Mr. Speaker everybody knows that nowadays for a man with a family, living on $3,743 is tantamount to living on social assistance. And if social benefits recipients had to pay taxes, that would be most ridiculous. Therefore, I say that a man with a family cannot live on less than $5,000 or $6,000 a year. That is also why I said earlier that we have come to the point of taxing the necessities of a family.

I understand, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. minister needs money to cover his deficits. But first and foremost, he should consider practising economy. He said he could save $75 million. I think that through a revision of the estimates of some departments, such as the Department of National Defence and others, he could trim down his estimates by as much as $400 million or even half a billion. This would only bring a little relief to the Canadian economy and it would be more logical for the Canadian people.

If we must live within our means, we should start to do so at the level of the federal budget. Can you imagine a country, with a population of 20 million, having a federal budget of $11,500 million, not to mention provincial budgets? It is simply ridiculous. There is surely some leakage somewhere; it is essential that the minister become aware of the situation and refrain from allowing too much latitude to all those experts, all those bureaucrats, who are constantly increasing the budgets.

The budget for the current year has increased by almost $3 billion. I find this astonishing, and I say again to the minister what we already told him at the time of the February 19 vote: This measure still affects the family budget and we shall not allow the government to take away more purchasing power from our families, which are extremely hard up at present. The minister should at all costs bear that in mind and put it in his bureaucrats' minds, if he still has some influence over them, but I doubt it.

Mr. Chairman, I would have like to dissuade the minister from introducing a bill which is still taxing, as I indicated earlier, the small and average wage-earner.

It is obvious that the citizen who lives on $3,500 annual income should not be taxed, not any more than the one who draws social security. The minister still has to collect a few dollars from the worker and that is where he goes to find. If that had still been possible, I would have liked to show him that this is not conformable to the will of the people.

We have a democratic government, we have been elected to act according to the will of the people of Canada; however, what we are doing now is not the will of the people of Canada. As far as I am concerned—and most certainly the same can be said of all other members here—I have pledged myself to serve my constituents. It is not in order to support trusts and other interests that we are here, Mr. Chairman. My only concern in this house is the well-being of my constituents, and I am sure the primary concern of all the other members is the well-being of their own constituents.

I would not want to lay all the blame on the hon. minister, as he is not the only one responsible for the present situation; in fact, he is not even the one who is really to blame.

[Mr. Gauthier.]

Above governments, there is a nameless organization whose members are very influential. It is this organization I want to denounce today to the people of Canada, because it uses both parties, Tories and Grits, to its own ends, pulling the strings as if they were puppets and putting the burden of taxation on the people of Canada so as to protect its own money. That is the problem which exists in parliament today, Mr. Chairman. It is obvious here that everything changes, except the senior officials.

I submit that the government, whether it is a Liberal or Conservative government, follows the same basic principles and is the tool of those experts whom I call senior officials and who are there to carry out the wishes of the great financiers. It is precisely against that state of affairs, against those masters, against the powerful, the mighty financiers in Canada who use the government, whether it is Liberal or Conservative, that we want to fight. We have just gone through a political crisis and if the Conservatives had been in office, the same thing would have happened, because they follow the same basic principles.

We do not have any set principles because when we go to the people we do not refer to them. But we discuss them because we have a doctrine: We say that we believe in Social Credit.

The members of the New Democratic party are socialists; they can explain something different, a different doctrine. But the Conservatives and the Liberals always have the same doctrine; their economic principles, their masters are the same.

We do not endorse all the principles of socialists, just as they do not endorse all of ours. But, nevertheless, our principles are different from those of the two old parties, and it is at that level that I say that changes are absolutely necessary.

When we consider the record of the two old parties since confederation, and especially over the last fifty years, we can only conclude that we have had a chameleon government which takes the colour of the political season. That is all we have. The actors come and go, but it is always the same tragedy: the bondage of the people and the triumph of the great financiers, the masters of our country. That is our parliamentary system today, Mr. Chairman. Now, this is what we want to expose. How do they get control of the country? Through taxes and surtaxes and by subjecting the people to slavery. That is how.

We have tremendous resources; we boast of being the second richest country in the world. And what have we got? Debts, debts to no end. What does the government do about it? It borrows, like just recently, and borrows again later, putting us deeper and deeper into debt.

But, Mr. Chairman, where does all that lead us? There is an absolute need for a more reasonable government assuming its responsibilities and getting money where money is. That money is in the hands of those who are exploiting our country and that is the only place to get it.

In the last vote, we indicated how this could be done. Through a free vote.

• (12:10 p.m.)

Mr. Chairman, if there were a free and non-partisan vote, we would have a truly democratic government, a popular government which would be working for the good of the people instead of protecting trusts which control our country. That is what we want.

When we get this free vote, the members will be free to work for their ridings. The government will be free; it will have a free hand, and the whole of the Canadian people will benefit from the democratic freedom to which we all aspire.

Mr. Chairman, that day is certainly not here yet. The financiers have too much influence over this government. I hope the people will awaken one day, before there is a revolution. I hope this with all my heart, but I fear that the financiers, who are heartless men, will prefer to see blood flow rather than give up a little of what they have.

We are still living in a democracy and I hope that the people will wake up as soon as possible and ask their true representatives, those who will work for them, to occupy the seats bought up by high finance.

I hope that this day is not too far away, Mr. Chairman, because I think that, at the present time, we are about to undergo a change which must be made at any cost. If that change does not occur in the country—I do not want to be pessimistic—I am terribly worried about Canada.

We are precisely here to protect Canadian interests and this is why we are asking today the minister to be more reasonable, more human, to understand the true problem and cope with it. We ask him to refrain from burdening the taxpayer and constantly taxing him. This is not what we could call a good administration.

I know that the minister is intelligent enough to know what to administer means I do not need to explain to him the economic process, he knows it very well, better than I do, but even though it is through no fault of his own, he is not free—that is why he was elected—the financiers have put a rope around his neck. He must often go and seek advice in Washington or Toronto. That is about all he can do. He makes statements, like the one he has just delivered to us, in order to tax a little more those who already are unable to pay their present taxes, and to protect a little more those who are in the process of taking hold of all Canada, 80 per cent of which they control already. It is true that we still barely manage to live on those 20 per cent, but to-morrow they will get us, and then we shall really see the advent of financial dictatorship which, believe me, Mr. Chairman, nobody wishes to see.

[English]

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Chairman, when the minister presented his statement on Wednesday he concluded with these words:

> ...the present international circumstances make it urgent, and I cannot emphasize this too much, that we deal as promptly as possible with the measures that are now necessary.

In opening my remarks this afternoon I should like to say that we in this group are of the opinion that on the presentation of this resolution and the consideration of the estimates of the Minister of Finance we should have ample opportunity to set forth clearly our views in regard to the various matters under discussion. But we also feel that it would be desirable that as soon as reasonably possible a decision be arrived at by the members of this house.

I suggest that the plea to parliament for understanding and co-operation in meeting the serious financial situation indicated a radical change in the attitude of the Minister of Finance. Until now the minister has brusquely waved aside any suggestion that the financial policies of the government have undesirable effects upon the national economy. It seems to me that his scorn of any advice, particularly from the Social Credit corner of the house, has been all too obvious on many occasions.

In speaking on the estimates the other day my colleague, the hon. member for Red Deer, dwelt at some length on many of the unhealthy aspects of our economy. It is not my intention today to go into any detail with respect to the conditions to which he has alluded. However, I might say that members of the Social Credit party have consistently opposed the deficit financing policies not only of this government but of successive federal governments and have predicted that a day of reckoning would surely come. Nations cannot borrow themselves into prosperity, and for governments to burden future generations with perpetual debts in order to meet current expenses is not only poor business but is, I maintain, morally wrong.

The Minister of Finance, I believe, must accept the responsibility for having during his term of office one of the largest deficits, if not the largest, in either the peacetime or wartime history of the country. As we consider the statements that have been presented to us we note that it will require over $1,400 million of the people's tax money just to pay the interest on the national debt in the 1968-69 fiscal year. Unless this trend is reversed the national debt is bound to continue to rise in the years ahead. However, our warnings in this regard have received very little attention.

On many occasions we have also expressed our concern about the fantastic growth of the public service and have called upon the government to exercise restraint. But each year we have seen a continuation of policies that put more and more Canadians on the government payroll without any compensating or commensurate services to the general public. The imposition, by the government of costly programs and projects requiring exorbitant outlays of public money has been challenged on many occasions. Again, I must say this challenge has had little effect on the thinking of the government. The result has been that millions of dollars have been unnecessarily added to an already bloated budget.

Royal commissions that serve no real useful purpose have been set up and have cost the taxpayers millions of dollars. In other cases, work that has been or is being done by royal commissions could readily have been done by Senate committees or other existing agencies, but because of the policy of the government in turning these matters over to royal commissions yet another strain has been added to an already overtaxed public.

These and other factors have in the last few years pushed the spending estimates of the federal government, as was mentioned in the house the other day, from approximately $7 billion to over $10 billion at the present time. With exorbitant interest rates, increasingly higher taxes, the spiralling cost of living and the consequent reduction in the purchasing power of the Canadian people, we have been brought apparently to the brink of financial chaos. According to the Minister of Finance, it seems as though the day of reckoning has finally come.

In order to assist in trying to undo the damage or at least minimize the adverse effects of inadequate and undesirable policies, the government is now asking us to co-operate because the nation is in financial difficulty and the stability of the Canadian dollar is threatened. What we have before us in the minister's statement and resolution is the sequel to the events of February 19 when the government was caught off guard and its bill to increase the tax on personal incomes went down to defeat by the vote of the united opposition. We all know, I think, even though there has been some attempt to reject this position, that traditionally this has meant the defeat of the government. The Prime Minister, in an attempt to salvage the situation, moved a confidence motion that was carried. Following the set-back the Minister of Finance has been searching feverishly for some way to meet the situation in which the government finds itself and has come up now with a resolution providing for an additional tax.

We in this group have already made the position we are taking public. Our decision to accept in principle these proposals, while maintaining our right to consider possible amendments, was based on a number of basic considerations. One was that the proposals now before us are in some measure less objectionable than those contained in Bill No. C-193. I believe that the defeat of that measure jolted the government into a reappraisal of its policies. While the end result has not been all that we had hoped, there have been some changes in the proposals that have been brought before us.

One of these involves the broadening of the tax base. Instead of the surtax being applied only to individuals it now includes corporations. It is our feeling and our belief that this is a desirable change, in spite of the objections that have been raised to the contrary. The suggestion was made this morning that this fact should be of some comfort to our friends in the New Democratic party because of their insistence through the years that corporations have not been paying their fair share of taxes. I do not believe that position has been borne out by the statements that have been made in the house by spokesmen for the New Democratic party in the course of this debate. We have felt that the whole burden should not be placed upon the individual taxpayer. A suggestion has been made that the burden will eventually be borne by individual taxpayers in the form of higher costs. However, perhaps the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, assisted possibly by the board that is to be set up, could keep a watchful eye on any developments in that regard to ensure that the individual taxpayer does not bear the full burden of the increased taxes the government claims it requires to meet its commitments.

Another factor is that the higher exemption is a recognized improvement in the new measure. Instead of the tax being applied on the amount of tax above $100, it now applies to the amount of tax above $200. I am not just sure what the net effect will be of the increase from $100 to $200 in the exemption, but the minister stated yesterday that 2,400,000 taxpayers will not be paying any surtax, or 36 per cent of those who are expected to fall within the income tax bracket this year. I believe, therefore, that this is another consideration.

But one of the major reasons for taking the position we have taken is that the government has indicated some intention of endeavouring to attack the problem on various fronts. For instance, there is to be a further cut in expenditures amounting to $75 million. I believe a far more drastic saving could be effected without adversely affecting the nation as a whole. If the government had used a fine-tooth comb in going through its estimates and its spending program I am confident it could have come up with far greater cuts without, as I say, adversely affecting the country at this time. Nevertheless, in addition to the cuts the government had already indicated it would make it is now stating that it intends to reduce expenditure by a further $75 million.

The minister also indicated that there will be a freeze on the strength of the civil service. I referred to this in my opening remarks. During the years we have indicated that the personnel of the civil service has been unnecessarily increased. If we had received additional services commensurate with the increase the situation would not have been so bad, but we are convinced that we have not been getting our money's worth from the increase in the number of civil servants.

It seems, that the main recommendation in these proposals is for increased revenue. Under the present traditional system the government has but two sources of income, first, taxation and, second, borrowing. We recognize that the federal government has certain constitutional responsibilities. We are also aware that in order to discharge those constitutional responsibilities the government requires additional revenue.

I believe that one reason for the need for increased revenue on the part of the federal government is that it has insisted on moving into fields of provincial jurisdiction. The result has been that the federal government must now take an increasing share of the tax dollar to meet its commitments in these fields in order to make it appear to the provinces that it is giving the provinces something when all the time it is just returning to the provinces tax revenue that should be theirs, was theirs in the first place and should never have been taken from them.

As I say, under our traditional financing system the federal government has just two sources of income, taxation and borrowing. We are opposed to borrowing because of its ultimate effect upon the national debt. The interest charge on our national debt, as I have indicated, will amount to $1,400 million this year.

The electors of this country have not seen fit to consider alternatives to our traditional financing system. Hence we are faced today with a government in office that is committed to the old outmoded system in many respects. The hands of the government are tied. It is now struggling to meet the situation through policies that have never proven very effective in the past but are the only ones available to the government under the present system. This is one of the factors we have had to take into consideration in reaching our decision.

We believe that the principle of a balanced budget is a good one. I commend the Minister of Trade and Commerce—I believe he is still Minister of Trade and Commerce—for affirming, when he announced he was going to take his departure from public office, his adherence to the principle of a balanced budget and indicating that had he been minister of finance this would have been the effect of his policies. We in this group have always insisted that the principle of a balanced budget is a sound one.

I referred to the fact that the Minister of Finance must take the responsibility for having last year the largest deficit, I believe in Canadian history. I have made reference to our national debt and the interest charges thereon. In making the announcement that the government plans to balance its budget the minister is pursuing the right objective even though some of the means used are open to serious question.

To sum up our position, it is based on the following considerations. First of all, although the unhappy situation in which the nation and the government find themselves is largely of the government's own making, we cannot turn back the clock so we must do what we can to assist in minimizing the effect of the past mistakes of the government.

Second, as I have stated, we have always favoured the principle of balanced budgets. We therefore welcome the government's move to achieve that end by further cuts in government expenditure and by holding the line on increasing the number in the public service. As a result we are prepared to accept the principle of the more widely based surtax as a temporary measure, and we are glad that the government has place in the legislation the limitation that the surtax will apply for not more than a two-year period. Under the other proposal the situation was wide open; the government could have forgotten about the tax and it would have become a permanent feature. There is at least an indication now that at some time we can debate this matter again and that the surtax could not become permanent without the approval of parliament.

Third, Mr. Chairman, a critical situation faces the country, and inasmuch as our monetary system depends to a considerable extent on public confidence we do not want to take any position that would have the effect of further weakening that confidence.

Mr. Alkenbrack: There is no public confidence in this government.

Mr. Patterson: I hear the suggestion that there is no financial crisis or serious financial situation. I think that is open to question. We find indications of it in the responses of important personalities across the country to this proposal. Some people say this is all we can do, some say there is still a lot more to be done, and some are betwixt and between and do not know just what the ultimate effect of the application of these policies is going to be on the national economy. Honestly speaking and facing the issue, I do not think there are too many who know exactly what will be the ultimate effect of these policies.

Our fourth consideration is the fact that we cannot afford a repetition of the debacle of several days ago. Therefore the decision on this matter has to be forthright and clear, and I believe the time has come when every major issue in this house should be approached with the same attitude.

We were quite prepared to oppose Bill No. C-193 and also to oppose the subsequent confidence motion introduced by the Prime Minister. But we do not believe that a perpetuation of a climate of uncertainty and political chaos would be in the interest of the country. Therefore, for these reasons, although the proposed measures are not the most desirable nor would they have been necessary had proper policies been pursued in the past, it is not our intention to oppose the implementation of what, to us, are temporary palliatives.

• (12:40 p.m.)

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, the subject matter of the resolution we are now considering looks strangely familiar. I thought we had disposed of this government's way of handling the country's finances by the vote on Bill No. C-193. As usual, the government is acting in a strange manner. Talking of strange ways of doing things, may I say that never before in my parliamentary career have I seen parliament treated in the way the Minister of Finance treated it the other day. He introduced his budget resolutions to the television audience of this country with the idea, no doubt, that members of parliament could learn about them from the press if they had not been watching television or listening to radio at the appropriate time. Certainly most members of the house have felt that as members of parliament they are entitled to hear before anybody else does what the government proposes to do. Never before in history has there been an example of such a flagrant denial of responsibility by a government.

This matter concerns every member of parliament since it touches on the rights, duties and privileges of every member. It also touches on the way this institution works. After all, this house is the bastion of our democracy. Our responsibility is to maintain responsible government. Regardless of our party affiliation I believe it is the duty of every one of us to preserve this institution, and its rights, duties and privileges, unimpaired for future generations. It is doubly important for a minister of the crown to maintain this institution unimpaired. I can only say that when a minister of finance ignores the elected representatives of the people of this country and does not reveal to them first those matters he ought to reveal to them, he and his government are acting most irresponsibly. I hope government supporters will be the first to tell him that is so.

I am taking part in this debate because the question of what is responsible government has now become crystallized as it never has been in any previous debate. Never before has the question of responsible government been so prominent in our minds. I touched on this matter on Monday, February 26. That was after the Prime Minister had made his suggestion. After that the Minister of Justice spoke. That speech, coupled with the actions of the Minister of Finance, shows that the Liberal party and this government deny the concept of responsible government.

The entire question began to be raised in the Prime Minister's statement. In so many words he said that the question of confidence with regard to a major government tax measure only arose because the government was defeated. He denied that inherent in any major tax proposal by the government is a question of confidence, asserting, instead that the defeat had raised that question of confidence. I submit that no government has the right to make that assertion since it negates the principle of responsible government we espouse and which we hope will continue to exist for a long time.

After the Prime Minister's statement I expanded on his ideas and took them to their logical and ridiculous extreme. I said that if the Prime Minister's assertion was correct he had found a method to perpetuate his party in office because it could never be voted out. Even as I was advancing my argument it sounded ridiculous to me; yet it was taken up by the Minister of Justice. Answering a question of mine he said that the government has the right to say whether a question of confidence exists and it has the right to say that before or after a vote is taken. Is there any truth in this assertion? No one will deny that on some minor matter which the government considers important it may say there is a question of confidence; in other words, if the proposal does not carry the government will consider itself defeated.

It must be remembered that the Prime Minister is the adviser to His Excellency the Governor General. The Prime Minister has the right to call an election when he wishes to. He need not be defeated before calling an election because he has the power to do so. On defeat on a minor matter which the government deems to be a question of confidence, naturally it would go to the country.

The foregoing argument does not mean that the government has the right to say that on major questions which have always been matters of confidence. The government cannot do that. A recognition of what constitutes a matter of confidence is the cornerstone of the effective working of responsible government under the British parliamentary system. These remarks apply to Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand, Canada and others. Inherent in the workings of the British parliamentary system is the acknowledgment that any major money bill involves a question of confidence. Notwithstanding that, the Liberal government attempts to say that major money bills are not questions of confidence and that a question of confidence shall arise only when it says it shall, either before or after a vote. We deny that any government has the right to say that a question of confidence is not inherent in any major measure. We deny that this government has the right to say that it can decide if a matter involves confidence after a vote defeating that measure has been taken.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nugent: Not only does this party deny that the Liberal party and the government have the right to say that but we reject it as a policy of this party. It is the policy of this party that a government must accept the responsibility of the inherent question of confidence that exists in every major item of legislation which will have a substantial effect on the country. This is not a case of opting out but of accepting responsibility. The Liberal party is trying to say: We have the right to deny our responsibilities in order to ensure that we stay here forever to enjoy power.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nugent: Now the Minister of Finance says that the present resolution involves a question of confidence. As my leader said the other day, what is the difference between the government's current proposals and those that were defeated? If there is any difference between them it can only be that this measure is less important than the previous measure since it involves less money.

I do not see how the government can tell us now, and be consistent, that this resolution involves a question of confidence. Such a statement denies the Prime Minister's honesty when he suggested to the house that a question of confidence arises only when the government has been defeated. That is what he told us. He said that the question of confidence even with regard to money matters arose only after the defeat of the government. Now we find the Minister of Finance saying, in connection with a far less important measure, that a question of confidence is involved. This is, of course, consistent with the ridiculous theory put forward by the Minister of Justice to the effect that the government can say either before or after a vote whether or not confidence is involved. I wonder whether, if this motion is defeated, we shall find the government consistent in this position. Not only could they say before or after a vote whether confidence was involved but they would also be able to reverse their opinion after the event. They could say before a vote that confidence was involved and then, if defeated, they could announce that it was not. I believe this question ought to be thoroughly aired because the New Democratic party seems confused about it.

On Monday I pointed out that the resignation of a government defeated on an important measure was a bastion not only of responsible government but of the party system in this country. I made it clear that to deny this concept would be to destroy our party system. But spokesmen for the N.D.P. have taken the position that merely by making a speech they can avoid this difficulty; they have only to make it clear that they are voting against a particular measure rather than voting non-confidence in the government. This, I say, amounts to a denial that the question of confidence is inherent in major tax measures and important pieces of legislation. In taking such an attitude I maintain they are destroying the basis of our system of responsible government and of the party system in Canada.

We are all familiar with the somersaults of the Ralliement de Créditistes in this regard. Plaintively they raise their voices against certain aspects of legislation but at the same time they are fearful of precipitating an election which could wipe them out. They say: We voted against one measure only and we did not vote non-confidence in the government. We have heard something similar from the Social Credit party. A wonderful system has been developed among these parties, the N.D.P., the Ralliement des Créditistes and the Social Credit group, all of whom are anxious to have members in this house but who are fleeing their responsibility on questions of fundamental importance to the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nugent: It is my contention, and I speak for our party, that the question of confidence is inherent in every major piece of government legislation, certainly in money bills. There can be no question of defeat on a major piece of legislation without the government being obliged to resign because parliament has voted non-confidence. The situation before us today is simply this: All the other parties in this house have denied that responsible government needs to exist. They have denied their duty as members to uphold a responsible system of government.

I do not believe I am called upon to trace the logical extension and show what this policy means to parliament and to Canada. But perhaps for the sake of some government supporters who are looking a little dismayed or disapproving I should point out that we have enjoyed responsible government for a long time because the government is bound to act in such a way as to please parliament or else parliament can throw it out. This is the essence of responsible government.

It is true a government cannot last longer than five years, but we do not have fixed elections in Canada as they do in the United States where it is not possible to throw out an administration between terms. The essence of our responsible democratic system is that unless a government enjoys the confidence of parliament it can at any time be kicked out of office. This is the control which parliament exercises. The government is now telling us: We deny that principle and we intend to stay in office. The only circumstances in which the Prime Minister would be obliged to advise the Governor General he had lost the confidence of parliament would be after the government had been defeated in parliament on a vote of confidence. There might not necessarily be a vote of confidence after a government has been defeated. There is a choice. The government would always have the best of both worlds. It could go on for five years but it could also decide, if it felt the climate of opinion was right, to go to the country and call an election whenever it wished to do so. This is not democratic. This is not responsible government.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege.

My question of privilege concerns the integrity of members of parliament and derives from a statement I just heard on television. It is a piece of news to the effect that the Ralliement Créditiste will support the government.

Mr. Chairman, I believe I was sufficiently clear in my remarks last night and today, when I stated the hon. minister can be sure that we shall fight with all our might against this measure.

Since our coming to this house, we always stood against tax increases, as we are convinced that taxation is not going to solve our problems.

I am told this piece of news was issued by the Canadian Press. I wish to call the attention of the house to this matter, Mr. Chairman, because it is in the interest of all members that the Canadian Press should not change or interpret their statements.

We said we would vote against the measure, because we have always been against income taxes as far as individuals and private companies are concerned and that is why I mentioned that the N.D.P. was happy to see all the private companies being taxed—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: This is not a question of privilege but rather a difference of opinion.

[English]

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, just before lunch I had outlined the position of the government with respect to the matter now before the committee and the fact that their present situation is that they can perpetuate themselves in office as long as they like. I believe that inherent in the resolution before us is a question of confidence, just as there was in the bill that we defeated. However, playing by their rules the Minister of Finance has now said that there is a question of confidence. I think it is incumbent upon hon. members to make sure they understand what they are voting for, that they are voting confidence in the government when they support this resolution. No matter what party one belongs to, in voting confidence in this government one is voting in favour of the theory that there is no such thing as responsible government.

The Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice have told us the official stand of the Liberal party, that it is up to the government to say when something is a vote of confidence and it can do so either before or after the vote. Therefore there is no way in which they can be defeated in this house against their will. They have made a point of saying this proposal is a confidence matter. I submit that having explained that position to the country they are being as fair and as honest as they know how in making sure that members understand that in voting confidence now they are voting for that kind of democracy which the Liberal party is asking the country to swallow whereby we are going to wipe out the age-old traditions of responsible government and start a new deal under which there will no longer be such a thing as responsible government as we have always known and understood it.

The Liberals tell us in effect that this is a motion of confidence in a party that says it can never be made responsible to the house unless its members so choose and that if they elect to call a matter a vote of confidence they can do so after they are sure they have won the vote. That is the official position of the Liberal party on responsible government. My party rejects it. My party insists that a question of confidence is inherent in every major issue and every major piece of business brought before this house. I suggest that what is involved is not just a case of members of the Liberal party supporting their party. When they vote on this resolution they will be telling the country that they no longer believe in responsible government, that their party comes first before our concept of responsible government, that their party comes before their duty to support the concept of responsible government.

I would not want this opportunity to pass without putting that plainly on the record and making sure it is understood, because I am sure that the Liberal opponent who ran against me in the last election is gong to deny vehemently that his party stands for any such thing. I am not quoting the suggestions of other people with respect to what the government stands for. I am quoting its official spokesmen. I am quoting the Prime Minister who said the only way confidence arose at all was because of a defeat. I am quoting the Minister of Justice, one of the front-runners in the Liberal leadership race, who says it is entirely up to the government to determine what is a matter of confidence and that they have the right to make the choice after a vote. I am quoting the Minister of Finance who in this case says, "We will make it a vote of confidence," but in this case the resolution does not involve as much money as the last measure which we defeated. In effect he too is saying it is the government's choice which dictates and not the importance of the item under consideration.

I am sure that the Liberal opponents who ran against me, and the ones who will be running against me again if they can find one to run under these circumstances, will be screaming that this is not Liberal party policy and that the Liberals believe in responsible government. How could anyone say that? Not one member from the government benches has risen to deny the position they have taken.

In the face of the official stand taken by the Liberal party on the question of responsibility, I ask anyone to tell me how a future government that does not want to be forced out can be forced out by a vote of parliament if the government has the right to say whenever it likes that a vote is not a vote of confidence or to call it a vote of confidence only after it has won the vote in the house? If this house cannot exercise control in that regard, where do we have responsible government? If we in this chamber surrender the power to get rid of a government that is bad, as our duty demands, then how or where do we have responsible government? I know that the Governor General can act only on the advice of the Prime Minister. Through those very customs and traditions which his party is now trying to tear down the Prime Minister gained the right to be the only adviser to the Governor General, and that on the basis that he has the confidence of parliament. But now the government tells us that parliament can never test that right unless they, the members of the government, feel like it.

I ask hon. members opposite supporting the government to search their consciences and ask themselves if that is how little responsibility they have for democracy, because democracy cannot survive without responsible government. If this house cannot control the government, who will? The answer is no one. What action can we take if we cannot vote them out of office? Hon. members opposite who support the government on this resolution when it comes to a vote will be attesting to their faith in their party, in their need, desire and determination to hold on to power. All of that means ten times as much to them as responsible government, the cornerstone of democracy.

When I suggest that this is the height of irresponsibility I think I am putting the case very mildly. I can remember how responsible they were in opposition when they said they had only one duty, to get the government out of office no matter what. That was at a time when I thought we had a pretty good government. As a matter of fact, when I study the present government and compare it with the one they were voting against then I know we had a wonderful government. But their only consideration was to get into power. Certainly people today could be excused for taking the attitude that no matter what we do in this country we must get rid of this government first. But I point out that first we must protect our institutions. The steps we try to take to get rid of this government must not harm our institutions. I believe that the first duty of most Canadians today would be to instruct their members of parliament to get rid of this government.

We have financial problems in the country today. One might say we are facing a financial crisis. Some suggest that to hold an election at this time is irresponsible and that we should keep the government in office. In view of the way the government has mishandled the financial problems of the country, coupled with its record of fumbling incompetence and stumbling from one error to another, surely one cannot say as a responsible member of parliament that we should leave this government in power. We have had a series of crises in the house, most of them brought on by the inept handling of normal problems by this government. Whenever the government has tried to do something it has done it wrong.

I should like to know what there is about hon. members opposite which weds them to the idea that the Liberal party has the divine right to rule. Why is it so important that this government should be maintained in office when it will not accept responsibility and is willing to sacrifice the bulwark of democracy in this country for the right to remain in power?

It is my intention to ask every supporter of the Liberal party how he can belong to a party which supports this measure. I intend to ask every supporter of the Liberal party how he can believe that his party is an effective instrument to perform those things that need to be done in the best interests of the country. Every Liberal in this country is going to have to ask himself whether he wants to belong to a party which obviously intends to destroy the responsibility of government. Liberal members must ask themselves whether they want to continue to belong to a party which does not believe in democracy but believes only in retaining power. There are some who believe that benevolent despotism is the finest thing for the country. It has not been good for this country. I have never heard any Liberal who espouses the policy of the present government say anything up to this time that would convince me that the government has acted in the interests of this country. It is very nice to have power, but a party should not adopt the position that it will do anything to retain power at the expense of the country. One must support his own party on the basis that it will serve the best interests of the country and will put that purpose before power.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I wish to deal with a special aspect of the financial problems facing Canada and to put before this committee and the government an alternative to the tax proposals we are discussing, to which the members of this party are opposed for the reasons put forward by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

The purpose of the government's financial plans, as I understand them, is to bring its revenues into line with its expenditures and to prevent the inflationary effects of government deficits. This purpose can obviously be achieved by increasing revenues or reducing expenditures. The trouble with increasing revenues, at least in the form that has been put before this committee, is that it will create unemployment and may well stimulate the pressure toward higher prices. The effect of a reduction of government expenditures, if applied indiscriminately, could also create hardships and would decrease productivity if applied to those government services which create conditions leading to increased productivity.

There is a field of conspicuously wasteful expenditure to which I should like to direct the attention of the minister and, so far as I am able, to the attention of the people of Canada. It is a field long regarded as sacrosanct but one which any government must examine seriously if it is to deal effectively with inflationary pressures. I refer to the immense and wasteful expenditure on obsolete defence systems. We are and have been spending a total on defence of $1,600 million per year, and the estimated expenditure for 1967-68 is over $1,700 million.

Let me point out to the committee and the government that included in that $1,700 million are expenditures on defence systems which are completely useless, meet no real threat, and should be discontinued. It is part of the conventional wisdom shared by many members of this house—perhaps we should call it conventional folly—to strain at the gnat of government spending on health services for Eskimos in the far north, for example, and to swallow the camel of immense outlays on defence of dubious utility against remote or even non-existent threats. Indeed, I think we must get away fom the fascination with defence systems which add nothing to our security and yet burden us so that we divert resources from those things urgently needed for economic growth.

Let me illustrate this. Since 1958 Canada has been spending in the neighbourhood of $130 million per year through NORAD on a system of active defence against the supposed manned bomber threat from the U.S.S.R. Total Canadian expenditures to date on NORAD have been, I have no doubt, in excess of $1 billion. The government proposes to continue with this expenditure even though it is clearly and obviously obsolete. When I expressed this view at the committee on external affairs and defence the Minister of National Defence said this was my own personal view. It is indeed my own personal view, but it is also the view held by military and defence experts.

In 1966 Mr. McNamara, the former secretary of defence of the United States, said this, and I commend it to the attention of the government, whose members may not choose to listen at the moment but perhaps will give some attention in the future:

> Our present system for defence against manned bomber attack was designed a decade ago when it was estimated that the Soviets would build a force capable of attacking the United States with many hundreds of long range aircraft. This threat did not develop as estimated.

In other words, Mr. McNamara told us that the threat against which these defences were built did not develop. He said:

> Indeed, the major threat confronting the United States consists of Soviet I.C.B.M.'s and submarine-launched ballistic missile forces.

Later Mr. McNamara said it was abundantly obvious that the anti-bomber defence system was vulnerable to missile attack. I remind the committee that this is what we are spending $130 million per year to support. I suggest it is absolutely clear that if the U.S.S.R. decided, and this is a very big "if", to launch an all-out attack, the only sort of attack that would be conceivable, it could use just a few of the more than 700 I.C.B.M.'s it has to destroy completely our anti-bomber defences.

The fact of the matter is that for many years past there has been no defence, and in the foreseeable future there will be no defence, against an all-out air attack except the deterrence of the invulnerable American strategic forces. Indeed, Mr. McNamara and others have made it abundantly clear that however North America and other countries choose to build up their defences by the installation of expensive anti-ballistic missile systems for new anti-bomber defences, the Soviet union could still effectively destroy the United States and Canada even after absorbing the full weight of a United States first strike.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, the reverse is true; the United States could effectively destroy the U.S.S.R. no matter what was the weight of the attack the U.S.S.R. delivered on North America. It is this undoubted, even if grisly situation, this power of mutual destruction that is the real defence until the happier days of the future when nuclear disarmament may become possible. No doubt for this reason a distinguished Canadian soldier, General Simonds, about four years ago told the defence committee that the Russians would have to be crazy to launch an attack of this sort. He went on to add that they were not crazy.

Mr. McNamara, again, speaking not only of the present anti-bomber defences but of contemplated systems said:

> We should be under no illusion that damage-limiting measures, regardless of how extensive they may be, could by themselves change the situation.

The situation to which he referred was that which I have already described, the power of the U.S.S.R. using I.C.B.M.'s and submarine-based missiles to destroy North America even after an all-out first strike by the Americans. This situation makes an anti-bomber defence irrelevant and obsolete, ineffectual and useless; it is unnecessary. The U.S.S.R. has never built up a bomber threat that could deal with North America. They could not launch such an attack without inviting their own destruction. If there is no threat and no means of meeting the threat even if it were real, money spent on it is spent on illusions; it is wasted. Some faint glimmering of this reality appeared in the government ranks when the Minister of Transport was minister of defence and drew up the white paper of 1964, because he told us then that this system would be gradually phased out. But in the meantime the Canadian taxpayer has been paying, as I said, $130 million a year for the upkeep of this obsolete system. Is this a trifle? I wonder why it cannot be looked at?

What of the future? I suspect that we are on the verge of committing ourselves morally if not legally to a continuation and extension of this waste in the future. The government is now negotiating for the continuation of the NORAD agreement which expires, as hon. members will know, in May of this year. NORAD is a treaty, as members of the committee are aware, providing for collaboration and a joint United States-Canadian command over North American air defence. I for one have no objection at all to our co-operating with the United States with regard to North American air defence. I believe that our sovereignty requires us to accept our share of surveillance of North American air space, and this can be better accomplished in co-operation with the United States.

But what else is involved? That is the billion dollar question facing Canada at the moment. I am well aware that legally the renewal of the NORAD treaty does not commit Canada to any particular system or any precise contribution, but can anyone pretend that the renewal of NORAD will not be a moral commitment to continue the present anti-bomber system until a new system is introduced and then to accept a share of any new anti-bomber system that the United States proposes to develop? We are going, under the cover of NORAD if not under its strict terms, to commit ourselves to spending hundreds of millions of dollars on anti-bomber defence.

A great deal is said in this house and elsewhere about Canadian independence. I believe that if we are to take our independence seriously it is necessary for us to scrutinize carefully any particular joint defence system and to decide for ourselves whether Canada can or should afford to contribute to it. To what new system are we going to be committed? Mr. McNamara's recent statement to the Senate armed services committee outlined the proposed new schemes for North American defence. One part consists of what is called a thin A.B.M. system, in the jargon that they use. This will cost our American friends $5 billion. It is said to be China-oriented. In other words, it is absolutely no defence against U.S.S.R. I.C.B.M.'s. If it were to be expanded into a full A.B.M. system it would cost upwards of $40 billion and it could be quickly offset by an improvement in the offensive capability of the U.S.S.R. In other words, the same degree of insecurity would be purchased at a fantastic cost.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that Canada should not spend a nickel on such a system and I am glad that the government has indicated that for the present, at any rate, it does not intend to take part in this A.B.M. system. I hope no Canadian government will.

Indeed, the very idea of a Chinese-oriented system is a good example of a vastly expensive system into which billions of dollars are poured to meet a military threat that is not real. This is, again, an example of pandering to misguided public opinion created by propaganda from the so-called industrial-military complex.

What is the rest of the new proposal to which we may be asked to commit ourselves, if not under NORAD at least in accordance with NORAD? We are going to be asked to share in the new defence arrangements proposed by Mr. McNamara, the installation of a new airborne warning control system supported by a new group of F-106 interceptors, at an anticipated cost to the United States of $12.30 billion. This new system is an airborne system which can track aircraft at low altitudes great distances from the United States. It has low vulnerability.

I suggest that whatever Canada's decision may be about this type of detection and protection we should not be drawn into outlays for new interceptors. I remind the committee again of the words of Mr. McNamara in discussing this matter:

> No air defence system can provide significant damage-limiting capability against the U.S.S.R. unless accompanied by strong effective A.B.M., a capability which is at present unattainable.

I ask the committee to note the words that no air defence system can provide significant damage-limiting capability unless it is accompanied by a system which is not attainable at the present time. I suggest that expenditures which cannot contribute significantly to Canadian or Unites States security, except on conditions which do not exist, cannot and ought not to be afforded. They are useless waste of money, men and resources. Precisely the same thing could be said about some of our present contributions to NATO. However, I have no time to go into that today.

We are committed for years to come to a tactical nuclear role. Our contribution is not needed in Europe and it has no military significance. The money we are spending on our present role in NATO is a substantial contribution to inflationary pressures. It does not contribute to the security of Canada or anyone else.

I believe no one in this house denies the necessity of spending money to buy security. In the sort of world in which we live a contribution to security and defence is essential. I am not urging that Canada opt out of its contribution to security and defence. A mobile force capable of backing international order can make a decisive and valuable contribution to world stability, and I suspect the need for this will grow rather than diminish. In such a case, defence expenditures are a real insurance premium against real risks. But I do protest against the tragic waste of scarce resources on illusory defences against illusory threats.

It is all very well to say, as some people do, "let us be good fellows. Let us go along with every system propounded by our neighbour to the south. In this way we will buy their good will." I say that the time has come for us to take a long, hard look for ourselves and firmly but politely decline to become partners in expensive and useless proposals. Partnership, yes, but partnership involves independence of judgment and the sharing of agreed and not unreal risks.

It may be argued that the subject I have discussed has little to do with our financial problems. May I remind the house that last night the Minister of Finance himself said that the war in Viet Nam has produced the present world financial crisis. The war in Viet Nam is a product of over-reliance on military solutions. The very same thing applies to the way we use our resources in this country, and in relation to the management of our resources we should eliminate expenditures which do not make any particular sense. My colleague, the hon. member for New Westminster, has reminded me that the average cost of defence to every Canadian family of four is $360 a year. I suggest this is no trifle.

I urge that the government scrutinize our defence commitments and expenditures with the same rigour it would apply to any other expenditure. I urge the government not to allow our fiscal system and the direction of our resources to be distorted as they have been in the past by defence expenditures which make no sense. If they do not believe they make no sense, I invite them to look at the matter seriously, consult the people who know what they are talking about, and even to read what Mr. McNamara, who has until recently presided over these systems as secretary of defence in the United States, has said. If they look into the facts they will find that, under the conventional myth which we seem to adopt that defence is sacrosanct, we are wasting our resources in this field when they are urgently needed for economic growth. I do not believe we will put our financial affairs into reasonable shape in this country or, indeed, in the world until we stop devoting resources to building up military hardware under conditions where it is never likely to be used, a direction of resources which gives us only insecurity instead of the security we are aiming for.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to take too much of the time of the house on this matter. However, I do want to register my opinions concerning the new tax measures which the minister has brought before the house and the opportunity which they afford the government to recover some of its financial losses and to bring in any future measures they may contemplate.

There is one aspect of this whole matter which I should like to make clear, namely, that the Canadian people are wondering what is going on and what it is all about. They are more and more perplexed as the days go by and less and less enlightened about the situation as we try to struggle out of this financial strait-jacket. However, there is one thing of which the people are sure, that they have been following the guide lines set down by successive Canadian governments according to which they should invest in their own country and work as honest, submissive and good-natured citizens. This they have done.

We have stressed upon them the importance of economizing, of constructing homes and of contributing to the building of a great nation. They have done so on the say-so of the Liberal administration and the preceding Conservative one. However, they woke up to the fact that they have been following the guide lines to the letter and that any mistakes that have been made have originated from this place and not from themselves. A great majority of them have been living on credit and those who have not found themselves without a cent to spare and with very small salaries on which to live. They have no means of counteracting the financial difficulties which beset them and cause them anxiety and insecurity. Yet they also know that they have followed to the letter the guide lines set down by the successive Canadian governments. They know that no one else can be blamed for the mess in which the country finds itself today but those who have their hands in the cookie jar.

What will the government tell the people who are the victims of its financial policies? Canadians are no farther advanced today than they were 30 years ago. In fact they have suffered a set-back. Well, you can fool some of the people all of the time and you can fool all of the people some of the time but you cannot fool all of the people all of the time. I believe this is what we are trying to do. The minister says the government is going to impose a 3 per cent surcharge on income tax for two years. I do not believe it will be for two years any more than I believe there will be a reimbursement of the corporation tax in two years. The government will say the people are used to it and while they will not put on another tax they will leave this surtax as it is. I feel certain that is exactly what is going to happen.

We seem to blame the municipalities, the provincial governments and everyone else for contributing to the high cost of living in this country. However, we forget to look in our own backyard. The minister knows quite well that the 3 per cent surcharge on corporations will affect consumer prices within one or two months after it is imposed. The cost of producing an article is reflected in the selling price of that same article. This is a vicious circle because what you collect on the one hand you have to give on the other in order to try to maintain stability. The surcharge on personal income will have the same effect. The only difference is that salaries go up by the stairway and the cost of living goes up by the escalator. There seems to be an imbalance here.

The Conservatives have criticized these measures but have not given any indication of how they would solve the problem. I just have to look back to 1957 and 1958 and the great visions of that time to realize how, since 1962, they have become the nightmares of the past. In 1959, when the right hon. member for Prince Albert was leading the Conservatives, he used to say that the country had a stable economy. I believe that is the situation today. I believe the financial problems can be blamed on the fact that certain financiers have been itching to speculate. I say that you are to blame for not putting them in their place. We are going to have to face up to this problem.

Last night on a television program a member of the government, a member of the official opposition and I were discussing the new proposals introduced by the Minister of Finance. I was asked exactly where the government could have picked up the revenue lost as a result of the defeat of Bill No. C-193. You do not have to be a wizard to do that. If the public accounts committee had met more often we would have been able to examine expenditures more carefully. I am not criticizing the fact that $400 million in waste or extravagance was found by the Auditor General. This amounts to about 5 per cent of the total expenditures on administration. I believe that every company finds that about 5 per cent or 10 per cent of its budget is being wasted. If we do not check this now, it will not be $400 million next year but $800 million. While we may not be able to regain the money lost we could at least reduce expenditures for the next year.

The Glassco commission did great work and its report cost a lot of money. The report has collected quite a lot of dust up to now. I am convinced if we search through that report we will find many recommendations that have not been implemented. I told one member yesterday that one statement in the Glassco report was that the federal government could save some money on the quality of paper used. The saving could amount to $1.5 million per year. I am quite certain that since the report was tabled there has not been a change in one sheet of paper used by the government. The hon. member for Lapointe and the hon. member for York-Humber during the question period this morning indicated their dissatisfaction with the disposal of certain assets from Expo. The hon. member for Lapointe stated that a loan had been made to Great Britain in 1946 carrying an interest rate of 2.5 per cent. The deferred interest alone on that loan amounts to $85 million. The minister should see if he can collect some of that money instead of choking the Canadian taxpayer.

There is another $100 million in guaranteed reserves in the chartered banks of Canada, which is interest free. The government could collect another $5 million there which would be a help. The federal government is also aware of the hidden reserves in the chartered banks. If they are hidden reserves they are hidden profits, but the minister does not tax them. Can the minister indicate to me any other Canadian corporation that could legally have hidden reserves or profits and not pay income tax on them? Why have sour milk for one and sweetened milk for the other? If we are going to make people contribute to the expense of running the country we should not make one group contribute and allow others to go free. I would not think that the minister has very many alternatives, but if the Auditor General were given additional staff to make investigations perhaps he could find that more than $400 million had been wasted. I ask the minister to tighten things up a little bit and try to stop these leaks.

When the Bank Act was passed last spring the chartered banks were permitted to raise their interest rates on loans from 6 per cent to 7¼ per cent. This affected the cost of living. The argument at that time was that the finance companies were lending more than the chartered banks. I do not believe there has been much change in that respect. I have not seen any finance companies in any great difficulty since then. The only direct result one has been able to ascertain has been that the cost of living has gone up. When someone says that the way to solve the problem of inflation is to have more unemployment in Canada, then I say that is stupid. You will not solve the problem of inflation by having a higher rate of unemployment. The problem will only be solved by having more respect for the Canadian people and the Canadian economy.

We contribute greatly to external aid. This is good if we can afford it. But before we become involved with NATO, NORAD and such organizations or worry about the Chinese in China or Africans in Africa the minister should concern himself with the welfare of Canadians in Canada. He will have his hands full finding solutions to our own problems. This might hurt his campaign a little, but I think he has a responsibility to the Canadian people. The function of the Canadian government is to take care of the business of Canadians and to solve the problems confronting the country in accordance with the needs and desires of the people. When that is done we can worry about a little external aid. In my opinion we should cut some of our present external aid. The minister should not use the excuse of a critical financial situation to squeeze the taxpayers a little more. The taxpayers are not in a position to be squeezed any more. They are going to start kicking, and I do not blame them.

Some radio commentators have been saying that perhaps le Ralliement is going to support the government on this measure, but as far as I am concerned they had better check their notes again. We have stated very clearly that we are against this tax, as we are against any other form of taxation. In my opinion the vote taken the other day had nothing to do with the tax itself, but so far as members of this party are concerned we are going to oppose this measure brought in by the Minister of Finance and we will continue to oppose such measures. I suggest that these commentators should get their facts correct because they can count on opposition from the members of this group on this vote.

I am trying to indicate to the government that although the minister tells the people to tighten their belts because we have to control inflation, measures such as this, as he knows very well contribute directly to rising costs and to inflation itself. As long as he maintains this attitude inflation will get worse.

The methods we have been using are those of the nineteenth century. They are methods that have led from one disaster to another. Therefore I suggest we should think about changing these methods to see whether or not there are other ways to meet the problems that face us. It seems that the government is reluctant to accept any simple solution, and the reason for this is that the situation today is complicated by their own manoeuvring.

This government reminds me of the scientists of the nineteenth century, which was about the poorest century in the matter of scientific development in the history of the world. For example, if your ideas did not accord with the members of L'Académie des Sciences you could be burnt at the stake. You just had to conform. The same thing applies to this government. They have developed their own spider's web. If somebody offers a simple solution that deals basically with the problem the government will not accept it. They claim that the economists will not approve.

I have my own reservations about economists, Mr. Chairman. There are economists both in the eastern bloc and in the western bloc, but each group of economists has different ideas and solutions for tackling the same problem. In this house there are perhaps half a dozen economists and they do not agree about the same problems. They talk about hypotheses, and I have my own hypothesis in this regard. In the field of medicine doctors, whether they be in the U.S.S.R. or in the United States, tell us that the heart is on the left side of the body. That is a proven fact. But economic theories are as different from each other as black from white. That is why I doubt those theories. We should adopt an orthodox approach to our economic problems. We should just use common sense.

At the present time we are just the tail end of the United States economy as a result of the Viet Nam war. We know that when the President of the United States barks, we wag. Some day we must be independent. We must be able to stand on our own feet, depend on our own people and our own natural resources, and solve our own problems. Instead of being a tail light on an automobile we must be a headlight and see where we are going. When that day comes the Canadian people will have more confidence in the institution of parliament and their elected representatives. But it will not come until we change our methods and cease applying pressure to the Canadian people that they as well as us do not like. On behalf of the people we are going to oppose such pressures.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Chairman, I have sympathy for everyone here who has to stay and listen to this debate. I do not feel guilty in rising to speak since I have taken little time of the house since Christmas. The people of my riding sent me here to represent them and to talk on important measures. I believe this is one of those measures they want me to speak on and I intend to do so, no matter how inconvenient that may be for some hon. members.

A couple of mornings ago I heard a newscaster say that the Minister of Finance believed that parliament, after the recent defeat, understood it must act in a responsible manner. As I listened I said to myself, "Responsible to whom? To whom must we be responsible?" By his behaviour in the house the Minister of Finance has consistently shown that he aspires to act in a manner that is responsible to the financial community of Canada. In other words, his actions and policies have been designed to win the confidence of Canada's financial community, and that is where we in this party part company with the minister and the government in which he is such a shining light.

Those of us who have been sent here have no particular mandate to represent the interests of this country's financial community, nor do we particularly want to win their confidence. We have come here because the people who elected us said, "Canada is rich with resources, technical know-how and men and women of varying ability. Through our government we must plan for these resources and make use of technical and scientific knowledge and skills in such a way that the needs of our people from coast to coast are met."

Surely that sentiment does not represent a pipe-dream? Surely it is not beyond the powers of a government in this country to achieve that dream. If the realization of this dream is proving difficult the reason for the difficulty is fairly plain to see. The financial community, in whose service the Minister of Finance is engaged, has never wanted the government to intervene in private business. Putting it more bluntly and coldly, this country's financial community has never wanted the government to interfere in any sphere where a profit was to be made. The financial community with its ally, the industrial hierarchy, felt it had a mandate to make any profits that were to be made in this country. It felt it had the right even to potential profits, and it felt that it had the right to keep some matters at a standstill until a profit could be made.

From the beginning the financial and industrial communities fought hard and intelligently against any so-called intrusion by government into the private affairs of private citizens. They fought against social security measures and they fought every inch of the way. I know what I am talking about. I was around when the original battle for old age pensions was fought in this chamber. The financial and economic hierarchies of this country have always felt that from their point of view social security legislation is undesirable, and here I am speaking of measures ranging from old age pensions to medicare, family allowances and the like.

While delivering what I hope is the last body blow against medicare, that faithful servant of our financial community, the Minister of Finance, tried to frighten the daylights out of the ordinary taxpayer and the wits out of provincial governments by saying that huge amounts of new money would be needed to finance medicare. Because of such an attitude we have seen conflict arising in this house.

The financial and industrial elite have sedulously resisted every attempt by the government to provide goods and services to the public through public agencies. It has been claimed that private enterprise can provide those services. We claim that only those who can pay for exorbitant profits and prices very much beyond what ordinary people can pay can obtain many of such goods and services. To give modern examples of my meaning let me cite housing and drugs. If the government really wanted to bring competition to the drug industry and drive prices down so that ordinary people could afford prescription drugs, why could it not set up a public corporation to manufacture and distribute drugs? The competition from such a public body would soon drive down the price of prescription drugs. For years Connaught Laboratories have been supplying insulin at cost to those suffering from diabetes and this has been a great boon to those people.

The things I have suggested are not being done because, as the Bible says, you cannot serve two masters at once. This government, ably led by the Minister of Finance, has chosen to serve the masters of the financial and economic communities instead of common people. There is no mystery about the matter. When our economy gets into difficulties our financial and industrial hierarchies say that the people who can least afford to in this country ought to tighten their belts and bear the burden. We talk of the assault on the Canadian dollar. That assault is as nothing compared with the assault the Minister of Finance has made on the health needs of the Canadian people. He was almost successful in having medicare ditched earlier this year.

We were not surprised by the introduction of Bill C-193. It imposed a 5 per cent surtax on income tax across the board and those who were mainly affected were those least able to bear the burden. Many of our people find it impossible to live under decent, modern conditions. A ceiling of $600 on the extra tax was imposed because the minister did not want the people in the higher income brackets to be hurt. The surtax bore heavily and relentlessly on the wage earners and low income people of this country. We in this party fought that proposal through every stage. We fought it until the measure was defeated not long ago. Now, in addition to asking us to accept other financial measures, the government asks us to accept a cut-back in industrial work.

When members from the west coast went home at Christmas they saw figures showing that the unemployment rate in British Columbia is almost twice the average unemployemnt rate for the rest of Canada. We were told at Christmas that in the various construction establishments on the west coast between 10 per cent and 25 per cent of the workers were unemployed, that in the manufacturing trades a similar percentage was out of work and that in the shipyards between 10 and 50 per cent were unemployed. This is not to be ascribed to seasonal unemployment. It is the direct result of cut-backs in the destroyer conversion program and related work which had been given to the west coast shipyards, or of the withdrawal of large public works in other fields.

Hon. members may have heard the latest example of this cut-back technique which is producing the very ailments that the government is so vocal about trying to cure. They may have heard that at Eskimo Point, a village with a population of roughly 400, the great killer among children, is meningitis, and that last year in a single 12-month period so many children died of this disease that had there been a comparable epidemic in Winnipeg 8,000 children would have died. Yet only a few days ago the government ordered cut-backs in the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare directly affecting the Eskimo population and, in consequence, the children of Eskimo Point.

I do not understand why we should suddenly listen when the minister tells us the financial people are concerned about the Canadian dollar and he has to merit their confidence by doing something to save it. Save the Canadian dollar for what? Save the Canadian economy for whom? This is what we want to know. Nobody would be more anxious than we would be to take conservation measures, fiscal and financial, if we could be sure the funds would be used so as to help those among the Canadian people who really need help. The hard fact is that despite all the government has been doing for the last two years, unemployment has increased sharply. It is impossible to visit the ridings of members on the coast without meeting ordinary folk who tell us that their young people fresh out of training or out of school cannot get jobs.

The cost of living continues to increase. True, it went up by only a tenth of a point last month but it has been rising steadily until in January of this year it was 4½ per cent higher than a year ago. The minister referred to housing. He said some improvement was evident. Last year there were 167,000 starts, 22 per cent above the 1966 figure. The hon. gentleman tells us that the minister in charge of housing says there will be 175,000 starts this year. He did not remind us of the figure which the economic council says we must reach if we are to keep ahead, namely, 190,000 housing starts this year. The position is that we are 15,000 starts behind, even accepting the minister's optimistic estimate. So the housing situation does not look very bright either.

Still looking at the housing picture, I point out that the minister said the increase in rents was undoubtedly due in part to higher property taxes, the higher cost of land and increased interest rates. He also said, and I quote his words: "but perhaps it is also because in many places landlords are in a strong bargaining position." Why does the government not do something about ordinary people who find themselves in the hands of landlords who are in a strong position?

An hon. Member: That is a provincial field.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): What is the use of a government which knows there is a shortage of housing, which admits that rents have increased to some extent because landlords are in a strong bargaining position, but whose members sit comfortably in their padded seats doing nothing to protect people from gouging landlords?

Electors in my riding are much impressed with what they see on television, the prestidigitation of the Minister of Finance—now you see it, now you don't—and the high-sounding language. But when it is all over they want to know when the government intends to do something about the cost of living, when it intends to do something about rents, and when it intends to take action to make decent housing available. They want to know these things. They want to know when the government will make up its mind whether or not to introduce medicare on July 1.

Scarcely a day goes by but I receive in my office letters from people in my riding who suffer from a common ailment. Their income is just not enough to go round, not enough to allow them a modern standard of living. These are people who live on old age pensions. Far from helping them out, the supplementary payment has placed them in a position where they are receiving less than the difference between what their old pension was worth and the rising cost of living. They would much have preferred $100 a month clear by a straight increase in the pension rather than a ceiling of $105 with a means test attached to it. There are veterans in our ridings whose pensions are just enough get them by. Their pensions are adequate to the point of sheer existence, but no more. When their wives, for example, want to go out and work for a few hours as waitresses or in some other occupation, the income allowed them under this new system is cut. The slight improvement in living standards for which they are hoping is denied them at every turn.

This government, and I say it seriously and advisedly, has mastered the art of reducing the living standards of the common people to an extent no previous government has been able to accomplish. Let that epitaph be recorded, because something tells me it will not be long before this government is buried underground and I hope this time it will be in that position for a long, long time.

What are we offered today? The Minister of Finance must have burned a good deal of midnight oil before he brought down this measure. I am under the impression that he, some of his officials and perhaps some of his cabinet colleagues sat down to try to figure out what could be done to draft a measure as close as possible to the bill which was defeated without actually getting ruled out of order or howled down, or both. The question which arose was: How can we draw up a measure which will offer a sop to all the opposition parties so they will vote in its favour and at the same time raise the revenue we need?

One does not have to seek for in this proposal to find the sop intended for the official opposition. The government decided they would offer a freeze on the number presently in the civil service. I do not know if they reckoned with the hon. member for Carleton or not, but probably there are one or two others in the Conservative party who feel a little uneasy about accepting a sop of that kind.

With respect to the N.D.P. they said, "We will offer two sops. We will cut down the amount of tax on individuals and introduce a corporation surtax of 3 per cent. We will give them the prices review board they are asking for. We will give it to them by name but not by actual board, and they will be just dumb enough to take it and think they have got the board they have been seeking." I say to the Minister of Finance that we are not falling for that sort of thing. We like the 3 per cent surtax on ordinary income a little better than the 5 per cent surtax originally proposed, but putting a little equity on top of a great inequitable tax structure is not going to buy us off. It is like putting a clean collar on top of a dirty shirt and hoping your coat will hide the shirt.

Over and over again we have said to the government that if it wants revenues it has been shown how to get them, and not just by us. It paid a great deal of money to get advice from the Carter commission on taxation, which has shown the government where it may collect money from wealthy corporations in the oil, gas and other fields. It has also shown the government how to build a much fairer tax base, taxing according to ability to pay. But the government does not want to get its taxes this way. Until we get the Carter report implemented, until we get equity, we are not going to fall for this kind of thing.

Nor are we going to fall for this review board sop. There are already signs that the minister wishes to bury mention of a prices review board. There is a tremendous reluctance on the part of the government to give us details as to this board. It will be a toothless wonder, just like the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs which gives protection only in small things. It gives no protection against rises in the cost of living.

This proposed review board apparently is to be a voluntary body, with representatives from labour and management. It will have no power to deal with the rising cost of living. It is the same as offering a bun to a burglar and hoping he will go away. Of course it is not going to work. The thing which makes it so hard to swallow is that on Wednesday the Minister of Finance said, as reported at page 7336 of Hansard:

> It seems quite evident to me that our first priority in economic policy now must be to achieve greater stability in prices and costs.

If the government's first priority is to achieve greater stability in prices and costs, then I feel sorry for its other priorities. Surely no stability can be achieved by means of a voluntary body which will periodically give advice on prices and wages, and I am certain it will be concerned more with wages than prices.

Surely it is time the minister began to think of acting in a responsible manner to the Canadian community as a whole from coast to coast. We need action on taxation, on the cost of living and on housing. I am pleased to see that the province of Quebec has become fed up waiting for a lead from Ottawa and has passed a rental control measure through its provincial legislature. I hope the other provinces will follow suit.

I hope too that the government will pay attention to the findings of the prairie commission on retailing, which urged a federal investigation. The facts and figures are not wanting. We brought them out in the prices committee. The government knows that excessive profits are being made. It knows that advertising is being used in many ways in which it should not be used.

Why does the government not take action? It knows there is need for action on unemployment. It is no use for members of the government to sit back and say: Let private business take up the slack. In 1932, when we had a really bad depression situation throughout the whole of this continent, members of the Canadian government sat back in padded chairs and hoped that providence or sun spots would do something about it. It took President Roosevelt to go out, get men and materials together and get employment going again. The banks were so grateful that for a little while they kept their mouths shut until he got employment going.

These are the things we need done. Our party is going to oppose this measure not only because it is inequitable but because without action on these other things it is perpetrating a fraud on the Canadian people. We want to see an over-all policy to build prosperity in Canada and we are not going to settle for anything less.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to speak at any length. I would like to thank hon. members who have participated in the debate for their comments, and there are one or two points by way of clarification that I would like to make.

The first and most important point that I ought to answer immediately is to be found at page 7401 of Hansard for March 7, in the speech of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands when, dealing with the relationships between Canada and the United States, he said:

> In addition to that we are going to help the United States in another curious way. We are going to invest our entire holding of United States dollars, apart from the necessary working balances, in United States government securities which do not constitute a liquid claim on the United States. What does this mean? It means that we are going to help the Americans with their balance of payment program by funnelling back to the United States American dollars which we earn either through exports or through various operations, and placing them in United States government securities which do not constitute a liquid claim on the United States, which will be neutralized, and which will be non-negotiable securities for an undisclosed fixed term.
> In return for that, the United States, plus the central banks of Germany and Italy, will provide us with $900 million United States as a stand-by credit. Presumably when our transfer of funds to government securities in the United States reaches a sufficiently high level, we shall draw on this $900 million, and the process will continue indefinitely because this government will not take the fiscal steps that could be taken to get us out of this tangle.

I would like to say to the committee and to the hon. member that there is no connection whatever between the action that the United States took in exempting Canada from the balance of payment restrictions and the credits we arranged with the Export-Import Bank and the other banks in Europe. I would not want to leave on the record the inference that there was, because it might cause some misunderstanding in financial markets. While I know that the financial world reads my speeches, because its members must, I am sure they also pay attention to the speeches of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, who has some reputation as a financial critic of the government for his party. That was the main point I wanted to make, Mr. Chairman.

I should like to comment on the speech of the Leader of the Opposition who repeated a statement made in this house earlier by the New Democratic party about refundable corporation taxes. Let me repeat what I said were the reasons for refunding that tax now. As recorded at page 4908 of Hansard for that date I said:

> Under the law, the payments must be refunded with interest not later than 36 months after they were due, or after they were received if they were late. They could be repaid as much as 18 months earlier if the government so decided. Consequently the amount collected—some $230 million in all—must be repaid some time between today and June, 1970. Clearly it would be difficult to make repayment in the next few months, but I believe we should not put off the repayment entirely until the last possible date for that would add seriously to the burdens to be faced during the 1969-70 fiscal year. I believe the measure I have proposed in regard to corporation taxes will provide us with enough cash receipts to permit us to repay a substantial amount of the refundable tax during 1968-69.

I was referring of course to bringing forward by two months the payment of corporate taxes and I might add that my hon. friend supported this. The reason we put the other taxes on for two years is that the problems we face are not only problems of this and next year, they are problems of the year following. I have no hesitation in saying that I have not changed my mind about the time of the refunding or repayment of that refundable tax, because I do not want to be building up for 1969-70 the kind of problems that would result. I believe if the Leader of the Opposition would reflect on this he might come to the same conclusion.

Mr. Stanfield: Without taking up too much time I just want to say to the minister that I have reflected on this and have not changed my mind, either.

Mr. Sharp: I thank the Leader of the Opposition for the fact that he has reflected on this. I am sorry he did not come to the same conclusion. Perhaps if he sat where I am and thought in terms of problems in 1969-70 he would have the same view.

I should also like to comment on the point made by the Leader of the Opposition about the so-called board of review. I listened with great interest to the speech made by that hon. gentleman and found myself going through the same sort of arguments he expressed when he was speaking. When he was talking about taxes he made two statements. First of all he said they were inflationary, because they would lead to higher costs or to higher wage demands. On the other hand he said they were deflationary because they would decrease the demand. This is a problem which faces all ministers of finance when they have to decide how to raise revenues. If you look at the present problem, as I am sure the Leader of the Opposition has, you have to see it all in one piece. The Leader of the Opposition suggested that we should only raise the taxes from corporations by speeding up their payments by two months. It seems to me that he thereby placed a great burden upon the review board which he believed might help restrain prices, wages and costs. I suggest to him that if we are going to have successful anti-inflationary policies we must have adequate fiscal and monetary policies to encourage restraint. It seems to me the hon. gentleman places far too great a burden upon the board in encouraging voluntary restraint and thereby endangers its success.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I think we have never had an opportunity to make a presentation to cabinet. Perhaps we should take this opportunity to say one word about a vitally important question which has been presented to this Minister of Finance and all his predecessors for the last 12 or 15 years. On each occasion with each cabinet minister there has been a successive intensity of deafness on their part of these problems. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni and the hon. member for Timiskaming are interested in this matter and have referred to it before.

I notice the intense look on the face of the Minister of Finance. I am not directing my remarks to him because he has ignored this matter before. I hope his colleagues in the cabinet will understand this problem and will bring some understanding to the government. The Minister of Finance may not be in his position much longer, for one reason or another.

Let me refer briefly to the necessity of providing some tax relief measures for industrial workers who must buy their own special clothing and equipment, and must maintain two homes in order to earn a living. Without repeating again who these people may be, let me say they are many in number and include loggers on the west coast who face considerable expense in respect of special clothing and must maintain two homes, one at the camp and one where they normally live. This is also true of many construction workers. If there is a persistence on the part of the government to ignore this legitimate plea for equity on the part of these workers, this simply underlines the fact that the government is not interested in providing the equity for these workers.

The Chairman: The question is on the motion by the Minister of Finance. All those in favour of the resolution will please rise. All those against the resolution will please rise.

Resolution (Mr. Sharp) agreed to: Yes, 124; Nays, 101.

• (4:10 p.m.)

The Chairman: Order. I declare the resolution carried. Shall I report the resolution?

An hon. Member: How about another vote?

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, I was paired. Had I voted I would have voted for the resolution.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Mr. Tardif of the committee of ways and means reports a certain resolution and requests that they be granted leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house. When shall the report be received? Now?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Mr. Sharp, seconded by Mr. Benson, moves that the said resolution be now concurred in. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Adopted, on division. When shall the committee have leave to sit again? Next sitting of the house? Agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Mr. Sharp, seconded by Mr. Benson, moves for leave to present a bill based on the said resolution, namely Bill No. C-207, to amend the Income Tax Act. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Adopted, on division. Mr. Sharp, seconded by Mr. Benson, moves that the said bill be now read a first time. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Adopted, on division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a second time? Next sitting of the house?

Mr. Starr: Never.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Agreed.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I should like to call item 64, resuming consideration of the motion for the second reading of an act to amend the National Housing Act.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, we welcome this order of business. Our party would like to expedite this matter today in all its stages, and I hope that the private members hour will be waived in order that we may complete this bill today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McCleave: Tell that to Benson, too, so that he understands.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I agree with this procedure as long as it is specified that if we waive private members hour it will be in order to go through with this legislation and no other, unless specified at the present time.

Mr. Starr: Agreed.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE RATIOS FOR INSURED LOANS

The house resumed from Monday, February 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Benson for the second reading of Bill No. C-202, to amend the National Housing Act, 1954.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The President of the Treasury Board.

Mr. Starr: I hope the minister does not take too much time.

Hon. E. J. Benson (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, this is really a very simple bill. I realize that hon. members opposite wish to say some words about housing. They have indicated that they would like to proceed with this bill through all its stages before six o'clock, so I will simply explain that the bill allows for a reduction of the down payment on homes by increasing the 95 per cent limit upon which C.M.H.C. may make loans or guarantee loans from $13,000 to $18,000. Under the maximum loan provision the down payment will be reduced from $2,150 to $900.

The only question that may arise in the minds of some hon. members is why in part (ii) of each of the three subsections we include 70 per cent of the amount by which the lending value exceeds $18,000. The maximum amount to which C.M.H.C. may go is set by order in council. The inclusion of part (ii) in each of the subsections is simply in order that the governor in council may, after consultation with C.M.H.C., decide to increase the total mortgage which is available under C.M.H.C. Central Mortgage can then do so, and lend or guarantee a loan to the extent of 70 per cent beyond the $18,000 to a new level which could be established in the future.

I hope that members on all sides of the house will support this bill in order that we may at least take this step toward helping to provide more homes for Canadians.

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, we are naturally very pleased that the government has finally acceded to our request to bring this matter before the house. Yesterday I had telephone calls from contractors in various parts of the country asking why the opposition was holding up this bill. I would point out that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) announced at the federal-provincial conference on December 10 or 11, I believe, that this was a proposal of the government, yet it was not until February 14 that the resolution appeared on the order paper. I therefore want to say categorically that not only do we not accept any blame for the delay, but we have urged the government to bring this matter forward; and as our house leader has said, we intend to co-operate by putting the bill through all its stages this day.

Although this is a relatively uncomplicated amendment it does give us an opportunity to deal with a question with regard to which we feel the government is very vulnerable. The minister responsible for housing is not here at the moment, but I hope he will take sufficient interest later to read what we have to say about this matter. Clearly, even on the admission of some hon. members on the other side of the house, the housing policy of this government is in a mess. I quote from the Montreal Gazette of February 17. This article bears the headline, "Hellyer Lashes Housing Policy As 'All Wrong' ", and is as follows:

When it comes to housing, the federal government is doing "all the wrong things," transport minister Paul Hellyer said yesterday.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a question of privilege to say that this quotation was slightly out of context. What I said was that governments do all the wrong things and that there was room for improvement in the co-operation between government and industry at all levels. The federal government was not singled out in any way, and I am sure my hon. friend would want to make that correction.

Mr. Chatterton: I am sure that if the minister were honest with himself, he would admit he would have liked to say what the newspaper quoted him as saying. I believe the Secretary of State for External Affairs admitted as much when he made a speech in London a few weeks ago.

As I said, I think the government is vulnerable with respect to its housing policy, but in view of our anxiety to co-operate and to put this legislation through in a hurry, I will reserve the comments I intended to make until the supplementary estimates come before the house.

The one point I want to make is that the resources of this government are so bankrupt that the only thing they can do to improve the housing situation is to reduce down payments. We are completely in favour of this proposal, but I should like to point out that it does not help those Canadians who really need help. I have worked out figures which show that for a person to obtain a loan of $18,000, which is about what is required today to build a house and to pay for the land, he would have to earn at least $8,000 a year.

The fact of the matter is that the provisions of the National Housing Act today are of no value to two thirds of the Canadian wage earners. They are excluded because of the high cost of financing, which is largely a result of the policies of this government. Just to reinforce my argument, may I point out that in 1965, of all N.H.A. loans that were made, only 9 per cent were made to people who earned less than $5,000. In 1966, of all N.H.A. loans made, only 4.8 per cent were made to those with a family income of less than $5,000. Last year, in 1967, only 1.4 per cent of all N.H.A. loans were made to people with a family income of less than $5,000.

Truly, there is a great gap today in the legislation in Canada to provide housing for the average Canadian of average income. I admit that legislation dealing with low rental housing is reasonably good. However, improvements can be made to it, and the time will come when we will improve it.

I think the main fault here lies with the provinces and municipalities. In this respect I give credit to the province of Ontario which has done more than any other province in Canada. But it is the people between that group and those earning more than $8,000 who today cannot be helped by the national housing legislation. I submit this is a problem to which the government of Canada will have to put its mind. We cannot go on indefinitely providing houses only for those earning an income above $8,000. The time is not far distant when that particular housing market will become saturated. Yet, those people earning less than $8,000 a year cannot qualify for N.H.A. loans simply because under the N.H.A. regulations the gross debt and service charges shall not exceed 7 per cent of their gross income. For a man earning $20,000, the 27 per cent of his income is not too much for housing, but for a man earning $4,000 or $5,000 that 27 per cent of his income is too much for housing.

I should like to quote from the publication called "Municipal Affairs" of February, 1968, published by the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities, where the following is said:

> The government recently announced a substantial increase in the amount of government funds to be allocated in 1968 to public housing. The public was advised that this larger subsidized rental housing program was being achieved through a reduction in the amount to be available for direct lending to the speculative builder market.
> What becomes very apparent as a consequence of these two recent government moves, is that subsidized rental housing or substandard housing will now be the only housing alternatives for many thousands of low and middle-income Canadian families. There can be no doubt about this, for how can a family with an annual income of less than $8,000 hope to finance a twenty-five year mortgage at eight and five eighths per cent, taking into account the current costs of home construction, the cost of land, and the effect of the 11 per cent federal sales tax plus the appropriate provincial sales tax rate on building materials.
> On two counts, these alternatives are unsatisfactory. Firstly, the number of public housing units currently available or shortly to become available falls far, far short of even current needs for low-income families, let alone middle-income families. Secondly, the rental rates that apply in public housing schemes are geared to income, and current income/rent schedules disqualify middle-income families from this kind of housing. Simply put, this means that the only solution to the housing problem of many Canadian famiiles is an inordinate level of personal debt.

That comes from a publication of one of the most responsible and well informed organizations in Canada.

As I said before, I will reserve for a later date some of the remarks that I intended to make. I will conclude by saying that we support this measure, and I submit to the fiovernment that the time has come when the maximum amount of loan should also be increased. The recommendation of the Canadian Home Builders Association is that it be increased to $24,000, and it can be done by order in council. I would urge on the minister that he give serious consideration to this.

Although it will not help the group of people whom I have described, earning less than $8,000, it will help a great number of other people. We also have to keep in mind of course that all this money comes from the private sector and none of it comes from the government, therefore I do not think there should be any objection to increasing the amount.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the members of the New Democratic party give a reluctant support to Bill No. C-202, which merely increases the ratio of loans from $13,000 to $18,000. It is striking example of Mohammed going to the mountain and bringing forth a mouse. The government's assistance is merely a band-aid assistance and does nothing to solve the vital and most critical social problem which we are facing in Canada today. It does nothing to solve the problem of the high cost of housing, the high interest rates and the critical shortage of homes. These are matters which should have first attention from the governments.

We have realized for a long time now that there was a need for a new minister of housing. Since I have been here, the standing committee on housing and urban development has not met once. In view of the serious shortage in housing, one would have thought that this standing committee would have met and come to grips with the problem, and would have invited representatives of the housing industry to express their views with regard to this problem. The former minister in charge of housing travelled across the country on a housing symposium, getting ideas from the housing industry, but he failed to table any of the facts he found or to refer them to the housing committee.

Then we had a federal-provincial conference in December at which little or nothing was accomplished as a result of bringing forth representation from the provinces and the federal government. Housing starts in 1965 numbered 165,000; in 1966, the figure was 134,000 and it appears that in 1967 we will be back to about 160,000. In the light of that record, the government has changed ministers. We in this party were looking forward to some great steps being taken by the new minister because we appreciated his accounting background. We thought he could solve some of the financial problems that are attendant upon housing. In addition, we thought he had a concern for people.

What has been the record of the new minister thus far? Well, first he introduced this minor change which is contained in Bill No. C-202 to increase the loan ratios on government insured loans. Second, he has given an indication that he will remove the interest ceiling on N.H.A. loans which now stands at 8½ per cent. This is his second approach to the problem. Certainly he must appreciate that, at the moment, conventional loans are 1 per cent above N.H.A. rates. What he is really doing by removing the ceiling is adding to housing costs.

Third, he made a change in the regulations with regard to the locked in provision of mortgages to developers of rental projects in connection with the prepayment of mortgages for as long as 25 years. He also expressed the intention of the government to participate chiefly in public housing, thereby leaving other fields of mortgage financing to conventional lenders. His last endeavour thus far has been a target of 175,000 homes, when in fact the Economic Council of Canada calls for a minimum of 200,000 homes made up of 190,000 new homes and 10,000 to replace older homes.

This is what he has done thus far. None of these measures strikes at the heart of the housing crisis in Canada. These moves indicate a lack of leadership in working with the provinces to assess housing needs and in giving financial assistance to fulfil those needs. There is an indication the government is abandoning the idea to set up an advisory committee on housing and urban development composed of representatives of federal and provincial governments. This idea was not well acccepted by the federal-provincial conference. The premiers of the different provinces, however, indicated the necessity for the heads of housing authorities to meet on a regular basis with the minister responsible for housing.

These measures indicate the government's dependence on institutional lenders to finance home building in Canada, in spite of their performance in the last four years. Incidentally these lenders, after having restricted their investments in housing, after having directed their moneys into shopping centres, luxury hotels and apartments, and in some cases after having transferred some of their moneys to the United States to be invested in United States equities, have now succeeded in telling the government this: If you give us a higher interest rate and restrict yourself to public housing we will invest the savings of the Canadian people in housing. This is the price we have to pay. This is the accepted approach by the government to solve the problems of housing.

I should like now to direct my attention to the changes brought about by the legislation proposed by the government. What does this legislation do? It will probably benefit the would-be home owner in the small urban centre where the cost of a new house would likely be between $13,000 and $19,000. The change in the loan ratio would make a difference I suggest of $1,500 in the value of the loan. This is just like giving a peanut to a starving elephant.

These are the only people the proposed changes will help. However, these people need help and the government has placed us in the position of having to approve this legislation. Second, the government has given a clear indication of its approach to housing. It has said it will participate only in public housing and will leave to the lending institutions the problem of financing housing in Canada. These are the only two things this legislation accomplishes.

What it does not do, Mr. Speaker, is that it does not help the people who live in the large urban centres where values sometimes range over $25,000. At this price, the gap between the mortgage loan of $18,000 and $25,000 or more is too great. The buyer with a small down payment is forced into secondary financing at interest rates of 12 per cent or 15 per cent. For example, Mr. Speaker, the average price of a single dwelling house in metro Toronto as of January 31, 1968, was $34,869. This represents an increase of $5,200 in one year. Three years ago, the average price was $21,914. We are faced with inflation in astronomical proportions. Any decision to lower the ratios here does not help the buyer in large urban centres.

Second, this legislation does not help to reduce land costs. In Toronto a 50 foot lot costs at least $10,000. Land costs there are the highest in North America and have increased by 500 per cent in the last ten years. I might say, Mr. Speaker, that this condition prevails right across Canada. The Ontario government collected land for Bramalea at a cost of $6,800 per lot and then marked those lots to $9,000 plus. This indicates that even the Ontario government is taking little or no action to limit increases in the cost of land.

This legislation does nothing to increase the supply of houses. In 1965 we had 165,000 starts; in 1966, the figure was 134,000; in 1967 it was 160,000 and in 1968 the projected figure is 175,000. As I pointed out, the Economic Council of Canada states that 200,000 homes should be the minimum target for housing, 190,000 new homes and 10,000 for the replacement of older homes. If we accept the target of the new minister, we will still fall far short of the requirement for new houses in Canada. When you think of the shortage created by the difference between 134,000 and 190,000 in 1961 and a shortage of 30,000 in 1967, you realize that we would have to build between 250,000 and 300,000 homes to begin to catch up with the housing shortage in Canada.

This legislation does nothing to bring down the high interest rates under the National Housing Act, rates that have ranged in the last ten years from 5½ per cent to 8⅝ per cent. The rates on conventional mortgages have ranged from 6 per cent to 9.5 per cent. As was pointed out by the previous speaker, to qualify for the maximum loan of $18,000 an applicant must have an income of at least $8,400 per year. On other occasions I have pointed out that $18,000 at 8⅝ per cent will give a total of $45,000 before the mortgage is paid up. Is it any wonder, Mr. Speaker, that the average family writes off the possibility of owning a home under these circumstances?

This legislation does nothing to bring down the cost of a home. No mention is made by the minister of any steps that he might take to do away with the federal sales tax of 11 per cent. The minister probably attended the federal-provincial conference and heard the recommendations of the different provinces to the effect that elimination of the 11 per cent federal sales tax would probably be followed by the elimination of the 5 per cent provincial sales tax. The money saved thereby could go toward the down payment on a home. However, the minister has done nothing to bring this about.

The legislation does nothing to assist persons to build homes under a co-operative scheme. The maritimes and Newfoundland delegates to the federal-provincial conference were practically scoffed at when they suggested that people should be helped to build homes under a co-operative scheme. This appears to be the approach of people in the maritimes and in Newfoundland to solving the critical housing problem in that area of Canada and they should be assisted by their government.

The legislation also does nothing to assist the construction of shell housing, another recommendation made by provincial representatives at the conference. Many people would like assistance to enable them to build the foundations and walls of a shell home by means of a government mortgage, using their own savings to complete the home. But nothing has been said by the minister about shell housing, which would also help solve the critical housing shortage.

The legislation does nothing to assist people who have to pay high rentals and are given no protection. This is why we in the New Democratic party are bitterly disappointed at the approach of the new minister of housing to the serious housing problem today. We give only reluctant support to this small measure that has been brought forward.

The minister might well say that the New Democratic party should put forward some corrective measures. We would do so, Mr. Speaker. The first thing we would do would be to make available at least $1.5 billion to finance new housing in Canada. When one realizes that we have spent $2 billion—which is $2,000 million—on defence and it looks as though this year the amount for housing will be considerably below that spent last year, one is bitterly disappointed at the approach of the minister toward this problem.

Second, Mr. Speaker, we would limit N.H.A. interest rates to 5 per cent. We would subsidize the difference between this and the current chargeable rate on homes up to at least $25,000 in value. This is an approach which would cut the cost of the home. The cost to the government would be minimal and the savings to the average home owner would be of great help.

Third, Mr. Speaker, we would enact a tenants bill of rights which would give them some protection against the treatment now being accorded them by landlords in large centres. The minister might argue that this is a matter for the provinces. If he does I think he should be reminded that he should work with the provinces to develop this code, and that he should accept the advice given at the federal-provincial conference constantly to work together with representatives of the housing authorities to bring this about.

Fourth, we would set a minimum target of at least 200,000 homes a year. This would be an attempt to solve the critical housing crisis we are facing today. We would also encourage limited dividend housing for senior citizens by increasing the mortgage available to 95 per cent of the value of the home. This area has been neglected during the past few years and it is about time that the government took some initiative to encourage this sort of housing.

Mr. Schreyer: And not only in Montreal and Toronto.

Mr. Gilbert: My colleague reminds me that this type of housing should be available not only in big cities such as Montreal and Toronto, but also in small towns and villages.

We think the government should participate more fully in public housing by increasing the mortgage ratio from the present 75-25 per cent ratio to a 90-10 per cent ratio. This recommendation was made by representatives at the federal-provincial conference. It is about time that the minister took immediate action to solve the problem of public housing. One cannot expect a municipality to participate on the basis of a ratio of 75-25 per cent. Not only is the ratio too high but they have other requirements, such as building schools and recreational and other facilities. We also feel that the public housing subsidy should be tied to income rather than to the present formula of 50-50.

The present 75-25 per cent ratio to a 90-10 per cent ratio.

We would also encourage, Mr. Speaker, massive purchases of land. This was a recommendation made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) in his statement to the federal-provincial conference. This action must be taken by federal and provincial governments in order to bring down the high cost of land.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, we would also increase home improvement loans. The record of home improvement loans in the last few years indicates that these loans have been declining. The reason has been that people have not felt inclined to borrow money from the banks under the Home Improvement Loans Act. It may be that some arrangement could be made with the municipalities whereby home owners borrow money for improvement purposes and add the repayments to their tax payments each year. It is fairly obvious that under the present home improvement scheme, with the banks administering and financing the land, things have not worked. I suggest the minister give close study to some arrangement between the municipalities and the government under which money made available to the municipalities could be lent to home owners to improve their homes, the repayments being added to their tax.

These are some of the corrective measures that we would take, Mr. Speaker. We hope the "band-aid approach" of the new minister will be altered and that he will apply his mind and his energy to solving the critical housing shortage in Canada. If he does, he will probably make a name for himself in the cabinet and across the country. If he does not, then the minister will fall into the political wastebasket that so many other cabinet ministers have fallen into when it comes to solving the housing crisis in Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I would like also to say a few words about that bill which I support with some reluctance, without however being against an increase in the loans made or guaranteed by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I feel that this increase to $18,000 was needed, because houses costs more and more to build and rents keep going up.

In my opinion, it is mostly for that reason that the minister agreed to introduce that amendment to the National Housing Act, but at the same time that justifies the criticism directed at the present government in the last few years by the Canadian public, the contractors and the eventual homeowners.

We notice a steady increase in the cost of houses, building materials and, consequently, rents. Housing is the main factor responsible for the increase in the price index, in the cost of living index. We have just completed a debate on that subject, and the rise in the cost of living has forced the government to take a position which, in my opinion, will not solve the problem. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) saw no other solution to fight inflation, and the increase in the cost of construction comes precisely into that price index which compels the government to take action and stabilize prices.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I should like to analyse briefly the causes that contributed to rent increases.

One of the most important is precisely that 11 per cent tax on building materials which seems even more significant than it appears. When an individual has a house built or purchases materials to improve the one he already owns, in most cases, he has to get a mortgage from an approved lender of the Central Mortage and Housing Corporation. He must also borrow the 11 per cent tax on building materials for his house. Now, the interest on that loan has reached 8⅝ per cent. This also means that the individual who decides to make repairs to his house will have to pay during 25 or 30 years an interest of 8⅝ per cent on the 11 per cent levied on building materials.

There is also another important fact and those who live in Quebec are aware of it. We also have in the province of Quebec an 8 per cent sales tax which is added to the federal tax, because it is computed when the amount of the federal tax of 11 per cent has been established. This means a 20 or 21 per cent tax on building materials on which an individual will have to pay 8⅝ per cent interest. Therefore, this is a scandalous item which increases considerably the cost of housing. I contend that, by removing that tax as was done a few years ago, we would considerably reduce the cost of housing and the minister would not have to put before us this amendment to-day.

In housing, the increase of municipal taxes, and mainly school taxes, must also be taken into consideration. As far as the province of Quebec is concerned—I do not know exactly what happens in the other provinces—school taxes increase at a rapid pace and there is no way of stopping it, at least at the present time. Taxes increase the cost of housing and prevent the average wage-earners from becoming homeowners. Some have made great sacrifices to make the down payment on the purchase of a house; they have paid their monthly instalments during a few years and if they are out of work for the shortest period on account of sickness, accident or other circumstances, they find themselves in an unbearable situation, and they are often forced to give back the house for which they have remitted $8,000, $15,000 or $20,000, because they cannot meet their payments.

Mr. Speaker, as I see it, we have the right to expect from the government a better housing policy, because it is becoming increasingly difficult for those in the middle income bracket to purchase a home. That is why many people are undecided when the time comes to decide whether they should purchase a home or resign themselves to living in accommodation that belongs to others. One wonders if they are not right in deciding to continue renting, because homeowners, in addition to what I mentioned a while ago, must take fire coverage and pay premiums which keep growing from year to year, and also attend to the maintenance of the house, to keep it in good condition.

And so, one realizes that today it is almost as costly to own a home as to rent one.

I think that the minister and the government should consider ordering as soon as possible a complete revision of the National Housing Act, for the benefit of both owners and tenants.

This amendment to the present act will certainly help some potential owners by allowing them to borrow more money, since the price of houses is going up. But even this will not solve their problems, far from it. It is perhaps a temporary solution but, sooner or later, these people will encounter even greater difficulties.

I admit frankly, Mr. Speaker, that I will vote in favour of the amendment proposed in the present bill.

I would have much preferred the minister responsible for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to suggest another way to make things easier for those who want to own their home.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is it the wish of the house to proceed with private members hour at this time?

Mr. Benson: I believe there was general agreement that we should continue with the legislation, get it through, and then perhaps revert to private members business.

Mr. Peters: If we continue with this business and then call it six o'clock, that will be all right; but not the other way around.

Mr. Benson: Could we complete this business and then call it six o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: Is it so ordered and agreed?

Mr. Starr: Agreed.

LABOUR RELATIONS

MARITIME UNION TRUSTEES—PRESENTATION OF FINAL REPORT

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): In rising at this time before other business is called I beg the indulgence of the house to ask for unanimous consent to revert to motions so that I may table the final report of the board of maritime trustees. I thought hon. members of the house would like to have it with them over the week end. I have arranged for distribution of the report. Technically, it should be tabled in the house before being distributed.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, could we not leave the matter until Monday, on motions?

• (5:00 p.m.)

Mr. Nicholson: I am suggesting it because there is nothing further to be said on the subject and I should like to distribute it over the week end when it might be put in the mail boxes.

Mr. Starr: Very well.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that we revert to motions to allow the minister to table the document to which he referred?

Mr. Lewis: Without a word.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Does the minister have leave to table the document?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: Could the leader of the house take advantage of this moment of interruption to tell us what the business will be for next week?

Mr. MacEachen: On Monday we shall take the second reading of the tax bill, and the committee stage. We would then continue with supplementary estimates and interim supply.

Mr. Knowles: What about third reading? Monday night?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE RATIOS FOR INSURED LOANS

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Benson for the second reading of Bill No. C-202, to amend the National Housing Act, 1954.

Mr. Bert Leboe (Cariboo): I shall detain the house for only a few moments because I do not consider that this simple amendment is a suitable occasion for a long speech on housing. We agree with the proposal which stipulates an increase in the amount available for mortgages and we shall support the move in this direction. I should like to leave one or two thoughts with the minister. I think it is time we all came to the conclusion, as we in the Social Credit party did many years ago, that financing in connection with housing should not be in competition with financing for industry. Industry can pass on its finance charges to the consumer, and this being the case it is in a much better position to bargain for finance than are people building houses. The purchaser of a home is simply buying a bill of expenses from the time he does so until he disposes of it. The home owner is therefore at a distinct disadvantage.

Surely we should reach the conclusion very quickly that funds for housing ought to be quite separate from any funds available to industry. In recognition of the special position of home owners and the value of home ownership, British Columbia many years ago instituted a home owners grant. It started out as a very small sum, $25 I believe for each home owner. Today it is $120—$130, my hon. friend tells me. The first $130 of an individual home owners taxes are paid by the provincial government.

It would be wise, in my view, to take the position adopted by the Social Credit party before the committee on banking and finance back in 1954, and set up a proper revolving fund to handle the needs of the housing industry. I think this would go a long way toward solving our housing problems. The money should be made available to home owners at the cost of operating the account and there should be no relation whatever between the interest rate charged and the rate charged for commercial loans. We believe the account could be handled with a rate in the neighbourhood of 2½ per cent. Not only would we have a fund operating at a low interest rate, but we would be in the happy position of administering a fund which remained at a constant figure.

We have seen interest rates rise to astronomical heights—and not one more house has been built as a result. May I urge the government and the minister to take a good look at the possibility of setting up a revolving fund which would not be in competition with industry and which would be operated at the cost of handling the account quite distinct from prevailing commercial interest rates.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Batten in the chair.

On clause 1—

Mr. Chatterton: Could the minister explain to the committee at what point after royal assent this new low down payment will apply in the processing of applications?

Mr. Benson: We shall apply it as soon as we possibly can after royal assent. There always is difficulty in sorting out applications as to which are in time, and which are not. Now that the bill has passed second reading, and we hope it will shortly pass through parliament, we shall try to set a date as soon as possible after the legislation becomes effective.

Mr. Chatterton: That is not quite the point I was trying to make. The applicable date will of course be immediately after royal assent. The contractors are anxious to know at what stage in the processing of applications the low down payment will apply. If the minister is not able to give us this information now, perhaps he will issue a statement as soon as possible after royal assent.

Mr. Benson: I have discussed this matter with the officials of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and they have it under consideration. There always is a difficulty in connection with the exact time, when something is done in stages, but I will undertake to issue a statement in this connection at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. Chatterton: I know that a change of this type always creates difficulties. May I suggest that when a decision has been made as to the point at which the decision will apply, the hon. gentleman leave room for an appeal to the minister. I have found there are always special cases in which special consideration is required.

Mr. Benson: I should like to assure the hon. member that as long as I am minister anyone may appeal to me at any time when it appears he is being unfairly treated under legislation for which I am responsible.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Mr. Enns: That gives rise to another question. The minister says this will be so, as long as he is minister. There may be an imminent change in government, and without reflecting on the abilities of the minister may I ask whether this will be written into the regulations?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, I will bring these representations to the attention of the officials of C.M.H.C., who want to administer this fairly, and I will make sure regulations are drawn up so that we will know the exact time of the cut-off. I will even show my hon. friend a copy of them before we publish them.

Mr. Gilbert: Would the minister give us some details with regard to the differences in loan ratios? I understand the difference at best is only $1,500. I would like the minister to give us a few examples of how these changes would affect a mortgage loan.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, I do not think I can be expected to make calculations in committee, but this means that on mortgages up to $18,000 we will be able to lend 95 per cent of the mortgage value. The previous level was $13,000, so the great benefit is in the area between $13,000 and $18,000.

Mr. Alkenbrack: May I ask the minister if this applies to new housing only?

Mr. Benson: Yes, Mr. Chairman, this is for new housing.

Mr. Gilbert: Can the minister give us some details of the anticipated amount of money the government will be spending on housing this year as compared with last year?

Mr. Benson: I do not have those figures in front of me. My hon. friend knows that we are concentrating on certain areas such as public housing, urban renewal, sewage, student residences, homes for the aged and limited dividend housing. I should point out to my hon. friend that we have had a great many applications for limited dividend housing projects, probably more than we will be able to facilitate this year.

We are looking into these applications and we will make sure that the projects are spread across the country. They will not all go to Toronto and Montreal, as someone suggested earlier. The total amount of money that we are making available in these areas is in the neighbourhood of $650 million. Present indications are that housing starts this year will reach the 175,000 level, that is, basic residences, rental residences and dwellings. On top of this we anticipate that there will be another 10,000 or 12,000 units covering university residences for married couples and single persons, and hostel accommodation for elderly people. From this point of view and at this time, this year looks as though it will be pretty good for housing. But that does not solve all the problems.

If we were going into a lengthy debate I would like to deal with some of the ideas that my hon. friend has raised. I am also informed that we will be able to reach the economic council's objective of 585,000 homes to be built over the next three years. I think we can do this, but as I said earlier, this would not solve all the housing problem. It would not solve the main problem, the one I am particularly concerned with, and that is how we provide a house for the fellow earning between $5,000 and $7,000 a year. I have given my ideas on this subject when speaking outside the house, and I look forward to mentioning them in the house on a future occasion.

Mr. Chatterton: Can the minister assure us that the $75 million reduction to which the Minister of Finance has referred will not come from money that is to be spent on public housing?

Mr. Benson: None of this will come out of public housing.

Mr. Germa: Mr. Chairman, I was interested in the minister's statement that there had been an increase in applications for limited dividend housing. Are these applications coming from the private sector or from non-profit organizations?

Mr. Benson: These are mainly coming from the private side. A limited dividend corporation is a separate corporation created to build housing units for rental purposes, on which the returns to the owners of the corporation are limited to 5 per cent. There are certain tax advantages in them, and they are mainly built by people who are in the contracting business or housing rental business.

There is no limit on the funds we have available for organizations that want to build low rental homes for the elderly. We anticipate we will have all the necessary funds available for this kind of housing this year, and we also think that in the public housing field our funds will be quite adequate.

Mr. Chatterton: Will this apply to student housing also? There will be enough money to cover any applications that come in?

Mr. Benson: I think there will be no problem. I base my estimates on the forecasts given me by the officials of C.M.H.C., and they foresee no difficulty.

Mr. Gilbert: Would the minister tell us if the government has abandoned the idea of setting up a federal-provincial council on housing and urban development?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, I would like to indicate that this idea has not been abandoned; but I have not been the minister responsible for housing for too long a period of time. This is one of the things I have been considering with the officials of C.M.H.C. and with my advisers.

Mr. Enns: Mr. Chairman, the minister spoke about not wanting to make detailed calculations on how this legislation would apply to specific cases, and we can appreciate this. However, I think it should be pointed out that although additional moneys will help substantially to improve the housing situation, the average citizen will still encounter difficulty in view of current high interest rates.

Payment of interest and principal on a $14,000 loan over a 25 year period at 6 per cent would be $89.85 monthly, which is a reasonable payment for accommodation. At 7 per cent this rises to $98.06. At 8 per cent it rises to $106.85, and at 9 per cent, which is the rate at which we are selling money at present, it rises to $115.92, which in many cases is more than 25 per cent of a person's income.

Mr. Germa: I wish to ask another question concerning limited dividend housing. I think it is pretty well known that limited dividend housing fell on its head because of certain indiscreet acts by the private sector a few years ago, whereby these projects were abandoned because private individuals tried to maximize their profits through various nefarious means. Has the minister anything to offer which will guarantee that the same situation will not happen again?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, we are looking very carefully at the applicants for limited divided housing construction. We are trying to assure in every way that the C.M.H.C. can be certain there will be none of this business of building a limited dividend project, getting your profit out, and leaving it. We will do our utmost to avoid this, and my officials assure me that they believe they can avoid it under present circumstances.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. Gilbert: In view of the intended amendment in respect of the change to the loan ratio of mortgages, does the minister intend changing the ratio from that under the N.H.A.?

Mr. Benson: That is not proposed in this particular piece of legislation. I should like to assure my hon. friend that this is under consideration at the present time, and that when I bring in some more comprehensive changes to the National Housing Act, I hope during the next session of parliament, consideration will be given to this matter.

Clause agreed to.

Title agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bill.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Bill reported and read the third time and passed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Do I understand there was some prior agreement to adjourn when this particular item was completed?

Mr. Knowles: Vous avez raison.

Mr. Benson: I believe it was agreed that when we finished this piece of legislation we would call it six o'clock.

It being twenty five minutes after five o'clock, by unanimous consent Mr. Speaker adjourned the house, without question put.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, March 11, 1968

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

VACANCY

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to section 10 of the House of Commons Act, I wish to give notice that a vacancy occurred in the representation in the House of Commons of the electoral district of Saint-Jacques, Montreal, in the province of Quebec, as a result of the death of Mr. Maurice Rinfret, former member for the said district.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CHRÉTIEN—CORRECTION OF FIGURES STATED IN TELEVISION INTERVIEW

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Last night, interviewed by journalists on television, I gave an approximate figure in answer to a question about the amount of reserves held by Canada. Trusting my memory, I made a mistake. The only figure I know is the one given by the Minister of Finance on February 29 last, namely that our reserves approximate to $2.49 billion.

THE MINISTRY

ANNOUNCEMENT OF RESIGNATION OF PRIVY COUNCIL PRESIDENT

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would like to announce the resignation from the cabinet of the President of the Privy Council, Hon. W. L. Gordon, in accordance with the request he made to me some weeks ago and which I accepted, with both personal and official regret, as of March 11, 1968.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

PUBLIC RELATIONS SERVICE, JUSTICE DEPARTMENT

Question No. 598—Mr. Woolliams:

1. (a) For each of the years 1964 to 1967 inclusive, how many persons were employed from time-to-time in the information and/or public relations services of the Department of Justice (b) what position has been and is now held by each such employee, for what period and at what salary or remuneration?

2. (a) For each of the years 1964 to 1967 inclusive, what persons, firms or corporations, if any, other than the departmental information services or public relations division, have been employed and/or retained for the purpose of preparing, disseminating or in any manner dealing with the information services and/or public relations of the Department of Justice (b) what are the names of such persons, firms and corporations, if any; for what purpose and period was the employment and what was the cost in each instance (c) were public tenders called for the services described in (a) and (b) and, if not, upon what basis and by whom was the selection made?

3. (a) For each of the years 1964 to 1967 inclusive, how many press releases have been prepared for or on behalf of the department and/or the Minister of Justice; by whom were the same prepared and at what cost (b) for each of the years 1964 to 1967 inclusive, what radio and television time has been purchased by the Department of Justice; for what purpose and for what cost (c) for each of the years 1964 to 1967 inclusive, what advertising or other space was purchased in domestic and foreign newspapers, magazines and other publications; for what purpose and for what cost?

4. For each of the years 1964 to 1967 inclusive, what was the cost of travel of the Minister of Justice and his staff and of any of the personnel described in parts 1 and 2 above; what trips were undertaken and for what purpose?

5. For each of the years 1964 to 1967 inclusive, what advertising or any other related contracts have been awarded by the Department of Justice; to whom were the same awarded, for what purpose and for what cost; were public tenders called in each instance and, if not, upon what basis and by whom was the contract awarded?

6. Does the Department of Justice maintain and/or operate any office located elsewhere than in Ottawa for the purpose, in whole or in part, of promoting the public relations of the department and/or the Minister of Justice, and if so, where are such offices located; what is the cost of the maintenance and operation of such offices; how many are employed in each such office and at what salary or remuneration in each case?

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice):

1. (a) None. (b) Not applicable.

2. (a) None. (b) Not applicable. (c) Not applicable.

3. (a) None. All press releases were prepared by departmental and ministerial personnel. (b) None. (c) None.

Questions

4. For the Ministers of Justice and staff, the following amounts were paid with respect to travelling expenses for the fiscal years shown below: 1964-65, $8,729.33; 1965-66, $6,724.07; 1966-67, $2,316.86; 1967 to Oct. 31, $1,530.17.

All travelling was on government business. No record is maintained of the purpose of the individual trips.

5. None.

6. No.

Note: Since the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Canadian Penitentiary Service, National Parole Board, investigation and research (Combines Investigation Act) and bankruptcy branch no longer fall within the administrative responsibility of the Minister of Justice, the information supplied above does not include information respecting these services.

*C.B.C. COVERAGE OF EXPO AND PAN-AMERICAN GAMES

Question No. 693—Mr. McIntosh:

1. What were the total direct and indirect costs of the C.B.C. preparations and coverage of the Pan American games in Winnipeg, Manitoba?

2. What personnel, facilities and equipment from C.B.C. maritime region were made available to assist in the C.B.C.'s network and local coverage of the Pan American games in Winnipeg?

3. How many days in advance of the opening of the Pan American games in Winnipeg were personnel from the C.B.C. maritime region authorized to proceed to Winnipeg?

4. Has the C.B.C. purchased any equipment since January 1, 1966 from funds specifically designated for centennial productions or centennial coverage?

5. (a) What was the estimated capital cost by the C.B.C. for its structure and facilities at the Expo site (b) what are the actual expenditures to date (c) what are the actual direct and indirect expenditures to date by the C.B.C. for the operation, administration, maintenance and production costs of its broadcasting centre at the Expo site?

6. Is the C.B.C. or any agency of the government undertaking any studies or investigations related directly to expenditures made by the C.B.C. leading to the construction of new buildings in Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver?

[Translation]

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, since the answer to this question covers a page and a half, I would ask that it be considered as read and printed in Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Béchard: I am informed by the C.B.C. as follows: 1. The C.B.C. was host broadcaster and exclusive production agent for the Pan American Games. As such, it was required to assume responsibility for not only television and radio of all athletic events, many of which occurred simultaneously and at widely scattered venues, during the period of the games. The C.B.C. was also required to provide production facilities and staff assistance to foreign broadcasters. This work resulted in the production of 62 hours of television programming to Canada, United States and Mexico in English, French and Spanish; and of 233 hours of radio in many languages to all of the Americas, the Caribbean and parts of Europe and Africa. The financial requirements of so doing were as follows: direct costs of production—$587,000; the use of staff and other regular overhead items when applied to the games on a standard rate basis—$362,000; and the provision of temporary technical and production installations to meet special demands—$307,000.

2. No facilities or equipment from C.B.C. maritime region were made available to assist in coverage of the Pan-American Games. Eleven TV technicians from Halifax, one radio technician from Moncton and one program clearance officer from Halifax were assigned to Winnipeg for various periods.

3. The 11-man technical crew from Halifax was part of the corporation's pool of personnel organized to cover major centennial events across Canada. Their involvement in the Pan-American Games was planned before the beginning of the year and they were in Winnipeg from July 26 to August 8. The radio technician was in Winnipeg from July 16 to August 8 and the program clearance officer was in Winnipeg from July 1 to August 10. Actual travel dates would have been finalized approximately three weeks in advance.

4. No.

5. (a) $9,858,000 exclusive of provincial sales tax. (b) $10,191,000 inclusive of provincial sales tax. (c) The cost of operating the International Broadcasting Centre was approximately $6,000,000. Under the corporation's terms of reference, these facilities were available to all users without charge.

6. Yes.

CORPORAL PUNISHMENT IN PENITENTIARIES

Question No. 718—Mr. Orlikow:

1. How many times has corporal punishment been used each year for the past ten years in federal institutions?

2. How many prisoners have had such corporal punishment more than once?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): 1 and 2. In federal institutions, corporal punishment is administered as a court order or as a sentence awarded by an institutional board of discipline. Corporal punishment, as a court order, was used as follows: 1957, 28; 1958, 14; 1959, 7; 1960, 17; 1961, 6; 1962, 11; 1963, 9; 1964, 22; 1965, 3; 1966, 3; Total 120.

In 34 of these cases, corporal punishment was used on two or more occasions to discharge the court order.

Corporal punishment, as a sentence awarded by an institutional board of discipline, was used as follows: 1957, 15; 1958, 16; 1959, 24; 1960, 12; 1961, 67; 1962, 18; 1963, 96; 1964, 26; 1965, 7; 1966, 32; Total, 313.

17 of these inmates have had such corporal punishment more than once.

Under the provisions of the Parole Act the National Parole Board may, upon application therefor, revoke or suspend any court sentence of whipping.

As of 1967 and pursuant to a new directive, sentences of strapping awarded by an institutional board of discipline may not be executed unless and until approved by the Commissioner of Penitentiaries except where an inmate is found guilty of participating in collective riotous behaviour beyond normal methods of control, and instant use of corporal punishment may restore order.

STUDIES FOR LABOUR RELATIONS TASK FORCE

Question No. 828—Mr. Allmand:

1. What are the titles of the studies undertaken by federal government departments for the Labour Relations Task Force, and who are the authors?

2. What other studies are in the research program which have not been commissioned or assigned?

Mr. John R. Matheson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Full details of the research program of the task force on labour relations indicating the titles of studies undertaken by federal government departments, and studies which have not been commissioned or assigned, can be found in Appendix B of the progress report, tabled in the house on February 29, 1968.

* STUDY OF NATIONAL CAPITAL AREA

Question No. 867—Mr. Southam:

When the government decides to establish a joint study with a view of setting up a National Capital Area, will it give consideration to having officials from each of Canada's ten provinces on this study group in order to fully examine the matter?

Mr. John R. Matheson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer to starred question No. 867 is as follows.

This question has been discussed with the premiers of all the provinces and it has been agreed that there should be a study group set up by the governments of Ontario and Quebec and by the federal government concerning the national capital area, and that the other provincial governments will be kept informed of all important developments in connection with this matter. The study group has been established and has held a number of meetings.

* FEDERAL GRANTS, CONTRACTS, ETC.—LONDON, ONT.

Question No. 907—Mr. Irvine:

1. What was the total value of federal grants, subsidies and contracts awarded to the City of London and its agencies, including Public Utilities Commission, Board of Education, Hospitals, Old Age and Rest Homes, during the years 1965, 1966 and 1967?

2. What was the total value of federal grants, subsidies and contracts to educational institutions, including the University of Western Ontario, in this period?

3. What was the total value of federal grants, subsidies and contracts awarded to manufacturing, business firms and other service organizations in the City of London, in this same period?

4. In each instance what was the name of the recipient and the amount of each contract, grant or subsidy?

[Translation]

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): It is impossible to give a complete breakdown of government expenditures according to municipalities, electoral ridings and other entities of this sort. The government does not base its budgetary estimates on such a breakdown nor register its expenditures in this way. It would be possible to give information concerning expenditures when a definite work, program or beneficiary is mentioned in the question. Naturally, in some cases these concern a municipality or a particular electoral riding.

EXPO '67 DEFICIT

Question No. 930—Mr. Coates:

Is the government now in a position to indicate the expected deficit associated with Expo '67 and, if so, what is the amount of the estimated deficit and, of this estimated deficit, how much is the responsibility of the federal government?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Expo brought large financial net benefits to Canada. Therefore, on a national basis, it was a good investment of funds although as an isolated project, there was a substantial deficit. The termination of contracts, disposal of assets and final financial statements of Expo '67 will be completed only about June 30, 1968. Therefore, the exact amount of the net cost within the gates of Expo is not yet known. It is estimated that the total net cost in the books of the exhibition corporation will amount to approximately $295,000,000. of which 50 per cent, or approximately $147,500,000. will be paid by the federal government, 37½ per cent by the province of Quebec and 12½ per cent by the city of Montreal, under the tripartite agreement. Not reflected in the deficit of the corporation are the following:

1. Assets transferred to the three governments were recorded in the books of the exhibition corporation at a value of $74 million.

2. The estimated increase in the tax revenues of all governments generated by expenditures on Expo was $238 million.

3. Foreign participants invested an estimated $200 million in their participation of Expo '67.

4. Tourist revenue increased in Canada in 1967 by approximately $490 million, most of which was due to Expo '67.

5. Over 50 per cent of Expo visitors were non-Canadian tourists. Approximately one million Expo admissions were by people from outside continental United States and Canada. The foreign pavilions were operated by the trade, commerce and industry departments of the 72 foreign governments and the three international organizations represented. All of this will result in benefit to Canada's foreign trade and general reputation abroad.

Expo '67 was universally acclaimed as the greatest world exhibition in history. It has generated greater understanding of Canada at home and abroad, and has produced substantial intangible benefits which cannot be reduced to a sum of money in assessing the overall value of Expo.

* C.B.C. USE OF U.P.P. PROGRAMS

Question No. 933—Mr. Ormiston:

1. Has the C.B.C. at any time delivered U.P.P. programs, purchased by the C.B.C. to its affiliates that purchased these U.P.P. programs?

2. In respect to Part 1 above, does the C.B.C. make the normal program charge on a per hour range for these U.P.P. programs?

3. In respect to Parts 1 and 2 above, to how much has the subsidy to the affiliates amounted, to date?

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): The answer to this question is as follows:

Some of the United Program Purchase organization's programs purchased by C.B.C. owned stations for local use are transmitted via microwave at a common time period. C.B.C. affiliated stations purchasing the same programs independent of the C.B.C. are permitted, upon request, to "lift off" these programs during the time of the C.B.C.'s line feed. This practice is usually employed to complement regular network colour programming where affiliated stations not able to originate colour film programs can transmit network colour programs. In addition, sponsors of specific programs common to both C.B.C. owned stations and some affiliated stations have requested that such programs be "lifted off" by the affiliated stations during the period they are being fed to C.B.C. stations. The affiliated stations U.P.P. membership is not a requisite to receive this service.

The answer to Nos. 2 and 3 is that there is no charge to affiliated stations, whether or not they are members of the U.P.P., nor is there any additional cost to the C.B.C.

LANGUAGE REQUIREMENTS FOR POSTMEN

Question No. 934—Mr. Valade:

1. What are the requirements of the Postmaster General concerning a knowledge of the English language for French-speaking Canadians and of the French language for English-speaking Canadians who apply for the position of mailman?

2. How many applicants have been turned down between January 1, 1967, and January 1, 1968 (a) in the case of applicants residing in Quebec who did not have an adequate knowledge of English (b) in the case of English-speaking applicants who did not have an adequate knowledge of French, in each of the provinces?

3. Are applicants for the position of mailman required to undergo an examination on their knowledge of the French language in provinces other than Quebec?

4. What type of examination applies to applicants for the position of mailman as concerns (a) the English language (b) the French language?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I have been given the following information by the Public Service Commission: As the Public Service Commission has no class "mailman" all answers to the questions below refer to the official class letter carrier.

1. Section 20 of the Public Service Employment Act reads as follows: "Employees appointed to serve in any department or other portion of the public service, or part thereof, shall be qualified in the knowledge and use of the English or French language or both, to the extent that the commission deems necessary in order that the functions of such department, portion or part can be performed adequately and effective service can be provided to the public."

2. (a) 161. (b) Four in the province of Ontario; none in other provinces.

3. Yes, provided a knowledge of the French language was indicated as a requirement for the position.

4. At the time of interview, applicants are given an oral examination to determine the degree of ability to understand or to speak the language, or languages, as the case may be. The Public Service Commission will shortly have tests designed to determine the candidate's ability to read and to write the language, or languages, as the case may be.

YOUTH TRAVEL AND EXCHANGE PROGRAM

Question No. 952—Mr. Bell (Carleton):

1. During the year 1967, how many (a) students (b) escorts, took advantage of the youth travel and exchange program?

2. (a) On what basis is the federal contribution thereto made (b) what was the total cost thereof to the Government of Canada?

3. Will the program be continued in 1968 and subsequent years?

4. If so, is it anticipated that (a) changes will be made in the program and, if so, what changes (b) an increasing number of students will be enabled to have the advantage of the program?

5. By what branch or division of government will the program be administered?

6. Who is the director or chief thereof?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): 1. (a) 4,800. (b) 400.

2. (a) The federal government paid all travel costs and made a grant to each province of $260 per unit for travelling expenses and $520 per unit for hosting purposes. (b) $820,000.

3. Yes.

4. (a) Yes. Whereas the commission did not support exchanges with other countries, such projects will be supported in the future and will account for about 10 per cent of total programs. Furthermore, the following changes are made to domestic programs: Federal-Provincial: The name will be changed from "The Federal/Provincial Youth Travel Program" to "The Young Voyageur Program". Provinces will put more emphasis on the educational aspects of the program. Voluntary Agencies: Projects will be assessed on the basis of the contribution they make to the development of a higher standard of Canadian citizenship. A small international dimension is to be added. (b) No.

5. The travel and exchange division of the citizenship branch, Secretary of State.

6. J. R. Préfontaine.

PILOTAGE BOARD

Question No. 968—Mr. Latulippe:

1. When was the Pilotage Board set up and who are the members of that Board?

2. What are the total expenditures of the Board?

3. What are the total expenditures for each of the members since their appointment?

4. Who are the full-time and part-time employees of the Board and what amounts have they received since their appointments?

5. When will the Board's report be published?

Mr. John R. Matheson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): I am informed by the royal commission on pilotage as follows: 1. The royal commission on pilotage was appointed on November 1, 1962 by P.C. 1962-1575. Its members are: Hon. Y. Bernier, Judge of the Superior Court of Quebec. Mr. R. K. Smith, Q.C., Waterloo, Ontario. Mr. H. A. Renwick, Vancouver, B.C.

2. The total expenditures of the royal commission on pilotage from Nov. 1, 1962 to February 1, 1968 has amounted to $917,867.

3. The total expenditures for each of the commissioners for the period November 1962 to February 1, 1968, is: Hon. Y. Bernier, $67,443.00, covering per diem living allowance ($50.00) plus travelling expenses. Mr. R. K. Smith, Q.C. $56,505.00, covering per diem honorarium ($100.) and living allowance ($20) plus travelling expenses. Mr. H. A. Renwick, $52,123.00, covering per diem honorarium ($100.) and living allowance ($20) plus travelling expenses.

Questions

4. The number of employees of the royal commission on pilotage (exclusive of consultants) has varied from year to year and the total expenditures in salaries during the period Nov. 1, 1962 to Feb. 1, 1968 has amounted to $368,200. Following are the names of the persons now employed by the royal commission on pilotage with the annual emolument each receives from the royal commission: G. W. Nadeau, Secretary, director of research and asst. counsel (on loan from Dept. of Transport). (Terminable allowance $6,429 yearly). F. C. Morissette, Asst. secretary (on loan from the Public Service Commission). (Terminable allowance $2,500 yearly). Capt. J. A. Heenan, Technical adviser, annual salary $12,600. Cdr. C. H. Little, English editor, annual salary $15,000. Cdt. Geo. Sabouret, French editor, annual salary $15,000. Mrs. J. Lamontagne, Clerical staff, annual salary $6,256. Mrs. E. Tzopa, Clerical staff, annual salary $5,847. Mrs. D. Chabot, Clerical staff, annual salary, $5,594. Mrs. E. Havercroft, Clerical staff, annual salary $5,571. Mrs. Y. Nadeau, Clerical staff, annual salary $5,400. Mrs. C. Alary, Clerical staff, annual salary $5,228. Mrs. M. Heatley, Clerical staff, annual salary $4,093. Mr. L. Menard, Clerical staff, annual salary $4,021.

5. The royal commission's report to the government will appear in 5 parts, each contained in a separate volume or group of volumes. Part I will be the main one; it will direct attention to the present state of the pilotage legislation in Canada, will report on its pilotage legislation in Canada, will report on its adequacy or otherwise in the light of existing conditions as disclosed by the evidence and will recommend the basic changes that should be made in the law, including the pilotage organization, to meet the present and foreseeable requirements of the pilotage service. The commission expects to be in a position to present this first part of its report to the government in about 6 to 8 weeks. The other parts of the report, which will be in the nature of supporting documents, will report on the factual situation in each of the 25 pilotage districts in Canada, including those on the great lakes. These separate reports (part II-part V) will be submitted to the government progressively as they are completed, which it is expected may take another year.

FRED PROGRAM, PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Question No. 990—Mr. MacLean (Queens):

1. What projects are (a) in being (b) in prospect under the Fund for Rural Economic Development (FRED) program for Prince Edward Island?

2. What is the total amount of expenditure by the Government of Canada involved in these projects for the fiscal years 1967-68 and 1968-69 (a) for Prince Edward Island (b) for all of Canada?

3. What number of the Public Servants of Canada are employed for this program in Prince Edward Island?

4. Where will such personnel be located?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): 1. (a) None. (b) Officials of the federal government and the provincial government are currently working together in the preparation of a comprehensive rural development plan for presentation to the governments of Canada and Prince Edward Island.

2. (a) In 1967-68: None. In 1968-69: No specific allotment has been set aside for Prince Edward Island for the fiscal year 1968-69 as there is no way of knowing, at this stage of the development of the plan, how much will be required during the year. (b) In 1967-68, approximately $6,000,000 will be spent for all of Canada. In 1968-69, parliament will be asked to approve an estimate of $9,600,000 for all of Canada under the Fund for Rural Economic Development.

3. Two public servants of Canada are working full time in the preparation of a comprehensive rural development plan in Prince Edward Island. In addition, from time to time, in Prince Edward Island, several other federal officials have worked and are working on the preparation of the plan.

4. The two federal officials working full time in the preparation of the comprehensive rural development plan live in Charlottetown, P.E.I.

CIVIL DEFENCE EXPENDITURES

Question No. 992—Mr. Laprise:

1. How many civil defence schools are there in (a) Canada (b) each province?

2. What amount was spent by the federal government each year since 1960 for civil defence (a) in Canada (b) for each province?

3. What is the planned expenditure for the years 1967-1968 and 1968-1969 (a) in Canada (b) for each province?

[Translation]

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Insofar as Canada Emergency Measures Organization is concerned: 1. (a) in Canada: 3. (b) In each province: Ontario, 2 (one of which is the Federal Canadian Emergency Measures College, Arnprior, Ontario); Alberta, 1.

It is pointed out that the provinces not having permanently established schools fulfil their training requirements by conducting courses on an ad hoc basis.

RECRUITMENT IN U.S. OF CLASSIFICATION OFFICERS

Question No. 1,006—Mr. Bell (Carleton):

1. Is the Public Service Commission endeavouring to recruit in the United States of America officers for the Bureau of Classification Review?

2. If so (a) what number of officers (b) what precisely are the duties to be performed by such officers (c) what salary range will attach to such positions (d) what educational and other qualifications will be required of appointees?

3. (a) Were attempts made to recruit such officers (i) in Canada (ii) in the Commonwealth (iii) in France (b) if so, with what results precisely in each case?

4. Will it be a condition of employment of any officers recruited in the United States of America that they be or agree to become bilingual?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I have been given the following information by the Public Service Commission: 1. Yes. In January of this year the Public Service Commission endeavoured to recruit in the United States, professional personnel administrators with specialized training and qualifications in job evaluation and pay administration to fill existing vacancies in several departments of government including the bureau of classification revision.

2. (a) The Public Service Commission was prepared to recruit up to forty eight officers possessing the special qualifications referred to in (1). (b) The duties of officers who might be recruited may be summarized briefly as follows:

For officers placed in departments: the implementation within the department of the current classification program; job description writing; job analysis; job evaluation and pay administration.

For officers placed in the bureau of classification revision: the development, writing and maintenance of classification standards; performance of the classification audit and review function. (c) In January 1968, when the recruitment effort was made the salaries of the positions in question ranged from $9,955 per annum to $12,608 per annum. (d) Prospective candidates for these positions are required to have a university degree. Other qualifications required are: professional experience in job evaluation and pay administration; professional knowledge of modern principles and techniques of general personnel administration.

3. (a) (i) Yes. Since 1965 several country-wide campaigns have been conducted in Canada to recruit candidates possessing the required qualifications. As a result of these campaigns approximately fifty employees have been recruited in Canada from outside the public service. In addition, through intensive training programs some one hundred and ten employees from within the Public Service have acquired the necessary skills and qualifications and are now employed on classification and pay administration work. (ii) Yes. Efforts were made to recruit qualified candidates in Britain in late 1967. (iii) No. See also answer to 3(b). (b) The result of the recruitment effort in Britain was that two candidates were qualified for employment in classification and pay administration, but neither of these qualified candidates accepted offers of employment with the Public Service of Canada.

In the light of the experience in Britain, it was decided not to attempt to recruit candidates in France.

4. Yes. It is a condition of employment for any officers recruited in the United States for the positions in question that they either already have a working knowledge of both French and English or that they agree to acquire it through appropriate training.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS

Question No. 1,022—Mrs. Wadds:

1. What amount was loaned under the Small Businesses Loans Act in each month beginning January, 1967, through and including January, 1968?

2. What amount was loaned under this Act each year from its commencement?

[Miss LaMarsh.]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance):

1.

Month 1967	Amount $
January	1,231,620
February	1,169,111
March	1,190,267
April	1,239,775
May	2,266,407
June	2,356,725
July	2,108,888

1966	20,095,355

BRIDGE COST, P.E.I. NATIONAL PARK

Question No. 1,033—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. What is the estimated cost of constructing a bridge across Rustico Harbour to complete the Gulf Shore Highway in the Prince Edward Island National Park?

2. What was the estimated cost of such a bridge when it was decided to construct the Gulf Shore Highway?

3. Is it intended to build this bridge?

4. If so, when is construction scheduled to commence?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. The cost estimate for this bridge was completed in 1965. It was $1,550,000. To meet rising costs this estimate would now have to be increased to approximately $1,800,000.

2. As the Gulf Shore Highway project was divided into three separate phases, no detailed estimate of the Rustico Harbour bridge was prepared at the time construction started on phase I. However, a preliminary estimate of the entire project, including the bridge, made in 1954 was $2,845,000. The actual cost of completing the highway without the bridge was $3,397,000.

3. The construction of this bridge is not currently being considered.

4. Not applicable.

ROYAL COMMISSIONS PRESENTLY OPERATING

Question No. 1,044—Mr. Coates:

How many Royal Commissions are in operation at the present time, what area does each cover, what has been the cost of each to the federal government as of this date, what is the estimated final cost of each, and on what date should final reports be received by the government?

Mr. John R. Matheson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Six royal commissions were in operation on February 12, 1968.

	Cost to date	Forecast to March 31, 1969
Pilotage	$ 922,794	$1,251,969
Bilingualism and Biculturalism	6,745,612	7,646,181
Farm Machinery	497,835	984,117
Security	220,698	473,600
Status of women	254,275	1,209,408
Hay River	15,000	N/A

The areas covered by these commissions include problems relating to marine pilotage provided in Canada, bilingualism and biculturalism, farm machinery costs, security, status of women and the administration of justice at Hay River, N.W.T.

It is expected that the report of the commission of inquiry into the administration of justice in the Hay River Area of the N.W.T. will be completed during the current fiscal year (1967-68). It is not possible to forecast the date when final reports will be received by the government from the other commissions, although it is considered reasonable to assume that all of these commissions excepting the royal commission on the status of women will terminate their work during the 1968-69 fiscal year.

FUEL OIL TENDERS, MONTMAGNY PUBLIC BUILDING

Question No. 1,046—Mr. Berger:

1. Has the Department of Public Works asked for tenders for the supplying of fuel oil to the government's Montmagny Building (Post Office, Customs-Manpower) for the year 1967-1968?

2. If so, where were such tenders advertised?

3. How many tenders were submitted, by whom were they submitted, and to whom was the contract granted?

[Translation]

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): 1. No. The Department of Defence Production invited tenders for the supply of fuel oil for the federal building at Montmagny, Quebec, during the period August 1, 1967, to July 31, 1968.

2. The Department of Defence Production does not publicly advertise tenders. It does send invitations to tender to suppliers from established departmental source lists.

3. Six (6) firms submitted bids as follows: 1. Champlain Oil Products Limited, Montreal 3, P.Q. 2. Texaco Canada Limited, Montreal, P.Q. 3. The British American Oil Co. Ltd., Toronto, Ontario. 4. Imperial Oil Limited, Ottawa, Ontario. 5. Les Petroles Irving Inc., Saint John, N.B. 6. Les Huiles de Quebec Limited, Quebec City, P.Q.

Contract was awarded to Champlain Oil Products Limited, the lowest bidder.

P.F.R.A. PROJECTS IN PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Question No. 1,048—Mr. Jorgenson:

1. How many P.F.R.A. projects were started in 1967 in each of the Prairie Provinces?

2. What was the nature of each of the projects and estimated cost?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): 1. Manitoba, 6; Saskatchewan, 33; Alberta, 19.

2. Manitoba: 6 Community Dugouts, $21,-080; Saskatchewan: 2 community pastures, Kinistino, $186,000; White Bear, $265,000; 4 large community water storage projects, Lake Lenore, $98,000, Helgason, $96,000, Esterhazy, $200,000, Greenleigh, $32,500; 24 community dugouts, $75,090; 3 community stock watering dams, $48,120; Alberta: 1 large community water storage and irrigation project—Therriault, $90,500; 16 community dugouts, $70,660; 1 community stock watering dam, $1,850; 1 community irrigation project, $4,950.

MANPOWER AND IMMIGRATION RADIO TIME

Question No. 1,053—Mrs. Wadds:

1. How much radio time does the Department of Manpower and Immigration use?

2. How much does it cost annually?

Mr. J. C. Munro (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. 20 hours and 35 minutes from April 1, 1967 to February 23, 1968.

2. $12,226.62.

Questions

BILINGUAL BONUS TO PUBLIC SERVANTS, EDMONTON

Question No. 1,060—Mr. Lambert:

How many persons in the public service of Canada, employed in Edmonton or its immediate area, qualify for the 7 per cent pay bonus or any other bonus for sufficient proficiency in both the English and French languages?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I have been given the following information by the Public Service Commission: The answer to this question is "nil".

* FLOOD CONTROL AGREEMENT, UPPER THAMES VALLEY

Question No. 1,080—Mr. Irvine:

1. Is it the intention of the federal government to negotiate with the City of London, the Government of the Province of Ontario, and the Upper Thames Valley Conservation Authority for an extension of the 1961 Flood Control Agreement which would permit the completion of the program outlined in the Upper Thames Valley Conservation Report of 1952?

2. Have representations been received by the federal government from the City of London?

3. Have representations or submissions been received by the federal government from the Government of the Province of Ontario?

4. What initiative does the federal government intend to take in this urgent matter?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's question is related to the river Thames project and the Water Protection Act. 1. The 1961 Flood Control Agreement referred to in the question presumably is that signed by Canada and Ontario on January 28, 1961, providing for a contribution by Canada not exceeding $3,615,200 over a period of ten years to the construction of four flood control reservoirs and related channel improvements on the Upper Thames River system. This agreement resulted from an application by Ontario for a financial contribution to these works under the above act. The initiative for negotiation of extension of the agreement rests with Ontario. Any negotiations would be between Canada and Ontario.

2. No representations have been received by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources from the city of London in this connection.

3. No representations or submissions in this connection have been received by my department from the government of the province of Ontario.

[Mr. Munro.]

4. The initiative in this matter rests with the government of Ontario.

NATIONAL MANIFESTATIONS ON PARLIAMENT HILL

Question No. 1,084—Mr. Lambert:

1. Did the Secretary of State receive a letter from Z. Jarmicki, National President of the Canadian Polish Congress, protesting the exclusion of the Polish ethnic community from the national manifestations on Parliament Hill on June 30-July 1?

2. If so, what was the reply to such representations?

3. Were similar protestations received from national organizations representing the Italians, Dutch, Slovaks, and Hungarian communities in Canada and, if so, what was the nature of the replies?

4. What were the criteria used by the C.B.C. to determine participation in the national presentations made on Parliament Hill on June 30, in addition to long hair and screaming voices?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): 1. No.

2. Not applicable.

3 and 4. Not from specific ethnic organizations, but a letter was received from the chairman of the Canadian Folk Arts Council commenting on the fact that some ethnic groups were not represented in the program. In reply, it was noted that the selection of participants in the program was a joint undertaking of the centennial commission, Canadian Folk Arts Council and Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. While the general goal was to reflect all facets of Canadian life, it was recognized that time and budgetary limitations would mean that some national groups and some geographical areas could not be represented. Since the program was to be viewed by Her Majesty the Queen as well as carried on national television, the final selection of participants was left to the C.B.C. producer who, it was felt, was best qualified to decide which groups together would offer the most representative, colorful and professional presentation.

* REMOVAL OF INCOME TAX DOCUMENTS, WINNIPEG

Question No. 1,086—Mr. Sherman:

1. Were any documents of taxpayers removed by officers of the Department of National Revenue from the premises of the taxpayers or of their accountants or agents in Winnipeg during January 1968?

2. If any documents were so removed, were they removed with the consent of the taxpayers or the accountant or agent concerned?

3. If any documents were so removed without such consent, under what statutory authority did the removals take place?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of National Revenue): 1. Yes.

2. The records were delivered voluntarily to officers of the Department of National Revenue, Taxation, pursuant to a requirement issued under Section 126(2) of the Income Tax Act.

3. Not applicable.

PORTRAIT OF MR. DIEFENBAKER

Question No. 1,088—Mr. Enns:

1. On what date was the portrait of the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent placed in the Parliament Buildings?

2. (a) What are the government's plans for displaying a portrait of the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker? (b) Does the plan in this regard differ from that followed in regard to the display of portraits honouring former Prime Ministers?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): 1. March 4th, 1959.

2. (a) The portrait of the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker, commissioned by the government, will become the property of parliament. The display of this portrait in the parliament building is a matter falling within the domain of His Honour the Speaker. (b) See answer to part (a).

HARBOUR IMPROVEMENTS, ST. BRIDE'S, NFLD.

Question No. 1,090—Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert):

Has a survey been conducted recently in the harbour area of St. Bride's, Newfoundland and, if so, when will improvements be made?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Funds have been allocated for repairs and maintenance work on existing facilities at St. Bride's to facilitate the local fishery. In addition, a survey is now in progress to ascertain what other improvements may be warranted.

NATIONAL MUSEUMS ACT

Question No. 1,095—Mr. Bell (Carleton):

1. Has the National Museums Act been proclaimed?

2. If so, on what date?

3. If not, when may its proclamation be anticipated?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State):

1. No.

2. Not applicable.

3. It is the intention of the government that the act shall come into force on April 1, 1968.

NATIONAL MUSEUMS APPOINTMENTS

Question No. 1,103—Mr. Bell (Carleton):

1. Has the Board of Trustees of the National Museums of Canada been appointed?

2. If so, who are the members thereof?

3. If not, when may its proclamation be anticipated?

4. Has (a) the Secretary-General of the National Museums of Canada (b) the director of each museum, been appointed?

5. If so, what are the names of such appointees?

6. If not, when may such appointments be anticipated?

7. Have any by-laws of the National Museums of Canada been enacted?

8. If so, on what date and to what purport are such by-laws?

9. Have any consultative committees been established?

10. If so, what committees and who are the members thereof?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State):

1. Yes.

2. Mr. Jean Ostiguy, Montreal, Quebec, chairman; Mr. J. Ronald Longstaffe, Vancouver, British Columbia, vice-chairman; Mr. Allan Bronfman, Montreal, Quebec; Mrs. Nina Cohen, Glace Bay, Nova Scotia; Mrs. Phyllis George, Moncton, New Brunswick; Mr. George W. P. Heffelfinger, Winnipeg, Manitoba; Mr. Kiyoshi Izumi, Regina, Saskatchewan; Dr. Amiot Jolicœur, Ste. Foy, Quebec; M^{me} C. Marcoux-Baillargeon, Montreal, Quebec; Mr. David Spurgeon, Toronto, Ontario; Professor G. S. Vickers, Toronto, Ontario; Dr. J. Tuzo Wilson, Toronto, Ontario; and, ex officio, Mr. Jean Boucher, Director of the Canada Council, and Dr. W. G. Schneider, President of the National Research Council.

3. Not applicable.

4. (a) Yes. (b) No.

5. Mr. Charles J. Mackenzie has been appointed Secretary General of the National Museums of Canada; under the act; the directors of the museums are to be appointed by the governor in council on the recommendation of the board of trustees.

Inquiries of the Ministry

6. After the first meeting of the board of trustees.

7. No.

8. Not applicable.

9. No.

10. Not applicable.

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Last Wednesday at this time I asked whether starred question No. 545 could not be answered, and I was told by the parliamentary secretary that my request would be considered. It has not been answered yet. In view of the fact that this is a simple question requiring straightforward and factual information, and that it has been on the order paper for nearly five months, I would request the Prime Minister to speak to the minister concerned to see if this question could not be answered on Wednesday next.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I will be glad to do so.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege with regard to question No. 909. It has been on the order paper since January 22 and is a very simple series of questions. I was wondering if perhaps the Secretary of State could make arrangements to have this question answered by Wednesday. I quite understand, Mr. Speaker, that the government may not want to answer the question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

FINANCE

LEVEL OF EXCHANGE RESERVES AT TIME OF ADDITIONAL CREDIT ARRANGEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is for the Minister of Finance. I wonder whether the minister will advise the house whether the level of Canada's foreign exchange reserves had dipped to $1.7 billion or thereabouts by the time Canada had obtained the additional credit rights to $900 million U.S. announced by the Minister of Finance on Thursday, as asserted three times by the Minister of National Revenue on the French television network last evening.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman knows it is not customary to reveal the state of our foreign exchange reserves, except at the end of the month. The Minister of National Revenue spoke to me about his statement on the television network. He rose today on a question of privilege and said his memory was at fault. I wish to assure the house the Minister of National Revenue is not aware of the current state of our foreign exchange reserves.

Mr. Lambert: May I ask a supplementary question. Will the minister kindly advise whether the Minister of National Revenue was also in error when he advised that Canada's daily loss of foreign exchange reserves was at the rate of $25 to $35 million per day up to the time the minister announced these new credit rights?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am not wholly aware of what the Minister of National Revenue said, but I can assure the hon. member that the Minister of National Revenue is not aware of the change in our exchange reserves from day to day.

Mr. Lambert: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am speaking with reference to the text of this—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to remind the hon. member that the only questions which can be asked about statements made outside the house should be put to the Prime Minister, with a view to ascertaining whether such alleged statements correspond to government policy.

Mr. Lambert: I will ask my question of the Prime Minister, then. Does the Prime Minister agree that the Minister of National Revenue was in a position to disclose figures regarding Canada's foreign exchange reserves at any time during the recent monetary crisis?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the minister has already indicated on a question of privilege that the figures he used yesterday were inaccurate.

Mr. Lambert: Does the Prime Minister agree that ministers of the crown should appear on television programs with faulty memories?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

I should like to tell the house that yesterday I was defending the Canadian dollar. I wanted to establish that the dollar had sufficient reserves and that, last week, we had improved the situation in that area. Therefore, I think that the hon. member has no reason to become excited.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether we might not go to another question. The minister has risen on a question of privilege which is really an explanation of a statement made outside the house. I suggest it should not be pursued further.

HUMAN RIGHTS

REPORTED DISCRIMINATION IN EMPLOYMENT CONTRACT IN NORTH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I ask my question in light of the Supreme Court decision last week upholding the validity of an employment contract clause that forbade a relationship between members of different races. Because of our concern for equality in this regard, I wonder whether the Prime Minister can advise the house of the intention of his government to introduce legislation to make such contracts or impositions illegal in the future.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have asked for a report on this matter from the Department of Justice. The Minister of Justice received the report only at lunch time, and I would prefer to examine it before I reply to my hon. friend.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. There have been instances in the past when the Supreme Court of Canada has seen fit to permit a rehearing before the full court. As the decision in the Canadian Marconi case is one that, regardless of its merits as a legal proposition, will place Canada in the position of being regarded internationally as a country in which the highest court has determined that discrimination is in order—for that will be the misinterpretation—would the government consider doing that which has been done in the past, namely asking the Supreme Court to have a full panel of judges sit on this question instead of five judges, in view of the importance of this matter to Canada's international face, if I may use that expression, or image all over the world?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I have said that I would look into this matter in all its aspects and with all the facts before me. I think that is a wise procedure to follow before coming to any decision or making any statement in connection with such an important question.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the minister of northern affairs whether his department still requires companies that employ men in northern parts of Canada to write this kind of clause into their employment contracts.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I think I can say confidently that no contracts are written in either of the territories, but in all instances they are consummated in one of the provinces; and the law respecting any such contract would be the law of the province in which the contract was written.

Mr. Orlikow: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister whether it is true, as has been reported, that this clause in the contract was written in at the request of his department some years ago?

Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, I think that is an aspect of the matter that might well be disclosed when the Prime Minister makes the comprehensive statement that he has indicated.

Mr. Howard: May I address a further supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Considering what the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development said, that the contract in question was written in one province and was to be applicable in another jurisdiction, the implication being that such province has extraterritorial jurisdiction to make a contract which is to be effective in areas which are exclusively under federal jurisdiction, will the Prime Minister look into that aspect of the matter as well?

Mr. Pearson: Yes.

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alcide Simard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Could he tell the house whether the Canadian government intends to shake its fist at every country which, like Gabon, is totally unimpressed by its uncompromising arrogance?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is an argument rather than a question.

[English]

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could direct a question to the Minister of Transport relating to that section of his department which deals with meteorological matters. I ask the minister whether he might be able to arrange that March 22 be a fine, clear and sunny day.

Mr. J. R. Keays (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development who is responsible to parliament for the historic sites commission. With reference to the importation of potatoes from the United States to Canada, would the minister give consideration to the construction of a hothouse at Cap Rouge, Quebec, to commemorate the planting of the first potatoes on Canadian soil?

FINANCE

ACTION TO CURTAIL INCREASES IN INTEREST RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): I wish to direct my question to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Considering the number of complaints that I and many other members of the house, no doubt, have received concerning the sharp increase in interest rates now being charged by all lending institutions, may I ask what the government proposes to do to curtail these increases in interest rates?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we shall be discussing the finance estimates again shortly, I hope.

Mr. Hales: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Prime Minister consider referring this very serious matter to the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs?

Mr. Pearson: I should think, Mr. Speaker, that should the committee feel it would be useful to look into this matter, it would take that action.

LABOUR RELATIONS

MONTREAL—APPOINTMENT OF ARBITRATION BOARD ON PICARD REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roger-E. Régimbal (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

In view of the imminent danger of a complete paralysis in the Montreal port which could affect its activities for a long time and the possibility that the house will adjourn soon, does the government intend to take immediately, with all its resources and authority, some steps liable to solve the labour-management conflict delaying the settlement of that collective agreement?

[English]

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, considerable effort is being made to see there is no strike. I think the hon. member should refer this question to the Minister of Labour, who has the primary responsibility in the matter.

Mr. Régimbal: May I direct my question to the Minister of Labour. At least one minister believes he knows what he is talking about.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Would the hon. member please repeat the question? I did not hear the first part of it.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Are you the Minister of Labour?

Mr. Régimbal: In view of the imminent danger of the complete paralysis of the port of Montreal, which would affect the activities of the port for a long time to come, and since there is a possibility that the house will adjourn soon, will the minister initiate immediately with all the resources and authority at his command any proposal to find a solution to labour-management troubles in that port?

Mr. Nicholson: Some days ago, in answering a question put by an hon. member, I think I said that if the two representatives, that of the longshoremen and that of the shipping federation on the conciliation board requested, were not able to agree on a chairman, I would be glad to appoint one. When a report was received by me on Thursday last from the representatives of the longshoremen and the shipping federation that they had not been able to agree on a chairman, on Friday we approached Associate Chief Judge Alan Gold, of Montreal, and asked him to chair the board. I am pleased to say that on Friday night Judge Gold accepted the chairmanship of the board of conciliation and I understand that he is already at work. I am hopeful that with Judge Gold's experience and prestige in labour disputes, and with men like Louis Laberge and William Baker on the board, they will be able to come to grips quickly with the problems causing the present difficulties.

Mr. Régimbal: As a supplementary question, is the minister now prepared to advance the opposition's suggestion of a long term contract and a permanent industrial relations committee?

Hon. B. S. Mackasey (Member of the Administration): That has been considered, Mr. Speaker. I share the hon. member's interest in the port of Montreal, which I think he will agree should be above petty politics.

[Later:]

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the hon. Minister of Agriculture, further to the question put to him by my colleague from Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes.

Can he tell us whether his department or one of its agencies, such as the Canadian Wheat Board, or the Corn Exchange, have invited foreign shippers to use the Port Cartier or Baie Comeau port facilities, instead of the Montreal harbour, during the next shipping season, in view of the fact the present difficulties between shippers and dockers would make that port unusable?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I doubt that my department has done anything of the kind, but I shall take the question as notice, in case instructions should have been given to that effect.

[English]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister would inquire also as to the wheat board and the corn exchange, not only his department but also these agencies?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Labour. Is he aware that according to today's Montreal Gazette the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) is now handling the labour matter? I would like to know who is minister of labour?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

UNITED NATIONS

VIET NAM—PROPOSED DISCUSSION IN SECURITY COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of reports over the week end that the United States commander in Viet Nam is asking for an additional 200,000 or more troops, thus indicating a further escalation of the disastrous war there, would the government consider asking the Secretary General of the United Nations to place this matter on the agenda of the Security Council immediately, in order to try to bring world opinion to bear on the possibility of a cease fire?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this matter has been considered at the United Nations. It could be considered in the general assembly and the Security Council, but I would point out to my hon. friend that on the basis of the investigation that has been made there is no reason to believe that North Viet Nam or communist China would appear at the Security Council.

Mr. Lewis: As a supplementary question may I ask the right hon. gentleman whether it would not be possible at the Security Council to discuss the matter on a world wide basis; and can the right hon. Prime Minister be so certain that either or both of these countries might not be induced to appear if the matter was discussed by the Security Council?

Mr. Pearson: It would hardly be in a world wide framework if one quarter of the world's people were not represented in the Security Council at the time of the discussion. I should also point out to my hon. friend that the Secretary General, who is always anxious to use the United Nations, as we all are, whenever possible, has taken the position that this is still a matter for the Geneva conference to decide before the United Nations.

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): As a supplementary question will the Prime Minister inform the house whether the government has expressed any opinion with regard to the enlargement of forces in Viet Nam, particularly as it might affect Cambodia and Laos?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, this is a question based on newspaper reports which we have not yet had confirmed by any official source.

FINANCE

REPORTED STATEMENT BY TRADE MINISTER ON CORPORATION TAX SURCHARGE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address this question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Was the Minister of Trade and Commerce expressing the view of the government when he said in Halifax that the 3 per cent surtax on corporation levies is a decentive to industry, and that confidence in the country's economy has been shaken by the deficits this country is experiencing?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is quoting, of course, from a newspaper account.

Mr. Hees: Would the right hon. Prime Minister lean slightly to his left and confirm with the Minister of Trade and Commerce that this is exactly what he did say?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INVESTIGATION INTO GROCERY RETAILING IN WESTERN PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct this question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the minister's announcement over the week end that he has instructed the combines investigation branch to investigate the grocery retail business on the prairies, can he tell us what powers he has given in connection with this investigation? Can he also say whether it will cover the whole of the country, in view of the fact that the grocery retail business is nation wide?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if I may I should like to clarify the assumption in the hon. member's question. I said I had asked the director of investigation and research to examine the allegations set forth in the particular chapter of the Batten report relating to the grocery industry in western Canada, and that if he were to find substantiation for those allegations he should on his own motion begin an inquiry.

At the moment a formal inquiry is not under way. The officials of the department and the director of investigation and research are investigating those allegations.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Is the minister, as he suggested in Calgary, prepared to meet with the three provincial premiers with regard to this matter and recommend that there be a reference to the restrictive trade practices commission with regard to the high cost of groceries in western Canada?

Mr. Turner: The hon. member will recall that I mentioned I had invited Judge Mary Batten to Ottawa. She will arrive on Tuesday night and meet with me and the officials of my department on Wednesday. I would, of course, be willing to meet the three premiers at any time to discuss the matter. The royal commission was commissioned by them, and Judge Mary Batten and her two fellow commissioners reported to them. After they have had an opportunity to review the report they might wish to approach me on the subject.

Mr. Woolliams: Will the minister not take the initiative and ask to meet with the three premiers with regard to such an important matter as the high cost of living and the high cost of groceries?

Mr. Turner: I think the hon. member would expect me to review the report in some detail before I took any such action.

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, is the minister in a position at the present time to say whether he has given serious consideration to a similar study which would affect the maritime provinces and Quebec?

Mr. Turner: This commission was undertaken on the instructions of the three provincial governments. I see no reason that the premiers of the maritime provinces, if they saw fit, might not undertake a similar inquiry.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Who will pay for it?

[Later:]

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address a belated supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. When he is discussing this report with respect to price increases in the prairie provinces, will he ask those who are particularly concerned to inquire as to the direct relationship of the people who own these chain stores with fruit wholesalers and brokers who sell our British Columbia fruit?

CRIMINAL CODE

INQUIRY AS TO FREE VOTE ON ABORTION AMENDMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the present state of confusion which exists with regard to matters of confidence, would the Prime Minister indicate if the vote on the proposed Criminal Code amendment dealing with abortion will be a free vote or whether it will be regarded as a vote of confidence? I ask this question in the light of the apparent conflicting views of the Minister of Justice and the Minister of National Health and Welfare on this score.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): The matter is under consideration, Mr. Speaker.

GRAIN

OATS AND BARLEY—INQUIRY AS TO FINAL PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce under whose jurisdiction is the Canadian Wheat Board. Is the Canadian Wheat Board sending out the cheques today, or will the farmers have to wait longer?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I hope to be in a position to make a statement tomorrow about the delivery dates for the cheques for oats and barley, and the amount of the final payment.

TRADE

INQUIRY AS TO SIGNING OF INTERNATIONAL GRAINS AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to reply to a question and a supplementary question asked last Friday by the hon. member for Provencher regarding the signing of the international grains arrangement.

The international grains arrangement consists of a wheat trade convention and a food aid convention. Thirty two countries have signed the wheat trade convention, including Canada, the United States of America and the other major wheat exporting countries. A significant number of the major importers such as Britain, Japan and the European economic community have also signed. The 17 countries that participated in the Kennedy round grain negotiations and were eligible to sign the food aid convention have done so.

With regard to the supplementary question, the answer is that, as indicated last Friday, Canada does intend to do so. We expect that all of the countries that have signed the conventions will complete ratification procedures by the deadline.

COMPANY OF YOUNG CANADIANS

REPORTED SUBSIDIZATION OF PRIVATE SCHOOLS IN B.C.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Following the failure of the C.B.C. to credit the federal government with the financing through the Company of Young Canadians of two private schools in Vancouver as shown on a nation wide television program yesterday, will the federal government correct this omission or will it withdraw its financing from these rather startling schools?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest that the question might be placed on the order paper.

UNITED NATIONS

VIET NAM—SUGGESTED ACTION FOR PROTECTION OF CHILDREN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, this question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the serious situation of the children of Viet Nam and their plight as a result of the war, could the minister advise us whether any thought is being given to the evacuation of these children from the war area under the supervision and protection of the United Nations or a subcommittee of that organization?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I do not believe consideration has been given to this matter by the United Nations. However, I will make an examination to see whether this matter is being considered.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—REPORTED RESULT OF U.S. OPINION POLL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs or to the right hon. Prime Minister. In giving consideration to the suggestion made last Friday by the right hon. member for Prince Albert that this house consider a resolution urging a cessation of the bombing in Viet Nam, would the government take into consideration the newly released public opinion poll which shows for the first time that a majority of the public in the United States is adverse to the involvement in the Viet Nam war?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that the question he has asked is argumentative.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

RHODESIA—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON RECENT TALKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister further to the questions I put to him last week concerning Rhodesia. Is the Prime Minister now in a position to say whether consultations or discussions are still taking place with Great Britain, and whether consultations have taken place with other members of the Commonwealth concerning the Rhodesian situation? Further, would he state whether these consultations concern a tightening of the sanctions on Rhodesia?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, these exchanges are still going on. My hon. friend may have noticed that in Westminster last Friday Prime Minister Wilson rejected a suggestion that there should be an emergency meeting of the prime ministers to discuss Rhodesia, on the ground that it is not likely that any constructive result would come from such a meeting at this time.

This matter is before the Security Council of the United Nations, and I believe consideration is being given to having a meeting of the commonwealth sanctions committee in London.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MONTREAL—ACTION TO DEAL WITH UNEMPLOYMENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, reports published just before the week end indicate that the level of unemployment is at a ten year high and that construction starts are at a ten year low in Canada's largest city, the island of Montreal. I should like to ask the Minister of Labour whether he is now proposing a course of action to his cabinet colleagues or whether he intends in the near future to meet with provincial or municipal officials to determine an immediate course of action.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The first part of the question is not in order. The hon. member is asking about communications between members of the cabinet, and that part of the question is not in order.

Mr. Grafftey: Then I will ask the minister whether, in view of the grave situation existing at this time, he intends to meet with municipal and provincial officials in order to determine an immediate course of action.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): The situation is under active study. It has been under study by the branches of government concerned. It is, I may say, a matter of more direct concern to the Department of Manpower and Immigration than to the Department of Labour in accordance with the existing division of responsibilities, but I can assure the hon. member that my colleague, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, and I are working on this difficult and serious problem.

[Translation]

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a supplementary question to the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Does the minister intend to confer with the municipal and provincial authorities in order to decide on a line of action and remedy the situation?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this is a general situation with which we are dealing at the moment. We have contracts with the provinces and the municipalities and we are doing all we can.

[English]

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): There are 67,000 people out of work in the city of Montreal, a number equivalent to the whole working force of one city the size of Regina. Will the minister meet with Mayor Drapeau and see whether he can work out a plan to deal with this situation?

[Later:]

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): I wish to address a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In view of the unsatisfactory answers given by the Minister of Labour and the minister of manpower to the questions asked them in connection with the serious plight of those who are unemployed in the city of Montreal, where the number out of work has now risen to the highest point in eight years, would the right hon. gentleman speak to these two ministers to see whether some more serious attitude toward unemployment in our largest city—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NIGERIA—CANADIAN EFFORTS TO END CIVIL WAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the war between Nigeria and Biafra. Considering that a member of the Commonwealth is supplying arms to one party in this dispute, can the minister advise whether Canada is taking any initiative within a Commonwealth context to bring to an end this flow of war materials and, hopefully, to the war itself?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I indicated on Thursday last, I believe, that the Secretary General of the Commonwealth, with the approval of most Commonwealth countries, was in the process of mediation, and it was generally felt that his endeavours in this regard ought to be supported.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NORAD—HOUSE CONSIDERATION OF RENEWAL AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): My question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the importance to Canada of current negotiations for the renewal of NORAD will the right hon. gentleman assure the house that the renewal agreement will be submitted for discussion in this house before it is signed?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot give that assurance. The government will have to take its responsibilities and then submit its decision to the house, as is normally done in connection with these matters.

INQUIRY AS TO PURCHASE OF TRANSPORT AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Is it the intention of the Department of National Defence to proceed with the purchase of four Lockheed C-141 Starlifter transport aircraft?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question ought to be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Crouse: May I point out that there is urgency attached to this question, in view of the fact that defence planners have known since 1965 that they would want about a dozen Starlifters to make the army truly mobile and to refuel Canada's new fighters—

Mr. Speaker: Order please. This appears to be argumentative. The hon. member knows that if in his view there is urgency attached to the matter it can be discussed on the adjournment motion.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO PAYMENT OF PENSION INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Prince Edward-Lennox): I wish to ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs the following question. When can the war veterans of Canada expect to receive the much needed 15 per cent increase in their pensions, which was to have gone into effect on January 1 last?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): It will, of course, go into effect as from January 1 as soon as the house sees fit to pass the supplementary estimates.

[Later:]

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): May I put a supplementary question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. On the undertaking of the opposition to deal promptly with the estimates of his department, will the hon. gentleman assure us that those estimates will be brought before the house without further delay?

Mr. Teillet: These estimates are already before the house to be dealt with.

Mr. Chatterton: Can the minister say when they will be brought before the house?

Mr. Teillet: They are before the house now.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT OF FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether we can expect amendments to the Farm Improvement Loans Act to be introduced prior to any adjournment which may come about in the course of the next three weeks or so.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): I do not think it will be on the order of business, but of course that would depend on how much longer the house sits. I find it difficult to answer the question.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INQUIRY AS TO STATEMENT ON PRICES REVIEW BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister arising out of a statement he made toward the end of last week, when he said he would be making a statement today on the proposed prices and wages review board. Since the right hon. gentleman did not do so on motions, would he be good enough to inform us when he intends to make that statement?

[Mr. Alkenbrack.]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I intend to make a speech, if I am permitted, and I will refer to this matter in the course of that speech.

INDUSTRY

SYDNEY, N.S.—ADDITIONAL FEDERAL ASSISTANCE RESPECTING STEEL PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I have a question for the Prime Minister. Last Monday the right hon. gentleman indicated that correspondence had been sent to Premier Smith in connection with the Sydney steel situation. As of Friday this correspondence had not arrived. I wonder whether the Prime Minister would check with his office to see whether it was actually put into the mail.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): A letter has gone to the premier, and a telegram was sent to him today asking if he agrees to having it tabled.

REVIEW OF DESIGNATED AREA POLICY RESPECTING ATLANTIC PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): My question is directed to the Minister of Industry. Has the minister yet received the study of the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council showing that the slowest city growth rates in Canada exist in the maritimes, and would he now re-examine the request to have the whole of Atlantic Canada made a designated area?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

WEST GERMANY—OBJECTIONS TO DRAFT NUCLEAR TREATY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. What position has the Canadian government taken with regard to the objections raised by the government of West Germany to the draft treaty on the non-proliferation of nuclear weapons, particularly in regard to the four further safeguards which the West Germany government has stated to be necessary?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest the hon. member is now asking a question which is very wide in scope and of the type which should be answered on motions.

Mr. Harkness: With respect, I do not think so. I believe the minister is prepared to state Canada's position with regard to this important matter.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I should like to take this question as notice.

DECISION RESPECTING MEMBERSHIP IN ORGANIZATION OF AMERICAN STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a question for the Secretary of of State for External Affairs. In view of a reported statement by the Minister of Transport over the week end, is it now a fact that the Canadian government has decided that Canada should not become a member of the Organization of American States?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question as asked is argumentative.

SHIPPING

REPORT ON ADMINISTRATION OF SMALL BOAT HARBOURS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the large number of requests for copies of the report by Dr. Tom How on the administration of small vessel harbours, and in view of the desire of many people to help the government to arrive at a speedy solution to problems of this sort on the Pacific coast, would the minister reconsider his earlier decision not to make this report public?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): I will be glad to think about it. It is, of course, an internal document, but as I indicated what we might do is extract certain of the contents for publication. I will give the question further consideration.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SUMMERSIDE, P.E.I.—INQUIRY AS TO FUTURE OF BASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, about two weeks ago the premier of Prince Edward Island led a delegation to Ottawa which conferred extensively with the Minister of National Defence. I now ask the Prime Minister, inasmuch as this delegation returns tomorrow, whether in view of the very serious economic situation that has developed in Prince Edward Island, particularly this winter, he will be in a position to assure the premier and the members of that delegation that there will be no reduction at this time in the Canadian Forces base at Summerside.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we are making good progress in working out arrangements which I think will be satisfactory to the provincial and federal authorities.

IMMIGRATION

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Several months ago the minister indicated to the house that he would be proposing amendments to the act at the earliest possible opportunity. I should like to ask the minister if he is in a position to say whether any amendments will be proposed before the adjournment of the session.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think it will be difficult before the present session is adjourned, but I believe that next session we shall propose some amendments to the Immigration Act.

[English]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MATTERS TO BE DEALT WITH BEFORE RECESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is it possible for the Prime Minister to indicate to the house what items of business the government has on its list for parliament to deal with before we adjourn or rise for a certain event that some of us have heard about?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we must dispose of this bill, and I hope positively.

Then there are the supplementary estimates and interim supply. Perhaps we could then adjourn, although I know my hon. friend does not want us to adjourn because he wants to save the country from too many speeches, according to the press this morning. But if we adjourn after interim supply, when we return after the events to which my hon. friend referred we could carry on with the rest of the business that is considered essential.

Mr. Knowles: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Where does the legislation regarding the Canada Development Corporation now stand?

Mr. Pearson: That is important legislation, and I hope we will be able to dispose of the bill before this session finishes all its work. But that may be out of my control.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question to the government house leader. When does he intend to bring forward the supplementary estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs so the house may agree to them?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, we worked out an arrangement with the other house leaders with respect to the sequence of the estimates, and it was understood that following the finance estimates we would deal with external affairs and then defence. We would be prepared following that to deal with any other department, including veterans affairs.

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Will the date of parliament's return be set before parliament adjourns for that certain event, or will it be set by the new prime minister when he is chosen?

Mr. Pearson: Oh no, Mr. Speaker, it should be set for quite early in April.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Could he tell us whether Bill No. C-186 is still on the government list of priority measures to be passed this session?

[English]

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. A. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the parliamentary secretary to the Secretary of State. On November 1, 1967 an address was passed for documents in relation to the control of pollution in the Ottawa river, and on December 20, 1967, a further address for documents in relation to the development of the national capital area. I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would see what can be done to expedite the tabling of these documents.

[Translation]

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I will look into it immediately. I am advised that we have asked for authorization to table those documents.

[English]

AIR CANADA

WINNIPEG—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON OVERHAUL BASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. R. Sherman (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. In view of the minister's triumphant week end on the prairies, and particularly in Winnipeg, is he now in a position to ice the cake by announcing his plans for the future of the Winnipeg air base and the government's regional air policy?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I shall continue to make every effort to reach a satisfactory solution. It is not possible to make an announcement at this time, but I can assure my hon. friend that a great deal of time and effort is being expended to make an announcement at the earliest possible date.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO REDUCTION IN HEALTH SERVICES FUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. As a result of the financial crisis faced by the government of Canada, are funds for Indian health services in the provinces being curtailed on the same scale as those in respect of northern health services for Indians and Eskimos in the Yukon and Northwest Territories?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to take this question as notice.

CANADIAN FILM DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT AND OPERATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State. Inasmuch as the house did not sit on Sunday I did not have the opportunity to wish the good lady a happy first anniversary of the giving of royal assent to the Canadian Film Development Corporation legislation. I wonder whether now, a year later, the government has appointed the officers of that corporation.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the government has, but the announcement has not yet been made.

FINANCE

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—REQUEST FOR MORATORIUM ON FARM DEBTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture and ask whether negotiations are in progress between the government of Prince Edward Island and his department with a view to instituting a moratorium on debts payable by farmers in Prince Edward Island to the Farm Credit Corporation, due to the depressed economic situation of agriculture in that province.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I know of no specific and current negotiations with the provincial government at this time on this question, but the Farm Credit Corporation, as I understand it, does have authority to postpone payments in a year when prices and returns to farmers are inadequate. I feel very certain that if things are of this critical nature they will give very serious consideration to such requests.

INDUSTRY

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE IN DEVELOPMENT OF ALBERTA TAR SANDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and I had a tête-à-tête about the Athabasca tar sands, and the minister indicated he would give consideration to making a statement about this. I wonder whether he has come to a conclusion about it.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there is not enough material on which to make a statement. This is only an interesting project, and that seems to be all there is to say about it at this time.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR SURCHARGE

On the order:

Second reading of Bill C-207, an act to amend the Income Tax Act—the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I should like to make it clear that I do not wish to make life difficult for Your Honour; neither do I wish to bore the house with a procedural discussion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: I thought that was a way in which I could get applause. Nevertheless it does seem to me that there is a point that should be decided by Your Honour, if not for the sake of the debate on which we are now about to launch, then it should be decided for the sake of the future. We have learned around here that precedents can sometimes get established very easily, and once we have them they become binding for a long time to come.

• (3:30 p.m.)

I would point out that there are quite a few citations in the authorities regarding the house being asked again in the same session to decide on something on which it has already made a decision. I will not take the time of the house to read all of these citations but I will quote a couple of them just to have them on the record in this context. Citation 200(1) at page 167 of Beauchesne's fourth edition reads as follows:

An old rule of parliament reads: "That a question being once made and carried in the affirmative or negative, cannot be questioned again but must stand as the judgment of the house." Unless such a rule were in existence, the time of the house might be used in the discussion of motions of the same nature and contradictory decisions would be sometimes arrived at in the course of the same session.

The other citation to which I would draw your attention is citation 163 at page 137 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, which reads as follows:

A mere alteration of the words of a question, without any substantial change in its object will not be sufficient to evade the rule that no question shall be offered which is substantially the same as one which has already been expressed in the current session. It is possible, however, so far to vary the character of a motion as to withdraw it from the operation of the rule.

I read the whole of that citation not only to be fair but because it was the last sentence on which the chairman of the committee of the whole relied when he made his ruling on an amendment proposed over a year ago by the then minister of transport, Hon. J. W. Pickersgill. You Honour will remember that that decision of the Deputy Speaker, which had been given after a great deal of study and thought, was appealed to you. You had to go through the same process again and you ruled that the amendment was out of order. It was your opinion that the substitute proposition offered by Mr. Pickersgill was not sufficiently different from the one that had been defeated for it to be allowed for presentation to the house in the same session.

Having made reference to Your Honour's ruling in 1967, may I indicate for the record that it is to be found at pages 12269 and 12270 of Hansard for January 26, 1967. What we had before us then was an amendment to a bill with which we were dealing in committee of the whole, and therefore Your Honour relied on citations which dealt with amendments. I believe Your Honour will agree that the same principles apply to a bill which is being offered in the place of one that has been defeated. You pointed out that there were citations at page 549 of May's seventeenth edition and at page 285 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 406(c), for example, which say that amendments are out of order if they are inconsistent with the decision which has been given upon a former amendment. You went on to say that even though hon. Mr. Pickersgill had brought in an amendment which varied from the former one, in your view it was inconsistent with the former decision and that the committee could not be asked to make the same decision in reverse.

Therefore it seems to me we have to be concerned about what we are being asked to do today. The order has been called for second reading of Bill No. C-207 which, as everyone in Canada knows, is the government's replacement for Bill No. C-193. Some of the facts about this bill should be noted. There are eight clauses in Bill No. C-207. I have not read every last line of the bill but I have checked the clauses closely and I have made all the necessary comparisons. I find that clause 1 of Bill No. C-207 is a brand new clause. It bears no relationship to anything that was in Bill No. C-193. So far, so good. Clause 2, however, seems to me to be clause 1 of the former bill, verbatim. Clause 3 of Bill No. C-207 is clause 2 of the former bill, verbatim. Clause 4 of Bill No. C-207 is clause 3 of Bill No. C-193, verbatim. Clause 5 of Bill No. C-207 is similar to clause 4 of the previous bill but its similarity is a little short of identity. Clause 6 of the new bill is a brand new one. It is completely different from anything that we had before us in the previous bill.

Then we come to clause 7 which is the contentious one having to do with a temporary surtax. I remember there was a little discussion on these words on February 19. It is true, and I do not argue with it at all, that clause 7 is in many respects different from the similar provisions of the previous bill. May I take a moment to indicate what some of these differences are. In the previous bill the surtax was only on individuals. In this bill the surtax is on both individuals and corporations. In the previous bill there was a floor of $100 of income tax before the surtax applied. In this bill the floor is $200. In the old bill the rate was 5 per cent; in this bill the rate is 3 per cent. In the old bill there was a ceiling; in this bill there is no ceiling. This bill provides the surtax for only two years; in the former bill there was no time limit. I can see that a pretty good case could be made procedurally for this clause being different from the corresponding clause in the other bill, and if all this bill did was to bring in a new style of surtax in place of the other one I agree that one would have a hard job trying to argue that it was the same proposition. It is not impossible to argue that way, but it would be difficult.

I move on to clause 8 of the new bill and I find that it is identical with clause 6 of the previous bill.

To sum up, there are eight clauses in this bill of which two are brand new, two are similar and four are identical. It is like the bishop's egg, and I do not quite know what Your Honour will do with it. When on February 19 the house voted against third reading of Bill No. C-193 it voted down the whole bill. Your Honour, as a member of parliament, knows what went on in committee of the whole but as Mr. Speaker your only concern is what happened in the house, and in the house Bill No. C-193 in its entirety was defeated. I recognize that those clauses in Bill No. C-207 which are identical with clauses in Bill No. C-193 were not contentious. Your

Honour knows it, but I am telling you anyway that these were the clauses which went through the committee of the whole with little or no debate, and certainly without any votes being called on them.

The most contentious clause was the one which had to do with the surtax. There was a vote on that clause in committee of the whole, and I am free to admit that when most of us voted against the third reading of Bill No. C-193 we were directing our vote mainly against the surtax. The fact is that the bill was turned down in its entirety and now we have before us a bill containing eight clauses, four of which are identical reproductions of clauses in the bill that was defeated, two more of which are similar and only two of which are brand new.

If there were a way to separate these various clauses, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the house would mind giving unanimous consent to the introduction of the clauses that we do not oppose, that we did not contest on the previous occasion. I can see that a ruling could be made that the clause on the surtax is different but I am concerned about the future if this bill is allowed to be presented for second reading without any comment, any protest or any qualifications. I have been around here long enough to know what will happen if this bill is allowed to be presented without any objection. A session or two or a parliament or two from now, some other government will want to introduce a bill replacing one that has been defeated, and Bill C-207 as substituted for Bill C-193 will be cited as a precedent. It will be said that it was done in March, 1968, so it can be done again. This kind of situation must be avoided, and that is why I raised this point of order.

I have tried in this presentation not to make things too difficult for you. I have tried also not to take a position to the effect that we cannot proceed with this legislation. I take the position, as do my colleagues, that we have no objection to the clauses that we opposed before being brought back again. On the other hand, we opposed the surtax previously and we are going to vote against it this time. We are not unwilling for the house to be asked to consider this surtax provision because of the fact it is reasonably different from the provisions of the previous bill, but we hope the house will vote against it, as it did on February 19.

