board. This I do not say through personal glorification, but to prove to you that in the province of Quebec politics have nothing to do with our local organizations.

Mr. BERGERON. They would not have elected a Conservative if they were all Liberals.

Mr. STENSON. Why, certainly they would, if he was only qualified for the position, and if he was not qualified, they would not elect him.

Mr. BERGERON. You do not mean to say there was no Conservatives qualified.

Mr. STENSON. No distinction is made between Conservatives and Liberals, and the proof of that is that I worked to get a Conservative elected as mayor of the council when I was on it, and when there were only four Liberal councillors.

Mr. BERGERON. It is a good place.

Mr. STENSON. It is a good place, and it is improving. But for a number of years it was not so good, it was too Conservative. As the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Poupore) had said, every voter in the province of Quebec for municipal and provincial elections, is a bona fide voter, and that is the kind of voters we want. In the province of Quebec all these voters are bona fide voters. There is no officer that can be appointed either by the provincial or the federal authorities, who can know the bona fide voters as well as the neighbours of those bona fide voters, as well as those who conduct the local municipal business of all the bona fide voters, and of every interested party in that municipality. Those seven men composing the local council are chosen, as a general rule, from the different portions of the municipality; they are not all taken en bloc, they are chosen from the different sections and the different portions of that municipality. They are acquainted with all the surrounding families, they know exactly who are bona fide, and who are justly entitled to vote in their local affairs, they know exactly who are justly entitled to vote in provincial affairs; and I maintain that the man who is entitled to vote in local or provincial affairs is the man who is entitled to vote in Dominion affairs, and that each province should have the right of choosing those voters. Not only that, but I contend they are the best qualified to choose them. Each municipality is best qualified to choose its own electors, and those are the electors which cannot be improved upon by any outsider, even if you get a revising officer to go in there. Now, our experience has been that when the revising officer came in to prepare the federal lists, he took those local lists and examined them to see if the qualifications of the federal Act were exactly similar to those of the local Acts. If they were not he had either to strike off a few, and they were but very few, or he had to add a few, and they were but very few. Now, there was a contest between the two parties to get to the revising officer to try to influence him to put on names, and others to try to prevent those names from being put on, or to put on others from the opposite side. I do not accuse the revising officer in my division; I do not believe that he would have been guilty of putting on any man that should not have been put on that list. But I know that he has put on names there through misrepresentation, and he has left others off, although acting in the very best good faith, he has left others off by being misinformed, by being led into an error by parties who are interested in doing it. Now, when the list is left to the preparation of the local councils, when these seven councillors are sitting there acting without any party or political prejudice at their council board, they cannot be led into that error, because each one of them knows his own section of the municipality, and on his representation no one can come in and deceive the other members. Therefore, with regard to the preliminary stage of the lists in Quebec, that objection does not carry. With regard to the payment of the judges and clerks in the province of Ontario, as mentioned by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), that does not apply in Quebec. Now with regard to the list being revised only on the eve of the local elections, that does not apply either in the province of Quebec, for in that province, in the month of March every year, these lists are carefully revised by every local council in the province who does its duty at all. Therefore, the lists are perfectly new every year. Now, with regard to this statement of the hon. member for Bothwell that the Liberals gave a pledge to bring in a new Franchise Bill without being asked, I have only to say that during my contest, not only was I asked but I promised to have the old Franchise Bill abolished, and to have as far as possible a new one based upon provincial franchise. If any proof is wanted that petitions have been sent in, the hon. member for Bothwell ought to be satisfied that a large number of petitions have been sent in here when he sees the majority of members who have been elected to assist the right hon. leader of the Government to abolish this Bill, for it is one of those pledges that we made, and it is a pledge that we are bound to carry out.

Mr. TAYLOR. The only one.

Mr. STENSON. In time we will carry them all out. Now, with regard to the limits of the constituency, the hon. member for Bothwell attempts to make a point by saying that this cannot apply because constituencies for the provinces and those for the Dominion Parliament have not the same limits. I admit they have not the same limits. Too many have been gerrymandered to have the same limits. But notwithstanding the gerrymander, this Bill does apply and applies without there being a fault found in it, for surely the hon. member for Bothwell won't find in his gerrymandered constituencies any one municipality that has been split in two.

Mr. CLANCY. Oh, yes.

Mr. STENSON. Well, it will apply all the same, because if there is a list being arranged it will apply everywhere as long as it is done for the Dominion House.

Mr. CLANCY. These municipalities were split, but not for the Dominion.

Mr. STENSON. Well, then let this law be passed and it will apply just the same if they were split into a dozen parts. The list is there for the Ontario elections, the same list will be there in each municipality, and even if a portion of that municipality is put into another constituency, that does not disfranchise those who were set off for they can vote in the constituency in which they reside.

Mr. CLANCY. You do not know much about the Ontario law.

Mr. STENSON. I know something of common sense, and common sense will tell you that that does not disfranchise the portion taken off, but sets them in another constituency. I do not believe my hon. friend will say that the Ontario law is not based on common sense, we have too many sensible men coming from the province of Ontario to believe that. Now, the hon. gentleman says that the municipal lists cannot be made practical in Ontario. Well, I do not know why. We can make them practical in Quebec. If they are not practical in Ontario, go to work and make them as we have made them in Quebec and they will be just as practical in Ontario as in Quebec.

Mr. COCHRANE. What about the manhood franchise?

Mr. STENSON. I have not the slightest objection to manhood suffrage in Ontario. If you have manhood suffrage in Ontario, very well, keep it and use it, but do not ask us in Quebec to accept it, because we do not want it. Leave us free to apply the franchise as we please in the province of Quebec; leave us free also to apply it to the federal elections. I do not see what objections hon. gentlemen from Ontario or any other province can have to Quebec people electing members to this House by the votes that they think best qualified to elect them. As long as we elect our 65 members, we ask no advantage because that just allows us to conduct our affairs according to our views, and you can conduct yours according to your views. In that way we will secure provincial autonomy, and we will allow the province of Quebec and every other province in the Dominion to make its own electoral lists as it may see fit. When this is done, no province will have any complaint to offer; the members will be elected by bona fide electors, and the members will represent each province in accordance with the franchise of the province.

Mr. POWELL. I do not intend to trouble the House to any considerable extent. I propose to crystallize, as it were, the opinions expressed on this side of the House in the form of an amendment, which I will move before I take my seat. Before doing so, as the matter is under discussion, I may give expression to a few views I entertain concerning this matter. In the first place, there can be no dispute, I think, in this House—and several hon. gentlemen opposite have acceded to the view—that it is very desirable, indeed, that the federal power should have a franchise of its own, and that that franchise should be uniform. This view was dissented from by the right hon. leader of the Government, when he spoke the other evening, and he referred, in proof of the desirability of adopting the view he himself took, to the course of the framers of the American constitution, and adverted to the alleged long discussion that took place in Independence Hall, in Philadelphia, concerning this matter. In respect to that contention, while I agree with the hon. gentleman, that the matter of state representation in Congress and in the Senate formed the subject of a most prolonged discussion before that convention, yet I can scarcely accede to his statement that the question of the desirability of having one uniform federal franchise received any great share of attention at the hands of those illustrious men who formed that convention. It was incidental, but only incidental, to the discussion of the other subject. While I am on that point, I may say that the United States constitution was evolved under peculiar circumstances. The reason that the constitution is as it is with reference to the franchise, was due, not to the fact that any great man who sat around that council board was in favour of state franchises, but it was due to the fact that state jealousies would admit of no other. Under the old federation which existed for five or six years previous to the adoption of the constitution, state differences had become very intense, indeed. To such an extent had state jealousies been carried that war had actually existed between Pennsylvania and New York; war was threatened between Vermont and New York and New Hampshire. To such small matter had these jealousies extended, that in a matter even of a lighthouse site which New York obtained from New Jersey, at the mouth of the Hudson, the state of New Jersey, in return for the practical embargo placed on New Jersey's trade, imposed an annual tax of $1,800 upon the small piece of ground which New York required for the erection of the lighthouse. In view of those state jealousies, which were so intense, the convention left the franchise to individual states, for the simple reason that no general franchise could be agreed upon. But while it did so, it reserved to the federal power the right at any time by law to make or alter such regulations as the local powers might adopt, except as to the place for choosing senators; and when the greatest political genius who sat at that council, the greatest political genius this continent has ever had, Alexander Hamilton, wrote his article in the "Federalist," commending the constitution of the state of New York, he approved this feature, this clause, of the American constitution which provided for federal control, and used these words:

I am greatly mistaken, notwithstanding, if there be any article in the whole plan more completely defensible than this.

He was replying to the contention made, that the federal power should exercise no influence over the franchise.

Its propriety rests upon the evidence of this plain proposition, that every government ought to contain in itself the means of its own preservation.

He elaborated that view in the letter which appears as No. 59 in the "Federalist." As to the authorship of that letter there is no question, although it was published anonymously; it is acknowledged to be that of Alexander Hamilton by every person familiar with the "Federalist."

Our constitution adopted at Quebec differs from the constitution of the United States in this way. By mere force of state jealousies in the United States, the Constitutional Convention were bound to allow the fixing of the franchise to rest, in the first instance, with the state authorities, subject to the control and revision of the federal authorities. The fathers of our confederation adopted, however, an entirely different view. Our constitution, so far as this question is concerned, does not recognize—and I need not elaborate this point, because every lawyer is aware of it—any power of provincial autonomy. The provincial franchises had to be followed in the first instance, 'ex necessitate rei,' or the conference would have been obliged to embody in our constitution a complete code of franchise and election law; but the moment this central Parliament repealed those old regulations by the adoption of new measures, then the local franchises became obsolete. The law that governs is section 41 of our constitution:

Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, all laws in force in the several provinces at the union relative to the following matters, or any of them, namely:—The qualifications and disqualifications of persons to be elected or to sit or vote as members of the House of Assembly or Legislative Assembly in the several provinces, the voters at elections of such members, the oaths to be taken by voters, the returning officers, their powers and duties, the proceedings at elections, the periods during which elections may be continued, the trial of controverted elections and proceedings incident thereto, the vacating of seats of members, and the execution of new writs, in case of seats vacated otherwise than by dissolution—shall respectively apply to elections of members to serve in the House of Commons for the same several provinces.

The local franchises, we thus see, were entirely provisional. That being the text of our constitution, if we are following out the genius of the constitution, we should have our federal franchise independent entirely of the local franchise. But this is a matter, not so much of constitutional right, as it is a matter of expediency and regulation under the circumstances of the case, as it is a matter of broad national policy. That being so, what do we find the most advanced political thought of the world to be in this matter? The most modern instance of a federation like ours is the federation of the German Empire. What was done in its formation? Men untrammelled by state jealousies, under the guidance of great masters of political principles, like Bismarck and those associated with him, went to work and build a great imperial fabric. Did they incorporate the ideas of the United States, or adopt the ideas that were embodied in the constitution of Canada? We find that twenty-six states comprise the German Empire. They have most diverse and complex franchises. In some cases, the individual states elected representatives to their local parliaments by direct, and in other cases by indirect electors; in other cases, representatives were sent to the different Houses by electors whose franchises were based on qualifications of rate-paying and other qualifications.

Now, in the German Empire we find that they have adopted one great uniform federal franchise, and that federal franchise is manhood suffrage and manhood suffrage alone. They did not act upon any such idea as the leader of the Government is disposed to have this House follow. It would be antagonistic to the idea of an imperial, national unity.

I come now, Sir, to consider very briefly the great desirability of having uniformity, because every man who is a Canadian citizen should know, wherever he goes, what the requirements of fellow-citizenship are from the Pacific to the Atlantic; we should all exercise our franchise on precisely the same basis. By doing so, we are firmly establishing that which in the United States was their great want; we are building up a strong federal and national sentiment, and a strong federal and central sentiment should under our constitution exist. The evolution of all the United States constitutional history is simply the broadening, and the deepening, and the intensifying of the federal sentiment, the working out of a grander federal amplitude. I recognize that the federal power should not entrench on the local, nor the local on the federal; but the maintenance of the federal in its integrity is as much an essential to the existence of any lasting federation in Canada, as is the maintenance of the local. This brings me now to the last point I shall consider, and that is the old Franchise Act. Well, Sir, the old Franchise Act was expensive; there is no question about that, and in my judgment it could have been rendered inexpensive in a very simple manner indeed. But what about the principle of the old Franchise Act? Remember the franchise was adopted by following the precedents of that nation to which we all look as the most highly evolved political society in modern history; I need not say that I speak of Great Britain. We followed the action of the English Parliament in adopting that Franchise Act. Without discussing details of our local Franchise Acts, I will point to the fact that in the local franchises, in the maritime provinces, no matter how one of these revisers, who is generally a fair-minded but legally uneducated man, no matter how he may blunder there is no provision made in these laws to rectify that blunder. He may leave a man off the list who is entitled to get on, and there is no way to get him on; he may, in his honest judgment by taking a cranky view, deprive a man of the franchise, a most serious infraction of a man's rights, but there is no way of rectifying that error. In Great Britain where they realize that every man should vote who has the right to, they guard sacredly every man's right of franchise and provide methods of appeal, but in the maritime provinces under the local Acts, there is no provision for appeal—there is no sufficient protection to a man in the right of franchise. In the province of Prince Edward Island there is not even an election list, and in every other of the maritime provinces the electoral list is only written, not printed. When this matter comes before the committee for discussion of its details I will be able to point out to the Solicitor General—for I will consider it then my duty to assist in perfecting the law so far as the maritime provinces are concerned—I will point out to the Solicitor General certain ways in which this Bill can be improved in respect to matters wherein it is not now workable at all. The amendment, Mr. Speaker, which I shall move is as follows:—

That the Bill shall not now be read a second time, but that it be resolved: That this House, while desirous of reducing the expense of the preparation of the lists so far as may be practicable, considers that no system of franchise will be satisfactory which does not preserve federal control over both the basis of suffrage and the voters' lists.

After Recess.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I shall not detain the House for any length of time with the few observations I have to make on this Bill. It is true that we had a somewhat similar measure before the House last session and some discussion upon it. It is also true that the Government made a great deal of noise about the great improvement they proposed to make in the Franchise Act, and we were led to believe we would have a Bill not exactly of the mongrel character of the measure now before the House. No doubt there were some serious objections to the old franchise law; it was perhaps cumbersome and expensive, but at the same time there was a great deal in that Act which commended itself to the better judgment of our people. It was a Bill that applied to the whole Dominion and gave a uniform franchise to all, in accordance with the principle laid down in the British North America Act. In that way, Sir, it was an Act worthy of a progressive country such as Canada is to-day. I do not think that the mongrel character of the franchise which will prevail under this Bill now submitted to us by the Government, will commend itself to the electors of this Dominion. We will have in this Parliament, one franchise for Quebec, another for Ontario, another for New Brunswick, and so on, and in the case of the province in which I have the honour to represent a constituency, I do not think this Bill is applicable at all. In the first place, we have not in the province of Prince Edward Island any system of registration. True, there was a system of registration in force in that province over twenty years ago, and according to section 5, subsection "c" of this Bill, if an election for the Dominion House were to be held there now, the lists that would be used would be the lists prepared over twenty years ago. Section 5, subsection "c" says:

(c.) The voters' lists shall be those prepared for the several polling divisions so established and which on the day next preceding the day fixed for the nomination of candidates for such Dominion election were in force or were last in force under the laws of that province for the purposes of provincial elections.

Now, if an election were held in Prince Edward Island under this Bill, as it stands, the lists to be used if they could be used at all would be lists that were prepared pre-vious to the year 1879, because the registration Act in Prince Edward Island was repealed, if my memory serves me right, in that year, and if there was a revision at all, it must have taken place in some year before 1879. I think that is a very serious oversight in the Bill, so far as it affects the province from which I have the honour to come. I do not know by what means the Government propose to overcome that difficulty. They may get their friends in the local government of Prince Edward Island to introduce a Registration Act; but the province for its own purposes does very well without a Registration Act, and I do not think it would be fair for this House or this Government to impose upon that province the burden and expense of preparing a system of registration and voters' lists for the purpose of holding Dominion elections. That is one insuperable objection which will cause me to vote against this Bill. In place of being a step forward, I think it is a retrograde step. Under the old Franchise Act we had a uniform franchise from one end of the Dominion to the other; but now we adopt a system of franchises which may hold in a province to-day, but which may be changed entirely at the next session of the legislature; and the effect of the operation of the Bill will be that the candidates for this Parliament will not know exactly under what franchise they may have to run their election. I do not think that is a condition of things which hon. members of this House will support. I am willing to admit that there is very serious objection to the Franchise Act now in force, on account of its expensiveness. The expenses in connection with it come under three heads: First, the expense to the Dominion Government; second, the expense to the candidate; and third, the expense to the elector, as well as his trouble in getting his name put on the voters' list. How does this Bill propose to get rid of these expenses? The Bill does not propose to lessen the expense of the candidate in any way. He has to take the same care in revising the lists under the proposed Bill as he does under the law at present. Then, the expense of the Federal Government is to be thrown upon the local governments. If hon. gentlemen opposite propose to do that, I think they might very well have proceeded one step further. They might have said, While you are revising the voters' lists for the municipalities and for the province, you might as well add a third column for the Dominion list under a franchise adopted by this Parliament, which would have the great merit of uniformity. For instance, I understand that in Ontario there are two lists made up, one list for the municipalities, which is put in one column, and another list for the local legislature, which is put in another column. Why not, while you are about it, add a third column, containing the names of those who are qualified to vote in Dominion elections, under a uniform qualification all over the Dominion? It may require a little more machinery in the Bill than it has at present, but it is not an impossible task. This would give you uniformity. Perhaps the objection may be raised that the Federal Parliament cannot compel the local governments to perform that work; but under the provisions of this Bill the Federal Parliament compels the local government to do something very nearly akin to it, because I find that section 8 reads as follows:—

Where under the laws of a province the voters' lists for any provincial electoral district or division are prepared not at regular intervals, but at such times as are fixed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council, or some other provincial or local authority, or only from time to time for the purpose of a general or other election in immediate contemplation, the last preceding voters' lists so prepared shall be used for the purpose of any Dominion election in the territory comprised in such provincial electoral district or division, or any part thereof, if such lists have been prepared not more than one year before the date of the writ for such Dominion election; otherwise, new voters' lists shall be prepared, and for the purpose of preparing and giving effect to such voters' lists the Governor in Council may appoint all necessary officers and confer upon them all necessary powers, and in the preparation and revision, and bringing into force of such new voters' lists the provisions of the laws of the province regulating the preparation and revision and bringing into force of the provincial voters' lists in such cases shall, as far as possible, be observed and followed.

It is here laid down, that, when the voters' lists for the provinces are more than a year old, the provinces will be compelled to make up new lists. This Bill imposes on the provinces new labour, and I do not see why, in order to have uniformity, we should not impose on them the further task of having the lists for the provincial legislatures and for the House of Commons prepared at the same time. If that will not prove sufficient, I would commend to the hon. Solicitor General the advisability of having both the provincial and Dominion lists prepared by joint officers appointed by the Dominion and local governments. This would, to some extent, relieve the great trouble and expense to the electors in attending to more than one revision. Those revisions could be proceeded with simultaneously, and if this would require more machinery, it would, as regards general utility and practical purposes, remove the defects of this Bill and a great deal of the labour and expenditure imposed on candidates both for the local legislatures and the Dominion Parliament. In that case the expense could be evenly borne by the provinces and the Dominion share and share alike.

I do not intend to proceed at any great length in further discussing this Bill. The great objection to it is, that it is not such a measure as the constitution of this country requires. Canada, we are told, has lately become a nation. I do not know what has made Canada a nation, but I am sure that the introduction of this mongrel franchise is not one of those things which would entitle Canada to be called a nation. I might proceed and discuss some of the other clauses, but, as they will come up again in committee, I shall wait until that stage is reached. The objections to the Bill are, in my opinion, insuperable; and, until they are eliminated, I cannot support it.

Mr. MARTIN.

Mr. BRITTON. It must be admitted that the opposition to this Bill is reduced to a minimum, when it is conceded that the present franchise law must be repealed. With the exception of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) and the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Martin), no one has a good word to say for the old Act, but every one seems willing it should be killed and buried, and not a few are ready to throw a stone at its grave. The hon. member from Bothwell said that there were no petitions against the present law, and no outcry for its repeal. Surely, the hon. gentleman could not have attended the political meetings in the last election campaigns, or he would have heard considerable outcry against it, unless there is very different talk at the meetings in the west, compared to what is heard in the east. The outcry on the part of the Liberals in the west against this law was certainly not dissented from in any way by Conservatives. The latter were as vigorous in their promises to vote for its repeal as was the hon. member who spoke before recess, and on all hands there was unanimity of opinion condemning it. That being the case, and the press of the country also being outspoken, I should not think there was any necessity for any petition to inform this House of the general feeling in the country against the present law. I do not, for a moment, accuse the revising officers under that Act of being dishonest, or of any intention to be unfair. Many of them were county judges, against whom I have not a word to say; and those who were not, were, in many cases, men who intended to be fair to both parties. But the fact remains that these lists were stuffed, and stuffed in a way most unfair to the Liberals. They had in them the names of men who had been dead, in some cases to my knowledge, twenty years, and also the names of men who had ceased to own property in the polling divisions in which they were electors, for years, and had moved away, thousands of miles, in some cases, from the places where their names were registered. It may not have been a desire to be unfair, but the fact remains that, in some cases, these revising officers put the burden of proof on the persons claiming that names were improperly on the lists. They obliged these persons to prove a negative; they obliged them to prove that a person whose name was on the list was not possessed of property sufficient to qualify him; and in many cases the parties appealing abandoned their appeal rather than be put to the expense and trouble of proving a negative. In this way these lists became discredited all through the country, and the time has not come too soon for the repeal of the law. The few words we have heard in this House, this afternoon and evening, in favour of the present law, only amount to damning it with faint praise. If it is conceded that the law should be repealed, the question is, what should take its place. I, for one, am glad to hear members on both sides declare that they wish to approach this question as free from party bias as possible. There are some members who think that no one can talk on either side without showing party feeling. There is one hon. gentleman who has never said anything, since I have come here, in reference to any member on this side, without imputing unworthy motives to him. I refer to the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Bennett). When any one on this side rises to address the House, he is, according to that hon. gentleman, a confessed schemer or has some promise in his pocket, or there is something that disentitles him from saying a word on the question before the House. But I am glad to say that there are others who are fair to hon. members on this side, and are willing to deal with questions of this kind in a generous and impartial spirit. It is in the interest of everybody that these lists should be correctly made, and that every one on them should have the right to vote, and if we can, either through the machinery provided by the provinces or provided by ourselves, get lists that are pure and right, we shall have obtained the desideratum sought for by all members on both sides.

It is proposed that the provincial lists shall be used, and as has been said by the right hon. the Premier and as was said, better than I can hope to say it, by the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Heyd), representation by provinces is a part of our system of government in this country, and if the provinces are satisfied to entrust the provincial electors with the franchise for the purpose of sending men to Parliament at Ottawa, it seems to me that we ought not to complain. It is our own doing. If this Bill is passed it is equivalent to our saying that these men qualified to vote for representatives in the provincial House are competent to vote for members in this House. We do not dispose of anything except for the present. We may be putting it in the hands of the provinces to pass laws hereafter that we may not approve of. But in that case the same legislative power exists in this Parliament to alter the law if it is found to work injustice. These laws of the several provinces seem to be good, as they have been described by the different members who have spoken, except in the case of Prince Edward Island as stated by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Martin), upon which I shall comment later. Take the Ontario law, with which I am, of course, more familiar than with that of any other province. One hon. gentleman said that we do not have annual lists in Ontario. We do have annual lists. The first person who has to deal with the names of those who are to be electors is the assessor. As everybody knows, the assessor is a municipal officer sometimes of one side of politics, if he has any politics at all, and sometimes of the other, but in no sense a political representative. He is chosen, as a rule, because he is a man of good judgment, knows the value of property, and is a fair and disinterested man to make out the list of property liable for assessment. He prepares his roll, which then goes to the clerk of the municipality. In many cases these clerks have held their offices for many years. They are men who come at last to have very little feeling one way or the other in political matters. They hold their office year after year under the different municipal councils, in which the Conservative element sometimes predominates and sometimes the Liberal, and in the course of time they assume a neutral tint in regard to politics. They are sworn men. The clerk takes the list from the assessors and classifies the people according to qualification, those who vote for municipal officers and those who vote in the provincial elections. The list being printed it is sent out. Hon. gentlemen who look at the Act will see what care has been taken to have all this done with the greatest impartiality and in such a way that the greatest publicity can be given to it so that every wrong may be set right. The clerks are obliged to send the lists to the members of the council, and to the different public officers of the municipality. They are obliged to send ten copies to the member of this House, recognizing him as one who is interested in the preparation of the voters' lists. They are obliged also to send ten copies to the defeated candidate for this House if he has polled any votes, also to the provincial representative and the defeated candidate, also ten copies to each of the Reeves. The officials who receive these copies are obliged to put them up in their offices, with a view, as stated, to securing the greatest publicity for these lists. Then comes the question of appeals. Anybody can appeal who is interested in that matter, and the appeal is to the judge. After proper steps have been taken, which I need not specify, the judge hears the appeals and strikes off the names that should not appear on the list and adds those that should. No precaution could be suggested that is not taken in order to give only those who are qualified a place upon these lists. If we are satisfied to accept the same qualification in voters as is provided in the case of the local House, the work is complete and ready to our hand, and that without expense to us. It is true there are small fees given to the clerk of the municipality, and a fee of $4 a day and personal expenses for the county judge, if I remember well. We have nothing to do with this, we do not pay the money. As to the registration of voters under the Manhood Suffrage Act, there is a slightly higher fee, $5 a day, I think to the county judge and $10 a day to the chairman of the board of registration. There is, therefore, a tremendous saving of expense so far as this Dominion is concerned. As to the expense of the individual candidate, I say without fear of successful contradiction there is a very large saving to him. He knows that the names that come to him for his examination through the channels I have mentioned are, in the main, only names that ought to be there, and so his work is very greatly reduced when he comes to scrutinize the list and to secure the revision of it. But the saving to the Dominion is an absolute saving of all the expenses except, in the event of the lists not having been revised within the year, and the Dominion being obliged to use that board of registration for the purpose of preparing a new list. In that case the officers would be Dominion officers and the Dominion would pay the expense of them, but this would be a mere bagatelle in every constituency, compared with the expense we have now. There is a saving in the very large item of printing and in the revising officers' fees. If there were no other advantages in this Bill, getting such lists as we are likely to get, at any rate as the law is administered in Ontario, it would be well worth saving.

I am free to admit that if there is such a case in Prince Edward Island as the hon. member for East Queen's has stated, if in utilizing the list in Prince Edward Island, we should be adopting a list twenty-five years old, there is a wrong. No list of twenty-five years standing can represent the electors of to-day, and if there is any such list as that, some provision should be made to have a more modern list. I cannot think that the hon. member for East Queen's is correct; I think that there must be some mistake about it. I cannot imagine that Prince Edward Island for its own sake, would be willing to accept a list twenty-five years old without revision. This would mean that a new generation had been born and had grown up since the list was made and were still disfranchised. I think there must be some mistake about it, but if there is no mistake, then such a case as that ought in some way to be provided for. When the debate was on before one hon. gentleman, I think it was the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills), said that any province might change the law and might allow women to vote. Well, under present circumstances that is something so easily remedied that it only has to be mentioned to enable us to prevent anything of that kind occurring.

An hon. MEMBER. There would be no harm.

Mr. BRITTON. Perhaps not, but at the present time we are not sufficiently advanced, not so advanced as some of us would like to be, to say that we are willing to give the franchise to women. In all the provinces the law reads something like this: That every male person who is a British subject by birth or naturalization, and of the full age of twenty-one years, and possesses the qualification required in the locality, is entitled to vote. But just now, it seems to me, and I offer it as a suggestion at this stage of the debate, it seems to me that there would be no harm in adopting that as the first part of this clause 5 of the Bill, and say that the persons who are entitled to vote are male persons above twenty-one years of age, who are British subjects by birth or naturalization, and who are possessed of the qualifications necessary for the exercise of the provincial franchise. That would remove any difficulty such as was suggested by the hon. member for Annapolis. As far as Ontario is concerned, the disqualifications are those which show a desire on the part of the Government of the province of Ontario to have an election as free as possible from taint, or any influence that would be bad or that would work against having the greatest freedom of expression of opinion on the part of the electorate. I have not heard any hon. gentleman who finds fault with them on that ground. So I think that, guarded with such care, both as to those who are disqualified and to those who are qualified, and providing for the machinery which we are at liberty to make use of, I fail to appreciate the objections that are made to the Bill.

Mr. HUGHES. In opposing the present Bill, I may be permitted to give a few reasons actuating my course. The proposal, in short, is to return to the old system in vogue before the present Franchise Act was passed some years ago. I presume the members of each province will reason from their own point of view, and I propose to discuss it from the view point of a member from the province of Ontario. Those of us who are familiar with the Ontario election law, particularly those of us who sit on this side of the House, know to our sorrow the defects in that law. I will not say the expense is as great as under the Dominion law, but the difficulty of obtaining a good list is as great as it is under the Dominion law. But once this list is prepared there are other difficulties. When we come to the question of voting we are met, not with the secret ballot we have in the Dominion, but with a numbered ballot, and we know how that is used. In the recent election in the province of Ontario, one gentleman came to me and said he feared he could not support the Conservative candidate because his tenant, a Conservative who rented a hotel from him, had informed him that the license commissioner had told him that they very much feared that if the owner of the property voted for the Liberal-Conservative candidate a license would not be given him for next year. So this man stood face to face with either losing his rent or with having to vote for the Liberal candidate. I asked him how they could tell in what way they voted, and the answer was that the ballots were numbered, and after the elections were over these were all traced up and marked in every riding, showing whether the elector had voted Liberal or Conservative. However, it is not my intention here to go into the details of these objections. There are some good points in connection with the present Dominion franchise. The two essential points are those that were brought out by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) in making his amendment this afternoon. The main point is uniformity of franchise, and another one is the control of the voters' list. Now, if the Solicitor General will kindly give me a little attention I will make a proposition to him. As I said, it is not my intention to make any lengthy criticism of this Bill now, because I can do that in committee; but I will take the opportunity of making a suggestion which will involve all that is good in the proposal to utilize the provincial franchise, and I am satisfied it will reduce the cost to a minimum. At the present time, whether under the provincial franchise or under the Dominion, there is for every polling subdivision a deputy returning officer and a poll clerk. In addition to this, Mr. Speaker, I want to suggest that there should be an agent appointed by each candidate. If there are two parties, let there be two agents, if there are three parties let each candidate in the election have an agent, and let each agent have his clerk. These should be officially recognized in the law. I should say also that these men might be paid out of the Dominion funds, although appointed by the candidates. Then I would suggest that a clerk for each of these agents should be appointed, and I would make provision in the law to have him paid by the candidate appointing him, or for that matter these agents and their clerks might both be entitled to the same pay as the deputy returning officer and his clerk, and be paid by the candidates. However, that matter is a mere question of detail. I would have the nominations take place two weeks before the day of the election. The day after the nomination, or at some convenient time soon thereafter, let this board of six persons meet in each polling subdivision and take what they now take for election purposes, the written list of the clerk of the peace as finally revised by the judge. Let the deputy returning officer and each agent take this list and have it written in triplicate, or according as the number of candidates may be. Then let every candidate go over that list, and let every elector whose name is omitted in any way, every young man who has recently become of age, every tenant who has moved in from an adjoining subdivision or an adjoining county, come before this board, and by taking the oath, show that he is qualified to be placed on that list. We would thus have a very inexpensive mode of preparing a list. People might object to giving judicial functions to this deputy returning officer by empowering him to administer the oath. Why, you do it in your election law to-day. He is permitted to swear the agent on election day, and why should he not be permitted to swear an elector as well to his right to vote? In the present list we find that the work is well done by the county judges, the work is nearly all done on the basis of the assessor, and I am satisfied from experience that these local officials would do it as honestly and as efficiently as if it were done by the judges of the land. Now, Sir, in the present election law of the province of Ontario there are great defects. In the first place, every young man coming to be twenty-one years of age after the revision of that list is disfranchised from voting until his name is entered on the next list. Every clergyman who changes his station is disfranchised if he does not have his name put on the list a year in advance. Every tenant who moves from one municipality to another is disfranchised under the existing law. If a man the day before an election moves out of one polling subdivision and takes his furniture with him, constituting a change of residence, he cannot return and vote on election day. Under the present provincial franchise in the province of Ontario there are very many men, good, worthy citizens, who are debarred from voting. If a comparison were made between the number who are disfranchised under the provincial law of Ontario and those who are disfranchised under this objectionable law of the Dominion of Canada, I venture the assertion that the number will be found greater who are disfranchised under the provincial law than under the Dominion law. There are other arguments that might be advanced; but I do not wish to occupy the time of the House longer, and I will reserve them for the committee stage, when I will present them. I merely wish to submit to the hon. Solicitor General and the Government the suggestion that while retaining all that is good in the present law and taking the provincial lists as a basis, we should retain control of the preparation of the lists, and of the qualification entitling an elector to vote, and above all things we should regulate the control of the ballots, which in Ontario are numbered, so as to have a free ballot at Dominion elections.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). We are not dealing at the present time with the Dominion election law, but with the Franchise Act. The question of the ballot will come up in connection with the Dominion election law.

Mr. HUGHES. It will not do to have one qualification in one province and a different qualification in another, and also different methods in respect to the preparation of the lists. In the cities and towns of Ontario, we have a registration system that works fairly well. Why should that not apply also to country districts? Why should a young farmer be in a worse position than a young clerk? I will not, however, discuss the matter further, but will take the opportunity of presenting my views in committee.

Mr. MACLEAN. I would not have addressed the House to-night but for the remarks made by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Stenson) just before the dinner hour. The hon. gentleman then said that the chief reason why he supported the Bill was, because he believed in provincial autonomy and provincial rights. If there is any reason why I oppose this Bill, it is because I am a federalist, and believe in federal rights and in the vindication of the Dominion as against any or all of the provinces which compose it. The Dominion of Canada is a much greater country than any of its great provinces, or all of them added together. So long as I occupy a seat in this House, I hope always to be able to raise my voice in favour of the federalist idea in our constitution as against the provincial view presented by hon. gentlemen opposite. And what else can we expect than the provincial view from this Government? The Government is made up of provincial politicians. The introducer of the Bill is a provincial politician, and nothing else, and he proposes a provincial franchise for the Dominion. The right hon. leader of the House, when he formed his Government, said he was forming his Government of provincial politicians, and he took into it, as Finance Minister, a provincial politician, who has muddled and bedevilled the trade situation of this country. The right hon. gentleman took into his Cabinet a provincial politician as Minister of the Interior. What is our experience of the Minister of the Interior? The "Globe" newspaper, the other day, spoke of him as an eminent young statesman from the west. In view of what is taking place in another Chamber to-night, after what took place in the Railway Committee this morning, we see that this young and eminent statesman from the west is simply a small provincial politician, and he is rapidly finding his level. The right hon. gentleman brought in another provincial politician as Minister of Railways, and he takes nothing but a provincial view of politics. This morning, we saw him taking a position in respect to a railway question that he repudiated in this House last night; and the Government all through has no record but a record of provincial politicians, men who take a provincial view of federal affairs. We, as Conservatives, who are federalists at heart, believe in the federalist idea, and most of all in this Dominion controlling its own franchise and regulating it. I believe we can have a franchise which we can regulate, and a voters' list which can be prepared at a moderate cost. I believe in preparing a list at a reasonable expense, but it should be a federal list, first and always, and so long as I have a vote, it will be cast in favour of a federal list. The hon. gentlemen opposite are nothing but provincial politicians, and the proof is, that since they came into power, they have abandoned many of their provincial ideas. Those provincialists tried to put aside the present Minister of Trade and Commerce. He is a federalist, and to-day he commands the respect of his party, because he is a federalist; and I am glad to say, he is gradually overcoming those provincial politicians who are his colleagues, and to-day enjoys more than any hon. gentleman opposite the esteem of this country. But if he does so enjoy the public confidence, it is because of his federal views, and because he has not allowed himself to be put aside, though the attempt has been made, by the provincial politicians who control the Cabinet. And the same can be said of the present Minister of Justice who is gradually growing into a federalist who has had long federal experience and who had to be called in to take the place of another provincialist who had been given that department. The provincialists of the Cabinet at its formation did their best to keep the present Minister out of office, as they tried to belittle the Minister of Trade and Commerce. So far as hon. gentlemen opposite are concerned, the proof that they are provincial politicians and take only a provincial view, is found in the fact that, when they have taken the federal view, they have succeeded, and, when they have adopted the narrow provincial view, they have failed. They adopted the federal view in respect to trade, and they are now wearing our clothes and are claiming credit because they adopted the federal view, the Dominion view, that Canada expects this Parliament to frame the tariff in the interest of the Dominion, and not in the interest of the provinces. Another proof that these gentlemen are provincialists and nothing else is, that provincialism ran side by side and hand in hand with the annexationist movement in this country. Provincialism and annexationism have the same common characteristic, and these have been shown in the past history of hon. gentlemen opposite. I am not afraid to say in this House, that we ought to keep the Dominion franchise in our hands; and I make this prophecy, that if hon. gentlemen opposite adopt the provincial list to-day, they will return to this House after their first experience, and demand a federal franchise. This has been their experience in the past; they have not been able to realize their provincial views. Whenever they have succeeded, it is because they have adopted Dominion lines; and when they have had an experience of provincial lists, they will come back and ask the Dominion Parliament to pass a federal franchise and have a list prepared entirely on national lines. If the hon. gentlemen opposite will bring forward a measure which will be reasonable so far as cost is concerned, but which will preserve the federal idea, the federal control of our own franchise, I will be willing to accept and vote for such a proposition. If they will lay down those lines they can obtain a conference with our leaders, and a Bill may be framed that both parties and the people will accept; but hon. gentlemen opposite will never get this side of the House to agree to place ourselves in the hands of provincial politicians, such as there are in Ontario and in other provinces, and abandon federal ideas, and accept provincial ideas advocated by men who have never realized in the slightest degree the national idea and the importance of this great country.

