the attention of hon. gentlemen to the fact that we collected $51,000,000 in 1900, and that we expended $52,000,000. What is the answer of hon. gentlemen opposite ? They say that a part of this should be charged to capital account. That is not a fair answer. A fair statement is that we spent more money than we collected ; that we made the largest collection that was ever made in Canada, that we made the largest expenditure on the other hand, and, instead of having upon the whole transaction, namely, the sums of money that were spent on capital as well as the sums that were chargeable to consolidated revenue, a surplus, we have, in round numbers $1,687,000 of a deficit. I think that is a fair way of putting it, and if hon. gentlemen boast of that kind of thing, I do not think there is very much credit due them. If hon. gentlemen were able to say: We have only charged to capital account such items as properly belong to it, we have not unloaded on capital account for the purpose of having a surplus they would be able to make a creditable showing. But, hon. gentlemen, as they have done in connection with the Intercolonial Railway, require to charge endless expenditures to capital account in order to show a surplus. The Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Blair) could have a surplus to such an extent as suits his sweet will by adopting that course. He could charge services to capital account which did not properly belong to capital account as was shown in a debate in this House during last session. It was then shown that he had charged to capital account expenditures in connection with services that had never been so charged before. I do not say that the hon. Minister of Finance is doing that, but, if the expenditures on the Intercolonial Railway which were charged to capital account, form part of that surplus of $8,000,000 it shows how much there is to support the claim of such a surplus. The fact is that hon. gentlemen have paid out over $1,500,000 more than they collected, although the sum collected was very large. As to the attitude of hon. gentlemen upon this question in the past I shall not dwell. We have had the spectacle of hon. gentlemen going to the people with one set of professions and coming back and acting on an entirely different set. They have proclaimed that they have a revenue tariff and that they are able to collect $51.-000,000 with a surplus of $8,000,000 under that tariff. The very thing that hon. gentlemen declared against in the past. Hon. gentlemen went to the country and declared against the national policy, but, what was the attitude of hon. gentlemen in the past. I suppose I may acquit the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. He was fortunately silent but the right hon. First Minister was not silent in his early history in regard to being a protectionist. He was a protectionist in the movement which took place in the province of Quebec in 1876, when the national party was formed. The right hon. gentleman was a member of the legislature of Quebec at that time, and he joined in the movement for protection to the industries of Canada. That was the attitude of the right hon. gentleman upon that occasion. Then, I will take the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). I am sorry he is not here to-night, because he was very pronounced upon the question of protection. This is what the hon. gentleman had to say before the national policy was adopted in 1878 :

> I believe that the interests of the nation at large would be promoted by judicial protection. I believe that the agricultural industries of the Dominion would be promoted by protection and that the manufacturers, being brought to the door of the farmer, would afford a market for a great many articles that would not be saleable if the market were 3,000 miles away. With a home market of this kind established by protection to manufacturers the agriculturists can benefit by producing a rotation of crops.

The right hon. First Minister, although not a member of this House at that time——

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright). My hon. friend (Mr. Clancy) is mistaken. The Prime Minister was a member of this House in 1876, and he entered the government of Mr. Mackenzie in 1876 or 1877—I forget which.

The PRIME MINISTER. In 1877.

Mr. CLANCY. Quite so, but before he came into this House, he had in his province in which he was a distinguished member of the legislature, in which he was a prominent and leading mind in what was known as the national party, said that he favoured protection to Canadian industries. It is a matter of little consequence whether he was a member of this House in 1876, or whether he made the statement upon that occasion or prior to that. The point I am endeavouring to make is that the right hon. gentleman at one time in his life did look favourably upon protection to Canadian industries. Now, we will take the hon. Minister of Customs (Hon. Mr. Paterson) who also entertained a view of that kind. He said :

> I must admit that I am in favour of a defensive policy. I cannot view with complacency what we see in this country. We live beside a country with a population ten times greater than our own whose industries have been fostered by protection until they are enabled even in some articles in which Great Britain excels, to challenge supremacy with her. While that nation has erected against us and other countries a hostile tariff, we have our hands bound and give them free and unrestricted rights of trade in our market.

There can be no doubt about the tone of that speech. That speech was made before the tariff was introduced in 1879. Now, I am going to acquit the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce of having committed himself, so far as he can be traced, to statements of that kind, but the hon. gentleman had it in his desk. The hon. gentleman believed in protection. There is no doubt about that and I challenge the hon. gentleman to say that he did not believe in protection.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. When ?

Mr. CLANCY. I will show the hon. gentleman when he believed in protection. We have the right hon. Prime Minister who is very candid sometimes, and I am going to call one of the most respectable witnesses in Canada to prove that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce was favourable to protection. He is a distinguished member to the party to which he belongs, an hon. gentleman who has done great service to his party, and I am bound to admit that the hon. gentleman with his ability could not fail to perform some service to his country whether we quite agree with the attitude he has maintained during his long years of service or not. But, at a public dinner, given to the hon. gentleman on the 10th of May, 1900, in this city, what was said ? We have an hon. gentleman who rose, not late in the evening, I presume, not at that period when men are influenced or moved by the spirit, but at that sober period when men feel quite candid and the right hon. gentleman was extremely candid. He was referring to the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce when he said :

There never was a day of the many days since we had to discuss questions together in council but I could count and rely on the support of Sir Richard Cartwright; and though, as sometimes happens in the councils of the party, we did not agree when in council, when the policy of the party was agreed upon, Sir Richard Cartwright never wavered in his support of it. I will give you an instance which has come to me from reliable sources, and is a thing which goes far to show the character of the guest of the evening.

Mark the words, Mr. Speaker : the 'character' of the guest of the evening. I want the Minister of Trade and Commerce. (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) to note what follows :

In the days of Mr. Mackenzie, when the country was very much depressed, there were many who believed that if the tariff was increased, that policy would be justified by the necessities of the revenue, and that it would be a valuable policy for the country at large. I can give you the story without betraying secrets, because these things happened before my day, but if the advice of Sir Richard Cartwright had prevailed at that time this policy would have been adopted.

That is the time when the hon. gentleman (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) had it in his heart. There is more :

Mr. CLANCY.

If it was not accepted, it was on account of other influences which prevailed with the government of the day, and for sixteen or twenty years Sir Richard Cartwright bore the brunt of the obloquy of not having responded to public sentiment, whereas the truth was that he was ready to respond to public sentiment. For eighteen years he bore the brunt of all the obloquy and never whispered a word. It is not every day you can find such abnegation and such loyalty to the party, and I have reasons to believe and to repeat it to you, I not only repeat it to you my colleagues, but wish my words to be heard all over Canada, that Canada little knows the debt of gratitude it owes to Sir Richard Cartwright.

Now, Mr. Speaker, by a very easy translation, what does this mean ? It means that in 1878, when the Liberal party went to the country, when the hon. gentleman cried out against protection himself, that he had it in his heart and was a believer in protection.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright). By no manner of means. I have no objection to tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) what happened, if he will permit me. For revenue purposes, and for revenue purposes alone, I advised in 1876—the thing is public property—I advised, as is perfectly well known on both sides of the House, an increase of the taxation to about 20 per cent, but it had nothing in the world to do with the question of protection. It was done because there was a deficit or impending deficit. It was done for revenue purposes.

Mr. CLANCY. If that be so, the hon. gentleman (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) has done his leader manifest injustice. Did the First Minister state the truth or was he doing the Minister of Trade and Commerce an injustice ? Why, Sir, the very position that was taken afterwards by the hon. gentleman (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) shows it. When his colleagues knew that he wanted and believed in protective tariffs—to use plain English as it is understood in Canada——

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Not protective tariff ; revenue tariff.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman and his leader will have to settle the question of 'revenue' and 'protection' between themselves. The First Minister has put himself on record on that question, and the country will believe the First Minister. The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) who was known to his colleagues to have favoured at least a considerable amount of protection, put himself on record in 1890. I want to show the position of that hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) at the two periods in order to see how he stands before the world. He said in 1890 :

I say our protective system was a huge mistake, in so far as it was honest at all, and in so far as it was not honest, it was a huge scheme of robbery. A small ring clique of combines and protected manufacturers have, as I have told you, been permitted for years to make a prize and plunder of the people of Canada. I stand by the declaration I have made that protection is nothing more or less than deliberate legalized and organized robbery, and more than that, if you do not stamp it out, it is the very high road to political slavery first, and industrial slavery afterwards. Our policy from first to last has been to destroy the villainous system of protection by free trade. Revenue tariff or continental free trade.

That is the position the hon. gentleman occupied during these whole years, when he did what ? When, to use the words of the right hon. the Prime Minister, he bore the brunt of obloquy for not responding to public opinion, and when he bore it in silence and did not dare to act upon the dictates of his own conscience. And what happened ? Notwithstanding that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) went to his own constituency before the elections of 1896 and declared that if his party were returned to power he would be Finance Minister ; notwithstanding that, he is sentenced to sit at the feet of the present Finance Minister (Hon. Mr. Fielding). And why was that done ? It was done for the reason that was disclosed in the First Minister's speech, who in the most extraordinary manner at a public dinner felt constrained to disclose the sad picture of Sir Richard Cartwright for eighteen or twenty years bearing in silence the brunt of obloquy because he did not respond to public opinion, I shall not dwell on that further ; I shall leave it for the public to pronounce judgment upon it. We have here to-day a set of gentlemen in office who have gone back on every profession they have made. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) laid down the political moral code of hon. gentlemen opposite before the elections of 1896. Speaking at Bracebridge for the Liberal leaders, and hoping at that time to be a minister himself, he used the language which I shall quote. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) too, has been set aside, and I am not sure that he is not having his revenge in some quarters, I am not sure that he is not giving evidence to the people of Canada that he is not quite pleased with the treatment he received. Mr. Charlton said at Bracebridge :

> In concluding his speech he told the audience what the Liberal party will do when they get into office. We will stop going into debt.

Well, the government have not done that. Why, Sir, we have had a declaration even this afternoon from the Finance Minister that, notwithstanding they claim a surplus of $8,000,000 ; we had the declaration from the Finance Minister this afternoon that the government claimed a surplus of $8,000,000 odd ; the revenue collected from the people in the form of taxation is said to be $52,000,000 in the present year ; and we have the announcement from the Finance Minister that, notwithstanding that fact, he proposes to run into debt during the present year to the amount of nearly $2,000,000. This is what the hon. member for North Norfolk said on that occasion :

> We will stop going into debt. We will adopt principles of honesty and economy.

Leaving aside the very difficult and irritating question as to honesty, where is the economy ?