This is the problem as I see it, Mr. Speaker, and I place it on your doorstep, conscious of the fact that you realize how important it is that our precedents be ones that will not make difficulty in the years that lie ahead.

Mr. Eldon Woolliams (Bow River): Speaking personally on this matter, Mr. Speaker, I join the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on his statement of the facts to you and the authorities he has mentioned. I should like to set out briefly the similarity between the railway bill and the one now before the house which imposes a surtax. Before doing so may I point out that the most important thing to keep in mind is that a question having once been moved and carried in the negative or affirmative cannot be revived again and must stand as a decision of the house. We have heard a lot about the waste of time in parliament, and that is one of the reasons for this rule. Once a decision has been made on an important matter the government cannot keep dragging it in and forcing parliament to make another decision upon it.

In order for the government to get around the problem so ably presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, Your Honour has to consider citation 163 which reads as follows:

> A mere alteration of the words of a question, without any substantial change in its object will not be sufficient to evade the rule that no question shall be offered which is substantially the same as one which has already been expressed in the current session.

My submission is that a surtax is a surtax and a change in the rate of the tax from 3 per cent to 5 per cent or from 2 per cent to 7 per cent would be a mere alteration which would not affect the rule that once a judgment has been made it has been made. I feel that Your Honour is going to have some difficulty, if you permit the house to proceed with this bill, in being able to distinguish the decision you make this afternoon from the one you made in connection with the railway bill. What was that decision? The former minister of transport, Mr. Pickersgill, introduced changes in the Railway Act concerning the Crowsnest Pass freight rates. This provision was defeated in committee and the next day he dragged in another amendment which changed the words "Crowsnest Pass freight rates" to statutory rates. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill), the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr.

Diefenbaker), and I objected on that occasion. The chairman ruled against us.

When Mr. Speaker resumed the chair he reviewed our arguments as well as the decision of the chairman. He found that the new amendment was substantially the same as the original amendment to the bill in question. Your Honour ruled, therefore, it was a matter that could not be decided again in the same session, so the amendment was ruled out of order. This government failed the first time to get a favourable judgment on a surtax of 5 per cent so they have now reduced it to 3 per cent. The reason this party voted against the surtax last time was not so much because of the amount of the tax but because we felt the government would not cut down its expenditures. We say this country does not need a surtax. If the government had kept its financial house in order it would not have needed a surtax. However, they are back again with the same question, a surtax. This is the fundamental part of the bill before us. It is the same horse being trotted out again before parliament. I do not believe that the government is on sound ground so far as this bill is concerned.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has carefully set out, and I am not going to review again, those sections of the bill which are identical and those that are not identical. The sections that are identical are the meat of the bill which we are going to discuss this afternoon, namely, the surtax. The surtax is needed because the government is in difficulty financially and it is in difficulty financially because it would not put its house in order. This is the position we have taken in the past and it is the position we are going to take now. It seems to me the government is asking that something be done again because it was unable to win a vote in the house on a previous occasion.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, when this matter was discussed at the resolution stage there was a preliminary objection to the presentation of the resolution. I was not present at that time. I should like to ask Your Honour, even at this late date, to examine the situation with regard to the question of notice for the taking up of that resolution. If memory serves me right, the two instances in which this particular general procedure was adopted occurred in 1957 and again in 1962 when I occupied the chair Your Honour now occupies. There was never any question of notice, so those occasions were not precedents and may not be germane. I share with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and my colleague, the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams), the grave concern for the precedent that may have been established on this particular occasion.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I am sure Your Honour has probably anticipated this point coming up and has canvassed the rules. However, I would refer Your Honour to page 126 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 148, which reads:

> It is a wholesome restraint upon members that they cannot revive a debate already concluded; and it would be little use in preventing the same question from being offered twice in the same session is, without being offered, its merits might be discussed again and again.

I ask Your Honour to try to anticipate the course that this debate will take and ask yourself this question: Will we be retracing our steps and reviving a discussion which took place on a previous occasion in this session with regard to the particular issue which is before the house?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to support the points of view that have been put forward by hon. member who have spoken. I think we are justified in showing concern with regard to the setting of precedents in the House of Commons. There are plenty of people who think they are unimportant, but the experience of the last few days has shown that they are vital to the operation of this institution. If it seems wise to Your Honour to rule that the present bill is acceptable and if the bill should subsequently be defeated on second or third reading, I suggest it would then be open to the government to bring in yet a third bill with a slight modification in the percentage rates sought for surtax purposes. This is the danger that I see. There could be a repetition of several bills in a session, each with slight variations to permit a government to extricate itself from some difficulty.

I consider that the arguments that have been presented cover the ground thoroughly and are an expression of the point of view that is held by many members in this house. I simply add, Mr. Speaker, that an opposition has only the protection of the Speaker and the rules in order that its position may not be downgraded to one which would make the opposition very inferior in the House of Commons.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin my comments on the point of order by referring to the nature of the motion to which this particular bill is now related but without making any comment about the constitutional aspect of the situation that developed on that Monday night.

It is quite clear, Mr. Speaker, that the motion which was then before the house and which is now mentioned as a possible barrier to our proceeding with this bill was the simple motion that the bill be now read a third time and do pass. I have examined the Canadian authorities, both Beauchesne and Bourinot. I have also examined the precedents of the house. I suggest that it was open to the government to make a motion to revive that particular bill at that time. The Minister of Justice in his statement made this argument, though the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre disagreed with it.

I think there is a very strong case to be made in support of the argument advanced by the Minister of Justice that the motion at that time was a simple motion and that the operative word in the motion was the word "now". It was open to the government to move that the bill be given third reading at a later time. This is a very important point, and there is quite a bit of evidence to be found in the authorities to support the argument made by the Minister of Justice.

In this particular instance, however, I do not intend to lay the weight of the procedural argument on this particular point because the essence of the argument of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is that the house has already taken a decision on this question and therefore it cannot be brought back again in the same session. In substance that is the basis of the problem before the Chair.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, I have examined some of the authorities. I have examined the bills and I have examined some precedents. First of all, I want to outline to the house the principal difference between Bill No. C-193 and the bill now before the house. The new bill proposes a different scheme of taxation. It should be apparent to hon. members that the surtax in the previous bill rested solely upon the individual taxpayer. There was no surtax payable by corporations. In this particular bill there is a new scheme of taxation because the incidence of taxation has been shifted partly from the individual income taxpayer and placed upon the corporations. Certainly this involves a very new element and is a new and substantial aspect of this bill.

The surtax on corporations and individuals proposed by the new bill differs from the previous surtax on individuals not only in the essential matter of the incidence—and the essential matter of the incidence is a shift, in part, from the personal income taxpayer to the corporate taxpayer—but also in its rate, its maximum and minimum amounts and its proposed duration. The surtax on individuals is proposed at a rate of 3 per cent compared with a surtax at a rate of 5 per cent. The proposed surtax on individuals is on basic tax in excess of $200 compared with a surtax in the former bill on basic tax in excess of $100. The proposed surtax will not apply to taxable income under $1,643; the surtax in the former bill would have started to become payable on taxable income in excess of $909. The proposed surtax on individuals will have no ceiling; the surtax in Bill No. C-193 would not have exceeded $600.

The proposed surtax on individuals will apply for the taxation years 1968 and 1969 only; the surtax proposed in Bill No. C-193 was intended to be temporary but was not restricted to specific years. A surtax of 3 per cent is proposed on corporations for 1968 and 1969; the former Bill No. C-193 did not provide for such a tax.

The resolution preceding the bill and the bill we are now considering which is based on that resolution propose that corporations be required to move forward by two months the period during which they pay their income tax for a year. But the payment schedule to be followed by corporations in changing to the new payment period differs from that proposed in Bill No. C-193. Instead of making ten payments for their first taxation year starting after November, 1967, each of which would be one-tenth of their estimated tax, corporations will be required to make five payments, each of which is equal to one-fifth of their estimated tax.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the bill and the resolution on which it is based propose that the 10 per cent of income limitation on the amount deductible as a charitable donation be removed with respect to donations to a province, thus bringing the deduction of such donations into line with that allowed for donations to the federal government. In addition, Mr. Speaker, it proposes that the present right to carry forward for one year any amount by which charitable donations in a year exceed the maximum deductible in that year be extended to apply to donations made to a province or to the federal government.

This provision was not in the former bill at all.

So it seems quite apparent, Mr. Speaker, that not only is there a different scheme of taxation proposed in the new bill, specifically and basically with reference to its incidence, but there is also a range of differences that are very important to the population of Canada, to corporations and to individuals. Therefore we can argue that these provisions are different.

As Beauchesne says in his fourth edition, there is no rule which restrains the presentation of two or more bills relating to the same subject and containing similar provisions. But if a decision of the house has already been taken on one such bill, for example, if the bill has been given or refused a second reading, then the other is not proceeded with if it contains substantially the same provisions. I am arguing that the provisions in the bill before us are not the same in substance as the provisions in the former bill because in the second bill a scheme of taxation entirely different in character is proposed.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to answer a question later. In the same citation Beauchesne says:

• (4:00 p.m.)

On consideration of the Profiteering Bill as amended, in session 1919, a member asked whether clause three of the bill was in order, as it was substantially a repetition of a bill which had been rejected on second reading; but the Speaker held that the house could revise a decision, provided that it was not asked to disagree with the same question.

That is paragraph 2 of citation 373, Beauchesne's fourth edition, page 273.

On looking at May's seventeenth edition one finds that Beauchesne used May as a source. At page 518 of the seventeenth edition May repeats the same rule:

There is no rule or custom which restrains the presentation of two or more bills relating to the same subject, and containing similar provisions—

On the following page there is another interesting paragraph. As Your Honour pointed out the other day, May's seventeenth edition is fairly recent, having been published in 1964. On page 519 the following paragraph is found:

Objection has also been taken to a bill on the broader ground that it raised a question which had been previously decided by the house in the course of proceedings on another bill of the same session.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

Then May goes on to say:

Such objection has rarely been found capable of being sustained.

Then he lists a number of cases. The last case is very clear. It deals with this subject:

When the latter bill contained a portion only of the earlier rejected bill—

I am arguing that there are differences in substance in the provisions of the two bills. I am also relying on this particular instance which May cites when he says on page 520:

When the later bill contained a portion only of the earlier rejected bill.—The Local Government Provisional Order...Bill, 1914, was allowed to proceed, although it contained one of the orders contained in the Local Government Provisional Orders ...Bill...which had been rejected in the session of 1914.

Here we have several new elements. Even if we brought forward the same bill and put in a new part one we would gain some support from this particular paragraph in May to argue that it was in order.

I want to refer to two precedents in the British house which are very much on point. I have not done the research that others have done on this matter but there is a case that May refers to in the British house on August 14, 1919. It is found on page 1718 of the British parliamentary debates. An amendment was proposed and one member of the house, Sir G. Younger, rose on a point of order. He said:

Before this amendment is moved may I ask whether clause 3 as it stands is not really a repetition of the Municipal Authorities Enabling Bill which was rejected in this house on second reading, enabling authorities by order of the Board of Trade to establish businesses and does the clause not put into this bill what was actually refused a second reading by this house at the beginning of the session?

The Speaker ruled as follows:

It is sometimes found that second thoughts are best.

I am sure the Minister of Finance may find food for thought in that comment. Mr. Speaker went on to say:

It is open to the house to revise its decision provided that it is not asked to agree to or disagree with identically—

I emphasize "with identically".

—the same question. That is not the case here.

Mr. Lambert: Rewriting a paragraph and inserting new commas does not change something from being identical with something else.

Mr. MacEachen: As Mr. Speaker said then, if he were asked to give an opinion on identically the same question the matter would then be out of order. That, clearly, is in his ruling.

There is another case in the British house. I will not read it all but it is to be found on August 3, 1920. At page 2206 of the British proceedings Mr. Palmer, rising on a point of order with regard to an amendment to a motion then before the house, said in part:

> My point is this, that this house, having come to the decision early in the year to enact these regulations only until 31st August, or peacetime, whichever came the sooner, this house is not competent to act on that decision, and by a bill of this kind to extend the regulations with regard to shops for another 18 months; that it is a rule of this house that the house having come to a decision, cannot reverse, alter or override that decision within the same session.

That is the point the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre put to the Chair. The Speaker on that occasion said:

> I do not think that can be strictly applied in a case of this sort, for, even assuming the house had in its mind that these regulations in the first instance should continue only until 31st December, it was quite open to the house to reconsider the matter, and to extend that period. It might have done it by an amending bill in the same session. There is nothing to prevent that.

Another member who was then present, Major Nall, said:

> May I ask whether it is, in that case, competent for this house actually to reverse in the same session, a decision arrived at in the early part of the session?

The Speaker gave his decision and said:

> The house must not be asked to consider the proposition in exactly the same terms;—

Those are the words he used, "exactly the same terms."

> —that is to say, I ought not, if I observed it, to put identically the same question twice. The house having come to a decision, I ought not to put identically the same question—

Again we see the words "identically the same question".

> —again to the House, so that the House could have an opportunity of reversing its decision. In this case, there is no question which I have put from the chair which could be regarded as identically the same as that upon which the house has already pronounced.

I suggest to Your Honour that this question, if it is put, will not be identically the same as the previous question. I have indicated that there is a difference in the scheme of taxation and in the incidence of taxation. The burden of taxation is being shifted in part from the individual taxpayer to the corporation. There are differences in ceilings, in floors and in rates as well as in other aspects. My argument, based on the precedents I have just cited, is that in proposing this particular bill the government is, of course, proposing a bill which is related to the same subject and which contains similar provisions. Of course that is so, because both bills relate to taxes and surtax. But there is no rule against that. I have cited the authorities. A bar would be raised against the government in proceeding with this bill if the house, when the Chair put the question, were asked to decide on exactly the same question or on identically the same proposition. That is what British Speakers have held.

Mr. Baldwin: How do you regard a surtax of 4.99 per cent?

Mr. MacEachen: I have put forward my points after considering the authorities. I am not resting the case on the nature of the question which was defeated. I am resting my case on the simple argument that the house, when the Chair puts this question, will not be asked to deal with identically the same question that was contained in Bill C-193.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister permit a question or two? First, may I ask him if he will address himself to the fact to which I drew the attention of the house, namely, that there are four clauses in the new bill which are identical with four clauses in the previous bill? He knows that I admitted there are differences in the surtax, and I outlined them as well as he did, but will he deal with the fact that there are four clauses in the new bill which are identical with four clauses in the old bill? Will he also address himself to this fact? He gives citations and says it is possible to bring forward part of a former bill that has been defeated, but would he recognize that this new bill does not leave out anything that was in the former bill?

An hon. Member: Address the Speaker.

Mr. Knowles: I am addressing the Speaker but I am putting a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare and I would like his undivided attention. I enjoy it better that way.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: Will he face the fact that what is proposed in this bill is not to bring forward parts of what was in the former bill?

It is all here, everything that was in the former bill. There is not a clause that is missing. Some of it has been changed, but this is not just partially the old bill. It is all of it, and a couple of new things have been added.

Just one other question, Mr. Speaker. When the minister cites Speakers' rulings from Westminster will he face the fact that our Speaker on January 26, 1967, ruled it was not only identity that mattered but also similarity and the necessity not to infringe on the rule that the house must not be asked to do something that is inconsistent with a former decision?

I submit that what we are being asked for in this bill is to re-enact the whole of Bill C-193, with a couple of changes and additions, and we are being asked to make a decision which clearly in four cases, and almost so in other cases, is inconsistent with the decision we took on February 19.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief. The question has been dealt with at length by members more learned in the rules of the house than I but I would like to point out the difficult position that you are in and I would like to refresh your memory on a ruling that you made on January 26, 1967.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would advise the hon. member of the rule against repetition. This has already been brought to my attention.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I will endeavour not to be as repetitious as perhaps you think I may be. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) has stated that he thinks this bill is not identical with the previous one and therefore should be accepted, but I would like to point out what Your Honour said on January 26 last year, as recorded on page 12270 of Hansard:

> The minister this afternoon showed that in the one case there is a mandatory review, and in the other case what he calls a facultative review. In the one case there is a one-shot review; in the other a continuing review. These, I admit, are substantial changes—

Those are your words.

> —and I might even be prepared to admit that the objectives of the original clause and of this amendment may differ. But from my limited understanding it seems that the adoption of the amendment would reinstate in part—

This is the important point.

> —a clause which has already been rejected in its entirety by the committee.
> [Mr. Knowles.]

You then went on to reject the amendment offered by the minister of transport of that day, saying that it proposed to reinstate a clause which had already been rejected. In that case you referred to substantial changes and to differences between the objectives of the original clause and the amendment. In this case we have not got a substantial difference. We have not got an objective that is different. Some four clauses are going to be reinstated and in fact the entire old bill is included in new Bill C-207. I cannot see Your Honour ruling in any other way than you did on that occasion and saying anything else but that this bill is out of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the remarks of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) about the point of order now being discussed.

At the outset of his remarks, the minister seemed to suggest that the motion before the house on Monday, February 19 last was that the bill be now read for the third time. But he forgot to add that when the Speaker calls for the question, he also asks us that the bill be now read the third time and passed. The minister did not add the words: "Agreed to and passed".

Now, what was the answer of the house? It was of the opinion that the bill be not now agreed to. It was not merely a matter of saying "now". The opposition did not introduce any amendment to say in six or eight months. The opposition simply voted against the bill, and rejected it.

In addition, the Minister of National Health and Welfare feels that there are some differences between Bill No. C-207 and the former Bill No. C-193. He says: Bill No. C-207 does not only apply to individuals, like the former bill, but also to corporations. Now, that part concerning individuals, namely the surtax on personal income tax was defeated with Bill No. C-193.

If the Minister of National Health and Welfare maintained that the new bill only applied to corporation income tax, then it would be different. But he adds corporations only to be in a position to include the 3 per cent on personal income tax. It only means that he adds, in the same sentence, part of what has already been rejected in Bill No. C-193, and other things, so that what has already been rejected can be agreed to.

If the minister wishes to introduce a bill affecting only the profits of corporations, it is all right. But by adding "on the income of individuals", he adds something that has been rejected.

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Health and Welfare finds a second difference. The new bill says 3 per cent instead of 5 per cent. Under such conditions, we could proceed ad absurdum. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) could just as well propose 4.9 per cent, and that would have been different as an expression. Why 3 per cent instead of 4½ per cent? Why 3 per cent instead of 4 per cent? One has merely to change the figures.

So, if the new bill is defeated, the Minister of Finance can try again by suggesting a temporary surtax of 2, 4 or 5½ per cent. The object of the vote would still be a temporary surtax, but with a different rate. By so doing, we could vote during the same session or even two years in a row, on temporary surtaxes of 2, 2¼, 2½, 2¾, 2⅞, and 3⅛ per cent, and it would always be the same bill. The government would only have to say: This is not a confidence vote, and it could try again until the opposition was exhausted and the rate had reached 11 97/98 per cent. Then, Mr. Speaker, this would become quite repetitive.

The third difference mentioned by the Minister of National Health and Welfare is that this temporary surtax would apply to any taxable income exceeding $200 instead of $100.

There again, Mr. Speaker, I claim the bill is no different in its presentation. Instead of $100, the minister could have specified $101, $102, $105, $109.10, and so on, ad absurdum.

Moreover, it may be related that a precedent was set by the house in 1962, following a ruling of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) who, at the time, was Speaker. A Liberal member had proposed an amendment to the effect that third reading of the bill be given a six-month hoist. As I strongly opposed the principle of the bill and thought that six months was not long enough, I proposed a subamendment to postpone the third reading of the bill not for six months but twenty years. At that time, the Speaker had stated that the question to be decided was not by how long the third reading should be postponed, but whether or not it should be postponed, and that postponing it by six months, eight months, ten years or twenty years was not the crux of the problem; it was a matter of determining whether the bill should be read for the third time, or whether third reading should be postponed to a later date. The amendment mentioned six months and my subamendment said twenty years. It was then declared that my subamendment was not in order, because the main purpose of the amendment was to postpone the third reading for six months.

The same thing happens here: whether it is 3 per cent instead of 5 per cent, or $200 instead of $100, this does not constitute a difference or a change in the principle.

The hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare suggested a fourth difference to the effect that the first bill mentioned a temporary surtax without specifying when it would end while the new bill states that it will stop inevitably in two years. What was not specified in the previous bill is now spelled out by the Minister of Finance in Bill No. C-207. Under the previous bill, we knew that the temporary surtax would be levied for a period of two years but it was not specified, while it is specified in the new bill.

Therefore, I contend that there is no difference between Bill No. C-207 and Bill No. C-193 as to the substance. There is simply a difference in the figures. If we accept the idea that a simple difference in the figures constitutes a difference in the nature or in the substance, then, Mr. Speaker, we let ourselves open to repetitive amendments because, in the future, it will be possible to present amendments to postpone the consideration of a bill for six months, seven months, eight months and nine months and two days.

The hon. Minister of Finance does not propose any basic difference. Both bills are similar in all respects. The minister has sweetened the pill a little but the vitamins are still there. Honey has been added to the cod liver oil or castor oil but the people will still have to swallow the same medicine. It is the same sweetening, but when you swallow the pill, the result remains the same.

Mr. Valade: It is arsenic.

Mr. Grégoire: For those reasons, Mr. Speaker, I contend that the bill is the same as the one which has already been presented.

Those are the remarks which I wanted to make, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Ian Wahn (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I shall not prolong this discussion unduly because I think we all agree that the basic principle involved is simple although its application may be difficult. The basic principle surely is this: Is the question raised by the new bill essentially the same as that raised by the old bill? I doubt very much that an exact precedent can be found. I think this is a question which has to be decided upon the basis of common sense. One of the questions raised is whether a 5 per cent surcharge on personal income tax is essentially the same as a 3 per cent surcharge on personal income tax. If my recollection is correct, the 5 per cent surtax would have raised approximately $185 million and the 3 per cent surtax will raise about $105 million, a difference of $80 million. How can hon. members opposite say that $80 million represent a meaningless difference unless they are prepared to say "what is $80 million"? I do not think they would wish to take that attitude.

To get down to figures which we can perhaps understand more easily, suppose I am offered $50,000 for my home. This raises a question, should I sell? But if someone else offers me $30,000 for the same home, it seems to me it becomes a very different question. It is clear to me that on common sense grounds, apart from other circumstances, a 5 per cent surtax on personal income tax is very different from a 3 per cent surtax on personal income tax.

Other differences have been referred to. There is the fact that to make up in part for the revenue lost by the reduction in the surtax on personal income tax the surtax is now to apply to corporations. There is the fact that no limitation is now placed on the maximum tax—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder whether we are making much progress by having these figures quoted. They were quoted in detail by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and I have heard them a few times now.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Just a few words, Mr. Speaker, because I think as you do that we have been discussing for several minutes whether or not Bill No. C-207 is a repetition of Bill No. C-193.

Now, I believe that citation 148 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, 4th edition, quoted earlier, can be applied here:

> It is a wholesome restraint upon members that they cannot revive a debate already concluded; and it would be little use in preventing the same question from being offered twice in the same session—

Government members maintain that Bill No. C-207 is different from Bill No. C-193 but the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) maintains the opposite. The fact is that the principle of Bill No. C-207 remains the same as that of Bill No. C-193. What we discussed on February 19 and on preceding days concerned a surtax proposed in Bill No. C-193, and we will again be discussing a surtax. Whether that tax is 2, 3, 5, or 10 per cent, the basic principle remains the same.

Now, we are asked to discuss again the surtax that I regard as poison because, in the present circumstances, this is really a poison, and whether it is administered in small or in large doses, it still remains a poison.

I believe we are going to repeat the speeches we had the opportunity to deliver while considering Bill No. C-193. We will resort to the same arguments and maintain the same positions, because we are definitely against a surtax at this time. I say the government is acting hypocritically in introducing Bill No. C-207, because it had promised that Bill No. C-193 would be dead and gone and would not be reintroduced in this house. Now, they are introducing just about the same bill, with a few changes in the details of Bill No. C-193. The surtax rate is 3 per cent and the corporations are also taxed, but the principle of the bill is exactly the same from beginning to end, from A to Z, and we shall oppose it. Mr. Speaker, we humbly submit to you that this bill is but a repetition of the other one.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I believe I should mention to hon. members that I do not propose to give a decision immediately. I should like to have at least a few minutes in which to study the interesting arguments put forward by those who have taken part in this debate.

However, I should like to refer specifically now to one question which has already been decided and to which reference was made by the hon. member for Edmonton West, that is, the question of notice which was raised originally by the hon. member for Lapointe. The substance of the ruling I made at the time, a ruling which I still think is in order, was that our procedure in regard to a resolution in ways and means is distinctive; no notice is required for the very reason that such resolutions are introduced in committee of ways and means. The resolution does not exist until it is introduced in committee of ways and means which is set up not by notice but at the beginning of each session. No motion is required for the Speaker to leave the chair and the house to go into committee of ways and means to consider something about which the house may have no notice at all. I am assured by the clerks that there is not one single precedent in the whole history of this parliament of a ways and means resolution having been placed on the order paper by way of formal notice. It is only appended to the notice paper. There must be a reason that this type of resolution is not given the usual type of notice provided for by standing order No. 41. The reason is that such resolutions are initiated in ways and means.

Perhaps I should have mentioned the other day that there is an apparent discrepancy between the procedure which has always been followed and standing order 41. It may well be that our rules should be amended in some way relative to supply and ways and means procedure or that we should change the procedure which has been followed in the past. Certainly there seems to be something basically wrong with the principle that a resolution can be brought in without notice at all in the committee of ways and means, by virtue of a long-standing practice of the House of Commons. Some hon. members may wish that I submit this matter to the committee on procedure. In fact, I propose to submit it to the chairman of the committee and ask him to review the situation which was raised at the time. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said that it was a grey area. I admit that it is at least grey and I would ask him, along with his colleagues on the committee, to review the situation.

Returning to the perhaps more important question raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and other hon. members and having considered the point of order, the house might allow me a few moments to review the argument, to look over the blues and study the precedents quoted by all hon. members. I am sure I will be in a position in the latter part of this afternoon to give a decision. If the government house leader is in agreement I would suggest that he might call another order to allow the Speaker to leave the chair.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, your suggestion can be carried out by the house going into the committee of supply and continuing with the supplementary estimates of the Department of Finance.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Tardif in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Administration—

4c. Grant to the endowment fund of the Vanier Institute of the Family—L'institut Vanier de la famille, $236,869.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. House again in committee of supply, supplementary estimates (C) 1967-68, Department of Finance, vote 4c.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, before we proceed with the estimates of the Department of Finance, a suggestion has been made widely on this side of the house which I am happy to voice. The suggestion is that we take up the supplementary items of the Department of Veterans Affairs. I am sure we can pass these quickly and give the veterans the assurance that their disability pensions will be increased.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, we are prepared to pass the estimates of the Department of Finance and then we might proceed with the Department of Veterans Affairs. I believe this would satisfy everybody.

Item agreed to.

Municipal Development and Loan Board—

46c. Further amount required in the current and subsequent fiscal years for the purposes of Finance Votes 50b of Appropriation Act No. 2, 1966, and 50e of Appropriation Act No. 4, 1966, respecting the forgiveness of 25% of the amounts of the loans made to municipalities under the Municipal Development and Loan Act, $17,000,000.

Item agreed to.

INSURANCE

1c. Departmental administration, $11,300.

Item agreed to.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, if it is acceptable to the Chair we might now call the Department of Veterans Affairs.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

Administration—

1c. Departmental Administration—To extend the purposes of Veterans Affairs Vote 1 of the Main Estimates for 1967-68 to include the recoverable expenditures and the payment detailed in these Estimates, $1.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs, administration, Vote 1c.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister would be prepared to make a statement concerning the intentions of the government in respect of veterans pensions so that it will be on the record at this time.

Mr. Teillet: Mr. Chairman, I think I did that at the time I made tthe announcement. The intention of the government is to increase the pensions 15 per cent across the board effective January 1, 1968. I appreciate the co-operation of members in dealing with these estimates today. We will be able to get the cheques out by the end of the month.

Mr. Keays: Mr. Chairman, could the minister inform us what he intends to do with regard to war veterans allowances?

Mr. Teillet: Mr. Chairman, I also answered that question some time ago. We have considered it and there is no intention to proceed with it at the moment in view of the adjustment which was made previously.

Mr. Fane: Mr. Chairman, I am very glad that we are dealing with the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs this afternoon. The veterans of this country have waited a long time for the 15 per cent increase that was promised them by the minister last fall. It certainly is high time this matter was brought before the house. It is too bad that the Woods report on veterans affairs has not been presented. The minister says this is because of the difficulties in translation from one language to the other. I wonder, however, whether that really is the situation. I wonder whether Mr. Justice Woods may perhaps have said something in that report that the government does not like and is afraid to bring before the house.

Mr. Teillet: Mr. Chairman, I do not like to interrupt the hon. gentleman but I think he would want to be fair. No member of the government, including myself, has seen the report. We do not know what is in it.

Mr. Fane: Thank you, Mr. Minister. Mr. Chairman, I was under the impression that the Woods report had been presented to the minister and that he was in possession of it. I apologize to him for having made a statement which I apparently made out of turn.

The veterans have waited a very long time and feel that this government throughout its whole life has not given them proper consideration. Their pensions have been graded according to the lowest category of civil servant. They have not received increases comparable with the increases granted to civil servants. Therefore their pensions perhaps should be again reviewed so that they might be brought more in line with the wages and salaries of the same class of civil servants.

It is unfortunate that veterans pensions are tied to the lowest paid class of civil servants, because our veterans are Canadian citizens who volunteered for the armed services that were brought into being when necessity faced our nation. Not all the people who enlisted were in that low category of civil servant. Some very able men served in the ranks as private soldiers. I have spoken about two of the men who served with me. They were both killed beside me. One was a very noted lawyer—he was a private soldier—and the other was a minister of the Presbyterian church. They were both university graduates and could certainly not be considered as those in the lowest paid class of the civil service. I am not saying anything against the lower categories of civil servants, but I believe that veterans are entitled to more consideration than being tied, so far as their pensions are concerned, to the lowest paid class of civil servant in the government of Canada.

I do not want to belabour the point, Mr. Chairman, and take up too much time because I know other hon. members wish to speak on these estimates. I think it is a very good thing that we have an opportunity to discuss the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs this afternoon, and the sooner this item is passed the sooner our veterans will receive the increases in their pensions.

Mr. Chatterton: Mr. Chairman, we are naturally very glad that the government found it possible to bring forward these estimates at this time. I assure hon. members that there will be no delay so far as our party is concerned. I would ask the minister to give us the assurance that the increases in veterans pensions will go out in the March cheques.

There is one point, and only one, that I wish to make. It is with regard to directives that have gone out to Veterans Land Act offices across the country respecting restrictions on loans to veterans who apply for establishment under the Veterans Land Act. According to the directives that have gone out, starting April 1 this year a veteran will not be able to receive a loan under the Veterans Land Act if his income is more than $7,000 or, in the case of the Atlantic provinces and Newfoundland, if his income is more than $6,000. This restriction does not apply in cases where a new house is to be built. I must confess right off the bat that I do not know the details of these instructions.

I wish to sidetrack for a moment, Mr. Chairman, to indicate the position at which we have arrived in Canada with respect to directives which are not confidential. Administrative directives go out to several hundred members of the civil service, even to the lowest of the low clerks in the civil service. But when a member of parliament asks for a copy of such a directive the minister himself refuses to give him a copy. There must be a rethinking on the part of the government of Canada with regard to its attitude toward members of parliament.

I can, as a veteran, go into a Veterans Land Act office and obtain a great deal more information by asking questions than I can by writing to the minister. The minister ordered his top civil servants to send me a summary of these directives. I have obtained ten times as much information from inquiring at Veterans Land Act offices than the minister gave me in a letter. This is a different subject, Mr. Chairman, but it is something that requires the attention of governments in the future. We have arrived at a deplorable situation when members of parliament cannot get information to which every civil servant has access.

Coming back to the restrictions on Veterans Land Act applicants in the future, it is true that this policy is supposed to apply for one year only. I maintain that we can be sure of that only if the present government is not in office at the end of that year. I recognize that behind this directive, this policy decision of the government, is the saving of money, but there are certain places where it is not possible, reasonable or feasible to save money. Veterans legislation such as the Veterans Land Act was passed by parliament as a reward for service. It was not social welfare legislation. It was never intended that there would be a means test to ascertain whether a person should receive benefits under the Veterans Land Act for university training or re-establishment. Whether a veteran was to receive these benefits was not dependent on the amount of income he earned. These benefits were provided as a reward for service.

Beginning on April 1 of this year we could have a most anomalous position. Let us say that veteran A has five children, had meritorious service, receive a disability pension of 100 per cent and has not been able up to now to save enough money for a down payment on a house under the Veterans Land Act. When he goes to the Veterans Land Act office he will be rejected if he resides in the Atlantic provinces or Newfoundland and his income is $6,001. If the veteran is from elsewhere in Canada his application will be rejected if his income is $7,001.

Mr. Teillet: Be fair, now.

Mr. Chatterton: But another veteran who has no children will probably be able to receive a loan because his income is less than the minimum set by the government. I should like the minister to tell us later what will happen when such an applicant applies. Will the minister use his discretion? Why were these directives issued saying that in the circumstances I have outlined a loan cannot be made?

There is another class of veteran who could be badly hit. I refer to those now in the armed forces. As hon. members know, members of the armed forces can receive a loan under the Veterans Land Act only if they are on their last posting and they can get a letter to certify that they are on their last posting. However, it is very difficult to get such a letter. The result is that many veterans who stayed in the armed forces and have not hitherto been able to qualify for a loan under the Veterans Land Act will in the ensuing year beginning April 1 not be able to get such a loan.

I have not been able to find out what other exceptions there are. I realize that where the loan is for a new house the veteran will be able to get it. However, I have not been able to find out exactly what will be the situation with regard to full-time farmers. I understand that under the Veterans Land Act those full-time farmers who apply for a loan in order to remove an encumbrance will be refused. I maintain that this is an extremely wrong principle to adopt in the case of legislation which was intended as a reward for service. It was certainly never the intention of parliament when the Veterans Land Act and other veterans legislation was passed that there should be any kind of a means test with respect to the reward to be given for service. I hope that before we pass these estimates the minister will answer some of the questions I raised or refute them if the information I have obtained about these directives is incorrect.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Groos: Mr. Chairman, I was very pleased that the last speaker, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, brought up the point about the position of the present members of the armed forces with respect to establishing their claims for loans under the Veterans Land Act without having received a firm notice that they are on their last posting. I would be very interested to hear the minister's reply on this point.

I want to bring out once again, even more forcibly than I brought it up before if that is possible, the matter of domiciliary care for veterans, particularly the older veterans. If I may refresh the memories of some hon. members on this point, may I point out that I am not talking about complete medical care but rather about care for older soldiers who do not require full hospital and medical care but do require some medical supervision and some place to go where there is someone to look after them.

I realize this is a provincial matter, but I do not think we can shrug off our federal responsibility with respect to these men and women, and shortly there will be an increasing number of women as those women who served in the armed forces in the second world war become in need of this type of care. We cannot shrug off our federal responsibility in this regard. These people have served their country in time of need, and I am quite positive that the country would hate to see them out on the streets, so to speak, with no one to look after them. Therefore I think it is up to the Department of Veterans Affairs to take up this challenge and deal with it.

However, I wish to go on record as saying that I realize how humane the Department of Veterans Affairs has been so far in their dealings with cases of this sort. I realize how they have bent the regulations as far as possible to provide the kind of assistance which these people need. But I think we have reached the point now where, with the provinces unable to cope with this situation and regardless of how many pensions we give, the total amount of money is not sufficient to provide an old veteran with the type of facilities he needs in his old age.

I would like to hear from the minister exactly what the government is prepared to do about this matter. I will not expect him to have the answers at his fingetrips right now, but I wish to serve notice on him that the next time his estimates come before the house I will want to hear some firm government policy from his lips. The time has passed when we can afford to make do with the facilities provided up to now by the Department of Veterans Affairs, and if we are going to be honest about this we must realize that we will have to provide what is required in the absence of the necessary provisions being made by the provincial governments. I should like to reiterate that I realize how far the department officials have bent the regulations to meet the need, but more facilities must be provided for the ever-increasing need.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, as usual I shall be quite brief. I do not intend to take the time of the house to deal with the administration of the department because that is being done very thoroughly by the members of the standing committee on veterans affairs. The officials in the various branches of the department come before the committee and explain to its members how the department operates in various provinces and various sections of Canada. However, I do wish to say that having been a member of the standing committee on veterans affairs since 1945 I know the officials of the department have set a standard of excellence in their human approach to the problems that veterans and their dependents face which could be copied to an even greater extent by some officials in other departments.

I rise at this time to say in particular that I am delighted that these estimates provide for $7,800,000 to pay for the 15 per cent increase in disability pensions. This increase was welcomed by all the veterans organizations, which I understand wrote the minister on this account, and it was certainly welcomed by the veterans and their dependants. As a matter of fact, some veterans discussed this matter with me recently and told me how fortunate they thought it was that they got the 15 per cent increase before the economy moves were undertaken. At one time they were very worried. The increase applies as of January 1. It will take some time for these pensions to be recalculated and they will receive the 15 per cent increase for the first three months with their April cheques. I am very glad the house has agreed to go ahead with these estimates at this time to make this possible because I know a great deal of work is involved in preparing the cheques and sending them out to the veterans concerned and to their dependants.

I received many representations with respect to this matter and I have no hesitation in saying that the veterans and their dependants were very worried about the possibility of an early dissolution of parliament as the result of the confidence motion. I am pleased that we are considering these estimates now in time for the office work to be done so that the veterans will have no further reason to worry.

There is another matter which I am sure will come before the standing committee on veterans affairs when it meets, I presume, after the Woods report is tabled in both languages. I am referring to the new formula which I expect the departmental committee has devised and will bring before the committee so that in future disability pensions will be based on a sound foundation. I remember quite well that when the first act was drawn up the basic pension was based on the wages of a casual labourer or someone working in maintenance work in the House of Commons. There is no relationship today between the scale of pensions and the original intention when the act was established. I trust that the minister's committee will recommend something to correct that injustice.

I have a word or two to say about war veterans allowances. It is late in this session, but I expect that when the standing committee on veterans affairs meets to study the recommendations of the Woods report with respect to the administration of the Canadian pension commission the commission will also make representations before the committee with regard to certain changes they think are desirable in war veterans allowances. I will not say any more about this matter at this time because I would like to hear the representations from veterans organizations.

I would like to say that the veterans organizations seem to be very responsible since they have had an opportunity to make representations to the government. I remember a different set of circumstances which prevailed in the United States where in some cases such organizations asked for government action which could not be justified by the circumstances at the time. But I do want to pay a tribute to all veterans organizations in this country for their responsible approach to these problems, having in mind that these pensions have to be paid for from the consolidated revenue fund and having in mind the needs of the veterans and their dependants whom they represent.

Before resuming my seat I want to bring one or two other matters to the attention of the minister. I want to thank the minister for his willingness to have officials of the Veterans Land Act administration go into the Arrow lakes and other areas affected by the Columbia treaty project. He will be interested to know that one of his officials went to Kelowna not so long ago to deal with a problem of a veteran. He was very concerned about it. Later the veteran was pleased with the result of this man's visit. He was satisfied because he got other land to compensate him for the land that was to be flooded. Other arrangements were also made, as a result of support from one of the minister's officials, and the veteran appreciates this.

This department is reaching its closing phase so I ask the minister to urge his officials to go into that area again to clean up the few odd cases that remain. I should like to deal particularly with a veteran who is not a settler under the Veterans Land Act. He is an old veteran with whom I served in the first world war. I am informed that the B.C. Hydro and power authority is going to expropriate his property. His wife is a rather vigorous lady so they will have quite a time in getting that veteran and his wife off the property if they send in the police.

The man in question is very ill so his wife has had to carry on the battle in his name. She has done an excellent job. They have a very good farm in the Arrow lakes district some six or seven miles from Nakusp. I trust that the minister will get one of his officials to go there and have a chat with this man to see if the parties cannot be brought together in order that this project will not be marred by some unfortunate incident. It is unfortunate for the veteran concerned because he has a very fine property. I thank the minister for doing this on one or two other occasions for men who had not settled under the Veterans Land Act. I know of one or two instances in which, as a result of a visit from a Veterans Land Act official, the veteran got a few thousand dollars more from B.C. Hydro and agreed that the compensation was fair.

One other matter about which I receive some complaint concerns veterans who have to have dentures or dental treatment. They are required to go to Shaughnessy for this work. In view of the ages of some of these men I hope that arrangements can be made for a local dentist to do this work for them so they will not be caused this unnecessary inconvenience. I note I have the support of the hon. member for Cariboo in this connection.

The other point I wish to make concerns prescriptions. There are a few veterans who require drugs repeatedly. Under the present arrangments they are required to send periodically to Shaughnessy for a new order of these drugs. Some of these men are reaching an age where they are not really capable of writing letters of that sort. I ask the minister to look into that problem to see if the officials at Shaughnessy could not give authority to some local doctor or druggist to provide the drugs required by these veterans. In some cases they find it very difficult to comply with this regulation.

These are my remarks at the present time. I know there are others who want to speak and I hope these estimates will be completed by six o'clock so these veterans will have their fears removed.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the minister a question or two about the Woods report. My understanding is that the board of inquiry, or whatever they call themselves, completed their hearings around June 15 last year. Then, of course, the board reviewed the evidence in order to write its report. My understanding is that the report was completed in October and has been awaiting translation for months. On February 8, as recorded on page 6501 of Hansard, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich asked the minister a question with regard to whether the Woods report had been translated. The minister replied as follows:

> No, Mr. Speaker. I have no information other than what I gave the house last week. I will make inquiries, but I understand that it should be in my hands by the middle of this month.

That would be the middle of February, which is some time ago now. Then the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich asked a supplementary question:

> In view of the fact that it has already taken four months to complete the translation, will the minister now in any event study the report in English so that a decision may be expedited?

So many things have gone wrong with the present administration that I am not surprised that the translation of the Woods repor has been delayed. However, it seems to me the minister has not shown much initiative in pressing for the translation of that report. Why are the veterans placed at the bottom of the list with regard to the translation of reports? So far as veterans are concerned the investigation by the Woods committee with regard to the Pension Act was considered and is still considered to be of vital importance. It has been delayed for years. The committee, I believe, was quite competent to review the matter, so why this endless delay? The minister says, I have not received the report. Who has the report? Where is it in this great conglomeration of government administration? To whom was the report made? Was it made to the minister or the Prime Minister? In whose hands is that report and why can it not be translated? This is a clear case of discrimination against the veterans of this country.

It seems to me that one of the priority tasks last fall should have been the translation of that report and tabling it in the house as well as referring it to the standing committee on veterans affairs. The time to work on it would have been during the course of the winter. As I see it now, we are not going to have this report in our hands before the session comes to an end. When the next session starts there will be delays. The minister will say if he is then the minister, and I express the hope that he may be transferred to another department, that he has not received the report or it has not been translated. A whole year will have gone by before the disability pensioners of this country have any idea whether or not justice is going to be done to them at long last.

The hon. member for Kootenay West mentioned once again that the basic pension of the disability pensioners should be adjusted. It bears no relationship to conditions and has no relationship to the sacrifice that has been made by these men. We have been looking to the Woods report to present a solution to this problem.

I conclude by remarks, Mr. Chairman, by asking the minister to give us an explanation as to why he cannot get action on the simple matter of the translation of this report. We have had all sorts of other things translated and reports filed but, oh no, if it is a veterans affairs matter it is at the bottom of the list. I hold the minister responsible for this shabby neglect of the disability pensioners of this country.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, my remarks will be brief. First of all I want to echo the strong sentiments of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and also to point out that in my constituency, and I am sure in all others across Canada, there are invariably veterans who feel that the burden of proof imposed upon them by the Canadian Pension Commission is unjust. We have all had the idea that in cases of doubt the issue should be resolved in favour of the veterans; yet I know of several instances in my own area—and I am sure other hon. members have had the same experience—where veterans feel that the burden of proof is resolved against them unless they can clearly establish their case.

I understand that the purport of the legislation was not to throw that stringent a burden upon a veteran who may have some complaint or disability which he finds virtually impossible to link up with service rendered to Canada years ago. I further understand that the Woods report will deal with this point, which I think makes it all the more necessary that the minister see to it that those responsible for translating the report place it before us as soon as possible. If it is only the translation that is holding up the report, then I think this is one of the biggest arguments that can be raised against bilingualism. Whether a report be in one language or the other, surely the important thing is to have it before us so that some action can be taken to clear up long-standing abuses. Certainly I hope this action will be taken.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I see the Minister of Veterans Affairs is busily taking notes, presumably in order to reply to the questions being raised in the committee. There are two matters upon which I should like some clarification from the minister. First, what, if anything, can he do to assist people on war veterans allowance who for some time have been experiencing a nightmare? I admit that the nightmare was not created directly by the minister but rather by his colleague, the minister of National Health and Welfare, who brought in the supplementary benefit for recipients of the old age security pension. As the minister knows, that department invited people to apply for the supplementary benefit. A great many people on war veterans allowance accepted that invitation in good faith but as a result found themselves in what I have described as a nightmarish situation in that they would have received more than the allowable income permitted under war veterans allowance.

I have not had the experience on the veterans affairs committee of my colleague from Kootenay West, but I do try to follow the statements made by the minister in the house from time to time. One of the matters that I feel the minister has still not explained to the satisfaction of myself and certainly to the satisfaction of some people on war veterans allowance is how the increase resulting from the cost of living index provision can be allowed to war veterans allowance recipients without exceeding the ceiling on income but the supplementary benefit itself cannot be allowed. How is somebody on war veterans allowance going to sort out all the permutations that can arise in this situation?

For example, a person on old age security receives the $1.50 or 2 per cent increase. If he has applied for and is receiving the supplementary benefit he gets the extra 60 cents a month. On the other hand, if he decides, as an increasing number of recipients of war veterans allowance have, not to reapply after one year's receipt of the old age supplementary benefit, then I understand he is not entitled to the 60 cents a month cost of living bonus, which to say the least is a fairly modest amount. Nevertheless people with the kind of income ceiling that such recipients of war veterans allowance have are called upon to take into account relatively small amounts of money.

How can the minister justify the equity of a system—I realize that this matter does not come wholly within the purview of his department—whereby certain people on war veterans allowance receive the cost of living bonus while others are unable to do so, depending on whether they decide to apply for the supplementary benefit? Without going into this question extensively, because the matter has been debated in the house, could the minister explain with a greater degree of clarity than he has hitherto why it is that there is a ruling that war veterans allowance recipients cannot be allowed to receive the old age income supplement if they are also old age security pensioners unless it is included in their income for purposes of the ceiling?

There is one other question I want to raise with the minister. I grant that this may be a temporary situation but it is one that arises in connection with war veterans allowance recipients who are receiving a disability pension from the United Kingdom. If my understanding is correct there was an increase in the disability pension rate in the United Kingdom just prior to the recent devaluation of the pound. As a result people in Canada in receipt of this pension expected to get the increase. However, when they cashed their cheques they found they got less than before. If I understand the situation correctly, the decision of the war veterans allowance board was that for war veterans allowance income purposes the British pound would be valued at its pre-devaluation level, with the result that for a one month period recipients of war veterans allowance in Canada actually received less in Canadian dollars than they would have had the British pound not been devalued and the disability pensions not raised.

This kind of action is pretty niggardly, to say the least. I do not understand all the complexities of the timing, but according to my information the practical effect of the situation is that war veterans allowance recipients in Canada are actually receiving a number of dollars less from the United Kingdom, according to the size of their disability pension, than they would have otherwise received. If this is an administrative decision it is a pretty unfortunate one to make at a time when the present government is supposed, as it says, to be exercising economy measures. I hardly think we need go that far. If the minister can clarify the two situations I have raised I think it would be of value to veterans across the country and might perhaps give us some understanding of what course of action should be taken in regard to some of these matters when they are dealt with in greater depth than is possible in this committee at the present moment.

[Translation]

Mr. Laniel: Mr. Chairman, I should not like to let the debate on supplementary estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs go by without saying a few words on the overall problem of Canadian veterans.

A moment ago, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) made some statements which, to my mind, were most unfair for the hon. minister. I do not want to take it upon myself to defend the minister, because I know that he is capable of finding the necessary arguments to justify certain attitudes or positions his department has taken in the face of problems which have come up. But I do want to tell the members I hope personally that in spite of what happens in the next few days and months, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Teillet) will continue in that post, for, in my opinion, he is the one who has best served the interests of veterans.

Mr. Chairman, first of all, I wish to congratulate the hon. minister for the step he has taken—that is why the supplementary estimates of his department are before the house—by increasing the veterans' pensions by 15 per cent. If one considers the various increases granted in previous years, one finds that they actually represent a substantial improvement, compared to the pensions paid when the present government came into power.

Of course, there is still a great deal to be done and, personally, I hope that it will be possible to readjust those pensions according to some schedule so as to avoid asking the house constantly for further increases. But until then, Mr. Chairman, I think that the minister is to be commended, and I hope that the inter-departmental committee now considering the basic rates of pensions will be in a position to submit to him a report which will result, in the next months, in the introduction of a piece of legislation designed to settle this problem once and for all.

As far as the Woods report is concerned, I hope, like all members of the veterans affairs committee, that it will be referred as soon as possible to that committee, either the report itself, or a summary of that report, or still a piece of legislation relating thereto. But it is urgent that the officials of the Department of Veterans Affairs provide an opportunity for organizations to make representations and offer comments in order that we may obtain a complete reform and reorganization of the Pension Commission, with a view to improving the situation and serving the interests of veterans better.

I am convinced, Mr. Chairman, that this report which, according to my information will be quite long, will open the way toward improvements in the pension field, for the greater good of veterans.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I would simply thank the members of the house who are members of the committee on veterans affairs for their co-operation, but I would say to them that when this report is sent to the committee, we shall have a great deal of serious work to do, so as to help the minister in accomplishing a reform which has perhaps been delayed, but which will surely be worth it.

However, I must comment on the remark made a few minutes ago by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave), who said that it might be one of the reasons why he might have reservations about bilingualism if the latter entailed such delays in the introduction of reports in both languages. I wonder what the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave) would have said if the French version only of the Woods report had been tabled in the house.

This is a very technical report. One should not forget that such reports comprise some quite technical terms and that it is important that both ethnic groups can have an exact understanding of the recommendations in precise terms and in a quite definite translation. I think that perhaps the Woods commission, which has undertaken this translation itself, should be urged to speed it up a little, but I am convinced that the minister will receive the report and that it will be made available to us without delay, so that the committee can get to work if this report is sent to it.

[English]

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member who has just taken his seat directed some remarks at me and I do not expect he will quarrel with my rising. My response to his remarks is simple. I would not mind if the report were written in Latin, in Iroquois or in any other language. If there has been an injustice it is up to the government to correct that injustice. It should not hide behind the excuse that it has had to wait for months and months for a translation. If the report can only come before us in French and if the recommendations of the report are sound, the government should act on those recommendations. I would accept that wholeheartedly. I do not think we should take a good cause and trample on it or postpone action by hiding behind bilingualism.

Mr. Laniel: Would the hon. member permit a question? Does the hon. member know that the veterans association did not want that report to be referred to officials of the pension commission before it was referred to the committee on veterans affairs? The association did not want the commission to begin work on the report before the report had been made available to the committee because the veterans association wished to make representations to the committee in order to help in the preparation of a good committee report.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I do not quarrel with the request of the veterans association nor do I argue with the hon. member. His remarks do not seem germane to the point we were arguing about.

Mr. Fawcett: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to hold up the minister's estimates. Like many other hon. members I feel that the increase in pensions is long overdue, and I welcome it.

I wish to bring one or two matters to the minister's attention. One is the interminable delay that some people experience in trying to have their appeals heard. I shall not go into great detail and I shall cite only one case as an example. It is the case of a veteran who was receiving a disability pension and who died approximately two years ago. Because it was alleged that his disability was only two-fifths attributable to war service his wife was not entitled to a war pension. Following his death strong evidence came to light contesting the allegation that his disability was two-fifths attributable to his war service and supporting strongly the widow's claim for a pension. I will not go into details about the case since it is being processed. I shall merely say that from my reading of the evidence there is a strong case for paying the widow a pension. She appealed the previous decision some months ago and despite numerous telephone calls and letters I understand that the appeal will not be heard until May or June.

The widow is faced with a real problem. She has a child attending a secondary school. He will finish school this year and she wants to send him to a university. Although she does not at present need financial assistance she is obliged to conserve the little money she has in order to hold on to her home. Her resources are not enough to permit her to further the education of her child without assistance and she is anxious to know where she stands so far as the child is concerned. In all fairness I do not understand why there should be such a delay in handling appeals after all the evidence has been turned in. In cases of this kind, widows are placed in an extremely unenviable position.

I have been involved in another similar case. The appeal was finally decided in the widow's favour after the case had been under consideration for almost five years. Such delays appear to be unnecessary and when they do occur the provision for 12 months retroactive pay is insufficient. Something should be done to expedite the handling of appeals in cases such as those I have mentioned.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Churchill: No. We are waiting for a reply from the minister. If he is not going to reply there will have to be further discussion. I give him the opportunity. Does he intend to answer the questions which have been raised?

Mr. Teillet: I think I should be permitted to wait until all the representations have been made and then reply to the questions. I do not think I ought to get up half a dozen times to speak on different points.

Mr. Chatterton: In that case perhaps the committee should allow the item to stand until we have dealt with the other questions. Otherwise the minister might be ruled out of order when he does rise to speak.

Mr. Teillet: I do not think it is a question of passing this item immediately. After hon. members have asked their questions and made their comments I shall be glad to deal with them.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few comments on this matter. I think we are all deeply in debt to the present minister. The announcement that this rather substantial increase was to come was made on December 20. Anyone who reflects on the events of that time will recall the situation on the London money market, the scramble there, virtually duplicated in every treasury in the western world, the anxious preoccupation with budget balancing, fiscal responsibilities and so on. Bearing in mind the fact that my hon. friend has brought in three substantial increases in the less than five years during which he has held his present portfolio, the increase before the one now contemplated having been on September 1, 1966, and bearing in mind the sacrifices we are asking the Canadian people generally to make so as to present a position of fiscal responsibility and integrity to the world, I think it is greatly to the minister's credit that he should bring forward this recommendation now.

I am sure we are all anxious that the Woods committee report should not be delayed. I feel it would be very wrong if the report came to us in English alone and we had to await a second report in French. As one who appeared before the Woods committee and therefore seized with the highly technical arguments that were brought to bear on certain sections of the Pension Act, I can think of nothing more painful than the necessity of re-examining later, in another language, the significance of the committee's recommendations.

We are looking forward not to a modest change in pension legislation but to a new, streamlined act which will meet the requirements of veterans as we find them today rather than as we found them at the conclusion of the war. I think the report will recommend far reaching changes and, as I say, I hope it comes forward very shortly.

During the past week I lost a friend, a member of my battery with the same rank as myself. He left a widow and a family—two children at university, I believe. Had it been possible to implement the recommendations of the Woods committee, the financial position of this veteran before he died might have been altogether different and the circumstances of his dependants would consequently be much more satisfactory. Over the weekend a doctor friend of mine, an active Conservative, incidentally, telephoned to tell me about another friend of mine, a man who fought overseas as a very young fighter pilot and who may die very soon. The changes one might expect from the Woods committee recommendations could very well bring about major improvements in the lives of veterans such as these two and I suggest that the minister, who is most sympathetic in this connection, might reflect on the serious consequences of undue delay.

In calculating pensions paid to veterans we often find that the basis used is the salary currently received by low paid civil servants. By comparison the veteran is thought of as a man with a wife, two children and a 100 per cent disability. Perhaps it was not unnatural to expect that a veteran at the conclusion of a war would have a wife and two children; I can understand why this comparison was made originally. But possibly the French officials whom we interviewed in Paris at the Boulevard des Invalides were correct in their approach, that compensation should be paid with the veteran alone in mind, not his wife and his other dependants.

Such a suggestion is immediately questioned, of course, by experts such as the officials of service organizations who say that additional pension allowances are required in respect of a wife and children or the family simply could not survive. But this approach, I feel, begs the question. The amount of the individual award might, indeed, be sufficient if it were based on a straightforward comparison between the real needs of the veteran himself and the salaries of the civil servants to be selected. I suspect from inquiries I have made that the theoretical awards on the basis I have mentioned, namely, a wife and two children, are an illusion. Too many disabled veterans end up with neither children nor a wife and an entirely inadequate pension.

We are comparing that packet, veteran plus dependants, with the low paid civil service employee. I do not think it would be very difficult, with the computers available, for the Minister of Veterans Affairs to give some consideration to the question of whether or not a basis with adequate remuneration for the veteran alone might in most circumstances be more equitable. There are many other considerations that enter into this picture. There have been cases where wives have not really been dependants in the true sense of the word.

Bearing in mind that the main burden of our responsibilities at the moment is toward people who served in world war II, which now is a full generation ago, and to a lesser degree to those who served in world war I, perhaps it would be timely for the Department of Veterans Affairs to make a thorough statistical study of what would be the difference if the base of compensation were to shift, with some qualification provided to meet special needs—

Mr. Chatterton: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. We on this side purposely cut down our speeches so that the minister would have a chance to reply before six o'clock. The discussion which the hon. member for Leeds is now carrying on could be more properly carried on after we have received the Woods report. We want to get these estimates accepted today because we might not have a chance after six o'clock.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Chairman, I have nothing more to add.

Mr. Chatterton: You were taking up time.

Mr. Matheson: That is not fair.

Mr. Teillet: Mr. Chairman, on rising to reply to the representations and queries I wish to express my thanks to the members of the committee for the interest they have again shown in this very important subject. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich was the first to speak and some of the subjects he covered were also mentioned by a number of other hon. members. Speaking of the Veterans Land Act, which I know interests the hon. gentleman very much, I urge him to understand that there is no question of a means test being applied but certain guide lines—I know that is a much misused word—have been issued to the regional offices in the hope that veterans would go to those offices, ask for explanations and get a clear understanding of what is involved. The hon. gentleman mentioned a figure of $7,000 which was used as a guide line, as an income below which veterans would be given priority. That $7,000 does not include such things as pensions, the wife's income, or family allowances. It is personal income outside of these other things.

This is the guide line that was given and it is hoped that not too many people will be affected. However, it is not mandatory and instructions have gone out that every case is to be judged on its merits in order to avoid the kind of thing that the hon. gentleman mentioned where in some cases a matter of a few dollars might cause hardship. This is only a guide and we hope that no hardship will result.

Mr. Chatterton: Will the minister assure the house that no veteran will be denied a loan simply because of income?

Mr. Teillet: I do not believe I could give that assurance because the case may arise—I am not speaking of new construction—where a veteran wants to improve his holding but his income is at such a level that it may be felt he could wait for a year before doing so. That could result from this directive.

Mr. Chatterton: Could the minister give us the assurance that no veteran, other than a veteran wanting to build a new house, applying to acquire a small holding or farm will be denied a loan on account of income?

Mr. Teillet: Again I would say that generally speaking this would be the case. I hesitate to give an absolute assurance. A case may easily develop where a veteran might be requested to wait for a year because his personal circumstances were such that he could do so without any hardship. This does not affect the applications of veterans at any time and those who qualify will be eligible, even those who may be asked to delay for a year. It is also my understanding that any effect on farm lending will be negligible. I believe that covers most of the points raised by the hon.

member with respect to the Veterans Land Act.

With respect to the 15 per cent increase in pensions and the issuing of the cheques may I say I appreciate very much getting these estimates through today. This will give the officials of the department an opportunity to get to work, although I believe the calculations have already been made. They can now put the operation into the works in order to get the cheques out by the end of this month. I cannot, of course, give an absolute guarantee because the final authority will not be given until such time as the supplementary estimates bill receives royal assent.

Mr. Knowles: If there is going to be any delay would the minister request that this item be taken out and be made a bill by itself? Then it could be given royal assent right away.

Mr. Teillet: That might be done, and I will be glad to consider it. I see no difficulty about that because once the house has approved I do not think there is much question as to what will happen in the other place. We are very anxious to get this out this month. Even though the March cheque might be only for the regular amount, at least we could get the adjustment cheque out at about the same time.

Hon. members showed much interest and asked a number of questions about the Woods committee report. I should explain the difficulty involved in the translation of it. It is a very extensive report comprising, I understand, some 1,600 pages. As has been mentioned, many technical terms are used when dealing with veterans affairs. In fact reference was made to our own Department of Veterans Affairs jargon. The manner of speaking of veterans when they are dealing with veterans benefits is sometimes extremely difficult to translate, and I have some responsibility for some of the delay in the issuing of the report because I have had the translation very carefully checked as it proceeded. I insisted on this being done in order to make sure that the two texts of the report would mean exactly the same thing.

Not too many hours ago I was informed that the chairman of the committee proposes to be in Ottawa about March 21 and hopes to be in a position to present the report at that time. I certainly hope he can meet that deadline. In view of the criticism that has been levelled at the delays, may I say that I in no way hold the members of the committee responsible for those delays. Whatever criticism may be justifiably levelled, I accept it. I think they were very diligent in their work. They undertook a tremendous task and considering their enthusiasm and ability I believe that their report will have been well worth waiting for.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni raised a number of questions concerning eligibility for the $30 a month old age adjustment payment and not it being available to war veterans allowance recipients. The experience has been that administratively this becomes very awkward. This type of thing was done on two occasions in recent years when old age assistance was increased by $10. Things became very difficult administratively. Finally we increased the ceiling of allowable income for war veterans allowance recipients in order to take that in. We also did so again just about the time when the $30 a month supplement came into being. The ceiling was increased to $145 a month for a single man and $245 a month for a married man. While these amounts were needed, part of the reason for this procedure was not to get involved in administrative difficulties.

In the case of the cost of living supplement the amount is small enough that it would not cause difficulties but if it were multiplied four or five times over the years it would. It is anticipated that before this occurs another raise in the ceiling on allowable income for war veterans allowance recipients would be justifiable and there would be a need at that time for this to be absorbed again. If the hon. member would like to speak to some of the officials about this matter I believe the situation could be explained to him much better than I could do it here at this time. I am sure they would be pleased to talk to him.

You will recall that at the time the $30 a month supplement was passed the war veterans allowance board wrote a letter to each war veterans allowance recipient asking that they make no decision before consulting the officials of the Department of Veterans Affairs. If they would follow that course, I believe they would find that the decision taken would be to their advantage. The officials of the department would advise the veteran to make the type of application that would be most beneficial to him. I might suggest that the same situation pertains in respect of the Veterans Land Act. I believe that if they went to the officials they would be given the kind of advice which would be most beneficial to them.

I should like to thank the hon. member for Kootenay West for again bringing to my attention the difficulties faced by those in his area. As has been the case in the past the officials will do everything possible to be helpful. I believe this is an assurance which members of the house will accept because the officials of the department have a reputation for acting in the interests of the veterans.

The Chairman: Shall vote 1c carry?

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister—

The Chairman: Order. Shall I rise and report certain resolutions and request that the committee be granted leave to sit later this day or at the next sitting of the house?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, it is not yet six o'clock and we are willing to pass these estimates.

The Chairman: Order. I understand that the Speaker wishes to come into the chamber.

Mr. Starr: Before the Speaker comes into the chamber perhaps we might pass these estimates.

The Chairman: Shall Vote 1 carry?

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, before the minister leaves the matter of the Veterans Land Act may I ask whether any consideration is being given to a reduction in the size of the veteran's holding to take into consideration the situation where the land value places the land out of the reach of the veteran?

Mr. Teillet: I would like to refer back to the answers I have given the house previously in this regard, if that would be satisfactory.

Item agreed to.

The following items were agreed to:

Pensions—

25c. Pensions for Disability and Death—To provide, effective the 1st day of January, 1968, that the Pension Act be amended as follows:

(a) Schedules A and B to the said Act are repealed and the Schedules A and B set out in the details of the Estimates are substituted therefor; and

(b) in subsection (2) of section 38 the words "six hundred and thirty-six" are struck out and the words "seven hundred and thirty-two" are substituted therefor; and

(c) in subsection (4) of section 38 the words "three hundred dollars" are struck out and the words "three hundred and forty-eight dollars" are substituted therefor, $7,800,000.

Treatment Services—

38c. Treatment and Related Allowances, $205,000.

Veterans Affairs—

L120c. To increase to $450,000 the amount that may be charged at any one time to the Working Capital Advance established by Vote 517 of the Appropriation Act No. 5, 1958, for the purpose of financing the manufacture of Remembrance Day poppies and wreaths; additional amount required, $50,000.

The Chairman: That completes the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR SURCHARGE

The house resumed consideration of the order:

Second reading of Bill C-207, an act to amend the Income Tax Act—the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Speaker: At this time perhaps I might be permitted to apprise hon. members of the ruling I have reached after considering the very interesting arguments submitted earlier this afternoon. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre mentioned, it is a question which has attracted my attention during the past few days and, as many other hon. members have done, I, too, have reviewed the precedents on the point.

The point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and discussed by other hon. members is that Bill C-207 should not be proceeded with because in effect it renews a question decided during the current session. I should like to refer hon. members to citation 200(1) of Beauchesne's fourth edition and also to Bourinot's fourth edition, page 328-9. The latter reads as follows:

It is, however, an ancient rule of parliament that "no question or motion can regularly be offered if it is substantially the same with one on which the judgment of the house has already been expressed during the current session." The old rule of parliament reads: "That a question being once made, and carried in the affirmative or negative, cannot be questioned again, but must stand as a judgment of the house." Unless such a rule were in existence, the time of the house might be used in the discussion of motions of the same nature and contradictory decisions would be sometimes arrived at in the course of the same session.

Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 373(2), reads as follows:

There is no rule which restrains the presentation of two or more Bills relating to the same subject, and containing similar provisions—

This is a point which is important because some hon. members have suggested we should not discuss similar matters or similar principles during the same session. The experience of hon. members, I am sure, is that we have done that, at least, exceptionally. Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 373(2), continues:

> But if a decision of the House has already been taken on one such Bill, for example, if the Bill has been given or refused a second reading, the other is not proceeded with if it contains substantially the same provisions—

The word "substantially" appears again. Beauchesne's citation 163 reads as follows:

> A mere alteration of the words of a question, without any substantial change in its object will not be sufficient to evade the rule that no question shall be offered which is substantially the same as one which has already been expressed in the current session.

Again, citation 375(1) of Beauchesne's fourth edition reads as follows:

> A Bill is in order when substantially different from another Bill on the same matter previously disposed of during the session.

The solution, according to Bourinot, must be found within the following proposition which appears at page 329 of his fourth edition:

> "The only means by which a negative vote can be revoked is by proposing another question, similar in its general purport to that which had been rejected, but with sufficient variance to constitute a new question; and the house would determine whether it were substantially the same question or not."

• (6:00 p.m.)

It then becomes a matter of interpretation or judgment whether, in the words of the rule, the motion offered is substantially the same as the one on which the decision of the house has been expressed. The only way to interpret the two measures in relation to the rule is to compare the proposals offered in each case; that is, in the previous bill and in the new bill now before the house.

What the Chair should do, in my view, is to compare the provisions of Bill C-207, now before the house, with those of Bill C-193 which was defeated on third reading. This was done by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and by other hon. members who have assisted the Chair. Perhaps hon. members will allow me to refer again to the several clauses.

Clause 1 of the new Bill C-207 deals with a gift tax. It is a completely new proposition which was not dealt with in any way, shape or form in Bill C-193. Clause 2 of Bill C-207, on the other hand, is a repetition of clause 1 in Bill C-193. Clause 3 of Bill C-207 is consequential upon the change proposed in clause 2 and is also of a purely technical nature. However, this clause is an exact repetition of the corresponding clause in the Bill C-193.

Clause 4 of Bill C-207 is identical with clause 3 of Bill C-193. This clause relates to deductions permitted in computing the tax payable under the farmers' and fishermen's averaging provision. This provision does not appear to be related to a surtax; it is an independent proposition, standing by itself, and I have serious doubts whether it ought to be reintroduced as part of Bill C-207.

Clause 5 of Bill C-207 provides for prepayment of the corporation tax. There are different rates of prepayment. One hon. member found it difficult to see the difference, but there is some difference between this clause and the corresponding clause of Bill C-193. Clause 6 of Bill C-207 is consequential upon the amendments set out in clause 1 thereof. It is entirely new, and therefore it is in no way objectionable.

Clause 7 of Bill C-207 contains the substantive part of the new taxation proposal. It is similar to the previous proposal in that it is a surtax. According to our authorities and precedents, the fact that they are similar proposals in itself is not sufficient to justify a ruling that it is out of order. The test is whether or not there are substantial differences between the two proposals.

The new clause of Bill C-207 provides a special surtax of 3 per cent compared with a surtax of 5 per cent in the original bill. The earlier resolution and bill carried a basic tax floor of $100. The new clause in Bill C-207 increases the basic exemption to $200. The first proposal fixed a ceiling of $600 with regard to surtax payments. Bill C-207 imposes no such limitation. The original surtax was a continuing tax. The revised bill proposes a levy of a fixed duration for the years 1968 and 1969.

The new bill proposes, in clause 7, the imposition of a surtax on the tax paid by corporations. This, of course, is entirely new. There was no similar provision in the previous bill. This in itself would appear to constitute a substantial change making clause 7 of Bill C-207 a new question in relation to clause 5 of Bill C-193. Finally, clause 8 of Bill C-207 dealing with the refund of tax repeats word for word clause 6 of Bill C-193. I find it difficult, again, to justify a repetition of this clause in the new bill.

It will be seen, therefore, that while the substantive clauses of Bill C-207 are, in general, substantially new, clauses 2, 3, 4 and 8 of Bill C-207 are a repetition of the clauses in Bill C-193 which was defeated on third reading.

Hon. members have referred to a ruling which the Chair made last year in connection with the transport bill. The hon. member for Acadia in particular and also the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred to this ruling. I am in agreement with what the Chair stated at that time, namely:

> The cumulation, however, of all these added changes does not obviate the basic requirement that no part of the new proposal should be inconsistent with the committee's previous decision.

That is a quotation from the ruling of the Chair made on January 26, 1967 (p. 1233, Journals, 1967-8) on an appeal from a ruling of the chairman of the committee of the whole when the committee was considering the transport bill. In other words, what we have to guard against is putting the house in a position where it might have to take a decision which in part would be inconsistent with a decision taken previously. I suggest to the house that this is exactly what the house would be doing if it were allowed to adopt clauses 2, 3, 4 and 8 which are exact repetitions of the clauses in Bill C-193 which was defeated on third reading.

For all these reasons my suggestion would be that Bill C-207 should be withdrawn and a new measure introduced which would take into account the fact that there should be no contradiction between it and the decision taken previously.

I should like to bring to the attention of the house a citation from May's seventeenth edition, page 522, which is as follows:

> If it should become necessary, before the second reading of a bill, to make considerable changes in its provisions, such changes can only be accomplished, at this stage, by discharging the order for the second reading and withdrawing the bill.

I should bring also to the attention of hon. members that in my view this does not invalidate the ways and means resolution which was adopted last Friday. A new bill based on that resolution and containing clauses which in my view are acceptable and not in contradiction to the principle of the decision on the former bill can be submitted readily to the house, introduced and considered for first reading.

I therefore consider that an order of the house should issue for the withdrawal of the bill now before the house so that the government may have an opportunity to introduce a new measure.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at ten o'clock this day are as follows: The hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Brand), Indian Affairs—Saskatchewan—medical decision respecting sterilization and contraceptives; the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Schreyer), Agriculture—potatoes—imports from United States into western Canada; the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke (Mr. Johnston), Company of Young Canadians—reported subsidization of private schools in British Columbia.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Government order No. 69, second reading of Bill No. C-207, to amend the Income Tax Act.

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the ruling made by His Honour at 6 p.m. I move that the order for second reading of Bill No. C-207 be discharged and the bill withdrawn.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I ask for leave to revert to routine proceedings for the purpose of introducing a bill based on the ways and means resolution adopted on Friday, February 9.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent to revert to routine proceedings for the purpose of introducing a bill based on the ways and means resolution adopted on Friday, February 9?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the bill which I am asking leave to introduce is similar to Bill No. C-207 except that it removes those clauses to which His Honour took exception. It also includes one very minor subclause of a very technical nature, which I would have moved in committee, which does not affect in any way the substance of the bill.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, we agree, provided the bill receives only first reading this evening.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Mr. Sharp moves for leave to present Bill C-208 to amend the Income Tax Act, based on the income tax resolution concurred in by the house on Friday last. Shall the minister have leave to introduce said bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sharp moved the first reading of the bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Starr: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a second time? At the next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister when copies of the revised bill will be in our boxes?

Mr. Fairweather: The government is retreating but maintaining the initiative.

Mr. MacEachen: It shows how flexible we are. Copies of the bill will be in hon. members' boxes tomorrow morning.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the Chair to assume that the house will now go into committee of supply?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Batten in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE

Board of Broadcast Governors—

1c. Salaries and other expenses, $35,000.

The Chairman: Order. House again in committee of supply supplementary estimates (C), 1967-68, Department of Secretary of State, Board of Broadcast Governors, vote 1c. Shall vote No. 1c carry?

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make just a few brief remarks on this item. It would seem to me that the members of the new Board of Broadcast Governors, when they have had an opportunity to get settled, will realize that they should do something to correct what has gone on of late on the C.B.C. television news and news commentaries.

In the last few weeks there have been people in the country who have said they have seen nothing but a complete take-over by the government of the C.B.C. news media, and that the C.B.C. news has become little more than a government brainwashing operation. We saw a good sample of it recently, shortly after February 19, when the Prime Minister returned to Canada from Jamaica and appeared on C.B.C. television. The information that a number of us have been given is that the Prime Minister went on television that evening on the understanding that no other person would be allowed to go on the television after he appeared that evening, and that no commentary would be permitted on his remarks. When one hears these observations made by those who are in a position to know, it becomes very alarming indeed.

As most of us know, television is one of the most powerful media of information to influence the public. In recent weeks, within the space of three days, through the medium of television the names of persons little known to the general public became household words. I believe the new Board of Broadcast Governors should ensure that every effort is made to see that there is no interference by the government in office with the news media. Not only that, but they should ensure that there must appear to be no interference from within the news media. This is very important.

In addition to that, in the house and in other places, the suggestion has been made in the last few months that there has been some political interference with the C.B.C. I do not wish to rehash what has already been said in the house on other occasions, but I would certainly hope that the new Board of Broadcast Governors will take the greatest care to make sure that there is even no appearance of any control of the news media by the government, or indeed by any political party. I hope the new president of the CB.C. will bear this in mind when he assumes his new duties.

Mr. Prittie: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few remarks while we are on the item concerning the Board of Broadcast Governors. The hon. member for Oxford made a complaint about the news coverage on the C.B.C., and the leader of my party, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, also made a passing reference to this subject in the debate which followed the February 19 incident. I am not inclined to make very much of that at the moment because the C.B.C. has a new management, and I think it is only fair for members of the house to give the new president and executive vice president some time to assume control of their jobs and make whatever changes they think are necessary in the operation of the corporation. So I will refrain from making any other remarks concerning the C.B.C. at this time.

The new Broadcasting Act has now received royal assent, and I wish to express the hope that the members of the regulatory authority, the chairman, vice chairman and the members who are to make up the new Canadian Radio and Television Commission, will be appointed without too much delay. We have been drifting for a number of years in the field of broadcasting, beginning with the Fowler report, which was followed by the white paper on broadcasting. Then followed the committee's study on the white paper, and then finally the long debate on the act itself.

It took the government a long time to find the personnel to head the C.B.C.

We understand a number of people refused the job. Let us hope that it will not take as long for the government to find personnel to man the new regulatory authority, because that body will have very important work. The new authority will have the job of controlling radio and television broadcasting in Canada. There are a number of very important things which have to be tackled and the sooner these people are appointed the better.

Then, I should like to refer to some of the items that need to be looked at in the very near future. We have had very strong representations made to the broadcasting committee about the employment of Canadian talent. This is a matter which really cannot be left too much longer. Month by month talented Canadians, actors, writers and producers leave for the United States and the United Kingdom. This problem, if allowed to continue for a matter of a year or two, will result in the loss of the pool of talent this country has to do the kind of broadcasting that should be done.

Another matter with which we are dealing in the broadcasting committee at the present time is educational television. One of the matters about which we hear a great deal is whether educational television should be on very high frequency or ultra-high frequency. Recommendations have been made by a number of groups that have appeared before the committee to the effect that all television receivers in Canada should be equipped to receive ultra-high frequency channels. They are not, as yet. Over two years ago I introduced a private members bill on this subject. There is a provision in the new act which would allow the regulatory authority to require Canadian importers or manufacturers to build into all T.V. sets the capacity to receive ultra-high frequency channels. I say this because there are sets still being manufactured without this capability. In fact most sets manufactured in Canada are in this category, and it is going to be essential when educational television actually gets on the air in this country. When that will be I do not know, at the rate we are going at the present time. So I do urge simply that the government, without too much delay, find the people necessary to staff the new Canadian Radio and Television Commission. This commission has in front of it some very important tasks. Enough has been said about broadcasting in general during the debate which took place only last month, so I shall confine my remarks to these few at the present time.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. Before we proceed any further with the consideration of the estimates I wonder if we could have some information from the government house leader as to which member of the administration is responsible for piloting these estimates tonight. Several times we have had the President of the Treasury Board in charge, but tonight perhaps it is the Minister without Portfolio who is sitting on the front bench. He always seems to be around whenever a crisis develops.

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Chairman, in the absence of the Secretary of State who will be back later tonight, I am taking notes of the representations made by hon. members concerning these supplementary estimates.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I was glad to hear the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr.

Béchard) say that he was taking it upon himself to listen to any matter related to broadcasting to which we might call his and the government's attention.

It is a rather costly service for Canadian taxpayers. It is true, as the previous speaker just said, that the C.B.C. now has a new management: new presidents, new vice-presidents and new secretaries. We can only express the wish now that this new management will take into account the true situation prevailing in Canada at present and that it will not try to lay down policies but rather to serve the best interests of the Canadian people.

Too often in the past, we have had to deplore serious mistakes on the part of C.B.C. officials, even some high officials. This makes us invite the new administration to be careful, to avoid errors as much as possible. Mistakes will be made, that happens everywhere—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, if members hear me as well as I hear them, they hear me very well indeed! I understand that many of them are not interested in what we have to say about a state corporation, and that is why we see quite often that positions are taken which are not compatible with the studies we must make in the house.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to speak very long about the C.B.C. tonight. I would only say again that we want the C.B.C. to deal with everyone fairly and impartially, to give the Canadian people a just treatment.

In the past, we have seen certain groups receive preferential treatment while others were almost totally ignored. In my opinion, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should respect all schools of thought in Canada and all should be allowed to express their opinion, for only thus, in my opinion, will we achieve greater understanding.

Everyone does not necessarily have the same ideas and opinions. However, the C.B.C. should recognize this basic principle and allow all groups to express their opinions, explain their program and put forward their point of view. This will help to create a spirit of good will and mutual respect in Canada.

Mr. Chairman, I said earlier that on many occasions, we had cause to complain about the administration within the C.B.C. For instance, with regard to news coverage, we are given daily reports on the Viet Nam war, while current events in Canada are systematically ignored. We are told about terrible massacres which occur thousands of miles away, in countries where the C.B.C. sends reporters with cameras and so on. This is beyond me.

It is all very well to tell us what is going on in Viet Nam, but it is another matter to devote energies and millions of dollars to present solely, more or less, news about war and its atrocities. In my opinion, it would be more important to earmark that money for the extension of broadcasting services to those areas of the country which are still without them.

I want to mention, for example, certain towns in northern Quebec, like Chibougamau and Chapais, where C.B.C. television programs cannot be received. The inhabitants of Parent, along the C.N.R. tracks, cannot receive them either.

For six years now, we have been calling for television for the French-speaking citizens of British Columbia. We are told that when the necessary money is available, the French television network will be extended to the population of western Canada.

We hear in this house flamboyant statements to the effect that there is a wish to respect bilingualism, that the French-speaking citizens should have the same advantages as the English-speaking, that they should receive equal treatment. But the only place where all Canadians receive equal treatment by the C.B.C. is in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Chairman, it would cost far less to the government or to the crown corporation to provide a French television service in the western provinces than to cover wars in Viet Nam, Korea, Africa or other countries in the world.

It is all very well to give us news coverage of current events but, I reapeat, we should first provide services for our own people at home.

It would be very interesting, for example, to have television programs showing the Rocky Mountains and the beautiful lakes in that region. It would also be interesting to see the sights in eastern Canada, in the maritime provinces and in the province of Quebec, for example: the Manicouagan or other very important industries, which would be of great interest to Canadians in the west.

Mr. Chairman, I hope that the new C.B.C. management will take into account the wishes of the people, which are mainly to know their country and be informed of what is going on in Canada. The C.B.C. will fulfil this function when it informs the Canadian people of what goes on in Canada, on what exists in Canada, and when it stops spending millions of dollars to cover wars, murders and shameful events.

Mr. Chairman, we firmly believe that the C.B.C. can be useful. It must service Canadians and serve them with justice and objectivity, giving them the right to speak and respecting that right, so that the C.B.C. may be avluable and truly represent the Canadian people.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, we all remember that the young lady who is Secretary of State said one day that there was something rotten in the C.B.C. That statement angered certain existentialist commentators. I have the impression, just the same, that among the members of this house, that statement met with the acceptance of most of us who are trying to estimate the work performed by the C.B.C. and that, in the party itself, it was agreed that there was much room for improvement in the C.B.C.

At the time when our government was putting forward the improvements, the amendments or the new organizations which we have approved, we hoped that the C.B.C. would give to the Canadian people something more objective and lasting under the circumstances, because we had all deplored, Mr. Chairman, the kind of infiltration which we have all witnessed. I do not think that it is some kind of partisanship merely reflecting electioneering, which is usually deplored, but even then, those conditions were so obvious that we generally recognized there had been some separatism and socialism infiltration within the C.B.C. and in certain fields for reasons which may seem evident to some, less to others, and perhaps also some people who reject all the principles in which we have believed up to now.

Mr. Chairman, I see that my hon. friend, the member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire), disagrees. I do not believe that he is protesting on behalf of that swarm of atheists who would like to bring into question again everything in which we believe, we the representatives of all Canadians, of all faiths or allegiances.

We have seen on the C.B.C. revolutionaries who did not even need the excuse of a more acceptable ideology to be given the right of expressing themselves on the air more often than their turn.

Mr. Chairman, a few minutes ago, the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste (Mr. Caouette) said that the C.B.C. could respect all currents of thoughts. That was indeed the opinion of the government which established the C.B.C., of the governments which, ever since, have endeavoured to modernize the C.B.C. structures, and of parliament which has voted this year a very substantial budget to the corporation. I too believe that the C.B.C. should respect every opinion.

However, Mr. Chairman, when I watch the C.B.C. programs, I cannot help noticing that the Liberal party is being treated generously, which is only natural since it is the party in power; the same thing would probably be true of the Conservatives if they were in power. They would be treated just as generously, to be sure.

• (8:20 p.m.)

Members of the New Democratic party also appear more often than their turn, but I am not going to blame them. Perhaps, it is because they have members who are—how should I say; I am trying to find a word to which they will not take issue—who are more aggressive than the others and they happen to be on the French and English networks perhaps more often than would warrant their representation in the house. I am not going to complain about that, because every time they appear, they have something constructive to offer.

The same thing applies to members of the Ralliement Créditiste, but they enjoy an extraordinary advantage. Since they have no money of their own, thanks to the generosity of philanthropists or charitable people who want to save the race, they have programs on private stations to propagate their doctrine, their revalorization of the financial system.

Mr. Chairman, I have been sitting for two years and a half in this corner of the house, next to the door, on the first row. Therefore, nobody can call me a black-bencher, and I am one of those who are wondering why nobody thought of asking an independent, since we are so few. Until recently, we were four; we are now only three: one Independent Conservative, who persists in sitting next to the Conservatives, which implies that his views are rather conservative, the hon. member for Lapointe, my good friend, behind me, who is a Créditiste, a separatist, and an independent, because nobody else wanted him, and myself. We, independents, are of that breed of Christians who are alleged to have to accept anybody with all their failings and all their qualities. We have accepted the hon. member for Lapointe even though we often disagree with him, and I say so with great kindness, because he also can, if need be, prove rather helpful to us, since he is much more familiar than we are with parliamentary procedure. I think of all that and, in conclusion, I see myself as a true Independent.

In spite of that agreement, the member for Lapointe persists in saying that I am a Liberal or an Independent who has sold out to the Liberals. If I followed his trend of thought, I could say that he has sold out to all types of independent ideologies because, from my point of view, there is only one Independent member and, I say it most humbly, it is the member for Trois-Rivières; all the others ran under other tickets, either Independent Conservative, Créditiste, separatist. They now claim to be Independents because, ultimately, no one was willing to adopt them.

All this, Mr. Chairman, to say that it seems to me that the C.B.C. could, at least once a year for perhaps five minutes, or let us say ten minutes, invite the Independent members to air their views on national politics, to sort out what is good about the Conservatives, the members of the New Democratic party, of the Social Credit party, the Ralliement Créditiste, the Liberals and perhaps even the separatists, and try to make a synthesis, so that Canadian listeners might hear objective opinions; because the only ones left who can laud the ideologies adopted by their colleagues are the ones who bear the obvious label of as categorized a party as that of the Liberals, or the Conservatives, or the the New Democratic party, or the Ralliement Créditiste or the Social Credit party.

On the other hand, those who have some sense of solidarity do not say anything to harm their party; nor do they praise it too highly, for fear of being accused of prejudice, because we, French Canadians, are constitutionally modest. But there remains only one true Independent who ran under the independent ticket.

My friend, the member for Lapointe, claims that I am a faithful servant of the Liberal party, but he did not follow me in my last electoral campaign. He does not know that back home I had the courage to tell my constituents that I would not come here to oppose but to co-operate, because there is enough opposition but perhaps not enough co-operation.

[Mr. Mongrain.]

Were the Conservative party in power, I should adopt the same attitude. I would have adopted the same attitude provided, of course the Conservatives had not made the same blunders as the Liberals, and I feel that things are pretty equal.

If I add up parliamentary childish tricks, and errors due to childishness which can be attributed to the Liberals since they have come to power, I admit, Mr. Chairman, that I start to worry. The situation we witnessed this afternoon is another example that strikes me as sadly convincing, that the Liberal party and the Conservative party need to turn a new leaf. That is what I have been saying for two years and a half in this house and I say it again, as a piece of friendly advice which is not necessarily destructive, although it seems to shock some of my friends on the treasury benches.

Mr. Chairman, I am still talking about the C.B.C. and I find it surprising—I see that everyone understands except the hon. member for Lapointe—that in view of its impartiality, at least that was the intention of the legislators and the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste summarized it when he said that the C.B.C. should reflect all currents of opinion in Canada, the corporation does not invite once a year, for five or ten minutes, the independent member who might be, for the Canadian people, the voice of the conscience of all those parties which have allegiances to respect and which do so sometimes at the expense of the simple and naked truth.

Mr. Chairman, I was shocked on many occasions. I shall mention one case so that the house will understand what I wish to illustrate, because most hon. members, at least the French-speaking ones, who have seen that program, must have also been shocked.

Time after time, young people of 16, 17, 18 and 19 years of age are invited on the French network. They come and tell us that God does not exist anymore, that religion is nothing but utter nonsense, a sham, whereas I believe that the young people of my province, who speak my language, have an entirely different concept of the religious philosophy which must guide a Canadian who has not lost his senses. I am surprised to see that the C.B.C. does not invite young people from my riding and others who are 16, 17, 18, 19 or 20 years old, who are still going to school and who could use their leisure doing things as frivolous as tearing down those eternal truths in which we have all believed, whatever the language or the formula we use to worship the Creator.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Instead of wasting their time at such things, those young people should be doing, for instance, what we call charitable work or they go and work in underdeveloped countries in order to rekindle the flame of friendship for such developed countries as we are, although we do not always give them any proof, and I cannot conceive that the C.B.C. does not consider having those young people appear on those programs when they occupy their free time with so serious, so constructive and so conventional concerns. It seems that nowadays everything in which the community has believed for thousands of years, should be completely demolished for the benefit of a very small minority, either Catholic or Protestant, or whatever its allegiance. However, the fact remains that we all ask ourselves, whatever our beliefs, if the world in which we live has not had a Creator, and I am surprised, I am even shocked to see the C.B.C. featuring those nihilists, those intellectual revolutionaries who are barely old enough not to be in diapers and who come and tell us that God does not exist, that the religious principles in which we believe are all a sham and foolishness, and that we should not even consider them for a minute.

Mr. Chairman, if the C.B.C.—

An hon. Member: Name the program!

Mr. Mongrain: One cannot name them all. There is "Tirez au clair", for one, and a host of others! Seminary students are guests on these programs. Where I come from, Mr. Chairman, seminaries are religious institutions and I cannot but think that such persons are chosen intentionally, to bring them on television and have them hold such language. I live among French Canadian workers, whom I have known for 20 or 25 years, and I know that they are but a very small minority to think like that. I think that hon. members from the other Quebec ridings—I speak only about the French network programs, but I imagine that the same problem arises on the English network—take the same view, for mine does not differ so much from that of others.

Mr. Chairman, the C.B.C. has no true sense of values.

The Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh) was right in saying that something was rotten within the C.B.C. Whether existentialist newspapermen and the sophisticated people we have today like it or not, I think that, for the sake of truth and objectivity, we must repeat these things in the house.

Mr. Chairman, the C.B.C. should perhaps have invited more often—at least once a year or, to be reasonable, once every two years—the only independent member in this house.

I would add that my friends in the Ralliement Créditiste are truly independent, for they do not let themselves be influenced by all these partisan considerations. I am not ready to accept their financial ideology because I do not understand it. But their leader is a good teacher and perhaps one day I will finally understand it.

Mr. Chairman, are the actual values of the society in which we are living inevitably negative values? Must the representatives of the Canadian people, who are here to play their part, destroy everything that existed until now? Must we make a clean sweep of everything we had before to take up dubious doctrines which have not proved themselves?

I think that the C.B.C. fails in its duty when it allows revolutionaries, systematic wreckers to attack the eternal values in which we believe. I think that the C.B.C. should reflect the opinion of the majority, and see to it that most programs correspond to the will of the public.

Mr. Chairman, my conclusion will be modest and probably disappointing for those who are listening to me, but I should like to conclude by saying that the Secretary of State, that brilliant young lady whom we know and admire, told the truth when she stated in the house that there was something rotten in the C.B.C. But it is equally true that there are not enough independent members being elected and who could be the "voice of conscience" for all parties, by grouping all members of goodwill who are not free to express in the house what an independent member can express. As a matter of fact, there are among the Liberal and Conservative members, the members of the New Democratic party and the Créditistes, members of parliament who have good ideas and sensible attitudes.

I will stop here as I am well aware that this will not impress the C.B.C. But I should like to have the support of other members when I say that the C.B.C. is not commissioned to give subversive ideologies an exaggerated importance but rather to serve the Canadian people in what are their strongest assets, namely those truths in which the great majority of us believe, but which the C.B.C. has apparently been taking pleasure in downgrading those past few years.

• (8:40 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Nasserden: Rising to say a few words on this supplementary estimate I would point out to the hon. member for Three Rivers that when he talks about mistakes the Liberals have made during the past three years he is talking about mistakes he himself has made, because most of the time he has been supporting the Liberals in the House of Commons.

I think it is appropriate that on a day like this we should be undertaking a study of supplementary estimates—

Mr. Mongrain: On a question of privilege. I should like to apologize to the hon. member for interrupting, but I have the impression he was speaking about myself. I missed his remarks because I did not have time to put on my earphone. Would the hon. member repeat, for my benefit, what he said?

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order.

Under the rules of the house—I do not know exactly under what standing order—it is forbidden to repeat the same thing twice. That is why, if the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain) is asking that, I wish to point out that it is forbidden under the rules.

[English]

Mr. Mongrain: On the same point of order, may I say that I did not address the hon. member for Lapointe. I addressed my question through you, Mr. Chairman, to the hon. member for Rosthern.

Mr. Nasserden: I would be glad to repeat what I said in any place in Canada as well as in the House of Commons. If the government has been making mistakes, as the hon. member for Three Rivers indicated, most of those mistakes have been his mistakes, because he supported the government on so many occasions.

[Mr. Mongrain.]

Mr. Mongrain: On a point of order. I should like to remind the hon. member that there is no city in the province of Quebec which is called Three Rivers. There is only one which is called Trois-Rivières.

Mr. Nasserden: I agree with the hon. member. And Trois-Rivières is one of the most beautiful places in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nasserden: I hope some day it will send to the House of Commons a member who will support in the House of Commons the things he speaks about.

We have before us supplementary estimates covering a variety of items and, as I say, it is appropriate that on a day such as this in the history of parliament we should be discussing the question of expenditure. If one looks at expenditures on administration in the various departments he is bound to notice that salaries and special services, including professional services, are mentioned in almost every one of them. Take the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, where the amount is $234,578. Then again, in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, we find that $67,000—

The Chairman: I am sure the hon. member was listening to the hon. member for Trois Rivières when he said we were supposed to be talking about the estimates of the Board of Broadcast Governors, and that he would do so. May I suggest the same course to the hon. member?

Mr. Nasserden: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. That is what I intend to do. I intend to relate what I am saying to the item before us, because on occasions such as this it is the duty of the opposition to draw attention to areas in which the government could make the savings necessary to prevent an increase in taxation, such as they are so desperately seeking from parliament at the present time. To assist me in this connection I have here an article taken from the report of the Auditor General telling us that the C.B.C. spent $104,000 for hotel space which it did not use and a further $217,000 for programs which were junked. Talking about programs which could be junked, I too can think of a few that could very well be junked.

Visiting my riding not too long ago I had occasion to call at the town of Duck Lake. The C.B.C. had a crew out there in connection with a program dealing with the plight of the Indian population in this country. They went into this community, not to picture what was good but to pick out everything that was undesirable, everything that cast a poor light on the people there.

They dealt with this subject in a film which was sent out across Canada on more than one occasion showing what was supposed to be the situation at Duck Lake. Mr. Chairman, they even had a man go down on his knees and wash his hands in a mud puddle. Then they called Duck Lake a mud puddle, situated halfway between Saskatoon and Prince Albert in the province of Saskatchewan.

That is the kind of thing for which we pay our money. That is why we have a government that is on the ropes today, because it has to provide the money for this kind of thing. Bearing in mind that the C.B.C. spent $104,000 on unused hotel space, how dearly must the Minister of Finance wish he had that $104,000 today. How dearly he must wish he had the $217,000 spent on programs that were junked, and the $103,000 which went into obsolete film.

When the hon. member for York-Humber was speaking on the broadcasting bill, which was his right—whether we all agree with everything he said or not—the Secretary of State offered him $5.48 if he would shut his mouth, saying that was his share of the cost of C.B.C. operations. Yet when the estimates were issued later they showed that the C.B.C. cost per capita is $7. The cabinet intimates that this is a small price to pay for a national institution such as the C.B.C., but recently one newspaper headline pointed out that civil service payrolls could bankrupt Canada.

We must consider economic conditions in the country at present. We must remember how the government has shown a careless attitude with regard to the manpower requirements not only of its departments but of the various crown corporations such as the C.B.C. When we do this we have a picture of a government that does not know how to spend money properly, yet it has the arrogance to come to parliament and seek approval for these supplementary estimates.

Items in these supplementary estimates for the various departments which have caught my eye are those for specialist and professional services. I would like to know how these are broken up and who receives these moneys. I would venture the opinion that much of these moneys go to favourites of the government engaged in the advertising business.

When the government took office it was supposed to have all the answers. It was going to solve all the problems. It was going to eliminate all the waste and extravagance in the public service. Now we see item after item in the estimates portraying the extravagant incompetence of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, having listened to the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat I am strongly tempted to say it would be interesting to ask questions about the cost of a certain Tory extravaganza, which some of us had to watch on television last summer. For a few days we had nothing but Tory propaganda broadcast across the length and breadth of the country.

Mr. Baldwin: That was educational television.

Mr. Barnett: The item under discussion is an estimate for the Board of Broadcast Governors, and I would like to make a few remarks on that topic, supplementing some observations made earlier by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond.

Mr. Reid: Don't ruin the debate, Tom, by talking about the subject.

Mr. Barnett: I did not catch that interjection.

An hon. Member: He said don't ruin the debate by talking about the subject under discussion.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I detect that you are in a somewhat indulgent mood this evening and I trust you did not catch that interjection. I wish to direct the attention of the committee, and of the parliamentary secretary who is being very attentive to the discussion, to the last section of the Broadcasting Act passed by the House of Commons recently, which says that "this act shall come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation." I think we should have some declaration from the government on when it intends to make the new Broadcasting Act operative.

This is most important so far as the operations of the new Canada Radio and Television Commission are concerned. Appointments have been made to the top executive positions in the C.B.C., and we assume those new public servants are taking a hard look at the corporation's operations and at the direction in which it should be moving. I think it is equally important that the new Canadian regulatory body should start functioning as quickly as possible.

The new regulatory body should be taking a hard look at the over-all picture concerning the future of Canadian broadcasting and should be considering the new guide lines to be laid down. In addition to the points raised by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond I wish to stress one important area which should receive early attention from the new regulatory body, and this covers the question of how the operations of community antenna systems are going to fit into the current broadcasting picture.

One of the most important changes made in the Broadcasting Act involved community antenna systems. I believe that all concerned should know as quickly as possible the rules, regulations, and the lines of departure that the new regulatory body is going to lay down in this connection. This is something of vital concern to much of the coastal area of British Columbia. At the moment it is of very real concern to certain operators within my area on Vancouver island.

As the parliamentary secretary is aware, the coastal area of British Columbia and Vancouver island is broken up by mountains which interfere with television reception. What is now needed is information on extensions planned by the C.B.C. and private broadcasters in the conventional sense, and the degree of freedom of action which community antenna system operators will enjoy, particularly in the utilization of microwave lengths.

C.A.T.V. people have expressed many fears about the prospect of their coming under the jurisdiction of the new regulatory body. I have suggested that if this new body operates as I feel it should operate, then it will protect community antenna operators, because under the terms of the legislation it must take them into consideration as part of the total broadcasting picture throughout the country.

As I have said this could be a matter of great importance and practical concern to many communities in the more isolated areas of the country which at the present time are not able to enjoy any form of television broadcasting. Associated with this I would hope that the new regulatory body, when planning the total broadcasting picture, would impress upon the C.B.C. the importance of bringing at least basic television coverage to the areas of the country which do not now have it through the public broadcasting system. Again, in mentioning the whole northern three quarters of Vancouver island, which is one area that for a long time had neither television nor radio coverage from the public broadcasting system, I am happy to say that this last year, some 13 or 14 years after I first began making representations, radio service has been brought to many of these communities. However, I understand that television coverage for these areas is a long way in the future.

I believe this matter should be given priority by the council and the C.B.C. when planning its future capital expenditures program. When considering the capital financing requirements of the C.B.C., especially in view of the further terms of reference we have given in the new act, I believe the council should recognize the importance of the C.B.C. bringing at least its basic radio and television services to the areas of Canada which now have no such services. I hope there will be an early proclamation of the new Broadcasting Act and that this will be one of the things which will be accelerated. I believe it is important that this be done and that there be no unnecessary duplication of effort and expenditure on the part of the people in the C.A.T.V. field with that of the people in the so-called conventional broadcasting field. I hope we will be given some information either from the parliamentary secretary or from the Secretary of State, if she returns before these items pass, concerning the intention of the government when the new Broadcasting Act becomes effective.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I listened earlier with great interest to the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain). He reminded me of a San Francisco hippie throwing flowers. For the past two years, he has been going around throwing bouquets right and left. I think that is somewhat the part played by the hon. member for Trois-Rivières in the house. He keeps the vase behind the curtain and when the opportunity presents itself, he does not hesitate to throw it, especially when the person involved is absent. Besides, the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) knows something about it, even though he came in for some praise this evening.

He asked earlier to take part in a program, perhaps once every two years, as he said. I would suggest to the C.B.C. that he not be given free time on the program "Les affaires de l'État," but rather on the program "Les travaux et les jours," which deals with gardening, where he would feel completely at home. On the other hand, if he is allowed to appear on the program "Les affaires de l'État, it will be more free time granted to the Liberals. The hon. member for Trois-Rivières may protest as long as he wants but we know very well that it is not necessary to dig very deep before uncovering the ideas of the Liberals in him.

Now, let us go on to more serious matters.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege.

The hon. member for Lapointe is insulting me when he says: "Let us go on to more serious matters". He is suggesting that the member for Trois-Rivières is not serious in his remarks. I want to tell him that if I were growing flowers I would not grow evil-smelling or prickly flowers like cactus.

Mr. Grégoire: Cactuses grow in barren land, not in good land.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I wonder whether we should not leave horticulture now to study the question before us.

Mr. Grégoire: That is what I wanted to do, Mr. Chairman, withdraw from growing flowers.

A few moments ago, Mr. Chairman, something about the C.B.C. impressed me particularly and I would like to give it my support: the member for Villeneuve said that all sensible ideologies, whatever they are, must be given free expression on the C.B.C., as long as this is done equitably and everyone is able to express his opinions, and there is no shedding of blood.

Mr. Chairman, one thing should be noted in all this. We would allow everyone to express their views, but this does not necessarily mean that, during a given period of time or during a same week, everyone will have the same opportunity to express their opinions. It comes by variable periods and cycles.

I remember quite well that, following the 1962 election, the Ralliement Créditiste of which I was then a member was quite popular and was invited regularly by the C.B.C., as was the case following the 1963 election.

I remember also that the Conservatives had a lot of publicity, on the news, for two or three months before their convention and that they were given two full days during their convention.

Now, that the Liberal convention is forthcoming, we notice that the candidates to the leadership are given more publicity on the news and they will get even more as the date of the convention draws near. And that is only to be expected.

I noticed also that, during the crisis of February 19 last, when I held in this house the balance of power, the C.B.C., of course, wanted to know what side I would support. It did not last very long because at the end of two days, it was the hon. member for Villeneuve who took over. The television cameras started hounding him, and I find that perfectly normal, because his role became more important.

In 1962-1963, when the Créditistes had 30 members in this house with 26 from Quebec they had some weight and they were a source of news much more important than in 1958 when none had been elected or in 1968 when there is only 8 of them left. The thing is obvious.

Mr. Chairman, we must admit that these things can vary. If, after the next election, they are 50, as I hope, they will represent a greater source of news.

Mr. Caouette: Fifty Créditistes.

Mr. Grégoire: Fifty Créditistes, that is what I said. That will be a much greater source of public news. Sometimes it is the number, sometimes it is the occasion, that attracts the cameras.

I mentioned earlier the Conservative convention as well as the Liberal convention. In such a case it is the occasion which is the source of news and which brings the television cameras zeroing in on such group rather than on other groups. It is perfectly normal. As was the case in 1962, 1963, the Créditistes have had their day—they will probably have it again, I hope so for their sake we must not forget that at the present time, at the Quebec level, there is another group which is also newsworthy. It may not be because of the number of members represented in the house, since there is one here, and two in Quebec. It may not be either on account of a special occasion but it might come from something else such as, for instance, new ideas. All this is information, and nobody—neither the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) nor the C.B.C.—can forget it. All these factors must be taken into consideration for that is what makes the news.

For example, when a new power group scores a success, as did the Ralliement Créditiste in 1962; when a party holds a convention, as the Conservatives did last year and the Liberals will this year; when a special event occurs, such as the crisis of last February 19—all this makes news of various degrees of importance and coming from various sources. It allows each particular group to come into the limelight at one time and recede into the shadows at another time. That is normal.

What I find abnormal is that a director general—I do not remember his exact title —Mr. Marcel Ouimet, the general manager of the C.B.C., should send "secret and urgent" messages condemning the publicity given to the so-called "Lévesque Gang". I do not consider that as normal for several reasons.

First of all, the Independentists, as any other group, pay taxes. Furthermore, they are good news material, since they have something new to offer at a given time or period. They come up with new ideas as others could.

Secondly, the number of his appearances on television is considered as "secret", although it has never been so for others. Why send a secret and urgent message to condemn the number of times that the name of Mr. Lévesque has been mentioned, when no general investigation was launched to assess the publicity obtained by others on the basis of news they could represent and the circumstances under which they made the news? If instead of a secret and urgent message, a general investigation were launched by the C.B.C. services, on the number of times politicians have appeared, the circumstances under which they did appear and the sources of such news, perhaps then conclusions could be drawn other than those deriving from a mere interest in a specific ideology, the Quebec independence movement, caused by its novelty.

For a year, there have nevertheless been two members in Quebec and one in Ottawa.

Mr. Caouette: May I put a question to the hon. member?

[Mr. Grégoire.]

A few days ago, as all those who listened to the news on the national television network, I heard Mr. Pierre Bourgault twice airing his grievances against Mrs. Ferretti, vice-president of his group.

Does the hon. member think that can be called expressing ideas? Must the C.B.C. allow time for quarrels inside a party, between Mrs. Ferretti and Mr. Pierre Bourgault, for instance?

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I will give two answers.

I remember very well that when a former member of the Ralliement Créditiste, Dr. Guy Marcoux, left the party, the C.B.C. news service broadcast the ideas expressed by Dr. Marcoux, by the hon. member for Villeneuve, by myself and by another member of the Ralliement Créditiste.

Moreover, when the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) decided to sit as an independent Progressive Conservative member a week ago, he was allowed to explain the reasons of his decision and the causes of the division within his party.

The R.I.N. has called a conference which is to be held on March 30. This party has several thousands of members but it is divided. The supporters of both viewpoints have been allowed to air their views. I must point out that the R.I.N. receives much less publicity on the C.B.C. than the Liberal party can have now and this is understandable. It receives much less publicity than the Conservatives during their convention last September.

I think I have answered the question.

Mr. Guay: No.

Mr. Grégoire: The member for Villeneuve asked me if I could explain the matter and I said yes. He had two reasons. First, the R.I.N. convention is the object of as many comments as the Liberal convention taking place at this time and the one the Conservatives had, last September.

Second, that quibbling has been explained over the news, just as all other quibblings that have taken place.

These are but two examples.

Mr. Guay: Bourgault is not a member of the house.

Mr. Grégoire: That does not make any difference. It is a political movement that has its justification.

In this connection, I would remind the hon. member for Villeneuve, for the benefit of the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay) that before 1962, when we did not have any member in the house, when we were in the same position as that referred to by the hon. member for Lévis, the hon. member for Villeneuve and I were saying that nothing represented in the House of Commons, was not a sufficient reason to be deprived of the news services from the C.B.C. Any ideology should be freely expressed. It is after elections that public opinion makes itself known.

Mr. Caouette: I wish to point out that before the election, the C.B.C. never asked us to express our views or to say anything. On the other hand, when the disagreement arose, we had actually been elected by the people, whereas neither Mr. Bourgault nor Mrs. Ferretti were and will ever be elected.

Mr. Grégoire: I admit that they were not, but I am not a prophet any more than the hon. member for Villeneuve to say that they will not be. Just wait and see.

The hon. member asks me whether I admit that before 1952, we had never been asked. I will not say "never", but I agree that even without a single elected member, we were far from getting the publicity we were entitled to. We were told at that time, as the hon. member for Villeneuve will remember, that the Ralliement Créditiste would not get a single member elected. But we got 26 elected.

And now, the hon. member for Villeneuve says: You will not get a single member elected! He will admit with me that by saying that we will not get one member elected—

Mr. Caouette: I mean at the federal parliament.

Mr. Grégoire: We do not intend to run for the federal parliament and the hon. member knows it. But he must confess that he is using now the same arguments the Liberals used at that time. I would ask him to show his good faith by calling on him, in any event—

Mr. Mongrain: May I ask my hon. friend a question?

Mr. Grégoire: Of course.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member for Lapointe not make a distinction between what is usually called newscasts, interviews, forums or expressions of opinions which are presented as being the opinions of most people?

Mr. Grégoire: Of course, Mr. Chairman, one must make distinctions in all that. But whether on news programs or elsewhere, all ideologies have their place.

If a political party, for instance, even one not represented in parliament by a member, brings together in a convention 1,000, 1,200 or 1,400 persons in Quebec only, that is news.

The member is asking whether I admit the difference. I also admit that all ideologies must have access to the opinion programs, for these ideas must be presented to the public. I think that all ideologies have a right to both kinds of programs, opinion and news.

Mr. Chairman, I think my answer satisfies the member for Villeneuve. He has suffered enough discrimination from the Liberals, before 1962. As I am personally aware of the situation, I think he is satisfied with my answer.

When you have been in the same situation, Mr. Chairman, you understand what I mean. The hon. member for Villeneuve knows what I mean when I say that even though we did not have any elected representative before 1962, we represented an ideology. The fact that we did not have any elected member at that time did not prove anything, since we had 26 elected later on. I hope there will be as many in the future.

Mr. Caouette: But we did not have any before.

Mr. Grégoire: We had some after. People believed in that theory, since we had 26 members elected. That, we know afterwards. But beforehand, we should not try to stifle ideologies.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. Chairman, I am now reverting to the point I was dealing with. What worries me most is that a general manager of the C.B.C. should send "confidential and urgent" messages condemning on ideology because the name of a certain person or that of his movement were mentioned a certain number of times—28 times, I think—in the space of ten days, three weeks or a month.

In my opinion, that is not right. If somebody wishes to have such inquiries made and to quote figures, this should be done for all and in an honest way. I do not see why such messages should be sent confidentially, since the public must be interested in knowing these figures.

The proof is that the hon. member for Villeneuve and I myself have already put on the order paper questions asking how often a certain person had appeared on television, on a certain program, and we have always received an answer.

So, why send secret messages? What is there to conceal in all that? What does the manager of the C.B.C. want to hide? Would he want to prepare a black list of independentists? Why, Mr. Chairman? They are citizens who are entitled to their opinions as long as they express them peaceably and quietly, and I think that they are now expressing their opinions quietly and peaceably.

Mr. Guay: 7-Up.

Mr. Grégoire: The hon. member for Lévis says: 7-Up. The Liberal party was there, as well as the members of the N.D.P., the Q.F.L. and the C.N.T.U. Let us not try to blame what does not exist. Some individuals may have taken advantage of the circumstance to create trouble. We do not approve it; on the contrary, we disapprove it; we condemn it. But as long as we do it peacefully and quietly, there is no reason to try to prevent the expression of any ideology.

Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain) mentioned that all political parties were invited to the programs "Les affaires de l'État" and "La politique provinciale".

It should not be forgotten that at the last provincial election, 9.9 per cent of the people, that is 200,000 persons, voted for the independentists, and out of 25 programs available to the provincial parties, only one went to the independentist parties. Do you find that sufficient considering that independentists got 10 per cent of the vote? Can you say that that is normal and reasonable? Mr. Chairman, I think it would be advisable to ask the C.B.C. to revise its calculations in this regard.

That is what I wanted to say. I think the general manager of the C.B.C., Mr. Marcel Ouimet, should stop trying to build a black list around ideologies, around individuals who have the right to express themselves on the C.B.C. He should become a bit more broad-minded and allow everyone to make himself heard, and not prevent the Independantists from appearing on the C.B.C. because, like everybody else, they pay taxes to support that institutions.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Chairman, some time ago we had the opportunity of expressing our views and our wishes with regard to the C.B.C. I do not therefore intend to repeat the opinions expressed at that time.

Nor do I want to repeat the recriminations, the personal complaints and lamentations voiced by the members for Trois-Rivières, Lapointe and Villeneuve (Messrs. Mongrain, Grégoire and Caouette) because by so doing we would be straying from the purpose of the debate in which we are taking part this evening.

However, while we are studing item 1 of those estimates, I should like to express the views of those who elected me here, to acquaint my colleagues and the government with their views on that crown corporation.

I repeat that I do not intend to lean to generalities that I could lead us to criticisms with regard to all fields of administration of the C.B.C. I do not have to do so as recently, the regional director of the French network, Mr. Marcel Ouimet, in non-equivocal and extremely overwhelming terms severely criticized the conduct of his subordinates. What concerns me is to see that a responsible person in such an important position within a crown corporation should deem it necessary to accuse publicly employees under his own authority. Moreover, those charges were so serious that they infected and affected as well the confidence the public should have in this crown corporation. I said "infected" as I believe there is within the C.B.C. an infection which the regional director of the French network deemed necessary to expose publicly. We all know—all the members of the house are aware of it, whether they admit it or not—that there is within that organization an all-powerful control depending not upon the higher authorities, but in many cases upon those holding inferior positions in the hierarchy. We know, for instance, that there is in the field of public affairs an all-powerful person who determines what programs of public interest will be broadcast by the C.B.C. and what people should be chosen to take part in them.

Finally, that person whose name I believe I can mention, Mr. Marc Thibault, enjoys a greatly exaggerated authority within that crown corporation. Several employees of the C.B.C. complained to my office in the past about the omnipotence, the power of that high official who domineers over the public information broadcasts and controls them according to his whims.

So, if the regional director—

Mr. Caouette: Not the regional director, the general director.

Mr. Valade: —the general director of the French network deems it necessary to make such a criticism known to the public, it is because, in my view, he seems unable to solve the problem. On account of the part he is made to play, of the little authority or the little protection he is given by the government, he felt, at a given time, the need to express publicly his uneasiness in the face of conditions he is unable to correct by himself.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I have been listening to my friend, the hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade), who is usually very objective, but I would not want him to lead the house astray. Twice now I have heard him say that the vice-president wanted to discuss publicly a matter of internal administration, when everyone knows that those were confidential instructions sent within the C.B.C. administration. It was through the indiscretion of some journalists that they were made public. The vice-president did not publish them.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Chairman, I do not feel that the point of order raised by the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain) is justified.

If those instructions leaked out or were published in the papers because of an indiscretion, I am willing to take the word of the hon. member for Trois-Rivières for it.

On the other hand, with regard to Mr. Ouimet's statement, one may wonder whether there really was a leak or whether, in certain quarters, someone did not want those instructions to appear in the newspapers.

In any case, whatever the technique that was used, one cannot deny that there is very deep unrest within that corporation, specially when a person in authority such as Mr. Ouimet, feels unable to solve as difficult a problem as that one. I think that, in a case like this it is the duty of parliament or of this government to step into the picture. After the violent accusations the Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh) launched against the corporation, I wonder what we are waiting for to show that we are not afraid of a corporation which is in some way the child of the government, that we do not hesitate to protect the interests of the public which must pay the cost of the corporation, to set up the machinery of an inquiry?

Let us convene the committee on broadcasting, films and assistance to the arts, let us conduct an inquiry, in camera if necessary, but, if we have some respect for those who have elected us, I do not think we should allow all kinds of doubts or implications to subsist. If there is any basis to them, the situation should be corrected. Otherwise, those who cast doubts within the C.B.C. should be blamed.

I do not want, Mr. Chairman, to dwell further on that point. I will probably have the opportunity to bring it up again, but I would like now to refer to an extremely important thing for the city of Montreal.

Several years ago, that is in 1958, 1959 and 1960, the C.B.C. began negotiations with the Montreal authorities for the construction of a complex for the technical facilities, the studios, cameras, indeed for all that is required for the new television technique.

The former government had committed itself, with the city of Montreal and Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation to build in the eastern part of the metropolis what was known as the "Cite des Ondes".

As we know, this project was to have been started on October 1st, 1965. But of course, after election day, it was put off until October 1st, 1966. The present Secretary of State, and the one before her, who is now in the other place, had, at a number of public meetings, promised the Montreal taxpayers that no delay would be tolerated on this project.

However even though it is of vital importance to the metropolis of Canada, it has been continuously put off. At that time we believed the minister when she said, that this "Cité des Ondes" project was being put off until the end of Expo '67, in view of the considerable amount of works that would accrue to Montreal because of Expo.

Expo is over now; business is extraordinarily slack in the city of Montreal, where you find more than 8 per cent of the unemployed of Quebec. All merchants, businessmen, citizens and workers, who are interested in knowing the government's intentions as regards this project, are still waiting for the implementation of this election promise by a minister, by a government which have given no indication yet of their intentions concerning the execution of that project.

Some people say it will be worth $70 million. Perhaps the population will be told that because of the austerity program, the government lacks the money. Perhaps the government will say: We cannot afford it, and the project must again be put off.

However, Mr. Chairman, in that is a political and moral obligation of the Liberal government towards the people of Montreal. It consists in carrying out that project in Montreal without any delay. If there is a lack of money, perhaps the government could reduce the C.B.C. budget by $15 or $20 million a year, and after three years, it would have paid for the new buildings of the corporation.

We have no right to leave the entire population of the metropolis of Canada in a state of indecision. All this is extremely prejudicial to the businessmen and the people of the eastern part of Montreal.

I am surprised—and I say this without reflecting whatsoever on my Montreal colleagues—at the silence of my friends opposite who represent ridings in the Montreal area. The population is greatly concerned over the government's delay in carrying out that project and I am surprised to find that no Liberal member from Montreal is rising to insist that his party, the present government, keep its formal commitment toward the people of Montreal. If the government fails to make its intentions known, whatever they are, the people of Montreal will surely not forget it. The government should recognize that that is a formal commitment, an undertaking, an election promise that it is not keeping and has not kept. Mr. Chairman, I feel I had to emphasize in this house that oversight, that anomaly on the part of the Liberal party.

Those are the few remarks I wanted to make.

I want to stress again that millions of dollars which could be invested in the eastern part of the city of Montreal will be so only when the people, the businessmen and the contractors know whether or not those buildings will be erected in the eastern part of Montreal as promised. Incidentally, I met several people who assured me that there will be a recrudescence of activity in the eastern part of the metropolis, as soon as the government makes its intentions known. It will certainly help the workers to get some work and alleviate the serious problem of unemployment which exists in the Canadian metropolis.

[English]

Mr. Brand: Mr. Chairman, I intend to be mercifully brief. When the hon. member for Rosthern was cataloguing the waste the Auditor General found in the C.B.C., to the extent of $320 thousand. I could not help thinking back a year when the Board of Broadcast Governors approved the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's request that television facilities should be built in the city of Saskatoon, my constituency. This facility had been promised for many years and suddenly the cabinet, faced with financial problems and all the other internal problems, squashed the idea very completely. I thought perhaps that now was as good a time as any to rise and briefly ask the government once again whether or not they would consider reinstating the construction of this facility. They seem willing to see $320 thousand wasted which incidentally was the amount of money voted in the estimates from which this facility in Saskatoon would have been supplied. Somehow or other, the money got lost.

I can assure you that the people of my constituency, who are contributing something over $7 per capita to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, would be more than interested in being able to assess the results of their investment in this crown corporation. Saskatoon is the only city of its size in Canada that does not have a second television facility, and I feel the time has come when this should be provided. In addition, provision should be made for a satellite transmitter to cover the other areas to the west. A year has gone by, and we have been very patient in my city. If the aspirants for leadership have any influence at all,—yes, even the good looking ones, and I note that three of them smiled when I said that—it would be very much to their advantage to press on their cabinet colleagues the need for allowing this facility before April 6. Certainly we believe we are entitled to it. Heaven knows we are paying for it. I feel we should have the opportunity to decide whether or not our money is being well spent.

The only C.B.C. programs we get from the station we have are the ones the C.B.C. dumps on that station. Some of them are good, I will admit, that, but some of them are utter trash, as has been pointed out before. I should like to tell the government that from now on, as long as the house is sitting, I intend to raise this matter at every possible opportunity until they see the error of their ways and allow Saskatoon the privilege of having a C.B.C. facility in that city.

Mr. Sherman: Mr. Chairman, I am one of those in this chamber who during the past two years or more has on several occasions had some stern and critical things to say about the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, particularly in the area of public affairs programming on television. Therefore it may surprise some members of the committee this evening to learn that I come here not to bury Caesar but to praise him.

I believe that the criticisms that have been levelled at C.B.C. public affairs programming on television during the past two years by a number of members of this chamber, including the hon. member for Elgin, the hon. member for Oxford, the hon. member for Leeds, myself and others who have spoken out, were entirely legitimate. Certainly I know they were criticisms made by those who were entirely sincere and conscientious, and I am now satisfied that those criticisms were compeletly constructive.

I think it is becoming apparent to an encouraging degree, albeit to a limited extent, that some of the shafts of criticism have found their target and are producing some improvements. I like to think that it is because members of the chamber, as well as members of the general public, editorial writers and members of the press, have taken it upon themselves to speak out in this area and objectively and constructively to analyse and assess what our public broadcasting service is doing, what it is achieving and where it is falling short of its legitimate aims, that these encouraging improvements, gradual and minimal as they may be, are now becoming evident in our national broadcasting programming.

I exclude myself from any participation in this exercise, but as far as the others to whom I have referred are concerned I suggest they can take some well earned satisfaction at the degree of study and application that they have brought to bear on this question. In the past little while public affairs programming in the C.B.C. television service has reflected a substantial improvement in the area of balanced programs, an area about which many of us expressed concern. I think this improvement is reflected in a general healthiness in the programming of the corporation that was not present before.

There are two cases immediately in point. I think of some excellent public affairs shows on C.B.C. television last week, one on India and another on the anatomy of communist espionage. I also think of what I found to be a moving experience last night when producer Beryl Fox's tribute to Bernard Fall was presented on C.B.C. television in the form of a documentary film entitled "Last Reflections on a War". Personally, Mr. Chairman, I found my exposure to that hour of documentary film a moving experience and an infinitely poignant one. I do not agree entirely with the persuasion of the film itself, but generally I thought it was a fair, objective, valuable and, as I said before, infinitely poignant contribution to the current bibliography on Viet Nam.

I did not feel that way about the first film that was produced by Beryl Fox entitled "Mills of the Gods", an award winning film which admittedly was technically and artistically excellent. I did not feel, however, that the content, philosophy, persuasion and message of that film was entirely constructive, objective, fair or balanced. However, that is my personal opinion, and I dare say that others in the country, and certainly Miss Fox herself, have a view that is opposed to mine. I thought her first documentary left something to be desired and I have said so both inside and outside the chamber.

However, Mr. Chairman, whatever shortcomings were found in the first documentary poem that Miss Fox did on Viet Nam, and whatever weaknesses and errors were there, these were more than overcome and compensated for last evening in her moving film that the C.B.C. screened last night under her production, "Last Reflections on a War". I do not believe that such a documentary could possibly have been shown on the C.B.C. network two years ago. Two years ago, even a year ago, I felt that this was the type of balance or objectivity that was desperately needed in television programming on the national network of this country but which we were failing to get because of a particular cant, slant or point of view that was being brought to international affairs as a result of certain influences that were being exerted in the programming department of the C.B.C. However, this kind of objective approach is now possible, and the documentary screened last night was a manifestation of that approach.

Some members of this house, and other people outside it who have spoken out during the last two years or more against what they felt was a serious weakness in the programming policy of the C.B.C., can now take some well deserved credit for having achieved improvement in this particular area. It is an improvement that a great many Canadians—I venture to say the majority of Canadians—desperately and devoutly wished and which they now hail with considerable satisfaction.

On the whole, Mr. Chairman, I think the programming is now considerably better balanced. There is certainly less of what I regarded as blatant and unreasonable anti-Americanism in the C.B.C. television news broadcasts and some of the more telescopic public affairs programs such as "Viewpoint". As I say, I think this creeping evidence of balanced objectivity is a response to the views enunciated in this chamber and articulated by people outside the chamber, not just by professionals, such as members of the press and people in other areas of professional life who have spoken up, but by the average citizen who has made his opinions known through the mail, at meetings and by word of mouth. I suggest they can take satisfaction from something that represents an obvious improvement in our national broadcasting service and its approach to national events and affairs. Much needs to be done, but there is evidence of the legitimacy of many of the criticisms some of us expressed about the C.B.C.

About ten days ago, Mr. Marcel Ouimet, a top executive of the corporation, felt constrained to issue a directive focussing attention on separatist influences and programming tendencies within the corporation. Inside and outside this chamber during the past two years, evidence, with supporting documentation, was given of this unfortunate and nefarious practice. Unfortunately, though, these activities have been hard to prove. Such activities, which are sensational and invite criticism, tend to compromise the credibility of the person making a charge. I think that those who spoke out against the use of existing C.B.C. facilities for the spread of separatist influences are to be commended.

The criticisms of the corporation which have been made are justified beyond all shadow of doubt. Because of Mr. Marcel Ouimet's initiative a few days ago evidence in black and white was brought forward to show that this unfortunate manipulation and exploitation of national broadcasting facilities, for which each and every one of us pays, was taking place. The evidence of that manipulation and exploitation was so serious and strong that a senior executive, Mr. Ouimet, felt constrained to tell all program and production personnel working under him that he was aware of this practice, and that it was their responsibility in the interests of Canada and confederation to eliminate it so far as was constitutionally and legally practicable within the national corporation. At the same time it must be remembered that a great many people in the corporation display loyalty and patriotism to this nation.

Much needs to be done to improve the corporation, as was made evident in the past few days. Nevertheless, having been fairly free with my criticisms of the C.B.C., I wish to take this opportunity to say that I believe in giving credit where credit is due. I believe a concerted effort has been made in recent weeks on the part of program directors and senior executives of the C.B.C. to bring a new balance to their public affair programs, and I commend them for that. There is room for better balance, as there is always room and need for vigilance and management responsibility, but a start has been made in the direction of improving matters. I should be delinquent as a member of this chamber and as one who is interested in this field if I failed to recognize the improvement that has taken place.

May I say a word or two about the Board of Broadcast Governors, covered by this item in the estimates. Though some of my remarks have not dealt with this central subject, since Your Honour was charitable enough to allow others to deviate from it I hoped you would allow me to do the same, and I thank you for allowing me a certain latitude.

When considering the B.B.G. we must realize that in Canadian broadcasting we have come to the end of an era, an important era in an important industry. Soon the B.B.G. will be phased out of existence, to be replaced by the regulatory authority, the Canadian Radio and Television Commission. It behooves us now to salute an authoritative body that has made great contributions to Canadian broadcasting. In particular it behooves members of this house to salute the outgoing head of the B.B.G., Dr. Andrew Stewart. I do not know what plans Dr. Stewart has for his future because I have not been privy to any decision that has been made. However, judging from the silence on the subject I should judge that Dr. Stewart is not planning to extend his active life in broadcasting at this time. If one may judge from the lack of comment with regard to C.R.T.C. appointments up to now and with regard to Dr. Stewart's future plans, one might expect that Dr. Stewart will be employing his many talents in fields other than broadcasting, though what those fields will be it is difficult to say.

I wanted to say some things about the B.B.G. which the house I think would wish to hear, but time does not permit me to do so now. Perhaps within the next 24 hours I might be permitted to continue my remarks. May I call it ten o'clock?

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Since it is ten o'clock shall I rise, report progress and request leave to sit again?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the government house leader what surprises the government has for us tomorrow?

Mr. MacEachen: Tomorrow we want to take second reading of the tax bill.

Mr. Knowles: Which one?

Mr. MacEachen: Following that, we shall take the supplementary estimates.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—SASKATCHEWAN—MEDICAL DECISIONS AFFECTING STERILIZATION AND CONTRACEPTIVES

Mr. L. M. Brand (Saskatoon): On February 8 I addressed a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development asking whether he had received letters of protest from certain medical authorities in Saskatchewan regarding actions by officials of the department of Indian affairs in making arbitrary and long distance medical decisions contrary to those made by the local doctors with respect to treating Indians in connection with medical sterilization and the use of contraceptive pills.

Quite properly, the minister pointed out at that time that I should have addressed my question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare within whose purview the question of the health of Indians comes. However, I should like to point out that I deliberately addressed the question to the minister of Indian affairs because it seemed inconceivable to me that decisions affecting Indians and the manner in which they are treated should be made unilaterally by the Department of National Health and Welfare, without consultation with the minister of Indian affairs.

Needless to say, when this matter was brought to my attention I was very perturbed about two factors in particular, first that there should be bureaucratic interference with bona fide medical decisions and, second, that there should be an attempt by the department, whichever it was, to control Indians—to consider them as some sort of imbecile ward of a government department.

The question came to my mind whether we were encouraging the Indian people toward self-determination by acting in this way, and whether this bureaucratic interference with valid medical decisions should be permitted. In support of my statement I have here a copy of a letter from the Department of National Health and Welfare in which, after a reference to the sterilization of two particular native people who are mentioned, the following appears:

> Sterilization for Indians is not condoned as a directorate policy, nor is the routine use of contraceptive device or pill. However, with certain medical grounds contraceptive techniques are allowed under physician guidance.

It is true there are valid medical reasons for sterilization, apart from any policy which might be laid down by a bureaucratic administration. For example one could mention chronic disease, such as kidney disease or tuberculosis where further pregnancies would exacerbate the disease, and where there are several children in the family and it was felt sterilization should be carried out. And there are many gynaecological reasons for precluding further pregnancies unless grave risk to the mother is accepted.

The use of the contraceptive pill may also be justified for valid and cogent medical reasons, not just for the social reasons which we have all come to understand. Today we seem to be asking for self-determination for our Indian people, the development of a spirit of self reliance so that they can look after themselves and play their part to the full in our society because, after all, they are the true founding people of this country. Accordingly, it seems to me this interference with valid medical decisions should be ended and that Indians should be given freedom to make decisions for themselves under proper medical guidance.

I would be very interested in hearing either from the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Laing), who I know has a sympathetic regard for this sort of problem, or from the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mrs. Rideout), to see whether or not this policy is going to be reversed, and what are the plans of the departments to look after what to me appears to be a very serious problem.

Mrs. Margaret Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have checked with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Laing) about the question the hon. member has raised, and I have been advised that he has received no letters protesting the action that his officials allegedly took in connection with medical sterilization and the use of contraceptive pills by Indians. In any event these matters would normally come within the purview of the Department of National Health and Welfare. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has also informed me that his officials did not send out a directive regarding sterilization or the use of contraceptive pills by Indians.

AGRICULTURE—POTATOES—IMPORTS FROM U.S. INTO WESTERN CANADA

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful that the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Beer) is present to listen to the subject matter which I wish to bring to the attention of the department and the minister. What is involved is an application by the Canadian Horticultural Council, on behalf of the potato growers organizations of Manitoba, Alberta and British Columbia, made to the minister in an attempt to get him to consider imposing value for duty on the importation of potatoes from the United States.

The application for the imposition of value for duty was made on January 22, by which time the groups involved had already become concerned about the effect which American surplus potatoes was having on prices paid to producers in western Canada. The application was followed up by a delegation which came to see the minister in Ottawa in February. Since then there has been no indication from the minister as to whether he will accede to this request.

Last week I asked the minister if he was in a position to say whether his officials had made any calculations to determine whether in fact there was dumping of American potatoes in Canada. The minister has said that one of the reasons the government has not as yet agreed to the imposition of value for duty is because of the opposition to such a course of action by maritime provinces potato shippers. It is not clear in my mind, nor in the minds of western potato growers and their representatives, whether the potato shippers from the maritimes are truly representative of the growers or whether they are more representative of the wholesaler and distributor segments of the potato industry in that part of the country.

In any case I would like to point out that section 40(7)(b) of the Customs Act provides that the minister may have a calculation made as to the importation of any fruit or vegetable into this country to determine whether or not the price at which they come in constitutes dumping. The minister should do at least that much. He should indicate to the people who have made this request to him six weeks ago what the findings of his officials were with regard to their application. He should not just simply sit back and say that they are giving the application consideration, but that because they have this opposition from the maritimes they do not feel it would be wise to take any action just yet.

The fact of the matter is that very often when a value for duty imposition is requested by producers, if action is not taken within two or three weeks it really loses its effectiveness. At the time in late January when the application was made approximately 40 per cent of western Canadian potato production was still not marketed. As a result of the procrastination and the failure to impose the value for duty there has been a depressing effect on prices to the producers in western Canada. Twenty per cent of that 40 per cent has still to be marketed.

When does the minister intend to take action in this regard and impose a value for duty? If another six week period goes by he might as well forget it. It should be said in closing that the potato growers in western Canada have had to suffer through two consecutive years of depressed prices. This is not a healthy situation for any industry. Last year it could have been argued that the low price was due to over-production on the part of the producers themselves. I believe the minister suggested this last year. His advice was heeded by the growers and aided perhaps by nature. The fact is that potato production is down considerably in Canada this year, but despite this reduction the over-all prices remain depressed. They remain depressed because of the huge surplus south of the line which, as I said, is acting as a depressant on Canadian potato prices.

There is much more in the way of fact and figures which I should like to place on the record, but this is not necessary in view of the fact that the minister was in receipt of the brief and the application of the Western Canadian Potato Growers Association. They show a formula which under the provisions of section 40(7)(b) of the Customs Act could mean that the minister could take action to place a value for duty on American potatoes at a level of approximately $2.75. If this were done I am sure Canadian producers would be satisfied. By doing this the minister would be doing nothing more than what is provided for under the law. The law is there and I should like to know why the minister does not avail himself of it.

Mr. Bruce S. Beer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I should like to express the appreciation of the minister and my own personal appreciation to the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Schreyer) for the very responsible way in which he has presented his question. I am pleased tonight that I have a rather straight-forward answer for him, which I am sure he will find helpful, if not as encouraging as it might be.

Early in February the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene) and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Chrétien) met with representatives of the British Columbia interior vegetable marketing board, the British Columbia coast vegetable marketing board, the Alberta potato commission and the Manitoba vegetable marketing commission at which time they requested that the government impose a minimum value for duty on potatoes imported into western Canada under section 40A(7) of the Customs Act. They indicated that their application had the support of potato growers organizations in Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Alberta and British Columbia. However they indicated that concurrence in their application was refused by officials of the growers, shippers and processors associations of Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

Following these representations the government set up an interdepartmental committee to consider the application. A review of the situation by this committee indicated that a minimum value for duty on potatoes imported from the United States was not appropriate under conditions existing at that time. In reaching this conclusion the major factors that were considered were:

1. The relative volumes moving from the United States into Canada;

2. The importance of the trade in potatoes between Canada and the United States;

3. The lack of unanimity and the opposition to the imposition of value for duty on potatoes by other growers across Canada;

4. Our obligations under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade;

5. The fact that the United States was at that time instituting a potato diversion program aimed at strengthening their market.

Since then the matter has been kept under continuous review by departmental officials and has been considered from time to time at the ministerial level. In the meantime prices in the United States have firmed and this has been reflected in prices in western Canada. The situation, however, is being kept under review.

COMPANY OF YOUNG CANADIANS—REPORTED SUBSIDIZATION OF PRIVATE SCHOOLS IN B.C.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, my question arises out of a program which appeared on television yesterday, "Through The Eyes of Tomorrow", which dealt with three private schools in the Vancouver area, the New School, the Barker School and the Knowplace School. At no time during the course of the program was any mention made that two of these schools, the Barker School and the Knowplace School, are being subsidized by the federal government through the Company of Young Canadians.

This was a rather surprising oversight because we know that the Company of Young Canadians recently hired a public relations officer whose job it is to see that this organization obtains wide coverage for its activities.

On the other hand, I think anyone viewing the program would understand the oversight, because I am sure that the average taxpaying citizen would not be reassured, after watching the activities in the schools, to realize that his tax dollar was going to subsidize a private school.

I raised the question of the Knowplace School, but if there is any doubt about it, with regard to the Barker School there is an article in the Vancouver Province of February 14, written by Mr. Wilf Bennett, which reads in part as follows:

> Barker admits his school would be out of business this year if it weren't for a boost from the Company of Young Canadians. His staff teachers are C.Y.C. members, drawing incomes of $2,600 a year —not princely by today's teacher salary standards but enough to get by on. The C.Y.C. is backing the school for just one year.

Also, there is an article which appeared in an issue of "The Ubyssey", the student newspaper of the University of British Columbia, which reads in part as follows:

> Barker admits his school would have been out of business this year if the Company of Young Canadians had not agreed to pay the salaries of his staff. "We charge parents what they can afford to pay, but this doesn't nearly cover our costs. If it weren't for the C.Y.C., we couldn't have operated this year."

So I do not think there is any doubt about the involvement of the C.Y.C. in an activity that is completely outside the scope of the act under which that organization was set up. Certainly sections 14 and 15 of the act dealing with the objects and powers of the company expressly indicate that it is to work alongside of and in co-operation with the existing organizations in the field. This would include the field of education. Anyone watching the television program would realize that a good deal of the time is spent in direct criticism of the existing school organizations.

• (10:20 p.m.)

Again I might draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to an article from The Ubyssey written by one Terry Campbell for the Canadian University Press. Speaking of the schools, he said:

> The second thing that is clear is the youngsters who are coming out of the free schools are going to be very different from our normal schools system's product.
> They will not be complacent acceptors of the status quo or apathetic citizens. They will be the product of an organized attack against the existing educational structure and are going to expand this attack into other areas of society.
> The movement is young and spreading. Its ultimate results remain to be seen.

This is one observer's view of the activities which the federal government is subsidizing through its Company of Young Canadians. I would argue that it was not the intention of this parliament when it passed the bill to launch an attack on the public schools system of British Columbia or of any other province. I would ask seriously whether the federal government is investigating the constitutional factors involved in this most remarkable intrusion of the federal government into the field of education in a province.

Mr. John R. Matheson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this question was raised by my friend, the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke, this afternoon, and his representations will be brought to the attention of Mr. Alan Clarke, the director of the Company of Young Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The motion to adjourn the house is now deemed to have been adopted. The house stands adjourned until 2.30 p.m. tomorrow afternoon.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

GRAIN

WHEAT, OATS AND BARLEY—STATEMENT AS TO FINAL PAYMENTS

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a brief statement regarding final payments for barley and oats. Producers delivered 35,-104,357 bushels of oats and 106,155,792 bushels of barley to the Canadian Wheat Board in the 1966-67 crop year. The pools for these two crops were closed on January 31. The amounts of the final payments to be distributed are $8,402,616 for oats and a record $35,-798,202 for barley.

These are not payments by the government of Canada, but represent the net returns of the Canadian Wheat Board in the marketing of western Canadian oats and barley for the 1966-67 crop year. The board will begin mailing the final payment cheques for barley today, and immediately after completion of the barley payments the final payment cheques for oats will be distributed. The average final payment for barley of 33.7 cents a bushel has been exceeded only once, and the average final payment for oats of 23.9 cents per bushel is just slightly below last year's record payment.

I beg leave, Mr. Speaker, to table the statement being issued today in Winnipeg by the Canadian Wheat Board regarding these final payments.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to table this document?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Winters: The 1966-67 wheat pool account was closed on February 29 and the necessary accounting is now being completed. I expect to be able to make an announcement in about two weeks, when the board will be in a position to commence mailing the final payment cheques for wheat. I may say, however, that through international co-operation toward the implementation of the international grains arrangement scheduled for July 1, the marketing of wheat is now more orderly both as to demand and price.

Mr. W. H. Jorgenson (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, the farmers of western Canada will be pleased to learn that the cheques in payment for oats and barley will be issued soon. Since sales during the past crop year have been much below previous years there is a very serious shortage of cash in the hands of farmers with which to pay the necessary production costs. I might add that as a result of the fact this government has seen fit to contribute greatly to the increased cost of production, these cheques will be most welcome. During the past two years farm costs have risen at an alarming rate, and farmers are caught in a very serious cost-price squeeze.

We are pleased that the final payments on both oats and barley are relatively stable in comparison with past years. However, farmers will be looking forward with great expectations to higher payments on the 1966-67 wheat crop, although I doubt very much if those expectations will be realized.

Mr. Ed Schreyer (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, we listened with interest to the statement just made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. One thing that became obvious very quickly was that in terms of dollars and cents the amount involved to the producers in western Canada was almost identical to that of last year. There has been an increase in deliveries of oats to the board of about 15 million bushels, and there has been an equivalent decline in the deliveries of barley. The amount of the final payment from the board this year comes out to within a cent or two of the amount that was paid last year. It is fair to say, as the last speaker has said, that the cost-price situation in agriculture in western Canada remains acute. The amount incoming in receipts to producers remains relatively static, but meanwhile the cost of production soars.

The minister and his colleagues should be made aware once again that the cost of production indices for agriculture have increased by about 80 points from 1962 up to the present. However, there is nothing to balance off this increase in the cost of production, inasmuch as the price the producers receive for their primary crops has remained static. Between now and the end of this crop year the government must come forward with a policy on price support and price stabilization. I see no alternative, Mr. Speaker, if we are to hope to keep the grain producers in western Canada engaged in the production of wheat, oats and barley.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say I am somewhat puzzled by the statement that appears on page 2 of the statement to the effect that:

> —through international co-operation...the marketing of wheat is now more orderly both as to demand and price.

I think the minister is using euphemistic terms in that statement, Mr. Speaker, because the evidence is to the contrary. The price is still lagging, and there is not much hope in the immediate future of any improvement. We look forward with anticipation to the statement the minister will make on the closing of the wheat pool for the last crop year prior to the mailing out of the cheques.

VACANCY

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty to inform the house that consequent upon the notification of a vacancy in the representation given in this house on Monday, March 11, 1968 by the hon. member for Sainte-Marie, and pursuant to section 10 of the House of Commons Act, I have addressed my warrant to the chief electoral officer for the issuance of a new writ of election for the electoral district of Saint-Jacques.

UNITED NATIONS

RHODESIA—REQUEST OF AFRICAN NATIONS FOR SECURITY COUNCIL MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question about Rhodesia. Can he inform the house what is Canada's position in view of the request by African nations for an urgent meeting of the Security Council?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have supported that request. I understand the Security Council will meet this week and deal with this matter. There will also be a meeting of the Commonwealth sanctions committee on Rhodesia I understand later this week in London.

[Mr. Schreyer.]

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the Prime Minister inform the house whether the government of Canada has made representations of any kind to Rhodesia within say the last 48 hours in connection with executions?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker; no formal representations.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In connection with added sanctions, has the government of Canada anything to say at this time as to whether Canada intends to join with certain other Commonwealth countries in banning mail to and from Rhodesia?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, one of the matters that I hope will be discussed by the Security Council is the imposition of more stringent and additional sanctions against Rhodesia; and we would support this.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, within the Commonwealth is anything being suggested along the unusual line that mail to and from Rhodesia would be barred?

Mr. Pearson: To be effective this matter, I think, would have to be dealt with on a universal basis at the United Nations. It could not be effectively done by the Commonwealth countries acting alone.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is a dangerous course.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INQUIRY AS TO STATEMENT ON PRICES REVIEW BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I direct my question to the Prime Minister. Considering the rather general statement the Minister of Finance made last week regarding a review board, would he indicate whether the government has now decided to introduce legislation and when will that legislation be introduced to set up such board?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I expect to deal with that matter in the statement which I hope I shall be permitted to make this afternoon, on second reading of the bill.

Mr. Stanfield: Which bill?

AGRICULTURE

CHEESE—INQUIRY AS TO APPLICATION OF SUBSIDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alcide Simard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

Can he tell the house whether it is correct that only the Ontario cheese producers are granted by his department, a subsidy as an incentive to exports?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker.

HARBOURS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—DEVELOPMENT OF PORT AT ROBERTS BANK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Following the review by the attorney general's department in British Columbia of the relative legal positions of the federal and provincial governments with regard to jurisdiction over Roberts Bank —which review, incidentally, indicates the strength of the provincial position—may we expect the federal government to submit its case to the Supreme Court?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): I have not seen the legal review my hon. friend is referring to. We hope to get ahead with construction of the port, and hope that no unnecessary legal obstacles will interfere with completing it on time.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister inform the house whether the federal government is accepting from the provincial government some part of the funds necessary for the building of this port?

Mr. Hellyer: That is really not necessary. We have volunteered to co-operate with the provincial government with the development of what we call industrial estates associated with the port, the reclaiming of land which would be used by industries associated with the port's development. This has already been suggested, and I am waiting to hear from the premier to see whether he wants to discuss this matter further.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): In view of conflicting reports and information gaps regarding this project may I ask the minister, when the estimates of his department are before the house or when interim supply is bing considered, to make a full statement regarding this development, as there is much confusion about the federal government's position in this matter.

Mr. Hellyer: I shall be glad to give that suggestion consideration, Mr. Speaker, though I do not think there is much confusion about the federal government's position. Our position is that we should like to see port facilities ready by the end of March, 1970, and we intend to go ahead and build them so they will be ready.

Mr. D. V. Pugh (Okanagan Boundary): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the provincial government of British Columbia made a substantial offer, in the neighborhood of $15 million, to entice the federal government to come forward with its plans?

Mr. Hellyer: I think that suggestion may add confusion to the matter instead of clarifying the issue. The provincial government has offered to share in a joint crown corporation for the development of the port. As I indicated, our over-all study of port facilities in the country and the best method of management and administration is just commencing. It will be some months before we know what additional local participation might be advisable in the national interest.

In the meantime, particularly in view of representations made by the three prairie provinces, which have considerable reservations about the suggestion put forward by the premier of British Columbia, we decided that the best course of action would be to build the port, continue with our study, and at the same time keep an open mind about further discussion with the province at a later date as to the possibility of additional local representation.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PRAIRIE PROVINCES—ACTION TO DEAL WITH UNEMPLOYMENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. In view of a report issued yesterday by the department of manpower indicating that unemployment in the three prairie provinces is now 14 per cent higher than it was a year ago, and since this is a picture which is general across the country today, is the government planning to introduce measures in the near future to stimulate the economy and prevent unemployment from increasing further?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): All the government's policies are designed to that end.

Mr. Hees: As this is the kind of answer the Prime Minister has been giving me for over a year now, during which period unemployment has been steadily increasing, would he please take the question seriously and stop laughing at the unemployed?

Some hon. Members: Order.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT RESPECTING BASES IN MARITIMES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. In view of reports in today's press can the minister inform the house what changes, if any, are being considered involving Canadian forces bases at Summerside and Greenwood?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): I did announce some time ago our intention to phase out the Neptune aircraft and that in consequence we would have to redeploy the Arguses. We are doing so; we are leaving three squadrons at Greenwood, putting one in at Summerside and another at Comox. In order to maintain the operational capacity of the base at Summerside we are moving the search and rescue unit from Greenwood to Summerside, hoping in this way to achieve our aim and establish an efficient military operation while arranging that almost all areas share in the over-all reductions we have to make.

Mr. Nowlan: I should like to ask the minister whether he will extend the same courtesy and consideration to the people of Nova Scotia as he did to the people of Prince Edward Island by undertaking to meet a delegation from Nova Scotia to discuss the merits of this move.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I have not been requested to receive a delegation from Nova Scotia, though I would gladly accept such a request. As far as the decision we have reached is concerned, I do not know that we could revise it.

[Mr. Hees.]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): A supplementary question to the minister of defence. Is the positioning of the search and rescue squadron in Summerside designed to help find and rescue this government?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): I have a further supplementary question for the Minister of National Defence. In view of the importance of his announcement, involving the transfer of one service from one air base to another, would he find an early opportunity, either in the house or before the standing committee, to make a statement in connection with this base consolidation or reorientation program, which gives rise to a lot of uncertainty and concern in Halifax?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): The situation is this. The base at Greenwood will stay at a level of over 2,100 service and civilian personnel. This represents a reduction of around 250. A similar reduction is taking place at Summerside. The over-all base consolidation arrangements are far from settled.

I hope the hon. gentleman will accept the fact that these decisions are taken very reluctantly, but we have to be realists and what I am trying to do is to preserve bases, to have the load shared by as many bases as possible even when faced with the unfortunate decision to reduce the number of personnel.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for that and we do accept his assurance, but could he go one step further and indicate whether the naval base at Shearwater is in any way involved or could conceivably be involved in this movement, or subsequent movements that might come about in the ensuing months?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): No; it would be premature for me to say anything about Shearwater. We have no plans to reduce the operations there.

Mr. Nowlan: As a supplementary following the minister's answer to my first question, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask whether he has already received a protest from the premier of Nova Scotia about this move; and in view of the fact that unification was sold to the country on the basis of cost and efficiency—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nowlan: —would he undertake to refer this matter to the defence committee?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's supplementary is argumentative.

Mr. Nowlan: How about the first question?

[Later:]

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I want to rephrase the question which 20 minutes ago Your Honour thought was argumentative. It is directed to the Minister of National Defence. I should like to ask whether the minister has already received a protest about this move from the premier of Nova Scotia. If so, would he undertake to meet the delegation from Nova Scotia before any irrevocable move, as suggested by the minister earlier, is made?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I received the telegram at noon. I am willing to meet any delegation which would come from Nova Scotia with problems relating to the base at Greenwood, but I have to confirm that the decision which was taken to redeploy Arguses, as I indicated, is irrevocable.

INQUIRY AS TO PURCHASE OF TRANSPORT AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of a Canadian officer's comment that "mobile command is the most immobile force in the world," has the minister made any progress in the direction of securing further heavy transport aircraft which would have as one of their functions the refueling of the CF-5 now coming off the assembly line?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, may I comment on the first part of the question and say I hope my hon. friend saw my photograph in the local newspapers the other day, showing me jumping off the first helicopter that we had received for mobile command. This implies that very soon we will have the means of being completely mobile. So far as the C-141 is concerned, we are now studying all the options available to the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

TRADE

WHEAT—SALES AT LESS THAN MINIMUM PRICE UNDER AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce in reference to the statement he made about grain, in which he pointed out that the payments are made by the wheat board out of receipts from sales of wheat. Would the hon. gentleman now tell the house whether any wheat has been sold at below the minimum floor price set under the international wheat agreement, and whether any subsidies have been paid?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The answer to both questions is yes.

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has he received any other resignations, delayed or ineffective, from the cabinet, in addition to the—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question is not in order.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, in light of the coming spring equinox, will the Minister of Transport see whether he can make an arrangement to have a large degree of visibility on those days surrounding that date?

POLLUTION

MONTREAL—REQUEST FOR MORE EFFECTIVE CONTROL PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Bud Germa (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of a report by a Hydro Quebec engineer that air pollution in Montreal yesterday was so severe as to cause power failure through short circuits, would the minister make an effort to institute a more effective pollution control program?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think this would be a good subject to bring to the attention of the government of the province of Quebec.

Inquiries of the Ministry

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

KENYA—PROTESTS AGAINST ALLEGED RACIST POLICIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Has the government made any representations to or inquiries of the government of Kenya, either directly or through the Commonwealth secretariat, with respect to the alleged racist policies presently being carried out by the government of that country against its Commonwealth residents of Asian origin?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, not to my knowledge.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

APPLICATION IN CANADA OF AUTOMOBILE ANTI-POLLUTION STANDARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, now that officials have completed the relevant studies, and in that Washington has ordered anti-pollution standards for 1968 motor vehicles, I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare why Ottawa has not invoked similar standards for the safety of Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question as asked is argumentative.

Mr. Grafftey: Could I re-fuse the question, Mr. Speaker?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: Re-fuse is right.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Put a longer fuse on it.

Mr. Grafftey: May I rephrase the question to the minister. Has the minister been informed that the anti-pollution vehicle standard now law in the United States is being offered to Canadian citizens as an extra cost optional?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for informing me of this. I have already been aware of it.

Mr. Grafftey: Well, I am aware of it, and I would now ask the Minister of Transport a supplementary question. Since this situation clearly demonstrates that Canadians cannot depend on United States legislation for protection, will the Minister of Transport proceed immediately to invoke motor vehicle safety standards for the protection of Canadians?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is making a representation. I am sure it has been noted by the minister.

Mr. Grafftey: I did not hear your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I suggested to the hon. member that he had made a representation to the minister which I assume has been noted.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I assure the minister that it is not a representation. It is a clear call for action and justice.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION RESPECTING OFF-SHORE MINERAL RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct this question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Some months ago, following the decision of the Supreme Court with regard to the matter of off-shore rights relating to British Columbia, the Prime Minister was asked in the house what next step the government proposed to take with regard to following this decision. In view of the reply that the matter was under study, is the Prime Minister yet in a position to inform the house what steps this government proposes to take.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Not at the moment, Mr. Speaker. I hope to be able to do so shortly.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, am I to understand from the reply of the Prime Minister that this study is not complete despite the fact that the crown corporation has purchased the mineral rights from Dosco?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MATTERS TO BE DEALT WITH BEFORE RECESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for either the Prime Minister or the government house leader and it is supplementary to my question of yesterday regarding matters to be dealt with before this house rises. In view of the importance of Bill C-190 particularly in relation to the price of drugs, and in view of the fact that it has reached the committee of the whole stage, can this be included in the items to be dealt with and finalized before the house rises?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that of course would depend on the progress in respect of the three items I mentioned yesterday.

Mr. William Dean Howe (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Parke, Davis Company has raised its prices recently by as much as 30 per cent, is there any chance that the government will give some priority to this matter so we can spare the people of Canada any further profiteering by the drug companies of Canada?

COMMUNICATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO RESERVATION OF SATELLITE SPACE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the severe criticism at a meeting in Montreal yesterday of the lack of government initiative in respect of a space program, can the minister give us a progress report concerning any such program?

Mr. Speaker: Order, the hon. member is asking for a statement of the type which should be made on motions.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, may I revise my question. Can the minister say whether the government has made any reservations in space for Canada, or has taken any other independent action on behalf of this country in view of the severe criticism?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I may be in orbit but I am not at this moment responsible for the Canadian space program. The Department of National Defence—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest the question is one which might be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement which appeared in the press, and in view of the chasing around by the possible leadership candidates, may I ask the Prime Minister if he can say whether the government has under consideration a space program for Canada, and whether there is any hope of it being implemented?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is asking a question which I have suggested cannot be asked at this time.

[Later:]

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister this question, which I have carefully written out. Has the government made approaches to the United States or Russia recently about a joint space program and, if so, when will plans be finalized?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker. I hope there will be an announcement on this matter very shortly, depending on space programs.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): In view of the fact that I cannot get information on this matter I wish to discuss it at ten o'clock tonight.

LABOUR RELATIONS

MONTREAL—APPOINTMENT OF ARBITRATION BOARD ON PICARD REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

I should like to ask him if he is ready to reply to the question I put to him yesterday concerning the instructions of his department with regard to port activities?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker, but I shall reply tomorrow.

BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

INQUIRY AS TO PRODUCTION OF WHITE PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

As several months have already elapsed since the publication of the Laurendeau-Dunton report, can he tell us whether the government would consider the possibility or accept the suggestion that a white paper be tabled on bilingualism in Canada?

[English]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, a report has been prepared on the progress of bilingualism in the federal civil service. That report is being translated. As soon as the translation is completed, which I hope will be today or tomorrow, perhaps it could be tabled in the house.

[Translation]

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the hon. Minister of Justice.

I should like to ask him whether he has found a way to overcome the obstacles brought forward by the Quebec government with regard to insertion of language guarantees in the constitution?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question, as asked, is out of order.

[English]

IMMIGRATION

SASKATCHEWAN—ACCEPTANCE OF APPLICANTS FROM KENYA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration but in his absence the parliamentary secretary may wish to take notice of it. Has any request been received from the premier of Saskatchewan that a special effort be made to accept British subjects in Kenya for residence in Saskatchewan, despite reports that unemployment is on the increase in the prairies?

Mr. J. C. Munro (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I am not aware of any such request, Mr. Speaker. I will check it out and reply tomorrow or the next day.

PUBLIC WORKS

FRASER RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO AGREEMENT ON CONTROL PROJECTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources having to do with the Fraser river flood control agreement. Can the minister say whether he has met with the British Columbia minister concerned, and whether an agreement on this matter has been signed?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I met on Saturday with the minister of lands, forests and water resources of British Columbia. I made suggestions to him regarding the federal-provincial Fraser river flood control agreement. He is to report to his colleagues. I am to report to mine. We are to meet again in a few days.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

JOHN STEPHEN MARSHALL—REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF SENTENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, this question is for the Solicitor General. It follows a question asked by my colleague the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria on March 1. Has the Solicitor General had an opportunity to talk with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development regarding the Cape Breton Indian, Stephen Marshall, who at his trial according to reports was not represented by counsel and could not speak English? Is the minister's department doing anything to assist this man in an appeal by way, for instance, of providing defence counsel?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have had an opportunity to discuss the matter with my colleague the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Every effort is being made to give assistance to this individual on his appeal.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEDICARE—MEETING WITH PROVINCES RESPECTING IMPLEMENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct this question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the great shift in opinion from universality to selectivity in welfare, and in view of our present financial situation, does the minister plan further talks with the provinces before implementing his universal medicare bill?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker.

SASKATCHEWAN—RESTRICTION ON FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION UNDER MEDICARE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. M. Brand (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare which is in a sense supplementary to one asked a few minutes ago. Can he state whether money to be sent to Saskatchewan under the medicare program beginning July 1 will be designated for use for medicare only, in order in this way to help alleviate the catastrophic deterrent fees soon to be introduced in Saskatchewan in respect of the medical and hospital care plan?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that his question cannot be asked at this time. If there is some immediate urgency he may wish to discuss the matter on the adjournment motion.

HARBOURS

MONTREAL—INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF ADMINISTRATOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer).

In view of the urgent need to settle the serious situation now prevailing in the port of Montreal, does the Minister of Transport intend to appoint, after consultation with the local authorities, a special administrator whose authority and jurisdiction would be all-encompassing over the port of Montreal?

[English]

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated earlier this question of the management and control of port facilities is being studied by the government. I would not wish to prejudge the results of that study, because no comprehensive look has been taken at this question for many years. I hope it will not take too long to have the inquiry completed. In the meantime we have problems at the port of Montreal, and I am sure my colleague the Minister of Labour is doing everything possible to see that the labour situation there is ameliorated.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a further question to the hon. minister.

In view of the fact that he is not too sure when the investigations concerning the port of Montreal will be completed, and since there are not only labour relations problems in the port of Montreal, could the minister inform the house whether, pending completion of these studies, he could not, together with the authorities of the city of Montreal, appoint a special manager who would at least deal temporarily with the problems of the port of Montreal?

AGRICULTURE

MILK—REQUEST FOR INCREASED MINIMUM SUPPORT PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, as a result of the minister's reply to the hon. member for Lapointe I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Does he expect to introduce a new dairy policy providing for $5 per hundredweight of manufactured milk and, if so, when does he expect to implement it?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the dairy policy for next year is now being considered by the officials of the Department of Agriculture. It will be announced as soon as possible in the house, if it is still sitting, or notice will be given in the press.

[English]

TRADE

DURUM WHEAT—PROSPECTS FOR EXPORT SALES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. D. McLelland (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether, before he leaves his present portfolio, he will issue a statement as to what are government views in respect of future sales of Durum wheat on the export market. Is there any indication of an increased demand in the immediate future? The answer to this question would be of assistance to farmers in western Canada when making their plans for spring seeding operations.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It appears to me the hon. member is asking for a statement. If he is only asking whether a statement will be made, the question would be in order.

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Perhaps I could reply, Mr. Speaker, by saying that I can make some remarks on the subject when my supplementary estimates are being considered.

Inquiries of the Ministry

POTATOES—REQUEST FOR SPECIAL MISSION TO PROMOTE EXPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the deterioration of seed potato sales in the past few months, will the minister and his department give consideration to the inauguration of a special mission which might further increase this potential and thus alleviate the serious position the potato market has assumed in recent months?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we are actively seeking new markets. I had the opportunity of discussing this very serious problem with the premier of Prince Edward Island when I visited there last week.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Having now reported on this conversation, will the minister tell us whether a special mission, like other special missions which have been established, will be set up for the express purpose of helping to solve problems in respect of seed potatoes?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is reiterating his question.

BANKRUPTCY

REQUEST THAT ACT BE PROCLAIMED IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Melvin McQuaid (Kings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs whether he has received a request from the Lieutenant Governor of Prince Edward Island for a proclamation by the governor in council declaring part X of the Bankruptcy Act to be in force in that province?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not believe the question is in order. It could easily be placed on the order paper. If there is some urgency, which is not apparent to me, it might be discussed later on today.

The hon. member for Kootenay West.

Mr. Herridge: The minister has sent me an answer by mail since I rose.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR RECONSTITUTION OF PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of [Mr. Winters.]

National Health and Welfare in his capacity as government house leader. In view of the anticipated adjournment of the house and the government's long delay in dealing with urgent problems in respect of Indian affairs, with particular reference to the visit by members of parliament to reservations planned over a year ago, will the minister take the necessary action to reconstitute the parliamentary committee on Indian affairs in order that it might meet from time to time and adjourn from place to place during the parliamentary recess?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to consider that request and discuss it with the minister.

FISHERIES

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF STRAIGHT BASE LINES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, in view of the desperate plight of the Canadian east coast fishing industry I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he can now inform the house of any progress being made toward the further establishment of base lines, which would serve as a conservative measure in respect of Canada's fisheries.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If my memory serves me correctly this question was asked just a few days ago.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member might ask another question, as the question asked by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg was not acceptable and there can be no supplementary question.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I will phrase my question somewhat differently. Since it has been three years or more since the government said it would put base lines into effect, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs what is holding them back. Why can members not get answers to questions? Has the government dropped the Pearson gunboat philosophy?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether it is the intention of the government to propose another law of the sea conference to resolve the international differences in respect of the 12 mile limit.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend knows, co-ordinates with regard to the base line system have been established in some sections of eastern Canada. In order to proceed with other base lines in other parts of Canada we are now giving consideration as to whether some further conference arrangements might assist us in meeting some of the resistance we have been experiencing in our negotiations with particular countries.

FINANCE

MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY FOR REPORT ON FOREIGN OWNERSHIP

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, in view of the resignation of the President of the Privy Council announced yesterday, will the Prime Minister advise the house which member of the cabinet is responsible for the application of the Watkins report?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): All of them.

[Later:]

Mr. Hees: I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is it his intention to place the Watkins report under the administrative responsibility of a minister, and if so which minister?

Mr. Pearson: I will assume that responsibility myself.

Mr. Hees: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the Prime Minister expect to make an announcement in the near future with regard to replacements for the portfolios of President of the Privy Council and Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

TRANSPORT

SECOND FERRY SERVICE BETWEEN NOVA SCOTIA AND NEW ENGLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. O. Bower (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether his department has received representations to the effect that a Swedish ferry company is prepared to put up some $500,000 for the establishment of a test run this summer of a ferry supplement to the Bluenose between Bar Harbor, Maine and Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, the Swedish interest having a—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I should think that question should be placed on the order paper.

[Translation]

RURAL DEVELOPMENT

ARDA—ACCESS ROAD BETWEEN LASARRE AND JAMES BAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the hon. Minister of Forestry and Rural Development as the minister responsible for the administration of ARDA.

Has he received recently from the Quebec provincial authorities requests for assistance with a view to the construction of a road from LaSarre to James Bay?

Mr. Speaker: This question should be put on the order paper.

[English]

POLLUTION

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON POSSIBLE GOVERNMENT ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, in view of the major increase in inspections for pollution control proposed yesterday by President Johnson in the United States, has the Canadian government given further consideration to stepping up its anti-pollution measures?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, we are doing our best. There are many things possible in the United States which are not possible in Canada. The constitutional system, for one, has something to do with this.

Mr. Aiken: I should like to ask the minister whether the United States has made any additional proposals to Canada respecting international waters as a result of this latest move.

Mr. Pepin: Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, but we are keeping close contact with the United States government in respect of these matters.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

INQUIRY AS TO CONTRACTS FOR DESTROYER ESCORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Industry whether he can now give the house some idea when contracts will be awarded in respect of the four new destroyer escorts.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): An answer has been prepared for a question on the order paper, indicating that contracts should be let before April 12.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

POSSIBLE PHASING OUT OF PINE TREE RADAR STATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): My question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. Since his officials are currently engaged in studying the feasibility of participating jointly with the United States in developing an airborne radar defence capability, I should like to ask the minister whether his department is drawing up contingency plans to phase out the radar stations on the Pine Tree Line.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question should be put on the order paper.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

HEATING OIL AND GASOLINE—STATEMENT ON PRICE INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Bud Germa (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Can the minister report on the results of his promised investigation into the increase in fuel oil and gasoline prices?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): I will be glad to do so tomorrow.

FINANCE

REMOVAL OF TAX ON PRODUCTION MACHINERY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the recent report of the O.E.C.D. regarding the cost-price relationship of Canadian production, is it the intention of the government to consider the removal of the 11 per cent sales tax on production machinery?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): I hope the hon. gentleman has carefully read that report, and he will see that generally the fiscal policies of the government were approved.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance made some remarks but he did not answer my question. I wonder if he would tell us whether it is the intention of the government to remove the 11 per cent sales tax on production machinery.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is repeating a question he has already asked.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR SURCHARGE

On the order:

Second reading of Bill C-208, an act to amend the Income Tax Act—the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I was not in the house yesterday, due to prior commitments which had been made when I was advised that the house was likely to be proroguing on March 8. Having followed the suggestion that on March 11 the house would not be sitting, I accepted two engagements and I was not here when the order for second reading of Bill C-207 was called.

There was a certain amount of discussion in the house yesterday, and I was very pleased with the ruling of the Speaker. Now, with the introduction of the new Bill C-208, I wish to refer to the rules of parliament with regard to bringing back on the floor of the House of Commons matters already decided in the current session.

On February 27 I spoke in the House of Commons with regard to the non-confidence motion, and during the course of my remarks I pointed out that I had been assured by two members of the cabinet that the bill which had been defeated on February 19—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should state his point of order. I think I have to remind him in all fairness that the house spent a good part of yesterday in discussing this point of order. A decision having been made, is reviving a matter on which the house has already decided. Therefore I invite him to state his point of order as succinctly as possible.

Mr. Cowan: I will do so immediately. Yesterday the house was discussing Bill C-207. Today I am discussing Bill C-208, which I am told is an entirely new bill. I should like to refer to citation 163 on page 137 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, which reads as follows:

A mere alteration of the words of a question, without any substantial change in its object will not be sufficient to evade the rule that no question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder if the hon. member has taken the trouble to read the Hansard of yesterday, where he will see that the arguments he proposes to advance now were advanced for the benefit of the Chair. He has just stated that Bill C-208 is an entirely new bill. It is new in the sense that some of the provisions in the previous bill are not included in the one now before us, but as I read the provisions of this bill they are a repetition of some of the provisions contained in Bill C-207, which have been ruled in order.