Mr. McCLEARY. I have for some days sat as a learner at the feet of the Gamaliels who have been instructing us in regard to the measure now submitted for our consideration. Unlike my hon. friend from Pontiac (Mr. Poupore), I came here unpledged to my electors, and for the simple reason that they never asked me to pledge myself to vote against the Dominion Franchise Act. But if I came unpledged I am free to confess that I did not come unbiassed, because my judgment was that the Dominion franchise law could be improved and I would have been very glad to have given my vote in favour of a proposition that would have placed in the hands of the people of this country a franchise law more simple and less costly than the existing Act, but at the same time a franchise that would be uniform. I have listened to hear some arguments from gentlemen who are in favour of this Bill, in order that my mind might be brought to a definite conclusion as to my duty in regard to the vote which I shall give. I expected that the right hon. the leader of the House would announce some logical reasons why our present Franchise Act should be repealed, and our franchise handed over to the provincial legislatures. But, Sir, his very first statement convinced me that the attitude of his Government on this question was wrong, for, after stating that the franchise of the people of this country lay at the very basis of our parliamentary institutions, he proceeded to propose that this, which he called the very basis of the Federal Parliament, should be handed over to the provincial legislatures, for their making and their imprimatur. Hon. gentlemen opposite who come from Ontario have told us a good deal about the franchise law in that province, and if we were to believe them we would regard that law as a most guileless thing, as a law devoid of anything questionable, and which was the very ideal that an honest and intelligent and free electorate should demand. But, Sir, those of us who have experience of the Ontario Franchise Act know that it is not the guileless beauty that the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) represented; nor is it the guileless thing that the hon. member for Kingston referred to, nor yet that beautiful perfection which the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) portrayed it to be. The hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) told us the other night, that he had before denounced the Dominion Franchise Act as the most iniquitous measure that was ever placed on the Statute-books of this country, and he repeated that statement and assured us that he had not changed his mind. Well, Sir, I do not know that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) need have said that, in order to justify any vote of his in support of the Government, because no member in this House—except possibly the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright)—denounced the National Policy in more violent terms than did the hon. gentleman, and yet he had no compunction of conscience in sitting quietly beside his Government and supporting a policy which was changed very little, if at all, from that Conservative National Policy which he for eighteen years had been denouncing. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) told us, that we can get our lists from the province of Ontario simply for the cost of printing, and the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) followed up in detail the making of these lists from the time the assessor goes around until they come before the county judge, but right there the hon. gentleman (Mr. Britton) stopped short. The hon. gentleman must know, as we all know, that the most important and vital spot in the whole franchise law of the province of Ontario, is just what takes place after the county court judge gets through with his work. Do we have a printed list then, as the hon. member stated. No, Mr. Speaker, we do not. After the assessor has handed over the roll to the clerk, and the clerk has sent out copies to those mentioned in the Act, do we have the voters' lists hung up in a public place so that the people can see whether or not they are entitled to vote after the revision before the judge? No, Sir, we have nothing of the kind. On the contrary, as was shown the other night by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) after the revision by the county judge, there are hundreds of names written in ink and without being numbered so that they cannot be compared or traced afterwards. The hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) made a strong argument in this regard. How easy it is for an evil-disposed person to get hold of these lists and write in a name if he wants to, and how easy it is for such an one to draw his pen through the name of a political opponent, so that when that man comes up to vote he may not be permitted to. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite, is that fair? Sir, it is a dishonest act, and it has occurred time and time again in the province of Ontario. This very last election, in my own town, when the clerk of the peace sent down the roll book to the deputy returning officers, my attention was called to the fact that there were names left off the list. I want to give the clerk of the peace credit for this, that when I telephoned and apprised him of the fact, he had the omission corrected, and on election day these men had their votes. But in the adjoining riding of Monck, in one polling subdivision all the names under the letter S and part of those under the letter W were omitted from the voters' list. And, forsooth, hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that we shall have a complete, honest and fair list if we adopt the franchise of the province of Ontario. No, Mr. Speaker, we shall have anything but a complete and fair list, if we adopt the lists as they are compiled at the present time by those officials. Hon. gentlemen opposite from the province of Ontario who have spoken seem much enamoured of our provincial franchise because it is based on the one man one vote principle. If that is good for the province of Ontario, why is it not good for the whole Dominion? Why do these gentlemen not insist on having a uniform franchise of that kind? I certainly approve of the principle of one man one vote. I would be very glad to see that adopted as the principle of the franchise for this Parliament. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) the other night said that if we would look at the Statute-book, we would find that the Hon. Oliver Mowat ought to receive credit for giving the young men of the province of Ontario the right to vote. Let me tell that hon. gentleman that while that Act is on the Statute-book of Ontario as having been passed by the Mowat Government, if he will look up the journals of the province of Ontario, he will find that years before it was passed the Conservative Opposition in the local House moved to amend the Franchise Act so as to give farmers' sons and the young men in our towns and cities the right to vote, and every Liberal in the House voted against it. So the hon. gentleman must not attempt to take credit to the Ontario Government for this wise provision in the Ontario law. But, Sir, I would be afraid to trust my franchise with a party composed of men like those who have been conducting the affairs of the province of Ontario for the last 25 or 26 years—and, by the way, there are indications that there may be a change in that respect before long. The Liberal Government in the province of Ontario have not hesitated to do some of the meanest things in regard to the franchise law of the province that could be perpetrated by a government having any preten-sions to decency and honesty. Need I call to the minds of hon. members of this House the Act passed by that government by which they legislated a man into Parliament who could not be elected by the people. When the city of Toronto was by statute entitled to three members, they provided that a voter in that city should have only two-thirds of a vote. They put on the Statute-book a law declaring that while three members were to be elected for the city of Toronto, each voter could only vote for two. The consequence was that the Liberal party, who were in the minority in the city of Toronto, had their man elected by Act of Parliament. What kind of a proceeding is that? Is it fair, is it right, is it just? Of course, they were shamed out of it afterwards. Then they thought that possibly under a system of registration, which they enacted in 1894, and by carving up and manipulating the city of Toronto they might get a member or two. So they applied to the city of Toronto an Act known as the Registration Act. But their Act proved to be equally weak in that regard, because up to the present time they have not been able to get a member elected in that intelligent city.

An hon. MEMBER. They were near it.

Mr. McCLEARY. Near enough to be left. Referring for a moment to the registration in towns and cities, I realize that it acts very unfairly to the larger towns. For instance, take it in my own county. By an Act of the local legislature last session the Registration Act was extended to the county towns. The county town of my county is smaller than the town in which I live, but the former had registration, while the latter had not. A special Act was passed giving registration to the town of Niagara Falls. This registration cost that town between $500 and $600. How unfair it is for any Government to have the right to manipulate any franchise law in that way—to say, we will give certain municipalities the right to registration, and will not give it to others. It seems to me untenable and unsound, and we would be a foolish lot of representatives if we were to hand over to any local government the power to control the franchise for this Federal Parliament. Another objection I have to this Bill is that it will bring into our municipal elections such a party feeling that our municipalities must eventually suffer. This matter was brought out the other night by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Moore). There will be a desperate effort on the part of the two political parties in each municipality to get control of the municipal council, and what does that mean? It means that the municipality must eventually suffer, because as long as they can get a party man, they will not look for a business man or a man who has the most interest in the municipality; they will not look for careful and prudent farmers, like the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. McMillan) to represent them; but they will try to elect some party hack who will do their work in the council, and that will be the cause of the degeneration of our municipal councils. This is a danger which we cannot afford to incur. We ought to oppose any law that would have that tendency. Apart from all these reasons for opposing this Bill, my greatest reason is that which was expressed by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), because it proposes to hand over to the provincial government the right to say who shall be the electors who will send men to this Parliament. We have a responsible Government, and we ought to have responsible parliamentarians; and if the local governments say who shall be the electors, we need not be in the truest sense responsible to them. We ought to have the franchise of this House under our complete control. The question I presume will come up in committee, and I sincerely hope that the hon. Solicitor General will see that the position he has taken is inimical to the best interests of our country. I believe that it is against the genius of our confederation to place such an Act on the Statute-book, proposing to hand over to an irresponsible body the right to say who shall be the electors who shall vote for the representatives who make this Parliament.

Mr. HENDERSON. The very year that the Franchise Act was put upon our Statute-book, the Liberal party declared that as soon as they came to power they would repeal it, and as they are now in power, the repeal of that law is a foregone conclusion, and, therefore, I am not going to discuss the question whether it should be repealed or not. We are not so much concerned, upon this side, about the repeal of the law as we are about what shall take its place. The hon. Solicitor General has introduced a Bill substituting the voters' lists in use in the various provinces for the present lists. To be brief, I desire simply to draw his attention to the fact that the voters' lists, although made yearly by the various municipalities, are by no means, in Ontario at least, made perfect every year. The lists, as they come from the municipalities, are not by any means perfect, and no man would care to run an election on such a list. These lists are only revised once in four years, or during the year in which a provincial election takes place. In the other years, the revision is very superficial indeed, and in fact is only a revision for municipal elections and not a revision to perfect the lists for legislative purposes. It would be unfortunate if a Dominion election were sprung upon the country at any time between the various revisions for legislative purposes, and the elections for this House should be held on lists altogether imperfect, not revised, not completed, but simply handed over by the municipal officers. In every instance, such lists are very imperfect indeed, and for that reason I think, with many other hon. members on this side, that some control should be had by us over the revision of these lists, in order to make them more perfect when we require to use them. It has been said by hon. members on the other side that one of the great objections to the Dominion franchise law is the partisanship of those who are charged with the revising of the lists, but although the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), a few nights ago, made that charge in a sweeping way, he was still good enough to say that in his country he had no such complaint to make. For my part, living in the adjoining county, I will say that I have had no complaint to make, and I would like to see the hon. member in this House who would rise up and say that in his particular county he has any special complaint to make. My impression has been all along that these general complaints were simply a cry with very little foundation indeed, and that no man was prepared to come down and make a specific charge of partisanship on the part of any revising officer. In my opinion, the revising officers, under the present law, are men who could be trusted a great deal more than the men who make up the provincial lists. Who is it that makes up the provincial lists? It is the assessors. Notwithstanding all that has been said about the assessors in Ontario, I know, from my personal knowledge quite well, that the assessor is selected, not so much on account of his qualification to value property, as on account of his qualification to see just so many of the young men as are politically friendly to him, when he goes around, and to see as few as possible who are politically opposed to him. That is the chief qualification of an assessor in Ontario, namely, to make the best lists in the interest of the party predominate in the municipal council for the time being. I do not make this charge against the Liberals any more than against the Conservative party, because I believe it is true in both cases, but you cannot expect to get an assessment roll, which will at all fairly represent the electorate of the province, and if the lists are made from those rolls, and not specially revised occasionally, so as to make them perfect, a great many men will be left off who are entitled to vote and a great many left on who are not entitled to vote. An hon. gentleman spoke a few minutes ago with reference to the omission of names on the lists under the Dominion franchise law, and of the names of dead men appearing on these lists at election times. Well, men will continue to die from day to day, and we must certainly expect that from the time a list is prepared until used, even if the interval be only one year, a very large number indeed of the names of dead men will be found on it. I remember, on the last occasion when revising the lists in my county for a provincial election,

I found the name of a man on the list who had been dead for over two years, but whose name had been taken from the assessor's roll of that year. I knew as a fact that a man who had been dead two years appeared on the list. The assessor had put him on the roll a year after he was dead, and the clerk continued his name on the list, so that the fact of a dead man's name appearing on a list is not the fault of the Dominion Franchise Act, because the same thing occurs under the municipal system.

A strong charge is made that the cost of revising the lists under the Dominion Franchise Act, is excessive. True, that law imposes heavy expense on the Dominion, but at the same time there is the expense to be borne by the municipalities in the preparation of the provincial lists and the expense to be borne by the candidates concerned in revising the lists. In my experience, and I say it without hesitation, and with some considerable knowledge of revising lists, I would rather undertake to revise a list under the Dominion Franchise Act than under the provincial law. I believe I could do it more cheaply, more easily, with less labour and inconvenience, and more thoroughly. I do not see why there should be such a very large expense to the candidate in connection with the revision of the lists. In the county of Halton, which I have the honour to represent, I have had occasion to revise the list at various times under the Dominion Franchise Act, and I am satisfied that at the expense of $100 we make a very thorough list indeed. Others perhaps may have paid a great deal more, but that is their fault. With a properly organized system throughout the county for the revision of lists, the thing can be done under the Dominion system, at a cost, I am quite sure, equally as low, if not less, than that of revising the provincial lists. Let us look for a moment at a single municipality, and I have in my mind one in which I was interested in revising the list for the provincial election. There were presented 175 appeals in that township after that so-called "complete" list had been made by the officers. Take it for granted that twenty-five of these appeals related to municipal appeals only. That would leave 150 as the number of names that had been wrongly put on or wrongfully left off, and I am satisfied that there were that number, at any rate, that related exclusively to the list for the purpose of election to the local legislature. This meant that 150 different men had to attend the court in order to have their names put on, or to defend them if they were attacked and an attempt made to strike them off. These 150 men had to be served personally by a bailiff with a notice prepared by the clerk. The clerk had to be paid for preparing it and the constable for serving it, and in reference to many of them subpoenas to be issued and conduct money paid as well as the cost of the service. The clerk has to be paid, and the judge has to be paid for holding court. Altogether the cost to the candidate, at any rate, is as great if not greater, than in the revision of the Dominion lists. The Dominion system is more perfect than the provincial. There are many young men working as farm assistants or otherwise whose names it is desired to add to the list, who are not allowed by their employers to attend court. If a young man happens to be a Conservative and is employed by a Liberal farmer, he may be detained at home, and his name is not put on the list, as the judge will say—as I have heard him say more than once—that if the young man does not consider his vote worth his day's pay, he should not have it. Under the Dominion Act, we have the plan of adding that name by means of a declaration. The party can make a declaration in the evening without losing time. He can make it before a municipal councillor or a justice of the peace. It is placed in the hands of the reviser, who examines it to see if it complies with the statute, and if it is all right, the name is added to the list. This allows a saving of time and adds the name of a voter to the list in many cases where under the provincial system, it would not be added.

Now, what is wanted, we say, is not the substitution of the provincial lists for the present Dominion lists, but rather some modification of the provincial lists, some machinery by which the Parliament of Canada would have control over the final revision of these lists, so that they could be revised in the interests of those who are to represent the electorate that are placed upon those lists. And I am quite sure that some additional machinery of that kind, a system of revision cheaper and more thorough than that of the province, at any rate in Ontario, would meet the approval of this House very much better than the sweeping proposition that has been made by the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick). For these reasons, I am constrained to vote for the amendment that is proposed against the second reading of this Bill.

Mr. GILLIES. In rising to offer a few observations, I may premise what I have to say by congratulating the House upon the tone of the present discussion. It is very different indeed from the debate that took place in this House in 1885, when the Franchise Act was introduced by the late Sir John Macdonald. I cannot help observing that the spirit of that debate was most partisan, bitter and extremely rancorous. In that respect, this debate compares very favourably with the other.

I may say at once that I am entirely opposed to this Bill, and will vote in favour of the amendment. I hold that this Parilament should have control of its own franchise. The design in this respect of the fathers of confederation in arranging the constitution of this Dominion was a most wise and beneficent one. I cannot help thinking that the right hon. gentleman who leads the House skipped lightly over that chapter of history to which he referred when he endeavoured to draw a comparison between the constitutions of Canada and the United States respectively. He said that the constitution under our system is analogous to that of the republic to the south of us. Nothing of the kind. The organizations are distinct and very dissimilar. As was abundantly shown by the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood), the system which now obtains in the United States and has obtained since the constitutional convention of 1787 was a scheme of compromise that was evolved between the two conflicting parties in the union. If we look back at the history of the constitutional convention, which took place after the sitting of the so-called Continental Congress, and in which such men as Randolph, Read, Morris and Hamilton, and other great men took part, we shall see that the conclusion arrived at on this subject was a matter of compromise. It was held by several of these great men that the representation of the states in Congress should be regulated in the same manner as in the Senate, while others held that representatives of the different states should be elected on a franchise to be laid down by Congress itself. It was in order to reach an agreement that it was concluded then, and the system has obtained from that day, that all members from the House of Representatives should be elected upon a state franchise. But when our Act of confederation was drawn up, it was laid down that the franchise for the selection of members of this House should be controlled by the Federal Parliament itself. And this was for the purpose and with the design of strengthening the Federal authority. Now, it is tolerably clear that there is a very wide difference between the constitution of the United States in this regard and that of the Canadian confederation. The argument, therefore, made use of by the leader of the Government does not apply in the slightest degree, because the cases are not analogous but distinctly and emphatically dissimilar. The 41st section of the British North America Act reads as follows:—

Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, all laws in force in the several provinces at the union relative to the following matters, or any of them, namely:—The qualifications and disqualifications of persons to be elected or to sit or vote as members of the House of Assembly or Legislative Assembly in the several provinces, the voters at elections of such members, the oaths to be taken by voters, the returning officers, their powers and duties, the proceedings at elections, the periods during which elections may be continued, the trial of controverted elections and proceedings incident thereto, the vacating of seats of members, and the execution of new writs, in case of seats vacated otherwise than by dissolution—shall respectfully apply to elections of members to serve in the House of Commons for the same several provinces.

The fathers of confederation could not do otherwise. They simply adopted the franchise of the several provinces as a basis for the election of the first House of Commons, and that was to apply to the election of all subsequent Houses until the House of Commons itself in its wisdom and by the exercise of its constitutional right, powers and functions, adopted another law under which its members should be elected. The explicit meaning of this Act is, that the House of Commons should regulate the franchise under which its members are elected. Acting upon that idea, the House of Commons did, in 1855, enact the law which it is now sought to repeal. That Act has some faults, no doubt; it is cumbersome and expensive; I readily admit these two defects. But, with these defects, it has merits, merits that should commend it to the members of this House. At all events, it has the merit of uniformity, and that should be fundamental in any law passed by this House regulating the franchise. It has also the merit of impartiality. Some hon. gentlemen may be inclined to smile at the statement that the law is impartial; but I venture to assert that there is no hon. gentleman in this House who will rise in his place and state a single instance where partiality has been shown in any constituency in this Dominion from the time the first revision was made, in 1886, down to the present day. Hon. gentlemen say that they have heard of cases of partiality, but we never heard of any single case having been formulated, much less proved, where a revising officer in any part of the Dominion had acted with partiality. Why, these officers were impartial, good reasons may be assigned. They were judges of the land in one case, or they were revising barristers in the other, barristers of high standing in the community in which they were appointed to act. They were sworn into office; they were not removable except by the House of Commons; they were not officers of the Government but officers of the Parliament of Canada, and therefore were only removable by the House of Commons. They were incapable of being elected to the House of Commons of Canada for two years after they had resigned or vacated office. In that respect, the law was more stringent with respect to them than it is towards the judges themselves. A judge may leave the bench to-day and come into the House of Commons to-morrow, but a revising barrister cannot come into the House of Commons, or into any legislative assembly of a province, nor can he be a candidate for any Parliament for two years after he ceases to be a revising barrister. We may, therefore, understand how careful the Government was, in framing this Act, to separate the revising barrister from all political influence. Now, Mr. Speaker, I was very much surprised when I heard the right hon. gentleman make use of these words in his speech on the second reading :

On this side of the House we have an absolute hostility to the revising officer and the lists prepared by the revising officer. During the last twenty years we have suffered too much at the hands of the revising officers.

Now, I cannot understand why the right hon. gentleman should have such a dislike to the revising officers, a body of men that cannot in any degree with truth be charged with partiality, a body of men who are eminently qualified for their positions, a body of men who discharge their duties wisely and well, a body of men that are not only above political considerations not only above the Government that appointed them, but are irremovable except by action of the House of Commons. It is for their eminent fairness that they can be obnoxious to the right hon. gentleman. A court of revision constituted upon fair lines is unsuitable to him and distasteful to the party that he ostensibly leads. A little further on, the hon. gentleman said :

This very Franchise Act was an abuse of power whereby the revision of the lists was placed in the hands of henchmen of the Administration.

Well, I humbly submit, that this was an asseveration that should not have come from the right hon. gentleman. I do not think it is in consonance with the dignity of the position the hon. gentleman holds in this country. It is an allegation that cannot be substantiated in any way by the right hon. gentleman, or by any other gentleman behind him in this House or country. That they were henchmen of the Administration is an impossibility, because they were above, not only every political party, but above the Government that appointed them. Now, the hon. gentleman who introduced this Bill the other day, the Solicitor General, whom I am glad to see in his seat, made a very good speech. Whatever his political views may be, that hon. gentleman generally succeeds in making clear any Act that he introduces into this House, and I must compliment him upon the very clear and brief statement that he made when introducing the measure we are now dealing with. The hon. gentleman claims, as one of the merits of this Bill, that it is based on a Bill introduced some years previously by the late Sir John Thompson. Well, Mr. Speaker, I was glad to see the hon. gentleman, in this indirect way, pay to the late Sir John Thompson that high compliment that was his due. I am one of those that did not wait until Sir John Thompson was in his grave to pay tribute to the sterling honesty, superior ability and high-minded purposes of that great and lamented statesman. But I would remind the hon. gentleman that the Bill he introduced differs very widely from the Bill which was introduced by Sir John Thompson in June, 1894. The present Bill transfers absolutely over to the local legislatures the control of the franchise under which members are elected to the House of Commons, whereas, the Bill introduced by Sir John Thompson retained in the federal Parliament the right to control its own franchise. The Solicitor General will see at once the difference between the Act he is now promoting and the Act introduced by Sir John Thompson. I am quite ready to admit that Sir John Thompson stated that the property qualification of the electors in the different provinces for elections to the House of Commons should be the same as the property qualification of electors for provincial purposes ; but he did not go further. And the selection of the provincial standard of property qualification was but one means and only one means of enabling the revising officer to make up his lists. If the hon. Solicitor General proposed to go only that far, I will at once agree with him, and accept it as a sort of compromise. If he adopts the property qualification in the different provinces and maintains the franchise within federal control I am disposed to go that far ; but when we are called upon to abrogate our functions as legislators and delegate our right, power and authority to an irresponsible legislature to say who shall vote for members of this House, that would be a humiliating and unwarrantable abdication of those functions which we are supposed to discharge here. In order to show that Sir John Thompson intended that the control of the preparation of the lists should rest in the federal authorities, I need not cite the speech he delivered in introducing the Bill. He said :

We uphold the feature which I regard as the principal feature of the Franchise Act of 1885, and that is that the revision shall take place by officers under the control of this Parliament and of the Federal Government. The great principle which underlay the Franchise Act of 1885 was the control by this Parliament over matters connected with the franchise. It was contended that control should exist in two branches ; in the first place, as regards the laying down of the franchise itself, and, in the second place, as regards the administration of the law by which the franchise was carried out.

The House will see that Sir John Thompson distinctly laid down these two propositions, namely, that the Federal Parliament prescribe the franchise under which persons shall be voters at Dominion elections ; and he also stated most emphatically and unequivocally that the make-up of these lists was to be within federal control. I should like to ask the hon. Solicitor General to explain how he is going to reconcile with the ordinary idea of justice the fact that he under his proposed Bill will disfranchise many hundreds of good citizens if his proposition becomes law. The hon. gentleman says that the local authorities will make up the lists under the laws of the different provinces. The hon. gentleman nods assent to this and therefore agrees with me as to that. In several of the provinces, thousands of people, qualified in every respect from a property standpoint, are disqualified under provincial law and are not capable of voting at Dominion elections. Does the hon. gentleman propose that those people shall remain disqualified and disfranchised for Dominion purposes; and if so how does he reconcile that position with his idea of justice and fair-play and with the acknowledged right of every British subject coming up to the standard qualification to vote in the community in which he lives? In the province of Nova Scotia from which I come we have a severe disfranchising law. The Minister of Finance who now sits in this House will remember that the Act was introduced by the party of which he was a prominent member. The law was passed in 1871, before the hon. gentleman came into active political life; but it was perpetuated in a very energetic manner, as I may say, by him after he entered public life, efforts were made to repeal it by the Conservative party on several occasions, but the hon. gentleman stood by and defended the monstrosity. That law disqualifies very many worthy citizens of the province from voting at Dominion elections. The classes of those disqualified will be found enumerated in chap. 4, section 67 of the Acts of Nova Scotia, which reads as follows:—

Any one who within fifteen days before the election was an employee, or in receipt of wages or emoluments of any kind as such employee, in the post office, the custom-house, the Inland Revenue Department, the lighthouse service, on the Government railroads—

All these people designated in the Act would be prevented from voting, if we adopted provincial franchises, for members of the House of Commons. I ask the hon. gentleman on what ground of right or justice—of course I am aware that Parliament has the power and can pass any law—he can justify the disfranchisement of 3,000 or 4,000 citizens of the province, men who are discharging the duties of citizenship in a very admirable manner, who are contributing towards municipal taxes, but who, although they pay their taxes, and every other exaction imposed upon them or demanded of them by the municipal authorities, yet are not allowed to vote at Dominion elections because one may be receiving $100 a year for keeping a lighthouse or $150 for work done in the custom-house, post office or inland revenue service. On what ground can the hon. gentleman justify the disenfranchisement of such class I have mentioned? Time and again efforts were made in that province to repeal this very obnoxious and unjust measure. All those attempts, however, were checkmated and met with defeat at the hands of the Liberal party, with which the Minister of Finance was identified before he entered this House. Laudable efforts were made by the Conservative Opposition in the local House on different occasions to secure the repeal of this Act, but the Liberal Government always voted on the other side and refused to repeal it. For the life of me I cannot understand why a dignified body like the House of Commons of Canada should give a power of attorney to the legislatures of the provinces to enable them to select the manner of men who should vote for members of this Federal Parliament.

Let me draw the attention of the House to the manner in which the lists are made up in the province of Nova Scotia, whence I come. The municipalities are incorporated as in Ontario; assessors are appointed in the different municipalities, and revisers are placed under them. The Act says that the polling sections of the different localities shall be collected in groups of from two to five in each municipality, and that each group shall have three revisers. In the county of Cape Breton, in which municipality I reside, there are twenty-four municipal districts, and five different revising courts, each comprised of three members, so that there are fifteen revisers for the whole county. These gentlemen meet and go over the electoral lists and compile a list. There is no provision made for having names put on the list, except in a round-about way, by giving notice, and so on; and the final court of revision is the sheriff. Now, Sir, the sheriff is an officer of the local government, and in too many cases in our province is very often a played-out politician who has done local service for years, and, as a last resort, he gets the office. This official is constituted the final court of appeal on those electoral lists. It is easily understood what manner of court it is which is presided over by a functionary of that kind. The Solicitor General is a good lawyer, and I ask him to consider well before he will constitute such a court as I have described, to make the lists that shall govern the election of members from the province of Nova Scotia to this federal House. After the sheriff does his work, the lists are then made up and returned to the clerk of the council, but they are written and not printed. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) will see what room there is for fraud under conditions of that sort. I am free to admit, that I believe the hon. gentleman is ready to meet such difficulties as that, and to make some effort to reform what would be an outrageous condition of affairs, if this Bill became law. I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick), before he presses this measure to a conclusion, to pause and to ensure that protection will be given against the possibilities of such fraud. I say, Mr. Speaker, that the old Franchise Act, cumbersome and expensive as it is, is yet capable of such amendment as will commend it to the House and to the country. It possessed the security of uniformity and impartiality, which this Bill does not. And, as to its impartiality, I challenge any hon. member, from Victoria to Yarmouth, in Nova Scotia, to say that the revising barrister, or the revising judge, did not act fairly and honestly from the first revision in 1886 down to the last. I am within the hearing of every member from my province in this House, and I challenge any one of them to contradict this statement. Then why disturb the judicial feature that our present revision possesses, and transfer and hand it over to parties in too many cases absolutely unacquainted with judicial procedure, and complete strangers to the most elementary rules of evidence? The Dominion Franchise Act had, therefore, the transcendent merits of uniformity and impartiality, and the cumbersome and expensive part of it could easily be removed by a well-considered amendment in this Parliament. I believe that, by adopting the amendment moved by my hon. friend (Mr. Powell), we will be moving in the direction of perfecting the present Dominion Act. Now, Sir, as to manhood suffrage. I am a strong believer in it, hedged in and safeguarded by a rigid and careful system of registration under the control of the federal authority. We have this principle admitted in the province of Ontario; we have it in the North-west Territories; we have it in Manitoba; we have it in New Brunswick; we have it in Prince Edward Island, practically, and in the remaining provinces of Nova Scotia and Quebec, the property qualification for voters is so low that it almost approaches manhood suffrage. We have all over the Dominion manhood suffrage practically, and, in my opinion, it would be well for this House to face the question now and at once. I believe, Sir, that manhood suffrage, carried out under a stringent and vigilant system of registration, would fill every want in this country. I believe, Sir, that we should have that registration under the directing eye of the Parliament of Canada, conducted before sworn officers of the federal Government, and if we had that, I submit, that such a system would commend itself to the Canadian people. I, therefore, Mr. Speaker, oppose this Bill, because it is contrary to the spirit of the British North America Act, I oppose it because this Parliament having once become seized of its own franchise, it is a retrograde step to go back to the provincial franchise, I oppose this Bill further, because it leads at once to the decentralization of the federal authority, and I believe, Sir, that in the federal authority alone should lie the right to regulate the franchise under which the members of the House of Commons of Canada should be elected. I oppose it because of its want of uniformity; I oppose it because it hands over to the provinces a power which this Parliament should exercise; I oppose it because it forces upon the provinces a burthen which we have no right to lay upon them; and I oppose it further upon the broad principle that every legislative body should have the framing of the rules and conditions under which persons seeking admission would be admitted to its councils and deliberations.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to occupy the time of the House for just a few minutes to state my position with regard to the amendment which has been proposed this evening. I have read it over very carefully, and have tried to bring my mind in line with its suggestions. I cannot, however, see that it provides for the elimination of our old-time friend the revising barrister. I am in full sympathy with the idea enunciated by my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) in favour of a uniform federal franchise, if that idea can be worked out without the help of the revising barrister, and without incurring the enormous expense entailed upon the country and upon individual candidates by the present Franchise Act. I am not in love with the proposed Act brought down by the Government. In fact, I am Tory enough to think that the present Dominion law is about as close to universal suffrage as this country ever should go. The Liberals in Ontario have gone to the other extreme; but if they are satisfied, I do not think, in view of the recent elections in Ontario, that Conservatives have much cause to complain. The old Franchise Act, with its revising officers and its expensiveness, is bad for the country, and is of no good for either party. I do not like the Government's proposed Act; but bad as it is, it is better than the system proposed by the amendment, and unless it can be made clear to me that this amendment does not contemplate the retention of our old friend the revising officer, I shall have to vote against it.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise simply to call attention to a point that has not yet been brought before the House respecting the strong objection there is to having the basis of the franchise for this House fixed by the local bodies. The right hon. gentleman who leads the House, and who, with the hon. Solicitor General, made the two principal speeches that have been made in support of this Bill, made a very elaborate argument to show that because the states of the Union fixed the franchise for the House of Representatives, therefore the provinces of confederation of Canada should fix the franchise for this Parliament. My hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Powell), however, pointed out what by some accident escaped the attention of the right hon. leader of the House. The right hon. leader of the House said:

By the authority of the precedent, because under the American constitution, which, in so far as the federation principle is concerned, is largely a prototype of our own, the regulating of the franchise for the election of members for Congress is not under the control of Congress.

Why, Sir, of course it is under the control of Congress, and expressly so, as was shown to-night by the hon. member for Westmoreland. The constitution says that it shall not go beyond the control of Congress, as my hon. friend quoted to-night. The right hon. leader of the House went on to say :

But it is embodied in the constitution itself, and is a fixed enactment, beyond and above the legislative powers of Congress.

I have been reading the debates that took place prior to the framing of the constitution. The able men who took part in those debates saw the evils that might arise from allowing the states to fix the franchise; but they were coaxing those states into a confederation, and they were afraid to take any other course than they took. As my hon. friend quoted it to-night, I quote it now, for the purpose of leading on to something else. The 4th section of the constitution reads as follows:—

The times, places and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives shall be prescribed in each state by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing senators.

Here the constitution itself does the very thing that my right hon. friend says was not done. But the most singular thing is that my right hon. friend went on to show that Congress could do the very thing which he said it could not do; for after recess he went elaborately into the instance of Congress doing it, namely, when at the close of the war the black vote was brought in. But now I am going to read to you what was said in the "Federalist," and what has not yet been quoted in this House, as a reason why it was possible for those wise men to agree to let the states fix the franchise for the federal House of Representatives, and it suggests a reason why we should not allow the provinces to fix the basis of our franchise :

Upon this clause, which was finally adopted by a unanimous vote, the "Federalist" has remarked: "The provision made by the convention appears to be the best that lay within their option. It must be satisfactory to every state, because it is conformable to the standard already established by the state itself. It will be safe to the United States, because, being fixed by the state constitutions, it is not alterable by the state governments, and it cannot be feared that the people of the state will alter this part of their constitutions in such a manner as to abridge the rights secured to them by the federal constitution."

So that you see that the great "Federalist" writer and statesman saw that it was a most extraordinary thing for a great parliament like the House of Representatives to give to lower bodies the power of fixing the franchise, which should be the matrix of what that great assembly would be. But he says it is safe, because as the franchise which they have is embodied in the constitution, it is not alterable by the state governments. The objection I have to the main principle of my hon. and learned friend's Bill after all is this, that he gives the provinces the fixing of the franchise which shall return members to this House. The main objection I have to it is not that it does not introduce uniformity, but that it gives to other bodies—I am not dwelling on the fact that they are inferior bodies, though we know they are certainly inferior in power and dignity—the fixing of the franchise which shall return members to this House.

Mr. MILLS. And the altering of it.

Mr. DAVIN. And the altering of it. Look at the state of things that was called to the attention of this House by my hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Mills). Look at the state of things that was called to our attention by the hon. baronet who leads the Opposition with regard to Manitoba. Look at the state of things in Manitoba that was brought before us by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Roche) this year. And I have one affidavit here by Mr. Ross, which I shall not trouble the House with reading, but which shows that under the present Manitoba Act he was refused the right of putting 165 electors on the lists, all of whom were qualified, and many of whom had been several years in the province. I appeal to my hon. and learned friend the Solicitor General, who has charge of the Bill, to pause. Surely he does not want to introduce legislation that in any one province will do a great wrong. Yet by this Bill he will impose on the Dominion, as regards the franchise in Manitoba, a system which even the Toronto "Globe" condemned at the time it was introduced, and which the Manitoba "Free Press"—an independent or rather a Liberal paper—condemned in the strongest and most emphatic language. I could read article after article from the Manitoba "Free Press" denouncing the present franchise law of that province as a most iniquitous law. I am not speaking now as a Conservative, but simply as a member of this House, and I ask hon. gentlemen who are in the majority: Is it right for them—it may strike themselves to-morrow—to force on the people of Manitoba a franchise for the election of members to this House which, as it has been managed up to the present, is steeped in trickery and has been the means of perpetrating untold wrongs on the electorate. The same language holds good with regard to Nova Scotia, and my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Martin) says with regard to Prince Edward Island.

The right hon. gentleman who leads the Government, in reply to the hon. baronet who leads the Opposition, said :

In so far as Nova Scotia is concerned, his argument did not go very far. Indeed, he refuted his own argument, because he said, at a later period, that the legislature of that province had repealed the obnoxious law.

It is almost impossible for me to believe that the right hon. gentleman was conscious really of what he was saying at that point. The hon. leader of the Opposition had pointed out that, having in view a prospective election, the Nova Scotia legislature passed a certain law for the purpose of controlling the election, and when that election was passed, then they repealed the law. Was not that a proof of the very thing we complain of? And yet the right hon. gentleman replied to that statement in the language I have quoted. It is really almost impossible to believe that he was conscious of the patent fallacy that underlay his argument. The right hon. gentleman went on to say that he admitted there was force in the argument that a legislature can abuse its powers. What, I ask you, would we naturally expect of a man in the position of the First Minister, who admits there is force in the argument that a legislature can abuse its powers? Would we not expect him to find a means to prevent such abuse? But instead he went on to say that he knew very well what a majority could do, and to indicate that some wrong had come from the majority to the Liberal party in this House. I can only say that I have not yet heard any Liberal mention a single case in which any individual can be accused of having done wrong under the existing franchise law.

Just to be a little more explicit, let me point out the peculiar proposition that lies beneath this Bill of my hon. and learned friend, the Solicitor General. The first proposition is this, that in a federation the popular branch of the central Parliament should not control its own electoral franchise. The next is that in a federation, the legislature of each of the provinces of the federation should not only control its own electoral franchise, but within the provincial bounds the electoral franchise of the central Parliament of the federation. You have only to state these propositions to show their utter absurdity. And what is the argument in their support used by the right hon. gentleman? It reads like a piece of fine satire. He says, practically: Here we have two powers in the federation; our powers are divisible, therefore we shall have one franchise. Where is the logic? Let me read the right hon. gentleman's words:

The reason for that is that our system is a system of divided legislative powers.

And because it is a system of divided legislative powers, it should have only one franchise, and it is the lower assemblies which should control, not only their own franchise, but the franchise of this House. What is the object that we should aim at? Is it not that this House, under whatever law we pass, should be a true representation of the opinion in the country? That is what we should aim at, and I was surprised to hear my right hon. friend talk of principles and philosophy in this matter. We sometimes hear his eulogists tell us that he has been a student of Burke and Fox and the other great Liberal statesmen of England. Well, Burke would have come down on him, if he were in this House, pretty strongly for talking about philosophy in such a connection, or even of principle. What we are aiming at here is simply to work out an expedient or a means by which this House shall be a true representation of the opinion of the country.

It seems to me that my hon. and learned friend the Solicitor General, when he introduced this Bill, was guilty of a little want of candour. He told this House that this Bill had a precedent in the one introduced by the late Sir John Thompson in 1894. Could my hon. friend have been candid in making that statement? Why, all that the Bill by Sir John Thompson in 1894 aimed at was to use the provincial franchises as a basis on which to arrive at a Dominion list, but the Dominion lists were not to pass out of the control of the Dominion Parliament.

The essence of this Bill, as shown by the language of my hon. and learned friend and of his right hon. leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and by the Bill itself is to transfer the control from this House to the provincial legislatures. The right hon. gentleman, using the word "control" in one sense at one time and in another sense at another time, which is not very creditable to his logic, to say nothing of morality, says that we give control of the franchise to the local legislatures but we do not part with it, but still exercise sovereignty. It is like saying if you give a five pound note or a dollar bill to a man and he takes it away, you still have it, or, to quote an old and vulgar saying, that you can eat your cake and have it too. I wish to call attention to what the hon. Solicitor General said. I was almost pained I must confess to read the language of the hon. gentleman. Speaking of the province of Quebec, he said that he was determined that Quebec should have its local franchise for the Dominion. So far as I am concerned I am quite content to let Quebec have its local franchise for the Dominion. One of the things I would complain about with regard to this Bill is that it would thrust upon the people of Ontario and Manitoba and New Brunswick who may not wish it, manhood suffrage for the elections of this House. Sir, is there any cogent argument in stating that there should be the same franchise for this House as for the legislature? Have we not to exercise higher powers which the local legislatures do not exercise? Have we not to exercise higher powers? Is it not possible that the same class of people who would effectively choose the minds that should control a municipality or a county may not be the persons who should choose the minds to control a local legislature, still less to choose the minds to legislate in this House. Suppose that we were independent and had to have a foreign policy and still greater questions were coming before us, is it not possible that we should require a different matrix to get a good House of Commons from that which would give us a good local assembly? One of the objections I have to this is that it thrusts will-nilly upon people who may not wish it the system of manhood suffrage for election to this House. In Ontario, instead of giving manhood suffrage certain evidences are required that people are fulfilling their duties to the state. The hon. Solicitor General said that he was determined to keep for Quebec its own franchise. But hear what he says about the poor people of Ontario:

It may be that a desire exists in some provinces to extend the franchise so broadly that all men may have a right to participate in the elections; there may be a desire that all men, even those whose only asset in life is the vote they may dispose of as a marketable commodity in the elections, should occupy the same position as the man who has some stake in the country.