> We will cut down the annual expenditures by four or five millions of dollars. We will bring about prosperity to the farmers by promoting reciprocal trade relations with their natural market.

Namely, that of the United States. Has that been done ? And lastly :

> We will have the same code for public as for private morals.

It is fair to say, Mr. Speaker, that that was too refined altogether for the hon. gentlemen. No wonder my hon. friend said that a gentleman committing a party to a position of that kind, should be consigned to the place he holds to-day.

I say we can well afford to leave this matter to the judgment of public opinion. We have hon. gentlemen here to-day occupying a position just the opposite of that which they occupied before. We have hon. gentlemen declaring that we have no protection, when we have a protective tariff. With regard to our position on the question of the one-sided preference and the challenge the Finance Minister made this afternoon on the subject of the preference, I am speaking for myself entirely when I say that it is not the business of the Conservative party to repeal a one-sided, silly and senseless preference which hon. gentlemen opposite adopt ; but it is the business of the Conservative party to undo by all rational means the mistakes and misdeeds of hon. gentlemen opposite. The policy of the Conservative party is to educate our own people and the people of Great Britain too ; because I think the speeches made in this House are not without effect on public sentiment in Great Britain. We have gentlemen in this House capable of pointing out the immense advantages that would inure to the British Empire from trade relations carried on within the empire, as against every other country in the world. Is that not a reasonable and rational proposition which will commend itself to public sentiment in Great Britain ? We must help to educate the people of Great Britain to see the advantage of a condition of things that would be of mutual benefit to the people of Great Britain and to the people of Canada. But I despair, as the people of this country have reason to despair, of the consummation of that great achievement for Canada and the empire—and it will be a great achievement when it is brought about, as I hope it will be in the near future—so long as we have hon. gentlemen on that side of the House declaring that the people of Great Britain would be madmen and fools if they assented to anything of the sort.

This is, in short, the difference between the two parties on this question. We believe that this country has a great future as a part of the British Empire; but we believe it has a future and destiny of its own that warrants it in having a fiscal policy of its own. We believe we are not called upon to go to another country and say, We will give you this for the pleasure of taxing people who are already impoverished by taxation. I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to lay their finger on a single feature that can be urged on behalf of the present preference. What were the declarations made by the Liberal party in 1896 and laid down in the platform adopted in their convention in 1893 ? To reduce taxation on the necessaries of life. As the only modifying feature of what is to-day a decidedly protective tariff—and I am not finding fault with it on that ground—we have the preference which covers less than 26 per cent of all the dutiable goods imported into Canada. In that 26 per cent do the necessaries of life come in on more favourable terms than the luxuries ? No, Sir ; there is that fatal cut which admits all the luxuries of life on the same ground as the most pressing necessaries. Then, I ask hon. gentlemen where are the modifying features of this tariff to show that they carried out their pledge of 1896 to lighten the burden of taxation on the necessaries of life ? I will not say that there are not some cases, but they are so trivial and unimportant that they amount to nothing in the way of reducing the taxation. Now, I repeat that while our attachment to Great Britain needs not the proof of this one-sided policy, the people of this country have shown, when the occasion has arisen, that they need give no such proof of their loyalty to the mother country. There are no dollars and cents in it. If we had to prove our loyalty to the mother country by concessions on the basis of dollars and cents, that would be the lowest ground on which we could put it. I repeat, that while we have an interest and a destiny which is inseparable from Great Britain and which we do not desire to have separated, we have a future of our own ; and I believe that the best way we can serve the interests of the empire is by making our own country great and prosperous.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright). Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to inflict a fourth financial speech on the House to-night. Three are, I think, as much as the average digestion of ordinary members of parliament can very well endure ; and, therefore, with the assent of hon. gentlemen, I would move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Might I ask when it is proposed to resume the debate—to-morrow or Monday ?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. To-morrow.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Will it proceed from day to day ?

The PRIME MINISTER. We shall be glad to consult the convenience of hon. gentlemen on that point.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of the Prime Minister, House adjourned at 9.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, March 15, 1901.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 68) respecting the McClary Manufacturing Company.—Mr. Hyman.

Bill (No. 69) to incorporate the St. Lawrence Power Company.—Mr. Logan.

Bill (No. 70) respecting the E. B. Eddy Company.—Mr. Champagne—by Mr. Monet.

Bill (No. 71) respecting the Hudson Bay and Pacific Railway Company.—Mr. Oliver —by Mr. Douglas.

Bill (No. 72) respecting the Kettle River Valley Railway Company.—Mr. Galliher—by Mr. Davis.

Bill (No. 73) respecting the Vancouver, Westminster, Northern and Yukon Railway Company.—Mr. Galliher—by Mr. Davis.

REPRESENTATION IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. WILLIAM J. ROCHE (Marquette) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 74) respecting representation in the North-west Territories. He said : Mr. Speaker, I would ask leave to change the title of this Bill from one to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1900, to a Bill to amend the Act respecting representation in the North-west Territories.

The PRIME MINISTER. Explain.

Mr. ROCHE (Marquette). This Bill refers solely to the North-west Territories, and it is meant to correct certain abuses which crept in during the last election. For instance, the lists in the North-west Territories are supposed to be completed and posted up eight days prior to election day, and to be finally revised two days prior to election day. The enumerators who prepare the lists also revise them and it has occurred that political opponents, desiring to obtain certificates for voters to poll their votes outside of their own polling subdivisions, have been unable to do so until within two days of an election day, whereas political friends have been enabled to obtain certificates any time within eight days. The Bill contains a clause to correct this abuse and to allow the issue of certificates any time during the eight days and also to provide a penalty for issuing blank certificates. Blank certificates have been issued to friends, whereas they have been refused to opponents, and a clause has been introduced to correct that. Then, again, the enumerator who would not give any certificates to his political opponents until within two days of the election would conveniently make himself scarce during these two days, and our friends were not able to obtain certificates at all. A clause has been introduced into the Bill settling the place, or office, where this enumerator may be found in order to secure certificates and to have placed on the list names that are entitled to be there. It also provides penalties for the wilful infraction of any of these provisions. These, in short, are the amendments proposed, which will be explained more in detail upon the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). May I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Roche, Marquette) if that can be made applicable to, say, the province of Manitoba, particularly in regard to requiring that the returning officer should have an office in which he may be found before the election ? I was utterly unable to get any certificates because he absented himself for four days.

Mr. ROCHE (Marquette). That can be provided for, but it is not included in this Bill, which applies only to the North-west Territories.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved :

That, during the remainder of the session, Government Orders shall have precedence on Mondays, after ' Questions to be put by members.'

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not intend to oppose the motion, but, I suppose the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has taken into consideration the amount of time which will be required for the private Bill legislation before the House. It is a matter that I have not given very much consideration to.

The PRIME MINISTER. I think that we have made sufficient progress now to justify the government in taking this day. I have not been forgetting private legislation, but I see no reason why we should not go on with the government business and have the private legislation disposed of also.

Motion agreed to.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAY.

Mr. EDWARD HACKETT (West Prince, P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are entered into, I desire to bring to the notice of the government a very urgent matter affecting the people of Canada. It especially affects the people of Prince Edward Island, and when I say the people of Prince Edward Island I mean the people of Canada. I regret that I am unable to give notice of this question, but I want to ask the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Blair) : How are the trains down in Prince Edward Island moving ? What means has he taken to see that the people there are supplied with train accommodation that they should be supplied with ?

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hackett) wants to enter into a discussion he will have to move the adjournment of the House. If it is only to ask a question upon an urgent matter——

Mr. HACKETT. I do not wish to go into a discussion.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would ask the hon. gentleman simply to put his question without engaging in a debate.

Mr. HACKETT. I move that the House do now adjourn in order to put myself in order. The people of Prince Edward Island paid for that railway. It cost them $3,250,000. At the time of confederation that railway became the property of Canada and it was to be operated by the government of Canada. I have never known since confederation that the government of Canada has failed in its duty in operating that railway. But, I hold in my hand a telegram, received by me to-day from a friend in Prince Edward Island. I will read that telegram to the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, and I am pleased to see that he is present and that the time is most opportune now to reply to this question.

Mr. Edward Hackett, M.P., Ottawa :

Tignish, P.E.I., March 15, 1901.

No train this week. Superintendent won't employ sufficient men clear track.

(Sgd.) P. C. MURPHY, M.D.

Here is a telegram from a reputable and responsible man in the village of Tignish, informing me that, for the last week, there has been no train at Tignish. When we consider that the people of Prince Edward Island built this railway that they should be afforded every accommodation, and that the government of Canada acquired this railway it is only right that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals should see that his superintendent down there employs sufficient men to keep that railway open. An hon. gentleman opposite said something about snowing. I remember, that, two years ago, the hon. Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) was down in Prince Edward Island at a by-election. He received an address and he closed a beautiful speech by quoting Kipling's poem, 'Our Lady of the Snows,' which was received with great applause. We happen to live amongst snow, but it is not beyond the power of the government of Canada to have the railway track cleared and to give the people sufficient accommodation. Now, in corroboration of the telegram received by me to-day, the 15th of March, I hold in my hand a newspaper published in Charlottetown, the Charlottetown Examiner, of date the 12th of March. It says :

The failure of the western train to go beyond Summerside yesterday afternoon, will add to the discontent that prevails there on account of the irregular train service. It is remembered that just before the election there were numbers of men engaged to pick and pull the weeds along the track. But now, when the snowdrifts are deep, though men are rather more plentiful than they were in the fall, and have more leisure, very few indeed are called upon to use the shovel along the line. It is remarked that if a by-election were being held in West Prince instead of East Queen's there would not be now such wonderful anxiety to save a few dollars of the public money. The money would be spent and the trains would go through. L'Impartial had a strong article upon the subject last week, and the Summerside Journal is agitating this grievance of the west. We feel sure that if Mr. Sharp were relieved—as he ought to be—of the pressure of political influence, he would see to it that the west should have a regular train service as well as the east. At present the people at the west have strong ground for complaint, and they will do well if they agitate for railway reform.

Mr. HUGHES (P.E.I.) Read it all.