So I do not think the hon. member would be helpful by going into all the arguments which were made during the debate on the point of order yesterday.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to go into all the arguments raised yesterday. I am referring specifically to clause 2 of Bill C-208, which is similar to clause 5 of Bill C-207 and to clause 4 of Bill C-193. I have read yesterday's Hansard, and I have also read with pleasure your ruling as it appears in this morning's Votes and Proceedings. I should like to read the following paragraph from page 755 of today's Votes and Proceedings:

Clause 5 of C-207 provides for prepayment of the corporation tax. There are different rates of prepayment.

May I point out in all sincerity, sir, that I think this should read "different dates of prepayment" because I cannot find any difference in rates. It goes on:

One hon. member found it difficult to see the difference, but there is some difference between this clause and the corresponding clause of Bill C-193.

May I draw your attention—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will have to advance his own argument. He cannot use the decision of the Chair to justify the argument he wishes to make in connection with the present bill.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Speaker, may I draw your attention to the explanatory notes accompanying these clauses in the bills I mentioned. In Bill C-193 the explanatory note for clause 4 reads:

This amendment would require corporations to pay their corporation income tax over a period which commences two months closer to the beginning of their taxation year than at present.

In Bill C-207 the identical words are used in the explanatory note for clause 5. It reads:

This amendment would require corporations to pay their corporation income tax over a period which commences two months closer to the beginning of their taxation year than at present.

In Bill C-208 the explanatory note for clause 2 reads:

This amendment would require corporations to pay their corporation income tax over a period which commences two months closer to the beginning of their taxation year than at present.

The person writing the explanatory notes in all three bills was well aware of the fact that they are substantially the same and aimed to accomplish the same objective; that is, that the amendment would require corporations to pay their corporation income tax over a period which commences two months closer to the beginning of their taxation year than at present. I suggest that clause 2 in Bill C-208 violates the rule that we cannot bring back on the floor of the House of Commons a provision which has already been decided by the house.

Since I cannot use the decision of the Speaker to reinforce my own arguments, may I quote the hon. member for Acadia who pointed out yesterday that in a similar decision the Speaker of the day, whom I do not wish to identify, ruled that a clause in the Transportation Act which was previously rejected could not be brought back in an amended form. That ruling bore on a clause. This is a clause of Bill C-208 which I submit contains a provision on which a decision was made on February 19. I have read the similar parts in the explanatory notes, and the end result will be exactly the same. If the payments commence two months closer to the beginning of the taxation year, the end result will be to pay regularly for ten months. I believe this clause 2 should be withdrawn as it appears in the bill before the bill is discussed.

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to hon. members that no point at all would be served by reviving the argument which was made yesterday. I appreciate the fact that the hon. member did not have an opportunity yesterday to submit the argument which he is submitting now. Unfortunately for him, though, it cannot be applied retroactively to the debate which we had yesterday. It may be that if I had had the benefit of his views I might have reached a different decision in connection with the particular clause to which he has referred. However, having considered all the arguments which were then before me I reached a certain conclusion and with regret I must tell the hon. member I do not see how I can vary the decision which was rendered after much thought and with great pain.

Mr. Cowan: May I ask if the ruling is on the different dates of prepayment or the different rates of prepayment?

Mr. Speaker: I will rise on motions some day and correct Hansard.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-208, to amend the Income Tax Act.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to have the opportunity of speaking on Bill No. C-208, as indeed I would have been glad to have the opportunity of speaking on Bill No. C-207 yesterday. The second reading of a bill deals with the principle of the measure, and I hope to discuss that principle and the necessity for this bill within the context of the current financial and economic situation which, in the view of the government, makes a bill of this kind important and necessary at this time.

Amidst the current financial difficulties and problems, and we certainly have them, and the predictions of doom and gloom to come, it is well, Mr. Speaker, to recall the actual and potential strength of this country. This country is one of the richest, most stable and most fortunate countries in the world. It is the envy of practically every other country in the world. It is well also, in order to keep things in perspective, to recall the progress we have made in recent years which puts us in a much stronger position today to meet the difficult problems we are encountering.

The fourth annual review of the Economic Council of Canada, which was made public in September, 1967, had this to say on page 11 in the section dealing with the performance of the economy. In this paragraph the council was referring to the expansion since 1961:

> This represents probably the longest uninterrupted expansion—and certainly the longest peacetime expansion—in Canadian business cycle history.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Starr: Started by the Conservatives in 1961.

Mr. Pearson: The governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Speaker, also mentioned the economic gains we have made, while warning us in very clear terms of the dangers and difficulties ahead, in a speech which he made last November in Winnipeg. Referring again to the period of the last six years, he said:

> Our real output has increased by over 40 per cent and we have greatly strengthened the economic foundations of the country. We have added greatly to our manufacturing capacity and demonstrated our ability to sell more manufactured goods in world markets. We have continued to seek out and develop a wide variety of forest and mineral and power resources. We have added significantly to our infrastructure in the form of roads and other means of transportation. We have provided greatly increased facilities for general and technical education. And at the same time as we have done all these things we have raised our standard of living rapidly: Personal consumption per head has risen by nearly a quarter since the beginning of this decade.

Then, he went on:

> Our basic problem is how to cope with prosperity and add to high levels of output already attained: Our present difficulties do not arise out of any basic economic weakness or shortage of resources—

Mr. Rasminsky then pointed out that by 1966 it was clear that our growth rate would decrease, and that the main question was whether this would take place without the expansion coming to a full stop as has happened so often in similar circumstances in the past. In fact, as matters turned out, economic expansion has continued, though at a distinctly more moderate and sustainable rate. In other words, bust has not followed boom. It is undeniable, however, that we are now facing serious economic and financial problems, but so is every country in the world including the United Kingdom and the United States.

It is true also that these problems are made more dangerous, and their solutions made more difficult, by threats to the international financial and economic co-operation which so far has distinguished the post-war years from those of the thirties. It is devoutly to be hoped that we do not return to those earlier years when governments foolishly thought they could save themselves by adopting protectionist national policies which attempted to export their own difficulties and their own problems. Today, the reversion to economic nationalism of that kind would only compound every country's difficulties and lead the way to general economic and political deterioration which could be fatal to international progress and co-operation.

Canada, Mr. Speaker, has played, and hopes to continue to play, a full part in international economic co-operation, particularly in the international trade and payments system that has been built up and which, as we have learned to our advantage recently, is still working despite the intense strains to which it is currently subjected and which could destroy it with unhappy results.

Canada's own basic position, as I have said, is strong, and so is the backing for our dollar. If anyone feels pessimistic about the situation in Canada, let him read this report which came out the day before yesterday from the O.E.C.D., which is an international committee, and which deals with the current economic and financial situation in Canada. Our economic and financial position has stood up well, then, to the pressures which have been directed against it, as indeed they have been directed against other countries. In so far as standing up to those pressures is concerned, I should like to pay my tribute and give thanks to the government of the United States for the way it has co-operated with Canada in meeting those pressures in a way which is of advantage to both countries.

It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that no country, certainly no country in the position of Canada, can isolate itself from those pressures which are continuing but which by their very nature make sound national policies more important than ever. We have our own responsibilities to discharge and we will not be excused for failure to do so by blaming that failure on the international situation, on the exchange gamblers, on Paris or on Viet Nam. However, Mr. Speaker, the fact remains that our financial problems today, as is the case with other countries, are being increasingly aggravated by troubled international situations both economic and political.

The problem of most immediate concern to us, Mr. Speaker, is to maintain financial stability without hindering economic expansion. This is more and more difficult to accomplish in an age of rising costs, rising expenditures and rising expectations. While government policies do require heavy public expenditures at all levels of government—and I will have something to say about that a little later —they also increasingly require the determination of priorities, again at all levels of government, in the allocation of resources.

This is the more necessary and the more difficult, Mr. Speaker, because conditions, both national and international, change so rapidly these days. It is not easy to adapt economic and financial policies to those changes. I do not think we need to be smug or complacent as to our own successes or failures, if you like, in regard to this adaptation. But I would quote from the report of this international body, the O.E.C.D., which had this to say at page 12:

> A striking feature of the last two years has been the speed with which policies—

They are writing about Canadian policies.

> —have been adjusted to changes in business conditions. And in most cases the timing and magnitude of the policy measures adopted was well chosen.

Again on page 31, in the conclusion of the report, there is this paragraph:

> In the last two years, with the trend of business conditions changing quickly, the authorities—

They are referring to the Canadian authorities.

> —have on the whole been successful in maintaining relatively high levels of employment while combating first excesses and then mildly recessionary tendencies appearing on the demand side. Both monetary and fiscal policies have been rather promptly adjusted to changing conditions.

Our most worrying problem at the present time, as I have just said, Mr. Speaker, is the threat to financial stability from the recent and continuing rates of increase of prices, incomes and costs in the Canadian economy. The steps that have been taken in fiscal and monetary policy now need to be supplemented by new procedures to ensure that the public interest in price stability is taken into account whenever important decisions affecting prices, incomes and costs are made.

Before dealing with these measures, Mr. Speaker, I wish to review the background against which these procedures that will be recommended should be viewed. In a white paper on employment and income in 1945 the government of Canada committed itself—and successive governments have accepted that commitment—to the maintenance of a high and stable level of employment. Henceforth that was to be a central objective of economic policy in this country, and rightly so.

While this objective was not always fulfilled, Mr. Speaker, during the years that followed, we did have two long periods of sustained growth and high employment. Of course, employment is directly related to growth. That is why we had high employment, because we had the growth. This situation prevailed until the recession of the late fifties which was succeeded after 1961 by a renewed steady growth of production and employment.

There is also a direct relationship, in economic growth, between productivity and the level of real income. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, because of this relationship it is very disturbing to all members, I think, to realize that now the average productivity of the Canadian worker is still appreciably less than that of his counterpart in the United States. I am sure that all members will agree that this situation must be corrected if Canadians wish to enjoy living standards equal or nearer to those of Americans. Increases in productivity is essential if we are to have rising incomes without the kind of inflation which will rapidly erode the benefits we would otherwise receive from this rise.

Price inflation works great inequities, causing the greatest hardship to the relatively weak groups in the community who have no organized market power to combat it, those whose incomes are fixed or lag well behind the increasing cost of living. When price inflation persists long enough and creates a general expectation of further inflation, then serious distortions arise in the whole economy as well as in financial markets. The likely consequence is recession and large scale unemployment. This is particularly true in a country like Canada because our economic well-being depends so greatly on our international competitive position. When our prices rise faster than those of the United States, in particular, and of our other major trading partners, we are in trouble. That is why I was very glad to read in this O.E.C.D. report the following sentence on page 31:

> There is little indication that the competitive position of Canadian industry has yet been seriously impaired.

Mr. Stanfield: Seriously impaired.

Mr. Pearson: Yes. It has been impaired, but this publication says that it has not yet been seriously impaired. As my hon. friend realizes, Mr. Speaker, I am not underestimating the difficulties that may cause that serious impairment unless we do something about them. Price stability is a necessary condition for achieving the other goals of high employment and adequate growth.

The responsibility of government to curb inflation is made the more difficult because financial and currency problems are often concerned with considerations that are more psychological than concrete in nature. The problem of psychology is largely one of confidence.

There are some who appear to believe that prices and costs will continue rising in the way they have in recent months. They assume that further inflation is inevitable and thereby help to make it so. This is dangerous, of course, because inflation feeds on itself. Moreover, while some, and rightly, may fear it, others may find it good because of the feeling of prosperity and well-being it may give for a time. It can produce an l.s.d. experience—and I am not talking about pounds, shillings and pence. So government has a responsibility to do what it can to prevent the "hangover" by preventing the experience.

During the period of economic expansion which began in 1961 we had for most of that time reasonable price stability. This brought great benefits to all Canadians and demonstrated the underlying strength of our economy. It also, as I have said, brought problems of prosperity, prices and cost problems, arising out of the growing strains in recent years on our resources. Looking back in retrospect, it is clear that dangerous upward pressures on prices and costs were going to be hard to avoid, but that was not so clear at the time. In its second annual review, published in December, 1965, the Economic Council of Canada was still in a position to say, and I quote from the report of the council published in that month:

> —a careful appraisal of the nature and patterns of recent changes would suggest that at the present time there appears to be little evidence to indicate that a broad and widely dispersed acceleration of price increases or accentuation of price pressures is under way.

That is what the economic council said at the end of 1965. However, as the economy subsequently moved to even higher levels of employment and heavier pressures on our resources, price inflation at that time became, and it remains, a major danger. It was then that monetary and fiscal action was taken by the government to moderate demands on our resources.

Despite the easing of pressures in the economy, Canada's price performance over the last year or two, in contrast with earlier years, has been bad. It now compares unfavourably with that of most other industrialized countries and, of special significance to us, it compares unfavourably with that of the United States of America.

The average annual rate of increase in the consumer price index from January, 1965, to January, 1968, has been 3.7 per cent. From 1952 to 1965 it was only 1.3 per cent. During the whole period from 1949 to 1967, the rate was 2.3 per cent. So our recent performance has not been good.

It is important to note also that prices of imported goods have not been increasing more rapidly in the past three years than in the period 1952 to 1964. Obviously any marked increase in import prices can exert strong upward leverage on domestic price levels, as happened, for example, in 1950-51. But this has not been the case this time. The average annual increase in import prices has been 1.3 per cent from the beginning of 1965 to the third quarter of 1967, compared with an average annual rate of 1.7 per cent from 1952 to 1964.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, prices of most types of goods and services have recently been rising at rates that are clearly inconsistent with any definition of reasonable price stability.

Productivity, of course, is an important factor in these matters; it is an important determinant of prices and income. The only way to increase real incomes, with a given quantity of capital and labour, is to improve productivity. Increases of money incomes which run ahead of increases of real output are, for the country as a whole, illusory and self-defeating. So policies to achieve price stability must be policies to keep the over-all increase in incomes within limits set by the real increase in production.

The urgency of this matter, and it is urgent, is shown, among other things, by the fact that in the past two years new wage settlements have on the average provided for annual increases in earnings of more than 8 per cent. The O.E.C.D. report which I referred to put it at 8.7 per cent. Such increases are well beyond the long-run average gain in productivity in Canada, by any relevant measure. They are also well above the increases in the last two years under similar collective agreements in the United States, where long-run average productivity growth is about the same as in Canada.

Corporation profits, which in the early years of expansion had risen strongly to relatively high levels, have, however, declined significantly in the course of the past two years. Profits before tax in 1967 were about 5 per cent lower than two years earlier, although non-farm output had increased by some 8 to 9 per cent. Without this decline in profits—and I admit that the decline has been from the high levels of the earlier period—wage and salary increases in excess of productivity gains would have had an even greater effect on prices.

This spiralling process in prices and incomes cannot be halted overnight, but we must do our best to check it. There is no easy way to do this in a free society and in an open economy, and Canada has about the most open economy in the world. There is no easy way to do this, especially in a period of economic expansion. Rising demands, which go with expansion and prosperity, push up costs. Rising costs push up prices. Higher prices in their turn further push up costs, which affect production and consumption and halt expansion.

For the resulting difficulties, labour blames big business and management and their excessive profits. Big business blames labour unions and their alleged excessive demands. Consumers blame the merchants. The merchants blame the manufacturers, and everyone blames the government, especially the federal government, even though more than 55 per cent of the taxes in this country now go to provincial and municipal governments.

These days I receive letters, listen to speeches and read editorials in the newspapers urging the government to cut expenditures, to reduce inflationary pressures and lower rising costs. However, the government is also urged, often by the same people who demand that we cut costs, to spend more money on pensions, on anti-pollution measures, on housing, on price supports for farmers, on education, retraining, health grants, research and on a great many other worthy and important projects and purposes. Every day we are urged to curb expenditures. At the same time we are criticized for cutting out or cutting down on some good and favourite projects, even though it is realized that in present circumstances some very desirable things will have to be postponed or scrapped or reduced in order to keep the finances of the country on an even keel.

Eventually everything has to be paid for and the government does not have any magic way of raising money for these purposes. It is, of course, easy to say that it can all be done by eliminating waste and extravagance.

An hon. Member: Right.

Mr. Pearson: It is easy to say that it can all be done by eliminating waste and extravagance but the problem of finding the hundreds of millions of dollars which will be required to do all the things that ought to be done, and I have mentioned some of them, cannot be met by eliminating waste and extravagance alone, desirable though that is.

An hon. Member: But it would help.

Mr. Pearson: So it becomes more and more a problem of priorities and of assessing what even an expanding economy can take on at any given time. And these priorities, let me add, are priorities within provincial and municipal expenditures as well as federal, because municipal and provincial expenditures cover more than half the expenditures of the country.

Mr. Woolliams: Why don't you take the lead?

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Medicare in the provinces.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Mr. Pearson: I will come to that in a few moments. I will show who is taking the lead in cutting expenditures.

The government has to spend the money it collects wisely and well, of course, but that money can only be secured by taxing or borrowing. At the present time it is not easy to do either—either to tax or to borrow. Interest rates make it difficult to borrow and taxes are already high. But the money must be found and that is one of the purposes of the bill before the house. We cannot safely indulge in deficit financing when inflation, not recession, is the main danger.

To check inflation government must, of course, keep its own financial affairs in order. This requires in present circumstances establishing a balance between income and expenditure even if it means the postponement or elimination for the time being of many good projects and the reduction of government borrowing even for good purposes. We are eliminating certain programs and we have postponed or stretched out others.

We have reduced substantially the amount we shall have to spend as well as the amounts we shall have to borrow in 1968 for all purposes. We have asked the provincial governments and, through them, municipal governments, to co-operate in this effort. Reduction of expenditures and an increase in revenues, along with a reduction of non-budgetary outlays, are, then, necessary for financial stability. This, I repeat, is why we have introduced the bill now before the house and why we shall propose further cuts in expenditure.

The critics of the government say, of course, that there ought not to be any tax increases, or that the kind we are proposing are the wrong kind; that our proposals are inflationary or that they are deflationary; sometimes these two complaints are made in the course of the same speech. They say the reductions are made in the wrong places, or that they should not be made at all, or that the reductions should be bigger. The government is accused of being niggardly or extravagant, or both.

The most persistent charge is that we have lost control of expenditures, which are said to be skyrocketing. I submit that the government has made a very real and effective effort to maintain control over increased expenditure.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Such control, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) quite rightly said some time ago, is the only control which in present conditions is realistic. Our effort has certainly been more successful in controlling expenditure than the effort made at the provincial and municipal levels as comparative figures show quite clearly. We are now achieving a substantial reduction in the rate of increase in budgetary expenditures. The rate of increase for 1968-69 will be 4.1 per cent. It was 12.5 per cent for the current fiscal year. On October 4 the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp), as reported on page 2810 of Hansard, told the House of Commons of our efforts to screen and reduce programs and expenditures and work toward a balanced budget. The opposition was not impressed. They claimed that federal expenditures remained excessive and were out of control and getting more so in comparison with the growth of our national product, and that we have no right to ask for taxes until we have reduced expenditures to much lower levels.

Let me give the house some figures to show that the percentage increase in federal expenditures, was not greater but less than the increase in the gross national product during the last five years. There was a 42 per cent increase in the gross national product as against 30 per cent in federal expenditures. During the period from 1957 to 1966, roughly a ten-year period, the increase in federal expenditures and the increase in the gross national product were roughly the same—81 per cent. But during the same period the increase in provincial and municipal expenditures amounted to 186 per cent. For the ten-year period as a whole, the percentage increase in federal expenditures was identical with the increase in the gross national product. In that same period the annual average percentage increase in provincial and municipal expenditures was 12.1, while the average annual increase in federal expenditures was 6.7 per cent, and we shall be reducing that in the forthcoming year to 4.1 per cent.

The same trend is shown in the figures for total federal and provincial expenditures as percentages of the gross national product. In 1954 federal expenditure represented 16.9 per cent of the g.n.p. That figure in the first three-quarters of 1967 had gone down to 14.5 per cent whereas the figure for provincial and municipal expenditure had risen from 10.7 per cent to 19.4 per cent.

Equally significant are the percentage figures of total public expenditures in Canada divided between the federal government on the one hand and provincial and municipal governments on the other. In 1952 the federal percentage was 66 per cent. This had declined by 1966 to 43 per cent whereas provincial and municipal expenditure had gone up from 34 per cent to 57 per cent. I am not criticizing the increased requirements of the provinces and the municipal governments. They were, of course, required for important things. But these figures do indicate where the impact of expenditure mainly lies at the present time in terms of prices and costs. The figures tell their own story.

I should like to look at the total federal expenditure figures in more detail and consider why these have been increasing in recent years. Our budgetary expenditures in 1962-63 amounted to $6.570 billion. The projected figure for the current year is $9.885 billion. This represents an increase in roughly a five-year period of $3.315 billion. Next year we are budgeting for $10.3 billion which we hope to reduce by $75 million.

Now what was the nature of the expenditure involved in this figure of $9.885 billion which has been described as extravagant and as representing an excessive increase over preceding years? Of this amount $1,800 million is allocated to defence. This represents 18.2 per cent of our budget and 2.9 per cent of our gross national product. It is the lowest percentage of the gross national product devoted to defence by any country in NATO except Denmark and Luxembourg. Can we reduce it? Of course we can, if we wish to withdraw from our present commitments for collective and continental defence, if we wish to withdraw from the Atlantic coalition for defence—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: —and restrict our defence expenditures to those required for internal security and a Canadian contingent for a United Nations police force, which would mean, in effect, becoming a non-committed power in international affairs.

• (4:10 p.m.)

The second great category of expenditures in this total of over $9 billion represents payments to individuals in this country. Among them are pensions, family and youth allowances, the government contribution to unemployment insurance, and veterans pensions. These total $2,428 million.

The third category is payments to provincial governments, and this year they represent $1,892 million. These are total figures, and that is where our money is going.

Let us now look at the increases, both the amount of the increases in absolute terms and the nature of them. The first category of increases is to be found in programs introduced by the present government which represented new expenditures in 1967-68. In that year expenditures for these new programs came to $424 million.

What are these new programs? They include youth allowances, the health resources fund, the fund for rural economic development, occupational training for adults, which cost $120 million, the municipal development and loan board, post-secondary educational grants, which cost $103 million, manpower mobility, the Canada Student Loans Act, the area development program, the program for advancement of industrial technology, defence industry modernization, and general incentives to industry for the expansion of scientific research and development in Canada. All these represent a $424 million increase for very good proposals and projects.

The second category of increases covers increases in the last five years in programs which have been enlarged by the present government. These programs include family allowances, old age, blind, disabled and unemployment assistance, the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act, medical research grants, subsidies and other payments to provinces, payments to municipalities, veterans affairs, freight assistance, the trans-Canada highway. Over that period these increases come to $1,075 million.

If you look at the increases over a one-year period you will find that the main increase last year in the categories of health and welfare for increased social security, debt charges, provincial and municipal governments, veterans affairs, transportation and communications, resources development and Indian affairs, aid to education, external aid and general government expenditures, which was only a $20 million increase, came to an over-all total of $975 million. Surely the increases in expenditures last year were on programs and projects which had good and worthy ends.

In this connection I would like to point out two things. The first is that of our total expenditures more than 55 per cent are uncontrollable. The second is that some of the biggest increases within the last few years have been under such things as the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act and the family allowances programs. The increases with respect to these programs are automatic with the increases in population. Those automatic increases have amounted to $124 million this year, which could be added to those over which the government cannot exercise control because of the nature of the expenditures themselves.

Therefore I submit, Mr. Speaker, that in our expenditures to an extent never exceeded before in this country we have been relating economic policies and social policies. This is one of the things that has got us into some financial difficulty and why we now have to use the instruments of economic policy perhaps a little more effectively than we have been doing for the last year or two.

These instruments of economic policy, which the house knows are used to influence our economy, are fiscal policy and monetary policy. They are both powerful instruments. The federal government and the central bank—and here I want to pay my tribute to the way the central bank has been managing its affairs—have tried to employ these instruments as effectively as possible in the difficult and changing circumstances that they have had to face. Yet these instruments do have their limitations. There is no doubt about that.

The impact of both monetary and fiscal policies on the level of demand in the economy is not immediate but takes effect with a very significant time lag, and that means that those policies have to be formulated with a forward view of the economy. But the economy, especially in these days, is often subject to influences that are essentially unpredictable and that make accurate forecasting very difficult indeed. The techniques of economic forecasting have improved considerably over the years but there will always remain unpredictable situations, as pointed out in the report of the O.E.C.D. to which I have referred.

There will always be the risk that the combined weight of monetary and fiscal policy will be inappropriate at some particular period of time. This risk is greatest when the economy is already operating at high levels of output and employment and when a moderate under-estimation of future demand strength may be sufficient to permit the emergence of excessive demand pressure. The reverse mistake could also be made and lead to recession.

Therefore the government has supplemented fiscal and monetary policies by selective economic programs of a longer range importance, designed to improve productivity, to encourage price competition within the economy, and to make it easier for workers to move to the jobs where they are most needed.

Among these are the programs for occupational training and retraining, the labour mobility program, the program for the advancement of industrial technology, industrial research and development incentives, the rural development program and the adjustment assistance programs. The government has also made very substantial funds available to the provinces for vocational, technical and professional education.

These selective programs, along with fiscal and monetary policies, have their effect over the longer term. But in the current situation additional measures are required to have a more direct and immediate effect. We must find some effective means of influencing, not controlling but influencing, the many individual decisions that give rise to increases in incomes, costs and prices. To this end the government proposes to establish a governmental agency, commission or board, whatever it may be called, to review and scrutinize major decisions affecting prices, incomes and costs throughout the economy.

This agency will analyse the nature and probable effect of such decisions and, where necessary, subject them to public review and criticism. It will also discuss price and cost problems with representatives of management, labour and consumers, in order to clarify the issues involved and ensure before major decisions are reached that all concerned are aware of the issues and that in dealing with them the public interest is taken fully into account.

The precise nature and the terms of reference of this review agency will be determined after necessary consultations with interested parties. These include provincial governments, the leading elements in the labour movement and in industry, professional associations and others concerned. We shall also, Mr. Speaker, take carefully into account any views on this proposal expressed in parliament.

Consultation with and the co-operation of the provinces will be of first importance. It is clear, Mr. Speaker, that except for businesses and operations under federal jurisdiction, prices, incomes and costs are matters largely within provincial jurisdiction.

Of course the federal government has responsibility for fiscal and monetary policy. But to avoid any conflict or misunderstanding the agency's legal functions, which we propose, will be limited to inquiry and report and to the focusing of public opinion on the findings it may make, compliance with which will be voluntary.

There are various ways in which such a prices and costs review agency could be established. But it is important that it should be done quickly and I believe this can be done by using the provisions of the Inquiries Act. It is not contemplated, therefore, that additional legislation will be required at this time. In the light of experience, if and when an agency with greater powers and authority is required—and this is the way such a board was handled in the United Kingdom—then the government can submit legislation to parliament for that purpose within the constitutional authority it has. Meanwhile action can be taken under the Inquiries Act at once to set up this machinery with carefully defined powers of investigation and report.

In connection with the role of any review agency it is interesting to look at the course adopted in the United Kingdom and followed by the government of the United Kingdom through the national board for prices and incomes. There the problem is a simpler one constitutionally, of course, than we have in Canada. According to an official United Kingdom statement the policy objective of the government in setting up that board was that "money incomes should rise in line with the long term growth of national output and that a generally stable level of prices should be maintained." The specific role of the board is "to examine and report on any questions relating to prices charged for goods or services; to pay claims or settlements or other matters relating to conditions of service and employment; or to any other form of income." The British board has interpreted its task as having three aims: "First, to bring home to the parties immediately concerned the wider implications of their actions; second, to bring these implications home to others involved in similar situations which are not before the board; third, as promoting a quicker adaptation of out of date practices to new needs through consultation between management, unions and the government." In Canada we will have the advantage of working out the powers of this review agency after studying the experience of the United Kingdom board which has been in operation now since 1965, I think.

In the United States similar responsibilities have been assigned to a cabinet committee on price stability which recently has been established. Many other countries have set up similar agencies or agencies with a similar purpose in mind. The methods adopted in other countries have varied but it is clear that machinery of this kind is found to be essential in many major industrial countries.

As an immediate step to deal with the problem in Canada pending the establishment of the board or agency or commission, a special ad hoc committee of cabinet composed of certain ministers who have responsibility in these matters is being established and charged with the responsibility of ensuring that effective action is taken jointly to develop and bring this program into effect. I have sent letters to the premiers of the provinces setting out our concern about the problem, our ideas concerning how we should proceed to deal with it and asking for their co-operation. We are proposing early meetings between federal and provincial representatives to discuss in detail the way in which the two levels of government can co-operate most effectively in this important task. A small group of senior officials is getting in touch with the provincial governments to prepare the way for these early consultations.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Prime Minister would accept a question? I should like to ask him whether he would be prepared to table the letters he has sent to the provinces.

Mr. Pearson: I would be very glad to do that, Mr. Speaker. I will send a wire to the provincial premiers asking for their permission to do so. Some of them may wish that I wait until they reply.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am afraid the right hon. Prime Minister does not see the hon. member for Jacques-Cartier-Lasalle who is seeking permission to ask a question.

Mr. Rock: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a simple question in this regard. I hope this agency will cover the cost of drugs manufactured in Canada as well as everything else.

Mr. Pearson: I would think the authority of the agency in its investigatory powers under the act would be sufficient for that purpose.

Canada is by no means alone in having to face the problem of reconciling full employment with the maintenance of reasonable stability of prices. Other countries have resolved this objective through a variety of means, but it is urgent that Canada find methods that fit the Canadian political, constitutional and economic framework. We must deal effectively with the problem because a solution must be found to it if we are to proceed with sustained economic expansion.

Mr. Speaker, I ask the house to look at the bill before it in the light of current financial conditions as well as in the light of the background of the other conditions which I have ventured to put forward and with which perhaps I have dealt at too great length. I have no hesitation in the circumstances we face to ask the house to support this bill. It represents only a part but an important part of the government's plans. These must be plans at all levels of government in order to secure for this country financial stability with an economic expansion that is continuous and sustainable, the benefits of which will be shared fully and fairly among all sections of our people.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister permit one short question? In the light of the action now taken by the government can he explain why while campaigning in Quebec the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) spoke of reducing the tax burden on the Canadian people rather than increasing it.

Mr. Pearson: I hope the time will come, Mr. Speaker, when that may be done. Perhaps the minister was looking into the future.

Hon. R. A. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, this government has introduced more strange and undesirable parliamentary precedents than all its predecessors put together. This afternoon another has been added—a budget by instalments. Last week we had budgets by press conference and budgets by television. This afternoon we have a budget by instalments. Last Wednesday the minister announced new budgetary measures to replace those defeated by the house. He announced them in committee of supply. Today, just four parliamentary days later, we have the unusual spectacle of the Prime Minister, in what is probably his parliamentary swan song, delivering another budget message. By what procedure? He intervenes on second reading to make a statement which is in fact irrelevant to the bill under discussion. The only way to describe this inept and bumbling procedure is "budget by instalments".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): One thing that is clear, sir, is that this government of alleged decision has been demonstrated to be a government of ineptitude. For, sir, this new budget which was delivered by the Prime Minister was really an admission of failure. It is an apologia for the fact that the Prime Minister acknowledges at last "that Canada's price performance over the past year or two has been bad". It has been bad, Mr. Speaker. That is what we have been trying to tell the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance for months and months on end. Deaf to our pleas have they been. The Prime Minister went on to say: "It now compares unfavourably with that of most other industrialized countries and, of special significance, with that of the United States." Mr. Speaker, that sounds as if the Leader of the Opposition had written it.

What is the Prime Minister's remedy for the situation? The substance of his parliamentary swan song today was apparently a prices and income review agency or commission. He has not even decided what it is to be called; that is a token of the significance he attaches to it. He says an agency or a commission, or call it what you will. Its functions, its objectives and particularly its procedures and its sanctions were left vague and uncertain. The conclusion I came to as I listened to the Prime Minister was that the proposal was a tangled and belated compromise between expediency and necessity.

Certainly inflationary pressures throughout the nation are rampant. Firm and decisive action is imperative. The savings of our people have been eroded and continue to be eroded month by month. Gains in wages have been lost due to fantastic price increases, even before wage earners have had an opportunity to enjoy them. Up and up has gone the cost of living and down and down has gone employment. Today, for example, in our greatest city, Montreal, the unemployment rate is 7 per cent, which represents an unemployed working force larger than the total working force of the capital of Saskatchewan, the city of Regina. Those who are employed are living in dread and fear of runaway inflation. Why do we have these situations in this great country? I am going to analyse some of the reasons the Prime Minister advanced this afternoon but I say to him directly, and I say what the people of Canada know, that the basic reason lies with the 27 men who sit opposite of the treasury benches.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mismanagement of our economy, mistaken budgetary and fiscal policies, fire and fall back policies, flip flop —these have been the characteristics displayed by the Prime Minister and his band of quarrelsome, querulous colleagues. Make no mistake, it is this government which is the author of our economic misfortune, and no attempt to blame it on international factors or blame it on the provinces or municipalities has any basic realism. Excessive spending, wasteful practices, and blindness to economic forces have brought us to the brink of disaster. No attention has been paid to the warnings of the Economic Council of Canada and less to the Auditor General's reports. Politics first has been the watchword of this government.

Will this belated attempt to impose some restraint be of any value? I think the Canadian people will insist on something more than window-dressing. They have been fed enough political flim-flam and economic humbug. Look at the situation. Last June the Minister of Finance talked about guide lines and then he backed away from them. He abandoned this procedure of persuasive restraint. Today, nine months later, what does the government do? It suggests, and I think this is the sum total of the Prime Minister's speech this afternoon, that at some later date it may lock the stable door after it has investigated to make sure that the horse has really been stolen.

What about this matter of priorities that the Prime Minister suggests? What a conversion that is, Mr. Speaker. Not since the conversion of Saul on the road to Damascus has there been anything to equal the Prime Minister's new rectitude in this clasping to his breast of the very policy of priorities that he has always spurned. Priorities indeed. I really thought that only we on this side of the house had talked in that realistic manner. He says, "Oh, yes, we are going to establish an ad hoc committee of the cabinet". How that will make the profiteers tremble. Sir, if a cabinet committee frightens industry and labour as much as any form of a committee of this cabinet frightens the members of this house, inflation will be over automatically,

What of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs? Some of us on this side of the house were under the illusion that it was established to do the very things that are now suggested are going to be done by this agency, commission or call it what you will. Is it that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Turner) is in the doghouse because of his leadership ambitions? Must his wings be clipped? Is this why the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is being denuded of all those great things described to us earlier in the session as its role? What is to happen with all the officials who have been appointed to this new department? The Prime Minister left this unsaid, but merely inferred the transfer of authority to the new agency, commission or call it what you will.

The absence of genuine effectiveness in the new proposal the Prime Minister made this afternoon would seem to be indicated by the fact that no legislation is proposed by the government, that the existing legislative powers are sufficient. "We will do it under the Inquiries Act." If parliament can be bypassed now let me point out that the government had it in its power to establish this commission or agency at any time in the last 18 or 24 months when the inflationary situation was developing. The Prime Minister said this afternoon that conditions had been bad during the last two years. That was his phrase, "bad for two years". Why then, if he admits that today, did he dilly-dally and fiddle while the flames of inflation developed?

The Prime Minister gave no indication this afternoon whether there would be any sanctions in this agency or commission. What teeth will it have? Will it be merely a toothless albatross encumbering the economy? The Prime Minister, as I say, does not even know what it should be called. Whatever it may be called, will it be merely the establishment of another cumbersome, ineffective bureaucracy to replace the jurisdiction of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, who now appears to have got himself in the doghouse?

At the moment the government's proposal, I submit, is nothing more than an expression of pious future intention. The government cannot make up their minds what to do, so they ask others to tell them. I suggest that these pious intentions look just like buckpassing. There are many questions that must be answered before the attitude of this house to the proposal in respect of this particular agency can be determined.

We on this side of the house, and let me make this absolutely clear, are determined that inflation must be stopped, but we have had enough of gay promises without any subsequent effective action. Perhaps there are two things about which I might congratulate the Prime Minister. First, he made a speech in the House of Commons and not on television. Second, at long last he recognized that the present economic expansion started in the year 1961. Listen to his phrase this afternoon, of which I made very careful note—"during our period of expansion which began in 1961". How different from what he used to say when he sat on this side of the house and when the speeches were rolled out for him by the present Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen). Only because the Prime Minister is about to leave us do I refrain from saying that it has taken the right hon. member for Algoma East at least three years to destroy the expansion of the economy which the Progressive Conservative government began.

[Mr. Bell (Carleton).]

May I now give some attention to the new income tax bill, the third attempt at legislative parenthood by the Minister of Finance. This now emasculated bill is the crumbling cornerstone of the government's tottering budgetary edifice. Allegedly the tax increases which it contains—and that is all that is left of it—are designed to meet the fiscal, economic and international crisis which was once so fervently denied by the government but is now so clearly admitted on all sides as well as by the Prime Minister this afternoon.

This crisis is chiefly of the government's own creation. But I want to put to the house very directly that the real crisis in Canada today is a crisis of government, or more specifically a crisis due to lack of competent government. Whatever tinkering may be attempted by fiscal and budgetary expedients, whatever piecemeal efforts may be made to bolster our sagging economy, the crisis will not be ended until this incompetent government is dismissed by the electors. It will not be ended until the government is replaced by a responsible, effective and decisive administration. Yes, sir, the crisis in Canada today is a crisis of confidence and confidence, both domestic and international, can only be restored by a new government.

I think Strickland Gillilan must have had this government in mind when he wrote:

Off ag'in, on ag'in,
Gone ag'in—Finnigan.

What other seven words could more aptly describe the fiscal and economic gyrations of the Minister of Finance? I suggest that his words have seldom been matched by actions, and such actions as he has taken have misfired or been reversed. Unlike any of his predecessors, the Minister of Finance has permitted himself to be the prisoner of events, instead of attempting to act as the captain of the nation's fiscal fate. Yet in his rather frequent television appearances—and I do not attach anything sinister to the number of times he has been on television recently—the Minister of Finance has developed a unique talent for making his inconsistency sound plausible and his about-turns appear economically sophisticated as well as personal vindications.

This house realizes that this is the sixth income tax bill in two sessions of parliament. This country has been treated to the spectacle of what amounts to four budgets in just over 14 months. The first one was on December 19, 1966, the second on June 1, 1967, the third on November 30, 1967, and the fourth on March 6, 1968, which now has been extended by this procedure of budgets by instalments. Of course, as we all know, there have been some intermediate so-called financial statements. The Minister of Finance has done at least one thing. He has achieved an all-time record as a budgeter within the briefest possible period. I suggest to the house that that fact in itself constitutes a confession of dismal failure and of unprecedented fiscal mismanagement. The minister says, "Oh no, this demonstrates flexibility". Flexibility, as the minister interprets it, is just an excuse for uncertainty and a cover for inadequate foresight or the total failure of any foresight.

The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Chrétien) was very clear about this. I thought he made one of the frankest presentations on television on Sunday night that I have ever heard. The interviewer's name was Mr. Martin, and I do not think it was the hon. member for Essex East. Mr. Martin asked the following question in discussing the manner in which the budget was presented:

> And yet, generally enough, in the press it has been recognized as a sort of contempt of parliament.

This is what the Minister of National Revenue answered, and I quote from a translation on which I had the skilled assistance of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert):

> Oh well, some people! There are many traditionalists in Canada and Mr. Sharp is not one of them. He is an extremely flexible person, so flexible that in fact it is his third budget. He is not wedded to the idea that one must present a budget and be bound by it. One must follow economic circumstances, and it is not something very wrong.

The Minister of National Revenue is apparently a great one to make a virtue out of necessity. He said that the Minister of Finance is so flexible that in fact he has delivered three budgets. Flexible, indeed. Let us imagine that instead of making three mistakes he had made six. If he had delivered six budgets he would have been even more flexible. Is fiscal uncertainty to be elevated to a principle of statecraft?

The Minister of Finance has attempted to justify his various changes of course and pace by alleging international factors, as did the Prime Minister this afternoon. But I ask the Prime Minister and I ask the Minister of Finance: Can they point to any nation which has followed such an uncertain, inconsistent budgetary policy as to need four budgets in 14 months?

In the first of these budgets the minister urged restraint. In the second he expressed fear that restraints might lead to recession or economic slowdown. In the third he reversed himself again and asserted a renewed need for restraints, and in the present budget measures he has simply reiterated or underlined that need. In the first budget he taxed, then he removed taxes, then he reversed himself and taxed again, and now in this bill he has proposed another form of taxation. Surely nothing more is needed to establish that the minister has simply resembled a cork bobbing in the economic sea, helpless to resist the waves and helpless to resist forces which he neither foresaw nor attempted to control in advance.

The Prime Minister quoted various alleged authorities this afternoon but he forgot to quote the words of the London Economist written on September 30, 1967, which focus attention on the failure of our fiscal policies as represented by this bill as vividly today as they did then. They read as follows:

> Mr. Sharp, alas, cannot avoid the responsibility for inadequate fiscal action, the need for which he now seems belatedly to have realized. His budget—

That is the June budget.

> —did not revive last year's expansion, but it did nothing to stem the rise in costs and prices. Worst of all, it pushed interest rates higher, because the public was unwilling to absorb bonds and generate a further increase in the money supply.

There we have stated what is responsible for the outrageous interest rates in this country today, namely, the policies of this government which have pushed interest rates higher. The article reads further:

> There have been few examples of such a violent swing of the levers of economic control. Policies that would have been admirably suited to cope with a state of excessive under-utilization of resources were continued well after demand was clearly pressing too hard on the limits of supply. This was not the fault of business, which was trying to cope with its own cost squeeze, but the fault of government which ought to have been far more sensitive to the signals that the economy was making to it.

There, exposed by perhaps the most perceptive economic journal in the world, is the record of the fiscal flip-flop which has led us to our present crisis and which is the parent of this bill. The Economist pinpoints the undoubted fact that government policies are responsible for the usurious interest rates crippling the economy, interest rates which simply cannot be continued at their present level. It pinpoints as well the violent changes in government policy. This article, which as I say is as penetrating and perceptive today as it was in September, concludes with this comment:

> What Canada needs is not a change in the country's longer term objective of well-based prosperity, but the simple recognition that the pace of spending has been running ahead of real output.

Well, sir, the government's recognition of this fact has been to increase this year's main estimates as contrasted with last year's main estimates by almost 8 per cent. I am going to deal with the Prime Minister's figures in this respect. Restraint is what the government preaches, but extravagance and wastefulness are what it practices. In his statement this afternoon the Prime Minister said that the increase in the estimates this year was 4.1 per cent over last year. I suggest that this figure is simply a delusion. It compares apples with oranges. It compares next year's main estimates with the total of all of this year's estimates. It is a phony technique of argument.

This comparison gives no consideration whatever to the supplementary estimates, no consideration to the expenditures that will be required for medicare. I say to you that the only realistic figure to put forward in any comparison of the main estimates for next year would be an increase of almost 8 per cent over last year's main estimates. There is the Expo deficit and a variety of other things to consider. Before we are finished the increase will be considerably more. I did not think it was sporting of the Prime Minister this afternoon to attempt to unload so much of the blame on the provinces and municipalities. What he did not say was that many of the provincial and municipal costs result from the fact that this government forced their hands in cost-sharing programs, and the proposal for July 1 next is forcing their hands even more.

I want to come back to the fact that this bill, as the main part of this fourth budget, came about by the most extraordinary procedure in budget history. Its second birth, resulting from Your Honour's ruling, deserves the attention of Shakespeare. The only way to describe it is, "a comedy of errors". Twenty years ago the then minister of finance, Mr. Abbott, brought about budget by radio, then a unique process of bypassing parliament and violating all constitutional precepts. The uproar which resulted from that technique ought to have laid these odd procedures to final rest. But oh, no, what Mr. Abbott could do the present minister could do better. Last Wednesday afternoon he condescended to tell the house that he intended to propose tax measures. Did he disclose to the house what they were? Not at all. He decided to upstage Mr. Abbott by holding, within an hour of the adjournment of this house, a press conference to tell what he declined to disclose to the people's representatives. Budget by press conference is the new technique for ministers who are "with it". By coincidence, there was a popular television program later that evening and naturally the star of the show was the minister.

Budget by press conference lasted only an hour and a half as the accepted new technique and was replaced by budget by television. So Mr. Abbott, with his old fashioned budget by radio, was passé. The new technique of defiance of parliament, the new way of expressing "parliament be damned" is budget by press conference and budget by television. Finally, this afternoon we have had budget by instalments.

Again, it was the Minister of National Revenue who let the cat out of the bag completely. During the same television interview to which I referred earlier this question was put to the Minister of National Revenue by Mr. Martin:

> This week there were announced new fiscal measures after the defeat in the commons of the temporary surtax of 5 per cent. These were announced by means of a press conference; it is rather unusual, let us say, in the traditions and usages of parliament.

The Minister of National Revenue replied:

> Yes, it is unusual. It is the first time for a tax to be announced by way of a press conference. But it was as the result of the circumstances which prevailed last week. We were negotiating with several countries and with the United States in particular to stabilize the dollar—

Apparently the minister knew about the negotiations that were going on, although he did not really know the dollar was in difficulty. The Minister of Finance did not disclose the figures to his colleague, apparently.

> —and it was absolutely necessary to disclose the new tax to the House of Commons. Since it was a Wednesday, the minister made his presentation in the afternoon without saying precisely what were the nature of the taxes he would levy and he tabled at six o'clock in the House of Commons the budgetary resolutions and he thought that these could lie—

I put down "dormant" but it might be translated "undisclosed".

—undisclosed until tomorrow in the afternoon, only the Speaker was inclined to transmit them to the press. Therefore, the Minister of Finance felt he was obliged to make a statement immediately to the press so that it would be patently clear that it was the Minister of Finance who was making the announcement. But he had warned the opposition parties that he was going to do it.

Well, sir, one of the problems with this government is that except for the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), who is preoccupied with other matters, they do not have a parliamentarian in their whole kit and caboodle. When they lost Chevrier and Pickersgill, and when Martin became an internationalist, they were left without a parliamentarian of any kind. They stumble from one parliamentary crisis to another chiefly because none of them has ever bothered to discover what parliament is all about. I believe, sir, they should remember what Cicero said, that "to stumble twice against the same stone is a proverbial disgrace".

With all the vigour that I can command I deplore their contemptuous treatment of parliament, their cavalier disdain for established budget practices, their scornful arrogance in by-passing this commons chamber. Then, sir, the attempt to present at this one session of parliament a budget proposal so similar in principle, as it is in this bill, to one defeated by this house constitutes a precedent dangerous and intolerable. My comments do not reflect upon Your Honour's ruling but upon the lack of parliamentary understanding by this government. If this house has any role at all which predominates over all others it is as keeper of the purse strings. The precedent set by the Minister of Finance in recent days must be reversed or it will plague our Canadian democracy for long years after all of us have gone to our rewards.

But, sir, odd and objectionable as the procedures have been, even odder still are the proposals themselves. In most aspects the proposals in this bill are far more objectionable than those defeated by this house in Bill No. C-193. I think there are certain principles upon which all members in this house on all sides can agree. All of us appreciate that drastic action is needed to restore confidence domestically and internationally. This government has brought us to that point. All of us agree that defence of the Canadian dollar is a first obligation of parliament and that it must be achieved whatever the side consequences.

All of us support a major attack upon inflation and its continuous victimizing of every Canadian. Relative stability in the price-cost structure, I submit, is imperative if we are to achieve balanced economic growth. Our trade must be expanded, our productivity greatly enhanced, our industry made adequately competitive.

But, Mr. Speaker, this is the test: will the proposals in this bill achieve any of these agreed objectives? With respect, I submit that they retreat from rather than advance to those objectives. The proposed cure, the 3 per cent surcharge on personal and corporate incomes, will intensify rather than alleviate the fiscal malady. I put it to the house, how can you stabilize prices when you set out deliberately to increase costs of production? That is the government's dilemma. These new tax policies will in fact feed the fires of inflation and in their final impact will bear most heavily on those least able to pay. It is the consumer who will pay for this government's mismanagement.

What I am saying to the house is that what the government is doing is pursuing an inconsistent and self-defeating course. The government seeks to control or at least to stabilize prices; yet by an increase in personal and corporate income taxes it makes inevitable a rise in costs. The government apparently seeks to stabilize wages and salaries; yet it raids the worker's pocketbook, driving him inexorably to seek additional income.

These increased costs of production, inevitable as they will be as a direct result of this bill, will be passed along to the consumer. Those costs which are passed along to the domestic consumer will give impetus to the inflationary spiral. Those passed along to the international consumer will reduce our competitiveness in world trade, enhance our balance of payments difficulties and keep the Canadian dollar in a state of suspense. At the very time when we ought to be exerting a unified national effort to expand our exports, the Minister of Finance is raising our costs in a manner which can only frustrate our export drive. These tax hikes, I submit, will sabotage our trade promotion.

Over last week end in Halifax, I think it was, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Winters) coined the term that the budget proposals would be a "decentive" to industry. He knows they will be as well a "decentive" to trade at the very time when our trade promotion should be most aggressive. Why he with his views about balanced budgets and "decentives" remains in this government must be a mystery to all members and indeed to all Canadians. I suggest that he would be doing a national service by insisting upon the immediate acceptance of his resignation so that he can speak his mind freely and easily. The example of the former president of the privy council is there for him to emulate.

So, sir, with this new prices and incomes commission or agency on the one side and the corporate and personal income surcharges on the other, the Minister of Finance is establishing opposing forces that are inevitably set upon a collision course. And, as in so many other matters, the government, being uncertain of its proper course, has set in motion two diametrically opposed forces and now sits back to watch which one will triumph.

The minister's attitude to this situation, Mr. Speaker, reminds me of the following statement by Plato:

> Has he not also another object, which is that they may be impoverished by payment of taxes, and thus compelled to devote themselves to their daily wants and therefore less likely to conspire against him?

Are there any alternatives, Mr. Speaker, to the government's present policy? There is one simple alternative that was explicitly presented by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) last Thursday night. The personal and corporate surcharges are designed to raise $150 million. But the government already has on hand $105 million in refundable corporate tax which it proposed to pay out in this fiscal year and which, under the laws enacted by this parliament, it need not repay before May, 1969. The acceleration of repayment was decided upon by the minister last June, I think it was, when he was in one of his moods which led him to think that the economy needed stimulation and when he thought that he should get some additional money into circulation to prevent slowdown and unemployment. His view of the economy has changed. I suggest he could easily and legally withhold payment instead of imposing an income surcharge.

The minister alleges that this would create problems for the minister of finance in the fiscal year 1969-70. Surely, Mr. Speaker, this is only a confession of the inadequacy of his present policies. A budget in this year within reasonable balance would give the new minister of finance in 1969-70 genuine flexibility to care for the repayment out of growth. In any event, Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the Minister of Finance that we on this side of the house will not hold it against him at all. We would be quite glad to take our chances on what our budget will be in 1969-70.

If the minister would adopt the Leader of the Opposition's suggestion, Mr. Speaker, the difference to be made up would be $45 to $50 million. Surely, as the Leader of the Opposition said, in a budget of $10¼ billion it should be possible to save $50 million. It is not as if all the water had already been wrung out of the estimates.

Mr. Woolliams: They are waterlogged.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Yes, Mr. Speaker, maybe they are waterlogged.

Last autumn the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Benson) engaged in the greatest propaganda drive of all time to convince the public of their belated conversion to budget restraint. What an heroic battle, we were told, was being waged in Treasury Board to avert increases in expenditures. But when the main estimates were tabled they disclosed what I have pointed out—an 8 per cent rise over the main estimates of one year ago. The alleged "hold the line" policy had become merely a propaganda farce.

All that the Treasury Board had done, Mr. Speaker, was what is done every year, namely, cut back on departmental requests. I think everyone knows, certainly anyone who has sat in government knows, that there is an annual game between departments and Treasury Board. The departments submit considerably more than they expect to receive, believing that whatever they submit Treasury Board will cut them back. This cat and mouse game is as old as the techniques of budgeting. But this year, Mr. Speaker, for the first time the Minister of Finance and the President of Treasury Board made flamboyant boasts about the normal processes of estimating and they claimed virtue for actions which every preceding Treasury Board had considered just good fun.

Now, sir, can there be any further restraints? I point out to the minister that in the summer and autumn of 1962 the late Hon. George Clyde Nowlan and his colleagues on Treasury Board, of whom I was one, managed a reduction of $228 million in a budget of $6¼ billion without interfering with any essential service. From experience I know how difficult it is, but it can be done and it can be done without loss to the economy and without loss to the essential services to the public.

I want to refer the minister to the tables that appear at page 650 of Hansard for October 18, 1962. He will see there the savings of $228 million. If $228 million can be saved from a $6¼ billion budget, is it asking too much to save $50 million more from a $10¼ billion budget, particularly when the minister proposes to save $75 million after the President of the Treasury Board, less than a month ago, assured us that not an additional dollar could be saved from the main estimates? I put it to the Prime Minister that if he would only read the recommendations of the Auditor General and the recommendations in the reports of the public accounts committee of this house he would find a good many ways to take him a long way to the objectives he has named.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Sir, there are times when I wish the minister would frame and put on his desk, so that he could see it every hour, this quotation from a message that President Grover Cleveland gave to congress:

> When more of the people's sustenance is exacted through the form of taxation than is necessary to meet the just obligations of government and expenses of its economical administration, such exaction becomes ruthless extortion and a violation of the fundamental principles of a free government.

An hon. Member: Resign.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): When this government came to office less than five years ago spending was at a rate of about $6 billion per annum. Now, as a result of what the former distinguished Superintendent of Insurance, K.R. MacGregor, described as the "spend-yourself-rich" theory of government, spending exceeds $10.25 billion. By the end of the next fiscal year it will exceed $10.5 billion. Some of Mr. MacGregor's comments in his address to the last annual meeting of the Mutual Life Assurance Company of Canada are directly relevant to this bill and the budget policy it represents, and I quote them:

> Earlier, I referred to the "spend-yourself-rich" theory of government. At this point, I should like to suggest the desirability of abandoning as well the "spend-yourself-popular" theory of government in favour of policies more attuned to the wishes of most Canadians. Political leaders seem to have been proceeding on the assumption that Canadians want a paternalistic government, but I am convinced that a majority want first, good government, in order to lead the country out of confusion and uncertainty,—

Heaven knows, we have enough of that today.

> —and second, more of their incomes left for their own disposal. For many years, people have been led to think that governments can do things better and cheaper, but more are now coming to realize that all things—including universal welfare schemes —have to be paid for in full, and that an increasingly onerous tax burden is the inevitable result.

This bill is that "inevitable result", that "increasingly onerous tax burden". For the short reprieve that this government has in office it should take to heart Ken MacGregor's wise words.

The Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board have been engaged in a major propaganda effort to try to convince the public that the government proposes to balance the budget. The President of the Treasury Board, as reported on page 6663 of Hansard for February 13, 1968, went so far as to guarantee a balanced budget—guarantee, if you please. Well, those are only a few of his many glib words that the President of the Treasury Board will have to eat.

The budget deficit for this year, 1967-68, will exceed $750 million. That, Mr. Speaker, is three quarters of a billion dollars. Last Wednesday the Minister of Finance, in releasing statistics which he called "a new outlook for 1968-69 budgetary position", in defiance of his colleague on the Treasury Board forecast a budgetary deficit of $40 million next year, with only limited provision being made for supplementary estimates and without any provision being made for medicare. Far from the balanced budget guaranteed by the President of the Treasury Board, we are heading into a major budget deficit, and if we get the economic slowdown, the deflation, the increased unemployment and the lower agricultural prices which are likely to result from mistaken government policies, the deficit may be much greater. The pretensions of a balanced budget are simply a propaganda hoax attempted to be perpetrated on the Canadian people.

What disturbs me, sir, is the disposition of the government and of some members of the public to blame extravagant governmental expenditures on the public service. It is an insulting fallacy that civil servants are the big spenders. The big spenders, the wasteful, extravagant profligates, are the members of the cabinet itself. The great majority of civil servants try to run a tight ship, and as taxpayers themselves they are sensitive to wasteful projects. But they cannot contend with their political bosses—this disintegrating cabinet. The cabinet members are the ones who throw the millions around and who fail to respond to the Auditor General's strictures.

A by-product of this type of thinking is the absolute freeze on public service establishments. I point out that rarely, indeed, do I adopt the views of the President of the Treasury Board. But on December 7, 1967, just three months ago, before the Minister of Finance imposed the freeze, the President of the Treasury Board expressed views which I hold. Since he expressed them more forcefully and vividly than I could ever hope to do, I wish to quote them. I want members of the house to remember that I am quoting the President of the Treasury Board and I want them to visualize him speaking in his usual glib and jaunty manner. I quote from page 5173 of Hansard:

> I do not think, however, that we should go so far as to impose an arbitrary absolute "freeze" on present establishments. We have examined this suggestion which has been put forward from a number of quarters. Governments in the past, both federal and provincial, have attempted to "freeze" establishments. Such efforts have never been successful. They have produced inequities, distortions, frustrations, and even waste, as senior officials have been obliged to get along without the supporting staff which they require in order to function effectively.

Remember, Mr. Speaker, that was just three months ago.

> The adverse consequences of an absolute freeze persist long after the freeze itself has been abolished or has been eroded away. At the very best, a freeze succeeds only in buying time until a proper policy for restraining staff growth can be devised. A freeze is not in itself a policy: instead it is evidence that no policy exists—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Resign, resign.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Listen to this, Mr. Speaker.

> —and that the authority imposing the freeze has proven to be incapable of devising a policy. We have a policy and we are going to apply it.

Can you not hear the President of the Treasury Board uttering those words? I say to him, "Oh, consistency, thou art a jewel."

When I started to meditate about the President of the Treasury Board, whose words I adopt in full, and what he had done I thought that only two men could have described adequately what has taken place, and they were Gilbert and Sullivan. So I went to Utopia Limited and I read words that apply here. The words which introduce to the stage Sir Bailey Barre, Q.C., M.P., ought to apply to the introduction of the President of the Treasury Board, C.A., M.P. I quote:

> A complicated gentleman allow me to present,
> Of all the arts and faculties the terse embodiment,
> He's a great Arithmetician who can demonstrate with ease,
> That two and two are three, or five, or anything you please;
> An eminent Logician who can make it clear to you
> That black is white—when looked at from the proper point of view;
> A marvellous Philologist who'll undertake to show
> That "yes" is but another and a neater form of "no".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: That applies to the finance minister.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Sir, that which on December 7 last was evidence of no policy, is now policy. That which proved, according to the President of the Treasury Board, that the authority imposing a freeze was incapable of devising a policy, is now gospel. This house did not need additional proof of the incapacity of the authority. That which the President of the Treasury Board said on December 7 had never been successful, had produced inequities, distortions and waste, is now clutched to his heart as revealed wisdom. Need one say more to display that this yo-yo government is without a clue from month to month as to where it is going or, indeed, as to where it has been.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Henri Bourassa, from the depth of his experience, characterized this attitude when he exclaimed :"The only policy of Liberalism is to have no policies; the only principle of Liberalism is to have no principles."

This bill contains the same proposal as was made in the unlamented Bill C-193, or should I say it was lamented only by the Minister of Finance who has made it clear he considers the measure now before us to be only second best.

The feature of this legislation from which the hon. gentleman expects to receive the most substantial sums in the next fiscal period is the provision for accelerated payment of corporate income tax. What the house should understand is that this is merely a gimmick. It is a one-shot operation and in the long run it will not produce a single extra dollar; it simply helps the minister in the immediate fiscal period before us. It is useful once, and once only. In its impact it merely transfers the need to resort to credit facilities from the government to the corporations. It is unlikely to reduce in any way the strain upon the market. The Minister of Finance may be relieved of the necessity of going to the market for the $240 million which this acceleration will yield in the first fiscal period but the payers, the industrial and commercial enterprises of the nation, will probably have to borrow this amount from the banks and the other financial institutions, leaving the net market situation approximately unchanged. However, though we doubt the basic utility of this proposal we shall not oppose it in committee.

Let it be understood by all, though, that the pressure upon the capital market will not be substantially relieved. The impact of government policies will continue to hold up the already intolerable scale of interest rates. I repeat that the burden of interest charges which is being placed on the young people of this nation is becoming nothing short of a national disgrace. Usury, I regret to say, has become an accepted fact of Canadian life, not equalled since Christ drove the usurers from the temple.

It is only by indirection that this bill can be of any advantage in the major task of protecting the Canadian dollar. Yesterday afternoon a fantastic episode was revealed in this house in connection with our exchange reserves. Three times in the course of a television program on Sunday night the Minister of National Revenue stated positively that our reserves had fallen to $1,700 million, which would represent a loss of $790 million in one week. On a question of privilege the minister corrected this. What had happened? He had suffered from a lapse of memory, he said.

Did the Minister of National Revenue make a minor mistake involving only about $800 million? Poor Mr. C. D. Howe got into trouble for asking "What's a million?" Today the Minister of National Revenue forgets about $800 million. A memory lapse, indeed. What a change. The Minister of National Revenue said our losses were running at a rate of between $25 million and $35 million each day. The Minister of Finance says the Minister of National Revenue has not been made privy to his secrets at all. But there has been no denial of the figure which his colleague gave.

In my view the proposals in this bill will not really help to stabilize our dollar position. They will further discourage investment by Canadians in Canada and force Canadian capital to seek opportunities abroad. I suggest that no one can fail to view with alarm the rapid trend of Canadian mutuals, for example, to invest in United States and other securities. At the end of 1967 Canadian mutual fund investments in foreign equities had risen to 44 per cent from 33 per cent the previous year. This vast drain of Canadian capital will be accelerated by the terms of the bill before us. While the minister is struggling to bolster our dollar he is adopting self-defeating taxation policies which intensify his problem.

Mr. Speaker, Bill C-208 is, if anything, more objectionable than the taxation measure which the house rejected earlier. It is an attempt by the Minister of Finance to make the Canadian people scapegoats for the government's own deficiencies and for the consequences of its reversible on-again off-again policies. The bill itself is an unholy tangle of opportunism and necessity. It is self-defeating, likely to inflame rather than control the inflationary forces at work in the nation. It will not solve the fiscal and economic crisis confronting Canada. The only answer to the current crisis, Mr. Speaker, is a new government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, in the course of a fairly long political experience I have seldom heard an important statement more disappointing, more devoid of content and more bewildering than the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) this afternoon.

I am sure he is occupied by important national business at this moment; I should have liked to say this while he was here, because I was terribly disappointed, and I respect the right hon. gentleman. After spending an awfully long time on a silly, elementary exposition of orthodox economic nonsense he followed this up by revealing something he did not define—a review board which is a complete hoax on this parliament and on the people of Canada. The right hon. gentleman even entered the sphere of psychedelic economics and talked about l.s.d. He attempted to blame the provinces, the municipalities, the international world, everybody and everything except the policies for which he and his colleagues are responsible.

He gave us an elementary lecture on economics which was not relevant to the present economic situation in Canada or in any other part of the world. Then he talked about the review board which we were promised a few days ago, a board which was going to do something about controlling the pressure for price or wage increases. And it ended in nothing at all. I say to the Prime Minister as the leader of my country: It is shameful to represent to parliament and to the people of Canada that you are coming before them with a policy and then to come before them with a sham. That is shameful distortion of the duties of a government, and particularly of a prime minister.

I can understand why. If you look through Hansard of the last couple of years you will find that the Minister of Finance had deprecated the idea of a review board. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene), on a late show, expressed himself in his usual amusing way about the irrelevancy of a prices review board. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Turner), in a speech which he made when the legislation setting up his department was before committee, was as supercilious about it as he is about most of the suggestions made to him. We have one minister who does not like the idea, we have another minister who is amused by it, and we have a third minister who is supercilious about it. In those circumstances how could we expect the Prime Minister to come out with any policy that is meaningful on the same subject?

If I sound indignant it is because I am, Mr. Speaker. This is the only area of policy in which I had hoped the government would do something today. But instead the Prime Minister comes in with a statement which literally means nothing at all and tells us nothing about what he will do about prices, wages, incomes or anything else. It is an insult not only to the intelligence of the people of this country but to the members of this house. It is a form of cynicism I would have expected from some members of the cabinet but which I had a right not to expect from the Prime Minister himself.

When you look at the Prime Minister's statement, what did he tell us? He said, as the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) pointed out, that it might be a board or it might be a commission. Then he said it will be set up under the Inquiries Act. I looked at that act, Mr. Speaker. I do not claim to be a legal expert, or an expert on the particular relevance of the sections of that act, but that act does not provide for the kind of continuing agency which we must have to deal with the problem of prices, wages and incomes. That act talks about giving a person who is to be charged notice of the charge. Who in heaven's name is talking about a charge? The act does not give a commissioner of inquiry authority to make recommendations. What good is a board which does not make recommendations? It is entirely irrelevant to the kind of economic and social inquiry which is necessary.

We are not dealing with a Munsinger affair for which you appoint a royal commission under the Inquiries Act, of a Spencer affair, or some scandal, or some particular issue that is being investigated. We are talking about a basic economic and social policy to be made by a basic economic and social agency. What insulting nonsense it was for the Prime Minister to suggest that under the Inquiries Act he is going to set an arm of social and economic policy on a continuing and meaningful basis. It is not going to be anything of the sort.

We were told that the policy with which the government was now coming before parliament was a three-pronged policy. One prong was a bill to recoup the revenue which might have been collected under the bill which was defeated. The second was a reduction in expenditures of $75 million. I have not yet figured out the percentage which that is of $10 billion, but I suspect it is pretty infinitesimal. The third was the establishment of some kind of agency to control by persuasion or in some other way restrain the increased cost of living.

We have got the bill by which to get the taxes. The $75 million cut in expenditures is not worth a hoot in Hades so far as the people of Canada are concerned. It is no more than a scratch on the surface so that members of the government may be able to say, "We have cut expenditures". It is another cynical outrage. So far as the third and most important part of the policy which we were promised is concerned, it is now just a large zero without meaning, without content and without purpose. Yet the government thinks that members of the opposition, and indeed its own supporters, ought to vote for it on the bill which is before the house.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that I was deeply disappointed by the statement of the right hon. Prime Minister because in his analysis of the economy he did no more than repeat the things which the Minister of Finance has said over and over again, until one was as bored when the Prime Minister sat down as one had been when the Minister of Finance sat down. The change of voice had no effect on the words that were used or the thoughts that were expressed. I am almost inclined to be Biblical about it, the voice being the voice of Jacob but the hand being the hand of Esau —the Minister of Finance. I was inspired to this kind of comment by the hon. member for Carleton but I assure you, sir, that I am not going to Aristotle, Plato, or indeed to Gilbert and Sullivan tonight, although I might be tempted to go to the Marx brothers, which might provide a more appropriate analogy.

Moreover, the Prime Minister showed his failure and his government's failure to comprehend the nature of the present problem by saying, with a kind of charming smile on his face, that sometimes this tax bill is accused of being inflationary and sometimes of being deflationary. Let me tell the right hon. Prime Minister a secret. It is a fact that this tax bill is both. It is a fact that in the present economic situation the tax bill is inflationary in the sense that it will increase prices. It will probably encourage higher wage demands through the personal surtax, and the surtax on corporations will be passed on to the consumer in the form of higher prices. Thus it will be inflationary in that sense. It will be deflationary as well because the withdrawal of this money from the purchasing power of the country will further depress the economy and further increase unemployment.

This is the dilemma in which the right hon. gentleman and his friends and their friends in the loyal opposition find themselves—these great supporters of the system which has completely tied them hand and foot. This is their dilemma, that without the necessary planning and control of the agencies of economic power in our society this kind of policy is both inflationary and deflationary at the same time. As I have said elsewhere, it gives you the worst of both worlds: increasing prices and increasing unemployment simultaneously. That is exactly what this policy does, and that is exactly what it will do. The right hon. gentleman shows a lack of comprehension about the present world when he is astounded by people suggesting that this bill will be both at the same time. It will indeed be both at the same time.

In a speech which I made last December I said, and so have many of my colleagues, that we cannot go along with the Conservative party's attitude to this situation. I think the government is right in saying to the Conservatives: "Stop talking about cuts in expenditures without telling us what you wish to cut out." The right hon. Prime Minister would be perfectly entitled to say to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), "In my speech today I indicated the programs which have caused increases in federal government expenditures. Please indicate which of these you want cut out." Which of these programs the Prime Minister has listed has the Conservative party got courage and honesty enough to say it does not want?

Mr. Grafftey: That is an old saw.

Mr. Lewis: It is not an old saw. It is a fact. Let parliament and the people of Canada into the secret as to which of these programs—old age security pensions, family and youth allowances, veterans pensions, equalization payments, the Canada Assistance Plan, hospital insurance, health grants, etc., etc.—the Conservative party wants cut. I say, Mr. Speaker, that if they were sitting to your right instead of to your left they would not touch a single one of these programs because they know perfectly well that these programs have the support of the Canadian people and are necessary to the welfare of the Canadian people.

• (5:40 p.m.)

Mr. Starr: They do not represent the total budget. You should be honest about it.

Mr. Lewis: I will try to be honest. I do not have to try very hard to be more honest than some other hon. gentlemen who are calling for honesty. I appreciate that they are not the total budget I realize there are other expenses involved, but they are related to these programs.

Mr. Starr: They are not.

Mr. Lewis: I join with anyone who is for motherhood and against sin. I am in favour of ridding ourselves of waste and extravagance. Who is not? In fact, while this was going on I had a suggestion in mind. I intended to suggest to the right hon. Prime Minister that by sacking half his cabinet he might accomplish something in the way of expenditure cuts. Undoubtedly there is waste and extravagance and it should be cut out, but I say seriously to my friends in the Conservative party—I do not wish to fight with them—that even if we cut out whatever waste and extravagance there is we still will not meet the essential problem, because the introduction of new programs to help the economy, to stimulate the economy, build houses and provide people with social insurance and medical insurance will require government expenditures.

Mr. Grafftey: It is not what they are doing but rather how they are doing it.

Mr. Lewis: In that I will agree with my hon. friend. If what the criticism amounts to is that the government is not doing these things well, then I certainly agree with them on that. The hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) asked me to be honest. I am trying to be honest. I do not intend to fool myself, any member of this house or any citizen of Canada by suggesting that it is possible to have a modern society with government participation in all the fields in which it must participate without increasing expenditures and therefore without the need for increased revenue. There is no way to avoid this. I do not propose to present my arguments on any basis other than a recognition of that fact in a modern society.

There are other areas, however, in which serious cuts in expenditures can be made in addition to cutting down on waste and extravagance. There are such things as some of those suggested by the Auditor General and by the Glassco commission. We think there are also other ways in which to cut expenditures. We have indicated these time and time again to the government. We believe Canada should stop wasting money on defence expenditures that are of no value to the international community and of no value to Canada's national interests. Every penny spent on NORAD—if my memory serves me correctly the amount is about $130 million—is a total and absolute waste because NORAD was created to meet a threatened manned bomber attack the danger of which disappeared if it ever existed at all. Most of our defence expenditures under NATO are now useless because the situation in Europe is entirely changed. I do not wish to go into the details of this. My friend and colleague the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) did so the other day.

The international situation for which NATO was created in 1948-49 no longer exists. The threat of Soviet attack in Europe has certainly receded and I hope with all my heart has disappeared. Statements by representatives of all the members of NATO and the recent investigation have shown that everybody is agreed that the role of NATO should be changed from that of a military alliance to that of an organization to negotiate with the Warsaw pact countries solutions to European political problems. These, therefore, are the areas in which the government could bring about cuts in expenditures of hundreds of millions of dollars without affecting any issue of principle or welfare internationally or nationally. The right hon. Prime Minister recognized this but then said, if I remember his words correctly, that this would mean becoming an uncommitted nation.

I do not see what right—I was first inclined to use rather stronger language—the Prime Minister had to say that. France has withdrawn its military participation in NATO and is by no means an uncommitted nation. There are other nations in Europe which are not part of the military NATO machine and they are by no means uncommitted nations. We are not suggesting for one moment that Canada should be anything other than a nation concerned with the welfare and progress of the democracies and the democratic objectives which all of us in this parliament are determined to preserve and expand. That does not mean, however, that we must participate in huge military expenditures that are of no value. That is the case in respect of the expenditures to which I have referred.

This is not a debate on external affairs but perhaps I might add that I am perfectly and profoundly convinced that by hanging on to these traditional policies without the courage to reassess them—and this is true for our friends as well as for ourselves—we create harm internationally because this makes us unable to deal in a modern and relevant way with the new problems which exist in Europe and in the world. We concentrate so much on an outdated military role for NATO that the reports which suggest a political role are treated as just so many statements and words to which no one pays any attention. The argument continues to be heard that western Germany should have this or that or that some countries should do this or do that militarily. These are the issues on which we concentrate to the exclusion of consideration of the new political situation in Europe which requires a solution. So if we are looking for cuts in expenditures and in manpower that would be considerable and significant, these are the areas where we ought to be looking.

Then there are other areas where we could raise additional revenue. We have said this time and time again although my Conservative friends certainly have not. There are those areas mentioned in the Carter report such as the situation in which people make money in the stock market. I am describing it in that way so that it will be clear to what I am referring. There is the matter of a tax on the money people make on the stock market or from speculating in currency or in gold to the disadvantage of Canada and the world. These people get away without paying any tax on this money. Then there is the matter of the removal of concessions to mining companiest, insurance companies and oil companies.

What has happened in respect of this bill is that the Minister of Finance and his advisers have decided to put a little sugar on the pill. They have thought of us as children who would be attracted by the sugar and therefore would swallow the pill even though we regurgitated the one he tried to give us on February 19. Let me tell you that my colleagues in my party, and I join them, are pleased and proud of the fact that parliament was able to force out of this government and this Minister of Finance some little modicum of improvement in the tax bill. The rate is now 3 per cent instead of 5 per cent. It is a little more equitable because corporations are covered as well as individuals. It is definitely declared to be a temporary tax for only two years. It has removed the ceiling and it has increased the floor from $100 to $200. All these things were ordained against the minister's wishes and against the government's intentions by the determination of all opposition members not to stand for the inequity of the last bill.

We are very pleased today that parliament was able to assert itself and make the minister, against his desires and his wishes, be a little more fair. Fairness is the kind of thing that even when squeezed out against a person's wish is still of some value. Other things may not be. We are not going to swallow this bill even though it is sugar-coated, because it still heightens and underlines the inequities of the present tax system and it is still the wrong policy for Canada's economy.

Nothing struck me more disappointingly and distressingly about the Prime Minister's statement than this fact. He was able to make a speech of about an hour on this day, March 12, 1968, and say not a single, solitary word about unemployment in Canada. He said not one single, solitary word. Indeed, he even went so far as to make a statement somewhere in his speech, and I say this with some hesitation about the Prime Minister of this country, which was totally and factually wrong. It was untrue. Somewhere in his speech the right hon. Prime Minister said that our economy is still expanding, although at a slower and more bearable rate. The fact is that our economy is no longer expanding at the present time.

The fact of the matter is, and someone ought to have told the Prime Minister, that as of January of this year unemployment in Canada was at 6.1 per cent of the work force. Someone should have told the Prime Minister that in the Atlantic provinces the rate of unemployment as of January of this year was 11 per cent. Someone should have told him that in Quebec as of today the rate of unemployment is over 8 per cent and in Montreal is 7 per cent. Someone should have told him that on the prairies the rate of unemployment is now over 6 per cent and in British Columbia higher still.

To make a statement about the state of the economic union in Canada today and mention not a single, solitary, syllable about increasing unemployment in Canada is to be capable of that kind of self-delusion, if not distortion, which may be as admired as it is to be regretted. The fact is that we oppose this bill because of these unemployment figures. We oppose this bill because it continues a disastrous policy for Canada.

Raising $150 million additional in a budget of $10 billion is not going to arouse the confidence of the international money market unless all the people who deal in the international money market are a gang of moronic idiots. I do not think the people dealing in the international money market are morons. They are usually pretty cute, and people as cute as they are, are not going to think that the raising of revenue by less than 1 per cent of the total budget shows an ability to control the economy. They still use some simple monosyllabic words to describe that kind of hoax. They are pretty sophisticated men and women who deal in that market. Does the Minister of Finance believe that they will really feel this is the way the Canadian dollar is being saved? That is rubbish.

The kind of thing that could really increase these people's confidence in Canada is increased productivity in this country and the accomplishment of some of those things the now-buried Watkins report suggests. I suppose the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Gordon) resigned from the government because he has to put on sackcloth and ashes to supervise the burial of the great policy he has been promoting for so many years but which now appears to be completely dead. I do not blame him for feeling sad about it. I feel sad also.

It is my belief that we can increase the confidence in Canada if we do some of the things suggested in the Watkins report including the rationalization of Canada's industry, the specialization of Canada's industry, doing away with the idea that Canada's economy is to continue to be merely a carbon copy of the economy south of us, which is what it is now. We should do the things that will make Canada's economy efficient, and above all we should decrease unemployment to at least 3 per cent or even less. When we do that our revenues will increase, our people will have a higher standard of living, and the entire world will see a growing, throbbing economy. Surely that is the greatest safeguard of the currency of any nation in the world.

Why was the British government unable to hold its currency in spite of all the things it tried? Basically the economy of Great Britain was in very serious difficulty. Why is Canada pretty confident that we can hold the dollar with care but without too much trouble? It is basically because the economies of North America are strong. Our resources are many and our economies are rich. That is why we can do what a poor economy like Britain's, which requires a great deal of modernization and a great deal of attention, was unable to do.

These are the things we should do to protect our currency. We must manage the economy properly by planning properly, not planning the way the Minister of Finance and his advisors have been doing or, as my leader said the other day, by putting on the brakes one day and the accelerator the next, and, according to some of the articles I have read, at least six months late each time.

The final word I want to say, and I will not be more than a minute or two, is that in our opinion Canada is becoming so tied to the economy and even the monetary system of the country to the south that our independence, our sovereignty, our freedom of action and our self-reliance are being eroded by the policies of the government of this country supported, at least I think, by members of the official opposition. Nothing gives greater evidence of this than the Minister of Finance's own behaviour since the United States policy was announced by the president in January. I do not have any quotations but the Minister of Finance is in the chamber and if I misstate him I invite him to correct me.

In January, immediately after the President of the United States announced his policies, the Minister of Finance in his engaging way rose in this house and before television cameras stated these policies would not affect the Canadian economy. He said: We are not worried about them at all and there is no need to be concerned because they will not affect us. A little later he said he had to go to Washington to get clarification of these policies that were clear to him at the beginning of January and which did not affect us. A little later they apparently were not clear to him. Then three or four days ago he came to this house and with great glee and satisfaction informed us that the United States policies which did not affect us and which we did not care about because they had no influence on our economy, the policies which had already been clarified for him, were now not to be applied to Canada at all. He went to the most awful trouble to get rid of policies that meant nothing, according to him.

The fact is that he was not honest with himself or with us in January. He was under self-delusion later when he talked about clarification. He knew perfectly well that the United States policies would affect the Canadian economy and eventually he would have to do something about them. What does he do? Does he take some action on the part of this government? No, Mr. Speaker, he makes a trip of the mendicant to Washington. He gets down on his knees and makes a new arrangement with the government of another country, the policies of which do not apply to us. "Please do it to him, don't do it to me", says the Minister of Finance, and when he gets the right response he comes back here with glee.

• (6:00 p.m.)

I realize it is six o'clock, Mr. Speaker. Let me conclude by saying that we will oppose the bill before us because it carries on the inequities. We are disappointed beyond words at the lack of any substance to the review system about which the Prime Minister spoke today. I hope we share the view of all opposition members that this kind of performance by the government should not only not have the confidence of the house but does not deserve the confidence of the people of Canada, particularly the working people of this country.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at ten o'clock this day are as follows: The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis), Consideration to withdrawing Canada's participation from NORAD; the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Macquarrie), External Affairs—Nigeria—Canadian efforts to end civil war; the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell), Communications—inquiry as to reservation of satellite space.

It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR SURCHARGE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Sharp for the second reading of Bill No. C-208, to amend the Income Tax Act.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I intend tonight to proceed with a consideration of the speech made this afternoon by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson).

I shall abstain from analysing that of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) in which there is some good, since he blames the government for not having anticipated the financial and economic situation now prevailing in Canada. On the other hand, the hon. member for Carleton, as usual for the Conservatives, took great care not to offer a solution to the problems we have to deal with now.

That is on a par with the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) who said, among other things, that the new bill introduced in the house was a pill a little more sugared than Bill No. C-193 but he too forgot to offer a plausible solution, a solution that might settle the problem.

Since 1962, we, of the Ralliement Créditiste, have been warning the government against this serious situation, this present state of economic chaos. Government members might say again and again that the same situation prevails in Great Britain, in the United States, in Belgium and in France, but this does not settle the problem here in Canada.

It is surely not by means of tax increases that we shall lower the cost of living, create employment or promote the economic development of our young country abounding in all kinds of resources.

This afternoon, we listened to the speeches of the Prime Minister, of the hon. members for Carleton and for York South and tomorrow, it will be reported in the press, on radio and on television, that the opposition criticized the government, that the latter announced further taxes, that the Prime Minister said that the federal government was spending less than the provinces or the municipalities. Now, the whole speech of the Prime Minister may be summed up this way: The provinces and municipalities spend more than the federal government.

Mr. Speaker, at a meeting of the members of the Ralliement Créditiste, we asked ourselves: in view of the precarious situation of the minority government, and in view of the fact that at times—perhaps not always, but at times—we of the Ralliement can hold the balance of power of this parliament, how should we use this balance of power, as a political party composed of intelligent beings, for I maintain the members of the Ralliement Créditiste are intelligent and reasonable beings. We asked ourselves this question: How must we use this power? Must we use it merely to bring on elections or rather, in a given situation, must we try to obtain maximum results for the Canadian people? That is the question we asked ourselves: Must we spend our time playing at elections?

Mr. Asselin (Charlevoix): You are afraid of elections.

Mr. Caouette: The hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Asselin) says that we are afraid of elections. I am willing to fight him on his own grounds, at La Malbaie, or anywhere else for that matter. I have already defeated him and he knows it. He was a minister, but a minister who was not worth a penny.

Mr. Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

I invite the hon. member to meet me on my own grounds, any time at all!

Mr. Caouette: Any time at all, as the hon. member knows. He was once called "honourable". It lasted three weeks. If he thinks he is the most important person in the riding of Charlevoix, he will see what will happen in the next elections. He will lose his riding.

Mr. Speaker, we wondered whether, in a given situation, we should be content to play at elections or try instead to get the very best results for the Canadian people. That is the question each Créditiste member must ask himself, not only in the house, but outside the house. That is the question the hon. member for Charlevoix should ponder instead of thinking only of elections and spending the people's money.

In the parliamentary crisis brought about by the defeat of Bill No. C-193, was it more important to oppose the tax increase or to defeat a government which would have been followed by a similar government? That was the question.

When we think, Mr. Speaker, that there was a time when, on the other side of the house, there were 208 Conservatives out of a total of 265 federal members, and it was then that the Canadian dollar was devaluated and there were a million unemployed in Canada, one cannot accept that these people should give us a lesson and keep saying that the Créditistes are afraid of elections. From 208, their number fell to 100. They lost 108 members, I think, and now they are trying to give us a lesson!

Mr. Speaker, that does not prevent this government from having responsibilities and I shall talk about that later.

[Mr. Caouette.]

By the course of action we took during the debate on Bill No. C-193, as well as those who voted with us, we saved Canadians an increase of about $475 million in taxes and got them a refund of more than $75 million already collected since January 1, 1968. That is, I think, a positive action which will be profitable to all Canadians.

• (8:10 p.m.)

Mr. Lambert: Not even a cent was reimbursed.

Mr. Caouette: Certain generous persons have accused us of having sold out to the Liberals. Did the same generous persons accuse us of having sold out to the Liberals when we voted with the government to increase old age pensions from $75 to $105 per month?

Where is the logic of certain election fanatics?

And for the information of the Conservatives—I regret that the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) is not here this evening, because I would give him a piece of my mind—on February 5, 1963, when the Conservative government was defeated, before the vote, I was in the office of a Conservative minister—there were two of them—and I was asked to support the government and I was told that, in the afternoon of the following day, I would be given John Diefenbaker's head on a silver platter, here, in the House of Commons. This statement was made by two ministers and the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) is aware of it.

Mr. Speaker, we have not sold out either to the Conservatives or to the Liberals. But we do use our heads in parliament. I hear some members laughing. If you want to hear some more in this vein, I can oblige.

Everybody must know that we have voted against taxes and we have won our point. If the government brings in another legislation with taxes such as the one before us, we shall vote against it. Whether the vote is taken to-night, to-morrow or the day after, we shall vote against taxes, because the Canadian people is already overburdened with taxes. We submit—and I suggest to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) to listen to this—that if the Canadian government is able to lend money without interest to England, Algeria, Bolivia, India, Jamaica, or to any other country in the world, it should have at least the decency to finance its own monetary needs without interest as well. The Bank of Canada is certainly in a position to play its own part, that is, make financially possible what is materially feasible. And I challenge the hon. Minister of Finance to tell me that that solution will not solve the problem facing the government at the present time.

Mr. Speaker, we are tired of seeing our taxes increased. I was informed earlier that the province of Ontario once more has to increase its taxes on gasoline, tobacco and cigarettes. The municipalities' turn will come next. Quebec city has just announced $1.20 increase on every $100 assessment. The city of Montreal has just announced some restrictions: such project will not be carried out for lack of funds.

The Prime Minister said this afternoon: Let us respect the system.

Earlier, Mr. Speaker, following the supper recess, I found two letters in my mail. I have one here which comes from St. Edgar in the Bonaventure riding. Unfortunately, the hon. member for Bonaventure is not in the house. It is a letter from a lady in St. Edgar, whose name I will not mention, but I have her letter in my hand. She begins in this way:

After listening to you on the television—

Mr. Speaker, I speak on television, each week, in Sherbrooke, Quebec, Carleton, Rivière-du-Loup, Chicoutimi, Rouyn-Noranda.

Mr. Mongrain: Not on the C.B.C.

Mr. Caouette: Not on the C.B.C., of course, but on private stations.

As one might expect, people listen.

I continue:

After listening to you on the CHAU television station, I want to congratulate you, because everything you say really makes sense.

Do you hear the hon. member for Charlevoix laugh. He finds that funny. We licked him in 1962 and in 1963, but he is not satisfied yet. Rest assured that we will lick him the next time.

Mr. Asselin (Charlevoix): The next time, you are the one we will lick.

Mr. Caouette: And the former little minister without portfolio will remember it, that time.

Mr. Asselin (Charlevoix): It is you that we will lick.

Mr. Caouette: This is what that lady says:

I want to congratulate you, because everything you say really makes sense and how happy we would be if, some day, we could go to bed at night without worrying about the next day.

That is the letter of a family.

We are eight in our family. I can tell you that the children do not have everything they need. As for myself, I am sick.

This is the mother of the family who writes that.

Mr. Speaker, I have four files, with four drawers, each filled with letters like that in my office. They come from people in every part of Quebec, New Brunswick, Manitoba, northern Ontario, who complain about their economic plight. Those are needy families. Do we have to go to India to see destitutes? Do we have to go to Jamaica or to England to see poverty? We have some right here at home; we can see people who go to bed at night worrying about what the next day will bring.

I have here another letter from Cap d'Espoir, in Gaspé South county. This is what it says:

Mr. Caouette, I listen to you every week over the television station at Carleton. I like to hear you talk. I find you are so right, even if I did not vote for you. Here, in Gaspé, your party did not have a candidate. It is very sad, because some people would have voted for your party. Personally, I am frank about it, I did not vote for your party, instead I voted for the Conservatives. There has not been much change. What can we do about it, whether they are Tories or Grits, they are all alike; the system is always the same.

That is precisely what we are saying. That letter, Mr. Speaker, comes from the riding of Gaspé—

Mr. Keays: Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the hon. member?

Is that person the leader of your party in the riding of Gaspé?

Mr. Caouette: No, he is a former organizer of the member who just put the question, and he has just now lost him.

Mr. Speaker, having said this, I come to the analysis of the speech which the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) made this afternoon, a magnificent speech prepared by financial experts. There is no getting out of it, he did not prepare that speech himself. Besides, at one point, he had to change certain terms because those who wrote the speech did not use the terms he usually uses. But we realize that it was a speech intended to save the face of finance. It was not a speech for the people, to save the young, to save fathers and mothers, no.

It was a speech asking us to make even more sacrifices, to tighten our belt even more. Only, tomorrow, the headlines will report not —that there are many parliamentary correspondents, I see—that the right hon. Prime Minister said it was necessary to levy a new tax, that the Conservatives blamed the government and the New Democratic party blamed the government. But the solution that we are advocating, to use the Bank of Canada, will be relegated to the obituary column or the back pages of the newspapers, even to the classified advertisements, perhaps under "Apartments for rent".

Mr. Speaker, it is certainly not through the press nor the C.B.C. radio and television networks that we can make our views known to the people. We use a network of private stations and this House of Commons to say what we have to say, to put forward our solutions. And I come to that.

The right hon. Prime Minister said this afternoon, quoting, for instance, "The 4th Annual Review of the Economic Council of Canada" published in September 1967:

• (8:20 p.m.)

[English]

This (expansion since 1961) represents probably the longest uninterrupted expansion—and certainly the longest peacetime expansion—in Canadian business cycle history.

[Translation]

The cycle system: cycle of expansion, cycle of recession.

When I was a boy going to school, I was taught sacred history. I learned the story of Joseph who interpreted the dreams of Pharaoh—

Mr. Mongrain: May I ask a question?

Mr. Caouette: You could let me conclude and ask your questions later, I do not mind but I find interruptions disturbing.

Mr. Mongrain: If the Chair would allow me. I know the hon. member is able to improvise and I have a simple question to ask him: Am I to understand that the hon. member did not receive the French version of the Prime Minister's speech, since he is quoting from the English version?

Mr. Caouette: Well, Mr. Speaker, I must say that I received this afternoon a revised French version, and I thank one of the Prime Minister's secretaries who has sent it to me, but it is almost impossible to read it. The note accompanying the text reads as follows:

I am very sorry to send you a rough French version, but the translators have just finished. I thought you might like to have something in French anyway, even if only a rough draft. Otherwise, it would be necessary to wait for tomorrow's Hansard.

Therefore, efforts were made to give me the French version. In fact, I think there are 43 pages. I thank those responsible in the Prime Minister's office for their consideration. They must have known I was going to speak in French tonight. I want to be fair and impartial.

Mr. Speaker, I was speaking of the dreams of Pharaoh which were interpreted by Joseph. Pharaoh had a strange dream one night. In the morning he sent for Joseph and told him: I dreamt of seven fat kine. All was for the best in the best of all possible worlds, everyone was happy, the court was prosperous, everything was going smoothly. A little later, I had the vision of seven lean kine. Joseph then explained to the Pharaoh that the seven fat kine meant seven years of abundance, and the seven lean kine, seven years of famine, and that the granaries had to be filled during the years of abundance so that people could live during the years of famine.

This is what I am reminded of by this government cycle contrivance or this cyclist business.

An hon. Member: Cyclic.

Mr. Caouette: The word "bicycle" could have been substituted for "cycle". That is what the Prime Minister said this afternoon and he further added:

[English]

It is also true that these problems are made more dangerous, and their solution made more difficult, by threats to the international financial and economic co-operation which so far has distinguished the post-war years from those of the thirties.

[Translation]

In 1928, Mr. Speaker, speeches similar to the one made this afternoon by the Prime Minister were heard in parliament, warning us against inflation, against a rapid economic growth, against projects that can wait, against the requirements of provinces, municipalities and school boards.

Mr. Speaker, this speach is strangely similar to the speeches made in 1928 and in 1929, a few months before the economic crash which practically ruined the economy in Canada and in the United States.

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister did not tell us this afternoon that in 1914, before the first world war, our national debt had not reached a billion dollars, while in 1918, four years later, it was approximately $3.5 billion or $3.75 billion. What was the source of those $3 billion during the war?

From 1918 to 1939, our national debt did not practically increase, it remained approximately at $3½ and $3¾ billion. We went through the depression years saying to the Canadian people: "It is a world depression, starve on heaps or mountains of wheat, while large quantities of wheat and millions of bags of flour were thrown in lakes Superior, Erie and Ontario and 600,000 Canadians and their family were underfed. Potatoes were burnt in New Brunswick. Production was destroyed. Businesses were going bankrupt, a total ruin. It was the great economic depression, because there was no money, Mr. Speaker.

Our national debt remained at $3 billion until 1939. Now, from 1937 to 1945, the public debt has passed from $3.5-3.75 billion to $17 billion, representing an increase of $14 billion. But where did these $14 billion which were used to subsidize the war come from?

I remember the depression years. I was a young man then. We were desperately looking for jobs. There were no jobs, neither for the young, nor for men with a family to support. In 1939, Mr. Speaker, this is the invitation they sent to the young people of Canada: For the last ten years you have been ill fed, for the last ten years have not been well clothed, for the last ten years you been living in shabby tenements, now we invite you to join the army of His Majesty, to fight for the defence of what you have seen, of what you have been through, the great depression. Come now and fight for the defence of civilization and Christianity. This is what we were told.

The manpower necessary to the production of valuable goods in Canada was taken away. Those 800,000 young men whom we undertook to dress and house properly, to ship to the battlegrounds, were not producing for the people as a whole, but were going to defend the Canadian homeland. During those war years, when did we hear the Liberal government tell us that we were short of money to manufacture guns, shells, war destructive weapons, to clothe the soldiers, to feed them, to carry them over to Europe? Never. On the contrary, Canada reached a standard of living higher than before the war and during the economic crisis.

Furthermore, the Canadian government managed to give approximately $5 billion to England. Every time we threw bombs over Germany, did the Canadian government send Hitler a letter saying: If you do not pay cash, we will not throw them? Of course not, we gave him all that for nothing during those five years of war.

Today, the Minister of Finance, the right hon. Prime Minister and the government tell us that they are short of money while the Canadian economy is prosperous. If war broke out tomorrow, we would still find billions of dollars to dress the young people. We would send our university students to carry on their studies in military universities; we would find billions to make tanks, shells and guns. To fight the war, we would still find billions but when it comes to developing our Canadian economy, to create jobs for the 80,000 unemployed in the city of Montreal, to create jobs for the 400,000 or 500,000 jobless Canadians, the government tells us: We cannot afford it under the present financial conditions. The government grovels and crawls before a financial system.

The Prime Minister continued his jeremiad this afternoon when he said:

• (8:30 p.m.)

[English]

Our most worrying problem now is the threat to financial stability from the recent and continuing rates of increase of prices, incomes and costs in the Canadian economy.

[Translation]

Who is responsible for that situation, for the financial instability, for the increase in prices and in the cost of production? The tax increases and not just the government expenditures.

The Prime Minister also said:

[English]

Increase in productivity is essential if we are to have rising incomes without the kind of inflation which will rapidly erode the benefits we would otherwise receive from this rise.

[Translation]

We recognize that a higher standard of living is closely related to increased productivity. At the present time the warehouses of our plants, our wholesalers and retailers are splitting at the seams with all kinds of goods. All one has to do to realize it is go around Ottawa, down Bank street, go to Eaton's or Simpson's or Caplan's or anywhere else in the country, go to Montreal, Vancouver, Winnipeg or Halifax. It is the same everywhere: the stores are full, overflowing with goods of all kinds and sales are advertised which are seasonal, mid-seasonal, quarter-seasonal, and combined. You see sales everywhere. Is productivity lacking to give the Canadian people enough purchasing power to dress, eat, and house themselves decently? Do we lack essential goods in Canada? "Increased productivity". That sounds good for the journalists who tomorrow will speak over the radio, or on television or in the papers. "Increased productivity". But, we do not even manage to sell the present stocks.

People feel the same way about it as that lady who wrote:

"Mr. Caouette, we are anxious to have a system that will allow us to go to bed at night without worrying about the following morning."

Mr. Speaker, that is the situation in which hundreds of thousands of Canadians live and, the government does not take it into account.

The Prime Minister said—with all that, I have only reached page 5—and I quote:

[English]

The responsibility of government to curb inflation is made the more difficult because financial and currency problems are often concerned with considerations which are more psychological than concrete in nature.

[Translation]

Is the situation of that lady from Bonaventure "psychological"? Is it psychological or is it real, concrete?

Mr. Speaker, some people are poor, not only in my riding, but also in yours, in short, from one end of Canada to the other. But we fail to see that poverty at home, we go elsewhere, all over the world looking for it. We fail to see the poverty on our doorstep. That is the inconsistency of a government which is a slave to a barbaric financial system. That is the situation in which we find ourselves. Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister went on to say:

[English]

Productivity is of course an important determinant of prices and incomes. The only way to increase real incomes, with a given quantity of capital and labour, is to improve productivity. Increases of money incomes which run ahead of increases in real output are for the country as a whole self-defeating and illusory.

[Mr. Caouette.]

Nobody disputes that. However, Mr. Speaker, what has been the productivity of the financial system this year, that we should pay it a tribute of $1,406 million in interest only? What has the financial system produced to be able to obtain this year $1,406 million in interest on the national debt, while we lend to foreigners without interest?

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) says that when we grant loans to foreign countries, we are not lending them any money but providing them with credit. What is the difference between credit and money? Whenever the bank gives me a $25,000 credit, I write cheques just the same as if it were handing me $25,000 in pennies. When we hand them credit, what is it made of? It enables them to buy in Canada or in some other countries. Those countries will be using our credit to buy here in Canada and we are lending them without interest.

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister said further on, on page 8:

[English]

At the same time we are often criticized for cutting out or cutting down on some good and favourite project even though it is realized that in present circumstances some very desirable things will have to be postponed or scrapped or reduced in order to keep the finances of the country on an even keel.

[Translation]

Why did the Prime Minister not tell us that if there were to be a war tomorrow morning, this situation would no longer exist? The Prime Minister did not deal with that but had he done so, he would have said: This is an emergency situation. When war breaks out, they say: Hurry up, we need guns. Hurry up, war is breaking out. There will be billions of dollars to keep the country on an even keel. But in peace time, to build hospitals, schools, highways, to help the municipalities, the provinces—

[English]

Let us keep the country on an even keel, Mr. Speaker. "Everything has to be paid for eventually and the government does not have any magic way of raising money for this purpose."

[Translation]

The government has no magic way of collecting revenue or finding money, but it needs it. Why did the Prime Minister not tell us who had this magic power of creating money and credit? Who controls money and credit, in Canada, if not the government? If the government does not have this magic power of finding the money necessary to run the country, to develop the economy, who then has this power? Who is the financial wizard magician who creates money and credit as he wishes in Canada?

The Prime Minister says here and this time it is serious:

[English]

The government has to spend the money it collects wisely and well.

[Translation]

It does so not very "wisely" but quite "well".

[English]

But that money can only be secured by taxing or borrowing.

[Translation]

Who makes that money, if the sovereign government of Canada is unable to do so?

The Prime Minister stated that the federal government had full responsibility for the financial, monetary and fiscal system of Canada, but that provinces and municipalities were spending more money than the federal government.

Mr. Speaker, if there are only two vehicles available to the government to find money: taxation or loans, who else has the means to make money without levying taxes or contracting loans? That is what we are asking the government and what we have been trying to explain to them for so long.

At this stage I should like to repeat, in parenthesis, what Right Hon. Mackenzie King said in 1935 during an election campaign that put an end to the administration of the Conservative government:

• (8:40 p.m.)

[English]

Once a nation parts with the control of its currency and credit, it matters not who makes the nation's laws—

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, whether it be Bill No. C-193, C-207, C-210, C-392 or 1115—

[English]

—it matters not who makes the nation's laws. Usury, once in control, will wreck any nation.

[Translation]

This is precisely the situation in which the government finds itself at present: usury is in the process of gobbling up the savings of the Canadian people and the natural resources of our country in order to concentrate them in the hands of a group we call the Canadian bankers, who control money and credit in Canada. The Minister of Finance is afraid of saying so, but I am not. The chartered banks of Canada control the issuing of money and credit and when the Prime Minister says that the Bank of Canada is there in order to help us, I contend that the Bank of Canada is but a slave in the hands of the Canadian chartered banks. Such is the part played by the Bank of Canada today.

I shall go on with the statement made by Right Hon. Mackenzie King:

[English]

Until the control of the issue of currency and credit is restored to government, and recognized as its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility, all talk of the sovereignty of parliament and democracy is idle and futile.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: That, Mr. Speaker, has been said 33 years ago.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired, unless he has the unanimous consent to continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I am very thankful to my colleagues—

Mr. Speaker: I regret to have to ask the hon. member to resume his seat, but some hon. members do not agree that he continue his remarks.

Mr. Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, we are not against it.

Mr. Speaker: No doubt the hon. member is not opposed to it, but I believe there are two other hon. members, the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Nasserden)—

Mr. Caouette: I would only need five minutes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to continue his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous agreement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: I thank my colleagues, Mr. Speaker.

I arouse a great deal of sympathy by quoting a former Canadian prime minister, namely Right Hon. Mackenzie King.

Nevertheless, I would have liked this afternoon that the present Prime Minister, before leaving the house, had had at least the courage to tell us what Mackenzie King was already saying 33 years ago, when he kept on urging us to act, to take action.

He should have admitted that the government is not sovereign in monetary and fiscal matters, that it follows the instructions given by the financial interests of Canada rather than prompted by the best interests of the people. The Prime Minister drew a parallel this afternoon between the expenditures of the provinces and municipalities and those of the federal government. The Minister of Finance, the government and members of the house are aware of it, the situation is just as alarming for the provinces and the school boards as it is for the federal government. Why? Because Ottawa does not assume its responsibilities in the monetary field.

I read on February 27 last, I think in the Catholic newspaper Le Devoir of Montreal... I am sorry, it was Le Droit, another Catholic newspaper; and I quote:

Hydro-Quebec pays $530,000 interest a day.

Hydro-Quebec only, not the province, Mr. Speaker.

Here is what the president of Hydro-Quebec said:

Hydro-Quebec has had to borrow $260,000,000 a year—

Borrow from whom, Mr. Speaker? Who has the power to lend, if governments do not have the power to create money? There are others who create this money. Money does not grow on trees, be they spruce, pine or birch trees! Is it made by men, somewhere? It does not come from heaven, as in the times of the Hebrews, who each morning gathered manna in the desert. Money does not grow in that way. It is created somewhere, but the minister will not say where. Nor will the Prime Minister!

[Mr. Speaker.]

I read on:

Hydro-Quebec has had to borrow $260,000,000 a year during the last four years "on a tighter and tighter market"—

The same market used by the Minister of Finance: Washington!

—Mr. Jean-Claude Lessard, president of Hydro-Quebec, said yesterday before the Canadian Club. He added that the cumulative debt forces us in 1968 to pay $560,000 interest each morning.

Half a million in interest only! I will tell you that soon, very very soon we shall be masters in our own house, in the province of Quebec! And at the federal level, I will tell you that many decades, many centuries of confederation will go by before we even begin to be masters in our own house!

And if to that amount are added the municipal, school and provincial taxes levied on our production, the amount of our direct expenses reaches $700,000 per day on which we have no control.

Mr. Grégoire: The federal government pays $4 million in interest alone.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, is it known that the amount of $1,406 million in interest paid by the federal government this year represents $70 per capita in Canada? Is it known that a family made up of 5 members pays $350 in interest per year on the Canadian national debt in addition to the interests on the provincial debt and on the debts of the Quebec Hydro Commission? An amount of $70 per year. Legislation is easily passed to increase taxes and to make the Canadian people pay more.

Does the Minister of Finance not agree that the people have paid enough, that they are quite fed up with that burden, that legalized theft?

• (8:50 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, this is what the chairman of the Hydro Commission says:

Those additional expenses exceed the amount that any other Canadian public utility undertaking has to pay.

Nevertheless, we must work with a view to the future.

Can one imagine such a statement. The more we give, the more we are bogged down, but never mind, let us head toward the future even if it means getting more and more bogged down. There is only one future in front of us, we shall sink more and more deeply as we get along. There can be no other future in a system like this. We are caught in it.

Our investment projects for the next five years will certainly exceed $1 billion and adding the repayment of loans which will become due, we shall need approximately another $200 million before the end of 1972, said Mr. Lessard.

In order to obtain funds and carry out our program, we must, like private companies, meet the demands of the financial market and pay a higher interest rate each year, he said, and our last loan—

The loan raised by the province of Quebec or Hydro-Quebec carries a 7 per cent annual interest.

Mr. Speaker, this is where the chairman of the Hydro-Quebec Commission says:

In order to obtain funds ... we must, like private companies, meet the demands of the financial market and pay a higher interest rate each year, and our last loan, he said, at an actual rate of 7 per cent, raises a fond memory of the 3½ per cent rate that we paid a scant 10 years ago.

Mr. Speaker, why is the interest rate up to 7 per cent? Is it the province of Quebec or the federal government which has fixed that rate?

The present Minister of Finance, the right hon. Prime Minister and the government said at the time of the raise: Any further tax is to reinvigorate the Canadian economy. Now, a few months after the federal parliament passed these pieces of legislation, we are in a worse situation than six months ago.

Mr. Speaker, the president of the Hydro added:

The Quebec Hydro had first to prove that it could operate smoothly the whole electrical network.

The network was operating, but the system was not.

Today, it has been proved. Our present objective is different: we want to demonstrate that this huge enterprise can be administered with maximum efficiency—

That "efficiency" depends on the financial system.

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up more of the time of the house.

In concluding my remarks, I would like to quote the figures which the right hon. Prime Minister used this afternoon, when he asked the Conservatives, the members of the New Democratic party, in fact all the opposition parties: What reductions would you have us make in government expenditures? Our projection for 1967-68 is $9,885,000,000, an increase of $3,315,000,000, or 50 per cent.

The right hon. Prime Minister said: "We are spending $1,800 million for national defence this year." That has been corroborated this afternoon by the hon. Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux).

He said also: "Payments to individuals, especially in the field of social security such as the old age pension, $1.4 billion, family allowances, $630 million, unemployment insurance, $74 million, veterans' pensions, $324 million."

The Prime Minister asked: Would you like us to cut those pensions? No, indeed; everybody wants better pensions. We want to increase them.

Do we want cuts in the expenditures for national defence? Certainly! This would enable us to save $400 million and the government would not have to introduce the bill now before the house.

But the most remarkable thing, Mr. Speaker, is that the Prime Minister then quotes expenditures for joint programs and payments amounting to $1,892 million. There is also a total of $424 million for youth allowances, assistance to rural development, rural economy, manpower mobility.

Mr. Speaker, $1.75 billion are allocated for family allowances, old age pensions, allowances for the blind, the disabled, social assistance, hospital insurance, and so on. The Prime Minister asks you: What would you like us to cut in all that?

Mr. Speaker, our mistake is trying to adjust our physical possibilities to our monetary power or our financial obligations instead of adjusting our financial system to the true development possibilities of our country.

In fact, I noticed that the Prime Minister omitted one of the main expenditures, that is $1,406 million for the interest on our national debt. A sum of $1,406 million, more than the total paid in old age pensions in Canada. But the Prime Minister does not mention that fact. He does not ask us whether cutbacks are advisable in this regard. No, the matter is not mentioned or discussed at all.

But we are indeed asked: Should old age pensions be cut? Should defence expenditures be reduced? Should there be cutbacks with regard to manpower mobility? Should expenditures be decreased in a field such as economic development? But, on the other hand, we are not asked: Should expenditures be reduced for the servicing of the debt, that is, $1,406 million? The Prime Minister overlooks that point, but we do mention it. We have actually been making that suggestion to the government for a long time, even though the proposal has been termed ridiculous and we have been called hot-heads. It matters little.

Mr. Speaker, there is a solution at this time. We have said so here in the house six years ago. I also said it in 1946, because I was here from 1946 to 1949. The solution, Mr. Speaker, lies in the answer to this question: Given its resources, its people, its social classes, its engineers, its professionals, its miners, its farmers, its workers, its experts, its will, is Canada able to guarantee to every Canadian citizen economic security in personal liberty?

Are we able to guarantee to our older citizens a pension of $105 a month? Are we able, with our brains and brawn to develop the Quebec northwest, the north of Ontario or the northern regions of Canada where doubtless lie vast resources? That is the question that we must ask ourselves.

But this is not the question put by the hon. Minister of Finance, who simplifies everything and says: Do we have the money needed? Can we borrow or tax the people? Can the people bear a heavier tax burden?

Bill No. C-208 provides for new taxes. Even if we say that we are taxing corporations or companies, the companies will have to increase their prices, when we are trying to fight inflation. When prices get higher again, it will be the average Canadian who will once more foot the bill.

He is told: Instead of a 5 per cent surtax, we will impose a 3 per cent surtax, but we will also tax the corporations which, in turn, will increase their prices by 5 per cent perhaps, so that the average Canadian will have to pay 8 per cent more instead of 3 per cent, as mentioned in the bill. This is hypocrisy, this is dishonesty towards the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker, I shall conclude on this note. If the government can find billions of dollars in order to kill, it is time they find some to provide a good life for the Canadian people.

If the government does not know where to get money, if it knows only taxes and loans, we suggest that it turn to the Bank of Canada, which belongs to the country and to the Canadian people. It should not order the Bank of Canada to create an unlimited amount of worthless dollars, but request it to maintain under any circumstances and the whole year long a perfect balance between productivity and purchasing power.

We know that if the purchasing power of the people were increased by a national dividend taken from the funds of the Bank of Canada, it would prevent new taxes and allow the people to buy the surplus accumulated in warehouses and wholesale stores, reinvigorate the Canadian economy and create secondary industries which would be assured of selling their production.

Then, Mr. Speaker, the Bank of Canada would be the servant of Canada, the Canadian people and the human being. It is in that direction that we are working here in and outside the house, and we will not be induced to pass bills to levy other taxes in order to solve a problem which will remain unsolved, because it has never been solved up to now.

We were confronted with the same problem during the last world war and the last economic depression from 1929 to 1939.

It is by applying the principles of Major Douglas and Social Credit that we will solve those financial and economic problems. The Minister of Finance should turn towards Social Credit instead of always looking in the same direction; he should consider the opportunities available in Canada and endeavour to satisfy the Canadian people by giving them maximum security and freedom.

[English]

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) who has, as usual, done an excellent job in laying down the principles of Social Credit. I know that after this great speech it will never again slip his mind that any vote on a budgetary matter, be it at the resolution stage, on second reading, at the committee stage or on third reading, is a vote of confidence. We in the Social Credit party are aware that any vote which will come on this bill will be a vote of confidence. This fact has been established at least I trust until the next defeat of the government.

Although we support the changed resolution, we do so reluctantly, perhaps because we have had experience in taking second looks, as evidenced by the actions of Social Credit governments elsewhere. The measures now before us are not as distasteful as the original ones which brought about the defeat of the government. We know that the country is ready and prepared for the show to go ahead in the first week in April. It would not be regarded as exactly sporting to disturb that show now. The musicians have been warming up for a long time and the stage is set for everyone to go on the road full time, not just on week ends.

However, let us warn the government that it should remember, when this parliament is called back to finish the session, that our patience does wear thin, just as it wore thin regarding the original budget measure we helped to defeat some few weeks ago. We appreciate the need to save the dollar, be it United States or Canadian, as well as the Japanese yen and any other currency of the western world in which our economic system must place its trust if it is to carry on. We know also that the Minister of Finance came back last summer from Rio de Janeiro with the idea of removing gold as the measure of international money. This was an idea that would have done credit and still does credit to the original ideas of Social Credit. Since 1935 we have always insisted that our monetary system had a basic weakness and flaw so long as for its stability it is related in any way on a metal rather than on the credit of the people. This is being proved in a most remarkable way these days. The wisdom of the stand taken in 1935 shines through all of the dreary news reports of runs on gold. The sooner a system is worked out whereby the money of this country no longer relies on this metal and is no longer at the mercy of ruthless speculators placed strategically around the world, the better off the entire world will be.

One of the things we would least like to see is another devaluation of the Canadian dollar, with the resultant loss of confidence. The Conservative party has had considerable experience along this line and no doubt would be willing to try it again had it the opportunity to do so, I do not think in this time of international crisis we can afford the type of policy and experimentation that took place in 1962.

There is one lesson the government has to learn, and it should have learned this lesson before now. It does the government no good at all to adopt policies suggested by the N.D.P., at least it does no good in this house. There is no gratitude on the part of members of that party and there is no gain for the government. I listened a few days ago to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) who a few months ago during an earlier speech described the necessity to set up a Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In that speech she bit the hand that bled for her. As I listened to her the other day it struck me that she was committing a cruelty to animals; not to dumb animals, but surely to stupid animals. Surely it is stupid time after time to bring in legislation in line with the ideas either of that hon. lady or of the N.D.P. There were cries for many years in support of a department of consumer affairs, but when the legislation was produced the government received nothing but abuse from that party.

It was probably in light of the knowledge that the N.D.P. had for some years advocated a special status for the province of Quebec that the labour bill, C-186, was brought in. It received the same cruel and vicious treatment. I find myself in agreement with the N.D.P. that this was not a good bill, but to act on the expectation of support from that quarter was again a mistake.

Medicare was brought forward and pushed through, although almost all provinces opposed it. This was another project of the N.D.P. taken over by the Liberals in an attempt to find some ground for election campaigning that would appeal to the left. Finally we are now going to have a prices review board. This was a very special and pet project of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. No sooner was this legislation presented as a policy of this government than it was described as a toothless wonder.

I do not know why the Liberal government continues to bring forward these pet projects, only to have detraction take place instantaneously by those they are seeking to placate.

• (9:10 p.m.)

An hon. Member: There is no gratitude at all.

Mr. Johnston: As someone said, there is just no gratitude at all, and I would agree with that statement. I do not know whether the speech made this afternoon has satisfied the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. It did not do much for the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), as was made clear in his eloquent description of the speech. In a way, I agree with him that it was rather sad that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) should have chosen this vehicle as perhaps his parting speech to the house.

I realize that it would be difficult at this time to find a subject which he could revive and bring to the house, because so many of the policies of the government have been shattered and lie as wrecks and ruins across the country. It would hardly do to talk about foreign policy at the present time, because there is not much credit to be found there. It would hardly do to talk about the commonwealth, because that hangs by a very slender thread. It would not do to talk about the Company of Young Canadians, because that cherished dream has not got off the ground successfully, nor would it do to talk about a prices review board at this time as a parting message of hope and inspiration to the house. It certainly would not help at all to point to Great Britain as an example, a nation whose socialist government has brought that country to the lowest ebb it has ever known, and whose policies are succeeding only in providing our country and others in remoter parts of the world with a flow of immigrants.

An hon. Member: We need them.

Mr. Johnston: Yes, we do need them in British Columbia and we can use them there because that is a province that has balanced its budget for some time, and again this year has presented a balanced budget.

An hon. Member: What rot.

Mr. Johnston: That province has been able to carry on an expanded program without inflation, at the same time as we have seen the federal government incur ever increasing deficits, and finally, as a last resort, is striving so desperately to come up with a balanced budget.

Here we must congratulate the minister, in that his efforts have been at least in the right direction. I would not call them courageous, but at least they are persistent. While perhaps this quality cannot be said to shine, at least it has something to recommend it when it moves in the direction of balancing the budget. I would hope that this would be the hon. gentleman's last exercise in this function.

Mr. Howard: Don't go the way the other finance minister went—out.

An hon. Member: Will the hon. member tell us whether he will support the government?

Mr. Johnston: I have already said that. Some days ago I indicated that the international situation and a host of internal reasons made it imperative that we do not manufacture in this country an unnecessary or a completely phoney crisis. I still think that this policy, which we cannot take any pleasure or any joy in following, is at least the lesser of the evils that confront us at this time. But we would hope that if it should be the good fortune of the minister to present other budgets to this parliament, he would be able to present more realistic ones than some in the past have been, and that he will learn once and for all that the concept of the welfare state no longer strikes deep in the hearts of Canadians because they have come to realize, through their own experience and through watching Britain and the Scandinavian countries, that it involves a cost, and they are growing weary of paying the costs. There is no advantage to be gained along that line and much to be gained by a more courageous outlook, as well as much to be gained from introducing on the domestic scene a similar monetary policy to that for which the Minister of Finance strives on the international scene, one in which the creation of money will no longer be through the process of debt, and one which, if implemented by the nations of the world, has been described as similar to putting a paper tiger in the bank of the nations of the world.

In today's world we desperately need this kind of explosion of liquidity in order that we can increase the production of the world and in order that the two greatest nations of the world can cease to wage the experimental war in which they are engaged in Viet Nam, can cease diverting their productions to that war effort so that they can keep their economies fuelled, and through the cessation of that empty exercise can get down to the internal problems which face them both, and thus provide for the citizens of the world the fruits of that production which our technology has made possible.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, as has been pointed out by several members of the house, particularly on this side, the bill before us is certainly very inadequate for the job it is supposed to do. This afternoon the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) gave a very convincing, straightforward and analytical speech, one of the best that I have heard for a long time in this chamber. I think it must have made the government realize the error of its ways and the great predicament in which it finds itself. The government has taxed, borrowed, and got itself into trouble. It is boxed in. What a book Walter Gordon could write today about troubled Canada. What a book the present Minister of Finance could write under the heading "Nobody knows the troubles I've been in".

Why does the government find itself in this kind of trouble? It is because on our front benches, with the exception of one or two of its occupants, there is not one person who has learned how to meet a payroll. The cabinet is composed of people who have had training in the academic field, a group of former civil servants who only had to prepare estimates, ask for money and it was given: Seek and ye shall find. And it was given unto them. This was the experience they had. Now they find themselves confronted with the difficult task of operating a government in a business-like way.

What sort of paradoxical, contradictory legislation has this group on the front benches produced? Today we heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) talking about a review board which has no teeth in it. He is going to set up a review board. What is our new Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs supposed to do? It seems to me that one is contradicting the other. I remember two years ago we had the then minister of national health and welfare spending $700,000 to persuade people to stop smoking cigarettes or using tobacco. At the same time we had the then minister of agriculture promoting the growing of tobacco by giving subsidies. We had the then minister of finance putting a tax on motorcars coming into Canada with a value of more than $5,000, while his brother in law, the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury) was developing a plan to bring them in duty free.

Not too long ago we had a minister of labour, then responsible for housing, trying to get the interest rate down, and we had a minister of finance, responsible for interest rates going up and up. We have had the minister of manpower stepping up the immigration program, yet the minister responsible for housing could not even find houses to take care of the citizens we have in the country today. We cannot even find jobs for all Canadians, yet we have a minister stepping up the rate of immigration. This is the sort of operation we have had from this group on the treasury benches.

This afternoon the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) asked—and I have heard this from the Liberal benches, as well: What programs do you Conservatives want to cut out? When you talk about saving money, what a lot of political clap-trap that is. This was only said for political purposes. He had the audacity to suggest we were saying we would cut out old age pensions or hospitalization or unemployment assistance and the like. Certainly not; we are not going to cut out these programs. After all, who did more for the old age pensioners than this party that I represent? No other party has done more for them. Well do I remember the six buck boys across the way, the time they raised the old age pension by $6.

Certainly, we do not want to cut down on these programs. We want these programs, and we want other services, but we want them operated on a businesslike basis. We want to cut out the waste and extravagance. We do not want the sort of thing that was brought to our attention just lately in the setting up of the new Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It has not even got off the ground. What has it cost? According to the estimates for 1967-68, supplementaries included, it cost $7.75 million to set up the new department, and it has not even taken wing. This department will not be consulted because we are going to have a review board instead.

According to the estimates for 1968-69 the same department will cost $8.75 million, up another million for this coming year. What do we hear about this department? We hear they have wall to wall broadloom rugs in their offices and lavish furnishings throughout. We hear they have a man with nothing more to do than take a pair of scissors and clip newspapers, yet they pay him $7,000 or $8,000 a year. This is the sort of thing of which we do not approve. Hon. members opposite do not approve of it themselves, yet they allow it to continue.

What about the Department of Industry which was set up in 1963-64? We spoke against the establishment of this department and said that the Department of Trade and Commerce, with a new section headed by a deputy minister, could do everything this Department of Industry would attempt to do. That department began to function in 1963-64 with a staff of 274 and a budget of $25 million. Let us take a look at it now. During 1967-68 there were 783 people employed, an increase of 509, and the budget was $171 million. In 1968-69, according to the blue book we have in front of us now, and this does not include what is found in the supplementary estimates, the staff numbered 1,025 and expenditures amounted to $161 million. This figure would be higher, of course, if the supplementaries were included. This is the type of thing we have been talking about on this side. This is what we want to see stopped.

What about travel and removal expenses for federal departments? Let us take a look at these. In 1966-67, all departments spent $76,706,000, in round figures. The following year, 1967-68, they spent $100,896 million, an increase of $24 million in one year for travel and removal of public civil servants. Now, we come to this year, when the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Benson) said, "I am going to cut these budgets; we are going to take a sharp knife and cut them down". If we look at travel and removal expenses for this coming year in the blue book we find they total $108,089,000, an increase of $7 million.

Now, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, in a short period of two years, why should travel and removal expenses have gone up $31 million? It is disgraceful. We have government employees flitting all over this country. Two will arrive in a place where one would do. We will have half a dozen over here where one would have been sufficient. There is no co-ordination whatever in so far as travel expenses are concerned. If you want to go on a trip, put in a requisition and the government will send you wherever you want to go. I don't know whether they travel first class or second class, but I dare say many of them travel first class. This is the sort of waste and extravagance we have been talking about for many years. One could go through all the departments. I am sorry, I cannot accommodate the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene), but I could if I took the time to look up his estimates.

Mr. Greene: We are very frugal.

Mr. Hales: Travel expenses for the Department of National Health and Welfare increased by $830,000 in order to have people flitting around the country. The Department of Transport expenses increased by $965,000 to have people skipping here and there. The Department of National Defence takes the prize. They had an increase of $9,439,000 in one year. I ask you, what control is exercised? The President of the Treasury Board talks about wonderful control. I have yet to see it.

The hon. Member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) now advises me, travel expenses for the Department of Agriculture were up 30 per cent this year over last year.

Now, what about the C.B.C. about which so much has been said from this side of the house? I do not propose to take too long on this, but I should draw attention to some of the pensions given by that department. We all recall when the pension of the former governor of the Bank of Canada was increased from about $11,800 to $25,000 a year on the eve of the expiry of his term of office. This increase was never submitted to cabinet for approval.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Hon. members opposite have not learned their lesson as to the control of these things, Mr. Speaker, because this sort of thing is still going on without cabinet approval. an ex vice president of the C.B.C. by the name of Briggs was promoted, almost on the eve of his retirement, to a post at $15,000 a year. Later his salary was increased by a mere 67 per cent to $25,000. Then came his retirement almost at once. Not only did he depart with a pension comparable to that paid a prime minister of Canada, but in addition the C.B.C. granted him a gratuity of one year's pay, namely $25,000. Certainly that was beyond the terms of the employment contract he held.

One of the purposes of the report of the Auditor General is to see that the taxpayer's money is not spent for a purpose or in a manner that has not been authorized by parliament. The Auditor General in his recent report devotes the longest section of his review of crown corporations to the C.B.C., during which he discloses the facts of the Briggs case and establishes that it was not within the competency of the directors of that corporation to take this action, and that the payment of this retirement allowance was not within the provisions of the Broadcasting Act. So it appears, Mr. Speaker, that the corporation had no authority to make this payment.

What is the government doing about this sort of thing, Mr. Speaker? What steps is it taking, in face of an attitude in the C.B.C. that spawns this sort of thing? What steps is the government taking to protect the $154,-200,000 which the taxpayers must give the C.B.C. this year to discharge its responsibility for broadcasting? The C.B.C. have also made arrangements to supplement the pension plan for the vice president and 12 other executives of the C.B.C. A retirement pension has been arranged for these people, without the usual contribution of 2 per cent that applies in other corporations.

The C.B.C. has inflated itself, Mr. Speaker, into a self-governing empire beyond the control of parliament, and the government has done nothing to stop it. Well, I will take part of that back; the Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh) did say that the management was rotten, and I think she knew what she was talking about. She must have known that these things were going on.

On August 17, 1967, nearly one year ago, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Benson) issued a circular to all departments of government suggesting that departments set up an accounts receivable section within their financial administration. Under such a system they would add to an audited figure the sales or charges of the department and subtract from the total all of the payments received. The final figure should balance with the control figure. In other words, the money coming in and going out of each department is controlled. To date, Mr. Speaker, several departments of government have still not implemented this businesslike system, even though they were asked to do so two years ago. What control can government have over funds unless there is an accounts receivable control figure?

I should also like to make one or two observations about the inadequate accounting and financial control procedures at Fort Smith in the Northwest Territories. At page 38 of his 1967 report the Auditor General says:

1. Internal control over cash receipts was still lacking—

2. Departmental billings were still being released without review—

—outstanding accounts amounting to over $25,000 were left with the Fort Smith office for collection. It was not evident that any follow-up action has since been taken on these accounts or that payments have been received with respect to them.

So there is no record taken of receipts, and so on.

Then in paragraph 81, under the heading "Inadequate accounting and financial control procedures, Indian agencies" we read the following:

1. Unsatisfactory cash handling procedures—

2. Lack of proper internal control—

3. Unsatisfactory accounts receivable procedures—

4. Unsatisfactory stores and equipment control procedures—

According to this paragraph stocktaking had been carried out in an irregular manner. Imagine running a business in such a way, Mr. Speaker. To continue:

5. Inadequate payroll records and procedures—

It appears that time records had been destroyed prematurely and in consequence the payroll records could not be verified. I place these matters before the house, Mr. Speaker, because all taxpayers would like to see things done in a businesslike way.

I do not want to go into detail on this next matter, Mr. Speaker, but I think it is suffice to say that the members of this house will recall some of the questions I asked in connection with the importation by Studebaker of Volkswagen motorcars. This situation arose because there were certain export credits outstanding to Studebaker permitting them to import cars duty free. Studebaker were in the process of going out of the automobile business in Canada and did not want to lose these credits, because they were worth money. They therefore entered into a deal with Volkswagen to bring in cars duty free, sell them to Volkswagen and keep the duty amounting to $2¼ million.

The minister of national revenue of that day rose in this house and told us that he was waiting for a ruling on the matter from the Department of Justice. We heard no more until the report published by the Auditor General, from which we now learn that the Department of Justice had stated that Volkswagen was the importer of the cars, not Studebaker, and that $2¼ million duty was owing to the crown. However, the whole thing was wiped out by order in council No. 1621 of August 23, 1967. That $2¼ million rightfully belonged to each and every taxpayer of this country, yet the amount was written off and the slate wiped clean. We are also told that apparently another motor car company owes us a considerable sum of money.

The Auditor General mentioned the figure of $30 million and the situation was brought about in this way. As hon. members realize, imports that are allowed into the country duty free bear a proportionate relationship to exports. If a manufacturer's exports are not sufficient to offset his imports, then this portion of his imports becomes taxable. I understand that the Department of National Revenue is not keeping up to date accounts of the transactions. The department is waiting for automobile manufacturers to report their exports, and apparently it has taken the manufacturers over 18 months to report.

Why does the department not adopt the concept that comes into play when others become involved with customs? If we import something and we feel we ought not to pay the duty on an item, we nevertheless pay the duty, and then fill out a form, make our claim, and have the duty remitted to us. Why cannot the department do that with the motorcar manufacturers? In other words, why can it not charge them duty on the goods they import and then, when the manufacturers produce their export figures, remit that duty. Why does the department not send them a bill every six months, to show them where they stand? Yet, according to the report, 18 months has gone by and not one cent has been paid. We do not know how much the manufacturers owe. What kind of bookkeeping is this? The debt is not listed even as an account receivable. Can you imagine the income tax man coming to your place of business, looking into your books, when, at the same time you have in your pocket $30 million in accounts receivable which are not even recorded in the ledger? You can imagine what would happen to you.

Mr. Monteith: Never mind $30 million: What about 30 cents?

Mr. Hales: That is what is happening. We expect this government to correct these things.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hales: Let us look at further examples of a smaller nature. The amounts involved are not large, but it is the principle that we are concerned about. Take the Department of Manpower. They bought 5000 calendars and distributed them to industries at a cost of $2,500. Tenders for those calendars were not even called. What business has the government in the advertising field? Anyone who wants to hire help knows where to go. An employer does not need a calendar on his desk to remind him about Department of Manpower centres. Moreover the calendar frames were made in the United States; only the small, printed, relatively unimportant parts were made in Canada. Why does the government do such things?

Next we come to area development grants. I am one who believes in loans. When a person gets a loan he has some responsibility to repay an investment; he will work to pay back his loan. But when a person gets a outright grant he may not worry too much about making that grant pay its way. Accordingly the man who has a loan outstanding is more likely to pay some attention to using wisely the money he has borrowed.

Last fall I put a question on the order paper about the R.C.A. television tube factory at Midland, which was then a designated area. This firm built a $24 million plant there, and received a $5 million grant from the government. Yes, $5 million; and at that time I dare say the R.C.A. company did not need the money as much as the federal government needed it. That grant could stand a lot of scrutiny and warrants considerable questioning.

I have not time to go into all the examples I could cite. To return to the bill: I say that it is compounded of a number of half hearted and inappropriate provisions. It hopes to rectify a grave situation which has been created by years of reckless government extravagance. But you cannot solve our problems this way. Instead of seeking to raise more money from the earnings of ordinary Canadians, the minister would do better to persuade his colleagues to cut their spending. I could give many more examples. Now the minister has been driven to panic measures. He wants to freeze the public service, to soak the taxpayers and to squeeze the business community, all last minute, last ditch expedients. That may bring temporary relief for the minister's problems, but it cannot alter the effects of years of mismanagement, as was so well said this afternoon by the hon. member for Carleton.

The truth is that this government has spent itself into a corner; there are no two ways about it. For five years they have spent at an unprecedented rate, and figures have been quoted to prove it. The government has ignored the sound economic advice of those whose job it is to provide it. Like the prodigal son, the government has squandered its substance in riotous living. But there will be no fatted calf for them; they will not be returning here as a government. You see, the prodigal son spent his own money, but the money this government squandered over the years belonged not to them but to the Canadian people. It was money held in trust and the government has dishonoured that trust. Why have they disregarded all the good suggestions which were given to them?

Had the government listened to the sound advice that has come from various sources I conclude that it could have saved money which it needlessly spent. Not only would the government have more revenue at its disposal, but we, in this country, would be spared the uneasiness we now feel about our economy.

In desperation and panic the government has frozen the civil service. This is neither fair nor efficient, and is unlikely to be effective. Why did the government not try to accomplish something that would be effective without impairing the morale or efficiency of the public service? Why did they not do that by regulating costs and the intake of personnel over the past few years, instead of by suddenly freezing everything when it was too late to do so?

Administrative overhead costs have risen steadily in all departments and agencies. When the Glassco commission finished its work in 1963, administrative costs approximated $1 billion a year. Those costs for the year ending March 31, 1968, have now jumped to $1.6 billion, an increase of about 60 per cent over the last five years. The Prime Minister in his speech this afternoon blamed increased expenditures on the provinces and municipalities. I say to him, children who live in glass houses should not throw stones. I also say to him, sweep off your own doorstep before you pass the buck to others.

No wonder the minister comes here seeking additional tax fodder to feed the insatiable money burner that this government is. Now we find that personnel in government departments and agencies have increased by 40,000 in the last five years. The minister and his colleagues have made a great parade of cutting expenditures, but it is an empty gesture. It was obvious that no real savings could be expected from the pruning of departmental budgets which had not been finalized. It is as though a man's wife came home and said "I have saved you $500". And when asked how she had accomplished this, explained, "I looked at a fur coat which would have cost $500 but I did not buy it." It is as simple as that. That is what the government tried to tell us on December 7 when they said they were saving money. Why did not the minister take a close look at a lot of these estimates and cut out these expenditures which can be labelled as wasteful and extravagant?

The Department of External Affairs never ranked as one of the big departments, but its budget has jumped more than $1,500,000 in the last five years. What about our embassies overseas? Has no control been placed over their expenditures? The budget of the Department of Agriculture has risen $118 million.

The biggest surprise, judging by the nature of its work and the modesty of its achievements, has been provided by the Department of Manpower and Immigration. Its annual budget has leaped from about $179 million five years ago to a staggering $403 million, an increase of $224 million in five years, or just about 127 per cent. It is true some savings have been made, but they were marginal savings at the expense of services to the taxpayer, not on such items as staff, travelling expenses, telephone calls, office rent and so on. Public works, transportation and defence services have all been pared. Indian and Eskimo peoples will have to make do with an even lower standard of medical and welfare assistance than in the past.

If the twins of finance and revenue had used a sharper paring knife the bill now before us would have been unnecessary. Recently the Minister of Finance said a great deal about the critical situation in which this country suddenly finds itself, leaving the impression that it is all due to outside influences beyond our control, and that he and his fellow ministers are waging an heroic battle to save Canada. He solemnly tells us it is the patriotic duty of all Canadians to refrain from criticism and do what he asks them to do.

Mr. Speaker, for the past five years the opposition has been pointing out to the government that its inability to control expenditures was running the country into trouble. We have tried to indicate long-range policies and demonstrate the need for better control in the economic sphere. The government's advisers have told them the same things. But hon. gentlemen opposite ignored their advisers as they ignored the opposition. Now they have landed in the economic soup as a result of their own floundering efforts, and they come crying to the people to help them out.

In conclusion I would simply say that the illustrations I have given are not all new. They have been given by others over a considerable period. What I have stated has been said by every reputable financial writer and newspaperman in Canada for the past year or more. People have lost confidence in this government. Today there is an outflow of millions of dollars on the part of Canadians who are selling Canadian securities and purchasing United States securities. This is shocking, but it has been going on for some time. People are doing this because they say they lose their money through inflation in the United States only half as fast as they are currently losing it in Canada, and there are some other advantages.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene), addressing an FAO conference in Rome, had this to say with reference to Canadian taxpayers:

If they lose faith in the efficiency of our endeavours, if they come to believe that their taxes are but adding to the bureaucracy or to the pile of papers in some murky vault, they will lose the will to participate.

These are true words and I commend the hon. gentleman for saying them. I wish he had been able to persuade his fellow members in the cabinet to take them to heart. I have not lost faith in Canada or lost my confidence in this great country, far from it. But I along with millions of other Canadians have lost confidence in this government and I propose to vote against this bill.

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): While hon. members are still pondering the peroration of the hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Hales), may I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—POSSIBLE WITHDRAWAL OF CANADIAN FORCES FROM NORAD AS MEASURE OF ECONOMY

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): The other day I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question which is being asked increasingly often by the people of Canada, and it was this:

As an aid to curtailing unnecessary spending and saving the Canadian taxpayers millions of dollars, will the government consider withdrawing Canada's participation in NORAD?

The other day I got no answer. Yesterday, my colleague the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) asked a question on the same subject in an effort to get the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) to guarantee that parliament would have an opportunity to discuss the NORAD agreement before it comes up for renewal on May 12, so that the Canadian people may know what they are being committed to.

The Prime Minister replied in these words:

No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot give that assurance. The government will have to take its responsibilities and then submit its decision to the house as is normally done in connection with these matters.

[Mr. Hales.]

I do not know whether this is normal or not, but I believe the people of Canada ought to be given an opportunity to discuss the NORAD agreement in all its aspects before they are committed to what will be an inexorable ten-year contract with the United States. The agreement comes up only once every ten years.

• (10:00 p.m.)

There is no doubt that when the new NORAD agreement is submitted to Canada it will contain some far reaching changes. The Canadian people are very worried at the prospect of the government signing the new NORAD agreement before we have an opportunity of knowing what its new provisions will be, and what Canada will be committed to for the next ten years.

For some years now the New Democratic party, of which I am a member, has believed and has urged that Canada should withdraw from NORAD. I shall briefly give our reasons for urging this. First we consider that NORAD is a worthless defence against a threat that never came off, the threat in the minds of United States military commanders that the U.S.S.R. would build up huge bomber fleets to use against this continent. In this context NORAD today is a museum piece along with the Maginot line. Neither has provided any security because they were not designed to meet developments that actually took place.

Second, we want to withdraw from NORAD because every year NORAD is a waste of $130 million of the taxpayers' hard earned money. At a time when the government is scraping every little bit it can from small taxpayers, it would be a big relief to the taxpayers of this country to save $130 million a year on something which is an expensive and worthless activity.

Third, we want to withdraw from NORAD because the money we could save by so doing we could use for many useful and necessary things in Canada, such as housing, medicare, and pensions, to mention only three. By providing money for these things we would do a great deal for the internal security and well-being of the country when, as I say, NORAD in its present form has been proven obsolete.

Fourth, if we stay in NORAD we shall be drawn closer and closer into the net of United States plans for continental defence, involving huge expenditures on new interceptor aircraft and other military hardware, of which we know very little and of which we will know nothing more until the government has signed, sealed and delivered the new agreement which will commit us for another ten year period. We believe that this sort of things is far too dangerous for Canada. It means that we are choosing Canada as the battlefield for a nuclear war between powerful super powers, and I don't mean just the United States and the U.S.S.R. because there will be other super powers within the next ten years. I think that would be a very strange form of protection for the people of our country.

In the fifth place, if we mean what we say, Canada should throw her support not behind a regional alliance such as NORAD but behind the United Nations. We should work more forcefully than ever for a United Nations peace keeping force free from domination by powerful super powers.

How can we tell the people of the other countries of the world that we are free from entangling alliances, from set points of view, and from imperialism of all kinds if we are tied up tight to the Pentagon? Having seen what is going on over in Asia, and in Viet Nam in particular during the last few years, I think we should be taking this heaven-sent chance provided by the renewal of the NORAD agreement to get out of that entanglement. The United States has got deeper and deeper into that situation over in Asia, and I do not think we should allow Canada to be dragged into the morass that is the war in Viet Nam.

I urge that the Canadian people be given a chance through parliament to debate this treaty before it is signed on May 12, and I believe that those Canadian people, through the Canadian parliament, should decide at this time to withdraw altogether from NORAD.

Mr. Gérard Pelletier (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated in his statement to the standing committee on external affairs last Thursday, the government considers that there is a continuing threat to North America from manned bombers which it would be irresponsible for it to ignore. For this reason the government believes we should co-operate with the United States in the defence of the continent as we have done in one way or another since the beginning of the second world war. If co-operation between the air defence forces of Canada and the United States against the continuing bomber threat is to be effective it is necessary to have a single air defence plan and an integrated command and control system. This requirement has been satifactorily met by NORAD for the past ten years.

The government is now in the process of negotiation and consideration of the existing agreement which expires in May. The financial burden of maintaining the NORAD command structure is borne substantially by the United States. The cost to Canada for defence against bombers arises largely out of Canada's contribution of forces and equipment to this joint task. These costs would thus be incurred regardless of whether or not NORAD existed, unless we permitted the United States to assume controlling responsibility for the defence of Canada against bombers and, indeed, for the surveillance of Canadian air space. Such a surrender of sovereignty the government is not prepared to contemplate.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—NIGERIA—CANADIAN EFFORTS TO END CIVIL WAR

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, as I have done on several occasions in recent months, I asked a question about the Canadian attitude toward and participation in efforts to bring about a cessation of the war in Nigeria which has gone on for many months, a war which is called the forgotten war and one which arrests little interest and receives little space in the newspapers. This is a profound and appalling tragedy, marked as wars always are with hatred, destruction and death. I should like to see more interest and more initiative taken by this country, which has contributed so much to the development of the modern commonwealth of autonomous states. We should not wait until the explosion becomes more devastating and the dangers more threatening; nor should we wait until great power competition—and it is there as in other wars —escalates explosively.

In Canada, unfortunately, we have little thoughtful journalism devoted to an in-depth coverage of international affairs. Only the sensational ever gains attention. It would be revealing if one could enumerate the small number of dispatches emanating from or dealing with Nigeria in the months since the war began. So it is parliament which must show the initiative in this terribly important matter.

On February 9, in answer to a question of mine the Prime Minister indicated that he thought this would be a subject he would discuss with the British Prime Minister. After the visit it became clear that this question was not discussed. If our belief in the commonwealth is to be more than tokenism, surely it is incumbent upon us to concern ourselves with, and exert with other commonwealth states a powerful pressure for peace in this strife torn part of the world.

We do not have to assess blame; it would be unlikely that all wrong is one side and all good is on the other. But if we circumscribe and inhibit all our actions and responses by the declaration that we recognize only Nigeria and refuse even to hear the voice of Biafra, we are in fact being neutral on one side in this terrible conflict.

The United Kingdom has certainly been neutral on one side. It is providing arms to Lagos, a practice which Lord Goodman in a House of Lords debate recently described as "wholly inappropriate, wholly shameful and wholly wrong", and I agree with him wholly. This is scarcely a helpful attitude on the part of the senior member of the commonwealth. The government in providing arms to Lagos has joined company with the Soviet union. Surely if there is any vitality in the commonwealth there should be joint action in the first instance to put a stop to this arms flow.

Out of Biafra there are trickling horrible stories of atrocities approaching the range of genocide. As the Archbishop of Canterbury said in the debate to which I have referred, "Biafra people have suffered the most terrible violence". There are serious estimates from thoughtful people of massacres of as many as 30,000 men, women and children in the eastern provinces of Nigeria. As one well known African expert has said, surely before long Biafra will end up being half cemetery and half concentration camp.

With such dreadful statistics coming out, should not one of the first orders of the day be the dispatch of a fact finding commission to get to the bottom of the situation. Surely Canada will do its part in this regard. After that might come a more important exercise. If a cessation of hostilities could be obtained, and it must, there could be a dispatch of a peace keeping force. This would have to be agreeable to both sides, but what a challenge this would be to the commonwealth states; if men from the far flung members of this unique and interesting association of nations could go to that troubled area and maintain the peace in that country, which brought such great hopes to all believers in the commonwealth and all people interested in Africa just a few years ago. I would like to see Canada take the lead in this regard and turn our proclamations of affection for the commonwealth into concrete action to restore peace and to bring about a settlement in that area, so events could move to that kind of climax, just as in some of those other dreadful situations in other areas about which we have been belatedly concerned. This is the sort of thing I feel we should reach out for, before events drag us in. Surely farsightedness is a part of statesmanship, and surely our position in the commonwealth requires statesmanship of this order.

Mr. Gerard Pelletier (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Here, Mr. Speaker, is an outline of the efforts of the Canadian government to bring about a peaceful settlement in Nigeria. I should first of all express, as we have expressed before, the government's deep concern at the tragic events taking place in this fellow commonwealth country which has the largest population of any country in Africa and potentially one of the brightest futures of any of the new nations. Canada's close association with Nigeria since its independence has been a source of great satisfaction to us; our commonwealth ties are strong and we have been able to provide capital and technical assistance to the Nigerian people as a concrete expression of our friendship and our desire to see the country develop further as a strong and responsible member of the community of nations.

The civil turmoil which has been taking place in Nigeria since the middle of last year has, as I said, been a matter of concern to us, and we have felt called upon to give expression to that concern as well as our genuine willingness to be of what assistance we can in helping the Nigerians to find means of solving Nigeria's problems. Other countries and organizations including the organization of African unity, have voiced similar concern. The Nigerian federal military government has made it clear that it considers Nigeria's problems to be of an internal character, to be resolved by Nigerians themselves without outside interference. We naturally respect this position as well as Nigeria's status as a fully independent nation, but we have taken every occasion to impress on the Nigerian federal leaders our concern with the situation in their country, and our hope that it will be possible to reach a negotiated settlement of Nigeria's problems. These views were expressed by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs during the centennial visit to Canada last October of Admiral Wey, who represented the the federal military government, and the visit in December of the Nigerian commissioner for external affairs, Dr. Arikpo.

The eastern region of Nigeria has declared itself in secession from the rest of the country and has used military and other means within its control to try to enforce this declaration. Neither the Canadian government nor any other government has recognized this secessionist régime, and we have relations only with the central authorities of the federal government at Lagos. None the less, when we express our hope, publicly and to the government at Lagos, that a negotiated settlement may be found, we mean particularly that means may be found to resolve the differences between the federal authorities and the eastern Nigerians who have declared themselves to be in secession.

It has seemed to the government that while other organizations might be able to afford assistance to the Nigerians in their search for a settlement, the commonwealth through its secretary general is at present the best placed to provide help when needed. Mr. Arnold Smith has undertaken consultations in pursuit of this aim, and has had lengthy discussions with Nigerian leaders. The Canadian government fully supports the efforts of the secretary general—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must advise the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired.

COMMUNICATIONS—INQUIRY AS TO RESERVATION OF SATELLITE SPACE

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I will only keep hon. members in orbit for a short while this evening. This is not meant to refer to the eloquent plea of the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Macquarrie) on behalf of commonwealth action in Africa, to which I heartily subscribe, but it refers to the question I ventured this afternoon about the space program of this country.

My question was prompted by a number of press reports today, particularly in Montreal and Toronto papers, of a meeting of the Canadian Aeronautics and Space Institute which was held in Montreal. It was attended by experts from universities, industry and government. Please note that civil servants were present. It was stated quite frankly that this meeting was held to get federal authorities to act quickly in establishing a space agency. It was also stated that the purpose of the meeting was to complain about the absence of a national space agency for Canada.

Some history is necessary to explain my point. I should like to refer to the statement which was made in the so-called Chapman committee report of February 1967 which said:

> The need for use by Canada of communications satellites for domestic communications is clearly established, and there is a risk that ultimate control over the specification, supply, and operation of the space segment of a communications satellite system may not reside in Canada.

Perhaps the record should contain some of the references because this will be a continuing matter. The first reference, with which I have had some connection after the estimates of last year, was a question which was asked of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) on November 17 about the meeting he had in the United States on the matter of a space program and satellite operation. The minister did not say there was direct discussion on this subject but he offered some hope when he said this whole matter was presently under discussion by the government and decisions will be announced in the not too distant future.

• (10:20 p.m.)

On December 14, 1967, I asked another question pointing out the implications of his space and satellite matter in connection with the Bell Telephone bill. At that time the minister said, as reported on page 5411 of Hansard:

> If it were felt essential this matter could be given consideration, because the government has made considerable progress in its plans in respect of commercial satellites.

He went on to say that it might be possible for the committee to look into it. Well, we passed the Bell Telephone bill and the matter was not discussed. We are at the time when the civil servants have presented their study. Last January, two consortiums were formed, one being the so-called Soble consortium, which has made its request. We have a new one now that is called the Canadian communications satellite system, which includes the trans-Canada telephone system and C.N.-C.P. Telecommunications. A report has already come forward and the minister has had his meetings in the United States. The deputy minister has told the broadcasting committee that some first steps have been taken, but we still have not received any definite word or a progress report.

I feel very sincerely, Mr. Speaker, that Canada must have its own space program, and I of course include satellites in this. I think that is in the national interest. It is important, even necessary, to co-operate in some aspects of this program with the United States and even with Russia. However, we must go forward and have this program in the interests of this great nation where geography problems are so tremendous. It will help our defence and many of our industries. One can think of television and other aspects of the communications field that will be affected. It is a broad subject and I will not get into it tonight. I merely ask now the question that I felt was not completely answered this afternoon: What progress report can the government give in this regard? At the same time, I urge the government to get moving, because we are losing our place in this very important international field, as was pointed out at this meeting yesterday which was reported in the newspapers this morning.

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): I want to say at the outset that it is not the impression of the government of Canada that we are losing our position in respect of space and satellite development. I am not so sure the Department of Transport should be responsible for answering this question, but in the limited time available this afternoon I was asked to prepare a statement in reply.

There is no international law in existence at the moment that would provide for any country in the world making a reservation on space for the installation of a communications satellite. This is the first one. A country wishing to make use of available space may, however, notify the International Telecommunications Union, known as I.T.U., at Geneva. They would notify this organization of the intention to launch a space satellite. The organization is simply a means of providing information to interested launchers and offers no protection whatever of a place in space.

A further development in this field was the adaptation of the International Satellite Organization known as Intal-Sat. The operation of this body is financed pro rata by its members. If a member state determines to put a satellite into orbit, an application is made to Intal-Sat, seeking its co-operation. Usually commercial satellites, a concept that is an arm of the United States Space Organization, at the request of Intal-Sat undertakes the launch. A domestic satellite for Canada would be required to occupy one or more of the eight planned positions obtainable for the northern half of the western hemisphere, including such countries of course as Brazil, Mexico and the United States.

Informal conversations with the United States have already taken place respecting Canada's plans to launch a satellite which would bring live television into the farthest reaches of Canada and improve both radio and telephone communication. However, though the plans are being actively pursued they have not reached the stage where it would be desirable either to notify I.T.U. officially of our future intentions or to make application to Intal-Sat for launching privileges.

I can assure the hon. member for Saint John-Albert that things are moving rapidly in that direction with the usual alacrity displayed by this government. I can understand the hon. member's concern about communications when I think of the many hours that both he and I spent in a bus unable to communicate with the outside world to determine that very interesting things were taking place in parliament.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.28 p.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TABLING OF AGREEMENTS ENTERED INTO BY CANADA

Mr. Gérard Pelletier (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, with leave, I should like to table the English and French texts of a number of agreements recently entered into by the government.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to table these documents?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CONSIDERATION OF CONSTITUTIONAL COURT

Question No. 874—Mr. Caouette:

1. Does the government intend to consider with the provinces the possibility of setting up a constitutional court?

2. During the last three years, did the government receive from the provinces or other bodies reports, memoranda or other documents requesting the setting up of such a court and, if so, from whom?

3. Is the federal research team on constitutional problems studying this matter?

[Translation]

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): 1. As a result of the recent constitutional conference, this possibility will be considered during the continuing constitutional discussions with the provinces.

2. No.

3. The establishment of a constitutional court is being studied at the present time.

[English]

LEGISLATION REVISION COMMISSION

Question No. 876—Mr. Caouette:

1. What steps were taken by the Canadian Legislation Revision Commission to improve the French version of Statutes?

2. When will the Revised Statutes of Canada be published and available to all Canadians?

3. In the Legislation Section, are the bills drafted jointly by French-speaking and English-speaking lawyers and, if not, for what reason?

4. Among the seven English-speaking lawyers of of the Legislation Section, how many are bilingual?

5. Among the four French-speaking lawyers of the Legislation Section, how many are bilingual?

[Translation]

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): 1. Particular attention is being paid to the French text of the statutes in order to improve the expression of that text wherever corrections can be made within the limits of the powers of the Commission under Section 5 of 1964-65, c. 48.

2. It was intended that the Revised Statutes would be available in the Fall of 1968. This may not now be achieved because of the continuation of the 1967 Session of Parliament into the year 1968.

3. Until recently almost all Bills drafted in the Legislation Section were drafted in the first instance in English and then translated into French by translators carrying out the functions prescribed by the Translation Bureau Act (R.S. 1952, c. 270, s. 3). Civil Law lawyers were consulted in respect of civil law matters when they arose. Since the inception of the revision of the Statutes which began in 1965, the addition of experienced French-speaking civil law lawyers to the staff of the Legislation Section has made it possible to initiate working arrangements under which Bills prepared as described above are reviewed by such French-speaking civil law lawyers to ensure as far as possible that each of the two language versions of a Bill accurately expresses the substance of the other, and so that the implications of the proposed legislation in terms of its application to the common law and civil law may be fully appreciated and assessed. Plans are now being worked out that will formalize these arrangements and extend them to all Bills that are drafted in the Legislation Section. The ultimate objective is the implementation, as soon as possible, of a system of dual-language drafting involving the preparation of draft Bills in English and French as part of a single process.

4. The seven English-speaking common law lawyers of the Legislation Section (who belong to the Bars of Ontario (2), Alberta (1), Saskatchewan (2), Manitoba (1) and Nova Scotia (1)), are not bilingual.

5. The four French-speaking civil law lawyers of the Legislation Section (all of whom are members of the Quebec Bar) are bilingual.

EXHIBITION OF CANADIAN ART IN EUROPE

Question No. 909—Mr. Nesbitt:

1. Has an exhibition of Canadian painting and sculpture been sent to Europe?

2. If so, in what cities has the exhibition thereof been held or proposed to be held, and during what period in each city?

3. How many (a) paintings (b) sculptures (c) other artistic productions are represented?

4. How many artists are represented?

5. Were arrangements made to transport and pay the expenses of Canadian art critics to the exhibition in Paris, France?

6. If so (a) by what department or agency of government (b) what are the names of such critics (c) what media do they represent (d) what was the total cost of the trip for such critics and any accompanying officials (e) what, in detail, was the purpose of the trip of such critics (f) was the trip approved (i) before or after the budget speech of the Minister of Finance on November 30, 1967 (ii) before or after the commencement of examination by the Treasury Board of possible retrenchment in expenditures?

7. Did any Minister of the Crown attend in Paris in connection with the exhibition there?

8. If so (a) what Minister (b) how long was he absent from Canada (c) was he accompanied by any staff and, if so, by whom (d) what were the total expenses of such Minister's trip and of his staff, if any?

9. (a) What officials, if any, of (i) the Department of External Affairs (ii) the National Gallery of Canada, have made trips to any of the cities revealed in the answer to Part 2 in respect of the planning or the actual conduct of the exhibition (b) what further trips of officials of the Department or Gallery are contemplated (c) what is the total cost to date of such trips (d) what is the total estimated cost of contemplated trips?

10. What is the grand total amount that this exhibition is expected to cost?

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Yes.

2. Musée National d'Art Moderne, Paris, January 12 to February 17, 1968; Musée Cantonal des Beaux-Arts, Lausanne, July 11 to August 31, 1968; Palais des Beaux-Arts, Brussels, September 19 to October 19, 1968; Galleria Nazionale di Arte Moderna, Rome, May 16 to June 15, 1968.

3. (a) 63; (b) 13; (c) Nil.

4. 19.

5. Yes.

6. 9. (a) (i) None; (ii) the commissioner general for the exhibition, and the deputy director of the National Gallery; (b) the commissioner general for the exhibition is expected to visit the cities which will be toured by the exhibition, in order to supervise preparations and to be in attendance along with the director of the National Gallery or her representative on the opening day; (c) $3,853.71; (d) $5,550.

10. Authorized budget, $88,700.

BUTTER RESERVES

Question No. 943—Mr. Laprise:

1. What amount of butter did the government have in warehouses on January 1, 1966, 1967 and 1968?

2. Are the reserves of butter in stock adequate to meet the consumer demand during the present season and, if not, how much must be imported?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): 1. January 1, 1966, 60,049,316 lbs.; January 1, 1967, 40,726,829 lbs.; January 1, 1968, 43,549,848 lbs.

2. Present indications are that stocks will be sufficient.

I.L.O. CONVENTIONS ON SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC RIGHTS

Question No. 1,001—Mr. Orlikow:

1. In connection with the Canadian Charter of Human Rights, what Conventions of the International Labour Organization dealing with social and economic rights has Canada ratified?

2. Were these Conventions ratified by Canada, which are now part of the legal structure of Canada, included in the documents prepared by the Government of Canada for discussion at the Federal-Provincial Conference and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Canada has ratified the following I.L.O. conventions dealing with social and economic rights: *No. 1, Hours of Work (Industry), 1919 (First Session), March 21, 1935; No. 7, Minimum Age (Sea) 1920, (Second Session), March 31, 1926; No. 8, Unemployment Indemnity, 1920 (Second Session), March 31, 1926; No. 14, Weekly Rest (Industry), 1921 (Third Session), March 21, 1935; No. 15, Minimum Age (Trimmers and Stokers), 1921 (Third Session), March 31, 1926; No. 16, Medical Examination of Young Persons (Sea), 1921 (Third Session), March 31, 1926; No. 22, Seamen's Articles of Agreement, 1926 (Ninth Session), June 30, 1938; *No. 26, Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery, 1928 (Eleventh Session), April 25, 1935; No. 27, Marking of Weight (Packages Transported by Vessels), 1929 (Twelfth Session), June 30, 1938; No. 32, Protection Against Accidents (Dockers) Revised, 1932 (Sixteenth Session), April 6, 1946; No. 45, Employment of Women on Underground Work in Mines of All Kinds, 1935 (Nineteenth Session), Sept. 16, 1966; No. 58, Minimum Age for Employment at Sea, 1936 (Twenty-Second Session), Sept. 10, 1951; No. 63, Statistics of Wages and Hours of Work, 1938 (Twenty-Fourth Session), April 6, 1946; No. 68, Food and Catering (Ships' Crews), 1946 (Twenty-Eighth Session), March 19, 1951; No. 69, Certification of Ships' Cooks, 1946 (Twenty-Eighth Session), March 19, 1951; No. 73, Medical Examination (Seafarers), 1946 (Twenty-Eighth Session), March 19, 1951; No. 74, Certification of Able Seamen, 1946 (Twenty-Eighth Session), March 19, 1951; No. 88, Employment Service, 1948 (Thirty-First Session), August 24, 1950; No. 105, Abolition of Forced Labour, 1957 (Fortieth Session), July 14, 1959; No. 108, Seafarers' National Identity Documents (Forty-First Session), May 31, 1967; No. 111, Discrimination in respect of employment and occupation, 1958, (Forty-Second Session), Nov. 26, 1964; No. 122, Employment Policy, 1964 (Forty-Eighth Session), Sept. 16, 1966.

* The implementing Federal Statutes concerning ratification of these conventions were declared ultra vires by the Privy Council, 1937.

2. The texts of these conventions were not included in the documents prepared by the government of Canada for discussion at the recent federal-provincial conference since they were not a specific item on the agenda, although they fall within the general field of human rights. The texts of a number of major United Nations conventions on human rights were included in the document "A Canadian Charter of Human Rights", for illustrative purposes. It should be noted that many of the ILO conventions, upon ratification by Canada, require implementation through either federal, or by both federal and provincial legislation.

AREA DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Question No. 1,009—Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert):

Since the inception of the Area Development Program under the Department of Industry, what has been for the designated areas, by province (a) number of applications (b) number of new jobs (c) capital investment (d) total federal payments, expressing each of the preceding as a unit of the labour force in each province, e.g., in New Brunswick 25 new jobs for 1,000 members of the labour force, and so on?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): The following statistics relate to all active applications which have been approved, or are under review, in the period since the inception of the area development program and December 31, 1967:

A.

SEARCHES IN CANADA BY POLICE OFFICERS FROM ABROAD

Question No. 1,015—Mr. Caouette:

1. Is there an agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of Britain allowing British police officers to conduct searches in Canada (a) with warrant (b) without warrant?

2. Is there such an agreement with the Government of the Republic of France concerning either (a) or (b) above?

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): In so far as the Department of External Affairs is concerned: 1. (a) and (b) No.

2. No.

REQUIREMENT FOR SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBERS

Question No. 1,025—Mr. Thompson:

Supplementary

1. Is it compulsory for every adult Canadian to apply for a Social Insurance number?

2. What is the penalty for those who do not apply for a Social Insurance number?

3. How many known cases are there of people who are required to have a Social Insurance number who have not applied or who refuse to apply for a number?

4. (a) Are there citizens who are being penalized for not having a Social Insurance number (b) what is the amount of the penalty (c) how many Canadians are being prosecuted in the Courts for not possessing a Social Insurance number or for refusing to apply?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Department of National Revenue as follows: 1. No.

2. The failure to apply for a social insurance number as required under the Canada Pension Plan could result in the loss of benefits under that act. Individuals who are taxable for 1967 or subsequent taxation years and who fail to apply for a social insurance number, as required under the Income Tax Act, are liable to the penalties provided in subsection 3 of section 55 of that act.

3. There are fewer than one hundred thousand people who file income tax returns who have not yet supplied information with regard to their social insurance numbers. The number of those who have refused to apply for a social insurance number is not available but there have been very few such cases.

4. (a) There have been no penalties assessed under the Income Tax Act but under the Canada Pension Plan there is a potential loss of pension rights for contributors who fail to supply social insurance numbers. (b) See question 2 above. (c) None.

FISHING OPERATIONS, LITTLE HARBOUR, N.S.

Question No. 1,091—Mr. Forrestall:

1. What is the number of men actively engaged in fishing at Little Harbour, Halifax County?

2. How many boats are being operated from there?

3. What is the extent of the annual total catch in pounds and dollars?

4. Has the government received requests for the enlargement of the wharf facility there and, if so, what plans have been made?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Departments of Fisheries and Public Works as follows: 1. 19.

2. 17.

3. The catch in 1966 was 583,000 lbs. valued to fishermen at $39,363.

4. Yes, but no plans have been made for the enlargement of the wharf facility at this time.

Motions for Papers

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I inquired one week ago today about the answer to starred question No. 545, which is dated October 24. I should like to have the question answered, and I did not hear the parliamentary secretary say that he intended to answer it today.

Mr. Starr: He did not say he would.

Mr. Hees: Could the parliamentary secretary advise me about the question now?

Mr. Béchard: It was not answered today, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. E. J. Benson (President of the Treasury Board): I wish to assure the hon. member that I have the answer to the question. It came to my attention and to my office this morning, and it will be answered the next time we have questions.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, notice of motion for the production of papers No. 46 is acceptable to the government.

Notice of motion No. 56 is acceptable to the government subject to the usual reservations concerning privileged papers and the consent of the relevant government authorities.

Would Your Honour be kind enough to call notice of motion No. 42?

Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining notices of motions be allowed to stand.

FRENCH COPIES OF SUPREME COURT JUDGMENTS

Motion No. 46—Mr. Caouette:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a return showing whether the opinion of the Supreme Court concerning underwater rights has been published in French and, if not, for what reason; whether consideration has been given to the possibility of publishing in both official languages the judgments of the Supreme Court concerning the problem of the sharing of the legislative powers between the federal and provincial governments and, if not, for what reason; and how many judgments of the Supreme Court were given in English only, in French only, and in both languages, during the last five years.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY AGREEMENTS WITH B.C.

Motion No. 56—Mr. Barnett:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Prime Minister and/or the the Minister of Public Works and the Government of British Columbia since June 3, 1964, on the subject-matter of the alteration or extension of Trans-Canada Highway agreements on the items referred to in the letter of May 26, 1964, from the Premier of British Columbia to the Prime Minister.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION RESPECTING OFF-SHORE MINERAL RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, I think, the Prime Minister told me that he hoped soon to answer my question about the government's plans having to do with off-shore oil policy and what direction that policy will take following the Supreme Court decision. Since the session may adjourn soon, and since my right hon. friend may not have extensive plans for the future, I wonder if he could assure the house that he will make a statement about this matter soon, perhaps before the house adjourns or recesses.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I hope to do that by the end of the week, Mr. Speaker. There have been some developments in the last 48 hours which I should like to include in my answer.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

OFFER TO FACILITATE PASSAGE OF BILL C-190

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I ask the Prime Minister if he will consider proceeding with Bill C-190, to amend the Patent Act and the Trade Marks Act, before the recess. Members of this party are prepared to forgo any debate in committee of the whole and third reading, the bill already having had second reading. We think it is important for steps to be taken to lower the high price of drugs, and we are prepared to facilitate passage of the bill if the government is prepared to bring it before the house before the recess.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): If we could dispose of the bill now before the house, and the estimates and supply, I should hope, perhaps, that we could deal with my hon. friend's bill by arrangement so that debate could be kept to a minimum in accordance with my hon. friend's intentions, in order to have the matter dealt with before we adjourn.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Prime Minister consider bringing down the bill before interim supply, so we could dispose of it?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Pearson: It is important to get supply through first.

MANPOWER

SUGGESTED RETRAINING PROGRAM FOR UNEMPLOYED ARCHITECTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Could the minister tell us whether his department considers offering, under its manpower retraining program, special courses to numerous architects out of employment at the present time because of the crisis affecting the building industry?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, retraining courses offered by the Department of Manpower and Immigration are not meant for professionals.

[English]

IMMIGRATION

CONSIDERATION OF APPLICATIONS FROM ASIANS IN KENYA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Has a special team been created under special circumstances in order to arrange for some if not all of the 5,000 Asians in Kenya to come to Canada? Has the minister's department such a plan at the present time?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have already answered that question. An agent of the Department of Immigration went to Kenya to help the Canadian high commissioner at Nairobi. A team of civil servants is probably already on its way to Kenya to study the applications.

We are now studying the situation. I know there is an increase in the number of applications, but I cannot say how many people will come.

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has this team been instructed to include in any conclusion it arrives at the consideration that in Canada from 6 per cent to 7 per cent of the work force is unemployed?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that the question is argumentative.

Mr. Woolliams: I did not mean it to be argumentative. Perhaps I sounded argumentative.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Woolliams: I shall try to rephrase it. In view of the fact that there is serious unemployment in this country, has the team been instructed to pay special regard to this circumstance?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, our selection criteria automatically take these facts into account.

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: A supplementary question. Have instructions been given to the team to pay regard to the special circumstances involving unemployment?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I believe our system is flexible enough to take into account the present circumstances, in Kenya as well as in Canada, and I doubt that it should be necessary to issue special instructions.

[English]

TRADE

REPORTED INCREASE IN IMPORTS AS COMPARED TO EXPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that imports into Canada during the month of January, the latest month for which figures are available, increased at nearly twice the rate of exports from this country, is the government planning to take steps in the immediate future to make sure that this alarming trend does not continue?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): My own main responsibility is for exports, and we had a good month in January with exports up considerably as compared with January a year ago. It is true imports were higher last January than they were in January of 1967, but it would be a mistake to judge our trading pattern on the performance in a single month, particularly the first month in the year.

Mr. Hees: Is it not true that imports increased by 8 per cent and exports by only 5 per cent as compared with a year ago, and is this not a significant figure?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That question may not sound argumentative, but it is.

[Later:]

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Would he be prepared to satisfy the eagerness of the Minister of Agriculture to share responsibility for declining sales of grain?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Speaker, they are not declining.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SUMMER EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES FOR UNIVERSITY STUDENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a question I should like to direct to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Is the government making any special arrangements for the employment of university students this summer? I ask this question in view of the cutbacks announced affecting opportunities normally available in federal government employment and elsewhere. If nothing is done there is likely to be a large excess of students on the labour market seeking unsuccessfully to provide themselves with funds to continue their education.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we have a special section which deals with students. We shall try to find as many jobs as possible, but with regard to exchanges with foreign students, especially European students, we take into account the fact that there will be fewer jobs next year in Canada, so as to favour Canadian students.