My hon. friend (Mr. Fitzpatrick) nods to me. Even when after the monstrosity has been brought before him, he smiles approval of the abominable concoction that marks his legislative reign. He says in effect: I am ready to give you an Act of Parliament to give men the franchise whose only estate is the vote you give them and the price they can get for their treacherous act in selling it. And he still nods at me. I say that it is unworthy of this legislature and unworthy of my hon. and learned friend, and still more unworthy of his position, to be ready so to legislate as to give the franchise to those whom the greatest radical that ever lived declared should not be endowed with it. Hon. gentlemen opposite claim to be Liberals. Do they honour the name of John Stuart Mill. Mill declared that no man should be given the franchise who was of this character. No man should be given the franchise, unless though in some small way, doing acts of citizenship and contributing to the common stock. No bankrupt should have it and no man in receipt of public alms. For, as he says, why should we give to these the control of the money of the state? That is what we do. The people who send us here send us to spend money, and if they are a low class of people their representatives here will be of a low class. Mill denounced the idea—I have his words here under my hand—that a man who could not read or write, a man who did not pay his taxes or even an insolvent who had not got a satisfactory discharge should be on the voters' list. And yet my hon. friend says: I am ready to legislate so as to force upon Ontario, what Ontario does not now allow, that the electors for this House shall include men whose only asset in life is the vote which is for them a marketable commodity. But what I particularly find fault with my hon. friend for is that he, a gentleman of experience, a gentleman learned in the law, should state to this House that this Act is founded upon and was an imitation of the precedent set by Sir John Thompson in 1894. I have Sir John Thompson's proposed Act here before me. I will not take the time to read it, but hon. gentlemen who care to compare it with this Bill will find the comparison instructive. Sir John Thompson proposed to do what I should not object to—to use the municipal lists and the provincial lists to get a Dominion list. I do not mind what you make use of to get a list, so long as that list shall be subject to the control of this Parliament.

The argument of expense is the only one that I have heard strongly used against the present Act. Two kinds of expense have been complained of. I must say, in passing, that we have had from both sides of the House speeches that were most instructive to me. I have listened to them with great interest. My hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) pointed out that the chief expense was the revision of the lists by the judge. If we pay the judge for the revision of the lists the same price paid by the province, one-half the expense will disappear. My hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Moore) showed the other night that the amounts stated by the Solicitor General as to cost had been exaggerated.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). I think my hon. and learned friend is going a little too far. I took my statement from the Auditor General's Report. I am willing to lay it on the Table, giving the page from which I quoted.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, I see that, by refusing to agree to that statement of mine, my hon. and learned friend makes his case worse.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I draw a distinction between fact and fancy.

Mr. DAVIN. Suppose I take that sum and divide it by two, and spread it over thirteen years. Mind, I am not saying you must have that Act, but I say that, for the ultimate revision of any lists, we must not be thrown at the mercy of such revising officers as we have in Manitoba; we must not be placed at the mercy of creatures of the provincial governments, who can be got to do any iniquity that is demanded of them by their provincial leaders. In the ultimate revision we must have judges to deal with, and, provided we have due safeguards, I would not care very much what was the process by which you got out the list. But I regard the thing as a means to an end. Now, is it consonant with our dignity that we should allow another and inferior body to fix that which the right hon. gentleman describes to be the very basis and foundation of our political life? I will not so far forget my duty on the present occasion as to go into the details of this measure; I will only point out the course which I think we should follow. My hon. and learned friend introduced it as a Bill that would give us the provincial lists as our lists, and what is the principal clause, after all, in his Bill? The principal clause is the 8th clause, and in that he tells us that the basis he is going to give us for our list is a basis as shifting as the sand of the seashore. It is a basis that has no permanency whatever. He gives you a list that you may find, when you want the list, that it is not there. Then, he provides the same machinery—I wish my hon. friend from East Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson) was here—he provides the same machinery precisely, as an alternative, that he admits now this Act is introduced to supersede. He tells you that, in certain cases, you may not find that you have a provincial list within the twelve months, and then,

If such lists have been prepared not more than one year before the date of the writ for such Dominion election; otherwise new voters' lists shall be prepared, and for the purpose of preparing and giving effect to such voters' lists the Governor in Council may appoint all necessary officers and confer upon them all necessary powers, and in the preparation and revision and bringing into force of such new voters' lists the provision of the laws of the province, regulating the preparation and revision and bringing into force of the provincial voters' lists in such cases, shall as far as possible be observed and followed.

But the officers will be Dominion officers, and you may have, therefore, a machinery very much like that which he wants to supersede. So that, after all, we are not going to have such a cheap system as has been suggested to us, and my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) showed this evening, very clearly, how that was. Now, to show that my fears are not groundless, that we may get little help to guard us against such officers as I have spoken of, as exist in Manitoba, if you turn to the 17th section, which is a section amending the Dominion Elections Act, we read:

Not more than one elector for each compartment shall at any one time enter the room where the poll is held, and each elector upon so entering shall declare his name, surname and addition, which shall be entered or recorded by the poll clerk in the poll-book provided for that purpose, which shall be kept in form R in the first schedule of this Act; and if the same are found on the list of voters for the polling district of such polling station, or if he is found entitled to vote—

“Or if he is found entitled to vote”—what is the meaning of that?

Mr. DAVIN.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Prince Edward Island.

Mr. DAVIN. Is that to be for the returning officer to decide?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. They have no list in Prince Edward Island to prepare, and you have, therefore, to leave it in the hands of the returning officer.

Mr. DAVIN. Is that a satisfactory state of things? There is another gap, another pit-fall. I pointed out, a moment ago, that what we were doing was forcing on Ontario manhood suffrage for the Dominion, and what you are doing in Prince Edward Island, which now has a good and fair system of returning men to Parliament, is to force on them such a system as they have in Prince Edward Island, and leave it entirely with the returning officer as to whether he will put a name on or not. Now, when we go into committee, I do hope that we may find between the two sides of the House a modus vivendi, some means of coming to a fair arrangement by which, instead of talking of principles and talking of philosophy, we shall regard the making of the lists as a means to an end, an honest means to a noble end, a fair means to a desirable end, a means of giving us honest and trustworthy lists that shall send to this House a fair, just and effective representation of the opinion of the country.

Mr. MOORE. I do not rise to make a speech on this subject. But I have noticed that some hon. members, in commenting upon a speech I made upon this subject last week, dispute the figures which I quoted as to the cost of the various revisions of the voters' lists which were made since the Act was first passed. I understand from the Solicitor General to-night, that he called those figures fancy figures, and disputed the correctness of those which I had quoted. I will say here now, that I took my figures directly from the Auditor General's Report, and I challenge him, or any other man, to show that they are incorrect. The statement I then made was, that the four revisions that have taken place during the operation of the Act, in the last twelve years, cost $826,782.97, which would amount, spread over the twelve years, to $68,898 a year. So I say, that the statement made by the Solicitor General, that the cost had been $1,500,000, does not agree with the Report of the Auditor General, and that my figures are absolutely correct.

Mr. WALLACE. Hon. gentlemen opposite who have spoken on this subject, have taken it for granted that there was nothing to be said in favour of the present Franchise Act; but, when the debate had gone on, we found out that there is nothing to be said to-night in favour of the proposed new Franchise Bill. Speaker after speaker have got up on the Government side and have exhausted themselves in an effort to produce arguments that would justify this House in abolishing the Franchise Act and taking this backward step. It is a retrograde step that is proposed, and one unworthy of a Government that call themselves progressive and Liberal. This is a step in the wrong direction. It is, as has been truthfully stated on this side of the House to-night, an abdication of the functions of this Parliament. We have the power to regulate our own franchise. It is eminently proper that the power should be vested in this Parliament, and still more proper that Parliament should exercise it. For some years the provincial franchises were used. It was inevitable that they should be used because there was no other means available for the preparation of the lists for the first House of Commons of Canada. Year after year the same franchise was adopted; but Sir John Macdonald introduced a Franchise Bill, which was not passed into law but was brought up for the purpose of familiarizing the House and the country with its provisions so that it might be adopted in years to come. That new Franchise Bill was adopted in 1885. There have been many objections made to it, and we all remember the circumstances under which it was passed. The objections that have been made are, in the first place, that it was cumbersome, that it was hard to learn and hard to understand. It was somewhat cumbersome; but that very fault appears to have led to the preparation of a more perfect list than the local list, as I will conclusively prove. The Act as it has been in force provides for every voter getting his name on the list with the lowest possible expense, and least trouble, and to that extent is in direct contrast to the provincial list in Ontario. The object of the Ontario list appears to be to prevent men who are duly qualified from getting their names placed on the list. The expense is as great, the difficulty is as great, as with the Dominion list, and when all this trouble has been undertaken, you have not in the case of the provincial list got even a nearly perfect list. It is stated as an objection that an immense list is prepared under the Dominion Franchise Act. The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) said it looked like a stuffed list. The hon. gentleman was forced, however, to admit that the revising officer was an eminently fair one. Hon. gentlemen opposite are obliged to make this admission because these officers in nine cases out of ten are judges of the land. They perform judicial functions and are the judges of last resort in regard to provincial lists. The only class of men who are entirely removed from the political arena are these men who were made revising officers for the Dominion lists. Yet we have been told—we have not been told to-night, because hon. gentlemen opposite dare not make the statement—that they have acted unfairly. Although hon. gentlemen opposite have been endeavouring to create that impression throughout the country, they have completely failed. They now say that they have nothing to say against the revising officer, but that there is the revising officer's clerk, a very wicked individual, according to the hon. member for West Elgin. I only know the revising officer's clerk in my own riding. He is the judge's son, a barrister, and an eminently fair man against whom nothing could be said by either side as regards his impartiality and his care in preparing the lists and complying with the law. This charge against some of the revising officers' clerks was untrue and it has been urged for the first time to-night; and no proof has been given in support of it, any more than proof has been given of the unfairness of the revising officers who are principally judges of the land. Then we are told that the Act was expensive. Perhaps so. There are two expenses to be considered: one is the expense to the Government, and the other is the expense to the individual candidate. I presume we are more interested in the latter. We have a very general interest in the expense to the country, but we have a special interest in the expense to the candidate who causes a revision of the list, and I have no hesitation in saying that it is more expensive in the case of the local lists than in the case of the lists under the Dominion Franchise Act. Take my own constituency as regards the local legislature. The Mowat Government gerrymandered it twice in order to make it a safe constituency, if they could. It is not nearly so large as the constituency for Dominion purposes, and the population is not more than half; yet for one-half of this Dominion constituency the local candidates, Mr. St. John and Mr. Hill, have been put to more trouble and expense in revising the lists than in revising the Dominion list for the larger constituency, and yet they did not secure nearly as perfect a list. The provincial list is essentially an imperfect list. In the township of Vaughan, where I live, there were on our side, I think, about 100 appeals put in; but though the court was held for a day or two, it was difficult to get the people to attend from so large a township and remain there until they gave evidence necessary to have their names put on the list. The result, both on the Reform and Conservative side, was that men did not appear to have their names put on the list, because the evidence was not sufficient to satisfy the judge, who desired conclusive evidence; and, therefore, although there was a good deal of expense incurred and a good deal of trouble taken, a very imperfect list was obtained. A large number of names of those entitled to vote were not put on the list, notwithstanding the expense and trouble taken, whereas our Dominion list was more perfect and less expensive. Under the Dominion Act a man who is entitled to vote can have his name placed on the list without much expense and very little trouble or loss of time by making affidavit, when he has demonstrated his right to vote. Another objection, and to my mind a pretty strong one, is that when this local and imperfect list is obtained, you have neither a written nor a printed list. You have first a printed list, second, you have a number of names written in, and third, you have a pen stroke drawn through a number of names. We had that experience at the last local election. Every one wanted to know where a revised list could be obtained; but nobody could secure one except with great trouble. We had first a printed list, but when the revised list was obtained it was found that a pen had been drawn through certain names and certain other names had been added in writing; and we had therefore a list partly printed, partly erased and certain names added in writing, a list that could be easily tampered with when dishonest men had charge of it, and we know dishonest men have had charge of it in the past and have tampered with the ballot boxes in my own immediate locality. The Government in introducing this Franchise Bill have utterly failed to justify it. We have evidence from every province in the Dominion of the iniquities perpetrated under the local franchise laws; we have had demonstrated to us the injustice of the Manitoba law, and we have had time and again evidence of the unfairness of the Franchise Act passed by the local legislature of Nova Scotia. In Ontario we have a franchise law which aims at disfranchising people. If a man moves from one electoral district to another he loses his right to vote. He does not dispossess himself of his property, he does not break any law of the land, but yet he is an alien when the election comes on. I know of one case, that of Mr. John Abell, who employs 150 men in the city of Toronto. Mr. Abell removed from West York to the city of Toronto; he could not vote in West York because he could not swear he was residing there, and although he had $150,000 or $200,000 worth of property in the city of Toronto, he could not vote there because his name was not on the list. So in the case of Dr. Orr, our candidate for the local legislature. He committed the crime of removing from the electoral district of West York, as it was constituted for the local legislature, and removing into the city of Toronto, but remaining in the old electoral district of York as it has been for fifty years constituted as a Dominion constituency, and although he was a candidate for the local legislature, he did not have a vote either in West York or in the city of Toronto. He was treated as an alien in the country in which he was born and had lived all his life. It looks perhaps as if we were going to have a change of government in Ontario, and if so we will have a new franchise Bill in that province. But, Sir, I refuse to let any local legislature—I care not what its politics may be—dictate the franchise for the Parliament of Canada. I know that if a Conservative Government came into power in Ontario they would have removed many of the inequalities and injustices of the franchise law of that province. That they would make it more just and equitable I have not the slightest doubt, but even so, I maintain that we have no right to delegate the franchise for the Parliament of Canada to any local legislature or to any county council or to any municipal council. I say, Sir, that we are lowering our dignity and doing an injustice to ourselves by taking such a course. There is still another objection to this Bill now proposed by the Government. Under the Dominion Franchise Act there is a simple oath specified, which sets forth four things: first, that you are a British subject; second, that you are twenty-one years of age; third, that you have not bribed anybody and that nobody has bribed you; and fourth, that you are the person mentioned on the voters' list. That is a form of oath that is understandable by anybody, but under the local law in Ontario the voter is met with a series of complicated oaths. The one most usual to be administered is that referring to the manhood suffrage, and I venture to say that that oath will not be properly administered by one returning officer out of a hundred. There are half a dozen blanks to be filled up and these blanks state certain dates, and one of the dates is:

That you have resided within this province for twelve months before the.....day of....., being the day up to which a complaint could be made to the county court judge under the Ontario voters' list, and to insert the names of any persons in this list.

That date varies in every municipality in the province of Ontario, and who is going to fill up that blank? The deputy returning officer knows nothing about it, the polling clerk knows nothing about it, the returning officer knows nothing about it, the Ontario legislature provides no date, and the whole thing may be used and is used effectively as a bluff to prevent certain people from voting, whom it is considered desirable should not vote. This oath acts as a deterrent to people from voting and indeed the whole Ontario Act seems to tend in that direction. For all these reasons. I say that we should stick to a Dominion franchise law and amend it, as we easily can do. It is said by hon. gentlemen opposite that the fact that we have admitted that changes should be made in the Dominion Franchise Act is sufficient to condemn it. Not so. We do not claim that the Bill is infallible. In 1894 Sir John Thompson introduced an amendment, in the first place to make the Dominion Franchise Act less expensive, and, in the second place, to remove certain inconsistencies, and to make it work more smoothly. We recognized then that the Act should be amended, and we recommend that course to-day as strongly as we did four years ago. The fact that we admit that does not justify the retrograde step which the Government proposes that the House should now take—a step which I am sure, if they adopt it, either their own Government or a Conservative Government will in the near future repeal in order to revert to a Dominion franchise, which is the true system and the only one that will work effectively. Take all the difficulties that have been pointed out in adopting the different franchises in the different provinces. In the province of Ontario you have one man one vote, while in the province of Quebec you have one man six votes. Why should you give property such an advantage as that in the province of Quebec, if you do not give property an equal advantage in the province of Ontario? Will somebody justify it? Will anybody say that the people of Quebec are more intelligent and have a right to have a wider franchise than the people of Ontario? No one can urge that; they shall all be treated exactly alike. Besides that, a very important consideration is this. Following logically upon the principle of one man one vote, one vote should have one value. But hon. gentlemen opposite have not proposed that that shall be the case. Of course, it could not be done now without a redistribution Act, which I presume hon. gentlemen opposite will not attempt, at any rate until the next census has been taken. But in the province of Ontario, where one man one vote prevails, they have not recognized the principle of representation according to population, which they advocated many years ago, and which logically and consistently should follow. For instance, they have cut up the riding of West York, and have added a large portion of its population to West Toronto. The result is that to-day there are probably 20,000 people in the west riding of York, and probably three times 20,000 in the west riding of Toronto. This is unfair and unjustifiable. We should have as nearly as possible a uniform franchise. It is true, the franchise of the present Dominion Act is not uniform, but it is very nearly so. It is not perfect. Its framers attempted to make a uniform franchise, but they found that they had to depart from it in some minor respects; but so far as the whole Dominion is concerned, the franchise is pretty nearly uniform, so that a man having a vote in one portion of the Dominion is entitled to a vote if he makes his residence in any other portion of the Dominion. In that respect it is a commendable act; but the proposed Bill utterly ignores that object. Now, Sir, it would be in my opinion a calamity to this country if this Bill for the adoption of the franchises of the different provinces of the Dominion becomes the law of the land. It will not increase the intelligence of the members elected to this House; it will not raise the power and strength of this great central Parliament of Canada. It will be of no benefit whatever that I can see except that it may save the Dominion Parliament from the expenditure of a sum of money which would be necessary for the making of Dominion lists. It increases the expenses to the candidates, which to us is a more important matter. I say that if it does cause expense to the Dominion to obtain a Dominion list, the result completely justifies that expenditure. I do not believe the lists should be revised every year. That is an expense to the Government and both a labour and expense to the individual. But if a by-election is held, there might be some simple and inexpensive machinery for revising the list for the constituency in which that by-election is held, so that it will be held under an up-to-date voters' list. That is not proposed to be done by this Bill.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. How do you propose to do that?

Mr. WALLACE. I would propose to do it by a registration.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). How late would you have it?

Mr. WALLACE. I would have it after the vacancy occurred. I would allow sufficient time to elapse between the issue of the writ and the holding of the election to have a registration, so that there would be a list right up to date. But that is only one proposal. There are other methods by which an up-to-date list could be obtained, and I think it is important that it should be obtained. It has been stated that it is wrong to have a by-election on a list two or three years old. I quite agree with that. I say that wrong should be remedied, and it can be remedied cheaply and effectively in various ways. So I hope that this Parliament will not adopt a law which has nothing to recommend it except that it saves this Dominion of Canada the expenditure of a small sum of money, while it takes from the individual candidates a sum much larger than before, and where the expenditure should not be imposed upon the individual candidates. It is the duty of the state to provide as perfect a list as possible, and this duty should not devolve upon the candidates nor upon the political parties, more than to the smallest extent possible. For these reasons I am of opinion that this Bill should be read about this day six months.

Mr. LEGRIS. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I think it but right to extend my congratulations to the hon. gentlemen opposite, for the opposition they are offering the measure now before us. The House can bear witness to the idle opposition which the hon. gentlemen, during several sittings of the House, have offered this measure which, however, cannot fail meeting public approval. Let them go on, as long as they please, opposing so just and opportune a measure; such a course cannot but help our cause before the country. The Act now in force has often been discussed before the electorate, and I may say, speaking for the province of Quebec, that it has been condemned as formally as possible at the hands of the people. As a matter of fact, never did public opinion declare itself more openly on any important measure than it has done with regard to the franchise law of 1885. Many a time at public meetings and on the hustings did I hear that law inveighed against and denounced, but never yet have I heard any of our opponents utter a single word to vindicate it; on the contrary, they would confess, by their silence at least, if not by word of mouth, that it ought to be repealed. And no later than to-day did we not hear the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Poupore) stating in this House that he had pledged himself before his electors to vote in favour of any Bill to repeal the franchise Act of 1885? It was on good ground, therefore, that I stated, at the outset, that by opposing during several sittings the measure now under consideration the hon. gentlemen opposite were rendering us a service. Those hon. gentlemen have thought the best they could do was to have an amendment proposed to the Bill by one of their friends, but it is a spiritless amendment, to say the least, as it only tells us that this House is anxious to reduce the expenses attendant upon the preparation of the voters' lists, so far as may be practicable, while, it adds, no system of franchise would be satisfactory which did not preserve federal control. Such is the opinion given expression to by the majority of the hon. gentlemen. All those, at least, to whose speeches I have listened to, have declared that the expenditure attendant upon the preparation of the electoral lists were too large and even exorbitant. Now, the hon. gentlemen were in power at the time, and they ought to have found some means of reducing that expenditure. The hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), when introducing this Bill, told us that the four revisions of the electoral lists had cost the country $1,154,000, which represents an average of $288,000 for every revision. Now, if we refer to the expenditure incurred for the last revision which took place in 1894-95, we see, by the reply given by the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) on the 12th February, 1896, that the last revision cost no less than $235,396.98. It is quite evident therefore, that, experience did not teach them how to reduce the expenditure attendant upon the preparation of those electoral lists. Moreover, if we glance over the procedure which the revising officers had to go through, it is easy to understand that it could not be done without a large expenditure, and, moreover, a useless one, as we have in each province, voters' lists that are prepared by the municipal councils. Those lists are prepared yearly by competent men, chosen irrespective of party politics; they will also, as a rule, give better satisfaction, as they are more easy of access to the interested parties. The case is quite different with the lists prepared by the revising officers appointed by the Dominion Government, and belonging exclusively to one political party. Those officers strongly sympathise with the political party from which they get their appointment and, moreover, as they are often called upon to act in localities they are unacquainted with, they have to rely upon the information their political friends supply them with.

It seems out of question that the electoral lists of the different provinces, being prepared every year, without our having to concern ourselves about them, they would give fuller satisfaction than the Dominion lists can. As a matter of fact, under the Dominion Franchise Act, the expenditure necessarily involved is so large that it has led to the still worse effect of preventing the Government of the day, as also the former Administration, to revise yearly the electoral lists, as provided by the law now in force. What are the actual facts, Sir? Whenever any by-elections are coming off, we have to take lists four years old. This is an intolerable state of things, one that constitutes a real hardship for the voters whose names are not on the lists. Under the present system, a yearly revision would involve too large an expenditure. Therefore we cannot secure fair and equitable lists, without incurring heavy expenditures, whilst it would be quite otherwise, should we use the lists prepared for provincial elections. It is also contended that it is necessary to maintain the present system on the plea that it secures a much desired uniformity. I agree that the preparation of the voters' lists based on different systems may be attended with some inconveniences; but it should also be borne in mind that the provincial lists are prepared by municipal councils, being thereby less liable to lead to mistakes and to hardships than the present lists are. I am sorry, however, that the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) has not seen his way clear to insert in the Bill now under consideration a provision by which the right of suffrage of an elector would be restricted to his place of residence. All those who have had to run an election know all the inconvenience of bringing to the polls persons who do not reside in the locality where they are qualified to vote. Those inconveniences are of such a nature as to justify the hon. Solicitor General, if he can see his way clear to do it, in amending his Bill, when it comes under the consideration of the committee, so as to make it provide for residential voting. Every hon. member in this House knows all the trouble and expenditure incurred by the candidates and their friends in bringing to the polls those voters who do not reside in the locality where they have a right to vote. But there are further disadvantages which I may merely mention here. Those voters who come from outside to vote are mostly always the cause of controverted election trials being brought about and of elections being voided. As every hon. gentleman knows, one of the most heavy burdens which the candidates and their friends have to bear is the paying of the travelling expenses of those who come from a distance. Now, those expenditures are unlawful; they make the candidate liable to have his election contested and should the trial of the election petition take place, his election may be voided. I am sure the Bill now under consideration would not adequately meet the views of the voters in the province of Quebec, should it not include a clause providing for residential voting. In my opinion, Sir, notwithstanding all what the hon. gentlemen opposite may say to the contrary, it would be far preferable for us to revert to the former state of things and to use the provincial lists. The voters of this country will then be able to express their opinion in the same manner as when voting at a provincial election. The electors will make their voice heard as easily then as they do now; they will be able to give expression to their views by means of the provincial lists in a more satisfactory manner than they can do through the federal lists now in use. This change would save the country and those who concern themselves with the preparation of those voters' lists all the expenditure, and trouble attendant upon the revision of the Dominion voters' lists, under the present system.

Mr. CHAUVIN. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, in listening to the remarks just fallen from the hon. member for Maskinongé (Mr. Legris), I noticed that while attacking the Franchise Act, he did not say anything in vindication of the Bill now under our consideration. He even went so far as to say that there were deficiencies in the Bill introduced by the hon. Solicitor General, and among other amendments, he did suggest residential voting. Now, Sir, we are not called upon to vindicate the franchise law of 1885, and I may tell the hon. gentlemen opposite that we are all opposed to that law remaining in force any longer, as it stands now. For my part, I say without hesitation, that were I asked to vote in favour of the law remaining in force, as it stands now, I would vote against it. But we have proposed an amendment which points out the main objectionable feature of the Bill introduced by the hon. Solicitor General. As to the matter of expenditure, I quite coincide with the hon. member for Maskinongé. I admit that the machinery of the Act of 1885 is too expensive, as stated in the amendment. But I would have liked the Government to introduce a Bill which, while reducing the large public expenditure necessitated by the machinery of the Act, would have provided for the control of Parliament over the franchise under which its members are elected. Now, Sir, if we oppose this Bill, it is because this very principle is infringed. We hold that this Parliament is an independent body, superior to the provinces. The provincial legislatures enjoy but delegated powers, which were conferred on them by the Imperial Parliament. At any rate, the Dominion Parliament, so far as its origin and dignity are concerned, is above the provincial legislatures, and it seems desirable that it should have, at least, the control of the voters' lists on which its members are elected. Every parliament is vested with that power. Why, then, should the Dominion Parliament, which is above the provincial legislatures, and is an independent body, not possess the right of electing its own members? Such is the principle for which we are now battling, and such is the reason why we oppose the present Bill, which ignores that principle. If the hon. Solicitor General is willing to insert in his Bill a clause providing for the control of the Dominion Parliament over the voters' lists, let him make a proposition to that effect, and I make bold to tell him that he will have the support of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, or, at least, I give him my word that I will support the Bill. But Parliament should not divest itself of its control over the lists on which the members of this House are elected.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). (Translation.) The hon. gentleman will perhaps allow me to interrupt him a moment. Would the hon. gentleman point out to us what means we should take, in his opinion, in order to exercise that control?

Mr. CHAUVIN. (Translation.) I do not think either the member for Terrebonne, or any other hon. gentleman, is called upon to legislate here instead of the hon. gentlemen opposite—

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. (Translation.) The hon. gentleman wants concessions, and I was just asking him what he wants.

Mr. CHAUVIN. (Translation.) Those concessions, I propose to ask them from the Solicitor General when the House is sitting in Committee of the Whole, and when this Bill is under their consideration I will then propose that this Bill be so modified as to secure to Parliament the exclusive control of the lists on which members of this House are elected. I would certainly endorse this measure, were it enacted that Parliament shall have control over the lists on which members of the House of Commons are elected; and such is, to my mind, the main objectionable feature of this Bill.

Hon. gentlemen have spoken of decentralization in connection with the exercise of the suffrage; they said that it was desirable to give the provinces the right of determining the franchise on which the members of this House should be elected. They have also contended that the Act of 1885 interfered with provincial autonomy. When the Dominion Parliament adopted the present system under which members of this House are elected, it did not in the least interfere with the powers of the provincial legislatures. This House, on the contrary, under the British North America Act of 1867, enjoys the right and privilege of legislating on that matter. The Government of Canada has the right to superintend and control and regulate the preparation of the electoral lists on which the members of this House are elected; it has the unquestionable right of determining its own franchise and to make provisions as to who shall have a right to vote at the election of members of this House.

It is, therefore, out of question to controvert the right of this Parliament to enact a franchise of its own, and it cannot be said that when this legislation was adopted, the rights of the provinces were interfered with. I agree that the machinery of that law is too expensive and that it is necessary to find the means of removing that objectionable feature of that system.

I did not rise, Sir, in order to answer the hon. member for Maskinongé, who is not quite satisfied with this Bill, but only to give expression to my views on the measure introduced by the hon. Solicitor General, and before I resume my seat, let me say here that I cannot support this Bill, because in my opinion it is contrary to the dignity, to the prerogatives and even to the interests of the members of this House. By enacting such legislation, we would find ourselves at the mercy of the local legislatures, which is against the dignity of the Dominion Parliament.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I do not rise for the purpose of discussing the general question, but simply to remove a misconception which seems to exist on the other side of the House with regard to the provincial law of Nova Scotia regulating the franchise, and which has been given expression to by at least three hon. members on the opposite side. The hon. leader of the Opposition thus spoke on this point, as reported in "Hansard," page 2339, Daily edition:

I need not at this moment go into the evidences that existed in regard to that point, further than to say that it was found that the right and power of the local legislatures to select a franchise, which was afterwards used by the Dominion, was in some cases certainly grossly abused; and so generally was that abuse pursued, that in the province of Nova Scotia the legislature absolutely passed a franchise Act after the general elections to have an effect upon the Dominion elections, although they never intended to use it and never did use it, for their own elections, and they repealed the Act before the general elections came on, showing they had absolutely the power to control the representation of this Parliament, by adopting a policy which they did not exercise themselves and never intended to exercise. One such illustration is sufficient to prove the absolute necessity of this Parliament, if it was going to occupy an independent position in the estimation of the country and the world adopting a franchise of its own. That led to the passage of the Act of 1885, &c.

I do not desire to contradict this statement, very general in its terms, and which may possibly refer to something I have not under my hand, but I would be obliged to the hon. gentleman, if he would intimate what Act of the Nova Scotia legislature he had in his mind, because I find that his statement has been made the basis of numerous remarks on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite. Would the hon. gentleman tell the House what particular Act it is to which he referred, or the time when that Act was passed?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. At this moment I am not able to lay my hands on the Act, but it was an Act that was passed a long time ago. I have it in my recollection, and it has been cited over and over again on the floor of this House. I shall look it up, and give the hon. gentleman, at some future period, the precise information.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I have no recollection of any Act of the kind. I had the honour of being Prime Minister of that province for twelve years, and a member of its Government and legislature for fourteen years, and nothing of the kind ever occurred during that period. I have no recollection of any Act being passed during all these years by the Nova Scotia legislature which had any relation whatever to the Dominion franchise or the Dominion lists. I know of no Act passed during that period which would warrant the statement of the hon. gentleman. If something of the kind occurred in earlier years, it has escaped my memory, and if the hon. gentleman has any recollection of such an Act, of course, I do not presume to contradict him.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My recollection is, that the Act was introduced by Mr. Martin I. Wilkins.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That would carry us back a very long time ago, and would hardly be a justification for the Dominion Franchise Act, which was only passed in 1885. Another point made was, that this disfranchising Act of Nova Scotia was passed by a Liberal government. It may be no harm to remind hon. gentlemen that in 1871, when that Act was passed, parties in Nova Scotia were not divided on the lines of Liberal and Conservative. Before confederation, and for several years afterwards, the parties in Nova Scotia were divided on the lines of confederate and anti-confederate, and many men who formed part of the anti-confederates then, and who, presumably, approved of that Act, afterwards became included in the Conservative party of Canada. That Act was the outcome of party lines existing at the time of the union, when we did not call ourselves Liberals and Conservatives. I do not wish to go at any length into these matters, but I may say that that Act was introduced simply because it was the avowed policy of the Dominion Government to interfere in the provincial affairs.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, the very reverse.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. In the very events connected with the passing of that disfranchising Act, there were interferences by the Dominion Government with the rights and liberties of the Nova Scotia legislature which were open to the gravest objection. I do not wish, however, to enter into that aspect of the case, but prefer simply to take this ground. So far as that Act could deal with the provincial franchise, what right has this House to discuss it? What care we what a province may do with respect to its provincial franchise? But, hon. gentlemen may say, the provincial lists are those you are taking for the Dominion. That is the case, and if the Dominion lists are interfered with by the provincial authorities, I admit that that would be fair ground of opposition, but there never was a time when the Dominion lists did not contain the names of these Dominion officials. Those officials disfranchised by that local Act were entitled to vote in the Dominion elections. The disqualification which was created by that provincial franchise law of Nova Scotia, does not touch the voters' lists at all.

Mr. MILLS. I never heard any one say to the contrary in this House.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Then, if the names of the Dominion officials have always been on the lists used in the Dominion elections, what is all this fuss about?

Mr. MILLS. Because there was an Act passed disfranchising them from voting, and that is engrafted in this Bill.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. What right has this House to say to any independent legislature of any province how it shall deal with its own provincial franchise, so long as it does not touch the franchise of this House?

Mr. MILLS. It is going to do that?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It is not, and never did.

Mr. MILLS. But that is the intention now.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No, there never was any intention of doing that; it did not do it, and will not do it. I want it clearly understood, that, while there were good reasons—which I do not wish to enter into now, because that is a provincial question—for disqualifying the Dominion officials for provincial purposes, that disqualification never touched the voters' lists at all. The voters' lists, from the beginning, contained the names of these Dominion officials who are otherwise qualified under the general conditions of the franchise, and the disqualification only took place when the voter went to the poll. His right to vote then could be challenged, and the oath put to him, which he could not take if he were a Dominion official. I am prepared to defend that Act whenever and wherever necessary, but whether it be wise or not, so long as it does not affect the lists for the Dominion elections, we have no right to complain. Therefore, there never was any ground for complaint as regards the Nova Scotia lists affecting the franchise of the House of Commons, but, if there had been any such disqualification, I want to point out that, years before the Dominion Franchise Act was passed, that difficulty was met. The difficulty was only imaginary, it was never real; but, imaginary as it was, this House legislated on the question and removed the evil, if it ever had any existence, which it had not. Here is the Representation Act of 1892. In chapter 3 of 45 Victoria, the Act relating to the representation of the various electoral districts of the Dominion, I find this provision:

Notwithstanding anything in any law of the province of Nova Scotia or of the Dominion of Canada, no employee on the Intercolonial Railway in that province shall be disqualified to vote as an elector at any future election of a member or members to serve in the House of Commons of Canada, if he shall have the necessary property and other qualifications therefor required by law. In the event of the name of any such elector being an employee on the Intercolonial Railway, having been omitted by the revisers from the list of qualified voters for a member of the General Assembly of Nova Scotia under the laws in force in that province, or to be returned to the county clerks or clerks of the peace, or omitted from the lists of voters deposited by the sheriff with the county clerks or clerks of the peace, or obtained by the returning officer, or furnished to the deputy returning officer, it shall be lawful for such employee to vote as an elector at any future election of a member or members to serve in the House of Commons of Canada, on his taking, or offering to take, before the sheriff or returning officer, the following oath.

Now, Sir, it will be apparent from what I have stated there never was any disqualification on the part of the provincial legislature of Nova Scotia which touched the lists of voters for members of the House of Commons of Canada.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) tell me why it was necessary, then, to pass this Act which he has just now read? It was necessary to enfranchise these parties who had been disfranchised by the law of Nova Scotia.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I will answer the question of my hon. friend by saying that it was not necessary to pass this law. If the names were on the list, and it is not disputed that they were on the list, will my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) say how came in the disfranchisement.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What was the need of the law if they were not disfranchised?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I say there was no necessity for it. My hon. friend has not answered the question, if the names were on the lists and it is shown that they were, will he tell how it was that they were disfranchised in the Dominion election?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In this way—while the lists for the local election were the lists for the Dominion election, and the lists from the local preventing these parties from voting, it became necessary, this Parliament was compelled in fact, in defence of the rights of the people of Nova Scotia who were disfranchised, to pass this Act.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) says that the provincial lists prevented them from voting. That would be a very strong argument only that the hon. gentleman is misinformed as to the facts, for, as I have shown, the local lists did not prevent them voting. The lists contained the name of every Dominion official who was qualified to vote by his property or otherwise in the usual way. That was the list, the official was not disqualified by having his name left off the list and there was no other disqualification. The facts show from the beginning disqualification of Dominion officials was merely a freak of the imagination. Hon. gentlemen have heard the statement and I challenge contradiction of it—that the names of Dominion officials were never left off the lists under the provincial law, and the names being on the lists the parties were entitled to vote in the Dominion election. There was never any need for the passing of the Act of 1882. Hon. gentlemen opposite have pleaded that the Dominion Franchise Act was necessary by reason of the fact of this disqualification in Nova Scotia. I pointed out that the disqualification, as respects the Dominion lists never existed, because the names were on the list, and, second, if by any possibility the names had been left off the list, then, three years before the Franchise Act was passed, this Parliament had passed an Act which would meet the difficulty and give these men their votes. The argument, therefore, that three years later you had to pass a Dominion Franchise Act to get names on the Dominion lists which were already on the provincial list entitling the parties to vote in Dominion elections, shows that that is a mere delusion. If any of the facts that I have stated, which I state in good faith, are disputed, I shall be glad if any hon. gentleman will show, either now or at a later stage in what respect they are inaccurate.

Before resuming my seat, I desire to say a word with regard to the matter on which the lists are made up in Nova Scotia. They are made up by the municipalities. The idea that one would infer from statements that were made that these lists were made up by the local government or by parties interested in the local government are not well founded. I represented the metropolitan constituency of Halifax in the provincial parliament for many years. During that time, the municipality of Halifax was about evenly divided. Perhaps at one time the Conservatives predominated and at another the Liberals. I have never heard any difficulty about the lists. There may have been in some cases partisan revisers; that would happen in any case. I have heard of partisan revising officers under the Dominion law, though I do not make the charge that I personally know of any such. The lists in Nova Scotia were made up, on the whole, free from partisanship—practically, of course, not absolutely. I speak as one who was elected time after time on lists prepared under the direction of officers appointed by a Conservative council, and made, I believe, in the main, fairly. With regard to the Dominion Franchise Act, whatever difference of opinion there may be as to what is the proper basis of the franchise, public opinion has reached the conclusion that, in nearly all the provinces, the difference between the Dominion and the local franchises is so unimportant that there is no excuse for keeping up the organizations and undertaking the expense for two lists. Inasmuch as that is the most convenient in the interests of economy and the convenience of candidates, committee men and officials, and all those who spend time and money in making out lists, inasmuch as the convenient way is to make the reform by doing away with the Dominion lists, I think the public will decide that the Bill is in the right direction.

Mr. MILLS. I wish to say but one word. I agree absolutely with what the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has stated, for it has never been stated in this House, to my knowledge, that the local law of Nova Scotia disfranchised Dominion officials in elections for members of this House.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Why, then, was this Act passed in 1882?