Mr. HACKETT. That is all. The Minister of Railways will not employ the men to shovel the track although plenty of men are to be found to do the work. In the interest of the people whom I represent, I ask the minister (Hon. Mr. Blair) to see that they shall have at least one train a day. We find the people of western Canada agitating for railway accommodation in Manitoba and the North-west and elsewhere where we are building railways, and the people of Prince Edward Island are satisfied that they shall have all necessary accommodation notwithstanding that in the little province we are deprived of anything like a decent mail service. The urgency of the matter will be seen when this gentleman to whom I referred, had to pay an extra amount for the sending of his telegram across the short cable of nine miles, from Cape Traverse to Cape Tormentine. I, as the representative of my constituents ask the Minister of Railways, I call on him and I demand from him that he shall see that sufficient men are employed to keep the track clear and give the people west of Summerside that railway accommodation they are entitled to.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair). The information which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hackett) has just now given me is the first I have had on this subject, and I think it would perhaps have sufficed if the hon. gentleman had sent me the telegram and put me in possession of the information which he has, so that I could have communicated with the general manager and have the matter inquired into. I am quite sure that there is no disposition on the part of any of the authorities to stay their hands when obstacles occur in connection with the running of our trains. The mere employment of additional labour would not, I am sure, prompt them to refuse doing anything that might be required under such circumstances. They have no instructions which would warrant them in not giving a proper service to any part of the Island, or indeed any other portion of the government railways. If the hon. gentleman will send me that telegram I will at once communicate with Moncton and ascertain what the facts are. I am not at all surprised that trains should be blocked there, because that is not an uncommon thing when storms are heavy and the same thing is occurring all over Canada. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hackett) that perhaps those who are writing or inspiring such newspaper articles as he has read are more anxious to find a grievance and make a complaint than they are to bring the facts to the knowledge of the proper officers. I would suspect that the paper that the hon. gentleman has read from, is not one which is ordinarily friendly to the government, and I would imagine that it was not anxious to put the case in an impartial way. There is certainly no design on the part of the Minister of Railways or of the government, or the department to refuse the people all proper railway facilities or accommodation. I promise the hon. gentleman that I will inquire into the matter at once. I am advised that the very paper which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hackett) has read from, contains the additional statement that the condition which is represented to have occurred on the western portion of the line has occurred all over the line. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Hackett) will know whether that is correct or not. If it is correct, it will show that this block in the west is not due to any discrimination on the part of the authorities.

Motion to adjourn the House negatived.

HALIFAX-MANCHESTER LINE.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Before the Orders of the Day are called, will the right hon. the Prime Minister permit me to mention that I have just received a telegram from the president of the Board of Trade of Halifax protesting against a contract being made with the Manchester line which omits Halifax as a port of call on the homeward voyage. The board protests that the subsidy should not be granted unless Halifax is included both ways, and stipulation made that Halifax shippers shall have the privilege of shipping at least 2,000 tons per homeward voyage. I presume that the matter has been brought to the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright), but in case it has not, I take the opportunity of mentioning it now. It is a matter which demands the attention of the minister.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Hon. Mr. Fielding :

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to His Majesty.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright). Mr. Speaker, it is always matter of honest and legitimate curiosity on the advent of a new parliament, to ascertain whether either of the great parties representing the two great divisions of public opinion in this country have anything in the way of a new policy to propose ; and when, as in the case of one of these we have the happiness of knowing that they have almost a complete brand-new outfit of new leaders the curiosity is deepened. On the present occasion, however, if I am to judge from the speech of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Osler), who, I suppose was constituted the mouthpiece of the opposition, and also of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) who followed him ; there does not appear to be any great chance of our legitimate curiosity being gratified. The hon. member from Toronto (Mr. Osler) in the course of his remarks yesterday observed that there was not much to be said about the budget—and the hon. member did not say much. The government largely agreeing with the hon. member (Mr. Osler), thought that they might give the opposition the great advantage always dear to theologians, to politicians, and to ladies of all sorts and conditions, of having the last word. We were willing to rest our case on the statements of my hon. friend beside me (Hon. Mr. Fielding), thinking our friends of the opposition were likewise willing to rest their case on the champion they had provided. But as it appears that the hon. gentlemen desire a further continuation of the debate, we have no objection whatever that the matter should be discussed from every point of view.

As I have said, Sir, the hon. member for Toronto did not speak at any great length. The hon. gentleman did not give us much indication of the new policy, if a new policy there is to be, which the opposition are prepared to propound. I am bound to say that in that respect, however, although he did not speak quite as long, he gave us some more hints than the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) who succeeded him. The hon. member for Toronto is of opinion that from this time forth—I do not know whether in this he spoke for himself, or as the mouthpiece of the opposition—there should be no more bonuses to railways, unless I presume such bonuses are approved by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company or some other competent authority. The hon. gentleman was likewise of opinion that the time had come when we should issue no more scrip to the half-breeds. The hon. gentleman, in the third place, thought it was impolitic to go on expending money on the St. Lawrence navigation, if I followed him correctly, until it was pretty well established in the fulness of time whether Montreal or Quebec should be the great port of Canada. Now, Sir, if on that occasion the hon. member spoke as the mouthpiece of the opposition, and if they will formulate their views and put them in the shape of a motion embodying these three great planks, nothing will give us more pleasure than to discuss them in any way, shape or form they please to choose.

As for my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), I did not observe that he made any suggestion at all, except to the effect that he was not going to be stampeded by any one—I do not know to whom he had reference—to vote against the present preference to Great Britain unless he liked to.

In the way of criticism, the hon. member for Toronto complained at some length of the increase of the public debt. The hon. gentleman did not find it convenient to mention, what I think he might have mentioned, that in four years the total increase of the debt of Canada under the present government has been a little less than $7,000,000; while, if my memory is not at fault, in the three years preceding, the total increase of the debt of Canada had been $17,000,000. It is perfectly true that the debt of Canada increased by about $7,000,000 in the last four years; and of what items were those seven millions mainly composed ? They were composed of a grant of about $3,500,000 to the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, a grant of $1,500,000, a free gift of the people of Canada to the troops in South Africa, and a discount of about $1,000,000 caused by the placing of a 2½ per cent loan in the English market.

Mr. Speaker, I am as averse as any hon. member can be to seeing any undue increase, or any increase that can be avoided, to the public debt of this country. It is, for our means and resources, a large debt, and I do not like to see it increased; but I will say this, that in the course of my experience I never knew a case in which better value was given to the country for an addition of six or seven millions of dollars to the debt than has been given to Canada in these three items to which I have referred. By the addition of $3,500,000, in the shape of a subsidy to the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, the government very largely developed a very important region in British Columbia, and at the same time provided a large and growing market for a large section of the North-west, a matter of great importance and value to the settlement of that country; and it can easily be established, if hon. gentlemen choose to take the trouble to examine our records, that even at the present moment, in all human probability, the result of that expenditure and the increased population and increased trade and traffic thence accruing, has been to add to our revenue in the shape of increased returns from customs and excise, which we would not have had but for the construction of that road, a sum of money which has already almost entirely recouped the treasury of Canada for that $3,500,000. I say nothing of the importance—though they are a part of the consideration for that $3,500,000—of the great advantages which were obtained not merely for the people of the North-west, but the people of older Canada, who are enabled to trade with British Columbia on very much better terms than they could have done if that subsidy had not been granted. For the $1,500,000 which was granted for the service of Her Majesty in South Africa, I say also that this country has obtained good and adequate value. Putting all other considerations aside, and looking at the matter from the most sordid pounds-shillings-and-pence point of view you please, as a mere mercantile venture, as an advertisement, Canada never used $1,500,000 to better purpose than when she sent 3,000 of her choicest troops to Africa, and when they established for themselves, as I am glad to be able to say they did, a record unsurpassed by any other portion of Her Majesty's forces, for gallantry, discipline, endurance, skill and conduct in the field. The $1,000,000 which we added to our public debt under the guise of discount on a 2½ per cent loan, made by my hon. friend shortly after his entrance into office, was also money right well spent, and for this simple reason. It is a matter of very great importance to us, who will have to renew our indebtedness for many millions, I think not far short of fifty or sixty millions, within the course of a few years, to establish as low a rate of interest for our loans as can possibly be obtained; and therefore that nominal addition to our debt was money very well spent and invested in the interest of the people of Canada. If my hon. friend had simply desired to keep down the apparent debt, it would have been a very easy thing for him to have floated a 3 per cent loan. Had he done so, instead of an apparent addition to our debt of $1,000,000, he would have been able to reduce it by half a million from the proceeds of the premium which he would at that period have been able to secure on such a loan. In our $266,000,000 of net debt now existing, it would be hard for any hon. gentleman to point out any case in which the people of Canada have got better value for their money than they have in these six millions which have been added to our debt under the present government. I say further: if we were able to invest sixty millions on equally good terms, my hon. friend the Finance Minister would be well advised to do it, and do it at once.

The hon. member for Toronto also wanted to know what we had done with the large surpluses which we had received during the last few years. Sir, I am pleased to be able to inform the hon. gentleman and his friends that what we did with the surpluses to which he alludes was to pay off the large undischarged liabilities which our predecessors had left behind them. When we came into office we found that our predecessors had gone out of office not merely with a considerable deficit, but likewise with a large amount of undischarged liabilities.

There were several millions due on railway subsidies unpaid. There was a very large amount, not less, I think, than $10,000,000 or $12,000,000 at least, to be paid for the completion of the canal contracts which were under way and which the late government had left unfinished. If you add these sums together, you will find that there is ample scope for the employment of the entire surplus which we accumulated during our term. I say nothing of the fact, which may more fitly be discussed another time, that we had besides to turn a dead railway into a live one and provide a considerable sum for equipping and putting the Intercolonial Railway into shape to be an efficient competitor with its great rival.

But my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Osler), not content with the past, projected his eagle vision into the future. He desired to know what provision we were going to make for the next 25 years. I was pleased to hear that remark. The hon. gentleman is a citizen of Toronto. He has witnessed, no doubt with interest, how, for the space of thirty years, the Reform party have kept power in Ontario, and I think it suggested itself to his mind that as things were going there was every probability that the present party in power would be called on to provide for the future of this country for the next 25 years. Sir, I am pleased to be able to relieve the mind of my hon. friend with respect to these 25 years. During the next 25 years, in fact, during a shorter period, we may probably have to refund the whole or very nearly the whole of our debts. At this moment, the charges for our debt and sinking fund are a little over $13,000,000 a year, but if my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) succeeds in establishing a 2½ per cent or even 2¾ per cent rate and in dispensing with the sinking fund—as I know he will—the probabilities are that before the 25 years will have expired, we will have reduced that $13,000,000, which is a fixed charge that we cannot control, to something like $6,000,000 or $7,000,000. And if the population—as I think, under the energetic operations of my hon. friend in front of me and other valuable members of the party, it will be—is sufficiently increased, if it resumes its normal rate of increase, and at the end of the 25 years we have 8,000,000 or 10,000,000 of people—as we have every reason to hope we may—the interest will be absolutely reduced to one-half, and, relatively to the population it will be reduced to one-quarter of the amount we now pay.