[English]

Mr. Nesbitt: I was wondering whether the government intends to make any special arrangements this year in addition to those normally made, because of the likelihood of increased unemployment and the lack of labour opportunities.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is simply repeating the question he asked originally.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PROPOSED MANNING OF NAVAL SHIP WITH FRENCH SPEAKING CREW

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I desire to direct a question, a most important one, to the Minister of National Defence.

Because of the technical training problems involved, and since under present procedures all orders are conveyed in English by the naval squadron leader, commodore or admiral, will the minister reconsider his proposed separation of a specific navy ship from normal operation and procedure with the designation that all on board must have French as their mother language?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest that the hon. member place his question on the order paper.

Mr. Winch: In view of the fact that this new procedure is in the mind of the minister, is it not of urgency?

Mr. Speaker: The minister can, of course, reply in writing to the hon. member's written question.

WINNING OF TROPHY BY CABOT SQUADRON NO. 562, AIR CADETS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Is he aware that Cabot squadron No. 562, Royal Canadian Air Cadets, with its commanding officer, Squadron Leader T. R. Young, of North Sydney, has been named the outstanding air cadet squadron in Canada during centennial year? May I also ask the minister, will he be in a position to attend the testimonial dinner and presentation of the dominion trophy, to be held on March 23—and may I add that this minister would be most welcome?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question may be allowed as a special case.

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am aware that the 562 Cabot squadron has won a number of honours in the past, and I know it richly deserves the honour it won this year. I would like the hon. gentleman to be kind enough to transmit my own congratulations to the squadron. Unfortunately I will not be available for the particular occasion on March 23, but I will make sure that somebody from headquarters who does appreciate the work of air cadets will be present.

FINANCE

MEASURES TO RETAIN U.S. INVESTMENT FUNDS IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): My question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In view of the minister's announcement last week of arrangements with the United States to prevent U.S. investment funds passing through Canada to other countries, may I ask whether the government has decided to set up any special machinery to carry out this pledge?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): The machinery for this purpose is under examination now.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. What Canadian initiatives are planned, in co-operation with other countries, which might have the effect of preventing further deterioration in international financial mechanisms which now seem to be at the mercy of speculators?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, both the governor of the Bank of Canada and I have been in touch with other central banks and with other financial authorities throughout the world. We are very concerned about the present situation, and are trying to take measures that would be useful. Indeed, some of the measures that were taken last week have a relationship to the international monetary system, and we are prepared to consider other initiatives, if any are open to us, that would be useful.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEDICARE—COST IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Secretary of State a question with regard to question No. 727 on the order paper. In view of the fact that this question has been on the order paper since November 21 last, and in view of the fact that the information requested is clearly and immediately available to the federal government, may I ask the hon. lady if it is the intention of the government deliberately to withhold the information requested in this question?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I will look into the matter, Mr. Speaker. Sometimes queries in that direction are not answered as rapidly as one could wish. I will ask whether that might be what is wrong, or whether there is some other reason.

ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT BOARD

PROPOSED MOVE OF HEADQUARTERS FROM OTTAWA TO MARITIMES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare in reference to the Atlantic Development Board. Now that one of his fellow contenders has joined those of us who have advocated the movement of A.D.B. headquarters from Ottawa to a maritime location, can he advise whether consideration is being given to this desirable development?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, that item is not under active consideration, but it will be considered in the light of my hon. friend's representations.

Inquiries of the Ministry

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

HEATING OIL AND GASOLINE—STATEMENT ON PRICE INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Finance can he now give us a report on the inquiry into the increases in the prices of gasoline and heating oil, a report which he has been promising to give for some considerable time?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker. My officials have looked into the recent increases that have occurred in the prices of gasoline, oil and heating fuel. I understand that the explanation given by the industry is that the increases were made necessary by rising costs, chiefly salaries, wages and supplies.

However, before a judgment can be made on issues such as this more information is required about a number of related factors. It is not sufficient to know only the extent to which costs have risen. Increased productivity, for example, might enable an industry to absorb cost increases and thereby avoid the need for higher prices. Other relevant considerations include the levels of profitability and capacity at which industry is operating, its ability to attract capital, and the degree of domestic and foreign competition.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would think the additional information now being given by the minister should preferably be given at the time of motions.

Mr. Lewis: As a supplementary question, do I understand from the minister's reply as far as it went, or as far as it got, that the only information his department has sought in all these weeks is information given to it by the companies concerned, or have the officials of his department made any independent inquiry into some of the matters he mentioned?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker; my department has gone further than that. It is because of the relations which exist in respect of the price of gasoline that the Prime Minister has announced his plans for an agency for reviewing such things. It would be my hope that this type of price rise would be exactly the sort of matter that would be inquired into by the board.

Mr. Lewis: In view of the fact that the agency about which the Prime Minister spoke yesterday is not likely to be established for some time, would the minister undertake to make a statement on motions on this inquiry in respect of increased prices for supplies which are important to all consumers in Canada?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I understood that the hon. gentleman did not think very much of the establishment of the board proposed by the Prime Minister. I am happy to see that he is changing his mind. This is the kind of situation that requires a thorough review and not just a superficial examination.

[Translation]

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REFUSAL TO HOLD TRIAL IN FRENCH

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Solicitor General. Is he aware that Justice Alfred Watt, of British Columbia, denies to a certain Suzanne Poulin, who does not speak English, the right to defend herself in her mother tongue? If so, what action does he intend to take?

[English]

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the facts as alleged by the hon. member but I will consult with the Minister of Justice.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he has received a communication from the Minister of Trade and Commerce about that minister's responsibilities and, if so, what was the reply.

Mr. Speaker: I have some doubt about the question as asked. I find it difficult to ascertain the purport or import of the question.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister how he can accept the resignation of one minister and not that of another.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Pearson: That is easy.

[Mr. Lewis.]

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE REDUCTION IN EXPENDITURES OF DEPARTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address this question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of his announcement of the proposal to set up a board to review prices and costs, is it the intention of the government when this board is set up to cut back extensively on the expenditures that have now been incurred by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is our intention to cut back expenditures on every possible occasion, and in that connection to resist demands from the other side for hundreds of millions of dollars of extra expenditures.

Mr. Starr: In view of the hope the Prime Minister expressed yesterday that this board would help solve the problems of the high costs and difficulties in other areas does the Prime Minister not think it would be wise to cut down expenses by eliminating duplication of work?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is not in order.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

WEST GERMANY—OBJECTIONS TO DRAFT NUCLEAR TREATY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs appears to have been neglected today. I do not like to see him in that situation under the present circumstances; therefore I should like to ask him whether he is now in a position to answer the question I asked the day before yesterday with regard to the Canadian position in reference to the further safeguards requested by West Germany in connection with the non-proliferation nuclear treaty.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government of West Germany is not a member of the 18 nation group that has been discussing the non-proliferation treaty. It has indicated, however, that it proposes to support the treaty notwithstanding the fact that the treaty does not fully comply with some of its reservations. It has sent a letter to the Canadian and other governments as a matter of record, setting out what it regards as imperfections in the treaty which it hopes might perhaps be considered very shortly when the whole matter is referred to the United Nations for consideration.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, my question to the minister was whether Canada was supporting the position that these further safeguards should be written into the treaty.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Canada supports the treaty, and we indicated this intention at the 18 power meeting. We will, however, be prepared to consider improvements in the treaty when the matter is referred very shortly to the United Nations.

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, will the minister for external affairs tell us whether our government has indicated to West Germany that we support their four points or any modification of those four points?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We have not indicated that we support the four points, Mr. Speaker. We have indicated, however, that some of their points do deserve further consideration.

WATER RESOURCES

PEMBINA RIVER—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON DISCUSSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, because of the fairly imminent adjournment of the house I wonder whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs would look into the matter of the discussions between the United States and Canada about the Pembina river project, and give a report to the house tomorrow?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

REPORTED PREMATURE RELEASE OF NEW STAMP ISSUE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General regarding a subject I mentioned to him before the house was called to order. It relates to a stamp which was issued today for the first time to the general public. Is the minister aware that there exists at least one of these stamps, which I have in my possession on a letter, which carries a cancellation dated two days ago at Trois Rivières, Quebec? This is two days before the stamp was issued to the public. Will the minister look into this matter?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would have hoped the hon. member could have received a reply when he spoke to the minister.

Mr. Howard: The minister pretty well indicated that I should ask the question in this way because, as I understand it, he would like to put on record his concern in this regard as it may involve theft in his department.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for advising me of this unusual situation. I know that my department takes all the necessary precautions to prevent this sort of thing. I shall certainly look into the matter and report to the hon. member.

[English]

PUBLIC SERVICE

POSITION OF EXECUTIVE AND PROFESSIONAL OFFICERS RESPECTING COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. A. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the President of the Treasury Board whether the government has taken any action to remove misunderstandings existing in several departments of government due to erroneous directives that employees in executive or professional roles are required to resign from employee organizations before collective bargaining begins.

Hon. E. J. Benson (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, we looked into this question which my hon. friend has raised before, and found that in one department there was an erroneous interpretation of the directive of the Treasury Board. We have been in touch with this and other departments to make sure the directive issued by the Treasury Board is adhered to within the departments.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Would it not have been simpler for the minister to have replied to the questions which were—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I placed this question on the order paper three weeks ago.

Mr. Benson: Action is better than words.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LEGISLATION TO INCREASE PENSIONS OF RETIRED CIVIL SERVANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether there is now any hope that before the right hon. gentleman resigns as Prime Minister, the government will place before parliament the matter of an increase in the pensions of retired civil servants, an increase to which these people are surely entitled?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member must never give up hope.

LABOUR RELATIONS

MONTREAL—APPOINTMENT OF ARBITRATION BOARD ON PICARD REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

Is he in a position today to answer the question that I put to him yesterday?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the question put to me last Monday by the hon. member for Sainte-Marie, I am told that nobody in my department nor in the Board of Grain Commissioners suggested to exporters to use Port Cartier or Baie Comeau facilities instead of Montreal harbour, when arrangements were made for the shipment of grain during the next season.

I am told also that the Canadian Wheat Board has not made such proposals. I wish to point out to the hon. member that the buyers themselves plan the grain shipments. I am pleased to inform the house, Mr. Speaker, that since January 1 of this year, grain exports through Montreal harbour have amounted to 1.4 million bushels.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement and statistics the minister has given in respect of grain export shipments from Montreal, can he tell us what is his forecast for this coming year?

[Mr. Benson.]

[Translation]

Mr. Greene: There will surely be—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

CRIMINAL CODE

REQUEST FOR WITHDRAWAL OF ABORTION AND HOMOSEXUAL PROVISIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the hon. Minister of Justice.

Can he tell the house if perchance he intends to withdraw his bill on abortion and homosexuality, in view of the fact that a large number of citizens consider that policy antimoral?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[English]

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

HEARING AIDS—REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the fact that one of every four senior citizens must use a hearing aid, and in view of the fact that the retail mark-ups on these devices run as high as 306 per cent of the wholesale price, will the minister institute an immediate inquiry into the price of hearing aids in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order please. While I know this is an important matter I feel the question should be placed on the order paper.

PUBLIC SERVICE

IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF GLASSCO COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board. Earlier today he indicated that he has in his possession the answer to starred question No. 545, dated October 24. As there is a distinct possibility that this house may adjourn before these questions are called again, would the minister be kind enough to send me the answer he has so I may have it today?

Hon. E. J. Benson (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I will be very pleased to send my hon. friend a copy of the answer to the question soon, which indicates the tremendous progress this government has made in this direction.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hees: Is that the reason this government has carefully hidden these answers for five solid months?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the supplementary question is argumentative.

Mr. Benson: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am afraid the reply would also be argumentative.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Benson: I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the minister rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Benson: Yes, I rise on a question of privilege. I should like to say that the government has not hidden—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Benson: The government has not hidden the answer to this question for a period of five months, but it has taken five months to get all the information that was required, because of the great accomplishments of the government in this regard.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The supplementary question was, of course, out of order, and there was no question of privilege.

Mr. Hees: On the question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There is no question of privilege, so this cannot be pursued. The supplementary question was out of order, and I suggest we now go on to something else.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT BOARD

INQUIRY AS TO COMPLETION OF DEVELOPMENT PLAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare in his responsibility as reporting to parliament for the Atlantic Development Board. For some months a number of us have been asking when the comprehensive plan for the development of the Atlantic region will be received. Can the minister now give us an indication of when that important report will be tabled?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the planning process is advancing toward completion within the Atlantic Development Board, and the members of the board will very shortly be dealing with various sector reports in order to formulate an over-all plan for the year.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Inasmuch as this report may become available during the adjournment of parliament, will the minister assure hon. members that the report will be circulated for study at that time?

Mr. MacEachen: I would be glad to discuss the question with the board itself, Mr. Speaker.

INCOME TAX ACT

INQUIRY AS TO EXAMINATION AND APPROVAL BY JUSTICE MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Did the minister examine and approve the tax bill ruled upon Monday in this house?

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, this is a question of departmental administration. I am not sure that I am required to answer it under the rules.

Mr. McCleave: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, that arises from the minister's answer, it has been the custom in the past to ask questions to see whether the Minister of Justice is carrying out his responsibilities under the bill of rights. I think this minister, like ministers before him, is required to answer the question.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am on the point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I could rule immediately on the point of order. It is elementary, and I am sure all hon. members agree, that even when questions are in order and an hon. member has the right to ask a question, the rules do not provide that the minister must answer. Even if the answer is not satisfactory to the member who asked for information, he has to accept that answer.

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is that the kind of arrogant prime minister you will be if you are chosen?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR SURCHARGE

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Sharp for the second reading of Bill No. C-208, to amend the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, those of us on this side who have some liking for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) have felt very much like commiserating with him during the course of the past few weeks because of the embarrassment and difficulties in which he has found himself. I think many of us on this side feel that he is accident prone and Canada has a star-crossed minister.

Some of my colleagues tell me that from time to time the Minister of Finance has given to the house a brilliant analysis of the state of the economy. I certainly have no reason to question that judgment of my colleagues. However, it seems to me that while the minister may be capable of making brilliant analyses of the state of the economy, the problem is that the conclusions he reaches and the courses of action he maps out often do not follow the analyses arrived at and are quite erroneous.

At the present time, for example, we are told by the minister what is the combination of circumstances and what are the sets of problems that are causing difficulty in our economy. Then, as a follow-up, he presents us with fiscal measures, with a tax bill that in trying to deal with one set of problems in the economy will cause harm in other ways. It will cause harm by bringing about higher levels of unemployment than we have already, and they are already cause for concern. It will bring about a further slow down in economic growth. When we look at the indices for last year we see that in terms of constant dollars there was last year very little economic growth in Canada.

I realize that because other hon. members have spoken in this debate, at the resolution stage and on the bill that was defeated, much of what I will say will be repetitious; but I do not apologize for that. I happen to have been connected with Jesuit institutions at one time, and one pedagogical rule that the Jesuits like to emphasize—perhaps I could express it in Latin—is repetitio matur studiurum est, which means that repetition is the mother of learning.

In the case of this government and the Minister of Finance I feel there is no need to apologize for repetition because it is one way of getting across to the government some of the fundamental, basic rules of economic performance. This government, surely, with all the high-priced help it has at its beck and call, should not have got itself in the position of levying increased taxation at a time when there are already strong indications of a slowdown in economic growth, an increase in unemployment, and so on. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I will repeat quite a number of things without the slightest wish to apologize.

We are given to understand by the minister that the purpose of the bill now before us, the bill which the press has been referring to as tax bill mark III, is to combat the fires of inflation that are burning in Canada. I certainly agree that we have serious inflation at the present time. An increase in the cost of living of 4.5 per cent in two successive years is hardly a matter about which to be complacent.

The rate of inflation that exists in this country exceeds that of the United States, despite the fact that the economy of the United States is being overstrained and overreached much more than ours. Our neighbour to the south is fighting a war the cost of which approximates $25 billion or $26 billion a year. It is attempting to implement domestic policies and programs which are every bit as comprehensive as those of the government of Canada. It is maintaining a military presence not just in southeast Asia but on the continent of Europe on a scale proportionately higher than ours.

Despite all this, in the United States they have managed to keep the rate of inflation somewhat lower than that which prevails in Canada. I might add that on top of this they have been increasing the money supply at a faster rate than was the case in Canada last year. Despite all these things, inflation is burning away very much more dangerously here than there, which makes one ask how this can be possible. I have already made my remonstrances to the Minister of Finance that he should not be proposing to the house a bill which will have the effect of taxing away excess demand. I have already insisted, together with others, that there is no excess demand on goods and services in Canada at the present time. It is not that kind of inflation. This has been reasserted to the minister by members on this side of the house time and time again, but apparently he has not heard. He does not want to hear. Whatever the reason, he proceeds as though there is excess demand and he recommends taxation accordingly. The inflation we have in this country today has really very little to do with demand. Therefore the adding of taxes merely adds to the problem and adds to the cost of goods and services. This will be followed in short order by an increase in prices and a demand for increased wages.

Obviously, members would agree that the inflation we have in this country now is a cost induced inflation and the imposition of a surtax does nothing to cure the disease. There is a second negative effect as well. We will derive from this new tax an effect which is opposite to that which is really needed. The new tax will lower demand, which is not excessive now, and it will increase the amount of unutilized economic resources. It follows therefore, there will be a further increase in unemployment, a further slowing down of economic growth. I know that some members opposite found it amusing yesterday when the hon. member for York-South (Mr. Lewis) made the logical assertion, that the effect of the tax measure before us will be to bring about simultaneously both inflationary pressures and deflationary pressures.

In a sense, Mr. Speaker, it would seem that this is not possible. However, I feel it certainly can be said that the effect of this bill will be paradoxical in that it will increase costs, and in that sense will be inflationary, while at the same time the effect will be to reduce employment and cause a greater under-utilization of our economic resources. In that sense it will be deflationary. The net effect certainly will be undesirable.

As I understand the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp), he advances as an argument for this surtax the assertion that it will enable the government to come close to balancing its budget, and therefore will remove the necessity for the government to go to the bond or money market to obtain funds. This will remove some of the pressures on the money-market. I do not wish to be critical in this respect, because there has been an excessive demand on the money market. This government is not the only cause of it. I do not believe there is any reason for criticism of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) for saying, as he did, that the actual increase in expenditures at the federal level has been much less, in percentage, than the rate of increase of expenditures by provinces and municipalities. I agree with the Prime Minister.

There is nothing new in this phenomenon which is very apparent in the United States federal system and, I would suspect, in other federal systems throughout the world. The fact is that provincial governments have been increasing their expenditures rapidly. Perhaps this is the result of greater urbanization or industrialization, the great increase in the birth rate, and so on. All of these things necessitate greater expenditures on education and municipal services. The fact is that provincial governments have been spending more and more money and have been going to the money market more often for larger and larger amounts. This has nothing to do, it would seem, with political ideology, but I certainly do not wish to criticize the Prime Minister for having pointed out these facts to hon. members.

I agree it is too simple to criticize this government's spending which, I must concede, in so far as its rate of increase is concerned has been kept down to a greater extent than that of provincial or local governments. What should be looked at, in my opinion, is the rate of increase in spending in relation to that of the provinces, in relation to that of other industrialized states, in relation to the increase in gross national product and per capita income. All of these indices should be looked at before we attack the federal government for increasing its program of expenditures.

Of course taxes could be lowered. Of course public programs contemplated could be put aside. Of course public programs already implemented could be discontinued. All these things could be done; but if we took this option we should be prepared to admit that the consequences in social terms would be very disturbing. Within a short time private opulence and public squalor would become all too evident. We would have inadequate social services, inadequate educational facilities, and eventually all this would wither away our social conscience.

But I do not wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that there is no room for this government to cut costs. I do agree with the hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Hales), who made a fine speech last evening outlining in detail some of the areas this government could explore with a view to cutting costs. Since he did such a good job in that regard, it is really unnecessary for me to do the same thing, as I had in mind to do. Very briefly, I should like to say that being on the public accounts committee with the hon. member it is becoming more and more obvious to us that if this government cared just a little more about administrative efficiency and cost cutting procedures a few million dollars might be saved for the public purse.

I am not sure of the position of my colleagues, Mr. Speaker, but I know my personal feeling is that there is nothing wrong with the announced intention of this government of putting a freeze on the recruitment of civil servants. It seems to me that in some departments a certain amount of extravagance has crept in as well as excessive recruitment. Some departments have adopted a sort of jet set attitude as to how to go about things. No doubt this is causing the administrative costs of some departments to rise higher than is really necessary. Probably at some future date, it will be necessary to increase the number of civil servants, but at the moment I agree that it is time for a period of consolidation and tightening up.

I think the hon. member for Wellington South pointed out, and if he did not I recall reading it in the Auditor General's report, that since 1962 there has been an increase in administrative personnel in the order of 40,000 and an increase in administrative costs in the order of $500 million. There are still many recommendations in the Glassco report that have not been implemented. The public accounts committee, working in conjunction with the Auditor General, has pointed out 450 instances in which administrative expenses could be pared. Of these 450 cases which have been resubmitted and resubmitted to the cabinet for action, only one third have been attended to. It is my personal opinion that that particular course of action at this time is a meritorious one.

[Mr. Schreyer.]

It has also come to my attention that the Department of Public Works has become increasingly sloppy in its leasing of office space from private owners. The department has leased space which has then remained unused for months and months. Whole floors of office buildings in Ottawa are left idle, though all the while the rental is being paid. The department is engaging in leasing additional premises, even when other premises that have already been leased for some time remain underused. On top of all this, Mr. Speaker, a $40 million expenditure program in the Ottawa area is planned for this year to construct additional office space.

However, Mr. Speaker, I have digressed and I should like to return to the matter of price stability in our economy. In concluding my remarks in this connection the point I wish to make is simply this, that price stability, given the current set of conditions in our economy, cannot be achieved by fiscal or monetary measures. In fact such measures aggravate that set of conditions.

It seems to me that the steps that must be taken to achieve the goal of price stabilization must relate to the factors that are causing cost and price increases. Once we embark upon this goal we quickly find ourselves in the thicket or jungle of administered pricing, rising interest rates and, worst of all, something that has become chronic during the past 18 months or two years, the phenomenon known as the expectation of further inflation to come.

The inflation we are experiencing now, Mr. Speaker, is feeding on itself, and there is no question in my mind that this is the greatest single cause of the absolutely absurd interest rates existing in Canada today. Presumably those engaged in corporate enterprises and those who frequently deal on the money markets do not have very much faith in the capacity of this government to contain inflation, because they are proceeding to borrow, despite high rates of interest, thereby bringing about a continuing upward pressure on interest rates.

To give some indication how absolutely incomprehensible and absurd the interest rates in this country have become, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to three promissory notes I hold in my hand issued by one of the chartered banks to an individual who is personally known to me. The amount of money involved, the sum of $800, is not important. When the first note was issued in February, 1967, the loan was extended at a rate of 6 per cent. By June the rate had increased to 7 per cent; and the most recent note carries an interest rate marked on it of 9 per cent per year. This indicates an increase of from 6 per cent to 9 per cent in a 12-month period. It is also significant that the 8 per cent level was skipped altogether. Interest rates seem to be growing by geometric progression.

For how long, Mr. Speaker, have the people of Canada to accept such a course of events? Interest rates in Canada today are 2 per cent or nearly 2½ per cent above comparable rates in the United States. Not so long ago monetary management considered sufficient a differential of three-quarters of one per cent in interest rates between Canada and the United States. During the period 1950 to 1962 when we had a floating exchange rate the interest rate differential between Canada and the United States never exceeded four-fifths of one per cent. Following that period the differential may have increased a little; but during the last 12 months there has developed the absolutely crazy situation where interest rates in this country are more than 2 per cent higher than comparable levels in the United States.

Despite the present difficulties the United States is having in the international money market and also with their balance of payments position, the prevailing interest rates on conventional mortgages in the United States are between 6½ per cent and 6¾ per cent. In Canada, Mr. Speaker, the N.H.A. rate is 8½ per cent and the conventional prime rate 9 per cent or 9¼ per cent. When will it stop? The Minister of Finance will tell us, of course, that the reason for this grave situation is international in scope, and therefore beyond the capability of this government to do much about. I am sure that is what he will say.

In light of the rather alarming set of circumstances which are developing in our economy, Mr. Speaker, particularly with regard to interest rates and capital flow, we do not find it difficult to support the government in its intention to establish a prices review board. It is becoming increasingly clear that in a time of cost-push inflation a prices review board is an essential instrument of economic management. This is especially true today in view of the fact that the traditional fiscal and monetary policies to combat problems confronting the country are not proving effective.

Traditional fiscal and monetary policies cannot cope with cost-push inflation, Mr. Speaker. The minister persists in using these instruments like a broadaxe. What is required is something that is specially designed for a given task. I submit that a prices review board is specifically designed to deal with cost-push inflation, provided of course that it has some clear and coherent objective in mind. However, Mr. Speaker, it is not clear —at least it is not, judging from what the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance have said—what the government does have in mind and what form the prices review board will take, much less what powers it will have.

It may operate in a similar fashion to the department of consumer affairs and hire personnel, give them a pair of scissors and tell them to cut out articles from newspapers that show price movements. It seems to me that more than that will have to be done if this board is to serve any useful purpose. We understand that because of the constitutional division of powers the board will be circumscribed in dealing with many of the things that are required; but surely the board will be given the power to summon witnesses, call for documents and records, and so on. Surely this is possible; and if it is possible it should be done. Yet, judging from the Prime Minister's words, I have the uneasy feeling that the board will not be set up on any continuing basis. I suspect it will look at isolated price movements and consider each price movement in an isolated review. That will not be effective. I hope the minister and his colleagues will take the time to tell us how the board is to operate and how it will function in examining all significant price movements in the country.

I cannot leave the subject without saying that the Minister of Finance this afternoon had the unmitigated gall to say to my colleague from York South (Mr. Lewis) that he was glad the members of the N.D.P. support the establishment of a prices review board. Actually we have advocated that for some time. Not long ago the Minister of Finance expressed lack of enthusiasm for the concept of a review board; his more enlightened colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) also expressed distaste for the review board idea. Now the government has brought the concept forward in a mutilated and unintelligible form, and they have the gall to say, "We are glad you like it." Talk about conversions. I will not steal the expression the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) used yesterday, but he did speak of one minister's conversion as a parallel to that on the road to Damascus. Here we see the government's conversion with respect to the review board idea. Certainly that conversion ought to be noticed by all.

An hon. Member: It was a death bed conversion.

Mr. Schreyer: Quite so. Since in all likelihood the present members of the treasury benches will not be occupying their seats for long, it is a death bed conversion. I do not respect the government's posturing as to the functioning of the Prices Review Board. They steal the name but bastardize the ideal. The board will function in some ill defined way. On top of that the government has the gall to pretend that the idea of its creation is theirs. If one wants to see classic examples of parvenus, he has only to look at members of the government.

I wish to refer to the statement of the Minister of Finance about the international position of the Canadian dollar. Here again we ought to be dissatisfied with the minister's performance and with his statements. I do not want to be rude or smart, but I must say that I am satisfied the minister understands comprehensively this business of international capital movements. As he knows so much about international monetary conditions and capital flows, why cannot he tell the house more? He has not told us much in recent months about the position of the Canadian dollar. We know that at times it has been at its agreed maximum and sometimes at its minimum. Recently its value has been at the minimum end of the scale. We do not know why this oscillation has occurred. All we know is that it has taken place. Yet the minister says that our economy is functioning well and that our trade performance is good. On page 7334 of Hansard for March 6 the Minister of Finance is reported to have said in part:

> —by the end of the year our trade surplus was running at its highest level in over a decade... Our export performance has been good, especially in the past few months...Our economy is not significantly underutilized;

Then the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) asked, "Where is the crisis, then?" I repeat, in the light of the minister's statements, where is the crisis? What is causing loss of confidence in the Canadian dollar? The minister in so many words says that that has taken place. Ostensibly, to correct the lack of confidence this bill has been introduced. The government seems to think that we must display to the world our determination to take restrictive measures at home, that in this way the confidence in our dollar will be restored, and that international investors and owners of capital will look at our position more favourably. I wish the minister would say whether he thinks the Canadian economy is consumer oriented. Have we not enough savings to invest? Is that the root cause of our current problem? Frankly, I do not think the minister would say that our economy is consumer oriented and that not enough is being saved for investment. I wish to read some sentences from a speech he made to a dinner meeting of the New York Economic Club, at the Waldorf-Astoria, last November 14, when at one point he said:

> Our over-all rate of savings in Canada is high—among the highest of all countries in the western world. Last year it was estimated that total Canadian savings amounted to nearly $12 billions of which almost $3½ billions were personal savings in one form or another...

So, our over-all rate of savings is high, among the highest of all countries in the western world. I wish the minister and his colleagues would be more consistent in their pronouncements about Canadian savings and whether we are saving enough to invest. The matter has other implications, which I shall allude to in a minute.

If some lack confidence in the Canadian economy and dollar, that lack of confidence cannot be related to our production or trade performances. Therefore, that lack of confidence must have something to do with capital flows. Last January, when the United States restrained direct capital investment flows to Canada to 65 per cent of the 1963 and 1964 level, national and foreign investors must have become afraid about what would happen. If they were afraid, their fear must have been caused by ignorance, since investment in 1967 in any case was under the 65 per cent limitation. Now that limitation has been withdrawn, pursuant to an arrangement that our minister made with the secretary of the treasury of the United States. Whether the 65 per cent limitation would have had any practical bearing on our situation is irrelevant since the limitation has been withdrawn. The limitation would have had no practical effect in terms of actual investment this year, as compared with that of 1966-67.

Unimportant as it may be, it will presumably help restore confidence in the Canadian dollar. Investors and speculators have apparently frightened themselves, and now require some psychological comfort before they will move back in. From the reading I have been able to do it becomes increasingly apparent to me that the phenomenon known as investor confidence is often not connected with practical considerations; there are so many inconsistencies and paradoxes at work in connection with the international movement of capital that one does have cause to wonder, as George Brown did some years ago, what the "gnomes of Zurich" are doing. Listening to the Minister of Finance brought us no enlightenment.

As we know, the United States is itself in balance of payments difficulties. Foreign claims on United States gold far exceed United States gold balances and the situation is deteriorating further. Imports into the United States have been increasing at the rate of 11 per cent per year in the last two years, while exports have been increasing at the rate of 1 per cent. During the period in which this negative balance has been developing, a steady decline of gold stocks has been experienced.

Despite this, Canada has entered into an arrangement with the United States by which they are giving us about $500 million in standby credit. We in turn are pledged to maintain our holdings of United States securities in a form in which they will not constitute a liquid claim on United States reserves. There is nothing wrong about co-operation, it seems to me, as long as co-operation is meaningful. But in this case I get a distinct impression—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must advise the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Schreyer: I would not attempt to complete all I had hoped to say but I would ask the indulgence of the house for an additional two minutes.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: Two minutes.

Mr. Schreyer: As I was about to say, in so far as the arrangements announced a few days ago represent attempts at co-operation, they are laudable and should be supported. But to the extent they represent co-operation between two countries both of which are in extreme balance of payment difficulties, it seems to me the arrangement is not really meaningful.

One thing has come out of it. It has tied the Canadian dollar more closely than ever to the situation in the United States; it has tied the Canadian dollar more closely than ever to United States payments difficulties. Moreover it is my view that the set of problems which the United States faces in connection with its balance of payments situation is a chronic one which is likely to exist for a number of years, certainly as long as the war in Viet Nam lasts and as long as it maintains a powerful military presence in so many parts of the world.

The very fact that there has been a massive outflow of Canadian funds into United States equity stocks in the last four months is in itself some reason for the minister to feel despondent. I do not wish to begin now to make a case for exchange controls, but it is certainly a denial of common sense to be pleading on the one hand that the United States should not turn off the tap of investment and on the other hand to allow with apparent equanimity so large an outflow of Canadian investment funds into United States equity stock.

In conclusion, let me say we cannot support this tax bill because we are not convinced the minister has proved his case in relation to international monetary problems. In the second place, we cannot support the proposals for higher taxes because the present tax is based on a foundation which is inequitable, and to support any surtax calculated on such a base would be to compound inequity.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): It had not been my intention to participate in the debate on second reading of this bill, because I did have some things to say on the resolution stage and I propose to say something further during the committee stage. But in view of the Prime Minister's (Mr. Pearson) wide ranging view of financial and economic policy yesterday it seemed to me that if he thought it appropriate to take up the time of the house in that way it would be quite appropriate for me to make a reply at this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: I will resist the great temptation to blister the government, though I doubt whether any leader of the opposition ever had more ammunition to use. I propose to refrain from anything of that sort and to continue what I believe has been a responsible attitude on our part. I must, however, bring to the attention of the house one striking example of the contrast between the sort of thing I have been saying and the sort of thing which was said by hon. gentlemen opposite, when they were in opposition, in connection with exchange difficulties.

This struck me as being so apposite that I thought I should bring it to the attention of the house before I go on with my remarks. It is a report of a speech made in Kitchener on June 5, 1962 by the hon. member for Algoma East (Mr. Pearson), then leader of the opposition and now Prime Minister of Canada. According to this report he said:

• (4:00 p.m.)

There is evidence to suggest other countries may be helping to prop up the Canadian dollar, and if this is so, Canada "can be ashamed," Liberal leader Lester Pearson said last night.

In his most trenchant attack on the government's handling of devaluation, Mr. Pearson said a "mysterious $62 million of aid has come in somehow to help out. It seems to be some sort of temporary loan from foreign central banks to give us a hand."

He also said:

We used to be looked to as a model of good management in our economic and financial affairs.

And now we have to be helped out.

Other governments, of course, have their own good reasons for helping out. They don't want a complete financial collapse here, because it's the sort of thing that spreads.

I wonder what my hon. friends opposite would think if I had been talking that way during the last couple of weeks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: However, we have no intention of creating any unnecessary difficulties. The present situation of the government and of the country is of course troublesome because of the uncertainties internationally, and also because of something short of complete conviction about the government and its determination to carry out the appropriate policies.

We know that the United States dollar is under pressure because of balance of payments difficulties. We know too that part of the trouble here in Canada is doubts about the adequate determination or the ability of the government of Canada to contain inflation. Some of us who have been watching the process have been rather interested in seeing the members of the government trying to set themselves up as the saviours of the country from a situation they largely created themselves.

However, I think there is an increasing area of agreement on some points between ourselves and hon. gentlemen opposite. Certainly the extent of the area of disagreement has been substantially reduced. It now seems to be agreed that the performance of Canada with regard to inflation has been bad. This now seems to be agreed on both sides of the house. This is what the Prime Minister said yesterday, as I understood him and he was not expressing any very different opinions from those that have been expressed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp).

I think it has been agreed, too, that as a result of this the competitive position of the country has been eroded, although there is some difference of opinion as to how serious the erosion has been. Our view on this side of the house is that it is urgent that inflation be controlled, that that is basic to the competitive position of Canadian industry, that to do this the Canadian government must have a budgetary policy that is related to the conditions of the economy, that it has not had this in recent times, and that the government has not yet demonstrated that it is prepared to adopt it.

I take the position that an appropriate budgetary policy, and the other recommendations laid down by the Economic Council of Canada, are not in themselves enough to achieve reasonable price stability and conditions of full employment, and I have been saying this for some time. When I say that the government has not yet shown any determination to adopt a budgetary policy appropriate to the conditions of the economy I simply refer to the decision made with regard to the medicare program, because certainly the reasons the Minister of Finance gave a year ago for deferring that program apply with far greater force today.

In October of last year the Minister of Finance gave some views about containing inflation. I believe these were the real, deeply held views of the minister with regard to the present situation and how it must be dealt with. On that occasion when he spoke to this house he stated most emphatically that if necessary he was quite prepared to create some slack in the economy for a period of a year or two in order to remove the inflationary pressures.

It seems to me there is every indication, from what has happened since then, that in the view of the Minister of Finance and of the government substantial unemployment is necessary at the present time in order to meet the existing problem. To me, as I said then and as I have said since, this is an unacceptable solution.

It is true that in November, during the course of his mini-budget, the Minister of Finance made vague reference to some temporary program for encouraging restraint throughout the economy. It was an obscure reference, and when I questioned him in the house about it a few weeks ago, and asked what progress had been made with regard to the development of that program, he was not able to indicate that there had been any consultations outside the government. In fact I got the very distinct impression that very little indeed had been done with regard to exploring the possibilities of this, and certainly the statement made by the Prime Minister yesterday, in which he was unable to indicate the terms of reference or give any real description of the agency or the program that was to be followed, confirmed my view that in fact the government had been doing little or nothing on this program or this approach since last fall.

Certainly there had been no consultation. Certainly a good many months have been lost without the benefit of consultation. Now we are in the position where the best the government can say is that it is going to start consultations with the provinces and with other bodies to see what the terms of reference of this agency ought to be. This is as far as the government has taken us on this matter after all these months. Of course what all this does to the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs I would not know. I get the distinct impression that the government does not know either, because its members certainly avoided answering the question when it was asked earlier this afternoon.

I believe that a policy, a program to encourage restraint is essential. I recognize that there are substantial difficulties involved in any such program, but I say in all sincerity that to date the government has shown a complete failure to be able to maintain anything approaching price stability under conditions even approaching adequate employment.

I recognize, and am quite prepared to admit, that there was a good deal of slack in the economy when the government took over in 1963, although it started to move up after 1961. What I am saying now is that inflation has been out of proportion and excessive under this government ever since the rate of employment in this country reached anything approaching an acceptable figure. I do not say this simply to be abusive but rather to emphasize the point that surely, long since this, the government ought to have realized the need for other policies to at least supplement the policies it was following, and, that the policies it was following must lead either to continued uncontrolled inflation on the one hand, or to an eventual resort to deflation and unemployment on the other hand. Certainly at no time during its existence has this government demonstrated it is capable of maintaining an adequate rate of employment and price stability at the same time.

That is one reason that ever since I came here I have placed some emphasis on the need for a positive policy of restraint, guide lines, or whatever one might wish to call it. One can talk about the difficulty involved in a policy of guide lines. But what is the alternative? I think it has been demonstrated that this is difficult if there is inflation or excessive unemployment. This is not a problem just of this year; it is a problem of the times and a problem with which the government ought long since to have been wrestling. I cannot assess the Prime Minister's statement of yesterday. No one in the house nor in the country can assess it because it is so vague. No one knows what it means. All I can hope is that the government finally means business and is determined to move ahead in the area of encouraging a policy of restraint throughout the Canadian economy.

I think it is extraordinary that no serious move has been made in this direction long before this, because we now learn that the governor of the Bank of Canada has been urging the government for more than a year to adopt some such measure as this. In view of what had been happening, in view of the excessive increase in the cost of living and in view of the price level for not a matter of a year but for two or three years, I suggest there has been grave negligence on the part of the government in not heeding the advice of the governor of the Bank of Canada in this respect.

If it took an exchange crisis to bring the government to the point of facing this sort of thing then, well, as I say, it is an ill wind that does not blow somebody some good. It is regretted, however, that so far as I can see the government has not even started to discuss what form this program will take. I do not wish to be unfair to the Minister of Finance. I recognize he has heavy responsibilities; but I should like to say to him, through you, Mr. Speaker, what I feel. I feel that he is really relying on unemployment and a restraint on the growth of the economy to solve his present price problem. It is clear that unemployment is growing. It is clear also that this policy of additional taxation associated with crippling interest rates, scarcity of credit and restraint on the growth of the economy generally will set back for years the efforts to move ahead made in some of the slower growing parts of Canada, like the Atlantic provinces. This policy will set these parts of the country back for years; there is no question about that.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would permit a question. I should like to understand his argument and receive some clarification. Does he consider that a reduction in government revenues would add to the amount we would have to borrow and therefore place upward pressure on interest rates.

Mr. Stanfield: I will come to that in a moment, Mr. Speaker. I do not think the alternative is quite as stark, actually, as the hon. minister seems to suggest. If he feels I have not answered his question when I finish I shall be happy to do so if he will remind me. The Minister of Finance said that taxes tend to be both inflationary and deflationary.

Mr. Sharp: That is what my hon. friend said.

Mr. Stanfield: This is what I understood my friend the Minister of Finance to say the other day.

Mr. Sharp: I was interpreting your remarks.

Mr. Stanfield: If the minister wishes to quote my remarks that is one thing, but I wish he would not interpret them.

Certainly I believe it is agreed that these taxes add to the costs and the upward pressure on costs. They could only be considered inflationary in that they tend to reduce effective demand. It seems to be pretty well agreed, however, that demand is not excessive now. We do not have an overheated economy. I do not hear anyone arguing that the Canadian economy is overheated. We do have idle resources, particularly human resources. Canada seems to be getting more of these as the months go by. We have a growing number of unemployed. We have falling profit margins and a further reduction in effective demand is likely to add to the difficulties of the country.

I assume that the Minister of Finance is concerned first of all about establishing financial responsibility by balancing his budget and reducing the demands on the capital markets. I assume also that he wishes to reduce inflationary pressures. When we discuss these matters we do so under some difficulty because we have not had a full budgetary presentation; we ought to have. Of course we are involved in a most extraordinary procedure in which these tax measures have been presented to the country and subsequently to the house. My point today is that we are not considering these proposals in the context of a full budgetary presentation, which would inform us at least what the minister's estimates were about growth, what his assumptions were when he computed his tax levels and things of that sort. So, to a considerable extent we are working in the dark. I hope the minister is not completely in the dark also. Certainly we do not have full information when we discuss these things now.

We do know that the current rate of the economic growth of the country is only about half the optimum or indeed the necessary rate of growth which the Economic Council of Canada has prescribed. We do know that if the country were growing at the optimum rate of growth, if this were conceivable under present circumstances, there would be substantial amounts of additional revenue and a great deal more than what the proposed 3 per cent surcharges would produce during the coming year, which is estimated to be $150 million. The difference between my position and that of the Minister of Finance in respect of his bill is about $150 million net. Of course a relatively slight increase in the rate of growth of the country would produce more than this. Apparently it is not possible for the Minister of Finance to contemplate measures to stimulate the economy, reduce the amount of unemployment and secure additional revenue in that way. I presume he does not feel that possible because of what he considers to be inflationary pressures in the country. If that is so, then the justifications for the tax increases are anti-inflationary justifications. This brings us to the minister's conviction that the need is to maintain a slow rate of growth with the resulting increase in unemployment in order to contain inflationary pressures. We are then back to the position he took very firmly last October.

• (4:20 p.m.)

I suggest therefore that the justification for increased taxes is not real in terms of additional revenue as such, because as I indicated the other day this could come from a deferment of the repayment of the refundable portion of the corporation taxes, plus an additional saving of $50 million. It is very difficult for the Minister of Finance to persuade me, or the country, that this is not a quite satisfactory alternative to additional taxes.

Mr. Sharp: It is not very satisfactory.

Mr. Stanfield: The minister says it is not very satisfactory. I cannot help but feel therefore that the additional surcharge on taxes is designed not only with revenue in mind but also with the rate of growth of the economy in mind, to act as a deliberate slowdown measure and as the minister's most essential anti-inflationary program. I think this flows from the attitude the minister demonstrated last October when he indicated he was prepared to resort to measures to create some slack in the economy and keep it there for a year or two. I suggest this is involved in the tax measures before us today.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Winters) has described these tax measures as a disincentive. He said this was necessary, although I do not know quite why. If this is necessary because of a lack of confidence in the government to control inflation, then this is perhaps a high price for the Canadian people to pay. High interest rates are due to the rate of inflation and the high bank rate the Bank of Canada saw fit to impose in the circumstances.

One more difference between the Minister of Finance and myself is that I refuse to believe it is necessary to maintain a substantial slack in the economy from time to time to control inflation. I refuse to accept that as a civilized way to proceed. We are going to have, and we certainly have now, a continued inflationary flow with growing unemployment, and I think it is fair to ask how much unemployment we are going to have and for how long.

The other day the Minister of Finance said, if I interpreted him correctly and he will correct me if I am wrong, that my suggestion that there was no need for the imposition of surcharges on taxes, because we could follow the alternative of deferring the repayment of the refundable tax and obtain additional savings, would put too big a restraint on the review board. What sort of board or agency is this going to be, and what sort of effective force is it going to have if it can only work when there is from 4 per cent to 5 per cent unemployment in the country? Surely the purpose of encouraging restraint throughout the economy is to help us maintain something like adequate employment with a reasonable degree of price stability. Do we have to have unemployment to the extent of 4 per cent or 5 per cent before this board can play a helpful role? Is it putting too big a strain on this agency, or whatever it is going to be, to suggest that even with 4 per cent unemployment it needs additional buttressing in the form of additional taxation to contain inflation? It seems to me my hon. friend is indicating once again how little confidence he has in measures such as his government is now proposing.

Mr. Sharp: This is a very interesting argument and I should like to ask the hon. gentleman a question. I am not doing so for the purpose of needling, but rather to get the full gist of his argument. Is he suggesting that we should not be budgeting for a balanced budget this year?

Mr. Stanfield: I think my position is pretty clear, Mr. Speaker, but I will be happy to remove any obscurity that might exist in the mind of the Minister of Finance.

An hon. Member: That would be impossible.

Mr. Stanfield: No, I think I can get this across, if I have not already succeeded.

An hon. Member: You'd have to hit him over the head.

Mr. Stanfield: We are not enthusiastic about this, but I have suggested that we would go along with the proposal to step up corporation taxes. We do not believe that the government needs to resort to the surcharges it is proposing because it can find this $150 million in the other ways I have suggested.

Mr. Sharp: This is the point I should like to clarify. The repayment of the refundable tax is not an expenditure measure.

Mr. Stanfield: When my hon. friend talks about something in the nature of $150 million —and I do not want to get into the position of Mr. Howe—he is talking about forecasts. I do not think my hon. friend can say with complete confidence that his forecasts are so accurate that even with this surcharge he will come up with a balanced budget, or that without it he will not.

Mr. Sharp: I am going to try.

Mr. Stanfield: No doubt the minister will try, and I am sure he will try as long as he is there. I want to say in all sincerity that it is not my purpose to make light of the difficulties that exist. I am really trying to discuss this matter in a serious way.

It is my hope that the government is not so discouraged about maintaining something like full employment along with a reasonable degree of price stability that from time to time it feels it has to create a substantial amount of unemployment in order to return to conditions of stability. As I understand it, the purpose of the agency that is being established is to try to reconcile or make it easier to achieve these two goals.

Yesterday the Prime Minister spoke about the increase in provincial expenditures and said that they were growing more rapidly than those of the federal government. There have been large increases in expenditures in the fields of education, health and welfare. This is true right across the country; it is not just true of one provincial government. This is the general situation I think in which provincial governments find themselves. Indeed the Economic Council of Canada has expressed the view that it is economically desirable that the Atlantic provinces should spend more than they have been able to spend, especially on such matters as education, highway improvement and other measures.

However, I think it is quite correct to say that the provinces today have relatively little flexibility in their financial position. As a result of programs, some sponsored by the federal government, such as the hospital plan, and others, programs designed to equalize educational opportunities throughout the particular province, and so on, the provinces are involved in programs they have adopted which have a very substantial annual built-in escalation. The present government has added to this problem by proposing quite recently that the provinces go ahead with another substantial program with a large annual built-in escalation.

The main point I wish to emphasize is that it does not help at all to point to the increase across the board in the expenditures of the provinces. The forecast made by the tax structure committee, sponsored by the federal government and the provinces, indicated that on the basis of programs then existing the provincial governments would move into positions of increasing deficit whereas the federal government would move into a position of increasing surplus. The lesson I draw from all this is the need for genuine consultation between the federal government and the provinces with regard to priorities. We have not yet had this. The process of consultation has really been considerably discredited by the federal government through insisting on going ahead with, for example, the medicare program, although eight of the ten provinces said they did not approve of the program and it was not the form of medicare program that they wanted.

Certainly a great and urgent need in Canada today is stability and growth. Surely that is where we must put the emphasis. It is not that economic growth is an end in itself. I think a country like ours has to have in mind higher purposes than this. We must think in terms of the quality of Canadian life. I do not believe in the process of cutting back just for the sake of cutting back. Certainly we want to get rid of waste. Certainly we must consider the position of the taxpayer.

I believe that the government has an active role to play in development, and equalizing opportunity and providing better services to the people. But surely we can agree that all of this has to come from economic growth. Economic growth will make it possible for us to do these things. We must therefore think in terms of an expansion of employment and increasing productivity. As I said, I cannot accept the principle that we need substantial unemployment to be rid of inflation. We are not in the position of having an overheated economy.

There are economic situations in which it is difficult to achieve full employment, but ordinarily this is not the case when the United States economy is growing in strength as it has been doing. Latterly we have not been doing as well as they have. In addition to all this, as I say, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the government has been putting additional and unnecessary pressures on the provinces.

Therefore in summary I would say that in the existing circumstances we should not adopt policies which have the effect of creating additional unemployment, when there is already more unemployment than we want to see. We must recognize that an adequate rate of growth is essential to a satisfactory solution of our economic problems. We must bear in mind also the effect of these policies on areas of slow growth in the country.

Certainly the government must practise restraint. I suggest that it must consult with the provinces to work out priorities, and not simply dictate policies to the provinces. We should all be trying to work toward positions of greater flexibility so that this and other governments can respond more adequately to the changing conditions of the economy. We need to adopt a budgetary policy related to the needs of the economy, bearing in mind the priorities in the country. Therefore, I hope the government will get really busy with the program of encouraging restraints in our economy. I hope it will take really seriously the views of the Bank of Canada in this respect, and not merely the views that I have been expressing.

I think the failure of the policies of the government with regard to inflation has been long since apparent. I believe it was a grave mistake for the government not to heed the advice of the Bank of Canada far sooner than it did. The minister seemed to feel the need of some such policy last fall; but even now, more than a year after the governor of the Bank of Canada recommended the policy and many months after the Minister of Finance suggested that he was working toward such a policy, the government is unable to describe to the house the terms of reference of the agency. Even now there has been no consultation by the government with those outside the government with regard to how this program is going to work.

So we need a demonstration of restraint. The government has an opportunity to give the country a demonstration of restraint. We have a responsibility in connection with the unemployed and the maintenance of economic growth. Therefore, sir, in my opinion the surcharges are not necessary to meet the current emergency. I think rather that the government should put more emphasis on restraint and should defer the repayment of the refundable portion of tax rather than resort to additional taxation, which will have the effect of imposing a further restraint on the growth of the economy and will tend to further increase unemployment.

So, Mr. Speaker, I urge the members of the house to oppose the measures put forward by the minister relating to surcharges, on the ground that they are not appropriate to the conditions that exist and they are burdens which are not required to be imposed on the Canadian people at the present time. Also in passing I cannot urge too strongly upon the government its responsibility to proceed seriously and conscientiously with the program of encouraging restraints throughout the economy.

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): I wish to make some comments on this Bill No. C-208. I presume that inasmuch as it is going to reduce the happiness now rampant in Canada the entire house should be opposed to its acceptance. I know that in the neighbouring country to the south they are engaged in the pursuit of life, liberty and happiness. I was happy to learn from reading Hansard for Monday, February 19, a day upon which I was not in the house, that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Chrétien) had emphasized three times that the people of Canada were happy with the 5 per cent surcharge. As the minister said, they should be happy because conditions in Canada are better than in the United States or Great Britain. If they were happy with the 5 per cent surcharge, then how disappointed they are going to be when they are hit with only 3 per cent.

The matter was drawn to the attention of the house by the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) as you will find if you have been reading Hansard, and he advocated that if happiness consisted of having a 5 per cent surcharge on your income tax, why not go to 15 per cent or 20 per cent and make the taxpayers of Canada extremely happy? The thought was not advanced any further because of events that occurred on February 19 to which I do not need to refer. However, I have some comments to make on this bill because I regret exceedingly that the cabinet has brought forward Bill No. C-208, primarily because of clause 2.

Yesterday my friend, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), spoke at some considerable length. He handled his part of the debate in a masterful fashion. But I, sitting to the right of Mr. Speaker, began to wonder if my friend was not going a little too far. I felt I should examine his statements. He said, as reported at page 7551 of Hansard:

> Indeed he—

—Mr. Pearson—

> —even went so far as to make a statement somewhere in his speech, and I say this with some hesitation about the Prime Minister of this country, which was totally and factually wrong. It was untrue. Somewhere in his speech the right hon. Prime Minister said that our economy is still expanding, although at a slower and more bearable rate. The fact is that our economy is no longer expanding at the present time.

This comment was made by the hon. member for York South, and I looked at him and looked at him. He made the flat statement that it was untrue. I presume we might examine the statement of the Prime Minister in more detail to see just where the truth lies. However, I am one who has always said that actions speak louder than words. If anyone is interested in my stand on the no confidence motion, they can find it set forth clearly in Hansard for Tuesday, February 27, when I publicly stated on the floor of this house that > —The only way you could revive that bill is to prorogue this house and bring the bill in in another session. If you want to do that I will vote for the bill in a new house but I certainly will not vote in any way, shape or form for a revival of Bill No. C-193 in the present session no matter who tries to bring it in.

I said, as reported on page 7058 of Hansard:

> If there is no statement made that Bill C-193 will be revived in this session of parliament and if no effort is made to circumvent the Speaker's decision, as the cabinet tried to do in the case of the transport bill, I can support the continuation of the cabinet in office.

I voted accordingly, and after having made the remarks, I feel I cannot support bringing this Bill No. C-193 on which the House of Commons had expressed itself on February 19, back into the house in any manner, shape or form. Now, I should like to refer to other statements made on the same day, February 27, by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Trudeau). I am one who considers that the position of Minister of Justice is the second most important in the cabinet. I hold the Ministry of Justice in such high regard because of comments on innumerable occasions made by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, who made this remark time after time with regard to Hon. Ernest Lapointe and with regard to Hon. Louis St. Laurent.

The Minister of Justice occupies a position of extreme importance in this country, a position that should never be denigrated in any way by anyone, least of all by the occupant of the position. On February 27, page 7042 of Hansard, you will find a report of the speech by the Minister of Justice with regard to this same matter:

> The point I am making now, Mr. Speaker, is that we are not trying...to revive the bill and put it back on the order paper.

Some members of the opposition said, "Try it", and the Minister of Justice said:

> Hon. members say "Try it". It is easy to defy us because we say we would not do so.

Then, the minister goes on:

> I will even go further, and I will say that it is not only the government's intention not to reintroduce this legislation...

There was an interruption by some hon. members who shouted, "Hear, hear". Then, the Minister of Justice said:

> The government recognizes that it is the will of this house not to collect taxes that way.

This refers to the surcharge on income tax of 5 per cent according to Bill No. C-193 and by stepping up the collection of corporation taxes so they would be paid two months closer to the beginning of the fiscal year of the corporation. Those were the two major points of the bill. The Minister of Justice said that the government recognized it was the will of this house not to collect taxes that way.

On the same page, following a question by the hon. member of Calgary North (Mr. Harkness), we find this from the Minister of Justice:

> Mr. Speaker, what I am trying to explain just now is that it is not our intention to bring that bill back.

The minister answered a number of questions and then was asked a question by the hon. member for Lapointe, as reported at page 7044 of Hansard. The hon. member inquired if the government considered that Monday night's vote was final, to which the Minister of Justice replied:

> I repeated earlier what the Prime Minister had said previously, namely that the bill had been defeated, that we accepted that decision and would not bring it back before the house.

The Minister of Justice said that the Prime Minister had said the bill had been defeated, and in order to ascertain the exact words the Prime Minister used we need only refer to Hansard for February 23, which I have here.

I wish to read the words of the Prime Minister as they appear on page 6921 of Hansard:

We, as the government, accept the fact of that rejection.

There are no qualifying words, no clauses. In the bottom right hand corner of page 6921 of Hansard we find those words:

We, as the government, accept the fact of that rejection.

On page 6922 of Hansard the Prime Minister is reported as saying:

—nor does it ask parliament to reconsider that decision.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Again, Mr. Speaker, as reported at page 6923 the Prime Minister continues:

It does not ask the house to rescind or reconsider any vote.

Then again on the same page:

We have made it quite clear we are not going to ask for further progress on that bill—

I rose yesterday, Mr. Speaker and members of the House of Commons, in an effort to prove that clause 2 of Bill No. C-208 is similar in every way, with the exception of a slight change in the manner of payment, to clause 4 of Bill No. C-193. Bill No. C-208 that the cabinet has seen fit to bring forward is, in my opinion, in direct contravention of the rules of the house. I am not going to say whether it is in direct contravention of the words of the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister; I will leave hon. members to judge for themselves on that score. I have simply read to the house from the record of this House of Commons. If the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) hesitated, as he said he did yesterday, making the remarks that he did, I regret that it was possible for me to read the remarks of the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister at this time.

I cannot support this bill, Mr. Speaker, and if it comes to a roll call vote, for the first time since I was elected to parliament I shall vote against the cabinet. There is nothing outstanding about that stand.

Mr. Boulanger: Shame.

Mr. Cowan: I have sat in this house—

Mr. Boulanger: Why don't you get out of the party then?

Mr. Cowan: Make your own speech after I am through, buster.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Trouble in paradise.

Mr. Cowan: Paradise? In stating that I will vote against the party for the first time since I was elected to this house six years ago, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that this action is not untoward. I remember sitting in this house when the parliamentary secretary to the prime minister, as he then was, the present Minister of Justice, in the winter of 1965-66 voted against the party during a committee vote. He was sitting two seats over from me and I moved over and said to him: "Parliamentary secretaries are not supposed to vote against government motions". He leaned over and said to me: "I couldn't care less, my friend. This is a matter of principle to me and I am voting the way I feel".

However, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman was in good company because four seats over from him the then associate minister of defence was also voting against the cabinet of which he was a member. Although these hon. gentleman voted against the party's desires on that occasion, it is interesting to note that they have not felt the discipline of the party. In fact, one has been advanced to Minister of Justice and the other has been promoted from associate minister of defence to minister of defence.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): You are next, Ralph.

Mr. Cowan: Don't bet any money on that, boys.

I have nothing further that I wish to say on this question, Mr. Speaker. It is a matter of principle to me. I am sorry it is not a matter of principle to other members of this party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cowan: I am sorry to see the hon. member for Saint-Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien) applauding when we are reducing the happiness that he gave to this nation with this tax. We are now reducing the tax from 5 per cent to 3 per cent. Later on it may be reduced to 1 per cent. If he meant what he said when I quoted him from Hansard, if all of us were happy with 5 per cent, why cut it down to 3?

As I say, Mr. Speaker, I cannot vote for this bill that the cabinet has brought to the floor of the house. Clause 2 is too similar in every way to the original clause 4 of Bill No. C-193 for me to support it. I would support the original bill in a new session following prorogation; but I cannot support any repetition of Bill No. C-193, because of the rules of this house.

Might I end, Mr. Speaker, with a little item that I have taken from that great Canadian periodical Reader's Digest. You will remember that it was made Canadian overnight and is one of our Canadian thought makers. In the current issue for March there is to be found at page 240 an item that bears on this very point. It is taken from trial testimony submitted by the National Shorthand Reporters Association. They are the official verbatim reporters who cover the courts. We have an overbearing lawyer and a witness and the quotation is:

Q: As a matter of fact, sir, you were so scared that you don't know whether it was a motorcar or something resembling a motorcar that hit you, isn't that true?

A: Well, it resembled one, all right. I was struck by the resemblance.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, when I listen to these debates on fiscal and monetary policy and also when I listen to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) I am always reminded of a well-known Doukhobor saying to the effect that if you stir the waters long enough you will muddy them so that no one will be able to see the fish.

I must say, having listened to the Leader of the Opposition and read in today's papers what happened in Toronto yesterday, that I cannot reconcile the philosophies of these two gentlemen. I think they are rather out of tune. I suggest to the Leader of the Opposition that he consult with the premier of Ontario to make certain that they are taking the same philosophic approach to taxation policies in this country, policies that represent the view of the Progressive Conservative party.

I intend to be brief, Mr. Speaker, because I do not think there is any necessity for me to repeat many of the arguments that have been made by members on the opposition side of the house in regard to this legislation. Let me say that I entered this debate with every sympathy for the minister, whom I recognize as an honourable man of integrity who is trying to do the best he can from his point of view under these very difficult conditions. However, Mr. Speaker, he suffers from the restrictions that are imposed by government policy. He suffers from the restrictions imposed by his own view of economic affairs and also from the restrictions imposed by all of those persons who occupy comfortable pews in Canada at the present time.

[Mr. Cowan.]

Nevertheless I give the minister credit for his work in connection with achieving complete exemption from United States controls over capital outflow to Canada and the additional $900 million in United States funds as stand-by credits to protect the Canadian dollar. I hope that these two major developments will be successful in maintaining the dollar at its present level. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, it would be very hard under present circumstances to find fault with the minister's resolute action in defence of the Canadian dollar. This does not tie me in with the international bankers in any respect whatever, but I think it only fair to say that. As to what will be the effect of these actions, Mr. Speaker, I simply quote the Prime Minister's words today—that we must never give up hope. That is the attitude of a great many of us at this time to this aspect of our budgetary problems.

I am of the opinion that this new bill is more equitable than the former bill because it reduces the surtax on individual incomes from 5 per cent to 3 per cent. It also imposes a similar 3 per cent on corporation profits. I have heard some discussion in this connection and am given to understand that this 3 per cent tax on corporations may impose a hardship on small companies engaged in business or in manufacturing. We might hear more about that later in the committee stage.

I want to say a word or two about the Carter report, since it has been discussed a few times. I shall be brief. I see the agonized expression on the face of the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury) but I intend to pursue the subject. The minister has been subjected to some criticism for his failure to implement the principles of the Carter commission report. However, so far as I am personally concerned, while our group supports the general principles of the Carter report, I am of the opinion that the minister was wise to allow all those interested in its recommendations to make representations to the government and to the various parties in this house. I have been personally advised by officers of the Royal Canadian Legion and other veterans organizations that they were very pleased to have the opportunity to make representations with respect to the proposed taxation of disability pensions.

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the national farm unions, the British Columbia Fruit Growers Association, the Beef Growers Association, the co-operatives, credit unions, various organizations interested in the status of women—I do not know why such an ancient chap as I am should always be getting letters from the ladies with respect to problems only—and other groups have informed the government that they are glad to have the opportunity to make representations with respect to certain recommendations contained in the Carter commission report. I think that was wise. I do not think it was possible to take action on such an important taxation proposal without getting the reaction and representations of those it is intended to affect.

As a strong supporter of the main recommendations of the Carter report, personally I am glad that the government has provided the opportunity for the representatives of these various groups to present their views. However, I am disappointed to know that this bill provides for the taxation of people in receipt of the $105 a month which they have been able to obtain only after passing a means test. Surely here was an opportunity for the government to recognize one of the principles outlined in the Carter commission report, when introducing this bill. I hope when we reach the committee stage some more will be said about this. I trust the minister has a more satisfactory answer than has appeared so far.

I now want to say a word or two about foreign investment, because that has been mentioned in this debate. The problem of foreign ownership of Canadian industry and resources is becoming more and more acute, and members of this party join with many other Canadians in deploring this development, not in a spirit of narrow minded nationalism but rather because foreign ownership and control often brings with it a pattern of industrial development that is not in the interests of the Canadian people. It also makes progressively more difficult the control and management of the Canadian economy by the Canadian people through their elected governments.

When the Regina manifesto was the economic bible of our party—and I still have a lingering affection for the Regina manifesto; I was one of the early pioneers in this movement, you know—this situation would have been handled very easily indeed. We should simply have said, "Let's socialize all these companies," and that would be the end of it.

It may interest you to know, Mr. Speaker, that I was very surprised when talking to that philosopher, polemic and poet of the press gallery, Mr. Arthur Blakely, to hear that he was a strong supporter of the Regina manifesto. However, my spirits drooped when he gave me his reasons. He said he knew our party could never get elected to power while the Regina manifesto was our program. Needless to say, I was very interested in his observation. Since the time of the Regina manifesto our party has changed its policy. It now believes that the crucial issue before the Canadian people is not the nationality of the shareholders of any company, but rather, who determines and guides our national development. It was for this reason that the financial experts of this party discarded at the outset the idea of wholesale or extensive nationalization.

For one thing, our experts say that nationalization is impracticable, since it could not win the public support which is essential for any policy in a political democracy. It is for that reason that the New Democratic party proposes a Canada development fund, under government control, which would channel Canadian savings into investment in public or private enterprises, or a combination of both, to the advantage of the Canadian people as a whole. I think the former president of the privy council has done much to create a climate that is favourable to that idea in this country. He also wrote a book on the question.

I frankly admit I am not expert on financial affairs; I leave those questions to persons who have made a particular study of them, but I am a bit confused about the advantages or disadvantages of a fixed or floating exchange rate. However, Mr. Speaker, my reading on this problem indicates that over the years government of all political stripes have used fixed and floating exchange rates at particular times to meet what were described as national emergencies. I trust that in the near future the minister will inform the house of his reasons for supporting a fixed exchange rate under present circumstances.

I will frankly admit, Mr. Speaker, that my opposition to this bill is not based on intellectual concepts related to the handling of money, but on government policy in general. And here I want to list three or four reasons which induced me to oppose this bill. One of them is inflation. That is a subject that has been extensively discussed in this house and country. Surely all of us realize that inflation is one of the most serious problems we must face at this time and that inflation is the reason for the increased cost of living, and the consequent increasing injustice suffered by those who are required to live on small fixed incomes—people such as pensioners of various types.

We know that the major cause of inflation in Canada at this time is the war in Viet Nam. Regardless of any bumbling or mistaken policies by this government, that is the major cause of inflation on the North American continent at this time. I might say in that respect that I consulted some persons who are, shall I say, well known in United States banking circles, and they have confirmed this.

The United States is living in a war oriented economy, the effects of which have been felt over the entire North American continent, which suffered a similar experience, though, to a lesser degree, during the Korean war. Therefore in my opinion in the interests of the Canadian people the government ought to do all it can to stop the war in Viet Nam. I am reliably informed that the quickest and most effective way to stop the war in Viet Nam is to prevent the export to the United States of Canadian nickel, which is so essential to the prosecution of that war. I am also informed that nickel is in short supply in Canada and in some other countries, and it is for this reason that the International Nickel Company is borrowing $50 million in the United States for plant expansion.

In this connection, considering former government action, I cannot understand why the government does not consider negotiating an agreement with the United States for nickel on terms similar to those offered to France for the export of uranium and, in so doing, earn the gratitude of all peace loving people, and take a confident step toward stopping inflation and the consequent increase in living costs in Canada, in addition to any other measures that the government of this country ought to take.

I find that in the Financial Post for January 27, 1968, Knowlton Nash wrote:

> In Caesar's day, it cost about 75 cents to kill an enemy soldier; in world war II, the cost was up to $50,000 per dead enemy. In Viet Nam it's costing about $1 million for every enemy dead.

That indicates that the war economy of the United States and the cost of the war are the basic reasons for the inflation we suffer from at this time.

• (5:10 p.m.)

I am opposed to this measure because of government policy in this respect. While I am normally a peaceful man, I am not a congenital pacifist. It is for this reason that as a Canadian socialist, in opposition to the views of some of the leaders of our party at that time, I supported the Canadian government's efforts in the second world war from the commencement, realizing that the Canadian government was fighting Hitler and the nazi philosophy which was a menace to our civilization. I wonder what would be happening now if Hitler had won that war. We would either be dead or in slavery. As I say, I am naturally inclined to be peaceful. Therefore, since about 1950 I have been opposed to Canada's support of NATO and have generally supported the arguments put forward by that well-known United States ambassador, Mr. Kennan. I have had no hesitation about presenting my views on this subject both in this house and in the country.

I must say I was interested to hear this morning that my arguments in this respect, presented at our founding convention in 1961, still linger in the memory of that impeccable, pithy and impartial columnist Mr. Maurice Western who was present on that occasion to hear two of the leading figures argue the case for staying in NATO and two other speakers, one of whom was the hon. member for Kootenay West, speak in favour of Canada's withdrawing from NATO. Anyway, since its founding convention in 1961 this party has been opposed to Canada's continued participation in NATO; we have made it clear that Canada should not remain in NATO, once that organization became a nuclear alliance.

The hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer), the former minister of national defence, replied to a question addressed to him by the hon. member for Kootenay West by saying, that NATO was a nuclear alliance and that the Canadian air division had a striking capacity 100 times greater than that required to destroy Hiroshima in the second world war. This is another reason I am opposed to the measure before us—because of the expenditures in relation to NATO membership.

What about NORAD? Since our founding convention in 1961, this party has repeatedly questioned whether any significant contribution has been made to the defence of Canada by NORAD. In any case we believe the organization has outlived its usefulness, that the agreements should therefore be terminated and that some of the money spent in this connection could be better spent on providing conventional troops or trained civilians for the United Nations, or in aid to underdeveloped countries.

The estimates for the Department of National Defence for the coming fiscal year total $1,700 millions. We could have saved at least $700 million of this for a starter had we withdrawn from the NATO and NORAD agreements. This is another reason for my opposition to the bill before us.

I am also opposed to the bill because the government of Canada has refused to use the Bank of Canada to provide the social capital required by federal, provincial and municipal governments for social investment, such as housing, hospitals, schools and other necessary facilities required by governments.

In conclusion, I wish to philosophize to a modest extent in order to place my ideas before the house. I fully appreciate the minister's difficulties occasioned by government policy, his own ideas on economics and the fact that society's technology shapes the lives and the understanding of citizens. The technology of our times, while it is air-conditioned and automated, is still essentially capitalist in its structure and logic. We have more comfort today, but after talking to the dozens of people I meet I question whether the people as a whole are any happier than their parents were 50 years ago; in many cases they have lost their purpose in life, lost their zest for undertaking things and lost their community identity because of the increasing size of our cities.

Mr. Alkenbrack: That is the truest thing you have ever said.

Mr. Herridge: Instead of the obvious exploitation of years past, we have developed a comfortable capitalism which imposes new but more effective forms of social control. However, I cannot resist saying that despite our level of material prosperity, capitalism continues to institutionalize injustice and corrupt the potentialities of human beings. The capitalist system, with all its improvements, has succeeded in seducing the minds of many people who live in greater security and comfort, with the result that the status quo is granted a spurious consent. Individuals are inclined to identify themselves with the existence which is imposed upon them from above and are indoctrinated by the conditions under which they live and think, but are unable to transcend. In my opinion, the unrealized potentialities of many people remain undeveloped, due to an overabundance of goods and services which satisfy their immediate material needs, rendering them incapable of developing the aesthetic side of life which is the foundation of human happiness.

If government policies were designed to give effect to my proposals, that is, to stop the war in Viet Nam, to stop wasteful expenditure on defence and to use the Bank of Canada for social capital, I am confident we would be able to provide a material cultural environment which would enable all Canadians to understand the truth about life, to appreciate goodness wherever found and to enjoy beauty in all its forms.

Some hon. Members: Question.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, before you put the motion I rise on a point of order. In view of what has transpired previously and in order to save the time of the house and duplication of votes, particularly on this bill, I would ask whether the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) would state whether he considers this vote as a vote of confidence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Sharp) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Ballard: I was paired with a member of the administration, the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey). Had I voted, I would have voted against the motion.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, March 14, 1968

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

RURAL DEVELOPMENT

TABLING OF FIRST REPORT OF CANADIAN COUNCIL

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table, in French and in English, the first report of the Canadian Council on rural development.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to table the said report?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

TABLING OF AGREEMENT WITH ANVIL MINING CORPORATION

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I desire to table two copies of an agreement between Her Majesty the Queen in right of Canada and Anvil Mining Corporation Limited.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to table these documents?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

IMMIGRATION

PROVISION FOR APPEAL WHEN BAIL REFUSED

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-209, respecting the Immigration Act and the Immigration Appeal Board Act (immigrants' bail).

Mr. Starr: Explain.

Mr. Woolliams: Briefly, this bill seeks to amend the Immigration Act and the Immigration Appeal Board Act so that where an inquiry officer refuses bail to an immigrant who is incarcerated in Canada while waiting for his hearing, or where that immigrant has been refused an application by the appeal board, he can appeal to a supreme or superior court in the province.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

REDUCTION IN BUDGET FOR NORTHERN HEALTH SERVICES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the federal responsibility to the native peoples of Canada for health and welfare, will the minister use his influence with the Minister of National Health and Welfare to rescind recent cut-backs and decreases in federal government service in this vital field?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that question is not acceptable. The hon. member is asking the minister if he will use influence with another minister. That is not a proper form of question.

Mr. Dinsdale: Then may I rephrase my question and direct it once more to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Is the minister aware that a directive has gone out from the Department of National Health and Welfare to chiefs and councillors in Canada indicating that the federal government has been forced to reduce many of its programs, and that resources available for health services to Indian people have also been greatly reduced?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not so aware.

Mr. R. J. Orange (Northwest Territories): A supplementary question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, Mr. Speaker. In view of the conflicting reports which one hears about this matter would the minister, as house leader, consider calling the health and welfare committee to determine whether in fact there have been cut-backs in these programs?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): In reply to the question asked by the hon. member for the Northwest Territories I should like to say that the funds available for health services in the north for the forthcoming year will be as great as in the preceding year if not slightly greater. In that year the funds for this service were increased by 14 per cent. We have not been able to maintain that rate of expansion for the northern people because of the current situation, but there is no reduction in the amount of estimated expenditure for the northern people for the forthcoming year.

We have, however, been obliged to review the services which have been provided, though I wish to assure my hon. friend that there will be no reduction in the number of institutions operating in the north. At the present time I am personally conducting an extensive and detailed review of this situation, and until this is concluded I should not like to prejudge the question of sending the matter to a parliamentary committee.

Mr. Dinsdale: For the sake of clarifying this vital issue would the minister agree to table the documents which have gone out to the various branches of the Department of National Health and Welfare responsible for the health care of native Canadians, both Indians and Eskimos, indicating that there have been specific instructions to reduce expenditures in this field?

Mr. MacEachen: I shall be glad to investigate the possibility of tabling any appropriate communications, but I wish to assure the hon. member that no reduction of expenditure is proposed for the forthcoming year either in northern services in general or in Indian health services.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Can the minister assure the house that Indians will continue to be entitled to hospital and medical care without having to prove indigence, as was reported on the C.B.C. last night?

Mr. MacEachen: I understand that in the past we have been assisting Indians where indigency existed. I do not believe the hon. gentleman has made a particularly relevant point with respect to the previous practice.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the minister this. In view of statements made by Manitoba doctors and carried over the C.B.C., has a directive gone out, or is one in contemplation, notifying the authorities that from now on, or in the near future, Indians will not be given the medical and hospital services they have received heretofore unless they can prove they are indigent?

Mr. MacEachen: I want to tell the hon. member that a directive has gone out from the director general of medical services in the department to his senior officers in the various regions of Canada indicating the type of services which the department will be able to offer to Indians in the coming year. I wish to make it very clear that we are not reducing expenditures as compared with last year's expenditures on these items. We have, however, been unable to maintain the rate of expansion in terms of expenditure that we did in the previous year, and because of this we have been obliged to review the nature of the services we have been offering to the Indian population.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacEachen: I have already stated in reply to my hon. friend from the Northwest Territories that I am personally conducting a detailed review of this situation with my colleagues.

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): A supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister tell us whether he has received a telegram from the premier of Manitoba asking for clarification of this new policy, and whether he has had time to reply?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): To my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, I have received no telegram from Manitoba. I think my hon. friend said the premier of Manitoba. I do not recall receiving one, but I will check as soon as I get back to my office.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare in his capacity as house leader if he would forthwith refer his estimates to the appropriate committee so it could test the accuracy of the statements he has made.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member surely can test the accuracy of my statements in this house.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It arises from part of the reply by the Minister of National Health and Welfare indicating that no directive has gone out to the field to reduce medical services to our native Canadians. If this is so I wish to ask him who authorized the letter that went to all the Indian bands and councils across Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is obviously not a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the question might be allowed as an inquiry rather than as a matter of privilege.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish there to be any suggestion that the hon. member has been misled. I have said there has been no directive indicating a reduction in expenditures in comparison with the preceding year. As a matter of fact in both the northern health services and the Indian health services there has been a slight increase in the proposed estimates. The hon. member asked whether I would table any such correspondence or directives. I will consider the possibility of tabling the directives that have emanated from the department indicating the pattern of services the department presently finds it possible to make available. I have not stated there has been no rearrangement of these services; there has. I stated to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to hon. members that we have had several supplementaries, and a number of members are awaiting an opportunity to ask other questions. We shall probably have time to return to this matter later on during the question period.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO LANGUAGE REQUIREMENTS IN ADVERTISEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

The Public Service Commission of Canada published recently circular No. 68-ID-3050, with regard to the position of assistant director of production at the printing bureau of the Canadian government in Hull. One of the special requirements to qualify for the position—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should ask his question as briefly as possible.

Mr. Caouette: I am coming to that, Mr. Speaker, but hon. members have to know what it is about, and I quote:

> This position requires a knowledge of the English language but a knowledge of French would be considered an asset in the assessment of candidates.

Can the right hon. Prime Minister tell us whether, eventually, it will be mentioned in those circulars that the French language is just as essential as the English language, or whether it is only as asset?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that question is more in the nature of a grievance, and I do not think it is in order for that reason.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I shall put my question differently.

Will the right hon. Prime Minister require, in the name of the bilingualism which he champions in Canada, that the Public Service Commission put French on the same footing as English when advertising competitions?

Mr. Speaker: I admit the question is very important, but it is much too general in nature and, therefore, it should be placed on the order paper.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

HAL BANKS—REFUSAL OF EXTRADITION BY U.S. GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has the government been advised why the United States government has refused the application of the province of Ontario for the extradition of Hal Banks?

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter which is handled by the Department of External Affairs, and our excellent Secretary of State for External Affairs might want to answer the question.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government has been notified by the United States Secretary of State that he has declined the request of the government of Canada for the extradition of Hal Banks charged with perjury committed in Ottawa. The ground for the decision of the Secretary of State is that extradition is sought on a charge of perjury arising directly out of the denial of guilt of a non-extradictable offence.

It is the view of the Canadian authorities that this exception does not exist under the terms of the extradition convention between Canada and the United States. In these circumstances the Canadian government is requesting that the Secretary of State reconsider his decision in the light of the provisions of the treaty or, alternatively, consent to the adjudication of this treaty interpretation question by an international tribunal.

IMMIGRATION

ADMISSION OF SEASONAL FARM LABOUR FROM WEST INDIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Madill (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Have arrangements been made this year for the entry into Canada of seasonal labour from the West Indies for the market gardening and canning industries?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Madill: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Why has the minimum wage rate been so drastically increased?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The supplementary is not in order.

[Translation]

SASKATCHEWAN—ACCEPTANCE OF APPLICANTS FROM KENYA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): While I am on my feet I should like to answer the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski) who asked me the other day whether the hon. premier of Saskatchewan had offered to co-operate with us or contact us with regard to Kenya immigrants.

I wish to reply affirmatively. The Saskatchewan premier offered to help us, with a view to accepting Kenya immigrants in the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration who tells us that the Saskatchewan premier is ready to accept immigrants from Kenya.

Did the Saskatchewan premier say whether that was meant to replace the people who left that province under the C.C.F. administration?

[English]

Mr. Douglas: They are leaving under the Liberals.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

[Later:]

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I am sorry I did not hear him when he spoke but I did not have my earpiece on and could not follow the minister in my lousy French. My question is as follows. Did the premier of Saskatchewan indicate the number of immigrants he was prepared to accept at this time?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, may I reply in my lousy English. The answer is yes, about 10 or 12 families.

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the acting secretary of state. Would the minister make representation to the Board of Broadcast Governors regarding the need to have the radio and television frequencies free and clear from static and other interferences on March 22?

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Were any new government policies announced by the government through the program "Twenty Million Questions" last evening, in keeping with the recent precedents established in this regard?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question is aggressive.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

[Translation]

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Finance.

Since the presentation of the annual report of the Bank of Canada, has the minister met with the governor of the bank to discuss ways to fight inflation, and what salary reduction has he accepted?

[English]

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INVESTIGATION INTO GROCERY RETAILING IN WESTERN PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Two days ago I asked the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs a question in reference to Judge Batten's report concerning the investigation into the high cost of groceries in western Canada. In view of the fact that the minister has now agreed to have the combines investigation branch take a look at the high cost of groceries in western Canada, is it the government's intention to confine this investigation to the west and not include the rest of Canada?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I will discuss the matter with the minister.

Mr. Woolliams: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the Prime Minister consider that the decision in this regard will somewhat usurp the function and jurisdiction of this agency and/or board described by him in his recent speech?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is not in order.

INDUSTRY

SYDNEY, N.S.—AVAILABILITY OF PREVIOUS LOAN TO STEEL COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In his most recent correspondence with Premier Smith he referred to the amount of $1.7 million loaned to Dosco as being available to assist in the steel crisis.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I assume my hon. friend is referring to the last communication I sent to the premier of Nova Scotia. I have asked the premier whether he is agreeable to my tabling this communication, which I would like very much to table. He asked me to hold off for a day or two so he would have an opportunity to examine it further. His letter to me has already been tabled.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. It is based on a newspaper article which refers to the government's intention to allow the $1.7 million previously loaned to Dosco to be made available in the steel crisis. My question relates to a statement made in this house by the Minister of Justice and a letter of the Prime Minister in which it was said that in addition there is a question of a possible claim by—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member please ask his question?

Mr. MacInnnis (Cape Breton South): I should like to ask the Prime Minister to explain the statement in a letter over his signature that there is in addition a possible claim by the federal government against Dosco in respect of $1.7 million. When did the government decide that it did have a claim, and why did the Minister of Justice not answer this question which has remained unanswered for a long time?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member the date of the letter to which he has referred?

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): January 23, 1968.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEDICARE—FAILURE OF ALBERTA PLAN TO QUALIFY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he can advise the house when he intends to reply to a letter from Premier Manning dated some time early in December asking in what way the Alberta health plan did not comply with the legislative requirements of the federal medicare plan.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think I have replied to that letter, but I will check. I think the letter to the premier went out last Saturday.

LABOUR RELATIONS

MONTREAL—INQUIRY AS TO MEETING OF CONCILIATION BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. N. Ormiston (Melville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour whether the conciliation board chaired by Associate Chief Judge Gold, which the minister referred to in answer to a question on Monday last, has commenced its hearings. If not, has the minister any information as to when such hearings might commence?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question, thereby affording me an opportunity to get an up to date report. I am informed that the conciliation board will hold its first meeting tomorrow. I might say that, since his appointment as chairman, the associate chief judge has been doing intensive research on the subject, getting background information, etc. Perhaps I should add that the Minister without Portfolio, my former parliamentary secretary, at my request has been working closely with the parties informing them of the assistance available from the department and in other ways. Actual hearings open tomorrow.

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY AS TO CONSIDERATION AND REVIEW OF PROGRAMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent (Ont.)): Mr. Speaker, in view of the severe economic upheaval caused to farmers by the sudden closing of the Chatham sugar refinery, has the Minister of Agriculture instituted any inquiry regarding this season's plans of other Canadian food producers, particularly regarding the effect on seasonal contracting?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the question of contracting and seasonal plans for various segments of agriculture is under continuing review by the department. I do not know whether my hon. friend has any specific area in mind, but I know of no special programs at the present time apart from the normal course of constant review by the department of these programs.

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to know whether the minister is now in a position to announce a floor price for sunflower seeds in order that the producers may make plans for the current growing season.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, any announcement in respect of floor prices would be by the stabilization board in the normal course. There is no specific announcement today in respect of this program.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member for Kent, Ontario. Has the minister or his department, on the advice of his advisory council, established a policy specifically in respect of sugar beets?

[Mr. Ormiston.]

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, the government's policy has always been very clear in respect of sugar beets. It is to support the sugar beet growers, I think to the tune of some $6 million last year, and this is a program with which the growers were very well satisfied if my understanding is correct. The national purpose of the support program has been to support the Canadian sugar beet growers until such time as there is a world agreement in respect of sugar prices.

Mr. D. V. Pugh (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Agriculture indicate now whether he has a report in respect of the brief submitted last October by the food producers of Canada and the Canadian Horticultural Council in respect of the importation of Australian canned goods into Canada?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I believe the problem that was brought to our attention in the brief referred to by the hon. member has been before a joint committee of officials with respect to finding an ultimate solution. I believe that committee will report very shortly. Any action that is required as a result of their deliberations will be announced in the near future.

Mr. Pugh: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister indicate whether the whole question of the hardship caused to Canadian processors has been taken up with Australian government officials?

Mr. Greene: I am sure that officials not only of our department but of other departments of government have been in consultation with the Australians in regard to this very serious problem as it affects the peach canning industry in particular. If any action is required on either an unilateral or bilateral basis, of course it will be announced in the normal and proper fashion.

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture if he has decided whether to refer the question of the operation of the agricultural stabilization board to the standing committee after the reconvening of parliament.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, the operation of the stabilization board and the officials of the board, if my memory serves me correctly, were before the standing committee when the estimates of the department were before the committee last year, and following the resumption of hostilities here in the house—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Greene: —I am very certain the new estimates will be before that committee, and certainly they would be very free to examine the officials of the stabilization board when the estimates are before the standing committee.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE ACTION TO AVERT WORLD CRISIS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister of which I have given him notice. Have countries no alternative but to wait out the alarming challenges to their monetary systems now being made by hoarders and speculators, or are plans well advanced for a world system based on the real worth of nations?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will recognize that the question is argumentative.

[Later:]

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, I have purged my question of any argument. I will again ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether plans are well advanced for a world monetary system based on the real worth of nations and immune from present challenges.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure my hon. friend knows that at the last meeting of the International Monetary Fund in Brazil, which I believe was held in October, proposals were made for special drawing rights which would buttress the existing international arrangements. Unfortunately those proposals have not yet been agreed to by all the governments concerned, but they are being very actively considered. I believe there is to be a meeting at the end of the month, in Stockholm I think, where I hope further progress will be made.

I hope before that time the situation on the international monetary scene will have improved so that progress can be both convincing and enduring. It is certainly necessary that a more stable currency and exchange basis be established for international trade and payments. This is a matter not only for economic co-operation but also for international and political co-operation. The lack of this has been one of the reasons for the delays we have faced in working out these new plans.

PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS

IMPLEMENTATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON ELECTION EXPENSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that only two out of 12 Liberal members attended an organization meeting of the committee on privileges and elections to which the report of the committee on election expenses was referred, could the Prime Minister assure the house that the government continues to be concerned about studying and implementing the report—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question, of course, alludes to the operations and procedures of a committee, and as such it is not in order.

Mr. Brewin: With respect, Mr. Speaker, my question relates to the policy of the government in this respect. May I finish my question? Will the Prime Minister tell the house whether the government is continuing its interest and concern in studying and implementing—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Forrestall).

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

ALLEGED SUPPRESSION OF FILMED INTERVIEW WITH NIGERIAN OFFICIAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question was for the Secretary of State, who keeps disappearing. In her absence—

An hon. Member: That is no mean trick.

Mr. Forrestall: I see that the hon. lady has returned to the chamber. If I were poetic like the senior member for Halifax I might wax eloquent in this regard. Might I ask the Secretary of State a rather serious question. Can she indicate to the house why there was suppression of a recent C.B.C. interview with

Dr. Mbadiwe, of the Biafran region of Nigeria, which was filmed for television purposes?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would think the question should be placed on the order paper. If there is urgency in it the hon. member might give me notice so we could consider the matter at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Forrestall: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—and you will have to direct me; it may be a question of privilege—the question I am raising is one involving the suppression of legitimate news in Canada, and news of an area in the world—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I fully recognize the importance of the matter, but the hon. member is asking why certain action has been taken by the corporation. I would think a question asked in this way is not of the type which can be put as a verbal question at this time.

Mr. Forrestall: Might I rephrase my question in this way, Mr. Speaker. I accept your judgment and your wisdom. Can the minister indicate whether a recent filmed interview was suppressed—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Both the original and the rephrased question might be placed on the order paper.

CRIMINAL CODE

POSSIBLE AMENDMENTS FOLLOWING DECISIONS RESPECTING HABITUAL CRIMINALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. I assume his attention has been called to the recent important decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada dealing with habitual criminals. Would the minister have his officers make a close examination of those decisions, and would he report to the house his views as to whether amendments should be made to the Criminal Code to clarify the existing provisions?

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows the omnibus amendments now being proposed to the Criminal Code include amendments in respect of this matter. I will consider, in the light of these decisions, whether further amendments should be made; but I would like to have the Criminal Code amendments considered as soon as possible.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

SHIPPING

INQUIRY AS TO PROVISION OF INSTRUCTION IN NAVIGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alcide Simard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

Because of the little interest and the lack of co-ordination and planning shown by Quebec with regard to maritime training, does the minister intend to take over the responsibility for such training as required by Quebec maritime interests?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that, in its present form, that question is out of order. Since it is based on an allegation, it cannot be deemed acceptable.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NORTH SYDNEY, N.S.—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE FOR DOCK WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration which is related to questions I have posed previously to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Transport concerning the forthcoming large scale lay-offs by the C.N.R. of dockworkers at North Sydney.

I ask the minister whether, in view of the fact that these lay-offs will involve an estimated minimum of 600 workers, with extreme hardship and dislocation caused to them, he will appoint a special task force from his department to operate on the spot to ascertain whether alternate employment can be found for these workers.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the situation requires that we deal with it in a special way, not necessarily by appointing a task force, but we will surely send people so that these workers may benefit by all the services of the department as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister referred to benefits. In view of the fact that these lay-offs are brought about by modernization and technological change in a crown corporation, will these workers be eligible for transitional assistance benefits during the period required to find permanent employment?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I think that, generally speaking, these workers are entitled to all the benefits of manpower programs. I cannot say this applies to each and every one of them—we will have to consider each individual case—but, generally speaking, the programs certainly apply to these workers.

[English]

STEPS TO STIMULATE EMPLOYMENT IN CONSTRUCTION INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the statement by the president of the Canadian Construction Association that the construction industry in Canada faces serious unemployment before the fall, and in view of the obvious time lag in the construction industry between planning and construction, could the Prime Minister take an early occasion to indicate to the house whether the government has any plans on hand or in mind to stimulate employment in the construction industry by autumn?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister not think that one very important way of dealing with this problem might be the resumption of the Northumberland crossing project?

UNITED NATIONS

CYPRUS—CONTINUED CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN PEACE KEEPING FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the request from the Secretary General of the United Nations that the Cyprus mandate be renewed, would the minister tell us whether Canada intends to renew her commitment to the peace keeping force?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the request of the Secretary General has not yet been officially received, but if it is the matter will be brought to the attention of my colleagues for their consideration.

FINANCE

TERMS AND CONDITIONS OF NEW HOLDINGS OF U.S. SECURITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance arising out of the recent government decision to transfer all our United States dollars to non-liquid or non-negotiable securities. Could the minister inform the house as to the term and interest rates of the new United States securities held by the Canadian government?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): These are now being negotiated. I am not in a position to reveal this information because the terms have not been settled, but I can assure the house that these securities will be payable on demand.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister assure the house that these securities will be payable in less than 365 days?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. As I said, these securities can be cashed whenever they are needed to supplement our reserves.

INCOME TAX

INQUIRY AS TO REVISED SCHEDULE OF DEDUCTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): I should like to address my question to the Minister of National Revenue. On February 29 the minister advised the house that his department was preparing a revised schedule of income tax deductions which would be mailed to employers by the middle of this month, which is tomorrow. I should like to ask him whether copies of this schedule have been prepared and sent out.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, those forms have not been prepared, due to the revised financial policy, but we think that we will be in a position to send them for April 1 with the 3 per cent rate.

Inquiries of the Ministry

[English]

Mr. Hales: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will copies of the revised schedule be produced right away and sent to employers?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, those forms are being prepared, but I do not think that they will be ready for a few days yet.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR DELAY IN TRANSFERS BETWEEN MARITIME BASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence and ask him whether he would agree to the request made to him in a telegram today or yesterday by the premier of Nova Scotia to delay any move on the proposed transfer of men between Summerside and Greenwood until Nova Scotia has had an opportunity to present a brief.

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that in the present circumstances the brief will arrive before the decision is implemented.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that both economic and military considerations are involved in this matter, would the minister consider referring the question of base consolidation and shifts between bases to the standing committee of the house?

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the one directed to the Minister of National Defence. I should like to ask him, in the light of his reply to the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings, whether the department has not yet made a final decision to transfer the search and rescue facility from Greenwood to Summerside.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I am sorry if I indicated that, Mr. Speaker, because the decision has been made. I was referring to the implementation.

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It has to do with some of the questions raised this afternoon and others raised by myself earlier having to do with the reduction in strength of the Canadian forces base at Summerside, with a possible loss of revenue of one and a half million dollars. Will the Prime Minister indicate, as he did earlier, that the government will accept responsibility for this further difficulty to the depressed economy of the province and seek ways to make adjustments?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is argumentative.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

PROSECUTION OF DISTRIBUTORS OF U.S. MAGAZINE FOR BIRTH CONTROL ADVERTISEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I sent the Minister of Justice notice of this question. Does he plan to prosecute the distributors of Red Book magazine, which carried in its March issue an advertisement on birth control in contravention of section 150 (2)(c) of the Criminal Code?

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question, but he should realize this is a matter for provincial authorities and not for the federal government.

Mr. Prittie: I have a supplementary question for the Postmaster General. Have the regional postal authorities in Vancouver referred this matter to him, since Red Book is an imported magazine?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): I did not hear the first part of the question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Since we are running short of time, perhaps the minister might take notice of the question and answer it tomorrow.

Mr. S. J. Enns (Portage-Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the house leader and relates to the question asked earlier by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond. Will the house deal in this session with Bill S-22, item No. 60 on the order paper?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

INCOME TAX

DEDUCTIONS RESPECTING AIRCRAFT PROVIDED LIBERAL LEADERSHIP CANDIDATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Will the companies which are donating aircraft to the Liberal leadership candidates be allowed tax deductions on these donations, so they may pass half the cost on to the taxpayers of Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Orders of the day.

WATER RESOURCES

PEMBINA RIVER—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON DISCUSSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order. I have been trying to catch Your Honour's eye for the last 25 minutes in order that the Secretary of State for External Affairs may be allowed to answer a question I asked him yesterday. Would Your Honour allow it at this time?

Mr. Speaker: Yes, if there is agreement in the house to go beyond the time allotted.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should have volunteered the answer which I promised to give. Yesterday my hon. friend asked what progress was being made in considering the water resource project on the Pembina river which the International Joint Commission has recommended for development by Canada and the United States.

Officials of the federal government have given the report careful consideration. There have been exchanges between the federal and provincial authorities on this subject, and it is expected that these exchanges will shortly result in an agreement on the Canadian position with regard to the project. When this takes place, Mr. Speaker, we will then take the matter up further with the United States government.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR SURCHARGE

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. C-208, to amend the Income Tax Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Batten in the chair.

On clause 1—Gifts to Her Majesty.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, so far as it goes I think this clause is one which would commend itself to the committee. Indeed, it is the only reasonable clause in what is a bad bill. However, what I should like to ask the minister is why he has restricted this exemption to the provinces. Why not apply this exemption as well to the municipalities or to the agencies of provincial governments? I have in mind, Mr. Chairman, such organizations as the Ontario Heritage Foundation which, for example, has been set up in an attempt to preserve historic sites in the province of Ontario—

The Chairman: Order. I apologize for interrupting the hon. member but it is a little difficult for the Chair to hear what is being said. May we have order, please?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I was saying that I had in mind such agencies as the Ontario Heritage Foundation, with which the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has recently entered into an agreement for the preservation of historic sites in the province of Ontario, an agreement of which I think all of us would approve.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that if this particular clause is good in relation to provinces it ought to be good as well in relation to provincial agencies and municipalities. The committee will be aware of the interest I have taken in this matter, since I put a question on the order paper. That question was answered on January 22 of this year, at page 5767 of Hansard, and I believe resulted in some representations being made to the minister by certain of the provincial governments.

Perhaps the minister would indicate at this stage whether he would go further than he has gone and extend consideration to these other bodies I have mentioned.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, we have been considering this matter for some time. We had particularly in mind some recent donations that had been made to provinces of art collections and so on. Personally I had some knowledge of the McMichael's collection that had been donated to the province of Ontario. In that case a donation could not be made to Her Majesty in right of Canada because the National Art Gallery was unable to accept a donation outside of Ottawa and there was no way in which the collection could have been looked after.

It seemed to us that we at least ought to extend the principle to Her Majesty in right of a province. It is possible, of course, to extend this exemption a very long way, but I suggest to the committee that we should make haste slowly in this direction. Otherwise we may be opening the door to transactions which would have the effect of seriously reducing our revenues, thereby passing on a larger load to the rest of the taxpayers. I do not believe one should extend this exemption indefinitely to cover all sorts of donations to all sorts of agencies.

I suggest to the committee, Mr. Chairman, that while we may not have gone far enough now, we at least ought to take this step at the present time.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, the minister did not indicate why he thought it would be going too far to extend the exemption to municipalities. I agree with the minister that it should not be extended a great distance, but surely it is likely to be most effective if it is extended to municipalities. In the matter of preserving historic sites, gifts are more likely to be made to a municipality than to a province.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, this is a very difficult question of degree. The original reason the exemption applied only to donations to Her Majesty in right of Canada was that they were supposed to be gifts that were of general benefit to the whole nation. When a gift is made to a province the benefit, presumably, is spread over a rather smaller area, but nevertheless an area that is sufficiently broad. When you begin to allow donations to municipalities as deductions, you start raising questions about whether the taxpayers as a whole should have to pick up the lost revenues.

I suggest to the hon. member, Mr. Chairman, that this is really a matter of degree, and at this time I hesitate to go any further.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, while we are on this point, in light of what the minister has said perhaps he would answer the question I put to his colleague on the orders of the day. Does the minister think that donations made by private companies by providing free air travel for other leadership candidates than the Minister of Finance should be allowed as a deductible expense, which has the effect of passing half of the cost back to the taxpayers?

Mr. Sharp: As far as I know, Mr. Chairman, any donations that are made to me, either in campaigning as a candidate in a constituency or in campaigning for the leadership, are not deductible.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I am not talking about campaign donations but air travel that is made available to candidates and which will cost money to the companies concerned. Does it not follow as normal business practice for these companies to charge for the cost and, in effect, recover half of that cost from the taxpayers?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I am quite sure that my colleague the Minister of National Revenue does not permit things to be done indirectly that are forbidden directly. This is a matter of administration. When the Minister of National Revenue looks at expenses that are properly chargeable he tries to discover whether they have been incurred in earning an income. That is the only criterion that is applied.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Chairman, if a donor makes a gift to a university in a given province, would such a gift qualify in this particular case?

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Sharp: It is my understanding that it would qualify under other parts of the act, subject to the limitation that is in the act today.

There is a special position in regard to gifts that are made to the crown and that position has been maintained in the law for many years. All that this clause does is to extend the right of deduction with respect to gifts made in right of a province. That right exists with respect to gifts to Canada.

Mr. Walker: How will art collections be valued for tax purposes? Will the original purchase price be taken into account? How does one arrive at an evaluation?

Mr. Sharp: I understand that when collections are donated to the government in right of Canada, that is, to the national gallery, the evaluations are made by the gallery itself.

When it comes to donations to the crown in right of a province the national gallery, of course, would be consulted. I must point out that these donations to the crown affect the revenues of the provinces as well as the federal government.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I wonder whether the minister would mind answering one or two questions. Before asking him the questions I wish to read to him some comments he made regarding the International Monetary Fund meeting in Rio de Janeiro. He said in part:

> I had the opportunity to meet all the ministers of finance of the world. We met many times in large groups and in small groups. One of the main problems we discused was the problem of interest rates. It was pleasant to meet with ministers of finance from around the world because at least we could console one another. We looked at this problem; we examined it carefully and at length for a week.

Mr. Knowles: The minister had better go back.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I continue:

> There was not one of us who could come up with an easy or early solution to the problem of high interest.

Can the minister tell us whether, since that meeting took place, he has seen any signs that might indicate that interest rates will be reduced?

Mr. Sharp: I am sure all hon. member are reading the newspapers very carefully these days and looking at the international financial crisis. One aspect of this international financial crisis is a continuing increase in interest rates, and that is why there is no easy answer to the problem of interest rates. It is a very disturbing aspect of the international financial situation, and until that situation is clarified I do not see much prospect of lower interest rates.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): If the minister will think back to the time when gold prices were increased in 1934 he will remember what that increase did to interest rates. The government at the present time is refinancing loans that it floated at that time. It is interesting to note that the Canadian government was able to finance the war at a rate of three-quarters of 1 per cent on short term bills and 3 per cent on long term bonds. These long term bonds are now coming due and are being refinanced at a rate of approximately 6.5 per cent. Considering these factors, has the minister changed his mind about the advisability of increasing the gold price as one way of meeting the problem of high interest rates?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Chairman. It is not the intention of the Canadian government to take actions that would disturb the international monetary markets more than they are now disturbed. The United States government has made it clear that it will not increase the price of gold. It is not the policy of the Canadian government to follow any other course.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Yet, Mr. Chairman, if we are to learn anything from history we must recognize that prior to the last increase in gold prices the average interest rate on government securities during the 1920's was 4 per cent and that during the 1930's it dropped to 3 per cent and during the 1940's to an average of 2 per cent. Would the minister not be extremely pleased if he had to pay only 2 per cent on government borrowings?

Mr. Sharp: I see no prospect of any 2 per cent interest rate, nor do I think an increased gold price would bring such a result about at this time. Indeed, an increased gold price would lead to a further expectation of inflation and might lead, therefore, to increasing reluctance on the part of individuals to lend their money at low interest rates.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Does the minister not agree that interest rates began rising when United States gold reserves began dropping? Rates have risen in direct proportion to the loss of United States gold reserves.

Mr. Sharp: I am inclined to think that we ought to improve the international monetary system. The greatest contribution would be to bring into operation the supplementary drawing rights, on which we have worked for some time, to supplement the existing gold stocks and facilitate, therefore, international transactions and help to end the sort of financial disturbance that is now prevailing.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Is it not true that for the past 5,000 years of recorded history human beings have been seeking a substitute for gold? So far they have not found one that is universally acceptable.

Mr. Sharp: In the post-war period we found means to supplement gold. The International Monetary Fund was created for the purpose of supplementing gold and providing another means of carrying on international transactions, that is, transactions between countries, and financing them. I believe the time has come when we ought to carry this process a stage further. No one has suggested that gold ought to be eliminated as a reserve for international purposes. It would be very useful if we had a supplement to gold and we did not need to depend entirely on gold, the price of which could be changed, in order to make our international monetary system function well.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I agree with the minister, and we must use the services of the I.M.F. and various other international bodies. Is it not obvious, though, that what happened in the past can happen again? The present situation seems to be adding a headache to a brain tumor. Measures which are taken seem merely to delay the crisis. They do not cure it. Is it not true that this crisis engulfs the world? I have read a report that about 200 tons of gold will change hands on the London market today. How long can this go on?

Mr. Sharp: I cannot answer that last question. In the post-war period, when we introduced modern, international financial mechanisms, we saw the greatest expansion and prosperity that the world has ever seen. I regret that we now face this sort of international crisis. I suggest, none the less, that this international crisis will not be solved simply. I think the best way of dealing with it would be to carry into effect the new kinds of international reserves that have been under discussion among countries of the world for the past couple of years. I regret that we have not had a sufficient degree of international agreement to bring those reserves into effect. If we could do that I do not think we would be faced with the present crisis.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): May I ask the minister one more question? Does the government still intend to supply gold to the United States and to subsidize the United States to the tune of 14 per cent while so doing? We sold to the United States $100 million worth of gold but that gold cost us $114 million to produce because we pay a subsidy to our gold mining companies. Is it the intention of the government to continue to follow this practice or is the hon. gentleman reconsidering this procedure?

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. Sharp: Our policy has been to keep a certain proportion of our reserves in gold and a certain proportion in other forms of exchange, chiefly American dollars invested in the United States and earning interest. I believe this is the proper policy for Canada. I believe it is only prudent we should hold part of our reserves in gold as long as the present international financial system operates. I do not believe it would be prudent for Canada to hold all its reserves in gold. We would lose a great deal of revenue if we did so and successive ministers of finance would be obliged to impose still higher taxation in order to meet expenditures. So I think it is very wise to have invested a substantial part of our reserves in interest bearing securities.

Gold earns us nothing. It is sterile. We hold it because under the present international system we want to have some protection against the possibility that at some time in the future the price of gold might be increased. But I do not think it would be in the Canadian interest to keep more than a certain proportion of our reserves in gold. I believe that from time to time we shall sell some of our gold stocks and turn them into something which produces earnings to keep down taxation in this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I only have two or three questions for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp).

In view of the confusion now prevailing, both among the Canadian people and the deputation in general, as well as among some teachers in our Quebec schools, because of this mad or panicky gold rush which results in gold transactions between various countries, could the minister now state that, as far as our Canadian currency is concerned, the gold guarantee is no longer of any account since May 1, 1940, but that the Canadian gold reserve, as he just said, is only used for the international transactions which may be effected at a given time, in short, that gold is of no use at all to guarantee the currency in circulation in the country, under our monetary system? Is the minister in a position to tell us that?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Chairman, what the hon. gentleman has said is right. We retain a gold reserve for the purpose of settling international transactions. As I said in reply to the hon. member for Timmins, we have followed a policy of keeping part gold and part American dollars or dollars invested in United States securities, bearing in mind the fact that the United States dollar is based upon gold and one can never tell whether or not in the future the price of gold might be changed.

This has been the policy followed by successive governments over a long period and I think it is prudent. I agree with the hon. gentleman that a Canadian dollar bill cannot be presented in exchange for gold. Gold is retained for use in settling international transactions and for that purpose it is in my view, a very valuable part of our reserves.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, my other question is this.

A moment ago, the Minister of Finance, in answer to a question by the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin), said that Canada had to go along with the current of international affairs and that we must not upset the present course of the unsteady economy.

So one could say that we are only the followers of policies enacted internationally by foreign countries, that we must necessarily suffer the consequences of decisions taken in Washington, France, or England, and that we are unable to set down a clear and definite economic policy.

Now, I would like to ask the minister—I admit that there is now a severe international crisis and that perhaps some heads will roll in a few days or a few weeks—whether there is some law here in Canada which prevents the Canadian government or the Minister of Finance from using strictly Canadian, national credits, in order to ease the situation, and to boost the economy of the country again independently of other countries? Do we not have the means to implement something in this country without always having to run to the United States, to England, to Russia, or to other countries in the world?

At this point, I should like to put this question to the hon. Minister of Finance: Is there an act which prevents the government or the Department of Finance from using the services of the Bank of Canada to create new, debt-free, interest-free credit, a step which would not only have no influence on the international market, but, on the contrary, would enable us to increase our productivity, and would enable us to compete better than at the present time?

Does the hon. minister have any objection to using strictly national credit for Canadians, to boost the Canadian economy?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: In so far as transactions within Canada are concerned, this is exactly what we do. We have established a credit system, a very complicated and very delicate financial mechanism comprised of many kinds of institutions under the control of the monetary policy of the country through the Bank of Canada. But when it comes to international transactions then, of course, it is necessary to have something which foreigners want and will accept, and there are only two things I should like to have in my reserve in this situation. One of them is gold, which will be accepted by anyone, and the second is United States dollars which remain the most acceptable currency in the world and the currency in which we must settle most of our international transactions. We do have provisions for satisfying our internal credit needs and while we make use of them in a way which may not be altogether to the liking of the hon. member, the system works very well on the whole. But it will not work internationally.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, the hon. minister has just told us that he does not necessarily share the political ideas the Ralliement Créditiste advocates, but did the right hon. Prime Minister not tell us Tuesday in his speech that the government had only two ways of managing the country or making expenditures: borrow money or levy taxes?

Well, Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister of Finance knows full well that there is another way. If the government is sovereign, could the minister not resort to the credit of the Bank of Canada to balance Canada's economy on the basis of Canadian production. Why does the department not use the Bank of Canada to create the credit matching that production?

What prevents it from doing that? The law?

• (3:50 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I have had many discussions across the floor on this subject with the hon. gentleman as well as with other members of his party and those associated with him such as the hon. member for Lapointe. I do not think we are going to agree this afternoon on the best way of accomplishing our respective purposes. The government has responsibility for monetary policy and the Bank of Canada is the agency that is used to implement that policy. The Bank of Canada controls the volume of money in Canada, the volume of dollars that are created for the purpose of facilitating the financial system. The money that is put into circulation by the Bank of Canada becomes the foundation upon which other institutions extend credit.

The hon. gentleman is very well aware of the process, and so am I. We may differ as to how it actually works, but at any rate that is the way it is done. I am of the view that the operations of the Bank of Canada, like the operations of the Federal Reserve System in the United States or the Bank of England in England or the Bank of France in France or the Central Bank in Germany, are the accepted, tried and tested methods of controlling the expansion of credit.

I know my hon. friend has a different view. I know I despair of converting him to my view and I hope he despairs of converting me to his point of view, but at any rate I think we understand our respective points of view. I of course have the advantage over him that the point of view I believe is appropriate to the modern world, to our democratic institutions and so on, is accepted throughout the world. I do not believe there is any country in the world that has yet been wise or foolish enough to accept the views of my hon. friend.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I should like to put a final question.

The minister just said that the Bank of Canada determines the volume of credit or money in circulation. Could he tell us who creates this volume and increases it? No doubt the minister is in a position to recognize that the Bank of Canada plays only a minor part in the whole monetary organization in Canada—not fiscal but monetary. In fact, if the federal government issues bonds for $1 billion and the Bank of Canada purchases, to-morrow morning, $1 billion in bonds, the minister is in a position to say that chartered banks have the power, under the law, to multiply that credit by fourteen. It is at that point that the Bank of Canada controls the volume of credit, that is by purchasing from the government a bond which chartered banks have the means to multiply by fourteen and, moreover, to charge interest on the multiplication by fourteen.

I understand that the minister can say that my point of view differs from his, that his point of view is different from mine and that both must be respected. I respect the minister as a man, but on the other hand, I do not respect his point of view which is keeping the country in the economic chaos now experienced and which is merely due to a financial problem. If the minister stated: "To-morrow morning, we are going to use the Bank of Canada", the situation would be different. Why does not the Bank of Canada perform that multiplication by fourteen instead of leaving the matter in the hands of a few bankers who are empowered to handle the economic life of the whole country?

If the Bank of Canada multiplied the government commitment by fourteen, that money would be put in circulation interest-free to finance municipalities, provinces, school boards—the government would no longer have to reduce its urgent expenses. We would then see new buildings going up, new industries created, and so on. The wage earners or those who make profits as contractors would deposit these sums in the chartered banks, so that the deposits in the chartered banks would probably be the same as now, but instead of paying interest on the fourteen to one ratio which the chartered banks can apply now, we could have credit free of debt or interest, if you wish, even if we had to repay the amount we have received from the Bank of Canada over a certain period of time and with allowance made for the depreciation of the facilities built.

Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Finance must be able to tell us that the present amount of money, of credit in circulation is in the hands of the chartered banks and not in the hands of the credit unions, even if, as the minister tells us, the Bank of Canada dictates or controls the amount of credit in circulation. I know very well that if I go into a bank tomorrow and borrow $1,000—which I do not have on me since I am borrowing it—if the chartered bank lends me this $1,000, I open a savings account, not a current account. The accounts of other people are not diminished by my opening a savings account while I have no money, but there is $1,000 in my newly-opened account.

As soon as I open a savings account, the chartered bank which lent me the money can use it as reserves deposited in the Bank of Canada and multiply by fourteen the $1,000 it just lent me.

That is where the trouble lies. That is the system which has put us in the situation which the Minister of Finance is now facing. That is the system which is to blame for unemployment in Canada, which forces the Minister of Finance to ask all the other ministers: Cut down your expenses, stop certain projects, scrap others, do not encourage production in Canada, for we do not have the financial means needed.

Mr. Chairman, that is the basis of the difficulty facing the government at the present time. There are, in Canada, at the present time 500,000 unemployed, 80,000 of them in the city of Montreal alone. This includes those who are registered and excludes those who are not. Those who receive social welfare allowances are not considered as unemployed but they are anyway.

At the present time, we ask for the completion of winter works in some places. We are told that we cannot afford it, that we have to reduce our expenses. It is not permitted to carry out certain projects, to build roads, hospitals, buildings which the Canadian people need. By so doing, those who are in need are refused assistance.

Mr. Chairman, why does the hon. Minister of Finance not turn to the Bank of Canada? Why does he simply tell us: The Bank of Canada is at the service of the chartered banks to determine the volume of the money supply? The chartered banks are the ones who decide, not the Bank of Canada. However, I do not know of any law which prevents the hon. Minister of Finance from using the credit of the Bank of Canada.

If the government, this afternoon or tomorrow, would turn to the Bank of Canada to create such credits, that would add immediately to the reserves of the chartered banks and would allow them to increase those reserves 14 times. It would be a repetition of the situation which we have known in 1940, 1941, and 1942 when two Liberal members, Messrs. Arthur Slaght, of Parry Sound, and Gerry McGeer, of Vancouver, asked the Minister of Finance, Mr. Ilsley, who had created, through the Bank of Canada a new credit of $200 millions, I think, in order to finance the first war projects: Why do you not repeat that initiative, in order to finance the Canadian economy? And, Mr. Ilsley, answered: We cannot repeat that indefinitely, because as soon as we use a new credit of the Bank of Canada, it gives the chartered banks the power to multiply their reserves 10, 12, 15 or even 20 times, it puts in their hands an inflationary power. That is the inflationary power held today by the chartered banks. This is exactly the same situation and the hon. Minister of Finance knows it.

People can laugh about the present situation, but it is not funny. The Canadian people are not willing to face another depression for the sake of the sacrosanct dollar. The Canadian people are not willing to let their natural resources go down the drain to support the financial system.

Mr. Chairman, the Bank of Canada should be used fully to finance the expenditures of the federal government, the provincial governments and the municipal governments.

Speaking of municipalities, we know they are in a slump right now. The Union des municipalités de la province de Québec is meeting in Quebec these days. I am speaking of the municipalities of the province of Quebec, but the same goes for all the municipalities. They are forced to raise their taxes. The Quebec premier told their representatives: When the provincial budget comes down, we will try to levy new taxes to help you.

We dig one hole to fill another, and the more we do, the larger the hole becomes in the attempt to fill the others.

The situation is the same in Ontario. The government has just approved new taxes on gas, tobacco, parimutuel, all kinds of things and then we are told: That alone will not suffice, we will have to cut expenditures. Ottawa cuts expenditures, Quebec cuts expenditures, and Ontario too. Saskatchewan, under Mr. Thatcher, has also raised its taxes in every field.

Mr. Chairman, how far will the Minister of Finance lead us in that direction? Until we face a depression like the one we had in 1929-30? Is it preferable to plunge 20 million people into an economic depression and to increase the power of the few individuals in Canada who control the economic blood of our country, that is money? For they are the ones who would have us kneel before them when we sit in committee to study the sob stories of the financial community.

Mr. Chairman, it is time, I feel, for the Canadian Minister of Finance and the Canadian government to stand up and tell big finance: Instead of enslaving the people, you will serve the people. This is the trouble today. Instead of serving the people, they enslave the people; instead of bringing financiers to their senses, we obey them.

The Minister of Finance should seriously consider the situation. I understand that he may say we do not share point of view, but I have been advocating this philosophy for thirty years. When I became a Créditiste, over thirty years ago, I was only 19 or 20 years old. Why did I become a Créditiste? Because I never understood how it was that we were left literally to starve during the 1929-39 depression, while billions of dollars were found to wage the 1939-45 war.

How is it that for ten years, our colleges and institutions were only half filled, whereas during the war, there was insufficient space? Industries were sprouting throughout Canada. And now, 20 years after the war, as we must begin to refund what we had borrowed for the slaughter, we are facing facts: we must repay not only the capital, but also the interest. We have managed to pay that interest for the past 25 years. Today, it is the capital which must be paid. We have already paid $20 or $25 billion in interest since the end of the 1939-45 war, and our national debt still reaches $25 billion today. We have not paid a single cent of capital. We have paid, on the average, $1 billion a year in interests only on a fictitious debt created out of nothing by the Canadian banking system.

If the minister and the government had obtained interest-free loans from the Bank of Canada to meet their expenses, we would not find ourselves in such a situation. I challenge the minister to find a proper solution. Even if he doubles the taxes, introduces a bill providing for a 25 or 30 per cent tax increase, he will still not be able to meet his obligations, because the present system is not designed to cope with such a situation. The system is conceived to crush the government and the Canadian nation, and we are not getting rid of it.

Mr. Chairman, I say to the Minister of Finance that he has both the moral and the administrative obligation to put an end to this damnable financial system which oppresses the Canadian people.

[English]

Mr. Leboe: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words to the minister in this connection. I was surprised to hear the minister talk in the last few days about the international crisis and then brag today about the financial systems of all the nations in the western world. I cannot help but say to him that he has put forward one of the greatest contradictions in respect of finance that I have heard for a long long time. Surely he must understand that the people of Canada, having considered the situation very carefully, have decided that the present financial system of the government has failed absolutely due to the fact that bank interest rates are now as high as 12½ and 13 per cent. If anyone in this or any other country suggests there is a sound reason that interest rates should be as high as 12 or 13 per cent, then all I can say is I would have to see much stronger evidence than I have seen to date.

I believe that any alert minister of finance should be very careful to listen at this time to anyone who has anything to offer, whether it be good or bad, and assess what he has to say. Otherwise the minister would be very much like the individual who, when a person to whom he owed some money said "let us cancel the debt", said, "I would rather die owing you than not pay". If the minister continues in this way we will be faced with a situation which no one in this or any other country would like to see.

I should like to refer briefly to a small but powerful book. I suggest the Minister of Finance is quite aware of it. It was written by Vincent Cartwright Vickers. He was deputy lieutenant of the city of London, a director of Vickers Limited for 22 years and a director of London Assurance from which he resigned in January, 1939. In 1910 he was made a governor of the Bank of England and resigned this appointment in 1919. I wish the minister would compare what Mr. Vickers had to say with the situation which has been outlined by the minister over the last couple of weeks. In the opening paragraph on page 1 of this book entitled "Economic Tribulation" Mr. Vickers had this to say:

> Slowly but inevitably the old financial system is crumbling under the weight of modern conditions and the better education of the people; the sooner it crumbles the better, and the sooner it gives way to a better and more modern technique the sooner will the world achieve good will and peace amongst men.
> The present order of things must change. The economic structure of civilization is obviously leaning heavily. To build upon it, to add weight to it as it now stands, crooked and unsafe, can only bring nearer the day of its collapse.

Today we are approaching the situation this man had in mind when he said that slowly but surely the mills of the gods would grind. What was written in 1941 by this man who for nine years was governor of the Bank of England we find expressed in the words of the minister today. When the minister says he does not understand what is meant when someone talks about changing the situation to one of an increasing involvement by the Bank of Canada in the debt of our country, I cannot understand to whom he is listening.

The minister said today that we have a fine financial system. Yet we find him also saying that the world is facing a terrible crisis and that the international monetary situation is almost beyond repair. We are now experiencing one of the greatest financial crises we have ever experienced. The situation is almost chaotic. It does seem to me that the time has come when we must stop burying our heads in the sand like ostriches and waving our tail-feathers in the air like palm trees. According to the Minister of Finance that is the position we are to assume.

I do not think the minister listened to what the hon. member for Villeneuve said and I do not think he intends to read what he said when and if he ever has the chance during the campaign. Let me tell the minister that if he expects to become the prime minister of this country and take it upon his shoulders to formulate Canadian policy he had better keep his ears tuned to some of the things which have been said. Let me refer him to the warnings given during the meetings of the committee on finance. He was told that if there was not some control of competition for deposits by trust companies and banks we would find ourselves in a terrible position because of high interest rates. I do not know how anyone can find himself in this position without being very much concerned. When we were discussing the effects of competition for deposits the Governor of the Bank of Canada said he did not anticipate high interest rates for ten years. That was the shortest ten years of my life.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I was very interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Timmins but I do not entirely agree with his contention. I am not sure what the real situation is in respect of gold but I am concerned about what seems to be a lack of interest on the part of the minister in what appears to be a calamity. Canada may not operate on the gold standard but we are tied very closely to the United States which does. The United States now has a national debt of some $64 billion in short and long term paper. In support of this debt the United States has approximately $10 billion in gold. If all the short term money was recalled the United States would be bankrupt.

Canada has reserves to the extent of about one-tenth of those held by the United States. We are tied very closely to their dollar. For many reasons we do not use Canadian dollars in international trade but use United States dollars. If their dollar collapses, even though the minister may not be worried about what will happen to the United States it will bankrupt the Canadian economy. We will then not only be bankrupt like the United States but the Canadian dollar will be at a higher rate and we will lose our trade with every nation in the world. We will be middling rich but starving.

Yesterday about $200 million in gold was transferred on the London market. This amount has probably increased today by another $20 million. At this rate it will take less than 30 days to find out whether the United States is totally bankrupt. The minister is being unfair to the house and to the country when he gives the impression that we have a new unit of exchange in the International Monetary Fund. The United States dollar is backed by gold and therefore gold is backing the International Monetary Fund. What will happen if United States short term money is recalled and the United States becomes bankrupt? Unless the minister envisages some change in the next few weeks I suggest that with the present trend the United States will be bankrupt within 30 days.

The present rush on gold will surely accelerate. Something will have to be done before the end of next week. Canada must also do something because our exchange is closely tied to the United States dollar. According to some of the remarks made by other hon. members the role played so far by the Bank of Canada has been detrimental.

When we took the limit off interest rates we were told by the minister that interest rates would go down. They have not gone down, they have gone up. They have gone up to the extent that the housing industry is now frozen. In the province of Quebec 600 major producers are leaving because of high interest rates and taking most of their business to the state of Vermont. This surely is a direct result of high interest rates and the instability of our economy.

I agree with the minister when he suggests that Canada is not going to set the gold standard. I am sure he is aware that all the countries involved in the monetary fund rejected the idea suggested at Rio de Janeiro that the United States dollar be used as the basis for international exchange. The only country interested in maintaining the price of gold at $35 per ounce was the United States. I am not sure what the result would be if we increased that price to $75, $100 or even higher.

I do know that for years Canada was hoodwinked into believing that it was absolutely necessary to stabilize the price of silver at 97 cents an ounce because that was the desire of the United States. We did not make money as a great silver producer. The United States then passed an act and the price of silver went up to $1.29 per ounce. We continued to produce it for the United States at that price. Some producers got smart, began producing for Britain, and the price of silver rose to $2.46 per ounce. I understand silver is selling on the commercial market for a great deal more. This would indicate that the price of silver is double what the United States is using for the base of its reserve.

The United States is not God Almighty so far as monetary policies are concerned. The United States has been unsuccessful in its negotiations throughout the world in respect of pegging the value of gold. Even with the huge amounts of gold the United States has said it has had over the years, it has been unable to establish stability in respect of its own money. This would indicate the United States has been printing scrip that it never intended to redeem. I think they are doing it with the consent of a number of countries which are now faced with a very serious problem and an almost inevitable calamity.

I ask the minister what he is going to do about this situation. What help can he give the Canadian people if a disaster develops? I calculate that it is not more than two weeks away. I am only guessing but I think that if the International Monetary Fund breaks down and gold is allowed to seek its own level the United States will have a 40-cent dollar. I am also scared that Canada will have a 60-cent dollar, which will mean that Canada will not be able to sell in any market in the world. We will be in a very serious position.

Some of the minister's colleagues may not believe that the situation is serious but I think it is when leaders of the international monetary agencies of the world are spending their Sundays visiting Switzerland not to ski but to sit down and discuss financial matters. These people do not think it is a laughing matter. I am sure those seven or eight people who have been meeting regularly know the limit to which they will be able to back currency in the current situation. I think it is a calamity for us and for the people of the world.

[Mr. Peters.]

I do not think we will be serving the best interests of the International Monetary Fund or our own best interests if we fail to present what may be an alternative in this situation. I know there are repercussions which I do not understand in the alternative suggested, but I am quite sure everyone will agree that if the price of gold were to double there would be a great deal less interest in moving it around and keeping it under the bed. Speculation is what is moving gold around, not its value.

I believe that people in other countries and United States citizens are involved in this speculation. When people see a very serious economic situation developing which will affect them they hedge, just as the Canadian government has hedged to a limited degree. The minister should not appear to be amused by this situation or try to pass it off. A serious calamity may befall the world in the next few days. If it does occur it will make the Viet Nam war back-page news rather than front-page news. We will not need to withdraw the supply of nickel; that problem will be solved. The Vietnamese will find themselves well off.

The people who are buying gold are not stupid. They also have money, which is very important in the world of economics. These people are going to the London market and buying gold in very large quantities. They are buying $200 million worth of gold a day. This is a very large transaction. In my opinion it is not countries that are buying gold but individuals, corporations and companies interested in hedging in this way.

Perhaps the hon. member for Villeneuve did not give us the answer to the problem but I think what he said is well worth looking at. We will have to make ourselves less dependent on the United States economy or we will find ourselves very hurt by an economic collapse in the international monetary field. We may be hurt even more than the Americans who have perhaps precipitated this kind of collapse.

The Americans appear to have $10 billion worth of gold. If it is sold at the rate of a quarter of a billion dollars a day it will last only 40 days. If the buying of gold accelerates as it has in the past few days, a calamity would easily develop in the next 10 days.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Chairman, before the minister rises to say something on this rather intriguing question of the price of gold and the mythological claim which gold seems to have on mankind, I should like to ask him to comment on two propositions. First of all, is it not true that if the United States were to raise the price of gold every other nation would also devalue its currency in the same proportion and we would be back in the same boat where we started? Second, what would happen if the United States unilaterally decided to stop buying and selling gold at the price of $35 an ounce and let it find its own level as a monetary metal? It seems to me to be absurd to some extent, when the United States has a gross national product of some $800 billion, that a world monetary crisis of this nature can be brought on by a balance of payments deficit of only $3 billion.

I represent a gold mining constituency and naturally we are very interested in what happens to the price of gold. But it seems to me that a great deal of the discussion this afternoon has been a little far out so far as my understanding of the economics of gold is concerned. It is my understanding that what really makes a nation wealthy and powerful is not the amount of gold it has but the extent of its productive capacity. Gold itself does not produce anything. The people working in the factories and the products they produce are the real key. I ask the minister to comment on those two propositions.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, some of the comments made by the hon. member for Villeneuve and the hon. member for Timiskaming, to which I believe there was a reply from the minister, dealt with the fact that the Canadian dollar was not attached to gold in any way, shape or form. I should like to illustrate to hon. members just how true this is. Because of all the hullabaloo about the purchase of gold that is going on in Canada and other places around the world, I thought it would be interesting to find out just how one went about purchasing gold.

I went to the bank and informed them that I was interested in purchasing some gold. In spite of the fact that on the counter there was a big sign which said they bought and sold gold, the first thing the young gentleman who served me said was that they would not take any more orders for gold. I asked him, "What do you mean when you say the bank will not take any more orders for gold?" He said, "We are just not taking any more orders for gold." I asked, "Why?" He said he did not know why. I said, "Can you find out?" He went to find out why they were not taking orders for gold. He brought back another gentleman who then proceeded to try to discourage me from buying gold. He told me that there were storage costs, handling charges and this, that and the other thing.

But I persisted in getting an answer so he went on and even got to the stage of intimating that it was rather unpatriotic to buy gold. I pointed out to him that I happened to be the member of parliament who represents the largest gold producing area on the North American continent and I wondered why it was unpatriotic to buy Canadian gold in a Canadian bank. He changed his tune a little then, and although it took me some two hours and thirty minutes I was able to purchase a little bit of gold.

But the interesting point is that you cannot buy gold for Canadian dollars. You have to go back to your own bank and get the money in American funds. The most interesting point of all is that if you want to store gold in a Canadian bank you also have to pay the storage charges in American dollars. Therefore when the minister says the Canadian dollar is not attached to gold, believe me, Mr. Chairman, he is telling the truth. The trouble is that the Canadian dollar happens to be tied to the American dollar and the American dollar happens to be tied to gold, or it has been until now.

An hon. Member: Where does the gold come from?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I made this inquiry of the gentleman at the bank. He said they did not have any here and would have to send to Toronto for it. I said, "Suppose they have not any there; what will you do?" He said they would have to send to the mint for it. Apparently the mint may also be out of gold because it is processed in London, England. A few years ago we had over 200 producing gold mines in this country. Now we are down to about 25 and a number of those are closing this year. But still we have to send to England if we want to buy Canadian gold in Canada and we have to use American money.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Yes.

Mr. Caouette: The Minister of Finance has probably never seen pure gold. Would the hon. member for Timmins send it over so the minister may look at it?

• (4:30 p.m.)

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not mind lugging it as long as I know where to get it. I think that the point raised by the hon. member for Timiskaming is a valid one. I have followed this situation very closely because I have been very interested in gold and I have tried to study the problem and the intricacies of the trading in gold on the international market over the years. The headlines today speak of the buying rush on gold in London, Paris and Zurich which has reached panic proportions. When the same thing happened before Christmas the international financiers were able to cool off the rush a little. Early in January, there was another run and again they were able to cool it off. Last week it started again and over the week end there was a big meeting of the Group of Ten in Switzerland. They came out with a joint statement that they were going to hold the line. However, this time it has had no effect. The panic started on Monday, continued yesterday and increased further today.

Unless I am mistaken and unless all the signs all over the world mean nothing, it would appear to me that by this week end and no later one of two things must be done. Either the price of gold will have to be raised to a meaningful level or gold will have to be demonetized. I am not sure what effect the raising of the price of gold would have. It was done in the 1930's one country at a time. What happened then was that gold moved from one country to another. If it is done sensibly at this time, what will happen will be that the International Monetary Fund will adjust all the currencies to a meaningful value. If they try to demonetize gold, then, unless the minister has more information and a greater understanding of the situation than I have, there will be utter and complete chaos in the world because, as I mentioned before, for 5,000 years people in this world have been looking for a substitute for gold, and as things have progressed over the years some countries within their boundaries have learned to manage without gold.

History has shown to us that paper money is nothing more than paper which can be used to plaster walls. It has to have some other value before it can be accepted and before it has the trust and faith of the nations of the world for use in international commerce which is so necessary in the world today.

I say again, Mr. Chairman, that not later than this week end some decision must be made or the world will face a depression which will make the one in the 1930's look like a garden party.

[Mr. Martin (Timmins).]

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to put one or two brief and simple questions to the minister. I do not think this is the time for us to go into an extensive examination of the reform of our monetary system which, after all, has served Canada rather well in the last two decades. But I should like to ask the minister whether I am correct in my understanding of what he has said in his responses to questions and indeed in his speeches to the house and to the committee. As I understand it, first, our trade position is excellent and currently it is improving. Second, our dollar is buoyant. Indeed, if it were free it would probably tend upward. Third, fiscally speaking we are now very nearly in balance. According to some independent assessments, we are in balance or even better at present. My question is: Why do we tax now? If I understand the minister correctly, his answer is that we tax: (a) in order that Canada will not have to borrow more in what is obviously a capital-scarce market and thereby further inflate interest rates and complicate other borrowing in Canada and, (b) in order to curb consumer purchases so as to reduce inflation. Am I being too simplistic in the reasons which I advance for the government's action in coming to the country at this time for this not very substantial sum of money? Are these the reasons? Is this the situation?

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, I just want to ask the minister a couple of questions. I should like to say first, however, that I was interested in noting that he said he had not been converted by the hon. member for Villeneuve. If the hon. member for Villeneuve cannot convert him I suggest that he might go back and read the speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on debt free money made in February, 1963, and consult his colleagues who voted for a resolution on debt free money. This might give him all the explanations he needs in order to support the position of the hon. member for Villeneuve.

My sole purpose in rising is to say that I hope that in the course of this discussion the minister will make some statement which, if possible, will assuage the fears of the Canadian people with respect to the present critical situation in the international money markets. I recognize the minister's difficulties. The minister is dealing with a very delicate mechanism. He wants to say nothing that will make the situation worse, nor is he in a position to make forecasts when all the factors are not known.

However, it seems to me that the people of this country have some right to know what the government's plans are and what the government is striving to do. Most of us have the feeling that many of the governments and peoples of the world are like a mesmerized rabbit watching the snake getting closer and closer, and no one seems to know what to do about it. For months now we have watched the gold hoarders, the speculators and the Swiss bankers buying gold and raiding the United States dollar. The situation is approaching the breaking point.

The hon. member for Leeds spoke about our buoyant dollar. If our dollar is buoyant I do not know why the Bank of Canada had to put up some $474 million in the months of January and February in order to keep the Canadian dollar from collapsing. It could not have been very buoyant at that time. Certainly our dollar, and I do not say it with any glee, is under the same pressure as are the United States dollar and the British pound. I am not trying to allocate blame. What I am asking is that we face up to the reality of the situation.

I do not profess to be an authority on international finance, but basing myself on whatever study I have done of the international monetary theory it seems to me that the problem which has been facing the world for several years now and will face us increasingly in the next few months is the problem of the contracting world liquidity. Our international situation is very much like the situation that countries faced domestically in the early 1930's, namely, that in countries which were on the gold standard the medium of exchange was not expanding as rapidly as the economy. There was a period in the 1930's when we had an abundance of goods and people who needed the goods but we lacked a medium of exchange. When we moved from the gold standard to a managed currency within each country such as we have today we managed to provide the medium of exchange by which people could do business. Now, on an international basis, we have not been able to provide this flexible medium of international exchange. As a matter of fact, not only has world liquidity not been keeping pace with the growing trade in the world but it is now likely to contract.

I believe most authorities estimate that the devaluation of the British pound wiped out $1 billion worth of world liquidity. If the United States carries out its intention this year of balancing its payments, this will wipe out some $3 billion worth of world liquidity. Contraction of world liquidity could precipitate very serious problems for international trade. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the world will have to think very seriously about how it can expand world liquidity to keep pace with increasing demand.

However, what I want to ask the minister is this. What prospect is there of getting some agreement reasonably soon among the members of the I.M.F. with respect to supplementary drawing rights? Also, what prospect is there of getting some agreed unit of international monetary exchange? It seems to me that this is the only hope.

I know that this question has been discussed at meetings of ministers of finance of the member nations of the I.M.F., and I understand there was some resistance to it, which I think is unfortunate. I should like to know where the resistance comes from. Is there any hope that in light of the present crisis this resistance will be withdrawn? Is there any prospect that the nations that recognize the need for what I would call a managed international currency would be prepared to proceed without, say, France, which has strenuously opposed this change? Is there any hope that the process that would normally have been left until next October can be speeded up? Frankly, Mr. Chairman, I do not think that we have until next October. If the minister is reasonably optimistic then he will relieve my mind and the minds of a lot of people in Canada, but I doubt that we have until next October.

Are there any emergency measures that can be taken in this regard? Is anything being done to bring the ministers of finance together at an early date in the hope of working out a solution? If the minister can give us any hope or reason for optimism I can assure the minister that he will set a lot of people's minds at ease at a time when there is considerable concern, in some quarters even consternation.

[Translation]

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Chairman I shall be brief as I have ony a few specific questions to direct to the hon. minister.

Here is the first one: Why is manipulating allowed as regards the interest rate of the Bank of Canada? Why was the Bank of Canada able for about twenty years to maintain a stable rate of interest so as to guarantee a kind of economy which could be termed stable? But since 1945, namely since the manipulating as regards the interest rate of the Bank of Canada, the economy has been completely unbalanced. That is the reason why the interest rate has no limits and is out of control.

I should like the hon. minister to give us explanations as regards the interest rate maintained by the Bank of Canada and the high interest rate due to manipulating. In a word, why, once again, this manipulating of the interest rate?

That is the question I am directing to the hon. minister. If he will be so kind as to answer, I will have further questions to ask him afterwards.

[English]

Mr. McLean (Charlotte): Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words on this question. I think that gold backing for the United States dollar is a myth. All currencies of the world are based on the United States dollar. If the price of gold was changed all currencies would also change in proportion.

A few weeks ago the amount of money circulating in the United States was $181 billion. The United States currency is not only a domestic currency but an international currency. United States currency can be spent in Europe. In the United States a dollar is a dollar. In Canada a dollar is a dollar. However, in Europe a United States dollar is no longer a dollar but a gold dollar.

To my mind, trying to prevent people from buying gold is a little out of line. The United States is contending that the price of gold should not be raised. We must remember that $750 million worth of gold each year does not enter the monetary system at all; it is going into industry and into the arts. Although General de Gaulle was blamed last year for taking gold out of the United States, I understand he did not take one cent's worth out of that country. The United States is losing gold to people all over the world. These people want to protect their investments. They are called sharpers, dishonest and unpatriotic. But money itself, Mr. Chairman, is not patriotic.

Gold does not come from the United States alone. The United States is mining only about one-third of the gold that is used in industry and the arts in that country. The United States is also using a lot of gold in its space program. The electronics industry also uses gold. This gold is procured from countries other than the United States. They are even getting it from Canada. We shut down our gold mines because we do not charge a proper price for the gold.

Where can you find any industry today, Mr. Chairman, that buys its raw materials at 1934 prices? I well remember the depression of 1929 which to my mind was brought about by the United States policy toward gold. The United States had gathered in gold from all round the world. This led to speculation in the United States. I remember that at that time currencies all over the world were dislocated.

I think my hon. friend across the aisle is wrong in what he says, because it was only after President Roosevelt established the price of gold at $35 an ounce that the currencies of the world were adjusted and countries were able to conduct business. I was in business at that time and if that price had not been established when it was, in six months we would have gone into bankruptcy because three-quarters of our products were exported. I remember that what happened was a direct result of the gold situation.

I cannot understand why our friends across the way want to substitute something else for gold. What they want is "paper gold". How is the United States going to finance the Viet Nam war unless it is with this paper gold? They cannot use real gold because they have not sufficient reserves. So they issue paper and call it paper gold, but you cannot get gold for it. It is not right to call that paper gold, but that is what they do.

I cannot understand that attitude. For my part I say, let us stick to gold at least while the Viet Nam war is on. I think this question definitely should be looked into. When we are paying $15 million a year in subsidies to our gold mines I do not see why we should sell the product of our gold mines to the United States for $35 an ounce, a price that was established in 1934.

When President Roosevelt established that price in 1934 people everywhere told him that this action would raise prices in the United States. It did no such thing. Prices before and after the gold hike were practically the same with the exception of some imports. But what did that action do? It restored world trade and world trade restored prices. That is exactly what we are up against today. The question is one of liquidity.

We need liquidity and we are not getting it. No matter what you say about gold, it is the base for credit. Some say that the International Monetary Fund has old-fashioned ideas. When Canada puts up $100 million, the fund asks for $25 million of that subscription to be in gold. Why is that done? Paper credits are expanding but the relative gold base for our money is going the other way. The United States is saying to European countries, "You have $15 billion in gold in your reserves." At the same time any United States economist will tell you that the purchasing power of the United States dollar will decrease from 4 to 5 per cent in 1968. I presume the Canadian dollar will follow that decline. Personally I do not think we can do anything about that inflation. Despite the so-called new economics we have in today's world, I do not think we can do anything about it because for a long time we have had inflation and we are going to have inflation. It has now become a question of the degree of inflation we are to have. But the United States is telling Europe, "You have got $15 billion in gold locked up in the common market and in 1968 the purchasing power of your gold is going down from 4 to 5 per cent." I ask you, who is going to believe that?

Some say that all we need to do nowadays is issue paper currency. If gold values are to be kept to the level of paper currency values, by and by your paper currency will be worthless and your gold will be worthless. That is ridiculous. People do not believe that gold is worthless. People think and have always thought that gold is the store of value.

The other day a young woman in Toronto took her savings out of her bank to buy gold. She thought she was protecting her investment; she was getting out of paper and into gold. People all over the world are thinking the same way. When a woman in India buys a gold bracelet it is because she does not trust the bank with her money and trusts gold. From the year 1340 gold has been on the upward trend. And in a while its price has reached a plateau but its price has always crept up. It has never gone down.

All the United States has to do if it wants to get out of the jam it is in is to say, "We will not buy or sell gold at $35 an ounce." That is all there is to it and it could do it within the framework of the International Monetary Fund. The president need not go to congress. In fact, I do not see why he should. I do not see why we have to defend the Canadian dollar. It is pegged at 92½ cents United States. Incidentally, much of my information comes from New York international reports. When the Canadian dollar moves down three-quarters of a cent it has got to be defended by the Bank of Canada, but if we had a flexible exchange rate there would be no need to defend it. In the 1920's our dollar went down at one time to 76 cents United States and within one year of that it was selling at a premium. Why did things happen that way? When your dollar goes down the tariff barriers against you go down at the same time. Your exports increase and your imports decrease. It is as simple as that. The marketplace supplies the answer.

I would say that the United States is defending its dollar to save face only. It is saying that an increase in the price of gold would benefit mainly Russia and South Africa. Russia has no store of gold and neither has South Africa. The South African mines produce about $1 billion worth of gold each year but the South Africans use that money to buy commodities all round the world. That action increases international trade. As for Russia, at present they are using their funds for spaceships, armies and navies. If they had twice the amount of gold they would be over here buying pins and needles and the sort of stuff the people in Russia want.

Leaving out Russia and South Africa for the moment, it is obvious that if the price of gold were increased the approximately $42 billion of gold in the western world would double or triple in value. I was reading a book written about 120 years ago by a French economist. He said that the only way to find the price of gold is to see how much gold will buy how much silver. France at that time was on the silver standard. Applying that measurement to gold prices, gold today should be worth $105 an ounce because the price of silver has also gone up.

As for this talk of gold being a monetary measure, how can gold possibly be a monetary measure when in 1967 no gold went into the central banks? Instead, approximately $750 million worth went into industry. Accordingly, gold is a commodity. Why should it not be traded at commodity prices instead of the price that was fixed in 1934?

I cannot understand the thinking of some people in the opposition. Some of them want this paper gold. I think we have got too much paper. The world is swamped in paper. I think we want some restriction and gold has always applied a restriction. Away back in 1840 the Bank of England was checked for issuing too much paper. They had to get back to gold.

What we are facing is very serious and we should be looking into the problem. The Minister of Finance should take this question seriously. Actually I know he takes it seriously but perhaps he cannot talk freely because he moves in the International Monetary Fund circle. All right, that may be so. Along these lines I said to the president of the mining association, "Why don't you people get off your fannies and do something about gold?" He said, "Well, we have tried to do something. We tried away back when Mr. Fleming was finance minister. He went down to Washington and he got rapped so damn hard across the knuckles that no finance minister has dared to go back to Washington since then and mention gold."

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I shall be brief in replying to the comments which have been made and which have carried us far beyond clause 1 of the bill. I can understand the interest and concern of hon. members in the present international crisis. I first wish to say to hon. members who have spoken that I listened most carefully to their comments. I have been much engaged in thinking about the crisis that has existed for some time and I have devoted a good deal of my attention to considering what would be appropriate action not only for this country but for the collectivity of nations.

It is a very serious problem. I have been pointing this out to the house over a period of several weeks and it is one reason why I felt it was very desirable we should proceed with the bill before us. It is also the reason for my announcing a number of other measures to be as certain as we can be that we in Canada are not a cause of disturbance and that our defences are well buttressed so that we do not get brought into the centre of this worldwide disturbance. I say this in response to remarks made by my hon. friend from Leeds who made some comments about the position of the Canadian dollar.

As I said earlier in the house, our trade position is very good, our exports are high, our imports are not rising too rapidly. We are now getting our fiscal situation into what I consider to be a sound position and it is generally recognized, as we saw the other day in a statement by the O.E.C.D., that our fiscal policies, particularly the rapidity with which we have been able to adjust them to meet a changing situation, are commended by the international community.

[Mr. McLean (Charlotte).]

There is no group of nations in the world more important than those that belong to the O.E.C.D. They include all the major industrialized countries, and if they comment that the Canadian economy is strong, that the Canadian dollar is properly priced and that our policies are appropriate to the circumstances, it is a mark in our favour which is not disregarded in the markets of the world. The policies which the O.E.C.D. commended include measures of the kind which are now before us. It has been necessary for us to make it plain to the world that we are determined to maintain a sound economy, this enabling the world as a whole to look at Canada and say: There is a country whose currency is appropriate to its circumstances. I have no hesitation in commending parliament for having taken very seriously the proposals which have been put before it and for discussing today the serious international disturbances which have been engaging our attention.

A number of questions have been asked. I do not think I can answer them all to the satisfaction of the committee but I should like to say something first of all about the relationship between the Canadian dollar, the American dollar and gold. The legal position is that the Canadian dollar is established on the basis of a relationship to the United States dollar and until this relationship is changed whatever happens to the American dollar is reflected in the value of the Canadian dollar. So the sort of comment made by the hon. member for Timiskaming that we might see a 40-cent American dollar and a 60-cent Canadian dollar is not likely to be apposite. The latter at the present time is worth 92½ cents United States and until this relationship is changed by Canada, presumably in consultation with and with the approval of the International Monetary Fund, the present relationship will continue.

Mr. Peters: That relationship is artificial. We have agreed to maintain our dollar at 92½ cents. But if something exceptional were to happen to the United States dollar is it not true that the International Monetary Fund could no longer support the present value of the Canadian dollar in terms of the United States dollar? I mentioned a hypothetical situation in which the United States dollar fell seriously in value. The International Monetary Fund could not maintain the present relationship in such circumstances because it would mean the virtual collapse of the fund.

Mr. Sharp: The hon. member is talking now about a hypothetical situation which is most unlikely to arise. The United States dollar is the principal reserve currency in the world; it is held by central banks or treasuries, in addition to gold. So one cannot devalue the United States dollar. All one can do is change the price of gold. There is no reason to think that if the price of gold were changed or if any change were made in the relationship between gold and the United States dollar this would necessarily disturb the relationship between other world currencies and the American dollar. This is the view I hold, though I cannot say for certain. The relationship is established by other factors—relative costs, purchasing power, and so on.

Mr. Douglas: In the event the price of gold was raised substantially would this not have a serious effect on world liquidity?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Chairman. This is one of the principal reasons why an increase in the price of gold is not a panacea, not necessarily the best way of dealing with the problem of expanding international liquidity. It seems to me and to other ministers of finance who have studied this question that it would be better to have a controlled increase in international liquidity rather than an arbitrary and indiscriminate increase which would come about as a result of an increase in the price of gold. The benefits of such an increase would depend on how much gold a country held, and we must remember that gold is not distributed equally round the world in proportion to the needs of various countries or even in proportion to their reserves. Some countries, such as France and Switzerland, hold a high proportion of their reserves in gold. Others, such as Canada, hold about half. The proportion varies greatly, so an increase in the price of gold would not provide additional liquidity on the basis of need.

Mr. Douglas: How long can the United States continue to buy gold at $35 an ounce when it costs a great deal more than that to produce it?

Mr. Sharp: I do not like to speculate about the actions of the United States because I am not privy to their councils. As I understand it, United States policy so far has been to maintain the price of gold at $35 an ounce. I should explain that the United States is maintaining this price not only in connection with transactions between central banks which present claims on the federal reserve system when they cash United States dollars but it has also been providing gold at the same price in the London gold market, with the result that there is one price for gold throughout the world. As many hon. members have pointed out, very large amounts of gold have been sold in the London gold market, and this is a reflection of the very serious disturbances going on in which very large amounts of gold are disappearing out of stocks into private hoards.

I shall now deal with the final question, that raised by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam about the prospects of getting some agreement and why we have had difficulty. The so-called Group of Ten which comprises the ministers of finance of the ten most important financial countries in the world, as one might say, and Canada happens to be included in that Group of Ten, have been working for some time on the creation of a new type of reserve unit. In Rio this year we approved in principle a system of special drawing rights as a supplement to existing reserves of gold and reserve currencies. It had been understood that these new reserve units, whatever they were to be, were not to be used until they were needed. One of the tests is that they would not relieve the United States of the necessity of dealing with its own balance of payments problem. This has been one of the difficult issues. There is no doubt about it that the United States has been in balance of payments difficulties for a period of years, and these have been greatly exacerbated recently by the Viet Nam war and the unwillingness of the United States to impose taxes in order to pay the cost of that war.

I hesitate to say this because I do not mean it as any reflection on the United States—they make their own decisions—but I do think we in this country have been very wise, albeit with some difficulty, in imposing the necessary taxes upon ourselves so that our finances are in good order. There is no doubt about it that one of the reasons the United States is losing gold and one of the reasons it is in balance of payments difficulties is that it has been unwilling to do what we are doing in this parliament, impose taxes so that their fiscal position would be improved. I think that is all I have to say, Mr. Chairman.

[Translation]

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, I shall be very brief. I would simply like to point out a few things which I think might be useful to my colleagues at this stage of the debate.

I listened patiently to all that has been said on this bill and previous measures, and I think we are facing a situation which should be clear to everyone. We are most of us speaking about a problem which we do not understand and about which we have insufficient experience. I feel it is no presumption to say that, in this house, there are perhaps not more than three or four members who have enough experience of the complexities of international finance and I think that they, who know most about that, are the ones who are asking themselves the most questions.

I say, therefore, that this is not the time to pose as experts and try to settle international or national crises, or to promote our respective ideologies, but I believe that the time has come for us to form a kind of sacred union in order to get through the present crisis. I know that, under normal conditions, it is in order for everybody to make suggestions, in our parliamentary system. But, Mr. Chairman, I think we must draw a line, especially when, in a way, our house is burning. When the house is burning, everybody lends a helping hand to put the fire out; one does not sit idly by discussing the best way of putting it out, one acts. One puts the fire out first, and then one discusses the advisability of improving one's methods.

It is in that spirit, Mr. Chairman, that last evening, although I was quite inclined to do like others and play the giddy-goat before the government and to have the satisfaction of voting against a 3 per cent surtax on personal income tax, I told myself that, in such circumstances, one had to think of the superior interests of the country instead of merely considering our electoral interests. I also thought that if we would not co-operate with the government to prevent a worsening of the crisis, those who would particularly suffer the most would again be the small wage-earners, the pensioners who would see the value of the dollar considerably decrease, the unemployed whose number would appreciably increase, the small and average businesses which would be unable to survive. I think that such considerations should have priority over the interest which could lead us to defeat the government, to launch elections and to be in a position to say: Well, it was defeated by us. But at what cost? By a worsening of a situation which could be disastrous for the country.

[Mr. Mongrain.]

Mr. Chairman, I have listened to all the representations made in this house by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp); I have reread the appeal made to us by the right hon. Prime Minister. I have read the comments in the press on the pathetic appeal made for the twentieth time by President Johnson of the United States, a country with which we have such close economic ties.

I have also read, in yesterday's edition of La Presse, an article in which the author of the Kiplinger Washington Letter made somber predictions concerning the future of the Canadian dollar. I have listened to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and I should like, in passing, to congratulate him on his moderation and abnegation during a debate in the course of which he could easily have demolished the government by all sorts of demagogic arguments.

In view of all this, I have said to myself: this is not the time to hold interminable discussions. This is a time for nation-wide cooperation, for what we are trying to settle is the future of the country and of our electorate. It is not a matter of knowing whether we are smarter than those in power.

In my opinion, those responsible for the future of my country are members of the government legally in power at present, and I feel that regardless of our political affiliation, we should heed the voice of our conscience and tell ourselves: It is a time for co-operation, it is a time for a sacred union in order to spare Canada a disaster. I urge all my colleagues to put an end to all unprofitable discussions on financial theories and on ways to settle national and international crises. Let us leave it to the government to assume its responsibilities. If it is wrong, we can always call it to account at the next election, but the Canadian people will not be able to blame us for having systematically caused trouble, for selfish reasons, at this critical time.

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Chairman, I had a question to put to the hon. Minister of Finance. Unfortunately, he did not understand it. I had asked why the Bank of Canada was allowed to fiddle around with the interest rates. Those rates were kept, for several years, I believe, at 2, 2½, 3 per cent and the economy was more stable than today.

That is the question I put to the hon. minister and I should like to have a reply.

I have many other questions to put to him, but I shall do so only when he has given me a reply. I demand a reply from the hon. minister, provided he understood me this time: why is the Bank of Canada allowed to manipulate the interest rate?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member still did not understand me. This time I should like him to understand me.

I asked why the manipulation of the interest rate of the Bank of Canada was allowed? Why is the Bank of Canada allowed to increase or lower its rate?

What are the results of the increase in the rate of the Bank of Canada? The present consequence, is the imbalance of our economy.

• (5:20 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, the bank rate is a reflection of conditions in the money markets. The bank rate does not make interest rates. Interest rates are determined in Canada by a variety of factors, one of the most important being the relationship between our interest rates here and the interest rates in other countries because Canada, as the hon. member knows, is one of the largest importers of capital of any country in the world. If we are to continue to have access to that capital, our rates of return must be sufficiently attractive that the money that we need for the development of the country will come here. That money cannot be provided internally; it must be provided by the external receipts which are needed to buy the goods and services which we import.

[Translation]

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Chairman, I do not have much to say about that. The answer given by the hon. minister is not very logical and I believe the manipulation of the interest rate of the Bank of Canada would not be necessary, because this permits an increase in the interest rate at the present time.

I should like to ask the hon. minister why he is not tackling the high interest rate we have at present. Why not let that rate go down? It seems to me that if the rate of interest were lowered, it would help to stabilize the economy, to lower the costs of big as well as small enterprise. It seems to me that in this way the "price" and the "money" figures could agree with one another, as they should.

Banks are lending money for housing at a 10 per cent rate of interest and I believe that is illogical. There are even some that lend money at 18 and 20 per cent for industrial loans, to various municipalities, school boards—

[English]

The Chairman: Order, please.

[Translation]

Mr. Latulippe: I believe the rates of interest should go down now—

[English]

The Chairman: Order. I apologize for interrupting the hon. member for Compton-Frontenac. I recognize that up to this point the debate has been rather wide in scope. However, perhaps I might suggest to members of the committee that we confine our remarks more closely to the bill before us which deals with an amendment to the Income Tax Act.

[Translation]

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Chairman, in this case, I will simply ask the hon. minister: where does the financial system end? Does a financial system have to be a system organized for the exploitation of the community or for financing purposes?

A financial system, it seems to me, should finance the economy of a country, of all organizations, of every individual. If a financial system does not do that, it does not perform its function. The financial system certainly does not perform its task at the present time, since it does not finance the economy of the country; is fact, it exploits to such an extent the economic organizations, that the citizens are left to die of hunger, to die by all sorts of ways, on mountains of wheat. In my opinion, the financial system should be reformed, thought over and ways to do so should be found. If the means we advocate are not satisfactory to the government, let them find some other means to finance our economy and balance the budgets of the federal, provincial, municipal and school administrations.

Nothing is balanced anymore. The economy is upside down, completely unbalanced and the solutions offered at the present time tend only to raise the cost of living, create problems, impose restraints of all kinds, prevent the Canadian citizens from building and expanding their country and prevent the Canadian people from working.

Soon, all the Canadian people will receive unemployment benefits or they will depend on public assistance. Therefore, if the number of the citizens who work is almost inexistent in Canada, how many in this country will live?

The Minister of Finance does not find another solution at the present time, other than restricting credit and increasing interest rates. There is no alternative other than preventing the Canadian citizens from dealing with financial matters. That is the reason why we let the interest rate go up in every field, when they are already unreasonable and exorbitant. That interest rate ruins the Canadian economy. It should be lowered and brought within the reach of the citizens, but not one hon. member asks for reforms, for something for the people, for a balanced economy.

If the International Bank does not meet the needs of our country, we do not have to follow the international regulations. Our country is a sovereign country and I think that we can find other means than those suggested by the international finance which has always exploited the people. For war purposes, money is easily found, there is no talk of financial nonsense. But in peace time, we talk of financial nonsense, we accept restraints, all kind of things which are contrary to the essential needs of the people.

There is a serious problem in Canada. We should understand once for all that we must find the means to settle it, at least to enable our people to live, build and flourish. Let us see to it that our population have three meals a day and a decent house to live in. This is the reason for the existence of a government. It is the object of a financial system. It is also the duty of the Minister of Finance who has all that responsibility on his shoulders.

Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Finance is responsible for the economy of Canada. If he really wanted, he could find other means, more logical, more permanent, more appropriate to accommodate the people of Canada and enable them to live decently and honestly in their country which abounds in resources.

[English]

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, from listening to the speeches made on this clause I have not understood it up until now. I gather, however, that it is a relatively new departure in terms of public policy because it would permit a person to deduct the full amount of any gift made to Canada or to any agency that the Canadian parliament establishes such as the Canada Council which I presume falls in this category. It would permit the deduction of the full amount of any gift without regard to the 10 per cent ceiling which would pertain to the type of gift a person might make to a province, and I assume that would include any municipality. Canadian municipalities are included, but in relation to the whole bill I do not know just what this means. I assume that a person can deduct gifts to municipalities and to provinces having regard to the 10 per cent ceiling.

• (5:30 p.m.)

I suggest that once the government embarked upon this course it should have also taken into account the amount of municipal land taxes that individual home owners pay. It has been advanced by the President of the Treasury Board and his predecessor that municipal taxes represent one of the greatest costs to individuals who want to acquire homes. This can be related directly to the cost of services.

Taxes in Ottawa range from $400 to $500 for homes valued in the neighbourhood of $16,000 to $18,000. It seems to me that municipal taxes of this kind are involuntary gifts to municipalities. It may not be that the minister when drafting this bill had in mind that a person would be able to deduct municipal taxes as gifts. He shakes his head and smiles. I gather he did not intend that interpretation. This was obviously an oversight on his part. We invariably find that the greater burden of taxation is carried by individuals in the lower income bracket.

Another factor to be considered is the high rate of interest on mortgages. These rates have increased very sharply in the last few years. This is the direct result of government action, and a larger bite is being taken in this way out of the income of the individual. Not long ago a motion appeared on the order paper dealing with this matter. It suggested generally that there should be some relief for those people who have to pay land taxes. It would seem to me that by allowing home owners to deduct municipal taxes in the same way as gifts these people would be treated more fairly than they are at this time.

As I read this clause I cannot think of anybody who would be able to take advantage of the tax relief. No one I know is sufficiently affluent to be in a position to make gifts to provinces, the federal government or an agency thereof.

An hon. Member: You don't know the right people.

Mr. Howard: The people I have been associated with all my life make lots of involuntary gifts to provinces, municipalities and the federal government by way of taxes. It seems to me that this clause again favours those people who have a sufficiently large income that they can make large gifts to agencies of government. Apparently they are to be allowed to deduct the entire amount of such gifts, probably amounting to thousands of dollars, from their net incomes.

On the surface this seems to be a favourable piece of legislation but I submit that it is in fact discriminatory. The 10 per cent ceiling in so far as gifts to charitable organizations are concerned is to be maintained. The average taxpayer makes gifts to organizations such as the Red Cross and others that partake in the red feather campaign. They make contributions in amounts of $5 or $10 but they are limited as to the amount they may deduct from income for purposes of taxation. The clause before us has reference really to millionaires who are in a position to make large gifts to governments or their agents. They will be allowed to deduct the entire contribution from net income. I would be more disposed to accept the clause if the minister would indicate that individuals who make gifts to municipalities and provinces in the form of taxes could deduct them from net income.

Persistently throughout the debate on the successive bills the minister has introduced, those rejected by parliament or by the Speaker, we have talked in terms of the necessity to provide tax relief for the individual, the working stiff or the guy in the lower income bracket. It is obvious from this tax measure the government is not concerned about that individual. Once again the government wants to extract everything it can from the wage earner who is not in a position to deduct living and travelling expenses from his taxable income as the businessman is able to do. These people have been forgotten again.

Some individuals have suggested we should support this clause because it does offer tax relief. It does not offer any tax relief to those individuals who most need it. The wage earner is not able to juggle his income or cook his books in order to receive more favourable tax treatment. He is unable to make any adjustments whatsoever because the tax is deducted at source. All the clause offers him is the opportunity to make a contribution to a municipality or to a government or its agencies. He can still, of course, make small contributions to service organizations and deduct these from net income up to a ceiling of 10 per cent. The fact that the amendment says that an individual can deduct the total amount of any gift made to a municipality or a government indicates again that special treatment is being given to the rich.

Because of the discriminatory nature of clause I I cannot see why it should be supported. But I could support it if the minister would undertake to make, if not a straight declaration of intent at a specific time, at least some declaration about land taxes and the interest rates which people have to pay in order that some counterbalancing recognition would be given by the government to those from whom it is extracting the most taxes. If the minister will give us any assurances in this regard I will be very interested in listening to them.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, as I explained in reply to the hon. member for Carleton, all this clause does is extend to gifts to the crown in right of the provinces the same treatment as has been accorded until now to gifts to the crown in right of Canada. I can assure the hon. member that since I have been Minister of Finance I have looked several times at the proposals that have been made that taxes on property or interest on mortgage debt should be deductible from taxable income. I have never been persuaded that this was particularly equitable and I was confirmed in this view by the views of the Carter commission, with which my hon. friend's party is apparently in very close agreement.

The members of that commission, after investigating these very proposals, came out very strongly against them on the ground that it was not equitable as between home owners and tenants, and so on. Indeed, the Carter commission almost recommended that the imputed rent on owner-occupied houses should be subject to tax. They wanted to move the other way altogether and tax home owners even more than they are now taxed. This is the view the Carter commission came to. I mention this as further evidence that it is a very arguable proposition whether it is equitable to deduct either property taxes or mortgage interest.

In my case, one of the reasons I live in a house that I own rather than an apartment is that it really pays me because I do not have to pay tax on imputed income. Perhaps I should, but I certainly should not be permitted, I think, to deduct from my income the taxes I pay and—well, I do not have a mortgage but if I had, the interest on the mortgage.

Mr. Howard: You are lucky not to have a mortgage. How did you reach that stage? It is interesting that the minister has finally found something in the Carter commission report to which he can attach himself. It is obviously a peculiarly isolated attachment to one aspect only of the Carter commission report. As I understand it, the proposals of the Carter commission related to a total picture and a total package. The commission did not consider land taxes in isolation and look at them all by themselves. What is required is that we look at the total tax structure as it has grown up in Canada. This is what the Carter commission did and it came to a number of conclusions with regard to that total picture.

The commissioner was considering the total picture of the tax structure in Canada when he talked about the favouritism that exists in the tax structure with respect to a number of industries in this country. The commissioner also came to the conclusion that we should consider a dollar of income as a dollar liable to taxation. It was in this context that the Carter commission made its report. Therefore the fact that the minister extracts from the report of that commission a particular view with which he happens to agree does not in the total sense, I think, make that view invalid and it does not give him grounds for advancing it as a reason for disregarding or discarding the concept about which we are talking.

If I own a home and rent a room or own an apartment block and rent apartments I can deduct for taxation purposes the expenditures incurred by me in running whatever business I am running, whether it is renting one room or renting a whole apartment block. Included in these expenses are land taxes. It is quite true that in this sense the corporation that owns a block of apartments or the individual renting a suite extracts from the tenants sufficient money to help pay the total bill and leave a profit. But the tenants do not receive any consideration in their rent because the individual who owns the building is able to deduct the amount he pays in property taxes and on maintenance and the like. The owner of the house or apartment block can deduct these things from his tax bill.

[Mr. Sharp.]

The minister did not say that our point was invalid; he said it was arguable. I submit that he cannot reject it with any validity, and any reasonable assumption that anybody will accept his rejection, on the basis that he has taken from the report of the Carter commission one or two paragraphs simply to substantiate his point of view, unless he is willing to accept the whole of the report of the commission. I say this because the report of the Carter commission was a package proposition. All I can read into the minister's remarks is that once again here is an indication that the interests of the average wage earner, the only person who cannot escape the payment of income tax, have been disregarded.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to see so many Liberals in the house this afternoon and to find that they are still vocal. I would like to comment on the first clause of this bill. I thought I had spoken on it earlier but found that what I said bore no relationship at all to the clause under discussion. When I read the clause I was not only surprised to find that but also to find that donors would be allowed to make gifts to a province and deduct the amount of their gift from their income for tax purposes. Like the hon. member for Skeena I was shocked that anyone would feel inclined to make such a gift.

The minister in his explanation pointed out that this provision included a number of agencies of the federal government that are now being supported, at least partially, by gifts of this kind. I presume the minister was referring to federally sponsored research, probably some forms of the arts, the Company of Young Canadians and similar agencies which are accepting gifts in this way. I ask the minister how he justifies this provision. I do not know when the provision was passed, although I have looked at a number of the amendments to the act.

I presume the minister is aware of the amount of money being donated to the federal government by individuals and corporations. I am sure the minister has studied this matter because for the past few weeks he has been telling us that the government needs more money. This is obviously not a way in which to get more money. It is a way to allow a redistribution of money. In this case it is putting money into the provincial rather than the federal field. Perhaps there should be a discussion of the relationship of this provision to the federal and provincial fields. I should like to know whether the minister has considered with the provinces the kind of dispensation there should be in respect of these gifts, and why this amendment does not include those responsible agencies of the provincial governments which should receive gifts.

In the province of Ontario, and particularly in the districts and unorganized townships of northern Ontario, there is what is called a land tax. This is not what the hon. member for Skeena referred to. This tax, which is collected by the department of lands and forests, is no better than a gift because we receive absolutely nothing in return for it. It is imposed on non-agricultural land held by an individual. In theory the government, in return for the tax, is supposed to provide fire protection. I wonder whether the minister considers that this land tax, which is really a gift, is subject to the provisions of the bill.

I should like to know why, when we are being asked to pass this amendment, we are not provided with a list of acceptable organizations in the provinces. I am not likely to be in the financial position to make donations to the University of Toronto but there are two or three people in my riding who may be rich enough to do that and take advantage of the income tax exemption. They may find that subclause 2 will allow them to include part of that donation in next year's income tax returns.