Mr. MILLS. But what was the practical operation of that law as carried out by ignorant revisers. The effect was this—when they came to the revision of the local lists, they left off a large number of these employees. And that was so generally done that it was found necessary to pass a law here to right wrongs that were being done—illegally done, for legally these employees had the right to have their names upon the lists. In the remarks I made the other afternoon, I expressly asked the House to draw the distinction between the acts that disqualified the electors from voting in Nova Scotia and the franchise law. They were two separate Acts altogether. There is a Franchise Act for Nova Scotia and also an Act disqualifying certain parties from voting for members to be returned to the parliament of Nova Scotia, but there is not an Act of Nova Scotia disqualifying any person whose name is on the local list from voting for the return of a member to this House. But, as I have said, the effect of that Act was such upon ignorant revising officers—ignorant of the law, but otherwise good men—that they disqualified these employees altogether by leaving their names off the local lists, and the Act of 1882 was passed by this Parliament, as hon. members can see who will refer to the debates of that time for the purpose of remedying that evil. The election came on and it was found that a large number of electors had been left off the lists. How could they be got on the lists unless there was a law made to place them there, and it was for that purpose that the Act was passed. The hon. Minister of Finance has put up a target, shot at it and killed it. But it was never alive. It was never stated that the province of Nova Scotia ever enacted a law disfranchising any persons in Nova Scotia from taking part in the elections of a member to this House. But I contend that the effect of this Bill that is before the House will be to disfranchise a large number of employees of the Dominion Government in Nova Scotia in Dominion elections if the Bill is not changed. I state that emphatically—that that will be the effect of the law if it is passed in its present form. But even if the Bill is carried on its second reading, I have confidence enough in the members of the Government to believe that when they see that—and some hon. members opposite do see it—they will remedy this defect. I have full confidence in the Government that they will not disfranchise people in this wholesale manner, and also that there will be a great many amendments that will perhaps make the Bill more presentable than it is at the present time.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I have never heard of such cases as those the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) has cited of Dominion officials being unable to get their names on the lists. It is entirely new to me.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I want to put my recollection against that of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), and, while I am on my feet, to do what I can to settle the question as to the reason for the legislation of this Parliament to which the hon. gentleman has referred. My recollection is the same as that of the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills), that it was because what the hon. gentleman says the law required in Nova Scotia to be done was not done, and these men who were disfranchised by the Act of the Nova Scotia legislature in the local elections, were, designedly or otherwise, left off the local lists, though, as the hon. gentleman says, had the law been carried out, they would have been there. I rise particularly, however, to show why the hon. gentleman should not be permitted to lead this House to believe that everything done in his time in Nova Scotia with regard to the local lists was above suspicion. If my recollection is right, there was great activity in 1890 on the part of his party in Nova Scotia, and the lists were attended to after a very Liberal fashion. The local legislature in 1891 took those lists as the basis for the lists then settled under the legislation of that year, and what is the result? If my information be correct, in one district in the county of Guysborough, as I am informed by those who ought to know, and who take some interest in these matters, and were affected by the facts I am going to mention—if my information be correct, under this lovely system that prevails in Nova Scotia, and that the hon. gentleman is proud of being connected with, out of a local list in the district of Larry's River, in the county of Guysborough, out of 207 names on the local lists, there are but seven who are qualified to vote in reality, or rather who were on the assessment roll.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not know the circumstances to which my hon. friend refers. But I am quite satisfied he will find the system to which he refers is based upon sound reasons, and I do not remember that that part of it was ever challenged in the House of Assembly, which was supposed to be interested in it.

Mr. McNEILL. I think the House owes a debt of gratitude to my hon. friend the Finance Minister, who has called forcibly our attention to the fact that this House, at all events, believed that it was necessary for the protection of its privileges to pass a special Act because of the course pursued by the government of the province of Nova Scotia. The hon. gentleman desires us to believe that notwithstanding all the able representatives on both sides from that province who were then in this House, this House of Commons of Canada would deliberately place on the Statute-book a senseless statute, something that was of no value whatever, and that had no reason whatever for its existence.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman has missed the point.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not think I have missed the point. I think that is exactly what the hon. gentleman was endeavouring to persuade us of, that this Act had been placed on the Statute-book without any good reason whatever. He said it was absolutely unnecessary, that it should not have been placed there.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If the hon. gentleman will permit me to make a remark—my point was that it was unnecessary, though that was not the main point. The main point was that if disqualification ever existed, it had been removed three years before the Dominion Franchise Act was passed.

Mr. McNEILL. But the hon. gentleman is not dealing with the point at all. The hon. gentleman said this Act was unnecessary, and in order that he should persuade this House of that fact, he must assume that all the representatives of his own province who were in this House had not among them sufficient ability to explain to this House the fact he has now endeavoured to place before us, and that if they did at that time lay before the House the facts that he has laid before us to-night, or the assumed facts that he has laid before us to-night, either this House was so stupid that they could not understand them, or this House behaved so improperly as to do what they knew was improper or unnecessary. Now, with regard to the other point, my hon. friend says that it was quite unnecessary that the Franchise Act of 1885 should be passed, because of his alleged statement that this Act of 1882 had already been passed. I say, Mr. Speaker, that no stronger reason could possibly be urged for the passing of that Franchise Act than the fact that this House had been obliged, in the protection of its privileges, to put this Act of 1882 on the Statute-book. What stronger argument could possibly be advanced? It may be they guarded the privileges of this House so far as that particular Act is concerned, but that did not cover the Dominion of Canada. If conduct of that kind were possible in Nova Scotia, and if this House found it necessary for the protection of its privileges, to guard itself against the action of the Government of Nova Scotia, it was equally necessary that it should guard itself against similar acts on the part of other provinces which might come into force at any time.

Mr. McISAAC. I would not say a word on this occasion were it not for the reference which the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) made to a district in the county of Guysborough. Personally, I do not know very much about it, but the hon. gentleman says that in the district of Larry's River, about the year 1890, some 207 names were put on the provincial list, and he says that he has information that only about seven of them were really qualified to go on the list.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Seven who were on the assessment roll.

Mr. McISAAC. I know nothing about it, except what the hon. gentleman says. But if this be true, his inference is that the provincial Franchise Act in Nova Scotia is unfair as compared to that of the Dominion. Now, if these statements are true, that there are only seven qualified electors in the district of Larry's River, and that 200 were on who had no right to be there, what will this House think when I say that in that same district, under the Dominion Franchise Act, about the same number got on the list, which proves that the Dominion list is no better. The hon. gentleman will remember that the Conservative candidate who ran in that county the last election, got at least seven votes in that district, as many as he says were qualified, but I am told that the Liberal member had over 100 majority, thus showing that if there was anything wrong in connection with names on the provincial list, the same wrong existed in reference to the Dominion Franchise Act. Therefore, there is no argument in the statement of the hon. gentleman. I am sure the information he gives cannot be very reliable, and I am quite sure there was no fraud or improper conduct on the part of those preparing the Dominion and local lists in Larry's River. I am glad the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) made the statement to the House, because I am aware that there were many hon. members from Ontario and elsewhere who were under the impression that the Franchise Act of Nova Scotia did disqualify Dominion officials from voting at Dominion elections. The hon. member said that revisers through ignorance left Dominion officials off the list. Perhaps it may be so in Annapolis, but in my part of the province I never knew such ignorance to exist. So far as I am concerned I would much prefer under existing conditions for party purposes to have the Franchise Act than the Bill now before the House. If the old Act were continued we could make some use of the machinery which hon. gentlemen opposite have made use of when in power. We could utilize the revising barristers and the revising barrister's clerks and so get some of the advantages the hon. gentlemen obtained. Under the Act now proposed the same advantage will be secured by hon. gentlemen opposite as by ourselves. In some districts there will be Reform and in others Conservative officers, and so one political party will not have any advantage over the other.

Bill (No. 104) respecting the Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company.—(Mr. Sutherland.)

Bill (No. 105) respecting the Montreal Island Belt Line Railway Company.—(Mr. Sutherland.)

EXAMINATION OF STATIONARY ENGINEERS.

On the order for introduction of Bill "An Act respecting the examination of stationary engineers and the inspection of steam boilers.—(Mr. Sutherland.)

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I beg to state that I propose to introduce this Bill at the request of the Association of Stationary Engineers. Owing to the point having been raised by several legal gentlemen in the House as to whether the powers contained in the Bill standing in my name come within the jurisdiction of this Parliament or are altogether within the jurisdiction of the provinces, at the suggestion of hon. members on both sides of the House the matter has been referred to the Department of Justice for an opinion. I ask that the Bill be allowed to stand until we have received the opinion of the Department of Justice.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Within what period does the hon. gentleman expect to procure the opinion of the Department of Justice? I do not see why a long time should be occupied in securing an opinion on this subject. The question was brought up on the Bill introduced by the Minister of Marine respecting engineers on steamboats, and I then alluded to the subject.

Mr. SCRIVER.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I do not think there will be any delay whatever in obtaining an opinion. My hon. friend (Mr. Sutherland) will take on his own shoulders some of the responsibility for delay, as he did not send over the Bill as quickly as he should have done.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I suggest this point for the consideration of the House, whether this course is entirely in order. We have a law officer of the Crown in this House, and no doubt he is here for the purpose of expressing from time to time his opinion on questions that may arise. But it occurs to me—although I cannot at the moment lay my hands on the authority—that the reference of a Bill or other matter direct from the House to the law officers of such, with the object of obtaining a report from them to this House, is not according to English practice. On the contrary, I believe—I am not raising the point of order, but I am merely adverting to the practice—there is authority which prevents the House obtaining the opinion of the law officers of the Crown given to the Crown. That is a confidential document, and on special occasions is submitted, with the consent of the Crown and the consent of the Government, to the House. I suggest this point; and I think it would be a pity, if that be the rule, to unintentionally violate it. Perhaps the hon. gentleman who has charge of the Bill will not be in the slightest degree prejudiced by letting this order stand until this prior question is considered, as to whether it was proper and regular to obtain the law officer's opinion and quote it in this House in regard to a Bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I understand that this course is being adopted on the suggestion of members on both sides of the House who thought an opinion might be had. Whether that will be agreed to by the House, I do not know.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I suppose the objection could be overcome by the Solicitor General stating the decision arrived at as his opinion.

Mr. SPEAKER. There is no motion before the House. As to the point raised as to taking the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, I do not understand that any question of that kind has been raised here. It was mentioned by the intended mover of the Bill that it was intended to delay the introduction of the Bill so that he could obtain a legal opinion. I do not think that the question arises now.

THE COASTING TRADE OF CANADA.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 106) to amend the Act respecting the coasting trade of Canada. He said: Early in the session, in fact during the debate on the Address, I called the attention of the Government to cases that had arisen in connection with the coasting trade on the Pacific Coast, and suggested for the consideration of the Government the propriety of amending the legislation touching the coasting trade of Canada as might be considered necessary to meet the cases that have arisen, or if not, of instructing the customs officers to act in connection with the enforcement of our coasting laws, so that our vessels might be treated in American waters as well and fairly as United States ships were treated in our waters. I am not yet without hope that the Government will deal with this question, and I quite realize that it would be entirely useless, at this stage of the session, for me to expect that this particular Bill could be considered in the ordinary way. Yet I propose to occupy the attention of the House for a short time in the hope that the views I submit may be considered by the Government and the Government may directly deal with the cases that have occurred. The Minister of the Interior will remember, and no doubt the Minister of Customs will recollect, that last fall difficulties in respect to the coasting laws of the United States arose. In connection with this subject, I have had the advantage of discussing it with Capt. Irving, the head of the Canadian Pacific Railway Navigation Company, as vessels under his control were directly affected. I propose, so as to be accurate, to make my statement rather full.

First, let me say that the way in which the case came up was this. The United States authorities put a new construction on their coasting laws so as to prevent British registered ships taking, for instance, Canadian goods, that is, goods freighted over the United States railway system from a United States port to another United States port. When the reference was made, directly or indirectly by Captain Irving to know if that was reciprocal, so far as he was able to learn from the Customs Department the action or want of action on the part of the customs authorities was not so interpreted. I have a copy of a letter written the Customs Department at Victoria by the manager of the Canadian Pacific Navigation Company, where he asks for information under this head, and says:

There is a law which prohibits an American vessel from carrying Canadian freight from an American port to a Canadian port whilst in transit from one Canadian port to another Canadian port by rail through the United States in bond. A similar law prevails in the United States.

And so on. That was as he understood it, but the answer he got from the collector of customs who had communicated with Ottawa was, among other things:

In reply I beg to state that I am not aware of any law which prohibits an American vessel carrying Canadian merchandise from an American port to a Canadian port, whilst in transit from one Canadian port to another Canadian port by rail through the United States in bond.

In other words, the statute was construed as probably all of us understood it up to this time: as merely concerning a direct shipment on the one voyage from one port of the same flag to another port of the same flag by a vessel carrying a different flag. This letter from the Customs Department is dated the 19th November, and it contains the following clause also:—

The solution of the question raised by Captain Irving is not clear until it is known what facilities will be afforded for the transfer of goods at St. Michael's for Fort Cudahy without payment of United States customs duties on goods so transferred.

The whole question being connected with the Alaskan trade as it came up in the first instance. Captain Irving wrote to the Minister of the Interior on December the 9th and he again mentioned the difficulties that are arising, and the embarrassments that are being put upon Canadian vessels by this interpretation on the part of the United States customs officers, and he quotes cases where under similar circumstances the Canadian authorities do not treat American vessels in the same way. The Minister of the Interior acknowledged that letter on December 16th, and I am merely pressing these letters upon the attention of the House to show that there has been time for the Government to reach a policy on this question, and I am in hopes that either a decision has been reached to interpret our law in the way Capt. Irving mentions, or, if that interpretation be impossible, to pass a Bill this session on the lines of the legislation now going through Congress. The Minister of the Interior, in reply to this letter, wrote on December 16th:

The subject referred to is one on which I cannot give you a positive opinion at the present time. The whole subject referred to will have to be considered and dealt with in the near future, and as it does not affect my department, I am asking the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the Minister of Customs to give it their consideration.

On December 30th, Capt. Irving wrote to the Minister of Customs:

I have to call your attention to a phase of coasting trade now carried on by the United States vessels between British ports on this coast, under a system absolutely prohibitive in the United States ports to British vessels. Canadian freight from Victoria, B.C., has been carried to Glenora, B.C., near Telegraph Creek, by United States vessels, the transshipment taking place at Fort Wrangel, a port on the United States coast of Alaska. The "Alaskan" is the name of the United States vessel which is taking these goods from Fort Wrangel to Glenora, while boats of the Pacific Coast Steamship Company, all American registered vessels, carry them from Victoria to Fort Wrangel. I refer you to section 2 of chapter 83, R. S. C., an Act respecting the coasting trade of Canada, and to section 4 of the said Act.

I may say that the views of this department under which this was allowed was no doubt that the voyage before the transshipment was one voyage, and that this double shipment was not within the strict terms of the spirit of our coasting laws. Capt. Irving continues :

The responsibility for the enforcement of our Act seems to rest solely with your department.

That is, that no private prosecutor can proceed against any one for a violation of the coasting laws ; that can be done only on the authority of the Government.

No such evasion of the principle of coasting laws is permitted in the United States, and the competition is consequently most unequal for our vessels on this coast. I do not believe a similar state of affairs is allowed anywhere on the Atlantic Coast. Should, however, by any possibility, the letter of our Coasting Act allow this overriding of the undoubted object of all such legislation, and of the spirit of our Act, which prohibits foreign vessels carrying goods "by water from one port of Canada to another," I hope you will see fit to have an amendment submitted to Parliament which will remove all doubt as to the effect of the legislation now on the Statute-book.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I understand the object of the writer there is to have prohibition against American vessels carrying goods from Victoria to Fort Wrangel.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Just the same as in a parallel case they would do with our vessels between their ports.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not see the parallel.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is a little involved, but I think I can make it clear. The law of the United States at present is under section 4347 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which reads :

No merchandise shall be transported, under penalty of forfeiture thereof, from one port of the United States to another port of the United States in a vessel belonging wholly or in part to a subject of any foreign power ; but this decision shall not be construed to prohibit the sailing of any foreign vessel from one to another port of the United States, provided no merchandise other than that imported in such vessel from some foreign port, and which shall not have been unladen, shall be carried from one port or place to another in the United States.

Now there happens to have been a case under that clause in the United States and notwithstanding this decision to which I will refer, the law is being carried out under instructions to the customs officers in the United States on the lines of the Declaratory Bill now going through Congress. The case to which I refer is the case of the United States against 250 kegs of nails, the California case, and it is as follows :—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

In the case of the United States vs. 250 kegs of nails, brought in the United States District Court for the Southern District of California, the merchandise sought to be forfeited was wholly the product and manufacture of the United States. It was shipped at New York in a Belgian vessel, consigned under regular bills of lading to a commercial house at Antwerp ; there the merchandise was discharged and landed, and was subsequently shipped on a British vessel consigned to the owners at the port of Redondo, in California, under bills of lading signed by the master of the British ship, and was carried to Redondo, where it was entered at the custom-house as a manufacture of the United States, which had been exported and was now returned to this country. The United States District Court, Judge Ross presiding, held that upon these facts the merchandise was not subject to forfeiture under the term of the above-quoted statute. This case was appealed to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, where the decision of the District Court was affirmed. (61 Federal Reporter, 410.) In the latter decision, the court, among other things says :—

"It is urged that the facts disclosed in this case amount to a palpable evasion of the statute, and that such is admitted to have been the intention of the parties to the transaction. The purpose the parties had in view can make no difference with the interpretation of the statute. They practiced no concealment or fraud upon the Government. The acts were done openly. They had the statute before them for their guidance. The unlawful act there defined was 'malum prohibitum' only. The statute left them free to ship freight from New York to Redondo in any manner they saw fit, save and except the manner therein prohibited. They followed a method not mentioned in the statute. They had a right to assume that the whole intention of Congress had been expressed in the words of the statute."

That is, the goods are just taken from one bottom and put into another at the port, although the whole shipment is really between two ports of the one country. The court here said that that clause did not provide for that, though there were two shipments, though the goods were meant to go direct to two ports ; that is, they went on one ship for one part of this journey and out of that ship to another. Although there were two separate voyages instead of one they said that this section of the United States statutes would not cover a case of that kind. And so, in the face of the keen rivalry developed on the Pacific Coast, there has been the interpretation of this section to which I refer in order to prevent Victoria vessels or British Columbia vessels getting any part of that carrying trade. But in order to prevent British Columbia vessels getting any part of that carrying trade coming to Victoria or Vancouver, the officers were instructed, before Congress began to deal with this matter at all, to treat all these cases as a violation of the Act, and to proceed against the vessels.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). Were those goods landed at a British Columbia port ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, they were landed. They were taken from one vessel and put into another, and the courts of California held that that could be done, as their statutes did not cover such a case. But the present orders of the department are based upon another construction, that it is a palpable evasion of the statute, and should not be permitted. The department regard the shipment of the goods as going inland from one port under the American flag to another port under the American flag, and are attempting to prevent any of those goods being carried for any part of that journey in any ship that does not fly the American flag. There has been a reference to another section of the statutes, section 3110, but I need not read it. The Seattle "Post-Intelligencer," of 26th January, 1898, contains a statement which corroborates what I have stated to the House. As all these matters are given prominence, wherever they may directly or indirectly worry or annoy their neighbours to the north, this paper prints this statement in large and prominent type, as follows:—

CANNOT EVADE THE TARIFF—TRANSPORTATION OF GOODS FROM ONE U. S. PORT TO ANOTHER, VIA BRITISH PORTS, BALKED BY SECRETARY SPAULDING.

The attempt to evade the United States customs regulations in their imposition of a duty at Alaska ports on Canadian goods, by purchasing outfits in Seattle, shipping them to British Columbia ports in an American bottom, and there transferring to a British bottom for their destination, has been effectually balked by the United States Government officials. As announced in a special despatch to the Post-Intelligencer from Washington, published yesterday morning, Acting Secretary Spaulding has decided that the transportation of freight in such a manner is a violation of our exporting laws, and subjects the merchandise to seizure. Section 4347 of the Revised Statutes, as amended February 15, 1893, under which this ruling is made, is as follows:—

That reads just as I have already read it.

A telegram received by the "Post-Intelligencer" yesterday from Acting Secretary Spaulding, announced that the collector of this district had been advised of the decision, and the officials at Dyea and Skagway will be at once notified.

This matter was first brought to the attention of the Treasury Department on January 14, and since then the British steamers "Danube" and "Tees" have been able to get away with freight which, under the late decision, would be subject to seizure at Dyea and Skagway.

These steamers are Canadian Pacific Navigation Company steamers. I believe the "Danube" has since been seized, libelled, and released under bonds. Then, section 3008 of the Revised Statutes is quoted, and the statement goes on:

This action has never been enforced, and that was probably the reason why it is ignored by Secretary Spaulding. That it exactly fits the present case is apparent. The shipment of goods to Victoria, Vancouver or Nanaimo would be an export. The transshipment there and subsequent landing at Dyea or Skagway would be a re-landing in the sense of section 3008, and would not only subject the goods to seizure, but persons concerned to a penalty of $400.

Then on January 24, the British Columbia papers publish a despatch from Washington, which gives the instruction of Acting Secretary Spaulding, and states that his decision was reached in a case presented by the Canadian Pacific Navigation Company. Mr. Irving, in fact, submitted in advance, very wisely, when he first heard of this trouble, a hypothetical case to a collector at one of the ports on the Sound, and this was sent to Washington for instructions. The result of that was a telegram to this effect:

The transportation of American freight from Seattle or other American ports consigned for Alaska, via Victoria, Vancouver or Nanaimo, and at those ports transferred to British vessels, is a violation of American coasting laws, and subjects the merchandise to forfeiture. General Spaulding to-day said:

This measure is one of several in course of preparation by the Treasury which seems to be called for by recent events and new conditions, to protect and develop American interests in the Pacific and Alaska.

Then he refers again to the Act of 1893, and quotes one of these sections which I have mentioned. So we find introduced into Congress this session on a message from the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Gage, a Bill amending the laws relating to navigation, Bill 3580, and Mr. Payne in introducing this Bill, says:

The object of the Bill is to protect our sea-coast trade along the Pacific Coast with Alaska. That is the sole and only object of the Bill. It happens now under existing law that a cargo of goods may be shipped from some port like Seattle to Victoria or Vancouver, for 90 miles, in an American vessel, and then the cargo taken some 900 or 1,000 miles in a foreign vessel to Alaska.

Strange to say, Mr. Payne, acting for the Administration, says that the present law permits that, whereas Acting Secretary Spaulding's ruling was that the law did not permit anything of the kind, and instructions were given accordingly to the collectors of the different ports to prevent it in every way in their power. Mr. Payne goes on to say:

The object of the Bill is to prevent that sort of thing, and to follow those cargoes shipped from the Pacific slope, in the United States, to Alaska, whether stopping at Vancouver and Victoria or not, and require that they shall be shipped in an American vessel. That is the prime object of the Bill.

Then he asks that this report from Secretary Gage be read, and in that report Secretary Gage, consistent with the action of the Acting-Secretary, treated this as a declaratory Bill, and not as Mr. Payne seemed to think, a material amendment.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Did Mr. Payne, in introducing the Bill, cite any authority in support of his position that it was lawful to tranship goods shipped from San Francisco ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, although that may be because he had not the matter as well in hand as the Administration. Undoubtedly, they put that construction upon it, and that construction of the law was being enforced at their ports when Mr. Payne made that speech. And so Secretary Gage says :

Section 1 is a stronger and more explicit statement of certain provisions of section 4347 of the Revised Statutes. It is not put in the form of an amendment of that section, as the revisers of the statutes saw fit to incorporate in that section certain legislation based on the Treaty of Washington of 1871. The present validity of that legislation has for some years been disputed, and to avoid any legislative declaration on that dispute as a part of this measure, where it is not involved, the first section is drawn independently, though in effect it amends indirectly the other portions of section 4347.

The essential amendment is in the words "or for any part of the voyage." The question has recently been put to the Treasury whether American goods consigned to Alaskan ports from Seattle can be carried in American vessels to Victoria, a distance of only 72 miles, and at Victoria be put on British vessels to be carried to Dyea, a distance of 900 miles, or to St. Michael's, a distance of about 2,000 miles. The Treasury Department has ruled that this is a violation of the laws reserving the coasting trade to American vessels. It is a palpable evasion of those laws, but in some quarters doubt is expressed whether the courts will not decide, as they did in the case of a shipment of a cargo of nails from New York to Antwerp by a foreign vessel—

He refers to this very case I have mentioned.

—and thence to San Francisco by another foreign vessel, that the law had been successfully evaded, not violated. That decision led to the amendment of the Revised Statutes, section 4347, by the Act of February 15, 1893, prohibiting shipment "via a foreign port." That amendment, however, does not, perhaps, fully cover the transaction here referred to. The policy of the United States is to confine carrying by water for the whole voyage between American ports to American vessels. It is believed that section explicitly affirms that policy and removes all doubt.

That is all, I think, that is material in this memo. from the Secretary of the Treasury. The rest refers to other subjects which have been already discussed. Now, our coasting Act is as much capable of that construction as the section of the United States laws to which I have referred. I am not quarrelling with the United States policy, for I see nothing unfriendly in it at all. The difficulty I have endeavoured to point out is, that this construction has suddenly been put upon that statute, owing to a change in the state of affairs that has arisen on the coast, and that construction is being enforced, whereas on our side we are going on in the good-natured way in which both governments were proceeding before. Our statute says :

No goods or passengers shall be carried by water from one port of Canada to another except in British ships.

Under similar language in the United States law, the United States authorities declare that that cannot be done, either directly or indirectly. The law cannot be evaded by using an American bottom for a short part of the trip, and then transshipping into a foreign bottom at a foreign port for the rest of the journey. The United States contend that the trade between the two American ports should be carried by American vessels and they are going on perfecting and enforcing their laws on that line. The spirit of our Act is equally that the trade between two Canadian ports should be carried by British bottoms ; and I feel satisfied that if this subject is carefully looked into, there will be no hesitation on the part of our Government—if the statute will bear the construction I think it possibly may now bear—in sending to our collectors similar instructions with regard to foreign vessels that the United States have sent to their collectors.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Will the hon. gentleman give a concrete case to show what he wants ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I could not do better than mention the case which actually occurred, and which yet is a case of the kind in which our collectors will not, and have not, interfered. I refer to the case of the steamer "Alaskan," a United States vessel, which took goods from Fort Wrangel to Glenora, while the boats of the Pacific Coast Steamship Company, all American registered vessels, carried them from Victoria to Fort Wrangel. By means of this transshipment at Wrangel, they so arranged that their vessels carried those Canadian goods all the way between Victoria and Glenora, two Canadian ports.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). If the case were reversed, and if our law were exactly the same as the American law, would the hon. gentleman think that the American law, enforced as it is now being enforced, would prevent the transaction he refers to ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have already said that I have not formed a very strong opinion on that point. I think myself, that the construction which the United States Treasury has put upon their existing law would be supported by the courts.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Supposing it were supported by the courts, the hon. gentleman will know that the shipment from Victoria to Wrangel is a shipment from a Canadian port to an American port. If our law is precisely the same as the American law, and the same interpretation be put upon it as they are putting on theirs, would it prevent the transaction the hon. gentleman refers to ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think it would. If my memory is right, the way in which the thing is done is this. The goods are billed, for instance, from Victoria to Glenora. Glenora is put at the bottom of the bill of lading.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Supposing they were billed first to Wrangel, and then from Wrangel to Glenora ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not know that the courts would care much about the manner in which they were billed, if they got right to the bottom of the transaction and found it was a bona fide shipment of goods from a Canadian port to a Canadian port. I think there is a good deal in the view that our legislation would carry us far enough to meet the case, and if that be so, there is no necessity for this Bill; but that is a point the ship-owners wish to have referred to the Justice Department. Mr. Irving made a very practical suggestion in December, that if the Justice Department thought this was not a construction that could be put upon our Act, we should obtain the necessary legislation declaring that to be the meaning of the law. So that, in order that this Bill may receive the earliest consideration, and not in the expectation that a Bill in the hands of a private member can be advanced into law at this session, even if it had met with the approval of the Government, as a public Bill, I would ask leave to introduce this Bill.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Will the hon. gentleman state shortly the substance of what is proposed by that Bill ? I was otherwise occupied, and unable to catch what he said at the moment.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not know whether it would be better to make this a declaratory Bill, but have not done so, and do not see much difference, provided the object is attained. The first clause provides :

Section 2 of the Act respecting the coasting trade of Canada, being chap. 83 of the Revised Statutes, is hereby repealed and the following substituted therefor :—

No goods or passengers shall be carried by water from one port of Canada to another port of Canada, either for the whole voyage or for any part of the voyage, except in British ships; and if any goods or passengers are so carried, as aforesaid, contrary to this Act, the master of the ship or vessel so carrying the same shall incur the penalty of four hundred dollars, and any goods so carried shall be forfeited, as smuggled, and such ship or vessel may be detained by the collector of customs at any port or place to which such goods or passengers are brought, until such penalty is paid, or security for the payment therefor given to his satisfaction, and until such goods are delivered up to him, to be dealt with as goods forfeited under the provisions of "The Customs Act."

This is the old section re-enacted, with the interpolation of the words "port of Canada either for the whole voyage or for any part of the voyage." Then, I add the following subsection :—

Nothing in this section shall be construed to prohibit the carrying from one port of Canada to another port of Canada, in a ship other than a British ship, of goods which have been imported in such ship from a foreign port, and have not been unladen at a port of Canada.

Because, of course, we do not aim at disturbing any vessel arriving with goods, where the cargo is not unladen or broken.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This is obviously a Bill which under certain circumstances might be very important, and, of course, I have no intention of expressing any opinion upon it now. I merely rose to ascertain if I understood the observations of the hon. mover correctly. I tried to follow them. If I understood the hon. gentleman right, the transportation companies in British Columbia—very properly—tried to get as much of the carrying trade in goods going north as they could, and it was suggested that goods might be carried from San Francisco or Tacoma or Seattle or any of the American ports on their way north and landed at Victoria and there be transhipped from the American vessel to the British vessel which should carry them forward. It struck me, when the matter came before me at first, that there might be some difficulties in that way. Much as we would like, and as I am sure, every member of the House would like to facilitate anything that could transfer the carrying trade to our own bottoms, there is an initial difficulty at Victoria. How could you send the goods from San Francisco to Victoria and tranship them there ? There is no treaty between United States and Great Britain enabling that to be done, nor is there any statute that I know of. When goods are carried from San Francisco to Victoria, when they enter the port of Victoria they must be legally entered I should imagine. I do not see how that could be overcome. I would be glad if the hon. gentleman would suggest some means to overcome it. As soon as a ship arrives at Victoria, the collector at the port must say : Under the law, if you land this freight here you must pay duty. How can I take your word, or what authority have I for allowing these goods to be transhipped ? There is no treaty under which you can tranship goods and forward them.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. They come through in bond.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I would like to call my hon.

friend's attention to that. If he will turn to the Treaty of Washington, he will find that the bonding privileges do not extend to goods arriving by sea, and, therefore, the treaty does not provide for bonding goods from San Francisco, Seattle or Tacoma to Victoria.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is nothing to prevent them doing it if they choose.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I would be very glad to be informed how that could be reached.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not claim that we can force or compel the United States to change the course they are taking. On the contrary, I said that we could not even complain of their action. But I said also that if that was so and they choose that course, there is only one thing for us to do, and that is not to allow them to take everything. We certainly could prevent American ships carrying between our ports Victoria and Glenora.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I should think that there would be no room for difference of opinion except for the point I have raised, which, however, is of the utmost importance. There should be no difficulty about the proper construction of our Act as there ought to be no difficulty about the construction of the American Act. But an important case in which a difficulty might arise would be in the case of goods from Victoria to Glenora to be transhipped, under treaty rights, at Fort Wrangel. We have the right to carry from Victoria to Glenora and an American ship has not. Without expressing a definite opinion upon a matter which has not come before me, I take it that there can be no reasonable doubt about that point.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is what the Bill means, but at present, the practice is different.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The goods when shipped from one point in British territory to another cannot be carried in American ships. We are at one in the matter, I fancy.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. But what is necessary is to get the construction formally put on the present Act and instructions sent out in accordance with it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We have been considering the matter. Of course, our object is to give our own transportation companies fair-play and to secure for them as large a share of this trade as possible.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. If I followed the hon. gentleman his statement was, that a certain ruling of the department had been given and action taken upon it; but the statute was not strong enough to bear it, and legislation has been introduced in the form of a declaratory Act to give the necessary power?

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In the United States.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Exactly, and now he proposes to make our law stronger?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If it requires amendment.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. And he is adding the same words that they are adding—"part of a voyage"?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. If I followed the hon. gentleman right, while the Treasury Department made that ruling in the California case, they had not the statutory authority for what they did?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Quite so.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Then the hon. gentleman does not blame the Customs Department of Canada, under the wording of our statute which is similar in its language?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have been arguing that the decision in the California case was not sound and that that was the view practically taken by the Washington authorities. They have, in fact, ignored it. So far as that is concerned, I said that construction had stood only until this excitement, as we may call it, arose on the Pacific, and then in the close competition, the authorities at Washington looked into the matter and ignored the construction put upon the statute in the California case, and gave their law what I do not think should be called an extreme construction. They are following that by a declaratory Act, and all I want is that we shall see if our Act will bear that construction, and, if not, follow it with a declaratory Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DINING CARS ON THE I. C. R.

Mr. McMULLEN asked,

How many dining cars are on the Intercolonial Railway? How many are kept in operation? What was the gross expenditure, including wages, supplies, &c., during the last year, and what were the gross receipts?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). There were no dining cars on the Intercolonial Railway previous to the opening of the Montreal Extension on the 1st March, but there are now three cars, being combined dining and restaurant cars in operation, and have been in operation since the 1st March. The cost of fitting up these cars was $7,321.97; the cost of equipping them was $2,528.06; the cost of operating them from the 1st to the 22nd instant, $913; gross earnings during same period, $655.55.

LIQUOR PERMITS IN THE YUKON.

Mr. FOSTER asked,

Has a permit or permits to take whisky in the Yukon district been granted to one Chambers, or to Chambers & Chisholm, of Oak Lake, Manitoba, by either the Government of the Dominion or the North-west Territories? If so, for what amount was the permit granted?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). A permit to take 1,000 gallons of whisky into the Yukon district was issued, by the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories, to William Chambers, of Oak Lake, Manitoba. No permit has been issued to Chambers & Chisholm, of Oak Lake, Manitoba. I may add that this information now appears for the fourth time on the "Hansard" this session, and I hope hon. gentlemen opposite will be able to assimilate it so as to avoid the necessity of asking the question again.

Mr. WALLACE. Myself and a number of members about me, although listening attentively, could not hear the statement made by the Minister of the Interior. I think the members of this House are entitled to have a statement made in such a manner that they can hear it. I would therefore ask that the Minister of the Interior read the statement again.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I will not throw any doubt upon the remark which the hon. gentleman has made. I am of course bound to accept his statement that he did not hear what I said. But if he did not hear it, if he will look back at "Hansard" a few days ago, he will get the information twice repeated on the same day. It now appears on the "Hansard" for the fourth time during this session. I am not aware that I am under any obligation to repeat from day to day information which has already been conveyed to the House.

INFANTRY COMPANY, MORRIS, MANITOBA.

Mr. LaRIVIERE asked,

Will the request of Capt. Geo. P. Bliss, to be authorized to form an infantry company in the town of Morris, province of Manitoba, be granted?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Bordon). I beg to reply to the hon. gentleman that the matter is under consideration. But I may add for his information, that the granting of the request of Capt. Bliss would involve an increase in the establishment of the militia, an increase to the numerical strength of the militia, and therefore would involve an increase of the annual vote.

STATISTICAL BRANCH, DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. HEYD asked,

1. What is the number of persons at present employed in the Statistical Branch of the Department of Agriculture?

2. Upon what work have they been engaged during the past six months?

3. What was the total cost of the branch, including salaries, for the past fiscal year?

4. Is Mr. George Johnson still the Dominion statistician, so-called, and the chief of this branch?

5. What is Mr. Johnson's salary?

6. About what date will it be necessary to begin to prepare for the taking of the forthcoming decennial census?

7. If Mr. Johnson is still the chief of this branch, will it be his duty to take charge of the next census?

8. Is Mr. George Johnson the same person who was frequently denounced in Parliament and in the Liberal press for active and offensive partisanship?

9. Is it the intention to reorganize the Statistical Branch of the Department of Agriculture?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). 1. Eight. 2. The work includes the Statistical Year Book, Criminal Statistics and General Statistics. 3. For the fiscal year 1896-97, $22,844.89, made up as follows:—

General statistics.....	$4,237 55
Manitoba census.....	1,873 35
Criminal statistics	1,509 67
Statistical Year Book.....	7,573 82
Salaries of permanent staff.....	7,650 50

$22,844 89

4. Mr. George Johnson, who was appointed statistician of the Department of Agriculture in 1889, still holds that position and is chief of the Statistical Branch. 5. $2,400 per annum. 6. A small amount will have to be placed in the Estimates to be submitted in 1899 for preliminary work. 7. As to who will take charge of the next census, that will be determined by the department when the work comes up. 8. While I cannot state definitely, my impression is that it is the same. 9. The question has not yet been considered.

TELEGRAPH LINE, COUNTY OF CHICOUTIMI.

Mr. MARCOTTE asked,

1. How much has the building of the Government telegraph line cost between St. Alexis and Anse St. Jean, county of Chicoutimi?

2. Who had the contract for furnishing the posts, and what is the amount of the contract?

3. What amount has been paid to the contractor ?

4. Who had the contract for placing the posts and what is the price of this contract ?

5. What is the amount that has been paid for this last work ?

6. Were tenders asked for these works ?

7. What is the length of the said telegraph line between St. Alexis and Anse St. Jean ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. $4,509.76. 2. The poles were supplied by H. Tremblay, of Anse St. Jean, and J. N. Savard, of St. Alexis, for $1.50 per pole. 3. Mr. Tremblay has received $960 and Mr. Savard $955.50. 4. The contract for placing the poles, the insulators, &c., &c., was given to Elzéar Boivin at the rate of $50 per mile. 5. The total amount paid to Mr. Boivin is $2,003.13. 6. An estimate was made by the department of the cost of construction and the parties above named were asked to submit a tender. In the case of the construction of the line the tender first made, which was $60, was reduced by the department to $50 and the agreement made on that basis. 7. 40 1-16 miles.

MRS. ROSS, TELEGRAPH OPERATOR.

Mr. GILLIES asked,

1. When were Mrs. Ross's services as telegraph operator at North-east Margaree, Inverness county, Cape Breton, dispensed with by the Government ?

2. How long was she in the employ of the Government as telegraph operator ?

3. Was she dismissed from her position, and if so, why ?

4. Were any complaints lodged against her in the department or with any member of the Government ? If so, by whom, and what were the complaints ?