Mr. COCHRANE. Is it to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture the hon. gentleman is referring ?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. My hon. colleague the Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Fisher) will answer for himself. I do not know what surprises may be in store for us, but I say candidly that I was rather sorry to see my hon. friends, who have spoken so far, were rather disposed to fall back into the old ruts. These hon. gentlemen refused—and refused, I fear, deliberately—to face the facts. They refused to admit that within the last four or five years conditions have changed to an extraordinary degree in Canada. They refused to admit that new obligations have been assumed, for which we have had to provide, and they refused entirely to make any reasonable allowance for the expenditure rendered requisite by these changed conditions. They preferred to repeat exploded charges. I had hoped better from them, I thought that those things might well enough be relegated to the limbo which always follows a general election, and that we would turn over a new leaf and deal with things to a greater extent as we find them to-day. But no doubt these hon. gentlemen are a good deal handicapped by the traditions which they have inherited from their predecessors. No doubt also they have found it rather difficult to get anything new to propose, and they must not complain—though I notice some of them are disposed to complain—too much if the people are disposed to judge them by the standards they themselves set up. I have seen a good deal of political life in Canada, and can very well recollect that, when times were hard, and we were in power, our friends opposite were the very foremost to impress on the people that these things depended entirely on the government. If times were bad the government were to blame. Sir, the people took them at their own words. The people judged them by their own standard and did, I dare say, to some extent, give my right hon. friend beside me and his colleagues credit for the fact that there were good times and that they knew how to make the most of them.

But when I come to deal with such criticisms as I have heard from hon. gentlemen opposite, I notice one thing. Not only are these criticisms to a great extent contradictory, but they appear to be self-destructive. These hon. gentlemen complain that we have stolen their policy, and almost in the same breath they complain that we introduced—especially in the matter of the preferential tariff—a totally new departure. They are never tired of complaining that we are giving England a preference, without favour or consideration granted to us, and at the same time they make it a charge against this government that one of the results of our policy has been a largely increased trade with the United States. Some of them were willing to show—and I think my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) rather intimated the same thing—that all the advantage which England gets in the preferential trade is of an extremely flimsy description. I think some have put it as low as one-quarter of 1 per cent. I think the hon. gentleman admitted that it was one-third of 1 per cent. What particular figure they may finally settle upon is a matter for their own consideration, but I would point out to them, that if that consideration be a mere flimsy and trivial matter, if the preference is of very little importance, is it not rather an audacious request on their part and would it not be one on ours, to ask that the English people should abandon their old and well-settled policy for so very trifling a consideration. I am not of the opinion myself that it is of such a trifling advantage. I think it is a matter, on more than sentimental grounds, of very considerable importance to the English manufacturer and exporter that whereas German and American competitors have to pay $3, he is only called on to pay $2, and I entirely differ from the hon. gentleman in thinking that the great consuming population of Canada fail to reap a large advantage from that reduction. Also—though I think they did not dwell much on that point—I have noticed that many of them complain that this reduction so trivial in consequence and insignificant in its character, has worked a great deal of injury to our own manufactures. There also I do not agree with them, although I dare say some may be more or less inconvenienced by the fact that they have to compete on less favourable terms with England in our market.

Then these hon. gentlemen are constantly complaining of the extravagance of this government and constantly pointing to the fact that we are spending a great deal more money than they did—with which point I shall deal later on—yet almost in the same breath you will find these hon. gentlemen, or some of the leading men among them, constantly urging the government forward to new and heavy expenditure, in some cases expenditures, which, if carried out at all, would probably mean an addition of some hundreds of millions of dollars to our national debt. Sir, I would advise these hon. gentlemen to agree with each other—though perhaps that would be too hard, considering their traditions—and if they can agree with each other, I would advise them to formulate, and to formulate without much delay, some definite policy ; and, when they have so done, to challenge the policy of the government.

Mr. BENNETT. And you would adopt the policy ?

Mr. COCHRANE. As you did the national policy.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. No, I think my hon. friend is speaking in considerable ignorance of the real effect of the introduction of the preferential tariff, and other changes made in the tariff of 1897. If he means to say that our tariff is a very high revenue tariff, I will agree with him ; if he says it is a protective tariff, I differ. And I will tell him that the best test of a protective tariff the world over is this—and he will see it exemplified on the other side of the border—that under a protective tariff imports go down. Under our tariff imports have expanded marvellously.

Now, it is inevitable, under the circumstances, that I must go over some of the old ground. If our friends on the other side will persist in making these unfair comparisons, if they will ignore the changed conditions of the country and the new services we have to provide for, if they will ignore entirely the proposals which they themselves made in 1896 from this side of the House, it becomes our duty, whenever they take that line, to remind them, and to remind the country, of what the real, actual position of affairs was. Now, in 1896, the then Finance Minister, Mr. Foster, brought down main estimates—and it was perfectly well known that he had very large supplemental estimates in reserve, though I will not go over that ground now—these main estimates alone showing that he required $38,358,000 for the services of 1897. We will start with his main estimates ; for the sake of the argument, I put on one side the well known fact that he must have introduced, had his government remained in power, very heavy supplemental estimates in addition. These hon. gentlemen declare that we are enormously and atrociously extravagant, because my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding), in the year last past, has expended $43,000,000, or nearly so. Now, I will admit that an additional expenditure of $4,600,000, in round numbers, is a very large addition to the annual expenditure ; it is a thing to be inquired into, a thing to be explained. But, before these hon. gentlemen declare that the mere fact that $4,600,000 more was spent in 1900 than was asked for in the main estimates alone for 1897 proves extravagance on our part, they will do well, and the House will do well, to consider under what circumstances this additional expenditure was required. I speak now, of course, of the sum chargeable to consolidated fund alone. I find that of the $4,600,000 additional expenditure, at least $1,500,000 was required for the services of the Intercolonial Railway, every penny of which was recouped to the treasury from the added receipts of the Intercolonial Railway. And a sum nearly as large was required for the service of the Yukon territory, for which the late government did not need to provide one farthing ; and this sum likewise was recouped the people of Canada out of the receipts of the Yukon territory. This service has not cost the people of the older provinces one single stiver. In fact, I am rather inclined to believe that the balance is the other way, and that we have a fair amount to our credit as a result of our expenditure on the Yukon. Then, about $500,000 was spent in the reduction of our debt in the added sum spent for sinking fund. If you want to make a fair comparison of expenditure, from this $4,600,000 you must take the $3,500,000 which appeared on both sides of the account. That is only common fair-play. And, when that is done you find that the alleged increase of $4,600,000 diminishes to a total increase at the end of the fourth year of $1,100,000—giving, as I said, the hon. gentlemen the benefit of the fact that I have simply taken their main estimates and have entirely left out of sight the enormous supplemental estimates that they would have had to bring down. Now, the total receipts from the railways and canals was, in 1896, $3,490,000, and, in 1900, $5,232,000, being an increase of receipts at the end of the fourth year of $1,638,000. Our expenditures for the same purpose, in 1896, were $3,826,000, and, in 1900, $5,244,000. So, our expenditures increased $1,418,000, while our receipts increased $1,638,000. I do not lose sight of the fact that there was considerable expenditure on capital account during that interval, but I point out that the interest on that account, up to June 30, 1900, was met, and, I believe, fully met, by the additional sum we received from the Intercolonial Railway. Sir, I would like to ask hon. gentlemen opposite how much the poorer we were owing to the fact that my hon. friend the Minister of Railways now spends five millions or five and a quarter millions on the Intercolonial Railway, and gets back five and a quarter millions ; how much poorer we are because we spend a million and a quarter or a million and a half in the Yukon and receive a million and a quarter or a million and a half from the Yukon ; how much poorer we are because we are debited on the one side with half a million of sinking fund and reduce the other side by purchasing half a million out of the sinking fund ?

There is another way of looking at this question that hon. gentlemen opposite would do well to consider. As I have said, the conditions are mightily changed. In 1896, when these proposals that I alluded to were brought down, we had a very considerable deficit. We were threatened with a deficit in 1897. In 1895 our total available income, after providing for the fixed charges—for interest and sinking fund, subsidies to provinces, and expenses known as 'collection of revenues'—was $7,000,000. In 1897, things were somewhat better ; our total available income was about $10,000,000. In 1900, making these self-same deductions, our available income was about $21,000,000. That is to say, our available income is treble what it had been in 1895, and it is double our available income—which is the point which hon. gentlemen should chiefly consider in regard to these matters—of 1897. And, while our available income had increased over 100 per cent, our expenditure on the same basis—putting on one side the fixed charges and expenses known as 'collection or revenue,' which, as I said, are recouped—was about 10 per cent more than it had been in 1896 and 1897—the expenses of the two years not varying materially. Under the circumstances, it does not lie in the mouths of hon. gentlemen opposite to say that this government has been very reckless or extravagant in the additions it has made in public expenditure. And, if the House wants to know how the remaining $1,100,000, for which we are fairly accountable, is made up, I can give him in gross—I shall not inflict on hon. members the minute details—the three main items that have caused that increase. One of these was a considerable expenditure on the militia, to which I never heard a whisper of opposition from hon. gentlemen opposite. Another was a heavier expenditure on the part of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) ; and, if I remember well, very few indeed of his items were challenged in detail.

The third large item was caused by my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture in the expenditures he made, with the unanimous approval of this House, for the purpose of developing and expanding our trade in agricultural products of various kinds ; the fourth was for the purpose of increasing and extending the immigration into this country on the part of my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior. Now, Sir, if I am correctly advised, the result of my hon. friend's operations, in brief, has been this, that probably within the last three or four years—and here again he can correct me if I am in error—something like 30,000 or 40,000 farms have been taken up in Manitoba and the North-west, are now being brought into cultivation, and are adding largely to the resources, and wealth, and exporting power of this country. These were the objects for which we incurred an additional expenditure. Up to the present moment they have not been challenged by hon. gentlemen, and I doubt very much whether here or elsewhere hon. gentlemen will venture to challenge the expenditures incurred for these particular purposes ; and if they do not venture to challenge them, if they are content to allow them to pass with their entire approval, then I say we are perfectly justified in saying that the additional expenditure we have incurred is either, as I have already said, wholly and entirely in the nature of cross entries where, for every penny we spend we get a penny back, or that it is for purposes which command the unanimous approval of this House and of the people of this country.