I can see the cancer society in the province of Ontario being supportet by donations from estates. There is a growing desire on the part of many families to request contributions in money rather than floral tributes. The minister appears to be giving a carte blanche cheque to anyone who wishes to make a donation to any of the provincially sponsored charities, unless he limits the number of those charities. The provision would also mean that if the government wanted to set one up it could be set up specifically for this purpose. Of course there may be regulations with respect to the provision but I wonder why hon. members seem to be so impatient to pass this amendment without knowing what it relates to.

I have always been concerned about amendments which do not state what they intend. In this case, whom will this amendment affect? I suggest that the minister may be giving away a considerable portion in taxes to the provinces and the result could be a loss of income to the federal government which he may not have fully anticipated. I am certainly not implying that his officials have not considered this matter but I think members of parliament should have some say as to the organizations to which tax free gifts can be made. I believe that a list of them should be attached as a schedule to the bill.

Mr. Sharp: To satisfy the hon. member may I say that Her Majesty in right of Canada is of course the government of Canada or any agency that is designated as an agency of the government. It does not apply to anyone else. This applies similarly to the provinces. Whatever agency it may be, it must in fact be the province or an emanation of the province. It cannot be a mixed corporation. It must be an agency that is the same as the provincial government or an aspect of it.

Mr. Peters: May I ask a question with respect to the example which I used of the University of Toronto? Certainly the Ontario government controls and operates it, with outside assistance. Would this provision apply to a donation to the University of Toronto?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Chairman, it would be treated as a charitable donation which under the act would be subject to the 10 per cent limitation.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Filibuster. Shame.

Mr. Howard: The hon. members who are now yapping may not be concerned about the income of the federal government, but I have some questions to ask of the minister.

Mr. Barnett: We might not be in this position if some of these gentlemen had been here on February 19.

Mr. Howard: Yes, but the fact is we are here and the minister has presented a bill to the house asking parliament to approve a provision which will reduce the income of the crown. Could the minister give us his estimate of the loss of income or the difference between last year's and this year's income as a result of this provision?

Mr. Sharp: I do not think this will have an appreciable effect upon revenues. The purpose is to encourage those wealthy individuals, who might otherwise be tempted to give their donations to United States art galleries and so on, to give them, for example, to the province of Ontario as part of their art collection, as well as to the national gallery. The effect upon the revenues is infinitesimal. I do not think there is a sufficient number of these wealthy individuals with art collections or with material of this kind which they would wish to donate outright to the crown, whether in right of Canada or in right of a province.

Mr. Howard: It would seem to me, since there is no limit, that this is all the more reason why centres of education should be included under the provision so as to attract greater contributions from these wealthy individuals instead of imposing the 10 per cent ceiling. Would the inclusion in this clause of centres of higher learning such as the University of Toronto or the University of British Columbia, so that gifts to them would not be subject to the 10 per cent ceiling, be considered by the minister as an acceptable amendment?

Mr. Sharp: I do not think it would be advisable to go that far. The hon. member knows there are many institutions which would demand the same treatment. This would have a serious effect upon the revenues and I think would give relief to people to whom there is no intention of giving relief under this legislation.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Corporations.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I recall that with respect to a similar clause in a previous bill the minister indicated he anticipated an additional revenue of $240 million. Is that still the situation?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Chairman. The amount is approximately the same. There is some difference as a result of the change in the schedule of payments but the addition of the 3 per cent surtax makes it all up. So we are expecting about $240 million.

Mr. Howard: Does that $240 million not include the 3 per cent corporate sales tax?

Mr. Sharp: I have delayed in answering the hon. member for Skeena because I wanted to be accurate in my answer and was looking at my notes. The new pattern will result in some companies not making as many payments in the 1968-69 fiscal year as they would have under the schedule in Bill C-193, but this is almost exactly offset by the fact that the payments which are made will be greater by reason of the 3 per cent corporation surtax. But of course within a few weeks or months they would be paying some more, so there is no relief in the total amount of the speed-up. It just comes in at a somewhat different time.

Mr. Howard: Do I understand that the income from this amount is really income which in previous years has been paid as arrearages rather than in the current year?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Chairman. As I explained once before when the previous bill was under consideration, what we are doing now is dealing with the corporation tax on a more up to date basis closer to the way in which individuals pay their tax. The result is that in this next year we will be getting from corporations another $240 million that they will never get back. This is an addition to our revenues. It is an additional amount that corporations must provide to us. The only condition under which they would ever get it back would be if they went out of business.

• (6:00 p.m.)

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, when I used the word "arrearages" I did not use it in the sense that the deadline for paying these arrearages had been passed, in other words, that the corporations had been permitted to drag on into subsequent years payment of taxes for a previous year and all that was being done was updating the payment. In this case it is not additional money; it is merely compressing the first year's payment into a shorter period of time and carrying on in that way in the future.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, so there is no doubt about this—this is a point about which there does appear to be some misunderstanding—the corporations will be required to pay $240 million more taxes than they would had we continued under the old schedule. As confirmation of that, when we put individuals on a pay as you go basis some years ago we forgave the amount of the additional liability. In fact this is an additional imposition on the corporations which they never retrieve unless they go out of business.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Mr. Cowan: No, Mr. Chairman. I waited for the question asked by the hon. member for Skeena and I rose the minute that the minister had answered the question. We are now on clause 2 of Bill No. C-208. Shall I call it six o'clock?

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. It being six o'clock shall I rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again later this day?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at ten o'clock tonight are as follows: the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), Income Tax; the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell), Public Service; the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Orange), Northern Affairs.

It being six o'clock the house will now proceed—

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, before you call the next order, there has been some conversation among members and I have a suggestion to make that may meet with the consent of the house. It is that the house make an order that in the consideration of private members' business the house take only that period of time during the hour that is necessary to deal with and dispose of item No. 1, which is Bill No. C-105 relating to Rainbow Pipe Line Corporation, and that having concluded our disposition of the bill the house then adjourn for supper.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions (papers), private bills, public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

RAINBOW PIPE LINE CORPORATION

On the order:

House again in committee of the whole on Bill C-105, an act to incorporate Rainbow Pipe Line Corporation (Without Amendment)—Mr. Orange.

Mr. R. J. Orange (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Do I understand that the hon. member for Northwest Territories is asking for the floor before we read the order for the house to go into committee of the whole?

Mr. Orange: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have a point of order. In view of the fact that this bill will not be passed by the house because the sponsors of the bill are not prepared to make any amendments, I ask leave of the house to withdraw the bill from the order paper.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Northwest Territories has moved that the said order be discharged and that the bill be withdrawn. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and bill withdrawn.

Mr. McNulty: Mr. Speaker, I believe there is unanimous agreement to rise now until eight o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps it would be more orderly if we resumed in committee of the whole so that business can continue at eight o'clock.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR SURCHARGE

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-208, to amend the Income Tax Act—Mr. Sharp—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: Pursuant to special order I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Chairman: Order, please. House again in committee of supply on Bill C-208 to amend the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, when the committee adjourned I had taken the floor to ask a question of the Minister of Finance. He is not here at the moment, therefore I am willing to put my question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare regarding clause 2.

I maintain that clause 2 of Bill C-208 is the same as clause 4 in Bill C-193 which was disposed of by this house on February 19. In citation 163 of Beauchesne's fourth edition you will find authority for the proposition that mere alteration of the words of a question without any substantial change in its object will not be sufficient. I would ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare if he will outline to me what the substantial change is in clause 2 of Bill C-208, as compared with clause 4 of Bill C-193 which was disposed of.

The expert who was authorized by the cabinet to write explanatory notes on Bill C-193 described clause 4 this way:

> This amendment would require corporations to pay their corporation income tax over a period which commences two months closer to the beginning of their taxation year than at present.

He continues on for more paragraphs. The gentleman who wrote the explanatory note for clause 2 in Bill C-208 wrote about clause 2:

> This amendment would require corporations to pay their corporation income tax over a period which commences two months closer to the beginning of their taxation year than at present.

Those are exactly the same words as in Bill C-193, and the explanatory note continues on for quite a few paragraphs, exactly the same as the explanatory note in Bill C-193. I am simply following in the steps of the Minister of Finance who yesterday asked the Leader of the Opposition—he said he was not doing so by way of personal needling—for the full gist of his argument. I am asking to get the full gist of what the cabinet meant in bringing in a bill which, as I said yesterday, strikes me by its resemblance in clause 2 to the former clause 4 in Bill C-193. May I have a detailed explanation as to the difference which makes it possible to bring that bill forward despite citation 163 in Beauchesne, which says:

> —without any substantial change in its object—

Some hon. Members: Question, question.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Finance has finally come in. As I said, I would be happy with an explanation by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. If he does not wish to give an answer I should like to speak a little further. If he does not intend to answer my question I should like to speak further now.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, there are differences between this clause and the similar clause in Bill C-193. These differences relate to the time of the payment of the instalments of taxes in order to make up the moving forward of the tax. These represent, I believe, some fairly substantial changes and I remember that His Honour, when he was dealing with the bill, recognized this and took exception to four other clauses in the bill which were the same. On that basis I reintroduced this bill, which is Bill C-208. It was my understanding that he did not take exception to this clause as being the same as the clause in the previous bill. That, I understand, was His Honour's ruling and I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that I can say anything more.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, I would ask the Minister of Finance where the difference is when, under Bill C-193, by making ten monthly payments you end up in exactly the same place as you get to under Bill C-208 by making five bi-monthly payments. You end up in exactly the same place, in exactly the same amount. How does this fit in with "without any substantial change in its object"?

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, Mr. Speaker has already ruled on these questions. Surely, this is purely an academic question at this stage.

Mr. Ricard: It is a new bill.

Mr. Nicholson: After hearing arguments from all sides of the house Mr. Speaker made his decision. He pointed out that there were differences in certain sections of the new bill before the house and none in others. Surely it is academic to be entering into further discussions, to be asking questions at this time and attempting to sit in judgment on the Speaker of this house.

Mr. Teillet: That is right.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cowan: That's the spirit, boys. Don't wait for the argument. I have deliberately not mentioned Mr. Speaker's name or brought him into the discussion, but it was he who suggested to me to raise this point during argument on the bill.

An hon. Member: I doubt that.

Mr. Cowan: Thank you. I will repeat that again. The Speaker himself suggested to me that I could raise the point during argument on the bill.

Mr. Woolliams: That must have been told to you confidentially.

Mr. Cowan: I did not bring the matter up tonight—

Mr. Woolliams: Man, oh man.

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 agreed to.

On clause 4.

Mr. Orlikow: I intend to oppose this clause in the same way as we have opposed every suggestion by this government and this minister to raise taxes at this time. Obviously, for 1968 the minister is proposing solutions for Canada's economic troubles that have been proposed by practically every government since the 1920's, when the economy has been in trouble. Those solutions failed then and, inevitably, this solution will fail now.

The minister says that the way to cure our ills is to increase taxes and decrease the purchasing power of the Canadian people. Inevitably that must lead to greater unemployment. Deliberately the minister is following policies that will foster greater unemployment.

Recent figures released by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics relating to the Department of Manpower and Immigration prove that what we said a few months ago, when the minister first made his proposals, has come true. For the benefit of committee members I shall read these figures, contained in an article which appeared in todays Ottawa Journal:

> Unemployment in February rose to 482,000, up 18,000 from January, and represented 6.4 per cent of the labor force, highest level since March of 1964 . . .
> The February unemployment figure was 86,000 higher than the same month of last year . . .
> The February percentage of unemployed, 6.4, compared with 6.1 per cent in January and 5.4 per cent in February of last year. Two years ago the February rate was five per cent.

The increased personal and corporation taxes undoubtedly will increase the numbers of unemployed. An examination of the regional figures shows what difficulties we are heading into. In the Atlantic provinces 67,000 in February were unemployed. In Quebec, 179,000 were unemployed early this year; in Ontario there were 130,000, on the prairies 48,000 and in British Columbia 58,000.

What the minister has done can bring comfort to only one group of people in this country, that is, the forces of Quebec which are looking forward to separation. If unemployment in Quebec continues to rise at its present rate, what better argument could be advanced that federation cannot meet the needs of that province? Unemployment is rising everywhere and the policies the minister is following will make the situation even worse.

Opposition to what the minister is doing has come from many sources. Last month the Canadian Labour Congress and the Confederation of National Trade Unions made their annual submissions to the government. While these two organizations have differences about such matters as Bill C-186, their submissions with regard to economic and social matters are remarkable in their similarity. I wish briefly to put on record what the Confederation of National Trade Unions had to say in this respect. I quote this union rather than the Canadian Labour Congress because of the close association which some of the ministers opposite have had and perhaps still have, with that organization.

After all, the brother of the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development was the secretary of the Confederation of National Trade Unions, and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration was president of that confederation before he came here as a cabinet minister. I see the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development in his place. I wish to put on record what that confederation has said, because it bears directly on the proposals we are discussing today. The report I have here, which I shall summarize, states:

> The Confederation of National Trade Unions advocated yesterday stimulation rather than restraint of the economy, which it described as socially anarchic. The C.N.T.U. urged the recreation of a prices board and institution of some of the main proposals of the Carter royal commission on taxation.
> Sprinkled liberally throughout its annual presentation to the cabinet were suggestions that the government is creating a situation where the rich are getting richer and the poor getting poorer.

I will come back to that point in a few moments. The brief continued, according to this press report:

> The fine promises of a great society which lit up the eyes of the population seven or eight years ago and preserved among the masses a spark of friendship for the system governing us have had hardly any follow-up.
> The brief urged implementation of the Carter commission's recommendations that capital gains be taxed, corporation and personal income taxes be integrated and that a progressive tax rate be instituted.

I find this interesting because the Minister of Finance has on a number of occasions been highly critical of members of this group who have urged the implementation of the Carter commission recommendations. He has sought to create the impression that in doing so we were advocating a course contrary to the best interests of the working people of this country, a charge we have consistently denied. The briefs submitted by the Confederation of National Trade Unions and by the Canadian Labour Congress, both endorsing the basic proposals of the Carter commission and urging the government to implement them now, show clearly the line taken by these organizations which between them represent almost two million Canadians who work for wages.

Instead of doing this, the minister tells us that because we are in financial difficulties a surcharge of 3 per cent on personal income tax must be levied, accompanied by an increase in corporation taxes. Rather than implement the Carter commission report the hon. gentleman is penalizing those who are already paying more than they ought to pay. At the same time he allows those corporations which are in the select group of resource based industries to get away scot free, as they have all the time.

In addition, the minister and the Prime Minister have sought to create the impression that the reason for our difficulties at the present time is that we have permitted wage increases which are unreasonably large, in excess of the ability of the economy to stand, more than the increase in our productivity justifies, and so on. The Prime Minister said in his speech—and I quote from page 7 of the press release giving the text:

> Corporation profits, which in the early years of expansion had risen strongly to relatively high levels, have, however, declined significantly in the course of the past two years.

That is true. But I wish that in the years when corporation profits were high, back in 1965 and 1966, we had heard from the Prime Minister, as well as from the president of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Rasminsky, who has also been making appeals for restraint lately, appeals directed to the corporations along the lines of those we hear today directed to workers and trade unionists urging them to exercise restraint and common sense.

One example of the inability or refusal of the government to urge restraint on those who ought to show it is the case which came up a couple of months ago when first Noranda Copper, then International Nickel and Hudson Bay Mining increased the price of copper by more than 25 per cent. Members of this party raised the matter with the Minister of Finance who promised to look into the situation.

He did so, and eventually we got a statement from the Minister of Trade and Commerce in which the hon. gentleman explained that world prices of copper had risen to such an extent that a 25 per cent increase in prices in Canada by the companies I have mentioned was actually quite moderate. The fact is that the profits of those private companies have never been as high as they are at the present time. But they did not feel called upon to exercise any restraint. After all, there is a war on in Viet Nam, there is a fantastic demand for copper, there is a copper strike in progress in the United States, removing domestic producers in that country from the picture, so why not get all the market will bear? Accordingly they raised their prices by more than 25 per cent. And what did the Minister of Trade and Commerce say, speaking for the government? The increase, he told us, was quite a reasonable one and the companies were acting reasonably.

In the face of this attitute I suggest that the proposal of the government for the establishment of a board to look into prices and, I suppose, into wages—certainly not into profits, because it would be too much to expect this government to appoint a board to look into exorbitant profits made by corporations—will prove as useless and as fruitless an effort as most of the measures the minister has put forward.

• (8:20 p.m.)

We intend to vote against this tax bill because we believe that increased taxes at a time of increasing unemployment will make the situation worse rather than better. If we want to use the resources of Canada in manpower and materials to meet the need for homes, schools, hospitals and recreation centres we should not increase taxes, rather we should cut them.

I have another reason for voting against this tax proposal. Indeed it is my intention to vote against any proposal made by the government to increase taxes, as long as it refuses to face up to the need to wipe out the tremendous inequities in our taxation system. If we had an equitable taxation system the special interests in this country such as the mining companies, the insurance companies and the trust companies would be paying tens of millions of dollars more each year in taxes than they are now paying.

These special interests have done a wonderful job in confusing the Canadian public. According to them one would think the Carter commission was a group of wild eyed socialists who had no experience with business, who know nothing about the tax system or about anything else. The facts are the exact opposite. The Carter commission was appointed in 1962 by the Conservative government under the leadership of the right hon. member for Prince Albert. Mr. Kenneth Carter was a former director of the Canadian Tax Foundation. The commission hired a large staff of competent, well trained experts who spent about three years making their studies. The study cost $3½ million, and the report has been greeted with approval by everybody except the Minister of Finance and the special interests who, it seems to me, he is here to represent and to defend.

The Carter commission on taxation found that essentially Canada has an unfair tax system. It found that billions of dollars of income are escaping tax altogether, or enjoying tax privileges which make the burden of taxation on the rest of the people of Canada that much greater. It recommended lower taxes for income groups making less than $10,000 a year, and higher taxes for those making over $10,000 a year, and taxes for persons making capital gains. The commission's recommendations would have benefited 95 per cent of the people of Canada. Conversely they would have hurt the 5 per cent who get special privileges under the present tax system. Naturally we heard ad nauseam from the 5 per cent as to the inequities and iniquities in the proposals of the Carter commission.

While these special interests represent only 5 per cent of the people of Canada obviously they have the ear of the Minister of Finance and of the government because the minister has found innumerable reasons to ignore the commission's recommendations and to refuse to implement them, saying that further study is needed, and going into great detail about the difficulties of implementing the recommendations. In my opinion, as long as we have this minister and this government in office it is unlikely that the Canadian people will see the Carter commission's basic recommendations implemented.

What did the Carter commission find out? As I said a moment ago, it found out that the present taxation system does not afford fair taxation for all Canadians. It found that the present tax structure has led to Canadians being less well off, through the lack of goods and services that could be provided by more efficient use of labour, capital and natural resources. It found that compliance and collection costs have been needlessly raised by duplication in provincial and federal administrations; and that the federal tax administration is open to political influence. I will come back to that point in a moment, Mr. Chairman, when I examine the reason why the government has not yet implemented a capital gains tax.

The commission also said:

> We are fully aware that these conclusions constitute a severe criticism of the present tax system. They were not arrived at lightly nor are they the result of pre-conceived opinions.
>
> Whenever conflicts arose in our proposals—they were reconciled in favour of equity.
> We are convinced that preserving and developing the system by scrupulously fair taxes must override all other objectives.

With respect to the privileged groups that I have mentioned, it recommended that mining companies should have their depletion allowances removed. It pointed out that 85 per cent of the benefits of such allowances go to only eight oil and mining companies, most of which do not need this incentive. Removing these exemptions would provide a minimum of $150 million a year to the treasury. Mr. Chairman, that is the 1964 calculation, and I suggest that the 1968 calculation would show an even greater amount.

The commission found that the uranium industry, in its existence up to 1964, on an investment of just one quarter of a billion dollars made a profit on that investment of over $250 million, or 100 per cent, but that it paid only $30 million in taxes. I remind hon. members of the comments of my colleague, the hon. member for Sudbury, who pointed out that the uranium industry left individual miners in Elliot Lake to carry the burden of paying for homes, when they had no jobs left. The industry left the local municipality with the cost of paying for services, for lights, sewers and schools that had been built, in expectation that it was a permanent industry. The industry itself got off scot free.

The commission pointed out that in 1964 revenues to Canadian insurance companies exceeded expenditures by $90 million, including policy dividends and increases in reserves. Income tax was paid on only $5 million of that amount, and amounted to $2 million. At the same time Canadian insurance companies, with about 30 per cent of their business abroad, paid $13,800,000, or six times as much, to foreign governments. Foreign companies paid no income tax on a comparable amount of insurance sold in Canada. Had the prosperous insurance companies been taxed on the same basis as other corporations, in 1964 they would have paid $77 million instead of $2 million.

This is the kind of tax system which apparently the minister wants to perpetuate, and in order to do so he is asking hon. members to approve an increase in personal income tax that will affect every taxpayer in Canada, an increase of 3 per cent, and an increase in taxation on corporations which are already paying their fair share of taxes. The minister is doing this in order to continue the completely despicable system of permitting oil, mining, and insurance companies to continue paying virtually no taxation at all.

I pointed out recently that the Pine Point operation owned by Cominco in three years made a profit of over $80 million, and because of the three year tax free period will not pay five cents in taxes on that money. I think it is ironical that the railway which was built in order to bring the ore out of the Pine Point mine was built by the C.N.R. I presume it was financed in the usual way by the government of Canada borrowing money on which interest must have been paid.

The Carter commission recommended that all income be taxable. If one strips away the technical language in the report this would seem to mean that income from stocks options should be taxable, that gifts should be taxable, and that income of any kind whether in the form of unemployment insurance payments, compensation payments, sickness benefits, and so on should be taxable. Of course we are told that the workers do not wish to pay a tax on these items. No one wants to pay taxes.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the amount of tax a worker would pay on unemployment payments or compensation would not be very much. This would be a small price for the ordinary worker to pay, if as part of the package the corporations paid their fair share of taxes, if those engaged in profiteering paid a fair share of the taxes and if those engaged in gambling and games paid a fair share of the taxes. Many people would not like to pay these taxes, but if we went along with the other proposals of the Carter commission which would benefit the bulk of the Canadian people they would be very happy to pay taxes on these items which I have mentioned.

The Carter commission recommended that block tax credit be given for secondary education costs and that a capital gains tax be applied to property. The commission also recommended that there be limits on expense account living. One cannot go into any expensive restaurant any day of the week in the cities of Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, Winnipeg, Calgary or Vancouver without seeing a large number of people eating expensive lunches which are paid for almost completely by the people of Canada, because these lunches are charged to the cost of doing business.

The Carter commission also recommended taxation of families as units, with a provision for averaging year to year income fluctuations over a five year period. I have mentioned some of the recommendations contained in the Carter commission report. This party and other organizations, as well as individuals, have been calling on the government to implement these provisions. The government has refused to do this. This is not surprising when one realizes what this means to certain important industries. The mining industry on the basis of 1964 figures probably would have paid taxes on an additional $130 million or $150 million per year. Naturally the mining industry is opposed to the implementation of the Carter commission report. Unfortunately the minister seems to have listened to those engaged in that industry. The insurance companies would have paid taxes on profits of $90 million but they paid a tax on less than $5 million.

I think it is scandalous that the minister has refused to bring forward the slightest hope that the government of Canada would follow the example of virtually every other country in the western world in implementing a capital gains tax. I should like to place on the record the views in this regard of a man who certainly cannot be called a wide eyed radical. I am speaking of Mr. Douglas H. Fullerton who has made his mark through the work he has done while serving on various commissions, having been appointed by former Liberal governments.

The Chairman: Order. I must interrupt the hon. member to advise him that the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, before we proceed any further in the debate I have a question which I should like to ask of the minister.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, before the hon. gentleman asks his question I think perhaps I should inform members of the committee who are not aware of it that there have been some very dramatic developments this evening which affect the international money markets. I am not fully aware of what these developments are, but there has been a change in the rediscount rate in the United States. I gather also that the gold market has been closed in London and there is some talk about a bank holiday. I thought I should so inform the house and ask that if possible we complete the work in the committee stage. I will have to engage in some urgent consultations with my officials to determine what action this country should take under the circumstances.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, this is exactly the question I had intended asking the minister. I wondered whether the fact that tomorrow will be a bank holiday in Great Britain would affect the Canadian situation.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister could possibly answer another question. Although I have heard this secondhand, I understand an announcement has been made that the United States rediscount rate has been increased. Will that mean that this country will have to follow suit tomorrow?

Mr. Sharp: It is exactly considerations of this kind which I should like to have an opportunity to discuss with my advisers. There obviously has been a very dramatic development in the last few hours. I hesitate to make off-the-cuff statements under these circumstances.

• (8:40 p.m.)

Mr. Knowles: In the light of the statement the minister has made, I wonder whether it would not be advisable for us to suspend the discussion of this bill tonight and let the minister have his consultations without the pressure of having to sit here.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Knowles: I offer that suggestion, but if it is not acceptable there are a few things some of us still want to say. Is the minister at all interested in having this discussion suspended and the house dealing with something else tonight?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I would naturally prefer to get through the committee stage. It is not our intention to proceed with third reading tonight, so there will be another opportunity for members to say something about the bill in principle. I believe it would also be very helpful under these circumstances if the house were to take action approving the bill at committee stage.

Mr. Stanfield: We do not want to cut anyone off, but we are prepared to proceed with the matter.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, first of all, it may seem like coming from the sublime to the ridiculous to raise a very minor point about the wording of this clause, but I am sure the minister would like, before he gets through with it, to have the wording of this bill correct. The proposed new part 1A, section 104A(1) in clause 4 reads as follows:

> Every individual liable to pay tax under part I for a taxation year shall pay a tax for the year equal to 3 per cent of the amount by which its tax payable under part I by the individual for the taxation year exceeds $200.

When I first looked at that I wondered why the taxpayer was being referred to as "its". Perhaps that is the way the minister thinks of the taxpayer, as an "it". In spite of the fact that my French has not even reached the lousy stage yet, I have looked up the wording in the French version and if I understand it correctly, instead of "its" in line 32 it is "the".

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member. Apparently a slip was made in the drafting which was not noticed. If you look at new subsection (2) you will see that the "its" refers to corporations which are usually considered as being neuter, whereas individuals are not. The word should be "the".

Mr. Knowles: I have the amendment written out if the minister would like it.

Mr. Sharp: Thank you very much.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, would you like to deal with this small change before we continue? I offer an amendment to the minister which reads:

That the word "its" in line 32 on page 3 of Bill No. C-208 be changed to the word "the".

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, may I say that this is not a vote of confidence.

Mr. Knowles: In the minister or in me?

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I think it is either section 3 or 4 of the Bill of Rights which requires the Minister of Justice to consider carefully every piece of government legislation that comes before us. I suggest he must take his share of the blame for this lousy English.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I should like now to say a few words about the clause as amended. I need not take time to emphasize the position that we in this group have taken, to the effect that in our view this surtax ought not to be imposed. We shall therefore be voting against clause 4 of this bill. However, Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Question, question.

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has the floor, and I suggest that members of the committee ought to afford him the ordinary courtesy.

Mr. Knowles: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. The point I want to make can be made rather quickly, but I urge the minister to give it serious consideration. This clause adds a surtax which compounds any tax inequities that already exist. One very serious inequity which has developed, because things have been put together, like Topsy, relates to the income tax that now hits certain old age pensioners, particularly those who are receiving the guaranteed income supplement.

As the minister knows, a little over a year ago the government brought before parliament a measure designed, as stated by the government, to guarantee to old age pensioners a certain level of income. That level for a single pensioner was to be $105 per month or $1,260 per year. When that was done no change was made in the income tax provisions. The result now is that a single old age pensioner between the ages of 67 and 70 who is receiving the basic $75 a month but has nothing else, and therefore is drawing the $30 supplement, finds himself in a bracket where it is necessary for him to pay income tax.

Let me make it crystal clear, Mr. Chairman, that I have no objection to the imposition of income tax on the basic old age pension. We are satisfied that is the way it should be operated. If there is no means test it should be taxable income. However, when you require a person to go through a means or income test to get a supplement to bring his income up to a certain minimum level, and then turn around and take some of that guarantee away through the medium of income tax, we think this is grossly unfair.

Let me give the minister the figures, though I am sure they must have been brought to his attention. A single old age pensioner between the ages of 67 and 70 has an income tax exemption level, including charitable donations, of $1,100. If he gets a pension of $1,260 per year he has $160 on which he must pay tax. This tax amounts to $21.10 per year. That amount may not seem great, but this comes as a pretty cruel blow. The result is that this person is having to pay this tax, thereby cutting down the income which was brought up to the guaranteed level.

In the case of a married couple, if they are both between 67 and 70, the situation is a little worse. They receive a total of $210 a month, or $2,520 a year, and their exemption level is only $2,100. They have to pay therefore $54.10 income tax a year.

I am not quarrelling with income tax being imposed on the means test-free pension, the pension that everyone gets. But to submit people to an income test so they can be brought up to a certain minimum level, and then to turn around and take away part of that extra income is, it seems to me, grossly unfair. I think this is the kind of adjustment that ought to have been made in the income tax arrangements.

There are two or three other things I should like to deal with in this respect. However since the minister has said that third reading is not being called tonight, I can deal with those points in the few remarks I shall make on third reading. But, Mr. Chairman, I should like the minister's comments on the one case I have raised. I will defer the other points I have to make until we reach third reading.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, on the understanding that the minister does not intend to call third reading this evening—

An hon. Member: He said that.

Mr. Lewis: Just hold your horses a moment. As I was saying, Mr. Chairman, on the understanding that the minister does not intend to call third reading this evening, my colleagues who were anxious to speak on this clause have agreed to defer their remarks, in view of the emergency which the minister announced.

The Chairman: Shall clause 4 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I understood that the hon. member wanted me to make some comments tonight on this point. If not, I shall defer my comments until third reading. This is a point we have looked at on many occasions. I can confirm the general calculations the hon. member made, because I have made the same calculations myself. This is a very difficult point of principle, because we do of course include as taxable income all payments of old age pensions to anyone. They are part of taxable income. This is part of a general philosophy that income is taxed, however it is received.

This, indeed, is the underlying principle of the Carter commission, which suggests that there should be a comprehensive tax base that affects all income. It is not necessarily a contradiction to supplement incomes up to a certain level, and then tax them. It may mean that slightly less is received net; but nevertheless that is in accordance with the principle that not only underlies our tax structure but underlies the Carter commission report which is trying to work out a logical structure for the taxation of income.

The Chairman: Shall clause 4 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Some hon. Members: No.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I should like to deal briefly with clause 4 of the bill which tends to increase the personal income tax, and I have always been against that.

We notice at present in the house an atmosphere which reflects pretty well the views I have always held on the subject, because the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) has just announced a gold crisis throughout the world, because banks are flooded with requests for that precious metal called gold. Banks are therefore being closed, a state of crisis is declared, and all that for a metal found deep down a mine-shaft, which is turned into gold and buried in another hole, at Fort Knox, United States, or elsewhere and then, additional salaries have to be paid to have the army watch over it.

Mr. Chairman, it would seem that in 1968, in Canada as elsewhere, ministers of finance suffer from gold mania.

That reminds me of the four verses of the legend of the golden calf:

Le veau d'or est toujours debout
On encense sa puissance d'un bout du monde à l'autre bout
Et perché sur son piédestal
Satan conduit le bal.

It refers to the legend of the golden calf, the music of which was written by Gounod in Faust.

The gold mania has taken hold of the people in the western hemisphere. It is funny that we do not hear about the same crisis in the eastern world at this time. It is funny to see that the orientals do not suffer from the same mania.

However, while we worship the golden calf, while everybody bows before it in Canada as well as in other countries, unemployment increases. Statistics today indicate an increase in the unemployment rate which reaches a record in Canada, that is 8 per cent, and 8.4 per cent in Quebec. However, nobody seems to be worried about that. We do not hear the Minister of Finance nor the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) proclaim a crisis. There are 179,000 unemployed in the province of Quebec. Nobody considers it a crisis. But, if some people want to buy gold, they call it a crisis. If the gold reserve decreases, at Fort Knox or elsewhere, immediately those who normally worship the golden calf have a fit, a feeling of excitement prevails and the situation becomes serious. But, when there are unemployed, like at the present time in Canada and in Quebec, nobody has a fit, nobody rebels. If we have destitution, if we have slums, if it is difficult to build houses, nobody gets mad about it.

• (9:00 p.m.)

Today, taxes are going up in Alberta, in Ontario, and Mr. Johnson in Quebec has also announced a shower of taxes. That is known as a shower of taxes. Ottawa levies taxes, and Quebec does the same.

Not content with announcing his own shower of provincial taxes, Mr. Johnson tells the mayors association he has just met: We are doing our duty, we are assuming our responsibilities, we are increasing our taxes. Do the same, gentleman mayors. That is the advice Mr. Johnson gave yesterday, to the mayors of the Quebec municipalities.

And so, the federal government, the provinces, and the municipalities increase their taxes. School boards will be doing the same.

Where will the people go, with all those increased taxes?

Some hon. Members: Toward gold.

Mr. Grégoire: Toward gold.

In the meantime, the hon. Minister of Finance pulls out the few hairs he has left over the gold crisis. On all fours before the gold calf. Incense is burned to its power, and Satan leads the ball.

Still, if only the federal government raised taxes but gave more services. But no, it decreases them.

In Montreal harbour, the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) has not done anything to solve the problem. He cancelled the subsidies to develop the Montreal airport. He cancelled the subsidies to develop the port of Quebec. He has done nothing about developing winter shipping on the St. Lawrence.

In Montreal, a new building was supposed to be erected to house the C.B.C., but the money to that end was reduced. The amounts were decreased and at the same time, taxes have increased under clause 4 of the bill now under study.

The government collects more taxes and, at the same time, it cancels the subsidies towards the construction of public buildings and for public services. At the same time, the provinces raise their taxes. That is a shower of taxes. Moreover, municipalities are advised to increase their taxes. Where are we heading, Mr. Chairman? Is it that our governments are so driven by the gold craze that they forget what is going on here, what happens to our population? The Quebec premier Mr. Johnson, said that there was only one solution and I use his own expression: Let Ottawa hand over some taxes to the provinces. But Ottawa will not let go: it is trapped in a struggle to save the dollar. Not to save the individuals or the unemployed, no: to save the dollar.

[Mr. Grégoire.]

In the United States it is gold, here it is the dollar. We must save the dollar. No matter if citizens are stripped of everything, if what they have left is taken away from them, if there is unemployment and misery. We must save the dollar. Let us save the dollar.

Things have reached a point where this government's slogan is: The dollar must be saved, gold must be saved. As for the citizen, no matter. There are 179,000 unemployed in Quebec, that is 8.4 per cent of the total, and that is of no importance. There is no time to think of that: the dollar must be saved, gold must be saved.

Mr. Chairman, it makes one wonder whether the government is not a little panic-stricken in the present situation. Why does the government not wage the same fight to save the individual, the Canadian citizen, as it wages to save the dollar? It is very important in a period of crisis to save the individual also. When I see this fight to save the dollar, I wonder what is wrong with Canada that we are forced to wage such a big fight? What could be the reason for such a crisis? Why an economic crisis?

Have potatoes stopped growing in Canada, as the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) would say? Have cows stopped giving milk, and caused an economic crisis? Have hens stopped giving eggs? Has production decreased in our pulp mills, our industries? Has production stopped? No, Mr. Chairman, we are able to produce as much as before. Our industry, our agriculture can be as flourishing as they were. There is no crisis in those areas.

Our workers are not refusing to work. They are willing to carry on; they are ready to make every effort. Our dealers are willing to keep on selling: they have goods to sell. They are not short of goods. In proof of that, there are sales everywhere. Our natural resources are still there. We are still able to tap and develop them. Why, then, a crisis of the dollar?

The average citizen, Mr. Chairman, has a right to wonder why there is a dollar crisis, when our natural resources are still there, our industries are still there, our citizens are still doing their duty to produce, our businessmen are still ready to sell and Canadian citizens are ready to buy as much and even more than yesterday.

Why, then, a dollar crisis? Whence does it arise? Is it not rather a fictitious, artificial, superficial situation brought about by great financiers throughout the world with a view to devaluating the real resource, production, to be in a better position to control it.

When a country gets prosperous, there are financiers who endeavour to control its industries, its businesses, its economy. They try to reduce the prices of those industries, to be in a better position to buy them, to control them, as was done during the 1929 depression.

Economy was thriving then. The dollar collapsed overnight, and great international trusts, big international corporations took control of our Canadian industries and succeeded in developing them to their own advantage.

From 1929 to 1939, at a time of another dollar crisis, and not an industrial crisis, some international trusts succeeded in getting the control of our large electric power companies, our pulp and paper mills, our major industries and, at the present time, they want to start the same game all over again.

Mr. Chairman, we are told there is a crisis, but I do not believe there is a real crisis. It is only in the minds of those who administer our economic and monetary system. The dollar crisis exists only in the minds of those who manage our monetary system, that is, in the mind of our Minister of Finance, the governor of the Bank of Canada and a few others, because there is no real crisis. We still have our natural resources, our resources, our workers in a position to produce and our citizens who can buy. It seems to me quite clear, Mr. Chairman.

Now, why is there a crisis at the present time? What have we done to be the victims of a crisis which we did not want? What is at fault in Canada that we are suddenly engulfed in a crisis? What happened?

Gold, Mr. Chairman. But for the past 28 years, our money has not been based on gold. It was a minister of finance of the Liberal government in 1940, Mr. Ilsley, who stated in 1940 that the value of the Canadian dollar was no longer based on gold.

• (9:10 p.m.)

Our dollar is not based on gold. Then why? Would it be on account of the monetary crisis in the United States, in Europe, in Great Britain or elsewhere? Now, since our dollar is no longer based on gold, why should we suddenly experience a crisis? Why should we be the victims of a crisis with which we have nothing to do?

It would be about time for our Minister of Finance to solve the problems of which he is responsible and he should refrain, moreover, from trying to solve the problems of others and plunging us in a crisis which does not concern us.

He says that the solution is higher taxes. That is not a solution, Mr. Chairman. On the contrary, it will only create a problem, because if the federal government, the provinces, the municipalities and the school boards raise their taxes, we will be showered by taxes, as they say, and the people, who bear the brunt of it, will be the victims of a crisis brought about by our Minister of Finance, who wants everybody to impose taxes. Other countries may be faced with a crisis, but it should not affect us because our dollar is no longer based on gold. However, there will soon be a crisis in Canada if everybody starts imposing more and more taxes.

Therefore, I am opposed to clause 4 of this bill, because there is no reason for this tax. Furthermore, this tax will help to bring about a real crisis which will affect the whole Canadian people. Mr. Johnson said yesterday: There is only one solution: let Ottawa lower its taxes. However, there is another solution: if Ottawa does not want to lower its taxes, let Quebec lower its own.

[English]

The Chairman: Shall clause 4 carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Grégoire: On division.

The Chairman: Order. The question is on clause 4.

Mr. Knowles: As amended.

The Chairman: The question is on clause 4 as amended.

Clause agreed to: Yeas, 110; nays, 84.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Title agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bill?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Some hon. Members: Next sitting of the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Next sitting of the house.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the house to go into committee of supply for supplementary estimates.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply—Mr. Tardif in the chair.

BOARD OF BROADCAST GOVERNORS

1c. Salaries and other expenses, $35,000.

Mr. Sherman: Mr. Chairman, when the committee was last on this particular item—

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The minister is rising on a point of order.

Mr. MacEachen: In order to ensure the orderly discussion of the estimates, we are now considering the vote of the Board of Broadcast Governors. This will be handled by the Secretary of State. If it is agreeable, following the carrying of that item, if this is done tonight, I should like to call all of the items under the name of the Secretary of State. I hope that will be agreeable.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pugh: She is not running.

Mr. Sherman: Mr. Chairman, when the committee was last considering this item a few days ago I was making some remarks about the extent of the improvements that I had detected in public affairs programming on C.B.C. television in recent months. I gave credit where I believed it was justified and made the point that I felt the Beryl Fox documentary on Viet Nam last Sunday night on C.B.C. television entitled "Last Reflections on a War" was a poignantly moving and beautiful experience. In my opinion it was a much better balanced program on Viet Nam than any I had seen previously on C.B.C. television, much better balanced than the previous C.B.C. television studies of Viet Nam.

I then moved on to what will be the concluding phase of my remarks, to say a word or two about the Board of Broadcast Governors and the passing of an era in Canadian broadcasting. The era of the B.B.G. is being phased out fairly soon and we will move into the era of the Canadian Radio-Television Commission, which will be the main supervisory authority in this field. I felt that a hail and farewell to the B.B.G., and particularly to its distinguished president and chairman, Dr. Andrew Stewart, was in order at this time.

Dr. Stewart came to broadcasting a virtual, or at least a comparative stranger. He came from the field of education to an industry of which he obviously possessed great knowledge and for which he obviously possessed great sensitivity. None the less it was an industry with which he had no direct connection. He brought to it, I suggest, Mr. Chairman, a rare dedication, a fine wit and a keen academic mind. He presided over the licensing and the control and authority-dispensing functions of broadcasting in Canada in one of its most exciting and explosive periods, when the so-called second stations entered Canada's major television markets. I refer to the new private stations that now constitute in large part the Canadian television network. Dr. Stewart, as head of the B.B.G., witnessed the inception of this new era in Canadian broadcasting, the era of private television operations and of competition in the major Canadian broadcasting markets.

I submit that as head of the B.B.G. he served both as father and as nurse to what are still comparatively new offspring. They are now testing and venturing upon new ground, but I am sure they are destined to fulfil a great role and serve a great purpose in Canadian national and cultural life in the years ahead.

• (9:20 p.m.)

I think the stations that came into being then, and all those connected with them, owe Dr. Stewart a debt of gratitude for the sagacity and sensitivity he displayed during the first difficult years of competitive television in this country. At all times in my experience Dr. Stewart ruled with understanding and responsibility. I join with my colleagues in this house in saluting Dr. Stewart for the contribution he made to broadcasting in Canada, as his board, the Board of Broadcast Governors, is phased out to be replaced by the new broadcasting authority. I suggest that the new chief of the Canadian Radio-Television Commission could do worse than mark the footsteps of the good doctor and tread in them boldly.

In the field of broadcasting in this country we stand on the threshold of an exciting era, of unexplored frontiers, when all Canadians, because of the nature of the industry and of this country, will be integrally involved in Canadian broadcasting and affected every day of their lives by what is done by broadcasters. One case in point is educational television, or instructional television, a subject with which the standing committee on broadcasting, films and assistance to the arts has been studiously engaged for the past several weeks, and in connection with which that committee has been examining a wide variety of witnesses who have come to Ottawa to present to committee members their knowledge and expertise in this field.

The frontiers of Canadian E.T.V. have hardly been approached, let alone crossed. There are great chapters ahead for educational television in Canada. This is one area in which the new officers of the C.R.T.C., this new broadcasting authority, will be vitally interested. So, speaking for myself, I hope it will be possible for the views of Dr. Andrew Stewart and other members of the Board of Broadcast Governors to be made available to the standing committee on broadcasting while it is continuing its study of E.T.V. and before any long range policy in the field of educational television is formulated. All of us on the standing committee look forward to the soon to be announced appointments to the Canadian Radio-Television Commission. And we look forward to working with the new executive officers of the new broadcasting body in order to buttress and improve broadcasting in this country.

I conclude by reiterating my thankfulness and appreciation for the work that Dr. Stewart and the B.B.G. have done, a feeling that I am sure is shared by everyone in this chamber, and by expressing the firm belief that the new C.R.T.C. authority will continue in its predecessor's most instructive footsteps.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg South, in contrast with those of other members of his party in the house in weeks gone by, are refreshing. The Conservative party has usually used any occasion on which we discuss broadcasting to castigate the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I am sure that we all at some time or other, when viewing C.B.C. programs, have heard views expressed with which we do not agree. That is understandable, because by its nature the C.B.C. must try to please everyone in Canada, and obviously that cannot be done all the time. Consequently from time to time all of us shall see programs which we find objectionable.

Regretfully, I say, we have not seen any element of reasonableness or balance in the Conservative party's approach to public broadcasting in this nation. Their criticisms have all been onesided and that is why the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg South sounded so refreshing. But no matter how often he expresses his views, new, fundamental views, perhaps, they will not undo the damage that has resulted from an unreasoned and unreasonable condemnation of the public broadcasting system by his party's members.

When the legislation establishing the Board of Broadcast Governors was introduced, and the old board of C.B.C. governors was to be replaced, a Conservative government was in office. That legislation was alluded to by practically everyone who supported it as the salvation of broadcasting in Canada. Credit should be given where credit is due. The man who piloted that legislation through the house was a highly respected, honoured and loved member. Practically everyone, regardless of party, held him in high esteem. I am referring to the late George Nowlan.

Regardless of the qualities of the then new legislation to establish the Board of Broadcast Governors, all was not well. All on the government side alluded to the bill as bringing in a most necessary organizational structure which would save Canadians from the denigrating effects that television and radio would have if they were allowed to go on unfettered and uncontrolled.

It is interesting to see how appointments to that new Board of Broadcast Governors, which was established by the Conservative government, were made. The board was loaded with people whose only qualification for sitting on it was that they were Conservatives or Conservative supporters. Perhaps that is why the Conservative party now find it necessary to condemn public broadcasting in Canada. The board which the Conservative party established was abortive. Those who sat on it knew nothing about broadcasting. The Conservatives loaded the board with people who had no real conscience or determination with respect to making public broadcasting a worth-while venture in Canada. The Conservatives loaded that board with political appointees. In fact, at one stage during those years, while for some purpose a national conference of Conservatives was being held in the Chateau Laurier here in Ottawa, there were in attendance goodly numbers of young delegates and young gentlemen whose purpose appeared to be, not the business of the conference itself but to search out individuals within the Conservative ranks in government who could provide a television licence. Again we saw the emergence of the lowest form of political involvement in the field of public broadcasting.

• (9:30 p.m.)

An hon. Member: Like your relationship with the C.L.C.

Mr. Howard: If the hon. member who made that comment would like to ask me a question, so that I could hear it, I would gladly yield him the floor for that purpose. Or if he would like to take the floor himself I would be glad to listen to him. I do not see any takers. The hon. member who just interrupted must be one of those whom the Minister of Agriculture labelled yesterday as one whose watermelon was more important than his head.

An hon. Member: Filibuster.

Mr. Howard: I know, Mr. Chairman, that you are concerned about the enforcement of the rules. I do not call upon you to protect me from these members who are yaking away for some unknown purpose. I am simply saying that if there is difficulty in Canada with respect to broadcasting, the Conservative party must bear the brunt of the blame because it was the Conservative party which sought to establish a Board of Broadcast Governors for the sole purpose of providing havens for its own political supporters. As a consequence, regardless of the merits which might have been inherent in the structure set-up, it could not operate with any effectiveness because it was loaded with political hacks. These are the facts. No wonder hon. gentlemen to my right take objection to the truth when it comes home to them.

I want to say with respect to public broadcasting that I am not one of those who are addicted to television viewing. Indeed if there were a scale I would be on the other end of it, inasmuch as I do not particularly like television as a medium of communication or entertainment; I seldom take the opportunity of viewing it. But I do enjoy radio and especially I enjoy the C.B.C.'s radio broadcasting.

Over the years I have enjoyed listening to those programs which have always been of extremely high quality, and show evidence of fine programming, ranging all the way from the early morning news and views, including Max Ferguson's contribution, which I am sure, is a delight to all of us, to the more serious evening programs. Naturally there are programs which do not please everybody; any organization such as the C.B.C. which tries to deal with the Canadian population in total cannot please all the people all the time. But on balance the radio programs emanating from the C.B.C. are as fine this year as they were in years past and deserve a large measure of commendation and support.

I hear an hon. member use the word "filibuster"; I hear this word in the background. If any in this parliament over the last five years—I am not talking about right now—are liable to a charge of filibustering, it is the people in the Conservative ranks.

Mr. Régimbal: Know all.

Mr. Howard: They do not like the truth; it is too bad. They do not enjoy listening to it. We only need look at the progress made in considering broadcasting legislation itself. I understand there was agreement that if the broadcasting bill introduced this session was referred to a committee for close and essential examination, as it was, it would be considered in the house with a minimal amount of discussion. This was one of those gentlemen's agreements which are made. Yet when it got to the house we found the Conservative party unable to contain its desire to destroy public broadcasting in Canada, and for this purpose it was prepared to embark on a filibuster, day after interminable day, as though hon. members were determined to outdo their efforts during the flag fiasco.

I am attempting to talk in a reasonable way about an aspect of public broadcasting that I enjoy, namely radio. I am being enticed to depart from that subject by some friends of mine who sit very close to me. I intend to resist that temptation, however, and simply say that if we had more speeches of the type and quality of the speech about public broadcasting just made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South, a person who has obviously had a new view about broadcasting in recent times, we would get more of what people expect from parliament, namely a reasoned and balanced conversation about public policy. As it is, we find one particular party hell bent to destroy public broadcasting, to which end it is prepared to embark on a continuing program of vituperation which encourages among the general public a lack of perspective when it comes to the broad concept upon which the C.B.C. was founded. I have no further comment to make, other than that.

Mr. Grafftey: I intend to speak very briefly on this subject. I believe it is a happy coincidence that the Secretary of State should have within her jurisdiction not only the C.B.C., for which she reports to this house, but also the national arts centre currently under construction in Ottawa. I say it is a happy coincidence, because over the years the C.B.C. has had a mandate to encourage Canadian talent in the performing arts. I believe everybody in this house and in Canada generally recognizes that the C.B.C. has done an outstanding job in encouraging the performing arts in Canada. I repeat myself when I say it is a happy coincidence that the Secretary of State has the responsibility for reporting both the C.B.C. and the national arts centre. As I understand it, the new national arts centre will have a general mandate to encourage the performing arts in Canada, and I trust that the C.B.C. will co-operate to the greatest possible extent with the centre in carrying out that mandate.

I have already talked to the minister about the type of musical bodies that the arts centre will encourage initially in Ottawa. In years gone by the C.B.C., especially through its radio section, did a fine job in encouraging musical groups, although such may not necessarily be the case today.

I have also discussed this matter with the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The national capitals of many countries have developed magnificent symphony orchestras, with the assistance of public funds. I do not for a minute suggest that Ottawa is a world capital in the sense that Amsterdam, Copenhagen, and some other capitals are, but I think we should make a start now by encouraging the role which the government must play in assisting the performing arts, and by urging the C.B.C. to co-operate with the new centre.

I wish publicly to thank the minister for the opportunities I have had to discuss this matter with her. I hope whoever occupies her position in the future—and I trust it will be the hon. lady herself, because she has done a good job in this respect—will encourage co-operation between the C.B.C. and the national arts centre in Ottawa.

[Translation]

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, I think that liberties are being taken, that the standing orders are being disregarded when we deal with matters somewhat outside the scope of the subject under discussion. At this point, I should like to avail myself of the same latitude in order to express to the Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh) my satisfaction, and that of many Canadians, who were happy to learn today about the appointment of Hon. Georges-Émile Lapalme as chairman of an organization entrusted with the administration of an amount of approximately $10 million for film distribution.

Mr. Chairman, I think I may take the liberty of making a rather special comment, since I have known the appointee to this new position perhaps more intimately than most members, and I can say that he is a Canadian of unusual honesty, competence and loyalty. He has been noted for many years for his unfailing judgment in the field of arts, humanities, science and literature.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mongrain: I wish to congratulate the hon. Secretary of State for this choice, which lead us to hope this new organization will know numerous years of fruitful accomplishments across Canada. She could not have made a better choice. Indeed, she is an old hand at it. I have already told her so, but she was not in the house at the time.

I do not say this only as a matter of courtesy which a gentleman always owes to a lady. It is in the light of results and facts. For instance, when she had the courage to say there was something rotten in the C.B.C., the Secretary of State won the admiration and the esteem of the large majority of members.

It happens that the hon. Secretary of State, in addition to her other qualities, is a Liberal. I imagine that if she were a Conservative, the same could be said about her, that is, she would have accomplished fully as much. But someone had to say some day that there was something wrong with the C.B.C. and that reform was urgently needed so that this corporation should really become the instrument of culture, national unity and common sense which it is supposed to be according to the idea of those who set it up.

I wanted to pay this tribute, Mr. Chairman, first of all in the name of all those who, like me, were concerned about certain bad habits which the C.B.C. had acquired, and who are happy to see that an effort is being made, at least, to bring about reforms and to prevent the abuses of the past.

I take personal pleasure in congratulating Mr. Lapalme for his appointment, for I had the opportunity to know him better than several of my colleagues. But I know that I am expressing the feelings of many Canadians, especially those in the province of Quebec, when I say how glad we are to see that hon. Georges-Émile Lapalme has been appointed as chairman of the organization I mentioned earlier.

[English]

Mr. Peters: How long does the minister anticipate it will be before the B.B.G. is wound up and the new commission is appointed?

Miss LaMarsh: I think the order in council has already been passed indicating that the act will be proclaimed on April 1.

Item agreed to.

SECRETARY OF STATE

A—Department—

1c. Departmental Administration, including grants as detailed in the Estimates—To extend the purposes of Secretary of State Vote 1 of the Main Estimates for 1967-68 to provide that the Centennial Commission shall cease to exist on the 1st day of April, 1968; that all rights and property held by or in the name of or in trust for the Commission, and all obligations and liabilities of the Commission, existing before that day, shall continue as the rights, property, obligations and liabilities of Her Majesty in right of Canada; and to authorize the Secretary of State to do and perform all acts and things necessary for or incidental to closing out the affairs of the Commission and to provide a further amount of, $274,400.

Mr. Peters: This is a quite considerable item and it gives me an opportunity to congratulate the minister on the work that was done during centennial year. Governments move slowly, and here I can think of the National Arts Centre which has been abuilding for years. Had the Secretary of State been able to find people like John Fisher, and some of the others in the Expo organization, much of the red tape could have been avoided. They were able to get the Expo operation developed in good time for centennial year.

Although there was considerable duplication of costs, I think all Canadians will look back on centennial year as a great success and something to remember with a great deal of pride. Building nationhood is a difficult process. It is often developed most during periods when a country has to make an extreme sacrifice. Canada took a great step toward nationhood each time it became engaged in a war, but I think Canadians combined together during centennial year to take a great stride forward into nationhood, thanks largely to the centennial commission's efforts.

[Mr. Mongrain.]

• (9:50 p.m.)

I should like to congratulate that great Canadian, John Fisher, who under extreme difficulty headed up the commission and carried on even in the face of the political backbiting which went on among his friends and colleagues in the commission. He was able always to put forward the idea that it is great to be a Canadian and that one should be proud to be in Canada. I believe that his spirit as well as the utterances he made as he travelled across this country in centennial year and in preceding years, combined with the roughshod way in which the minister on many occasions administered the operation of the centennial commission and tore through the red tape, together with her ability to get things done, made it possible for all Canadians to enjoy a very fine year. Now when we are in the process of paying the bill for centennial year I think we should look back with great pride at the operation of the centennial commission. I believe this will be a memorial to the effectiveness of one woman in cabinet.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I rise very briefly to support the remarks made by the hon. member for Timiskaming and to congratulate the minister for the role she played in our centennial year. I also congratulate her on her ability to find men during that year. I have heard it said that she was the ideal personality to fulfil the role of Secretary of State during our centennial year. She combined in her personality that duality of the traditional and the go-go.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. After what I have heard here tonight I venture to say that the Secretary of State should run for the leadership post that is available.

Item agreed to.

2c. Construction or Acquisition of Buildings, Works, Land and Equipment—National Arts Centre, $7,500,000.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I am very disgusted when I look at this particular project and think of the time involved in its construction. If Campeau has been able to build four or five high rise buildings in the time it takes us to put a pile of cement in a hole which has been there for three years off and on, I think it is about time we reconsidered the construction methods we use. When I went to Expo I was very impressed when I heard Mr. Shaw and others who were responsible for the development of Expo talk about the critical path of building. The critical path of building has been a nightmare so far as the National Arts Centre is concerned. I realize that the Secretary of State probably has had nothing to do with the construction, since this no doubt comes under the Department of Public Works.

I should like to raise the point that the government service apparently has been able to obtain the knowhow in respect of the critical path of building. I would suggest that perhaps this ability in the critical path of building might be applied to the work undertaken by the Department of Public Works. If that department is not able to meet satisfactory schedules, then perhaps they should forget about building and let Campeau do it. Before the minister leaves, whether it be this year, next year or five years from now, I am sure she would like to be able to open the National Arts Centre. I am afraid that even if she is still in the department five years from now she cannot be sure that she will have this opportunity.

I believe the construction of this building is a national disgrace. The construction site is in the centre of the national capital where anyone can see it every day. We have established that we have the ability to find and hire the right people. The minister has been able to do this in respect of the very ingenious engineering projects which took place at Expo. Surely this ability can be applied to other government departments. I suggest that when the ministers obtain approval from parliament for expenditures, that they consider the critical path of construction so that when a building is to be built it will be built within a reasonable length of time. I believe that when it takes three years to construct the cement part of a building, that is too long a period. I suggest that this situation really is not satisfactory to the minister. I believe we should be very proud of the ability she has exhibited and I think that what has been accomplished in respect of the Expo construction should be extended to other works.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall item 2c carry?

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister could tell us when the National Arts Centre will be finished.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. It being ten o'clock shall I rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is it the wish of the committee that we carry on with the item?

Mr. Starr: Not unless we have some idea when the item will pass.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

• (10:00 p.m.)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the house leader what we will be undertaking tomorrow, Monday and Tuesday? Perhaps he is able to give us this information now.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will begin with third reading of the tax bill. Following completion of third reading we will continue consideration of the supplementary estimates.

Mr. Howard: In this connection, Mr. Speaker, in light of the extremely critical situation in the world referred to earlier this evening, I wonder whether the government would consider taking third reading of the tax bill on Monday, in order that we might see what develops over the week end and use third reading as a vehicle to discuss the situation?

Mr. Nesbitt: You can do that on supply.

Mr. MacEachen: I think we ought to have third reading of the bill tomorrow.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR SUSPENSION OF TRADING IN GOLD

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask for the permission of the house to revert to motions in order that I might make a short statement.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the house agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, in view of the closing of the London gold market tomorrow I am tonight requesting all banks and other dealers in gold in Canada to suspend trading in gold tomorrow, Friday, March 15, pending clarification of the situation concerning gold markets during the week end.

I should also like to say that the governor of the Bank of Canada issued a statement tonight that the bank rate has been fixed at 7½ per cent, effective March 15.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

PENITENTIARIES

APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS TO JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. Bernard Pilon (Chambly-Rouville) moved:

That Messrs. Aiken, Allmand, Dionne, Fulton, Lachance, Matheson, McQuaid, Prud'homme, Ricard, Rochon, Stafford, Tolmie, Watson (Châteauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie), Woolliams and Winch be appointed to serve on behalf of this house on the joint committee on penitentiaries which was established on February 1, 1968, and that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours thereof.

Motion agreed to.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

INCOME TAX—PROPOSED EXEMPTION OF GUARANTEED OLD AGE INCOME SUPPLEMENT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Monday, March 4, as recorded in Hansard at page 7231, I put this question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare:

In view of the fact that old age pensioners between the ages of 67 and 70 who are drawing the guaranteed income supplement, even though they have no other income, are being required to pay income tax on a portion of their supplement, will the minister take up with his colleague the Minister of Finance the possibility of exempting the supplement from income tax?

The minister replied as follows:

I will be glad to discuss the matter with the Minister of Finance.

I then responded with this question:

May I expect an answer at ten o'clock one of these nights?

I can use less than my allotted seven minutes in putting this question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare tonight, in view of the fact that at 8.40 or 8.45 this evening when we were discussing the income tax bill before the house at that time I put the question to the Minister of Finance. I have to admit that the answer I got from him was not very satisfactory, so I am back where I was on Monday, March 4, urging the Minister of National Health and Welfare to make his representations to the Minister of Finance with respect to this matter.

[Mr. Sharp.]

After all, it was the Minister of National Health and Welfare who brought in the legislation providing for the guaranteed income supplement, and the point that he made over and over again was that the purpose of this legislation was to guarantee to our old age pensioners a certain minimum level of income. That minimum level was to be $105 a month for a single person, or $1,260 a year. However, as I pointed out when I was speaking during the committee stage of the debate on the income tax bill, because of the fact that a single person has a tax exemption of only $1,100, the $1,260 that he receives puts him into the income tax bracket to the point that he has to pay something over $20 a year in income tax. In the case of a married couple, the tax they would have to pay is something over $50.

In all these cases I am referring to individuals between the ages of 67 and 70. Once they are over 70, they have the extra $500 exemption and the problem disappears, at least for people at these income levels. The minister knows very well—and I am sure he will not argue with this and will not wish to misrepresent me on it—that because I believe in no means test on the old age pension, I agree that the old age security, means test-free pension has to be taxable income. That is one of the reasons that you have no means test, because you make the adjustment by means of the income tax.

So what I am talking about is not the means test-free pension but the supplement which people receive only when they are submitted to what the minister euphemistically calls an income test. Some of the rest of us still call it a means test. My point is that when persons have been submitted to a test in order to get money to bring them up to a certain level, they should not have that amount of money reduced. It is a very simple situation. The Minister of National Health and Welfare says to all his pensioner friends across the country: I have brought your income up to a certain minimum level. Then his colleague the Minister of Finance turns around and takes some of it away. I therefore ask, Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of National Health and Welfare will make strong representations to the Minister of Finance to correct this most unfortunate situation?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have had the opportunity to discuss the matter with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp), and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) anticipated the results of that discussion by putting the question directly to the Minister of Finance who is responsible, basically, for the income tax law. The minister put the answer on the record tonight and there is no necessity for me to repeat it.

Of course I disagree with my hon. friend when he says that there is a means test on the new guaranteed income supplement. I imagine that no matter how long we are in the house, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will continue to regard this test as a means test, while I correctly describe it as an income test. My hon. friend realizes that while this group of people to which he refers is eligible for payment of income tax, they pay this tax because they have been raised to a level of income at which all taxpayers are eligible to pay tax.

So that what the hon. member is arguing is that in this particular case we should make a special provision which would place this group of taxpayers in a special category different from other taxpayers. The Minister of Finance has given the answer, and I have nothing to add to it.

Mr. Knowles: What about those over 70?

PUBLIC SERVICE—POSITION OF EXECUTIVE AND PROFESSIONAL OFFICERS RESPECTING COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

Hon. R. A. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, for a period of weeks I have been endeavouring, both publicly and privately but without success, to induce the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Benson) to clarify the statement of government policy on the obligations in respect of collective bargaining of public servants employed in a managerial or confidential capacity, and as well to arrange the withdrawal or reversal of erroneous directives on the subject issued in certain departments. Two simple questions, proper answers to which would have clarified the situation completely, were placed on the order paper by me as numbers 1073 and 1074 as long ago as February 19, but they have been ignored completely, despite the fact that I have emphasized their urgency twice to the President of the Treasury Board and twice to his parliamentary secretary.

When no answers were forthcoming yesterday after the questions had been called seven times, I was given no option but to ask this further question, which appears at page 7585 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the President of the Treasury Board whether the government has taken any action to remove misunderstandings existing in several departments of government due to erroneous directives that employees in executive or professional roles are required to resign from employee organizations before collective bargaining begins.

The minister replied:

> Mr. Speaker, we looked into this question which my hon. friend has raised before, and found that in one department there was an erroneous interpretation of the directive of the Treasury Board. We have been in touch with this and other departments to make sure the directive issued by the Treasury Board is adhered to within the departments.

Regrettably that answer is not correct. There was more than one department which issued an erroneous directive, and in fact no effective action has been taken to make sure the law passed by this parliament is obeyed. The result has been that a great many public servants, under a totally erroneous impression of the law, have felt compelled to resign from employee organizations, to their great personal detriment as well as to the loss of such organizations. In my view, these unrepudiated directives constitute an unfair labour practice, and I hope the record may be set completely straight tonight.

What is the law? Under the Public Service Staff Relations Act certain persons employed in a managerial or confidential capacity are placed under certain natural inhibitions with respect to collective bargaining. Obviously a managerial person cannot be both manager for the employer and negotiator for fellow employees. Conflict of interest must be avoided.

Three things are equally apparent. First, not all executive or professional employees are managerial or confidential employees who will be involved in collective bargaining, and the act does not so contemplate.

Second, the final determination of who is a managerial or confidential employee involved in the duties set out in section 2(u) of the act is vested in the public service staff relations board. It is not a unilateral determination by the employer.

Third, the act contains no prohibition of a managerial or confidential employee so determined belonging to an employee organization, provided they are in a non-voting, non-policy making, non-negotiating capacity.

Consequently, the employee organizations have established associate member categories to accommodate such managerial or confidential employees. These members have no right to join in decision making, but they can enjoy insurance benefits, social advantages, grievance procedure representation, and other proper benefits. Indeed, this is the only way they can enjoy the full advantages of the grievance procedure.

Earlier this year the cabinet authorized a document entitled "Statement of Government Policy on the Obligations of Public Servants Identified as Persons Employed in a Managerial or Confidential Capacity". This statement, a copy of which was laid on the table yesterday at my request as sessional paper 159E, is, in my opinion vague and ambiguous, and in its concluding paragraph, misleading, particularly in implying that it is solely the opinion of the employer which determines who is a person employed in a managerial or confidential capacity. That is for the staff relations board.

Subsequently, several departments misinterpreted the cabinet's statement of policy and issued firm and absolute directives to all managerial or confidential employees that they must separate from staff associations. I wish to quote only two. In the unemployment insurance commission, the directive dated February 15 stated:

> This means that if you hold a membership in an employee organization you must terminate such membership.

The directive in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development contained this phrase:

> You will lose this insurance by dissociating yourself from an employee organization, which you must now do.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, "which you must now do". This was addressed on February 22 to "all managerial and confidential exclusions".

I am told that there are several other equally erroneous directives, Mr. Speaker, and that the result has been a great many totally unnecessary resignations from some employee organizations, with consequent forfeiture of genuine benefits to executive and professional employees, some of them of long standing. I consider this, sir, to be unfair, discriminatory and intimidating labour practices, as they are defined under the provisions of section 9 of the act.

[Mr. Bell (Carleton).]

In my respectful submission the cabinet statement of policy should be revised and stripped of its ambiguities and improper influences. The improper and erroneous departmental directives should be withdrawn, and all employees to whom they were sent should be advised of their withdrawal. I ask the government to make clear the undoubted fact that the type of associate membership set up, for example, by the Professional Institute and the Public Service Alliance for managerial and confidential employees is wholly unobjectionable, and indeed that such employees should in fact be encouraged to enjoy the undoubted benefits of such associate membership.

Mr. J. E. Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Carleton for his precise timing in asking this question on the adjournment debate. I believe he pointed out that the President of the Treasury Board answered this question today. My only wish is that the hon. member had had enough faith in the minister and in the parliamentary secretary to know that an answer to the question was forthcoming.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): It was not answered today.

Mr. Walker: I do not wish to attribute motives of any kind. It is the right and privilege of every member who represents constituents to bring questions before parliament. But the awareness of an answer to this question was apparent.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): It has not been answered yet.

Mr. Walker: The staff of the Treasury Board is aware of only one departmental communication—and this was made very clear by the answer of the President of the Treasury Board on March 13 last—that contained a misinterpretation of the statement of government policy on the obligations of managerial and confidential personnel. As soon as this was drawn to the attention of the deputy head, he immediately issued a directive indicating that the communication in question was to be disregarded.

The policy statement itself says, in part, that a public servant employed in a managerial or confidential capacity must refrain from any association with an employee organization, as defined in the Public Service Staff Relations Act, that would be contrary to the provisions of law or that would create for him a conflict of interest.

I should like to point out to the house that, along with myself, the hon. member for Carleton was a member of the parliamentary committee that endorsed and approved these particular sections of the Public Service Staff Relations Act when it was reviewed by that committee.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS—REDUCTION IN BUDGET FOR NORTHERN HEALTH SERVICES

Mr. R. J. Orange (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, once again as a result of the directives which have been issued by the Department of National Health and Welfare I think we have created in Canada another barrier between the Indian people and the government of Canada in its efforts to bring these people into the mainstream of Canadian life. Today I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether he was prepared to refer to the committee on health and welfare the question of medical services to the Indian people. Part of his reply I found most satisfactory, as it had an effect on the Northwest Territories and the northern health service situation. He told me then that he would undertake a personal, detailed review of the situation. He said that until he had concluded that review he could not prejudge the question of placing the matter before a parliamentary committee.

• (10:20 p.m.)

Here I think we face an ideological dispute, or some misunderstanding. It is my impression that the philosophy of the Department of National Health and Welfare has been that the health of Canadian Indians is not the responsibility of the federal government. In my hand I have treaty No. 11. If you examine that treaty, which was signed by the Indian people of northern Canada, you will find nothing about health services. However, in the report of the commissioner, H. A. Conroy, which is dated October 12, 1921, we find this paragraph:

> Practically all the bands dealt with wanted more provision for medical attendance at each post, schools for their children, and supplies for their old and destitute.
> I pointed out that they were still able to make their own living, and that Dr. A. L. McDonald, of the Indian department, was then with me, and that they could see him, and that he would attend them free if they wished, but that it was impossible for the government to furnish regular medical attention, when they were occupying such a vast tract of territory.

Regardless of whether the government of Canada is legally responsible to the Indian people of Canada for medical health services, I believe it has a moral, ethical and traditional responsibility. I do not suggest that the Indian people of Canada will not soon look after their own medical services; I suggest that the directive which was issued by the government in the Manitoba zone on March 6 does not add up, when it says:

> The bands should establish health committees whose duty it would be "to determine what Indians of the band are medically indigent". These committees should meet at regular intervals in order to keep their records of indigents up to date.

Also in the same directive it says:

> Indian bands that have funds must make their own arrangements for the purchase of treatment services either by paying local physicians directly or by arranging to take part in medical insurance programs. If Indian bands wish to purchase insured medical services, whereby Indian people can go to any doctor of their choosing, medical services branch will consider assisting such bands in the payment of such insured services.

I have read many documents issued by many government departments but never have I read one more ambiguous. The effects of this document may lead to a deterioration in relations which have been so carefully built up. Through the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and through community development programs we have tried to bring the Indians of Canada into the mainstream of Canadian life. Yet we have here an example of one government department doing something contrary to the policy of another. I do not know whether there was liaison, but certainly there was no advance warning that this directive to cut down services would be issued. Certainly there was no consultation in this matter with Indian advisers and councillors.

Here we have a directive coming from an agency of government which, so far as I am concerned, may destroy the relationships which we have tried to build up in this country. I know the Minister of National Health and Welfare is deeply concerned about the matter and I know he feels strongly about it. I ask him to re-examine the situation, and if there are to be changes, to let those changes be known long before they are to take place. But, in the name of heaven, let us not further destroy the confidence that the Indian people of Canada have in their government.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Hear, hear.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The question which the hon. member for Northwest Territories asked is very complicated and it is impossible to deal with it adequately in a few minutes.

Of course the main objective of our service, so far as the Indian population is concerned, is to make sure that our Indians belong to the mainstream of the Canadian community. The best way to ensure that any person in the Canadian community is in the mainstream is to ensure that dependency is reduced and independence established. This will certainly be the objective for all groups in Canada, including the Indian population. In the Department of National Health and Welfare we have been obliged, as have other departments, to scrutinize our estimated expenditures for the coming year, and while we have been able to maintain at least the same level of expenditures for northern health services and Indian health services as was established last year, we have not been able to maintain the significant increase which prevailed over the preceding year; we increased the level of expenditures in northern health services in that year over the former year by about 14 per cent.

Given a definite budget, the officers of the medical service have had to accommodate the service provided within those budgetary limits. Certainly the members of the department are sympathetic to the needs of the Indian population, and of the population of northern Canada. This interest and sympathy has been expressed by the continuing efforts to improve the level of services. But we have been obliged to readjust, rearrange and in some cases to curtail services for the coming year.

I have listened with great interest to the representations of the hon. member for the Northwest Territories and to other representations which have been made, and I am currently reviewing the situation in an effort to ensure that minimum changes are made in this service. There is no lack of sympathy or concern. The consideration is a budgetary one in relation to other demands on the curtailed estimates of the department. I shall be discussing this problem with my colleagues and I hope that at the end of this discussion and review I shall be able to make a more definite statement about these services.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, March 15, 1968

The house met at 11 a.m.

JUSTICE AND LEGAL AFFAIRS

Fourth report of standing committee on justice and legal affairs—Mr. Cameron (High Park).

[Note: Text of foregoing report appears in today's Votes and Proceedings.]

PUBLIC SERVICE

TABLING OF REPORT ON DEVELOPMENT OF BILINGUALISM

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I should like to table a report on the progress which has been made in the development of bilingualism in the federal government and, if the house desires, it could be made an appendix to Hansard today.

Mr. Speaker: Has the Prime Minister leave to table this document?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that this document be appended to Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For text of document referred to, see appendix.]

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

TABLING OF REPORT ON ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE IN HAY RIVER, N.W.T.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I should like to table copies in English and French of a report by Hon. W. G. Morrow on the administration of justice in Hay River in the Northwest Territories and, in doing so, to thank Justice Morrow for the work he has done in preparing this report. Perhaps I might add that steps are being taken to produce the report in the Eskimo and Indian languages for distribution in the area.

Mr. Speaker: Has the Prime Minister leave to table this report?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

CONCURRENCE IN TWELFTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Joseph Macaluso (Hamilton West) moved that the twelfth report of the standing committee on transport and communications, presented to the house on Wednesday, March 13, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

FINANCE

INCREASE IN INTEREST RATE BY BANK OF CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance and ask him whether he has been invited to a week end meeting in Washington. If he is attending, in what capacity will he be doing so in addition to his capacity as Minister of Finance? Is there any other capacity in which he will be attending?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): I do not expect I shall be attending any meetings in Washington. I understand invitations are being extended to the governors of the central banks of the countries which are in the so-called gold pool, but to no others.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): In view of the fact that the rediscount rate has been raised to 7½ per cent, as announced by the governor of the Bank of Canada, and in view of the effect this will have on interest rates generally, is the minister giving thought or will he give thought to the possibility of imposing some restraint on interest rates, bearing in mind that higher rates will increase costs and add to the inflationary spiral?

Mr. Sharp: The bank rate in Canada was raised to follow the rediscount rate in the United States. It was evidence that Canada intends to maintain the value of the Canadian dollar. If we had not acted in this way I think our position would have been subject to misinterpretation. The purpose is to continue to attract capital into Canada in order to maintain the stability of the Canadian dollar and the Canadian economy. If we had not taken this action the result would have been serious. Therefore this is a contribution to employment, price stability and the general well being of the economy.

Mr. Douglas: In view of the fact that an increase in interest rates will increase costs and consequently add to inflation, is the minister considering any restraint to prevent interest rates generally from rising and avoid the disastrous effect this could produce by further escalating inflationary pressure on the economy?

Mr. Sharp: The only answer I am able to give is that I can think of nothing more serious than the instability of the Canadian dollar.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Would the minister explain to the house why there is a 2½ point spread in the so-called rediscount rate in Canada as compared to the United States, a spread which is much wider than is normally the case?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the difference between the rediscount rates in Canada and the United States is not really the significant figure. The really significant figure is the difference between long term interest rates in Canada and the United States. This is slightly above normal, but not very much.

Mr. Lambert: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister explain why there will be this 1½ point spread in the prime rate charged by the various banks as a result of the increase in the bank rate by Canada, which represents a 2½ point spread?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, this is a reflection of the fundamental situation that exists in international markets today. This is one of the most disturbed periods we have had. I can only reiterate that I believe the measures that are being taken are essential to underline the importance of maintaining the stability of the Canadian dollar. I can think of nothing more useful to the stability of employment and the standard of living of Canadians than to defend the Canadian dollar at the present time.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question?

[Mr. Sharp.]

In view of the fact that the Bank of Canada has announced that it will raise its discount rate to 7½ per cent, is the hon. minister considering the possibility that the chartered banks may increase their interest rates also?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the rate of interest in the market will be determined by the competitive forces that are at work, not only by the bank rate but by other factors as well. All I can say is that both the governor of the bank and I would prefer interest rates to be lower, but under the circumstances we believe that higher rates are the lesser evil.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, may I put a further supplementary question? Could the minister tell us how it is that the Bank of Canada can increase its discount rate without consulting parliament which, after all, is sovereign in this country?

[English]

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance, on the basis that everyone agrees that stability of the dollar is important, whether he is considering some form of foreign exchange control to prevent a very large outflow of capital, instead of being concerned solely with attracting capital from outside.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the government looks at all possible measures that will underpin the stability of the Canadian dollar in this very troubled world. I think any suggestion that we put on foreign exchange controls would lead to an undermining of confidence in the Canadian dollar, which is the very result that none of us wants to see.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. I wonder if the minister could inform the house whether there is any intention to close the gold market in Canada, as has been done in Great Britain.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, last night at ten o'clock I announced that I had asked the banks and the other dealers to suspend trading in gold. My officials have been in touch with the banks and the dealers, and I expect there will be general compliance with this request. This is a temporary measure pending clarification of the international situation.

[Later:]

Mr. John R. Matheson (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance which countries would tend to profit by an increase in the official price of gold?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, to judge from what I know about the situation the principal beneficiaries would be South Africa, the Soviet union and those countries which have very large proportions of gold in reserve such as France and Switzerland.

[Later:]

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): I have a question for the Minister of Finance, but apparently he was called away so I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. During the recent financial crisis, has the government been in direct contact with the governor of the Bank of Canada?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes indeed, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Korchinski: May I ask a supplementary question. Was the decision made yesterday to increase the interest rate the result of a government decision or was it a decision by the governor of the bank?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question, I am sure, is not in order.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

REDUCTION IN BUDGET FOR NORTHERN HEALTH SERVICES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I wish to direct to the minister of health and welfare. Has the minister received submissions from the premiers of Alberta and Manitoba protesting the reduction in health services to the Indian and Eskimo population of Canada? If so, what action has he taken to ensure that our native peoples will not have to bear the brunt of government fiscal mismanagement?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member realizes the second part of his question is in the form of an argument. The minister might answer the first part of the question.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have not received any messages from either of these gentlemen.

Mr. Dinsdale: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister received personal representations with respect to similar reductions in northern health services from the commissioner of the Northwest Territories, Mr. Hodgson, who was so instructed by the Northwest Territories council?

Mr. MacEachen: No, I have not. I received representations from the hon. member for the Northwest Territories.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I may make a supplementary answer to the effect that this morning I received a telegram from the premier of Alberta on this subject.

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the minister's assurance yesterday that the moneys allotted to the northern health service had not been reduced, would he assure the house that the services provided are not being reduced as of April 1?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I made a statement on this subject last night in response to a question asked by the hon. member for Northwest Territories. All the information is in that answer.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Prime Minister for his reply in which he indicated that he too had received a telegram. Could he indicate from whom the other telegrams were received?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I received a telegram from the premier of Manitoba, and last evening from the native women's conference which is meeting at the Mayfair hotel in Edmonton.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Prime Minister would take the house into his confidence and tell us the nature of the telegrams, and what was his reply on behalf of the government in that regard.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I received the telegrams only a few hours ago and have not been able to reply to them. I would be glad to make them public, but I would have to get in touch with the premier of Alberta before I could do that.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister after some discussion be prepared to table the telegrams and his replies to them?

Mr. Pearson: I would be glad to do that.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of National Health and Welfare indicated that he would consider the possibility of tabling the directive which went out from his department indicating that health services would be reduced to the Indian and Eskimo population. Is he now in a position to table that document?

Mr. MacEachen: Not today, Mr. Speaker. I told my hon. friend yesterday that I would investigate the possibility of doing so, and I am continuing to do that.

Mr. Simpson: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In answer to the question I directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare he said he made a statement last night and that all the information was there. I should like to bring to your attention the fact that when the minister made the statement he said this question is very complicated, and that it was impossible to deal with it adequately in a few minutes.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That of course is not a point of order.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare regarding the directive to which reference has been made. If the minister should decide that it is not possible to make that directive public, could we prevail on the hon. member for Brandon-Souris to make it public?

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the Minister of National Health and Welfare advise the house whether he is able also to table a copy of the letter from the regional director of his department in Edmonton to the deputy minister of the province of Alberta advising him that in Alberta the health services would be restricted to indigent Indians on reserves, and that beyond that health services would be the responsibility of the province of Alberta.

Mr. MacEachen: I would be happy to consider that suggestion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker; would the Minister of National Health and Welfare consider asking the house to revert to motions so he could make a statement on this matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is not a point of order; it is a question.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NIGERIA—COMMONWEALTH EFFORTS TO END CIVIL WAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In the light of recent publicized information from a leading Canadian expert on Nigeria concerning the continuing gravity of the Nigerian-Biafra conflict, could the minister advise us whether any further efforts have been made beyond those of Mr. Arnold Smith, and what Canada is doing toward the amelioration of civilian suffering in that area.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have been in almost continual contact with the Secretary General of the Commonwealth on this matter. Whether there have been any other developments in the last few days I am not sure, but I will look into this right away.

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether our government is asking the government at Lagos to permit shipments of relief supplies by the International Red Cross from Geneva to Biafra?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

KENYA—PROTESTS AGAINST ALLEGED RACIST POLICIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the Canadian government has made any representations to the government of Kenya about the invasion of human rights implicit in the virtual expulsion of thousands of native born Kenya Asians?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that matter is now being considered. I will take the question as notice.

Mr. Nesbitt: Has the government any information in respect of similar action reported to be planned by the governments of Tanzania and Uganda?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am aware of the situation in those countries.

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I think this question might have fallen to the hon. member for Kootenay West. Regrettably he is not here today, so I am attracted to ask the question of the Secretary of State. I should like to ask the hon. lady whether she is in a position to answer the question I posed yesterday.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am so attracted to the hon. member I have forgotten what the question was.

Mr. Knowles: You could always say yes.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, about a year ago I told the hon. member who made that interjection that I have been waiting to say yes for a long time, to the right question.

[Translation]

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, a former unexcelled labour leader.

Considering the high standard of living that Canadian workers have obtained for themselves, thanks to the unions, can the minister tell us whether it would be a good thing for the half million unemployed to organize their own union, which might have as its main objective to force the department to assume its responsibilities?

Mr. Speaker: The question as asked is out of order.

IMMIGRATION

ALLEGED INACCURATE INFORMATION GIVEN BY OFFICIALS ABROAD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Is it true that the information supplied in Europe by immigration officials is incorrect and untrue and is prejudicial to the interests of immigrants on their arrival in Canada?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is not a fact that the information supplied is incorrect.

[English]

[Later:]

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the statements and charges made by recently arrived immigrants in this country, particularly in Toronto, that they were given wrong information by our immigration representatives in the countries from which they came, would the minister not investigate whether these charges are correct?

Mr. Marchand: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will do that.

[Later:]

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a delayed supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the serious charges which have been laid against the government or government representation in various countries, will the minister, after investigating the situation, agree to make a statement in the early part of next week in order to clear the government of these charges?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, as soon as I have made inquiries and obtained information I shall make a statement to the house.

HOUSING

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER GOVERNMENT ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the report that unemployment in the month of February has gone very high, indeed to 6.4 per cent, is the government prepared to consider an immediate increase in the money supply and other activities to promote an immediate increase in housing as one method of dealing with unemployment?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): We naturally want to do everything we can to take care of the increase in unemployment, which was 18,000 this month over the previous month. My hon. friend will be glad to know that figures for employment have actually increased over this month last year, but the increase in the labour force was even greater.

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he is aware that prime conventional mortgage rates on residential construction are almost 3 per cent higher in Canada than in the United States and, if so—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Schreyer: May I rephrase the question by asking the Minister of Finance whether he can say that the government is contemplating any measures to reduce the differential existing in respect of conventional mortgage rates as between Canada and the United States; because this does not exist on any rational premise or reason.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, our whole policy at the present time is directed to trying to get interest rates in this country down, but this depends upon convincing the people who are lending money that our prices and costs are not going to rise and that the Canadian dollar is stable.

Mr. Woolliams: I have a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There have been so many members trying to ask questions on this matter I suggest that perhaps we should move on to another matter. We can return to this question later if there is time.

PENITENTIARIES

QUEBEC—INSTRUCTIONS RESPECTING PURCHASE OF FOOD

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the hon. Solicitor General.

Is it true that the authorities of federal penitentiaries located in the province of Quebec have been instructed not to purchase meat stamped "Quebec-Approved"?

Mr. Speaker: If that question is in order, it should be put on the order paper.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, with all due respect, I feel that question is very important as it may lead to inconveniences and misunderstandings between the two levels of government. To my mind, the hon. minister should at least pay attention to the question.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is making a representation to the minister. His question is in order to that extent.

[Mr. Schreyer.]

SHIPPING

HALIFAX—PROTEST AGAINST PROPOSED INCREASES IN HARBOUR AND PILOTAGE FEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. I have given him notice, although not very long notice, of it. Has the minister received a protest from the Halifax branch of the Shipping Federation of Canada regarding proposed increases in pilotage and boat charges at Halifax; and will he personally examine into these increases?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have not, since receiving notice of the question, had time to determine whether such representations have been received. I will make inquiries and advise my hon. friend.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could I ask the minister, while he is making inquiries into that matter, to see if he can find the report of the royal commission on pilotage.

AIR TRANSPORT

REQUESTS FOR ACTION UNDER REGIONAL AIR POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. R. Sherman (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. In order to ensure that there shall be no discrimination against the prairies under the government's regional air policy, would the minister consider granting TransAir an extension of the present deadline on the life of its subsidy for service on the prairie run?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this is not within the power of the minister. The show cause order was from the Air Transport Board, which has jurisdiction in this matter. They have now granted an extension of time to TransAir to file a new proposal. In the meantime the subsidy, as my hon. friend knows, is not being paid, but I am hopeful that TransAir will come up with a proposal that will be satisfactory to all concerned.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister assure the house that the prairie region will continue to have class I air carrier service as guaranteed under the regional air policy of 1966, even though this means paying some sort of subsidy?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is very familiar with the policy which was laid down and which I think will provide the kind of first class service in which he is interested. That is the policy we intend to pursue.

Mr. J. R. Keays (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. Due to the long delay in the holding of hearings which would permit the granting of a licence to a regional air carrier for the lower St. Lawrence and northern New Brunswick areas, would the minister inform us whether a decision on this vital subject will be made soon?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I will refer the hon. member's question to the Canadian Transport Commission.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the importance of this matter, would the minister do what he did on another occasion and stay in contact with his predecessor, our old friend the champion transportation dictator of all Canada, on this question?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, the president of the Canadian Transport Commission is in constant touch with the minister's office and is making—

An hon. Member: I'll bet he is.

Mr. Hellyer: I am just as interested as is my hon. friend in improving transportation facilities in all parts of Canada, and in the Atlantic provinces in particular.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister say whether he was in contact with the chairman of the transport commission during the last few days, at the time of the parliamentary crisis?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

HAL BANKS—REFUSAL OF EXTRADITION BY U.S. GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the government of Canada has lodged a formal protest with the United States against the unusual and unique intervention on the part of the Secretary of State or the department of state of that country on behalf of criminals, whether common or uncommon. Is this not a most unusual incident, in which there has been so great an interference with the administration in connection with extradition?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I indicated yesterday that the government intended to make a protest. This note of protest was delivered yesterday by our ambassador in Washington. Political authorities in both countries have the right to veto judicial action, but to the best of my knowledge that right has not been exercised by the executive authorities in either country for over 50 years.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it not a fact that that right has only been exercised when the individual in question has been prosecuted for a political offence?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of course the right of veto in respect of a political offence is one which would continue to be exercised by governments in both countries. We take the position that this is not that kind of offence. To the best of my knowledge, research shows that neither government has exercised the privilege of executive intervention for a period of over 50 years.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs would consider exchanging Doyle for Banks with the United States government.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the rather unusual television interview with the attorney general of Ontario last night, has the government an indication that Mr. Paul Hall of the Seafarers International Union in the United States brought pressure to bear on the United States government?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have no evidence whatsoever to warrant that suggestion.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question which I should like to put to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has he yet received any reply from the United States government in response to his request for reconsideration?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Our ambassador has informed me that we should receive a reply today.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION RESPECTING OFF-SHORE MINERAL RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in response to a question put to him earlier in the week, the right hon. Prime Minister indicated that he hoped to be able to make a statement to the house this week on the steps the government proposed to take next with regard to off-shore rights. I presume we must give up hope for such a statement this week, but would it be possible for the right hon. Prime Minister to make such a statement in the house on Monday?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I could answer the question now, although the reply is probably a little longer than usual.

As my hon. friend knows, the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada has been given on this subject. At the federal-provincial conference in July, 1965 I informed the provincial premiers that the government of Canada would negotiate equitable arrangements between the federal government and the provinces after the legal question has been resolved. That has now been done.

The whole question of off-shore minerals presents many complex and difficult problems, and it involves at least six departments of the federal government. Consultations are now going on among these departments. These consultations should be completed soon, and at that time we will begin discussions with the provinces on the official level. When these are completed we will invite the provinces to a federal-provincial conference, where I hope an equitable and satisfactory agreement can be reached.

Mr. Stanfield: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the government of Canada taking the position that this one decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in the reference in respect of the province of British Columbia settles the legal question with regard to all the provinces in Canada?

[Mr. Patterson.]

Mr. Pearson: Not necessarily, Mr. Speaker. I know the province of Nova Scotia takes a very different legal view of this situation. But we hope to be able to have discussions on the political level which will be satisfactory to all provinces.

Mr. Stanfield: Am I to infer from the answer of the Prime Minister that the government does not intend to proceed with any further legal references, but rather intends to proceed now to discussions with the provinces?

Mr. Pearson: The legal decision which has been given should help us to bring about an equitable political solution.

COAL

ROUTE TO BE FOLLOWED BY EXPORTS TO JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Some weeks ago he indicated that he was carrying on discussions with Kaiser Mines Limited regarding the coal contract with Japanese firms. I wish to ask him now whether he has received any assurances that the coal shipped to Japan will be carried over an all-Canadian route in so far as railway transportation is concerned.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): We have exchanged letters on this subject, and on the basis of these letters it is my understanding that the coal will be carried over an all-Canadian route.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INTERCEPTION AND IDENTIFICATION OF RUSSIAN PLANES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. How many flights of Soviet aircraft have been spotted along the east coast of Canada since we first became aware that these flights were taking place, on February 8 or 9?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I can separate in my memory the flights along the east coast from those on the west coast, but it seems to me, if my memory serves me right, that up to February 20 the reports I have seen mentioned about seven incidents. I think approximately five of them were on the east coast and two on the west coast.

Mr. Harkness: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that when this matter was discussed previously both the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Transport finally said these Russian planes were flying through international air space where commercial flights were taking place, has any protest now been made to the Soviet government against the continuation of these flights?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): My understanding is that this is a matter which concerns the international organization. There is a difference between military and civilian flights. I know that in one instance a Russian plane was in the path of a commercial airliner, and that it was seen by two commercial carriers, one of them a T.W.A. plane. I do not believe the Canadian government has taken a position in that particular instance. I think the matter was referred to the international organization.

Mr. Harkness: I have a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that these flights constitute a danger to commercial flights constantly travelling along those routes, has not the government of Canada a duty to protest this matter to the Soviet government?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I have to restrict my responsibilities, Mr. Speaker, to military matters. I think we did what we had to do; that is, we detected the planes and intercepted them.

Mr. Harkness: May I ask a further supplementary question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has he, in his capacity, taken note of these matters and made any representations to either the Soviet ambassador here or to the Soviet government?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): It had been the feeling, Mr. Speaker, that the way to handle this particular situation was to leave it to the international organization. This was the view. However, I would be glad to take a look at it again.

Mr. Andrew Chatwood (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): May I ask a supplementary question of the defence minister. In view of these continued intrusions by Russian aircraft, would the minister consider stationing defensive units at a more strategic location such as Goose Bay?

SPORTS

POSSIBLE TRANSFER OF N.H.L. TEAM TO VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): I had a question I wanted to ask the Minister of Justice. Having in mind the fact that a group of N.H.L. franchise owners are reported to be blocking the efforts of Vancouver to gain entry into the National Hockey League, will the minister look into the situation from the point of view of the combines legislation?

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, combines matters have been transferred to the excellent Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Perhaps he would want to consider this matter.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Minister of Justice for his kind reference and to say that the attitude is reciprocated and mutual. Under the Combines Investigation Act we do not have jurisdiction over professional sport in that, at the moment, it is considered to be a service industry. I want to say to the hon. member that in my personal capacity, however, Clarence Campbell being one of my constituents, I sent a telegram to him urging that Vancouver get the franchise.

Mr. McCleave: May I ask a supplementary question. Would the minister have control over beer?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NORTH SYDNEY, N.S.—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE FOR DOCK WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I posed a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, and asked if the dock workers in the port of North Sydney would be eligible for transitional assistance benefits. The minister replied to me in the French language. Since I do not have that great Trudeau facility to describe it as good or lousy, I had to wait until today to read the minister's reply. At no time did he mention transitional assistance benefits, but he mentioned the benefits under the manpower program. I am sure the minister must be aware that transitional assistance benefits were available to other workers in Canada, better known as TAB. Would this type of assistance be available to the workers in North Sydney?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I was not clear in my answer, Mr. Speaker. There is no doubt TAB does not apply to that case. I understood the hon. gentleman was referring to the mobility program and that is why I answered as I did.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): As I said yesterday, since this situation has been brought about by the government's technological change, why would TAB not apply to the port of North Sydney as it applied to workers in Windsor, Ontario?

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

STEPS TO IMPROVE CONDITIONS IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister inform the house what action is being taken on the proposals put forward by the premiers of the Atlantic provinces at the constitutional conference regarding the marked disparity between that region and the remainder of Canada? In addition, what consideration is being given to the special proposals made by Premier John Robarts in this regard, in view of the very high rate of unemployment in that area?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I will look into this.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

DISTRIBUTION OF U.S. MAGAZINE CONTAINING BIRTH CONTROL ADVERTISEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): I should like to ask the Postmaster General whether he has a reply to the question I asked him yesterday, and which he did not hear at that time, concerning the use of the mails by the publishers of a magazine containing birth control advertisements.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I am expecting a report momentarily, and I shall inform the house as soon as I receive it.

[Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria).]

COMBINES

RECOMMENDATION RESPECTING FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. This is not a question on sports. In view of the fact that the minister has now had his meeting with Judge Mary Batten, will he give consideration to the recommendation of the prairie royal commission that financial institutions be brought under the purview of the Combines Investigation Act so the consumer may be protected in the matter of credit buying?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the reference to financial companies being brought under the Combines Investigation Act was a reference made to the three prairie provinces. I said at the conclusion of the meeting with Judge Batten that we would be in communication with the three prairie governments as to the eventual disposition of this reference.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INVESTIGATION INTO GROCERY RETAILING IN WESTERN PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I should like to answer the question put to the Prime Minister yesterday by the hon. member for Bow River, whether the review of the allegations made in the Batten report affecting the grocery industry in western Canada would be extended to include the rest of Canada. I said to him privately, and I think I should put it on the record, that the director of investigation and research will deal in accordance with the statute with the allegations set forth in chapter 10 of the report which relates particularly to the situation in western Canada.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact that the Batten commission asked for an investigation into the whole business of grocery outlets and the exorbitant charges which are being made, does the minister intend to carry out a full scale investigation? If so, how soon will it begin?

Mr. Turner: Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I said I would ask the director to review all the allegations in the report. Of course he will follow the facts as they appear to him, and if he finds substance in these allegations then I asked him to begin an inquiry.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, which deals with the production of papers. About nine days ago this house ordered the production of certain papers in accordance with notice of motion No. 49 standing in my name. I ask the minister or ministers concerned to expedite the production of these papers concerning federal-provincial cost sharing programs. I feel that nine days is ample time to produce them.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NOWLAN—INABILITY TO HAVE QUESTIONS ACCEPTED FOR ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege, and I regret that I have to mention this. I have spoken with the officials concerned. My point relates to questions for the order paper. Yesterday afternoon, within the time limit, I submitted to the proper authorities certain questions that I expected would be on the order paper this morning. In view of the precarious state of this session the answers to these questions are of importance because they relate to the transfer of personnel from my riding to C.F.B. Summerside. The answers are important also because yesterday the Minister of National Defence said this matter might not be referred to the defence committee.

I understand there is objection to the number of questions asked. I have also been told there is objection to the length of questions. All questions but one were short and sweet and to the point. One perhaps is a little longer than the others. I have been told that I must go through the rigmarole of dividing up the questions among appropriate members. I cannot find the rule which says I must do so and, since time is of the essence, I am concerned about what may happen.

I want this matter to be recognized officially in Votes and Proceedings or on the order paper; that is why I am speaking now. I cannot find the rule which prohibits the questions in their present form from appearing on the order paper today. Since we may not be here for too many more days it is only fair for me now to ask officials of the defence department to start work on the answers to the questions, in order that suitable answers may be provided.

Mr. Speaker: I shall look into the matter raised by the hon. member.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR SURCHARGE

Hon. E. J. Benson (for the Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. C-208, to amend the Income Tax Act.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to say that we have indicated our opposition to the bill at previous stages. We have also indicated the parts of the bill we are prepared to accept. We are not prepared to accept the increase in personal and corporation income taxes, and I want to be on record as saying that is still our position.

Having stated that position during previous stages of the bill, we are now prepared to leave it at that and to have the question put.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to delay the house too long on third reading, but I feel it is essential that some comment should be made in connection with this bill, considering the international crisis that has overwhelmed us. It goes without saying that this situation does not call for a partisan political approach.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): At the moment we are in the eye of the hurricane and no one knows exactly what is going to come out of it. Those of my age, sir, cannot help hearing ominous echoes of 1929. We can only hope that those who today are in charge of the international monetary system and the governments of the major industrial countries will exhibit more wisdom than their predecessors of some 40 odd years ago, who stood helplessly wringing their hands while the world slipped into disaster.

I am not too optimistic, sir, that this wisdom will be found, because for some years those same people have been dodging the real issue before us in the international monetary system; that is, the development of a new international unit of exchange. I should say at this point that Canada's record on this is extremely good. We produced workable proposals for the development of such a unit, but they were frustrated by other nations in the world.

There are, of course, certain options open to the United States which would have their effect on Canada. No one can say yet what option the United States will take. One hears rumours of a two price system for gold, which strikes me as being difficult to work. It may be possible to make it work. One hears rumours that gold is to be demonetized. That would entail certain other actions on the part of the United States government which I doubt they are prepared to take at this time.

I think, in connection with this bill, we should turn our attention to what should be done to protect Canada's position. I will be frank to say, sir, that I was nothing short of appalled at the minister's answers to questions this morning. They indicate that he is locked in some sort of conventional wisdom and feels that the Canadian dollar can be protected indefinitely by the use of exchange reserves, despite the lamentable history of the same policy in the United Kingdom and the United States. I suggest to him, as I suggested the other day, that there is really only one way to protect the Canadian dollar, and that is by developing an expanding and prosperous economy in Canada.

I was disturbed, sir, to find the minister dismissing and rejecting out of hand the suggestions made in questions by the leader of this party and the member for York South, that steps should be taken to control the rise in interest rates and that measures ought to be taken to put into effect exchange controls. Frankly I consider the minister's answers ludicrous; sheer nonsense. I am afraid we will land ourselves in exactly the same sort of jam the world was landed in 40 years ago if the views of the minister and what he says are the views of the governor of the Bank of Canada are to be the views of those who control the international monetary system.

Finally, I suggest that this parliament ought to consider seriously the wisdom of recessing at this time. It may well become necessary to pass emergency legislation, and I doubt very much the wisdom of dismissing parliament now. We realize, of course, that to keep parliament in session at this time would be extremely awkward for the government party but surely, sir, the future of Canada and the possible necessity of taking drastic steps to protect ourselves from what may come out of the international crisis ought to override any party consideration of convenience at this time.

An hon. Member: I quite agree.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I will say only a few words, in view of the serious crisis in the financial field and the gold rush that has been going on for some weeks and that brought about yesterday the closing of the stock exchange and banks in several countries of the world.

There is no mistake about it, in the light of present circumstances, we live in a world of madmen and we are administered by the most remarkable among them.

Those people are tripping over themselves while they rush to the golden calf, but workmen and farmers got up as usual this morning to go about their work. Indeed, the farmers got up at the usual time this morning, namely about four or five o'clock, to milk the cows. This reminds me of a statement I heard once, to the effect that farmers got up at four o'clock to milk their cows while financiers got up at ten o'clock to milk the farmers. That is somewhat the situation in which we find ourselves at the present time.

The price of milk did not go up this morning. The salary of workers did not improve. Yet, the financial system, by order of the Bank of Canada, raises its discount rate by one half of one per cent without resorting to parliament. The banks, as I said a while ago, will raise their rates again and the people will again be trampled underfoot by the system.

• (12 noon)

We all know the story of the tower of Babel where there was a great confusion of languages. This does not mean that people did not speak the same language, but they did not understand each other, and when they saw this, they stopped building the tower.

We are building another tower of Babel today. People in the same country, province or municipality do not understand one another. But the difference today is that we are too stupid to stop building this tower of Babel.

Mr. Speaker, for thirty yeears, the Créditistes have been warning the succeeding federal governments of the situation now existing. The Créditistes have been called everything. It has been said that the implementing of their theory would give rise to inflation, economic chaos, a total failure of our economy, the downfall of Canada.

Today, our country is on the brink of ruin. We are witnessing an unrestrained race for financial control, and Social Credit is not to blame. It is not Social Credit that created the present inflation. It is not Social Credit which is responsible for the rise in the cost of living or for the extravagant expenditures in all fields.

Mr. Speaker, if serious consideration had been given to the solutions advocated by Social Credit thirty years ago, namely that the currency should truly reflect our resources and our production, we would not have today to cope with the system or the situation imposed upon us by a small group of men.

As a matter of fact, Pius XI said in 1931, 37 years ago already: Those who control money and credit are the masters of our whole lives and, without their permission, nobody has the right to breathe.

Let us consider the present situation in Great Britain. Let us consider the extreme poverty generally prevailing throughout the world. Let us observe the people getting nervous, businessmen getting worried, industrialists hesitating to forge ahead, to take action. Why? Because those who control money and credit have the power to prevent them from breathing.

Moreover, Pope Pius XI said that economics will be established and will truly attain its purpose only when it will provide each and every one of us with a part of the goods that nature and industry can provide, and that part should be sufficient to ensure a decent living for each and every one of us.

That is the aim, those are the objectives of a well planned economy, an economy that is serving the population. The pope did not say: inasmuch as the financial system allows, he said: "Inasmuch as nature and industry allow".

Now, Mr. Speaker, nature allows Canada to produce overabundant goods of all kinds, and industry, which is continuously ready to second nature, should not be blocked nor impeded in the upward march towards progress, towards the emancipation of our people, in short it should not be thwarted by an outmoded financial system which makes for legalized robbery in most countries where it is used.

Those are, Mr. Speaker, the few considerations which I wanted to make on the motion for third reading of Bill No. C-208. That bill will not solve the problem, it will not bring relief to poverty in Canada and I am repeating what I said two days ago: even if that bill provided a 25 per cent tax increase, it would not solve the situation in Canada.

It is not by taxing the labourer nor by overtaxing the small business or the small industry that we will save the Canadian economy, but by taking instead adequate monetary measures, some bold and courageous measures liable to put money at the disposal of the individual, not the individual at the disposal of money as expected in Bill No. C-208 which the government is attempting to have passed at this time.

[English]

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make only a few comments on the bill in the debate on third reading by way of adding to the remarks which have been made as to the seriousness of the situation we face. I think it behoves us in this house to dispense with this bill as soon as possible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: Yes. Dispense with it.

Mr. Thompson: Although we cannot agree with its basic policy we understand very well the need to avoid precipitating a further crisis at home which might weaken the confidence of the public in the operation of the parliamentary system. By doing so we would only be adding to the pressures which are building up on the international scene.

Having said that, I would urge the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) to do his utmost to bring about in the future so far as international monetary policy is concerned a system different from that which has been in operation in the past. We have been hanging on to the ragged coat-tails of an outworn financial policy which should have been discarded long ago. Many Canadians today are confused about what really is behind the crisis which we and other nations are facing. What has gold to do with trade balances and international settlements? What has it to do with our own financial system in Canada? It is not easy to find answers to these questions but I am sure that if we did so we would realize that in the game of international finance and politics the Soviet union, France, Switzerland and possibly South Africa will come out of this situation best.

Unfortunately, the United States government has insisted on hanging on to a policy which has resulted in a fantastic rise in interest rates, one which has worked undue hardship on us in Canada and placed a great strain on our economy and the stability of our finances. Because the United States has insisted on pegging the value of gold at an unrealistic level, pressure is now being exercised against the economic system in the world by countries which would destroy the policy which has insisted on maintaining the American dollar as the basis of international exchange—I am thinking of destruction in financial, not military terms.

The Minister of Finance owes it not only to his government but to his country to be in Washington to take part in the conferences scheduled for the weekend and insist we should no longer hang on to a financial system which could destroy the United States dollar as the medum of international exchange and take ours with it in the process. It is not enough to patch up the old arrangements. Before we see a repetition of what happened in 1929 a real effort must be made to restore confidence among the people of the world and to devise a system of exchange and international settlements which will remove once and for all the dangers which threaten the security of everyone in the world today. Canada has the opportunity to take the lead and insist that although something needs to be done so far as gold is concerned for a temporary period, it is necessary in the long run to devise a new system of international settlements designed to avoid a repetition in the future of the kind of crisis we are facing today.

We in this corner of the house, believe that we must deal immediately with the third reading of this bill whether or not we like the policies contained therein. I think that the Minister of Finance must take the major share of the blame for our present difficulties, but it is imperative that we do not add further to the uncertainty and lack of confidence that are developing in financial circles. Beyond this it is also necessary that steps be taken—and I suggest Canada could well take the lead—to bring about a new international exchange system which would not continually lead us into the precarious position that has been forced upon us by the present international situation.

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I have only one comment to make at this time and it arises from what transpired last night with the raising again of interest rates in the United States and Canada. It is argued that the reason the United States will not take a more realistic look at the price of gold is that this might work to the benefit of South Africa, France and Russia. I do not know whether that is true but, if so, it appears to me to be the same as if a drowning man refused to pull himself out of the water because somebody else might get out with him.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Sharp) which was agreed to on the following division:

• (1:00 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Pennell: I was paired with the hon. member for London (Mr. Irvine). Had I voted, I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, while I am opposed to the principle of this bill, I was paired with the former president of the privy council who I expected would be here this morning. However, when it comes to paring I am a George Washington. Had I voted, I would have voted against the motion.

Mr. Ballard: I was paired with a Member of the Administration, the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey). Had I voted, I would have voted against the motion.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF REPRESENTATIVES OF ICELAND PARLIAMENT

Mr. Speaker: May I ask the indulgence of the house to bring to the attention of all hon. members the presence in the Speaker's gallery of a very distinguished visitor, Mr. Sigmund Bjornason, Speaker of the lower house of parliament of Iceland. Mr. Speaker is accompanied by a fellow parliamentarian, Mr. Benedikt Grondal. As hon. members know, the Icelandic parliament is the oldest in the world, having been established in the year 930. On behalf of all hon. members I wish to extend a welcome to our distinguished visitors.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that a message has been received from the Senate informing this house that the Senate have passed Bill C-202, an act to amend the National Housing Act, 1954, without amendment.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Speaker, earlier in the day the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr), the house leader of the official opposition, was kind enough to inform us that his party was prepared to pass item No. 48 on the order paper. I consulted the leaders of the other parties and they also were most co-operative. I appreciate their co-operation and I respectfully ask Your Honour to call item No. 48.

CANADA DEPOSIT INSURANCE CORPORATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CALENDAR, FINANCIAL AND PREMIUM YEARS

Hon. L. T. Pennell (for the Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. S-24, to amend the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Peters: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: Order, please. House again in committee of supply. Estimates of the Department of the Secretary of State, vote No. 2c. Shall vote 2c carry?

SECRETARY OF STATE

2c. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment—National Arts Centre, $7,500,000.

Mrs. Wadds: Last night, Mr. Chairman, some comments were made about the Secretary of State, the member for Niagara Falls, and her contribution last year to centennial year. I wish to add my compliments to those which have been given. No one could have been more generous than the minister in the way she used her time and energy in making the many appearances she made last year, nor could anyone else have shown greater co-operation to the thousands of people interested in promoting centennial undertakings.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

• (2:40 p.m.)

Mrs. Wadds: Just before ten o'clock last night the hon. member for Timiskaming expressed the concern that many of us feel about the length of time it is taking to build the National Arts Centre. I believe that most Canadians were pleased when the project was initiated. However, since its initial introduction many have become concerned about construction delays and many have expressed concern to me about the additional costs that are being incurred, which have been partly brought about by delays in building and partly by other causes. According to the auditor's report for 1967 the cost of construction was $6,400,000, an increase of $2,800,000 over the preceding year, a substantial rise of some 25 per cent. According to the supplementary estimates, under the item for construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment there is an amount of $7,500,000, a further sharp increase. From the few figures I have come across in these records the total seems to be about $17,500,000 and we have heard various rumours that the cost will eventually go as high as $60 million or $70 million.

Can the minister tell the committee the size of the original estimate for the construction of the National Arts Centre and at what point the government intends to put a lid upon these skyrocketing costs? I might add that they do not include administrative and operating costs which are listed separately at $1,100,000, an increase of $80,000 over last year.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, there were questions asked last night about the National Arts Centre, especially with respect to the critical path. I have checked with the Department of Public Works which, as hon. members know, is responsible for construction, and I am told that the critical path method is being used. There is one man specifically in charge. It is my understanding that progress is on time; the project is to be completed and turned over on the last day of this year. It will then take three or four months to try out the auditorium. The original plan was that in May, 1969, productions would be staged, and as far as we are aware everything is on time. Of course, we do not know whether there will be any major strikes in the intervening period.

So far as costs are concerned it is my recollection, and I have not refreshed my memory recently, that the first estimate for the building amounted to some $18 million. My information is that the latest estimate, now about two years old, of a figure around $40 million or $43 million, represents what the cost will be, right on target.

The figures which appear each year for the administration of the centre increase, of course, as we approach the day when programs are to begin. The site is not very attractive now and it certainly was not attractive throughout the centennial year, but it seems to me hon. members are not really aware of how much has been completed inside the building. I have been remiss in this respect but after the remarks made last night I discussed this matter with the Minister of Public Works, and with his concurrence I am pleased to invite any member of the House of Commons who may wish to go for a guided tour of the premises at 11.30 a.m. on Monday next. A great deal of the building is like an iceberg. It has to be seen to be believed and I think that if hon. members would take an hour of their time to look at it they would appreciate how large an enterprise it is.

Mr. Starr: In issuing this invitation is the hon. lady suggesting that we should allow her estimates to stand until we have seen the building?

Miss LaMarsh: Not at all. This building will be the heart of Ottawa when it is opened about a year from now and I made my offer because I think hon. members would like an opportunity to see it. After all, it is a national centenary project and it is well ahead of many of other centenary projects, notably the one sponsored by the province of Ontario which is not expected to reach completion until a year later.

The board of trustees was set up more than a year ago and has held regular meetings, as have a great many auxiliary committees. It is working now in connection with the programs to be presented. Already it has been announced that Stratford Theatre is to become the Stratford National Theatre and will operate from the centre during the winter. There is to be a French speaking company to complement this arrangement and a concert orchestra which can be used as a pit orchestra; it will also be used by the C.B.C. for some of its functions and will be available to increase cultural activity within the city. Running costs are increasing because these plans have to be made in advance. One cannot produce an orchestra by May, 1969 in the absence of time for preparation.

I believe that if hon. members would take advantage of the opportunity to visit the buildings under construction, wearing hard hats and clothes which will not spoil too easily, bearing in mind that work is still in progress, they will have a new sense of pride in what will be a considerable national monument.

I have a few other comments to make and perhaps this is a good opportunity to deal with other matters which have been raised. I should like to thank hon. members for their overly generous words both last night and today. I should particularly like to thank the hon. lady who sits for Grenville-Dundas for her contribution to the centennial year, one of the most important of which was to pair with me on so many occasions, making it possible for me to be present at events in a non-political way. I think the hon. lady recognized, as did everyone else, that centenary projects were not party matters. All of us were careful not to bring partisan politics into them and it was an occasion for considerable pride for both of us that we were able to show our non-partisan approach by appearing together for most of the year.

It was a happy circumstance that the work of members of the Centennial Commission should have been mentioned in the discussions last night. The commission yesterday held its last meeting. Most of the employees have been re-engaged elsewhere, though some have not yet found positions. We expect all the work to be closed down on March 31, on which date the commission will go out of existence. In this connection I have a rather important announcement to make. It is the only one of its kind, I think, I have had to make in the seven and a half years I have been in parliament and one in which the committee of supply should be interested. The Centennial Commission instructed me yesterday that it is turning back to the treasury some $3,400,000 in unexpended funds.

Mrs. Wadds: I have one other question regarding the National Arts Centre. It relates to the future and has to do with advertising. Has the minister any plans with respect to general promotion of the centre's activities? I would refer in the first place to a magazine called Prologue which has been sent to me. Apparently it is being sent out broadly; it is stated on page one that the purpose of Prologue is to let Canadians everywhere know about the National Arts Centre. Apparently there are to be six issues sent out before the centre opens and I have been asked to find out what sending it to Canadians everywhere means, how many copies are to be distributed and what the approximate cost will be.

Miss LaMarsh: I do not have this information. I shall be glad to get it and send it to the hon. member. I am not familiar with the particular issue mentioned, but one of the objects of the trustees is to work with the Canada Council to make the centre a focus for all Canadians. It is important that people outside the capital city should have a sense of engagement and with this in mind it is desirable that they should know what is going on.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Chairman, I should like to echo the remarks made by the charming and gracious member for Grenville-Dundas and praise the good work of the Secretary of State during centennial year. I should like to say, too, that I believe the Centennial Commission did a fine job. If I may, Mr. Chairman, I should like to make one particular comment. I think that much is owed to John Fisher, the man who taught us all that our Canadianism should show. I think he should not be forgotten.

I should also like to thank the hon. lady for her invitation for next Monday. It will not be too much trouble to find clothes that are not so good, to use her expression. All I need is a hard hat size 7⅞ths and I shall be with her. I too am anxious to see the National Arts Centre commence business. Although I welcome it, I think the point raised by my colleague is extremely important and is something that should concern not only the minister but all ministers, indeed all parliamentarians.

These are very difficult times. Parliamentary institutions and the whole process of government are in disrepute, or near disrepute. One constantly hears increasing reaction along the line that whatever the government attempts to do it does it badly or it does not do it in time or it does it at too high a cost. I think this is something that we must watch. Buildings are not completed on time and the estimates are far removed from the actual cost. Therefore in these difficult and questioning times when people are looking askance at their institutions—and in a democracy the bulk of the people must respect the political institutions in order for them to work—all of us, especially those in executive authority, must look at matters such as the escalated cost of this building, which should cause to the most art-minded person in Canada to worry.

I would compliment the minister on her optimism and on her felicity of expression when she suggested that this building will be completed on time when actually it will be completed on the last day of the year following centennial year. We must remember that in fact it was a centennial project. However, it does us no good to harp on the past. The building was not completed in 1967. Nevertheless it will do much to enrich the lives of Canadians, though I wish it had not cost so much.

[Miss LaMarsh.]

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I only have a very brief question for the Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh), relating to vote 1c.

As regards the $100,000 grant to Le centre culturel du vieux Montréal, can she tell us whether this is the same theatrical company that went bankrupt recently and that was quartered in the stock exchange building? Yes, I think that was the name. Can the minister tell us whether the grant will be allowed nonetheless?

Miss LaMarsh: Yes.

Mr. Grégoire: So, it is the same theatrical company? I would like to make a comment. The minister tells me that this $100,000 will nonetheless be granted to this company. The hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Boulanger) tells me the company is back on its feet thanks to this grant.

Mr. Boulanger: The creditors accepted the company's offer and everything is all right now.

Mr. Grégoire: So much the better, if that means they have ben able to resume their activities.

Mr. Chairman, vote 2c reads as follows:

Construction or Acquisition of Buildings, Works, Land and Equipment—National Arts Centre.

I wish to put a question to the hon. minister concerning another building which was promised a long time ago and which is not progressing very fast—the C.B.C. building in Montreal. Could the hon. minister tell us what progress has been made and when we can expect that building to be finished? Could she give us some information concerning the C.B.C. building in Montreal?

[English]

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, I was in communication with Mr. Davidson, the new president of the C.B.C., the other day. He had asked that this along with other matters be held over until he had had time to look into them. He is having a meeting of the new board some time around the end of April at which time he will be prepared to make submissions to the board in regard to the Montreal building. We have every hope that after the new board has met tenders will be called almost immediately and construction will go ahead.

Item agreed to.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

1c. Administration, production and distribution of films and other visual materials, $170,000.

Mr. Mather: Mr. Chairman, I have two or three brief comments on this item and also one proposal. I think the film board performs a very useful and rather underrated service to Canada. I am told that at least 16 million people in Canada see one production or another of the film board every year and that 30 million people in other countries see productions of the National Film Board. The quality of the N.F.B. productions is indicated by the fact that over recent years more than 600 international awards have been won by the National Film Board for its work.

The work of the board is not confined simply to the production of films. Some of its employees are working on improvements in technical equipment which may be very useful. The board also plays a useful role in helping various departments of government by illustrating their efforts. In this regard I think the film board is to be commended.

The proposal I want to make and draw particularly to the attention of the Secretary of State, if I may, concerns what seems to me to be an urgent need for some action at the federal level to preserve historic Canadian film. Two or three archive organizations in this country are trying to do something along that line but I believe that they are not receiving sufficient financial support from the Canadian public. The film that the Canadian Film Institute is trying to preserve is irreplaceable. It is old film having to do with the earliest beginnings of the Canadian film industry. It is a sad fact to relate that last year a million feet of this historic film was burned because it was insecurely stored. In concluding my remarks I take the opportunity to direct the attention of the Secretary of State to this problem and to urge her to do what she can to draw together those connected with film archives to see whether or not they can work out with federal aid a program that will really protect historic Canadian film.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, I have a question I want to ask the Secretary of State in connection with the National Film Board. In all my dealings with government organizations I have never found a department of government performing its functions more adequately and perfectly than the film board. During the last 15 years I have had direct connections with the board and have arranged to purchase from them many hundreds of dollars worth of film which we have distributed to boards of education and school trustees for use in the school system of Ontario. The coverage given by the National Film Board to historical events, geographical features and industrial complexes is perfect.

However, in view of the uproar that is developing over educational television, which is something that leaves me cold—I am in favour of education through the use of film because you can use film when you want—I should like to ask the minister what proportion of the sales of the National Film Board is to school boards and boards of education for use in classroom instruction under the jurisdiction of the boards of education. These films are perfect for this purpose. I should like to think that all of their sales are made in this field, but what proportion is sold for educational purposes?

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, I am afraid I could not even hazard a guess but I will get the information as soon as I can.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, I raise the question only to emphasize the wonderful work that the National Film Board is doing in the field of visual education. The way it covers visual education cannot be improved upon by television because it is adequately presented in film form. The National Film Board is showing the way in this regard.

• (3:00 p.m.)

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I am rising briefly to support the representation by the hon. member for New Westminster that every effort be made to make certain that historic films be preserved in the future and are not subject to fire and destruction as has been the situation in a few cases in the past.

On behalf of a good many women in my riding who are associated with groups such as the women's institute and the parent-teachers association I should like to express their appreciation of the work done by the National Film Board in constituencies such as the one I have the honour to represent. There are many very small and sometimes isolated communities which have received very good service from the National Film Board. One of the best supporters of the National Film Board has been one of the finest national film councils of rural Canada, that of Kootenay West. I have been asked by these people to express to the minister their appreciation of the good work done by the National Film Board in the area I represent.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I rise to join with my colleagues in commending the work which the National Film Board has done over the years. It has produced a tremendous number of films of a cultural and educational nature. These films have been shown not only to millions of people in Canada but to audiences all over the world. The excellence of the work done has been demonstrated again and again by the large number of international awards which the film board has received. I join with other members of this group in commending the film board for the work it has been doing and in the hope that its work will be continued and extended.

I wish to raise a matter which while it may not be directly connected with the National Film Board is very close to it. I have reference to the Canadian Film Development Corporation. The bill which we discussed in 1966-67 was a proposal by the former secretary of state who is now a member of the other place that the people of Canada through the government co-operate in helping, through the creation of a fund, to establish in Canada a feature film industry. Although we are all aware of the work done by the National Film Board and the success it has had, Canada has not had a feature film industry despite the fact that in the English speaking world a number of Canadians have reached the top in the film industry as producers, writers, directors and actors. Great Britain, the United States and France are filled with ex-Canadians who are giving leadership and occupying important and influential places in the film industry.

It was the belief of the former secretary of state that we should endeavour to keep people such as these in Canada, a belief which I believe was shared by virtually everyone in this house. When the present Secretary of State brought forth the proposal to establish the Canadian Film Development Corporation and to provide a fund of $10 million she had virtually unanimous support. I should like to quote one paragraph from the statement of the minister on June 20, 1966 as recorded on page 6632 of Hansard. She said:

> We should, Mr. Chairman, be under no illusion about the difficulties which Canadian producers will face in building up a commercially viable industry in this country. They will have to make it commercially viable by exporting their work, which will have to be done by virtue of profitable distribution arrangements. Canadian films must prove good enough to win their own place on world screens.

I could quote further from the remarks of the minister on that and other occasions, but I believe we realized at that time as we do now that while this is an idea worthy of our support it will not be easy to buck the giants of the United States and Great Britain in the production of feature length films. It is very seldom that such films can be produced for a small amount of money. The government of Canada has provided a fund of $10 million. Most of us would like to see that money used to good advantage over a period of time.

Yesterday the names of the appointees to the board of directors of this corporation were announced. I should like to advise the minister, if she has not heard this already, that many members of parliament including myself are dismayed by the appointments which have been made. In addition every person in and around the film industry to whom I have spoken since yesterday is dismayed. Although the board is a very estimable group of ladies and gentlemen, with the possible exception of Madame Favreau they have had virtually no experience in the film industry and are all good Liberals. While these are not necessarily bad features I submit that they have nothing to do with the qualities required to make a success of this corporation.

I do not object to the government of Canada being generous and spending $40 million, as was mentioned a few moments ago, to build a performing arts centre and I do not mind the federal government making a contribution to agriculture—I will always support that. The whole purpose of this corporation, however, was to help finance and establish a commercial film industry. This is a very difficult, complicated and risky business. Here we find the government, on the recommendation of the minister, appointing a group of Liberal hacks as directors of the corporation. I have nothing against these persons as individuals. Mr. LaPalme, so far as I can ascertain, was a little better than average minister of the crown but he certainly is not expert in the field of the production of films. It is true that Mr. Frith has been a member of the B and B Commission and I believe he had some film-makers or television stations as clients in his law practice. Mr. Phillips and Mr. Harris were successful businessmen. They are also very influential members of the Liberal party. Madame Favreau has worked for a number of years for the film board and has been a film critic for La Presse.

If it was a good idea for the government to put up a substantial amount of money in 1966 to help create a feature film industry in Canada so that Canadian producers, writers and directors would remain in Canada, surely it is a good idea now and, if so, we should do everything possible to see that this corporation is a success. The first thing we should not do is appoint a group of hacks as a reward for past political services, because the running of this corporation will be difficult under the best of circumstances. I see the minister looking at me with some concern or perhaps disdain. There are a number of ex-Canadians who have built fine reputations in these fields. The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond on an earlier occasion talked about some Canadians who had gone on to make real names for themselves in this field, including Norman Jewison, Sydney Newman, Graeme Ferguson and Sydney Furie. These are individuals who have been eminently successful in making films which have not only been artistic and cultural but financially successful. These are the kind of people the minister ought to be looking for to be directors of this corporation, not such people as have been appointed so far.

• (3:10 p.m.)

I can only say to the minister in closing my brief remarks that I could not help but think, as I looked at the announcement of the appointments, that the only appointments that have been as bad or worse since I came to Ottawa are the appointments the present Prime Minister has made to the other place.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, I have to answer these remarks because I disagree totally with what the hon. member has said. He is obviously not aware of what this board is, because it is intended to be a bank. It is a board where money will be raised in a number of different ways, by grants, loans and participation. It will have a package responsibility in respect of scripts, star arrangements, distribution and everything else. We have been through all this. This is not to be a group that necessarily knows how to make movies because it will not make movies. This is to be a group that is culturally oriented and prepared to act in regard to a banking situation. There is to be a full time director who will be an expert in at least one of the aspects of movie-making.

I was very intrigued by the comparison which was made between members of this board and two or three gentlemen now living and working abroad who were originally Canadians and have now made their marks in the film industry. Most of them are drawing salaries of the nature of $100,000 a year. It is really laughable when my hon. friend suggests that we should somehow divorce them from their various enterprises in Italy, California and Britain to bring them back here for the kind of pittance this country pays its public servants. It is all very well to stand and make that kind of N.D.P. speech, but it has no practicality.

When it comes to setting up a board I am not prepared to appoint hacks, and while I know lots of hacks in lots of parties in the country I would not qualify any of the individuals on this board in that way. The chairman of the board is one of the most distinguished sons of French Canada. He is not only a very distinguished lawyer but also was the first Quebec minister of cultural affairs and one who felt so deeply about the field of cultural affairs that he resigned his portfolio because he did not think the province of Quebec was putting sufficient money into the field. I am quite astounded that the hon. member or anyone else would suggest that this gentleman, who has been good enough to accept this appointment, is a party hack. This man was good enough to be appointed by the mayor of Montreal, in respect of whom every party has tried to make claims, as his cultural adviser for the son of Expo. Surely no one can suggest that this man is a party hack, particularly in view of the amount of time he has generously offered us in the first year. This will be fairly onerous for this part time member of a federal board. It will amount to about a day per week.

I do not personally know the lady appointee but she comes very highly recommended. I do not know what her politics are and I have never inquired. She does have a particular qualification that recommends itself to me in that she happens to be female. I wanted a particularly good bilingual female on this board and this young woman seems to qualify.

Having regard to Mr. Frith, who is now living in this city, it is true that he has been a follower of the Liberal party. I for one do not find anything wrong with that, but he has not held office for eight or nine years and has been engaged in a number of enterprises, almost all of them in the cultural field, including television and radio. He was one of the most distinguished and hard-working members of the B and B commission and is one individual who above all others in the country is dedicated to a belief in the flourishing two founding cultures of Canada.

I met Mr. Phillips of Vancouver once. I believe he is a Liberal although I do not think he has particularly identified himself as such. Perhaps he will deny that he is. I am informed that he has made investments in films made in Canada, the latest being made by the British industry and starring Rita Tushingham. It was shown a year or so ago on the west coast. He is an enterprising and vigorous young businessman who knows what it is to invest his own money in this field. This seems to me to be a good background when it comes to investing public money.

Having regard to Mr. Harris, I do not know him personally but have been informed that he has a very distinguished career in business. I have never heard that he has any politics. He is a man who is particularly interested in the arts and the theatre.

It strikes me that all these people are particularly cultivated and well qualified Canadians. The most anyone can say is that they have taken an active interest in the affairs of their country and have chosen the best party to support. By no stretch of any rational kind of imagination could any of them be called a hack.

Mr. Orlikow: I do not know whether it was by accident or by design that the minister neglected to comment on Mr. Elliott, who is also a member of the board. Let me refer to the minister's own press release which indicates that Mr. Elliott, after working for a number of Ontario newspapers, joined the MacLaren advertising agency of Toronto in 1948. It is stated that he served six years as film production supervisor in the agency's television department and is now a vice president and director of the company. There is not much purpose in pursuing the political aspects but I want to put on record, in case the minister is as unknowledgeable about politics as she seems to be, that other members of this house know about the close relationship between the Liberal party and the MacLaren agency. It is not an accident that this gentleman was appointed to the board.

Surely I made it clear in my earlier remarks that I exempted Madame Favreau from my suggestion. I said she had spent a number of years working at the film board and as film critic for La Presse.

[Miss LaMarsh.]

I accept the minister's word that these people are interested in culture, but that is not the point. They have not been appointed as directors of the C.B.C. or as directors of the National Film Board, both of which are concerned to a large extent with educational and cultural productions. They have been appointed to a corporation with the one purpose of co-financing, which was the term I think the minister used when introducing the legislation, commercial full length films.

• (3:20 p.m.)

I say to the minister, as she said then, that this is a difficult and risky business. I hoped we would do everything possible to see that this business is a success. It is true, as the minister says, that these people will be acting as sort of directors of a bank. I have not had the experience with banks of some hon. members but I am quite sure that if you went to the Royal Bank of Canada, the Bank of Montreal or any other bank, or one of the banks we have established such as the Industrial Development Bank, the person with whom you would deal if you wanted money in large quantities would be one who had a pretty good grasp of all the implications of the business in which the prospective borrower was interested. If you want to borrow money for building houses you will deal with somebody in a bank who knows about building houses. If you want to borrow money for building a factory you will deal with somebody who knows what are the prospects of the industry concerned.

I suggest that there should have been appointed to the board as directors people who know the film industry. With regard to the people I mentioned, I forget the minister's exact term but she said my suggestion was ludicrous and so on because they are making $100,000 a year. That is true. Because they can make that kind of money and are successful I suggest they are the kind of people who should have been appointed to this board. I think it would be wonderful if one of them could come back to Canada as the full time general manager of the corporation, but here we have a part time board and I presume the members will be paid only an honorarium and their expenses. I am reasonably certain that amongst the names I have mentioned and hundreds I could mention who have left Canada to be actors, producers and directors there are two or three who would have been honoured had the minister said to them: Would you sit on a board of directors to help us establish a film industry in Canada? I am sure many of them feel they owe a debt of gratitude to this country for the start we gave them in the C.B.C., and so on. I am sure some of them could have been persuaded to sit on this board of directors rather than the kind of people the minister has appointed.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, I did make one oversight with regard to Mr. Elliott. Mr. Elliott has had some experience, as was indicated, with respect to films. He is one of the most brilliant young men it has been my pleasure to meet. Indeed, at one point there was a very strong chance that he would be nominated as the film commissioner for the National Film Board. He was not, however, in a position to devote full time attention to the public service. I apologize to Mr. Elliott for not dealing with him in the list to which I referred and which I had committed to memory.

However, the hon. member should realize that a number of people who have made an impression internationally in the film field are extremely interested in this program and have been writing me over the past couple of years because they wanted to know when the board of directors would be set up so they could make a proposition and obtain money from the board. Almost everyone I have spoken to throughout Canada who has been potentially a person who might serve on the board has had to demur when I have told him or her that they would, of course, completely and legally have to disassociate themselves from any enterprise which would at any time make any claim on the fund of $10 million. This has been the situation in the case of the best known home-grown Canadian film talent, who would have had to leave their companies in order to become associated with this board, as well as in the case of some who are not as well known. A great many people who were interested in and eager to take part in the program, once they realize that the proprieties of the situation were such that they could not have any financial interest of any kind and serve on the board, decided to stay away from the board and at a later time make application in the hope that they would be able to make Canadian films.

The hon. member cannot have it both ways. He suggests that if you go to a bank and want to borrow money in order to participate in a particular enterprise you go to someone in the bank who is qualified to deal with that matter. That is exactly what we hope will happen in respect of this board, namely, that if you go to the film development corporation you will be speaking to people who have an active knowledge of the industry and are there as full time appointees. A decision will be made by the board of trustees. This is exactly the same situation as obtains with the board of trustees of any bank, which is certainly not made up of people who do not understand the situation that exists when you ask for a loan.

I have noticed in this post, as in others I have held in the last couple of years, that when I have made nominations of appointees to positions my enemies, and sometimes my friends, have put forward arguments about appointing supporters of my party simply because they are supporters. I state quite frankly that the pressure in this regard is becoming less and less. But if I see two people before me and they are both good I will pick a Liberal any time over the other applicant. I make no apology for doing this.

It also seems to me that when we set up a board like this with respect to something that will be difficult but interesting, we are approaching very closely the American system whereby the day after the announcement is made there is in this house an unprincipled attack on the people appointed, even before they have picked a staff and opened an office. I suggest to the committee that they wait until the next supplementary estimates are presented to make these criticisms. I also suggest that the hon. member, in his generosity of heart and mind, should stand up and swallow his words.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I assure the minister that if a year from now I see that this corporation is doing a good job I shall, regardless of what I have said—and I retract nothing I have said up to now—make a special point of rising and commending the board for so doing even though they are laymen, which makes it difficult. But I say to the minister that I speak not only for myself but for a number of people in and around this field who are interested in the matter. I have spoken to some of these people since I saw the announcement in the press yesterday, and they expressed in even more vigorous language than I have their views in this regard. I could not use their language here because it would, to say the least, be unparliamentary.

Mr. Byrne: They probably learned that language from you.

[Translation]

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, I am among those who are somewhat surprised at the attitude of our colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). I know him well enough to know that he is incapable of a mean action or a shallow judgment. If I did not know him, I would be inclined to accuse him of pettiness in the circumstances, since he just gave an opinion which is not based —according to his own comments—on definite facts.

I sincerely believe that the minister does not have to make any apology to the house for her choice as concerns the appointment of the members of that board.

Personally, I cannot, without protest, let anyone make comments reflecting, for instance, on the integrity and the competence of Mr. Georges-Émile Lapalme. I have had the good fortune of knowing him intimately for a great number of years. I had the opportunity of seeing him perform in all kinds of fields. I also had the opportunity of ascertaining the soundness of his judgment, the confidence he inspires around him in all artistic circles, whether the graphic arts, the drama or any other artistic field.

In the province of Quebec, he has been a sort of innovator in all artistic fields. In fact, he has been called upon in all kinds of circles, including the provincial fields and those that are free from partisan politics. The municipal authorities of the city of Montreal, for instance, and the organizers of certain symphony concerts and such have repeatedly called upon his assistance. I say that he is a man of irreproachable judgment, known intellectual integrity and honesty, and very sound artistic taste.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Chairman, I know Miss Favreau by reputation. I know her for having read personally a good number of her columns on artistic matters; I think I know her well enough to say that she is very objective in her comments. I know, of course, that it is a grievous fault if she, or the others, are Liberals. Had sympathizers of the New Democratic party or the Ralliement Créditiste or the Conservatives been chosen, this would probably have won them favour, but still, that is the game of politics and, to my mind, it should not be taken into account.

But the point my hon. friend from Winnipeg North failed to see is that people in the business are not necessarily sought out for such agencies. It is rather a matter of creating a body which will know how to distribute, as equitably as possible, while observing the rules of distributive justice, that amount of $10 million the government is making available to those who will be willing to expand the film industry in Canada. Are technical people really needed for that purpose? Of course not, and on that point, I disagree with my friend for Winnipeg North.

Mr. Chairman, it so happens that a technician in the film making business has necessarily belonged to a particular school of thought and has been prompted by his personal taste and habits, for a great many years. If, by the force of circumstances, he is asked to sit on such a board, he should not allow himself to be influenced by his personal tastes, tendencies and habits, by his friends of many years or by the school which helped him to make a name for himself. If such types of persons are necessarily sought, it is quite reasonable to think that, at times, they may lack objectivity.

In such a case, we have chosen—at least, so I presume, because I am not acquainted with the others—businessmen who know how to administer a budget, people who have enough common sense and refined artistic taste, to know how to distribute that money, without necessarily giving too much to one school or one movement, but who will give to all those who can enrich the Canadian heritage in the film industry.

Now, Mr. Chairman, while pointing out those facts, I wish to say to the minister that she does not have to make any apology, especially if the remarks of my hon. friend for Winnipeg North have reflected on the reputation or prestige of Mr. Georges-Émile Lapalme. I would have liked to have tried to remedy the situation. I am sure that, a year or two from now, we will realize that we have an agency which is entirely capable of providing the country with the kind of service which it has been asked to provide.

Personally, I have complete confidence in the chairman of that agency. I cannot say anything about the other members, because I do not know them, but I believe that those who chose them certainly did not intend to choose election organizers, but people who will be an asset in the field of arts, and who will provide responsible management.

Having said that, Mr. Chairman, I have a question for the hon. minister.

[English]

In order to avoid any delay I will put my question in English. I understand that this $10 million will be distributed to those in the industry who will make films. Is it the intention of the minister or of the cabinet that this money eventually be reimbursed to the government in one way or another? Suppose a film is made, is then sold and makes a large profit. Will the grant allotted eventually be reimbursed to the government?

Miss LaMarsh: The legislation makes it clear that the board members may decide to invest in such a way as to have a share in any profits. Let us hope there is a share in the profits and not in the losses. It may also be that a grant may be given or even a straight loan with or without interest. It is certainly not the intention that the $10 million be completely spent. It is hoped that it will be a revolving fund and that profits will be forthcoming.

Mr. Mather: Mr. Chairman, before the item carries I wonder whether I could ask the minister a question. Would she undertake to give consideration to urging that new action be taken at the federal level for the preservation of historic films and the establishment of an adequate Canadian film archives to house irreplaceable art films?

Miss LaMarsh: A couple of years ago, when I undertook this portfolio, I was visited by representatives of various art groups. I asked them to meet and make a proposal as to who should keep the archives and who should have control of them. They have never come back to me with such a proposal. However, the film board keeps some film records, both in Montreal and in other regional centres, and of course the C.B.C. keeps a great number of them. I think it would be very helpful to the country if we had a central place in which to keep them. This is certainly something in which the film board is interested, and individual members of the film board such as Mr. Côté are very anxious to see it done.

I do not know whether in the next year's estimates the board will find some money to develop this program, but I think hon. members should realize there have been cut-backs and as of this week all agencies will have to take a 2 per cent cut. So while there is a continuing interest it may be that this year not much money will be spent on archives.

Mr. Sherman: Just before the item carries I should like to ask the Secretary of State one question. It arises from inquiries I have received from persons interested in the Canadian Film Development Corporation and the function it will have in promoting a feature film industry in Canada. Could the minister give the house any indication of how soon the corporation and its new board will be in a position to entertain applications for and inquiries about assistance to specific groups interested in launching themselves in the feature film industry? Is the board in a position to entertain such applications now?

Miss LaMarsh: No, Mr. Chairman. The new chairman who has just been appointed intends to call a meeting quite shortly. I have a list of almost 30 people with varying degrees of experience who have applied for the post of general manager of the board, and while this appointment is made by order in council it is made on the recommendation of the board. So the board will have to have its first meeting to choose its officers and make its regulations, at which time adequate public notice will be given that it is open for business.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 1c carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Item agreed to.

L75c. To increase to $2,800,000 the amount by which expenditures that may be charged at any time to the National Film Board Operating Account established by section 18 of the National Film Act may exceed receipts shown in the said Account; additional amount required, $800,000.

Item agreed to.

NATIONAL GALLERY OF CANADA

1c. Administration, Operation and Maintenance—To increase to $1,100,000 the amount of the payment to the National Gallery Purchase Account for the purpose of acquiring works of art in conformity with section 8 of the National Gallery Act, $350,000.

Mr. Herridge: I have a brief question. Could the minister enlighten the house as to what the $350,000 is to cover? Could she tell us what pictures have been purchased with this money, and in view of the fact that she has many more cultural opportunities than the member for Kootenay West could she explain to the committee the purpose and the philosophy behind abstract art?

Miss LaMarsh: The answer to the latter part of the question is, no, to each his own. I am sure that Dr. Boggs would be very happy to give the hon. member such instruction.

The amount of money in the national gallery vote is equivalent to the money for the purchase of the Rembrandt, which was in the nature of a centennial purchase for the gallery. I might say we have an offer already from the American Art Museum to buy the Rembrandt at a profit. If times should ever become tough, we could, therefore, start selling these national treasures.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Item agreed to.

PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION

5c. Construction or Acquisition of Buildings, Works, Land and Equipment including the Public Service Bilingual and Bicultural Development Program, $180,700.

Mr. McCleave: I should like to ask the minister a question on this item. Perhaps I am out of order but I will try the question on for size because she is in such an amiable green mood today. Is the government giving any consideration to having some form of regular review of the various pieces of legislation which deal with our relations with public service employees? I know that in 1961 a special parliamentary committee was set up to study this matter, and there was another one last year. It seems to me that after a reasonable length of time we should have some sort of guarantee that the relations between the government and the public service will be studied by another committee. It may be unfair to ask the hon. lady to answer this afternoon but I should like to pry from her, as skilfully as I can, her thoughts on the subject in the hope she will commit either herself or some future cabinet minister.

Miss LaMarsh: I have not heretofore had any thoughts on the matter but the hon. member has been so skilful in putting his question and the blandishment of his words has been so great that I find myself won over. I say, therefore, that I will be pleased to take up the matter with my colleagues.

Mr. Herridge: Before we conclude these estimates, which are the final estimates for our centennial year so far as the minister's department is concerned, I want to say on behalf of all parties in the house that I have this little poem which is dedicated to the minister:

> When time who steals our years away
> Shall steal our pleasures too
> Fond memories of her days still stay
> And half our joys renew.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: It is a beautiful poem but out of order. Shall the item carry?

Item agreed to.

[Miss LaMarsh.]

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

1c. Departmental administration, $399,753.

Mr. Peters: I believe this is the first time the minister has had an opportunity of explaining the administrative items of his department, Mr. Chairman. I think members would be very pleased to hear from him about the development of these several agencies, including the bankruptcy section. This course might result in considerably reducing the discussion.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Chairman, I defended the main estimates of the department when the department was under the Registrar General last fall. There was also a very thorough debate on the new consumer branch when the consumer and corporate affairs re-organization bill was brought before the house in November and December. Perhaps it would be more practicable if hon. members would direct my attention to whatever subjects they would like discussed. I feel we have had a fairly full review of the department within the last two or three months. I am willing to make a statement but I think it might be more useful if members of the committee were to direct my attention to specific subjects.

Mr. McCleave: Earlier today I raised a point with the minister and while I shall not labour it, it seems to me that a situation has developed in this country with regard to one of our national sports that deserves more consideration in parliament than it has received so far. I believe that thanks largely, I suspect, to the lure of television money, two hockey organizations in Canada have conspired against the national interest of Canadians. I refer to the Toronto Maple Leafs and the Montreal Canadiens. These two organizations have conspired to see to it that a third city in Canada shall be denied a franchise in the National Hockey League.

We have taken enough batting around of our national pride as a result of sending inferior hockey teams abroad to represent this country in so-called amateur play. In addition, however, we find a situation that has never been satisfactorily explained, namely, that ten of the 12 professional hockey teams on the North American continent are located in United States cities. The thought that immediately came to my mind with regard to the situation in Canada was that Toronto or Montreal, or both together, were unwilling to give up their share of the revenue that could be derived from national television broadcasting in Canada and that they had their eye on the almighty buck instead of any national pride in this country.

As the minister said earlier today, perhaps this is a matter that we cannot study in this house. However, I suggest to him that there may be very good reasons why the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission or other groups that we have set up in days gone by should be looking at this situation to see whether we cannot get Vancouver a franchise. The Restrictive Trade Practices Commission appeals to me because when we examine the motives of the Toronto and Montreal people who made the decision to support United States interests rather than British Columbia interests I believe it is apparent that they were motivated by whatever cash could be divided between them rather than any other reason.

I hope the minister will be aggressive enough in the field of national interest and Canadian pride to take a look at this situation. I suggest to the hon. gentleman, whom I esteem highly as do many other members on this side, that this might be just the crowbar that would open the door to success in connection with certain events early in April here in Ottawa. This might be just the thing that would bring him through with flying colours, assisted by Canadian pride and assisted by decisions that were made behind closed doors by a self-interested, money-grasping group of people. If there is an ounce of sportsmanship in that group I will grant it but I think it is 99 per cent self-interest. There may be a 1 per cent interest in Canada's ability to develop the greatest hockey players in the world.

Mr. Cashin: I wish to make a brief comment arising out of the remarks of the hon. gentleman. I generally subscribe to the viewpoint he has expressed. However, he did use a phrase during his remarks which, on reflection, he might wish to clarify in some way. It is for that reason I am rising. He referred to the fact we are sending inferior hockey teams abroad. If this remark were to stand without any further comment I think it might cast a reflection upon the Canadian national hockey team. I believe that the building of this hockey team is something which the theory the hon. member was advocating would assist. I feel that those who are behind these men have done much work which is in the country's interest. I know that in Newfoundland, from which one member of the team came, we raised several thousand dollars in order to help in the development of Canadian amateur talent.

It is in this sense that I agree with what the hon. member suggested. I think the effect that the professional hockey combine—or whatever one wants to call it—has on our young hockey players is unfortunate, and I strongly approve the action with respect to the Canadian national team that will bring an alternative course to young Canadian boys who wish to further their education. At the same time they will be able to develop their athletic skills. I am proud that we have men, willing to help, and that we have been able to raise financial resources to help these hockey players to further their education. One of the first places they visited, I believe, was St. John's, Newfoundland, and much credit is due to Alec Faulkner. I think they were a superior bunch of boys, and they did a tremendous job this year. I am sure hon. members on the opposition side would not wish to detract from the good name of our boys by using qualifying adjectives such as "inferior".

Mr. McCleave: My hon. friend is quite right. It would have been better if I had said that Canadians and the teams they send abroad to take part in competitions are hampered by phony amateur rules. A country's team which abides by them, as ours does, may find itself at the mercy of another country's team which may not abide by them in the same way. That is true especially of world championships. I fully accept the qualification my hon. friend has made.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask one or two important questions of our genial minister. Perhaps he might lump them together and answer them at once, so I shall begin with this question. Are these supplementary estimates all related to the new division of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, or is a general amount spread over the entire department, formerly the Department of the Registrar General?

Second, what step is represented by this number of persons who are being detailed to the new Consumer and Corporate Affairs section? Also is the minister to have one or two deputy ministers? Next I would ask whether the minister has taken any steps to co-ordinate other departments of government into his department; will his department take over some of their work?

Has the minister set up in the department a consumer advisory council, which the act says may be set up? If so, how many are on this consumer advisory council and what remuneration will they be paid? If the minister can answer these questions I shall reserve any others I have to ask until we come to other specific votes.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Chairman, I wish to underline all the questions the hon. member for Wellington South asked, because I am as interested as he is in the answers. This afternoon I particularly want to ask the minister what he intends to do about what has been highlighted again by the prairie commission. I do not want him to put me off by saying that he must talk to the prairie governments and find out what they are going to do, because this is a matter which comes within the purview of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. That department ought to be leading the prairie governments in action. The prairie governments made a number of recommendations, which I have been studying, and they have been asked to take action. I want to know the minister's response to those recommendations, since he has said that he recognizes how important public opinion is in these matters.

On March 11 when the minister spoke in Winnipeg he was reported to have said that he had instructed the federal combines branch to look into the grocery retailing business on the prairies. Later that day in the house he said he was prepared to look at the report and to meet Judge Mary Batten. I know he met Judge Batten, and presuming he has studied the report, I suggest he will consider that the time for action has come.

This week end, when the minister will start out on his tour as a potential candidate for his party leadership, he and I will probably travel in the same direction—not on the campaign trail, but geographically. It is important for the public to know what the new department intends to do about the situation uncovered by the commission on the prairies, one which is analogous to the situation that was uncovered by the joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons on consumer credit. That committee reported one year ago Christmas. On the prairies there has been discovered a virtual monopoly by two big firms, both in the grocery business, Canada Safeway and Weston.

[Mr. Hales.]

The report, as published in the Globe and Mail for Tuesday, March 5, contains these interesting facts:

> The largest sellers, Canada Safeway and the Weston stores, have acquired sufficient power to enable prices to rise above competitive levels, resulting in excess profits for the large chains.
>
> Excessive building of stores has led to underutilization of stores, unnecessarily raising the costs of retailing groceries.
> The position and power of the chains has led to and required the use of self-cancelling and costly advertising campaigns.
> The study also found that luxurious supermarkets, built to lure customers away from other stores, may have raised costs of food distribution.

The report goes further than did that of the joint Senate and House of Commons committee, when it pinpoints in this fashion just how much this monopoly has hurt Canadian families:

> For 1966, excess profits were declared to have cost consumers of Winnipeg, Regina, Saskatoon, Calgary and Edmonton, in terms of reduced well-being, a total of $3.5 million or $9.40 per family of four. Excess capacity cost consumers even more —$19.3 million, or $51.88 per family of four.

Grocery advertising cost each family of four $14.50, and luxurious conveniences, such as free parking and air conditioning represented 3 cents on every food dollar, or $38.72 a year for a family of four.

• (4:00 p.m.)

These figures for the average family of four may not mean much, but they mean a great deal to those on low incomes. The commission's recommendations are clear. One recommendation is that if present legislation is inadequate to correct the existing situation, the three prairie provinces should initiate a study with a view to providing necessary legislative changes, so that cases of inadequate industry performance on account of concentration can be examined and corrected. They also urged the federal government to examine the possibility of eliminating wasteful advertising and preventing the use of advertising to fortify positions of industrial control.

The minister is aware of the need for action along these lines. In recent speeches he has been talking about the troubled consumer, meaning consumers in lower income brackets. He said in one recent speech:

> There are many Canadians who are troubled consumers—the poor, the elderly, the handicapped, the regionally depressed. They have special consumer needs, special problems. One of the great questions of the next decade will be to expand the dimension of equal participation to all our citizens. A program for troubled consumers aimed at better protection against unscrupulous practices, which prey on the poor and handicapped, the development of better consumer skills, the provision of special goods and services for those who have particular needs, such as the elderly, and the provision of legal aid and consumer counselling to assist those with problems, can play a major part in opening the door for many dispossessed Canadians.

I want to say frankly to the minister, since he knows very well who the troubled consumers are—the poor, the elderly, the handicapped—that it will not be good enough merely to express concern. Evidence has been piling up before the joint committee and before the prairie committee on living costs that positions of power have been built up by two or three monopoly organizations operating in the grocery business, that it is essential that action be taken to prevent excess profit making, and that in this connection unnecessarily wasteful advertising should be stopped because it adds to the cost of groceries. I draw attention again to the recommendation that financial institutions which are essential to credit buying be brought within the purview of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs so that the combines investigation legislation can be applied in connection with them.

I wish to remind the minister of another important recommendation made by the joint committee:

Your committee noted that the Director of Investigation and Research under the Combines Investigation Act reported the discontinuance of a study of concentration in the food retailing industry in Canada on March 15, 1963 (Report of the Director of Investigation and Research, Combines Investigation Act for the year ended March 31, 1963). Your committee recommends that this study be resumed on a continuous basis and broadened to cover both food retailing and manufacturing in Canada with a particular view to examining concentration, market power and trade practices in the relations between retailers and suppliers.

The committee made that recommendation a year ago in its report, but as far as I know nothing whatever has been done about it. The prairie commission recommended to the provincial governments concerned that they approach the federal government with a request that the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs deal with a similar situation on the prairies—a situation which has become worse since the report was made.

It will not be good enough for the minister to hide behind the fact that so far the prairie governments have not approached him, or that jurisdiction over prices is shared between the federal government and the provinces. If the hon. gentleman is serious in his bid for leadership of the Liberal party, if he is serious about becoming prime minister of Canada, here is a plain challenge open to him.

The people have let it be known they are being crushed by rising living costs. We know what needs to be done. Evidence given by witnesses before two inquiries has made the facts available. Will the minister now take the action which is called for? He has already piloted legislation through the house which he says will help reduce the prices of prescription drugs by stimulating competition in the industry. This is what he must try to do about food prices, whatever method he chooses. We have recommended the setting up of a prices review board as a means of giving full publicity to excess profit takers, so that they can be brought under control and dealt with. I hope the minister will not take shelter behind the Prime Minister's statement that a review board with vague responsibilities in connection with industry as a whole is to be set up. As consumers we are asking him to set up a review board to deal with food, housing and consumer goods in Canada, now. What does the minister propose to do?

I am not concerned at this moment about false or misleading advertizing; I am satisfied the hon. gentleman will look after that. I want to know what he intends to do about the cost of living—not in the next decade, but now, before he stands up and says: I want to be the Liberal leader; I want to be prime minister of Canada. In the name of the consumers of Canada I ask what he intends to do to deal with the cost of living, which is already crushing a quarter of our people whose incomes are below acceptable levels.

Mr. Baldwin: After that inspiring speech by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway the minister may conclude that he might be answering a call to higher service by remaining in his present office rather than by seeking other responsibilities. If he sees this question in the same light as I do he may be able to perform a greater service for the people by remaining where he is. I recognize he has other talents, of course, but I just thought I would place that observation before him.

The Batten report has turned the spotlight on this issue, one which could conceivably be even more serious in the near future than it is today. I should like to ask the minister whether, in his discussions with the provinces, he would give consideration to a proposal which emanated from myself and other members of this party, namely that an effort be made by the governments of Canada, provincial and federal, to devise a joint approach to this problem.

Quite obviously the necessity of using the Criminal Code as a basis for the combines investigation legislation has proved highly unsatisfactory. There are cases when present procedures meet the situation, but a different approach is evidently called for. It will take either consent on the part of the federal government to shift all jurisdiction to the provinces, or else consent to grant all these powers to the federal authority. Failing this, a joint approach will have to be undertaken. I hope the minister will find out from the provinces what attitude they are inclined to adopt.

Here is a perfect example. A royal commission appointed by the three western provinces has resulted in a useful report to which reference has already been made in this debate. To what extent will the provinces be prepared to act in co-operation with the minister and the federal government in seeing that measures are taken which will be far better and more comprehensive than those possible under the restrictive terms of the present combines investigation legislation?

I say this advisedly. After listening to what the Prime Minister had to say, and observing that the government proposes to set up a prices review board, proceeding under the Inquiries Act, I am of the opinion that we can expect a dismal failure. Anyone examining the Inquiries Act will immediately observe that the powers conferred by it are limited to inquiries where the good government of Canada is involved. I suggest that on a reasonable interpretation of those words this means that if there is an attempt to inquire into matters that are purely within provincial jurisdiction this would be outside the scope of the Inquiries Act.

• (4:10 p.m.)

In addition, Mr. Chairman, I notice from an examination of the Inquiries Act that the board established under the act has the right to call witnesses to make examinations and then to report. It seems obvious that a very substantial period of time will lapse between the time the attention of the government is directed to cases of prices being charged that are higher than they should be, and the time that the report of the board is presented to the government. The period is such that the situation will probably be beyond repair.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

Having listened to the statement of the Prime Minister and examined the Inquiries Act, I do not think that a prices review board as envisaged by the Prime Minister will meet the existing situation, one which I think will become more serious in the near future. If this situation is to be met the federal government, together with the provincial governments, will have to devise ways and means of approaching the problem and of finding solutions. Therefore I urge the minister to seize this particular situation as a means of exploring with at least the three western provinces whether or not such an arrangement can be brought about.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few brief observations on this item. I am a little more optimistic about the purposes of this department. While I have heard some members say that it is nothing but a façade, I have heard others say that it is one of the most important legislative steps that have been introduced into this house. Under present circumstances, particularly during peacetime, we recognize it is experimental legislation. I am sure that as a result of application of the act amendments will be made which will bring about its better administration and increase its advantages to the people in general.

I wish to bring to the minister's attention a subject in which I have been interested for some time. When I spoke at length on the bill I mentioned the loss of income sustained by low income groups who had very little knowledge about how to purchase nutritional food at an economic price. One of the trade unions in Ottawa undertook some research into this question, Mr. Chairman, and made a survey of low income groups who purchased food at chain and other stores. They came to the conclusion that the average low income group, owing to lack of information and knowledge, wasted between $600 and $900 per year on food purchases. They had no knowledge of credit arrangements and other matters, and stores, advertizers and certain credit organizations took advantage of this lack of knowledge.

When the minister rises to answer the comments that have been made by members of the opposition I should like him to explain what is being done to inform these people and to educate them in this respect. I realize this can be done only through co-operation with other organizations in the country, whether these be trade unions, women's organizations or consumer organizations. They must be willing to co-operate both with the minister and with provincial departments in order to bring this information and knowledge to the attention of those who require it.

I listened to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway and to her comments about the operations of certain chain stores on the prairies. I have read the report to which she referred and I realize that it provides the basis for some very serious study and investigation. Before the minister undertakes that investigation I should like to bring to his attention a personal experience that I had in this respect. Up to the time I was elected a member of parliament and my standard of living was considerably raised I was a fruit grower and suffered from all the disadvantages of that occupation, particularly during the depression. I remember that on one occasion we sent a carload of fruit to Calgary; this was before the marketing board was established. The man in charge of this consignment went to a wholesaler who offered him a certain price. He refused the offer and said he would go to another wholesaler. He called on five wholesalers, and each telephoning the other and in each case dropping the price. After two days he went back to the original wholesaler and said he would accept the first offer, but this wholesaler already said that he could not offer the producer any more. Since he could not afford the demurrage and other expenses, Mr. Chairman, he had to accept the lowest offer.

Then later, Mr. Chairman, we tried to sell our fruit direct to the co-operatives on the prairies or to small country stores. But do you know what the brokers and wholesalers did? They notified the co-ops and the small stores that if they purchased any fruit direct from a grower in British Columbia they would receive no fruit or other imports from the United States, but would be cut off. This included citrus fruits, nuts, and so on. Therefore they were forced to buy from the wholesalers and the brokers. That situation was the direct cause of the formation of the Tree Fruits Marketing Board in British Columbia. I give that body credit for doing an excellent job since it was established, though there is room for improvement.

I suggest that in investigating the situation the minister must work with the provinces. I hope that he will inquire into the relationship that exists between wholesalers and brokers and the large chain stores. At one time they were practically controlled by half a dozen people. One of the worst offenders was the United Fruit Company whose headquarters was in the United States. I hope the minister also seeks information from the Tree Fruits Marketing Board, the producers and the co-operatives because they are all involved in pricing.

According to recent newspaper reports the provinces are becoming interested in this matter. This is natural; the consumers are aroused and want to be certain that they get better value for their dollar in the near future. On that account the government of British Columbia has passed a consumer protection act, and I see that other provinces have the same intention. This shows they are interested in the matter. I suggest that they are now in a mood to co-operate willingly with the minister in investigating particularly the cost of food and in formulating legislation, both federally and provincially, that will meet the situation.

I think the hon. member for Peace River was quite right when he said that this question cannot be confined just to investigations by the combines investigation branch. The matter covers a wider field. I am sure that if the minister, as I am confident he will, enters into this investigation with a spirit of co-operation with the provinces and to the advantage of the consumers, we will get results in the near future. I wish him well in all he undertakes in this direction.

Mr. Chatterton: Mr. Chairman, when the minister makes a few remarks later on I should like to ask him to give the members of the committee an example of some of the action that his department has taken that may prevent increases in costs, or which may stop misleading or false advertising and labelling.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I had hoped that the minister would give us his election outline of what he intends to do with regard to helping the consumers, through the functions of this new department. The people in my riding are more interested in the protection of the consumer than in anything else. I believe the minister has a great deal of scope in this field, one in which the general public is always fleeced. One day I happened to be in an A & P store on Bank street. I was interested in one commodity, cheese. I am interested in cheese because of my personal liking for it and also because of the fact that there are several cheese factories in my area. I was interested to notice a young man wet his thumb and rub the price off a package. I looked over his shoulder and saw that the price was 59 cents, but that he stamped on the package a new price of 61 cents. The cheese sold by the A & P stores obviously has a mark-up conducive to the operation of its business in relation to cheese prices.

Most members of this house know that the prices of cheese vary anywhere between 41 cents and 43 cents, depending on the type purchased from the board. Members will also know that a mark-up of 20 per cent would bring it into a fairly reasonable range. I think everyone will agree that this store was literally stealing from the pockets of the public because this change in price had no relationship to the mark-up or to a change in the price they paid for the cheese. Surely the public should be protected. I realize that if a store manager finds that the price he must pay for a product he is placing on his shelves has increased, he will have difficulty in keeping this product in tune with a reasonable price. When without reason, however, he changes the price he in effect is being dishonest.

It seems to me that this is a problem with which the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs should concern itself. If the price of cheese has gone up to 45 cents wholesale, then I am quite sure that new purchases should go on the shelves at a price of 66 cents. But this had not happened. We all are aware of the wholesale price for cheese, because we pay a subsidy on it and the price is decided by the cheese marketing board in Ontario. Here we have an example of a large store marking up a price, and placing a new price on a product. We all know this happens occasionally, but so far as I am concerned this is a totally dishonest practice.

There are other problems the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs should be looking at. One is the great problem involved in the ability to look at a commodity and decide whether or not it is a fair value.

Mr. Byrne: Taste it.

Mr. Peters: Yes. Not long ago here in Ottawa a salesman came to the manager of a small store wanting to sell him some peaches. The wholesale price was more than a chain store down the street was charging for its peaches. The small store manager said that he could not afford to buy peaches because he would have difficulty in selling them. The salesman said that his firm sold that brand of peaches to the chain store. They obtained a can of peaches from the other store and one that the salesman was attempting to sell to this small store manager, opened both cans, and found that the can obtained from the chain store had in it three half peaches less than there were in the other can.

In this type of situation it is difficult for a housewife to decide whether she is getting value for her money. If she happens to have 11 children and there are 11 pieces in one can, and then she finds that there are only eight pieces in another, and that as a result three of her children do not have any, she knows that she can do better by buying at one store than at another.

The condition I have described would seem to be a dishonest practice. In one case a person is buying peaches and in the other case is buying syrup. Surely there is a difference between these products, and yet the labels on the cans meet the specifications and requirements laid down. I am sure the minister, who has a family, will agree that if each member of his family can have two half peaches instead of one, or one and a half of the peach halves, there is an advantage in buying from one store rather than another. Yet a housewife would have to have a great deal of experience before she would be able to distinguish between the two products.

In respect of many products it is difficult to make a decision concerning which product is better, because of the regulations in respect of markings. Not long ago the manager of a supermarket pointed out the difference in the cans he had on his shelf. This resulted from a court action in the United States where it had been decided that for many years the 10 and 15 ounce cans had been improperly labelled. These were withdrawn, one being relabelled 9½ ounces and the other 14 ounces. But they were relabelled without any change in the size of the can. At the time of the discussion with the store manager he had both types of cans on his shelves. In one commodity there were six different types of cans, three of which appeared to be identical to three others, but there were six labels on those six cans indicating totally different products.

I am sure every member has had difficulty when buying a suit, both in respect of price and quality. The prices of suits appear to have gone up 25 per cent in the last year. I like to buy suits for about $35, but no matter how I try to persuade the manager of the store where I have dealt for many years, I am told there is no longer such a thing as a $35 suit. He has told me that when he sells a suit for $75, it has been reduced by 25 per cent for the purposes of a sale. Perhaps the minister has no control over this situation, but it is of concern to the consumer.

Surely the minister's department could have some control over the labels that appear on clothing. Years ago I bought a suit which was marked down from $99 to $19 because the store had to get rid of them. The manager found that when a suit of this type was pressed by the dry cleaners the material scorched. It must have been much like the material in ladies' slips, described I believe as angelskin. If the iron is a little too hot when you iron such a slip, it burns and the angel is exposed.

Mr. McQuaid: Could I ask the hon. member a question? Who does the ironing in his family?

Mr. Peters: It surely is not I; but I have observed this particular phenomenon. The suit I was talking about was made of material of this same type. The manager had showed me one that had come back from the dry cleaners, of which the whole side was scorched and discolored. Incidentally I bought the suit anyway, because I thought perhaps I would not bother getting it cleaned. In any event, for $19 what do you have to lose?

The point I am making is that in this country, with our National Research Council and scientific facilities, we should be able to have suits labelled so that we know exactly the kind of material used. If you want to buy a suit that will not burn, you should know which type to avoid. I am not sure what the material is in this suit I am wearing, but I believe it is labelled silk and wool. I am quite sure there is no silk in it, and I am not sure there is any wool in it either. These manufacturers are allowed to use labels that mean nothing in terms of actual content or quality. All we can do is buy something with a fancy name. We cannot know whether a suit will be long wearing, whether it will stand dry cleaning or resist certain kinds of beverage stains.

Surely the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs could require that proper labels be used on articles like suits, which would indicate exactly what one is buying. I agree that the major factor involved is still price; but if proper labelling were required the consumer would have some assurance as to what he was getting and would be protected at least to that extent.

There is also some difficulty as to actual size. If a suit is marked 44 tall or 44 stout, that should mean something. A pair of size 10 shoes should fit feet that are size 10. Feet do not seem to change in size after a certain age, but the last on which a shoe is made does not seem to bear any relationship to a particular size. It is some time since I have had little children, but in my experience children's clothes marked to fit six year olds do not necessarily fit six year olds. In my own experience these garments were too small. On the other hand I am sure that some of my neighbours who have six year old children have found these clothes marked for six year olds to be too large. This is an area in which the department could set up a code of standardization in order that the purchaser would know what he was getting in terms of actual size.

Over the years when I have been interested in buying a major electric appliance or an automobile—usually this happens in the spring when I have spring fever, after the snow has disappeared—I have purchased a copy of a consumer's magazine. This magazine contains the results of tests and gives preferences in respect of electrical appliances, automobiles and other things. It usually indicates the weaknesses and the advantages. One is still left with the decision as to whether he will select an article with certain weaknesses but which has the compensating features of certain advantages.

This situation is the same in respect of automobile tires. When one purchases an automobile he is given the option of equipping it with two ply, four ply or perhaps six ply tires. In some areas six ply tires do not seem to be adequate because most of the roads are gravelled, and automobiles equipped with two ply tires to be used in such areas would constitute a hazard. In any event, my point is that one should be able to find out exactly what these various tires are worth in terms of requirements.

It seems to me that advertisers in this country have been able to advertise to suit their own purposes and advantages, rather than on the basis of providing information to the general public. With reference to the two ply tires, there is probably no doubt that a two ply tire of the turnpike type would meet the requirements of heat reduction better than the ordinary four ply tire. In this same context, perhaps a six ply tire would present a decided hazard to a driver doing mostly city driving in a city like Ottawa, which normally has a lot of potholes. Such a driver might hit a pothole and would have to buy a new tire, because likely he would not be able to drive more than a few blocks before he had a flat tire.

• (4:40 p.m.)