6. Was an investigation held into the complaints, and if so, where, when, and by whom ?

6. Who is Mrs. Ross's successor as telegraph operator at North-east Margaree, and when appointed, and by whom recommended ?

7. What salary was paid Mrs. Ross, and what salary is being paid her successor ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. 14th January, 1898. 2. Since the 1st January, 1889. 3, 4, and 5. Miss Ross was relieved of her duties on grounds deemed sufficient by the department. No investigation was deemed necessary. 6. Duncan J. Ross succeeded Miss Ross, on the 14th January, 1898, on recommendation of the Minister of Public Works. 7. The salary paid in both cases is a commission of 25 per cent on Government line tolls guaranteed to a minimum of $50.

WHARF AT MACKAY'S POINT.

Mr. GILLIES asked,

1. Were tenders called for the building of the public wharf or pier at Mackay's Point, Inverness county, Cape Breton ?

Mr. MARCOTTE.

2. Who were the persons that tendered for this work, and the amount of each tender ?

3. Has the contract for this work been awarded, and if so, to whom, and what was the amount of the successful tenderer ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Mackay's Point is known to the department as Judique, and tenders were called for a wharf at the latter place. 2. The following tenders were received :—

Simmons & Burpee, Gibson, N.B....	$14,143
Donald McDonald, Centennial, Inverness county	15,000
J. B. McManus, Memramcook, N.B...	15,435

McDonald & Moffatt, Sydney, N.S..	17,550
Heney & Smith, Ottawa.....	18,123
John D. Reid, James W. Chisholm, Pugwash, N.S.....	19,545

3. Yes. The contract was given to the lowest tenderers, Messrs. Simmons & Burpee, for $14,143.

BREAKWATER, SUMMERSIDE HARBOUR.

Mr. POWELL asked,

Were tenders asked for for the construction of a breakwater at Summerside Harbour, P.E.I., and if so, what are the names of the persons who tendered, and the amounts of their respective tenders ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The contract has not yet been awarded to any of these tenderers, therefore it is not in the public interest to make the amount of the tenders known.

MAILS BETWEEN GOLDEN, B.C., AND ST. EUGENE.

Mr. FOSTER asked,

Who is the mail carrier between Golden, British Columbia, and St. Eugène ? How many times per week does he travel the route ? What does he get per year, and when did he receive the contract ? Who was the former contractor, and what the amount of his contract ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). I must ask the hon. gentleman to make a motion covering the papers.

Mr. FOSTER. There are no papers asked for.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am aware there are no papers ; but to answer these questions put here categorically would be quite misleading. I am desirous of having the fullest information furnished, and if the hon. gentleman will give notice of motion for a return, I will see that when the House takes up unopposed motions, it will be allowed to be carried at once.

THE MOHAWKS.

Mr. FOSTER asked,

1. Since what period has the Department of Indian Affairs withdrawn its grant towards payment of medical services to the Mohawks of the Bay of Quinté band ?

2. Who, at the time of the withdrawal, were the medical attendants of the band ?

3. How has the band been provided with medical services since, and who have been the attendants ?

4. Has any change been made by the Government in the personnel of the attendants since July, 1896, and if so, what ?

5. Has any change, if any, been made on the recommendation of the band or in opposition thereto ?

6. Why has such change, if any, been made ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. Since the 1st of July, 1892. 2. John Newton, M.D., and G. A. Whitman, M.D. 3. The service has been paid for from the funds of the band. Doctors Newton and Whitman continued to be the attendants until April, 1897. In that month the latter resigned, and Dr. John Moore was appointed to succeed him ; and on the 28th November last, Dr. Hicks replaced Dr. Newton. 4. The answer to the third question covers the fourth question. 5. (a). Dr. Moore was appointed on the recommendation of the Indian Council, vice Dr. Whitman, resigned. (b). Objection has been taken at a council of the band to the removal of Dr. Newton. 6. (a). Dr. Whitman resigned. (b). Dr. Newton was removed in consequence of political partisanship.

THE TRENT VALLEY CANAL.

Mr. CORBY asked,

Did the Minister of Railways and Canals write a letter to W. H. Biggar, Esq., of Belleville, or any other person, during the month of February last, promising to place a very substantial increase of money in the Estimates of this year in aid of the construction of the Trent Valley Canal, and if so, whether such letter will be laid on the Table of the House ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I am afraid I shall have to decline to make either an acknowledgment or a denial as to the contents of confidential communications which may pass between myself and a friendly correspondent. I cannot, therefore, accede to the hon. gentleman's request to lay on the Table any letter or communication which may have passed between myself and the gentleman named.

THE ASSISTANT INSPECTOR OF CUSTOMS, QUEBEC.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked,

1. Has the Minister of Customs received charges of misconduct, on the part of the Assistant Inspector of Customs in the province of Quebec, preferred by Dr. Ennis ?

2. If so, when were these charges received ?

3. If any action has been taken on these charges, what is it ?

4. Is it proposed to investigate these charges, if any has been preferred ?

5. If charges have been preferred, what are they ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). 1. The Minister of Customs has received charges of political partisanship, during the Dominion general election of June, 1896, against the Assistant Inspector of Customs for the province of Quebec, preferred by Dr. Ennis. 2. The 2nd of March, 1898. 3. No action has been taken on the charges so far. 4. The question of instituting an investigation into the charges is under consideration. 5. The answer to this is contained in reply to question No. 1.

WHARF AT ST. ANICET.

Mr. BERGERON asked,

1. How much did the wharf at St. Anicet cost when built ?

2. How much has been spent on it since ?

3. Is it true that a pier is to be built in the spring of 1893 ?

4. How much has been promised for such pier ?

5. Will the works be given by tender ?

6. Who was the keeper of the wharf until 1897 ?

7. Who is now ?

8. Why was Mr. Masson replaced ?

9. What is the amount of tolls collected by Mr. Dupuis ?

10. On whose recommendation was Mr. Dupuis appointed, and by whom ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. Cost of construction in 1862, $1,920.50. 2. Repairs, 1889-93, $709.65 ; reconstruction, 1893-94, $1,725.35. 3. Yes. 4. $3,000 were voted by Parliament at its last session for a wharf wing, or return, at the outer end, and repairs. 5. The work is to be done by day labour. 6. There was no regular keeper of the wharf until it was transferred to the Department of Marine and Fisheries on the 28th August, 1896. 7. Mr. S. Dupuis. 8. Mr. Masson was never put in charge either by the Department of Public Works or by the Department of Marine and Fisheries. 9. No statement of collection has been received from the wharfinger, but he has been called upon by the Department of Marine and Fisheries to forward a statement. 10. By the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

THE PARLIAMENT GROUNDS.

Mr. TAYLOR asked,

1. Was N. Robertson, superintendent of Parliament grounds, dismissed ? If so, when, and for what cause ?

2. Were tenders asked for the work he used to do ?

3. If so, who was the successful tenderer ?

4. What was the amount of his tender ?
5. Did he comply with the terms of the office ?
6. If not, in what respect, if any, were the specifications not complied with ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. N. Robertson was relieved of his duties as superintendent of the Parliament grounds in August, 1889, when it was decided by the then Minister of Public Works, under the authority of Council, to execute by contract the work of taking care of the grounds, which had hitherto been performed by day labour under the superintendence of Mr. Robertson. 2. 3 and 4. No tenders were asked when the contract was first made in 1889, Mr. Robertson being given the work for one year at $6,000, but in June, 1890, public tenders were asked, and Mr. Robertson, being the only tenderer, was awarded the contract for three years at the price of $5,600 per year. This contract was extended for three years without tender up to the 1st July, 1896. In December, 1896, public tenders were called for, the lowest being that of J. N. Grieves, and that tender was accepted. 5 and 6. He carried out the contract and the extensions thereof in accordance with the specification.

GATES ON THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

•Mr. DECHENE asked,

Whether tenders were called for, for the construction of gates on the Intercolonial Railway in 1897 ? If so, who made the lowest tender, and what was the price paid per gate ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Yes, tenders were called for the construction of gates on the Intercolonial Railway for the year 1897. Charles McNeil's, of New Glasgow, N.S., tender was the lowest. The price paid per gate was about $1.89.

POSTMASTER AT PICTOU, N.S.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked,

1. Did the hon. the Postmaster General or the hon. the Minister of Public Works make or cause to be made a proposal or intimation that the postmaster at Pictou, N.S., should be janitor as well, and live in the post office building, accepting rent, fuel, &c., in lieu of janitor's salary ?

2. Did the hon. the Postmaster General or the hon. the Minister of Public Works, on or about October, 1896, propose this or any arrangement of this character ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. Yes. 2. Yes.

HARBOUR OF REFUGE, ASPY BAY, N.S.

Mr. BETHUNE asked,

1. Has the Government come to any decision as to the making of a harbour of refuge at

Mr. TAYLOR.

Aspy Bay, Victoria county, N.S. ? If so, what is it ? Will the report of the engineer on this proposed work be soon laid on the Table of the House ?

2. When will a wharf be built at Seymour Point, Victoria county, N.S., for which a sum of money was voted last session ?

3. Will a wharf be built at Iona, Victoria county, N.S., this year, and at what estimated cost ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. No, not yet. 2. Plan and specification in course of preparation. 3. Until the Supplementary Estimates are brought down, I am not in a position to answer.

ROADMASTER AT RIVER DU LOUP— PATRICK LAVRY.

Mr. DECHENE asked,

Whether the Government paid the costs of the inquiry instituted in the case of Patrick Lavry, foreman at St. Louise Station, then roadmaster at River du Loup, and if so, to whom ; was Lavry's lawyer also paid, and if so, how much ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The Intercolonial Railway paid Mr. J. E. Bedard for services and expenses in the case of Patrick Lavry. Lavry's lawyer has not been paid by the railway.

PACIFIC CABLE FROM BRITISH COLUMBIA TO AUSTRALIA.

Mr. BEATTIE asked,

Is it the intention of the Government to take any action towards securing the laying of a cable from British Columbia to Australia, thereby completing the Imperial circle of telegraphic communication ?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). That matter is now under the consideration of the Government.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the notices of motion are called, I would suggest that in order to save time, we should go through the list and take the unopposed motions. I would ask the Government not to order motions to stand where there is no disposition to discuss them, but simply to have the papers brought down. A number of motions have been requested by the Government to stand in cases which it is considered important that we should have the information at once.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I do not think the last time this course was adopted the Government asked any undiscussed motions to stand.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think it was done because the Minister of the particular department happened not to be in the House.

THE VETERINARY INSPECTORS.

Mr. MONTAGUE moved for :

Return giving : (a) Names of Dominion veterinary or live stock inspectors appointed by the Government or the Minister of Agriculture since 13th July, 1896, with date of appointment in each case, and names of parties recommending them for appointment.

(b.) The amount of salary or allowance at which each of such has been appointed.

(c.) Copy of instructions issued by the Minister of Agriculture to such inspectors.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I observe that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) asked for the names of parties recommending the appointments. There will be a discussion on that and the hon. gentleman must let the motion stand or amend it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. There will be no discussion so far as I am concerned.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. It is not information which I think we should be called upon to give, and there will undoubtedly be discussion.

Mr. MONTAGUE. In view of what the Minister of Agriculture said last year, I thought he would be glad to give the names.

Mr. SPEAKER. The motion stands.

DISMISSAL OF NAPOLEON ALAIN, POSTMASTER.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Bergeron) moved for :

Copies of all Orders in Council, papers, depositions, reports, documents, &c., in relation to the dismissal of Napoléon Alain as postmaster of L'Ancienne-Lorette, and also copies of all instructions given by the department of the Postmaster General or any officers thereof, to the post office inspector in Quebec, or to any other officer thereof in relation to the giving of evidence in an action by the said Napoléon Alain versus one Frederic Belleau for damages.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). The hon. gentleman must understand that if this motion passes at all it cannot be construed as covering confidential communications between the officers of the department.

Mr. FOSTER. That, I think, is always understood.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. That is understood distinctly. I mention it now so that there will be no misunderstanding.

Motion agreed to.

THE YUKON TERRITORY—CUSTOMS REGULATIONS.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved for :

Copies of all reports to His Excellency the Governor General, minutes of Council, reports, papers and correspondence in any way relating to the navigation of the Yukon or Stikine rivers, or to customs regulations in connection therewith, including the transshipment of cargoes ; also all reports to His Excellency the Governor General, minutes of Council, correspondence and papers touching the customs regulations and fees imposed in connection with Canadian goods passing through St. Michael's, Dyea, Skagway and Wrangell.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I think the hon. gentleman had better let that stand. There are negotiations now pending, and it may be impossible to bring down what he asks for.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Of course, I know that there may be correspondence on that subject that it would not be convenient to bring down ; but the Government will have to exercise their own discretion as to that. We would like to have all the information that can be brought down.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Perhaps ten days hence the hon. gentleman might get fuller information.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. On that understanding, the motion might go.

Motion agreed to.

DISMISSAL OF JAMES M. AITKEN.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's) moved for :

Copies of all correspondence, Orders in Council and petitions with the names attached thereto, relative to the dismissal of James M. Aitken, sub-collector of customs at the outport of Montague, Prince Edward Island, together with reasons for which he was dismissed ; also copies of all applications for his position and names of parties applying therefor, and by whom recommended ?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). If the hon. gentleman wants to get this passed, the last phrase, after the word "dismissed," ought to be omitted ; otherwise it will have to stand.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's). I am willing to have it amended in that way, if I cannot get the whole information.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

PUBLIC WORKS AT MISTASSINI AND ST. METHODE.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Bergeron) moved for :

Copies of all instructions, correspondence, &c., in relation to the construction of wharfs at Mistassini and St. Méthode de Tékouabé ; a detailed statement showing the quantity of timber, iron and stone used in the said works ; by whom the said articles were furnished ; the prices paid therefor to each person ; the names of the carpenters and framers employed and the prices paid them per day, and how much was received in cash by them, as also by the day labourers who worked with them ; all other expenditure in relation to the said works ; copies of all correspondence in relation to the contracts awarded to Messrs. Tétu & Savard, of St. Félicien, for making timber for the St. Méthode wharf ; copies of the said contracts and of all further correspondence as to presenting payment of their accounts ; a statement of the quantity of timber prepared by them, and of the amount paid to them personally.

Copies of instructions issued to J. B. Carboneau, chief carpenter at the Mistassini and Ste. Méthode wharfs ; correspondence as to cancelling of his instructions at St. Méthode and the appointment of a chief carpenter in his place.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). The hon. gentleman in whose name this motion appears is not in his place, and I presume that the hon. gentleman who has moved the motion for him is not in a position to say whether he can assure the House that there is good reason for asking for all this information. I wish to call attention to this fact, that in many of these cases returns are being moved for which will involve very considerable expense in their preparation, more, I think, than the House should be asked to order ; unless the hon. member is prepared to say, on his responsibility, that he has good ground for pressing that this expenditure should be incurred. We do not want to refuse any information, but the House will agree that where returns are moved for which will necessarily involve a great deal of time and expense in their preparation, hon. gentlemen who move for them should give some reasons for their action.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Better let the motion stand.

Mr. BERGERON. I wish to say that I do not know anything at all about the motion, but my hon. friend from Montmorency asked me to move it.

Motion allowed to stand.

THE UNITED STATES VESSEL
"FREDERICK J. GERRING."

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER moved for :

Copies of all reports to His Excellency, Orders in Council, papers and correspondence, record of the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada referring to the condemnation and release of the United States fishing vessel "Frederick J. Gerring."

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I have no objection to the motion carrying, but of course the hon. gentleman understands that the correspondence is going on now.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I thought it was concluded.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We have received a communication from the United States authorities to-day, and I have made a report to Council in reply, a very lengthy one. That leaves the case pending.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The motion may pass, and it will be understood that only such papers will be brought down as are ready.

Motion agreed to.

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE—STAFF AND EMPLOYEES.

Mr. TYRWHITT (by Sir Charles Tupper) moved for :

Return showing : (a) The names and appointments of members of the staff and employees of the Royal Military College of Canada who have been struck off the strength between the 30th June, 1896, and 31st December, 1897.

(b) The corresponding dates.

(c) The respective conditions of engagement as regards duration.

(d) The respective lengths of service completed.

(e) The respective retiring allowances, if any, granted.

(f) The grounds upon which the respective grants were made, and the principles regulating them, with explanation of variation, if any.

(g) The appointments which having been vacated have since been refilled, with dates thereof.

(h) The extra public expenditure involved by the respective new appointments other than those caused by deaths, including travelling, lodging and all other charges met or to be met on this account.

(i) In cases of vacancies caused by death, the amounts granted to the families of the deceased employees.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Stand.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Do I understand that there is any objection to this ?

Mr. LANDERKIN. Several hon. gentlemen wish to speak upon it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Would it not be better to speak upon it when the papers come down ? I have made an appeal to forward the business of the House and have asked that the Government should not prevent motions of this kind, motions that are simply designed to elicit information, being carried. I hope my hon. friend (Mr. Landerkin) will allow this information to be brought down.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Since the hon. leader of the Opposition desires it, I waive any objection.

Motion agreed to.

GOLDEN TO ST. EUGENE, B.C., MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask permission of the House and of the Postmaster General (Mr.

Mulock) to move a motion which was embodied in my request to which the hon. gentleman objected on account of some technicalities connected with it. I suppose that as he has given me the assurance that he will bring down the information, there would be no objection to moving it at this stage. I therefore move :

For copies of all correspondence, reports, Orders in Council, tenders, if any, or papers relating to the carrying of the mail between Golden, B.C., and St. Eugene since July, 1896, the number of trips made by each carrier and the amount paid to each.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). All I told the hon. gentleman was that if he made a motion, I would see to it that there was no objection taken, no delay, so far as I could help it, in the adoption of the motion and the production of the papers. I meant just what I said. I do not know whether the wording of the motion covers all the papers that ought to be produced, and, if the hon. gentleman will give notice of the motion or give me a memorandum of what he desires, I will facilitate his getting the information. I am not speaking to delay him, but in order that there should be substantial production with the papers dealing with the matter.

Mr. FOSTER. I have asked for all the papers.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not know from hearing what has been read what is desired.

Mr. FOSTER. I will send the hon. Minister (Mr. Mulock) the copy of the motion I have read.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Better give notice of motion.

Mr. FOSTER. We shall never reach it again this session.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Having read what the hon. gentleman proposes, I have no objection to the motion.

Motion agreed to.

FREE AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS.

Mr. DAVIN moved :

That good faith on the part of the present Government with the farmers of the North-west should compel them to place agricultural implements on the free list.

He said : This motion is one in which the farmers of the North-west Territories, and probably more than the farmers of the North-west Territories, take a deep interest. I wish to say, first of all, that I approach this motion in the character of a protectionist, and I see no reason whatever why the strongest protectionist in Canada should not vote for this motion. It is seconded by my hon. friend from South Leeds (Mr. Taylor). I want also to say, in order to meet some of my independent friends on the other side and some of the Patrons ; this motion is not a vote of want of confidence in the Government. A vote of want of confidence in the Government is taken on a motion to go into committee, or when you traverse some other motion of the Government. But this motion is not a motion, technically and in the proper sense, implying a want of confidence, so that there is no reason why my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Rogers) or any other independent gentleman should not vote for it when we come to a vote, whether to-day or to-morrow, the next day or next week. Because the time will come, as the Greeks said of death, to-morrow, the next day, or the day after. When we come to a vote I hope that we shall not see Ministers sliding up the gangway to interview the Patrons and the independent members. And if they do I hope they won't succeed, as they succeeded in 1896, and in 1897, and once again this very session. It is a humiliating spectacle. Once it was the Postmaster General who did this, another time it was the Minister of Agriculture, and lately it was the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Why, Sir, I see the Postmaster General is at it again. Now, Sir, after the leader of the Opposition, I believe that I may say with truth that I have, at an earlier period than any other man in this House, advocated protection for the Dominion of Canada. I am a thorough believer in protection. Now, let me explain what scientific protection is. I understand that some manufacturers throughout the country, when they see in my name a motion like this, think that there is inconsistency on my part, or inconsistency on the part of hon. gentlemen who might vote for me. Why, Sir, this motion says in the first place that the Government, in order to keep good faith with the farmers of the North-west, should place agricultural implements on the free list. If I prove that the Government promised the people of the North-west, held out language to the people of the North-west that sounded as a promise, that they would get implements on the free list, is there any man listening to me who is not bound to vote for that motion ? Now, I want to explain what protection is. Protection does not mean that we are bound to put a duty on all articles that we manufacture in Canada. What protection means is this : That in regard to any industry that will flourish naturally in Canada, it is the duty of the Government to protect them from the foreigner until they get strong enough to fight unaided the world at large. The moment they get strong enough—protection does not say that you are going to put high duties on to keep outside competition away—to fight outside competition, then the protection may be withdrawn. In regard to this very article in this motion, what do we find? Why, Mr. Speaker, the truth about it is this: The Conservative party has done a great work for Canada and for these manufacturers. Before the Conservative party came into power in 1878, the implement manufacturers were in a sickly, in a poverty-stricken, in a helpless position. But after the Conservative party protected them, they not only made implements as good as were made in any other part of the world, they not only made them cheaper—which is one of the ends protection aims at—but they grew rich, and they grew able to fight the world in outside markets. My hon. friends on the opposite side of the House have again and again pointed out how these very manufacturers we are dealing with now, are able to send their goods to Australia, to the United States, to Great Britain, and to compete with all-comers in those markets, and we rejoice at it. I do not mention that in envious tones, or with a view of doing any harm to these manufacturers. On the contrary, I glory in it, because it is one of the results of a sound and wise policy on the part of the protectionist Government that was in power for so long, and with such great and happy results from this country. I take no stock in what the Prime Minister said on the 12th of October last, in Montreal. It was like one of the extraordinary statements we get from him from time to time. He said that the Liberal party in 20 months had done more for the country than the Conservative party had done in 20 years. Well, that was like some of the boasts I met with in a very interesting book, "Tartarin de Tarascon." When I read the extraordinary gasconading statements of the leader of the Government as to the giants he has fought and killed, and the great game he has brought down, I am reminded of the incomparable Tarascon who went out to fight great game and to shoot lions and panthers, but he only succeeded at last in bringing down a donkey. I take no stock in that kind of statement. I am here to-day as a protectionist and I move this motion and claim support for it on three grounds. First and foremost, is it to be tolerated for one minute that the farmers of the North-west should have held out to them by members who are now sitting on the Treasury benches, that if they got into power they would put those implements on the free list, and that then these hon. gentlemen can get into power, partly by the votes of those men, and when they cross over to the other side of the House, when the Minister of Trade and Commerce, now leading the House, crosses to the other side, when the leader of the Government crosses from this to the other side, when they taste the sweets of office, they can turn round and, to use a vulgar illustration but a very expressive one, make fat bacon at the whole North-west. Is it to be tolerated for a minute? Do you mean to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am not bound as a North-west member to express the opinions of the farmers of the North-west, most all of whom are protectionists? But whether protectionists or not, they claim to have their disappointment, their indignation, their scorn, their contempt for men who behave in that way, expressed in this House, and expressed in strong language. Now, I ask again: What is protection? It is putting up a duty that will enable the native manufacturer to struggle on to strength, and wealth, and power, as these very implement manufacturers have progressed, and in doing that, not only give you good implements manufactured within the country, but keep the prices of those implements in the country, give employment to men, and supply a home market for the farmers. One of our mottoes in 1878, was that the workshop should be close to the farmer. I have here pamphlets that were circulated in 1878: I have the principles that were laid down then when we were asking to be returned to power. We wanted to protect the native manufacturer, not simply for the purposes of enriching him, but for the purpose of getting cheaper goods, goods manufactured in this country, increasing the home market, and thus adding to the wealth of the farmer, giving him not merely a market across the Atlantic and across the international boundary, but giving him a market at his own doors. Because my own language was that we wanted the factory near the farm, and our own tall chimneys darkening our own blue skies, the tall chimneys of the factories of Canada. What happened? The Conservative party were in power for eighteen years; and all you have to do is to look over the Trade and Navigation Returns, to look over the records of the Bureau of Statistics of Ontario, and to look over anything that gives a record of the progress of Canada for those years to agree to this proposition, that no country on the face of the earth, no country in history ever progressed more than Canada did during those eighteen years under the beneficent policy of the Conservative party. We had a party opposing the Conservative party, denouncing their policy in the most unmeasured terms, throwing out professions in respect to other matters on which I do not wish to enter now, and by a fluke that party attained power, still holding before the people the idea that if they got into power they would do certain things, and among them that they would give the farmers of the North-west agricultural implements free of duty. I have in a volume near me the official report of the great Liberal convention that was held in 1893, of which Mr., now Sir Wilfrid Laurier, said that since the great Liberal meeting of 1859 there had never been such a grand convention in the history of Canada.

It was a very peculiar course the leader of the House took on that occasion. He did not lay down, as other leaders have done, a programme of his own. He said that he came there to learn; that he invited the magnates of the Liberal party all over Canada to come there and confer on the state of Canada, and enunciate a policy that would be not the policy of the leader, but the policy of the combined wisdom of the Liberal party. Hon. gentlemen will find at page 23 of the report, the hon. gentleman said:

I appear before you now simply to confirm what has already been stated by Mr. Sutherland, that this convention is not a convention to ratify cut-and-dried resolutions, but that the work today remains with the members of the convention itself. This is in every sense of the word a Liberal, a democratic convention. I am anxious, and my friends who are associated with me in leading the Liberal party are anxious, that in the policy to be adopted, all the suggestions should come from the people themselves, who are here represented.

Thus the principle laid down at that convention were the principles of the Liberal party. The convention passed a series of resolutions, and one of these resolutions, which will be found recorded at page 71 of the volume, is as follows—

That the customs tariff of the Dominion—

I ask the attention of the House to these words, because I am going to prove my proposition as I would prove a mathematical proposition.

—should be based not, as now, upon the protective principle, but upon the requirements of the public service.

That the existing tariff, founded upon an unsound principle, and used, as it has been, by the Government, as a corrupting agency wherewith to keep themselves in office, has developed monopolies, trusts and combinations.

That to that end, the tariff should be reduced to the needs of honest, economical and efficient government.

That it should be so adjusted as to make free, or to bear as lightly as possible upon the necessities of life, and should be so arranged as to promote freer trade with the whole world, more particularly with Great Britain and the United States.

We denounce the principle of protection as radically unsound, and unjust to the masses of the people, and we declare our conviction that any tariff changes based on that principle must fail to afford any substantial relief from the burdens under which the country labours.

It was put forward before the whole country, and the whole country was called to witness, that if those hon. gentlemen got into power, they would eliminate, to use their own language, every shred of protection from this tariff. What was the utterance of Mr., now Sir Wilfrid Laurier. He said, and his remarks will be found at page 32:

Gentlemen, you have nothing to expect from them.

The hon. gentleman intended to say that the people had nothing to expect from the Conservatives, and that they had much to expect from the Liberals. The hon. gentleman was here referring to the promise made by Sir John Thompson in respect to mouldering branches. Again, the hon. gentleman said:

Apart from the logic of events, you have the word of Mr. Foster himself, who has declared again and again within the last few weeks that tariff reform would consist in this, that there might be a few changes here and there, but that the principle of protection in the National Policy would be maintained. This simply means that the Government are going to scratch off the paint and put on a new coat of varnish, and call it tariff reform.

The hon. gentleman here meant, of course, that he would not merely take off the varnish or put on a new coat of paint, but he would tear down the scaffold and erect a new structure from foundation to roof. He continued:

By virtue of what principle will you tax the farmer in order to give work to the workingman? On what principle will you tax the workingman in order to give better price to the farmer?

There is not, I may say, a single province throughout the Dominion which clamours so much and so loudly to be freed from the incubus of the National Policy as Manitoba. * * * * * I submit to you that every cent that is levied should be levied first and foremost upon the luxuries of the people.

The Prime Minister came west. He spoke at Winnipeg, Moosomin, Regina, Moose Jaw, Prince Albert, and I think at Edmonton—I forget whether he spoke at Medicine Hat or not—and at every one of those places he spoke in the same vein. The hon. gentleman had with him at one time the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and at another time the Minister of Agriculture, and the Minister of Agriculture in definite terms went into the very grievances arising from the duty on agricultural implements. I will not read the speeches delivered on those different occasions, but I will make a quotation from a speech delivered by the present Minister of Agriculture at Moosomin, a report of which will be found in the Moosomin "Spectator," October 4, 1894. The hon. gentleman is of course concerned with any agricultural problems that require consideration at the hands of the Cabinet, and I quote from his speech. He said:

As a farmer, he was not satisfied with the reduction which had been made in the agricultural implement duty.

"What reduction was that? It was a reduction made by the ex-Finance Minister from 20 per cent to 15 per cent." This reduction was made at one fell swoop, to use the sympathetic and eloquent language of the hon. member for Eastern Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas), and the Conservative Government recognizing that as a protectionist Government it had a duty to perform to the farmers to protect them as well as the manufacturers, and that the farmers of the west and the farmers all over the country occupy a special position. Although it is economically unsound, there is a strong colour of reason for what the farmers declare—although as I have said it is not scientifically correct—that agricultural implements are their raw material; and recognizing this, the hon. member for York, N.B., when Finance Minister in 1894, reduced the duty on agricultural implements by 15 per cent. In Room No. 16 the agent of the Massey-Harris Company stated at a time when iron had $10 per ton duty on it as compared with $7 per ton now, that if the duty on agricultural implements was reduced as low as 15 per cent and no lower, the Massey-Harris Company and other manufacturers could do well. But now, at one fell swoop, to use the sympathetic language of the hon. member for East Assiniboia, this reduction to which I have referred was made as low as 20 per cent. As a farmer, the Minister of Agriculture said:

Because the United States Congress had made a standing offer of reciprocity in implements, and it was the duty of the Canadian Government to take advantage of that offer. Last year the farmers of western Canada imported $120,000 worth of American implements, on which they paid $40,000 duty. Referring to the Massey-Harris combination, he claimed that the fact that these people spoke of going to the States to fight the Yankees in their own market showed that Canadian manufacturers were able to get along without protection. Canadians were able to hold their own with the Yankees in any walk of life. If Massey-Harris got protection, why should not the farmers?

As the Minister of Agriculture has just come in, I beg to inform him that I have been quoting from a speech delivered by him at Moosomin in October, 1894. The farmers flocked to hear and see these great Liberals, and what impression do you think, Mr. Speaker, was made on the farmers who heard them? Sir, the impression was made that if the Liberals got into power the duty would be taken off these farming implements. But, Sir, the Liberals are not ready to take up their note of hand; they allowed their bills to be dishonoured in the bank of public opinion, and is it to be tolerated for a minute that the indignation of the disappointed farmers of Canada shall not get expression in this House?

Mr. BENNETT. Where are the Northwest members to-day?

Mr. DAVIN. I do not see many of them. My hon. friend from Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) and my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) are here, but the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) is not here, and it is a pity, because I am going to quote some eloquent words from that hon. member. Now, a campaign sheet was issued by the Liberal party, and in that campaign sheet for the election of 1896 they held up as one of the enormities of the existing tariff the duty of 20 per cent which was imposed on farming implements, mowing machines, &c. But, Sir, the duty on these farm implements under a Liberal Government to-day is still 20 per cent. I want to call attention to the title page of this election pamphlet, because it is very instructive. It was what Plato would call an esoteric document. It was only intended for the perusal of the political elect and those to whom they would think fit to show it. This is the title:

Dominion of Canada. Principles, Policy and Platform of the Liberal Party

And it says:

This pamphlet is not for general distribution.
(Signed) ALEX. SMITH,
Sec. of the Lib. Association.

And here is what this pamphlet set forth:

A reduction of the tariff as far as the interests of the revenue would permit, with a complete elimination of every feature of the tariff of a distinctive protective character.

And then we have the Conservative party held up to opprobrium because of the duty on farm implements was 20 per cent. Let me ask what impression was made on the farmers by such a pamphlet as that? Do the farmers of this country deserve consideration at the hands of the Government? You must remember that the farmer—I do not use this as the language of a demagogue—the farmer is the most useful man in the community. He begins everything; he lays the foundation of all our wealth; and he works under specially hard conditions frequently, because owing to the peculiarity of his business, if he has to borrow money he has to borrow it at a high rate of interest, and it is well known that the return for the farmer is very small compared with the return to the manufacturer and the business man. I do not see my hon. friend from Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Frost) here, but I am told that he is making in his business 34 per cent profit, and I am told that Massey-Harris & Co. make 34 per cent.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). It is a wonder you did not find that out long ago when you were supporting the National Policy.

Mr. DAVIN. I found it as early as 1892 and 1893, and in the latter year I moved in this House to lower the duties, and it was in consequence of my action that the revision of the tariff took place in 1894.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). That is the time you voted against your own motion.

Mr. DAVIN. No, it was not. I thought that poor joke of yours was knocked to pieces long ago. My hon. friend (Mr. Davis) knows what happens when out in the North-west a stone is flung by any one at a dog and the dog follows it meaninglessly ; just as meaninglessly as my hon. friend (Mr. Davis) tries to bite at an old chestnut now. I say, Mr. Speaker, that it was in consequence of my action that the tariff was revised in 1894. I call the attention of my hon. friend from Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) to this ; I call the attention of my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) to it ; I call the attention of my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Rogers) to it ; I call the attention of any of the independent members, I call the attention of the so-called Patrons, if there is a shred of patronism, if there is a shred of independence left in them ; I call their attention to the fact that a Government does not care very much about the opposition that comes to it from the straight Opposition in the House, because the attack of the straight Opposition is discounted by the fact that it is its business to criticise and oppose. But the moment a man from behind a Government, a follower of the Government ; the moment he stands up and expresses his opinion that a certain course contrary to their policy should be taken, that moment the Government pays attention to it. Although, of course, I have a very great respect for the abilities of my hon. friend from Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis), and a great respect for the abilities of my hon. friends from the west, still I do not say that their abilities are overpowering and gigantic. But, Sir, there is not one of these western Liberal members who cannot accomplish more than any twenty men on this side of the House if they will only stand up and fearlessly express the opinions of the people in that western country whence they come.

My hon. friend from Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) said to me, why did I not discover this state of things ? Well, Sir, if I did not discover it, his friends, whom he is now following, discovered it. In the very pamphlet to which I have referred they set out a comparison between the farmer and the manufacturer to which I will call his attention as very interesting and instructive. This is the pamphlet on which the fight was fought in the province of Ontario and all over the country ; it is the programme of the Liberal party, and, under the heading of "Manufacturers' Profits and Farmers' Profits," it says :

The question is sometimes asked, why are farm lands decreasing in value ? They are decreasing for the same reason that other stocks decrease—because the profit, after the expense of working them is paid, is so small.

Then it points out that according to the census of 1891 the manufacturers' profit was 34 per cent on a capital invested of $353,000,000 ; while the farmers' investment for the year 1892, according to the Ontario Bureau of Industries, was $979,000,000, and the net proceeds amounted to only $114,000,000. So that according to the case made out by the campaign sheet of the Liberal party the farmer deserves special consideration at our hands. But what does the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who, as a rule, leads this House, say on this subject ? He said it here in 1894, when we were about to legislate :

The produce of the farmer has been driven to the lowest point, but what he has to buy is sold to him at an increased price, as compared with the price in England. The farmer is bound by his circumstances to sell in the freest and cheapest market ; so also ought he to be privileged to buy in the cheapest market, consistent only with the imposition of such duties as are necessary for raising the revenue of the country. That is a proposition perfectly fair, perfectly just, perfectly equitable—so fair, so just, so reasonable and so equitable that the Government dare not attack it openly. And yet they cannot adopt it. Why ? Because they are chained and yoked to a system which is the reverse of just and fair and equitable.

These are the words of the right hon. gentleman who leads this House, and they apply to the present Government. That is the system they are carrying out now. In the Railway Committee yesterday the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) declared that if the present tariff was not high enough, he would be in favour of a tariff—and he would introduce a Railway Act to enable him to bring it into force by Order in Council—that would fully protect the people in the Boundary Creek country. The Minister of Railways says that, but mark the language of his leader :

And yet they cannot adopt it. Why ? Because they are chained and yoked to a system which is the reverse of just and fair and equitable.

That language went to the west in 1894. What were the farmers to think ? When the right hon. gentleman went west himself, the "Globe" had a picture of him bending over the North-west farmer, whose hands were manacled and gyved by the very tariff which is in force to-day ; and there we had the right hon. gentleman depicted as knocking off the chains and fetters of the poor North-western farmer. We had another picture—a picture of the man who fell among thieves, also the North-west farmer ; and there was the Good Samaritan, Wilfrid Laurier, bending over him and pouring the oil of joy and gladness into his wounds. But what the poor man who fell among thieves got from the right hon. gentleman was bottles of wind, vials of sunny ways of vapidty ; his promise to the North-west having proved of no more value than a dicer's oath. I want to show you, Sir, the disappointment that was felt. I have here the opinion of Duncan Marshall, who gives the views of the Patrons of Ontario, when they saw this tariff : "It is disappointing to the farmers who had been promised substantial changes from the party now in power," says Duncan Marshall, the well-known Patron campaigner. Hon. gentlemen can find this in the "Sun" newspaper of the 29th of April, 1897. He goes on to mention a number of articles which the farmer is interested in, on some of which the duty is higher to-day than it was under the Conservative Government. Now, my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver) when he made his maiden speech in this House, referred to the promises that had been made by the Liberal party. I have here the words of his speech, which will be found in "Hansard" in the debate on the Address. He, relying on such promises, did not think it necessary to support my contention in regard to implements, because he said :

If it is the intention of the Government to place agricultural implements on the free list and to meet the desire of the farmers of the North-west Territories, and carry out the promises made by the Liberal candidates, and by the supporters of the Liberal candidates in the North-west Territories, why delay it? Can any reason be given for delaying?

And I remember that my hon. friend was not able to vote with me, because he had confidence that when Parliament met in 1897 the Government would give the relief to the farmer that he said they had promised; and I can conceive that my hon. friend, with the independence that has already done him honour and placed him on a pinnacle before the people of this country for what he has done this year, is bound to support me on the present occasion. But to show how disappointed the people of the North-west were, I have here what took place in Winnipeg in October, 1897, when the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Jameson) and the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) were present. This is what the hon. member for Winnipeg said :

He dealt with the tariff first, and said that western members were disappointed with it.

Why were they disappointed with it? Because in that very city of Winnipeg the Prime Minister had promised, with regard to these very agricultural implements, that the farmers of the North-west would get them on very different terms from those on which they were getting them under the Conservative tariff.

He dealt with the tariff first, and said that western members were disappointed with it, but he was sorry to say that in their effort to reduce it, the western men had a force against them which was not all party, and mentioned as instances, Mr. Frost, the implement man,—

That is the hon. member for Leeds and Grenville.

—demanding reduced duties on everything but his products, and the duties on them he would like increased.