But, Sir, perhaps it is when we turn to the developments of trade and commerce that we are able to see better than in almost any other way how great and how vast are the strides which this country has been making within the last four or five years. I spoke just now of the increased trade with the United States, and here it is worth while observing that this increase is to a certain extent a nominal increase. The nominal increase, I believe, was close upon $40,000,000 during the past year. But it is to be observed that we imported and exported, thus virtually neutralizing part of the item a much larger quantity of coin and bullion than in previous years, and it is also beyond doubt that a large part of our increased exports to the United States consisted of precious metals, which would find a market with perfect facility in any other part of the world, and as to which we cannot say that we are under much obliation to American customers for relieving us of them. Nevertheless, after making all allowances, there is no doubt that our trade with the United States has largely increased, and so far from holding that as any ground for reproach, or any ground for misgiving, I for one am very glad indeed to know that our trade, and particularly our export trade with the United States, has incerased largely. A year or two ago our total export trade with the United States was about $45,000,000, our total export trade last year was $68,000,000, being an increase of about $23,000,000, although $4,000,000 of that is nominal, as I said, being composed of coin and bullion, which was exported and re-exported. Still there remains a very large increase in our export trade with the United States. Practically we sold them about $60,000,000 worth of the imports of our country, excluding coin and bullion. We sold to Great Britain at the same time, $96,000,000 worth. And here it is perhaps worth while to notice, because it bears to a certain extent on this question of preferential trade, that man for man and family for family, our trade with the 40,000,000 of people in Great Britain is very much more profitable for us than our trade with the 76,000,000 of the United States. Sir, it need not be so, it is due to the folly of both countries in my opinion, that it is so. We ought to trade a great deal more than we do with the United States. Having a frontier of 4,000 miles contiguous to them, it is neither to our credit nor to theirs that our trade is comparatively limited as it is. But I am speaking of facts, and the facts are that at this moment our trade with Great Britain per head is enormously in excess of our trade with the United States. We sell to the 40,000,000 of people in Great Britain about $96,000,000 worth, and we sell to the 76,000,000 in the United States something like $60,000,000 worth of goods per annum; in other words, every man, woman and child in Great Britain takes from us about $2.50 per head, whereas in the United States they take from us scarcely 80 cents per head, and perhaps if the matter were looked into it would hardly equal that sum.

Sir, here I may say a word or two about two separate fallacies which hon. gentlemen sometimes indulge in. They appear to consider that under a revenue tariff it follows of necessity that if you tax one country you must tax another to the same extent. Now under the very peculiar conditions of trade which exist in the United States, it by no means follows that a higher tariff will necessarily exclude their products, as a matter of fact we know it does not. We know that owing to conditions of trade, that I need not now enlarge upon, you can safely impose on American products, without any detriment to a reasonable interchange, a very much higher duty than you can on British goods. But when hon. gentlemen tell me, in the second place, that we receive no substantial benefit from the preference we have granted to Great Britain, I take leave to differ from them altogether. The information which reaches me from every quarter, and I think men of business in this House will confirm the statement that I make, all goes to show that looking at it as I said, in the most pounds, shillings and pence point of view you please, a magnificent stroke of business was done for Canada by the introduction of the preferential tariff.

There never was so good an advertisement given to any country, or to the productions of any country, as that given to the productions of Canada when we introduced preferential tariff. When hon. gentlemen say, as I think I heard one hon. gentleman say the other night, that not one man in a thousand in England knows anything or cares anything about the preferential tariff, I can tell him that there is probably not one man in a thousand in mercantile life in England who does not know and appreciate, and was not exceedingly impressed by the fact, that Canada alone of all the world had given a distinct preference to British goods in her markets. Sir, this is not a sentimental question. Great Britain stands in the position of a very rich and wealthy consumer who has the power of choosing between four or five rival competitors for her trade in goods nearly equal in quality, nearly equal in appearance. If you have the good-will of that customer you may rely upon it, and the people of Canada may rely upon it, that you will get a preference in the trade of that customer. In dealings with such a customer it is of great importance to have his good-will, and our people are finding it so more and more day after day. If our people will continue to send forward good articles, if they will avoid the danger which always besets trade when there is a rapid increase in the demand, of sending forward an inferior article, and relying on the previous excellence of their products to retain the market, I say if they will avoid that besetting sin, there is hardly any limit to the extent to which we may push our most profitable trade with England, more particularly as the articles which we have to sell are products of high quality, articles in which quality is looked to more than price by a very large portion of the English consumers with whom we deal.

Now, Sir, I do not see the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Osler) in the House, but I would like to put a question or two to his confreres. If these hon. gentlemen complain that we have too great a surplus, if they allege, as I think I heard that hon. gentleman allege, that when you have a surplus it is your duty either to reduce the taxes or to reduce the debt, I would like very much to know from the opposition what particular taxes they propose to reduce. Sir, that is part of the express business of an opposition. If the opposition think that any taxes are oppressive on the people they have the fullest constitutional power to bring the question up here, and I for one, would be disposed to give most respectful consideration to any proposition that they may be pleased to advance for the reduction of taxes, whether it be on American goods, whether it be in the shape of a further extension of the British preference, or in any shape they please. There is a fair and full opportunity and I invite them most cordially to do so, if they want to move to reduce taxation. They may also move to strike out items of expenditure. It is fair, it is just and it is the duty of the opposition and I would be pleased, particularly in the matter of railway bonuses and other things of that kind, to see the opposition bestirring themselves actively in the shape of reducing the various items which are brought down by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) and the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Blair) and some other of my hon. friends. But, Mr. Speaker, I would say to hon. gentlemen opposite, that if they are not prepared to come forward and move for the reduction of taxation, if they are not prepared to strike out any special outlay, if they are not ready to abrogate the preference which we now grant to Great Britain, there is not very much object to be attained by prolonging the discussion of the budget brought down by the hon. Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding). It can serve very little good purpose for them or for us, to go over the old allegations which have been threshed out on every hustings in the Dominion of Canada during the last general election. There is one point, however, upon which I am disposed, and upon which my hon. friend beside me (Hon. Mr. Fielding) is disposed, to partially agree with these hon. gentlemen. There is no doubt whatever that we have had a most extraordinary and remarkable expansion of trade and commerce within the last few years, and I would be very sorry that this House, or this government should proceed to regulate their expenditure on the assumption that this will go on and continue until they had absolutely clear proof that the expansion was based on a permanent increase in production, which was perfectly sure to be maintained. However, on that head, I shall have a little to say before I sit down. I quite admit, as the history of Canada, of the United States, of Great Britain and of every other commercial country shows, that periods of great commercial expansion are apt to be followed by periods, either of depression, or of stagnation, and that a reasonable margin should be allowed to provide for such a case. Particularly, when the rate of increase has been as great and vast as it has been in our case, it would be folly for us to expect that it could be maintained ad infinitum. I believe I am speaking, for, not only myself, but, for my colleagues, also, when I say that we have fully realized that fact, that we have had it clearly before our eyes and that we design to regulate our future conduct in accordance therewith. But, Sir, in all these matters, after all said and done, there are two things which may be regarded as about the very best test of trade development in a country like this. One, I think, is the test of the great and rapid increase of trade and commerce; another is our success in filling up our waste lands and in adding largely to the active producers of this country. As regards the development of trade it is absolutely unparalleled; the record is almost too good. The figures which my hon. friend beside me (Hon. Mr. Fielding) gave were sufficiently convincing, and if he erred at all, I think he erred on the side of moderation and hardly dwelt enough on the enormous rapidity with which our general trade, and more notably, our exports, have increased within the last few years. It is a very interesting fact that I now state to the House, that, within the last six months, the exports of our own produce, the produce of Canada amounted to $108,002,883. Before we came into office the exports for 1896—and it was a record year, it was the highest year that had been attained—amounted to $109,707,805. Six months of the present fiscal year equalled the highest record that up to that time had ever been attained in the fiscal history of Canada in the matter of the exports of our own produce. As to the total volume of our trade, I would like to call the attention of the House to this very notable fact, that, in 1868, the total volume of our trade was $131,027,532. In 1897, and it was a record year, it was the highest year we had ever attained, the total volume of our trade was $257,168,862. In these thirty years the total volume of our trade had increased by $126,-141,330, and these were during the years in which we had added the whole of the Northwest Territories, the province of Manitoba, the province of British Columbia and the province of Prince Edward Island to our territory. Sir, in 1897, the total volume of our trade was, as I have already said, $257,168,-862. In 1900, the total volume of our trade was $381,517,236, the difference being $124,-348,374 in three years, as against $126,141,-330 in thirty years. Sir, as to the question, and a very important question it is, whether the great growth in our exports is reasonably likely to be maintained, I have been at some pains to analyse the chief items of increase, and I am inclined to think, that, from the character and nature of the increases, there is a reasonable probability that the greater part, at any rate, of the expansion in our exports will be maintained, a point which all business men will regard as a very important matter. I find that our exports of bacon and hams in 1896 amounted to $4,381,968, while, in 1900, our exports of bacon and hams had grown to $12,758,025. In 1896, our exports of butter amounted to $1,052,089, while, in 1900, our exports of butter totalled $5,122,563. In the matter of cheese our exports in 1896, were $13,956,571, while, in 1900, they were $19,856,324. In the case of the mines our exports in 1896, were $8,059,650, and in 1900, $24,580,266. Our exports in manufactures likewise increased very largely in these years. I would point out that these several items compose the major portion of the total increases in our exports, and I think that there is reasonable ground to believe that these exports will not only be maintained, but probably will be increased with reasonable care and diligence on the part of our producers during the ensuing year or two. I need not say, Sir, that particularly in the case of the mines, these industries may be regarded as being almost in their infancy, that there is every ground in these and somewhat similar cases, as for instance, in the making of pulp, pulp wood, and paper therefrom, to look for a large and expanding trade. And now, Mr. Speaker, in concluding, let me ask if these facts be so, and I do not see how they can be successfully contradicted, is not my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Fielding) and are not the government fully justified in asking: Why disturb so prosperous a condition of things; your trade is increasing, your debt is stationary, your population is increasing, your revenue is increasing, new resources are developing everywhere—why should we be asked to disturb so wholesome and goodly a condition of affairs?