It seems to me that the consumer affairs department should give to the consumer, not necessarily an iron-clad guarantee or make a prohibition in respect of these matters, but should provide the general public with an assessment of new commodities in terms of the consumer's dollar and purchasing power, as well as the protection or liability of the consumer in respect of a particular product. In my opinion a good consumer affairs department would provide this type of protection.

I go back to the suit that the storekeeper told me would burn if it were ironed. There should have been on that suit a label warning the public against ironing it, because if it were ironed it would be a fire hazard and would also be very destructive to the suit. You do not need to go as far as saying, "This garment is not protected against wash and wear," or something of that nature. This may be a label that is attached to garments only if they are not protected against wash and wear. I suppose every woman knows that she should not iron her silk stockings, because damage will be caused to them if she does. But I am sure most people think that a steam iron properly applied is suitable for ironing a suit. If it is not, I think the consumer affairs department should insist that a label be affixed to the suit warning the public of this deficiency. In this way the consumer would be protected.

I do not know how far the minister has gone in this field. I have not had the opportunity of sitting on the consumer affairs committee, which I understand has made a great deal of noise and has done a great deal of listening. The people on that committee appear to be quite satisfied with where they are going, but I really have not seen much protection for the consumer. I therefore hope that the minister will deal with some of these problems. I do not think the minister has to say that he has solved the problems, but he should at least be able to tell us what machinery has been set up for solving them.

I believe that the general public of this country is not protected with regard to the quality or value of goods in the marketplace. I remember the advertising that was allowed to take place in some of the major stores against the importation of Japanese shirts. There was an instance when at one of the large stores I bought a shirt that had on it the brand name of the store. This brand name was superimposed on a Japanese label. After a number of washings the brand name came off and I found that it was a Japanese shirt. This shirt lasted about five years, which is much longer than some of the other shirts I have bought.

We allowed this store and others to advertise against the importation of those shirts because it was said they were no good. "No good" is a pretty general term. Though the company may not have been dishonest in its advertising, they did not say the shirt would not stand up to washing and that it would turn yellow after bleaching, the implication being that if you did any of the normal things to the shirt, you probably would not have any shirt.

We are a trading nation, a nation in which there has to be an exchange of goods. Therefore it is doubly important that some control be provided in order to protect the consuming public. This control must be provided by the government. The minister will be the darling of the consuming public if he is able to indicate that he has set up the machinery that will provide the kind of protection that will allow a young lady starting out in her housewifely duties, and who has not had the experience of a social science course at high school, to go into a store and know when she buys a baby blanket that it will fit the crib next week after it has been washed. The minister will be the darling of the consuming public if a young lady is able to go to the grocery store and buy a "special", knowing that there is some legitimacy attached to the label on the commodity. Then she will be protected against the ultimate disgrace of having her husband come home and say: I see you got sucked in because of that label, if you had gone to the store across the street you would have bought that product three cents cheaper.

I ask the minister to look at an ad of Johnson's Furniture Company which has appeared in one of the local newspapers, in which they advertize a closing-out sale of new furniture. Down near the bottom of the advertisement there is a little inset that says the company has complied with bylaw No. so-and-so of the city of Ottawa, which demands that they supply the city authorities with their purchase price, their normal retail price and the closing-out sale price of every commodity in the store. I did not know this type of bylaw existed. Certainly in a backward city such as Ottawa I would not have anticipated it. It really surprises me, and I commend the city of Ottawa for passing such a bylaw.

Whenever I drive down the street and see a closing-out sale, I wonder where they are moving to, whether it is only across the street, what kind of gimmick is involved and whether any sale is actually taking place. I was deeply impressed to learn of this bylaw of the city of Ottawa. This furniture company appears to be complying with the bylaw, which makes it mandatory that they declare the manufacturer's price which they paid, the list price, their normal retail price and the price at which they are prepared to sell the item in a closing-out sale.

I think that if the general public were provided with this kind of protection they would be in a much better position to make a decision as to whether an article is actually being sold at a sale price. The public are not able to make this decision at the present time because they have to contend with devious advertising that is really not honest and cannot be properly interpreted by the consumer.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Chairman, I know the minister wants to go west with the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway and I would not want to delay that process at all.

Mr. Knowles: That is quite an alliance.

Mr. Macquarrie: I had the pleasure of being at the minister's press conference this morning when he introduced his book. The minister's book was published by the same publisher that published mine, and I think that is the reason I was invited to the press conference. The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough and I should form a club which would indicate one could write a book without being involved as a leadership candidate.

I should like to ask the minister just one question, and I shall not delay him further. I am interested in knowing whether he now has information on the important matter about which my colleague the hon. member for Kings asked him the other day with reference to Prince Edward Island. I shall not speak further on these supplementals, except to say that I am growing very, very concerned about the tremendous extent of supplemental estimates, those things which should be an irregular item of business but with which we are asked to deal much more frequently as time goes by. I have discovered that in the last 20 years parliament has voted $6,700 million in supplementary estimates. The whole thing has become totally out of hand. Surely we can become better bookkeepers, and supplementary estimates should become the exception rather than the rule in these fields of large expenditure.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I gather that the hon. member for Queens was not directing the last remark particularly to our department, but to the whole scheme of supplementary estimates. A good deal of these supplementary estimates is as a result of a parliamentary decision to widen the scope of this department.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Howard: I know the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is trying his best to relinquish that position. So, as suggested by my colleague, the hon. member for Timiskaming, he might not become the darling of the consuming public in so far as the activities of the department he now heads are concerned. But whether it is this or another minister who heads this department, perhaps the greatest amount of protection the consumer public needs is protection from the minister's own government, and from the mismanagement which exists within that government.

I wish to ask the minister whether, in his concern for the interests of the consuming public, he will at the first opportunity make strong representations to the Minister of Finance with regard to a rather ridiculous situation which has arisen within the last few days. On the one hand we find the government saying how desperately it is searching to save money in government departments, to curtail costs and increase efficiency, and on the other hand we find great wastefulness within the Department of Finance so far as the taxpayers are concerned. This very day the Department of Finance is spending nine and three quarter cents to buy a sufficient amount of silver to put into each 10 cent piece. In other words, in order to get a sufficient amount of silver to put into a dime, the government is spending 9.75 cents. This does not take into account the cost of the copper which goes into making up the dime, the cost of production, the capital expenditures for the machines, or the salaries or distribution costs of the Royal Canadian Mint. So we are losing money on every 10 cent piece we strike today. We spend twenty four and three eighths cents to buy silver for every 25 cent piece we strike. This is an absolutely ludicrous situation when on the one hand the Minister of Finance speaks about savings to the consuming and taxpaying public, and on the other hand he is permitting the continuation of this sort of wastefulness.

Not long ago this parliament passed a bill authorizing the Minister of Finance this year to enter into the production of coinage to be made from nickel. If only the government would implement this law and start producing coins of nickel rather than silver, they would save the taxpayers of this nation countless thousands and perhaps millions of dollars. I wish the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs would bring this to the attention of his colleagues in the cabinet and thus bring some balance to the use of the taxpayer's money in a proper and legitimate way.

Although the minister is not the only one to suffer in this respect, he appears to be suffering more than any of his colleagues as a result of two factors: One, that he is the minister of a newly established department and, two, that he is a candidate for a higher office in the government. As a consequence of these two factors, someone who has far more knowledge than I have of what goes on in the government has obviously made a search of the activities and operations of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and come up with the conclusion that it contains a great deal of fat. I think the word "fat" is used in reference to the staff within the department who are not pulling their weight, who are not cutting the mustard, as the saying goes, who are not efficient administrators, and are not serving the public interest to the full extent. Just two days ago, the Minister of Agriculture said the following in relation to the operation of the government:

> The plethora of departments leads to duplication and waste. Under these conditions, the vertical structure of the public service makes the flow and tranfer of personnel in the interest of efficiency most difficult. Departments with obsolete or obsolescent functions find personnel underused, and thence underproductive. At the same time new departments are recruiting additional personnel. The result—fat.

The minister may laugh, but it was his colleague and seatmate who made these comments. It is a regrettable state of affairs for the Canadian public to find one minister, in his intense desire to become the prime minister of this nation, running around with a sharpened knife solely and simply for the purpose of slitting the throat of another minister. It may well be that the Minister of Agriculture knows what he is talking about because he refers here, indirectly if in no other way, to the fact that there are government departments which are obsolete, or have obsolete or obsolescent functions, and to the fact that their personnel is underused and thence unproductive. This is a pretty sad commentary for a minister of the crown to be making about the structure of the government. Perhaps one could accept it if it had been said half heartedly or jokingly, but it was said in a very serious way. This statement was contained in a speech by the Minister of Agriculture to the 63rd convention of the Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities held in the Hotel Saskatchewan on Wednesday, March 13, 1968 in Regina, Saskatchewan. The copy of the speech which I have here emanates from the office of the Minister of Agriculture.

If what the Minister of Agriculture said is correct, namely that there are departments with obsolete and obsolescent functions, that there is underproductivity, and that new departments are recruiting additional personnel, resulting in a lot of additional fat, I would suggest that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs should direct his attention toward greater efficiency in the government. He should try to protect the consumers' interest in that regard as well as protect their interests in the market place. He should not wait until the time in April when he will have a chance to become the prime minister, but he should have an immediate conference with the Prime Minister—even though the latter will be retiring in a couple of weeks—and the other members of the cabinet to consider the degree to which the taxpayers' money is being squandered within departments which have obsolete and obsolescent functions, and which are recruiting additional personnel, the result of which is a great deal of fat.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Turner: Mr. Chairman, may I rise on a point of order. I wonder whether it is the mood of the committee to try to finish these estimates today.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I know that certain members have made arrangements on the understanding there would be a private members hour. We cannot pass these estimates today, but I would suggest that matters such as this should be considered some time early in the afternoon and a discussion held among different parties. If this were done it would be much easier to reach an understanding.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is it the desire of the committee to continue the consideration of the estimates?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 1c carry?

Mr. Howard: I called it five o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: It being five o'clock, shall I rise, report the resolutions adopted and ask leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that a message has been received from the Senate informing this house that the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a joint committee to examine the progress of programs of the National Capital Commission in the development, conservation and improvement of the national capital region.

It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members business as listed on today's order paper, namely public bills and private bills.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might be permitted to interrupt at this moment. It might be helpful to the house if I put on the record the business proposed for Monday next. It is proposed that we continue consideration of the supplementary estimates by calling the Department of External Affairs. I am advised there has been general agreement that this department should be called. It would be followed then by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs; then, the Department of Defence Production and the Department of Industry. If we are fortunate enough to dispose of these three departments, I would then call the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the house leader if the government, in planning the business for next week, will take into consideration the desirability of dealing with orders Nos. 51 and 60. They are Bill No. C-190, to amend the Patent Act and Trade Marks Act, and Bill No. S-22, having to do with the Food and Drugs Act and hazardous substances. The government knows that we would be prepared to see both of these passed through their remaining stages with little or no debate.

Mr. Pennell: I will consult the government house leader and he will probably consult the other house leaders.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE PENALTIES FOR VIOLATIONS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North) moved second reading of Bill No. C-27, to amend the Combines Investigation Act (floor penalties, criminal joint tortfeasors, and moieties).

He said: The purpose of this bill, Mr. Speaker, which I am moving, is to strengthen the penalties for crimes committed in violation of the combines and monopoly laws. This bill, if approved, would not interfere with the penalty now provided under the law for a first offence, but would provide that on conviction for a second offence there shall be a mandatory minimum jail term of one year and for third or subsequent offences a mandatory minimum jail term of two years. The bill also makes clear that directors and officers of the companies involved in violations of our combines laws shall be held responsible for the acts of those corporations.

I bring forward this bill for two reasons. First of all, I am one of those who believe the laws of Canada should be applied to all Canadians with equal force and equal regard, whether those citizens be rich or poor, whether they break the anti-combines laws or are guilty of theft or being drunk and disorderly. These laws should be applied with equal force to Canadian citizens who can afford to have eminent counsel represent them, and to those poor souls who appear before magistrates without counsel every day of the week in the major cities of Canada, as well as the smaller cities, and who get little in the way of representation. If one picks up a newspaper in any city in Canada he can read about some poor citizen, guilty of a minor theft in some supermarket or some department store, being given six months or two months in jail. It is not uncommon, Mr. Speaker, to read of some poor citizen who has taken a little too much drink on a week end, who has created a disturbance and been convicted of being drunk and disorderly. He has been sentenced to a week or two, or perhaps a month, in one of our jails. In my own province of Manitoba this happens with some frequency, particularly for Manitoba citizens who are of Indian or Metis origin.

However, despite the fact that in this country we have had legislation prohibiting combines for more than 50 years, combines which are designed to overcharge the public for goods purchased by the public, no single person has been convicted and sent to prison. This has happened, despite the fact that some of the most respected, some of the largest corporations in Canada in various fields have been found guilty of violations of the anti-combines legislation of this country, not once or twice but three times. I will come back to that in a few moments. The fact is that the anti-combines legislation of this country is not doing the job it was designed to do. This has been accepted by many people, by economists who have studied the origin of this legislation, by members of parliament who have spoken about it and even members of the government who have on occasion referred to the inadequacies of the law.

Back in 1964, Mr. Speaker, the then minister of justice, who at that time was responsible for the administration of these laws, the late Mr. Favreau, made a speech on October 2 at Montebello in which he voiced his concern about the inadequacy of the law, and in which he said:

> It would seem that a new and hard look could be given at the present state of our legislation in this domain and that, without repealing the present law, we may want to seriously inquire how far and to what extent additional provisions could be enacted under the federal jurisdiction to regulate trade and commerce. In certain circumstances, it would seem to me appropriate to find ways and means to curb certain practices which it is in the public interest to prevent, but to do so otherwise than by prosecution before the criminal courts. And, even in the context of a statute which is in the nature of criminal legislation, it is very much in my mind that it should be possible to develop and use on a broader basis proceedings not necessarily linked with criminal charges such as for instance, substantive injunctions, either to prevent incipient offences or to prohibit the repetition of past practices—

[Mr. Orlikow.]

Well, Mr. Speaker, I think the late minister was aware, and I am sure the officials in his department were aware, of the complete inadequacy of the present law to control and prevent combines, which have mulcted from the Canadian public tens of millions of dollars. I am not one of those who believe in harsh penalties and I have spoken on a number of occasions about this matter, I have usually, if not always, urged a more humane approach, more probation, less jail, and so on.

• (5:10 p.m.)

In the field of combines legislation the record is clear. Our law courts have been lenient. They have not taken the law seriously. The law provides that where companies or individuals are guilty of conspiring one with the other in the creation of combines, they shall be fined or sent to jail. So far no one has served one day in jail after being convicted under this law. Had the government brought forward in the form of legislation some of the ideas of the late Mr. Favreau, whose 1964 speech I have just been reading from, the proposal I am making today would not be necessary.

Victims of price fixing combines in the United States can, after proving that a conspiracy to fix prices exists, sue for and collect damages from firms which have overcharged them. Customers of the General Electric Company were able to collect more than $160 million in damages after that company had been convicted under United States combines legislation.

Such things do not happen in Canada. When firms are convicted of keeping prices artificially high by combining with others, they are charged a minimal amount, and that is the end of it. As I have said, and as I repeat now, parliament has passed laws to control combines. Yet, after an investigation has been launched and after it has resulted in a prosecution before the courts, and a conviction, we find courts have imposed small fines of $2,000, $5,000, and recently $10,000. In the last couple of years we have had a couple of $25,000 fines. Actually by imposing such small fines the courts are giving combines cheap licences to steal from the public.

Despite 50 years of legislation on the subject, combines are not ending, but increasing.

For example the royal commission appointed by the three prairie provinces and headed by a former Liberal member of the Saskatchewan legislature, Judge Mary Batten, investigated the activities of Canada Safeway and Weston stores on the prairies. In her report she says:

> Excessive building of stores has led to underutilization of stores, unnecessarily raising the costs of retailing groceries.
> The position and power of the chains has led to and required the use of self-cancelling and costly advertising campaigns.

Essentially, a combine exists in the field of grocery merchandising in western Canada, which has cost the people of western Canada a substantial amount of money. I shall quote one more sentence from the report:

> Taken together, excess profits and costly excess capacity reduced consumer well-being by $61.28 per family of four in 1966.

That is an extremely large loss, the commissioner says, and I agree with her.

Hardly a month passes without Winnipeg city council reporting instances where they have called for tenders on various items, only to have various firms submit identical tenders. That that has happened proves, to my way of thinking, that combines exist. I know that the department thinks that identical tenders do not prove a combine, but I submit that they lead to an almost irresistible conclusion that combines exist. Winnipeg city council wrote to me in August of 1966 and said that they had asked for three tenders for street lighting equipment known as vapour luminaires. Canadian General Electric, Northern Electric and Canadian Westinghouse submitted identical prices of $80.75 per unit. That I suggest is strong evidence of a combine.

In October, 1966, Winnipeg city council asked for tenders for rock salt, to be used on the streets during the winter months. Domtar Chemicals Limited and the Canadian Salt Company Limited both submitted tenders of $18.40 per ton. That I suggest was not an accident.

In September, 1967, the city of Winnipeg again called for tenders for street lighting luminaires. Tenders were obtained from Canadian General Electric, Northern Electric, Electric Power Accessories and C.L.M. Industries for 89.77 per fixture. These firms are so in tune that they can quote to within the cent—they are not out one penny. That again was not an accident, and that again I suggest proves collusion.

The government ought to act. As I said earlier, I want to send no one to prison, yet something must be done to stop combining. Some companies have been convicted several times and have paid only nominal fines. Among those convicted one sees the biggest and most respected companies in this country. Abitibi Paper Company, which was convicted in 1960 and again in 1961, paid a fine of $15,000 both times. In 1960, when they were fined $15,000, their net profit was in the neighborhood of $15.5 million. In 1962, when they were convicted again, the net profit was similar. The St. Lawrence Corporation was fined $3,000 in 1958 and $20,000 in 1960. In 1959, the company's profit was over $6 million and in 1960 it was over $7 million. The Anglo-Canadian Pulp and Paper Mill was fined $3,000 in 1958 and $20,000 in 1960. It made a profit of more than $4½ million in each of those years.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, a corporation does not decide to join with its ostensible competitors to raise prices and mulct the public by accident. People are involved in these decisions—directors and officers of the company. If I were to put on record the names of the directors of these companies and of some of the other companies it would be a Who's Who of Canadian business. Some of the most prominent members of the Rideau Club, across the street from this chamber, are among the officers of these companies. Some of the members of the Manitoba Club, the most prominent club in the city of Winnipeg are similarly placed. These are the leaders of industry and commerce. I submit they have set the ordinary citizens of Canada a very poor example by ignoring, evading and flouting the law.

I hope ordinary citizens do not follow the example set by these respectable and eminent gentlemen. I realize that what I am proposing is a tough way to try to deal with combines. I wish there were better ways. In fact I know there are better ways, but I have been waiting ever since 1962 when I came to this house for a government to recognize what has long been evident, namely that the anti-combines legislation is a farce and a failure, and bring in new legislation which would give force to a basic principle we all accept, namely that combines which raise prices to the consumers of Canada must be held in check.

Combines Investigation Act

Mr. H. E. Stafford (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, if our present law dealing with offences under the Combines Investigation Act is inadequate, it is my submission that the proposed amendments contained in Bill C-27 will only add to those inadequacies. After listening to the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) I am certain that his proposals would only make matters worse.

The law as it stands does not say that those who violate the Combines Investigation Act shall be subject to a fine. It does not give one a licence to break the law, as it were. Under the present act the court may impose a sentence of up to two years imprisonment for a first or subsequent offence.

Mr. Orlikow: Have the courts ever done so?

Mr. Stafford: I say it is open to the courts to impose a sentence of up to two years imprisonment. It is left for the judges to decide, and I for one, having had experience in the courts of this province as well as in the courts of at least one other province, feel our judges are just as likely to give good decisions under the combines legislation as they are under any other of our statutes.

The bill before us would replace subsection (3) of section 31, making it mandatory to——punish a person who disobeys such prohibition or direction a second time by imprisonment for a term of not less than one year and, upon the third or subsequent such disobedience, by imprisonment for a term not less than two years.

To the penalty provisions in sections 32, 33 and 34 of the act, the hon. member would add:

—and upon a second offence to imprisonment for not less than one year and, upon a third or subsequent offence, to imprisonment for not less than two years.

In other words, clauses 1 to 6 of the bill provide for mandatory minimum terms of imprisonment of one year for a second offence and of two years for a third or subsequent offence.

Few sections of our Criminal Code make such sentences mandatory. There are some, for offences such as theft from the mails. But there are reasons for laying down minimum sentences in such cases. Under the Combines Investigation Act these reasons do not exist. I feel the judge trying the case is in the best position to judge what sentence should be awarded, according to the merits of each case.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

There are many reasons for believing that the amendments put forward in this bill will not work. For example, charges are usually laid against corporations—and corporations cannot be imprisoned. The provisions of Bill C-27 would have no effect on the corporations themselves. Moreover officials change, and those concerned in a second offence might well have had no connection whatever with a previous offence. And if the directors or officials of a corporation had changed a judge would hardly be able to sentence them at the time of a second offence, as outlined by the hon. member for Winnipeg North.

Then again, an offence by a company which had previously been convicted might involve an entirely different product line, and a court might not consider that an offence involving a different product line from that of the first offence did, in fact, amount to a second offence. It can easily be seen that many difficulties would arise and that the law might be much worse if these amendments were agreed to.

I take it we are assuming here that officials in these cases are to be charged, in addition to the corporations. Usually, as I say, it is the corporation which is charged, and before charges are laid the Minister of Justice or counsel approved by him recommends that certain actions be taken. In most cases it is the corporation which is the beneficiary of offences that take place and, as a result, if a prosecution is to be successful it might well be necessary to get evidence from directors or officials of the corporation. I am certain any crown attorney would be in a difficult position if he charged a director or an officer of a corporation, and then lost his case against both the director and the company. Remember that under the laws of this land one cannot force an individual to give evidence against himself.

• (5:30 p.m.)

For example, Mr. Speaker, a prohibition order applies to a corporation and to all persons occupying positions in the corporation at the time of conviction. Positions in these corporations do change. The order does not apply to new officers. So here again is a specific reason why the amendments proposed by my hon. friend from Winnipeg North do not satisfy the very aims for which Bill No. C-27 was designed.

In the year 1960 the anti-trust provisions of the Criminal Code were consolidated into the Combines Investigation Act. Therefore, all of the anti-combines legislation is now to be found in that act. Of course, Mr. Speaker, the onus is on the crown to prove the offence beyond any reasonable doubt. This onus, like any other criminal onus, naturally lies upon the crown attorney; and the burden lies on the crown throughout the trial. The accused corporation or officer must be proved guilty beyond any reasonable doubt, and is innocent until such guilt is proved.

Anti-combines legislation falls entirely within the scope of our criminal law. Under section 91A of the British North America Act power is conferred upon the parliament of Canada to enact laws in relation to criminal acts. Any departure from the purely criminal nature of the legislation would undoubtedly be held ultra vires.

Clause 7 of this bill, Mr. Speaker, is a provision for double damages on conviction and is intended to avoid infringement of provincial legislation. The clause does not confer any civil right of action for a breach of such right. In a Supreme Court of Canada case, Direct Lumber Company Limited v. Western Plywood Company Limited, which is reported in 1962, Supreme Court Reports at page 646, it was held that the then Criminal Code section 411(1)(c) relating to conspiracy in restraint of trade, and section 412(1)(a) and section 412(2) relating to price discrimination, give no cause of action in damages to a person alleging a breach of these sections by another.

Presumably, Mr. Speaker, the same holds true for the successor provisions of the code, sections 32(1)(b) and section 33A(1)(a) and subsection (2) respectively, and the other paragraphs of these provisions of the Combines Investigation Act. There may, however, be a right of action for common law conspiracy and also a right of action in Quebec under the civil law; but these points were not dealt with by the court.

The analogy to section 159 of the Excise Act—not section 158 as stated in the explanatory notes—is not an apt one. Section 159 refers to recovering double the amount of the excise duty and licence fee which should have been paid, a definite and readily ascertainable amount. In the present state of the law, therefore, the practicability of the clause proposed in the bill is open to question.

For example, Mr. Speaker, 150 or 200 years ago, in the days of the common informer, the solicitor general and the informant would split the fine. This is alien to the provisions of our present criminal law; and it is alien to our whole system of justice. The penalty emanating from our criminal law is based on a civil action, which seems highly irregular.

If I may return to clause 7, I noticed an old act to be found in the Revised Statutes of Ontario, 1960, volume 5, which first appeared in the Revised Statutes of Ontario, 1897, concerning monopolies and the dispensation of penal laws. According to section 4 of this act, which is the penalty section, a person may recover three times as much as the damages he sustained. Personally I have never known the provisions of this act to be invoked or heard of any charges being laid under the act; but perhaps the hon. member for Winnipeg North would like to scrutinize its provisions. Possibly it would satisfy his purpose as well as that of the amendment he has in mind.

The last clause of this particular bill, clause 8, deals with the personal liability of corporation officers and agents. It reads as follows:

> Where a corporation commits an act contrary to a provision of this act or fails or neglects to comply with any such provision or a prohibition or direction made thereunder, every one who, being a director, manager, or officer of such corporation, or acting on its behalf, authorizes, orders, does, fails or neglects to do, assents to or acquiesces in such act, failure or neglect, or any element of such act, failure or neglect, is guilty of that offence personally and jointly with the corporation.

As the explanatory note states, Mr. Speaker, the principle of this provision is already contained in section 38(e)—this should be section 38(3)—which applies to refusal to permit entry of premises and examination of documents, and failure to file returns of information. This section was first enacted as part of section 22(1) of the combines and fair prices act of 1919. In similar form it has been included in the present Combines Investigation Act since 1923. There does not appear to have been any debate whatever on the provision, and therefore there is no indication why it was made applicable to the two foregoing provisions only, and not to others of a similar nature, such as failure to make and submit affidavits when required.

Since a corporation can act only through its directors, officers and officials there might be some doubt as to whether an officer could be prosecuted personally for an offence committed by the corporation, if it were not for section 21 of the Criminal Code concerning aiding and abetting. In view of this section,

Mr. Speaker, there seems to be no doubt that a prosecution would lie against an officer who participated in an offence by the corporation; and even in the absence of such a section there would seem to be no doubt that he could be prosecuted for conspiracy.

A number of acts, such as the Bankruptcy Act, contain a provision to the effect that where an offence against an act has been committed by a corporation every officer, director or agent of the corporation who directed, authorized, condoned or participated in the commission of the offence is liable as if he had personally committed the offence. The Bankruptcy Act, section 162, is the relevant provision. In view of section 21 of the Criminal Code, such provision would appear to be redundant.

The necessity for such a provision therefore would seem to be highly questionable. The fact is that such a provision, applicable to certain enforcement provisions, has been in the act so long that it is difficult to take too firm a position. My submission is that when the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) sets out the many different exemptions which he feels should be offences he is misconstruing the whole reason for this act. I feel there is absolutely no reason to think that the judges of our nation cannot handle these cases, like any other case. I see no reason why any clause in Bill No. C-27 should be incorporated as an amendment to the Combines Investigation Act of this country. There seems to be little reason why Bill C-27 should become law. This bill violates the whole philosophy of the anti-combines legislation in this country. The late Chief Justice Duff summed up the philosophy of the combines legislation as follows:

> The enactment before us I have no doubt was passed for the protection of the specific public interest in free competition... This protection is afforded by stamping with illegality agreements which, when carried into effect, prevent or lessen competition unduly and making such agreements punishable offences, and, as the enactment is aimed at protecting the public interest in free competition, it is from that point of view that the question must be considered whether or not the prevention or lessening agreed upon will be undue.

[Translation]

Mr. Georges-C. Lachance (Lafontaine): Mr. Speaker, the main purpose of the bill introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) during the present session and in previous ones, is to provide for more severe penalties in the legislation concerning combines and monopolies, by imposing a minimum of one year of imprisonment for the first repetition of an offence, and a minimum of two years for further offences.

After listening to the hon. member for Winnipeg North, who is reputedly a quiet man, one would be inclined to think that businessmen and industrialists, in short, all those who constitute a very important part of our society, are potential criminals, and that they should be dealt with very severely, because the companies they manage break the laws relating to combines and monopolies.

I doubt that that is what the hon. member for Winnipeg North has in mind, in introducing this bill. But I wonder if he would still be of the same opinion if a bill were to be introduced today whereby workers or union leaders, in a labour union conflict, at the first repetition of an offence, were of necessity to be imprisoned because they had participated in a fight or had neglected—this applies especially to union leaders—to abide by the decision of an arbitration or labour relations board. I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North would rise immediately against such a punishment; he would shake his first and say that parliament arrogates to itself the right to punish the worker too severely; and I should agree with him wholeheartedly.

More and more, we are moving away from minimum penalties, and ever fewer minimum obligations are imposed upon the intelligence of our judges and presiding court officers, so that our courts might have more latitude in imposing sentences. That is in line with the new justice policy and I believe in it, because human justice is increasingly moving away from the punitive aspect.

[English]

Mr. Orlikow: Essentially for the rich.

[Translation]

Mr. Lachance: I do not think, Mr. Speaker, as mentioned a moment ago by the hon. member for Winnipeg North, that the legislator protects the rich at the expense of the poor.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, human justice gets farther and farther away from sentences involving imprisonment penalties. We give less importance to the punitive aspect of a sentence to consider its educational value.

I think that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre may not have understood me quite well or did not perhaps understand my point when he claimed that human justice protected the rich rather than the poor.

Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that minimum penalties restrict the freedom needed by judges and presiding court officers.

I take advantage of the fact that this bill refers to minimum jail terms of one year and two years to say again what I have said in the past to the effect that we must make an effort to improve our penitentiary system and to emphasize, in particular, the rehabilitation of prisoners.

At the risk of being called to order, Mr. Speaker, as we are speaking of prison and imprisonment, I think that further efforts should be made to set up an automatic remission system, and open the doors of the public service to those who, after leaving the penitentiary, show goodwill and deserve encouragement.

That the fines should be higher, Mr. Speaker, I am for it. I often noticed that in the case of actions taken under the combines monopolies legislation, fines were not high enough. When companies have a gross yearly production amounting to millions of dollars—as high as $50 million often—I am always surprised to notice that fines are sometimes only $1,000, $5,000 or $10,000. I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre when he says that the fines are not in proportion to the offence committed.

However, I do not agree with him when he says that, at the first relapse, the directors of the companies should be sentenced to prison because, naturally, corporations cannot be sent to prison.

I would agree, however, that in addition to higher fines, an agency should be created in order to keep an eye on corporations which have been prosecuted and found guilty. It would evidently be a government agency and I think that it would be in order if it would come under the jurisdiction of the department dealing with combines and monopolies.

As soon as some individuals or the directors of a company would have been found guilty, they would be subject to a control, at their own expense, during a specific period from six months to a year, according to circumstances, or even more if necessary. At any rate, that period of time would be determined by the court or by the director of the combines and monopolies board. I feel that we could thus avoid relapses and that the public would be protected a lot better.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that other hon. members want to say a few words on this question. Therefore, I shall say no more, but I think I must add that it might be a good thing to publish in the Canada Gazette the names of the companies that have been found guilty. Then, these people would have to think twice, and if they repeated the offence two or three times, the government would be in a position, when they applied for a new charter, to make investigations and turn them down.

This concludes the few remarks I wanted to make, Mr. Speaker. I know that other hon. members want to take part in the debate, but before sitting down, I must say that I am not against the principle of increasing fines, but I am against a prison sentence on first repetition of the offence.

[English]

Mr. Ian Wahn (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes left I should like to say how pleased we are on this side of the house that the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), speaking we trust on behalf of his party, introduced legislation which apparently is designed or is intended to increase free competition in this country. All of us on this side of the house certainly think that is a highly laudable purpose, although we are a little surprised to see the hon. member for Winnipeg North taking this particular method of achieving that purpose.

Recent economic council reports, and the more recent Watkins report, indicate how important effective competition is in achieving our basic economic objectives, which are of course the achievement of a high rate of economic growth, full employment and price stability. The Watkins report and the recent reports of the economic council also indicate that, in spite of the combines legislation which has been on our books now for many years, and in spite of the careful enforcement of that legislation by able officials, effective competition has not yet been achieved through this criminal legislation.

Basically I think the history of the legislation indicates quite clearly that effective competition cannot be achieved by criminal legislation. That is the basic problem in trying to modify the Combines Investigation Act to force businessmen to compete. For this reason the question of achieving effective competition, and the provisions of the combines act, have been referred to the economic council for consideration. Certainly the imposition of mandatory prison terms upon individuals will not have the desired effect. This is particularly true because the proposed amendment embodied in Bill No. C-27 is directed only at increasing the punishment imposed on individuals, and does not refer at all to corporations, which are the chief beneficiaries of restrictions upon competition.

May I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hour appointed for consideration of private members business has now expired.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

PROGRESS REPORT ON FEDERAL GOVERNMENT PROGRAM FOR DEVELOPMENT OF BILINGUALISM

March, 1968.

The report which follows is a summary of the progress being made in the development of bilingualism in the public service of Canada, and on the steps being taken by the government toward implementation of the report of the royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism.

The policy and program of the government on the subject of bilingualism have been developing progressively for a number of years. In 1963, at about the same time as the royal commission on this subject was established, an interdepartmental committee of senior officials was also formed with the responsibility of proposing measures to promote the development of bilingualism in the public service.

On April 6th, 1966, the Prime Minister announced the federal government's policy in this regard in a statement in the House of Commons. In this statement he announced that "The government hopes and expects that, within a reasonable period of years, a state of affairs in the public service will be reached whereby communications with the public will normally be in either official language having regard to the person being served; and a climate will be created in which public servants from both language groups will work together toward common goals, using their own language and applying their respective cultural values, but each fully understanding and appreciating those of the other".

It was emphasized that bilingualism would be introduced gradually over a period of years in a manner that will not lead to injustice or misunderstanding.

At the same time the Prime Minister announced a number of specific programs in this field. Without going into detail it might be mentioned that the first public service language school opened in February 1964 with 42 students and 4 language teachers; now over 5,000 public servants are engaged in second language training, and the service has over 200 teachers.

Second, the intention was stated to accelerate the recruitment of promising candidates who are proficient in both languages. This acceleration has taken place both at the university graduate level and also as applied to persons with some years of experience. This is reflected in the fact that, whereas in 1965 only 13.3 per cent of the university graduates recruited in the administrative and foreign service careers were French speaking, in 1967 on the other hand 270 out of 860 or 34.8 per cent had French as their mother tongue.

Third, it was announced that, beginning in 1967, reasonable proficiency in the two official languages or willingness to acquire it within a prescribed period of time would become an element of merit in the selection of university graduates recruited for administrative trainee positions where the need for bilingualism exists. This procedure is in effect.

Fourth, the government inaugurated the bicultural development program, under which 20 English speaking civil servants from the most senior categories are selected each year to spend a twelve month period with their families, in Quebec city, while 10 French speaking civil servants and their families spend a similar period in Toronto, to study the other official language and gain an understanding of the cultural values of the group they are visiting. This program enjoys the full support of the Universities of Laval, Toronto and York. In 1966-67, because of the shortness of time available for making arrangements, 8 officials and their families went to Quebec and one to Toronto. In 1967-68 a full quota of 20 officials and their families are in Quebec and 10 in Toronto for the current program. Among this year's group are the secretary to the cabinet, the president of Defence Construction Limited and other very senior officials.

It is easy to imagine the importance to the public service—its character and its functioning—of the introduction at the most senior levels over the next few years of approximately one hundred and fifty bilingual officials well acquainted with the culture of the two main linguistic groups. And it is just as easy for anyone who has lived in, or even only visited, the city of Ottawa to visualize the contribution that will be made by these one hundred and fifty families to changing the capital of the country into a city which truly reflects the bilingual and bicultural character of confederation.

The fifth of the programs relates to the introduction of a higher rate of pay in respect of those clerical and secretarial positions where there is a requirement for a knowledge of both languages and where both are actually used. A salary differential of 7 per cent for secretaries, stenographers and typists in this category was introduced effective 1 October, 1966. The Public Service Commission is also analyzing its possible application to certain clerical grades. It will be appreciated that these grades are of much greater diversity and complexity. When this study has been completed the government will consider ways and means of applying this policy to the clerical positions affected.

This policy of special payment for special language qualification in positions where this is desirable will of course be implemented in a way which will be fair to those who do not have such skills.

Sixth, the special secretariat on bilingualism has been in full operation during the past year. It works in close consultation with the Public Service Commission, the Treasury Board staff and all deputy ministers and heads of agencies in promoting the coordinated and progressive implementation of the government's policy and program regarding bilingualism in the public service. A number of interdepartmental committees have been established to pursue particular aspects of the question of bilingualism. In each department or agency an official has been designated as responsible for the bilingualism program in that organization, and a fulltime adviser on bilingualism has been appointed in a number of cases.

On December 5, 1967 the government received the report of the royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism. This report deals with the status of the two languages, not only within the public service, but also generally in Canada. It contains 14 recommendations, some relating to the federal jurisdiction, others to provincial jurisdictions, several involving both federal and provincial jurisdictions and two concerning constitutional change.

The report accepts as a guiding principle "the recognition of both official languages, in law and in practice, wherever the minority is numerous enough to be viable as a group". The federal government fully accepts this principle. This does not mean of course that the government will expect or require Canadians generally to become bilingual—the principle relates, not to any presumed obligation to learn the other language, however commendable that might be in terms of general education, but to the right of a citizen of either language to deal with public authorities in that language and to be understood. The goal is to reconcile a maximum of justice for official language minorities with a minimum of obligation for the official language majorities.

At the recent constitutional conference held from February 5 to 7, the implementation of the royal commission's report was one of the principal subjects of discussion. In the federal government's statement of policy announced at that time it was stated that > "the government of Canada for its part proposes to recommend to parliament, at its next session, an official languages bill that will formally declare English and French to be "the official languages of the parliament of Canada, of the federal courts, of the federal government, and of the federal administration". We also propose to appoint under the authority of that act "a commissioner of official languages charged with ensuring respect for the status of French and English in Canada."

To this end a plan of action is now being prepared to bring into full realization the objectives which have been set by the royal commission for the government of Canada, objectives which the government welcomes and accepts.

With regard to those recommendations depending upon action by the provincial governments, the government has also announced that "if they do accept them, as we hope they will, the government of Canada will be prepared to help in the implementation of these proposals if we are asked to do so. We will be glad to join with provincial governments in devising the methods by which our assistance could be made most effective."

It will be recalled that, following a very full discussion of the matter, the constitutional conference recorded the consensus reached on language rights. This important statement, which carried the unanimous support of the leaders of the ten provinces as well as the federal government, covered three cardinal points:

"1. Recognition by this conference that, as proposed by the royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism and as a matter of equity, French speaking Canadians outside of Quebec should have the same rights as English speaking Canadians in Quebec.

2. Recognition, as the royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism has recommended, of the desirability of proceeding by governmental action as speedily as possible, in ways most appropriate in each province and without dimishing existing rights, recognized by law or usage.

3. Establishment of a special committee to examine the report of the royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism and the views expressed at this conference on the report, and on other matters relating to language rights and their effective provision in practice, and to consult on methods of implementation, including the nature of possible federal assistance, and on the form and the method of constitutional amendment."

The federal government is proceeding with its plans for the implementation of the report. A group of federal officials are studying in detail the steps that would be involved, and the nature of the provisions that would be required in an official languages bill. It is planned to have such a bill ready for introduction early in the next session of parliament.

The federal government's program on bilingualism will be designed to ensure equality of the two languages with respect to the federal parliament; the Supreme Court of Canada and all courts established by parliament; federal statutes, important regulations and documents of general interest; the armed forces; embassies and offices of federal departments and agencies abroad; international agreements and agreements with the provinces; the federal administration in Ottawa; and in appropriate offices of departments and crown corporations across the country, particularly immigration and customs offices at all ports, and important transportation terminals.

These extensive changes will not occur spontaneously or instantly upon the passing of a statute: they will involve a complicated process of "tooling up" that will inevitably take some time to complete. The government, however, is determined to proceed as quickly as possible with the full implementation of these measures.

Mention should also be made of one further recommendation of the royal commission, which proposes that the two languages should have full equality of status throughout the capital area of Canada, and "that the two provincial governments concerned and the federal government should discuss and negotiate the necessary measures". The federal government strongly endorses this recommendation, and indeed a preparatory committee on the capital region of Canada, comprising officials of the three governments, had been established prior to the constitutional conference. The members of that conference noted that this tripartite study was under way, and recorded their unanimous concurrence. Since the conference, the preparatory committee has held a further all-day meeting to discuss the nature of possible joint arrangements for the further development of the capital region and encouraging progress is being made.

All of the measures in volume I of the royal commission's report are concerned with the status of English and French as official languages. This is only one out of several aspects of the questions of bilingualism and biculturalism. The royal commission will be submitting additional reports on other aspects in the months ahead, and will doubtless offer further recommendations that may be at least as significant as the present group of proposals.

Be that as it may, the current proposals of the commission are of very great importance. The commission describes them as comprising "a charter founded upon the concept of equal partnership". Some of them are complex and will take some time to work out fully. However, the federal government is anxious to give effect as rapidly as possible to those measures that lie wholly or partly within federal jurisdiction. It will welcome similar action by the provinces in their field and will be happy to discuss ways in which it may assist provinces in achieving the full accomplishment of the commission's recommendations.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, March 18, 1968

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

FINANCE

REPORT ON WEEK END INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENTS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it might assist the house if I were to report briefly on week end developments involving international financial arrangements.

The house will, I am sure, welcome the decisions announced yesterday in Washington by the governors of the central banks contributing to the gold pool. The governors supported the policy of the United States government in continuing to buy and sell gold at the existing price of $35 an ounce in transactions with monetary authorities. They expressed the belief that henceforth officially held gold should be used only to effect transfers among monetary authorities, and therefore they decided no longer to supply gold to the London market or any other gold market. They stated that as the existing stock of monetary gold is sufficient in view of the prospective establishment of the facility for special drawing rights, they no longer feel it necessary to buy gold from the market. They agreed that henceforth they will not sell gold to monetary authorities to replace gold sold in private markets.

The governors of the central banks contributing to the gold pool invited the co-operation by other central banks in the policies they had agreed on. The governor of the Bank of Canada has promised his co-operation, and I have assured him of the support of the government in this regard.

Further to strengthen the international monetary system, the federal reserve board of the United States announced yesterday an increase of U.S. $2,275 million in its "swap network" with other central banks and the Bank for International Settlements. The governor of the Bank of Canada announced that as part of this arrangement the reciprocal credit facility between the Bank of Canada and the federal reserve system has been increased from U.S. $750 million to U.S. $1,000 million.

27053—486

With the leave of the house I wish to table two press releases I issued last night, and one issued last night by the governor of the Bank of Canada, as well as the communiqué of the gold pool issued in Washington, to which they refer.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the minister have leave to table these documents?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lewis: Print them in Hansard.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested that these releases might be printed in Hansard, and this might be convenient to the house.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: For texts of documents referred to above, see appendix.]

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I know we are all pleased with the progress that was made over the week end by the various central banks meeting in Washington with regard to quietening down the international monetary crisis, and it is most interesting to hear the report of the Minister of Finance with regard to the measures that have been taken.

However, I think it is very clear from what the Minister of Finance has said, and from what has been stated publicly, that the measures so far taken, that is with respect to the problem of gold, will not of themselves supply the degree of international liquidity required to support the growing volume of international trade, and these measures must be followed by other measures such as increased drawing rights from the I.M.F. or something of that sort.

I hope the countries of the world, the Minister of Finance and the governor of the central bank will put to good use the time available to them, and I simply express the hope that the government of Canada will give every possible support to measures being considered for a further increase in international liquidity.

Report on International Developments

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all of us felt a certain relief that some at least temporary measure had been evolved. I stress the word temporary because I see, as I am sure a great many other people can see, some difficulties in maintaining the two price system as a permanent feature in the international monetary system.

• (2:40 p.m.)

However, it has bought time and I would hope the world monetary authorities will press forward with plans and proposals for the establishment of a new unit of international exchange which will once and for all relieve us of the incubus of gold that has been rather strangling the world for some centuries now.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, we would like to add our satisfaction over the fact that at least for the time being the price of gold has been steadied. I should hope the Minister of Finance would regard this as a temporary measure in the realization that there can be no relief to the problems of international liquidity or stability in so far as international settlements are concerned until some new approach can be initiated more in line with the need to meet world trading pressures. I would hope that in the next few months, which I believe is all the time that can normally be expected, some new base of international settlement can be arrived at.

INDUSTRY

TABLING OF LETTER TO N.S. PREMIER RESPECTING STEEL INDUSTRY

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table a communication addressed to the premier of Nova Scotia dated March 8 in respect of the steel industry in Cape Breton.

Mr. Speaker: Has the right hon. Prime Minister leave to table this document?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

TELEVISION

QUEBEC—TABLING OF COMMUNICATION RESPECTING EDUCATIONAL BROADCASTING

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should also like to table a communication addressed to the premier of Quebec with regard to educational broadcasting.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Mr. Speaker: Has the right hon. Prime Minister leave to table this document?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO ABOLISH CORPORAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-210, to amend the Criminal Code (abolishment of corporal punishment).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to abolish the punishment of whipping at present provided for in the Criminal Code. The infliction of corporal punishment is without a doubt a relic of the dark ages, yet is still used as a means of correction and discipline.

The continuance of such practice degrades institutions of justice and human reform and can only serve to further embitter and alienate the offender. State directed physical violence is completely inconsistent with modern penal practice.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

REFUSAL OF CATV APPLICATIONS, 1965

Question No. 965—Mr. Cowan:

What 13 CATV applications were turned down and for what reasons, as indicated in the Report of the Board of Broadcast Governors for the year ending March 31, 1965, page 11, where it is stated that "Community antenna television systems (CATV's) do not come under the Broadcasting Act, but are referred to the Board on an informal basis by the Minister of Transport who is the licensing authority" and that "In the fiscal year ended March 31, 1965, the Board examined 59 such applications and found that 46 of them, in its judgment, would not make the operation of existing TV stations uneconomical or inhibit the provision of alternate service"?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The following are the 13 applications and reasons:

Metro Videon Limited: new CATV Winnipeg.

Reason: The board wishes to advise that in its opinion the establishment of the CATV system as requested would affect adversely the economic position of stations CJAY-TV, CBWT and CBWFT, Winnipeg.

Neighborhood Television Limited: new CATV Sudbury.

Reason: The board wishes to advise that in its opinion the establishment of the system as proposed would inhibit the provision of alternative Canadian television service in the Sudbury area.

Allview Cable Service Ltd.: new CATV Sarnia, Point Edward, Froomfield and Corunna.

Reason: In the opinion of the board, the establishment of a CATV system to serve Sarnia, Point Edward, Froomfield, Corunna and the surrounding area as proposed in the application, would have an adverse effect on existing television stations and on the possibility of the provision of alternative service.

Western Television Cable Company Ltd.: new CATV system New Westminster, B.C.

Reason: The board wishes to advise that it is doubtful as to what economic effect the establishment of such a system would have on the operation of stations CBUT and CHAN-TV or on the provision of alternative service.

Brandon Television Limited: new CATV Brandon.

Reason: The board wishes to advise that in its opinion the establishment of the CATV system as proposed would adversely affect the economic position of Station CKX Brandon and would inhibit the provision of alternative Canadian television service to the area concerned.

George G. Henderson: new CATV Kamloops.

Kamloops Cable Television Limited: new CATV Kamloops.

Reason for both: The board wishes to advise that in its opinion the establishment of the systems as proposed would inhibit the provision of alternative Canadian television service in the area.

Lake Video Services Ltd.: CATV system Lake Cowichan, B.C.

Reason: The board wishes to advise that in its opinion the establishment of the system as proposed in the application would have an adverse effect on existing television service and on the possibility of the provision of alternative service, if the system included three Canadian channels and three American channels. In the board's opinion the system would not have such an adverse effect if it carried only the Canadian channels proposed.

George Malo: new CATV Sudbury.

Reason: In the opinion of the board the establishment of the CATV system to provide service to Sudbury, Coniston and Copper Cliff, Ontario, would have an adverse effect on existing television stations and on the possibility of the provision of alternative service in the area.

Canadian Wirevision Ltd.: CATV system Vancouver, Burnaby, Richmond and New Westminster, B.C.

Reason: The board wishes to advise that it is doubtful as to what economic effect the establishment of such systems would have on the operation of stations CBUT and CHAN-TV or on the provision of alternative service.

Cameron Gilbert Harju: CATV system Blackfalds.

Reason: The board has deferred a decision on its informal advice.

Victoria Cablevision Limited: To extend the CATV service at Saanich to include Victoria, Oak Bay and Esquimalt.

Reason: The board has deferred a decision on its informal advice.

H & B Communications Limited: CATV system Edmunston to add reception of Station WMEM-TV Presque Isle, Me.

Reason: The board has deferred a decision on its informal advice.

REFUSAL OF CATV APPLICATIONS, 1966

Question No. 966—Mr. Cowan:

What 10 CATV applications were refused and for what reasons, as indicated in the Report of the Board of Broadcast Governors for the year ending March 31, 1966, page 11, where it is stated that "The Minister of Transport ... provided that the Board should examine CATV applications ... In the fiscal year ended March 31, 1966, the Minister referred 82 CATV applications to the Board ... The Board found that 72 of them ... would not make the operation of existing TV stations uneconomical or inhibit the provision of alternate service"?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The following are the 10 CATV applications and the reasons:

Frontenac Broadcasting Company Limited: new CATV system—Kingston, Ontario.

Reason: The board wishes to advise that in its opinion the establishment of the CATV system as proposed would inhibit the provision of an alternative television service in the area.

Murray Leonard Sweigman: Kingston, Ontario.

Reason: The board wishes to advise that in its opinion the proposed change in the existing CATV system would inhibit the provision of an alternative television service in the area.

Neighbourhood Television Limited: new CATV system—Sudbury, Ontario.

Reason: The board wishes to advise that in its opinion the establishment of the proposed CATV system would inhibit the provision of alternative television service in the Sudbury area.

Cameron Gilbert Harju: new CATV system—Blackfalds, Alberta.

Fundy Cablevision Ltd. new CATV system—Saint John, Lancaster and the Parish of Simonds, New Brunswick.

Morton Flom: new CATV system—Quebec city, Levis, Sillery, Giffard, Quebec West, Ste. Foy, Charlesbourg, Lauzon, Montmorency, Beauport and Villeneuve, Quebec.

Reasons for the above: The board wishes to advise that in its opinion the new proposed CATV system would affect adversely the economic position of the television broadcasting station serving the area.

Oshawa T.V. Supply Limited: new CATV system—Oshawa, Ontario.

Reason: The board wishes to advise that in its opinion the proposed CATV system would inhibit the establishment of a local television broadcasting station.

Oshawa T.V. Supply Limited: to add WOKR-TV, Rochester, New York and WNED-TV, Buffalo, New York to the CATV system serving part of Oshawa, Ontario.

Reason: The board wishes to advise that in its opinion the change in the existing CATV system as proposed would inhibit the provision of an alternative television service in the area.

Western Communications Ltd: new CATV system—Regina, Saskatchewan.

Reason: The board wishes to advise that in its opinion the proposed system would affect adversely the economic position of the television broadcasting stations serving the area.

[Mr. Byrne.]

Lloyd Cyril Nelson: new CATV system—Brandon, Manitoba.

Reason: The board wishes to advise that in its opinion the establishment of the CATV system as proposed would adversely affect the economic position of Station CKX in Brandon and would inhibit the provision of alternative Canadian television service to the area concerned.

FAMILY INCOMES OF OCCUPANTS OF N.H.A. UNITS

Question No. 979—Mr. Douglas:

1. What was the average family income of purchasers of NHA single-family bungalows in each month during 1967?

2. What was the average family income of tenants of NHA financed apartments in 1967?

3. What was the family income distribution of tenants of NHA financed apartments in 1967?

Hon. E. J. Benson (President of the Treasury Board): 1. The average family income of purchasers of, and owner-applicants for, N.H.A. financed, single-family dwellings during 1967 was $8,769.

2 and 3. Information on family incomes of tenants in N.H.A. financed apartments is not available.

FINANCING FOR NEW HOUSING, 1967

Question No. 982—Mr. Douglas:

How much of the financing for new housing in Canada in 1967 was provided by (a) private funds (b) public funds (c) other sources?

Hon. E. J. Benson (President of the Treasury Board): Of the 164,123 housing units started in 1967, (a) 85,512 were financed by institutional mortgage lenders, (b) 45,325 were financed from public funds, and (c) 33,286 were financed from other sources.

INCREASES IN WHARFAGE RATES

Question No. 997—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. What was the date of the latest increase in wharfage rates for the Department of Transport facilities in Prince Edward Island?

2. What was the rate of increase?

3. For what reason or reasons were such rates increased?

4. Were similar increases put into effect in other parts of (a) the Maritime Provinces (b) Canada?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Storage charges for vegetables and roots in frost proof sheds revised effective October 20, 1966.

2. Former rates:	Rate in Cents
(a) unheated sheds,
(i) first ten days,	free
(ii) after first 10 days, per bushel per day	1/10
(b) heated sheds (no free storage period),
(i) first 20 days per bushel per day	1/4
(ii) after first 20 days per bushel per day	1/8

Revised rates:	Rate in Cents
(a) unheated sheds,
(i) first 10 days from initial entry into a shed for the purpose of consolidating a shipment	free
(ii) subject to subparagraph (iii) from the expiration of free time, per square foot for each 10 days or part thereof	5
(iii) where a shipment is moved from the shed prior to the 16th day calculated from initial entry, per square foot for the period	2½
(b) heated sheds (no free storage period)
(i) first 5 days or part thereof, from initial entry into shed for the purpose of consolidating a shipment, per square foot	8
(ii) second 5 day period or part thereof, per square foot	6
(iii) each additional 5 day period or part thereof, per square foot	4

3. The rates were revised to eliminate problems experienced in the application of charges on a per bushel basis and to promote more efficient use of space in sheds.

4. The rates form part of the schedule of charges under the government wharves regulations effective at all federal public wharves under Department of Transport administration.

Questions

CATCH FAILURE ASSISTANCE FOR FISHERMEN

Question No. 1,007—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria):

1. Is the Department of Fisheries considering legislation that will provide catch failure assistance to fishermen on a national level?

2. What progress has been made in determining this legislation and when is it expected to come into force?

Hon. H.-J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): 1. The matter is under study.

2. When a decision is reached on this very complex problem an announcement will be made by the government.

DESIGN AND DEVELOPMENT OF ARTIFICIAL HEART AND KIDNEY

Question No. 1,011—Mr. Hales:

On what basis has the government placed the question of the design and development of an artificial heart and kidney with McMaster University instead of a leading medical college such as McGill, Toronto or Queen's?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Department of Industry as follows: The government has not placed any contracts for the design and development of an artificial heart and kidney with McMaster University. This project is listed by McMaster University in a brochure called "A Proposal for C.A.R.E.D. at McMaster University" as an example of the type of project which might be undertaken by their new Centre for Applied Research and Engineering Design.

STUDY OF INDUSTRIALIZATION OF AGRICULTURE

Question No. 1,012—Mr. Hales:

On what basis has the government placed the study of industrialization of agriculture with McMaster University instead of an Agricultural College such as the University of Guelph or a western university?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Department of Industry as follows: The government has not sponsored any study of industrialization of agriculture with McMaster University. This project is listed by McMaster University in a brochure called "A Proposal for C.A.R.E.D. at McMaster University" as an example of the type of project which might be undertaken by their new Centre for Applied Research and Engineering Design.

Questions

SUBSIDY UNDER MARITIME FREIGHT RATES ACT

Question No. 1,045—Mr. Coates:

What was the total amount of the subsidy paid to the C.N.R. and the C.P.R. under the Maritime Freight Rates Act for the fiscal years 1965, 1966 and 1967?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport):

	C.N.R.	C.P.R.

GRANTS TO MANITOBA UNIVERSITY FOR MICROWAVE RADIATION MEASUREMENT

Question No. 1,076—Mr. Schreyer:

1. Has the federal Department of Agriculture or any other department or agency of the federal government made any grants to the University of Manitoba for the purpose of research and measurement of radiation emitted by microwave telecommunication facilities and the effects thereof on plants and animals?

2. If no such grants for such purpose were made to the University of Manitoba, were any made directly to any of the professional staff of the University of Manitoba, specifically as regards one Professor P. A. Kondra and/or one Professor M. A. K. Hamid?

3. If any such grants have been made by any federal agency, what is the amount and by what specific title is the research project named?

4. Has the federal Department of Agriculture or any other federal agency received any research project reports from the University of Manitoba or from any of its staff relative to (a) the measurement of microwave radiation (b) the effects of microwave radiation on plants and animals?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): In so far as the Department of Agriculture is concerned: 1. Yes.

2. Not applicable.

3. Amount: $3,800, effective April 1, 1968. Title: The Effect of Microwave on Growth and Performance of Chickens. (Prof. P. A. Kondra).

4. No.

In so far as the National Research Council of Canada is concerned: 1. No.

2. Grants have been made to Dr. M. A. K. Hamid, but not for the purpose of research and measurement of radiation emitted by microwave telecommunication facilities and the effects thereof on plants and animals.

3. Grants made to Dr. M. A. K. Hamid are as follows: Title—Investigation of near field phenomena

Amounts—

	1966	1967
Operating Grants	$ 6,000	$10,000
Major Equipment Grants	25,000	10,000

4. (a) Yes—annual progress reports by Dr. M. A. K. Hamid. (b) No.

CHANNEL ACROSS AVALON ISTHMUS, NFLD.

Question No. 1,081—Mr. Tucker:

1. Has the federal government any knowledge of plans to cut a channel through the Isthmus of Avalon, near Long Harbour, Newfoundland?

2. Has the federal government been approached by any provincial authority or by any private interest on organization in connection with this project?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Departments of Public Works, Transport and the Prime Minister's Office as follows: 1. No.

2. No.

ACQUISITION OF AIRCRAFT TO BELGIUM

Question No. 1,082—Mr. Lambert:

1. Was Canada involved in any negotiations with the Belgian Government with a view to the purchase by that Government of about a hundred aircraft of the type U.S. F-5 or its related type CF-5 to replace the F-84 as the Belgian tactical ground support fighter bomber?

2. If so, what were the results?

3. Does the decision of the Belgian Government to acquire instead a number of Mirage V in any way affect the consideration of the use of the CF-5 as an operational aircraft by Canadian Forces in Western Europe?

4. Was the CF-5 version of this aircraft of use to Belgium and, if so, what was the offer to the Belgian Government in competition with the offer relative to the Mirage V?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): In so far as the Department of Defence Production is concerned: 1. Yes.

2. The Belgium government decided not to purchase the CF-5 aircraft.

3. The decision of the Belgian government to acquire Mirage aircraft does not affect in any way any consideration of the possible use of the CF-5 as an operational aircraft by Canadian forces in western Europe.

4. It is understood that the CF-5 would have met their military requirements. Negotiations with the Belgian government indicated that Canada would be unable to meet their offset requirements and therefore no formal offer was made by the Canadian government. The Canadian government is not aware of the details of the offer relative to the Mirage V.

PRODUCTION OF NAPALM BOMB INGREDIENTS

Question No. 1,085—Mr. Mather:

Has the government a contract with the Dow Chemical Company plant in the Surrey-Delta area of British Columbia for the production of ingredients used in the manufacture of Napalm bombs?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): A nil answer is submitted for the Department of Defence Production, Canadian Arsenals Limited, Canadian Commercial Corporation and Polymer Corporation Limited.

ENTRY OF ASIANS AND AFRICANS

Question No. 1,087—Mr. Tucker:

1. In view of the situation in which certain African-Asians possessing British passports find themselves as a result of legislation contemplated or being considered by the British Parliament has the Government of Canada given consideration to take steps that might be taken to encourage this group to come to Canada as immigrants and to facilitate their entry?

2. Has any of this group already been admitted to Canada and, if so, how many?

Questions

3. How many of each of the following groups applied for entry to Canada as immigrants during (a) the calendar year 1967 (b) the current year to date (i) Asians (ii) Africans (iii) African-Asians?

4. How many of each of the above groups were actually admitted as immigrants during (a) the calendar year 1967 (b) the current year to date?

Mr. J. C. Munro (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. An immigration officer has been attached on special assignment to the staff of the Canadian high commissioner in Nairobi. In addition, a travelling immigration team will be proceeding to Nairobi in the next two or three weeks.

2, 3 and 4. An applicant's racial or ethnic origin is not a consideration in determining his admissibility to Canada, and no statistics are available to distinguish between this particular group of people and other residents of Kenya. During the calendar year 1967, the last period for which statistics are available, 239 former residents of Kenya were granted landed immigrant status.

AIR CANADA ADVERTISING PROGRAM

Question No. 1,099—Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert):

In connection with the current radio and television advertising program of Air Canada (a) what agency or agencies have been selected for said program (b) will Canadian talent and facilities, particularly with respect to the musical arrangements thereto, be utilized exclusively?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Air Canada advises as follows: (a) Foster Advertising Limited; (b) Not exclusively, if the use of an outside consultant is believed to improve the program.

6. Has the Industrial Development Bank made any loans on other tuna seiners and if so, what are the names of the ships and the amount of the loans?

7. Are payments on any of these loans in arrears?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance):

1, 2, 3, 5, 6 and 7. The ship was arrested. It has not been the practice, nor is it considered appropriate, for the Industrial Development Bank to make information publicly available relating to the affairs of a particular applicant or borrower.

4. This information is not available.

Questions

JANITOR SERVICE, R.C.M.P. BUILDING, CALGARY

Question No. 1,116—Mr. Ballard:

With reference to the new Royal Canadian Mounted Police building at Calgary, Alberta:

1. On what date was this building put into service by the R.C.M.P.?

2. Has the contract for janitorial service been let?

3. If so (a) to whom (b) were the janitorial services let by way of tender, were competitive quotations asked for, or otherwise?

4. What is the cost of janitorial services for this building?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): 1. June 20, 1967.

2. Yes, a short term contract which may be terminated at any month's end. Tenders have been called for the letting of an annual contract.

3. (a) The current contract was let to Servicemaster of Calgary Ltd. (b) Competitive quotations were invited and the current contract let to the low bidder.

4. $135.65 per week.

RURAL DEVELOPMENT ACTIVITIES IN P.E.I.

Question No. 1,120—Mr. McQuaid:

1. Has any agreement been signed with the Government of the Province of Prince Edward Island under subsection (1) of Section 4 of the Fund for Rural Economic Development Act?

2. If the answer to Part 1 is no, has any such agreement yet been drafted and submitted by either Government for approval?

3. Since July 11, 1966, what moneys were paid each year out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund to the Government of the Province of Prince Edward Island under the provisions of the Fund for Rural Economic Development Act?

4. Has the Government of Canada paid any money to the Government of the Province of Prince Edward Island to assist in financing the operations of the P.E.I. Economic Improvement Corporation and, if so, how much and when were the payments made?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): 1. No.

2. No.

3. None.

4. No.

*MR. JUSTICE LANDREVILLE—INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE PAYMENT OF PENSION

Question No. 1,128—Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Has the decision been made either by the government or the Minister of Justice, or any Minister thereof, as to the granting of a pension or other allowance to the former Justice Leo Landreville?

2. If so, what is the nature thereof?

[Mr. Sharp.]

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the government has decided at this time against taking the steps necessary to grant Mr. Landreville a pension or annuity.

OFFICERS OF SOVEREIGNTY ASSOCIATION MOVEMENT

Question No. 1,130—Mr. Bell (Carleton):

1. Has the attention of (a) the government (b) the Public Service Commission, been drawn to the addendum to the Report of the Board of Control to the City Council of Ottawa on March 4, 1968, which addendum contains a copy of a press release of the "Sovereignty Association Movement"?

2. If so, are the office telephone numbers there listed for (a) the chief co-ordinator, namely 996-1610 and (b) the policy co-ordinator, namely 992-0075, of the "Sovereignty Association Movement", on the telephone exchange of the Government of Canada?

3. If so, in what specific branch of what department or agency of the Government of Canada is each such telephone located?

4. (a) What position with the Government of Canada is held by (i) the person listed as chief co-ordinator (ii) the policy co-ordinator, of the said Movement (b) what are the duties of each such position?

5. Have these persons or either of them the permission of (a) the Government of Canada (b) their superior officers, to make use of the said telephones for the purposes of the said Movement?

6. If so, under what conditions?

7. If not, what action, if any, has been taken regarding (a) the past use (b) future use, of such telephones for the purposes of the said Movement?

8. In addition to the said telephones, were any other services or facilities of the Government of Canada used by either (a) the said chief co-ordinator, or (b) the policy co-ordinator, for the activities of the Movement?

9. If so, what services or facilities?

10. On what date was each of (a) the said chief co-ordinator (b) the said policy co-ordinator, first employed in the Public Service?

11. By what method of appointment and on whose recommendation was each such person so employed?

12. (a) Has any disciplinary action been taken against either of these employees (b) if so, of what nature (c) when?

Mr. John R. Matheson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): 1. (a) Yes. (b) No. The individuals referred to were not employed under the terms of the Public Service Employment Act.

2. (a) Yes; (b) yes.

3. 996-1610, science secretariat, Privy Council office located at 110 Argyle Street, Ottawa.

992-0075, royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism (switchboard).

4. (a) and (b) (i) None. The person listed as "chief co-ordinator" who had been employed on a short term contract to assemble research material on the nature and extent of industrial research in Canada for a study being conducted by the science secretariat of the Privy Council office, requested on March 4 that his contract be terminated on March 18, 1968 in order that he might take up other employment. The contractor was on duty for a total of 12½ days in the month of February, five days of which were after the issue of the press release referred to in part (1) of the question.

(a) and (b) (ii) I am informed, by the royal commission that the person listed as the "policy co-ordinator" holds the position of editorial assistant with duties as follows: "under the direction and according to the instructions of the director of editorial services, to edit research report manuscripts being prepared for publication, correcting typographical and stylistic errors and drawing the attention of his superior to such editorial questions as organization and presentation; finalizing bibliography and verifying references and annotations; proof-reading and final preparation of manuscripts for printing".

5. (a) and (b) No.

6. Not applicable.

7. The person listed as "chief co-ordinator" was interviewed by his administrative superiors on March 1, 1968 and informed them that no use whatever had been made of government telephones for the purposes of the "Sovereignty Association Movement" and that the listing of the telephone number 996-1610 in the press release was done without his knowledge or consent by an individual who had since resigned his position with the organization because he had made an inaccurate release without authorization. It was pointed out to the individual by his administrative superiors that the use of the government telephone and his time would not be tolerated for such purposes and in turn the individual stated that the telephone had not been used for such purposes nor would it be used in the future.

I am informed by the royal commission that the person listed as "policy co-ordinator" was asked by his supervisor for an explanation and has explained that the publication of his business telephone number was unauthorized by him and was unknown to him until after the event (see paragraph above). His supervisors requested and received assurance that the individual had not used his telephone for the purposes indicated and would not in the future.

8. (a) and (b) No.

9. Not applicable.

10. (a) The individual is not employed in the public service—he is employed part time on a contract basis, effective November 20, 1967. (b) The individual's employment does not fall within the public service regulations —he was employed by the royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism, effective November 1, 1965.

11. Insofar as the individual referred to as "chief co-ordinator" is concerned, he was employed by contract on the recommendation of former officials of Expo Corporation 1967 who were familiar with his capabilities.

Insofar as the individual referred to as "policy co-ordinator" I am informed by the royal commission that he was appointed under the terms of T.B. minute No. 685784-1 and 636527 of May 21, 1965, by the commission co-secretary on the recommendation of the director of research, as a research assistant, and was subsequently transferred to the editorial section on the recommendation of the supervisor of editorial services.

12. (a) None (see 7). (b) and (c) Not applicable.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PACIFIC WESTERN AIRLINE NORTHERN SERVICE

Question No. 1,002—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Since 1965, have there been any changes in the air service provided by Pacific Western Airlines to the following communities (a) Pine Point (b) service between Fort Smith and Uranium City (c) service between Hay River and Fort Resolution?

2. If so, when did the changes take place, for what reasons, and under whose authority?

3. What are the present P.W.A. schedules into these communities, and what routes are authorized under their charter?

1. In the last fiscal year, what was the expenditure of the Department of Trade and Commerce allocated to trade promotional and tourist promotional activities?

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

2. Of the above amount, how much was allocated to (a) trade missions (b) trade fairs

3. How many persons representative of private commercial interests attended trade missions or fairs at departmental expense, either in whole or in part?

4. What was the number of such persons sent abroad per trade fair or trade mission, and what was the cost per trade fair or mission in sending such persons?

Return tabled.

FINANCE

REFUNDING OF MATURING BONDS—INQUIRIES AS TO GOLD SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I understand there is some $175 million in bonds maturing at April 1. Can the minister give the house any indication as to the government's plans in respect of refunding these bonds, as well as the C.N.R. bonds falling due on May 15?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the cabinet has been considering the refinancing of these securities, and I expect I shall be making an announcement either today or tomorrow.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in view of the announcement by the minister in respect of the member countries of the world gold pool, does he still think they will be able to control the price of gold if countries like Russia, China and others continue to deal in gold on the free market?

Mr. Sharp: The object of the exercise, Mr. Speaker, is to stabilize the price of gold for transactions between countries settling their balance of payments differences, and to leave the free market to deal with supplies coming from new production. The gold pool is no longer in operation.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, is it the minister's intention to continue to buy gold at $35 an ounce from producers in Canada for sale to countries which belong to the gold pool?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I would refer the hon. gentleman to the communique issued by the governors, to which we have adhered, as follows:

Moreover, as the existing stock of monetary gold is sufficient in view of the prospective establishment of the facilities for special drawing rights, they no longer feel it necessary to buy gold from the market.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I do not like to raise questions of order, but with respect it does not appear to me that these questions are supplementary to the question I directed to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Speaker: The point of order is a little too late now that the questions have been asked and answered.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the question about bond conversions. Do these plans include also the spring conversion of Canada savings bonds?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, a decision has been made in respect of the conversion issue but I have forgotten whether an announcement has been made.

[Later:]

Mr. Sharp: Earlier today the hon. member for Edmonton West asked me a question about the new series of Canadian savings bonds, and I discover that I have made the announcement today.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance about the announced decision regarding the two price system for gold. In view of the fact that this is likely to be a stop gap measure designed to buy time, what steps is the Canadian government taking to hasten some decision by the member nations of the International Monetary Fund in respect of supplementary drawing rights and some new unit of international currency?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government has been foremost among nations in pressing for the establishment of a new form of reserve currency. We shall continue to do so, and I am hopeful that we will have good results.

Mr. Douglas: Further to the statement the minister made earlier, what will be the Canadian government's position in respect of buying gold from Canadian gold producers? Will the government be buying gold and, if so, at what price? Will the government be selling gold to the United States government as we did last year, and if so, at what price?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, this is the same question that was asked by the hon. member for Timiskaming which I answered by referring to the communiqué issued by the governors of the central banks, members of the gold pool, to which we have adhered; that is, that the central banks "no longer feel it necessary to buy gold from the market."

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question for clarification, Mr. Speaker. I was aware of the statement in the communiqué, but is it Canada's intention to sell any gold to the United States during the coming year and, if so, on what basis? Or am I to take it from the minister's statement that the United States will not be buying gold from Canada? Also, will the Canadian government be buying gold and, if so, on what price basis?

Mr. Sharp: There were two questions asked by the hon. member. I am sorry; I dealt only with the first. With regard to the second question, about sales of gold by Canada to the United States—that is from the Canadian exchange fund to the United States authorities—that, of course, is always possible. That depends upon what proportion of our reserves we want to keep in gold and what proportion in earning assets. Nothing that has happened changes those considerations, so I do not expect any change in normal behaviour. If we come to the conclusion that our gold reserves are more than adequate as a proportion of our total reserves, we might feel we should sell some in order to increase our earnings and thereby reduce the taxes we have to raise.

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): A supplementary question to the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker. Will the Canadian gold producers, then, be able to sell their product on any market in the world?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I ought to refer this question to my hon. friend the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The position at the present time under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act is that the mines are free to sell their gold where they will, but in order to obtain the subsidy that is available they must sell that gold to the mint. That will continue to be the situation. With regard to what happens to it thereafter, we will be governed by the agreement or the understanding that we have amongst central banks.

Mr. Lambert: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister tell me, if he has the information, what proportion of Canada's gold normally goes to the mint? I understand that two of the major mines in the country do not deliver to the mint.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Sharp: I do not have that information, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps my colleague the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has it.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there are now three mining companies that do not avail themselves of the legislation, merely because the cost of their production is inferior to that provided for by the regulations, that is it must be superior to $26.50 in order that the producer might avail himself of federal aid.

CRIMINAL CODE

POSSIBLE CHANGES IN PROPOSED AMENDMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the hon. Minister of Justice.

Did he, over the week-end, indicate publicly that his attitude had changed toward the amendments proposed to the Criminal Code?

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, there have been no changes in attitude. I have always said, since the bill was introduced, that the government would study with great care whatever judicious amendments are proposed.

[English]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister advise the house whether when he was making these statements he was speaking as the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will recognize that it was difficult for the Chair to determine what statements the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi was referring to. The rule is well known that no questions can be asked about statements made outside the house except by directing such questions to the Prime Minister to ascertain whether they represent government policy or otherwise.

Mr. Baldwin: Then may I rephrase my question to the minister, and preface it by saying I am referring to statements attributed to him in respect of amendments to the Criminal Code. I would simply ask the minister whether he does not think the house is sufficiently responsible and competent so he can take the house into his confidence before making further statements outside.

[Mr. Lambert.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is not in order as asked; it is argumentative.

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Justice in connection with the possible revision of his proposed amendments to the Criminal Code. I wonder whether the minister and his officials would give consideration to my bill introduced today with regard to the abolition of corporal punishment.

[Translation]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am very interested in the substance of this bill. I think that question should be considered in another bill. It is clear that, with regard to the present bill, we can only accept relatively minor amendments which do not substantially change its contents.

[English]

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the minister whether any consideration has been given to dividing this bill, so that some of the non-controversial parts of it may be passed in a reasonable length of time.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question has been asked at least once before in exactly the same terms.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

HOSPITAL AND MEDICAL SERVICES PAYMENTS TO PROVINCES NOT UNDER MEDICARE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare and ask him whether after July 1 the federal government will be discontinuing payments for hospital and medical services to all the provinces not under the federal medicare plan.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take the question as notice, but so far as the medicare program is concerned to my knowledge there has been no change in the current practice with respect to grants to provinces. However, I should like to check it further.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

TORONTO—REFUSAL TO PERMIT ARRESTED PERSON TO CONTACT LAWYER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Justice arising out of the report that a Miss Leslie Turner was arrested and held by the Toronto police for some hours before she was permitted to contact a lawyer.

In view of this further distressing instance, I should like to ask the hon. gentleman whether he would consider immediately amending the Criminal Code to spell out the right to counsel, without waiting for the charter of human rights to be enshrined in the constitution.

[Translation]

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member seems to think that it will be a long time before the charter of human rights is proclaimed. I beg to differ. Besides, the amendment to the Criminal Code he is proposing is very important. Personally, I am trying without much success to get the house to pass a proposed amendment to the Criminal Code which was approved on first reading three months ago.

An hon. Member: Put it on this afternoon.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, but would you pass it?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RHODESIA—INQUIRY AS TO REPORTED GUERRILLA ATTACKS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he is in a position to expand on the report on the radio news this morning to the effect that guerrilla attacks were being made on Rhodesia. Could the minister tell us where these attacks came from, and if there is any information as to the source of the logistical support for these guerrilla operations?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as yet we have no further information on this matter than that which the hon. gentleman has mentioned himself. There have been incursions into Rhodesia in the past, particularly at the end of last summer, but it is not known on what scale or how these latest alleged incursions have taken place. I am seeking more information.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

REQUEST FOR LIST OF RECIPIENTS OF MEDALS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): In view of the fact that we are approaching the end of this portion of the session, I should like to ask the Prime Minister about a starred question which I placed on the order paper ten days ago. Will he not table in the house a list of those who received the centennial medal, apart from those in the armed forces?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to answer this question on Wednesday. My right hon. friend asked for the list of names, and also the addresses of those on the list. Since there are some 15,000 names it will certainly take quite a long time to obtain the information, but I do not see why we should not try to get it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As I understand the Prime Minister, the list will be made available on Wednesday, but may I point out that it should be accompanied by addresses. We must avoid medals falling down as did manna from heaven. Two or three centennial medals have been given to the same individual, and this should be avoided.

Mr. Pearson: I will be glad to deal with it as an oral question, but I would like to point out to my right hon. friend that in the past the lists of names of people to whom commemorative medals have been given have never been made public. However, that itself is no reason why it should not be done this time.

HOUSING

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE CHANGE IN INTEREST RATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): I should like to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the imminent closing of the house and the continuing urgency for moneys to finance the construction of homes, I wonder whether the minister has any intention of announcing the government's policy regarding interest rates, and whether any extra provision is being made to meet this vital need.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. E. J. Benson (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I find this question a little misleading. There are provisions for additional lending powers in the supplementary estimates for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. However, I should like to assure my friend that this year we will build more houses than have ever been built in a single year in Canadian history.

Mr. Thompson: May I ask a supplementary question. Is it the intention to increase interest rates on C.M.H.C. loans?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, this is not the case. As I have said publicly, I should like to see C.M.H.C. interest rate ceiling eliminated, so that people who want money for mortgages can compete in the open market. In this way we could get more private money into mortgages in this country. Now, if we want to subsidize interest rates this is an entirely different matter. It is something that would have to be brought up by way of legislation.

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): As a supplementary question may I ask the minister whether he is satisfied that the estimate of the number of houses that will be built this year will be within 20,000 of the number the Economic Council of Canada recommends?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question is argumentative. One cannot ask whether the minister is satisfied or dissatisfied.

AGRICULTURE

QUEBEC—AGREEMENT RESPECTING CROP INSURANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Would he tell the house whether an agreement has been signed with the Quebec government in connection with the crop insurance plan now offered to Quebec farmers?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, such an agreement has not yet been signed, but negotiations are now proceeding and I think that it will be concluded this week or next week.

[Mr. Thompson.]

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

REDUCTION IN BUDGET FOR NORTHERN HEALTH SERVICES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is directed to the Prime Minister. On Friday I asked him whether he had received a telegram from Premier Manning regarding the proposed realignment of medical services for Indians. I was wondering whether he had received that wire now, and what reply he gave to it or to the premier of Manitoba.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, I replied over the week end, on Saturday, Mr. Speaker, to the effect that I was discussing the matter with the minister concerned. I hope to send a more substantive reply within a day or two, which I hope will remove some of the misunderstanding which has been created.

Mr. Lambert: My supplementary question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is the minister in a position to indicate to the house the nature of the directive that went out to the regional directorate of the prairie provinces in connection with medical services for Indians, since the statement by Hon. Mr. Ross in the Alberta house indicates some grave discrepancies with the answer given by the minister?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The communications which have been sent by the director general of medical services to the medical directors in the various regions in Canada are privileged documents. They are departmental documents, and I am unable at the present time to ascertain whether there have been communications that are not in that category. If so I will be happy to have them tabled.

Mr. Lambert: Is the minister suggesting that the letter from the regional director of the prairie region to the Alberta minister of health is a privileged document?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would think that question is not in order. It is possibly the type of question which would have to be raised by way of a point of order.

Mr. Lambert: Then may I ask a further supplementary question. Would the realignment of the medical services to which the minister was referring include a reduction in the care of tubercular cases on Indian reservations in the prairie provinces?

Mr. MacEachen: There have been changes proposed in the directive with respect to the treatment of tubercular Indians.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): The minister referred to the directive being sent out by the director. Does the minister accept responsibility in general for the directive?

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Has the minister yet decided whether he will table copies of the letters which went out to the Indian chiefs from the department explaining the decision?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker. As I told the house on Thursday and Friday, we have been conducting a review of this situation in an effort to reach the most satisfactory solution in so far as the Indian population is concerned. I hope to be able to make a statement on this matter within a day or so.

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): In so far as the reduction of services is concerned, I should like to ask the minister if he can assure the house that the emergency transportation service will not be reduced in so far as Indian people are concerned.

Mr. MacEachen: There is no proposal to reduce emergency transportation service.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GABON—INQUIRY AS TO STATUS OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister, prompted by the report of a recent statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs which was made at Moncton. Can the Prime Minister advise the house if there has been any change in our diplomatic relations with Gabon since the press release was issued on March 4? Is it intended to have our ambassador designate present his credentials at an early date?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): There has been no formal change. I hope this situation can be corrected. I hope we will soon be in communication with the government of Gabon to that end. However, we have not changed our attitude.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask a supplementary question. At the time of this incident I asked the Prime Minister if he would table in the house the letter which the government of Canada received from the government of Gabon. The Prime Minister indicated he was not sure whether such a letter had been received or whether there had been a conversation. In the latter case he would explore whether a memorandum might be tabled. So far as I am aware neither has been forthcoming.

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker, we cannot table the communication from the ambassador without his permission. We have not secured that permission. If and when we are able to secure it we would also wish to table a memorandum which I should hope would explain the situation in a way that the one communication does not do adequately.

Mr. Stanfield: Am I to understand the government of Canada has requested permission to table the letter from the government of Gabon? Has a formal request been make for permission to table this letter?

Mr. Pearson: I have no objection to that request being made. I am not sure of the date it was made, but I will look into it.

Mr. Stanfield: I am at a loss to know whether the government of Canada has requested permission to table the letter, or will request permission.

Mr. Pearson: I said I would look into the date when that request was made.

FINANCE

LOANS BY BANKS UNDER FARM IMPROVEMENT ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): My question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the Commons will be recessing shortly, and the difficulty farmers are experiencing in obtaining loans under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, can the minister advise the house whether any steps will be taken to relieve this serious situation?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I find this such a general question that perhaps it could be rephrased in more specific form.

Mr. Southam: Can the minister advise the house what steps, if any, have been taken to relieve the serious problem of credit under the Farm Improvement Loans Act? This matter has been under consideration for some time.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Sharp: The cabinet has approved a form of legislation. I am not quite certain whether it can be introduced before the end of the present part of this session.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): My supplementary is directed to the Minister of Justice. Is his department going to take action against the Canadian banks for the conspiracy they are carrying on in connection with this very matter?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question is not a supplementary. It may be related in some way, but I do not believe it is a supplementary question.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, and I shall indicate why the question is definitely a supplementary and in order. In this respect I call the attention of the house to a statement by the Minister of Finance. This statement appears on page 14281 of Hansard for March 21, 1967, at which time we were dealing with the Bank Act and the very situation which prevails today was outlined to the minister. In commenting on the situation at the time the minister had this to say:

> This is a highly hypothetical question and perhaps I should not even attempt to answer. There are strict provisions in the law against any such conspiracy as the hon. gentleman has described.

My question now, Mr. Speaker, based on the statement by the Minister of Finance at the time the Bank Act was before the house, is directed to the Minister of Justice. I would ask the Minister of Justice whether his department intends to take action to deal with this conspiracy as described by the Minister of Finance.

[Translation]

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if this question has been placed before the judicial authorities.

[English]

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I have a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the answer given by the Minister of Justice—

Mr. Speaker: Order. What is this question supplementary to?

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): With your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, I had understood a further supplementary question was being asked by the hon. member for Mackenzie, and I remained in my seat only to find that another question was being asked.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker with your permission I should like to revert to the question and ask the Minister of Finance a question supplementary to the question that was put to but not answered by the Minister of Justice. Could I ask the minister what he intends to do about this particular conspiracy to which the minister himself referred?

[Later:]

Mr. Terence Nugent (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. Now that the minister is aware of the statements made by the Minister of Finance in relation to the situation brought to his attention by the hon. member for Queens and the hon. member for Cape Breton South, would he take notice of the question and advise this house of the action he will take to make sure his department sees that justice is done in this regard?

[Translation]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I shall consider whether this matter actually comes under my department.

[English]

FISHERIES

SEALS—ACCESS TO HUNTING GROUNDS BY HUMANE SOCIETY REPRESENTATIVES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I had a question that I wanted to ask the Minister of Fisheries, but in his absence perhaps someone on the other side will take notice of it. Having in mind the opening of the seal hunting season I wonder whether the minister would indicate, in view of the public's concern, if representatives of the humane societies are being given access to the seal hunting grounds, and whether there will be any new regulations to meet the situation?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Acting Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I will take notice of this matter and probably give an answer tomorrow.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEDICARE—REQUEST FOR ANSWER TO QUESTION ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I had been hoping to direct a question to the Secretary of State. On Wednesday last the hon. lady was good enough to say she would seek to ascertain the reason my question No. 727 had not yet been answered. I am wondering whether the hon. lady has obtained the information necessary in order that this question can be answered.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I understand that it will probably be answered later this week.

Mr. Fulton: Before or after adjournment?

Miss LaMarsh: Depending on whether we adjourn early or late.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. Would the right hon. gentleman be good enough to take a look at question No. 727 and see if he does not agree with me that it specifically asks whether certain information is in the possession of the government, and, if so, that that information be given. Would the right hon. gentleman take a look at this question and see that the rules and customs of this house are maintained and that the privileges of members are protected by giving an answer to it without further delay?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have already looked at it along with other questions, and I should like to point out that many more questions have been answered in this session of parliament than in any other session in our history.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I was asking the Prime Minister whether he would see to it that this record is not spoiled by failing to answer question No. 727.

INDUSTRY

REVIEW OF DESIGNATED AREA POLICY RESPECTING ATLANTIC PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Industry, and it arises from his answer last week to my question regarding expansion of the operations of the area development agency to all parts of Atlantic Canada. Would the minister now state whether new legislation or any changes to the regulations are being proposed and, if so, when?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[Later:]

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry with reference to the affirmative answer given to the hon. member for Halifax, as reported at page 7468 of Hansard, with respect to the designated areas in the maritimes. In view of the great interest and the new optimism this affirmative answer has created, will the minister say whether he would welcome new approaches by the mayors of the cities affected in this matter?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the hon. member for Halifax has been scooped on his question, notice of which he gave me earlier. The answer to both interrogations is the same. The most recent report of the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council has not disclosed any new information or any new consideration which would lead to a revision of the program.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question that naturally follows. Why did the minister say, as reported at page 7468, that yes, he was going to re-examine this matter of designated areas?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Greenwood.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. Yes or no?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member kindly resume his seat. The hon. member asked the minister why the minister had said yes to a question previously asked. According to the rules this is certainly not a proper question.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, by way of clarification of my answer—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest that unless the hon. member wants to rephrase this question this matter cannot be pursued.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): In order to be helpful, Mr. Speaker, I will take your advice and rephrase my question. Is the minister planning any new measures or to re-examine this matter of the new designations of Halifax, Saint John and Fredericton in the maritimes?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, consideration has been given, as promised, to the most recent report of the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council; and, as I say, the report has disclosed no new considerations. Consequently no changes in the program are contemplated.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): In other words, Mr. Speaker, the minister's answer now is no, whereas as reported at page 7468 he said yes.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does not the fact that net migration from the Atlantic provinces reached a total of 103,000 in five years indicate there is new evidence?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

SOCIAL SECURITY

REPORTED STATEMENT BY JUSTICE MINISTER AS TO CHANGED BASIS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. May I ask the Prime Minister whether the Minister of Justice has been stating government policy in his call for future welfare plans to be put on a needs test basis rather than on a basis of universality?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will have to consult with the minister to see whether in fact he made any such statement.

TRANSPORT

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND CAUSEWAY—REQUEST FOR CONSULTATION BEFORE CHANGES MADE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Public Works. Two days ago the minister indicated that when the report of Colonel Churchill on the Northumberland causeway is completed the government will go ahead with its design and implement the program. Would the minister assure the members of this house that the government and officials of Prince Edward Island will be consulted before any definite decisions are made or any changes are made to the original causeway proposal?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, this is a pretty hypothetical question. I am not accepting the premise of the hon. member in which he sought to summarize what I said on the subject earlier. If he would care to rephrase the latter part of his question I would be glad to answer.

[Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert).]

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the minister feels somewhat sensitive about this matter. However, I am not trying to play games, so I will quickly rephrase what I said. I am simply asking whether the government of Prince Edward Island will be consulted after Colonel Churchill makes his report.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, we have tried to keep the government of Prince Edward Island fully informed as to what we are doing in this matter, and to work in very close co-operation with them. I do not think it would be proper to give an undertaking that they will be consulted before we take a decision as to the detail of the design.

[Later:]

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): I have a question for the Prime Minister arising out of the answer given me by the Minister of Public Works. In the light of the statement that there might not necessarily be consultation in connection with the resumption of work on the causeway project, and in the light of the fact that changes might substantially affect the economy of Prince Edward Island, would the right hon. gentleman assure members of this house that the government of Prince Edward Island will be consulted before changes are implemented?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I should like to confirm what the minister said in this regard, Mr. Speaker.

THE MINISTRY

ACCEPTANCE OF FREE TRANSPORTATION BY LEADERSHIP CANDIDATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Prime Minister a question. Has the Prime Minister given consideration to advising those of his ministers who are running for the leadership of the Liberal party of the dangers and impropriety of accepting free transportation from those groups who have dealings with the government?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO INCREASES IN PENSIONS AND DISABILITY ALLOWANCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Prince Edward-Lennox): My question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Now that the house has passed the supplementary estimates of his department, what further procedure is necessary in order to give effect to the promised 15 per cent raise in veteran's pensions?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): It is a matter of clearing up the supplementary estimates. Then they go to the other place for approval and royal assent.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope the hon. member will not pursue his question along those lines, because it would be clearly out of order to do so.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

STEPS TO DEAL WITH INFANT MORTALITY RATE AMONG INDIANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): My question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that the infant mortality rate among Canadian Indians and Eskimos is one of the highest in the world, I should like to ask the minister whether the government is contemplating any special program or course of action to deal with this problem.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The very important question raised by the hon. member is general and wide in scope. He is really asking for a statement which I suggest should be made on motions.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR RECONSTITUTION OF PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Bearing in mind previous difficulties in obtaining answers to indicate the intention of the Department of National Health and Welfare with respect to medical care of Indian people, will the Prime Minister take the course of introducing a motion to activate the Indian affairs committee of the house so that committee might look carefully into this question?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): The Minister of National Health and Welfare has already said he hopes to make a statement on this matter within a day or so.

INQUIRY AS TO PRODUCTION OF DISCUSSION DOCUMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It relates to questions asked in the house some days ago in connection with a series of meetings which have been scheduled to deal with preparations for amendments to the Indian Act, and a document which is being prepared with respect to it. The minister indicated that he was prepared to table this document. May I ask how close we are to that event?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I had intended to table the discussion document today, but I changed my mind and thought I would send it to all members of parliament together with a list of locations where meetings are being held and particulars of who are being invited.

Mr. Howard: Is this being sent to hon. members today?

Mr. Laing: It will be in the mail tonight.

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. May I ask whether the heartwarming reference to the role of the monarchy made by the Minister of Justice in Victoria a few days ago represents government policy?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): We all, with a few exceptions, make heartwarming references to the monarchy, and I hope we shall continue to do so.

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Would the Prime Minister follow the lead of the minister of consumer affairs and make a public expression of his views on the shabby treatment Vancouver is getting from the National Hockey League?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Supply—External Affairs

TRANSPORT

REPORTED BANKRUPTCIES IN CONSTRUCTION OF RAILWAY TO GREAT SLAVE LAKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether he has yet reached a decision on the request he received several weeks ago from hon. members asking for an investigation into the bankruptcy of construction firms which built the Great Slave Lake railway.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Not yet, Mr. Speaker. This is one of the most complicated files I have had to look at, and I should like a few more days in which to consider it.

Mr. Schreyer: I should like to ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether it constitutes a breach of privilege for the minister to refuse to answer his mail.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member will consult the precedents and authorities he will see that it does not.

FINANCE

PREPARATION FOR POSSIBLE DEFLATIONARY U.S. POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the clear implication in the statement by the governors of the central banks, and in view of reports from Washington that it is intended to pursue a severely deflationary policy in that country, has the minister instructed any of his officials or other economic experts in the government to prepare for the possibility of a deflationary drawback in the United States which might affect Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. emmber that this question is not in order.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

OFFER TO FACILITATE PASSAGE OF BILL C-190

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the government house leader supplementary to the one I put to the acting leader on Friday last, as reported in Hansard at page 7699. Has the hon. gentleman yet made arrangements for the house to deal this week with Bill C-190, to amend the Patent Act and the Trade Marks Act, and possibly one or two other items which have been mentioned?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker, arrangements have not yet been made with respect to any of those items. Any such arrangements would depend, naturally, upon the length of time required to debate any one or all of them.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister call a meeting of the house leaders, or negotiate the possibility of these measures being dealt with during the present week?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to do so.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: Supplementary estimates of the Department of External Affairs for 1967-68, vote No. 10c.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

10c—Construction, acquisition or improvement of buildings, works, lands, equipment and furnishings, $1,464,000.

Mr. Stanfield: I should like to make a few remarks, briefly I hope, on one aspect of the program of this department, much of which seems to be in a state of flux these days; at least that is my impression from the statements on various matters made by the contestants on the other side of the house. As a result I am a little confused as to the government's attitude toward a good many aspects of external affairs. Nevertheless there is one important part of this subject about which I should like to say something; it is the subject of foreign aid.

I assure the Secretary of State for External Affairs that my remarks are not intended to be critical. They are meant, rather, to be helpful.

• (3:30 p.m.)

It may be thought by some that this is a strange time to talk about external or foreign aid when we have internal financial strains, a considerable amount of unemployment, undeveloped areas in our own country, poor housing, poverty, and obviously much to do at home, more than we can hope to do satisfactorily in the immediate future. Why then talk about foreign aid at this time? In addition we have the international monetary problem, an international crisis relating to international currency, balance of payments problems, our own exchange problems and, of course, increased foreign aid could add to these problems.

Why then do I pick a time like this to speak very earnestly to the committee on the subject of foreign aid? Clearly, Mr. Chairman, because I believe that one must. I believe that the importance of this subject places even greater emphasis on the importance of handling our own economic problems intelligently and effectively so that we are in a position to increase our foreign aid. I think it adds even greater importance to the question of the resolution of the international problems of liquidity and exchange so that the western world, the developed world as a whole, will be in a position to increase its foreign aid. Clearly we must do better at home and abroad.

I am not raising this matter today from the point of view of charity. I am raising it as a matter of enlightened self-interest. I suggest that we and all the developed countries of the world must do more than we have been doing to help with the problems of overpopulation, hunger, and distress.

To anyone who looks at the prospects they are alarming and the statistics are certainly frightening. The statistics of world economic disparity are striking. The minority of the nations which are rich, possessing about 75 per cent of the world's wealth, have only about 25 per cent of the world's population. The proportion of the total population living in the less developed countries is going up as the death rate declines and the high birth rate continues. I understand it has been estimated that by 1975 the number of dependant children in the underdeveloped nations in the southern half of the globe, children under 15 years of age, will alone equal the total population of the developed nations of the world.

But statistics themselves convey nothing of the deprivation and the suffering which render millions of lives purposeless, barren, tortured and wasted. The humanitarian arguments for improved foreign aid need no recitation but there are other arguments at least equal and perhaps even more compelling, and it is to those that I want to refer briefly.

I think it is widely accepted by those concerned with international affairs that in the long run the growing disparities of economic status of people will lead to increased conflict and violence in international politics. I think it is agreed that the pressures of poverty are explosive, and it is natural that these pressures become even more intense when the growth of population and of expectation persistently outstrip the growth of food supplies, the growth of productivity and the growth in opportunity.

I say that if we are serious in our pursuit of peace we must confront the causes of conflict. To the degree that a peaceful world is essential to our own growth and expansion, and surely it is, we must be prepared to invest in the long-range stability and growth of the less developed nations. Therefore if we might choose to ignore the moral imperatives of inequality we cannot escape the economic and political consequences if the inequality persists and even grows. To decline to accept our responsibility to less developed countries is to invite a violence from which we will all certainly suffer.

Our aim must not be merely to increase the flow of funds, because funds can be as badly spent abroad as they are sometimes at home, though I am not making anything of that. Other countries have had unfortunate experiences with foreign aid which produced only rusting machinery and sometimes ended up in Swiss bank accounts. Our real success will be registered not simply in terms of the dollars we spend but in terms of the development which Canadian aid makes possible. Our guiding concern must be to promote those aid programs which will encourage the kind of capital investment necessary to create permanent increases in national income in the country assisted.

Our goal must be growth. I believe that an approach based on improving the rate of growth and the rate of productivity of less developed nations will make sense to most Canadians because it is a principle we have applied here at home. We are one of the few countries in the world which, after all, was formed with has followed the determination to use the wealth of the whole community to improve the productivity of the parts. We have not altogether succeeded but we have embodied this principle in our approach to equalization throughout our own country. We have followed that practice in Canada in the long run interests of all of us. Now that must be the basis of our approach to international aid.

Let me say, Mr. Chairman, that I understand and believe Canada's external aid program has improved in recent years. But I do not think we yet have any real cause for satisfaction when we compare our record with others, and certainly with the requirements of the countries depending upon us for assistance. We do not have any particular cause for pride when we compare our record with those of other developed countries. I think that until recent years we have been behind but I understand we have recently been coming forward.

If we are to assume our proper role in the international community I believe we must assign a high priority to foreign aid. I do not think we can regard it as a luxury or as a symbol of our generosity or as a means to prime the pumps of international trade. Instead I think we should see it as a very vital element along with trade, finance, defence, and other functions in an integrated Canadian foreign policy.

It is misleading to suggest there is any necessary conflict between the requirements of defence and diplomacy and the requirements of foreign aid. They surely share the common goals of international peace and security.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: Obviously security includes the maintenance of an efficient military force and traditional military activity. But surely it also includes the sort of thing I am talking about, and where the purposes are common surely it can be possible to develop policies which are consistent and complementary.

As a beginning to a new approach to foreign aid we must abandon the idea that in a world of major powers the contribution of a relatively small country like Canada can never amount to very much. On the contrary, I think we have many advantages which the large powers do not share.

• (3:40 p.m.)

As I understand it, and the distinguished Secretary of State for External Affairs will correct me if I am wrong, the total flow of external resources available as aid from the developed countries of the world has actually gone down in real terms over the last five years. I am not speaking about Canada but about the developed nations as a whole. As a percentage of the gross national product of the wealthier countries foreign aid has also gone down. It has gone down owing to the fact that over this period of five years the interest payments and the debt charges generally that the underdeveloped countries have had to pay have been eating more and more into the gross assistance they have been receiving, thereby further reducing the net assistance they have been receiving. In addition, there have been frequent and substantial erosions of prices of important primary products upon which the countries depend. I suggest, of course, that we must do more, as Mr. Strong has suggested, in terms of management effectiveness on the part of the donor and on the part of the recipient countries. We must give this high priority in order to help combat the cynicism and disillusionment with regard to external aid. I think that we must also do all we can to improve the terms of trade and opportunities for trade between the underdeveloped nations and the developed nations. I believe also that we should do all we can in association with other developed countries to reduce the very wide fluctuations which exist in respect of the foreign exchange earnings of these countries over relatively short periods of time. It would seem to be obvious that over the whole field we must do more to support research in the area of aid in terms of where it can be most effective in respect of results achieved and so on.

I do not oversimplify this problem, Mr. Chairman. I do not think for a moment that it will be simple to reduce substantially the disparity between the underdeveloped and the developed nations or that anyone has a simple cure-all in this regard. I do suggest, however, that we must make a greater effort than we have been making and must invite our friends and allies to make a greater effort also. I repeat again that to do this we must achieve a certain rate of growth in our own economy. But I understand that to double the net flow of assistance to the less developed countries would require only the increase in the gross national product which the major donor countries as a whole achieve every seven or eight weeks. In other words, in order to double the amount of assistance coming from the highly developed countries of the western world it would be necessary only to allocate the increase in gross national product that we achieve over a two-month period. The central question which confronts us and all developed countries, therefore, is whether or not we have the will and the sense of priority to do this.

I understand that our aid now is running at the rate of about three-fifths of one per cent of our gross national product and that we have undertaken to move it up to one per cent in the early 1970's. I must say that I am pleased that Canada is moving forward in this regard. I wish to say in all sincerity, however, that I still do not think that we have any particular cause for satisfaction. I understand also that my friend the Secretary of State for External Affairs ordered a complete review of our aid program a year or so ago and that this is under way. There will be another opportunity to discuss where the emphasis should be in our program and the methods we should use. I have expressed some views on this point outside the house and it is not my purpose to go into it today in the short time I hope to take.

My purpose today is to stress the importance of this program because of the grave and growing dangers that are developing in the world and because of the inadequate efforts being made in this regard by the developed countries as a whole. Second, I wish to emphasize the necessity of our achieving a fair rate of economic growth on our own so that we can take care of our poverty programs within Canada and do what we ought to be doing in the external aid field. I do not suggest that we abandon arrangements for collective security. We have a part to play in this regard and I hope we will continue to play it even though we may wish to revise our role from time to time. But I do not think any of us can think in terms of peace and security, in terms of armed alliances or in terms of collective security only. I should like to quote what I think is a very fine statement in this regard made by the former secretary of defence for the United States, Mr. McNamara. At pages 39 and 40 the statement reads as follows:

> Thus collective security remains the foundation of our defence policy.

This has reference to the United States of America.

> Ultimately, however, true international security will be found only in proper relations among states, not in hardware. This was my theme at Montreal two years ago, and I would emphasize it again now. If we look ahead towards the last quarter of the twentieth century, the world's overwhelming security problem will be the establishment of a proper relationship between the developed and well-fed societies and those which are hungry and neglected. This relationship will have to include a collective effort by the modern, technologically efficient, developed world to help the underdeveloped world to a decent existence. That task will require the devotion of political and economic efforts far surpassing any in which we now engage.
> To provide the needed effort, the developed world will have to compose its internal differences by agreement, not by coercion, and to organize itself for the common job to be done. It seems the lesson of human history that nations will join together effectively for such great efforts only when a common danger to their security is perceived. We must do our best to prepare ourselves and our friends, and even those who think of themselves as our adversaries, for the day when they perceive the common potential danger to our security of a hungry, angry, dissatisfied, and impatient majority of mankind. We in the United States must stand ready to co-operate in all those areas in which progress towards a safe, more humane global order can be made. Our security, and the quality of life within the United States, demand it.

And so say I, sir, for Canada. We may differ in respect of how much we should spend in support of this or that form of collective security or defence arrangement generally, but we and the other developed countries of the world must do more than we are doing to ease what clearly is becoming the greatest threat to international peace and security. I suggest that there are other ways in which we must be prepared to enlarge our international precipitations and participations. For example, we all breathe the same air and, of course, quite properly have been excited from time to time about the amount of fall-out and the danger from the fall-out from nuclear explosions. But there are, of course, many other forms of pollution developing which are a menace to health and life. Pollution develops in a variety of forms, many of which may seem remote to us at the moment, but I suggest that we should be participating with other nations in areas of research in order to forecast these problems and arrive at solutions. There are many such areas, but today I am speaking about external aid.

• (3:50 p.m.)

I believe that too many of our citizens and people of the world think of external aid in terms of charity whereas actually it is a vital and increasingly important part of foreign policy. I believe that one of the most depressing developments in the world in recent years has been the downgrading of foreign aid and the failure of the western nations to assist adequately in developing plans. I think the fact that in real terms the effort in foreign aid of the western nations has declined is one of the most depressing aspects of recent years.

Viet Nam is a great tragedy and we see its wide and unfortunate repercussions. We all fervently hope for a solution and we should all work for a solution to eliminate the tragic suffering. However, I suspect that the historian writing in the year 2050 will regard the tragedy of Viet Nam as being in fact overwhelmed in importance by the tragic neglect of the underdeveloped world in our day and generation and the resulting contribution we will all have made to the forces of hunger, frustration, anger and catastrophe. I suspect that the historian of the future will note how ready we all are to protest in righteous indignation when we see some act of injustice perpetrated in another part of the world. No doubt our indignation is usually well placed and perhaps sometimes it does some good. No doubt it often makes us feel better, and it costs so little to protest in comparison with doing something effective to reduce the causes of desperation and incipient violence in the world.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say at the outset that I was very happy to hear the words of the Leader of the Opposition and the emphasis he has put on the importance of increased economic or external aid. I agree with him that we are not doing enough and I hope that his words and the views of this house will be translated into a larger and more effective system of external aid. Some of my colleagues may discuss this matter further. I wish to discuss two matters of great importance at this moment in international affairs, and I refer to the NORAD treaty and the war in Viet Nam.

To deal first with perhaps the less important of the two, the question of NORAD, the government has indicated quite clearly its intention to renew the NORAD agreement which expires in May of this year. The other day I was questioning the Secretary of State for External Affairs during a committee meeting about what commitments Canada would be involved in by reason of the renewal of the NORAD agreement. The minister suggested, I think not before the committee but in a speech he made later, that those who questioned the need for Canada to unite with the United States in a joint scheme for defence against the manned bomber were irresponsible. Without, I hope, being at all offensive to the minister I want to throw the charge of irresponsibility right back at him. I cannot imagine anything more irresponsible than the course being pursued by the minister and, the government at this present time.

The government proposes to involve the Canadian people in a continuing expenditure of approximately $140 million a year on an anti-bomber defence. I know very well that the minister says that NORAD does not involve Canada in any actual or precise commitment. This no doubt is legally correct, but this country and this house are entitled to something more than mere legal quibbling. Of course the minister knows that the renewal of the NORAD agreement involves a moral obligation to continue the present anti-bomber defence and probably a new system of anti-bomber defence which may be substituted for the present system at the instance of the United States. Yet this lame duck government proposes, without any attempt to consult parliament, to impose an onerous burden on the backs of the Canadian people. A conservative estimate of that burden is $1 billion.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I am sure my hon. friend does not wish to convey the impression that the government does not intend to put the matter before parliament. This question was asked of the Prime Minister by my hon. friend and he said that the government had to take its responsibility but that it would submit its policy to parliament, as we would always do in respect of these matters.

Mr. Winch: As a fait accompli.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, the minister will have the opportunity to answer me. I do not regard what he has said as a question. If he wishes to ask a question I would rather he do so. If he does not I hope he will make his speech later. I have only so much time to present my point.

In answer to the minister's comment let me say in all seriousness that of course the government will come to the house after the fait accompli, after the new agreement is signed, and say that they want a vote of confidence on foreign policy. Assuming that we are not prepared at that time to turn out the government, the house will be bound to accept what has been done in its name. I suggest it is irresponsible on the part of the government to commit us to this type of expenditure or treaty, binding us to a $1 billion burden in the future, without first of all fully explaining the matter to this house. The government has failed to do this.

The minister pretends it is obvious that there is a continuing threat from manned bombers; yet neither he nor any member of the government deigns to discuss whether or not there is a real threat. The former minister of national defence, now Minister of Transport, knows better. As long ago as March of 1964 the minister referred in a white paper to the diminishing threat of the manned bomber.

In 1966, less than three years ago, as I indicated to the house last week, Mr. McNamara said that our anti-bomber defence was vulnerable to missile attack, that the threat of manned bombers had never developed as anticipated and, to use Mr. McNamara's own words, "without an unattainable A.B.M. system no air defence system could provide significant damage limiting capabilities". The damage limiting capability is the only purpose there could possibly be for any air defence system. I suggest that if it is impossible to provide such a system without the installation of an A.B.M. system, which Mr. McNamara says is unattainable, what he is saying in plain English is that the system is a waste of money and cannot perform the purpose for which it is designed. If this is so, who is irresponsible, the person who questions this useless waste of money or the government which is about to saddle the Canadian people with it without even a statement to parliament or an adequate debate on the subject? The minister of course, tries to cover up the matter by misrepresenting his critics. He suggests that those who oppose this anti-bomber system are thereby opposed to any contribution to the air defence of North America or any co-operation with the United States of America. Let me ask if there is any reasonable person who is opposing any form of air defence or co-operation with the United States of America? There is, of course, no one who does so. The critics of the anti-bomber defence system do not say that Canada should not contribute to the surveillance of the air space of North America. We do not say, if there is any reason to do so, that it should not be done in co-operation with the United States.

The minister suggests that to protect Canadian sovereignty it is necessary that Canada should participate in this United States anti-bomber defence. But if there is no real bomber threat—and it is to this that I direct the attention of the minister—what has an expensive system to repel it got to do with Canadian sovereignty? The precise reverse is true. If Canada is to be a genuinely sovereign nation then she must question for herself and use her own judgment as to the utility of proposed defensive systems and she must be prepared to refuse to accept blindly the judgment of the Pentagon. This we must do if we are to have a true understanding of Canadian sovereignty and not merely accept systems of this sort at the request of others.

But the all-important issue in international affairs today is not NORAD; it is Viet Nam. I want to discuss Canada's responsibility in regard to Viet Nam. There is perhaps one aspect of this tragic situation from which we can draw some comfort. It is that television and modern means of communication have brought the horror and futility of war closer to the minds and hearts of people all over the world than ever before. All over the world today people are discussing with deep concern the war in Viet Nam. Out of this concern I believe there is growing, and it will grow especially among the younger generation, a new determination to abolish war as an institution, a new realization that in the nuclear world we must construct a world community or perish. Perhaps that is a Utopian aspiration. Let us concentrate instead on the immediate problems of the war in Viet Nam, because if we do not end that war there will not be much future for the human race to speculate about.

We have been absorbed in this house in the last few weeks in the discussion of economic and financial affairs. There are some who are bored when we insist on discussing Viet Nam. Yet today, quite apart from historical questions, quite apart from the individual agony of those who are dying, quite apart from the threat to world peace, the very financial crisis we have been discussing, which is faced by the whole western world, finds its roots in the enormous waste of resources in Viet Nam on the part of the world's wealthiest nation.

The Minister of Finance reminded us of this the other day. I say to this committee that the struggle in the jungles, swamps and mountains of that remote nation in southeast Asia is closely linked with the destiny of all of us. We in this party have therefore no apology to make for the fact that for many years we have through continuous questions and interventions in debate tried to keep to the fore what we think is Canada's responsibility in connection with the war.

This tragic, barbarous war goes on in the name of the defence of freedom of a nation from the threat of communism. The people of that nation are being destroyed by the tremendous weight of fire power. Their way of life is being corrupted and ruined. Although half a million American troops have been sent to Viet Nam, General Westmoreland is calling for another 200,000, to be matched no doubt by further escalation on the other side. The military victory promised so often by optimistic American generals and politicians is no closer. The weight of bombs dropped on Viet Nam, both North and South, exceeds the bombing of all previous wars. But it is still not enough; further escalation is advocated. Yet the U.S.S.R. and China have made it clear, however unwillingly, that they are prepared to compete in giving military aid to North Viet Nam.

For every American escalation there promises to be a counter-escalation. The situation has even gone so far that there are rumours of demands for the use of tactical nuclear weapons in Viet Nam. Such use has been described by the Prime Minister, amongst others, as madness. But who is sure that madness will not take over as the war continues and frustration grows? The Viet Nam situation poisons international relations throughout the world. Progress to a detente in Europe is suspended. I want to sum up the situation by quoting the words of a well known American historian and writer, Theodore Draper. These words come from an article in Commentary of March, 1968:

> The American war in Viet Nam—

I emphasize the words, "The American war in Viet Nam."

> —is a political debacle, a military folly and a moral disgrace. It has become a war to save American pride and prestige, not to save the Vietnamese people from communism or anything else. As long as the only thing that stands between the Vietnamese people and communism is the huge American army of occupation, the U.S. is buying time for South Viet Nam at exorbitant cost. The conditions which breed anti-Americanism are being burned into the Vietnamese consciousness more and more deeply and as matters stand now the communists will be the long term beneficiaries.

That is precisely the viewpoint that we in this party take with respect to the continuation of the war, namely, that it is aiding the cause of communism and taking away from the cause of American or western security. On November 16 the external affairs committee had before it as a witness a Buddhist monk, Mr. Thick Nhat Hanh, formerly director of the School of Youth for Social Services in Saigon, I think. He told our committee that the sheer weight of physical suffering is almost beyond comprehension and the tragedy is increased by the fact that probably well over half the casualties are civilians and children. There had been, he said, a great deal of talk about peace and negotiations for peace but there has been very little reality behind it.

[Mr. Brewin.]

We in this party have clearly and consistently stated our view that American intervention in what was essentially a civil war has been without moral or legal justification. What is more, from the beginning we have said that it was doomed to futility. We have felt that so far from stopping communism, which was its avowed aim, it has been of tremendous aid to communism. Far from adding to American security it has undermined and will continue to undermine American security. The effort by force of foreign arms to dictate the future of Viet Nam has been a mistake, indeed, a hideous and tragic mistake.

However, it may be said that there is not much to be gained by discussing the past. One's emphasis should be on ending the war. As the Secretary of State for External Affairs has stated on numerous occasions, and I heartily agree with him, there is no way to end the war except by negotiation, or possibly by the total extermination of the people of Viet Nam, although I doubt if that would really end the war. It can be ended in only one way, by negotiation.

At the federal convention of the New Democratic party held in July we made this statement:

> We join with U Thant, with world religious leaders and with leading Americans in urging the unconditional cessation of the bombing of North Viet Nam as an essential preliminary to negotiations. We urge the government in Hanoi to indicate clearly its willingness to enter into negotiations when the bombing has ceased.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Since that date the secretary general of the United Nations has sounded out opinion in many countries, and he said quite recently that, in his opinion, if the bombing were stopped North Viet Nam would enter into meaningful negotiations within two weeks. Other sources have reported the same thing from Hanoi, namely, that Hanoi is ready to negotiate if the bombing is stopped. I say that despite the many protestations of a desire to negotiate on the part of the United States administration it has not stopped the bombing of North Viet Nam, and therefore the onus for the failure to negotiate seems to us to rest directly on the United States administration.

What then can be done to change the attitude of the United States administration? Obviously the responsibility for a change rests upon the American people themselves. We can urge the Americans to put pressure on their government, and we do not think we would be appealing in vain. According to a recent Gallup poll, 49 per cent of the American people now believe that the American intervention in Viet Nam was a mistake. We, in this party salute the courageous stand of Senator McCarthy against the administration. We rejoice at the support he is getting. We acknowledge that many distinguished senators and writers in the United States have urged a change in policy. We know that the American churches have spoken out. We know that a great number of the younger generation in the United States vigorously oppose the war. We recognize the difficulty in wartime of opposing government policies, and the charges of disloyalty and lack of patriotism which result. We know that it is difficult for a great and powerful country to admit that it is wrong. To do so is to think the unthinkable, and this of course is no easy operation. But I want to say that the friends of the United States, and they include the vast majority of the Canadian people, should not be afraid to make it clear where they stand on the question of ending the war in Viet Nam.

To admit a mistake and to rectify it does not always cause a great nation to lose prestige. Algeria, as many hon. members know, was for many Frenchmen far closer to their vital interests and the essential prestige of France than Viet Nam can ever be to the United States. French lives and French treasure were spent on an effort to maintain the proposition that Algeria was an integral part of France. Yet General de Gaulle, the incarnation of French pride and French nationalism, as I think he would call himself, pulled France out of Algeria. Has the prestige of France suffered by reason of this act of belated wisdom? Is the great United States of America desirous of lagging behind General de Gaulle in statesmanship because of its national pride? I suggest that the people of the United States can and will persuade their government to change its course, and I think it is up to us, their friends, to urge them to do so.

Another thing that could be done, which has been recommended in questions put in the house by my colleague and friend the hon. member for York South, is to ask that this matter be inscribed on the agenda of the security council. It is true, of course, that the security council perhaps cannot take action. It is true that North Viet Nam is not a member of the United Nations and does not acknowledge it jurisdiction. But the security council is charged with the responsibility of maintaining the peace of the world. At this crucial moment of threatened escalation, the security council could be the voice of the world's morality, if not legal authority, and we urge that this matter be brought forward for immediate discussion there.

We realize that dissent, however mildly or vigorously expressed, is not enough. It is not enough for us to recommend action to others, and Canada, despite the mild dissent expressed recently in government pronouncements on the subject of Viet Nam, is itself implicated in the conflict. It is implicated by the growing sales of war materials under the defence production sharing agreement. Canada is profiting from the war and compromising her neutrality. Under the defence production sharing agreement no control by means of export permits is exercised in respect of the use or dissemination of Canadian war materials. There is not the slightest doubt that much of the war material exported without control and without any attempt to impose control is finding its way into the hands of one side in the fighting in Viet Nam.

The original defence production sharing agreement was undoubtedly partly for Canada's benefit. It was a natural agreement to make with a close ally. But Canada is not and cannot be the ally of the United States in Viet Nam, and I suggest we must retake control over our exports of war materials. There is only one way to do it and that is by abrogating the defence production sharing agreement.

Some people will say that this is no more than a gesture and will in no way slow down or affect United States operations in Viet Nam. This may be true, but I think it would be an extremely important gesture. It would at least make clear to the United States government and people that Canada is prepared to do something to indicate that she is not an ally in the disastrous involvement of the United States in Viet Nam. I have no doubt it would cause a lot of hard feeling in administration circles but I believe that in the long run it would earn the respect of the American people.

If this is not enough we must look further. We in Canada control certain strategic materials. If the war continues we can and should impose selective embargoes on such materials going into a war which we cannot approve. It may be said that such an action would be unprecedented treatment of an ally. This is not so. Canada has already limited the export of strategic materials to Portugal, one of our NATO allies, on the ground that these materials might be used in colonial wars in Africa rather than for NATO purposes. Someone might say that the United States is not Portugal, and I agree, but it was only the other day that the Prime Minister, in referring to Gabon and France, said that the Canadian government does not distinguish between large and small nations in such matters. I suggest that we may well have the obligation to show what we believe and to act in accordance with the principles we have enunciated with regard to Viet Nam by taking the steps I suggest.

To sum up I wish to quote the words of a recent resolution passed by the federal council of my party because I think they represent the view which we want to put before the Canadian people. It reads as follows:

> Canada should not be an accomplice in an undeclared war that is destroying a people, endangering the peace of the world, poisoning international relations, and is against the interests not only of Viet Nam and Asia but of the United States and of the whole world.

We make this pronouncement as the firmest friends of the United States because we believe that it is in their interests, in our interests and in the world's interests that they stop the bombing, get on with the negotiations and put an end to this disastrous war.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I realize that we are dealing with the year-end estimates and while we are grateful for this opportunity to speak on external affairs, this is not the time for a prolonged debate. I had intended to be brief but in view of some of the remarks which have just been made by the hon. member for Greenwood I think it is necessary that I add a few remarks regarding Viet Nam at least to balance the record. As a matter of fact, I was quite amused as I listened to the hon. member's passionate appeal on behalf of Viet Nam, but I respect his sincerity. However, I fail to understand how he could overlook certain facts which are completely at odds with the argument he has advanced. I remind him that it was not the United States that started the Viet Nam war any more than it was the United States that started the Korean war.

• (4:20 p.m.)

When we look at the facts we must look at them for all sides. There is no one in this house who does not want peace. There is no nation in the world, except probably some communist nations which are making use of strategic revolutionary wars such as the one in Viet Nam, that does not want peace. But we will never have peace in the world by blithely following along with what seems to be the strategy of communist nations in abetting revolutionary wars in order to further their own aims. They seek to replace what they call the imperialistic, colonial western world.

It is interesting to note that the Prime Minister of Great Britain, who more or less follows the same ideological philosophy as the New Democratic party, has repeatedly taken a stand with the United States in its policy of containment so far as the communists are concerned in southeast Asia. Even the former foreign minister of Great Britain, who resigned the other day not over a difference in foreign policy but because he had not been consulted by the prime minister on financial policy, took the same general stand when he had responsibility in this field. I was interested also in reading the other day that Mr. Edward Heath, the leader of the Conservative party, had sounded a warning to the free world during a speech in parliament. He said that if the United States should now pull out of Viet Nam the immediate consequence would be increased Russian pressure on the Middle East and Berlin. In addition, he said that a defeat or a withdrawal from Viet Nam would weaken American morale and cause political pressures toward a withdrawal from world responsibility, bringing serious repercussions in regard to the United States role in Europe. He went on to say:

> If the United States will were to break, the impact on South Viet Nam of even further slaughter would be obvious, but the impact on southeast Asia would be just as wide.

It is interesting in this regard to note that nothing is said by the New Democratic party about the tens of thousands who lost their lives in the recent New Year's offensive by North Viet Nam. This occurred at a time when the people in the towns and cities thought they were celebrating the New Year's truce. People were literally slaughtered wholesale, but nothing is said about that. Mr. Heath went on to say:

> This is where the question comes back to our door-step . . . This is the importance of what is happening out in the Far East, not only to those likely to be affected but to this country.

There are many responsible people in the world who realize that the situation in Viet Nam is a very complicated one. I would be the first to agree that we cannot go on as we are going now. As soon as possible a means must be found to stop the warfare there. But I say also that the war will never be solved simply by the withdrawal of the United States and permitting communist North Viet Nam to take over the 14 million people in South Viet Nam without any regard for their sovereignty.

It is very interesting also that as a result of the recent offensive in Viet Nam the communist movement in southeast Asia has really overstepped itself. The domino theory is working but it is working in reverse. The national leaders of countries fronting on communist China are now recognizing, if they did not recognize it before, that it is not American imperialism but communist aggression that they face in Viet Nam. Viet Nam is simply the theatre of conflict between the two world forces of communism and democracy. They are locked together in a life and death struggle.

I had occasion last year to visit most of the countries fronting on communist China. I talked to the heads of government and various officials. In no case, all the way from Japan to Malaysia, did I find any government leader expressing the belief that the problem would be solved by the United States pulling out of South Viet Nam. In fact, when Britain decided to remove her own forces from southeast Asia we saw how rapidly some of the leaders of these southeast Asian countries asked Great Britain not to move out because she would be leaving a vacuum there that could not easily be filled. I am thinking particularly of the prime minister of Singapore who, as the leader of that strategic area, understands communist policies in that part of the world. These countries will be influenced by recent communist activities in northern Laos, in Thailand and even in little Cambodia. They realize that what the hon. member for Greenwood would describe as United States aggression in South Viet Nam is in reality communist aggression which is evidencing itself in those countries as well.

Consequently, Mr. Chairman, these countries recognize that freedom is at stake not only for the 14 million people of South Viet Nam but also for the 250 million people in the countries along the rim of China. They do not want communism but they do not have the resources to defend themselves against it. The most immoral thing the allied nations could do in the light of the developments in Asia today would be to abandon these people, thus rewarding communist aggression by sacrificing the freedom of these people. So, Mr. Chairman, as I say there are two sides to this question. While we want peace, and we in Canada must use the peculiar position we hold in the world to work for peace, we cannot believe we will ever gain peace by compromising the rights of individuals and our respect for autonomous nations. All these things should be guaranteed to such nations, no matter how small or how strong they may be.

Leaving that subject, Mr. Chairman, I must say how pleased I was to hear the remarks made by the leader of the official opposition this afternoon in expressing the policy of his party with regard to foreign aid. I believe this is a very vital subject. Our aid could be of a very unique type. While we can learn from the mistakes that have been committed by wealthier countries, we are not yet carrying our full responsibility in regard to the underdeveloped countries.

We have heard it said many times in recent months that the greatest problem in this country is unity. I should like to say a few words to those people who believe that national unity is our major problem at this criticial point in our history. I am convinced that we will find the problem of unity far less acute if we face up to the challenge to Canada to play her true part in the world family of nations. We are a nation such as every ex-colony would want to be. We have inherited stable and sometimes respected but sometimes not so respected institutions. But at least we certainly have greater stability of government than most nations in the world. Our people have the education and skills that make the difference between poverty and wealth in the industrialized world of today. One third of the world's people faces starvation and famine and another third is undernourished but we in Canada have abundance. Our problem is not how to produce wealth but how to bring it to those in our own land and elsewhere who are in need of it

Our nation is living proof that people do not have to accept a police state in order to have enough to eat. It is living proof that personal freedom and private initiative can deliver the goods while the best laid five-year plans of other nations end in failure. Across the world the people of the underdeveloped nations, the former colonies, can see in our nation how development can take place under freedom. We in Canada have a responsibility to make known to these people on the practical level the secrets of our success. It is up to us to demonstrate with action, not just with words, that our way of life, our dedication to service, which have been the means of providing us with so much, will also do likewise for them.

What we teach and demonstrate abroad, Mr. Chairman, we must substantiate at home. I do not think it is too ideal an objective when I say I believe Canada can lead the world in recovering a sense of unity among peoples. However, such unity will only be recovered by the rediscovery of conscience and an awareness of our own responsibility to each other. Canadians as a people must come to realize the changing character of the world and must help their country to play a leading role in resolving some of the great questions facing the future of man. Only if the individual citizen is concerned and involved with the problems of the world will his nation do anything of significance. Therefore every citizen has an obligation to inform himself about the world and, in one way or another, become involved in it. I hope that the Secretary of State for External Affairs, despite his activities in his party's leadership contest, will not cease to give attention to this very important aspect of not only developing a stronger aid program but of making Canadians themselves aware of their responsibilities in this field.

I should like to remind the members of this committee of a statement made by our own director of external aid not too long ago. Just before the close of centennial year he said:

> As we near the beginning of our second century as a nation, we are struggling to find a sense of purpose to unite us. It is not in economic terms that we justify our nationhood ... I believe that, by focusing the interest of Canadians in every walk of life and mobilizing the resources they represent to expand Canada's participation in the processes of international development, a new dynamic dimension can be brought into play in Canadian life.

I support that statement, Mr. Chairman. I think it is a very succinct definition of our responsibility at this time. Therefore I repeat that I appreciated the words of the Leader of the Official Opposition this afternoon as he expressed himself on this important topic.

I had not intended to deal at length with foreign policy but there are a couple of matters I should like to put before the minister in connection with Africa. You will forgive me, Mr. Chairman, for speaking about Africa but Africa claims the biggest part of my adult life. I am concerned about some of the things happening there and I do not believe that the people of Canada or the members of this house are fully aware of them.

We talk about the suffering in Viet Nam and the loss of life as the result of the terrible war being carried on there. But little do we realize that probably twice as many people during the last year alone lost their lives in the little secessionist country of Biafra. The other day we heard the very able testimony given by Dr. Johnson of the Presbyterian church when he outlined his experiences both in Biafra and Nigeria, having met officials in both areas. No news is given to the outside world about what is happening there but I would say that the horror and suffering taking place there at the present time are far worse than in Viet Nam. That does not mean that I condone the horror and suffering in Viet Nam. I just want to emphasize that in Nigeria we had a situation that we all felt was ideal. We felt it was the one place in colonial Africa where we could expect democracy to take firm root. However, the country has now been torn in half as the result of several military coups and a wholesale massacre by evil people.

Last year, several million people fled Nigeria and returned to their native land in eastern Nigeria. However, they have now found themselves locked in terrible slaughter without even the benefit of any kind of medical services, sanitation or help from the outside world. Surely something can be done about this situation. It is not good enough to dismiss it as an internal matter in Nigeria. It is not good enough to say that the United Nations has no responsibility in this situation. Are we going to see genocide on a scale not seen since world war II committed before the eyes of the world, with nobody saying or doing anything about it?

We are rightly proud of our own Arnold Smith who is secretary general of the Commonwealth Association. He is endeavouring to do something in this regard. However, it seems to me that Canada ought to be moving directly into this situation. We should use the confidence and good will that we have in Nigeria and among many of those on the Biafran side of the border in order to see whether some compromise, some arrangement or negotiation can be worked out. As Dr. Johnson told the external affairs committee the other day, having talked to leaders on both sides, these two peoples are fighting a war that neither wants and which they hope can be solved between themselves. Yet the war continues from week to week and from month to month.

There is one other area in Africa to which I should like to draw the attention of the committee, an area where likewise there have been wholesale murders during the last few years and nothing much has been said about them in the press. In fact, I do not think any mention of this situation has been made in this chamber. I speak of the Sudan. Southern Sudan, better known as Upper Sudan because it is nearer the head waters of the Nile, is inhabited by negroid people who through the centuries and particularly in recent years have not had the opportunities of those who live in Lower Sudan. They have suffered discrimination and persecution by the Arabs who, basically, control the government in Lower Sudan.

While we cannot estimate the numbers of people who have lost their lives in this country during the last two or three years, the number must run into the tens of thousands. I know that country well. I also knew many of the people who have lost their lives. I know the circumstances in which they lived and am aware of some of the terrible situations that have been permitted to develop as one group of people has tried to force its wishes upon another group less equipped and able to defend themselves. I say that the United Nations, the "have" nations of the world, cannot be excused, before the judgment seat of the Almighty, their disinterest and apparent complete lack of concern about what has taken place and is continuing to take place in the Sudan.

There is one other question with respect to Africa on which I want to touch. While the particular area concerned is not at the present time involved in what might be described as warfare, as a result of the Arab-Israeli conflict and the Russian policy of domination of the Mediterranean sufficient arms and military equipment, sophisticated to the nth degree and all basic tools of war, have been moved into Algeria to equip every nation on the continent of Africa with a reasonable size defence force. So sophisticated is some of the equipment which has been shipped there in recent months that it is impossible to believe Algerians are capable of operating it. This means that Russian technicians are in the country, even as they are in Egypt. We may even assume that the losses of military supplies and equipment incurred by Egypt in the five-day war with Israel a year ago have already been replaced.

What will happen if this kind of thing continues? How can we expect to maintain world peace if the tools of war are being assembled as they are in Algeria at the present time? There can be no doubt that the Russians are doing this intending to use the brute force of military strength to accomplish their aims in Africa and in the Mediterranean area. One can also assume, I believe, that their intentions go much farther, because the kind of concentration of military force I have described cannot be justified on any other hypothesis.

Yet we do nothing about all this. We talk about Viet Nam and decry United States policy. We blame the United States for everything that has gone wrong in the world today. The truth of the matter is that but for the United States and its actions some of us here would not have the privilege of standing up today to speak in perfect freedom as we are accustomed to do in Canada. As we look at the world today and search our consciences in the quest for peace we ought rather to be concerned about the policies of certain nations which would pose as our friends but which at the same time are seeking to destroy the way of life all of us hold dear and which Canada, as the hope, I believe, of every free nation in the world, must always strive to preserve.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to express a few of my own views on this important area of our responsibility and in doing so I should like to say that anything I say is certainly only an expression of my personal views; I hope they are shared by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the administration, but I do not know. I certainly intend to express only what are my own views.

Perhaps I am being a little nostalgic when I remind members of the house of the year 1941. I remember the feeling of so many Canadians in the 1st division in 1940 and 1941 when many of the wise people of the world seemed to feel that the British were, after all, rather foolish in their objection to the mighty power which confronted them and that perhaps the proper thing to do was to accept the presence in Europe of a great military force which was bound to prevail. At that time there was a very lonely feeling on the part of those who were in uniform in the United Kingdom, along with the gallant civilians who perhaps contributed more to victory in the long run than the soldiers ever did.

Perhaps the most encouraging thing for us in those dark and terrible days was that a young, intelligent, idealistic American by the name of Lyndon Baines Johnson from Texas stood up on two or three occasions and told the people of the United States that there was a conflict of far reaching proportions which could not be avoided. He made a dramatic speech approximately eight months before Pearl Harbour; it was not very popular in Texas, as was indicated by his political defeat.

In the course of his public career Lyndon Baines Johnson had served in the defence area. He had studied defence and, in particular, he had studied problems relating to American naval responsibility. In 1939 there was a very strong group of isolationists in the United States. They were honest but, in my opinion, deluded peace seekers who were urging the Roosevelt administration to cut down sharply its responsibilities in the Pacific. And Lyndon Johnson, coming from this rather isolationist part of the United States, helped lead the fight in the house against this profoundly shortsighted proposal. In 1941 he stood out as one of the great people who defended the lend-lease program, described by Winston Churchill as the most unsordid act of high policy in human history. I remember it was Johnson who identified himself with us at a time when we believed we were contributing something for mankind. I do not think there were many Canadians who really thought they were serving a Canadian interest or a British interest or a western interest; they really believed that the military solution was one which could not be avoided. President Johnson, when I saw him a few days ago in Washington, looked whiter than he did when we met him at Great Falls, Montana for the ceremonial opening of the Columbia dam project, but it appears to me that this man has played the part of a real man in world history and that he will go down as a great big man, the kind of man Texas might be expected to produce.

[Mr. Matheson.]

I spent some time months ago comparing the contribution, year by year, in public affairs of two personalities, Ho Chi Minh and Lyndon Baines Johnson. What a contrast there is between these two persons. I do not have the material with me on Ho—that, of course, is not his real name; he is of Chinese origin and his real name, I believe, is Al-Quoc. He was very active in Paris with the radical socialist party. He went to the U.S.S.R. in 1924 and became active there. He took part in the Chinese revolution of 1925-27. In 1927 he went to Siam, and I have talked to people in Bangkok who well remember his revolutionary activities there. He was imprisoned for his conduct in Hong Kong in 1931 and there are not many people in the east who forget what he stood for then. I think it is fair to say that this man has raised hell wherever he has gone over his rather long lifetime. I think his influence has been destructive.

I have read a great deal of the thoughts of Chairman Mao. I have read most of the extended five volume series. And it seems to me that Ho Chi Minh represents a practical, modern exponent of the revolutionary thoughts of Chairman Mao and his military lieutenant Lin Piao. Many of the essentially destructive and hurtful ideas of Mao are applied by Ho directly from the works of the Chinese leader. My view is that Chairman Mao is dated inasmuch as Marxian clichés are no longer relevant or applicable to the modern world.

I am glad the Leader of the Opposition prefaced his remarks by dilating for a few minutes on the important question of external aid. This is an area in which we in the west can even now claim some measure of success. What country has more to its credit than the United States? I would commend hon. members to look at the March 11 issue of the United States News and World Report where they will find an article headed: "Amazing Success Story In Asia". What do we find in Asia? Part of the story reads:

• (4:50 p.m.)

You see growing prosperity. Political stability is the rule, not the exception. You see new cities on what used to be swampland. You see Asians who are bigger and better-dressed.

Many of them were discouraged 15 years ago. They had very little hope. Now the trend is assuredly against the communists and not with them as it used to be. Fifteen years ago the communists were flushed with victories at home. They were on the march in Korea. Britain was fighting communist guerrillas in Malaysia.

I well remember going with a senior official of the government at Kuala Lumpur to look at the thousands and thousands of names that appeared on the memorials to the dead, the names of the Malaysians who gave their lives, and of the Indians and the British. It was a very sad sight. This was the result of 12 years of communist aggression, exactly what is now going on as a consequence of the invasion by North Viet Nam into the south. This is exactly the same pattern.

I am very glad that recently an hon. member referred to Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew. He is a youngish man. If anything, I suppose it could be said that he is of the "new wave." If anything he could be characterized as of the left. He is a man who was superbly educated in Britain but he is a man who knows Asia and knows it with the eyes and the ears of a person who is of Chinese origin. Lee Kuan Yew is not under any misapprehension as to what is going on. I quote from a report in the London Sunday Times of January 21 of this year:

> Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew of Singapore, the leading Asian socialist, the ablest of the Southeast Asian leaders, and certainly no American puppet, has said that the U.S. action in Viet Nam "gave the other Asians the chance" to stand on their own feet and to find their own way. He came to Washington just the other day, primarily because he had wrongly begun to fear that the U.S. would lose heart and patience before finishing the job.

The writer of this newspaper report said:

> I talked with him at some length, and he made no bones about his conviction that the U.S. intervention in Viet Nam had been the crucial factor which caused the Asian bandwagon to switch course, ending a long movement towards irrationality and dogmatism, and beginning a new movement towards rationality and practical progress.

Can anyone go to Jakarta today and talk with any of those people who suffered under 22 years of Sukarno without discovering that they know that Asia has at last got a chance to catch its breath? What has it done with its new chance? We find that all parts of Asia outside the communist held countries have shown fantastic economic expansion. The most dramatic example of all is Japan but other examples are the Philippines, Taiwan and South Korea, and at last we see movements of great encouragement in Cambodia.

Recently I was looking at the Sanwa bank report showing what Japan has been able to do. This is the country that was defeated by the big, cruel, imperialist United States which then assisted Japan and put it on its feet. The Japanese people have always tended to be left wing in their views. Virtually all the editors of Japanese newspapers are left wing, but they knew that more dangerous than the alleged "black mist", referred to in their last general election, was the "red mist," and so unequivocally they have thrown their lot in with the west. I quote from the Sanwa bank report:

> Japan continued to lead the world between 1961 and 1965 with a growth rate of 14.8 per cent.

In shipbuilding she is now first in the world and in fibres she is second in the world. In oil refining she is second in the world and in the production of power she is third in the world. In crude steel she is third in world production, and in gross national product these poor island people, who were defeated just a few years ago by the big, bad, ruthless Americans, through the assistance of their one-time enemies, the Americans, are now fifth in the world and sixth in volume of exports.

As a result what do we find? We find that the Japanese are grateful and they realize that international economic co-operation means something important. They have contributed to the new Asian Development Bank, matching dollar for dollar with the Americans. This was a hard thing for the Japanese to do, starting with the low base that they had after the war. But as a result what do we find? We find growth in virtually every free part of Asia. The new Asian Development Bank in Manila is headed by a Japanese, and we find plans for railroads, air and sea transport, radio and other communications. Countries that are to get these new links are the Philippines, Indonesia, South Viet Nam, Thailand, Laos, India and Afghanistan. This is the real way to help Asia, to work with the Asians. I believe that Lyndon Johnson, in the courageous and very difficult course he is pursuing, is making that kind of generous contribution.

The London Economist has never been a particularly right wing paper but recently it made an in-depth study of Viet Nam and why it matters, a study which has just been published. It talks about the basic issue, the question of whether or not the truth lies in American aggression or invasion from the north. On balance it says that the truth lies between these two extreme positions but probably a good deal nearer the American standpoint. It adds that the Hanoi government has sent large contingents of troops, sometimes in trickles, sometimes in solid formation, into South Viet Nam giving the whole conflict the character of invasion.

I remember approximately a year ago listening to Arthur Goldberg in Tokyo when he met with a large battery of international news correspondents who questioned him for two hours. If ever a man held open his arms to any possibility for peace it was Mr. Goldberg on that occasion. However, we do not hear about that from members in some parts of this chamber. Surely what matters is not alone the future of Viet Nam, important as this may be, but the future of all southeast Asia. But of course the future of South Viet Nam and of North Viet Nam is vitally important on its own account.

Ho Chi Minh almost paraphrases Mao Tse Tung in some of his chapters on mobile war and protracted war. When he wrote that "Americans do not like long, inconclusive wars and the war in Viet Nam is going to be a long, inconclusive war," I think Ho Chi Minh was wrong. I think that really he is now losing this war. I think that the 20,000 American dead and the gallant dead from South Viet Nam—and everyone knows it has been hard for those people to continue the struggle—are going to give peace and stability in our time, and perhaps before too long.

It would have been so easy to call it quits in Korea. Does anyone deny today that the defence of Korea was not wise from the standpoint of Asia? I believe Korea was strategically important for a wide variety of reasons.

We know there is a strong feeling in this country that if only we could get rid of this dreadful war everything would work out all right. In fact many people urge that the Americans should just plain get out. Does that make sense? I am looking at a news item appearing in the Brockville Recorder and Times, the issue of March 18, 1967, just a year ago, headed "Mao in Control At Gunpoint?" It was a story that came from Hong Kong and it reads:

> Mainland broadcasts claimed today the Communist Chinese army has taken over farms and factories in three more southeastern provinces. If true, it means that Mao Tse-tung has established control of production at gunpoint over a vast area of southern China ... the 2,500,000 man army had become the principal instrument of the communist party chairman's "great proletarian cultural revolution," a purge of so-called reactionary elements in Chinese life.
> It meant, too, that the army was achieving at least some success through force where Mao's militant civilian Red Guards and revolutionary rebels had failed, through political agitation, propagandizing and appeals to win popular support for the purge.

I had a chance to talk to the first Red Guard known to have gotten out, and quite frankly I believe that Chairman Mao has failed in a great many respects.

• (5:00 p.m.)

What is our attitude in respect to this quarter of the human race? I think it must be one of friendship but at the same time it must be based on realism and facing the real facts. According to people who have studied this area for many years, one of the most significant developments is the deterioration of relations between Russia and China. Surely our attitude is not one of hostility to either of these communist powers. As Canadians we desire full co-operation with both. From a study of some of the economic reports which have come from Singapore and Hong Kong I have come to the view that perhaps one of Canada's major responsibilities in the not too distant future will be to help in respect of the starvation problem which will be manifest on the continent of China. I have in my hand a detailed agricultural study by an eminent economist who writes:

> Why has China failed to keep pace in grain with increase in population? The answer is that grain production is much less profitable to the peasant than are cash crops. In the wake of the collapse of the great leap forward in 1960 there were urgent appeals by the government for the peasants, particularly those near big cities, to produce vegetables, pork, poultry, etc. The response to this was staggering. By 1966 you had reached a situation where in the land adjacent to the bigger towns (which also happens to be the richest and best agricultural land in China) all the resources, the fertilizer, the irrigation and the love, care and attention of the peasants both communally and privately, is devoted to cash crops.

There could, of course, be seven or eight crops of vegetables in a year. Grain deteriorated in volume. Actually it may now be argued that Mao has failed very seriously since 1957 in respect of what he regarded as the most important agricultural objective, the production of grain.

We have an important responsibility in foreign aid and I am happy that a great Canadian like Maurice Strong, a man with exceptional gifts, has come into this service at great financial sacrifice to himself and his family. He will help do those things which must in charity be done for all the countries of the world irrespective of their political complexion.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): An outstanding man.

Mr. Matheson: As the minister points out, he is an outstanding man. He is one of the great men of our time. I was glad to hear the Leader of the Opposition indicate that we should step up the volume of our aid. I believe everyone realizes that the government has been faced with the problem of matching income to expenditure. However, it is good at this time to have a person in the prominent position of the Leader of the Opposition come forward and take the position he has taken today in respect of foreign aid. This to me is statesmanship. I know his suggestion is supported by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and I know how fully it is supported by the Prime Minister.

The studies which have been undertaken in the last few years with regard to the problems of Russia and China lead us to believe there is not complete peace and understanding in the Communist camp. The recent conference at Budapest indicated that many people of socialist inclination do not think entirely alike. It has been pointed out that one of the most articulate supporters of the United States position at this time is Prime Minister Harold Wilson of the socialist party in the United Kingdom. Facts are facts and there are certain indisputable facts which cannot be avoided. While we may have certain differences of opinion with regard to the tactics employed by the United States I do not think we can question that their contribution in the main has aided mightily to the stability of Asia. Arthur Schlesinger, who is scarcely considered to be right wing, said:

> I am opposed to an immediate American withdrawal (a) because it would end all possibility of a negotiated settlement, (b) because it would deliver the people of Vietnam to the Vietcong, who would undoubtedly jail and murder a good many, especially among the students and intellectuals, and condemn the rest to a bleak Communist despotism, (c) because of the effect it would have in neighboring countries, especially on the gallant struggle of the Laotian neutralists under Prince Souvanna Phouma to maintain their independence. Also I find something distasteful about those sitting in ease in Europe and America, who would righteously hand over a country to a tough Communist crew on the ground, evidently, that, though they wouldn't much like communism for themselves, it will be just great for the Vietnamese.

We are not thinking alone of Viet Nam but of Asia in which there resides two-thirds of the human race.

James A. Michener spent many years in southeast Asia. He lived in Viet Nam and several surrounding countries. He is intimately knowledgeable with regard to areas such as Korea and the Philippines. He lived in Thailand, Indonesia, Burma, Pakistan and Ceylon. He writes:

> —I am driven by experience of the past and concern for the future to support my government's stand in Vietnam.
> I believe that our stand in Korea some years ago helped to stabilize that part of the world. The agreement there reached was not a particularly good one, but it has worked. It has saved Japan, established a border zone that could be more or less controlled, and relieved international tensions that might otherwise have expanded into a world war. In Korea the United States learned it could of itself oppose both Russia and China, and that was a salutary discovery. But Russia and China also learned that they could not operate with impunity against world opinion. What may have been most important, Russia and China had a chance to see and to evaluate each other. On balance, I am not unhappy about our intervention in Korea.

He analyses the situation at the present time in Viet Nam in similar terms.

Eric Linklater said:

> In the summer of 1951 I was in Korea. The beginning of that war had been the sudden invasion of South Korea by the Communist North and the almost simultaneous announcement, by the North, that its action had been necessary to counter aggression from the South. The small expeditionary force that Britain was able to send in defence of the South consisted, at first, of a battalion of the Middlesex Regiment, another of the Argylls. I had talked with their survivors, whose memories of the war were dominated by the appalling misery of the refugees who had fled from the North.
> The North pretended to be the aggrieved and virtuous party—

This is what we have been hearing from many sources with respect to Viet Nam and from some Canadians ad nauseam for several years.

> —but a multitude of starving, half-frozen refugees chose to escape from its virtue. There were no fugitives to the North.
> Today, in Vietnam, there is a comparable situation. The Communists were the original aggressors, and there has been strenuous propaganda to persuade the world that blame lies on the United States. In South Vietnam there are, perhaps, a million refugees from North Vietnam. The refugee tide, that is, has run in the same direction as in Korea—

I might add also in the same general direction, east to west in Berlin, and from mainland China to Hong Kong.

• (5:10 p.m.)

It is not unreasonable to suppose that there, as in Korea, the refugees know more about Asian communism, its aims and methods, than many well-intentioned people whose opinions are so deeply influenced by their detestation of war as to blind them to its causes.

I think we have people in this house who wish to be blinded. Jakov Lind made a very interesting suggestion when he said:

Why not try a shrewd solution to combat Communists in Asia? Help them to get to power; sooner or later they will all turn revisionist.

Recent developments in Europe would tend to make this sly suggestion almost reasonable. I think we should respect the writings in the books and articles by Mao Tse-Tung and Ho Chi Minh. There are two books of Ho to be found in our parliamentary library. His diary from prison is a very interesting document as are his published speeches which cover the period up to 1966: One can easily find a statement of purpose in the studies of Mao, some of which have even alarmed and frightened the Russians because they do not express their feelings about the desired course of human progress.

It seems to me that we lack in responsibility when we criticize those who have enabled us all to come safely through a very difficult period. One of the reasons advanced by Eliott Janeway for this assault on the dollar was the overextension of America both in terms of military and economic aid to other countries. I think it ill behooves Canadians at this time to make smart cracks at our American friends. I want to say how immensely grateful I am that we have at the present time, presiding over the affairs of our great neighbour, a man who always has stood for truth, vigorously, and fearlessly, whether popular or otherwise. The big Texan stands out as a very big man in a troubled world.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, it has been a while since I said anything about foreign affairs but I must say I am prompted to do so at this time after listening to the spiel I have just heard from the hon. member for Leeds, who can speak more pompously, utter more words and mean less than any other member in the house. He is in my opinion very able in saying those things which do not help us a bit when discussing international affairs.

I can never understand why people who profess to be anxious to defeat communism get up in this house and use the fact that communism is bad as a defence for some of the very stupid actions that we in the western world have taken. I do not think anybody in this house has to be persuaded that communism has its faults. I do not think anyone in this house, no matter how they approach the problem, is not anxious to make sure that our democratic system is extended to all new emerging countries and to make sure that it is improved to the advantage of the people of other countries in the world. I do not think there is any real point in the sort of diatribe engaged in by the hon. member who tried to convince us how bad communism is and therefore how right we are. This is nonsense.

Communism has its faults and we have ours. We are not going to correct our faults by pointing up the faults of the communists and then saying that because they are so bad we must not be so bad. Frankly, the United States position in respect of Viet Nam is dreadful. I first said in this house on September 8, 1961, and I have not changed my view since then, that the best friends the communists have in the world are those who make speeches like that of the hon. member for Leeds. I refer to those who rant and rave about the faults of communism instead of suggesting how to correct our own mistakes and how we can best help those people about whom we profess to be concerned. We should adopt a policy that is pro-democracy rather than one that is anti-communism. Those who believe in a policy of anti-communism seem to think that this is the only thing wrong in the world and that anything goes as long as we are fighting communism. Quite frankly, I thought there were other enemies in the world during the last war—the Nazis.

A number of other systems which are not communism or democracy exist in the world today including dictatorships and some that are anti-democratic. Are we to believe from this hot-headed attack against communism that these systems are more acceptable and that all we have to do is drive out communism in order that one of these other systems may take over, thereby improving the lot of these people? This is the suggestion made by those who are anti-communism, but I suggest it is not realistic.

Our objective should be the development of a policy in this country and in the United States, our great friend and ally, which is pro-democratic. This should be our aim and our hope, as well as the reason we spend money on foreign aid in an effort to do our best to assist other countries in obtaining those benefits that we enjoy. We should try to bring to these countries the best parts of our system in so far as they will fit the needs of these countries, in the hope that this will be of benefit to them.

Surely none of us in this house wants to ram anything down the throats of anyone. Surely that is what the hon. member for Leeds is attempting to do in respect of the United States policy in Viet Nam when he suggests that communism is so bad the actions of a democracy must be all right. I do not care whether you kill someone in the name of anti-communism, in the name of crime or in the name of passion, it is still murder. As law-abiding citizens the people who live under a democracy which is founded on idealism must take a very long and careful look at the violence that the United States is perpetrating on South Viet Nam in the pursuance of its policies or the lack thereof. No matter how blind we may be or how unwilling we are to criticize our friend and neighbour, I think a careful consideration of the situation will indicate that the United States is wrong.

Let me hasten to add that no nation in the history of the world has had more concern for its fellow man than the United States. The record of that country's contributions to international aid in an attempt to help underdeveloped countries and its contributions toward peace-keeping and in other directions cannot be criticized. The United States has opened its pocketbook in its endeavour to do the right thing. I am not questioning its motives. But no matter how great and wonderful its actions have been in this regard I must say that in my opinion it is wrong in respect of its policies in Viet Nam. No matter how well meaning or how good the intentions of that country are, its policies are dreadfully wrong. No matter how sincerely the United States may believe it is right in trying to contain communism and no matter how much that country believes in its own anti-communist policies, an action is not necessarily right because it is anti-communist. The idea that anything goes if it is anti-communism will defeat the ultimate purpose. As a result of that policy there is no reform possible for new or emerging countries and they will be forced to turn to communism as the only alternative. Communism is not the only alternative. Reform is the only alternative and I think it is an alternative these countries are entitled to and should have.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Certainly the Americans did not go into Viet Nam to save the South Vietnamese from an invasion by North Viet Nam. One has only to read the American explanation of their own actions to understand this. Reading in American newspapers what the American foreign office has said one finds that over the course of two years they sent military advisers to Viet Nam to help the neutralists make sure the situation would be stabilized so that elections could be held and the people could determine their own type of government. I think most members of the house would say this is a very laudable and worth-while objective. No one will argue with the idea of trying to bring about peace and stability so that people can choose the type of government they want.

I want to stress that the right to choose the type of government they want is the objective. We have subscribed to this objective in the United Nations charter. It is not a case of choosing the type of government we think they should have, that we want them to have, that is acceptable to us or even that we think is best for them. They have a perfect right to choose the type of government they want even if we think it is silly and even if it is so silly as communism. That is their right and we have subscribed to the idea that they have the right to choose the type of government they want, not that we want.

So here we have the Americans expressing this idea and providing military advisers to the neutralists to stabilize the situation so that elections could be held and the people could choose the type of government they wanted. We say that is a fine, great and wonderful idea. But did you happen to read the news a couple of years later when Buddhists and Catholics were rioting and people were burning themselves in protest that there had not been any elections because the Americans had prevented them? The situation was not stable enough and the American puppet, Premier Ky, said: We will not have elections now because the only result would be that the Viet Cong would win, or the neutralists would win and neither one is acceptable to us. The Americans backed him up.

I want to know what is the American policy. We have heard the puppet premier of South Viet Nam, backed by American power and kept in power by American arms, saying that the neutralists would not be acceptable. The Americans have said they went in to stabilize the situation, to advise the neutralists so that elections could be held and these people could choose the type of government they wanted. The actual fact is that those elections have not been held, that in fact the objective is to make sure they do not have freedom of choice. The objective is that they will have the anti-communist government that the Americans insist upon because apparently this is the only way we can stop the tide of communism from taking over all of the Far East. What nonsense.

I do not know where the silly idea started that communism is like a battlefront with the battle lines drawn and a line marking the danger area wherein communism must be contained. I always thought communism was a sort of insidious thing that creeps into a country and feeds on the false and the corrupt. I have always thought communism did not need any help from outside, that it fattens on the stupidity, arrogance, cruelty and incompetence of governments. It is the sort of thing that is fed and fattened by our failure to have faith in our democratic system, by our own failure to really use and practise those ideals on which our democratic system is based.

Communism can creep into any country where democracy is based on sham and hypocrisy, where we say we have respect for the people's right of self-determination but what we mean is that they will have self-determination as long as they do what we say. Communism can creep into any country where we say we have faith in a system of justice which eschews justice and where we resort to force to enforce our will. This is the stuff on which communism feeds.

I do not know where this so-called battlefront is and just why a neighbour of a communist country must of necessity be in greater danger of communism than any other country. Every country is in danger of communism; it does not matter whether its next door neighbour is communist or whether communism is three states away. What will assist communism is the sort of stupidity that says that so long as we tell everybody that the horrible things we do are in the name of anti-communism it must be right and this is the way to stop communism. Then communism will grow.

I suggest that the greatest ally communism has—and it is a system with so many faults that I do not know why we fear it so much—is our failure to criticize ourselves. Indeed, people should realize that the essence of our democratic system, the very fibre and strength of our system, is self-criticism. The only reason democracy can afford the luxury of freedom of speech, which allows anyone to tear it apart as much as they can, is that this is its greatest strength. Because we do tear it apart and thereby reveal our weaknesses we make it stronger as it is supposed to be. Yet what do we get from tearing ourselves apart and trying to improve? We get this nonsense about how bad the communists are instead of realizing how we are failing to practise what we preach, how little we really are doing to bring to others the benefits of this great system we enjoy, under which we live and to which we pay only lip service.

I suggest that the situation in South Viet Nam is such that there is now no hope that in that country there will be anything but a communist government, no matter what happens. If the Americans had never gone in there I think the odds are that the revolutionary government would probably have been dominated by the communists, if not a completely communist government. But after all these years of fighting there is no doubt in the world that there will be no hope of anything but a communist government there because of American intervention.

As I say, Mr. Chairman, the longer the war goes on the more will faith in democracy be destroyed in those struggling nations around the world which we would like to help and the greater will become the chance that communism will spread because those countries will have no faith in democracy. The American action in South Viet Nam is a denial of everything in which we believe in a democracy. It is a denial of everything we have subscribed to in the United Nations charter. It is going to be a complete failure in South Viet Nam. I say "we" because our friends and allies are murdering many people every day, causing untold suffering every day by following a policy which can have no military success, a policy which could not have been more mishandled.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Never mind about drawing battle lines around an area and saying "we must stop them here", because they will seep through. What we are doing is to weaken the hand of every would-be reformer in every country whose only chance for survival in a democratic way is through reform. We are pointing out that the democratic western world will not support reform and therefore these countries must resort to communist violence in order to bring about any change. How can anyone stand up here and tell me that this is the only way in which communism can be contained when for years the very seed of communism has been nurtured by our refusal to recognize that communism can best feed on the faults and weaknesses in our system? We do not need any special armour against the communists. Our best armour is built into our democratic system which allows self-criticism and encourages a critical analysis of what we are doing with relation to the needs of our people. We must practise it.

I must apologize to the committee for repeating myself but I do wish to say again, and I get a little more annoyed about it every day, that the greatest friends the communists have are people like the hon. member for Leeds. What helps them most is the kind of nonsense he was spouting in this chamber a little while ago when he pointed out the faults of the communists and then said, "here is your alternative: the stupidity we are practising or the worse stupidity of the communists". Why in heaven's name is there no other alternative? Have we never heard of reform under a system which is neither communist nor democratic? Where do we get the stupid idea that our choice is only between communism or democracy? Where did this idiocy arise? It could only be propagated by people who find any consistency between the United States position in Viet Nam now and the democratic process. The position is: you can only be red or dead, as though there were no other choice. Either the Americans are right or the communists are right, as though there were no other option.

Arguments such as these will destroy us unless we are willing to look critically at what we are doing and speak frankly to our friends and neighbours. Otherwise we will lose the struggle when the cards are all on our side. Why spend our time talking about what terrible fellows the communists are? We do not need to be convinced. We just need to be protected now and then and our allies need a little help, which we are not giving them by telling them how bad the communists are and then adopting communist methods ourselves. What we need is a more critical analysis of what we are doing and a greater realization of the need for some essential reforms to protect our friends from communism.

We must have more respect for the right to self-determination of even small countries, regardless of whether or not we like the way in which they choose their government and the way in which they run their country. I hope we will speak frankly to our neighbour, friend and ally, the United States, and ask them in the name of democracy to take another look at the situation and to withdraw from Viet Nam.

Mr. Prittie: Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to speak about Viet Nam, although I do wish to make one comment on this subject. I believe the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona said that the way things have developed Viet Nam will probably end up with some kind of communist government. When I was home in my constituency last week end I was shown a letter from a Canadian in Viet Nam. I do not have the letter with me nor do I have the freedom to quote from it at this moment, but let me say that he described conditions in that country and made some devastating comments about the South Vietnamese officials and the conduct of the war by the Americans. The only people for whom he had any praise were the South Vietnamese, many of whom have somehow, through all their terrible suffering, remained cheerful. While I was listening to the remarks of the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona I could not help but think that these people would probably be better off under any other type of administration than the one they have at present. If I can get permission to quote that letter I would like to read it in the house some day.

The minister will not be surprised at the topic I am going to bring up because I have brought it up many times before. It has to do with one particular aspect of external aid. In the past I have urged him that some attention be given to the question of the population problem and that family planning should be part of our external aid program. As I have said in the past, I never try to oversimplify the question of external aid. I know that many things have to be done to improve the living standard of the developing countries. Food aid is one thing, improved agricultural methods are another, educational aid is another, and improved trade is still another. But I have pointed out on a number of occasions that the gross national product of many of these countries is simply not keeping up with the growth of their population, and this is one aspect of the problem of developing countries which should be studied and considered.

This subject was debated earlier in this session. I presented a resolution, which was debated in the house on December 13, 1967, urging the Canadian government to improve family planning assistance in its external aid program. I do not wish at this time to go over all the arguments and statistics which I advanced then. I have raised the matter several times during the question period. However, I never seem to get any answer from the minister and I hope that before we finish these supplementary estimates I will get some answer.

I know that requests have been made to the external aid office. I know a request was made by the international planned parenthood federation for a donation from Canada to carry on the work they are doing in this field. The United States, the United Kingdom, and Sweden, to mention just three countries, are giving such assistance to the I.P.P.F., and the United States through its foreign aid program is also giving direct assistance in this connection. In view of the fact that these requests have been made I should like to know what is the attitude of the government. On January 22 I asked the minister this question following the visit to Ottawa of the minister of health and family planning of India:

> During the visit to Ottawa last week of the minister of health and family planning of India did he make a request, formally or informally, for a Canadian contribution to India's population control program?

The minister replied:

> Mr. Speaker, the minister from India visited the external aid officials. I have not had a report from them but when I get it I shall be glad to discuss it with my hon. friend.

I am always happy to have a discussion with the minister because he is a very pleasant and interesting person to talk to, but I would like to hear a statement made in public which would be on the record instead of just having a private discussion of the topic. In any case, I have not yet had an answer from him.

When the matter was debated in the house the hon. member for Rosedale, the minister's parliamentary secretary, replied on behalf of the government. I did not find the reply very satisfactory. He suggested in two places in his speech that if the government were to engage in this type of program there might be some objection from important religious groups in the country. I fail to see that such an objection would stand up today. We are not talking about abortion. I know that many people in this country are opposed to abortion; certainly the Roman Catholic church is. But we are talking about family planning which I do not believe is any longer a controversial subject in this country. Indeed, we are about to change our own law when we get around to discussing Bill S-22 which has already been passed by the Senate.

I do not believe there would be a great outcry on the part of any substantial part of the population if the government were to follow the lead of the United States, the United Kingdom and other governments. Aid would be given to those countries that want it and have no moral or religious objections to taking it. I refer particularly to India and Pakistan. In the past the minister has shown a great reluctance to discuss the subject. I am sure that within the department some consideration has been given to it and I would like an answer from the minister when he replies to the points raised during this debate.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to detain the committee long and I shall be reasonably brief as usual. My views on foreign affairs are fairly well known. I stand for an independent foreign policy for Canada. I have stated that repeatedly in this house. I have also expressed my opposition to Canada remaining in NATO and have done so throughout the years. The same situation holds true with respect to NORAD. I stand for support of the United Nations, for Canada doing what it can in the military sense to support the United Nations and also in respect of external aid.

I have also been strongly opposed, as the minister knows, to the war in Viet Nam, particularly after reading the report of a conference former President Eisenhower had with the governors of the states in the United States. He told them that the United States was in Viet Nam because they had to protect the natural resources in Viet Nam which were required by the United States. I have that report in my office. I could never see how they were fighting for freedom and democracy in doing that.

I noticed a report in a trade paper called The Machinist for March 14, which reads in part as follows:

AFL-CIO President George Meany made his usual good sense last week. He deplored those who say the U.S.A. can't afford costly programs to prevent more trouble in the cities because of the Viet Nam war. Mr. Meany declared:

"Of course, meeting the crisis in our cities will cost much. But... Americans are fighting in Viet Nam for the basic principle of free, democratic choice. The perpetuation of conditions which effectively deny full participation in American society by millions of citizens is a betrayal of that principle and an effort to those who are giving their lives for it.

As the minister knows, the executive of the AFL-CIO, including Mr. Paul Hall who is a vice president, supports the policies of the United States in Viet Nam. I am very glad to learn there is a minority in the trade union movement in the United States who are opposed to these policies and are organizing more effectively than in the past to express their opinion.

However, Mr. Chairman, I rise to deal with another matter briefly and that is the question of the failure of the United States government to return Harold Chamberlain Banks to this country and by so doing failing to recognize the terms of our extradition treaty with the United States. In that respect may I say I was reading an article in the Gazette for October 24, 1962 in which it was stated that Mr. Paul Hall blamed Mr. Dodge for rehearsing Sheehan in the evidence he gave before the Norris commission at hearings in Toronto. The article reads in part:

"We don't understand why labour people don't put a bridle on this fellow Dodge," he said. "This puts us in a terrible position."

He compared Mr. Dodge with teamster boss Jimmy Hoffa. Both wear "a tight halo" thinking that what they do is right even though it may be morally wrong, he added.

Just imagine a man like Paul Hall suggesting that Mr. Dodge would do what he considered was morally wrong. In further reference to Mr. Banks, I had some very interesting correspondence with the editor of the Globe and Mail. Banks is a man whom a great many Canadians want to see brought back to Canada to serve his term for the injustice he perpetuated on some Canadians. On one occasion the Globe and Mail published an editorial based entirely on a speech I made in the house in which I put his criminal record on Hansard. Mr. Banks sued the Globe and Mail for damages and he got damages to the extent of $3,500 because, in the opinion of the judge, the fair name and reputation of Mr. Banks in Canada had been harmed. The lawyers who conducted the case for Mr. Banks received $2,582.60. They have sent me all the court records and everything else, you see.

I want to deal briefly with this case. I understand that after Mr. Banks' appeal had been rejected by the judge in the United States he changed lawyers from Abraham Brodsky to Abram Chayes, a former legal officer in the state department. In my opinion and in the opinion of a good many people in Canada, the decision of Dean Rusk is an insult to this country. I was very pleased to know that the minister made a protest to the United States. I want to deal with one or two matters in connection with the case. I should like to refer to an article in the Ottawa Citizen for March 15 by Paul Kind. It reads:

Hal Banks, the former Canadian union boss whom a judge once said was made "of the stuff of the Capones and the Hoffas," is again about to walk the streets of the United States.

He has been freed, in effect, by secretary of state Dean Rusk who has rejected Canada's bid to bring the fallen seamen's leader to justice.

Thursday night in this capital it was being whispered that the spectre of American politics had loomed over the attempted extradition of Banks from the United States to Canada.

I know a little more about that than the minister does. I do not mind telling him later.

In a letter to Canadian ambassador Edgar Ritchie, the secretary of state said that he "regretted" that he was unable to order the extradition of Harold Chamberlain Banks.

Banks, 59, a U.S. citizen and former president of the Seafarers' International Union of Canada, will be freed as soon as Rusk's letter containing the extradition refusal is received by U.S. commissioner Salvatore Abruzzo who will issue the release order.

Banks was arrested in New York last August and since then has been held without bail.

Later last year, Abruzzo ordered Banks extradited on a province of Ontario warrant charging him with perjury.

Subsequently, Banks waived his right to appeal the Abruzzo ruling through the courts, and chose instead to appeal directly to the secretary of state.

I judge he was on sound grounds in doing that.

Ontario sought Banks' extradition on a charge of perjury arising from testimony the former union boss gave before the Norris royal commission on the destruction of the Canadian shipping industry in 1962.

Now, 28 days after the state department hearing Rusk has given his decision. The secretary of state said that the application for extradition presented a "unique problem."

• (5:50 p.m.)

It certainly did.

In Rusk's words, the extradition was sought on a charge of perjury arising from Banks' "protestation of his innocence in response to a question as to his participation in a conspiracy to commit assault."

There is an extradition treaty between Canada and the U.S. for perjury, but none for assault.

Declared Rusk: "Because the charge of perjury in this case arises directly out of a denial of guilt of a non-extraditable offence, I have concluded that it would not be compatible with the over-all design and purpose of the extradition treaty, which is limited and non-universal in its coverage of offences, to agree to extradition on the unique facts of this case."

Banks was originally convicted in Canada in 1964 on a conspiracy to assault charge arising from the beating of Captain Henry Walsh.

I have talked to that gentleman, Mr. Chairman, and let me tell you that he did get a beating.