Probably that hon. gentleman had some secret promise, because in the contest at West Toronto one of the opponents of the present members declared that the duty of 20 per cent was not enough for Mr. Frost and Massey & Harris, and that the Government would raise it. This is what the hon. member for Winnipeg went on to say :

Mr. Frost, the implement man, demanding reduced duties on everything but his products, and the duties on them he would like to see increased; also, Mr. Fraser, M.P. for Lambton, who is interested in the oil-producing works, wanted the duties kept up on oil, and several other Liberals were likewise in their theoretical love of free trade, but did not want the duties on their own particular goods touched. As a matter of fact, the whole of the east is against the west in the matter of protection.

Then the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) spoke. There is a picture of that hon. gentleman published in this newspaper report, and as I regard my hon. friend as a handsome man, I think he ought to sue for libel the artist who drew this picture of him, but probably the artist accurately depicted the expression of sadness and gloom which then changed the hon. gentleman's appearance, arising from the disappointment he had experienced in Ottawa. Here is what my hon. friend from Lisgar said :

Mr. Richardson spoke of the disappointment the tariff was to him, and said it was hard to get the duty on farmers' implements left alone, as the tendency in the caucus meetings was to increase them rather than decrease.

But who does not remember how that duty was denounced in the Liberal campaign sheets and speeches in 1895 and 1896. If my hon. friend had supported me the last time I brought this matter up, that would not have been the tendency in the caucus, and if he will support me now, he will do a great deal to destroy that tendency in the caucus of his party. He will find that if he is true to himself and speaks out his mind, not merely in meetings when he goes home, but here, which is the place above all where a member of Parliament ought to speak—because, although there is appropriateness in a member of Parliament speaking to his constituents on the platform in his riding and through the press, there is no place where he is so bound to speak out the truth that is in him as in this House of Commons—he will raise himself in the estimation of the people of the west, and he will effect something. That is the way I succeeded in accomplishing what I did. It was by kicking hard from year to year, and there never was a session in which I did not accomplish something for the farmers of the North-west. I believe my hon. friends mean well, but they are young members, and I do not think that in their first session they had a full grasp of their duties as parliamentarians. I know very well, because I have observed it, what a benumbing and hypnotic influence on a young member is produced by his surrounding at Ottawa, when he first arrives. I see that the "Globe" talks of the hypnotizing influence of society on its own friends. It tells us that even the Ministers of the Crown are hypnotized by Ottawa society. It says that the great social influence is Conservative, and its effect is such that one Minister after another has had to lower his flag before it. If that influence is so benumbing and hypnotizing on the Ministers, what must it not be on a wild bronco, full of fire, like my hon. friend the member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis). Or take my hon. friend from East Assinibola (Mr. Douglas). Why, my hon. friend was, of course, partly by circumstances and partly by his profession, kept away all his life from society, and we know very well that, when a thing is novel, its impression is far greater. I understand that even Ministers of the Crown who, when west, would not for any consideration have entered a dancing room, or come within the sound of a dancing fiddle, have, some of them, since arriving in Ottawa, taken lessons of a dancing-master, and have become, not merely political leaders, but leaders in the terpsichorean chorus, and gracefully bow and salute in the minuet.

This is what my hon. friend from Lisgar is reported in his own paper as having said:

The great difficulty members had to contend against at Ottawa was that they were not consulted. The Government made up its mind, and brought down its measures, and members as a rule had either to swallow the entire programme or to go into opposition. This policy very often tended to compromise the position of members.

Well, I have consolation in store for my hon. friend. He misunderstands his own leader. He has not read all that his leader has said. On the 12th of October last, speaking at the glorification of Mr. Tarte at the Tarte Club, at the same time that he was presented with the Tarte medal, of which a picture appeared in "La Patrie"—the Tarte medal, with the picture of Israel Tarte on it, hanging side by side with the Cobden medal and the star which emblazoned his consistent and proud bosom—my hon. friend's leader said—and I cite this to show my hon. friend that he need not swallow all the programme of the Government:

The Liberal party does not require of its members a blind support of any measure which seems good to its leaders.

So that I bring my hon. friend some consolation. He will be able now to go back to his constituents and tell them that one of those obscurantist Tories, on the other side of the House, who comes from the west, called his attention to certain words of his right hon. leader which are an emblazonment of liberty for the Liberals behind him. My hon. friend will not, therefore, feel bound to swallow the whole programme of the Government; he will not feel bound to swallow the whole elephant, and do mortal injury to his political digestion; he will not be forced to say, with Hosea Bigelow:

A marcfil Providence fashioned us holler
O' purpose that we might our principles swaller.

I have something further.

Mr. OLIVER. I rise to a question of privilege. I wish to state to the House that the hon. gentleman has distinctly and entirely misquoted my remarks in "Hansard."

Mr. DAVIN. I will send for the "Hansard" of the second session of 1896, and hope to be able to show the hon. gentleman that I have not misquoted him, but that I have given him full credit for what he said. If I have done otherwise, I shall make the 'amende honorable' for I have, for convenience, taken a newspaper report professing to be verbatim.

I want to call the attention of my hon. friend who is now leading the House (Sir Richard Cartwright)—and I am glad to see him leading it, because he leads it with grace and dignity—I want to call his attention to what he said in 1895:

This is not a case for half measures. You have in the fate of the Democratic party of the United States a warning and an example of the doom which will overtake any party that palters with its convictions, and after having placed itself at the head of a great popular movement, will offer the people a stone instead of bread.

That is the language which he used, when speaking of the Liberal policy with regard to the tariff.

These are weighty words, and they seem to be prophetic as well as weighty, for already the indignation of this people of Canada, this outraged and betrayed people is rising against a Government that does not regard its promises, its programme or its professions. What I said in 1896 could be said with still more truth now, the pallor of death is glooming upon the face of that moribund Ministry.

I was walking in the city of Hull the other day. I found that they were changing the names of the streets there, and, in this re-baptising of streets, they call one Avenue Laurier. I thought I would have the glory and pride of walking down this new-named street. While passing along it I began to think how, when the late Emperor Napoleon came into power, they changed the names of the streets in Paris, substituting for names that rang with republicanism those that reminded passers-by of Napoleon and Louis Napoleon. And I remember when I went through those streets of Paris in the autumn of 1870, the names redolent of the coup d'Etat were being torn down and names substituted that rang of the déchéance. I went along this street in Hull called the Avenue Laurier, and do you know whither it led? I hope it will not be injurious to your health, Mr. Speaker, or to the health of the Liberals, it led—'absit omen'—to a graveyard.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 91) to incorporate the Klondike and Peace River Gold Mining, Land and Transportation Company (Limited).—(Mr. Davis.)

Bill (No. 87) for the relief of Augustus Baldwin Hart.—(Mr. Landerkin)—(on division).

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

Mr. BRITTON moved second reading of Bill (No. 12) further to amend the Criminal Code. He said: This Bill is of great importance, and I had hoped to have the assistance of the Solicitor General in this as well as in certain other proposed amendments of the Criminal Code. Perhaps it is not an opportune time to discuss the Bill just now, and yet I am afraid that if I let this opportunity pass another may not present itself during the present session. I think I will content myself with moving the second reading of the Bill.

Mitton agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Mr. FORTIN moved second reading of Bill (No. 60) to amend the Weights and Measures Act. He said: I do not think it is necessary for me to make any explanation of the provisions of this Bill at this time, for the reason that there is now before the House, in committee, a measure introduced by the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue dealing with the same subject, and it is possible that this Bill might be incorporated with the Government Bill. Under these circumstances I will simply ask that the Bill be read the second time, and referred to the committee.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

TRADE MARKS AND DESIGNS.

Mr. BERTRAM moved second reading of Bill (No. 61) in further amendment of the Trade Mark and Design Act. He said: I do not think this Bill requires any lengthy explanation. It is simply to enable the owners of trade marks and union labels, that is labels used in connection with associations of workmen and trades unionists, to own them as their property, so that they may be able to use them in the same way as any manufacturer or merchant owns and uses a trade mark. It is a very simple measure, and I think the House will accept it readily. When the Bill gets into committee, if any further explanation is required it will be given.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I would ask whether the Minister of Agriculture has examined this Bill, and whether he has any reports with regard to it?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). I may say that I have looked into this Bill a little, and I find that there are in my department a good many papers connected with it, which I have glanced over but not very carefully yet. I am not prepared to say that the Bill should be thrown out. I think it is a matter that ought to be thoroughly ventilated in the House before we make any disposition of it. I would therefore suggest that the Bill be allowed to take its second reading, and be referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee with which it is certainly intimately connected, and then it can be dealt with in the ordinary way.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is the wiser course to pursue.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

SPECULATION IN THE SALE OF BUTTER AND CHEESE.

Mr. PARMALEE moved second reading of Bill (No. 83) to prohibit improper speculation in the sale of butter and cheese. He said: When introducing this Bill I took occasion to explain pretty fully its main features, so that I will now merely move its second reading, and suggest that it go to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). I would like to suggest that this Bill had better be sent to the Committee on Agriculture. It is a matter of considerable importance to the farmers of the country, and I think that committee would deal with it, perhaps, better than the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Minister of Agriculture is quite correct; I was going to make that suggestion myself.

Mr. PARMALEE. I am quite ready to adopt the suggestion. I suggested that it go to the Banking and Commerce Committee, because I thought it would meet with less opposition there than before any other committee. However, I am satisfied the Bill will receive greater attention before the Committee on Agriculture. While it is a Bill that concerns trade to some extent, it also intimately concerns the farmers and dairymen of this country.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

ADJOURNMENT—TRADE WITH THE WEST INDIES.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). As we have been very industrious this evening, I do not think we will ask the House to do any more business. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MACLEAN. Before the House adjourns, I have a matter to which I wished to call the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce when the Orders of the Day were called. There is an item in the London "Times," of Tuesday, March 15, which reports a debate in the House of Commons. It states that Mr. Chamberlain, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, on Monday, March 14, made a statement in the British House of Commons to this effect:

That we are engaged in negotiations with the United States and also with the Dominion of Canada, which we hope may result in reciprocity arrangements between those countries and the West Indies for West Indian products. I am unable at present to say that the negotiations have made much progress.

I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he will take the House and the country into his confidence as to the nature of these negotiations, and indicate what is likely to be the outcome of them.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I think my hon. friend will be able to obtain full information in a very short time, when the Budget is brought down. The propositions are necessarily closely intertwined with certain proposals of the Budget, and we hope then to give my hon. friend full satisfaction.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 8.25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 31st March, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 107) to incorporate the Yukon Overland Transportation Company.—(Mr. Domville.)

Bill (No. 108) to incorporate the Alaska and North-western Railway Company.—(Mr. Belcourt.)

Bill (No. 109) to incorporate the British American Light and Power Company.—(Mr. Rosamond.)

BATTLEFORD INDIAN AGENCY— DEATH OF CATTLE.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan) asked,

What number of cattle belonging to the Department of Indian Affairs died in the Battleford Indian agency during the winter of 1896-97, and what proportion of the deaths were attributable to the carelessness of officials?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Two hundred and seventy head of cattle belonging to the Department of Indian Affairs in the Battleford Indian Agency died during 1896-97. It appears that there is no doubt that the mortality was considerably increased by the lack of forethought of the agent in not providing fodder. But it is not possible to make a definite estimate as to what proportion of the deaths were attributable to that negligence.

CANADIAN AND ENGLISH MAILS— BEAVER LINE STEAMERS.

Mr. IVES (by Mr. Taylor) asked,

1. What are the names of the steamships that have been employed by the Beaver Line Company in carrying the Canadian and English mails under the contract now in force between the Canadian Government and that company?

2. How many trips has each of such steamships made under the said contracts, and what is the record of each trip of each steamship as to the time consumed in making the voyage?

3. What is the number of letters carried on each voyage?

4. Will the Government lay on the Table the contract above referred to?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). 1. The steamships regularly employed by the Beaver Line in carrying the Canadian and English mails are the "Gallia," "Lake Ontario," "Lake Huron," "Lake Superior," "Lake Winnipeg." 2. So far the "Gallia" has completed three round trips and is now on her return voyage to Liverpool on her fourth trip. The "Lake Winnipeg" has made three round trips, and is now on her way to Halifax on her fourth. The "Lake Ontario" has made two and a half round trips. The "Lake Huron" has completed three round trips, and is now on her fourth trip. The "Lake Superior" has completed two round trips, and is now on her voyage from St. John to complete her third. In addition one round trip has been made by the "Numidian," of the Allan Line, which took the place for that trip of the "Lake Ontario" damaged by collision. The record of each trip as to time consumed between Merville and Halifax, and vice versa, so far as yet reported, is as follows:—West-bound trips: "Gallia," 9d. 4h. 56m.; 10d. 23h. 40m.; 7d. 19h. 45m. "Lake Superior," 9d. 1h. 31m.; 8d. 12h. 41m.; 9d. 0h. 10m. "Lake Ontario," 9d. 1h. 8m. "Lake Huron," 10d. 4h. 15m.; 9d. 23h. 35m. "Lake Winnipeg," 12d. 6h. 31m.; 11d. 23h. 0m. East-bound trips: "Gallia," 8d. 2h. 50m.; 8d. 18h. 50m. "Lake Superior," 8d. 17h. 29m.; 9d. 5h. 10m. "Lake Ontario," 8d. 21h. 50m. "Lake Huron," 9d. 23h. "Lake Winnipeg," 10d. 17h. 1m.; 9d. 15h. 5m. 3. The letters are not counted, and, therefore, the information asked for cannot be supplied. 4. A copy of the contract will in due course be laid upon the Table of the House in compliance with the order of the House of date the 14th of February, 1898.

ONTARIO VOTERS' LISTS—REVISING OFFICERS—COST OF PRINTING.

Mr. BENNETT asked,

1. How many revising officers for the revision of voters' lists in Ontario were not senior or junior county judges, and what were their names and districts in which they acted?

2. What was the total amount paid to revising officers in Ontario under last revision of Dominion voters' lists?

3. What was the total cost of printing voters' lists for different ridings in the province of Ontario?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). 1. For the revision of 1894-95, there were in Ontario 14 revising officers, who were not county judges. 2. The total amount paid to revising officers in Ontario for last revision was $71,660.20. 3. The total cost of printing the voters' lists for the different ridings of Ontario was $34,306.88. I shall send over to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) the names of the revising officers referred to as not being county court judges, and also the detailed cost of printing the voters' list for each riding.

YUKON TERRITORY—LIQUOR PERMITS.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked,

Under what authority and in whose name were the licenses or permits to sell liquor in the Yukon territory in 1897 and 1898 issued?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). All permits to take liquor into the Yukon territory issued since the 1st of January, 1897, which includes the period specified by the hon. gentleman, have been issued in the name and under the authority of the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories.

LIGHTHOUSE SUPPLIES.

Mr. MACLEAN asked,

To whom has the contract for the delivery of lighthouse supplies from Montreal westward been given, and at what figure? Were there other offers?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The Collin's Bay Rafting and Forwarding Company, amount of contract, $3,750. The other offers were $3,749 and $3,840. The lowest tender which was $1 below that of the Collin's Bay Rafting Company, was passed over because the inspector of lighthouses reported against the steamer "Michigan," which the tenderers proposed employing for the work.

KINGSTON PENITENTIARY—MEDICAL OFFICER.

Mr. ROCHE asked,

1. What is the name of the medical officer attached to the Kingston Penitentiary?

2. Has he been appointed permanently?

3. What is his salary?

4. Does the law allow him to practice his profession outside of his position?

5. Are the Government aware, or have they information to the effect that the medical officer at Kingston Penitentiary is practicing his profession outside of his position?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). 1. Dr. Daniel Phelan. 2. Yes. 3. $1,500 per annum. 4. No. 5. No.

LAND DAMAGES AT BELCÉIL.

Mr. MONK asked,

1. Have land owners at Belc eil asked the Government for an indemnity on account of the dredging done by the Government on Belc eil shore for the purpose of building a wharf?
2. What are the names of the claimants?
3. What amounts have been claimed from the Government?
4. Has the Government paid, or agreed to pay, anything to these claimants?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. Yes. 2. Tancrede Bienvenu and Cyrille Choquette. 3. T. Bienvenu $1,675, and C. Choquette $2,700. 4. No, not yet.

CARETAKER OF BOOMS AT BELC IL.

Mr. MONK asked,

1. Has Bienvenu, caretaker of Government booms at Belc eil, resigned?
2. Who has been appointed in his place?
3. What salary is paid to the new caretaker?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. Yes. 2. Mr. Cyrille Choquette. 3. Mr. Choquette is being paid the same salary as that his predecessor received, viz.: $100 per annum.

MINERS' LICENSES—ASHCROFT STATION, B.C.

Mr. PRIOR asked,

1. Who is authorized to issue Yukon miners' licenses at Ashcroft Station, British Columbia, and by whom was he recommended for the position?
2. Is he paid any salary or commission for issuing same?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). There is no person at Ashcroft Station authorized to issue Yukon miners' licenses. The sub-collector of customs at Ashcroft is authorized to issue such licenses. He was so authorized, not on the recommendation of any one, but in accordance with the rule adopted by the Department of the Interior to have sub-collectors of customs act as issuers of miners' certificates at points at which the department has no agents. He is not paid any salary or commission for issuing same.

QUEEN VICTORIA PARK, NIAGARA FALLS.

Mr. McCLEARY asked,

1. Has the Government arrived at a decision, as to complying with the petition of the municipal and county councils of the county of Welland, who have asked that the Government land surrounding and in which are the ruins of Old Fort Erie, be given to and placed under the control of the commissioners of Queen Victoria Niagara Falls Park?
2. Is the Government aware that the commissioners of the park made a report to the Ontario Government on this matter?

Mr. FITZPATRICK.

3. Has there been any communication between this Government and the Government of Ontario in relation to this?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The Government has decided (the municipality consenting) to cancel the lease to the corporation of Fort Erie of the lands surrounding the ruins of the old fort (17½ acres) and issue a new one in favour of the commissioners of the Niagara Falls Park. This decision was conveyed to the reeve of the municipality on the 20th January, 1897. 2. The Government has been informed that the Park Commissioners made a report to the Ontario Government. 3. There has been no communication between this Government and the Government of Ontario in the matter.

THE EASTER HOLIDAYS.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the hon. gentleman who is leading the House, as I think it would be a great convenience to members on both sides to know, what is proposed in regard to the Easter holidays—when the adjournment will take place and for what period?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). In a matter of that kind it would be our desire to consult the convenience of the House on both sides. The adjournment, I think, speaking from recollection, has usually taken place on Wednesday night, and I suppose it will be until Tuesday at three o'clock.

Mr. BERGERON. It used to be till eight o'clock.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Tuesday is a Government day, and we might as well meet at three. However, I will let the hon. gentleman know tomorrow.

THE INSOLVENCY BILL.

Mr. MACLEAN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, will the hon. gentleman who is leading the House tell the country whether the Government intend to go on with the Insolvency Bill or not?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. That is not under the charge of the Government, I may inform the hon. gentleman.

DATE OF THE BUDGET.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose it may be assumed that, if nothing turns up to the contrary, the House will adjourn on Wednesday night. Under that assumption, does the hon. Finance Minister still think it best to go on with the Budget on Tuesday?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). That is our present intention, but I am willing to have the matter considered. If a change is to be made, it will be announced to-morrow, in connection with the arrangement for the adjournment. We have no present intention, however, to make any change.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. MORRISON. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to refer to a matter which is probably only of personal import. It is in reference to some remarks made by me during the debate on the Yukon Railway Bill. My attention has been called to the fact that in the "Hansard" report of my remarks, referring to the reports of Dr. Dawson and Mr. Ogilvie, I made use of the following words:—

I venture to say that there is not a capitalist in this country who would wish to invest $100,000 upon the strength of Mr. Ogilvie's or Dr. Dawson's report upon a gold mine.

Until my attention was drawn to these words, I was not aware that I had limited that remark to a gold mine. I was talking of the reports published by Dr. Dawson and Mr. Ogilvie, particularly Dr. Dawson's report of 1887, revised in 1898, and what I was contending was that nobody would be justified in investing money on the strength of those published reports. "Hansard" has it that I added the words, "on a gold mine." To the extent that that may be a reflection on Dr. Dawson, I wish in the most unreserved way to withdraw those words. It was not my intention in any way to refer to Dr. Dawson professionally, but rather to his published report as a surveyor, and not as an expert on gold mines; and if any misunderstanding has arisen in regard to Dr. Dawson's ability as a mining expert, I would be the last person in the world to make any adverse comment. I wish to make this explanation so that if any injury is done to Dr. Dawson, he may know that, so far as my intention is concerned, I did not wish to convey that idea. I am very sorry the words appear as they do. I will not say the words were not used as they appear in the revised report in "Hansard," but they escaped my attention.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Perhaps it would be desirable, as the matter is of some importance, if the hon. gentleman would say now, with the error before him, what he really intended to say, or what he would say now.

Mr. MORRISON. I thought I stated what I intended to say. I was speaking about the published reports of Dr. Dawson of 1887 and 1898, and Mr. Ogilvie's reports; and I made the remark that I considered that Mr. Ogilvie's report on a gold mine would be of little value in ascertaining the value of a gold mine, he being a surveyor and not an expert mining engineer. With this remark, in one instance, I coupled the name of Dr. Dawson; but I was talking about his report to the Geological Survey, not on gold mines at all, but on the topography of the country; but the words were added, "on a gold mine." I did not wish to say that capitalists would not be justified in investing on the strength of Dr. Dawson's report on a gold mine, because I think that Dr. Dawson's report on a gold mine, if he had the time and opportunity of investigating it, would be as good as that of any man undertaking to so report. I wish to offset any impression that the addition of the words "on a gold mine" might create, because I certainly had no intention of conveying the idea that a report by Dr. Dawson on a gold mine would be valueless.

VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS.

Mr. ELLIS. I would like to call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to an entry on the Journals, page 216:

And the question being proposed to the House by Mr. Speaker: "When shall the Bill be read a third time?"—and Mr. Speaker being unable to decide from the voices as to the time of reading, he submitted the question to the determination of the House: "That the Bill be now read a third time." and the House resolved the question in the affirmative by the following vote.

Then the votes are recorded, and immediately afterwards appears the entry:

Mr. Hughes accordingly moved that the Bill be now read a third time.

Then there is an entry recording the fact that Mr. Maclean moved in amendment, that the Bill be not now read a third time, but recommended to the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of adding certain clauses to it. That may be in exact accordance with what took place, but it certainly puts the House in the position of having voted twice on the same question. It would appear from the Journals, that after the House had resolved that the Bill be read a third time, an hon. member moved an amendment, and the House voted on that amendment. It seems to me that this record can hardly be correct.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not agree with the hon. gentleman. I think that the entry is quite right as it is. The vote which was first taken was taken to decide whether the mover of the Bill was at liberty to move for its third reading now, and the House decided that he was. It was not on the third reading that we voted, but on the question whether the hon. member who moved the Bill would be allowed to move for its third reading at that particular moment.

Mr. ELLIS. If that be the case, then those words should be put in the motion, so that it would not appear on the Journals that there were two motions of precisely the same character, and that after the Bill was read the third time an amendment was moved to it.

Mr. SPEAKER. In every case of the kind, the entry is the same. When a Bill has passed through committee without amendment, the question is put by the Chair: "When shall the Bill be read a third time?" The question is generally answered "Now" unanimously. Then the motion is put, as in this case, that the Bill be now read a third time, and any hon. gentleman is at liberty to move an amendment.

THE CATTLE TRADE—OPENING THE PORT OF BELFAST.

Mr. QUINN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) if any effort has been made by this Government to induce the Home Government to modify their regulations and allow the port of Belfast to be opened to our cattle trade. I mention this because navigation is about to open, and it would be advantageous to Canadian shippers to know if any steps have been taken in this direction at present. In this connection, I would like to recall the attention of the hon. Minister to the resolution of the Board of Trade of Montreal, passed on the 23rd September, 1897. I am sure that the hon. Minister is familiar with the contents of that resolution, the receipt of which was acknowledged by the Secretary of State, so that I need not quote it. I understand that Lord Strathcona and Mount Royal has made certain representations to the Home Government and done all he could in the matter, but I am informed by gentlemen in the old country, interested in this matter, that if a move were made by our Canadian Government, it would strengthen very much the hands of those in England who are willing to help our people to obtain the opening of the port of Belfast as a port for the receipt of cattle from this country.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must confine himself to merely putting the question.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I would say that this matter was up in the House a few days ago and fully explained then. This Government has already communicated with Lord Strathcona in the sense of the resolution to which the hon. gentleman has referred.

MR. ROTHWELL'S REPORT.

Mr. McINNES. Before the Orders of the Day are called, would the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) inform the House when he expects to be able to lay on the Table the report of Mr. Rothwell on the claims of certain settlers, into whose grievances he was appointed to inquire. I understand that he made a report some time ago, and he has given an order for it to be brought down. -

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I beg to say that I expect the return which the hon. gentleman asks for, and for which an order has been issued to be laid on the Table very soon. The return is very voluminous and involves a great amount of labour in its preparation. It is being got ready as rapidly as possible, and I hope in a few days to be able to lay it on the Table.

DISMISSAL OF COLOURED INTERCOLONIAL PORTERS.

Mr. FOSTER. I should like to ask the hon. Minister of Railways a question before the Orders are called. I have seen it stated in the New Brunswick papers that all the porters on the Pullman cars have been dismissed from the service of the Intercolonial. I would like to ask if that is true; and if so, whether they were dismissed for cause or whether the hon. gentleman is drawing the colour line in that service.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I am not sufficiently informed to give a very definite reply except to say that I am quite sure the colour line has not been drawn. I do not believe that the General Manager would be disposed to draw it of his own motion or without instructions from the Minister, and I can assure the hon. gentleman that he has not received any such instructions. I had a letter yesterday stating that that was the effect of certain action which had been taken by the General Manager. I have written to him on the subject and have not yet had his reply, but I assure the hon. member for York that anything that has been done has not been done with the view of discriminating against the colour line in that service.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Perhaps the gentleman is colour-blind.

ATTACHMENT OF SALARIES AND MONEYS IN THE HANDS OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. RICHARDSON moved that the House resolve itself into committee on Bill (No. 14) respecting the attachment of and moneys in the hands of the Government. He said: The object of the Bill is a very simple one. It is to enable the garnishment of moneys in the hands of the Government due or accruing to servants of the Government. It has been impossible, up to the present time, to garnishee the salaries of civil servants, and I think I am correct in saying that it be impossible to garnishee any money in the hands of the Government due to any person. My Bill only provides that moneys due to civil servants and money in the hands of the Government due to any person may be garnisheed, just as in the case of wages payable or money due by ordinary citizens. I think I need not present to the House any reasons why this should be done. Hon. members know that in various parts of the country it has been impossible to compel civil servants to pay their just debts. I do not know exactly how it is in Ottawa, but in the part of the country I come from considerable difficulty has been experienced in that regard, and if reports regarding the position of affairs in Ottawa are correct, I think members will endorse at least the principle of this Bill.

I know there are many difficulties in the way. It will be pointed out that a law of this kind will occasion very great trouble and probably some expense to the Government. But I would answer, that if the Government takes a strong position with regard to officials, very little difficulty need be experienced, and any difficulty that arises will rapidly diminish as years go by. A Bill was passed in the province of Manitoba similar to this, and they have had very little trouble, because, under the rules that have been made, if a civil servant allows his salary to be garnisheed a second time, it is tantamount to his dismissal, for the government will not retain him in office. The province of Ontario has passed an Act of the same kind, and I understand that in the province of Quebec similar steps have been taken.

Since my name has been identified with this Bill, I have received many petitions in favour of its passing. I have here a resolution passed at the regular monthly meeting of the Montreal Grocers' Association, on February 4th, 1897, which reads :

That the secretary prepare a petition praying the Federal Government to amend the law in order that a certain proportion of the salaries of the civil service employees may be made attachable for just debt, and have same distributed for signature by all traders.

I have also before me the petition of the Hamilton Grocers' Association, very largely signed indeed. The petition sets forth :

That by the existing law the salaries of civil service employees are exempt from garnisheed for just debt.

Wherefore, your petitioners respectfully request you to amend the law allowing a portion of the salaries of civil service employees to become attachable for just debt.

I understand that considerable difficulty has been experienced in reference to this very question in the United States, and it has been pointed out to me that the difficulty has been dealt with by resolution of the government, that any civil servant permitting his salary to be garnisheed shall be promptly dismissed. As I know that difficulties will be pointed out in relation to this Bill, I desire to have the measure brought before a Committee of the Whole House, so that there may be the fullest possible discussion, and the country thus may know exactly how the Government and members of this House feel upon the subject. My Bill may not be as perfect as it ought to be, but I hope that, with the maturest discussion on the subject, we shall be able to frame a measure that will effectually cover the ground.

It is not my desire that the Bill shall be retroactive. I do not think that we should go into questions of past debts : but if the civil service has due notice before the Bill is brought into force, that any debts contracted in future will be attachable, I think that is as far as we ought to go. I would invite the fullest discussion on the Bill.

Mr. FORTIN. I understand, that the object of the Bill is twofold, the first being to declare that all moneys due by the Crown shall be attachable, as if such moneys were due by private parties. So far as that is concerned, I can hardly see any objection. It seems to me that there is no reason why moneys due by the Crown to contractors, or for indemnities in cases of accidents on Government railways, or otherwise, should not be seizable, as if they were due by ordinary individuals, after judgment duly rendered by a competent court. The second object of the Bill, as I understand it, is to allow the salaries due to public officers to be attached. The Bill, as framed, would render the full salary in the hands of the Government seizable by garnishment. Now, with the principle of the Bill I entirely agree. It seems to me that there is no reason why public officers should not be compelled to pay their just debts, as ordinary citizens are. If we are to judge of the value of public office by the number of applicants, by the number of office-seekers, we may fairly conclude that public office offers fair emolument, that the salaries paid by the Crown to these officers are such as to enable the recipients of them to live well, to have sufficient to pay their legitimate debts, like ordinary citizens. As the law stands in the province of Quebec, the wages of a workingman or labourer can be attached for debt, but the amount attachable is limited to one-quarter of the amount of his wages. A labourer earning $1, $1.50 or $2, is liable to have his wages seized to the extent of one-quarter of that amount. In the case of officers of the Dominion Government, not one single cent of their salaries can be attached by garnishment. Now, this is a state of things that seems to me scandalous to a certain extent. There are officials of the Dominion Government in the various provinces, earning very big salaries. I know some who earn as high as $4,000 and $5,000 a year. They live extravagantly, most of them, buying wherever they can obtain credit, and never paying a single cent to their legitimate creditors, if they can avoid it. I say this is a scandal, and the thing should not exist at this present time in our country.

The legislation proposed would by no means be new. We in this Dominion are backward in a good many respects, and this is one in which we are behind the times. It is well known that in England the salaries of public officers can be attached after the officer is put into insolvency.

As is also well known, according to the bankruptcy law of England, any person who has allowed a judgment for at least £50 to remain unsettled for a certain time, can be put into insolvency. By another provision of the same law, upon application to the judge, after due notice to the head of the department where the public officer is employed, the judge may determine what portion of the salary of such public officer shall be paid into the hands of the trustee to be distributed to the creditors of such insolvent person. That is the only way of attaining the end for which we have at present no provision in our own law. In France there are similar provisions, with the difference that the proportion is determined by law. So far back as the promulgation of the Code of Civil Procedure, a portion of the salary of public officers has been declared to be liable to attachment. By article 580 of the Code of Civil Procedure of France, it is enacted that the salaries of public officers are liable to seizure in a proportion to be determined by the law and ordinances on the subject. Now, by a law which was passed on the 21st Ventose, an 9, under the first Republic, the following enactments were passed into law:—It was declared that the salaries should be seizable by attachment in the following proportion—one-fifth for the first thousand francs, that is equivalent to about $200; one-fourth of the following five thousand francs, or the equivalent of $1,000; and one-third of the excess, whatever the amount should be. By another article in the French code, these provisions were extended even to members of the army. Now, Mr. Speaker, if there are any servants of the Crown that should deserve protection upon a subject of this kind, it seems to me it is those who may be called upon by their profession to give their lives for the defence of their country. Although their salaries are very small, it has been found well in France that a portion of the salaries of the officers and men composing the army, should be liable to attachment. In the province of Quebec, as has been stated by the hon. member for Lisgar, we have also a statute concerning the seizure of salaries of public officers. But unfortunately that statute only applies to the public officers of the province of Quebec, it does not apply to the officers of this Government. The statute I allude to is 38 Victoria, chapter 12, which has been in existence ever since 1875. By that statute the salary of public officers is seizable in the following proportions:—1st, one-fifth of every monthly salary not exceeding $1,000 per annum; 2nd, one-fourth of every monthly salary exceeding $1,000, but not exceeding $2,000 per annum; 3rd, a third of every monthly salary exceeding $2,000 per annum. This statute, as I have said, has been in force ever since 1875. It was argued at the time it was enacted that the law would prove embarrassing to the Government, that it might in some cases prevent the Crown from obtaining the services of the best and ablest men that could be secured. Well, Sir, after an experience of some 23 years, I can safely assert that in no case has this law prevented the Government from obtaining the best and ablest men to serve in public employments. On the contrary, I may say that the law has worked so well, it has given such universal satisfaction, that I think it affords us a sufficient reason for adopting the provisions of that statute to a certain extent. I may add, moreover, that the officials employed by the provincial government of Quebec do not receive, as a rule, such high salaries as those employed by the Dominion Government; and if they manage to pay their legitimate debts and live under such a law, I do not see why the officials of the Dominion Government could not do the same thing.

Now, Sir, as I said before, although I am in favour of the principle of the Bill, I think that principle should not be carried too far. I think we should to a certain extent take into consideration the exigencies of the public service and the position of these men, and consequently, I think only a portion of the salary of the officials of this Government should be attachable as in England, as in France, as in the province of Quebec, and in the other provinces referred to by the member for Lisgar. In the operation of such a law there might be some force in this objection, and if this Bill goes into committee, I intend to move some amendments to it so as to make it as nearly as possible in accordance with the provisions of the provincial statute. There is no difficulty in working the Act. The writ of attachment, or whatever it is, is served upon the head or the deputy head of any department where the public official is employed. That head or deputy head transmits to the court a certificate showing the amount of salary payable to the official, and thereupon the judge declares the attachment valid and orders the deputy or the head of the department to pay to the plaintiff the amount attachable of such salary. It is not necessary, as you observe, for the deputy or the head of the department to leave his office and go to the court to declare what amount may be due to the public official.

But before we come to the consideration of the Bill I think we should examine whether this Parliament has jurisdiction to deal with the subject as to what may or may not be attachable; in other words, whether this law would be constitutional. It may be asked whether the attachment of the salaries of public officers for debt can be dealt with by the Dominion Parliament, or whether that must rest with the provincial parliaments to deal with. I must say that my impression is that it falls entirely within the jurisdiction of the provinces to deal with this subject.

Before the last session of the Quebec legislature commenced, as I was of the opinion that this subject came under the jurisdiction of the province, I had prepared a short Bill to amend our own code of civil procedure, and this Bill was entrusted to the eminent member for St. James Division of Montreal, Mr. Gouin. The Bill was introduced into the Quebec legislature. The Bill went through the legislative assembly, but unfortunately it was killed in the Upper House. It appears that measures of this kind that are progressive and liberal are liable to be killed by the Upper House, not only in this Parliament but in the provincial legislatures. But it is desirable to determine before we go further whether we have the necessary jurisdiction to deal with this matter or not. In the British North America Act hon. gentlemen will find a section referring to this subject.

Mr. PENNY. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman if this Parliament can legislate to attach salaries of merchants' clerks?

Mr. FORTIN. I do not believe so; and that is why I doubt very much that we can go so far as to say that any portion of the salary of a public employee of the Dominion can be attached. It seems to me that they fall under the terms of clause 13 of section 92 of the British North America Act, which gives to the different legislatures exclusive power to deal with property and civil rights in the provinces. To my mind there is no difference between declaring what portion of a salary shall be seizable and declaring whether a stove or stove-pipe or bedstead can be seized or not. It seems to me it is a question of civil right; it is civil property, which can only be dealt with by the legislature of the province. This is my own opinion, and I give it for what it is worth to the House. On the other hand, if hon. gentlemen will refer to section 91 of the British North America Act, they will find that by the enacting clause it is laid down as a rule that all subjects which do not expressly fall within section 92, belong to the Dominion Parliament, and we find in subsection 8 that Parliament may legislate as to the fixing of and providing for the salaries and allowances of civil and other officers of the Government of Canada. These are the only references I can find in support of the contention that the Parliament of the Dominion has jurisdiction to deal with this subject. The question was brought before the courts in an indirect way, and I will give the decisions for what they are worth. The question whether or not the Dominion Parliament has authority to deal with this question, the court was not called upon to decide. The question came up indirectly under the provisions of our provincial statute. Two cases were heard before the courts of Montreal. Rainville, J., in Crevier v. DeGrandpré & Lamothe, I.S. 5 L.N. p. 48, held:

(Translation.) I am of opinion that statute 38 Vic., ch. 12 does not apply to officers of the Dominion Government. The exemption of the salaries of public employees from seizure is a matter of constitutional law, and no provincial statute can affect the rights of employees of the federal Government.

The same judge decided, in the case of Evans v. Hudon & Browne, T.S. 22 L.C.J. 268:

That the exemption of the salaries of public employees from seizure is a matter of public order, and the Parliament of the province of Quebec has not the power to declare seizable the salaries of employees of the Federal Government, and, therefore, the collector of inland revenue in Montreal is not bound to make the return required by 38 Vic., chap. 12, sec. 5.

These cases do not exactly decide the point. The point submitted in these two cases was not whether a law enacted by this Parliament was constitutional or not; but the question came up indirectly, and the decisions show clearly that this learned judge, the late Mr. Justice Rainville, who was looked upon as a high authority in legal matters, took the view that a provincial legislature had not the power to deal with a question of this kind. I want it to be distinctly understood that although I have doubts as to whether the jurisdiction lies with this Parliament, I have not the slightest reluctance in declaring that a Bill of this kind should be enacted. I entirely approve of attaching the salaries of public officials, just as well as the salaries of other employees, clerks in banks, clerks in mercantile firms and elsewhere, which are seizable. I merely mention this question of authority in order that it may be elucidated by a full discussion in this House. I am not in favour of passing a law which may be attacked before the courts as unconstitutional. It will be far better to ventilate the matter now, and if we come to the conclusion that this Parliament has no power to deal with it, we might then content ourselves with the principle laid down in the first paragraph of the Bill, which has no reference to the salaries of public officers.

Mr. BRITTON. The Bill is a most important one, and I say at the outset that I am in sympathy with the object which the hon. member who proposes the Bill seeks to accomplish. I had thought of the subject before the Bill was introduced, and I read the Bill as soon as it was distributed and it seems to me that there are at least two most important questions which lie at the very outset of legislation of this kind which we ought to discuss, to say the least of it, and unless the hon. gentleman or some hon. member supporting the Bill is prepared to meet the difficulties which I will suggest, then there can hardly be any object in the House going into committee to-day on the Bill. It will be observed that the Bill is in two parts. The first provides :

1. All moneys in the hands of the Government of Canada, or under its control or management, and payable out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada shall be liable to attachment at the suit of any judgment creditor of any person to whom any portion of the said moneys is payable in the same manner and by the same process as moneys in the hands of private persons.