I doubt very much, Sir, whether these hon. gentlemen really believe that the existing condition of affairs could be bettered in any shape or form. I look around and I find it very difficult to ascertain where, if anywhere, there is any real discontent with the government. So far as I have been able to see, I am inclined to believe that the discontent which the hon. gentlemen opposite say exists may be confined to three classes. I am aware that there is a numerous class of gentlemen who are discontented with us because we have not made them senators. I am aware that there are certain manufacturers who are discontented with us because we have not chosen to allow the tariff to be used as an instrument for their private benefit; and I am aware also that the members of His Majesty's loyal opposition think, and, perhaps, with some reason, that we have had altogether too good times. I am inclined to think that that is beginning to dawn dimly upon their minds. My hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Osler), though he knew it not, had, to a certain extent, the spirit of prophecy on him when he almost predicted that we were here to stay, and to stay for five and twenty years. If that be so, I trust that my right hon. friend (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and his colleagues will be able, in these five and twenty years to administer the affairs of this country in such a way that when that time expires, they can point to equally as good a record as that we have the honour to submit to the consideration of the House and the country to-day.

Mr. A. C. BELL (Pictou). Mr. Speaker, I am sure we have all listened with a great deal of pleasure to the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright), but I dare say that some of us who were members of former parliaments had our pleasure diminished by the fact that we had heard that same speech in various forms on several occasions of late years. I may remark that it differs very widely from the orations which the hon. gentleman (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) was in the habit of delivering previous to 1896. I shall have occasion to make extracts from some of these former speeches of his, which will enable the House and the country to see what a wonderful distance the hon. gentleman has travelled, and how remarkable are his powers of locomotion. It would appear from what the minister (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) said at the end of his speech, that no reasonable man could suggest the idea that a change is wanted in this country, but still he sits representing a province which has overwhelmingly condemned the administration of which he is a member. More than that, I am told that in the constituencies he visited as an active agent of the Liberal party, his presence produced most disastrous results.

Mr. BENNETT. Lincoln.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). The county of Lincoln, with an assured Liberal majority of 600, was visited by the minister (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright), and his visit was immediately fatal to the candidate of the Liberal party there. Wherever the hon. gentleman passed through Ontario, his trail was marked in all directions by dying and perishing victims belonging to the Liberal party. He visited Toronto, and that city is to-day, perhaps, the banner Conservative stronghold of all Canada. Now, the Minister of Trade and Commerce is apparently very anxious that the Conservative opposition should furnish the government with some variation of its present policy. I am not surprised at that, because any one who takes the budget speech and adds to it what has been said by the minister (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright), will be inclined to remark that so far as power of initiating anything new is concerned, the government has shown an absolute want of efficiency. It has to-day a policy, and that remark may form a companion remark to the statement of the minister (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright), that the opposition has no policy. Well, a man whose purse has been taken from him by a footpad has no purse, while the footpad has come into possession of one, and may vaunt it if he choose. The government to-day has a policy, but it is a policy which they appropriated from the opposition, and the government apparently glorying, the theft, twits the opposition with having no policy. I do not think, however, that it is the intention of the opposition to allow itself to be thus defrauded of its policy. Sir, the Conservative party of Canada stands to-day as it has stood for the last twenty-three years, prepared to maintain that policy of protection; the policy of adequate protection. In that respect, I do not see that we could propound any policy that could be of advantage to our opponents, because notwithstanding the denial of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, they have shown themselves to be adepts, not in initiating a protective policy, but in the maintenance of a protectionist policy when it comes ready-made into their hands. I was more struck by what the Minister of Trade and Commerce did not say than by what he did say, and particularly so, as he avoided, with the utmost care, any reference to that part of the speech of the member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), which most required attention at his hands. There can be no doubt that the belief exists in the lower provinces, whence I come, as well as elsewhere in Canada, that immediately previous to 1879, the hon. gentleman (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) and his colleagues in the Mackenzie government, had, under pressure of public opinon, made up their minds to fall in with the views expressed in parliament by Sir John Macdonald and his lieutenants, in favour of protection to the manufacturing, the agricultural, the mining and the other interests. I have heard it told in detail that the hon. gentleman (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) had prepared a protective tariff, when his purpose was interrupted by an incursion of free traders from the lower provinces, who threatened the Mackenzie government with the loss of their support unless the project was abandoned. It is told that then the hon. gentleman locked up in his desk his protective tariff, and he probably has it in the archives of his family to the present day. If that be not the case, then it is difficult to attach any kind of meaning or relevancy to the remarks made by the premier at the banquet given to the Minister of Trade and Commerce in April last, and in which the Prime Minister represented that hon. gentleman as showing great magnanimity and great loyalty to his party, in that he silently lay for eighteen years under the odium of having obstructed himself to the will of the people, and thus brought disaster upon his party, whereas, had he chosen to speak out, he could have shown that the fault did not lie with him. I regret that the minister (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) did not deal with that question, because the one thing which is altogether unsatisfactory about the budget speech is, that it leaves the government to-day standing in the equivocal position they have occupied since they came to power, of endeavouring to pose before the country as being in favour of protecting the manufacturers, and at the same time in favour of giving the consumers all they want. They are endeavouring to avoid the point at which it would be necessary to declare themselves, and to show whether they are protectionists or whether they are in favour of a revenue tariff—free traders, so called. The minister (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) told us last night, when he interrupted the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), that he was in favour of a revenue tariff which would impose a 20 per cent duty upon imports, and that the condemnation to which he had been subjected was not because he refused to adopt a protective tariff, but because he refused to go beyond a 20 per cent tariff. The hon. gentleman declares that to-day he is in favour of a revenue tariff.

He maintains that he is to-day opposed to a protective tariff; and still he sits as a member of a government which has at this moment not a maximum revenue tariff of 20 per cent imposed on all the importations of the country, but a tariff with duties as high as 5 cents a gallon on coal oil, 35 per cent on various lines of manufacture, and specific duties on every page. My hon. friend will not for one moment, I am sure, contend that the tariff which includes specific duties as high as 5 cents a gallon on coal oil, and which grants bounties to the extent of $3 a ton on pig iron, which the manufacturers tell us can be produced for something less than $6 a ton, is in any sense a revenue tariff. Does the hon. gentleman ask the people of Canada to believe that he is sincere when he says that he is a strong upholder of a revenue tariff, while he sits in a government and draws the salary attaching to that government, which maintains a tariff such as I have described? It is too much for human credulity. It is almost impossible to understand how the hon. gentleman can make such statements in this House. However, that point has to a large extent been avoided. The hon. Minister of Finance has made no change whatever in the tariff, and so this matter goes for the moment over, and we are compelled—because in this House we must believe what is said by a member—to accept the statement that the tariff of the government is a revenue tariff, although it imposes specific duties in all directions and grants bounties to the extent of 50 per cent of the cost of the materials produced, and imposes taxes on some commodities as high as 35 per cent, or even 50 per cent or 60 per cent, while it admits other commodities free of duty altogether, in order that it may benefit and favour certain industries in the country. We have to believe, I say, in a technical sense, whatever is said in this House; but I must say that the mental effort required to believe all these things is such a tax upon us that nothing but regard for an old statesman of Canada, a man who has grown gray in the service of the country, would induce us even to make the attempt to reconcile these hopeless discrepancies.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I was very much pleased yesterday to hear a budget speech of so very pleasing a character, both to the country and to the opposition—one of the most pleasing that has ever been delivered in Canada; because it is filled with good things—the tidings of large revenues and abounding trade. I was pleased, during that discussion, to view the great delight which it afforded members sitting on the government side to feel that they were living in such a happy decade. Apparently, these gentlemen supposed that nothing of the kind had ever occurred before, and the Finance Minister, I believe, encouraged that belief in their minds. Now, it is always an unpleasant thing to dispel pleasing delusions. Still, we on this side of the House are always truthful ; and I am compelled, out of regard for the truth, to give these gentlemen the knowledge which they might not seek for themselves, in the happy condition in which they live—that there have been kings before Agamemnon, that there have been surpluses in this country before the days of the present Liberal administration. In 1881, 1882, and 1883, when Sir Leonard Tilley was Finance Minister of Canada, there were surpluses just as good, and I am compelled by truth to say even better than that with which the hon. Minister of Finance has met the House on this occasion. The surpluses of the Finance Minister which afforded such pleasure to his friends on the other side of the House, for the last three years amount to $14,615,000. For 1900, which is his banner year, he has a surplus of $8,054,000, a most amazing sum of money. Still, Sir Leonard Tilley, in 1883, had a surplus of $6,316,000, to which he added—and at that time my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) was sitting in the House, and did not contradict him, so that I presume a different system of book-keeping at that time prevailed—to which he added from the sale of Dominion lands $1,744,000, making a total surplus of $8,060,000, surpassing the boasted surplus of the present year by some $6,000. At present, I need scarcely say, receipts from the sale of Dominion lands are to be found under the head of miscellaneous, and are included in the consolidated revenue of Canada. In 1884 Sir Leonard Tilley had again the pleasant duty devolving upon him of meeting parliament with a surplus of $7,064,492, and adding the receipts from the sale of Dominion lands amounting to $1,009,000, he was able to present to the House a total surplus of $8,073,492. And we must remember that that was 17 years in the past, when Canada was a comparatively small, poor, and unimportant country, compared with the Canada of to-day. At the same time Sir Leonard Tilley was in a postion to announce to parliament that the whole capital expenditure of the country, amounting to $14,171,413, had been met in full without borrowing a cent of money outside of the revenues and the resources which came into the hands of the government. That achievement, I need scarcely say to my hon. friends who will take the trouble to recall the facts, eclipses the brilliant record which the Finance Minister was able to lay before parliament yesterday.

Mr. BELL (Pictou).

Another point that becomes interesting is to contrast the mode in which these different Finance Ministers dealt with this happy condition of affairs. We find that Sir Leonard Tilley showed a great desire to benefit the people of the country, and so managed the finances of that day that he reduced the net debt of Canada from $36.17 to $35.75 per head, and reduced the net interest on the debt of Canada from $1.64 to $1.50 per head, diminishing the annual impost on every individual in the country by 14 cents, or a relief of taxation on every family in the country of some 70 cents. Contrast that with the condition of things to-day. Does my hon. friend the Minister of Finance use his surplus, the golden harvest which has been gathered, for this purpose and in this way ? No. We find that under the present Finance Minister, who no doubt his friends on the other side of the House would like to suppose is a greater Finance Minister than has been, the debt has increased from $63.33 per head to $64.75, an increase of $1.42, and the net interest has increased from $1.74 per head to $1.78, an increase of 4 cents per head, showing a difference between the two of 18 cents as the result upon every individual in the country.