The president of the S.I.U. of North America is Paul Hall, a vice-president of the huge A.F.L.-C.I.O. labour organization, on whose Brooklyn-moored yacht Banks lived for several months.

According to this article, Mr. Chairman, there is considerable talk in Washington to the effect that some political influence and pressure have been used in this regard. In any event, I understand that this is the first failure to apply the extradition treaty in 50 years. The Journal for Saturday, March 16 contined the following:

The U.S. state department's move to prevent extradition of labour leader Hal Banks to Canada marks the first executive intervention against an extradition in 50 years, External Affairs Minister Martin said Friday.

As I said before, I am very glad that the minister has protested this action. I have some very interesting information on this case. I have a letter that I will show the minister some time. However, it has been suggested to me by some of the unions to which I am sympathetic, Canadian unions that stand on their own feet and run their own show, that I ask the minister a few questions.

[Mr. Herridge.]

First of all, would the minister get his officials in Washington to make inquiries whether there was any union influence on this decision because this is an election year in the United States? Second, would the minister get his officials to inquire whether this is retaliation because Canada is giving political asylum to draft resisters? We all know that all western countries have given political asylum to a good number of people who had to leave their own country because they were fearful of not obtaining justice. Third, would the minister also inquire whether any persons or any organization in Canada have made representations to the United States embassy in Ottawa since this matter became an issue? Fourth, would the minister inquire whether Mr. Charles Millard has been in Washington during recent weeks? I am sure that his officials in Washington would have some knowledge on this point.

These are the questions I wish to bring to the attention of the minister. However, before concluding I want to indicate how interested Canadians are in this matter by quoting an editorial that appeared in the Ottawa Citizen last Saturday entitled "Let's Have Hal Banks". It reads as follows:

An extraordinary ruling by U.S. Secretary of State Dean Rusk leaves Hal Banks a free man. It is an administrative decision that appears more closely related to politics than justice. Canadian proposals that the issue be taken to an international tribunal—possibly the World Court at the Hague—should be pressed.

I should mention in this regard that I am informed that the World Court sometimes takes ten years to reach a decision, so in that event most of us would be dead before we would know what the decision was.

Banks was convicted in Montreal of conspiracy to commit assault—not an extraditable offence. While on bail pending an appeal he fled to the U.S. The Ontario attorney general sought extradition on a charge of perjury. A New York judge granted the Ontario petition after a full hearing. That should have been enough.

But the secretary of state has reversed the decision on the remarkable ground that the alleged perjury was committed in connection with a non-extraditable offence. It is the charge of perjury that is at issue here, not the charge of conspiracy. Rusk has laid himself open to the suspicion that he has been influenced by union pressure during an election year.

Before an international tribunal can hear the case, the U.S. would have to agree. Agreement should be to Washington's advantage. By allowing the matter to be taken out of its hands, it could meet Canada's objections to the Rusk decision, and at the same time argue that it is giving Banks every chance to have his day in court.

And he has certainly had plenty, Mr. Chairman.

To do less is to acknowledge that the U.S. is a sanctuary for ruffians wanted in other countries.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I again bring to the attention of the minister that I have discussed this question with people in the labour movement who are very interested in it. Other questions in Canada directly related to this will have to be decided in the near future. I told these people that I would bring these facts to the attention of the minister. As I say, I congratulate the minister for protesting immediately the decision of Dean Rusk and I urge him to do what he can to get at the truth behind this unusual situation.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Chairman, I have only a few comments on the estimates of this department but since it is about 30 seconds to six may I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, may I ask my hon. friend and hon. members generally whether they would be agreeable to sit for a little while into the dinner hour?

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, we should have some understanding about this. What does the minister mean by "sit for a while during the dinner hour"?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Sit until seven o'clock, say, and then come back at eight.

Mr. Knowles: No. We want to hear the minister under favourable circumstances.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is why I want to finish tonight, Mr. Chairman. Can we listen to the hon. gentleman and then adjourn?

Mr. Schreyer: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, it is immaterial to me what we do. However, I understand that these matters have to be arranged by unanimous consent and I do not know whether other hon. members wish me to proceed now.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think they have agreed to listen to you.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Chairman, if I understand the mood of the committee correctly I am to proceed at this time.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Schreyer: It is perhaps a little awkward to make my remarks on the estimates of this department when every minute I am speaking I will be keeping hon. members from their dinner. Therefore I will try to make my remarks as brief as possible. I wish to commence by saying that within the next 18 months I presume that the government of Canada will be giving consideration to NATO matters and to NATO policy generally, particularly since this alliance terminates next year its twentieth year of existence and the treaty is due for renewal.

• (6:00 p.m.)

I am one of those who feel that the NATO alliance has served a useful purpose up to now and certainly did serve a useful purpose during its first few years of existence. At that time the threat was clear and present. It was real. Everyone knew from where it came. The capability of the countries of western Europe to meet that threat was very limited and demanded the kind of action that was taken in 1948-49 with the formation of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. It should be understood, however, that even then, in the light of conditions as they existed at that time, certain intelligent, articulate and capable spokesmen of the western allies—I refer in particular to George F. Kennon of the United States state department—felt that the establishment of the alliance was unnecessary and that it would prevent the normalization of relations in western Europe. As I say, I feel the alliance could easily be justified from the first day of its existence almost to the present time, but its continuation does become disturbing when we realize that in Europe more than anywhere else in the world conditions have changed considerably since the early fifties. But despite the changed political situation the member states of the alliance appear to be clinging to the old myths and neglecting the new realities which exist.

I am not advocating the withdrawal of Canada from the alliance as part of its foreign policy, nor am I suggesting that our membership should not be renewed. I am suggesting it is time for a critical revaluation and review. Perhaps we should renew our participation in the alliance on a different basis, on the basis of having our troops stationed here in Canada. We understand from the minister representing the Department of National Defence that Canada is seeking to develop a special role for its military, one based on a high degree of mobility. If we are serious about this it seems to me it would relate well to a NATO policy under which, while remaining in the alliance, we refused to continue indefinitely the garrisoning of Canadian troops in Europe. I think there is an onus on the government to indicate what the cost differential would be as between continuing our military presence in Europe and bringing our troops back to Canada and continuing a commitment to NATO while maintaining our men and equipment in a high state of readiness and mobility in case circumstances should develop in which they were needed in Europe.

The occasion I had last fall to attend a NATO parliamentarians' meeting in Paris along with 10 or 15 other members of the house gave me an opportunity to discuss matters relating to NATO with counterparts in the other member states. There is a great deal of consternation about what is being done in the alliance, and now outside the alliance, by the French. The reason, it seems to me, that France has taken certain policy decisions difficult for us to understand is that the alliance as a whole has been very slow to face and adjust to changing conditions in Europe. I do not wish to be misunderstood, but I wish to say that France is becoming more and more convinced that the communist threat on the continent of Europe is diminishing. In view of this, and the increasing strength of the western states, it becomes more than ever unnatural to continue to maintain large numbers of troops on the soil of the western European member states. France has disengaged from the military aspect of NATO while retaining a voice in the political part of the alliance. But because she has withdrawn from military commitments she is already in a position to take advantage of increased trade opportunities in eastern Europe.

Some of us may not approve the extent to which France has gone in disengaging from the NATO military structure. The fact remains that in the opinion of French policy-makers there is no further need to maintain the alliance in the form in which it has existed over the past 20 years. They sincerely believe there is an opportunity for a détente in Europe and that as long as NATO continues to be an exclusively military mechanism as it has been for all its past, it is not likely to contribute toward the achievement of a détente.

How often in the past 20 years have formal attempts been made by NATO to engage in talks with the Warsaw Pact authorities with a view to arranging reciprocal reductions in military strength? It is my understanding that not once in 20 years have any formal attempts of this kind been made by either one of the two military pacts. If this is the case, a strong argument can be made for getting out of the alliance so that it will not be able to hamper the credibility of national governments trying to seek a détente through bilateral arrangements.

As I said earlier, I am not one who challenges the necessity of the alliance in its initial years. But after 20 years, just how critical and perceptive a review or investigation is being made of its continued usefulness by Canadian foreign policy-makers? To what extent are they willing to admit that there have been these rather profound and obvious changes in conditions in that part of the world, which would tend to justify a changing role for Canada in that alliance even if we do, and I suggest we should, renew our participation in it?

I now wish to refer to our foreign aid programs. The Leader of the Opposition spoke at length in this connection and with much, if not all, of what he said I find myself like-minded. But it seems to me that even if we do increase the amount of our foreign aid from three-fifths of one per cent of our gross national product to one per cent, the figure we ultimately hope to arrive at in a couple of years, we should now be preparing ourselves for the rather frustrating performance that may be expected.

Despite the amount of money given as foreign aid by donor states over the years, statistics show that the economic growth of the recipient states has been very slow. In some cases growth has been non-existent. This is due to changing patterns in world trade. I am not sure whether the Leader of the Opposition made reference to this aspect of the problem. The fact is that many of the underdeveloped states are dependent on the sale of primary products, but world trade patterns are tending to depress the prices of these products. It is doubtful whether the world community can develop a new kind of trading mechanism that will help increase the value and price of such primary products whereby underdeveloped countries might achieve a higher return and enjoy a more favourable balance of trade. But despite this, Mr. Chairman, we must try to do much more in the field of foreign aid.

There is one matter I wish to bring to the attention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, which I hope he will bear in mind when discussing matters of state with his colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Last week and again today there was discussion in this house, and in the larger city newspapers, about the alleged fact that the government has reduced the amount of moneys available for northern health services. I wonder whether it is generally understood that the infant mortality rate of our native Indian and Eskimo population is amongst the highest in the world? According to my researches there are only four countries which show a higher infant mortality rate.

I am not trying to make a case here for reduced foreign aid but I do say there is something illogical in our extending foreign aid to underdeveloped countries to assist reduce their infant mortality rates and at the same time reducing the amount we spend on northern health services. Thanks largely to foreign aid the infant mortality rate of many underdeveloped countries has been reduced over the past ten years, but I stress the fact that the infant mortality rate of our native Indian and Eskimo population is exceeded only by the infant mortality rates of two countries in equatorial Africa, one or two in southeast Asia, and one in Latin America. If the minister wishes to head off criticism of his estimates covering foreign aid expenditures I think he should prevail upon his colleagues, in particular the Minister of National Health and Welfare, that our native population deserves better treatment in the way of health services.

There were two or three other matters I wished to refer to but since they were mentioned by other hon. members I feel it would be best at this point to listen to what the Secretary of State for External Affairs has to say.

Mr. Knowles: Six o'clock.

The Chairman: Order. May I be permitted to list the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment. They are as follows: the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Brand), Health and Welfare; the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave), Income Tax; the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Madill), Immigration.

It being after six o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At 6.19 p.m. the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, we have had a rather interesting and useful discussion of various aspects of Canadian foreign policy. I should like to begin by congratulating the Leader of the Opposition on what I thought was a helpful and constructive statement. I warmly welcome what he has had to say about the importance of external aid and the place it occupies in foreign policy today. I assure him I share fully the views which he so well expressed this afternoon.

A number of members have referred to the situation in Viet Nam. I believe this is a matter which should engage our attention at the present time, and I wish to say something about this to the house. There can be no differences of opinion about the urgency of the need to help bring this terrible ordeal to an end. We believe the only way to do so is through negotiations that are directed toward the establishment of a durable and stable settlement which both sides can accept and live with.

The immediate problem continues to be what it has been for some time; it is as simple to formulate as it has proven difficult to solve in practice. It is the problem of how to get the negotiations started and how to establish a sufficient measure of confidence between the two sides to enable them to sit down together and start discussing the basic political issues at stake in Viet Nam, instead of bringing their military weight to bear on them. This is the aspect of the problem to which the government has directed the highest priority and urgency. It has seemed to us that a country such as Canada which has had prolonged experience with the problems of that country and which has ready access to both sides might well be able to help bridge the gap between the battlefield and the conference room.

No third party of course can compel the two sides to change their positions and policies in order to take certain actions or refrain from others. The most we can hope to do is encourge the two sides to reconsider their positions, to clarify ambiguities and to see in this process of discussion and examination whether any element of common ground exists.

In my view there have recently been three major developments which have had a bearing on the diplomatic and military impasse which we face at the moment. I refer to the formulation of the position of the United States by the President at San Antonio on September 29 last, to the formulation of the North Vietnamese position by the foreign minister of that country on December 29 and, finally, to the activities on the ground in South Viet Nam over the past few weeks. Although separated by a matter of months these events must be looked at together as essential components in the existing problem.

There is no doubt in my mind and in that of the government that the bombing of North Viet Nam is a key factor in the total equation for the de-escalation of the conflict. In the San Antonio statement of last September the President of the United States announced a new United States approach to the cessation of bombing. He said that the United States would be prepared to stop the bombing if this would lead promptly to productive talks, on the assumption that North Viet Nam would not take advantage of this significant measure of restraint on the U.S.A. side to increase its relative military strength in the south. The President's position evidently was formulated to avoid a situation in which, with the bombing stopped and the talks proceeding, the other side would be able to exert renewed and unimpeded military pressure on the ground in the south if the talks did not progress to their liking.

In setting out this approach the President had not abandoned his earlier insistence on the other side making some contribution toward bringing about military de-escalation. He did, however, present it in a flexible way which it was hoped might make it easier for Hanoi to make a gesture toward meeting this requirement without totally abandoning their forces in the south. As I understand the situation, this continues to be the basic position of the United States.

Turning to Hanoi's position, it appeared that some degree of change had taken place there too. In the past, one of the problems has been that Hanoi, for whatever reason, had been unwilling to commit itself publicly to anything more than a demand that the United States stop bombing North Viet Nam, and unwilling to give a firm commitment on whether or not this would be a first step toward a negotiated peace. In an interview in January 1967, the North Vietnamese foreign minister said that talks "could" take place if the bombing stopped. Speaking at a reception at Hanoi in December, almost a year later, he said that talks "will" take place once United States attacks on North Viet Nam had stopped.

At the turn of the year, then, it seemed to us that while the positions of the two sides remained some distance apart, there were signs of change which deserved further attention. Accordingly I instructed our commissioner in Viet Nam, Mr. O. W. Dier, to proceed to Hanoi to deliver a letter from me on behalf of the government to the North Vietnamese foreign minister, seeking confirmation and clarification of his year end statement. I also reaffirmed the importance Canada has attached to the international commission as an agency which could make a useful contribution to the establishment and maintenance of some element of confidence between the two sides while talks were in progress. In issuing these instructions to our commissioner I hoped it might be possible to find some way of bridging the remaining gap between the San Antonio formula and the formula outlined by the foreign minister for Viet Nam in his year end statement.

The United States had said that the bombing could be stopped in return for an undertaking to talk, plus the exercise of military restraint by the north while the north had said that talks would follow the cessation of bombing. What I had hoped might be possible was a further modification of positions and agreement by both sides whereby the international commission might reassert its legitimate presence at key points, such as the demilitarized zone, to facilitate the exercise of restraint by both sides in terms of military activities around these key points and areas. If both sides were agreed that a commission presence of this character would be useful, this could be brought about without any change in the commission's mandate or without either side openly declaring that it would not do something or that it would do something else. In other words, the commission by its very presence, rather than by the exercise of force, could exert a restraining influence.

I very much regret having to report to the house that the reply I have received from the foreign minister of North Viet Nam, together with Mr. Dier's report on their discussions, does not suggest much flexibility in Hanoi's attitude toward factors, other than the cessation of bombing of the north, which clearly have to be taken into account if there is to be any realistic hope that ensuing talks are to have any purpose and meaning.

Speaking before the United Nations General Assembly last September I urged that the bombing be stopped as a matter of first priority in the search for peace. I saw this, and I urged that it be considered, not as a sure-fire formula for instant peace, but as a deliberate and calculated risk. To break out of the impasse prevailing at that time it seemed to me that the United States might make the first significant move, not as a prelude to capitalution, but as a gesture which might encourage the other side to respond in kind, as indeed the north will have to do. It might then be possible for other countries, in the new circumstances which would then prevail, to mobilize pressure for corresponding concessions by the north.

I believe that that was a sensible position to take and one which seemed to me to correspond to the facts as we knew them. I still believe that the bombing will have to be stopped as a matter of first priority, since I think it will be impossible for North Viet Nam to appear to be responding to military pressure. All the information we have received from Canadian soundings, and from sources other than our own contacts in Hanoi, only serve to convince me of the validity of this view.

Whether future soundings and exploratory discussions will prove that some form of bargain can be struck, I cannot predict. For the moment the available evidence is clear about the significance to be attached, from the point of view of North Viet Nam, to a cessation of the bombing of North Viet Nam. But if the refusal of North Viet Nam to appear to respond more flexibly under continuing miliraty duress is clear, it is no less important to bear in mind the difficulty that would be faced by the United States in modifying its requirements as a direct result of the other side's spectacular military thrusts.

If the United States was not prepared to take the calculated risk we and others urged them to take at the time when the pattern of military activity on the ground was more or less constant, one cannot be too hopeful about fresh initiatives at this particular moment, but the urgent necessity to break through the stalemate on negotiations has not lessened.

There is one potential danger which must be recognized. If talks are entered into with some hope of reaching agreement and are then broken off under the pressure of one side or the other attempting to score a point by a sudden and suicidal military push, it would be all the more difficult to get them started again. A situation such as this could also be an open invitation to further escalation. This would be regrettable.

Despite the clarification which appears to have taken place in respect of the formally stated positions of the two sides, the immediate prospects for negotiations can scarcely be described as encouraging, though we do not take this as any reason why we should not persist, as other countries are doing, in trying to encourage negotiations which might lead to peace. It is true that both sides are now firmly committed to a willingness to negotiate, but I am afraid that this does not carry us very far forward, as is tragically apparent by the unbroken continuation of the hostilities.

Both sides seem to envisage rather different objectives for the talks that are to follow a cessation of bombing. For the north, the objective is to bring about the total and early withdrawal of the United States from Viet Nam. For the United States, the objective is to secure South Viet Nam from northern military pressure, so that political change can come about peacefully and through the exercise of free choice. Each side is well aware of the other's objectives, which at the moment seem mutually incompatible.

Hanoi seems to see an unreciprocated cessation of the bombing, not only as a necessary procondition to undertaking talks, but as a gesture by the United States symbolizing the beginning of the process of total cessation of all American military action in the south, and indeed total withdrawal from the scene.

We know the conditions which were laid down by the United States at the Manila conference with regard to its intention to withdraw after six months, given the existence of certain conditions.

For their part, the United States and South Viet Nam have insisted on some measure of military restraint being exercised by the north, once again not as a final answer to the problem, but as representing a North Vietnamese realization that its military objectives cannot be met, and that its objectives cannot be met by military means.

We must maintain the commission presence in Viet Nam. This is first of all our international obligation, and we must be alive to any possible move which will help find a way out of the present impasse. This is our political obligation. The government accepts these obligations and, as it has done in the past, it will continue to play an active role in any search for peace in Viet Nam.

The immediate problem remains what it has been; how to get negotiations started. I reiterate that this is a matter of the greatest urgency and that a cessation of the bombing will clearly have a key significance in moving the problem in that direction. But the intractibility of the problem is demonstrated by the fact that the bombing has not been halted, that military restraint is not being shown and that talks have not been entered into. This suggests that future efforts to narrow the gap between the two sides may have to be directed to matters of political substance as well as to the terms and conditions for a beginning of talks. We are urgently examining this aspect of the matter at this particular moment.

I have never believed that stalemate and rigidity are adequate grounds for a "do nothing" posture, and abandoning all efforts because past endeavours have proved unrewarding.

• (8:20 p.m.)

I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that everyone in this house and everyone in the world is greatly concerned about the situation in Viet Nam. I am sure that we are not alone in our efforts to try to bring about at least preliminary talks between both parties. When our ambassador was in Hanoi recently we had a reaffirmation of the willingness of the North to talk, but we were not given any indication when those talks would take place, except that we were informed they would take place at an appropriate time. It would have been very helpful had we had some indication as to when they might take place, as this would have enabled us and other countries to impress upon the United States the desirability of action that would bring about the beginning of talks that might lead ultimately to a settlement.

Reference was made by the hon. member for Greenwood today to the use of the Security Council. He correctly said that the Security Council was established as a means of avoiding situations that threatened the peace, or situations that had resulted in a violation of the peace. If North and South Viet Nam and other countries involved in this situation were subject to the authority of the Security Council, there is no doubt that would be the place where this matter should be discussed. That would be the place where the great powers and the other, non-permanent members of the Security Council would be given an opportunity of taking steps that might lead to the negotiations that everyone wants to see undertaken.

The fact is that any action by the Security Council would provide nothing more than a place to debate. Some distinguished senators of the United States, notably Senator Mansfield who has been strongly opposed to the war, have for a long time urged that the matter be taken by the government of the United States to the Security Council. I can assure my hon. friend that this matter has been carefully considered by the Canadian government and other governments represented on the Security Council, great powers as well as non-permanent members.

The Secretary General of the United Nations has himself been opposed to taking this matter to the Security Council, for the reasons that I indicated at the outset, namely that the parties who are an integral part of any settlement are not subject to the authority of the Security Council because they are not members of the United Nations organization. His view is that it is within the framework of the Geneva powers that this problem should be discussed and should be resolved.

The Canadian government has not opposed this view. For a long time we have felt that if the matter could be brought within the Geneva framework, that is where the matter would more likely be settled or where greater progress would likely be made. But the fact is that one of the co-chairmen, the Soviet union, has been reluctant to call a meeting of the Geneva powers. The British government, as the other co-chairman, has been anxious to have discussions within the Geneva framework; but its action alone will not bring the other powers to the conference table under the terms of the Geneva agreement.

We continue to support the positions of countries, however, which take the view that the matter ought to be considered within the framework of the Geneva agreement. We support the position, for instance, of India; but it is a fact that the other member of the commission, Poland, has not supported this view. So countries have had to resort to whatever opportunities were open to them in their effort to try to help bring about a solution; in the case of Canada, the use of the access that is available to us, as a member of the commission, to the capitals of both countries, in addition to the efforts we have made by the sending of a special emissary to Hanoi on two occasions in the person of Mr. Chester Ronning.

But while the United Nations Security Council has not been seized of this matter, for the reasons that I have given, reasons supported strongly by the Secretary General, this does not mean that the matter has not been discussed in the United Nations. Indeed, at the last General Assembly the United States ambassador, Mr. Goldberg, himself initiated a discussion of the problem and there was a very wide discussion in the General Assembly debate on the question of Viet Nam. It was during that debate that Canada, Denmark, and Sweden called upon the United States to stop the bombing as a first act that might lead to some action on the part of the North which in turn might lead to preliminary discussions.

So this conflict, the seriousness of which is in the minds of everyone, continues to be our concern and we continue to do everything that we can to try to bring about some flexibility in the position of both sides, in the hope that we might in some way or another bring the parties together.

I am sure that it is the duty of all governments in the world to continue this process. We have not only used the United Nations, but we took advantage of ministerial discussions at NATO last fall, at Brussels, and in the previous spring in Luxembourg, to have an airing of this problem. The Canadian government will continue to use all its influence and every available opportunity that is presented to it to try to bring about a solution of this problem. It is only fair to point out that all of this is being done—

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Chairman, would the minister accept a question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Just a minute. As I was saying, Mr. Chairman, it is only fair to point out that all of this is being done at the suggestion of the President of the United States himself, who said in April of 1965, following the appeal made by the 17 unaligned nations, that he welcomed the effort of countries to try to bring about a narrowing of the gap and to try to bring about a discussion that could lead to a settlement of this matter.

I know of nothing more that the Canadian government could do in its efforts to try to help bring about a solution to this regrettable war, which has great significance not only for the United States, not only for its neighbour Canada, but which has an apparent bearing on the posture and the mood of the whole world.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister would accept a double-headed question. First of all I refer to the minister's previous references to the International Control Commission, which he referred to a number of times again this evening. It has been some time now since this commission has been able to issue a report. I wonder whether the minister thinks it would be not only possible but advisable, in view of this situation, that if the whole commission is unable to agree on some report, our representatives on the commission were to issue some form of report indicating the situation as it actually obtains at present, and some of the possibilities that might be applied, further to those which have already been applied by our government in regard to the cessation of bombing.

My second question, if I may tie it in with that, is as follows: In view of the fact that there is likely to be a very thorough reexamination of the basic policy of the United States in Viet Nam, I wonder whether our minister or members of this government have entered into discussions with representatives of the United States government with regard to the long term interests of the United States in Viet Nam in particular, and in southeast Asia in general, and whether or not we have stated our position on this important question.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, we have stated our own position. I think my hon. friend mentioned this when he spoke on this subject in the house last year, and he will recall that a few months before I had outlined the Canadian position with regard to the post-settlement period. We have discussed this with the United States and, as my hon. friend knows, the President announced in his Baltimore speech the position which the government of the United States would take with regard to the rehabilitation and reconstruction of southeast Asia, including Viet Nam.

With regard to the question of a report, there would be no objection, so far as Canada's position on that commission is concerned, to a report such as is being suggested. However, under the terms of the commission there has to be agreement between a majority of the members of the commission. It does not have to be a report that is unanimously supported. It will be recalled that in 1962 the commission did make a report. It was a majority report supported by Canada and India. There is certainly no objection from Canada to such a report.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs two questions. The first one has to do with the statement made by Secretary General U Thant on his return from a series of exploratory investigations, in which he gave it as his considered opinion that a cessation of the bombing of North Viet Nam would result in meaningful negotiations within two weeks. I want to ask the minister if, in the light of his correspondence with the foreign minister of North Viet Nam, and the report of Mr. Dier, he shares the feelings which U Thant had as a result of his investigation. In other words, does he feel that the assumption which U Thant drew from his conversations was fully warranted?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have publicly stated that the opinion expressed by the Secretary General is one that I would hope represented the true situation, and I do not have any doubt from the talks that I have had with the Secretary General himself that he believes that if the bombing did stop for the period mentioned there would be meaningful discussions. His information was based on views expressed to him in Paris by someone who represented the government of North Viet Nam, but someone who was not in high authority. Apart from this statement by the Secretary General our own discussions with the foreign minister and with members of the government of North Viet Nam yielded the information that there would be talks, but no indication when those talks might take place. This information has been passed on to the Secretary General. Indeed the government of France, about the same time as the statement was made by the Secretary General, expressed the view that if there was a cessation of bombing there would be talks shortly thereafter.

I wish that I could say that the information transmitted to us, which resulted from direct discussions with the governments concerned, confirmed the optimism of the Secretary General. But having said that, I do want to reiterate that I strongly support the position taken by the Secretary General, one that is perfectly consistent with the position we ourselves took last September, that the cessation of the bombing would transfer the onus to the north and was in the present situation the only means we know which might conceivably lead to talks.

Mr. Douglas: I wonder if I may put my second question to the minister very briefly. Am I correct in assuming from the minister's statement that there is no serious difference of opinion respecting the suggestion that a cessation of the bombing would probably result in negotiations, but that the difficulties are twofold: one, the matter of when the negotiations would take place; and two, the proviso laid down by the President of the United States in his San Antonio statement that there must be some commitment by North Viet Nam with reference to the building up of its military strength in the south? Am I correct in assuming that the real obstacle lies in the fact that the United States is insisting that the artificial division, the military demarkation line between North and South Viet Nam, has now become an international boundary and that North Viet Nam should be required to discontinue supporting whatever forces it may have in South Viet Nam? Is that the real obstacle lying at the root of any meaningful negotiations?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The answer to the question is no. The United States have said that they would be prepared to stop the bombing if they could be assured that talks would take place, and if some indication was given as to when these talks would take place. This is the information we were seeking to get.

As I speak tonight I choose my words carefully, but I still hope that the government of North Viet Nam, knowing that the American government is prepared to stop the bombing, would not only say they will enter the talks but would give an indication as to when these talks would begin. If that is done, I would feel very optimistic that we might begin to try to find a solution to this regrettable war.

Mr. Douglas: I do not wish to weary the minister, but I have a final question for him. May I ask him when the United States have ever publicly said that they are prepared to cease the bombing if they get a definite time as to when negotiations will begin, without the proviso which was contained in the San Antonio statement that they must also have an assurance with reference to any build-up of military forces or any continuation of support of the military forces which North Viet Nam has in the south.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not think I can add to what I have said. I have chosen my words rather carefully. I hold the strong view that if we could have an indication that there would be meaningful talks and that the date would be indicated, this would enable us to help bring about the kind of negotiations for which we have been working for a long time.

• (8:40 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Chairman, I listened with great interest, even with admiration, to the statement made to-night by the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) on the problem of war in Viet Nam. It was clear to me that he was fervently hoping that this war would end, and I can assure him that my party and myself—and I am convinced it is also the wish of all the Canadian people—are hoping that this war will come to an end as soon as possible.

We perceive more and more that this is a useless war. It appears to us, in every sense, as a war based on pride between two very powerful blocs facing each other in a very weak country from industrial and agriculture points of view, in short, in an underveloped country.

I have often wondered why those two blocs which are now clashing in Viet Nam, which fought in Korea a few years ago and which will perhaps clash elsewhere later on, have never fought on their own territory.

Every day in Viet Nam, like Korea and elsewhere, innocent victims are being killed, wounded or disabled for life, even though, in that part of Asia, the life span is generally shorter than elsewhere. It is that situation which makes us shudder.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think that the Viet Nam war is so much more cruel than any other war. All wars are cruel and should all be outlawed by civilized peoples. It seems to me that in the twentieth century, all the nations of the world should be civilized enough to understand one another and to prevent such wars.

We have witnessed many demonstrations, especially in the last few months, in favour of the cessation of bombing and the withdrawal of the United States from Viet Nam. Judging from these numerous demonstrations in Canada, in the United States, in England and in other European countries, one would think that the Americans are the only ones involved in this war. All the demonstrators want the Americans to go home, but there are very few appeals for the communists to withdraw as well.

We know that the United States have spent and are still spending hundreds of millions of dollars for all sorts of weapons and supplies for the war. They are also losing many young men. But against whom or what are they fighting? Can we believe that little North Viet Nam can alone face both the Americans and the South Vietnamese? Of course not. North Viet Nam is obviously helped by the other bloc, which is the communist bloc.

Like many Canadian citizens, Mr. Chairman, I would say that this war must stop as quickly as possible, the Americans must get out of Viet Nam, just like the other side.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs asked again tonight that negotiations continue or start, provided the bombing is stopped. The communist bloc would like the bombing to stop first and the Americans would like at least the assurance that the negotiations will start beforehand.

I agree with what many others have said in this house as well as elsewhere. It would be better to start with negotiations, because during negotiations less blood is shed. If negotiations were started in the right spirit, they could bring peace to Viet Nam and still the fears of those who now see a third world war coming.

On January 1, 1966, a group of Catholic Vietnamese priests presented a manifesto on the Vietnamese conflict and said among other thing;

> Since, under present war conditions, the North and South, as well as the great powers which support them, have in fact proved that they cannot, on their own, put an end to the war because of the illusory hope of victory or the capitulation of the other side, it appears that the only means, or almost, that might lead to the cessation of hostilities, to negotiations and to peace (which, a least, spares he most bloodshed), is to recognize U.S. mediation and arbitration, to have recourse to it and to co-operate sincerely with that organization.

According to the statement of the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs this evening. I understand that the International Control Commission seemed to be the only one to have the right to look in on the Vietnamese conflict. Now, I should like to ask him whether the United Nations would accept to undertake negotiations with a view to putting an end to that war, provided, of course, it were asked to do so; and whether this organization might stand a better chance of success than the International Control Commission, because it does seem that the commission is unable to initiate the negotiations which would appear to be the only way to put an end to this war. If the International Control Commission seems powerless, I think we should resort to another international body in an attempt to settle this conflict, because it will have to stop sooner or later. It does not seem possible, at least for the moment, that one of the two belligerents should gain a victory.

If we can avoid the genocide of the population of that part of Asia which, like any other nation, has a right to life and to self-government, I think it would be time to consider the possibility of establishing in that area a durable peace which might extend to the neighbouring states.

Not long ago, on October 5, 1967, an editorialist of L'Action of Quebec city, Mr. Odilon Arteau, asked himself the following question:

What is going on exactly in Viet Nam?

He mentioned what several writers, namely French writer Suzanne Labin, and men like Father Patrick O'Connor and Father Raymond de Jaegher, who have lived for years in Viet Nam, had said regarding the Vietnamese conflict. In his editorial, Mr. Arteau summarized the ten points made by these three journalists, all of them experts on Asian problems, and whose views were in complete agreement with the views of 20 other American and British experts who had also spent years in Viet Nam.

I quote:

• (8:50 p.m.)

Let us summarize the views of those experts who are in complete agreement, I repeat, with the views expressed by well-known experts, versed in all questions connected with the Far East.

1. It was the Viet Cong which started the hostilities in South Viet Nam and carried them on for several years before the American government was compelled to give substantial aid to South Viet Nam.

2. The Viet Cong is a political movement directed by communists. Its purpose is to establish a communist government in South Viet Nam.

3. Since 1954, the South Vietnamese government has constituted a true Vietnamese government and it is now fighting to gain its independence. No prominent nationalist in South Viet Nam has deserted to the Viet Cong since 1954.

[Mr. Laprise.]

4. The people's revolutionary party which is controlling the Viet Cong is a branch of the communist party in North Viet Nam. The Viet Cong itself is organised, armed and trained by North Vietnamese.

5. The Viet Cong have used terror, torture and cold-blooded murder in a way that differs only in quantity from Hitlerian atrocities.

6. The North Vietnamese communist regime is amongst the toughest and most brutal in all Asia. All opposition is exterminated.

7. Up till the time when the North intensified its attacks, the South Vietnamese population enjoyed a standard of living greatly superior to that of the North. Industries were prospering, schools, clinics and welfare services were rapidly increasing in numbers. From 1954 to 1963, there have been in South Viet Nam, in an atmosphere of great liberty, four national elections.

8. As amply shown by the files of the International Control Commission, the communists have broken and frequently violated the Geneva agreements.

9. President Johnson has continuously offered to hold unconditional peace talks with Hanoi. Hanoi, Peking and Moscow have rejected all offers. The burden of proof is now on the side of the communists.

10. If the United States stopped defending South Viet Nam as they do, Laos and the whole of the south and southeast Asia would lose their determination to resist a communist takeover, and all this half of the globe would be lost. Chinese domination over southeast Asia would be disastrous for the United States, since sooner or later Japan, India, Pakistan, the Philippines and many other countries would be lost.

From these ten points, Mr. Chairman, can be seen the strength of communist power in Viet Nam and that part of Asia. I think that we cannot condemn without a trial the United States and other countries of the free world for coming to the aid of the southern portion of this country which does not want communism.

So, Mr. Chairman, such is the situation in Viet Nam. Both the free and the communist worlds are wasting in that war considerable amounts of money and irreplaceable human lives. That must stop.

If both communists and Americans did their utmost to promote freedom and prosperity, if as many efforts and as much money were spent to help those underdeveloped countries, quite different results would be achieved, but unfortunately, too many people still seem to profit by such clashes. Too many people seem to be making large profits through those losses in human life, that destruction which they feel must rage in some part or other of the world, so that they may grow rich by manufacturing war weapons.

If some measure of control is needed, Mr. Chairman, it is needed at the level of these industries which are shedding human blood. If, instead of making war, we were all trying to develop the resources of all the countries of the world, we would reach step by step the stage where man would no longer have to fight against man in order to have the right to live and think, where all men would collaborate in exploiting the natural resources of our planet and all would benefit equally from the material and spiritual progress necessary for personal achievement and for that of the whole community.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I think that all of us in this house and in the whole country should do all that is humanly possible to bring about these negotiations as soon as possible, in order to put a stop to this ridiculous war which is destroying lives and which may spread not only to Asia but to all parts of the world.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think we have too many recommendations to make to the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs, for I am aware of his views on this subject. Nevertheless, I can assure him of the support of our group in everything he will undertake with the UN or with the International Control Commission in order to enter into negotiations as soon as possible, to put a stop to bombing on both sides. It is the only hope that is left us for the settlement of this conflict which, I hope, will end very soon.

[English]

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I hesitate to hold up the committee, and I thought a great deal before rising. The Secretary of State for External Affairs made what was obviously a prepared and measured statement, but I must say to him that that statement was as disappointing as it was measured. It seems to me that the minister attempted to emphasize his and the government's belief in the necessity for ceasing the bombing of Viet Nam, yet at the same time attempted to justify the refusal of the United States to cease that bombing. His entire speech seems to me to have been a kind of roundabout play that sought to do both things; but I do not think you can do both things, Mr. Chairman.

I do not know what the Secretary of State for External Affairs, or anybody else for that matter, means when he refers to meaningful negotiations. Whether or not the negotiations are meaningful will only be evident after they have started. However, if U Thant and the minister are right, that a cessation of the bombing is essential for any negotiations to begin, then in all kindness to the minister I say to him that it is mere gobbledegook not to recognize that the refusal of the United States to cease that bombing is an obstacle to negotiation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is exactly what we have said.

Mr. Lewis: Then I would be glad if the Secretary of State for External Affairs would rise and clearly say so. He indicated, for example, that even though Hanoi had stated its willingness to talk provided the bombing ceased, it did not say when.

• (9:00 p.m.)

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Lewis: I still do not know what the Secretary of State for External Affairs means exactly. It is probably due to my dumbness.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. gentleman is not dumb, and he knows it. I said we believe the bombing should stop and that this should be the first step. This was the position we took in September and it is the position we take now. It is not agreed to by the United States. It was because we knew that the United States did not agree that we sought to get some indication from the north of when the talks would begin, in the hope that it might persuade the government of the United States to stop the bombing as the Secretary General has urged, and as we urge.

Mr. Lewis: With great respect to the minister, that does not enlighten me. If he believed, as I have no doubt he did, that a cessation of the bombing was essential to the start of negotiations and if, after two years of urging by members of this party at least, and by many others across this country, he finally did state publicly that he wanted the bombing to stop, I say to the hon. gentleman that if he is right, and means it, he ought to criticize the power which refuses to stop the bombing. He tells us he sent someone to Hanoi to get an idea when talks could be expected to begin. Is he suggesting that Hanoi had said: Let the United States stop the bombing first and then we shall see whether we can talk? He cannot mean that, because he emphasized that the foreign secretary of North Viet Nam had stated on New Year's day: If the bombing ceases, there will be talks. Does the hon.

gentleman mean that the answer was: We shall not give you a date precisely until such time as the bombing ceases, but we repeat our intention to talk when the bombing ceases? If that is the difference, it seems to me a refusal to cease the bombing on that kind of excuse is entirely reprehensible and I see no reason why the minister cannot say so.

Throughout his speech the minister failed to inform the committee about one important aspect of this issue—whether the United States is ready to negotiate not only with North Viet Nam but with the Viet Cong or its political arm, the National Liberation Front, a question which is of great importance to the other side in this war. I have not yet seen an unqualified statement by the United States that they would be willing to deal with the N.L.F. I have seen statements to this effect surrounded by qualifications and reservations but I have never heard a clear statement that they would meet with the N.L.F. at the negotiating table. Yet, as my leader reminds me, one of the difficulties is that the puppet government in South Viet Nam has stated publicly and formally that under no conditions would it be willing to discuss peace with representatives of the National Liberation Front.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs made another unhappy statement, even though I am sure he did not want to convey the impression which it conveyed to me. He said it was difficult to get North Viet Nam to agree to talk, and that now, because there had been considerable activity on the ground on the part of North Viet Nam and the Viet Cong, we could not expect the United States to be ready to act very quickly.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I did not say that.

Mr. Lewis: That is what I understood the minister to say.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Well, the hon. member had better read it again.

Mr. Lewis: I have not been able to read the text of the minister's statement. If he does not accept my interpretation he can correct me, now. I understood him to say that the situation is now more difficult as far as the United States is concerned because the action on the ground has gone against its forces in Viet Nam and it was obviously difficult to expect the Americans to give the appearance of yielding to military pressure.

[Mr. Lewis.]

What this adds up to is that when the fighting is going well for the Americans they impose conditions for talks which are unacceptable, and when things are not going well they decline to talk because to do so would appear to be yielding to military pressure. All this appears to put to nought the minister's attempt to walk an even road, to sit carefully on the fence between the two sides engaged in the conflict and make sure that when he condemns one side he gives equal condemnation to the other. It does not seem to me that the situation justifies such an approach. This is not to say that North Viet Nam has been as eager to step forward as many of us would have liked. As my hon. friend from Greenwood pointed out, a resolution approved at our party convention in July suggested that Hanoi ought to make its position clear. It seems to us, however, that when on January 1 of this year Hanoi said "stop the bombing and we will talk" the burden immediately shifted to the United States to do so, to cease bombing. I regret very much that the minister should have made a statement expressing continued hope that the bombing would stop while at the same time attempting to justify United States failure to change its policy in this respect.

I suggest that the most bewildering and the most shattering comment on this situation was made the other day by Secretary of State Rusk while giving evidence before the Senate committee on foreign affairs. I do not have the quotation before me, but when it was put to him that the Hanoi authorities had declared clearly on January 1 of this year that they would talk if the bombing ceased, the answer given by Secretary of State Rusk was: I do not believe the North Vietnamese are ready to surrender. This was the most significant comment one could find, because it gave an inkling of the kind of thinking the state department is engaged in, and the kind of thinking which is influencing United States policy in connection with this disastrous war. They do not accept opportunities to stop the bombing and start talking, or at least they will not take the risk of stopping the bombing. I point out that it could be resumed, unfortunately, if no results were forthcoming—not that I would support its resumption. From the viewpoint of the Pentagon, it could be renewed if the effort for negotiation failed.

What is preventing Washington from taking this first, essential step, and what is preventing our government and the Secretary of State for External Affairs from having what I would call the courage, in this desperate world situation, to say clearly both in this house and on the floor of the United Nations that the responsibility has now shifted to Washington, Hanoi having said it would talk if the bombing ceased?

• (9:10 p.m.)

This to me was the most disappointing part of the minister's speech. I have no doubt that he is utterly and completely sincere in his search for a solution to the problem. I have no doubt that the government is utterly and completely sincere in that it does and in all it has done. I am not trying to denigrate the little the minister has done in seeking a cessation of the bombing, or the good things he has done by sending envoys to Hanoi. But I do not think this is enough.

After a little thought, I was not prepared to have this debate end with the kind of statement which the minister made, which it seems to me indicated no policy whatever except continuing along the same road. My hon. friend, the hon. member for Greenwood, was as aware as the minister of the limitations of a discussion at the Security Council. All members of this party in this chamber, and members of our convention and federal council who urged that the matter be brought to the Security Council, are well aware of the limitations.

We are well aware that North and South Viet Nam are not members of the United Nations and are not subject to the authority of the United Nations. But let me remind the Secretary of State for External Affairs that that has not stopped the United Nations from dealing with other situations. There have been more than one situation in which the Security Council has discussed and attempted to act upon matters when some of the parties concerned in those matters were not members of the United Nations.

There would be nothing to prevent the Security Council from discussing this matter, and for the United States at the Security Council to make some commitment that would be a first step toward negotiations. And, indeed, since behind the scenes the Soviet union is as important perhaps as Hanoi itself, then the presence of the Soviet union at the United Nations in the Security Council may well be of considerable value in a discussion by that council, and in the negotiations which would be carried on at the council, and behind the curtains between official council sessions.

We are well aware of the limitations, but I do not think that the reason which the Secretary of State for External Affairs has given for not placing the matter on the agenda is a valid reason. I conclude, Mr. Chairman, by repeating that I find it extremely disappointing that the government spokesman should tell us he still believes in the necessity for ceasing bombing North Viet Nam, and in the next breath attempt, by a description of events, to justify American failure to carry out that policy.

I was terribly disappointed and distressed by the fact that the government is apparently attempting to carry on a policy which on the one side says this and on the other side says that. In the meantime this horrible war continues. Thousands of Vietnamese are killed daily. The danger of escalation grows every day.

The press today reported that the administration in Washington was not going to send 260,000 men to Viet Nam, but it was going to increase its manpower there by 35,000 to 50,000. Mr. Chairman, one does not have to be a diplomatic or military expert to know that if you have agreed to increase your manpower today by 35,000 to 50,000 and the war lasts any length of time, then further escalation of your manpower is almst a certainty. In that situation it seems to me that members of this committee and the people of Canada cannot be satisfied with the kind of statement which the minister made in so desperate a situation.

[Translation]

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, it is quite obvious that, as far as the Viet Nam war is concerned, we all agree that it is a dirty war which should come to an end as soon as possible. It is quite obvious also that everyone is hoping that a way can be found to put an end to it.

There is no doubt also that opinions differ when it comes to evaluating what steps should be taken to that end. And there is some evidence of this, because the hon. member who spoke before me said that he was extremely disappointed about the position taken by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin).

Personally, I feel quite differently about that statement. I would say that it is realistic, reasonable, in the circumstances, and even rational, frank and courageous, since he is in a position where it takes some courage to say openly to the American giant what one thinks he should do or not do.

That attitude of the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs is for us a relief after those chain demonstrations which seem inspired, in most cases, by professional rioters, anarchists who today take advantage of this occasion to rebel against authority, to promote all kinds of violent and sometimes bloody riots and who, tomorrow, will find a pretext to instigate trouble in the social classes of various countries.

I say that the attitude of the hon. minister is also a relief from the unjust and unrealistic propaganda which is spread throughout the world, according to which the United States alone is to blame in that dirty war waged by the Vietnamese people, at the present time, and which concerns all the people of the world, because we know that a spark would be enough to set off an international and world-wide catastrophe.

However, it is exaggerating to say that the United States alone is to blame. Even if the newspapers do not give all the publicity they should to the atrocities which are perpetrated by the North Vietnamese, they do exist, not to mention the murders in series committed by those so-called North Vietnamese soldiers in South Viet Nam. They systematically murder the mayors and councillors of the municipalities, the members of the clergy, in an attempt to demoralize the people and win them over to their viewpoint. However, those atrocities should be emphasized and we should remember that even if Hanoi said, at a given time, that should the bombing stop, it would be prepared to open negotiations, it has always refused, up to now, to commit ifself to stop the infiltration in South Viet Nam of its emissaries who go there to perpetrate the atrocities I mentioned earlier and to try and demoralize South Viet Nam.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to quote the testimony of a prominent member of the Catholic clergy who lived in Viet Nam for 22 years, and who recently came back to Canada. While we discussed the Viet Nam situation with a promiment member of the American clergy who belonged to the category which we call the hawks—the member of the Canadian Catholic clergy would rather have been on the side of the doves,—he explained to us that following his 22 years experience, in Viet Nam, he would consider it a catastrophe—and that is the word he used—if the United States would withdraw from that part of the world without first securing certain conditions as they seem determined to require at the present time.

[Mr. Mongrain.]

• (9:20 p.m.)

It is true that we are all concerned about this war, that we find it dreadful, that we wish it would end as soon as possible, but we must be fair and I think it is dishonest to be always blaming the Americans only for its length and atrocity.

However, Mr. Chairman, this injustice could perhaps incite the government of Canada, which cannot do much at the present time, to act as the guiding light, as it were, of the nations involved in this conflict. This is perhaps the time for us to re-examine to some extent our international policies and our military commitments to other countries.

This may be the time for us to ask ourselves whether Canada, instead of intensifying its war effort, would not be better advised to take the necessary steps to gain credit with the nations of the world, as a peace agent or as a foster-father to the underdeveloped countries, as a neutral arbitrator in international disputes.

In order to do this, Mr. Chairman, we should of necessity revise not only our present military commitments with other countries, but also, and to quite an extent, our economic policies, because we know that to a large degree our economy is based on the production of war machinery, ammunition and equipment. I know this could not be achieved on a short term basis; I know it might entail a revolution of sorts in methods we had reason to adopt until now; I know it would probably entail planning a revision of our economy and our scientific research, which is also based to a large degree on the war industry; and orienting them towards peace industries.

This is a process which may not materialize before ten years, because I know that it is a field where drastic changes cannot be made overnight. We cannot change our habits so rapidly and reduce the military estimates to nearly nothing; I know that, on the contrary, it will require a systematic and extensive review. But I wonder, Mr. Chairman, whether the time has not come for Canada to take such action, because there are, in fact, very few countries that could enjoy the confidence of all the countries in the world, that could act as neutral arbitrators, peacemakers, in such conflicts, and not be suspected of having favoured one of the parties involved.

I understand, Mr. Chairman, that it implies a kind of revolution which cannot be launched aimlessly, but I still say that in the time in which we live, it might be a role better suited to our position and to our thinking. We could fulfill the duties of good samaritans to the world, thus winning the trust of the people who today are quite concerned about what is happening in the world and wonder whether it is not the beginning of the end of time. In fact, it is a natural and instinctive reaction to feel terrified at the thought of the destructive power of nuclear weapons which goes beyond the wildest imagination.

Once again, Mr. Chairman, I am in favour of a revision of our policies and when I say that I have the impression, that the conscience of the Secretary of State for External Affairs is somewhat moved, because we know him, in this house and in the country, as a man of peace, who may not have in his hands at the present time everything which is necessary to revolutionize drastically and quickly the thinking of Canada but who, in the long run, might consider a re-examination of our habits in the sense which I mentioned earlier.

For the time being, Mr. Chairman, I think that any non-partisan and objective person who sincerely wishes a settlement of that unfortunate conflict, will recognize that the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs in his statement this evening which in fact is only a repetition of at least two or three other statements made here or at the United Nations, has taken a stand which seems to me realistic, responsible, rational, frank and courageous, under the circumstances, and which in my opinion, will be perfect if, during the next five or ten years, we would not only rethink our military effort, but also redirect it, as a good samaritan would, so that our efforts for peace be really effective.

[English]

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to detain the house, but just prior to six o'clock I made a few brief remarks on these estimates. At that time I referred to that senior official of the Seafarers International Union in the United States, that criminal, that gangster, that fugitive from justice, Harold Chamberlain Banks. In all kindness I should like to ask the minister if he can report to the house whether he has had any favourable response to his protest to the Secretary of State of the United States. I should also like to ask him whether he will look into the suggestion I made at the request of some other people, with regard to this incident.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I will do that, Mr. Chairman. We have asked the United States to reconsider the ruling, as my hon. friend knows. We have been advised that they are now examining the note we delivered last Thursday. I have not had an official reply.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, on this discussion of the estimates of the Department of External Affairs I feel it would be unfortunate if I should let go this opportunity to discuss the current Canadian position on Rhodesia. I know from recent statements that this government is prepared to support further restrictive sanctions against that de facto government, in spite of the very obvious failure of the existing policy to bring down the government of Mr. Ian Smith, to improve the conditions of the African majority of that land, to add at all to the peace, security and stability of that region of Africa, or to bring forth any thanks or commendation from the African nations in the rest of the continent. The policy is one guaranteed to fail and one that we can criticize on a variety of grounds. Mr. John Sparrow, writing in the Sunday Times of London referred to Jonathan Swift and gave an example of what he would say were he alive today and viewing the Rhodesian situation. John Sparrow says:

> It is plain, too, on which side his feelings would lie in Rhodesia: the attacks he launched in "The Drapier's Letters" upon a government who, by oppressing the English ascendancy increased the miseries of the native Irish, would be deployed against a policy aimed at British settlers, only to intensify the hardships of the Africans—"Take care lest the severities you are so eager to inflict upon your kith and kin are not visited on the wretches whose well-being you profess to have at heart. No native in all the land will eat a crust of bread the more because you have taken away the cake from the table of his betters."

It seems to me that this is a very true comment on the situation in Rhodesia, and one which should give Canadians pause to think at a time when we make suggestions that this policy be intensified.

Then we could read from a statement by Elspeth Huxley when writing a letter from Africa entitled "Entering 1968". She is an author of considerable talent and ability, and one who knows the continent very thoroughly. She says this about the situation in Rhodesia:

• (9:30 p.m.)

> The third major tragedy of 1967 has been a total failure to cut through the Rhodesian knot. If to increase the real wealth of Africa is the one thing that really matters, those responsible for keeping on the sanctions policy should be prosecuted for the crime of wilful impoverishment. While sanctions have failed either to bankrupt Rhodesia or to dislodge Mr. Smith, they have succeeded in slowing down, and in some cases reversing, the country's development. Rhodesia could be producing more meat, more maize, more of many things needed by the world's hungry people. To prevent this is a crime against humanity considerably blacker than withholding the vote from a majority of Africans until a fairly basic level of education qualifies them to exercise it. If Britain, the United States and other countries had pumped in oil, and bought all Rhodesia could produce, more Africans would by now have got to the voters' rolls and majority rule would have been that much nearer, instead of even further away. As it is, everyone has lost, most of all the Africans.

She then goes on to say:

It is not even as if Britain was buying African goodwill with her lost trade. She is buying nothing but abuse and contempt, coupled with a demand for more aid without the least wisp of string attached.

Again I think we might give considerable thought to that statement. We might also take the word of an authority that perhaps even the hon. minister would recognize as being anything but right wing. This is the word of an outstanding person in today's world. I speak of Helen Suzman, the progressive representative in the parliament of the Union of South Africa, the sole representative of that political party. In the Sunday Times of August 13, 1967 she was asked:

You and your friends wouldn't like to see force used at this point?

This was in reference to Rhodesia. She replied:

I really do not think you could accomplish anything by using force. You have to realize, too, that if you go against the people who are in power in Rhodesia it is more than just putting things down by force: you have to realize that you have to face the situation thereafter, of armies, of occupation, and other untenable prospects.

When she was speaking of the attitude of South Africa toward Rhodesia she said:

There is no doubt that Smith has lasted much longer than people, myself included, thought he would. I think to a large extent he has more or less won his battle.

Then finally on South Africa, again in relation to Rhodesia, she said:

I also do not believe that anyone can impose anything from outside today on South Africa. The changes, if they are to be lasting, and viable, have to come from within.

[Mr. Johnston.]

Yet we have set on a course to attempt to force change from without against knowledgeable and expert advice from people who know Africa best, and against the best interests of the very people we purport to be assisting. What thanks do we get? Are we able to influence any African nation to follow the path that we would like to see them follow? The record of the last few months has been laughable. Has there been a moment when the Canadian government has dared to suggest to the government of Kenya that it end its policy of apartheid against the Asians resident in that land? Would we have the courage or the nerve to challenge these people with sanctions? The answer of course is no. We say we will do what we can to ease the problems of refugess from that land. We dare not suggest any change in the governmental policy there which would ease the problems of those people who are fleeing that land and who, by their flight, will bring it to an economic depression or an economic situation which will result in a request to us to provide aid in order to repair the damage they are busy doing themselves. This will be aid, over and above the taking in of some thousands of refugess.

When the neighbouring country of Uganda follows the same policy will we be able to raise one small voice of protest? Will we be able to remind them of the sanctions we placed on Rhodesia? We have done everything we can to develop that policy of sanctions. We have interested ourselves in southwest Africa. We have driven South Africa out of the commonwealth of nations. We have done all of these things and we have never wavered from our misguided policy in respect of Africa. Will we be able to ask Uganda to listen to us? The answer again is no. We will not even dare make a suggestion, and if we did it would not be listened to. We will be faced in a couple of years time with the problem of opening our doors again to another group of refugees, this time from Uganda.

What about that incident in the country of Gabon? The really important thing about this is not what it does to our internal trouble or what we might think of the government of France. The important thing is that it underlines more dramatically than anything else that our entire policy in Africa over the last 10 or 15 years has gained us not a single friend in that country. We needed one at the time of this incident. The Gabon people could have said to France: We cannot possibly slight this government in Ottawa because it has stood so resolutely and so long for African nationalism. Is this what happened? The answer again is no. The government in Canada was snubbed and slighted and received no thanks for the stand it held so stubbornly.

Would we as Canadians have dared to appeal to the government of Malawi to ease its pressure on the religious group, the Jehovah Witnesses, in that country? Has this government listened to the representations to use its good influences with that state on behalf of this religious sect, which is being persecuted there now? The answer again is no. Not only would we be afraid and hesitate even to suggest such a thing to them, but there is no good will on which to rely. Nothing has been gained from our policy in Rhodesia and in South Africa through the years.

We have no influence with the governments of the undeveloped nations, of Africa, many of which are far more sophisticated politically than is this government in Ottawa. They know that this government will never change its policies, so they are free to advocate a course of democratic freedom at the United Nations and to practise whatever policy they wish against their own people in Africa.

Dare we involve ourselves in the apartheid that is being practised in Nigeria at the present time? We may wring our hands and deplore the unhappy situation there. I noticed an appeal on behalf of Biafran refugees from Africa landed on my desk recently. It was endorsed by various members of this chamber. We know that because of the very policies that this government has followed so long, we have no influence in Nigeria.

• (9:40 p.m.)

We have been so busy attacking the governments of South Africa and Rhodesia that we have shut our eyes entirely to the evils of apartheid being practised in other sections of the same continent. I hold no brief at all for apartheid, but I believe that our policy in the southern regions of South Africa should be one of far greater realism than the one we have been so wishfully and wistfully following for so long. I think we would be of far greater assistance to all the peoples of Africa, black and white, if we were to follow a policy that improved the development of that part of the world and ended our policy of sanctions, because it is useless, wasteful and damaging to the very people it is designed to help. We could go so far as to recognize the existing government of Rhodesia.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 10c carry?

Mr. Prittie: Mr. Chairman, I rise only to ask the minister whether he is going to make any statement or reply concerning the points about external aid which I raised, and which my colleague the hon. member for Springfield raised this afternoon. I should like at sometime to have some comments from the minister on this subject.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, the agencies of the United Nations, as my hon. friend so well knows, are particularly well placed to render assistance in the field of family planning and to assist countries which request it. The United Nations development program, the World Health Organization and UNICEF are all in one way or the other attacking the problem of family planning at the request of the less developed countries. The Canadian government is of course a major contributor to the budgets of these organizations, and we are taking an increasing and definite interest in this matter.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, could I ask one question of the minister? Has the Canadian government made any representation to the government of Malawi on behalf of the Jehovah's Witnesses group there, who have alleged a policy of religious persecution being waged against them in recent months?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, we have complained of discrimination against various religious bodies in a number of countries. I cannot say offhand whether we have in this particular instance, but I will make immediate inquiries. If representations have been made to us, or we are made aware of such representations, we do take strong action.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I would like to take advantage of the study of the supplementary estimates of the Department of External Affairs to deal with something new, a matter widely discussed during the last month.

I mean the incident between Canada and Gabon, a small African country with a population of approximately 575,000 inhabitants, that is hardly more than that of Quebec city and its suburbs. One day the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) tells us that relations between Canada and Gabon have been broken off.

I would like to say, Mr. Chairman, first of all that diplomatic relations between Canada and Gabon were never established. The ambassador for Gabon had yet to present his credentials to the government in Ottawa, just as the Canadian ambassador had to present his to the government of Gabon. Still, we are told: We are breaking our relations.

Canada, which has seldom used that formula in the past, like a Don Quixote at the conquest of a windmill, suddenly says it breaks off relations which had never existed, with a very small country, Gabon. That almost takes on an international aspect. What must be done? Is Canada going to declare war on Gabon? The fact remains that relations are broken off which never existed.

Can the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs explain to us how this new formula works out in international affairs? How can relations be broken off when they have never existed? Indeed, it is a mystery to me how relations can be broken off which have yet to be established.

But, before giving the hon. minister time to answer this question, I should like to speak about the fundamental problem.

There are two conflicts in this overall problem. The first opposes the Ottawa government and the Quebec government; the second the Ottawa government and the government of Gabon.

The conflict between the Ottawa government and the Quebec government is as follows: A meeting of the ministers of education of French-speaking countries is being held in Gabon. Quebec says: Under the British North America Act, education is a provincial matter, and therefore, falls within the Quebec jurisdiction, as Quebec is the only French-speaking province in Canada. As education is a provincial matter: it falls to Quebec to attend and take part in those meetings on education which group French-speaking countries.

On the other hand, the federal government says: Yes, but this is external relations, because an invitation is extended by a sovereign country, Gabon, to another sovereign country, Canada; this is therefore a question of external relations. Now, as external relations are the responsibility of the federal government, the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs for Canada tells us: Gabon should have invited the federal government.

However, the purpose of that meeting was not to deal with international matters or external relations, but with educational problems common to French-speaking countries. In order to achieve that aim, the ministers of education had to get together and to that end, invitations had to be sent from one country to the other.

The invitation which brought about that conflict is only a means of achieving that purpose, namely to discuss problems concerning education which comes under provincial jurisdiction. Who is right, then? Is it the provincial authorities who look after education or the federal authorities who felt entitled to get the invitation? Which point is more important? Is it the discussion on education or the invitation to the conference? Undoubtedly, it was a discussion on education, and this concerns Quebec authorities.

The point of view of the government of the province of Quebec was this: in the field of education, the only jurisdiction is provincial. On the other hand, the federal government was affirming its jurisdiction over external affairs. But the only thing that had something to do with this field was the invitation. For Quebec, it was a question of discussing educational matters, over which the provinces, in this case Quebec, have exclusive jurisdiction.

Therefore, this implied nothing essential for Ottawa. In fact, the only thing involved was something purely incidental, that is to say an invitation, whereas for Quebec it had to do with educational matters, therefore with something essential over which the province has jurisdiction.

• (9:50 p.m.)

The conflict between Ottawa and the Republic of Gabon stems from the fact that Gabon did not invite the minister of education in Ottawa, since it sent invitations to the ministers of education of French-speaking countries. Since there is no minister of education in Ottawa, Gabon could not invite anyone from the federal department. On the other hand, if Gabon had invited the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs, he could not have attended the talks on education in Libreville, because he is not a minister of education but the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The invitation was not extended to ministers of external affairs but only to ministers of education, and how could the minister of education in Ottawa have been invited when he does not exist? If the Libreville government had sent an invitation addressed to the hon. minister of education, Ottawa, Canada, the letter would have been returned with the mention: wrong address, since there is no minister of education in Ottawa.

If such an invitation had been sent to the federal minister of education, what could Ottawa have done? Return it with the following explanation: Excuse us, but there is no such individual in Ottawa. Then, nobody would have been invited to represent Quebeckers at the meeting of the ministers of education of French-speaking countries.

What minister of the federal government could Libreville invite? Surely not the Minister of Justice (Mr. Trudeau) who was quite ready to advocate the breaking off of negotiations! Moreover, it was not a meeting of the Ministers of Justice. It was not, furthermore, a meeting of the Ministers of National Defence, of Prime Ministers or Ministers of Finance, because it was a meeting of ministers of education and there is no such post in Ottawa. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux) could not be invited, because he would have spoken about Bomarcs and nuclear weapons.

The invitation had to be sent to a minister of education. And there is no such minister in Ottawa. Therefore, the invitation was sent to the right place, at the provincial level, and it would have been a mistake to send it to Ottawa where there is no such minister. But there is a minister in charge of French education in Quebec and the invitation was sent to him.

Therefore, disagreement between Ottawa and Quebec was as unwarranted as disagreement between Ottawa and Gabon. It was a storm in a teapot, it was picking a quarrel needlessly, breaking off relations which did not exist, and that problem which should never have arisen was all in the minds of Ottawa officials. There are enough problems in Ottawa without trying to create new ones. Each minister tries to make problems for himself and it would seem that they try to outdo each other in that respect.

An hon. Member: Quebec also.

Mr. Grégoire: Now that everything is over, that everything has been done, that relations that never existed have been broken off, the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) announces that Ottawa had suggested that the invitation be sent to Ottawa, that a Canadian delegation participate to a conference of French speaking countries on education, and that Ottawa could have appointed a Quebec minister as head of the Canadian delegation to that meeting of education ministers. Such a suggestion, it seems to me, must have been embarrassing coming from a Canadian Prime Minister. How is it that the Prime Minister of Canada has felt compelled to seek a simple minister, in a simple province, to appoint him as head of the Canadian delegation? There is something contradictory there, something that good federalists like the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development (Mr. Sauvé) could not accept. I know that the minister would not have gone there because rural development was not a topic of discussion there.

The Quebec government denied having received such a proposal from the Ottawa government, and even if it had received it, it would have found it unacceptable. Indeed, it would have been unthinkable, in my opinion, that the Quebec minister of education should accept to take part in a conference on education as spokesman for the federal government, which has no authority, no jurisdiction in that field.

In view of these facts, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say that the Secretary of State for External Affairs made a serious blunder on that occasion. I consider him competent in other fields but in the Gabon incident, he has, it seems to me, been adversely influenced by other persons. I see that the minister would like to say a few words on that subject and I conclude in expressing the hope that the Quebec government will accept the proposal made by the hon. member for Dorion, Mr. François Aquin, who said that the Quebec government, in order to correct the situation, should open a Quebec house in Libreville—for the whole of Africa—such as the ones that already exist in Paris, London and Milan. Thus, the injustice toward a small and peace-minded country would be rectified.

Therefore, I hope that the Quebec government will be able to rectify the colossal blunder made by the federal government and that the Quebec government will establish a Quebec house in Libreville, so as to represent this country in all of Africa.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: This completes the estimates of the Department of External Affairs. It being ten o'clock, shall I rise, report the resolutions adopted and ask leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the government house leader in what order the supplementary estimates will be considered tomorrow.

Mr. MacEachen: The supplementary estimates will be considered in the order listed, beginning with the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, followed by the Department of Defence Production and the Department of Industry under the same minister, and then the estimates of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. I should like to point out that if by the end of the afternoon the consideration of the estimates of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is not completed, I will call the estimates of the departments which I have already mentioned.

• (10:00 p.m.)

Mr. Starr: I should like to ask a question so that we may know tomorrow when we consider the estimates of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs whether, in view of the fact a board will be set up to review costs and prices, it is the intention of the minister to introduce an amendment to reduce some of these estimates?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to interfere with the answer to that question, but I have one I should like to ask as well.

[Mr. Grégoire.]

Could we be informed tomorrow, before we begin consideration of the estimates of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, whether we will be proceeding this week with Bill No. C-190?

Mr. MacEachen: As suggested earlier today, I propose to have a meeting with the house leaders tomorrow morning. Possibly illumination on that point will issue from that meeting.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

CHANGES IN PERSONNEL OF STANDING COMMITTEES

Mr. Bernard Pilon (Chambly-Rouville): May we revert to motions, please, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that we revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pilon moved:

That the name of Mr. Stafford be substituted for the name of Mr. Cowan on the standing committee on broadcasting, films and assistance to the arts.

That the name of Mr. Ryan be substituted for the name of Mr. Cowan on the standing committee on health and welfare.

That the name of Mr. Groos be substituted for the name of Mr. Cowan on the standing committee on veterans affairs.

That the name of Mr. Noël be substituted for the name of Mr. Cowan on the joint committee on printing.

That the name of Mr. Caron be substituted for the name of Mr. Cowan on the joint committee on parliamentary restaurant.

That the name of Mr. Patterson be substituted for the name of Mr. Leboe on the standing committee on labour and employment.

That the name of Mr. Addison be substituted for the name of Mr. Goyer on the standing committee on transport and communications.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It has been moved by the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville:

That the name of Mr. Stafford be substituted for the name of Mr. Cowan on the standing committee on broadcasting, films and assistance to the arts.

Shall I dispense?

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Deputy Speaker:

That the name of Mr. Ryan be substituted for the name of Mr. Cowan on the standing committee on health and welfare.

That the name of Mr. Groos be substituted for the name of Mr. Cowan on the standing committee on veterans affairs.

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

That the name of Mr. Noël be substituted for the name of Mr. Cowan on the joint committee on printing.

That the name of Mr. Caron be substituted for the name of Mr. Cowan on the joint committee on parliamentary restaurant.

That the name of Mr. Patterson be substituted for the name of Mr. Leboe on the standing committee on labour and employment.

That the name of Mr. Addison be substituted for the name of Mr. Goyer on the standing committee on transport and communications.

Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask one question before the motion is carried? How is it the hon. member for York-Humber was on so many committees?

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, this motion can be debatable. Since it is past ten o'clock, I ask that the debate on this motion be adjourned until tomorrow.

Under standing order 32 (1)(m), this motion is debatable. I therefore ask that it be adjourned until tomorrow, as there is a matter of principle to be discussed.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being ten o'clock, and there appearing to be objection to the motion now before the house, would the house agree that the motion be considered tomorrow?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—SASKATCHEWAN—RESTRICTION ON FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION UNDER MEDICARE

Mr. L. M. Brand (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, on Monday, February 12, the Prime Minister made a statement in the house regarding the implementation of medicare. In part, and as reported at page 6599 of Hansard, he said:

> Today it remains the concern of the federal government to find the best way in which federal and provincial action can most effectively contribute, once the present legislation has come into effect, to achieve a practical medical care program available to as many Canadians as possible as soon as possible.

He went on to state that the act, with all its ramifications, will come into effect on July 1 of this year, and that at the outset only one or two provinces would participate since only one or two had satisfied the criteria set down by the government of Canada. The province of Saskatchewan will be one of those provinces, Mr. Speaker, and it certainly qualifies under the criteria because since 1962 the government of Saskatchewan has had in effect a comprehensive medical care program.

Coming into the scheme with only one other province, and perhaps another one or two, it cannot of course hope to meet the requirements of portability since the question comes to mind as to where and with whom can such a plan be portable. However, that seems to be beside the point, and I await with interest how the present government plans or intends to implement this particular part of the medicare criteria.

However, Mr. Speaker, as I read the Prime Minister's remarks it does seem clear that the Prime Minister wishes federal funds to be used to provide medical care for citizens of our individual qualifying provinces; but nowhere has the government stated unequivocally that the funds to be provided for medical care to the provinces will be grants conditional upon their use for the provision of payment of physicians' services or other essential portions of the medical care program.

As a consequence, Mr. Speaker, on March 12 I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether the money designated for Saskatchewan under the medical care program becoming effective July 1 would be designated for use for medical care only. I asked this question for a very valid reason indeed. Under the medical care legislation passed in Saskatchewan in 1962, the government of Saskatchewan has the power to introduce deterrent fees or other fiscal measures designed to deter citizens from making use of the medical care plan, and thus save the government money.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

Recently in Saskatchewan the government has stated that the costs of medicare are rising so rapidly that it would be necessary to introduce a deterrent fee of $1.50 per patient per office visit in order to save approximately $5 million which the government—and I quite believe this—claims it does not have. This money is necessary to meet the increase in costs of medical care in Saskatchewan. This deterrent fee will start on April 15. In addition, Mr. Speaker, $2.50 will be charged the average patient for every day that he is in hospital.

Since it seems obvious that such catastrophic deterrent fees will penalize those who are least able to pay, surely it is equally obvious that if this government will state unequivocally that the grants for medical care are conditional upon their use for medical care only in the province of Saskatchewan and other provinces, this will obviate the necessity for the introduction of this deterrent fee.

Since the amount coming to Saskatchewan in one year will be somewhere in the $12 million to $14 million range, this would mean that this year somewhere in the neighbourhood of $6 million would be available for the people of Saskatchewan and would save them from the imposition of deterrent fees. It would also save them from the burden of additional double taxation.

An answer at this time from the minister, or from his charming parliamentary secretary, would mean a great deal not only to the people of our province but to the people of every province. It would prevent an indiscriminate use of medical care funds for the purpose of balancing provincial budgets which have been overburdened by other expenditure on such things as highways, public buildings and the like. So I ask the minister through his parliamentary secretary to do the people of Saskatchewan a favour and assure them that the federal medical care funds will be used and designated for the purpose for which they were intended, namely the provision of medical care for the people not only of Saskatchewan but in every part of Canada.

• (10:10 p.m.)

Mrs. Margaret Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the payments made by the federal government to a province under the Medical Care Act are based on the national average per capita cost actually incurred by the medical care plans of all participating provinces in payments to medical practitioners for insured services provided to insured residents of those provinces.

Consequently the federal financial contribution during any fiscal year is a reimbursement of moneys actually spent during that fiscal year and there is no designation as to what use the province must put it.

Co-insurance charges payable by or on behalf of an individual patient are not recognized as provincial costs in determining the national average per capita cost.

IMMIGRATION—ADMISSION OF SEASONAL FARM LABOUR FROM WEST INDIES

Mr. J. E. Madill (Dufferin-Simcoe): My question goes to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and it relates to the subject I raised on Thursday, March 14—the bringing in of seasonal labour from the West Indies. My supplementary question, when I asked why the minimum wage rate had been so drastically increased, was ruled out of order.

To preface my remarks I should like to place on record telegrams received from growers and distributors of vegetables in the Bradford and Holland Marsh area which are nationally known. There is no end to the number of these telegrams; I shall place only a few of them on record so that the minister may understand how urgent this question is; the growing season is fast approaching and greenhouse work is being carried out in preparation for the coming crop and in anticipation of this labour being used.

The first telegram reads:

> Strenuously object to minimum hourly rate of $1.45 for West Indies casual labour. This will only speed up the primary producers being forced out of business and raise the living cost of our population. These people are happy to work for our minimum rate of $1.25. If impossible to change suggest discontinue unemployment benefits for months prior to November to divert local labour for the harvest.

This comes from Springdale Farms at Bradford. Another telegram of the same nature comes from Hillside Gardens, Bradford:

> We strongly object to hourly rate of $1.45 for West Indies casual labour. With transportation and housing etc. this comes to two dollars plus. Would be happy to use Canadian labour for this short period of time if available.

The following telegram was sent by Federal Farms:

> Vigorously protest increase imposed for West Indian farm labour. Rate in addition to transportation, free housing, far exceeds minimum wage set by government and local rates. This increase confirmed the entire immigration program established could be in jeopardy. Our minimum muck soil acreage is 400.

In drawing attention to this subject I am working in co-operation with the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. McCutcheon) and the hon. member for Kent (Ont.) (Mr. Danforth). I find in the Windsor Star of Tuesday, March 12 an article headed: "Jamaicans' pay increase hit". It is a long article, but it reads in part:

In addition to a guaranteed minimum of $58 a week, the Jamaicans are provided with living accommodation and their fare to and from Jamaica by plane, which is $140 return on charter flights and $275 return when they have to be carried on regular flights.

The experience of employers in 1967 was that Jamaicans employed on a piecework basis on tomatoes and apples earned more than the $145 minimum.

In the same article a Hamilton union chief is reported to have protested to the Ontario department of labour that Jamaican workers were ill paid and ill housed while they were in Ontario. The writer continues:

The most significant part of the protest was that the official misrepresented all the conditions under which Jamaican workers are allowed into Canada.

He even indicated that workers brought in had to pay their own air fare, when actually the only deductions made for this purpose are made at the request of the government authorities in Jamaica, who want to recover transportation costs of workers from Trinidad and other islands to Jamaica, before they embark for Canada.

With the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) speaking of restraints and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Turner) studying a chain of food stores, I cannot understand how the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) can act in this way, adding further to the costs of producers and merchandisers who have to compete in world markets.

According to the Ottawa Journal of March 15 our jobless total is the highest since 1964. It stated that farm jobs dropped by 23,000 in one month. With 750,000 unemployed I cannot see how raising the wages of these Jamaican workers—some are experienced and some are not—can do anything but make the situation worse. If unemployment insurance were held off for a longer period, to the fall, possibly some of our own unemployed would work to help these market gardeners harvest their crops.

I hope the minister will reconsider this matter and retain the minimum wage at $1.25 for these immigrants coming in as casual labour. I would point out that these people are expecting an answer from me, and I hope the minister can do something about the matter.

Hon. B. S. Mackasey (Member of the Administration): Mr. Speaker, in the brief time at my disposal I shall try to acquaint the hon. member as to how this minimum figure was arrived at. On March 1 the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) announced that in the summer of 1968 we will once again admit seasonal agricultural workers from the West Indies to help with harvesting of crops in southwestern Ontario. This decision was not an easy one. There are indications that Canadian workers available for seasonal work in agriculture, especially students, will have more difficulty in finding summer jobs than last year. In fact this question was raised very recently by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt).

The decision to go ahead with the off-shore labour program was made in spite of these indications. It was reached only because of the inherent difficulties in forecasting precisely the demand-supply relationship for a relatively small geographic area and for a type of work which is subject to fluctuations caused by climatic conditions.

The minister is very much aware of the dangers involved. If next summer there are Canadians asking for jobs, and not getting them, in the areas where there are West Indian workers under contract, he will be criticized for giving unfair treatment to Canadian labour. On the other hand, if there is a shortage of labour he will be equally criticized.

The conditions under which Canadian farmers can bring in West Indian workers this year are unchanged from last year. These conditions are not arbitrary. They were carefully reviewed with provincial representatives at a recent meeting of the federal-provincial agricultural manpower committee. The committee also reviewed the analysis made by the department of last year's movement, which revealed that the cost-benefit ratio for the West Indian workers compared well with that for domestic labour.

The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Madill) will certainly agree that it would be irresponsible to relax the conditions even more than they were last year, in view of the manpower forecasts and other warnings. These conditions remain the same. The starting and departure dates for these workers are the same as last year. The maximum duration of four months for their stay in Canada was retained in spite of the fact that last year West Indian workers on average stayed here for only eight to 12 weeks. The cost of transportation as distributed between the workers, their governments and the Canadian employers was also left unchanged. Now, I think this is the significant part.

The minimum wage rate as set for 1968 had to be adjusted if we wanted to retain the same conditions as in the last two years. It is based on two separate sets of statistics published by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. In 1966, the first year of the West Indian program, the minimum rate of $1.25 was based on the January 1965 daily wage rate, without board, that Ontario farmers paid their permanent help. This Ontario rate increased by 17.1 per cent in the next years. As a result we had to increase the 1968 rate for West Indian workers by the same percentage to $1.45.

Only a few days ago the Dominion Bureau of Statistics published more recent data. According to this report Ontario farmers in January 1966, paid their workers $1.25 an hour, which corresponds exactly to the rate we set in that year for West Indian workers. In January of this year the Ontario farmers paid an average $1.44 per hour, which again corresponds closely to the rate we set of $1.45 for West Indian workers for the coming season.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must advise the minister that the time allotted to him has expired.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.22 p.m.

APPENDIX

COMMUNIQUÉ AND PRESS RELEASES FOLLOWING MEETING OF CENTRAL BANK GOVERNORS

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Ottawa, March 17, 1968

68-37

The Honourable Mitchell Sharp, Minister of Finance, tonight welcomed the decisions announced in the communique issued in Washington today by the Governors of the Central Banks contributing to the Gold Pool. He noted the subsequent statement issued by the Governor of the Bank of Canada in which the Governor said the Bank of Canada would cooperate in the policies set forth in that communique, as other Central Banks had been invited to do. The Minister stated that he had assured the Governor of his support of this policy, which would apply to the gold held by the Bank on behalf of the Minister of Finance as part of Canada's official reserves.

The co-operation in the policies set forth in the Washington communique will not require any change in the practices that have been followed in the management of Canada's gold reserves, nor any change in the practices followed in the disposition of the output of Canadian gold mines.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Ottawa, March 17, 1968

68-33

The Honourable Mitchell Sharp, Minister of Finance, tonight made public the text of a telegram he had sent to all banks and to other dealers in gold requesting them to continue until further notice the suspension of trading in gold that was instituted on Friday in response to his request Thursday evening.

"In view of the important decisions relating to non-official markets for gold taken in Washington today by the central banks contributing to the gold pool I request that you continue to suspend trading in gold until further notice."

BANK OF CANADA

Ottawa, March 17th, 1968

The Governor of the Bank of Canada, Louis Rasminsky, announced tonight that as part of the large increase in Swap facilities between the Federal Reserve System and other central banks announced in Washington today the reciprocal credit facility between the Bank of Canada and the Federal Reserve System has been increased from $750 million to $1,000 million.

Mr. Rasminsky also stated that in response to the invitation addressed to other central banks in the communique issued at the conclusion of the Washington meeting of the Governors of the central banks of the contributing members of the Gold Pool, the Bank of Canada would co-operate in the policies set forth in that communique.

Communiqué

March 17, 1968.

The Governors of the central banks of Belgium, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the United States met in Washington March 16 and 17, 1968, to examine operations of the Gold Pool, to which they are active contributors. The Managing Director of the International Monetary Fund and the General Manager of the Bank for International Settlements also attended the meeting.

The Governors noted that it is the determined policy of the United States Government to defend the value of the dollar through appropriate fiscal and monetary measures and that substantial improvement of the United States balance of payments is a high priority objective.

They also noted that legislation approved by (U.S.) Congress makes the whole of the gold stock of the nation available for defending the value of the dollar.

They noted that the United States Government will continue to buy and sell gold at the existing price of $35 an ounce in transactions with monetary authorities. The Governors support this policy and believe it contributes to the maintenance of exchange stability.

The Governors noted the determination of the United Kingdom authorities to do all that is necessary to eliminate the deficit in the United Kingdom balance of payments as soon as possible and to move to a position of large and sustained surplus.

Finally, they noted that the governments of most European countries intend to pursue monetary and fiscal policies that encourage domestic expansion consistent with economic stability, avoid as far as possible increases in interest rates or a tightening of money markets, and thus contribute to conditions that will help all countries move toward payments equilibrium.

The Governors agreed to co-operate fully to maintain the existing parities as well as orderly conditions in their exchange markets in accordance with their obligations under the Articles of Agreement of the International Monetary Fund. The Governors believe that henceforth officially-held gold should be used only to effect transfers among monetary authorities and therefore they decided no longer to supply gold to the London gold market or any other gold market. Moreover, as the existing stock of monetary gold is sufficient in view of the prospective establishment of the facility for Special Drawing Rights, they no longer feel it necessary to buy gold from the market. Finally, they agreed that henceforth they will not sell gold to monetary authorities to replace gold sold in private markets.

The Governors agreed to co-operate even more closely than in the past to minimize flows of funds contributing to instability in the exchange markets, and to offset as necessary any such flows that may arise.

In view of the importance of the pound sterling in the international monetary system the Governors have agreed to provide further facilities which will bring the total of credits immediately available to the United Kingdom authorities (including the IMF standby) to $4 billion.

The Governors invite the co-operation by other central banks in the policies set forth above.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

LABOUR AND EMPLOYMENT

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Hugh Faulkner (Peterborough) presented the second report of the standing committee on labour and employment, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

CHANGES IN PERSONNEL OF STANDING COMMITTEES

The house resumed from Monday, March 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pilon:

That the name of Mr. Stafford be substituted for the name of Mr. Cowan on the standing committee on broadcasting, films and assistance to the arts;

That the name of Mr. Ryan be substituted for the name of Mr. Cowan on the standing committee on health and welfare;

That the name of Mr. Groos be substituted for the name of Mr. Cowan on the standing committee on veterans affairs;

That the name of Mr. Noël be substituted for the name of Mr. Cowan on the joint committee on printing;

That the name of Mr. Caron be substituted for the name of Mr. Cowan on the joint committee on the parliamentary restaurant;

That the name of Mr. Patterson be substituted for the name of Mr. Leboe on the standing committee on labour and employment; and

That the name of Mr. Addison be substituted for the name of Mr. Goyer on the standing committee on transport and communications.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words about the motion introduced by the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pilon), whip of the Liberal party.

First of all, it is obvious that it is designed to withdraw his committee membership from the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan), who was a member of several committees.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out that independent members have always been subjected to that sort of discrimination, because they never could be accepted on or appointed to any committee.

I admit the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain) sits on several committees, but for a very simple reason: he is a disguised Liberal.

On the other hand, the former member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard) was not a member of any committee.

I have not been a member of any committee since I have been sitting as an independent.

The member for York-Humber is to suffer the same fate; he is to be kept from sitting on committees. Why? Because he voted against taxes. Because he voted against the Liberal party, he is thrown out and forced to sit as an independent. He is denied the privilege of sitting on committees because he was not good, obedient. Because he did not act like a sheep, his lollipop is to be taken away from him. He is to be denied the right to sit on committees, and denied trips, etc.

• (2:40 p.m.)

In this regard, Mr. Speaker, the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Trudeau) spoke words in 1963 which can characterize the present situation. Indeed, in an article published in the April 1963 issue of "Cité libre" he said, and I quote:

—I wonder about the antidemocratic reflexes of the aboulic Liberal flock.

That is what he said about the Liberal party: "The aboulic Liberal herd" because, at that time, the Liberals were just like a flock, everyone voted like the leader, no one ever strayed from the beaten path and the present Minister of Justice was opposed to that.

Now, here is a member, within the Liberal party, who assumes his responsibilities, who uses his freedom, who acts like a member of parliament rather than a little Liberal sheep, a member of the "aboulic Liberal flock" and who votes according to his conscience. He is immediately thrown out. That justifies the fears expressed by the Minister of Justice when he said:

—I wonder about the antidemocratic reflexes of the aboulic Liberal flock.

It is, therefore, antidemocratic to tell all the Liberals: Vote like your leader, otherwise you get thrown out. That is the democracy of the Liberal party! After throwing them out, an attempt is made to deprive them of their candy, of their lollipops, and they are to be kept from sitting as members of committees.

The hon. Minister of Justice said more than that, Mr. Speaker. In the same article, still speaking about the democracy of the Liberal party, he said:

For the sake of realism and efficiency I had to, God forgive me, occasionally betray some of the revolts of my youth, but I have yet to trample down democracy.

If democracy is not being trampled under foot at the present time, what is happening then?

I hope that the Minister of Justice will protest against the attacks on democracy at the present time, since democracy is now under attack because the hon. member for York-Humber has been ousted from the Liberal party for his refusal to vote according to party line. Efforts are made to turn the Liberals into sheep and get them all to vote with their leader; if they refuse, they are thrown out, they are punished.

The Minister of Justice also said in the same article, and I quote:

The lead sheep having shown the way, the others followed with the elegance of cattle rushing to the feeding-trough.

That is what the Minister of Justice thought of the Liberal party in 1963. He saw it as a flock of sheep, a herd of cattle.

—with the elegance of cattle rushing to the feeding-trough.

Today, the Liberal party is on the point of doing the same thing again. It introduces a motion to increase taxes and forces all its members to vote for it, otherwise it turns them out. The Minister of Justice qualified the antidemocratic actions of the Liberal party like the one they are taking today as follows:

—even if Mr. Pearson was right in changing his mind personally, I should also denounce the autocratic Liberal structures and the extraordinary cowardice of its members.

The Minister of Justice, because he regarded the Liberal party as a flock of sheep, said:

I should also denounce the autocratic Liberal structures and the extraordinary cowardice of its members.

Mr. Speaker, I therefore say this to the members of the Liberal party: That is what the Minister of Justice thinks of you and he will think it even more later, since you are behaving in an undemocratic way by saying: We must vote like the leader, we must vote together with the party, or else we will be thrown out, no more lollipops! The Minister of Justice is calling you a flock of sheep.

I hear one of them bleating: the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay)—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member please direct his remarks to the Chair?

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I want to direct my remarks to the Chair, but what I am doing today is so serious that I cannot help quoting certain statements of the Minister of Justice in order to denounce afterwards the antidemocratic reflexes of the "aboulic Liberal flock".

This is what the Minister of Justice said in a situation like that—

Mr. Schreyer: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Grégoire: Certainly.

Mr. Schreyer: What is the title of the article which he is quoting?

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, that is a good question. It is an article published by the Minister of Justice in the magazine Cité libre of April 1963 under the title: "Pearson or the abdication of the mind."

In that article, the Minister of Justice said, referring to the Liberals:

Tous des caves, ma foi.

In English, we would say: All Liberals are lousy, by God.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Trudeau: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Grégoire: Certainly.

Mr. Trudeau: If the hon. member is ready to take as authority what I wrote about the Liberals at that time, is he also ready to admit what I said about the independentists and Social Crediters?

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I am willing to agree to all that the Minister of Justice was saying then, but since that time he has changed his mind and I can tell you why. In a quotation—

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I remind the hon. member that the motion now before the house does not deal with the Minister of Justice, with what he has said before nor what he is saying today. The hon. member should try to confine himself to the motion now before the house.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I am confining myself to the motion. I am only quoting authorities on the antidemocratic complexes of the "aboulic Liberal flock", to use the words of the Minister of Justice, for I think this is antidemocratic.

The hon. member for York-Humber is not asked for his permission before he is taken off the committees. It is done without his permission, by force of numbers, by force of the "aboulic Liberal flock" which proceeds "with the elegance of cattle rushing to the feeding-trough" as the Minister of Justice said. There is precisely one sentence of the Minister of Justice which clearly condemns those antidemocratic procedures, and I quote:

> I notice in the old Liberal guard, the same cynical stupidity—

The old guard consists of those who surround him today, the hon. member for Mercier, (Mr. Boulanger), the hon. member for St. Anne (Mr. Loiselle)—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should confine his remarks to the motion which is before the house for consideration.

Mr. Grégoire: Very well, I shall not mention any name, and I will carry on with my quotation:

> I notice in the Liberal old guard the same cynical stupidity; in the youth associations, I find the same selfish docility, and in between—

This, Mr. Speaker, is the answer to the question which the Minister of Justice asked me.

> —and in between, men of my generation who are trembling with anticipation because they had a glimpse of the painted face of power.

It is the painted face of power and honours which have made the Minister of Justice change his mind since 1963.

Mr. Trudeau: Would the hon. member for Lapointe allow me another question?

Mr. Grégoire: Certainly.

Mr. Trudeau: Has the hon. member joined the independentist party when he thought it might come into power?

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Justice thinks that we shall never come into power, it is all to my credit, because I did not join that party to assume power, but rather to promote ideas.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Grégoire: Whereas in the same article, Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Habel: Long live freedom.

Mr. Grégoire: Another sheep is bleating, Mr. Speaker. In the same article, the Minister of Justice said, and I quote:

> But I have yet to trample down democracy. That is why, on April 8, I intend to vote for the New Democratic party.

Two years later, he was a Liberal party candidate. He is—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. member once again that he must confine himself to the motion before the house.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I would simply like to discuss, and that is not out of order, the antidemocratic action we are taking now. It seems that in the Liberal party one must behave as if one belonged to a flock of little red lambs, if not, out! No more lollipops! No more candy!

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the hon. member for Lapointe?

Mr. Grégoire: Yes, certainly.

Mr. Béchard: Does the hon. member for Lapointe find that the Ralliement Créditiste took antidemocratic action when it threw him out a few years ago?

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows not whereof he speaks for, and I refer him to the statement of my former colleagues, they did not throw me out, I left on my own, and we remained good friends. Perhaps we had differences of opinion, but they did not throw me out, and the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) can tell you so. I was not thrown out by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) nor by anyone else, I left of my own free will, and hon. members opposite know it.

• (2:50 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Yes, yes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, when efforts are made to change a political party into a flock of sheep by telling its members: You will all think the same way; if you refuse, you will no longer be allowed to sit on committees, you will be deprived of your lollipop, what happens then is exactly what the Minister of Justice pointed out in his article, and I quote:

> But what we did not realize clearly enough is the degree of intellectual decay where that is finally leading us. But now Mr. Pearson and the Liberal party are opening our eyes suddenly.

That was the Minister of Justice talking about the Liberal party, two years before becoming a member of that party of "decay", that party which he called antidemocratic.

They want nobody to depart from the party line, or else, out. The Minister of Justice was condemning this partisanship which prevents an individual from thinking for himself.

Because the hon. member for York-Humber voted against taxes, he is thrown out. They do not want him to have his own ideas, and now, they want to keep him from sitting on committees.

Here is how the Minister of Justice condemned this situation, and I quote:

> Thus, the political philosophy of the Liberal party is very simple—

I would like Liberals to listen carefully to what the Minister of Justice thinks of the political philosophy of the Liberal party!

> Say anything, think anything; or, better still, do not think at all; but bring us into power for we can provide the best government.

Therefore, if you are a Liberal, think anything you want or, better still, do not think at all. That is what the hon. Minister of Justice says. I will end by saying, of the Liberals, that they are:

> All lousy, by God!

"All lousy" that is what the hon. Minister of Justice says of the Liberals, Mr. Speaker. When one of them asserts himself, as did the hon. member for York-Humber, he is thrown out. One would think the Liberal party only likes lousy members, as the hon. Minister of Justice called them. Mr. Speaker, you are an exception. I know that you have been a member of the Liberal party. I make an exception for you.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Grégoire: The others, Mr. Speaker, as the hon. Minister of Justice said quite rightly, are "all lousy". If one of them protests, as did the hon. member for York-Humber, it does not work.

[Mr. Grégoire.]

Mr. Speaker, I would like to say this: they are trying to prevent us, the independent members, from sitting on committees. I would rather not have the lollipops and sweets offered by the Liberal party and keep my freedom. I am far from holding the same political views as the hon. member for York-Humber. We disagree about almost everything. We do not have the same political ideology. We do not think the same way, but at least I respect a man who refuses to be one of the sheep in the flock, a man who, even if he does not think the way I do, has his own opinions. We are among those who would rather be free than belong, as the hon. Minister of Justice said, to an "aboulic Liberal flock".

Mr. Speaker, I would say to the hon. member for York-Humber that it is better for him to be free than to belong to what the Minister of Justice calls a flock of sheep or a bunch of lousy people.

As for the Liberals, they now know what the Minister of Justice thinks about them and I was not the one who said so.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows that according to a rule of the standing orders, there can be no repetition and I think that if he reads over his speech to-morrow, he will realize that he has repeated too often the same words and the same arguments.

Mr. Grégoire: Please do believe, Mr. Speaker that the Minister of Justice made that reference several times in his article. He mentioned seven or eight times—more often than myself—that the Liberals were sheep.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please, The hon. member seems to have completed his argument; I therefore invite him to bring his speech to a close.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I am willing to come to an agreement with you. Instead of continuing my remarks, I shall ask the authorization to publish as an appendix to Hansard the text of the article of the hon. Minister of Justice, and then I shall resume my seat.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Grégoire: Naturally, Mr. Speaker, the unanimous consent of the house is required.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that the document could only be published that way with the unanimous consent of the house, and I doubt very much that this consent can be given.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

As far as I am concerned, I am willing to give my consent provided the articles are also published in which I spoke of the Conservative party, notably of the former leader of the Conservative party as well—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Trudeau: —as what I said concerning the New Democratic party and the Social Credit party.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I suggest we return to a little bit of order.

Mr. Starr: Did you say anything about yourself?

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): What a leader you would make.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I was ready to sit down provided the members agreed to publish the article in Hansard, but you said consent was not unanimous in the house.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, this is what I wish to say in conclusion. The Liberal party should realize that it is disgraceful to act in this way. It is not because a member, who has been elected democratically, rises and speaks his mind that we should try and punish him, because everybody is entitled to his own opinion. Why tell him: "You will not sit on committees"? We must not try and punish him in this way. It is antidemocratic and the hon. Minister of Justice and Attorney General is against antidemocratic gestures, against antidemocratic reactions.

Therefore, I object to the motion. I think that it is a shame to act in this way. Such actions have been condemned by the hon. Minister of Justice and now I, myself, condemn them too. I ask that for once, we stop considering the members as mere sheep, as a flock.

Therefore, I say to the Liberals: "Try to have a little backbone." Stop crawling on all fours like curly sheep and try to hold your head back and think for yourself. In other words, and I close my remarks with this sentence: Stop being, as the hon. Minister of Justice said, lousy Liberals.

[English]

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I may not be in complete agreement with all the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Lapointe, but I am in agreement with some of them. It seems to me that it would have been in the best interests of the Liberal party not to have advanced this motion today after it was opposed in the house last night. There is some talk about a desire to conclude the business of the house; therefore it seems foolish to get into what appears to be a fundamental argument. This motion really asks us to undo something done by the house, not by the Liberal party. The Liberal party, as other parties, nominates those who are to sit on committees. These nominations are presented to the house in the form of motions, and these motions are normally routine. It is odd to see a motion of this type on the order paper.

In this particular case we should look at the attendance record of this member on committees. He has been on a large number of committees, and at the moment is being removed from membership on seven.

Some hon. Members: Five.

Mr. Peters: I stand corrected. My arithmetic never was very good. However, five is a sizeable number of committees. I believe this member has taken a very active part in the proceedings of those committees. There are some who disagree with the contentions he has put forward there, but I believe he has been faithful in his attendance.

• (3:00 p.m.)

I believe, Mr. Speaker, the government has been very foolish in bringing forward this motion at this time. The matter will come to a vote, and the members of the house will have to make an issue of it. The hon. member for York-Humber is not one of those who has prevented a quorum from being formed in committees of which he is a member; as far as my personal experience is concerned he has always arrived promptly and, if anything, the complaint has been that he has taken up more than his share of time in those committees. Nevertheless, this is an indication that he has been very interested and active in the committees concerned.

Another problem is this, Mr. Speaker. If after having been appointed a member of a particular committee by his party, for some reason that has nothing to do with the operation of the committee the member has a disagreement with his party colleagues, then I think it is incumbent upon this house to decide whether any change should be made in the personnel of the committee.

This particular motion, Mr. Speaker, is not the usual type that is moved to effect changes in the personnel of standing committees, maintaining the balance on those committees as between government and opposition representatives. In this particular case the house is being asked to endorse what is an internal question, and for that reason I think this motion falls into a different category. It seems to me that unless a member of a committee is guilty of some act that warrants the chairman of that committee asking the house for his removal, changes in committees should not be made in this manner. The issue here is an internal one and should not be dealt with in this way.

Another problem that will have soon to be faced is the representation of independent members on committees. For years there has been a role for independents in this house. Many independents return to the political parties from which they departed. There is usually a fundamental reason behind the move in the first place. For example, I am sure all members recall the recent voluntary exile of one member from one of the parties in this house, owing to extreme personal reasons, reasons which were matters for his own conscience. As long as that member was of the opinion that he should serve on committees, I think the party from whence he came would have agreed to allow him to remain on those committees.

However, Mr. Speaker, there are other members who have become independents who have departed their parties on far less favourable terms and certainly with less good will, and as a result have been sent to Coventry and isolated from their ex-colleagues. I think such a decision on the part of an individual member does not warrant the isolation of that member. As I say, if the members of a particular committee do not see fit to name one of their members and bring the dispute in question before the house for decision, then the matter should not be put before the house in this way, with the house being asked to endorse the disposition of an internal dispute within one political party.

I also believe, Mr. Speaker, that in presenting this motion the Liberal party could not have used poorer political judgment if they had tried. I think they have elected the hon. member for York-Humber for some years to come as a result of the action they have taken. I do not think I am revealing any confidences when I say it has been suggested to me on several occasions over the past ten years that I take certain voluntary action. In this regard I am sure I am not alone; other members of the house have also felt strongly about particular matters.

With perhaps three or four days of the session remaining, Mr. Speaker, I think it is very poor judgment on the part of the Liberal party to take this step, at a time when they should be trying to present a unified front to the country. Certainly I hope the members of the house take this matter seriously.

Mr. McIlraith: May I ask whether the hon. member will accept a question?

Mr. Peters: Certainly.

Mr. McIlraith: I have been following his argument rather closely. Is he arguing that this house and the members of other parties should choose what particular members of the New Democratic party should represent that party on different committees? That is the logical conclusion to be drawn from his argument. Is that what he intends to argue?

Mr. Peters: No, Mr. Speaker, and I apologize if that is the impression I have left. What I said was that it was the right of the individual parties to choose who shall represent them on the various committees. I presume they choose their members on the basis of particular abilities for particular committees. However, I suggest that this principle is not being followed in the presentation of this motion. The hon. member for York-Humber was nominated by his party to five committees. What the party is now doing is disqualifying the hon. member from attending those committees simply because he has been involuntarily deprived of his membership of the Liberal party and now has the status of an independent member.

My point is that the house as a whole agreed with the nomination of the hon. member by the Liberal party. Although I believe each party has the right to make its own nominations, what the Liberal party is now doing is taking disciplinary action against the hon. member and changing a decision previously made. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this is not a decision the Liberal party can make; it is now a matter for the house to decide. One of my colleagues has pointed out to me that it will take five Liberals to take the place of the hon. member; certainly that is the effect of the motion now before us.

The Liberal party, the New Democratic party, the Conservative party and the other parties in the house, as parties, have a very cosy arrangement for appointing members to committees. But, Mr. Speaker, eventually we must face the fact that the independent members, as members of parliament and as representatives of ridings, have a right to play some role in the operations of committees of parliament if those committees are really to be part of the democratic process, allowing what we consider to be the free expression of all opinions.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that like myself all hon. members will take this matter seriously. I have never felt that members of one party should have the right to ask members of other parties to assist them in disciplining a member of their own party. I hope the members of the Liberal party will not see fit to assist in disciplining the members of my party; certainly I am not pleased that they should invite me to participate in disciplining a member of their party. I hope other hon. members will reject this invitation and will preserve the membership of these committees as initially established. If as an independent the hon. member failed to do his job on those committees, then it would be the responsibility of the chairman to cite him and ask the house to take some action. But I do not think the present action should be taken because he has involuntarily changed his political affiliation.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I believe that seldom in the history of this parliament has there been presented a more arrogant motion than the one now before us for consideration. I believe it to be an intrusion into the independence of members of the house and an arrogant denial of democracy itself. Most members realize that they are elected first as members of parliament. Supporters of political parties they are, it is true, but they are elected first as members of parliament. To have a motion of this kind come before the house in an endeavour to stifle the effectiveness of a member of this house who, for one reason or another, does not see eye to eye with the political party with which he is affiliated, or with some minister with whom he is associated, is to my mind a denial of the very fundamentals that underline our Canadian democratic system.

I do not say that I agree with everything or anything the hon. member for York-Humber has said in the House of Commons; but when the whip of the government party brings forward a motion like this and in one swoop tries to take away a member's privilege to sit on house committees, he is striking at the heart of parliament.

I say too, sir, that considering the lip service this government has paid to the effectiveness of committee work, this motion is all the more despicable. Regardless of whether we have agreed in the past two years with the statements the hon. member for York-Humber has made, we know he is one of the best documented members in this shouse.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nasserden: He has done his homework. Not only that, but he has gone into committees and voiced his opinions and come into this house and voiced his opinions without fear. I recall that in a previous parliament, on one matter I thought important I differed with the official thinking of my party. The Speaker of that day gave me an opportunity to speak even though others said it would be better if I kept quiet. I believe this house must recognize that members have a right to express their independent opinions. Surely an independent member of the House of Commons is entitled to sit on some committees of the house. Surely his electors sent him here for that purpose.

I submit that for a political party, because it has decided to kick out one of its members, to take away the privilege of that member to sit on committees, is absolutely unforgivable arrogance, and I believe the government has made a serious mistake. I hope they will reconsider the whole matter. Perhaps in serving on five committees the hon. member has done more in this regard than most other members, but surely he is entitled to sit on some committees of this house. For these reasons I oppose this motion.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, today we have witnessed another government blunder.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Personnel Changes in Standing Committees

Mr. Starr: The government's action has not helped to expedite the business of the house. Because the government party has removed from its ranks a member of this house and has at the same time taken him off five committees of the house, we have been led into a situation where 45 minutes of the time of this house has been wasted in arguing the motion.

What crime did this member commit, Mr. Speaker? He used his common sense and judgment and voted against the tax increase. For that reason he was thrown out of the party. I just want to bring to the government's attention the fact that on the original bill the hon. member for York North (Mr. Addison) voted against the government on second reading, and he was not thrown out. There must be discrimination in the Liberal party.

We are all grateful to the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) who pointed a finger at the Minister of Justice (Mr. Trudeau) this afternoon. The minister's mask was torn off to reveal a childish, snarling man.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Starr: It is only fair that we should hear this afternoon from the hon. member for York-Humber. I understand he is to speak. I suggest that after he has spoken we move the adjournment of this debate so we can get on with the business of the country.

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I am not opposed to this motion to replace the hon. member for York-Humber on five committees, but this gives me an opportunity to point out one or two aspects of our committee operations.

Two of the five committees the hon. member for York-Humber is on, the committee on printing and the committee on the parliamentary restaurant, do not meet very frequently. The three others, the committees on health and welfare, broadcasting and veterans affairs, are reasonably active. The hon. member for Timiskaming has said that the hon. member for York-Humber has been faithful in attending committees. He has not been so faithful at the committee on broadcasting in the past three weeks simply because he is a member of the committee on health and welfare at the same time. He has been in the health committee fighting abortion and he could not get to the broadcasting committee.

My remarks do not apply to the hon. member for York-Humber alone. Many members are on the two committees I have just spoken of and on other committees. As a consequence, for the past three weeks in the broadcasting committee we have frequently wasted an hour a day, half an hour in the morning and another half an hour in the afternoon, waiting for quorums because members are at other committee meetings. There has been the added annoyance of having members drift in to the second committee an hour or an hour and a half after it has begun and begin a line of questioning which has already been dealt with, so they take up even more time.

I suggest that if we cannot arrange a different timetable for committees, a member should be on one committee only. They could then meet regularly and we could get a great deal more work done than at present. I say without hesitation that many times during the past three weeks one hour a day has been wasted in the broadcasting committee simply because members have been at the health and welfare committee, the public accounts committee or some other committee.

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, I only wish to take a moment or two on this motion, and I only want to refer briefly to the committee on the parliamentary restaurant. I regret very much being removed from that committee because I thought I had earned a permanent position there because in 1963, when the committee was fearful about trying to collect outstanding accounts of some $8,800, I did so; and my collection included a remittance of over $800 from a Liberal cabinet minister and $1,100 from the chairman of the Liberal caucus.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Cowan: I thought my actions in 1963 had earned me permanent membership on the restaurant committee.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think one or two comments ought to be made because the motion the house is now asked to deal with is a manifestation of one of the conventions that have been observed in the house for many years.

Each party is entitled to determine its representation on the standing committees. That has been well established. When the chief government whip rises in the house to move motions affecting hon. members of other parties in the house, he does not decide the committee membership for the official opposition or the New Democratic party. These names are transmitted to him from these parties, and he makes the motion as the chief government whip. It has been an established tradition that each party decides its own members to serve on the standing committees.

• (3:20 p.m.)

If these motions are to be debatable in the future, and if this convention is to be destroyed, then it will be open to a member on this side of the house to oppose the membership of a committee proposed by the N.D.P.—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacEachen: —and it will also be open to members of the official opposition to rise and oppose our membership. I repeat that it will be open for members on this side to oppose the nominees. We have accepted this convention. It is reflected in the motions made by the chief government whip. The member for York-Humber is no longer a member of the Liberal caucus, and surely it is open to the government party to decide the membership representing the government party on the committees.

It seems to me very, very strange for the house leader of the official opposition to raise his voice on this motion, because it is not so long since the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) withdrew from the Conservative caucus, and what happened? On March 1 the chief government whip moved a motion removing the hon. member for Winnipeg North South from the standing committee—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacEachen: —Winnipeg South Centre. Let me read the motion. It is to be found in Votes and Proceedings for March 1, 1968, as follows:

> On motion of Mr. Pilon, seconded by Mr. Matheson, it was ordered,—That the name of Mr. MacRae be substituted for that of Mr. Churchill on the standing committee on national defence.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Harkness: I wonder if the minister—

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have the floor.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. MacEachen: On March 8 a further motion was moved by the chief government whip:

> That the name of Mr. Rapp be substituted for that of Mr. Churchill on the standing committee on standing orders.

However the circumstances developed, in that either the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre himself decided he would no longer represent the Conservative party or the Conservative party itself decided that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre would no longer be on the committees, at any rate it is undoubtedly the case, I would presume, that the opposition whip conveyed the selection of the new committee members, in substitution for the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, to the government chief whip. I have no complaint about that because that is the convention that has been observed in this house ever since I have been here, and I believe that on a former occasion when a member from the N.D.P. withdrew from that party a similar series of events came into play.

Mr. Lewis: Without disagreeing with what the minister has said—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Do I understand that the hon. member for Calgary North wants to ask a question?

Mr. Harkness: I would like to make a comment.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary North.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have not yielded the floor. I was going to accept a question from the hon. member for York South.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member for York South rising for the purpose of asking a question?

Mr. Lewis: I was going to ask a question of the minister. I was going to say to the minister that without disagreeing with the principle he indicated, would the minister inform the house what likelihood there is of any of the committees with which this motion is concerned actually meeting between now and the end of this session?

Mr. MacEachen: Well, Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer the question, but I expect that the broadcasting committee is to meet—

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Lewis: That is why the motion is so silly.

Mr. MacEachen: —is to meet very shortly. The hon. member for York South now takes the ground that the timing is all wrong; the principle is all right but the timing is wrong.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: I did not oppose it last night.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to engage in an acrimonious debate with members of the house. I have exposed the convention that is at play in this motion, a convention that has been observed in the House of Commons, that has operated in the interests of all groups in this house, and members of parliament ought to consider whether this convention ought to be supported in the future. In order to give hon. members the opportunity to reflect on the matter, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There is a motion for the adjournment of the debate, and this motion is not debatable. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: Carried.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STEPS TO STIMULATE EMPLOYMENT IN CONSTRUCTION INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, on March 14 as recorded at page 7615 of Hansard the Leader of the Opposition asked this question of the right hon. Prime Minister. The Prime Minister is not in the chamber at the moment, but I wonder whether the Acting Prime Minister will convey this question to him:

> In view of the statement by the president of the Canadian Construction Association that the construction industry in Canada faces serious unemployment before the fall...could the Prime Minister take an early occasion to indicate to the house whether the government has any plans on hand or in mind to stimulate employment in the construction industry by autumn?

To which the Prime Minister replied:

> Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Would the Acting Prime Minister ask the Prime Minister whether he would be good enough to give us an indication or a statement on motions tomorrow as to what are the plans?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will direct the matter to the attention of the Prime Minister.

FINANCE

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION AT MEETING OF MONETARY FUND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, before asking my question I wonder if I may inquire whether the Prime Minister will be back during the question period.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think so.

Mr. Douglas: Then I will hold my question until he returns and in the meantime direct a question to the Minister of Finance. I wish to ask the minister about the meeting of the finance ministers of the I.M.F., which I believe is to be held on the 29th of this month in Sweden, and to ask him whether he intends to represent Canada at that meeting or, if not, who will represent Canada on that occasion.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, no decision has yet been taken.

Mr. Douglas: As a supplementary question, will Canada be represented? I am sure the minister will agree it is most important that Canada should be represented at this critical time. Will Canada be represented, and how soon will the minister be making a decision as to whether he personally will represent Canada, or someone else in his department?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, Canada will of course be represented. This is a meeting in which we have a very vital interest, and as soon as a decision is made as to representation I will tell the house.

CONVERSION OF 1959 SAVINGS BOND ISSUE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. With regard to the conversion of the 1959 series of Canada savings bonds, part of the conversion requirement being $27 million in 1968, is the Minister of Finance satisfied with the average interest rate of 6.88 per cent—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is argumentative.

UNITED NATIONS

RHODESIA—CANADIAN POSITION IN SECURITY COUNCIL DISCUSSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It concerns the Rhodesian situation now being considered by the United Nations Security Council. Considering that Canada heretofore and in other places has taken some initiative, can the minister advise the house as to the role of this country's delegation at the Security Council's deliberations on this very important matter?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the security council is meeting this afternoon to consider some of the matters that have taken place recently in Rhodesia. The representative of Canada has been active in consultations during the past few days in connection with two of the matters that will be discussed in the security council, and in respect of one of these we have taken some initiatives.

[Later:]

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a further question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding the Rhodesian matter. Unless the Security Council is doing a rather unusual thing in having a secret session, will the minister indicate the two matters to which he made reference and delineate the one in respect of which Canada intends to do something?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The discussions that have to do with the Canadian initiative concern the tightening of the sanctions against the Smith regime. The other matter being discussed in the Security Council, likely this afternoon, is a resolution on the implications of the executions carried out last week by the regime.

CYPRUS—CONTINUATION OF PEACE KEEPING OPERATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question likewise is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the announcement that the Security Council has given its approval to a three month extension of the peace keeping force in Cyprus, is it the intention of the Canadian government to continue its participation in this force?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I indicated last week that the Security Council had decided to renew the mandate as of March 26. I shall be bringing this matter to the attention of my colleagues shortly.

Mr. Thompson: Is it the intention of the government to attempt to make a different arrangement so far as the financing formula is concerned, or is the government going to continue the same contribution it has been making?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to see a change made in the contributions paid by members to the United Nations, but in the absence of an arrangement Canada does not propose to shirk its responsibilities.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether it is correct to say that this may be the last extension required owing to the improvement in the political situation in Cyprus, and that the force may either be withdrawn or reduced?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There has been some improvement in the situation on the island but I do not think the improvement is such that it would warrant the view that this may be the last renewal of the mandate.

NATIONAL SECURITY

QUEBEC—REPORTED ESTABLISHMENT OF GUERRILLA TRAINING CAMPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, this question is for the Minister of Justice. Is it the intention of the government to investigate charges made by the latest candidate for the Liberal leadership to the effect that guerrilla training camps have been operating in northern Quebec, and that a Cuban aircraft flew in and out of the isolated area without R.C.M.P. knowledge?

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): I will have to take the question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

WINTER WORKS

DESBIENS, QUE.—INQUIRY AS TO PROJECT AT DESBIENS, QUE.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alcide Simard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration but, in his absence, I shall put it to his parliamentary secretary.

What was the answer given by the minister to the letter sent to him by the mayor of Desbiens, on March 15, with regard to a winter work project estimated at $40,000?

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to suggest to the hon. member to put his question on the order paper, since there is talk of adjournment. Under the circumstances his question could be considered in order.

GRAIN

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO FINAL PAYMENT FOR 1966-67 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, in view of the possibility that the house may soon adjourn, and in view of the fact that the wheat pool for the 1966-67 crop year has been closed since March 1, almost three weeks, can the Minister of Trade and Commerce advise the house when the final payment to the wheat producers will be made and how much it will be?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have been in continual touch with the Canadian Wheat Board to see whether the payment might be expedited. The work is progressing and I think the final payment will be announced a week from today. It will be around that date, but at this time I am unable to say what the total amount will be.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Does the question asked by the hon. member for Medicine Hat represent the extent to which the abilities of that hon. member have been utilized by the government since he joined the Liberal party?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is out of order on many grounds. That type of question should not be asked.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT OF FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In the absence of any legislation affecting farm improvement loans and in view of the fact that the banks have generally provided loans at a lower rate of interest, has the minister recently had any consultation with the banks in respect of their continuing to provide loans at lower rates until legislation is introduced?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have been in touch with the banks about this matter. I am hopeful, if the house will agree, that we can get an amendment to the Farm Improvement Loans Act through before we adjourn.

Mr. Korchinski: If there is no assurance that there will be such agreement, will the legislation be retroactive?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's question is hypothetical.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, I have not completed my question. Will the legislation be retroactive or will the farmers have to continue paying higher rates purely because the minister is in a hurry to become prime minister?

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Is it the intention of the government to propose amendments to the Farm Improvement Loans Act to remove the statutory limit on the interest rate?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. It is the intention to remove the statutory limitation and give the governor in council the power to regulate.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, does the minister intend to bring down that legislation before the recess?

Mr. Sharp: If we could obtain agreement to pass it quickly I certainly would.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—REPORTED INCREASE IN COSTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I apologize for not having given him notice but things have been in a turmoil today. In view of the fact that the government of British Columbia has now practically admitted that the Columbia River treaty projects will cost over $200 million more than it has received from the United States, how does the minister justify his assurance to the Castlegar Chamber of Commerce in 1964 that the government of Canada would not sign an agreement that did not pay for all the projects?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret that I must tell the hon. member that his question is argumentative.

INDUSTRY

REVIEW OF DESIGNATED AREA POLICY RESPECTING ATLANTIC PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address this question to the Minister of Industry, notice of which I have given him. Could he advise the house in respect of the meeting regarding the area development program held this morning with representatives from the Atlantic region?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I met this morning with the minister of economic development of the province of New Brunswick and the mayor of Saint John with regard to the possible designation of Saint John and other metropolitan areas in the maritimes under the designated area program. We had a useful discussion and I hope that we resolved what has been a misunderstanding arising out of a question and answer which appeared in Hansard. The minister and the mayor both recognized that this program, which has resulted in some $680 million of new investment in the Atlantic provinces and the creation of some 17,000 jobs, has been extremely useful. I pointed out to them that this program, which is in the nature of a crash program relating to unemployment, is due to expire in 1971 and that if and when in his new tenure the minister of economic development of New Brunswick should bring forward proposals for making this program more relevant to the economic development plan in the Atlantic provinces I would be glad to discuss them with him.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, would the minister be willing to attend the meeting of the Atlantic premiers which has already been called for March 21 in Fredericton to deal with this matter, put forward the thoughts he has in mind today and attempt to settle the matter once and for all?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I understood from the minister of economic development of New Brunswick that it is unlikely he will be able to formulate specific proposals that soon.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

RESUMPTION OF COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF BILL C-190

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct this question to the government house leader. Is the minister now in a position to indicate at what point we will resume consideration in committee of the whole of Bill No. C-190?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have had consultations with the house leaders regarding the remaining business but those consultations have not yet been completed. I hope they will be very shortly, and as soon as they are I will indicate to the house what the expectations are.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Solicitor General.

Could he tell us if it is true that Mr. Igor Gouzenko, a former soviet officer, is entitled to a pension just like retired members of the R.C.M.P.?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest that this question should be put on the order paper.

FISHERIES

SEALS—ACCESS TO HUNTING GROUNDS BY HUMANE SOCIETY REPRESENTATIVES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Arthur Laing (Acting Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for New Westminster asked about visits by humane society representatives to the scene of the seal harvest. No one is prevented, of course, from visiting if they want to, and I am informed that representatives of a number of humane organizations in both Canada and Europe made visits yesterday in the vicinity of the Magdalen islands. In addition, I am informed that the fisheries department, at its own expense, has transported to the ice a representative of the humane society of Ontario, a veterinarian from the Department of Agriculture and a veterinarian from Edinburgh who is reputedly well versed in sealing. They are conducting some experiments with new killing methods.

INDUSTRY

CAPE BRETON, N.S.—CONTINUED OPERATION OF McBEAN MINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, not long ago the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources advised the house that the Cape Breton Development Corporation is taking over all Dosco mines except one, the McBean mine in my constituency, on April 1. Will he now advise the house what plans the government has to continue in production this one mine which employs about 400 men?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, a few months ago I discussed the matter with the former premier of Nova Scotia and representatives of miners. We had then concluded that we would consider the possibility of finding an independent contractor who would be in charge of that mine and would develop it at a reduced pace. I submitted this request to the Cape Breton Development Corporation. The vice president made it and reported his recommendations to the board which is supposed to make a decision and let me know it in the near future.

[English]

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, will the minister review the remarks made by the Prime Minister on national television last evening and indicate as soon as possible to the house when the money will be available to keep the Sydney steel operation and the McBean mine going? I think the minister has indicated that he is ready to answer the question. At least he could indicate whether he is interested in the remarks made by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the only thing the hon. member wants to know is whether the minister is interested in the remarks of the Prime Minister, certainly the question is not in order to that extent. I realize that the second part of the question is in order.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): With all due respect, sir, I would have directed my question to the proper minister or the Prime Minister if they had been in attendance in the house.

[Mr. Laing.]

SYDNEY, N.S.—REFUSAL OF FEDERAL LOAN TO PURCHASE STEEL PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, since the right hon. Prime Minister has apparently been detained perhaps I might direct my question to either the Acting Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance. The question relates to the Prime Minister's letter of March 8 to the premier of Nova Scotia in which the government gives its regrettable decision to the effect that it is not going to lend to the province of Nova Scotia half the capital cost of acquiring the assets of the steel mill at Sydney. In view of the very great difficulty any provincial government would have in borrowing this large sum of money because of the present state of the financial market, is the government going to offer any alternative form of assistance such as guaranteeing the loan, thus enabling the government of Nova Scotia to borrow this very considerable sum?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker, that would not be the government's intention.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I think the amount involved is something in the neighbourhood of $44 million. The province of Quebec has just had to involve eight banks in order to obtain $38 million. In view of this difficulty, what alternative policy is the government proposing to help Nova Scotia raise this very considerable sum at this very critical time in the money market?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the government set forth in the letter from the Prime Minister to the premier of Nova Scotia the assistance that the federal government is prepared to give.

Mr. Douglas: In this regard, nothing.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of Finance tell us whether the government has made up its mind that it has a claim on that money?

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance to consult with his colleagues in cabinet and ask them to give a little kinder treatment to the cabinet representative from Nova Scotia.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to persist in this question but I ask it again because the letter sent by the Prime Minister of January 23 referred to a possible claim in respect of $1,700,000. The government has yet to indicate whether it has any claim on that amount. How can it give something away which it does not know it has? The Minister of Justice has been waiting since October to answer that one.

Mr. Trudeau: You have not asked me the question.

ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT BOARD

REQUEST FOR ASSESSMENT OF TRANSFERS BETWEEN DEFENCE BASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare in his capacity as the minister responsible for the Atlantic Development Board. Will he inform the house whether an economist from the Atlantic Development Board assessed the implications of the phasing-out operation at Summerside? As he is the minister from Nova Scotia I should like to ask him whether the same consideration can be given to Nova Scotia by having an economist from the Atlantic Development Board assess the implications of the move from Greenwood to Summerside.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister may reply to the question in his official capacity but not in his capacity as the minister from Nova Scotia.

Mr. Nowlan: Will the minister in his reply to the first part of the question confirm that an Atlantic Development Board economist or staff member made an assessment of the economic implications of the phase-out of the base at Summerside, and will like consideration be extended by assessing the economic implications of the move from Greenwood?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I disagree with the expression "phase-out" as there is no phase-out in the normal sense. I will be glad to check with the Atlantic Development Board and give an answer in detail tomorrow.

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, will the minister be so kind as to advise whether he has registered his protest against the moving of the establishment from Greenwood to Summerside?

Mr. MacEachen: I have been very closely involved in discussions about this whole matter with the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Is this the minister's way of emphasizing his weakness in the cabinet?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR ANSWER TO QUESTION ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Secretary of State as I believe she is the person to whom questions having to do with several departments should be directed. I have had question No. 741 on the order paper since November 23. It relates to the number of women employed in federal undertakings. Will the minister see whether I can get an answer before parliament recesses?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I cannot promise that, Mr. Speaker, as the question involves the total number of women employed in all services, including the public service of Canada, industries and other undertakings. It takes quite a long time to gather information to answer this type of question. We are trying to gather that information but, of course, each day that goes by more women are involved. Perhaps that will please the hon. lady.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): The question has been on the order paper since November 23.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

SASKATCHEWAN—IMPOSITION OF DETERRENT HOSPITAL FEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Was it at his request that the deterrent fee of $2.50 was brought forward under the Saskatchewan hospitalization program?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that this question is not in order.

Mr. Nasserden: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. Part of this fee would normally be paid by the federal government and there is a suspicion that the government has used this as part of—

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Obviously the hon. member seeks to fish in troubled waters. I suggest that the question as asked is not in order.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It is not my fault that hon. gentlemen opposite are in troubled waters.

[Later:]

Mr. Nasserden: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the $2.50 fee under the hospitalization plan in Saskatchewan represent part of the austerity program of hon. gentlemen opposite?

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

DISTRIBUTION OF U.S. MAGAZINE CONTAINING BIRTH CONTROL ADVERTISEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Postmaster General has a reply today to my question of last week concerning the use of Canadian postal facilities by certain American magazines advertising birth control information, which is against our law?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, after carefully reviewing the circumstances surrounding these advertisements and obtaining appropriate legal advice, I have concluded that these are not proper cases in which to issue an interim prohibitory order under section 7 of the Post Office Act.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON FERRY SERVICE, SAINT JOHN, N.B.-DIGBY, N.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport since he has been left almost unnoticed in this question period. In view of the fact that for the last three years progressive questions have been asked and various regressive replies given with regard to the Digby-Saint John ferry, could the minister advise us on the present progress of these negotiations and whether we may expect an announcement before the end of the week or before April 4?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have an even more positive reply to this regressive question. I hope to make an announcement soon. Progress is being made and I am just as optimistic as I was the last time the question was asked of me—even more so.

Mr. Nowlan: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister be kind and considerate enough to take the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings into his confidence when he is about to make the announcement?

Mr. Hellyer: Why not?

INDIAN AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO REDUCTION IN HEALTH SERVICES FUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is he now in a position to make a more definite statement with regard to the curtailment of some of the medical services provided to the Indian people?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I hope to be making a statement before the house recesses but I do not think I can make it on orders of the day.

HUMAN RIGHTS

REPORTED DISCRIMINATION IN EMPLOYMENT CONTRACT IN NORTH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Last week a question was asked of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development with regard to the Supreme Court decision in respect of Mr. Terence Whitfield and his difficulties. The Prime Minister promised to make a statement. Will that statement be forthcoming before the house adjourns?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I think so, Mr. Speaker. I know the Prime Minister has been interested in this matter.

GRAIN

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF TWO PRICE SYSTEM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Now that the Minister of Finance has almost single handedly solved the world financial crisis by the introduction of a two price system for gold—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Korchinski: —will the Minister of Trade and Commerce consult with him and see whether he cannot introduce a two price system for wheat?

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: Order. House again in committee of supply. When the committee rose last Friday, March 15, item 1c of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was under consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

1c. Departmental administration, $399,753.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether it is now possible to have a statement from the government house leader or from the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs about our program. I do not wish to anticipate any negotiating that may still be going on but, as the government house leader recognizes, there is a relationship between the estimates of this department and the effect of Bill C-190. I am authorized to say on behalf of my colleagues that if we are going to go on with Bill C-190 tomorrow or the next day it will certainly make a difference in the amount of time necessary to deal with the estimates of this department. If negotiation has not yet been concluded perhaps we could take another department and come back to the estimates of this department when we know what the program is. The government house leader knows what we are prepared to do. Perhaps he could comment on the matter at this point.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate and understand the interest of the hon. member. I think he has a valid interest. However, there is one more element in this situation that I have to clear up before I can make any statement. If it is agreed, pending the conclusion of negotiations I certainly would be happy to call another department. However, I have taken great advantage of my colleague the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in having him in readiness in the house for a couple of days now and I must, even though the blandishments of my hon. friend are very great, let the minister carry on with his estimates. Within a very short time I shall be able to clear up this matter.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Chairman, I should just like to say that we would welcome the introduction of Bill C-190 because it is an important measure. We hope that some success may attend the efforts of the minister in working out the details in this regard.

So far as the estimates are concerned, we feel that the supplementary estimates have received considerable attention and it is not our intention to prolong the debate on them or on interim supply. But we hope we will be able to proceed with Bill C-190.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, this item contains a rather substantial sum, $142,525, as Canada's share of the expenses of the Canadian committee on mutual funds and investment contracts. I have had on the order paper since March 1 question No. 1,101 asking about this matter. If the minister is prepared to give a commitment that this question will be answered tomorrow I will not pursue the matter further. If he cannot do that, perhaps he could now give us particulars in connection with this substantial sum and state the purposes, objectives and terms of reference of this committee.

Mr. Prittie: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a very short intervention on just one subject. Last week, I believe, the hon. member for Halifax and the hon. member for New Westminster raised the question of professional sports in connection with the combines act. I realize that as the legislation stands at present services generally, and certainly professional sports, do not fall within the terms of the combines act. Therefore the minister and, indeed, the federal government have no power to act.

• (4:00 p.m.)

This matter has arisen in connection with the application by Vancouver for a franchise in the National Hockey League. Although the minister is probably aware of it, I should like to point out to him that there is a private member's bill before the house which would rectify this situation. It is Bill C-99, introduced by his colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, which expressly calls for professional sports to come under the Combines Investigation Act. I will not read the explanatory notes now but they state the case very well.

I should like to ask the minister one other question in connection with the Combines Investigation Act. As he reported to the house, this act is now under study by the Economic Council of Canada which will not be reporting for some time. Has the inclusion of services under the Combines Investigation Act been referred to the Economic Council of Canada? At the present time only commodities which are used in trade and commerce are subject to the act. But it seems to me that the power to fix prices and divide up markets in a way which could be detrimental to the public interest could just as well exist in the service industries as in trade in commodities. Certainly professional sports could be considered. Parliament should be responsive to public opinion, and public opinion in many parts of Canada, particularly on the west coast, is quite strong on this subject at present. I do not know whether the minister heard my question.

Mr. Turner: Yes.

Mr. Germa: Mr. Chairman, I welcome the opportunity to say a few words on this item in the estimates of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. As hon. members know, members of this party accepted the establishment of this department with certain reservations. We pointed out at that time what we considered to be very grave weaknesses in the legislation under which the department is operating. Nothing has happened in the intervening time to change our opinion of what this department will accomplish on behalf of the Canadian people. The Canadian people welcomed with joy the appointment of a minister who would have the power to intervene directly in the marketplace on their behalf to ensure they receive fair value for their money when they see fit to expend certain moneys on services which are required for their daily needs. This is a very wide field. It concerns every dollar spent by every person in the Dominion of Canada. So the minister, if he really seeks to do his job properly, could intervene in almost every sector of the business community.

However, in spite of the formation of this department the cost of living has continued to rise. We have not noticed any change in the upward push of prices. The D.B.S. figures published on Friday indicate that at present the cost of living stands at 152.7, an increase of .1 over last month. This is a rise of 4.5 per cent from February 1, 1967. The D.B.S. figures also show us that the housing index rose by .5 per cent. The problem of housing has long plagued the people of Canada, and these figures indicate that nothing has happened to offset the continued rise in the cost of accommodation for families. Surely this is one of the most essential areas in which the minister could intervene by seeking to find out why the cost of shelter for our families continues to rise despite the efforts of other departments of the government.

The Dominion Bureau of Statistics points out to us that one of the reasons for the increase in the cost of housing in the month of February was the increase in the insurance rates on housing. According to these figures the insurance companies must have increased their premiums. So far as I know the insurance companies have not stated their case before the Canadian people, before the government or before any board of review, for increasing the rates they charge for the insurance of houses against fire, flood, hail, etc. The insurance companies made an arbitrary decision to increase their rates.

I am not sure whether the minister has the power to intervene in this area but in view of the fact that the consumer dollar is involved I believe his jurisdiction is wide enough for him to intervene on behalf of the consumer. This is a very vital area. Insurance companies have often been referred to in this house. We have pointed out that they are not suffering from a low return on their investment. It seems to me that the minister could well intervene in this area and seek an explanation from the insurance companies for the increase in their rates. I realize he does not have the power to legislate against them but surely he could make them expose their books to the people of Canada and make them give an explanation for increasing their rates on housing.

I believe that if this were done it would go a long way toward exposing a business which has long preyed upon the Canadian people. In the long run it is the little man who bears the greater part of the burden because he cannot afford any risk and he has to go to an insurance company to obtain protection for the major investment represented by his acquisition of a place to live. He has to pay these rates regardless of how high they may be. I suggest to the minister that this is one area in which he could do something.

The legislation establishing the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs did not give the minister sufficient power under which he could act. The main purpose of the department, therefore, is to inform, to educate and to protect the consumer in the marketplace. Since the formation of this department I have not seen any literature or any programs on radio or television informing me as to its aim and powers. After all, I am also an amateur in the marketplace. I have been hoodwinked on numerous occasions and probably I will be hoodwinked again tomorrow or in my next venture into the jungle. The minister has not seen fit to educate me or any of the 20 million people in Canada.

I realize that the department has only been operating for four or five months and it is probably not right to condemn the minister at this early stage, but the people of Canada were quite happy when such a young and vigorous minister took over this portfolio and they had hoped they were going to see action and that the feathers would fly. However, so far I have been quite disappointed in that I have not seen anyone get plucked by the minister. He is a quite young, affable and vigorous person and he occupies a very sensitive position in the cabinet. His position is probably the most sensitive in the whole of Canada in that, if he wishes to do his job properly, he will have to intervene between the consumer and the business community. As a person occupying such a sensitive position he must be extremely careful not to become obligated to the business community because if it becomes necessary for him to react to any of their financial decisions he must be under no obligation to them and be free to act.

I am very doubtful, therefore, about the propriety of the minister accepting free transportation from a rubber company during his campaign for the leadership of the Liberal party. The time may come when he may have to intercede on behalf of the people against this company. I believe that by accepting this type of gift he is obligated to a certain degree and may be inhibited from acting in a completely unbiased manner. I urge the minister and the other ministers involved in the leadership campaign not to become entangled in obligations to various business enterprises. I am very reluctant to see ministers beholden to any of these major enterprises.

As proof positive of the fact the cost of living is continuing to rise I cite the recent report of the Batten commission which was authorized by the three prairie province governments to investigate grocery prices on the prairies. The commission revealed some startling figures concerning the degree to which two companies have gained control of the grocery business on the prairies. There is no doubt in my mind that if this condition exists on the prairies it exists in Ontario, Quebec and the rest of Canada. When the minister was asked if he would take action on the report and extend this type of investigation to the rest of Canada he was not too excited about doing so. He seemed to feel that if some other province wished to undertake an investigation he would be glad to receive the report.

This is another area of the responsibility of this department which I do not understand. Is it the responsibility of the minister to institute investigations into various prices? I suggest it is the responsibility of the department not only to receive reports from other commissions set up by other agencies but also, when it becomes aware of situations in Canada, to undertake investigations itself. If a monopoly situation is revealed, proper legal action should then be taken under another branch of this department to see that these people are properly brought into line.

I realize, of course, that the anti-combines legislation is not very effective. As was pointed out by one of my colleagues the other day, even though dozens and dozens of corporations have been convicted of price fixing, not one director of these various companies has ever been sent to jail. If these people are convicted they should not be allowed to escape the full penalty of the law, even though I am not one to advocate filling our jails with people because in most cases this serves a very limited purpose. However, I do know that people who have no financial means are suffering in our jails. The fact is that the directors and officers of major corporations can extract from the community hundreds of millions of dollars through illegal price fixing and never have to feel the full force of the law and languish in our jails. If the people of Canada saw such individuals brought to justice in a few instances they would have more faith in this department and more faith in the government.

Consumer credit is another field in which the minister would have the right to intercede. The consumer spends a large portion of his income paying usurious interest rates. If a finance company can legally charge up to 24 per cent for money, then I think it is up to the minister to point out that these companies are doing this. I know that these companies can do so legally but it is up to him to point out that this is a fact of life and that people must beware of these usurers in our society. They have been with us for a long time and I suppose they will be with us forever. Consumer credit in Canada today, exclusive of real estate mortages, totals about $8 billion and involves approximately $960 million in interest per annum. This is a sizeable amount of money which reduces the consumer's purchasing power.

The reduction in consumer purchasing power in turn deflates our economy and causes unemployment as well as all the other unsavoury things that go along with a deflated economy. I feel that the minister has the responsibility to see that every consumer has as much purchasing power as possible because this would benefit the whole country. One recalls that in 1966 there were various demonstrations by consumers all over Canada in front of supermarkets and other places. The consumer has become organized and he has a new minister to ask for help. The consumer has seen fit to complain about quality and prices as well as the type of service he receives for his money.

The consumer knows that there are on the roads today 670,000 unsafe automobiles. I feel it is the duty of the minister to find out why companies are allowed to put unsafe automobiles on the market intentionally. The average person who buys a car is not a mechanic. He is not able to judge the quality of workmanship or safety of the automobile. He has so many dollars in his pocket and knows he needs a car. Quite innocently he often buys an automobile which may cost him his life or other people their lives. All of us must be protected from this type of merchandising.

There has been some talk about drug prices. I should like to congratulate the minister upon the action he has taken in introducing Bill No. C-190 which all of us believe would have the effect of bringing down the price of drugs by allowing competition to enter this field. If the bill could only be brought before the house before the recess I believe the people of Canada would be forever in debt to the minister for at least accomplishing that much during the short period of time he has been in office.

[Mr. Germa.]

Health services are another area of concern to the consumer. Regardless of the state of health of a person at the moment he knows he is going to have to expend money on medical services. None of us will last forever. Eventually the machinery runs down and we have to seek advice and help from the medical profession. My remarks at this point apply equally to other professional people who arbitrarily set their rates, such as engineers, lawyers and so on. However, doctors are the ones who come closest to the consumer because the consumer has to go to them directly. Engineers and these other people are about one stage removed from the consumer.

• (4:20 p.m.)

I should like to refer to an editorial broadcast over station VOCM in St. John's, Newfoundland, on January 17, 1968. Part of it reads as follows:

> Recent discussion of rates for professional services—who sets the rates—and what relationship these rates have to the services rendered, brings to mind that some doctors have made upward revisions in their rate structure recently—in some cases as much as 30 per cent. We are given to understand that the increases have been applied because of the approach of medicare.

We all know that the medical profession has raised certain objections to medicare, and I commend the government for the stand they have taken in the face of those objections. But this editorial seems to indicate that in order to try to destroy medicare across Canada the profession has increased fees by 30 per cent so as to make the cost of medicare so expensive that the government would not dare to try to supply the people with medical services. I think this is a deplorable state of affairs. I am not saying that doctors are not entitled to a decent standard of living. They go out in all sorts of weather and have a very hard job to perform. They are dealing with sick people who are not necessarily on their best behaviour. For these reasons they deserve a standard of living better than most. That I recognize, Mr. Chairman.

I also recognize the fact that the person who pays the bill is the consumer. I also recognize the fact that these doctors were educated largely from public funds. I also recognize the fact that their equipment is supplied from public funds. Medical research is also charged to the public. It was the consumer in the first instance who supplied the money to educate the doctor. The consumer provided the required facilities and conducted the necessary research so that the doctor in turn could serve you and me better as a medical practitioner. Therefore I believe that the consumer has the right to state what the fees are to be for the services that are rendered. I claim that the taxpayer, the consumer, has a claim on the doctor's education and facilities.

This fact was recognized in Newfoundland a few years ago when the premier of that province placed certain restrictions on those members of the medical profession who took advantage of the very generous offer that was made to educate them. In turn they had to commit themselves to work for two years in outpost hospitals. I see nothing wrong with that sort of legislation. It is an admission that the government has the right to intervene on behalf of the consumer when members of this profession set their own rates. As the medical care program of the government begins to take effect the government itself will have more at stake because it will be paying 50 per cent of the cost of services. If medical fees are decided arbitrarily by a hostile medical profession it is easy to see that the profession could wreck the plan, and you and I, Mr. Chairman, and the rest of the people of Canada would be the losers.

The minister has also had his attention drawn through various questions put in the house to other price increases that have recently taken place. In one instance the consumer is not affected directly but indirectly the price he has to pay is affected. I refer to the recent increase in the price of copper. We asked the Minister of Finance to investigate the increase. I do not know the connection between the finance minister and the minister of consumer affairs, but in the long run it is the consumer who pays for price increases. If a basic commodity such as copper suffers a price increase, almost every other commodity on the market suffers similarly. It is in this respect that the minister of consumer affairs has a responsibility to the consumer to intervene.

When the subject of the recent rise in the price of copper was raised the answer given by the finance minister was that there was a world shortage of copper and therefore the price had risen. Also advantage was being taken of a strike of 50,000 copper workers in the United States to squeeze an additional 4 cents a pound, I believe it was, out of the price on the marketplace. At no time did the minister indicate that the profit position of these companies warranted a price increase. At no time did the minister say that the increased price of copper had anything to do with increased cost of production. There was no relationship between the cost of production and the cost of copper on the market; it was strictly a question of what the market would bear. Yet no action was taken by the minister against the corporations concerned.

I fail to see why the minister did not go to these companies and at least extract from them the admission that there was no legitimate reason to raise the price of copper, thus putting that admission on the record. The profit picture of these companies was good. The only reason they raised the price of copper was to take advantage of a shortage as a result of a strike in the United States and a war in Viet Nam.

I would also draw attention to the fact that gasoline has increased in price, as has fuel oil. These increases affect the consumer directly. In our northern climate fuel oil is essential. Yet the price of fuel oil has unwarrantedly risen. The increase has not been substantiated by the five or six oil companies that have a world-wide monopoly.

The increase in price was not arbitrated in the way the average worker has to arbitrate an increase in his wages. The worker has to go to a conciliation board and expose himself to the whole community. Unless he has community support he will not get an increase in wages. Through this democratic process of submitting his demands to public scrutiny he gets a wage increase. But there is no stipulation that corporations must negotiate with the community before they can increase their prices.

When the legislation to set up this department was going through we pleaded with the minister to include a provision setting up a prices review board. This suggestion was rejected as totally unworkable, unwarranted, unnecessary, regressive, plus a few other objectives. Therefore I was quite surprised the other day to hear the Prime Minister state in this chamber, as reported on page 7536 of Hansard for March 12:

> We must find some effective means of influencing, not controlling but influencing, the many individual decisions that give rise to increases in incomes, costs and prices. To this end the government proposes to establish a governmental agency, commission or board, whatever it may be called, to review and scrutinize major decisions affecting prices, incomes and costs throughout the economy.

• (4:30 p.m.)

Although the Prime Minister's statement was vague he intimated that the view of our group had had some effect on the government. The Prime Minister referred to some sort of board, agency, committee or what have you which will inquire into how economic decisions are made to increase incomes and prices. Of course, when the government talks of prices and costs it carefully does not use the word "profits". I have yet to hear a member of the government speak about profits or excess profits in this connection. It is in this area, though, that the new agency ought to inquire. Profits must be included as a cost to consumers. I submit that the consumer has the right to determine how much profit he is willing to pay on any commodity. Only when the board or agency the Prime Minister envisaged is capable of operating in this field will we be in a position to control the cost of living. I say this because farther on the Prime Minister said:

> We shall also, Mr. Speaker, take carefully into account any views on this proposal expressed in parliament.

We think that this is a good move. But we think the matter should be pursued and made concrete since at present we do not know whether the government is thinking of a board, agency or commission. At any rate, the germ of the thought is there. I urge the minister concerned to let the germ grow and to bring it to fruition.

Everything I have said so far applies generally to all of Canada. Yet there is one group which, because of its geographic position in the country, suffers more from high prices than the rest. I refer to those in the far northern parts. The farther north we go the more expensive it is to live. I come from a northern Ontario town. It is not in the extreme north but it costs us more to live than it costs the people of Toronto. A short time ago when I was on the Sudbury city council we were discussing the high cost of building materials in the city. We found that a square of shingles—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

An hon. Member: Go ahead.

Mr. Habel: No, no. That is enough.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Does the committee give unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue?

Mr. Habel: No, no. That is enough.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Germa.]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Sudbury.

Mr. Germa: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I will not be very long.

Mr. McLean (Charlotte): Will the hon. member permit a question? Does he say that the consumer ought to control the price of butter, eggs, milk and other farm produce?

Mr. Germa: Through an agency or a review board we could determine whether a given commodity was being sold at a fair price, whether the producer was receiving a fair return on his investment or whether the consumer was being hoodwinked. There ought to be some relation between the price of an article and its cost of production. In the open market we do not find that. The law of supply and demand is abrogated by the monopoly positions of various corporations and as a result we see goods being sold at prices which bear no relation to their costs of production.

I was talking about the problems of northern areas. The Sudbury city council learned that a square of shingles cost $1.50 more in Timmins than in North Bay. We also found that it cost 50 cents to transport a square of shingles from North Bay to Timmins. Of course, when inquiries about high prices were made we were fobbed off with the excuse, "Oh, well, it is the high cost of transportation that has been increasing the cost of your building materials." That was not so.

In Thompson, Manitoba, which is in the far north about 400 air miles dead north of Winnipeg, the average employee works at his job for about 17 days. This represents an inordinately high employee turnover and I wondered why a man would go 400 miles north into the wilderness, work for 17 days and then quit. We have half a million unemployed in Canada and yet this situation prevails in the north. On investigating, and after receiving letters from the president of the United Steel Workers, I learned that men will not stay in the far north because the cost of living is very high. I think the minister ought to intervene on behalf of these far northern people. Our men need jobs. They are willing to go into the north country because that is where our future lies. Yet they cannot make a go of it because of the increasing pressure they encounter from high living costs.

Among 500 construction workers in Thompson the average employment period is 17 days. Among the permanent employees of the mine the average rate of turnover is 85 per cent per annum. The miners there work for the company I used to work for and they are fairly well paid. Even so, their wages do not keep pace with the high cost of living in the far north. For instance, construction workers or mine employees pay up to $200 a month to rent a trailer. I submit that for $200 a month you could rent a reasonable house in Ottawa; in fact, you could rent a very nice house. Yet in the far north it costs $200 a month to live in a trailer, which does not represent a good living standard by any stretch of the imagination. I hope the minister will look into the special areas I have mentioned and do something to relieve the pressures that people all across Canada are feeling from high living costs.

Mr. Johnston: I shall be brief, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member for Sudbury wanted to see the feathers fly and yet he wanted the minister's wings to be clipped. I assure him that our avian interest is confined to seeing prices go down. I too was interested in the hon. member's discussion of a prices review board because what the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway described as a toothless wonder has now become food for thought. It does not matter how the minister or the government hold out their hands to the N.D.P.; their hands will be bitten.

I should like to ask the minister a question I have asked in the house on a couple of occasions. Has his department yet made a decision to appeal the fines levied against wholesale companies engaged in the mandarin orange trade in British Columbia? These fines were announced some months ago and at the time they seemed to me to be extremely low. Working out the mathematics of the highest fine and considering the some 20 years during which prices were fixed I found that it amounted to about $500 annually. I submit that this amounts to nothing more than a yearly licence to fix prices. I am sure that if any logging truck operator in the province were asked what his annual licence cost he would come up with a figure not too far removed from $500 for an operation on a much smaller scale.

I am convinced that the companies involved would not have gone to all the fuss and bother to fix the price if it was only going to yield them $500 a year. I think that the fines and the profits involved could not have been related in any way and I would like to know what is the decision on this matter.

Mrs. Wadds: Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that I feel obliged to take even a few minutes in the debate at this stage of the life of this parliament. I was prepared to waive my opportunity on Friday if it would have expedited the business of the house but now that the debate has been ranging so broadly I would like to say a few words. Incidentally, when I say "ranging broadly" I am not referring to the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke. Some of the speeches we have been listening to have ranged rather widely. I abhor obstructionist tactics in this house and it is certainly not in that spirit that I am rising because I would be very agreeable to co-operate in expediting the business of the house at this moment. In fact I feel the greatest sympathy for the contestants for the Liberal leadership to be decided in the first week of April. They should really be visiting the delegates at this moment.

It seems to me it is an example of the government's peculiar attitude to democracy that they have arranged things so that the members of the Liberal party are stuck in one place when they should really be some place else. It was not the fault of the opposition that the government did not foresee this happening and put its own house in order before the date was chosen for their very important convention. I regret, as many in my party do, the difficulties in which this puts many of the contestants, but I want to make it clear that it is entirely their own doing that this has happened.

The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is a most amiable minister and very popular both inside the house and outside. I would not want anything said at this time to be detrimental to his chances. In the first place I personally think, and I know thousands of others do also, that the Liberal party could do worse than choose him. In the second place it would be grossly unfair if anything said at this late date on the supplementary estimates were particularly harsh on him because, as ministers go, he is relatively moderate in his spending. In fact he could be considered a bit of a novice among the high-spending Liberal ministers. However, since he went against some rather important advice in the enlargement of his department to include consumer affairs, advice from a group that was set up purposely to advise the government, it seems to me only natural that some questions should be answered by him.

The minister's taking of matters into his own hands and setting up his own version of how to control consumer prices has done absolutely nothing to assist the consumer against rising costs and therefore we would like to hear from him just what he has done in this department to warrant the rising costs of the department. In the estimates for 1968-69 the cost of the Department of Corporate and Consumer Affairs is slightly over $8½ million. The cost in 1967-68 was nearly $7 million so the over-all increase is slightly over $1½ million. In the 1968-69 estimates the amount for the new consumer affairs branch is $394,400. This includes salaries totalling $220,000, travelling expenses of $20,000, and office supplies and equipment, $29,500. This in itself could be criticized in the light of the minister's statement on October 17 last, as reported on page 3211 of Hansard:

> I want to make it clear, as I attempted to do at the resolution stage, that we contemplate no substantial increase in government expenditure.

My values may be wrong but I consider this a substantial increase. I do not know of any other business that would not consider a quarter of a million dollars in additional salaries and travelling expenses a substantial increase. Neither do I know of any other business that would allow its planned expenditures to increase by well over 50 per cent, as has happened in the consumer affairs branch. With the additional cost so conveniently slipped into supplementary estimates this new branch, which was supposed to involve no substantial increase, is already within five months, less than half a year, costing well over half a million dollars, in fact a total of $569,300. At this rate one shudders to think what it may cost in two, three or five years. The only hope is that the present government will not be administering it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Wadds: Everyone knows that everyone is spending a lot of money these days. The minister reminded us on second reading of the bill establishing his department that personal expenditures on consumer goods and purchases are running at about $37 billion a year in Canada. This is most certainly a great deal of money but it covers everything having to do with human beings and their living within our society. It seems to me to be quite a problem to know how to cut down expenditures involving personal choices and personal decisions. It is going to be a very large undertaking indeed to assist people in making savings in this very broad and rather intangible expenditure of $37 billion. The approach seems to me to be a very essential one and needs a great deal more careful attention and consideration that we have been giving it so far.

The government seems to have forgotten the old adage not to throw good money after bad. It has been following the procedure of trying to solve the problem of too much spending by more spending. It is true that consumers do need direction and assistance with regard to the features offered by some merchandisers as against others and how to go about finding the qualities they are looking for. However, it seems unlikely that, by spending this large amount of money in this branch of the new department, housewives in northern Saskatchewan or Newfoundland will benefit very much in balancing their own personal budgets. Quite the contrary. It just adds to the over-all inflationary spiral which is already making it so very difficult for them.

The minister received the best of advice from the Economic Council of Canada on how to co-ordinate the many departments already dealing with the protection of consumers. At the resolution stage of the bill setting up his department, on October 13 of last year, as recorded at page 3070 of Hansard, the hon. member for Yukon reminded the minister in the most direct terms that it would be wise for him to follow the advice of the economic council when it said:

> The implementation of these recommendations does not require a vast expansion in government activity and in the size of the bureaucracy. Any such tendencies should be strongly resisted as being neither necessary nor wise—
> In view of the wide scope of consumer interests and the many departments which are engaged in activities affecting consumers, there is no possibility of concentrating all these activities in a single department, nor would it be desirable to try to do so.

The economic council was quite specific in recommending an interdepartmental committee on consumer affairs under the chairmanship of the deputy registrar general. This would have made further use of the knowledge and machinery already existing. It was one of the many steps which could have been taken to ease the growing concern in Canada about rapidly rising government spending.

• (4:50 p.m.)

The government has been warned and warned about its overspending. On page 261 of the fourth annual report of the Economic Council of Canada the growing uneasiness in Canada about the current pace of the over-all advance in government spending is mentioned. The very significant and alarming comment is added that the council shares this uneasiness. What is the use of setting up such groups as the Economic Council of Canada if its advice is not heeded? What is the use of enlarging departments if they are not to have any effect on results? Perhaps the minister would tell us whether any further increases are planned for the consumer affairs branch and, if so, what specific results he expects to receive from this further expenditure.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Chairman, since it is beginning to become obvious that we will not conclude these estimates before six o'clock and because of the rather specific speech in terms of figures by the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas, with the permission of the committee I might answer some of the questions which have arisen so far and then allow the debate to continue since the information which comes to me is such that at the moment I am convinced the debate on these estimates will not end this evening.

In analysing the increase in expenses of the department I should like to say first of all that of the amount of $683,753 only $175,000 relates to the new consumers branch. That amount involves the establishment of 26 positions, 18 of which have now been filled. The remainder of the expenses relating to the new consumers branch involves overhead expenses and travelling expenses related to the establishment of those positions.

I should like to go through this in some detail. The amount of $399,753 for departmental administration is divided as follows. We have a management study on cost benefits relating to the objectives of the department within the meaning of the more general report of the Economic Council of Canada so that the federal government would be able to ascertain what is the best way to meet those objectives. We feel that the $70,000 required for this study is a good investment on behalf of the Canadian taxpayers to ensure that proper administration is achieved in the new consumers branch.

Then there is an amount of $142,525 relating to the Canadian committee on mutual fund and investment contracts. The federal government is paying half the cost of a joint federal-provincial study which is reviewing the whole nature and operation of mutual funds in Canada. This was transferred to the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs from the estimates of the Privy Council. These estimates were not originally incurred by this department nor was this department responsible for them. Originally there was an annotation affixed to the blue book to this effect.

There is an amount of $10,328 involved in the obtaining of a legal opinion relating to the application of section 12(g) of the securities exchange act of the United States. This arose when the United States authorities were thinking of applying in a rather severe way the securities exchange act to those companies which had over a certain number of shareholders who were United States citizens and which had over a certain amount of assets. We were required to obtain counsel in Washington to advise us just what the legal effect of this statute was on Canadian companies having United States shareholders.

We have also retained consultants on certain specific problems and have asked for an amount of $20,000 for this purpose. There is an amount of $48,000 involved in establishing the minister's office. When the late Mr. Favreau was president of the privy council at the same time as he was registrar general he was entitled to only one office. This is the first time the office requirements appear against a separate minister, formerly the registrar general and now the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

There is a securities task force and we are asking for additional funds in the amount of $46,500 for this. Our department is looking into the possibility of establishing and the method by which to establish a federal presence in the securities field. We retained a leading authority on securities work, Professor Peter Williamson, to look into this. He retained a staff during last summer and I hope that shortly I will be in a position to advise my colleagues about this.

There is an amount of $152,400 relating to the corporations task force. This is under the chairmanship of Professor Bob Dickerson from the University of British Columbia who, with a group of academic lawyers from across the country, reviewed some specific problems relating to the amendments we seek to the Corporations Act. These amendments have to do with the disclosure of financial information, the duties of directors, insider trading, proxy solicitation and so on. I have received that report and have submitted it to practising lawyers in the profession who came to Ottawa after taking the oath and who received only a per diem allowance for their travelling expenses. We have also submitted this report to a group of professional chartered accountants, some of whom were nominated by the Institute of Chartered Accountants and some of whom I chose from my own personal professional experience.

That adds up to a total amount of $489,753. Less the amount transferred from salaries, the total is $399,753. As I said, only $175,000 is requested for the establishment of a consumers branch in the new department which was authorized last December by parliament.

Under vote 5c relating to the Bankruptcy Act the amount of $109,000 is for the setting up of three regional offices and an investigation squad in order to meet the responsibilities as I interpret them of combating fraudulent bankruptcies in this country, which I termed rather facetiously as being one of the growth industries of this country. I think we have now turned the tide in respect of the type of enforcement we are achieving.

We have managed to work out an agreement with some of the provinces, beginning with the province of Quebec, for the use of federal crown prosecutors in respect of offences under the Bankruptcy Act and provincial crown attorneys under the Criminal Code relating to bankruptcy matters. I believe that the centralization of this type of enforcement, aided by regional offices in Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver, teams of accountants and the bankruptcy squad now established in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, has made the investigation and coordination of case work, presentation of evidence and prosecution itself far more effective. On an earlier occasion in answer to a question posed by the hon. member for Yukon I gave these statistics. Here again I think we have an investment which the Canadian people would wish made in order to protect the business community of this country, particularly those small creditors who are usually hurt whenever a bankruptcy occurs.

Sub vote 25 of vote 20 in the amount of $80,000 relating to the patent division is to cover the cost of the mid-cyclical review for the professional category which was granted in January, 1967 but not paid until April or May of 1968. No funds were requested from the Treasury Board at that time. This was in response to an earlier request and since the money was not withdrawn it is brought back, I understand, into these estimates.

[Mr. Turner.]

The hon. member for Wellington South made some inquiries about some of these expenses and asked whether the entire amount of $683,753 was spent on the consumer branch. I have answered that question by informing the committee that $175,000 is the amount allocated to the branch. The hon. member also asked me about staff and I have already indicated to the committee that there are 26 positions of which about 18 have been filled. The hon. member also asked whether there were two deputy ministers or one. There is one deputy minister over one department. He asked whether the department intended to centralize the entire administration of consumer affairs throughout the federal government. Let me answer now by saying no, we intend to co-ordinate the consumer program in accordance with the legislation. If, after a review of management of consumer programs of the federal government, we should find that some matters would be better handled in a central way the government can then make the administrative changes. We have set up an interdepartmental committee of deputy ministers, under the chairmanship of my deputy minister to look into the various consumer programs from this point of view.

I was also asked about the consumer advisory council. I am almost in a position to publish the terms of reference and once I am able to present my nominees to my colleagues and get approval I will make an announcement regarding the membership of that council.

I should like to make some comment in response to the original remarks of the hon. member for Halifax and the remarks today by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond concerning National Hockey League franchises. When in Vancouver and in answer to a question asked in the house I outlined the contents of my telegram to Mr. Campbell. Let me state once again that as the courts interpret the act I have no jurisdiction over services. The jurisdiction and authority of the director of investigation and research under the Combines Investigation Act are limited to goods. Professional sport falls under the service item. I do not want in any way to anticipate the current study undertaken by the Economic Council of Canada which, by virtue of a reference made by this government on July 22, 1966, is reviewing the Combines Investigation Act, but I should like to say that since services amount to about 35 per cent of our gross national product it seems strange to me that goods should fall within the ambit of the act and services should not.

Let me say also that had I jursidiction and authority over services, and thereby over professional sport, I should be very interested in reviewing some of the contracts which are used by various clubs in the N.H.L., particularly those which tie up for life young boys around 14 years of age and of amateur status. I am inclined to think, without prejudging the situation, that had I the authority I would take more than a passing interest in that phase of the game.

Mr. McCleave: Would the minister permit a question at this stage? He said that if he had the authority to deal with hockey as a service he would do certain things. Is this authority one which parliament could grant?

Mr. Turner: I feel there is constitutional authority over services as there is over goods. There are limitations under which the director of investigation and research labours, aside from limitations in respect of staff. If parliament grants a department certain priorities, as we have been granted in respect of consumer affairs and combines, particularly if they arise out of reviews such as the Batten commission, about which I want to talk later, then the director of investigation and research must be given the necessary resources to do what parliament asks him to do. It is my opinion that at this moment he has not those necessary resources.

The statutory limitation is not only in respect of services; there is also a limitation in respect of civil jurisdiction. I have always felt that we have a constitutional remedy. We have relied on criminal law which involves a very heavy burden of proof. We have not tested the trade and commerce laws under the B.N.A. Act. Again without anticipating the study of the Economic Council of Canada, I feel there is something to be said for giving damages to an aggrieved party. Under the anti-trust legislation in the United States an aggrieved party, if successful, is entitled to triple damages.

I think we must also explore the possibility of allowing cease and desist orders. Because of the complicated nature of merger and combines cases, as well as restraint of trade cases, a complaint may be brought but by the time the director, with the resources he has, is able to bring evidence of a complicated transaction before the restrictive trade practices commission and obtain a report that there is a prima facie case, which in turn is brought before the courts by the attorney general, the aggrieved parties may be in bankruptcy. There is no authority under the act for the director to anticipate a decision and intervene or to call for a cease and desist order. Those are other limitations. Constitutionally I think the minister and the director of investigation and research would have authority over services if parliament were to grant it.

The Batten commission was again brought to my attention by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. I do not intend to go over the circumstances of the invitation I extended to Judge Mary Batten last week when she was down here, as I think the hon. member is aware of them. In respect of the grocery situation in western Canada I did ask the director of investigation and research to examine the allegations in that report. If he finds them to be substantiated he is required to initiate an inquiry. He has begun his work and I understand that officers are on their way to western Canada to examine the research and reports on which the allegations of the commission were founded.

I have also written the three prairie premiers asking them whether, in anticipation of any reference in respect of those aspects of the report which relate to the consumer branch of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, our officers may keep in touch with the research staff of the commission. I felt bound to proceed in this way because the commission was established by the three prairie governments. I can only take informal cognizance of it except in respect of the combines aspect.

The proper procedure would eventually be for the prairie governments to accept the recommendations of the Batten commission and refer them, as Judge Batten and her co-commissioners suggested, to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In anticipation of any reference I have asked the three premiers to allow my officers to examine the data so we will have the information on hand.

As the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway knows, a lot of these recommendations relating to the consumer goods industry were also made by the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, of which she was a member. There were also comments in the committee about the cost of living. In this respect the authority of this department is related to the general economic policy of the government. This department does not have any special weapon with which to attack the cost of living. The board of review suggested by the Prime Minister would relate to an examination of charges, prices and costs generally. The constitutional power of enforcement does not lie directly with the federal government, and this is one reason we are contacting the provincial governments at this time for their co-operation.

I do not want to comment generally on the economic policy of the government except in so far as it relates to my particular responsibilities as minister. I do not need to comment now on what my good friend the hon. member for Peace River asked about combines, because I feel I have already dealt quite thoroughly with that subject. The hon. member for Kootenay West asked what I was going to do by way of sponsoring public information for the consumer. I agree with him that one of the chief functions of this department when we get the resources from parliament—and I realize and accept the restriction on spending at this moment—will be in the role of research, public education and information. We now have in the department a consumer information section. We hope eventually to see what we can do within the federal jurisdiction to contribute to consumer counselling.

We look forward to seeing what we can do in co-operation with the media of the printed word, television and radio to help inform the Canadian consumer. As a matter of fact we have already received co-operation from many professional broadcasters, television people and those responsible for consumer columns and consumer pages in Canadian newspapers. They have already given us a great deal of help.

Mr. Herridge: Excellent.

Mr. Turner: I hope that within the next two or three weeks we will have ready a booklet of information for the consumer showing the average Canadian housewife where to write if she has a consumer complaint which needs remedying, action or information. That booklet should be published very shortly. I hope that for the moment the hon. member for Kootenay West will bear with me on this progress report.

The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich asked what I am going to do about misleading advertising. He will observe that the proposed amendment of the Criminal Code involves the transfer of section 306 of the Criminal Code, which relates to misleading advertising alongside section 33C of the Combines Investigation Act. The substance of this transfer is that instead of allowing the enforcement of this section relating to misleading advertising to rest in the hands of the provincial attorneys general, we intend to bring it back to the federal Department of Justice for crown prosecutions. I hope this will result in a more uniform enforcement of the statute.

There has been considerable case law or jurisprudence built up on those two sections. I hope that in the next review of the Criminal Code we may have more fundamental revisions to that particular section. I also refer members of the committee to the annual report of the Director of Investigation and Research, which sets out the important judicial decisions in respect of section 33C.

The hon. member for Timiskaming asked what our priorities were in the department, particularly as they relate to the consumer interest. First, we are undertaking a general review of the entire federal consumer program and the legislation enforcing it. I remember that when we were discussing the nature of the department last fall I was able to say to hon. members that the statute setting up the department was an enabling statute giving us initiating, co-ordinating and policy powers. The first step, surely, is to find out just where and how the consumer program is administered by the various federal departments and agencies and the interdepartmental committee which is now in operation under the chairmanship of my deputy minister. So the first thing is a review of the administration of and the legislation behind the present program. We have set up an information service which I have already described. We have set up a research bureau. We consider that misleading advertising is an immediate priority and we intend to enforce that section. The problem of labelling and packaging is receiving active consideration, particularly those recommendations that were made by the joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons.

Also, as I have said publicly, I am reviewing the constitutional position of the federal government with respect to bilingual labelling. If we admit that every consumer is entitled to know exactly what she is buying, she is also entitled to understand the language on the label. There are certain constitutional limitations. We are bound by international trade treaties, some of which provide for language requirements. The federal government is limited in its authority, of course, in respect of interprovincial and international trade.

I could go on but I think the hon. member sees the direction in which we are moving. We are also reviewing the question of standards and grades. I want to say again that we have to decide what our priorities are going to be because with a limited complement of 26 positions we have to allocate those priorities very carefully.

The hon. member for Queens asked whether the Lieutenant Governor in Council of Prince Edward Island had made application to me, as the minister responsible for the administration of the Bankruptcy Act, to bring into force part X of that act. My answer is yes, application has been made and we are drawing up the appropriate order in council. This relates to farmers or wage earners and their creditors and derives from a particularly unfortunate situation in Prince Edward Island.

I shall do my best to obtain an immediate answer to question No. 1,101 put by the hon. member for Carleton, but I have already talked about the Canadian committee on mutual funds and investment contracts. In reply to the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke, the last time the question arose in the house—I have talked to him privately since then about this matter—I said that I had asked legal counsel to advise me whether we should appeal the case. The advice we obtained was that we should not appeal the case. After reviewing the matter with my own officers and with officers of the Department of Justice I accepted that advice.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that this has brought up to date my participation in the debate with respect to questions asked by members of the committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Chairman, I think the minister has been more explicit today with regard to the work of the department than at any time I have heard him speak since the department was established or during the process of establishing it. I do not know how much this is due to the fact that he is preaching for a call, but I hope that the preaching for a call will continue and become much more definite in the next few days because I have seen today the first hopeful sign that there might be a little power in the department or at least in the mind of the minister the will to use that power.

The hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke said I had referred to this whole program as a toothless wonder. That is completely correct. It has been in the past. If I understood the minister correctly, he said he was asking the combines investigation officers to look into the situation of retailing on the prairies. Is this correct?

Mr. Turner: Yes.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I think this is the first indication that there might be some hope of the department intervening with regard to the cost of living.

• (5:20 p.m.)

I am quite sure that the governments of the prairie provinces will be only too glad to have leadership and direction from the federal department. This may very well be the beginning of a co-operative attempt to throw light on the situation and then to begin to deal with it. I am very glad the minister has taken the initiative but I do hope action will be continued in this direction for a long time in the future regardless of what may be the outcome of the forthcoming nomination convention, because there is a great deal of work to be done. The minister has the authority to do what he is doing, quite apart from the good will of the provinces, on the basis of the joint Senate and House of Commons committee examination of this matter which encompassed the whole of Canada, a much wider field than was covered by the study of the prairie commission. I believe that the minister has every right to move into this field on the basis of the committee's recommendations to the house. I am very glad he is doing so in the case of the prairie provinces on what I would hope to be a co-operative basis.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Chairman, may I interject for a moment? I hope I have not misled the hon. member. What I said was that we are examining the allegations in the Batten commission report. In other words, we would be analysing the factual basis upon which these allegations were made.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I hope the department will not stop at just an examination and will realize this is only the first nibble. Perhaps one cannot expect the department to develop teeth all at once. I was afraid we might have to "gum it", as used to be said when all the teeth were gone. Perhaps this is the cutting of the baby teeth. In any event, I hope the examination will not be pigeonholed but will lead to action.

I was grateful to the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas for bringing us down to earth regarding the cost of the consumer affairs branch. It is true that these supplementary estimates call for only $175,000 but the projected requirement in next year's estimates is $394,400 which is a big sum of money. I am not as concerned as the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas about the size of that sum of money as I am to ensure that the taxpayers and consumers of this country get their money's worth. I am far less interested in curtailing that amount of money than I am in ensuring that full value is given to the consumer for that money.