The only way to get at moneys that are payable by the Dominion to a creditor or to a person who claims to be a creditor, is by petition of right. The courts are not open to the ordinary suitor to make a claim against the Crown, and if this Bill should be passed just as it reads, that is a difficulty which would confront the judgment creditor. A way is attempted to be provided in the Bill of getting at moneys in the hands of the Crown without the procedure that our statute already provides, and I can easily understand that a person having a claim against the Government and where the privilege of suing by petition of right was denied him, he might, in collusion with some one else, allow a judgment to go against him, in order that this money might be attached and a case against the Crown be fought out on a garnishee proceeding of that kind, instead of on a petition of right, which, perhaps, he was not able to obtain. There is a legal difficulty in that way which stares me in the face in reading the first clause of the Bill. That, of course, involves the question which was raised by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fortin) as to the jurisdiction of the House to deal with a matter of this kind, and whether it does not come under the head of civil rights, and as to the enforcing of these rights as a matter of civil procedure which must be dealt with by the provinces themselves. If the provinces seek to deal with it, we have already a judgment of the higher court which says, that the provinces cannot deal with a question which is cognate to the one which we are now discussing. It has been decided that the provinces cannot tax the salaries of Dominion officials, and so the judges and the higher-paid officers of the civil service, living in any municipality, have their income entirely exempt from municipal taxation. If municipal bodies cannot deal with that question, then there might be a difficulty in their dealing with this question of attaching money in the hands of the Crown. The next part of this Bill seeks to provide for the attachment of the future salary of such person. It occurs to me that the wording of this section must be amended in committee. Of course, we cannot attach a future salary; but if the clause means that after this Act is passed, the salaries of Dominion officials shall be liable to attachment, the same as the salary of an ordinary servant of a corporation or an individual, then that can be made clear in committee. Then comes the difficulty, apart from the question of jurisdiction, apart from the question of our power to deal with civil rights; the difficulty comes up, that each province has a law for itself in reference to the attachment of the salaries of the individuals. In Ontario, you cannot attach wages unless there is at least $25 owing to a person. That is intended, of course, to prevent those earning small salaries having the wages taken away from the support of the family, and a just enough law it is. In each of the provinces there may be different legislation with regard to that, and it cannot be worked out in any general legislation, such as is attempted here, unless it goes a great deal further; and before it could go a great deal further, we would have to assure ourselves that we have the right to go a great deal further, the right to go far enough to provide the machinery for working out the attachment against money in the hands of this Dominion. That is the difficulty that lies at the very foundation of the Bill. It seems to me that every one in this House ought to seek to place the Dominion officials on no higher or better footing than the servants of ordinary corporations throughout the Dominion. We ought all to be in sympathy with that idea, and consequently we ought to be careful to see that our legislation is not entirely useless to effect the result that we aim at. It may be said: You admit there is an evil, and how do you propose to remedy that evil? It seems to me that the only way we can remedy it without infringement on provincial jurisdiction, would be some such legislation as this: That this Parliament gives the consent of the Crown, as indicated by Parliament, to the attachment of moneys in the hands of the Dominion, if the provincial legislatures think proper to pass a law making these moneys attachable. It is the consent of the Crown that is necessary in order to get at these moneys, and if this Parliament can give the consent of the Crown, then, I submit to gentlemen learned in the law, that we must leave it to be worked out by provincial legislation, on the two grounds I have mentioned: first, in regard to all moneys in the hands of the Crown, and, second, particularly in regard to this class of wages. Now, then, if my hon. friend (Mr. Richardson) is prepared, when the House goes into committee, to suggest amendments along the lines indicated by the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Fortin) and myself, then let us go into committee and pass legislation that will be of some benefit; but if not, perhaps the matter ought to be postponed until it has been more considered, and until some practical suggestion can be made that will tend to reach the result we seek.

Mr. MACLEAN. This proposition, to my mind, is meddlesome, and is not in line with the spirit of the times. I do not believe that we ought to be making additional laws for the collection of small debts; I believe that we should here, and especially in the provincial legislatures, rather pass legislation that would abolish these laws. As between two individuals, if a man has his goods and another man comes to him and asks him for these goods on credit, the man who owns the goods can protect himself while he has them in his possession, and he should not ask society to join him in collecting the debt, if he wishes to take the risk of disposing of those goods without cash payment. The curse of the day is the ease with which people get into debt, and if merchants and others understood that they were the guardians of their own goods and could not use society and the courts to collect their accounts, they would be much more careful in giving credit, and to that extent the public would be protected. All over the country we see that the principle of paying cash for goods is the only sound principle, and it is those merchants who sell for cash and do not give credit who make money; it is the man who gives credit that loses money. If the cash principle is coming into vogue more and more every day, then our legislation ought to be in the direction of encouraging people to buy for cash, and discouraging those who give credit. In the province of Ontario we have had a great deal of discussion about that matter, and, as far as I can gather, the trend of public opinion in Ontario is against the Division Court and the harshness with which the law is enforced in connection with it. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Richardson) who introduced the Bill, if it applies to the money under the control of Parliament out of which the indemnity of the members and the salaries of the officers of the House of Commons are paid?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Why, certainly.

Mr. MACLEAN. But the Bill refers only to moneys in the hands of the Government.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I meant that it should apply to all.

Mr. CAMERON. The salaries of the Ministers of the Crown, and Senators, and everybody else.

Mr. MACLEAN. Then, this Bill, as it is worded, does not apply.

Mr. BERGERON. The members' indemnity is not attachable by that Bill.

Mr. MACLEAN. Then, how do we appear before the country in respect to this matter? Here we have a Bill which says that the indemnity of the members and the salaries of the servants of this House are not attachable, but which says, on the other hand, that the salaries of those servants who are paid out of the Consolidated Fund, are attachable. This is legislation of a wrong kind. It is not in accordance with the spirit of the age, and we ought not to encourage it here, but should send the matter to the local legislature, where it belongs.

Mr. PENNY. Mr. Speaker, I cannot enter into the legal points of this Bill, as has been done by the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Fortin) and the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton), but I should like to put before the House the question from the merchant's standpoint. It has been found that some civil servants—I am glad to know not all of them—have taken advantage, and in many instances criminal advantage, of hiding behind the law as it is at present, to get out of paying their just debts. I ask, why should any one member of the community be favoured more than another? The ordinary citizen or the ordinary merchant's clerk is bound by law to pay his just debts, and the law can force him to do so, and I ask, why should any other man be screened in order that he may by a technicality avoid paying what he justly owes to his fellow-citizens? The civil servant is far more favoured than the ordinary merchant's clerk. He gets his salary on a certain day, and he knows he is sure of it, whereas the merchant's clerk in some instances has to wait several days; and, therefore, there is no reason why the civil servant should not pay his debts as they become due. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) has argued that the merchants should not give credit. Under ordinary circumstances I strongly condemn the credit system; but, as every one knows, exceptional circumstances may arise, under which a man may desire credit for a week or two; but that is no reason why he should be given advantages over his fellow-citizens. I represent a constituency which is composed to a very great extent of retail merchants, and I can say that one and all of them heartily endorse the principle of this Bill. In some instances, when they have gone to collect the debts due them, they have been met with the grossest impertinence and arrogance by civil servants. I ask, is this a proper state of affairs? I do not think any hon. member of this House will say that it is. Now, I wish it to be distinctly understood that I do not class the whole civil service in the category of those who wish to shirk their honourable responsibilities, because that would be very wrong. I am sure the great majority of the civil service of this country are above such contemptible practices; but there are in the service those who bring discredit upon their colleagues.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I wish to say a word or two in commendation of the attempt of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) to legislate in the direction of making the civil servants of the country honest. I have often heard it said in this House and outside of it that you cannot by Act of Parliament make people honest or moral. But there are exceptions to all rules, and I think that in this case we find an exception, because if such a Bill as is proposed is passed, we shall be able to make some at least of the civil servants of the Dominion honest, who are not so now and have not in the past been so. Therefore, I think this kind of legislation ought to commend itself to every member of this House. As has been said by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Penny), the civil servants of this country are in a better position to pay their debts than servants engaged in mercantile and other callings in life, because their salaries are fixed, and they know when they are going to get them. In fact, they get better salaries for the services they render than the men in similar positions in mercantile and other businesses, and they ought to be able to live within their means. Therefore, they are certainly to blame if they spend more than they honestly gain, and they ought to be taught by Act of Parliament to be honest men. I think it has been a great scandal in the Dominion of Canada for a long time that civil servants are at liberty to defy their creditors, and that this Parliament allows this state of affairs to continue, and retains in the service of the country men who, from time to time, get credit wherever they can, with the firm conviction that they are not going to pay certain debts, because the Government stands at their back and says that the creditor cannot seize or garnishee their salaries. I do not know anything about the question of jurisdiction, but certainly this Parliament has a sufficient number of legal gentlemen in it to be able to enact a law which will cover the ground. It is desirable that it should be covered, both in the interest of the Dominion, and for the credit of the civil service themselves. I suppose the larger proportion of the civil service pay their debts, and intend to pay them honestly, but there are some who have not done this, and who will not do it unless we by Act of Parliament compel them to do it. We had the statement made by the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Fortin) that the jurisdiction of the provinces has been set aside in this respect by two eminent judges in the province of Quebec, who have declared that the local legislature has not the power to pass an Act to garnishee the salaries of the servants of the Dominion Government. If that decision is correct, then certainly the Parliament that appoints these civil servants must have the power. Therefore, I think the legal gentlemen in this House, who usually give a good deal of attention to matters of this kind, ought to get their heads together, and frame some sort of enactment that will reach this difficulty. This is one of the few instances in which by legislation we can make men honest, and I think we ought to follow it out until we succeed.

Mr. MONK. Mr. Speaker, I do not quite coincide in the opinion of my hon. friend from Laval (Mr. Fortin) that this is a progressive liberal measure. A very large number of people will consider it a very harsh measure, and not without some cause. At any rate, I think the House should recognize that this measure is a very considerable innovation. Its scope is extremely large. It reaches any man who receives any money whatever from Dominion sources, the highest officials as well as the lowest, and it makes the whole of their salaries seizable.

There are also some details in the measure which, if it goes into committee, will require to be very considerably altered. In its present shape it is, at any rate so far as the laws of my province are concerned, utterly unworkable. For instance, it provides that the moneys can only be seized by a judgment debtor. Well, in the province of Quebec there are circumstances, exceptional if you will, which render it necessary at times for the creditor to seize before judgment, and this Bill would narrow the right down to the creditor who has obtained judgment. There is also the sweeping enactment in clause 2 which provides that the attachment shall be served upon the accountant of the department or the Auditor General. It is evident that in Montreal, where there is a very large number of persons receiving money from the Dominion Government, it will be extremely difficult for a creditor to seize in the hands of an accountant of a department, and be still more difficult and inconvenient for the accountant of the department to conform to the provisions of the code of procedure as regards declaring upon garnishment. The Bill also provides for seizure in the hands of the Auditor General, but I am not aware that the moneys of the Dominion are paid out by the Auditor General himself. They are paid upon his certificate or approval, but not by him. These, however, are matters of detail, and of course the Quebec legislature has recognized, impliedly at any rate, the unseizable character of the moneys of civil servants, paid from the Dominion treasury, as far as provincial legislation is concerned, by passing a special law providing that a certain portion of the salaries of provincial employees may be seized.

My experience is not in conformity with what has been stated by the hon. member for Laval, that this provision of law which makes a portion of the salary of the civil servants of the province of Quebec seizable, is one which has been executed without any difficulty. I believe that the opinion of the Government of the province of Quebec would be that that provision has caused considerable inconvenience to the public service. There are many reasons which go to show that a civil servant is not in the same position as an ordinary salaried man. In the first place, there is the public reason, which is the cause of the law being as it is to-day, that seizures of this kind will cause very considerable inconvenience and expense to the Government. In the province of Quebec, that has been found to be the case, and I have no doubt that in this larger sphere of the Dominion civil service these drawbacks will be still more considerable. There is also this consideration to be kept in mind. Take, for instance, a judge, because this Act, as I understand it, touches every person who is entitled to receive any money from the Dominion treasury. A judge, for instance, may be a man pre-eminently qualified to fulfil the duties of his position, in the fulfilment of which he is obliged to keep up a certain position, and if he be burdened with debt, however honest he may be, it will be impossible for him, under the provisions of this Act, to continue in his position. If the whole of his salary can be seized at the instance of a creditor, it will be impossible for him to continue occupying a seat on the bench. This will apply to a great many men of ability, honest men, in the employ of the Government, who, in consequence of that employment, have to keep up a certain station, and are therefore liable to be ousted from their positions by the sweeping provisions of this Bill.

I have no doubt that we have jurisdiction. It seems to me that later holdings and the judgments of the Privy Council are in this direction, that in a case of this kind, where, to a certain extent, you invade the domain proper of civil rights, still there is dominating that invasion the principle that we must have the absolute, free control over all our agents; and certainly one of the elements of that control, and perhaps the most important, is the power to decree under what conditions they shall be paid and what shall be the character—seizable or non-seizable—that will attach to the salaries we pay them.

Two objections were raised by the hon member for Kingston (Mr. Britton). One was that this Bill attacked the prerogative of the Crown. We cannot, as a rule, proceed against the Crown except by petition of right, but if we enact a law of this kind, it will constitute a renunciation on the part of the Crown of that prerogative, and it seems to me that Parliament has the right to do so by decreeing that attachment may issue against the Crown.

For the reasons I have given, I do not agree in the principle of this Bill. I would only admit of its being enacted under the restrictions which exist in the province of Quebec; but I believe it would be better for Parliament not to interfere with the present state of affairs.

Mr. GIBSON. I have noticed on several occasions that when Bills are introduced by members of Parliament who are not members of the legal profession, there is always a large number of that fraternity disposed to criticise them on general principles. I have had some experience in my time with men getting into debt and having their wages garnisheed month after month, and the objections raised by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken seem to me very flimsy. Take the railway corporations of this Dominion and see how the present law applies to them. Why, in the interest of the railway companies it has been the best thing that has ever taken place, and it has been the means of keeping, to a very large extent, railway employees from getting into debt as they formerly did, when it was a very expensive matter to garnishee the wages of employees. The railways have just the same difficulties to contend against as the Dominion Government, and they cover just as large an area. Our railway corporations cover the whole area of the Dominion, and they have no difficulty, when garnishees are entered against their employees, retaining for the time being the amount of money that is claimed by the merchants or those to whom the employee is indebted, until the matter is finally settled.

Now, what has been the result? The railway companies have set their faces against their employees getting into debt, and, as a matter of discipline, they have issued an order that has been in existence for very many years—for a long time, at all events—not only in the Dominion of Canada but in the United States, and railway managers tell me that it has had this salutary effect, that they have not one garnishee order now where formerly they had hundreds. And why is this? Simply because that for an employee to have his salary garnisheed a second time means dismissal, and because even if he is garnisheed for a debt that he has contracted before he entered the railway service, he takes good care to keep out of debt thereafter.

So far as the civil service of this country is concerned, if the law applies to every individual employer of labour throughout this broad Dominion, surely this same law ought to apply to Dominion officials, and this Parliament ought to set itself right upon that matter immediately. There are a large number of good men in our civil service of Canada who never get into debt. But, as the law now stands the Parliament of Canada actually encourages the dishonest civil servant to get into debt and keep in debt, and if the merchant dares to attempt to extort money from him, he has the merchant boycotted by his friends, and the result is that instead of an honest attempt being made by the civil servant to retrieve his lost ground, he goes deeper into debt, for he changes his merchant, and goes on from bad to worse. My hon. friend (Mr. Monk) who has just taken his seat, said that the civil servant had to keep up a certain position. I claim that no man is obliged to keep up a position beyond his income, and I think every civil servant in this country is well enough paid to keep out of debt at all events, and this Parliament should be the last body to give encouragement to anything of that kind. My hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) is afraid of members of Parliament having their indemnity attached. I, for one, should be very glad if this measure were sweeping enough to take in members of Parliament as well.

Mr. MACLEAN. Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has perverted what I said. I asked if the Bill covered that point and said if it did not I wish that it could be made to apply to the indemnity of members. And, now for the sake of a little political capital he puts this speech in my mouth.

Mr. GIBSON. I am glad that the hon. gentleman takes that view, for on that point I am quite in accord with him.

Mr. MACLEAN. And yet by this Bill, the Cabinet Ministers and lawyers who serve the Government will have their money exempt from seizure.

Mr. GIBSON. But I was rather amused when my hon. friend from East York said that nobody had any right to give credit. I would ask my hon. friend where many of us would have been in business if we had not been able to get credit in the earlier portion of our careers. The credit system is good enough so long as the men who sell their goods have confidence in those to whom they sell them and believe that they will be repaid the amount that is due them. So far as the civil servants who are in the habit of paying their just debts and who are free from debt are concerned, this law would not affect them at all. But what Parliament should do, is, as some speaker on this side has said, is to remove this standing disgrace from the name of the civil service of Canada, that their salaries cannot be attached. Why should any exception be made of one class or of a certain number of individuals? The law should apply to all. As Dominion officials are not employed in any particular province, this is the proper place as I think, and as I submit to the consideration of the House, to deal with the matter. We should not be legislating outside of our sphere. I think it is within the power of Parliament, and Parliament should take speedy measures to see that those civil servants who disobey the law in this regard and who have been in the habit in the past of wilfully getting into debt, even in carrying out the views of my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr.

Mr GIBSON.

Monk) that they must keep up appearance for appearance sake, should be compelled to change their course. I think it is far more to the credit of a civil servant to have a seedy coat and be free from debt than to come up here with a gold-headed cane and owing every second man he meets. For one, I am heartily in accord with the principles of the Bill. There may be features in it that can be improved when the matter is threshed out in committee, but I earnestly hope that members on both sides, irrespective of political feeling, will assist the hon. gentleman who has this measure in charge and set at rest for all time to come this pernicious system, the survival of a past age, of allowing one class or body of men to be exempt from the general law.

Mr. CASEY. When my attention was first called to this Bill, I understood it was entirely for the purpose of subjecting the salaries of civil servants and other employees of the Government to be garnisheed in the ordinary way. I was quite in accord with that principle and therefore declared my unqualified support of the Bill. My attention has since been called to the fact that the wording of the Bill seems to give it a larger range and to make it apply to all moneys owing by the Crown, as under contract or in any other way whatever. It has been urged, and, I think with some force, that this might be going too far. It has been urged that the prerogative right of the Crown to refuse to be sued in certain cases should not be encroached upon by this Act at all events, and that other than the summary proceeding necessary to a garnishee order should be taken to tie up moneys owing in the way I have mentioned. I fancy that statement of the case has a great deal of force, and it is probable that if we adopt the Bill, its language must be amended in committee so as to mean only what most of us supposed it meant. Coming to the real meaning of the Bill, the placing of the salaries of civil servants under the ordinary law in regard to garnishee orders, I am quite in favour of it. My hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) has given a very strong illustration of the usefulness of such an Act from his knowledge of railway matters. There is no doubt that the facility of getting pay from a railway employee by garnishee order has led to greater economy on the part of the men, and to a better system altogether. There is no doubt that the same good results would follow in the case of the civil servants.

I say this as a friend of the civil servant. I think I have shown during all the years I have been in this House that I have a friendly feeling toward the civil service of this country.

I do not think that the civil service are any more inclined, as a body, to get into debt than any other class. I do not think that they are more extravagant than other people on limited salaries, with an opportunity to get rid of those salaries in keeping up their positions. My arguments on this particular Bill and in favour of this particular provision do not imply a slur upon the character of the civil servant as a man willing to pay when he has the money. But I say it is a slur upon the character of the civil servant, to exempt him in the special manner in which the law now exempts him from the ordinary liabilities of a citizen. I think that this Bill will take the civil servant out of a position of an Indian who cannot be sued at law, and put him in the position of a citizen who is liable to be sued and have his salary garnished the same as anybody else.

It has been urged that civil servants abuse the credit given them by merchants and others. Perhaps they do, perhaps many other people who are not civil servants may do the same thing. But there is another view of the case. The mere fact that the civil servant's salary is exempted as it now is limits his credit. Not only is the civil servant who is inclined to be dishonest, tempted to abuse what credit he may have with the merchants, but another civil servant who wishes to be honest has his credit limited—both by the operations of the present law. A very cautious merchant will not give credit to a man whose salary is not liable in the ordinary way for his debts. That involves an unfairness to an economical manager of his salary. No doubt this new proposition would involve some little trouble to the Government, but I say that the Government should not object, or hesitate for a moment, to accept and to undergo that trouble. As the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) has pointed out, it can be no more trouble to them than to the large railway companies, and even if they were troubled, they should accept it in the public interests. There is no surrender of the prerogative that I can see in this matter of salaries, though there might be in the wider case which this Bill appears, in its present terms, to cover. I think, therefore, from the point of view of the civil servant, from the point of view of the Government, and from the point of view of the man with whom the civil servant deals, there is an advantage in adopting this Bill. I am heartily glad the hon. gentleman has brought it in, and I hope it will pass the second reading and be amended in committee so as to mean exactly what we wish it to mean.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). There are many serious questions involved in this Bill which I think should lead us to postpone it. I think it will be found that much benefit will be derived by postponing the consideration of this Bill until we have had greater opportunities to look into it. This Bill seems to me very much more far-reaching in its consequences than at first sight appears. You have got, for instance, to take it for granted that the Crown cannot be sued except by way of petition of right, that is to say, the Crown cannot be brought before the courts of the country except with the consent of the Crown. Now, if you pass this law, under the first clause you will be in this position, that a contractor who has a claim against the Crown, and who has applied for a petition of right, which petition of right has been refused, may exercise his claim against the Crown by virtue of this provision. Let me point out in what way. A contractor goes to a friendly creditor, and by collusion with the creditor, induces him to attach moneys in the hands of the Crown that he pretends are due to him. The Crown is obliged to appear before the court and declare whether or not it is indebted to the contractor. Thereupon the issue is engaged, the whole contest is fought out, and the petition of right, the whole principle of the protection of the Crown, is set at defiance. That is one of the consequences which would result from this Bill if allowed to pass in its present form. Now, I think that my hon. friend from Laval (Mr. Fortin) has not had sufficient confidence in his own judgment. He says that personally he is doubtful whether it is within the scope of this Parliament to pass legislation of this sort. I am quite aware that there have been cases in the province of Quebec, the few cases to which he referred, which went that far, and they declared that the local government or the local provincial Parliament have not the right to attach the salary of an official of the Federal Parliament. That is the case so far as our province is concerned. There have been two judgments which settle that principle, but they were judgments of the Superior Court alone and those judgments were never carried into appeal. But in Ontario you have the case of Leprohon and the city of Ottawa, which case went so far as the Ontario Court of Appeal; and there, by a divided judgment confirming the judgment of the lower court, it was settled that the provincial legislature had not the right to give power to a municipality to tax the salaries of a public officer in the service of the Dominion Government. Now, if that was good law, of course the necessary logical conclusion would be that the local authorities would have no right to deal with this matter at all. But I say it is impossible to conciliate the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Toronto, in the case of Leprohon and the city of Ottawa, with the judgment of the Privy Council in the case of the Bank of Toronto and Lambe. I have not got the case before me, but no doubt it is well known to all the legal gentlemen here. In that case it was held that the local authorities had power to tax the banks, within the limits of the province, upon their whole capital. Now, banks and banking are exclusively under the authority and control of the fedral power, and if that be so, and if the Privy Council has determined in defiance of the case of Leprohon and the city of Ottawa, that it is within the powers of the local legislature to tax banks and to levy upon their capital, what difference in principle is there between their doing so and a local legislature taxing the salaries of public officials—I mean to say in principle? There may be considerations which may apply in detail, but in principle I can see no distinction. Any hon. gentleman who is interested in the abstract question, can consult with advantage a book which has just been published by Lefroy on the British North America Act, there the case is discussed in the most admirable manner. He will find there the principle laid down in the case of the Bank of Toronto and Lambe, and since that time there is now very much doubt that the judgment in Leprohon and the city of Ottawa can have any further authority in our courts. Now, if we are placed face to face with that position, why should we go further to consider this Bill, at the present time at all events, without giving this matter very serious consideration? Why should we go so far as to have this doubtful principle applied? Suppose we declare here that the salaries of public officials in the employ of the Federal Government are attachable, and find ourselves in Quebec face to face with the statute there which declares that they are not attachable, immediately a conflict of authority would arise, which it seems to me desirable we should avoid. Now, I would like to draw the attention of the House to this other aspect of the case. The last paragraph of this Bill appears to me to be a clear infringement of the rights of the local Parliament to regulate the procedure in the courts. It is provided here by paragraph 3 how the creditors are to proceed to levy a judgment. I say that is a matter to be settled by the provincial courts, it is a matter over which we have no control, with which we cannot deal at all. Clearly then we have got to eliminate, at all events, that part of the Bill entirely from our consideration. Now, some of my hon. friends have made reference to the civil servants. I think it is only fair that I should draw attention to this fact. The civil servant who enters the employ of the Government makes a contract with the Government. At the time he makes that contract he assumes that he is going to contract obligations subject to the laws that exist at the time. If a man is induced to enter the civil service, and gives good value for the money he receives, if a man who has been unfortunate in business enters the service on the understanding that he will be free from attacks by judgment creditors, it would be very unfair, after he had entered the service, that his contract should be violated. That would be an improper act, and could not be justified.

Mr. FITZPATRICK.

Mr. FOSTER. Where does the contract exist?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. When he entered the service, there was an implied contract between the parties, and he takes his position subject to the laws that then exist. Of course, there can be modifications of the laws. Our laws are not as the laws of the Medes and Persians, that cannot be altered. The law may be amended, but it should not be amended lightly and without due consideration being given to the rights the members of the civil service possess.

Mr. MACLEAN. Would the Solicitor General answer the question whether the Bill covers the salaries of members and Senators, and payments made to attorneys for conducting Crown cases?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. If they are paid out of the Consolidated Fund.

Mr. SPROULE. As I interpret this law, it seems to me it would apply equally to members of Parliament and members of the Senate, as to members of the civil service, because all the moneys paid in these cases respectively are under the control of the Parliament of Canada. The Consolidated Revenue Fund is under the control of the Parliament of Canada, because we pass votes for every department and for every purpose for which money is required. The Bill provides:

All moneys in the hands of the Government of Canada or under its control or management, and payable out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada—

The indemnity paid to members is payable out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

—shall be liable to attachment at the suit of any judgment creditor of any person to whom any portion of the said moneys is payable, in the manner and by the same process as moneys in the hands of private persons.

That language is as plain as it can be made, and it applies to members of Parliament and members of the Senate the same as to any persons in the outside or inside civil service.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. So it should.

Mr. SPROULE. I hold that it does apply, and that it should apply. But it occurs to me that it is in conflict with the principle at present existing and carried out, that no persons can collect money from the Crown except by petition of right. In this case we give leave in advance. Such a law would apply to contractors, as well as to civil servants and members of Parliament. There seems to be two objects in this Bill: First, to give authority to collect money from the Crown; second, to say how it could be collected, or to lay down a way. In laying down that way, it is clearly an invasion on the rights of the provincial legislatures, and it is an authority that can only be given by a provincial legislature, and not by the Dominion Parliament. Section 2 provides as follows :—

Process for the attachment of the said moneys shall be served upon the accountant of the department—

Where is the difficulty of serving such a notice on the accountant of the House of Commons, or the accountant of the Senate ?

—by which they are payable, or in the case of an attachment against moneys payable out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada, upon the Auditor General.

If moneys are not payable to any department, or through the accountant of any department, then the process may be served upon the Auditor General. But section 3 appears to have an entirely different object in view. It applies solely to civil servants. The first section may or may not apply to civil servants ; but if it does apply to civil servants, it also applies to members of Parliament and to contractors, or to any one receiving money from the Crown ; but section 3 applies only to civil servants, and it applies to the salaries coming due. The previous clause appears to apply to money in the hands of the Crown already earned ; the last clause applies to money to be earned, under a contract of employment, a civil servant hiring for a year, or a contractor earning money under contract with the Crown. The Bill is very crudely drawn and appears to go very much further than the hon. gentleman who introduced it intended. I agree with the opinion expressed by the hon. Solicitor General, that it would be much better to consider this Bill very carefully before the House endeavours to crystallize a crude Bill of this nature into law, and find afterwards that it conflicts with the law at present in force. I am entirely in sympathy with the aim of the hon. gentleman who introduced the Bill. I never could see any reason why civil servants should be in the position of wards of the Government, like Indians, and why they should not occupy a similar position to other persons in the community. A civil servant should stand in the same relationship, with respect to his debts and the collection of those debts, as any other member of the community. I do not see why he should be exempted any more than any one else. It should be an inducement to him, so far as possible, to keep himself out of the toils of the law, and he should endeavour to stand with as high credit as possible under the circumstances.

Mr. CAMERON. I have a word or two to say on this subject. The hon. members for Laval and Kingston have expressed some doubts as to the power of this Parliament to pass the legislation proposed. Great lawyers and great men have always doubts. Thank goodness, I never have any doubts, and I do not admit, in the least, that the Parliament of Canada has not the power to pass this Bill, if it sees fit to pass it, in its present shape. Whether the Bill is a good one or a poor one, is another question. I cannot see any reason, either, why we should limit the operation of this Bill to poor civil servants. I think every man receiving allowances from the Crown should come under the provisions of this Bill or some other Bill. What reason is there why members of Parliament should escape payment of honest debts, while we make poor civil servants, on perhaps $600 a year, pay their debts ? Why should the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and distinguished members of the Cabinet, not be compelled to pay their honest debts ? My own idea on the subject is, that if the Bill should pass, it should apply to every class—judges, legislators, Senators, Ministers of the Crown and lieutenant-governors. Why, I know of a lieutenant-governor who could not get a pair of shoes on credit. I know a judge who was up before another judge half a dozen times, and escaped on the ground that it was of importance that the position should be sustained, when he could not pay a grocery bill. I know an inspector of inland revenue who had judgments galore against him, and, on the attempt being made to garnishee, appeared before a judge of the county under our Ontario procedure, for examination, and escaped upon the ground that these salaries were assigned by the Government to the civil servants to maintain the dignity of the position, when that man could not pay his grocer's bill—or if he could, he never did. He drew a salary of $1,600 and lived like a nabob, and yet escaped the payment of his little debts. My own opinion is that the Bill should go to the extreme limit. When I say that, I do not mean to say that it would apply to one-tenth of the civil servants. I do not believe it would. I believe the great mass of the civil servants pay their honest debts, but unfortunately we know that there are civil servants who will not pay their debts if they can escape, and under the law as it is they can escape. You may sue them, you may get judgment against them, but what is the use of a judgment against a civil servant who has nothing in the world to depend upon but the salary he gets from the Government. And so they escape the payment of their debts for the absolute necessities of life ; their grocer's bill remains unpaid, their shoemaker's bill remains unpaid, their baker's and their butcher's bill all remain unpaid. I know of such men within my own knowledge, and I say it is a scandal to the law of the land. Perhaps I should say it is not creditable to the Administration when they allow civil servants to remain in office who will not pay their honest debts. Now, Sir, we have the power here ; if we have not the power we are bound to resort to the local legislatures, but we certainly cannot give the local legislatures power. Those civil servants have their rights and incomes under the Union Act. There is a provision in the Union Act enabling this Government to provide for and fix the salaries of civil servants, and that question was fully argued before our Court of Appeal some years ago in the case the Solicitor General has referred to. It is well to understand the ground on which the Court of Appeal based its judgment. My hon. friend the Solicitor General has some doubts about the correctness of that judgment, but I am quite sure if he had read the judgment and the reasoning therefor, he would have no doubt whatever. I believe the judgment cannot be impeached in the slightest degree. The Court of Appeal, in giving judgment in that case, said :

Under clause 8 of the Union Act the Dominion Government is vested with the power of fixing and providing for the salaries and allowances of civil and other officers of the Dominion of Canada. If the Dominion Government is vested with the power of providing for and fixing the salaries, the assumption is that no other Government and no other power can interfere with that.

The court further said :

To permit a municipality, under a provincial law, to tax a Dominion salary, would, in effect, be to allow a provincial legislature under a provincial law to appropriate a portion of the Dominion revenue for provincial purposes. The Dominion salary is fixed by the Dominion, regulated by the Dominion, paid by the Dominion, and to allow a local legislature by a local law to interfere with that would be allowing a local legislature to interfere with a Dominion law.

The court further said :

To permit a local legislature by law to appropriate a part of a Dominion salary would be to deprive the Dominion of the power to fix the salary of its officials, contrary to the terms of the constitution, and thus impair, if not defeat, the operation of the federal power.

The reasons assigned by the Court of Appeal in giving judgment in that case appear to me to be conclusive to show that we have the power, and that we cannot vest the local legislatures with any such power.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that I approve entirely of the principle of the Bill ; if you can carry out that principle in an Act of Parliament at all. I may say further, that during the recess I paid a very considerable amount of attention to the framing of a Bill that would cover the whole case. I prepared half a dozen Bills, I examined every Canadian and English and American authority I could get on the subject, and I rose from the task with the firm conclusion in my mind, that no lawyer can prepare a Bill that will meet the object sought to be accomplished. It cannot be done ; and there are various reasons for it. Even if you could do it, what would be the result to the Government ? It is proposed to proceed by garnishee ; you have fifty garnishees, you have to employ fifty lawyers to look after them in fifty different divisions, and the expense to the Government would be simply enormous. It would pay the Government better, in my judgment, to pay the debts altogether than to submit to this process of garnishee proceedings. You would have in Ottawa a number of clerks for the purpose of keeping record of all these transactions. In country places you would have to employ lawyers to protect the rights of the Government, because one could easily understand that there might be collusion between the creditor and the debtor in order to fleece the Government, and so to protect the Government you would have to employ lawyers. It will be a grand harvest for the lawyers, I admit, if the Government allow this Bill to pass. It would be a grand harvest for the officials, but it does not pay the creditor and it will not pay the Government.

Another thing, you know that in 99 per cent of these cases, the amount involved is under $200, and these are within the jurisdiction of the division courts. Now, if the clerk of the division court issues a garnishee proceeding against the Government, how are you going to enforce the garnishee order when you have it ? We may pass a Bill to provide thus far, to get the judgment and to get the attachment order, but will the Solicitor General or one of the wise Ministers now on the Treasury benches tell me how you can get beyond the garnishee proceedings ? There is no process by which you can attach the Government ; they are not bound to pay the least attention to it. The case of Wilcox vs. Pirrell, 3 Law Reports, Exchequer Division, England, discusses the whole question, and it shows that when you attempt to go beyond the attaching order you are stopped. It is true you can take the proceeding known in the English courts, and known in some of our courts, of sequestration and injunction. You can proceed against the Government to sequester the officer's salary and an injunction to restrain the Government paying it over to the official ; but in the name of common sense, who will undertake the proceeding. Suppose the amount of the debt is $30, $40 or $50, why, the sequestration and injunction proceedings alone would cost, before they were finally settled, four or five hundred dollars, and is it to be conceived that any of these small creditors will risk the payment of that enormous sum in order to secure the payment of a small debt. It is a shadowy remedy ; it is no remedy at all. It is no protection to the honest creditor ; it is no punishment to the dishonest debtor, because you never can reach him. I say this Parliament has no power except through the Exchequer Court, or by a sequestration proceeding with an injunction; I deny its power to enforce an attaching order or to go a step beyond an attaching order. Then, Sir, tell me what is the sense of discussing this Bill? The law officers of the Crown ought at once tell us that a proceeding of this kind is wholly valueless.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The Solicitor General pointed out that.

Mr. CAMERON. The suggestion which I propose to make will, I think, cover the whole case, but the Bill does not go far enough.

It attacks only the salaries of officials, and, it is said by the Solicitor General, moneys due by the Crown to contractors. If it goes that far, for my own part, I would be opposed to that portion of the Bill. One can easily understand the complications and difficulties that might arise in case a creditor stepped in and took a garnishee proceeding for moneys due a contractor. But as to the civil servants and the judges and the members of the Government, and all officials, I do not know any reason why a creditor should not be able to proceed against them in a cheap and simple way. You cannot do it by Act of Parliament, but you can do it in some other way. Let me suggest to the gentlemen on the Treasury benches a way in which it could be done and ought to have been done long ago. Let them adopt the American system. The Government at Washington have adopted a system which costs nothing. You do not require a garnishee order, or an order of sequestration, or an injunction, or anything of the kind. You can do it with the stroke of a pen, and do it at once. I am not as a rule in favour of taking lessons from the Yankees; but it is well sometimes, when they lay down a good rule, to act on it. The Secretary of the Treasury at Washington issued a circular to the employees to the effect that all clerks receiving a stated salary who neglected to pay their debts, without presenting satisfactory reasons therefor, should not be retained in the service. Let this Government pass an Order in Council or resolution that, if it can be shown, for instance, by the production of a certificate of the clerk of a township or a town, that A. B. is three months in arrear in his taxes, or a certificate from the clerk of a court, under his signature and seal, that a judgment has been obtained against C. D., a civil servant, and that that debt or judgment has remained unsatisfied for three months, that man's office shall thereupon become vacant.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Would you apply that to members of Parliament?

Mr. CAMERON. Yes, I would. At least, I would not apply it so much to members as I would to the gentlemen on the Treasury benches. If you take that course, mark my words, you will not be troubled very long with civil servants being in arrear. There will be very few to run the risk of having unsatisfied judgments recorded against them. When you let the civil servants understand their position, there will be very few of them who will not pay their debts in full; and I say to the Government, and to any government, that it is not creditable, it is not maintaining the dignity of the civil service, to leave it possible for them to be brought before a judge of a county court and examined touching their estate, for the non-payment of their butcher's bill, or their tailor's bill or their shoemaker's bill, and retain their positions. I know that the late Government had a great many faults—they were nearly all faults; but that was a fault which in some cases they did not commit. I know of two civil servants who were removed some years ago by a Minister of the Crown because they did not pay their debts. One of these was in arrear for his tailor's bill, for the very clothes he wore, and the Minister thought that if he could buy clothes, the least he could do was to pay for them out of his salary, and his services were dispensed with. That was the proper course to take, and I hope this Government will put it on a substantial and unchangeable ground, and will pass an order notifying all civil servants in the sense I have indicated; and if they do, I say again, the Government will have no trouble and no expense, the civil servant will have all the protection to which he is entitled, and the creditor will be enabled to obtain what is due to him.

Mr. FOSTER. How will the hon. gentleman apply that to cabinet ministers?

Mr. CAMERON. I am afraid we will have to pass a special statute respecting cabinet ministers and ex-cabinet ministers.

Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Speaker, I am in sympathy with the object of the Bill now before the House, and I would like to see it passed into law, even in some amended form. I am in sympathy with it because I think it is going to be beneficial both to the creditors of the civil service and to the civil service themselves. When the civil servants find that they are placed on the same basis as clerks in other institutions, they will practice economy to the extent that will enable them to pay their just debts. I do not think that the whole of the salary of the civil servant should be attached. The law of Ontario leaves $25 to the labouring man or any other one whose salary is attached, although I understand that in some of the other provinces all the salary is attachable. But if the House passes this Bill, I think it would be right to leave some portion of the salary of civil servants unattachable to be applied to the immediate wants of their families. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) says that the Bill is far-reaching in its scope. Well, we might take the wording of the Ontario Act which was passed very recently, and which defines the classes to whom it applies. I am not going to say that the law should be so sweeping in its operation as to take in the indemnity of members of Parliament, although I will not object to it if it does. The words of the Ontario Act are :

The word "employee," when used in this Act, shall for the purposes of this Act mean any officer, clerk, messenger or other employee of the Government of the province attached or belonging to the departmental staff of the civil service of Ontario at the seat of government, and shall also include the officers, clerks and employees of the Government of the province attached or belonging to the offices of the courts mentioned in section 32 of the Ontario Public Service Act.

If the Government think that this is far enough for this Bill to go, it can be so amended ; but I do hope to see it become law in some form, so that the civil servants will be put on the same footing as clerks in other institutions. I have been told in Ottawa that it is not the clerks on small salaries whom the merchants and others have to complain of, but that it is those receiving large salaries. We will not be doing them any injustice, while we will be doing an act of justice to their creditors, by placing them in a position to collect their debts. I am pleased that the Bill is not to be retroactive, because in that way the civil servants will be forewarned that they must not be extravagant and must not live beyond their salaries.

Mr. TAYLOR. It appears to be the consensus of opinion of members on both sides of the House that a measure should be enacted on the lines suggested by the Bill. I would suggest that the Bill be read a second time, and be then referred to a special committee composed of two or three of our best lawyers and one or two common-sense men ; and let them whip the Bill into shape. I merely throw this out as a suggestion. I think it is the best way to deal with the Bill.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Those who have followed the course of the debate have no doubt by this time become convinced that a very large number of members believe that an evil exists which ought to be removed, and I have no doubt myself that the hon. gentleman who introduced this Bill had in his mind's eye this evil and desired to remedy it. But I think that the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) and the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) have both shown that the Bill is not primarily aimed at the evil which the introducer says exists. The primary object of this Bill, as contained in the first section, is to enable people who think they have claims of one kind or another against the Crown, which the Crown will not gratify them to have tried by petition of right, to have these claims investigated in a roundabout way by means of garnishee orders. I will undertake to say that if any hon. gentleman introduced a Bill of that kind simply on its merits, it would not receive very much countenance from hon. gentlemen on either side. Those who have been members of the Government formerly and those who are members of the Government now, and hon. gentlemen who have legal experience in connection with petitions of right, know well that governments are always specially careful to give any man who has a fair semblance of claim a fiat, in order that the justice of his claim may be tested in the courts. Experience shows that no really honest case is ever refused investigation at the hands of any government, and therefore I submit that it would be unwise for the House to countenance legislation which practically would have the effect of overriding the petition of right Act. This debate has turned almost entirely upon the necessity of introducing legislation to enable the salaries of civil servants to be garnisheed, but that is only incidentally touched in this Bill. Neither its first nor second section relates to that. It does not seem to me that that was the object of the mover. The third section makes some reference to it. It was dragged into that section in order to attract attention from those hon. gentlemen who are in favour of something being done in that regard. The judgment given by the Appeal Court of Ontario in the case of Leprohon against the city of Ottawa and also the judgment given by the Supreme Court of New Brunswick in the case of ex parte Owen lead me to the conclusion that no legislation can take place by a local Parliament which will have the effect of garnisheeing the pay this Parliament gives to servants engaged in Dominion work. I doubt very much whether legislation can be passed by a local legislature overcoming the difficulty which exists, but I think it would be possible, notwithstanding what my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. Cameron) has said, for this Parliament to enact a declaration, in some way or other, that the principle which prohibits the salary of civil servants from being attached should be removed. Some general law of that kind might be passed. When that difficulty is removed, then the local legislatures may enact a law enabling these salaries to be attached. I do not think, however, that hon. gentlemen are prepared at once to say that every poor man on the Intercolonial, for instance, will be liable to have his whole salary—for this Bill does not limit the amount—taken and his family go without food.

Now, I want to say a word to my hon. friends. Sneers are constantly being made at the civil servants, as if a large proportion of them are dishonest and do not pay their debts. I want to say, as a Minister who has been about twenty months in charge of a department, that there never has been a complaint made to me of one employee refusing to pay his debts. I am not aware that any of the employees of my department refuse to pay their debts. I am told, and I believe it is true, that the Intercolonial does take care by regulations to provide, as far as those regulations ought to be pushed, that the employees in the department do pay their debts; and if it is reported to the head of the department that one of the employees is not paying his debts, official steps are taken to insure that a fair proportion of his salary will be apportioned to pay debts which have been incurred for the support of his family. However, be that as it may, I take it there is not an hon. member in this House who is prepared to assume the responsibility of adopting this Bill as it stands.

Nor are they prepared to adopt even the third section of the Bill limiting the attachments to salary. My hon. friend from Laval pointed out that it would be unjust to attach the whole salary, and that we should adopt the system followed in the province of Quebec. I submit that in the different circumstances of the different provinces the local legislatures are in a better position to determine what proportion of these salaries should be attached and what left for the support of the family, than we are. Different rules prevail in the different provinces. These are matters which can be better determined by the provincial legislatures, and with the assistance which the Government have gained from the debate to-day, I think the better plan would be to let the matter stand over and give the Government opportunity to see whether it would be possible to introduce some legislation by which the prohibition now existing against attaching the salaries of civil servants might be removed and let the machinery for the attachment be afterwards carried out, if it can be, by the different provincial legislatures. My own judgment coincides very largely with that of the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron). I sat down also and tried to work the thing out and failed. If you make the service on the Auditor General, of every attachment that goes out from one part of Canada to the other, he will have to employ an army of lawyers, and the expense will be appalling.

Mr. BERGERON. What about the plan of the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron)?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That plan commends itself to my mind very much. I think it is a plan which probably could be worked out, and if that is the evident sense of the House, I dare say the Government will take a note of it. Something of the kind is carried out by the Railway Department, and the same principle which has been for some years in operation in that department might be applied by the Treasury Board, in some careful and guarded way, to the other branches of the public service. I think it would be better therefore that the debate should be adjourned and the matter carefully considered when the Bill comes up again. I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Before the debate is adjourned, I wish to say that I am entirely in accord with the object which the hon. member for Lisgar seeks to accomplish by his Bill, and I am sure that in that object he meets the approval of the commercial community. I consider that a measure of this kind is not only advantageous but absolutely necessary. No one can know better how necessary it is than those who are in business along the line of the Intercolonial Railway. We all, who have any experience over that route, know that employees of the Intercolonial are in the habit of making considerable exactions on the public. There are Intercolonial employees who will open a credit in one store, and when that is exhausted, choose another victim, and keep that process up as long as the public will stand it. A law to prevent this is not only necessary for the protection of the public but also for the protection of the railway employees themselves who pay their debts. Those who do not pay their debts give a bad reputation to the others. Last summer, I induced the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) to send a circular to all the employees, telling them that if they did not pay their debts, or come to some agreement with their creditors, they should be dismissed. And I was thanked by nearly two-thirds of the employees of the Intercolonial, because, they said, their reputations had previously been endangered by those who did not pay their debts. But a very interesting question arises in this case, that is, whether we have jurisdiction in the matter. For my part, I say decidedly that I do not think we have jurisdiction, while the provinces have. If we look at the code of procedure of the province of Quebec, at article 628 of the former code—and the same thing is repeated in article 599 in the new code—it is provided that the salaries of public officials are exempt from seizure, and that the salaries of public servants of the province shall be seizable up to one-fifth of the monthly payment, and so on. So, we see, the local legislature of the province of Quebec have declared that they have the right to exempt from seizure all the salaries of public employees, and have made an exception only in the case of employees of the province, whose salaries shall be seizable in part. So, the right of declaring the exemption from seizure of public employees has been taken by the province, and I think the province has the right to do so. Therefore, though I am entirely in accord with the Bill, and though wishing, for one, that all the provinces would enact laws to compel public employees to pay their debts, putting them upon the same footing as other citizens, I cannot support the measure, as I think it is beyond our jurisdiction. But I think the very best law is one such as the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) has suggested—that the Government should pass an Order in Council, or send a circular, saying that public employees who do not pay their debts, or come to some agreement with their creditors, should be dismissed. I think this law would be the best in form, the easiest to work, and the most satisfactory in its results.

Mr. LEMIEUX. (Translation.) In rising to participate in the discussion of the Bill under consideration, I am aware that I may be open to the imputation of making a pro domo speech, as I am the son of a Government employee, but I am free to state that, from what I have so far heard from the several legal gentlemen who have so ably spoken in support of the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), I am not yet satisfied that this measure should be crystallized into law by this House.

In my opinion, Sir, there is a great deal of exaggeration in what has been said here about the dishonesty of civil servants. For my part, I am satisfied that, with the exception of a few isolated cases of civil servants refusing to pay their debts, the great majority of them pay their debts honestly, and do not shirk their responsibilities. I know many contractors, many merchants and banking clerks who are still more eager than Government employees to escape payment of their honest debts, notwithstanding all that has been said here to the contrary.

The hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) has suggested a plan by which the evil complained of might be obviated, and he told us that by adopting his system that evil would sooner be rooted out than by enacting a law for the attachment of the salaries of civil servants. Sir, if the proposition of the hon. gentleman were adopted, what would be the result? We are told that an Order in Council could be passed by the Cabinet saying that public employees who do not pay their debts should be dismissed. But I have no hesitation in saying that a more radically vicious measure could hardly be devised. As a matter of fact, if such an Order in Council were adopted, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, Cabinet Ministers would feel obliged to interfere in favour of those unhappy officers who would happen to be in the clutches of their creditors. As the Ministers would have a discretionary power in the matter, they could decline carrying out such a drastic measure.

On the other hand, where would be the sanction of such a provision? It is provided by our codes of procedure how creditors are to proceed to secure the execution of judgments obtained against debtors. But, in this particular case, judgment creditors would, I suppose, apply to the Minister and tell him: "We have obtained a judgment from the court against such or such officer of your department; now, if he does not satisfy that judgment you are going to dismiss him." Will any hon. gentleman in this House pretend to say that such a measure could be enforced? It is true the Order in Council would be there, but nobody, with the least insight into human nature, will pretend to say that, under the circumstances, those civil servants, when they happen to be political friends of the Minister, would be removed by him. Therefore, as matters stand, the suggestion of the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) cannot commend itself to the judgment of the House. I coincide in the opinion of the hon. gentlemen who preceded me, when they said that Government employees should be put on the same footing as other members of the community. It must also be granted that the mass of our civil servants have but small salaries. It is true some of them are better paid, but they form the exception to the rule. Generally speaking, it may be said that civil servants in our country have salaries which barely enable them to keep up their position. In the face of these facts, I think the well-known motto that "Her Majesty's Government must be carried on" would not be out of place here. At all events, I must say that I am not ready to vote in favour of the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson). I take it that this Parliament cannot pass a legislation which, under the Union Act, is placed under the control of the provincial legislatures. In my opinion, this House should refrain from enacting a law interfering with provincial rights.

Why, Sir, when I heard my hon. friend from West Huron (Mr. Cameron) declare that it was within the scope of this Parliament to legislate in the matter, and when listening to the words fallen from the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Fortin), it struck me that their speeches did not bear that emphatic stamp of the Liberal principles which our party did so loudly proclaim before the country, when out of power. The Liberal party has unflinchingly advocated and battled in favour of provincial rights, against any encroachment whatsoever by the federal Government upon the prerogatives of our provincial legislatures. Yet, strange to say, hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, with a lack of consistency on their part, which is a matter of genuine surprise to me, declare themselves ready, under the intoxicating influence of power, no doubt, to endorse a Bill the scope of which they know perfectly well, and to sanction by their vote an encroachment by the federal authorities upon the rights of legislatures. What were the measures for which the Liberal party have kept battling for over twenty-five years? Upon all matters relating to provincial rights, such as the liquor licenses, the streams and watercourses, the law respecting escheats and forfeitures, the Liberal party did always unflinchingly resist any encroachment by the federal Government upon the rights of the provinces. Now, should the House pass this Bill into law, this would constitute an infringement of provincial autonomy. Therefore, as a Liberal, and, I may add, as a Canadian devoted to the constitution of our country, and wishing to have it respected, I am bound to register my vote against this legislation.

Mr. McNEILL. I entirely agree with the view that the civil servant should be obliged to carry out his contracts, as well as any other citizen of the Dominion. I am not prepared to say whether there is any great failing in that respect in the civil service or not. I do not know the facts. I think it is quite right that some steps should be taken in the direction, at all events, of securing to the creditor the right to recover from the civil servant as readily as he does from any one else. But I would venture to urge upon the Government the consideration of this point: That though it be right that the civil servant should be compelled to carry out his contract, the Government ought to take care that, in attempting to force the civil servant to carry out his contracts, they do not themselves set the example of breach of contract. I wish to emphasize, if I may, from my humble position in this House, what was said by the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) in that regard, and I hope that, whatever steps they may take with regard to this matter, the Government will take care that they do not violate any contract, or implied contract, which may have been made with the civil servant who is already in the service. However good the measure may be, if it goes the length of striking at the root of the contract which is entered into by the country with its employees, I think it would be a very serious blow to public faith; and I would suggest that the Government take that part of the question into their serious consideration in any arrangement that they may make in this regard.

Motion (Sir Louis Davies) agreed to, and debate adjourned.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT— SEDUCTION.

Mr. BRITTON moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 12) further to amend the Criminal Code. He said: In making this motion I want to make some remarks now in reference to the Act itself and in reference to the Criminal Code, and the amendments that seem to me to be necessary to the code. Although I would prefer not making these remarks in the absence of the Solicitor General and of others who are interested in a Bill like this, if I do not make them now probably I may not have another opportunity during the session. Therefore, I will make this motion, assuming that the Bill will not be disposed of to-night, and that before it reaches another stage, I may have the assistance of some members of the Government or of some other hon. gentlemen who are interested in putting the Bill into such a shape that it may be disposed of during the session. The first section of the Criminal Code that I wish to amend is section 684. This section makes it necessary that, in reference to any of the offences mentioned from section 181 to 190 inclusive, in order to obtain a conviction, there must be some corroborative evidence implicating the accused. Section 181 has reference to the seduction of girls above the age of 14 and under the age of 16. Sections 198 and 199 refer to unlawful intercourse with idiots and insane persons. I take it that there will be no discussion whatever as to the latter class of cases. There will be no difference of opinion that these cases ought to be placed in no different position from any other case where an offence is charged, and where a person may be found guilty on the evidence of one credible witness, or on such evidence as a court and a jury may think sufficient to convict a person. We know that our own law is very indulgent, and rightly so. Everybody is presumed to be innocent until he is proved to be guilty, and the benefit of any doubt must always be given to the prisoner. Every judge before whom a person is being tried for any offence will always tell the jury, and he will always act upon the principle himself if he is trying a case himself, that the benefit of every doubt is to be given to the prisoner, and conviction can only take place upon evidence clear, satisfactory and convincing. Now, as these last mentioned persons, idiots and insane persons, cannot give evidence themselves, there should be no more reason for the corroborative evidence of any person who knows of such an offence being committed against them than there would be in any other case. But section 181 stands on a different footing altogether. That section has reference, as I said, to the seduction of girls under the age of 16 and above the age of 14. There seems to me, in many cases, to be a failure of justice because of this section 684 requiring corroborative evidence. I will just give a concrete instance of cases that are in my mind, and that have led me to think that this law ought to be amended. They are cases of girls who are obliged to go out to service, their parents are poor and they let their daughters go out to service at an early age. A girl goes into a house and is seduced by her master. There is no doubt of the girl's previously chaste character; there is no doubt of the age of the girl, which, of course, must be established in order that there shall be an offence under this Act; there is no doubt about the improper intimacy of the girl with some man, because pregnancy follows, and the offence, according to the girl's own statement, has been committed by the person in whose employment she was, and in his house. Notwithstanding all that evidence, and notwithstanding the further evidence that there was no opportunity, so far as the parents knew, or so far as anybody else knew who was acquainted with the girl, for her to have intimacy with any other man than the one accused by her, yet on this point, and that is the crucial point in the prosecution, judges say, and with propriety in view of these words in the section: Yes, that is all true, but where is your evidence corroborating the statement of the girl and implicating the accused? You have established her previously chaste character, you have established everything else required, but you have not produced any corroborative evidence that the defendant is really the person who had improper relations with this girl. I say that, in many cases, that cannot be established under this provision of the code. If the circumstances I have mentioned are not sufficient corroborative evidence to establish that offence or to convince a jury, then it cannot be established, in many cases. Then it becomes the question whether it is desirable to have offences of that kind go unpunished because of the risk of opening the door to abuses which I need not mention, but hon. gentlemen who hear me will readily understand to what I refer; it becomes a question whether we should let persons who are really guilty go unpunished because of the risk I have suggested. Is the danger in this respect so great that rather than open the door to these abuses, we should allow guilty persons to escape? Now, those are the circumstances with which I wish to deal. The courts in Ontario have not decided precisely what corroborative evidence is necessary, or rather they have not decided what would be corroborative evidence within the meaning of the section I have just read. These cases are ordinary 'nisi prius' cases, cases that are decided before a judge and jury and, unless the judge thinks proper to reserve a case for the opinion of a higher court, no more is heard about it, the man is acquitted, and that is the end of it. One case has been reserved, but has not yet been argued, and that is another reason why I am willing that this Bill should not go much further to-night than a discussion of the points I have mentioned.

The case I refer to is that of the Queen vs. Vahey in which just such circumstances as I have mentioned came up. It was argued by the counsel who prosecuted that those circumstances would be the corroborative evidence that is required by the statute; and the judge reserved that question for the court. So far as I know or have heard, it has not been argued since and is now to be argued in Toronto. That is a case that ought to be made perfectly clear by legislation. I contend, as to the case I have mentioned, that the circumstances ought to be proved, that such a case should not stand on any different footing nor should there be any more required in prosecuting for such an offence than is required for the more serious one of rape or for the more ordinary one of larceny or embezzlement. If the House agrees with me, when we go into committee such an amendment will be moved.

The next point I submit is that there should be an amendment to section 744 of the code. That is to me an absurd provision. It occurs in the case of a judge refusing to reserve any question of law for the opinion of the court; that is where a judge who tries the case refuses to reserve a legal question, when asked, for the opinion of the court. The law, as it is now, provides that before the accused can appeal he must get leave in writing from the Attorney General, and with that leave in his hands he goes to the Court of Appeal, and on motion, notice having been given to the parties, he asks for leave to appeal. If leave is given, then the case comes on for argument. In that case the accused ought to have the right not of appeal but the right to go to the Court of Appeal, and at once ask for leave. That seems to me to be common sense, a very reasonable arrangement and every one with whom I have spoken agrees with that view. The party should not depend upon the whim or caprice or judgment of the Attorney General as to whether he should have leave to go to the Court of Appeal and ask from that Court leave to appeal on some important question which he thinks he should raise in the interest of the prisoner on trial in the way I have mentioned.

Then the other is a very important section indeed. Section 748 of the code allows the Minister of Justice to be a court of appeal. This is new legislation, so far as I am aware, in any country in the world. It is not the law in England, it was not the law in this country, we did not know anything about it until it appeared in our Criminal Code of 1892. It was acted on in the case of Mrs. Sternaman, and under that section she was given a new trial by the Minister of Justice. Another case was decided by the Minister in like manner. I submit that is a section which should not appear on our Statute-book. The Minister of Justice is a politician, necessarily so; he belongs to a party, and represents that party as Minister of Justice. In any case under this section and in every case there will be from this time on friends of the accused applying, when the case is a serious one and in all capital cases, to the Minister of Justice ; and if he is not willing to have the sentence commuted, at least he may be willing to grant a new trial. I do not think the Minister of Justice will do so in every case—I know he will not. I do not say that in every case where he granted a new trial, it should not have been granted ; but it is a power that should not be given to the Minister of Justice, to sit in his room in the Eastern Block of the Parliament Buildings and there hear persons who come on behalf of an accused, who has perhaps been convicted of a capital offence, as in the case to which I have referred, and hear all their evidence. Affidavits may be presented, that are perhaps false ; it is perhaps asserted that evidence has been found stating different facts, and some paltry excuse made for the fact that this evidence was not given on the trial ; and with this power in the hands of the Minister of Justice, it being possible for the Minister to grant a new trial, the House can easily see that the Minister might be induced to grant a new trial, and in any case where this course is taken it is possible that an absolute failure of justice may follow. No one who has had to do, as all members of the House have had to do, with the Department of Justice, has been exempt from calls made on him on behalf of prisoners. In very many cases their sentences are not interfered with, but objections are made all the same, and all the influence or supposed influence that can be brought to bear on members is first used to intercede with the Minister of Justice in behalf of these persons. All these things are done now, and how much more will they be done when it is known—although all people are supposed to know the law, this provision has not been much known until the case to which I alluded arose—that the Minister of Justice can interfere. Very many more attempts will be made to bring pressure on the Minister of Justice when the accused has friends willing and able to make the application. At all events this section ought to be seriously discussed and seriously considered before we allow it to remain on the Statute-book. I can easily understand that the Minister of Justice might not wish to possess power of that kind ; it is a tremendous power ; it is the power of the Court of Appeal embodied in one individual, exercised without argument, in the sense of a legal argument, and the application is dealt with by him when pressed by friends of the accused ; and while perhaps the Minister might not be willing to go the length of recommending executive clemency, yet he might not be willing to take the responsibility of allowing the sentence to go into effect and therefore might grant him a new trial. If a new trial were granted, there might be an absolute failure of justice. In suggesting these amendments and giving notice of the Bill, I know there are some points that hon. gentlemen cover with Bills now before the House, and there are other points suggested as amendments to the Criminal Code. If it be possible to add clauses in committee to meet such cases, I submit that these amendments ought to be made.

I believe that in sections 181 and 182 the word "reputation" ought to be used, instead of "character," because, of course, "reputation" is the important matter in a thing of this kind ; "character" is what a person is, "reputation" is what is said of him, and reputation has more to do in a matter of that kind than character. I put it to the judgment of the House, whether there is anything in my suggestion in that regard. Then, section 182 makes this offence complete only when committed under a promise of marriage. Any lawyer here who has practice in the courts of Ontario, will agree with me that this section has been frittered away by the manner in which the judges have dealt with it. For instance, it is said that that offence cannot be committed except committed at the time and under the influence of a promise of marriage. It seems to me that that is absurd. If the relation of engaged persons exists between the two, and if the promise of marriage is existing at the time, that surely ought to be all that is necessary, and so I would suggest that, instead of the words used in the code, some such words as these ought to be substituted:

While the promise of marriage exists—

Or :

Under the promise of marriage and while they are in an engaged relation.

That would prevent the possibility of it being held that, in order to make it an offence, it must be committed just following the promise of marriage. Another very important point is this : Under section 743, the trial judge may reserve a question of law for the Court of Appeal, and in Ontario the Court of Appeal for this purpose is made any division of the High Court of Justice. In the case of the Queen vs. Williams (reported), the Queen's Bench Division decided that the depositions taken before the coroner are admissible in evidence on the trial of the accused, and as against the accused. This decision was given under the Canada Evidence Act. In the Williams case, the trial judge reserved the legal point for the Queen's Bench Division, and they decided as I have stated, and the conviction stood. Then Hammond was tried for the murder of Katie Tough, and he was convicted. The depositions before the coroner were admitted in that case, following the decision in Queen vs. Williams, although there had been a decision the other way by Chief Justice Meredith in the Queen vs. Hendershott. Still, as there was a considered judgment in the case of the Queen vs.

Williams, the trial judge in the Hammond case admitted the evidence given by the prisoner and taken before the coroner. That case was reserved for the opinion of the Chancery Division, and the Chancery Division decided that this evidence was inadmissible. We have, therefore, two decisions of courts of equal jurisdiction—which are made courts of appeal under our criminal code—one in direct conflict with the other. I submit, Sir, that that condition of things must be cured. I understand the Solicitor General, or the Minister of Justice, intends during this session to introduce a Bill amending the Evidence Act, so that the evidence given before the coroner will be admissible. That would, of course, remove the difficulty as to this one question, but it does not remove the difficulty as to any other question. The point I make is, that where you constitute each of these divisions a court of appeal for the purpose of disposing of a reserved case, you permit at any time a conflict of authority between these divisions. I suggest that any reserved case should be to a court of appeal or to certain judges made a court of appeal for that purpose, and I think hon. gentlemen will agree with me that this is a very proper amendment for this House to make. There are many other sections that have inconsistencies in them, and that very slight amendments would improve. Let me call the attention of the House to this one case. In the codification of the Criminal law, the gentlemen who did the work apparently omitted to provide any special punishment for the offence of escape. Before the code was adopted, chapter 155 of the Revised Statutes of Canada provided, that whenever a person escaped and was recaptured, or attempted to escape from a penitentiary, his punishment might be, after the term of his present sentence expired, any additional term in the same place of imprisonment. When the code was adopted this Act was repealed, and they omitted to substitute any similar provision in the Criminal Code. I suggest, therefore, that section 955 of the code be amended, and that, as part of subsection 3, the following should be inserted:—

And providing further, that where any one is sentenced for any offence, and is at the date of such sentence serving a term of imprisonment in a penitentiary for any such offence, he may be sentenced for a term shorter than two years' imprisonment in the same penitentiary, such sentence to take effect from the termination of his existing sentence.

I live in the city of Kingston, and I know that there are frequent attempts to escape from the penitentiary there. It was thought to be in the interests of justice that any prisoner attempting to escape, or actually escaping, who is afterwards recaptured, should be tried for that offence. It was considered that the moral effect of trying the prisoner for his attempt would be beneficial. I do not know whether that is beneficial or not; I do not know whether it is worth while to exercise anything more than the prison discipline on such persons, but, at all events, the Government thought proper that such persons should be tried. For escape, the ordinary punishment is less than two or three years' imprisonment, and the law, as it now stands, is, that after trial for attempt to escape, the prisoner, if sentenced to less than two years, must serve out his original term in the penitentiary, and then be sent to a jail to serve his term of less than two years. They have to remain in the penitentiary until their original sentence expires. Then they have to be taken from the penitentiary and brought to the county jail, and maintained there at the expense of the province and the county, mainly the county, to serve the sentence for the attempt to escape. That was never the intention of the law. The Act with respect to escapes specially provides that the sentence shall be a further term in the place from which the escape or the attempt to escape was made. Of course, hon. members know that there is a provision in the Penitentiary Act and in the criminal law for the removal of prisoners from one penitentiary to another, and legislation on that point is not required. But legislation is required to prevent an injustice being done to counties where there are prisons, on the line I have indicated, so that when a judge finds a prisoner guilty of an escape or an attempt to escape, he may sentence him for a further term of imprisonment in the place from which the escape or attempted escape was made. These are the amendments which seem to me to be necessary and well worthy of the time and attention of this House on the present occasion. As to how far the Government will think it proper to adopt these amendments, I have not yet obtained any answer. But I present them to the House, so that hon. members can think them over, and I invite suggestions from the Minister who is leading the House, as to whether he wishes me to move that the House resolve itself into committee, and then let the committee rise and report progress, and sit again, or how he wishes to deal with the Bill, because I have no desire to come to a decision this evening. But in order to put myself in the position I desire, I move that the House resolve itself into committee on the Bill.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that my hon. friend has seen fit to move the motion which he has moved to-night, in the absence of the responsible legal adviser of the Crown. I think Bills of this kind to amend the Criminal Code, Bills of the first importance, should be discussed in the presence, under the advice and with the consent of the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick). My hon. friend, however, has seen fit, in the absence of almost every member of the Government—all but two—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No. five.

Mr. CAMERON. I have only seen three, and not one of them a lawyer.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. CAMERON. The hon. gentleman has moved this motion in the absence of the Solicitor General. I am one of those who as a general rule are opposed to frequent changes in the criminal law, especially in the Criminal Code, which in my judgment has no superior. It is a code which was prepared largely under the advice of the late Minister of Justice, than whom, I am bold to say, there never sat in the Parliament of Canada a more profound criminal lawyer; and I am opposed to changes being made in that Criminal Code, except on the advice of the responsible legal advisers of the Crown. The changes which the hon. gentleman proposes to make by this Bill are of an extremely radical character—changes which I may say at once I am entirely opposed to. The hon. gentleman proposes to repeal section 684, subsection "c" of the Criminal Code. That section provides that in a large class of cases, twelve or thirteen cases, no conviction can be obtained on the unsupported testimony of one witness. Take especially the class of cases which the hon. gentleman proposes to deal with. We all know that the Criminal Code provides for the trial and punishment of a large number of these offences, for instance, seducing a girl under 16 years of age; seducing a female under 21 years of age, under promise of marriage; seducing a ward by a guardian; officers of a vessel seducing female passengers; procuring the defilement of girls; parents and guardians procuring the defilement of their children and wards; landlords permitting their premises to be used for the purposes of prostitution; conspiring to secure the defilement of girls; having carnal connection with idiots; causing the prostitution of Indian women. In the Criminal Code a certain protection is provided for persons who are charged with these offences. Nobody that I know of complains of the law as it stands; that is, that men shall not be convicted of any of these offences on the unsupported testimony of one witness. I never heard a judge or a criminal prosecutor complain of that law. I never heard of any report or petition to this House or to the judges complaining of that provision in the law, which was introduced for wise and benevolent purposes. Everybody who knows anything of practice in the criminal courts knows perfectly well that in the majority of cases—or if not in the majority, at all events in a large number of cases—prosecutions under what is called the Charlton Act and similar laws are instigated not from the best of motives. A great many of these prosecutions are started for the purpose of extorting money, for the purpose of blackmailing, for the purpose of bleeding; and if you change the law that makes it necessary for two witnesses to the commission of the offence—not two witnesses to the commission of the offence, but one witness, with corroborative evidence—you will open wide the door to crimes worse than those provided for in the Criminal Code—fraud, attempts to extort money, and attempts to blackmail. The Parliament of Canada, for wise and sufficient reasons, in my judgment, cast around innocent men charged with the commission of these crimes, a parliamentary shield, and declared that they should not be convicted on the unsupported testimony of one person. Everybody who has had any practice in the courts knows that these prosecutions are largely instigated and carried on by the female said to have been injured. She lays an information; the man is sent over for trial; he is placed on trial before twelve of his countrymen; the woman goes into the witness box; she tells her story, which is possibly clear and plain enough; the young man may go into the box and deny every word she says; but the chances are ten to one, especially if the girl is a well-developed and good-looking girl, that she gets a conviction. I have been engaged for forty years, both as Crown prosecutor and defender, in scores of these cases, and I think I can honestly say that in my experience, at least 50 per cent of the cases the man was not at fault. And yet you would allow the girl to go into the witness-box—she may be a good girl and may not; she may have been a loose girl, and you know nothing about it, or it may not have been her first offence, and you know nothing about it—but you would allow her to go into the box and tell her story, and the man is convicted, though the chances are ten to one her story is not true. But the law steps in and says wisely, you shall not condemn a man on the unsupported testimony of any one person, man or woman. The law steps in and wisely affords that protection to the innocent. If the offence has been committed, the chances are ten to one there is some corroborative evidence. You need not have the evidence of some one who was actually present and saw the offence committed, but if you have evidence corroborating the probability of the girl's story, that is all that is required, and surely in the interest of the innocent and the guileless, that is all we should require. A man cannot be convicted of forgery upon the unsupported testimony of one witness. A man forges a dollar note, and yet to convict him you must have corroborative evidence. A man is alleged to have had connection with a girl, he may never have had connection with her, but upon her unsupported testimony, under my hon. friend's amendment, he may be convicted although pure and innocent as Joseph was. We know perfectly well how these things often arose. A young man is paying attentions to a young girl. For some reasons—perhaps good and valid—he abandons his attentions, she gets offended—you know the effect of a woman's scorn, a woman who has been jilted and neglected—she lays an information, has the man put on his trial, and goes into the witness-box, and under my hon. friend's Bill all she requires to establish her own case is her own evidence. I do not think it is desirable to resort to that extreme. I think the law has worked well; I am satisfied it has. I have never, in all the course of my practice, had a complaint against it; I never heard a judge complain against it; I never knew of any petition being presented to change it; I never knew of any remonstrance made to the Minister of Justice to amend the law. And yet my hon. friend, from some reason—it may be my obtuseness, but I have not been able to grapple with his line of argument—comes to the conclusion that the law is no good. In my judgment, Parliament ought not to rescind that law. It is part of our Criminal Code; and until sounder and more cogent reasons than the hon. member has submitted so far are presented to us, we ought not to make that radical change.

By a subsequent section of his Bill, the hon. gentleman proposes to make another amendment. I am not going to deal with all the hon. gentleman's remarks. He dealt with sections he proposes to amend and sections he does not propose to amend. It is sufficient for us to discuss those sections which he proposes to change. As the law now stands, a case may be reserved for the consideration of the Court of Appeal, with the consent in writing of the Attorney General. My hon. friend proposes to do away with the necessity of getting the consent of the Attorney General. I am opposed to that. If the case is a proper one to be argued by a full court, there is no difficulty in the world in getting the consent of the Attorney General. On the other hand, the necessity of getting that consent may, in a great many cases, prevent frivolous appeals, appeals not based on any legal foundation. At all events, it has had that effect, and I think we had better let well enough alone, and not attempt to make an amendment which, in my judgment, is not as good as the law now stands.

But the sting of my hon. friend's Bill is in the third clause. That proposes to amend what is a comparatively new section in our Criminal Code—the section that enables the Minister of Justice, on application for the commutation of the sentence of a convicted person, to grant, if he sees fit, a new trial. I do not think that the grounds on which my hon. friend wants to do away with this section are valid grounds. I do not think his reasons are sound. He says that the Minister of Justice is a politician. Granted; so is every judge almost who is on the bench. But the moment they come to deal with judicial questions, that moment they assume a judicial attitude, and lay aside their politics. I do not care what Attorney General it is, I would be prepared to trust the strongest Conservative Attorney General that ever sat in the ministerial chair to deal with a purely legal question as I would my own friend, the present Minister of Justice. When they come to deal with questions of that kind, if they are fit for their posts at all, they will consider them solely from a judicial point of view, no matter what their politics may have been or how strong politicians they may have been. The case the hon. gentleman has referred to, so far as my knowledge extends, is the only case in which a Minister of Justice has been called upon to exercise the power vested in him by the Criminal Code. I refer to the Sternaman case. If ever there was a case under the sun that justified a Minister of Justice in exercising the power vested in him by Parliament of ordering a new trial, it was that case. I read every word of the evidence from beginning to end, and I failed to discover, with all due deference to the jury, a particle of proof upon which a jury would be absolutely justified in a conviction. The great point in a criminal prosecution is the motive. Why was the murder committed? People do not commit criminal offences for the fun of the thing. There must be underlying the offence, in every case, a motive. In the Sternaham case, there was not the slightest motive suggested or given in evidence, if my memory serves me right. It was a murder, if a murder at all, without cause and without motive, and yet the jury convicted this unfortunate woman, and she was sentenced to be executed. If it had not been for this, in my judgment, a wise and merciful provision in the Criminal Code, that woman would have expiated her so-called offence on the gallows, or the Minister of Justice might have commuted her sentence. What would that mean? Neither she nor her children nor her children's children would ever escape the stain and stigma that would rest upon her and them, handed down from generation to generation, that she, their mother, was convicted of murdering their father. Here the merciful provision of the code comes in and provides that if the Minister of Justice believes, on examination of all the facts, that there ought to be a new trial, he is at liberty to grant a new trial. The Minister shall exercise his judgment. I think it was in this case a wise exercise of judgment, and whether the Minister were a friend of mine politically or not, I would be prepared to make the same statement. I know not the woman or any of her relatives, but I read every scrap of evidence gathered and submitted. There was some new evidence submitted, it is true. There was an affidavit. My learned friend suggests that it may have been a perjury. We cannot assume that.

Mr. BRITTON. I did not deal with this case at all.

Mr. CAMERON. No, but the hon. gentleman said that there might be affidavits and these affidavits might be false. We cannot assume that the parties who make these affidavits would commit, wilfully, a perjury. This case shows the wisdom of this provision in the law, and to repeal that provision would be to leave the law just as it was before. The unfortunate person convicted, although possibly innocent, would have to suffer the punishment of the law, or if that punishment were commuted, he would have to go through life pardoned, or the sentence commuted, with that stigma and stain resting upon his name, and his children and children's children would have to bear it for all time.

If the Government and Parliament will take my advice, and it is the result of 40 years experience, more or less, in the criminal as well as in the civil courts, they will not touch a single letter that the hon. gentleman seeks to repeal and amend by this Bill. In fact, unless at the instigation of the judges of our courts, who have daily experience of the administration of the criminal law, or at the suggestion of prominent lawyers who are conducting the business of the Crown, I would hardly change a letter in the Criminal Code. There may be here and there a little technicality that does not affect the merits of the Code and does not interfere with the administration of justice, there may be here and there a word which can be replaced to advantage with another word; but do not change this Criminal Code until you find it necessary to do so. And if there is a necessity to do so, let it be done under the responsibility of the Department of Justice. We have the Solicitor General here; let any change be made on his responsibility, and then we shall know exactly what we are doing. Meantime, I say to the Government: Vote against this Bill. And, in order to test the feeling of the House, I move that this Bill be not now referred to the Committee of the Whole House, but that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole House this day six months.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Cameron) is possibly not aware that the Bill has been read the second time.

Mr. CAMERON. I know, I did not happen to be here at the time. My motion is that it be not now committed but that it be committed this day six months.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I rise with some trepidation on account of want of legal knowledge attributed to me by the hon. member for Huron. But I had several years experience as Attorney General of my own province before coming here and have been practising for about twenty-five years in the court. I would ask my hon. friend (Mr. Cameron) to make a note of that. I think my hon. friend who introduces this Bill will receive the thanks of the Justice Department for the carefully prepared speech he has delivered and the information he has given. With the experience he has known to have had in the courts I am sure that what he has said will receive the most careful consideration, in connection with the Criminal Code and its amendment. I share, but not to the same extent, the objection of by hon. friend (Mr. Cameron) has made to the amendment of the Criminal Code. But I do not entertain the same view that he has expressed as to the Code itself. I think in many respects it is loosely and very badly drawn. I do not know any Act upon our Statute-book that bears evidence of greater carelessness than this. Perhaps I may be held to blame for that. I was one of the members of the Parliament by which this Code was passed. The Act was one of six or seven hundred sections, and the thermometer ranged between 85 and 90 during the time when most of the sections was considered in committee. Several gentlemen sat here, I was almost going to say in their shirt sleeves, discussing it. In point of fact, there were hardly half a dozen members in the House when a large number of these sections went through committee. Still, I have a keen admiration of the Act generally, I think there is a great deal in the hon. gentleman's argument that no hasty changes should be made in the Code as it stands.