What was the condition of affairs in those years ? The capital expenditure of the government then was very high. It was the period just on the eve of the rebellion in the North-west, and when there was great activity in canal and railway building and tremendous demands on the treasury were being made. In those three years the capital expenditure of Canada was $29,729,000, or an average of $9,909,771 per year, whereas in the four years of the present administration, the capital expenditure has been only $23,358,000, or $5,839,000 per year. Contrast the two expenditures on capital account, that of this government, amounting to $5,839,000 per year, and that of the Conservative government, in the period I have referred to, amounting to $9,900,000 per year, and you will see how much less expenditure this administration has had to meet, and yet the ministers of the period I have referred to, when a Conservative administration held office, were able, despite the fact that our population and resources were smaller, to exhibit surpluses greater than even those of which this government boasts.

What is the contrast in another respect. It will be found that the Finance Minister has not distinguished his term of office since 1897 by any great reduction in the taxes of the people, if we except the 12½ per cent, 25 per cent, and 33⅓ per cent taken, under the preferential tariff, off the duties on British goods. With the exception of this preference, the hon. gentleman has not made any reduction in the taxation. Compare his record in this respect with that of the late Sir Leonard Tilley. Sir Leonard Tilley in 1882 reduced taxation by one and a quarter million dollars, and in 1883 by a like amount.

He took this amount off the taxes with the full intention of diminishing the surplus and thereby lightening the burdens of the people, and yet, after making these reductions, he was still able to come before parliament with a surplus greater than that which the hon. the Finance Minister announced yesterday. It has been always held a proper policy for a finance minister to reduce taxation when he finds a buoyant revenue and a large surplus. I could recall capital speeches made by hon. gentlemen opposite—particularly by the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce, pointing out the great danger attending a surplus and declaring that a finance minister, whose administration showed a large surplus, was not a good financial manager. I am surprised that the hon. gentleman (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) has not succeeded in impressing this view, to which he so frequently gave such vigorous expression when in opposition, on his colleague, the Minister of Finance. The finance minister who succeeded Sir Leonard Tilley, the Hon. Geo. E. Foster, pursued the same course as did his predecessor. In 1891, when the country was very prosperous, when business was flourishing and the prospect of a surplus most certain, Mr. Foster took $2,000,000 off the taxes of the people, and he deliberately did so with the object of leaving that money in the pockets of the people instead of putting it into the treasury. He reduced the taxation of sugar by $3,500,000, and on the other hand imposed taxation of one million and a half dollars on malt, spirits and tobacco, making a net reduction of $2,000,000. But our present Finance Minister is wedded evidently to the opposite policy. His desire is to be able to boast of surpluses, but I do not know whether the people will enjoy his surpluses to the same extent as do the hon. gentleman and his supporters in this House. To my mind, the people would have far more reason to congratulate themselves if the Finance Minister would so manage the affairs of this country as to impose only such taxes as are necessary to avoid a deficit. But the hon. gentleman persists in keeping up the taxation so that he may be able to boast of a surplus.

In 1878 the net debt of Canada was $124,551,000; in 1896 it was $258,497,000, and in 1900 it was $265,000,000. There is nothing that seems to afford our hon. friends opposite so much pleasure as to make very unfair and misleading and improper statements in connection with the public accounts. During the few years they have been in office, they have had comparatively small capital expenditure to meet, compared with what the previous government had to meet in 1884 and 1885. The capital expenditure then rose to the point of $23,000,000 in one year. We then had to meet the cost of building the Canadian Pacific Railway and the expenses of the North-west rebellion, and were consequently adding to the capital debt of the country at the rate of $9,000,000 per year, as compared with a smaller capital expenditure of only $5,839,000 by this administration. So that it is not difficult to show that as regards the progress of Canada and the amount of money collected during the term of the present administration, and its addition to capital expenditure, that record is eclipsed by that of a previous Conservative administration.

I have indulged in these remarks principally because to a great extent the claim is made on the part of the government everywhere—not only on the hustings, but even here in the House of Commons, where men are supposed to know something of the facts—that we are living in an era of such prosperity as we never knew before, and that all this wonderful prosperity is entirely due to the financial guiding power and ability of our hon. friends opposite. This is a most absurd contention. I have pointed out facts to show that twenty years ago, when Canada was a poor country compared with to-day, a Conservative administration eclipsed the boasted record of the present government.

So far as the citizen of the country is concerned, he is not so much concerned in great surpluses as he is in economy. What is good for the citizen, 'the man in the street,' as he is called in the old country, is to have a government in power that will give him efficient service, security of life and property and light taxation. What is the record of this government in this respect? They have not reduced taxation, but have wonderfully increased it. It is true, they have, at various times in the past, condemned expenditures as extravagant and condemned them because they meant increased taxation. I might as well here recall to the memory of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce who, I regret to see, has left his place, an utterance of his own when he was in opposition and criticising the administration, to show the position he occupied toward this matter of expenditure at that time. In criticising the budget speech of Hon. Mr. Foster in 1896—the last occasion when the task devolved on the hon. gentleman (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright)—he expressed himself in this way. And I may say to those who listened to his speech to-day and noted not only what he said, but made correct and careful note of what he did not say, that the remarks that I am about to cite offer a remarkable contrast with his utterance of to-day:

> For my own part I do not hesitate to tell him that I consider a yearly expenditure of $40,000,000 of $38,300,000 altogether too large for the present resources of Canada. I say it is a disgrace and a shame to the government that have been entrusted with our affairs that they come down to us and ask for an expenditure of $38,300,000 a year for Federal purposes. Sir, the thing is wholly unjustifiable. . . . . The fact of the matter is that hon. gentlemen opposite have been discounting the future at a most tremendous rate, and now the bills have come back and there are no assets wherewith to meet them. Sir, there is very little use on the part of hon. gentlemen whining over this matter. They ought to try and meet it, and the way to meet it is to reduce our present establishment, the way to meet it is to reduce your present extravagant mode of government and to reduce your extravagant ideas.

In 1897, the hon. gentleman (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) went into power in company with his colleagues. In the year that had elapsed from the making of his speech in 1896 to his accepting office in 1897, affairs in Canada had changed only in that the recovery which was manifest in 1896 had continued to make its way. There was nothing in the circumstances of 1896 to justify the hon. gentleman in the statements he made, for instance, that we had been discounting the future at the most tremendous rate. We had been recuperating, we had been passing through a period of hard times, a period of rest, a period when the country was economizing and had gained a position from which it could go forward to greater expenditure, could begin to live upon a higher and more extravagant scale—as is the habit of governments as well of private individuals. If these remarks had been made by the hon. gentleman today in criticising the budget speech of his hon. friend the Minister of Finance, they would have been proper. We have been discounting the future; we have been taking every dollar we could from these fat years and spending it; we have not been putting one dollar of it away to meet the lean years that are to come. These remarks of the hon. gentleman would have been pregnant, pertinent, wise, if they had been made in criticising the budget speech of to-day; they were neither wise nor applicable in criticising the budget speech of Mr. Foster in 1896. What is the reason the hon. gentleman, who was so critical then, who was so rabid that his judgment persuaded him to say what he knows he could not defend anywhere, to make statements that are contrary to the facts and not to be defended—what is the reason that the hon. gentleman, who was so prone to criticism then that he was led to be unfair and unjust, who criticised so severly an expenditure of $38,000,000, sees nothing wrong in an expenditure that will touch if it does not exceed $46,000,000 ? The sole change apparent to me and to the country is that the hon. gentleman himself has got into office. The course which he recommended to the Conservative administration of reducing our present establishment, reducing the number of ministers and the cost of government has not been carried out. The ministers have been increased in number, and among the gentlemen so added to what he called an unnecessarily large establishment is the hon. minister himself. The hon. gentleman, so long as he is in this House, will not get up and argue that he should not be here—I presume that he is too logical for that. Before he makes up his mind to criticise the administration, his resignation will reach the premier, and he will be able to make that criticism a candid one. Is it possible that he will hesitate to make that small sacrifice in order that he may become once more the keen, unspairing critic of extravagant administration in Canada ?

An hon. MEMBER. He could not do justice to it.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). An hon. gentleman on this side has anticipated me. I am sorry that he who made so much of small opportunities during the years of Conservative administration is not on this side today. There is only one thing that would put him at a disadvantage—a lack of adjectives, I think he has quite exhausted the vocabulary in criticizing the Conservative administration. With such a task as would be presented to him if he were on this side, he would be in the position of the gentleman, who on one occasion was expected to indulge in a great burst of profanity, but said not a word except, 'I won't swear ; can't do justice to the subject.' Now, while we would like very much if we could have had the opportunity in indulging in an analysis of the fiscal management of this government, we would like also to lock horns with them on the subject of free trade or protection. We would like to have driven them out of the lines of Torres Vedras in which they are now so comfortably ensconsced, get them in the open and make them declare whether they are or are not in favour of protection. There is one subject on which our hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce has given us a large invitation. He has asked us to name those expenditures we would like to have stopped, to specify the taxes we would like to have reduced. I think it is not very difficult to meet his views in that respect. I think it would not be difficult, in the matter of public works, to make large economies without impairing the efficiency of the service. For instance, the expenditure on the Sorel bridge, to which attention has been called by the Auditor General, might have been much less without injury to any public interest. I think that numerous cases in which contracts are let without tender might have been managed by hon. gentlemen on this side so as to economize considerably. I think we could have built telegraph lines in British Columbia without such expense as has been indulged in by these hon. gentlemen. I think we could have economized to the extent of a couple of millions in the subsidies to the Crow's Nest Pass Railway.

I think, on the other hand, if we had been on that side of the House during the last four years we could have been able to specify some matters in respect of which we would have removed the taxation. I do not see why the Minister of Finance did not make some suggestions of that nature, while maintaining that protection of the industries of this country in which we support him, and for which we give him credit, according us that sincerest form of flattery which he has administered to our vanity in imitating our policy. If we had been on that side of the House we could have suggested changes in the tariff which would have impaired the rotundity of his remarkable surplus, and which would not have impaired the rotundity of the purse of the public. We could have suggested the removal of the taxation on sugar, of the taxation on tobacco; we could have suggested that in many other respects which are properly the subjects of a revenue tariff, the tariff could have been reduced on the necessaries of life to the lowest possible point. But the hon. gentleman will probably not take our advice in this matter.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not think the hon. gentleman would give it.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). I am giving it in all sincerity. A government which is going to maintain a protective system can derive money enough from the duties on protected articles, and still relieve many other articles by making them subject to a revenue tariff.