This is why I wish to raise this afternoon a few definite and specific problems in connection with the supplementary estimates before us. The minister said he is ready to announce the names of the personnel who are to form the consumer advisory council so that it may begin its work. If he has time this afternoon I hope he will tell us a little more about what the consumer advisory council will be doing, because I believe the minister tried to cover up the fact that the government is not yet ready to deal with the cost of living through selective price controls.

I point out to the minister that the government's policy has been known to change on some of these matters. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance have held a bait in front of us in the form of a prices review board designed to deal with increasing wages and other factors contributing to inflation but not with profits. It is possible that in view of the consumer pressure across the country we may yet live to see the day when the minister will see the necessity for the establishment of a prices review board under the jurisdiction of his department. So I should like to hear from the minister what the functions of this advisory council will be, whether it will keep in touch in a real way with consumer opinion across the country, what kind of techniques it will use to find out what consumers want, and whether it will be its job to make periodic reviews or analyses in its reports to the minister.

In my view the department should deal with one specific grievance, which has come to my desk and I am sure will reach the minister, from the Ottawa consumers protest association on behalf of the Canadian consumers protest association. The Ottawa branch is one of 55 similar groups located across Canada from Halifax to Vancouver. I know the minister is familiar with it. As a matter of fact I believe that when the group of women came up from Montreal to see him he ran away and hid from them ignominiously.

[Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway).]

Mr. Turner: Wait a minute, Mr. Chairman, I did not hide from them at all. They came up on short notice, as they are wont to do, and my parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Québec-Montmorency, spent an hour and a half with them.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): They were not satisfied with the replacement, good as he was. However, I am glad to know that the minister was not in hiding. These people have written to me.

An hon. Member: Perhaps he was shy.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I do not think he was shy but perhaps by the time they got through he did not know they were women. He may have thought they were pretty determined individuals. These people are most anxious that the minister should look closely at the recommendations of the Batten commission that tariffs on some essential foodstuffs be abolished. They are particularly concerned about the cost of tomatoes and cucumbers in the winter months. As the minister knows. there is a very limited supply of fresh food in Canada in the winter months, at which time it is possible to get an adequate supply of tomatoes and cucumbers from Mexico. It appears that the cost of production of tomatoes by Canadian greenhouse growers is almost three times as high per pound as that of Mexican growers. Recently in Ottawa Mexican tomatoes were priced at 59 cents for three pounds while Canadian tomatoes cost the consumer 39 cents a pound.

It is not to Canada's advantage to devote resources to growing tomatoes and cucumbers in the winter months. The protection of the industry through tariffs could well be an example of "hothouse" in two senses. The members of the association are most anxious that the tariffs be abolished. If it is necessary to give relief to the Canadian hothouse tomato and cucumber growers, then let it be given in some other form, such as relief in the form of subsidies, but let us not burden the housewives with the high cost of vital fresh food for their families in the wintertime. I hope the minister will seriously consider this complaint because it affects the whole of Canada so far as vital items in our diet are concerned.

I should like to speak about another matter which has not been dealt with at all in this debate. I receive a great many complaints from parents of teenagers across Canada. They feel very bitter about the advertising of buying on credit. They feel that often these young people, who are old enough to get away from home and have a part time or even a full time job, are being victimized by misleading and enticing advertising into incurring debts through credit buying facilities before they are old enough to know what they are doing and before they are fully financially independent. I think this is a field where the consumer needs protection badly. As I suggested once before in the house, the minister would do well to look at what is being done in the United States by one of the big foundations to counteract some of the fraudulent and misleading television advertising.

I feel that this is an area of particular concern when young teenagers are involved who are not really on their own except in the sense that they have the power to obtain credit but then have to rely on their parents to take care of the resulting debt. I believe this situation underlines the need for the minister to examine the recommendations of the prairie commission that facilities connected with credit buying ought to be brought within the purview of the Combines Investigation Act.

I hope the minister will take a real look at the report of the prairie commission on groceries. I am keeping my fingers very firmly crossed in this regard. I hope that his examination does not involve taking one horrified look and then deciding the problem is too big and too difficult to tackle. I hope he realizes that it may be big and difficult now but that it will become more unwieldy and more difficult as time passes.

There is one point upon which I wish to congratulate the minister. I refer to the introduction of Bill No. C-190 which could perhaps bring down the price of prescription drugs to consumers in Canada. I have been disappointed to find that one large group in the house feels that the bill is not good and they are not going to co-operate in giving the consumer the benefit of this legislation. Frankly, this is the first piece of consumer protection I have seen emanate from the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and I believe that the house would do well not to adjourn until Bill No. C-190 has been passed. I for one intend to advise every consumer I can find that Bill No. C-190 is a definite attempt to bring down the price of prescription drugs. One federal party in this country does not want that done. In my opinion these people are ignoring the interests of Canadian consumers, particularly the low income consumers who are today groaning under the heavy price of prescription drugs. I do not believe the house should adjourn until Bill No. C-190 has been considered in committee and given third reading.

I believe we should have followed the idea promulgated earlier to get these supplementary estimates out of the way today so we could go on with Bill No. C-190 tomorrow. If some of us in this corner are talking about other consumer difficulties today I want it clearly understood this simply results from the fact that one of the large parties in this house would not agree to go ahead with Bill No. C-190. I hope they will change their minds because they are going to be exceedingly unpopular with the consumers across this country if they do not do so.

In my view the consumers of this country are watching very closely what is being done by this new department. The minister has made a good start in what he has been doing lately. I want to urge him not to forget the motto which he has put so prominently in his new book. It reads:

> My plea is that we Liberals should embark on a crusade to defend the individual—whenever the rights of the weak are being sacrificed to the power of the strong.

This motto is in the minister's new book. The minister knows quite well that too often people who have written books have found that their contents have come back to haunt them. If the minister wants to avoid being haunted for the rest of his life he will remember that the rights of the weak are being sacrificed to the power of the strong across Canada today in the whole field of consumer activities, whether it be prairie retailing, prescription drugs, combines, housing or any other field. If the minister will embark on a genuine crusade and not just look into what is happening but seek one piece of legislation after another, he will find that a number of us in this corner will give him the same type of wholehearted support we have given Bill No. C-190. We will give this support to any effort he will make to co-operate with the prairie governments or any other government that will look at the cost of living and then take measures to deal with it, even if that involves price controls for the necessities. This is the thing his department will have to keep in mind. It is a big responsibility.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to speak at this point but the hon. lady who has just resumed her seat resorted to some blackmail in the words she uttered. I want to make it abundantly clear that a week ago last Monday the government house leader called a house leaders' meeting which I attended along with other house leaders. However, there was no representative from the New Democratic party. They ignored that meeting, and I do not know for what reason. At that time the government house leader asked us whether there was a possibility that the supplementary estimates and interim supply for two months could be dealt with before the end of that week. We thought there was that possibility and all of those present said so. The next day, or some days later, we got word that the New Democratic party would not agree to this course. They said they were going to filibuster the supplementary estimates until the end of the week. Their next approach was that they would agree to shut off this debate tonight provided the drug bill were brought before the house for consideration.

Our position on that bill has been made abundantly clear but I shall do so again so there will be no question about it. While we agree with the bill in so far as it may provide for lower prices we feel it is our responsibility and the minister's responsibility to have some concern for the safety aspect. It is this point that we want to stress. Not only should drugs be made cheaper for the Canadian people but there should also be some safeguards against drugs being imported into this country that would be detrimental to the consumers. We are not going to be blackmailed by the N.D.P. I want to make that abundantly clear. We have our own viewpoint and we are not going to be subjected to this kind of attack.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox.

Mr. Turner: Would the hon. member yield the floor for about two minutes on this subject?

Mr. Alkenbrack: After I am finished.

[Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway).]

Mr. Knowles: Then I am rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Turner: I will rise on a point of order then.

Mr. Knowles: I rise on a question of privilege. I do not wish to enter into any lengthy argument with the hon. member for Ontario, but he did make a reference to the fact there was a meeting of house leaders at which no representative from this party was present. The implication is that someone was not doing his duty and that someone in this case is the member for Winnipeg North Centre who happens to be this party's house leader. A meeting was held on a certain day at a time when I was in attendance at a meeting of the committee on health and welfare, but my views and the views of this party on this question had been made known at previous meetings. It had been made known repeatedly that we feel that Bill No. C-190 should be proceeded with before we recess.

• (5:40 p.m.)

Perhaps I might be permitted to say that our main quarrel is not with the members of the official opposition on this matter. They do not need to be so concerned. Our quarrel is with the government. After all, Bill No. C-190 is a piece of government legislation. It has been given first and second readings and has started to go through committee of the whole. We think that it should be proceeded with. That is why we have taken the stand that this session should not recess until it has been passed. In fact, we feel that if it is not dealt with before we rise it will not be dealt with at all; it will die on the order paper. That is our concern. I think the hon. member for Ontario is a little off the beam in the kind of complaints he is making.

Mr. Starr: I am not off the beam at all.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Order. I shall listen to the minister in a moment. Perhaps I should point out to the committee that while there may be some connection between the subject now before the committee and Bill No. C-190, which is why I have allowed the discussion to go ahead, I think that if there is to be an overly long discussion as to what the business of the house is to be it should take place with the Speaker in the chair. However, I will hear the minister.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order that relates to the remarks made by the hon. member for Ontario and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. As the minister responsible for Bill No. C-190 I want to make my position perfectly clear. When the bill was granted second reading through the courtesy of the house I undertook to review all reasonable amendments that might be suggested by members of the opposition. Some amendments were presented to me on an informal basis by members of the official opposition. Those amendments have been reviewed by officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare, the food and drug directorate, my department, the Department of Justice and the Department of Industry. Then in an informal way, and through the hon. member for Halton who was chairman of the House of Commons committee that gave birth to some of the recommendations made in the bill, we negotiated with the hon. member for Simcoe East and the hon. member for Saskatoon.

I said in introducing the bill that I was satisfied that the bill protected the people of Canada, that the bill gave an assurance to the people of Canada that only safe, efficacious, high quality drugs would be imported or distributed. The fact that the Department of National Health and Welfare was party to the drafting of the bill was further assurance to me.

In light of the suggestions that were made by the official opposition we reviewed the bill. We have come forth with what we think are additional clarifications that in our opinion re-ensure the safety measures of the bill. I am prepared, of course, to stand by the bill in terms of its economic significance and in terms of the safety of the Canadian people, and I am prepared to have it debated at any time.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Chairman, I am glad that despite the political exigencies of the moment the house can deal with this vital question by way of debate at this time. I want to congratulate the minister, even though he is playing one of the key roles in the coming drama on April 6, for being in his seat today and attending to his duties as a minister and member of this house should. I would also like to congratulate all members who have taken part in this debate and to note that many constructive opinions have been placed before the committee, as well as before the government on whose shoulders rests the responsibility for the persistent rise in the cost of living the heavy load of which is now being borne by the people of Canada.

As reported at pages 5609 to 5611 of Hansard for May 27, 1966, during the first session of this parliament, Mr. Chairman, I pointed out to the government the economic plight of the vast majority of the citizens of Canada whose lives and livelihoods were and are being so adversely affected by the spiralling cost of living. I was followed by other hon. members from all parties who voiced the same warnings to the government. They too pointed out the harm that was being done to the farmers, the labourers, the professional people in the medium and lower income brackets, to the old age pensioners, the veterans and war pensioners—yes, Mr. Chairman, to the consumers of this country in general.

At that time I stated that present-day government policy and the consequent high cost of consumer goods are storming the last bastion of individual hope and the right of the individual to a decent standard of living. I also stated that it is practically impossible for the average head of a family to make his modest salary support the family from one payday to the next. My colleagues who participated in that debate two years ago—and I say colleagues because they were members from all parties—were equally concerned to point out to the government that prices had skyrocketed all along the line, in food, rent, clothing, fuel, transportation, medical services, insurance, taxes and capital cost of housing both new and used. In this rapid and cruel escalation of costs this government has been a steady partner. Its policies over the past four years glaringly illustrate this fact.

I do not wish today to enumerate once more all those facets of life and living that the policies of this government have so adversely affected. All I wish to do today, is to indicate some of the adverse conditions existing today from the point of view of the consumers of Canada, conditions which are now worse than they were two years ago. In this connection I should like to refer to some statistics I have just received from our reliable Dominion Bureau of Statistics. These figures have been produced by machine. The official who talked to my secretary on the telephone stated that he had asked the computer for the latest figures on the cost of living index.

In May, 1966, when we had that impromptu but effective debate to which I have referred, the consumer price index stood at 143.4. In February, 1968 the consumer price index stood at 152.7, an increase of 6.5 per cent. As we all know, Mr. Chairman, 100 represents the level as at 1949.

I suggest that these are ominous figures. The consumer price index has increased by 6.5 per cent during the last 22 months. During approximately the same period unemployment across Canada has risen to about 6.4 per cent of the labour force. Thus the buying power of the people of Canada, especially of the unemployed, is being relentlessly choked. In May, 1966 people were referring to the cost of living, which then stood at the figure of 143.4, as unbearable. The government ignored our pleas and now, 22 months later, the figure is 152.7, an increase of 6.5 per cent in just 22 months. The government has done nothing about the matter. Perhaps I am being unfair. They have done something. They have formed a new department, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and installed a most gracious, intelligent and well liked minister to head it. He is running for the leadership of his party, and I wish him well. I say to him today that if he gets the leadership the thing for him to do, and quickly, is to try to reduce the cost of living of the working people of Canada.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Alkenbrack: The minister has spoken of the services and offices which have been started but so far the minister has not brought down the cost of living one single point. In fact, the cost of living has not decreased one-tenth of a point and the statistics quoted prove my point. I say to the minister: Do not let the Prime Minister in his easygoing way convince you that all that is necessary is the installation and setting up of another board or commission. I now wish to quote the Prime Minister's words on the Canadian economy spoken in this chamber. On page 7536 of Hansard for March 12, 1968, the Prime Minister is reported to have said:

> These selective programs...have their effect over the longer term. But in the curent situation additional measures are required to have a more direct and immediate effect. We must find some effective means of influencing, not controling but influencing, the many individual decisions that give rise to increases in incomes, costs and prices.

Those words are ominous. They point the finger at what the government has done during the past four years. The cabinet has not made one decision to prevent many unreasonable increases of incomes, costs and prices. Evidently the Prime Minister must have learned his lesson because from his words he seems to want to rectify the actions of the past four years.

As recorded in Hansard at page 7537 the Prime Minister went on to say:

> To this end the government proposes to establish a governmental agency, commission or board, whatever it may be called, to review and scrutinize major decisions affecting prices, incomes and costs throughout the economy.

He spoke of what this agency would do and then said:

> The precise nature and the terms of reference of this review agency wil be determined after necessary consultations with interested parties. These include provincial governments, the leading elements in the labour movement and in industry, professional associations and others concerned. We shall also, Mr. Speaker, take carefully into acocunt any views on this proposal expressed in parliament.

The Prime Minister's words are nothing but a gesture. They are a sort of economic windowdressing, enough to get him safely past his resignation date. I say to the minister, who may win the leadership, do something now about the vicious price spiral. Do something people can give you credit for. Make our price laws and regulations effective.

The Wartime Prices and Trade Board had a difficult job to do. I remember that in 1942, when I was in the lumber business, one of my trucks loaded with lumber destined for a wartime airdrome, Camp Mohawk at Deseronto, stalled on the road 20 miles north of Napanee with two blown tires. I had to apply to the board at their Kingston office for permission to buy two tires and they sent four men in a car 45 miles from Kingston to make certain that the truck needed two new tires. You could call that another ridiculous incident in the workings of bureaucracy, but they let me have the tires. That board was doing its job and it helped to win the war. The board was set up as an emergency measure.

Now, 26 years later, I submit that Canada will never survive economically unless some regulatory authority controls price levels within a free economy. The government ought to set an example first by controlling its own spending better. In his statement the other day the Prime Minister said, as recorded on page 7537 of Hansard:

> We shall also, Mr. Speaker, take carefully into account any views on this proposal expressed in parliament.

I hope the minister will heed the constructive words of all those who have taken part in this debate. I say that the response of this government to the warnings that were given in the debate of May 27, 1966, has been unacceptable. I deliberately use that word because it is one of the Prime Minister's favourites. When he used it as a private member of the chamber I sometimes agreed with him. But in this matter under discussion, and we are considering the little empire that is now ruled over by the minister, the government's action is unacceptable.

Let us examine the general estimates for 1967-68. The department spent $7,015,000 directly and $1,240,600 indirectly. In other words, the department last year cost Canada's taxpayers nearly $8.5 million. I know that includes the corporate affairs part of the department, and this amount cannot all be ascribed to new offices and the operation of the new department.

Mr. Turner: May I ask a question?

Mr. Alkenbrack: When I have finished, Mr. Chairman. For this fiscal year it is estimated that the department will spend $8,606,500 directly and $1,403,500 indirectly—well over $10 million. After having been granted nearly $20 million over two years the department is asking in these supplementary estimates for another handout of $683,753. Since its inception the department has not done anything to bring down living costs. Neither has it brought forward a single measure of legislative value to help the workingman, the farmer, the old age pensioner, the veteran, or the man on a fixed income. If this supplementary request is passed the department with its luxury empire of wall to wall carpets will have cost our taxpayers nearly $21 million. That is one reason why so many people across the country are dissatisfied with the government. That is why the consumer citizens of Canada are determined to change and rectify the situation at their next electoral opportunity.

An hon. Member: Are you kidding?

Another hon. Member: Six o'clock.

Mr. MacEachen: I rise on a point of order to speak of a matter that I mentioned last night. At eight o'clock we shall continue with the estimates of the Departments of Defence Production and Industry and then with the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and so on. It was understood that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs would not be in the house at eight o'clock.

An hon. Member: Where will he be?

The Chairman: The questions listed for debate on tonight's adjournment motion are as follows: the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis), Consumer Affairs—hearing aids—request for inquiry into prices; the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave), Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—alleged suppression of filmed interview with Nigerian official; the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. Muir), Labour Conditions—North Sydney, Nova Scotia—request for assistance for dock workers.

It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Chairman: Order. House again in committee of supply, Supplementary Estimates (C), 1967-68, of the Department of Defence Production. The details will be found on page 6 of the supplementary estimates. Vote 6c.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENCE PRODUCTION

6c. Reimbursement of the Defence Production Revolving Fund established by Section 16(1) of the Defence Production Act for losses sustained in the operation of the Crown-owned magnesium foundry at Haley, Ontario, prior to its sale in December, 1967, $480,000.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Chairman, I first became interested in this vote 6c in the estimates of the Department of Defence Production when I noted that it mentioned the sale of public property. The reason I am particularly interested in it is because recently the Minister of National Defence, or his department, saw fit to disband the local unit in my area, the Fourteenth Canadian Hussars. I will not go into the reasons, or what I think of the action of the government in this respect, but with the disbandment of that unit it left two armouries surplus in my constituency, one in Swift Current and one in Maple Creek.

To give a little of the history of the building of these armouries I would point out that I believe the land in both cases was given to the Department of National Defence for a nominal sum, I think the sum of $1. Now that the armouries are no longer used by the unit, naturally the municipalities in which they are situated are concerned about what is going to happen to them. As a result of their concern and their contacting me, I wrote to the Minister of National Defence and asked him if he would dispose of these armouries, and whether he had contacted the municipalities concerned to see if they could make a deal with the Department of National Defence, because these municipalities knew the circumstances surrounding the purchase of the land in the first place.

Much to my surprise on March 7, 1968, I received a letter from the minister, and I would like to put on the record part of the second paragraph of that letter, in which he wrote:

—the department is prevented by statute from effecting direct disposal of these properties. Under the provisions of the Surplus Crown Assets Act, my department is obligated to hand over all responsibility for the disposal of its surplus properties to the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation.

Further on he wrote:

—the department has no voice in the negotiations and cannot predetermine the sale price.

On receipt of that letter I examined my files and from them extracted a news release which apparently was issued by the Department of Defence Production, dated January 24, 1968. This news release, which I should like to put on the record says:

The Department of Defence Production announces the sale of Haley Industries Limited, Haley Station, Ontario, a crown-owned light alloys foundry, to Bartaco Industries Limited of Orillia, Ontario.

The Haley plant was built in 1951 for the production of high grade magnesium and aluminum castings required by Canadian defence industry and was operated for the crown under management contracts.

The foundry will continue operations in the Renfrew area as a subsidiary of Bartaco Industries Limited.

The Haley foundry was set up at a time when no other source for such castings was available in Canada. Other sources are now available and it is no longer necessary to maintain this facility as a crown-owned plant for defence purposes.

The next part of the news release is very important so far as I am concerned, where it says:

In line with the government's policy in such cases, the facility is now being turned over to commercial interests so that it may expand and diversify.

A number of companies interested in the foundry business were solicited and the only offer received was from Bartaco Industries Limited.

It seems very peculiar to me, Mr. Chairman, that the Department of Defence Production can handle the sale of public property in this manner, especially when the Department of National Defence says that it is prevented by statute from effecting direct disposal of such properties. Which department are we to believe?

[Mr. McIntosh.]

It may be coincidental that this foundry is in the Renfrew constituency which is represented by a minister of the crown, and that the two armouries I refer to are in the constituency of a backbencher. I wonder if this has any significance, because the hon. member representing the Renfrew area is also a candidate for the leadership of the Liberal party. Again I ask, is this just a coincidence?

I wish to ask the Minister of Defence Production why and how the sale of this plant in the Renfrew area was handled in this manner, and why was it when we, on this side of the chamber, requested that the department handle the sale of publicly owned property in my constituency, the minister's colleague said he was prevented by statute from doing so in this way?

I would also like to ask the assessed value of the property in Renfrew? I also wish to ask, because I have been unable to find out, for how much was this property sold? Further, I wish to ask whether this Bartaco company, mentioned in the department's news release, is an American or a Canadian firm? I have reason to believe that possibly at the time of the sale of the plant, some two or three months ago, Bartaco Industries was a Canadian firm, but that now it has been taken over by American interests. Was there no provision in the sale agreement that such a thing should not happen?

In addition, Mr. Chairman, I would like the minister to put on record the amount of the original capital expenditure for the building and the property in the first place. Referring to these supplementary estimates, what period do the figures therein cover? Actually the total of the two items in vote 6c and vote 7c amounts to $1,220,000. Was that the total loss on that plant over the time it was operated for the department, or was it the loss for one year?

I refer the minister's attention to the wording of item 6c:

Reimbursement of the defence production revolving fund established by section 16(1) of the Defence Production Act for losses sustained in the operation of the crown-owned magnesium foundry at Haley, Ontario, prior to its sale in Dcember, 1967.

• (8:10 p.m.)

Vote 7c provides for payment of the obligations of the crown-owned magnesium foundry at Haley, Ontario, outstanding as of September 30, 1967 in the amount of $740,000. There is a three month interval there. If you divide the amount of $480,000 by three it would seem that the operating loss would be $160,000 per month. I would like to have an explanation of that. I should also like to direct the minister's attention to the remarks the Auditor General made with regard to sales of this type. At page 204 of his report, chapter 261, the Auditor General says:

> Defence Production Revolving Fund. Section 16 of the Defence Production Act, R.S., c. 62, established the Defence Production revolving fund for the purpose of acquiring, storing, maintaining and transporting stocks of materials or defence supplies—

Further down the report continues:

> Also included in the year-end balance were loans of $10 million to manufacturers to assist them in the acquisition of capital equipment. These loans, which in our opinion were made contrary to section 16(2)(c) of the Defence Production Act, are commented on in paragraph 65 of this report.

I should like to know something about that and also under what heading this plant came. I do not see the Haley plant listed in the preface of the report. The minister might advise us whether this comes under Canadian Arsenals Limited. Would he advise us whether this company has ever shown a profit since 1951 and, if so, under what heading this was accredited. I should like the minister to advise us under what type of agreement with the government this company operated, and whether a financial statement was made available to the Auditor General. Perhaps the minister would explain whether there are other firms with like government agreements operating on a similar basis to that under which this company was operating from 1951 to 1967. Then he might advise whether the entire output of this plant was purchased by government agencies or through government contracts. I should like to know what type of agreement was made in respect of any loss to be paid for by the taxpayers, and whether if there should be a profit it would be credited to the taxpayers.

Before I proceed any further I should like the minister to give us the information concerning the assessed value of the property and the total amount the taxpayers of Canada received from the sale of this property.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I shall try to outline the history of this particular operation. The hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek has asked a great many precise questions. As is apparent from the news release which he read, this company was organized at the time of the Korean conflict in order to provide a source of magnesium castings for Canadian users, particularly Avro in connection with the Avro-CF-100 production. The company was founded and equipped by the crown in 1951 to meet the needs of the CF-100 engine production. Light Alloys Limited, a subsidiary of Dominion Magnesium Limited, undertook operation and management of the plant until 1962 when, due to a declining defence workload, they terminated the management agreement.

In 1962 Dominion Magnesium Limited, which had been operating on crown owned property under a management arrangement, was terminated by the government. Following the decision to continue operation of the facility, in 1962 Fleet Manufacturing Limited undertook the management and formed a new company, Haley Industries Limited, which they operated until early 1963. This agreement was terminated in 1963 at the request of the crown and further authority was obtained to continue operations under a D.D.P. administrator to the end of 1963, pending the sale or transfer to commercial interests. Because of our inability to find a satisfactory buyer when the decision to continue operation was taken Heroux Machine Parts Limited undertook management of the facility in February 1964, including a purchase option. The company did not take up the option and in early 1967 decided to withdraw from the management agreement. Bartaco Industries Limited purchased the facility and undertook control in December 1967.

This is the story of the facility for the production of magnesium castings which we were able to have constructed and subsequently kept in operation by private interests. The plant was operated under a management contract until the managers withdrew and another manager was found. Finally a D.D.P. administrator was appointed. Because of the difficulty of finding satisfactory markets we persuaded Heroux Machine Parts Limited, which had possibilities of marketing these castings in Canada and in the United States, to undertake a management contract. They declined to take up the purchase option and withdrew from the management contract. We solicited some 28 companies as prospective purchasers. I have a list of them here. They included both large and small companies, both Canadian and United States owned, and some United Kingdom owned. The only firm which we found to be interested in this was Bartaco Industries Limited. Their conditions of purchase were as outlined in the supplementary estimates namely that the crown would discharge all the outstanding obligations against Haley Industries Limited, and for this a supplementary estimate in the amount of $740,000 is provided.

The amount of $740,000 appears in vote 7c. In addition the crown is required to write off the previous losses incurred up to that date. This appears in the amount of $480,000 under vote 6c. With regard to the question why this plant was not sold through Canadian Crown Assets Disposal Corporation I should point out that Crown Assets deals with net assets, if I may put it that way; that is, assets of the crown which have a net marketable value. This enterprise unfortunately not only did not have a net marketable value but represented a cost to the crown in getting rid of it in the interests of not incurring further losses, but still ensuring a continuing supply of magnesium castings to the Canadian industry. Employment at Haley's continued. In relation to the letter received from the Minister of National Defence I should like to say that, while I am told I should not state opinions on legal matters it is my understanding that it is the law that the departments of government are required to transfer to the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation net assets which are surplus to the requirements of departments. These net assets are disposed of by Crown Assets Disposal and the proceeds are dealt with in accordance with the terms of the law. Exceptions to this kind of disposal by Crown Assets can be made by the minister who reports for Crown Assets, and this happens to be the Minister of Defence Production. The difference between the armoury and this Haley case is that the armoury represented net assets, and consequently was added to assets. In the other case there were no net assets, but rather liabilities. It is not proper for Crown Assets Disposal to deal with liabilities of this kind.

• (8:20 p.m.)

I regret that I have not got the value of the assessment, and by "assessment" I think the hon. gentleman means the municipal evaluation of the property in Renfrew. He did mention the original cost of the facilities. I think I can obtain the value of the assets, perhaps not tonight but later on.

Mr. McIntosh: It seems to me that if the Canadian taxpayer paid all the deficits of this organization, even by going through all the steps the minister suggested have been gone through since 1951 to 1962 and in subsequent years, there should be something left which would be considered net assets. If the people had to pay this $1,220,000 it seems that when the expenses were all paid off there should be certain net assets, including the building and the property. I should like the minister to explain why these assets were not treated in the same way as the armouries. Perhaps he could indicate the net amount the Canadian people received from this Bartaco company for the sale of this plant and facilities?

Mr. Drury: The net receipts to the crown from the disposal of this operation is nil. This amounted to a loss. It is costing money to hand this over to the Bartaco industry. It is being handed over as a going concern, with commitments to deliver on firm contracts. The alternative would be to close the operation down and this would involve a variety of charges, in addition to losing our source of magnesium castings, which we hope to maintain under the new management. There would also be a substantial amount of unemployment created.

It is my understanding that if the operation had been wound up as at the beginning of March the loss from December 5 to March 1 would be $140,000. This would have been written off. Repayments of advances from the revolving fund would have amounted to $97,000. Contract penalties—penalties for the failure to carry out contracts already entered into—would have amounted to $100,000. The return sales would have amounted to $80,000. Employee severance pay would have amounted to $50,000. Preservation of the building and the equipment pending its disposal, if there was any disposable value, would have amounted to $20,000. The cost of keeping a watchman, paying taxes, and maintaining the building for a year would have amounted to $40,000. The excess of the liabilities over the assets would amount to $116,000. The total of all these would be in the order of $643,000. If you set that against the figure provided here, being $740,000, you can see the difference. It is not mentioned that in the agreement with Bartaco the crown will recover one half of the net profits of the operations during the first two years. We can only estimate this, but it is our hope that this will amount to $165,000. This leaves a net payable to the crown of $575,000 to dispose of this as against some $643,000 to wind it up by paying the charges I have mentioned.

Mr. McIntosh: I am not sure who the minister thinks he is fooling when he suggests that if we carried on with this plan it would have cost us $500,000 because we would have to pay maintenance charges, taxes and so on. This reminds me of the government saying it has made a savings by cutting down on the estimates for next year. This is like saying that if I had $5,000 today I might spend $4,000, but I have not spent $4,000 today so I have saved $4,000. It would seem to me from what the minister has said that if this plant was turned over to anyone, with all the current liabilities paid by the Canadian people, there ought to be some sort of asset left. I should like to know what the crown got for those assets. I am not interested in how much money they might have saved because they did not carry on this operation, because that is foolish. There was something tangible to work with there, including a building and property. The people of Canada did absorb all the liabilities. This plant was turned over to a company for some amount and I should like to know whether it was less than $1,000.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Don't ask him, he wouldn't know.

Mr. McIntosh: We are dealing with the estimates and we should be able to get this information.

Mr. Drury: I will try again. The discharge of the outstanding liabilities came to a total net payment by the crown of $740,000. Obviously because this operation is continuing, the crown is not absorbing all the liabilities. It is not absorbing the contractural loss on sales contracts entered into and against which there has to be performance. This has been taken on by Bartaco. With the assumption of outstanding financial liabilities in terms of money owing to the bank and outstanding accounts payable the crown had to pay $740,000. If you wish a figure one might say the property and equipment was sold for $1.

Mr. McIntosh: I should like to thank the minister for divulging the sale price of this property. It would seem to me that the minister said there was concession for the Canadian people in that they will participate in the profits of the company during the first two years. He also said the operation did not make any money from the time it opened until it was sold for the sum of $1.

I still cannot understand how his department can make a sale of this type. The Minister of National Defence says it is impossible for government departments to make sales in this way. Once the liabilities were absorbed by the Canadian people, why did not the minister turn this over to Crown Assets, as the statute directs him to do? Under what authority did the minister make this sale for the sum of $1?

Mr. Drury: It was made under the authority vested in the minister responsible for the administration of the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation.

Mr. McIntosh: What authority could the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation give the minister that has not been given by parliament? I thought the statutes in this country were passed by this parliament.

I do not remember any provision in the act—and I have looked it over—that gives a minister authority to dispose of any property in any manner that he sees fit. I thought the laws were made for all the people of Canada, including ministers. If the statute says that this property should be disposed of by Crown Assets, I think the minister was wrong in disposing of it in the manner in which he did and for the price at which it was sold.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, the authority vested in the minister is provided under the law passed by the parliament of Canada. Under that law the minister responsible for Crown Assets Disposal Corporation has authority to vary the sale procedure set out in respect of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation. This is a power vested in one minister only and not in ministers of other government departments. No such authority resides in the Minister of National Defence; he has not responsibility for Crown Assets Disposal Corporation.

I tried to make the point to the hon. gentleman that what we are dealing with here is not a net asset; it is a liability. The fact that I am here seeking a supplementary appropriation is evidence of the fact that this is a liability being disposed of, and not an asset.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Chairman, I still do not understand the minister's explanation. I ask him: Does this vote give the minister authority to make that sale? If we pass this vote, do I correctly understand that the minister will use it as authority for making this sale, in order to get around the statutes as they are at the present time? Also, was there any guarantee to the Canadian public that this plant, sold for the sum of $1, would not be sold to foreign interests, or was there any guarantee that there would not be any change in Canadian control for any length of time?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, section 5 of the Surplus Crown Assets Act provides that the Minister of Defence Production may authorize a government department to dispose of surplus crown assets in such manner, upon such terms and subject to such conditions as he may consider desirable. This is an enactment of very long standing. In respect of a condition that this property remain in Canadian ownership, I hope I can get the hon. gentleman to appreciate that we have for a very long time been trying to dispose of the property at the most advantageous terms possible and finally succeeded in finding one buyer, one man who under rather difficult or harsh conditions was prepared to take this plant over and continue operating it.

Whether Bartaco should be forced to guarantee that the operation will remain in Canadian hands for a specified period of time seemed rather beyond our powers to insist upon as part of the bargain. We were trying to dispose of this property at the least cost to the people of Canada and still keep it as a continuing operation for the production of magnesium castings.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Chairman, would the minister use his authority to dispose of the two armouries I have referred to at the least cost to the Canadian public? Would he be prepared to sell these armouries for $1, which is the price for which this plant was sold?

Mr. Drury: I am not sure I would agree to that, Mr. Chairman. Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, as a trustee of public assets, has been charged with securing the best possible return on the disposal of these assets. In the exercise of this mandate, Crown Assets regards itself as trustee for all the taxpayers of Canada and is not, as a consequence, authorized to confer benefits on a particular section or community of Canada. In the discharge of this responsibility, however, they do accord a priority in disposal and allow a right of first refusal exercisable in the first instance by the government of the province in which the asset is situated, and in the second place by the municipal authorities of the area in which the asset is situated. In that order, these non-federal government bodies have the right of first refusal.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Chairman, in the light of that explanation I fail to see why the minister did not turn the Haley plant over to them. I cannot see the difference in the two transactions. As I said, perhaps it is coincidental that there is a minister representing the constituency of Renfrew and an opposition member representing the constituency of Swift Current-Maple Creek.

However, if the minister will not listen to reason in this regard I should like to ask him a further question in connection with the report of the Auditor General. Does this type of transaction come under the heading of "Unauthorized use of the Defence Production revolving fund" which is found on page 29 of the Auditor General's report? Does this paragraph in the report have any bearing on the sale of this property?

Mr. Drury: I do not think so. The report of the Auditor General will, I think, be examined in some detail by the public accounts committee. There, I am sure, legal advice will be sought as to the appropriateness of the observations made on the use of the revolving fund.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister whether he guaranteed any government funds to the company which bought this asset for the sum of $1, in order to keep it in operation.

Mr. Drury: No, Mr. Chairman. Indeed, as I have indicated, the liabilities of the crown are ended with this operation. The future obligations become the responsibility of the purchaser Bartaco, and the crown's participation in this transaction is limited to a share of future profits.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister whether he could briefly give us a picture of the authority and policy of the Department of Defence Production in the calling of tenders, the letting of contracts and the cancellation of contracts. I am certain that all of us from British Columbia would appreciate that information because we have noticed that in the realm of contracts the changing policy of the government has in the past few months almost totally wrecked the shipbuilding industry of British Columbia.

Only a few months ago the government very proudly announced in the House of Commons that this year they were going to call for contracts for the construction of search and rescue vessels for the coastguard system on the Pacific coast. That policy has now been changed and no contracts are to be awarded. It is bad enough that the government does not keep its word that it is going ahead, not only with research for the safety of the people employed on the ocean of the Pacific coast and projects which are necessary for the maintenance of and employment in a major industry, but on a question of even greater importance than that, which requires a clear explanation, as to whether the government lets a contract and then cancels it. Anyone who knows of the destroyer Chaudière is fully aware that it is badly in need of an overhaul and that the plans were to convert it so that it could carry a helicopter. Last fall a contract was let at the lowest tender to Burrard Drydock in Vancouver. The crew was ready, and I understand the material was purchased. The ship was at Esquimalt, ready to proceed to Burrard Drydock, and then the contract was cancelled. We were told that the conversion of the Chaudière will not be proceeded with for at least 18 months. As I have already pointed out, this has brought the shipbuilding industry on the west coast to ruin, as over 65 per cent of the people in that industry are unemployed.

It means, without any question whatsoever, that in 18 months time the cost of the conversion will be far larger than if the contract had gone ahead. So far as the Chaudière is concerned, the contract was let, the material was purchased, and the ship and the crew were ready, and 18 months from now the conversion will cost a lot more than the original contract called for. Surely it is very poor policy to wreck the industry in this way and to postpone the work for 18 months or two years, when the work will cost $2 or $3 million more. We fail to understand this decision, especially when the minister will, in the very near future, call for tenders for the construction of completely new destroyers, which in all probability will be built by the shipyards on the east coast.

Why is there discrimination in the letting of contracts for new construction, for alterations, repairs and conversion, against the province of British Columbia and in favour of the provinces on the east coast? I ask for an explanation of the policy of the department in respect of this. Does the minister have to follow the instruction of other departments in calling for tenders and letting contracts? Is the cancellation of the contract for the conversion of the Chaudière a decision of the Minister of National Defence? Is the Minister of Defence Production only obeying the decision of the Minister of National Defence, and if so did he draw to the attention, either of the Department of Finance or of the Treasury Board, what such a decision will mean in additional costs, in unemployment, and in the wrecking of an industry on the west coast? Have these matters been discussed by the minister, and is any attention being given to them—or is the department just blindly following the instructions of other departments in calling for tenders and letting contracts?

While I am on my feet I should like to ask for an explanation with regard to the letting of contracts, and the original estimates. Let us consider for example the aircraft carrier Bonaventure, which had to go in for an overhaul. I presume that the contract was let by the Department of Defence Production. According to the information contained in the original estimates and published by the press, the overhaul was going to cost in the neighbourhood of $8 million. Yet, now that it is in drydock we find that it will cost $3 million more to overhaul it. I am just using this as an illustration. All one has to do is to go through the public accounts to see how time after time the amount of money which the taxpayer has to pay runs into thousands, hundreds of thousands and millions of dollars over and above the original estimate and the original contract. Can the minister give us an explanation for this continual underestimation of the costs of conversion and overhaul, particularly with regard to the aircraft carrier Bonaventure?

I have just one other point which has come to my attention as a result of our discussion in the public accounts committee. What attention does the Department of Defence Production give to what other departments are doing, when it has been asked to act on behalf of those departments? I have in mind one example which came to the attention of the public accounts committee only this morning. The Department of National Defence asked the Department of Defence Production to call for tenders and to let contracts for the clearing of snow at Fort Churchill. The Department of Defence Production did so; but later it was found that the Department of National Defence had undertaken the work, with the result that, according to the interpretation of the Department of Justice, the taxpayer has to cover the costs of work which was never done. It was a snow job on the taxpayers. I completely fail to understand the reason for such inefficiency. Could we have some explanation of these various matters?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, with regard to the cancellation of contracts and the substantial cost mentioned in connection with Haley Industries, may I say that the payment of cancellation charges for contracts entered into by a crown agency has to be made by the crown. When the crown enters into a contract and, for one reason or another, may be forced to cancel it, the crown assumes responsibility for cancellation charges. So the contractor is not required to suffer a monetary loss as a consequence of the cancellation. In cases where it becomes necessary to cancel contracts, the crown assumes responsibility for the payment of cancellation charges.

In so far as the Chaudière is concerned, I think the hon. gentleman knows as well as I do that the priority concerning the building, repairs, overhauls and refitting of defence equipment is assigned by the Department of National Defence, and it is up to that department to decide what is to be overhauled, repaired and built anew, and when.

• (8:50 p.m.)

The services of the Department of Defence Production are used to contract for these services or these products. The selection of the products and the timing is the choice of the Department of National Defence. In the case of the alternatives in connection with the conversion of the Chaudière or the construction of new destroyers, this is a choice made by the Department of National Defence, and it is quite proper. In connection with the exercise of this choice, my department does furnish the Department of National Defence with figures as to the costs of these various options, costs in terms of money, and other economic consequences. When the Department of National Defence therefore is contemplating either a new contract or a cancellation, we do ensure that they are thoroughly advised as to the costs, and the cost disadvantages, of such a course of action. This I suggest was the information provided to the Department of National Defence in relation to the question of the Chaudière.

Now, the hon. gentleman has mentioned the poor estimates of cost made in relation to the naval overhaul work, and in particular in connection with the Bonaventure. This of course is a continuing difficulty, so far as I am concerned, in that it is very rare that on every occasion when the cost of an operation is mentioned, the total cost is ever produced. In connection with the refit and overhaul of the Bonaventure, bids were sought from shipyards covering, first, the cost, on a firm price basis, of the known work that has to be done and for which specifications could be provided. There is, second, an undisclosed, undetermined and unknown amount of additional work which will be required and which can only be discovered when the ship is in drydock and opened up, to use an expression. The hon. gentleman had some experience himself with that in his recent visit to the Bonaventure.

The amount of this work and its nature cannot be known until the ship is in drydock and after the contract is let. Consequently, as part of the contract, including the firm price bid for known, specified work, the shipyards are asked to quote an hourly rate for work which may arise out of the inspection of the ship, once it is in the dockyard. Estimates are made of what this might amount to in total man hours. Sometimes it turns out to be less, and sometimes more, depending on the condition of the interior of the machinery in some of the closed compartments, which is disclosed at the time of inspection.

In addition to this, the shipyards are furnished with equipment, gear and components which are purchased, not by the shipyards, but by the Department of Defence Production, and supplied on a free issue basis to the shipyards for installation in the ship. This is part of the cost of the refit, but it does not show up anywhere in the cost of the contract with the shipyard because it is a free in-free out entry. Consequently, when the total figures are finally seen, the total cost including the firm price of the known work, the amount of work made necessary as a result of the inspection of the sealed compartments and the final cost of procuring and installing the free issue, appears to be larger than the firm price bid which is the original bid by the shipyard.

I think this does account for confusion as to what the total cost is at any point. I am trying to insist that, when questions are asked in relation to only part of the cost of one of these refits, the hon. member is provided with the global cost as well as the particular answer.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Chairman, dealing with these items 6c and 7c concerning the sale for one dollar of the assets, or liabilities as the minister has chosen to describe them, I wonder if he could give us the inventory value at the time of the sale of the crown owned magnesium foundry located at Haley, Ontario, set out in the following classifications: real estate, machinery and automotive, raw materials, finished products and obsolete? Could he also place on the record, if he has the information, the directors and shareholders of this Bartaco organization?

Mr. Drury: I will try to get that information. I do not have the details as to the real estate value, the value of the inventory and the depreciated value of the machinery.

Mr. Forrestall: I have just one or two questions in connection with this vote. Since the minister has given details about the difficulty in estimating ship construction program costs, I should like to ask him if he could enlighten the committee on the four new D.D.H.'s, particularly as their total cost. The minister referred, I think quite wisely, to the misunderstandings which frequently arise when discussing costs involved in this type of construction or overhaul program.

I would specifically direct the minister's attention to the tender amount announced last fall in connection with the four D.D.H.'s. I ask him specifically, is this for the hull and machinery only or does it include all the radio, electronic and other sophisticated internal gear that is related to automatic fire power systems and so on?

Mr. Drury: No, Mr. Chairman, the cost of the completed ship, including the government furnished items, will be a lot closer to $50 million than the roughly $20 million bid.

Mr. Forrestall: This is quite a difference. Now we are talking about a $200 million plus program, and the contracts have not been awarded. On the basis of past experience, could the minister simply advise us, because of the importance to those sections of Canada which rely upon the ship construction industry, whether or not these costs are sufficiently under control to prevent any possibility of costs getting out of hand and the government having to cut back or postpone the program?

Mr. Drury: I am sure, Mr. Chairman, every effort is being made to ensure that at the time of the signing of the contract we will have accurate knowledge of the final cost. Quite understandably, my colleague the Minister of National Defence, whose money after all is paying for this, does not take very kindly to my tossing around loose figures and coming back for more money. I have assured him that my department will be able to procure the ship for the contracted price plus the cost of government furnished equipment, and that we will not be back asking for more money as a consequence of the costs having got out of control.

I think the hon. gentleman knows that, during the course of a naval construction program that takes four years to complete, there do tend to be changes in the art of naval warfare. During the course of construction there are occasions when the designers or even the users of the ship will ask for changes to be made. Sometimes these changes result in a change in cost. This is rather more the case with new designs of ships than it is with older ones, though this is always a possibility.

Mr. Forrestall: I thank the minister for that assurance. The last thing that we would want to see is this program costing in excess of $400 million and have the government colleagues of the Minister of National Defence cancel it.

Before I leave this particular area of questioning, Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister could tell me if the government is still adhering to its announced intention to spread at least part of this work among other yards outside the lead yard, or is the government seriously considering having all the work done in just one or two lead yards?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, we did look hard at the options. We could have had these new vessels built four in one yard, two in each of two yards or one in each of four yards. We retained consultants to do as careful a cost analysis of these options as possible. There is a very substantial saving to be achieved by having these vessels built in two pairs, or all four in one yard, provided the latter case were possible in terms of the time phasing requirements of the navy and the capacity of existing Canadian yards to handle the construction without making a very large investment in new plant.

I have reached the conclusion that the optimum, or best option, in terms of cost and time to the government was two and two. Two and two does represent a very substantial saving in dollars over the cost of one ship in one yard.

Mr. Forrestall: I thank the minister for that answer. Another matter which has interested me is this. I am not picking on this minister particularly, because this sort of thing does occur from time to time in various departments. I should like the minister to explain to the committee why the government persists in granting an increase in salary by way of promotion of a particular category from one pay bracket to another.

I should like to refer to the minister's main estimates, in which it is noted that in the year 1966-67, there were 65 people included in the $14,000 to $16,000 salary bracket, whereas this year, 1967-68, the figure increased to 571, which is an increase of 506 people. On the other hand, in the immediate next category below that bracket, $12,000 to $14,000, for the year 1966-67 the figure dropped to three persons.

I should like to know whether the minister eliminated that particular pay bracket. This underlines what I consider to be one of the reasons that the minister's department was high on the list compiled by the Auditor General in his recently tabled year-end report. I wonder whether the minister could give me an explanation of that.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I must say that I have noticed a few eyebrows being raised on the government side of the house. However, I can assure them that the hon. member for York-Humber, who periodically visits this group, has not made application for admission yet.

I rise, Mr. Chairman, particularly because reference was made earlier this evening to the policy of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation in disposing of armouries. I want to ask him about the disposal of an armoury and to get his advice, and I trust his sympathy.

The armoury at Nelson has for years been the headquarters of the militia there. At the same time it has been used by the navy and air cadets in that district. The militia unit there is now being trained in Trail with the rest of the militia unit, and I understand that the armoury at Nelson has been declared surplus and is for sale. Everyone in the district realizes that very good work is being done by the cadets, and those in charge of them. They are well sponsored by the citizens of the district. On that account they are very anxious to retain the armoury for the purpose of making use of it for the navy, army and air cadets.

I was very interested to hear the minister say that the province was given the first refusal and the municipality the second, but that the corporation could not favour one group or district as against the interests of the Canadian taxpayers as a whole. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman these cadets are actually saving the defence department money by using the armoury, and it is on that account that the city of Nelson, backed by the citizens of Nelson, are trying to purchase the armoury from Crown Assets Disposal Corporation.

I should like the minister to explain the procedure they should take, Mr. Chairman. I would also ask him to take note of the fact that if the building is purchased for the continued use of the navy, army and air cadets in the district this would actually save expenditure by the Department of National Defence. I think that is a matter for consideration; it is not a question of this being a strictly community effort. I wish the minister would advise me as to how these people should proceed; and I should like to know whether some consideration will be given to the fact that they are performing a very necessary function in relation to the operations of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, in reply to the question asked about the number of people in a particular salary bracket provided for in the main estimates, I think that what the hon. member has observed is a rise in the general level of salaries, which is characteristic of the public service. If one translates one year to the next by moving up a bracket, in which case there is a corresponding increase in numbers, he will realize this is how this particular situation has arisen.

So far as the armoury at Nelson is concerned, Mr. Chairman, I was not aware that the operation of the armoury by the municipality is going to result in that municipality carrying what would otherwise be a charge on the Department of National Defence. If this is so, and national defence would otherwise be required to bear the cost burden, I would certainly be glad to have a word with my colleague, the Minister of National Defence, about the matter. Until I have done that I cannot offer any precise advice to the hon. gentleman.

• (9:10 p.m.)

So far as the question of the Chaudière is concerned, I assure the hon. gentleman for Vancouver East that no contract was let. Since no contract had been entered into with respect to Chaudière the question of contract cancellation does not arise. He may have been under a misapprehension in that tenders limited to the west coast shipyards had been called. It was ascertained on the strength of bids received that Burrard Drydock was the low bidder. But prior to entering into any contract the Department of National Defence advised us that they would not be proceeding with the conversion as planned, and work on Chaudière was therefore limited basically to a modified refit, which is being carried out in the Burrard Dockyards.

Mr. Winch: I wish to ask some other questions. I know that Chaudière had to proceed to Esquimalt before going to the drydock. Actually, I want to ask about the construction of the new destroyers. Are any to be built on the west coast, and if not, why not?

Mr. Drury: It does not look as if any are to be built on the west coast, the reason being the substantially higher offer made by the west coast yards in respect of construction cost. If the hon. gentleman will refer back to Hansard he will see that the offer to build submitted by the west coast yards was slightly in excess of double the amount offered by the low bidders for the shipyard part of the work.

Mr. Winch: I know that, and that is the very point I am coming to. This has been intriguing me as well as others for a long time. We had the opportunity of spending a couple of days at the Burrard Drydock and we asked their people how this difference in price could possibly arise. They said, "You tell us, because the approximate 60 cents an hour wage difference does not make up the difference that has been quoted". They assured us that no excess profit was being charged and the only conclusion they could come to was that in the west coast bid they had included a sum for what might be called imponderables, which appeared in one part of the specifications.

I am told that the department did not set everything up fully, and the Burrard Drydock people had to guess at some figures. For instance, usually the specifications say what equipment is to be used and what purposes it is to be used for; but the Burrard Drydock people did not know the exact details of all that, and so they had only an approximate idea of what the imponderables in the design would be. It may be that the eastern shipyards did not tender with these imponderables in mind. The Burrard people want to know the basis of the eastern tenders because they say it is absolutely impossible for the bid price on the same specifications to be double on the west coast. The west coast price could not by any stretch of the imagination be double the east coast price. The only possible difference that could arise would be from the 60 cents an hour approximate wage differential, and that would not double the price.

Would the minister look into this matter and make certain that the tenders from the west coast shipyards and east coast shipyards cover the same costing on the same specifications, because it may be that the east coast shipyards did not take into account imponderables in the design.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I am in no position to know what view Burrard took of the written specifications which are a lengthy document. I am not in a position to explain to them the position taken by other bidders in respect of these specifications. I know in some instances there were qualifying clauses in bids that were received back, such as "subject to escalation". Before a contract can be let, it is of course necessary for the department to pin down these reservations and put a firm price against each reservation. The hon. gentleman referred to these as "imponderables". I think "reservations" is a better word. I assure the hon. gentleman that when these reservations are costed and there is a firm price contract, it will be let for a sum that is considerably lower than the figure put in by Burrard.

If the other, low bidders, did not cost everything completely out and now are being forced to do this, provided their price does not rise above the bid price of the man who bid on the whole job, the government will get value for its money and no injustice will have been done to Burrard.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 6(c) carry?

[Translation]

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, I should like to address two rather short remarks to the hon. minister. I ask Your Honour to bear with me, because those who preceded me did not limit themselves to dealing exclusively with the five items indicated in the supplementary estimates. However, my remarks will deal with the responsibilities of the hon. minister; one of them is more specifically related to item 10c.

• (9:20 p.m.)

I should like to deal with designated areas, for which he is answerable and concerning which I have already taken certain steps in addition to exchanging correspondence with him. It would seem that there is an unexplainable anomaly. For instance, in the riding I represent—and God knows there are others— the whole area covered by the manpower center is taken into account. The act was so designed, and it was probably logical at the time. But I feel that the present situation no longer corresponds to the needs of the times.

To my mind, this policy should be revised and the designated areas should correspond to the new electoral districts.

I give as an example the case of Trois-Rivières to which have been annexed in the past rural municipalities affected by under-employment, but which are not recognized as designated areas even though they now form part of the new constituency of Saint-Maurice and that of Berthier, both recognized as designated areas.

I think the existing legislation should be reviewed so as to be more realistic and meet present day requirements. I shall stress this fact as briefly as possible and ask the minister to take note thereof. I warn him that I shall follow up my remarks.

There seems to be some inconsistency that borders on unfairness towards those municipalities affected by under-employment and which, because a neighbouring municipality is not so affected, are deprived of the advantage of being considered as designated areas. Whereas a large number of industries would settle on the outskirts of the metropolis of the Mauricie, that is the city of Trois-Rivières, if they could enjoy the same benefits, those industries now have to settle instead 18 or 20 miles away in municipalities which are almost overcrowded and which will be unable shortly to give them the municipal services they need.

I will give more details to the minister in the correspondence I will exchange with him within a few days, but I call his attention to this matter and I ask him to be kind enough to see it as something which, in my opinion, deserves special consideration, because the case I mentioned concerns my constituency, although I know that the same situation prevails also in others. That is my first point.

My second remark, Mr. Chairman, concerns more specifically the printing bureau.

I would like to point out to the minister that there is now a strong presumption that the whole legislation for the establishment of bilingualism in the federal government services is being opposed at the level of heads of services in several departments. I could mention many departments, but I forget them on purpose because to-night, we are dealing with the Department of Defence Production. I want to mention only the case which is the minister's concern.

I think that the legislation, as proposed by the government, is commendable and praiseworthy. According to that legislation, bilingualism must be a factual thing in government services having to deal with people of both languages. I realize that the government has taken some constructive steps such as, for instance, the establishment of language schools, but one can see that there is some resistance at the division head level, and I shall mention a specific case in order that what I mean may be well understood.

Last week, on March 11 and 12 to be exact, the Canadian Government Printing Bureau, in order to fill a vacancy, announced a competition for the position of deputy chief of production, commanding a maximum yearly salary of $15,931, which is quite respectable. I know that at the printing bureau, some 65 per cent of the employees are French-speaking and that 95 per cent of them are bilingual, for we in Quebec have been learning English for a good many years.

Now, the fact is—the official announcement has not been made yet, but I was informed through certain indiscretions—that somebody has already been unofficially appointed to the position. According to the information we have he has been designated for 6 or 7 months. He has been groomed for the post, he was advised to undertake certain courses in order to qualify, and this is done in many departments. It seems that the person who will be officially appointed in a few days is English-speaking only, hardly understanding French and unable in practice to speak it, whereas there were a few other perfectly bilingual applicants with as many years of experience.

Let it be well understood that I do not wish to object because he has an English name; I even wonder if he is English. I have the name here, but I shall not mention it, in order not to prejudice his interests; it looks rather German to me, but that matters little. However, to ensure that policy of the government on bilinguism is consistent and not only window-dressing, it would be necessary, when there is an opening for a bilingual candidate, that the latter should be truly so.

Now, I note that in the qualifications required for that position—once again it is a typical case—the special requirements read as follows:

> The performance of the duties requires a knowledge of the English language but a knowledge of French will be considered an asset in the assessment of candidates.

Therefore for the performance of those duties, a knowledge of the English language is required, but a knowledge of French is an asset for the candidates!

Well, Mr. Chairman, that is watered-down bilingualism.

I noticed that, in this specific case, another candidate was perfectly bilingual, while that one was imperfectly bilingual. Their qualifications seemed to be equal—at least for three or four of the candidates—except that one had been told for six, seven, maybe eight months or a year to prepare himself, to attend certain courses in order to qualify, that the position would be open precisely because the person occupying that position was going on pension within a few weeks.

But other candidates, who are all French-speaking and perfectly bilingual, would have jumped at the opportunity to attend the same courses but they were not able to do so, because their superiors told them: You understand, at night, I lecture in English. You do not have to attend those courses and your chances are just as good. But when the time of the appointment came, the one who had attended five or six superficial courses, who had managed to gather some knowledge, was classified by the civil service as more competent than the others, even is he was not, simply because he is not adequately bilingual; I do not say perfectly bilingual, but adequately bilingual.

I should not want anyone to lose his job because he was not sufficiently bilingual, but I would like to know whether the policy of the government is something real, something to be observed, or if it is only a bluff, in cases where division heads of various departments can allow themselves to protect their friends by advising them months in advance to do this or that to qualify themselves and thus get around the government policy. It seems to me that for a position like this one, where at least 65 per cent of the employees—and I am not thinking of the customers—speak French, the director of production should be bilingual.

Mr. Chairman, I mentioned that case in a constructive way and I should like it to be well understood that I am not attempting to complain merely to try to pick a quarrel with the government. I am convinced that the government sincerely wants to draw up legislation which will recognize, in fact, the question that may have been debatable, that there are two founding peoples here, but that in various departments, amongst the division heads there are people who thwart government policy.

And so, I draw this to the attention of the minister, whom I feel is sympathetic. I mention a typical case, but there are dozens of others involving other departments where the interdepartmental protection of heads of services eliminates people who are perfectly bilingual on all sorts of pretexts and false representations, so that this government policy is not respected.

I do not ask the minister for an answer tonight, because I realize that I am drawing his attention to a case which perhaps he does not know about. I am ready to give him additional information and I must tell him that there are other similar cases in other departments.

In my opinion, this matter is much more important than is generally believed, because if government policy of implementing bilingualism in actual fact in the public service is not respected, the confidence of that part of the French-speaking population which wants to find a way of reconciling the two racial elements in order to avoid a division of the country will be undermined. It will be very difficult to establish a climate of understanding afterwards, when the government will want to introduce a constructive measure intended to consolidate the future of the Canadian confederation.

[English]

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Chairman, before items 6c and 7c are carried the minister should answer the questions which have been asked. If the answers are not available tonight from the officials in the gallery, maybe we should postpone consideration of these items until tomorrow and proceed with some other business. I would like to see the questions answered before we pass these items.

• (9:30 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I must reply first to the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain).

As far as the boundaries of designated areas are concerned, I think he fully realizes that such boundaries are established by the Department of Manpower and Immigration and not by mine. The department determines the potential of labour markets and in the present case, namely in the Trois-Rivières riding, there are two labour markets: one in Trois-Rivières, and the other in Grand'Mère.

I will submit the hon. member's representations to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand).

With regard to bilingualism within the public service and the tendency of some section heads to fight the introduction of bilingualism, I admit it is probably true in some cases.

On the other hand, I know what bilingualism means, especially when I call one of my deputy ministers and I am told that he is attending a French course.

If there is any resistance, I can assure the hon. member that I will do what I can, as well as my deputy ministers, to ensure the successful implementation of that policy.

[English]

Mr. Chairman, I regret that I do not have before me this evening the figures concerning the details of the valuation of this property of Haley Industries, including the depreciated value of the machinery and the value of the inventory. My officials who are present this evening do not have this information with them, either. If the hon. gentleman insists upon receiving the information in the house before passing the estimates, then the item will have to stand. If he is agreeable to the item passing then I will undertake to see that this information is provided for him not later than 2.30 tomorrow.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman, in answering the question of the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek the minister referred to his authority as the minister in charge of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation. Would the minister mind quoting that authority again.

Mr. Drury: Under Section 5(e) of the Surplus Crown Assets Act the Minister of Defence Production may authorize a government department to dispose of surplus crown assets in such manner, upon such terms and subject to such conditions as he may consider desirable.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): The minister has quoted that authority which he enjoys, but which is not enjoyed by other members of the cabinet, including the former minister of national defence, now the Minister of Transport. Nowhere in what he has quoted does he have authority to discharge in respect of any surplus government assets. He has merely quoted his responsibility as the minister in charge of crown assets.

I should like to ask the minister to turn now to the crown assets disposal act and quote the procedure which must be followed by him as well as by any other minister of the crown, and therefore refute what he has just used as his authority to sell through other than the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation. Would the minister quote that authority.

Mr. Drury: I have just quoted from section 5(e) of the Surplus Crown Assets Act.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I am asking the minister to quote the procedure any minister must follow. There is a procedure laid down for the minister in charge of crown assets, as well as a procedure which is applicable to every minister of the government. What is laid down applies to every minister of the government despite the fact that he may be in charge of crown assets. There is a procedure, and by violating this procedure I believe the minister is doing a snow job on the opposition.

No one questions the authority of the minister in charge of crown assets disposal, but there is a general procedure which must be followed and this is the procedure the minister is trying to violate, just as the Minister of Finance has violated the Bank Act and just as other ministers violate the procedure which is laid down. I ask the minister to show us where it is stated in the crown assets disposal act that he has authority to do this by following any different procedure than any other minister of the crown would have to follow.

Mr. Drury: I have read this once and I will read it again, slowly. Under section 5(e) of the act the Minister of Defence Production may authorize a government department, which includes the Department of Defence Production, to dispose of surplus crown assets in such manner, upon such terms and subject to such conditions as he may consider desirable. I suggest that that is statutory authority to authorize a department to enter into disposal arrangements which the Minister of Defence Production considers desirable.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I will also state my question as plainly and as slowly as possible for the minister's benefit. The special letter to which he has referred states that any department of government that has any surplus to dispose of must turn that over the Crown Assets, and that it must be disposed of through the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation and not by the Department of Defence Production. I would ask the minister to quote the authority of the former minister of national defence, the present Minister of Transport, who is here now, because it was clearly outlined that when any government department wishes to dispose of any surplus government assets the procedure is that they must be turned over to the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation. These must go through the Crown Assets. The minister cannot say that he has a special authority to sell through his department. He must accept the procedure that is laid down in the act. The minister is trying to do a snow job on this by violating the whole principle of the act.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Chairman, the legal entanglement in which we have become involved would appear to be a debate concerning whether Crown Assets or the Minister of National Defence was right in saying that no department is allowed to dispose of anything, and that this takes precedence over the statement which the minister has read from this yellow paper, which he has before him.

• (9:40 p.m.)

I am not denying that this is in the statutes. One statement says that no minister can do this yet the authority the minister quoted suggests that one minister can do this. Which is correct, so far as we are concerned? Before we pass these estimates I should like the minister to indicate whether the transaction carried out by the Haley company was audited by the Auditor General of Canada, or by a private auditor and, if so, whether that audit was sent to the Auditor General of Canada.

Mr. Drury: In so far as what the hon. gentleman refers to as a legal tangle is concerned, I do not want to try to give a legal interpretation. In fact I am told it is quite improper for a minister to do so. I suggest that what I read to the house is a section from the Surplus Crown Assets Act, which authorized the Minister of Defence Production to, in turn, authorize a government department to dispose of surplus assets other than through the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation. This is not the general procedure, but rather an exceptional procedure. The reason what appears to be an exceptional procedure was used in this case is, as I explained earlier, that we were not disposing of assets from which the taxpayer could expect to recover some proceeds, but rather we were disposing of a liability.

Mr. McIntosh: I do not agree for one moment that the minister did not dispose of an asset of the Canadian people. I should like to have had the opportunity to buy that factory for $1. I am sure I could have at least doubled my money, if not made more. If this was not an asset, I do not know what it was. It would have been far better for the minister to have closed the factory and given it to the town, because it might have been of some benefit to the town. Let me say in respect of the minister's remarks about the legal entanglement, that he should have instructed the Minister of National Defence that there was an exception to the rule, and that the only way this armoury should be disposed of was through Crown Assets Disposal Corporation.

Perhaps I could go to the Minister of National Defence and make a deal with him, whereby he could dispose of this property for $1. I am sure the people of my constituency would have been very pleased to get the armoury for $1. I wonder what avenues are available to us, as members on this side of the house, to approach ministers with such deals. Perhaps it is coincidental that in this case, in respect of which the minister sold the property for $1, the property was located in a constituency represented by a minister of the crown, who is a contender for the Liberal leadership. Is there any connection in that regard?

Mr. Drury: I regret that the hon. gentleman should suggest that there is any possible connection.

Mr. McIntosh: I regret that I had to do so.

Mr. Drury: The hon. gentleman quite clearly has not grasped what this is all about. A serious attempt was made by the department over a great number of years to run this at no cost to the crown, including efforts on the part of the administration when his party was in power. During the course of that time there was a change made in the management. These efforts were unsuccessful, and by 1967 we were still unable to find anybody who was prepared to run this business, except for an exorbitant fee. An endeavour was made to sell it as a going business, and consequently avoid the inevitable cancellation and closing up costs. Perhaps if the hon. gentleman had more experience in closing out businesses he would realize that you cannot shut down a business from one day to the next, at no cost. That cannot be done. Anybody who is honest in business will see that his clients and his employees do not suffer financially, if he can avoid it, when he goes out of business, unless he chooses to go into bankruptcy. Surely the hon. gentleman does not suggest that the crown should pretend or allege bankruptcy to avoid its obligations. We have tried to honour our obligations.

An endeavour was made to interest a number of companies in this operation, including the Canadian Bronze Company; the Heroux Machine Parts Company; United Aircraft of Canada; North American Trust; Canadian Management Company; Bendix Corporation, U.S.A.; Aluminum Company, Canada; Litton Systems, Toronto; Central Dynamics Limited, Montreal; Russel Industries; Motor Specialty Manufacturing, Vancouver; Levy Industries, Toronto, and I could go on and on with the list. When the hon. gentleman rather glibly suggests it could have been taken over by him for $1 and he could have doubled his money I should like to say to him that if he had assumed the contracts that Bartaco assumed I would have been glad to pay him $100. Bartaco has assumed a lot of continuing contractual undertakings which represent crown liabilities. In order to get the company to do this, we had to agree to absorb incurred losses carried forward from the balance sheets of previous years, plus the discharge of a number of outstanding financial obligations against the company. We were unable to get a continuing operator on any other condition.

One could have closed this down and rendered the facility saleable for scrap. In that particular area real estate is not very high. The building is obviously some 15 or 16 years old and unfortunately the machinery is equally as old. Something might have been received from the sale of this facility for scrap. The 165 or more employees would have been thrown out of work and the crown would have had to assume the responsibility for paying not only their separation pay but also an amount in respect of cancellation charges on contracts for process at the mill.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Chairman, the minister does not have to lecture me about how to run a business. I run a successful business, which is more than he has ever done, and I can prove that by asking the Minister of National Revenue whether I run a successful business. Let me say again to the minister that if I had the opportunity to buy that particular plant and property for $1 I could at least double my money. I could run any business if the minister on behalf of the Canadian people would agree to pay any liabilities I incurred. That is what he is telling me, and it is foolish. I don't think the minister had the authority to commit the Canadian people to any liabilities incurred by a private company, and I think this matter should be sent to a committee for investigation. There is more to it than what has come out tonight.

Mr. Walker: How about Dosco steel in Cape Breton?

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. The former whip of the Liberal party has just made a disparaging remark about the steelworkers in Cape Breton. They are not associated in any way with this particular debate, and I intend to make this very clear. This is the general attitude displayed by the former whip and other members of his party, although he is around here so seldom one would hardly know that. Let me add that this is the government's current approach in respect of the Sydney situation, in spite of what the Minister of National Health and Welfare has said in Cape Breton about how desperately this government is searching for a way to help.

• (9:50 p.m.)

This is the situation, despite the fact that the Prime Minister last night on national television said that when it comes to spending money to keep people employed, he is only too happy to do it. In spite of that, this callous government denies to the people of Nova Scotia the opportunity to obtain work. Yet the Minister of National Health and Welfare last summer in Cape Breton promised an audience of 20,000 people that this problem would be solved. Despite all this we have the hon. member rising and making the degrading remark that he did.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, the remark I made was addressed to the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek. The hon. member for Cape Breton South has referred to the remark I made. That remark was addressed to the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek. I was just trying to keep the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek logical in the argument he was putting forward.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Chairman, I think I have been quite logical. With regard to the people who would have been laid off if this plant had been closed, I can understand it is very difficult for the hon. member for Cape Breton South to accept the answer that was given. The two hon. members from Cape Breton have day after day in this house gone after the cabinet about the lay-offs in the coal mines, the steel plant, and so on. The same consideration is not given to their requests that is given to others. This brings me back to the point I made earlier, that it depends, as far as I am concerned, upon who asks for consideration to be given in these matters. In one case it was a minister of the crown who asked for consideration to be given, and it was given. The two members from Cape Breton have not received the same consideration. I ask why.

I refer back to the item in the estimates. I asked the Minister of National Defence for consideration in this question because I believed his department would understand much better than Crown Assets the original deal in regard to these armouries. But the minister told me that according to law he could not do it. He did not tell me there was any exception; he said he had to go to Crown Assets. Tonight we are told there is one exception. Apparently the Minister of Defence Production can take it upon himself to conduct a private sale between friends, or enemies, depending upon how you regard the directors and shareholders involved. We do not know who they are. This is what we are trying to find out. We want to know who the people are who bought this property for the sum of $1. We want to know why it was sold. We want to know why this company is apparently now in American hands. Ministers of this government have said that there is too much American capital in our country, yet tonight we hear that they have sold a plant, property and building to American or foreign interests.

We want to know why the plant was sold in this manner. Was no protection whatsoever given to the Canadian taxpayer in regard to this sale, except to assume all the liabilities involved therein, to get rid of the stockpile of inventory, the machinery, the property and the building for the sum of $1? It seems to me to be a pretty good deal for someone, but not for the Canadian taxpayer.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 6c carry?

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman, before this vote carries I want clarification as to who is right and who is wrong. The minister tonight keeps insisting upon quoting from the surplus Crown Assets Disposal Act, the authority which allows him to sell a property or dispose of a property as Minister of Defence Production. There has been no reference whatsoever to the procedure the minister must follow in regard to such a sale. There are in the house this evening five ministers out of 26. Fortunately one of the ministers present is the Minister of Transport, the former minister of national defence.

It boils down to this: Either the Minister of Defence Production must get up and tell the Minister of Transport that he was wrong, or the Minister of Transport must get up and tell the Minister of Defence Production that he is wrong, because in written form they have each taken opposite sides on this question, one saying that he can do this and the other saying that he cannot. Who is telling the truth? This is a question which comes up quite often in respect of this cabinet, that is, who is telling the truth?

The Minister of Defence Production quotes as his authority the Surplus Crown Assets Disposal Act. I say there is something wrong with that authority. I do not understand it. I understand the procedure, which applies to the Minister of Defence Production and any other minister in the cabinet, the same as it does to the Prime Minister and everybody concerned. The procedure is that property must be turned over to Crown Assets for disposal.

This is in the written authority of the Minister of Transport, the former minister of national defence. I have invited the minister to send for the authority, and quote it to me, that says he has a right to do it in any other way. I ask the minister to show me where in the act he is given a privilege not enjoyed by other ministers. This is the statement he made. He said he has an authority not enjoyed by the rest of the cabinet. This is interesting. There are four or five ministers in the chamber. Let us hear the Minister of Transport get up and say that the Minister of Defence Production does enjoy this special authority. I am asking a very simple question, Mr. Chairman. I am asking four or five ministers present, apart from the Minister of Defence Production to get up and support his argument. If they fail to do this, there is only one obvious answer, namely that the Minister of Defence Production is absolutely wrong, has violated the procedures, and this is an illegal sale. It is similar to the action taken by the Minister of Finance, who has been banking illegally despite the fact that the Bank Act is under his jurisdiction. I ask these ministers to get up and deny it.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 6c carry?

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Chairman, what we have seen tonight in the last half hour is a good example how the government wastes time. Thirty minutes ago I suggested to the minister that if he did not have the answers from the officials of the department in the gallery, we should go on to deal with the estimates of another department. The minister made back-handed comments, if you want to call them that, which certainly did not satisfactorily answer the questions asked from this side of the house.

We have consumed 30 minutes of time. When the house resumes tomorrow the minister can come here prepared to answer the questions. The reason we want answers to our questions is that the minister said he disposed of an asset of this country for $1, which he said was a liability; yet he was prepared to put $1,120,000 into this plant before he disposed of it. These actions require explanations in the House of Commons. When a minister knows he is coming into the House of Commons with five items of supplementary estimates, surely he can come prepared to answer the questions he can expect from members of parliament whose duty it is to scrutinize the estimates brought before the house. I deplore the fact that this amount of time has been consumed tonight, but it has not been our fault; it has been caused by the minister's lack of preparation in coming before the house with his estimates.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 6c carry?

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): No.

Mr. Starr: Ten o'clock.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the government house leader which supplementary estimates we will be considering tomorrow and Thursday.

Mr. MacEachen: We will continue with the estimates under consideration by the committee, namely, those of the Department of Defence Production, followed by the estimates of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and the departments as listed in supplementary estimates (C) in the order in which they are listed.

Mr. Knowles: Wouldn't we make more progress if we were on Bill C-190?

Some hon. Members: No.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS—HEARING AIDS—REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO PRICES

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, among the various complaints which come from consumers none are more distressing or more far reaching than the complaints from people who need hearing aids. All of us receive numerous requests that an investigation be made into the business of hearing aids to see whether some protection can be afforded to the elderly people who have to use them. An investigation in my province has shown that one in every four elderly people has to have a hearing aid.

Among the letters that I have received, I have one from an elderly man in Ontario who cannot afford a hearing aid, and another one from a man in Montreal who is in his 69th year and has had to buy four hearing aids in the last ten years. His most recent difficulty arose with a hearing aid which he purchased not so long ago for $325. It was in good working order but it was very heavy. So he traded it in and received only $25, but was charged $340 for a new hearing aid. Evidently his $340 did not go very far. What he bought was a spectacle type hearing aid for which, he told me, the suppliers used the frame and the lenses he had, and just changed the two stems from the frame to his ears. They used the ear mould from his old hearing aid. For that service he had to pay $340. That is just one example of many.

There was such an outcry about hearing aids recently in British Columbia that the minister of industry in that province directed his department to make an investigation into the matter. As a result it was found that the retail mark-ups on hearing aids sold in Vancouver and Victoria were as high as 306 per cent and that there is high pressure advertising in the industry. However, nothing much was done as a result of this inquiry. A member of the legislature, in speaking prior to the investigation, said that hearing aids which cost $35 in Japan are being sold in Vancouver for upwards of $400, and others which cost only $77 to manufacture are being sold for $700, and that high pressure sales tactics are being used.

I myself know an elderly couple living on Vancouver island both of whom have to use hearing aids. They are old age pensioners for whom buying these little batteries constantly is a real hardship. The hearings aids need constant repairs. I have known countless such elderly people for whom it is a constant drain to buy and repair these hearing aids.

A hearing aid for these people is a great necessity. If they have to go without it they are condemned to solitary confinement, just as if they were under a prison sentence, because unless they can use a hearing aid they are cut off from the world. Many of them do not have the means to purchase it. A correspondent of mine from Sault Ste. Marie assures me he is one of those people who has to forgo a hearing aid because his pension does not allow him to buy one.

I should like very much to hear from the department as to what is being done. I know they will probably inform me they are looking into the matter. I note that, according to one of the minister's speeches, the department is looking into it. First of all, I do not believe looking in is enough. I should like to know when the looking in is going to be finished, the scope and length of the investigation, and so on. Above all, I should like to know the kind of remedial action that is likely to be applied. Is the Combines Investigation Act going to be used to ascertain whether or not there is a combine in this industry? After all, when you have a mark-up of 306 per cent over the wholesale price, there must be some kind of control there which comes close to monopoly control. I do not want to be told that the department is looking into it and everything is under control. I want to be told something more definite which can be passed on to the elderly people of this country.

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): In the absence of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and his parliamentary assistant, I was handed the answer to be given to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis). The answer is: Yes, I have noted the allegations. The director of investigation and research under the Combines Investigation Act informs me that there is no evidence to suggest there has been an offence under that legislation, although undoubtedly prices are high. The government of Canada has no jurisdiction to control prices in the absence of an emergency, but the consumer affairs branch is looking into the hearing aid business to see if there is any other way in which my department can assist consumers. I cannot satisfy the hon. member's curiosity as to the actual stage of the study now.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—ALLEGED SUPPRESSION OF FILMED INTERVIEW WITH NIGERIAN OFFICIAL

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): This evening, if I may, I should like to take some time to explain a series of events which appear to me to have occurred in connection with the publication through the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation of what I consider to be legitimate news. Earlier last week and the two weeks immediately preceding, there were four representatives in Canada of what is called the breakaway region of Nigeria or, in other terms, Biafra. At the outset, let me make it clear that in my personal opinion there is insufficient evidence upon which to base any lasting conclusions as to who is right or who is wrong in this conflict.

However, I do wish to draw to the attention of the minister or the parliamentary secretary the following points. First, when Dr. Mbadiwe was in this country he was invited to participate in a filmed interview. According to my information, this interview was done by the C.B.C. Then the C.B.C., I think quite properly, invited the point of view of the officials from Nigeria who are in our country. My understanding is that these gentlemen did not wish to give this interview, for what reasons I am not sure.

• (10:10 p.m.)

What followed, to the best of my knowledge, is that a direction was given to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation news and public affairs department to cancel the filmed interview with Dr. Mbadiwe. I just want to review one or two other points. What is it that Dr. Mbadiwe wanted to say? What message did he want to leave? I suggest that what he wanted to say constitutes hard core, legitimate news, the type of news that could not conceivably editorially be simply swept aside. Having spent a little time in the news world I think I understand what is news and what is not. Dr. Mbadiwe wanted to tell Canadians that there is indeed a war going on in Biafra, a very serious war, and that a lot of people have been killed. There have also been massacres. The war has been termed, rightly or wrong, a war of genocide.

Dr. Mbadiwe wanted to bring these matters to the attention of the world because news from Nigeria during the last several months has been totally suppressed. He wanted to tell Canadians that the United Nations was being pressed to take action in this matter. He wanted to tell Canadians and the world, through our press media, that the human rights commission of the United Nations had been approached about this problem and urged to intercede to bring the killings to a halt. He wanted to urge upon the world, through Canada and our press media, which we had always thought was free and responsible, the need to supply drugs and medicine and to do everything in our power to urge upon such groups as the Organization for African Unity the absolute necessity to bring the war in Biafra to an immediate halt.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, he wanted Canadians simply to listen to his plea. We have always understood our press services, and indeed our government, to uphold the right of people to express their points of view. Whether we are right or wrong about this question is I think hardly the issue at stake. We have the words of some fairly eminent people in the world on this question. Lord Brockway, speaking on February 13 in the British House of Lords, in his plea for some sort of action on the part of the British government in connection with the war in Nigeria was backed up by His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury. The sort of points made by those two noble Lords in the British House of Lords are the same points that Dr. Mbadiwe and his colleagues wanted to leave with Canadians.

I understand that Dr. Mbadiwe was the leader of the group that visited Canada, and the senior political representative. Indeed he was one of the two cabinet ministers who signed over civilian control to the military after the military coup in Nigeria. His interview was suppressed. One of his group, Mr. Ndem, did take part in the filmed interview that was shown on one C.B.C. program. However, I am not concerned about that particular program but about the remarks of Dr. Mbadiwe in his filmed interview.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

I would be grateful if the parliamentary secretary would enlighten me as to whether or not there was direct intervention on the part of either the Department of the Secretary of State or the Department of External Affairs in the suppression of the remarks made last week by Dr. Mbadiwe.

[Translation]

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, on March 14 last the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Forrestall) asked the Secretary of State the question which he read at the end of his speech.

[English]

Can she indicate to the house why there was suppression of a recent C.B.C. interview with Dr. Mbadiwe, of the Biafran region of Nigeria, which was filmed for television purposes?

[Translation]

First of all, Mr. Speaker, I must say that the cancelling of that filmed interview on the national network was never contemplated and that it is still not contemplated.

In fact, on March 7, the Toronto news service of the English network of the C.B.C. instructed a cameraman to film sequences of an interview with Mr. Mbadiwe and to send the films to the news service.

It was decided not to use them on the national news broadcast but to make a distribution the next day, March 8, in closed circuit through 18 stations—the English network of the C.B.C. and affiliated stations—which were free to broadcast according to their schedule. This closed circuit is part of the national network and I think that it is customary for either the English network or the French network of the C.B.C. news service to follow this method of distribution to the C.B.C. stations and all affiliated stations.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—NORTH SYDNEY, N.S.—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE FOR DOCK WORKERS

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, since under the rules of the house I am limited to seven minutes, I shall proceed as quickly as possible. On July 9, 1965, the then minister of transport, Hon. J. W. Pickersgill issued an official press release advising that a new rail car ferry would be put into operation between the port of North Sydney and Newfoundland. After being questioned in this house over many months and after having received representations from many sources the minister admitted that this new service would bring unemployment to the region. Previously, inside and outside this chamber, he had denied on behalf of the government that there would be unemployment. He said that employment opportunities would go up and not down, and that the port of North Sydney had a bright, extremely bright, economic future so far as Canadian National operations there were concerned. Having said that, only then did he concede that the institution of the rail car ferry would have an impact on employment at the port. He said some existing employment would decline but that new jobs would be created and many economic advantages would accrue to the communities affected, by reason of the increase in traffic, to use his words.

Now, as a result of this government's action through the Canadian National, what do we find? During the busy summer season as many as 1,000 men are employed at the port of North Sydney, the average number employed all year being 700. According to statements by C.N.R. management, the new service will reduce the work force to 150 men. A minimum of 600 men will be without jobs.

Workers at Port aux Basques and Argentia will also be affected. This industry is the economic backbone of North Sydney, and all the surrounding districts from which workers come will also be hit badly. As I have already said, all this has been brought about as a result of this government's actions through the Canadian National.

You are aware, Mr. Speaker, that time and again over these many months I have pressed the government in this chamber about what it would do for these workers who will be unemployed, face hardships and be dislocated because of modernization and technological change. It is true that upgrading of educational standards has taken place. Co-operating together, the federal and provincial governments, the Canadian National and the town of North Sydney have sponsored a school for stevedores. This is all well and good. I give full marks to the government for this effort to prepare men for training. But what of the future? In a short period of time these layoffs will commence. Where will these men find other employment? The Department of Industry—and I am glad to see the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury) here tonight—has not been successful in bringing a new industry to the town of North Sydney.

• (10:20 p.m.)

Some time ago the workers in the automobile industry were affected in a somewhat similar manner as a result of the Canada-United States automotive parts agreement. I have a pamphlet here in my hand issued by the then minister of labour, the present Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen), who is the minister from Nova Scotia. It deals with the transitional assistance benefit program for the automobile workers, and in part is as follows:

> The program, introduced in June, 1965, was designed to apply to all workers whose employment is adversely affected by the Canada-United States automotive agreement—

It went on to state that the program would run through until July 26, 1969, and that payments would be available to the workers affected. That program was introduced because of the government's action in making that agreement with the United States in regard to automobile parts, and it provided that the men would have a period of about four years in which to find permanent employment. Why is there not a program instituted to assist these workers who are to be laid off at the port of North Sydney?

It is a somewhat similar situation to that of the automobile workers. The problem is not caused by a lack of markets in the area. It is a question of technological change and modernization brought about by the government, as a result of which a lot of people will be laid off and unemployed.

I would suggest and recommend to the government that it consider some sort of arrangement along the lines of the transitional assistance benefit program, better known as TAB, to help the workers at the port of North Sydney. Following the minister's statement in 1965 he held a press conference in Halifax, on July 24 of that year, at which the Minister of National Health and Welfare was present. The Minister of National Health and Welfare on that occasion gave the assurance that proposals had been under consideration for many months to adjust any worker displacements that might occur at North Sydney. According to a press report in the Chronicle-Herald:

> He and Mr. Pickersgill both assured the public that new programs were under consideration, and also that there would not be as much displacement of workers as far as North Sydney was concerned as had been reported. The introduction of stern-loading ships would eliminate much freight handling.

They both painted a very bright picture. Further, during the last federal election campaign the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Liberal candidate in my area stated that no one—but no one—among these workers who are going to be affected, would suffer. Again I suggest that the government should give consideration to establishing a program similar to the transitional assistance benefit program. I ask, what is the difference? Are the automobile workers any better than the dock workers at North Sydney? Are the dock workers at North Sydney not as good as the automobile workers at Windsor?

I regret that I do not see the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) in the chamber tonight, as he is the one to whom I have addressed questions on this matter. Of course the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) is not present either. The Minister of Industry is here and probably he is going to reply. But he is the only minister here, and this is a sad commentary on the interest which the government has in these men who work at the docks in North Sydney. It is another indication of the callous attitude which members of the government have toward unemployment in this country, which is now reaching close to half a million. In a few short months we are going to lose a minimum of another 600 jobs at North Sydney, and I urge the government to do something about it. All we have heard about the matter is talk, ever since Mr. Pickersgill has gone to a higher, more comfortable post.

At the time of his press conference he did not tell the people the truth of what was going to happen. He did not mention that, until he was free from the island of Cape Breton and back in Newfoundland, where he issued a press release. I would hope that the minister who sits before me tonight is not going to give a wordy answer without any meaning to it. I hope he will insist, among his cabinet colleagues, that something be done to assist these workers who are going to be displaced at North Sydney, something along the lines of the program which I understand has worked very well for the automobile workers.

We have a similar situation. The workers at North Sydney are affected by government action. The workers in the automobile industry were affected by government action. If the workers at North Sydney received benefits under such a program it would give them time to secure alternative employment. It would give them a period of years in which to adjust, get settled, and find suitable employment to replace what they are going to lose.

[Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria).]

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, without knowing exactly what point the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. Muir) was intending to make, there perhaps has not been called into the house tonight the minister who could most appropriately reply. I will agree with him that the minister most familiar with this particular problem and the possible solution to it would be the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand).

As the hon. gentleman has pointed out, the temporary assistance program which he cited is applicable to and was designed only for those adversely affected by the Canada-United States automotive agreement of 1965. He has suggested that this be extended to cover all people whose employment has been dislocated as a consequence of government action. I am sure the hon. gentleman will recognize that this would cover very large numbers of people and that perhaps if a program of this type were introduced it would tend to inhibit the government in taking the kind of constructive progressive actions that are needed in order to achieve not only a fairer distribution of the wealth in Canada but also to attempt to increase the total wealth in which all of us may have a greater share.

I am filled with sympathy concerning the plight of those in North Sydney who have been thrown out of work as a consequence of this. Over the past number of months I have taken a very considerable interest in the various mechanisms available to the federal government in an effort to increase employment opportunities in the Cape Breton area. I believe the hon. gentleman is aware of the very substantial efforts made by the federal government to improve opportunities there, perhaps not specifically related to the car ferry but in general terms. As he knows, the area development agency has been of some assistance in attracting new manufacturing investments and therefore in providing new jobs in manufacturing. The Cape Breton Development Corporation is dedicated to the purpose of increasing employment opportunities in the Cape Breton area, including North Sydney.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): At the same time employment opportunities are being reduced.

Mr. Drury: At the same time I believe the program operated by the Department of Manpower and Immigration, with which the hon. member is familiar, was designed to provide assistance to people while retraining and fitting themselves for the new and highly skilled occupations which can be carried on. I shall communicate the representations of the hon. gentleman to my colleague the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I should like to say to the hon. member once again that I share with him the regard the government has for the unfortunate plight of those in the Cape Breton area who through no fault of their own are currently out of work.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, March 20, 1968

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PROCEDURE

Fifth, sixth and seventh reports of special committee on procedure—Mr. MacEachen.

[Note: Text of foregoing reports appears in today's Votes and Proceedings.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ADJOURNMENT TO APRIL 23 ON COMPLETION OF CERTAIN BUSINESS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved:

That the house adjourn immediately after returning from attending royal assent to the proposed appropriation bills (supplementary estimates (c), 1967-68 and interim supply, 1968-69) and to any other measures; and

That it shall stand adjourned until Tuesday, April 23rd, 1968, at 2:30 p.m., provided always that if it appears to the satisfaction of Mr. Speaker, after consultation with Her Majesty's government, that the public interest requires that the house should meet at an earlier time during the adjournment, Mr. Speaker may give notice that he is so satisfied, and thereupon the house shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time; and

That, in the event of Mr. Speaker being unable to act owing to illness or other cause, the Deputy Speaker shall act in his stead for the purpose of this order.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, should not this motion be transferred to government orders?

Mr. MacEachen: No.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I should refer the hon. member to standing order 32(1)(a) and (m) which I think will convince him that we are following the correct procedure.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, convinced or not I rise to speak on the motion and to indicate that in view of the failure of the government to give a clear indication that it will proceed with the bill reducing drug prices before this house rises, we shall vote against this motion.

Let me point out that today we are being put in the same position we have been put in on a number of occasions. The most recent one that comes to my mind is the occasion of July 7, 1967 during the course of this very session. At that point we had before the house the report of a committee regarding the pensions of retired civil servants. Some of us wanted action on that report before the house rose for the summer recess. We were told to put it off. We were told the matter would be considered and dealt with in the fall. Frankly I did not believe that, but we had no option in the end but to accept the decision of the house, although we voted against the motion to adjourn on that occasion.

We are now being put in the same position. We have had no assurance from the government that it will proceed with the consideration of Bill No. C-190. In fact all the indications are that we are not going to proceed with it.

• (2:40 p.m.)

I point out that if we are asked to adjourn the session at this point without dealing with that legislation, that the legislation will not be passed in this session. According to the terms of this motion we will be asked to come back on April 23 to continue the session. Everyone knows that certain important changes in the life of this country will take place in the meantime. There is the possibility, if not the probability, that a new government will face us when we return on April 23, and everyone knows that not much more work will be done in the remainder of this session.

This means that Bill C-190 is almost certain to die with the then imminent prorogation of this session. To tell us that the matter can be dealt with then is not, we suggest, at all satisfactory. If we are going to get this legislation, we have to get it now. I call upon the government to hold off the motion until this matter has been dealt with. I recognize that in the way the motion is worded measures other than the two supply bills could be dealt with by the house and given royal assent before we rise. But it is significant that the only items that are named are the two supply bills. I suggest this makes it very clear that the government is not prepared for us to stay in session until we deal with Bill C-190.

27053—494½

Adjournment on Completion of Business

I am fully aware of all the arguments for our having a recess. I am fully aware of the particular reason for this motion. I am fully aware of the desire of those engaged in another contest to have the opportunity to do that. But I think we have a prior obligation to the people of Canada to do something about the problems that are facing them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: One of those problems is the high cost of living. The one specific piece of legislation this government has given us that will do something about the high cost of living is Bill C-190, which is designed in such a way as to bring down the cost of drugs to the people of this country. This is something the government has boasted about. It is one of two responses the government has made to the report of the special committee which recommended that something be done about drug prices. The government has boasted to high heaven about what it is going to do, and now it asks us to pass a resolution which in effect closes out any passing of that bill at this point in the session.

I stand here, Mr. Speaker, and make the assertion that if the bill is not dealt with now it will not be dealt with in this session. I have already cited the case of the superannuated civil servants who were asked to wait last July. They are still being asked to wait, those who have not died in the meantime. I remember that some years ago we had a government bill having to do with the Government Annuities Act. We were asked to wait until after a certain recess to deal with that bill. When we came back after the recess nothing was done, and that bill also died on the order paper.

I mention that bill in particular because the situation then parallels the situation which now faces us. The Government Annuities Act amendment of that year, about 1950 or 1951, was a government measure brought in with a great deal of fanfare; but then an insurance company lobby developed against the bill, and the lobby won. The government put the bill over until after the recess and that ended it.

We have the same situation now. We have a government bill of which the government has boasted. But there has been a terrific lobby against it by the pharmaceutical industry, and if this motion is passed and further consideration of the bill is put over until later, that lobby is such that the legislation will not be passed. Any assurances that this matter will be dealt with when we come back on April 23 might as well not be given, because they are not worth the time it takes to give them. I say that on the basis of experiences I have had, two of which I have cited, with this present government and a previous Liberal government.

We do not quarrel with April 23 as the date of our returning. We do not quarrel with the idea of a recess that is a little longer than the usual Easter recess, particularly in view of the Liberal convention that is to be held. But we still say that to the Liberals as well as to the rest of us the interests of the people of Canada should come first, and one of the things about which we could do something is the price of drugs.

My hon. friends opposite keep referring to matters of courtesy and the fact that they let others hold conventions without parliament being in session. I would remind hon. members opposite that when they had a convention in 1948 they managed to do it in such a way that parliament did not meet at all. That was the last time a party in power changed leaders. Parliament prorogued on June 30, 1948, and did not meet again until late in January, 1949, so the Liberals had ample time in that period to carry on their campaign and elect their new leader. It is the present Prime Minister who chose to give his resignation and to precipitate the leadership campaign while parliament is in session. He is responsible for this situation, but he has said repeatedly that the business of parliament comes first; in fact he said so several times in the last few weeks.

The Prime Minister has said the business of parliament comes first, even ahead of the Liberal leadership convention. This motion denies that statement. The motion says in effect that the Liberal leadership convention must come ahead of legislation to bring down the price of drugs. A statement was made a little while ago about another matter, namely the curtailing of health services in the north. I was very interested in the way Shaun Herron referred to this move on television, and spoke of the shabby values which some of the leadership candidates are giving us in this respect.

This motion is another case of shabby values. The right of the Liberal leadership candidates to travel around the country to try to win that coveted place is put ahead of their responsibility in parliament to deal with a matter which has been before us for a couple of years. This is not an opposition motion; it is not a proposal of ours. This is a government measure about which the government has boasted a great deal, the famous Bill C-190, one of the important effects of which is to reduce the price of drugs.

Therefore, because we have no assurance that this matter will be dealt with, we contend that this motion should not be passed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: Hon. members can utter these interjections, but all they are doing is giving me time to think of a few more things to say. Let it not be said that efforts have not been made to get this matter considered. The other house leaders have known for weeks that we wanted this piece of legislation dealt with. Attempts have been made to arrange to see the estimates through and pass this legislation at the same time. Strong words have been used, but one does not need to worry about that. The fundamental fact is that there is a difference of opinion in the house on this legislation. I know why there is a difference of opinion. It is a result of the power of the pharmaceutical lobby, which has influenced a great many people. I think we have a responsibility not only to the pharmaceutical industry, and not only to the Liberal convention, but also to the people of Canada. Therefore I insist that we stay here until this legislation is dealt with.

Although we are going to vote against this motion I have reached the conclusion that its wording does not preclude the possibility of dealing with Bill C-190. Therefore I say that even if the motion carries we shall continue to press in every way we can for Bill C-190 to be dealt with, in the hope that it can be one of the other measures referred to in the resolution which will receive royal assent at the time this part of the session comes to a conclusion. I deplore as strongly as I can the wording of this resolution which denies the Prime Minister's assertion that the business of parliament comes first. It is for this reason that we shall vote against it.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, we share the concern which has been expressed over the possibility that Bill C-190 will be allowed to die on the order paper at the end of this session. This is a very important bill. I think the fact that the government introduced it is an indication that the government considered it an important measure. On many occasions the government has expressed concern over the high cost of drugs, and in order to achieve some amelioration of the situation they did decide to introduce this measure. They assured us it would have a beneficial effect on drug prices. It is a little difficult, therefore, to understand why there has been such delay in having the house deal with it in a conclusive manner.

• (2:50 p.m.)

Now, Mr. Speaker, I too was a member of the public service committee which dealt with another measure to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred. Remembering the fate of that particular promise there is little to reassure us even if the government does say the measure will be dealt with after the recess. For these reasons, therefore, we share the concern of others about the delay that has been indicated. Yesterday I stated we would be happy to have the supplementary estimates and interim supply go through with a minimum of debate, possibly no more debate than has been held already, in order that we could deal with Bill No. C-190. I still feel that is a desirable procedure and hope consideration would be given to that suggestion.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, just like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I see that we will meet again on April 23 after a recess. At that time, it will be much more difficult to have any legislation now on the order paper passed.

We expect, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said, that the next prime minister will then want to prorogue the current session and open a new one.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre mentioned a very important bill which appears on the order paper, that is Bill No. C-190, and we would also like to see it passed before recess.

But there is another legislation which, we hope, will be passed during this session, and I would ask the government house leader to place it among the measures to be passed before the adjournment proposed in the motion before us. It is Bill No. C-186 entitled "An Act to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act".

Everybody knows, Mr. Speaker, that we have been asking for at least two years, amendments to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act and the composition of the Canada Labour Relations Board.

A cabinet committee studied the problem. At least three ministers, the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson), the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) and the hon. Member of the Administration (Mr. Mackasey) have spoken very strongly in favour of Bill No. C-186.

Moreover, on several occasions, we asked the right hon. Prime Minister if he would take the necessary steps for this bill to be passed during the present session, and he always seemed to be very much in favour of the idea that Bill No. C-186 should be passed during this session.

Now, if the government took the trouble to create a special cabinet committee if three ministers and the right hon. Prime Minister are directly interested in having Bill No. C-186 passed as soon as possible, I feel that, under those circumstances, not only should Bill No. C-190, which I strongly support, be included in the legislation to be passed before adjournment, but also Bill No. C-186 which I favour even more.

Mr. Speaker, I think we are ready to consider the motion for second reading of this bill. By the way, yesterday, the chairman of the committee on labour and employment asked for the unanimous consent of the house in order that the committee might sit during the sittings of the house yesterday in order to prepare its report. We gave that unanimous consent. The committee sat yesterday. I think it is now ready to present its report on Bill No. C-186 which I think could be passed very quickly.

If the government is willing to co-operate and accept the suggestion that the two bills, Nos. C-190 and C-186, be passed before the house adjourns, all the members of the opposition will then show much greater co-operation with regard to the speedy passage of the supplementary estimates and interim supplies which the government is asking.

Therefore, I appeal to the spirit of co-operation of the government house leader. If he is willing, to proceed with those two bills which, as stated earlier by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, have been introduced and endorsed by the government, we are ready to co-operate fully for the passage of the supplementary estimates, interim supply and the two bills I have just mentioned, namely Bills Nos. C-190 and C-186.

A good impulse on the part of the government leader will be followed by the full co-operation of the opposition; in fact, we can probably complete our business even more quickly, with the government's co-operation.

[Mr. Grégoire.]

[English]

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I think it will be generally accepted that I do not take up the time of the house too often, or for too long a period of time when I do. I am wondering whether it is possible for the Minister of National Health and Welfare to aid me in this pursuit of brevity. Could the minister give us an assurance that the bill to reduce drug prices will be one of those "any other measures" mentioned in paragraph 1?

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I remind the hon. member that we are not in committee now. The minister has already spoken. If the hon. member for Timmins wants to make a presentation, he should complete it before the minister responds.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, failing that assurance I will have to be my usual brief self.

There are two or three points which have been made and should be underlined. We should all realize that this is a government bill; that the bill has received first and second reading, approval in principle; that we do not need to take too much time of the house to complete the further stages. I think most important of all, Mr. Speaker, we should realize that no later than yesterday afternoon we had the assurance of the minister of consumer affairs that he is prepared to proceed with this bill at once. We also had the assurance that the minister wanted to see this bill through.

In the face of this, Mr. Speaker, and in view of the co-operation offered by the opposition to implement this legislation, what real reason do we have to hold it back?

Another matter that hon. members should realize is this. The government have the primary responsibility of bringing in the legislation that the house is going to deal with. They also have the responsibility of setting the time when the legislation should be brought in and dealt with. I think the members of the opposition should realize that they also have a responsibility in this regard. Who is affected by this legislation?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member for Timmins to remind him that what is now before the house is not the bill to which he refers. I fully admit that the matter can be referred to incidentally when speaking to the motion, but there is a very specific motion before the house. The hon. member is making a speech that he might want to make, or perhaps has made already when the house considered second reading of the bill to which he has referred. If the hon. member were given an entirely free hand to discuss this bill we might spend a long time discussing at length and in detail every item of business that is on the order paper.

I suggest to hon. members that this would not be in order, and that an effort should be made to concentrate on the motion that is now before the house.

• (3:00 p.m.)

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I agree with Your Honour, so I will approach this question from the other direction. If the motion that is on the order paper is agreed to it will mean that as soon as we finish supplementary estimates and interim supply we can forget everything else on the order paper and go jogging off across the country on what the newspapers like to refer to as another holiday for members of parliament.

If we go off just like that we shall be judged by those in this country who will be affected by our failure to pass the legislation, the sick, the aged and those with chronic ailments who must buy drugs every day and who every day are shocked by the prices they must pay for those drugs.

Here we have an opportunity to lower drug prices and we are asked by the government to forget about it. That is tantamount to saying "Let's get on with the Liberal leadership race and forget our responsibilities and ignore the first opportunity we have had to lower the cost of living in this country. Let's forget all about it. This isn't really important; other things are far more important." The judgment of the people will be passed not only on the government but on the opposition also, and the way our people judge us will depend on the way we deal with this particular issue.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I feel that we must support the proposal of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) inviting the government to give us the assurance that Bill No. C-190 will be considered and passed before the recess.

I wonder why the government is taking so much time to introduce this bill which seems very important for the reduction in the cost of drugs? We are confident that the bill will succeed in reducing the prices which are exorbitant in many cases, and the more we delay in passing it, the longer the consumers who cannot do without drugs must pay exorbitant prices. For a long time now, the government has told us of its determination to fight inflation and, in my opinion, it now has a golden opportunity to do so, at least in part, by reducing the price of drugs.

I think that we should study this bill before this session is adjourned, and that is why we support the proposal of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

[English]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, with respect to this motion to adjourn the house after interim supply and the supplementary estimates have been passed, I know most members are always glad to see the house recess after they have been here for a long and strenuous session. Most of us have things we want to do in our constituencies.

I am surprised at the silence of the government benches, at the failure of the Prime Minister or any cabinet minister to tell us why the adjournment is so important that we cannot deal with a piece of legislation which was introduced by the government on the recommendation of a committee of the house, a piece of legislation which has had second reading and only requires to be discussed in committee of the whole and given third reading. Surely the house is entitled to some statement from the government about why the adjournment is so urgent that a vital piece of legislation which could be put through the house in a comparatively short period cannot be dealt with.

I point out that the legislation we are asking be dealt with before the recess is the outcome of the work of a house committee which was appointed about two and a half years ago. The committee spent two years investigating the drug industry, and it professed to be appalled at the high price of drugs for the consumer. That committee brought in a series of recommendations, and the government has acted on one of them by dealing with sales tax on drugs. That action resulted in a temporary reduction in some drug prices, but I am told that prices already are climbing back up, and there has been virtually no relief for those in Canada who have to buy drugs.

The other committee recommendation the government acted on was the introduction of Bill C-190, dealing with patents and trade marks. We discussed this bill fully on second reading, and the government convinced many members that while the legislation would not solve all problems, it would go far toward reducing the price of drugs for Canadian people.

The government having done that, fine; we want to know why the government is not prepared to complete the job before it recesses. It is not as though the government has not had plenty of warning about our views. On orders of the day two or three weeks ago I asked the Prime Minister if he would consider calling Bill C-190, and the Prime Minister said then that once we get the supplementary estimates and interim supply through it might be possible to do that. We want to know whether the government is prepared to assure us that the bill will be called before the recess. Is this bill among "any other measures" referred to in the motion? The motion before the house says:

> That the house adjourn immediately after returning from attending royal assent to the proposed appropriation bills (supplementary estimates (C), 1967-68 and interim supply, 1968-69) and to any other measures;—

If the government would tell us this bill is one of the measures referred to, we could make rapid progress. The government knew this matter to be contentious, and it had ample opportunity to arrange the business of the house. I submit discussion of the matter would not take a great deal of time now. We could discuss the bill in committee of the whole and give it third reading in relatively short order.

I appreciate the government's problems. Government members want to get out of here as quickly as they can. They want to get on with the Liberal leadership convention, and that is understandable. I point out that the decision to hold the Liberal leadership convention in the first week of April and to try to carry on parliament while the leadership of the Liberal party was being contested was not made by the opposition parties. It was made by the government. Consequently this house has been bedevilled for the past few months with the government trying to run a two ring circus. Our present dilemma has been precipitated because the minds of many cabinet ministers are more on the leadership contest than on the business of the house or the affairs of their departments. We do not want in any way to obstruct the government members—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Douglas: —from attending their convention. We are prepared to do what we can, within conscionable limits, to see that government members get out of here and that cabinet ministers can conduct their campaigns and line up their delegates. But surely we are not asking too much when we ask the government to take a day or a day and a half, or whatever time is necessary, to pass this particular piece of legislation. As a matter of fact, if the government had agreed, yesterday we could have put through interim supply and supplementary estimates, and we could have begun the drug debate today and probably finished it by tomorrow. The government must decide what is its top priority.

Mr. Pearson: Exactly.

Mr. Douglas: The government must decide whether this drug legislation is more important than getting out of here a couple of days earlier. Whether it is of greater advantage to the people of Canada to have government members getting out a couple of days early to campaign instead of having the house sit for another day or day and a half to pass this important legislation is a decision and a responsibility the government must accept.

• (3:10 p.m.)

I agree with my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre that for the Prime Minister or anyone else to tell us that this legislation will be dealt with when we come back is not at all satisfactory. I have risen session after session for the last four years to ask the government about the Canada Development Corporation. There have been resolutions on the order paper to set up such a corporation. We were told repeatedly that the matter would be dealt with later in the session. We have not seen it yet.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You will.

Mr. Douglas: The Secretary of State for External Affairs says "You will". Where is it? The government has had four years to put it on the order paper. If the hon. gentleman as a candidate for the leadership of the Liberal party is making this a promise to me, he has my vote right now. But we have had promises for four consecutive years and nothing has happened, and such being the case I think we are justified in taking an attitude which is somewhat cynical, somewhat sceptical.

The government has brought in a motion which says parliament shall adjourn just as soon as the supplementary estimates, interim supply and any other measures it may wish to bring in have been dealt with. I want to say to the government in all seriousness that they will facilitate the adjournment of this session by saying now they are prepared to bring in Bill C-190 either before interim supply or right after interim supply, and that Bill C-190 will be one of the items listed under other matters. If we receive this kind of assurance we are prepared to support the motion before us and facilitate the business of the house. But if the government intends to insist that its political considerations take priority over a piece of legislation which they themselves introduced for the alleged purpose of helping to reduce drug prices, then we shall have no alternative but to oppose this motion and continue to insist that before parliament recesses we shall deal with this important piece of legislation. We feel we owe this to the people of Canada as well as to the members of the committee on drugs who toiled for two years to deal with this question.

Neither members on this side of the house nor members on the other side have the right to allow this legislation to be tossed into the wastepaper basket merely because there are political considerations which require the government to adjourn the house early, rather than do the thing which is the responsibility of parliament at the present time.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. I almost gagged when I heard him say that the government was being influenced by political considerations. I suppose what we have heard this afternoon is a demonstration of the purest concern for the public interest, completely unrelated to ballot boxes or votes or constituencies or the electorate. It has been an exercise in the public interest, nothing else. It has been an exercise in public morality.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacEachen: A party which voted for dissolution three weeks ago—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacEachen: A party which voted for an end of parliament, a party which voted to kill every item on the order paper, is today on its feet crying and begging to us to stay here for a few more days to pass a particular bill.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacEachen: Those of us who have watched the New Democratic party on these occasions will realize that this is a familiar technique. Last July the house was moving toward an adjournment on a regular basis; there was a consensus that it was time to adjourn for a period and go back to our constituencies. Everyone felt this. Suddenly the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said "No, you cannot leave until I have my increase for the retired civil servants."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: Blackmail.

Mr. MacEachen: Today we were told by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam that if we give a commitment to him and his party that we will bring in the drug bill now, he and his hon. friends will facilitate the passage of supplementary estimates and supply. What is that but political blackmail?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacEachen: Yesterday we tried to work out arrangements to accommodate all interests in the house. There was resistance to it because members of parliament both on this side of the house and on the other side are fed up with the tactics which are being employed on every occasion when we try to bring on an adjournment, tactics of blackmail.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacEachen: We are told we cannot close the house until such and such is done. We on this side know perfectly well that we cannot bring an end to the session. The right hon. member for Prince Albert, when he sat on these benches as prime minister, often said "The government opens the house but the opposition closes it." He was perfectly right. We need to get interim supply. We need to get the supplementary estimates passed. We must have these things before the house is adjourned. There is no time limit on the discussion, and members of the opposition, or members on this side, can keep us here as long as they wish. It is up to the members of the opposition to decide when the house is to close.

Adjournment on Completion of Business

A week ago Monday I made it clear in informal conversations—I do not intend to disclose anything which was said in confidence, but this has been made public—that it was the intention of the government to bring on an adjournment when we had completed the passage of interim supply and the supplementary estimates. This was the intention. Naturally the New Democratic party asked us to bring on the drug bill. We considered this and found that consideration of the drug bill would involve protracted debate. It could not be disposed of in a day or two. Hon. members over in that corner say they only want the debate to take one day, which means that everyone else must agree to pass it in a day. Mr. Speaker, other hon. members may wish to take a longer time.

Mr. Speaker, we are committed to Bill C-190. It was brought in by the government, it has been given second reading, it has been approved in principle by the House of Commons. Yesterday the responsible minister stated he was ready to stand by the bill in terms of its economic significance and the safety afforded to the Canadian public.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the minister—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the minister to read the rest of the statement made by his colleague?

Mr. MacEachen: I will. He said he was prepared to have it debated at any time. Certainly he is ready to have it debated at any time, because he is fully prepared; he knows his legislation and is ready to deal with it in the house.

• (3:20 p.m.)

We are not withdrawing this bill. It is still on the order paper and when the session is resumed next month it will be proceeded with by the government. I am quite satisfied that no matter what events take place in April this bill will be proceeded with by the government of Canada. In saying that I am satisfied that it is reasonable at this point to ask the house to complete consideration of the supply items and interim supply and reach an early adjournment so the house can return and complete the business on the order paper.

We are not asking for any special consideration. We have been engaged in the business of the house for a long period since the session began, and I believe it is reasonable to ask for an adjournment at this particular moment. I would ask the members of the New Democratic party to reconsider their position and give this motion unanimous approval.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister, as house leader, is prepared to say that the bill which has been under discussion will be the first item of government business to be called when the house resumes its sittings on April 23 in accordance with the terms of this motion.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to be house leader when we return.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Knowles: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I hope you will grant me the indulgence of a very brief statement before you call for the vote. I accepted without question your ruling about this motion as to when it should be debated. May I ask Your Honour at your leisure to reread standing order 21(2) which requires that certain government notices of motion be transferred to government orders. Would Your Honour also look at page 2 of the notice paper of Monday, March 18, in which notice was given of this motion and in which it is identified as a government notice of motion. It was because it was so identified as a government notice of motion that I thought standing order 22(2) should apply.

I do not quarrel with the fact that we have had the debate now, but I should like to point out that this is the reason I thought it should have been transferred to government orders.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps I might further substantiate the opinion I expressed a moment ago when I ruled on the point of order raised by the hon. member. I suggest to him that this is a point of order he is raising now rather than a question of privilege.

I should like to refer the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to the report of the committee on procedure which is referred to in volume XCIX of the Journals of the house for the year 1955, at page 746v. This is a report of the committee on procedure with which the hon. member is familiar. It was presented on June 14, 1955 and concurred in by the house on July 12, 1955. It reads in part as follows:

That motions for concurrence in reports of any standing or special committee, for the suspension of any standing order, or such other motions made upon routine procedings, as may be required for the observances of the proprieties of the house, the maintenance of its authority, the appointment or conduct of its officers, the management of its business, the arrangements of its proceedings, the correctness of its records, the fixing of its sitting days or the times of its meeting or adjournment shall be listed, when notice is required, called and disposed of under "Motions".

Those in favour of the motion please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed to the motion please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. MacEachen) which was agreed to on the following division:

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

COST OF MEDICARE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Question No. 727—Mr. Fulton:

1. As the result of discussions with provincial authorities about the proposed medicare program, or through other means, is it within the knowledge of the federal government what is the annual cost of that portion of the present medical care program in British Columbia which is paid out of tax money in that province and, if so, what is the amount?

2. On the basis of current statistics, what will be the cost to the treasury of British Columbia, in a full year, of the medicare program as provided under the federal legislation of 1966, if the program goes into effect with respect to B.C. on July 1, 1968?

3. What is the estimated cost to the federal Treasury in the same period in respect of British Columbia?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. No.

2. In the hypothetical case of a medicare program as provided under the federal legislation of 1966 being in operation for the full calendar year 1968, the estimated aggregate cost in British Columbia would be $82.3 million. With federal participation, the estimated cost to the treasury of British Columbia would be $39.6 million. Such an estimate, of course, is based on a number of assumptions concerning the number of residents covered, the schedule of fees, the percentage rate of payment, etc.

3. In the same hypothetical case for the calendar year 1968, assuming 100 per cent population coverage and full participation by all provinces and territories, the estimated cost to the federal treasury in respect of British Columbia would be $42.7 million.

CONTINGENCY VOTE IN ESTIMATES

Question No. 1,003—Mr. Bell (Carleton):

1. During each of the fiscal years 1963-64 to date, what was the total amount of the Vote in the Department of Finance or Treasury Board for contingencies and minor unforeseen expenses not otherwise provided for?

2. In each of the said years, what was the gross total amount initially charged to the said Vote for contingencies?

3. Of such amounts so charged to the said Vote, what was the total amount in each of the said years subsequently replaced in the said Vote by provision in Supplementary Estimates or otherwise?

4. In each of the said years, what was the net total amount finally charged to the said Vote after such replacements?

5. At any time, during any of the said years, was there outstanding and charged to the said Vote for contingencies an amount or amounts greater than the amount at that period of time appropriated by Parliament for the said Vote for contingencies?

6. If so, on what occasions?

Hon. E. J. Benson (President of the Treasury Board): 1. See statement Column (1).

2. See statement Column (2).

3. See statement Column (3).

4. See statement Column (4).

5. No.

6. See no. 5.

Fiscal Year	1 Total Amount Appropriated	2 Gross Amount Charged		3 Total Amount Replaced		4 Net Total Charged

Questions

NEW BUILDINGS, EXPERIMENTAL FARM, OTTAWA

Question No. 1,021—Mrs. Wadds:

What new buildings have been built at the Experimental Farm in the last five years, and what was the cost of each?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Department of Agriculture: 1964, Storage building (prefab), $14,765; 1965, Plastic greenhouse, $10,794; 1965, Lath house, $4,339; 1965, 2 Plywood silos, $4,700; 1966, 8 Screenhouses, $2,600; 1967, Greenhouse, $34,202; 1967, 2 Plastic greenhouses, $64,900.

Department of Public Works: 1963, East west headerhouse, $322,213; 1963, Seismograph vault (Energy, Mines & Resources), $90,421; 1964, Honey house addition, $165,039; 1966, Irrigation pump house, Hartwell locks, $40,360; 1966, Sir John Carling building, $9,962,579; 1967, Addition to apiculture building, $46,243; 1967, Plant growth building, $135,220.

OPERATION OF RETAIL OUTLETS, ARMED FORCES BASES

Question No. 1,036—Mr. Ballard:

In connection with the operation of food stores and other retail outlets on Canadian Forces Bases:

1. How many food stores, gas stations and other retail outlets are operated by N.P.F. (non-public funds of units)?

2. What is N.P.F.?

3. Is N.P.F. incorporated and in what province?

4. Who appoints or elects its management and to whom do they answer?

5. What is the total business volume (retail sales)?

6. Who audits the books and where is the audit published or to whom is it available?

7. Have there been any modifications to the policy governing N.P.F. in 1967, and are any proposed changes at present under discussion?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): 1. Food stores, 12; Gas stations, 41; other retail outlets, 179. In addition, Maple Leaf Services operate, 7 Food stores; 4 Gas stations; 16 other retail outlets; as well as canteens in troop lines and junior ranks' clubs.

2. "N.P.F." stands for "non-public funds" which is a term used in the Department of National Defence to indicate non-public money and property used for the collective benefit and welfare of the members of the forces, in accordance with section 39 of the National Defence Act.

[Mr. Benson.]

3. No, "N.P.F." is not incorporated. However, Maple Leaf Services is an independent body incorporated in May 1954 under the provisions of part II of the Companies' Act, and is therefore not a crown corporation.

4. The non-public funds of units or other elements of the Canadian Forces are administered by mess, institute or canteen committees, which are approved by the commanding officer, and are responsible to the commanding officer of the unit for the efficient management of the messes, institutes and canteens in accordance with orders issued by the chief of the defence staff. Insofar as Maple Leaf Services is concerned, the members of the corporation are the officers and men of the regular army. The operations are controlled by a board of six directors, (officers of the Canadian Forces). The president and managing director are responsible to the board of directors for the day to day management of the corporation.

5. In 1966-67, the total retail sales of the N.P.F. businesses listed in (1) above was $28,477,782, and Maple Leaf Services $20,377,175.

6. Non-public fund accounts are audited not less than once annually by a board of officers appointed by the commanding officer of the unit. The audit reports are made available to the commanding officer, his next superior officer, and to the mess, institute and canteen committees. Insofar as Maple Leaf Services is concerned, the annual audit is carried out by a private company. This audit is available to all members of the corporation.

7. No. However, in view of the fact that the reorganization act was proclaimed on 1 February, 1968, a proposal is being considered which would bring the services and amenities provided by Maple Leaf Services, as well as other N.P.F. activities, within an organization to be known as the Canadian Armed Forces Exchange System (CANEX). This will result in all resale outlets and amenities formerly under Maple Leaf Services and former naval or air force bases and units, being operated within the Canadian Armed Forces Exchange System under common management procedures and technical advice by the Director General CANEX as directed by the chief of the defence staff.

"GUIDE TO CANADIAN MINISTRIES"

Question No. 1,040—Mr. Bell (Carleton):

1. Was a Guide to Canadian Ministries 1867-1967 planned as a centennial project?

2. If so, what stage has been reached in its publication?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by Public Archives as follows: 1. Yes.

2. The data upon which the text of the Guide is based is provided by the Privy Council office. Owing to pressure of other work the office has not yet been able to send to the Public Archives the data for the period August 1, 1965 to July 1, 1967. As soon as this is received the Archives will proceed with the publication of a complete new edition of the Guide that will cover the period 1867-1967.

SALES OF DEFENCE EQUIPMENT TO U.S.

Question No. 1,069—Mr. Douglas:

1. What was the value of all arms, ammunition, implements of war, vehicles, mechanical and other equipment, water-craft, amphibious craft, aircraft, animals, articles, materials, substances and things required or used for the purpose of the defence of Canada or for cooperative efforts for defence being carried on by Canada and an associated government sold by Canada to the United States in 1967?

2. What was the value of air-to-ground rockets sold by Canada to the United States in 1967?

3. What was the value of TNT sold by Canada to the United States in 1967?

4. What was the value of Octrol sold by Canada to the United States in 1967?

5. What was the value of aircraft sold by Canada to the United States in 1967?

6. Was any of the material named in Part 1 and sold by Canada to the United States made in plants owned, leased or operated by the Canadian Government and, if so (a) what plants were involved and (b) what was produced in each of these plants?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Insofar as the Department of Defence Production is concerned: 1. Items under the heading "arms, ammunition, implements of war, vehicles, mechanical and other equipment, water-craft, amphibious craft, aircraft, animals, articles, materials, substances and things required or used for the purpose of the defence of Canada or for co-operative efforts for defence being carried on by Canada and an associated government sold by Canada to the United States in 1967" would include a substantial proportion of raw and semi-processed materials such as nickel, copper, zinc, iron ore, oil, chemicals, etc. entering into Canada/United States trade, for which there is no satisfactory method of ascertaining what proportion of the total movement was required or used for the purpose of defence. It is, therefore, not possible to give a definitive and meaningful answer to this part.

2. Nil.

3. In 1967 U.S. contracts for TNT placed in Canada under the Canada/United States production sharing program totalled $4,091,-342.

4. No Octrol nor Octol was sold by Canada to the United States in 1967.

5. No completed military aircraft were sold to the United States in 1967.

6. For the reasons given in the answer to part 1, a complete answer cannot be given for this part. For sales under the Canada/United States production sharing program, which are known to fall in the category defined in part 1: (a) (i) Canadian Arsenals Limited, filling division, St. Paul l'Ermite, Quebec; (ii) Louise Basin Plant, Quebec, (operated by Valcartier Industries, Valcartier, Quebec); (iii) Canadian Arsenals Limited, small arms division. (b) (i) Miscellaneous ammunition components; (ii) Brass cartridge cases; (iii) Components for small arms.

CONSTRUCTION OF DESTROYERS

Question No. 1,075—Mr. Forrestall:

1. What is the present total estimated cost for construction of the four new destroyers, including the equipment costs of these ships?

2. When will the review of the bids for the construction of these ships be completed?

3. Is any consideration being given to having one yard build all four ships?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): In so far as the Department of Defence Production is concerned: 1. The present estimated total cost for construction, equipment, installation of equipment and testing of equipment during the sea trials is between $220 million and $225 million.

2. Prior to April 12, 1968.

3. Consideration was given but it was found that such a course was not advantageous.

TENDER CALLS FOR DESTROYERS

Question No. 1,083—Mr. Lambert:

1. Have tender calls been put for the construction of any or all four of the so-called D.D.H. destroyers of the Department of National Defence and, if so (a) for how many (b) on what date?

Questions

2. How many tenders were received, from what firms, and for what amounts either individually or on any other basis?

3. If bids were received, are any or all of them acceptable and, if so, when is it expected that a decision would be reached to award a contract and, in that event, what would be the expected date of signing the contract?

4. In the event of a firm date for awarding a contract for any or all of these vessels, what would be the anticipated dates for (a) laying the keel (b) delivery of the vessels to the Canadian Forces Naval Branch?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): In so far as the Department of Defence Production is concerned: 1. Requests for proposals for the construction and installation of equipment items on four DDH-280 class vessels were issued to the shipyards qualified to submit proposals in two categories, one for the lead (first) ship and the second ship, and the other for the third and fourth ships, on April 12, 1967.

2. On the closing date for receipt of proposals, December 12th, 1967 two were received for the lead ship and the second ship of the program, and four were received for the third and fourth ships, as follows:

Name of company	Evaluation price
Lead and second ship
Marine Industries Limited	$20,436,200
Davie Shipbuilding Limited	$24,042,767
Third and fourth ship
Marine Industries Limited	$18,459,950
Davie Shipbuilding Limited	$22,523,170
Halifax Shipyard Division of DOSCO	$34,758,206
Burrard Dry Dock Company Limited	$49,287,230

3. Assessment and evaluation of the proposals is continuing. Award of contracts is expected to be made by April 12th, 1968.

4. The schedules for the construction of these ships will be the responsibilities of the successful contractors to meet the required delivery dates of June 1971 for the lead ship, November 1971 for the second, June 1972 for the third and September 1972 for the fourth ship.

SHIPS BUILT FOR ATLANTIC SUGAR REFINERIES

Question No. 1,089—Mr. MacRae:

1. How many ships have been built for the Atlantic Sugar Refineries Limited on which a federal government subsidy was paid?

[Mr. Lambert.]

2. Where were these ships built?

3. Where will they be used?

4. What were the total construction costs?

5. What was the total amount of the subsidy?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): 1. Atlantic Sugar Refineries Limited have contracted for 15 ships for which ship construction subsidies have been authorized. Of these, 11 are completed and four are under construction.

2. Yarrows Limited, 2 ships; Canadian Vickers Shipyards Limited: Montreal Division, 3 ships, Geo. T. Davie Division, 8 ships; Newfoundland Marine Works, 2 ships.

3. Not known.

4. Total construction costs are not known. However, "approved costs" for purposes of subsidies are $24,346,335.

5. Total amount of subsidy paid or to be paid is $12,173,167.50.

WHEAT BOARD ALLOCATION FOR MARKETING GRAIN

Question No. 1,097—Mr. Schreyer:

1. In the last fiscal year, what was the expenditure by the Canadian Wheat Board allocated to the operation of marketing producers' grain?

2. Of the above amount, how much was allocated to sales promotional activities?

Mr. B. S. Beer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): 1 and 2. Information with respect to the expenditure by the Canadian Wheat Board allocated to the operation of marketing producers' grain for the fiscal year ending July 31st, 1967, will appear in the board's annual report for the 1966-67 crop year and cannot be released until that report has been tabled in parliament. The annual report is now in its final stages of preparation and will be tabled in parliament shortly.

COMMITTEE ON MUTUAL FUNDS AND INVESTMENT CONTRACTS

Question No. 1,101—Mr. Bell (Carleton):

1. Who are the members of the Canadian Committee on Mutual Funds and Investment Contracts?

2. What are the terms of reference of the Committee?

3. When is it anticipated that a report will be received from the Committee?

4. What has been (a) the total cost of the Committee to date (b) the share thereof of the Government of Canada?

5. What is the anticipated additional cost of the Committee?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): 1. Gordon E. Grundy, F.C.A., chairman and Ontario representative; Louis de B. Gravel, Quebec representative; W. S. Irwin, British Columbia representative; K. P. Lawton, Q.C., New Brunswick representative; Marc Lalonde, Federal government representative; G. H. Rose, Q.C., Alberta representative; F. C. Tapley, Manitoba representative.

2. The Canadian securities administrators at their Winnipeg conference in 1965, passed a resolution recommending that a committee be established to study the mutual fund and investment contracts industries in Canada. In furtherance of this resolution, the province of Quebec, at the interprovincial conference of prime ministers of 1966, proposed that such a study be undertaken and that the federal government be invited to participate in it. The proposal was ratified at the federal-provincial conference held at Ottawa in November 1966. The purpose of the committee is to study the operations of mutual fund and investment contracts industries, including invesment funds offered for public participation by trust companies, and equity-based insurance contracts offered by insurance companies and to report on whether the existing legislation and regulation, in these areas, is adequate for the protection of the investor.

3. The winter of 1968-1969.

4. As at February 29, 1968, the total cash disbursements were $175,743.72. The federal government's share is 50 per cent of the total amount.

5. The committee has budgeted for additional expenditures of $312,407.

PENSION PLAN COLLECTIONS FROM PERSONS SINCE DECEASED

Question No 1,104—Mr. Rapp:

1. How much money was collected for the Canada Pension Plan from persons who died between January 1, 1966 and January 1, 1968?

2. Will these payments be returned to their estates?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of National Revenue): 1. Not available.

2. The maximum contribution payable by a contributor when calculated in accordance with the plan is not returnable to the estate of the contributor. However, for the year of death the calculation of the maximum Canada Pension Plan contribution payable by the deceased contributor is based on the number of months before the date of death and if the amount so calculated is less than the contributions actually collected the difference would be refunded to the estate of the contributor.

INCOME AND ESTATE TAX COLLECTIONS

Question No. 1,106—Mr. Davis:

1. What were the personal income tax payments to the federal government in total and on an average per capita basis, by province, for the fiscal year 1965-66?

2. What were the corporate income tax payments to the federal government in total and on an average per capita basis, by province, for the fiscal year 1965-66?

3. What was the Estate Tax, in total and by province, collected by the federal government in the fiscal year 1965-66?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of National Revenue): 1. Personal income tax payments to the federal government for the fiscal year 1965-66 were $3,166.6 million. The total includes old age security tax and provincial income tax collected by the federal government. Collection figures by provinces are not available because payments processed by the taxation data centre in Ottawa relate to all provinces and district office collection figures therefore do not indicate correctly the amount collected in each province. The following table, based on an analysis of tax returns, shows the total tax payable by individuals in respect of the 1965 taxation year distributed by the province of residence:

Province	Total Tax Payable $ million	Average per Capita $
Newfoundland	30.4	62.30
P.E.I.	5.8	53.21
Nova Scotia	66.1	87.43
New Brunswick	47.5	77.24
(x) Quebec	475.7	83.68
Ontario	1,425.0	209.93
Manitoba	129.2	133.89
Saskatchewan	115.3	121.37
Alberta	205.0	141.38
British Columbia	361.3	201.06

(x) Excludes taxes payable directly to the province.

2. Corporate income tax payments to the federal government in total for the fiscal year 1965-66 were $1,891.1 million. The total includes old age security tax and provincial income tax collected by the federal government. Collection figures by provinces, based on the location of the district office in which the revenue was collected, are shown in the following table:

CORPORATIONS

Province	Total Tax Collected $ million	Average per Capita $
Newfoundland	18.6	38.11
P.E.I.	2.8	25.69
Nova Scotia	18.2	24.07
New Brunswick	12.9	20.98
(x) Quebec	596.7	104.96
(x) Ontario	864.3	127.33
Manitoba	81.9	84.87
Saskatchewan	16.4	17.26
Alberta	84.4	58.21
British Columbia	194.5	108.24

(x) excludes corporation taxes collected directly by the province.

3. Estate tax payments to the federal government in total for the fiscal year 1965-66 were $108.4 million. Distribution of this total in accordance with the province in which the district office is located are set out below:

ESTATES

Province	Total Tax Collected $ million
Newfoundland	1.1
P.E.I.	.4
Nova Scotia	12.1
New Brunswick	2.0
(x) Quebec	21.1
(x) Ontario	52.6
Manitoba	4.8
Saskatchewan	3.2
Alberta	6.6
(x) British Columbia	4.5

(x) Succession duties are collected by these provinces.

EXPANSION OF TORONTO AND MONTREAL AIRPORTS

Question No. 1,115—Mr. Caouette:

1. What are the government's plans regarding the expansion of Dorval Airport?

2. In the last three years, what sum was expended on (a) Toronto Airport (b) Montreal Airport?

3. During the next three years, what sum does the government intend to spend on (a) Toronto Airport (b) Montreal Airport?

[Mr. Chrétien.]

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Major studies are underway by consultants and by the department in respect of future expansion of Montreal international airport. These studies are designed to consider both immediate and the long term needs for airport facilities relative to the current foreseeable demands of the aviation industry. At this time this examination is not sufficiently complete to permit a definitive statement of the department's plans. It is however expected that by early summer the studies will have been completed and firm plans evolved regarding the future development of the airport.

2. Capital expenditures at Montreal and Toronto international airports (1965/66 and 1966/67 actual; 1967/68 estimated). Montreal international airport, $12,322,338.00; Toronto international airport, $5,226,930.00.

3. Forecast of possible and foreseeable capital expenditures at Montreal and Toronto international airports for the next three years: 1968/69, 1969/70, 1970/71. Montreal international airport, $37,483,000.00; Toronto international airport, $35,372,000.00.

*RECIPIENTS OF CENTENNIAL MEDALS

Question No. 1,129—Mr. Diefenbaker:

Will the Prime Minister table in the House the full list of the names and addresses of recipients (other than the Armed Forces) of the Centennial Medal?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is as follows:

By long established practice the list of recipients of commemorative medals is not published. This, however, is not the difficulty in this case. In the case of the centennial medal the awards were made to persons nominated by federal, provincial and municipal authorities, as well as by many national organizations in the fields of welfare, education, defence, science, the arts, labour, sports, business and industry. These agencies and organizations made their recommendations on the understanding that their list would remain confidential as regards their source.

Moreover, the awards have not yet been completed as one province and certain municipalities have not sent in their full list. If these are not received shortly, the government intends to consider the list as completed. It can then be made public, though without any indication of the source of the recommendation.

*IMMIGRATION IN 1966 AND 1967

Question No. 1,136—Mr. Woolliams:

1. How many immigrants were permitted to enter Canada (a) in 1966 (b) in 1967?

2. From what countries did the majority of immigrants come?

3. What particular skills did the majority of immigrants have to qualify for entry?

4. How many people were deported from Canada (a) in 1966 (b) in 1967?

5. (a) How many immigrants are now incarcerated in Canada while awaiting disposition by way of an inquiry or appeal as to their right to remain in Canada (b) of those mentioned, how many have been refused bail while awaiting a hearing or appeal?

Mr. J. C. Munro (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is as follows: 1. (a) 192,804. (b) 209,840.

2. Great Britain, Italy, the United States, West Germany.

3. Managerial, professional, technical, clerical, service, manufacturing and construction.

4. (a) 1754. (b) 2172.

5. (a) 2. (b) 1.

COMMENCEMENT OF SERVICE OF FERRY "JOHN HAMILTON GRAY"

Question No. 1,137—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. When is it expected that the car ferry, John Hamilton Gray, will go into service between Borden and Cape Tormentine?

2. What was the original expected date?

3. What factors have caused the delay in completing construction of this ship?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. October, 1968.

2. Fall of 1967.

3. Design, engineering and production problems within the plant of the main propulsion supplier.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, notice of motion for the production of papers No. 57 is acceptable to the government, subject to the usual reservations concerning privileged papers and the consent of the relevant government authorities.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining notices of motions be allowed to stand.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HARBOUR DEVELOPMENT, ROBERTS BANK, B.C.

Motion No. 57—Mr. Douglas:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all correspondence exchanged between the Government of Canada and the Government of British Columbia on the subject-matter of the harbour development at Roberts Bank.

Motion agreed to.

FINANCE

PURCHASE OF BOND ISSUE BY BANK OF CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance with regard to the $175 million bond issue of April 1 about which a question was asked by the Leader of the Opposition the other day. Is the Bank of Canada taking $85 million of the issue immediately and, if so, what is the further $100 million in five year bonds which the bank will purchase later? Can the minister state what interest rate is being offered?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not have that information with me today. I will take the question as notice.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Is the government lending $55 million to the C.N.R. to redeem an issue due on May 15 and, if so, what is the interest rate involved?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I will also take this question as notice.

[Translation]

INCREASE IN INTEREST RATES ON GOVERNMENT BONDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance.

In the last few days, the Minister of Finance announced an increase in the interest rate of a few million dollars in government bonds, to convert matured bonds which the government is unable to refund at maturity. This rise in the interest rate varies between 2 and 2½ per cent and I would like to know whether this increase is included in the blue book containing the estimates for 1968.

Inquiries of the Ministry

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Of course, Mr. Speaker, there is no substance to the hon. gentleman's statement that interest rates have recently risen by 2.5 per cent. The interest rates that have been fixed on the bonds recently offered by the government are at the market.

[Translation]

[Later:]

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct another question to the Minister of Finance.

Following the ½ of 1 per cent increase in the bank rate by the Bank of Canada during the weekend, this morning's Le Devoir reports that several trust companies, among whom the General Trust of Canada, have also raised their interest rates. Can the minister tell us whether the government or parliament has jurisdiction over the Bank of Canada—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Latulippe: —and whether means could possibly be found to stop this reckless escalation—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is now asking for an interpretation of the legislation and, for this reason, I think the question is out of order.

[English]

ACTION TO CURTAIL INCREASES IN INTEREST RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Some weeks ago the Prime Minister indicated in answer to a question of mine that the cabinet was studying the effects of rising interest rates. Has the government reached any conclusion on what steps should be taken to correct the social and economic disabilities that have resulted from high interest rates?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is asking a question so wide in scope that I suggest to him such a statement should normally be made on motions.

Mr. Nasserden: Several weeks ago I brought this question to the attention of the Prime Minister. He indicated the matter was under study by the cabinet, so perhaps he would like to give us an interim report on the decisions they have reached.

[Mr. Latulippe.]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INQUIRY AS TO STATEMENT ON PRICES REVIEW BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister with respect to the setting up of the review board which he mentioned a week or ten days ago. Can the Prime Minister give us any idea when this board will be set up, whether the terms of reference have yet been drafted, and whether he is able to table his letter to the premiers with respect to this board?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to tabling the letter. A a matter of fact—and I will have to check this—we have already been in contact with the provinces to see whether there is agreement to table the correspondence between us. Immediately after my statement senior officials visited the provinces. They have already visited Ontario, Quebec and two other provinces and discussed with provincial officials the terms of reference for such a board and other matters related to it. I expect to have a report from them at the beginning of next week. This will enable us to go ahead with the drafting of the terms of reference.

Mr. Douglas: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the Prime Minister state a tentative date when he hopes this review board will be established? Is he hoping to do it while he is still in office or is this matter to be carried on by his successor?

Mr. Pearson: I would hope there might be at least considerable progress and perhaps some finality reached between now and April 25.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the Prime Minister indicate whether the house will have a chance to discuss the matter, having in mind that the board will be set up under the Inquiries Act and it will not be necessary, as he indicated, to secure parliamentary approval?

Mr. Pearson: I would hope it would be possible. I see no reason why it should not be possible for an appropriate parliamentary committee to discuss the matter after the recess.

HARBOURS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—DEVELOPMENT OF PORT AT ROBERTS BANK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. Has he yet reached an agreement with the government of British Columbia on the joint development of a super port at Roberts Bank?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): We are continuing to exchange letters, Mr. Speaker, and to keep the lines of communication open. In the meantime, plans for the port development are continuing so that there will be no hold-up and so we will be able to have it open on the required date.

UNITED NATIONS

RHODESIA—CANADIAN POSITION IN SECURITY COUNCIL DISCUSSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the appeal made at the United Nations yesterday in the speech by Lord Caradon, chief British delegate, for a review of possibilities for international action directed at crushing the Smith government in Rhodesia, can the minister state Canada's position with regard to methods to be used against the Rhodesian government? Is Canada going along with suggestions that Rhodesia be placed in international Coventry through suspension of mails and total rupture of economic and diplomatic relations, which will be detrimental to the Africans as well as the whites, or is the Canadian stand that present measures are as far as Canada is prepared to go?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Canada welcomes the statement made by the British ambassador, Lord Caradon. Canada has, all along, supported the British government, as indeed all commonwealth governments have, in opposing the unilateral declaration of independence by the government of Mr. Smith. As I said yesterday, the Security Council has begun again to consider the Rhodesian question in the light of the executions carried out recently by the Smith regime. Our representative is scheduled to take part in the discussion this afternoon in the Security Council. He will state the Canadian view of the situation and make clear our dismay at the deplorable conduct of the Rhodesian regime. In regard to sanctions he will also be suggesting that the council consider extending the existing selective mandatory sanctions to encompass the whole of Rhodesia's external trade, as we ourselves have done. This move should bring further pressure to bear on the Smith regime.

Mr. McIntosh: May I ask a supplementary question. Has Canada expressed agreement with Britain's stand against the use of force in dealing with the Rhodesian government?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Our view with regard to the use of force has been well stated. What I have just indicated is that we strongly support economic sanctions and believe the time has come when they might be strengthened.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF DEFENCE MATTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of National Defence. Will he give consideration to reporting to the defence committee of the House of Commons and seeking its opinion on the purchase of new planes, the construction of additional destroyers, and any new relationship with NATO and NORAD prior to their presentation as a fait accompli to the house or the defence committee?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): This is such a broad question, Mr. Speaker, that I ask the privilege of studying it very carefully.

TRADE

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO IMPLEMENTATION OF INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of a statement by an official of his department on March 18, as reported in yesterday's Globe and Mail, that there are a number of problems associated with the commencement of the new international world wheat agreement on July 1, 1968, can the minister advise the house what steps, if any, are being taken to seek the co-operation of Russia and other communist bloc countries who are not signatories to the international world wheat agreement in order that the new agreement may become effective?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, officials of the wheat board have visited Russia, as well as participating countries, and there are no grounds for the pessimism reportedly expressed in the article.

Mr. Southam: A supplementary or related question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister say what progress is being made toward setting up an international wheat council in London to take the place of the council that lapsed with the last international agreement?

Mr. Winters: There was a discussion last week. I understand they got along well and everything is moving in the direction of implementation. One cannot take it for a certainty because there are so many nations involved, but the proceedings are going well.

DURUM WHEAT—PROSPECTS FOR EXPORT SALES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. D. McLelland (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister inform the house what the present situation is regarding quota regulations on Durum wheat and the sales prospects for the rest of this year?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I anticipated this question and I am prepared for it. Sales of Durum wheat have been relatively good. For several weeks now the delivery quota on Durum wheat has been open and sales have been made as this type of wheat arrives at terminal positions. The wheat board informs us there will be relatively little left on farms at the end of the crop year. The market for Durum wheat next year, like this year, will be around 20 to 25 million bushels.

CROWN ASSETS

METHOD OF DISPOSAL OF SURPLUS GOVERNMENT MATERIAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Has any one minister been given special authority for the disposal of surplus government material or does the minister of each department necessarily have to dispose of surplus assets through Crown Assets Disposal Corporation?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister concerned dealt with that last night. There is a recognized procedure in connection with this matter under the responsibility of a minister.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I have a supplementary question. Will the Prime Minister outline for the benefit of members the procedure that one minister has to follow and which is directed to other ministers?

Mr. Speaker: Order, I doubt that this question is in order.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The answer given by the Prime Minister is definitely not in order if the question is out of order.

Mr. Speaker: I am afraid I cannot rule on that point.

[Later:]

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Can surplus assets within the Department of Defence Production be sold directly by the minister or his department?

Mr. Pearson: The minister is in his seat, Mr. Speaker, and perhaps my hon. friend would direct his question to him.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, quite often you have decided that when we wish to ask questions of policy we should direct them to the Prime Minister. We have often received that advice. Surely the Prime Minister knows what the law is. I asked him a simple yes or no question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): On a point of order, I directed this question to the Prime Minister's attention because I cannot get an honest answer from the Minister of Defence Production.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

FINANCE

GOLD—INQUIRY AS TO SALES PROCEDURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance and I have given him notice of it. It arises from an answer he gave to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam on Monday last which appears at page 7725 of Hansard. In answer to a question whether Canada would be selling gold to the United States the minister said in part:

> If we come to the conclusion that our gold reserves are more than adequate as a proportion of our total reserves, we might feel we should sell some in order to increase our earnings and thereby reduce the taxes we have to raise.

My question is: Under the terms of the agreement reached in Washington last week, would the minister tell us if it is possible for the government to transfer monetary gold—he referred to reserves—in any other way except by settlement of balance of payments? That is to say, can it actually be sold from our reserves and is the United States still going to buy gold or is it merely going to be transferred as part of the process of settling international payments?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, so far as I know there is nothing in the agreement reached in Washington last week which prevents the transfer of gold between central banks or between our exchange fund and the United States. The limitations are, first, upon the sale of gold out of reserves into the private market and, conversely, a restriction on the purchase of gold by monetary authorities from the market.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I have a supplementary question again arising out of the answer the minister gave last Monday. This part refers to the purchase of gold from Canadian producers by the government. The minister had this to say:

> The position at the present time under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should ask the question directly.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Very well. The minister has suggested that the provisions of the gold mining assistance act—excuse me, I simply have to lay the ground for the question; it is not one you can just spit out in two or three words. The minister has said he considers the situation is not changed and that the Canadian mint will purchase gold from Canadian producers. The question I want to ask is, on what terms will it be purchasing the gold, how will the price be set, and what will the Canadian mint do with it when it has purchased gold from Canadian producers?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the gold that is being purchased by the mint is being held in its own vaults until we reach a decision as to the best means of dealing with it. As the hon. gentleman knows, it is part of the agreement among the central banks that the monetary authorities will not add to their reserves by buying gold. We are not yet sure what policy to follow with respect to the gold acquired, so we are keeping it in the vaults pending final decision.

[Later:]

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of Finance is related to that asked by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. This matter is of particular importance to my area. Could the minister clarify whether the government is going to continue to buy gold from Canadian producers and, if so, at what price?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act gold can be purchased by the mint at $35 an ounce. The agreement that we have with the central banks is that our exchange fund will not buy any gold from the market. That is why I said in reply to an earlier question that the gold being purchased by the mint is being held in its vaults pending a decision as to the proper way of disposing of it.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Do I take it that the gold producers are free to sell gold on the open market at the same time if they so desire but that they will have to forgo the subsidy if they do?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The gold mines have the alternative of selling on the open market. If they do that, then of course they do not receive the subsidy. If they sell their gold to the mint they do receive the subsidy.

Inquiries of the Ministry

UNITED NATIONS

VIET NAM—SUGGESTED ACTION FOR PROTECTION OF CHILDREN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. On March 11 I asked the minister whether, in view of the serious situation of the children of Viet Nam and their plight as a result of the war, the United Nations or some agency of that body was giving consideration to evacuating these children from the war area. In reply the minister stated that he would make an examination to see whether this is being considered. Has the minister made this examination and is he able to advise me on this matter?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have been in touch with officials of the United Nations through the United Nations specialized agencies which have undertaken specific projects in Viet Nam. However, the sort of extensive evacuation program referred to in my hon. friend's question is not now under consideration by the United Nations. Practical possibilities do exist, however, for helping the victims of the recent upsurge in hostilities. The Canadian government has considered favourably an appeal for assistance from the government of the republic of Viet Nam and we will supply aid to the extent of some $200,000, including food, refugee supplies and the sponsorship of medical volunteers.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

REDUCTION IN BUDGET FOR NORTHERN HEALTH SERVICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. During the adjournment debate on March 14 the minister, speaking about health services for the Indian people, said, as recorded on page 7662 of Hansard:

> —we have been able to maintain at least the same level of expenditures for northern health services and Indian health services as was established last year.

May I ask the minister how he can reconcile that statement with the directive that has been issued by his department to all chiefs and councillors of Manitoba Indian bands, which leads off by saying that the federal government has been forced to reduce its program—

[Mr. Sharp.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's question is certainly argumentative. He is asking the minister to reconcile a statement made to the house with the statement to which the hon. member refers, which is argument.

Mr. Simpson: Then, Mr. Speaker, may I rephrase my question and ask the minister when he will be able to make a statement to the house to clear up the situation that now exists regarding reduced health services for the Indian people in northern Canada.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I hope to be able to make the statement before adjournment, preferably, if I am permitted, when my estimates are reached.

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the government reconsider its policy of halting any increase in expenditures on northern health services in view of the fact that the mortality rate among Indians and Eskimos in Canada is among the highest of any country in the world?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure the hon. member is restating a question that has been asked in precisely the same terms.

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY AS TO ASSISTANCE TO GREENHOUSE INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent (Ont.)): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped to direct my question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce but in his absence perhaps I can direct it to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the prime importance of the representations that have been made to the government on behalf of the greenhouse industry, can the minister indicate whether the government has yet formulated any policy?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that there has been any final resolution of the presentation that was made by the greenhouse industry. The representations are being studied by my department as well as by the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Tariff Board. Any government action that is taken as a result of these representations will be taken in the normal fashion.

PUBLIC SERVICE

SUPERANNUATED FEDERAL EMPLOYEES—REQUEST FOR INCREASED PENSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. A. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he received this week further representations from the Public Service Alliance of Canada urging him to take action before his retirement to increase the pensions of retired civil servants? Will the Prime Minister crown his career by acceding to this request as well as to the unanimous report of the special joint committee on the public service?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the hon. member for his anxiety to have me crown my career. I have received such a letter. I have not yet dealt with it, at least in the way indicated by my hon. friend.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the Prime Minister indicate whether he will deal with this matter before the date of his retirement, and is April 25 a significant date since he mentioned it a little while ago?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend's statement on this matter a little earlier indicates that by dealing with it he means dealing with it to his satisfaction, which is not quite the same thing. We will certainly give the matter consideration and do what we think is right in the circumstances.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

HOSPITAL AND MEDICAL SERVICES PAYMENTS TO PROVINCES NOT UNDER MEDICARE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It is very similar to the one I asked him last Monday which he took as notice. Will the minister indicate whether the federal government will be discontinuing payments for hospital and medical services to Indians in those provinces that have not come into the medicare plan by July 1?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it is to be expected that if the medical care plan is universally applied to the provinces that will be the source of medical care services.

LABOUR RELATIONS

MONTREAL—INQUIRY AS TO MEETING OF CONCILIATION BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the hon. Minister of Labour.

In view of the urgency and the importance of the matter, I should like the Minister of Labour or his colleague, the Member of the Administration responsible for studying the conflict between the shippers and the dockers in Montreal harbour, to tell us how far negotiations have progressed and when we can expect normal activities to be resumed in the largest port in Canada?

[English]

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as I reported in the house a few days ago, the conciliation board chaired by Associate Chief Judge Gold has been working assiduously. Hearings opened last Friday and the parties have been at it more or less continuously this week. I get periodic reports, including one received today from the Minister without Portfolio who, at my request, has been taking a special interest in this matter. Encouraging progress is being made. That is about all I can say at this time.

[Translation]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a supplementary question.

In view of the fact that this session will soon be adjourned, can the minister tell us whether normal activities in the harbour can be expected before resumption of the session, at the end of April?

[English]

Mr. Nicholson: There is no reason why not, if the good will that we hope will be shown by both parties is exhibited before the conciliation board.

IMMIGRATION

REPORTED POSSIBLE INFLUX OF CHINESE AND INDIANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. R. Sherman (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Can the minister say whether there are any grounds for reports that because of administrative changes under way in the department there will be a big influx very soon of Chinese and Indian immigrants to Canada? If so, will such immigrants be relatively skilled and will they be directed to those areas of Canada that have a manpower shortage?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have no indication that the information given to the house is correct. I will inquire and, if it is true, I shall give details.

[English]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WAGE INCREASES FOR SEASONAL LABOUR FROM WEST INDIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Madill (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance and I ask him to note it in any event. Does the minister think that the 11.5 per cent to 16 per cent wage increase for West Indies seasonal labour falls within the acceptable percentage for wage increases under his wage restraint proposals?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question is argumentative.

RESEARCH

PROPOSED INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT CENTRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Since the Prime Minister has received a report from Professor Plumptre about the feasibility of an international development centre in Canada, I would ask him whether tangible steps have been taken since that report was received.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, not yet, Mr. Speaker, but progress has been good. I know my hon. friend is particularly interested in this matter and perhaps I would be able to have a word with him and send him a progress report on it.

AIR TRANSPORT

OBJECTIONS TO REPORTS ON RECENT PLANE CRASHES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Has the minister or his department received a protest from the Canadian Airline Pilots Association about the report on the crash at Uplands airport a while ago? Will the minister arrange to dispose of this matter since this is the third time in recent days that the pilots' association has objected to departmental crash reports?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I shall take note of my hon. friend's question.

HUMAN RIGHTS

REPORTED DISCRIMINATION IN EMPLOYMENT CONTRACT IN NORTH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. On Monday, March 11, the hon. member for Skeena and the right hon. member for Prince Albert asked the Prime Minister questions about reported discrimination in an employment contract in Canada's north. I refer to the case of Terence Whitfield. The Prime Minister said he would like to study this matter before making a statement. It was our understanding that he would make a statement to the house. Is he now in a position to make that statement?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I have received a long report on the matter, Mr. Speaker, which corrects some of the misunderstandings and distortions arising from published reports. The report is too long for it to be useful in answering this question. I have asked the Minister of Justice to boil it down. Perhaps he will have it ready tomorrow.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

CHANGES IN PERSONNEL OF STANDING COMMITTEES

The house resumed, from Tuesday, March 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pilon:

That the name of Mr. Stafford be substituted for the name of Mr. Cowan on the standing committee on broadcasting, films and assistance to the arts;

That the name of Mr. Ryan be substituted for the name of Mr. Cowan on the standing committee on health and welfare;

That the name of Mr. Groos be substituted for the name of Mr. Cowan on the standing committee on veterans affairs;

That the name of Mr. Noël be substituted for the name of Mr. Cowan on the joint committee on printing;

That the name of Mr. Caron be substituted for the name of Mr. Cowan on the joint committee on the parliamentary restaurant;

That the name of Mr. Patterson be substituted for the name of Mr. Leboe on the standing committee on labour and employment; and

That the name of Mr. Addison be substituted for the name of Mr. Goyer on the standing committee on transport and communications.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the house to adopt the said motion?

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those against will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Pilon) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson). Had I voted, I would have voted either for or against.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Brown). Had I voted, I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, for the record, I was present but abstained on what I consider to be a purely internal problem of the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I abstained from voting as a protest against this waste of time and this abuse of parliament.

[English]

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Ballard). Had I voted, I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I take this opportunity to suggest to hon. members that I do not believe it is in accordance with the practice of the house for hon. members to make statements explaining why they voted or did not vote or why they were paired.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, does the same thing apply to the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The same thing applies to all members.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: Order. House again in committee of supply. When the committee rose on Tuesday, March 19, item 6c of the Department of Defence Production was under consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENCE PRODUCTION

6c. Reimbursement of the Defence Production Revolving Fund established by section 16(1) of the Defence Production Act for losses sustained in the operation of the crown-owned magnesium foundry at Haley, Ontario, prior to its sale in December, 1967, $480,000.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. McIntosh: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Chairman, may we have a statement from the minister? I believe he has some information for us.

[Mr. Walker.]

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, yesterday the hon. member for Rosthern asked who were the auditors of Haley Industries. There have been three firms: In the period 1951 to 1962, Thorne, Mulholland, Howson and McPherson; 1963, Clarkson, Gordon; and 1964 to 1967, Tighe Pearson. The Auditor General has not been appointed the official auditor of this company. Use was made of the auditors who were associated with the companies which had the management contracts.

The question was asked as to how many employees there were at Haley Industries. The current level of employment there is 184, I am informed, 34 of whom have been added since Bartaco took over early in the new year. Most of the employees reside in the constituencies of Renfrew North and Renfrew South. I am told that the length of service is as follows: 30 per cent of the employees have in excess of seven years service and the balance, some 70 per cent, have less than seven years service.

The special skills required in connection with this operation are those of metallurgists, radiographers, pattern-makers, core-makers and machinists. Even in respect of those who are not what one might call professionally trained, for the semi-skilled workers special training is needed.

The original facility in 1951 cost as follows: for land, $1; for buildings and services including water and electricity, $1,818,000; equipment, $894,000. In respect of the condition of the plant prior to the solution which has been proposed, namely the transfer to Bartaco Industries, we engaged consultants to report on the possibilities of keeping the plant in operation by various options. I am informed that the consultants reported that substantial new investment would be required if the plant were to continue profitably in the operation of the business in which it was engaged, that of producing magnesium and high quality aluminium castings. The foundry, and it is basically a foundry operation, had deteriorated over the course of the years, as one would expect, and further investment would be needed. In the view of the consultants this investment was required and would either have to be made by the crown or by a successor taking over the operation.

• (5:10 p.m.)

The report also pointed out the need for a strong management group to run the operation. I am told that the facility currently requires roof repairs, a waste disposal system, general renovations, processing rearrangements, and improved ventilation systems. Of course these are the responsibility of the new operator, Bartaco.

A question was also asked on the details of profits and losses during the firm's operation. I have the figures here. In 1952 there was a profit of $210,000; in 1953, $383,000; in 1954, $113,000; in 1955, $60,000; in 1956 $61,000; in 1957 $41,000. Subsequently there was losses: In 1958, $161,000; in 1959, $172,000; in 1960, $147,000; in 1961, a profit of $70,000; in 1962, a nine months period, a loss of $102,000; in 1963, under Fleet management, a profit of $55,000, followed in 1964 by a loss of $136,000; in 1965, a loss of $57,000; in 1966, a profit of $93,000; in 1967, a loss of $315,000; and in 1967, from September, the end of the company's fiscal year, until December 5, a further loss of $87,000.

The hon. member also asked for the names of the directors and the shareholders. The following are the directors: Robert Mathew Barr, president, J. S. Gairdner, vice president, John Howard Hawke, Samuel F. Ross, secretary, William A. Barr, Clarence W. Leonardi, and John Charles Sawchuk. The shareholders are: R. M. Barr, operating through Barchild Investments of Orillia, and J. S. Gairdner, operating through Glengair Investment of Toronto, who together own 82 per cent of the common stock, and there are also some 300 miscellaneous shareholders holding 18 per cent of the common stock. I am told that most of these 300 miscellaneous shareholders are Canadians.

In respect of the obligations of Bartaco, they have undertaken to continue this facility in operation for a minimum period of two years.

A question was asked as to when a sale to a United States firm was first known to the department and whether the department has ever obtained an assurance to maintain Canadian ownership. There has been no sale to a United States firm, although I am told that an offer was made by a firm in Philadelphia to purchase 52 per cent of the stock of this enterprise. The offer was made in February. I must say I do not know how long it will be valid and whether it will be accepted. No undertaking was given by the purchaser that it would remain under exclusively Canadian ownership.

The hon. member asked whether balance sheets were available. The answer is yes, a balance sheet is now in the process of being audited by the audit service branch of the Department of Finance.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Chairman, we thank the minister for the information he has given us. Can he tell us whether the figures regarding the plant, the building and the equipment, etc., related to the time of the sale? My question was related to the value of the asset at the time of the sale, not at the time it was first constructed.

Mr. Drury: As the hon. gentleman, who I understand is a member of the public accounts committee, will know, the valuation of the land would probably be obtainable on some form of appraisal. The cost of the land was $1. This is rural land in Renfrew county, and without in any way wishing to run down Renfrew county may I say that it is not of very substantial value per acre. Under a system of accounting which governments of Canada have pursued for a long time, the buildings are carried in their books, not at a depreciated, current or market value, but merely at the original cost figure. This is the only figure we have for this building which, since the inception of the operation, has continued to be owned by the government.

Mr. Nasserden: Was there any inventory of raw materials or stock on hand at the time of sale?

Mr. Drury: An audited balanced sheet was made up at the end of the company's fiscal year. A pro forma balance sheet was drawn up as of the date of sale, and this is the one which is currently being audited by the audit service branch of the Department of Finance. I do not think it should be released before it has been audited. But the figure in the balance sheet dated September 29 shows an inventory of raw materials of $116,000; work in process, castings, $120,000; castings finished but undelivered, $63,798; and work in process in respect of patterns, $103,000.

Mr. Nasserden: Were there any accounts receivable?

Mr. Drury: Yes, Mr. Chairman. In September there were accounts receivable in the amount of $261,979.15, without any reserve for bad debts in the balance sheet.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Chairman, I should like to direct the minister's attention to some remarks he made in the house last night. Near the bottom of page 7831 of Hansard in the left hand corner he made the following statement:

> This is not the general procedure, but rather an exceptional procedure.

The minister was dealing with the disposal of public assets in this manner. He continued:

> The reason what appears to be an exceptional procedure was used in this case is, as I explained earlier, that we were not disposing of assets from which the taxpayer could expect to recover some proceeds, but rather we were disposing of a liability.

Later he quoted his authority for disposing of it. Section 5(e) to which the minister referred last night reads:

• (5:20 p.m.)

> (e) authorize a government department to dispose of surplus crown assets in such manner, upon such terms and subject to such conditions as he may consider desirable;

The marginal note reads:

> Authority to department to dipose of assets.

This section gives the department the authority to dispose of assets, but if this is a liability where does the minister get his authority to dispose of a liability? This section only gives him authority to dispose of assets. Despite what the minister says, if this is the authority he is using then he must be disposing of an asset for the sum of one dollar. The minister said also that this procedure had only been used in exceptional cases. Would the minister mind telling the committee how many times he has used this authority to dispose of public assets?

Mr. Drury: Fortunately we have not encountered this kind of situation where a crown corporation has been in a consistently losing position and arrangements have had to be made to try to ensure its continued operation under the best circumstances possible. There have been other crown corporations which have not been consistently profitable but have been dealt with. In one instance there was a large ammunition producing facility at Val Cartier operated by Canadian Arsenals Limited. There was a sale made of this operation. It was somewhat similar in that it was a crown owned operation that was sold. However, in the case of the Val Cartier operation it was not a liability but represented a net asset to the crown.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Chairman, I thank the minister for that answer. I should like to ask him if section 8 of the Surplus Crown Assets Act has been drawn to his attention? This section reads:

> The minister may authorize the corporation to exercise or perform any or all of the functions, powers or duties of the minister under section 5.

Last night I asked the minister why he had not turned this plant over to Crown Assets, as directed by this act. The case to which I referred the minister concerned armouries under the Department of National Defence, and he thought they should be turned over to Crown Assets. In this case he did not do that because he said the plant was a liability. We have proven it was not a liability but an asset.

I should like to refer the minister to subsection 4 of section 13 of the same act. It reads:

> The accounts of the corporation shall be audited by the Auditor General of Canada and the audited statements of such accounts shall be included in the corporation's annual report.

Was the fact the accounts of the corporation were being audited by the Auditor General one of the reasons the minister did not handle the transaction in this way? I should like to ask the minister also, where are the credits shown? Where are the profits to which the minister referred during the period 1952-1958 and which I think amounted to over $2 million?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, the fact that the accounts of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation are audited by the Auditor General whereas Haley Industries accounts were audited by an outside auditor had nothing whatever to do with the means of disposal of this particular operation, as I endeavoured to indicate to the hon. gentleman last night. What was being sought here was an arrangement whereby, if possible, the plant could be continued as an industrial operation. This is not the kind of business with which Crown Assets Disposal Corporation is normally familiar. Crown Assets Disposal, in its normal course of business, deals with commodities, land and buildings not continuing in their previous use. In this sense it is not endeavouring to dispose of continuing operations. The search for a prospective buyer could best be performed by those who have some working knowledge of the business in which the firm has been engaged, and this knowledge of course resides in the Department of Defence Production rather than in Crown Assets Disposal Corporation.

The excess profits for the years in which there were such profits have, in accordance with the usual procedure, been turned back to the crown. The profits earned by the operator when he was operating on his own would remain with him. In the years in which a profit was made and a charge was made to the management operator for the use of the premises and for the use of government machines, those charges would be paid into the public accounts of the Receiver General.

Mr. McIntosh: I will try to simplify the point I am trying to make. How does the Auditor General scrutinize the balance sheets of transactions such as we have been discussing today from the time they start to the time of the disposal of the plant?

Mr. Drury: I am not quite sure what technique he would use, Mr. Chairman. However, the Auditor General has a resident representative in the Department of Defence Production. He has welcome access at all times to all the files in the department, and that is why he is a resident there, so he can obtain easy access

Mr. McIntosh: In view of that remark I would draw the minister's attention to page 29 of the Auditor General's report, section 65, which deals with the unauthorized use of the defence production revolving fund. I asked this question last night. Has this paragraph anything to do with transactions such as we are discussing at the present time?

Mr. Drury: I think that paragraph refers to the use of the revolving fund in connection with the acquisition, holding and disposal of commodities, if my recollection is accurate. This is really quite a different type of operation.

Mr. McIntosh: When the minister talks about commodities perhaps he had better define them because I think the defence production revolving fund is used for the purpose of acquiring, storing and maintaining stocks of material for defence supplies. Certainly the press release concerning the sale of this property led us to believe the department had been purchasing material for the Avro Arrow which went out of production some years ago. I am not sure the minister's reply to my question is correct, that the Auditor General was not trying to get at such transactions as this in his report. However, I will leave that for the moment and turn to another part of the minister's remarks last night. He said, as reported on page 7832 of Hansard:

> —I should like to say to him that if he had assumed the contract that Bartaco assumed I would have been glad to pay him $100. Bartaco has assumed a lot of continuing contractual undertakings which represent crown liabilities. In order to get the company to do this, we had to agree to absorb incurred losses carried forward from the balance sheets of previous years, plus the discharge of a number of outstanding financial obligations against the company. We were unable to get a continuing operator on any other condition.

I am wondering how the minister relates that statement to his press release which tells the Canadian public that the Haley foundry was set up at a time when no other source for such castings was available to Canada but that other sources are now available and it is no longer necessary to maintain this facility as a crown owned plant for defence purposes. I should like to know how long this situation has existed and why it was necessary for the government to enter into future contracts when according to the press release this material is now available from other sources.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, one of the principal consumers of the output of the Haley plant has been United Aircraft. With a substantial measure of crown assistance they have quite successfully developed the P.T.-6 gas turbine engine. Some of the essential castings for the P.T.-6 gas turbine engine were produced at Haley. It is my understanding that it would not have been possible for United Aircraft quickly to find sources other than Haley for these particular castings. In the interest of the continuing success, particularly in export markets, of the P.T.-6 it seemed desirable for Haley to continue its operations and if possible to expand in the export market, which is what we hope for beyond December, 1967.

Mr. McIntosh: Then may I ask the minister whether the government has contracted with Bartaco, or whatever other company owns the plant, in regard to future production of the plant and, if so, up until what time?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, as I mentioned we have had an undertaking from Bartaco to keep the plant in operation for a period of two years. This is a unilateral obligation on their part with no corresponding obligation on the crown to purchase any or all its output.

Mr. McIntosh: Then I take it from the ministers' remarks that Bartaco cannot sell to any foreign interest before the end of two years? Is this in the agreement with the crown?

Mr. Drury: No, Mr. Chairman. The undertaking is on the purchaser to ensure that the plant continues in operation for two years. That is the commitment. There is no commitment to remain as owner.

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words about this matter. I do so with deep feelings because last night in this chamber an insinuation was made against the Minister of Agriculture who is my next door neighbour. I should like to read a brief extract from Hansard. The hon. member for Swift Current said:

> Perhaps it is coincidental that in this case, in respect of which the minister sold the property for $1, the property was located in a constituency represented by a minister of the crown, who is a contender for the Liberal leadership. Is there any connection in that regard?
> Mr. Drury: I regret that the hon. gentleman should suggest that there is any possible connection.
>
> Mr. McIntosh: I regret that I had to do so.

I should like to set the geographical statistics straight here and to tell the hon. member for Swift Current that—

Mr. McIntosh: Maple Creek.

Mr. Hopkins: I am sorry, Swift Current-Maple Creek—that he does not need to worry about this plant being located in the constituency of a person who is in the Liberal leadership race. The plant happens to be in my constituency, and there are so many capable men running for the leadership of the Liberal party already that I really do not think I will throw my hat into the ring.

Mr. Fane: You would do better than a lot of them.

Mr. Hopkins: I am always interested in the comments of the hon. member for Vegreville. I should also like to point out that the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek said—

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Page.

Mr. Hopkins: As reported on page 7831:

> I do not agree for one moment that the minister did not dispose of an asset of the Canadian people. I should like to have had the opportunity to buy that factory for $1.