Now, there is another point in reference to which the Minister of Finance seemed to be in a somewhat combative mood, he was very anxious to have his course challenged in respect to the preferential tariff, he wishes that the opposition should challenge his course in that matter. The hon. gentleman reminds me of the miserable plight in which Sinbad the sailor found himself after he had foolishly allowed the old man of the seas to get upon his shoulder. He found himself choked and incommoded by the manner in which the old man of the sea gripped him about the neck, and when he suggested that the old man get off his shoulders, he, feeling very comfortable where he was, resigned to his situation, declined to quit. I believe the Minister of Finance with his preference to England on his back is in a similar situation, he put it there and let him keep it there. He is anxious apparently that the opposition should help him out of his dilemma. He blundered into it, he may blunder out of it; if not, let him blunder along until he falls under the weight of it, as he undoubtedly will. There can be no question whatever that if nothing else drives this government into a corner where they will be compelled to make an honest and public declaration of their policy, and to say whether they are genuine protectionists or hybrid free traders, it will be the operations of this precious preference to England. It is a thing that no man on this side of the House approves. But, as I have said, our hon. friends have got themselves into this plight, and by all means let them stay there until they find some way of relieving themselves. Now, the objections to such a policy are numerous. In the first place, while there may be some value in the sentimental considerations which are asserted continually, they are very intangible. When the Minister of Trade and Commerce, with his great experience, spoke, I hoped to hear something important from him. When he told us today that he was prepared to defend the preference and challenged the opposition to say anything against it, I hoped to hear him say something to justify it. Now, what was the extent of his justification? It was a bare assertion that the sentiment aroused, the effect produced upon the English mind by the knowledge of the fact that Canada alone of all the world had given that country a tariff preference, increased our exports to that country. The hon. gentleman made that assertion, I presume it was necessary for him to make some assertion, but did he furnish one vestige of proof of that assertion? Did he suggest one consideration that made that assertion a probability, that made it a likelihood? Not one. There is only the bald assertion that the kindly sentiments aroused in the minds of the English people by the preference we had given them, the fact that we had shown them a disposition to help them in the work of developing their trade, has earned for us a kindly place in their minds, to such an extent that they will buy our goods. Now, I do not believe that. I am prepared to believe it on reasonable proof, I have never heard any proof whatever, and I decline to accept even the assertion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the one thing follows the other. The facts are against it. The relative developments of trade as proved by the figures cited last night by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) discredit the statement. The showing is that while our trade with Great Britain has increased, it has increased much more largely with other countries to which we have shown no favour whatever. The evidence goes to show that while our trade has increased with Great Britain, it has increased far more with the United States. So that the whole argument falls to the ground, and in calling it an argument, I am showing sincere kindness towards the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I am conceding to him a great deal out of a sense of politeness. To my mind it is an argument that does not carry conviction. On the other hand, this mode of assisting the British manufacturer is, to my mind, exceedingly objectionable. What is the fact of the case? Supposing that we wanted to benefit England, supposing we wanted to bestow a large advantage upon her, the greatest advantage we can possibly bestow on her is by maintaining a good understanding with that country, by drawing closer and closer the ties of kinship and the feeling of kindness, while at the same time endeavouring to build up this country to a point, to a stature, at which it will be a more and more powerful ally and a strong arm to Great Britain, if she should ever need our help.

Now, how can we do that? That question was settled in 1879. One of the objections made at that time to the establishment of a protective tariff in Canada was that it was an unfriendly act towards Great Britain, a country which depended upon its manufactures, which prized its foreign trade. It was argued then that possibly the British government might even disallow our protective tariff on the ground that it was striking at British trade. But the men of that day who passed the national policy, who put the national policy into operation, had considered all these things, they met the objection that it was an unfriendly act to Great Britain, they faced that bugbear, for bugbear it was, they were not frightened by it, and they faced that consideration in 1879, and settled it then. Their protective tariff was not hampered, or impaired, or emasculated, by sentimental consideration for the manufacturers of Great Britain. Nothing of the kind was allowed to affect the efficiency of the national policy at that time, and nothing of the kind should be allowed to affect the efficiency of the national policy to-day. Therefore, I say if this administration is ever brought to their knees, when pressure of hard times will come to the manufacturing industries of this country, and bring them to that point where they will approach the government for relief, if this government is then going to maintain the position of a protectionist administration, it will have to look carefully into the effect of this preferential tariff. I believe that the very preference into which this administration fell by accident will force them at a very early date to declare themselves either straight protectionists, as I would like to see them, or to go back to their old love which was inculcated in them by Brown, Mackenzie and all the other worthies who were leaders of their party before 1879, and to declare themselves a free trade or a revenue tariff party, not only so, but to live such a life in the eyes of men as will prove them to be a free trade and a revenue tariff party.

Now, what is the objection to this preference? It is sometimes called a concession made to the British public. If it is a concession it amounts to very little. It is one that is conferred not upon the whole British population, but only upon a section of it. Now, the whole effect of the preference so far has been to increase the imports of Canada from Great Britain in the last year by $7,729,000.

Now, as this is rather an important point, perhaps I had better deal with it as a whole. The total imports of Canada in 1896 were $110,000,000, and in 1900, $189,000,000. Our total trade in imports increased in four years $79,000,000. The increase in the last year, this extraordinary year, this year in which we have had a most startling development of trade, has been $35,000,000, or nearly $36,000,000. Great Britain's part of this business, for the year 1896, amounted to $33,000,000, and for the year 1900, to $45,000,000. In exact figures, our trade with Great Britain increased in four years by $11,809,988, and in the last year, in which the most satisfactory increase has been made, satisfactory from the point of view of those who like that kind of thing, because it has been very well said that for people who like that kind of thing, that is the kind of thing they like, the increase was $7,729,607. We, on this side of the House, do not like it at all, because, as far as we can see, this increase has been at the expense, not of the whole people of Canada, but at the expense of a very limited class of the people of Canada, a matter to which I will refer later on. Taking now the United States imports, they amounted to $58,000,000 in 1896, while, in 1900, they amounted to $110,000,000, showing an increase in four years of $51,000,000, and in the last year, an increase of $17,000,000. Relatively, the increase in trade from Great Britain is larger. It is not surprising that it should be so, but the whole increase in our trade from the United States, amounting to $17,000,000, is more than double the increase in trade from Great Britain. Our imports from other countries also increased. We bought, in 1896, $19,000,000 worth, and in 1900, $35,000,000 worth. In four years our trade with other countries increased by nearly $16,000,000, and in the last year it increased by $9,000,000, so that, as compared with the rate of increase in our trade from Great Britain, it does not show to advantage at all. Our trade from a number of other countries increased from $19,000,000 to $35,000,000, and in the last year it increased by $9,000,000, whereas the trade from Great Britain showed an increase of $7,729,607 last year. However, this is not as conclusive, perhaps, as the figures given by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), because, he showed that, whereas the government party are, in this matter, driven to argue and to try and persuade the public that we are getting our advantage indirectly, that while we are increasing our imports from Great Britain, to a great extent, we are largely increasing the exports from this country, his evidence goes to show that Great Britain stood eighth in the list of countries in the order or proportion of their trade. So that, the fact of the matter is, that despite this preference given to Great Britain, our trade with that country has not increased as rapidly as it has with other countries to which we make no concession whatever.

Now, there is another very marked objection to this preference. It is given only to a special class in Great Britain. It is given only to a very limited portion of that class, because there are very many lines of manufacture in Great Britain which cannot compete with similar industries in the United States or in Canada. The advantage therefrom is derived by the manufacturers of woollens and some lines of metal. In wood, tobacco, and other manufactures they cannot compete. We can hold our own in manufactures of paper, and some other lines, and the consequence is that the scapegoat, the man who is called upon to make all these sacrifices in order that Canada shall acquire certain advantages of a sentimental character, is the manufacturer of a comparatively limited number of lines of goods in Canada. Take the manufacturers of woollens, for instance ; they tell us that they cannot face the competition to which they are subjected under a tariff that has been reduced by 33⅓ per cent. Why should a certain industry be singled out for destruction in order to secure a sentimental consideration of this kind ? If Canada wishes to confer an advantage on the empire, it should put a tax on all the citizens of Canada to defray the cost of that advantage, and not throw this burden upon one particular class. Apart from that, no man who is thoroughly in favour of adopting protection as the national fiscal system of Canada can justify that process, if it be one that throws a burden upon any particular industry in the country. The whole purpose of protection is to protect ; and to introduce into the system a provision which makes it inefficient is a course that can be followed by no government that honestly believes in protection. For a protective government to have tacked to this system such a form of modifying the tariff as this preference, is to show that these hon. gentlemen do not understand what they are doing, when they are, on the one hand, protecting by their system some industries, and on the other excluding some industries from its advantages. If, at the same time, their system is allowed to go to its legitimate end, it must end in disaster to the whole system, to the industries of the country, and they will be forced to deal with the subject at an early day.

There were a great many things in the budget speech which were very pleasing, because they conveyed to us the knowledge that the country is prosperous. However, there were a good many things not dealt with that one would naturally expect to be contained in a message indicating the condition of prosperity in which the country is. There are, I think, many portions of the world to which we might turn our eyes with the view of extending our trade. In the last budget speech, one of the most notable points was the information as to a proposed arrangement with a portion of the West Indies, by which we expected to develop a certain amount of trade in that direction. Unfortunately, that matter fell through, and it is a somewhat singular thing that, in the budget speech made this year, there is no reference whatever to any negotiations, or any attempt to regulate, or improve our relations with outside countries, and notably, no intimation made whatever to show that any effort has been made to develop our trade with the West Indies. This is a matter in respect to which I think the government should be alive ; they should be awake and hard at work. I believe it is only necessary for Canada to take in the West Indies to round out her confederation, to make it a perfect government, to give it all those diversities of climate, soil and product that will make it a self-supporting and practically independent part of the world. With the addition of the West Indian islands, so far as this country is concerned, I would not exchange places with the United States, powerful as they are. I think in that case we will be a microcosm, a little world, and we will have added to our territories a contiguous territory which would enable us to develop some very valuable resources. Then, there is another point, and that arises in connection with the preference tariff, to which I have paid some little attention. That is, the discrimination of Germany against the products of Canada. The government makes no reference to that. Apparently the government has never thought of it. Is the government prepared to take any action now to protect Canadian interests or is it inert ? Is it aware of this fact, or is it in the position of the Minister of Railways, who discovered only from a private telegram read by a private member, that an important portion of his railway system was blocked up by snow ? Is it possible that the administration is not aware that discrimination is being used against the exports of this country in Germany ? Is it possible the government has no remedy to offer ? Is it not a singular thing that in the one opportunity during the year which the Finance Minister has of telling the people of Canada how he is looking after their affairs and what proposals he has to make for the future, that the Finance Minister neglects to give any consideration to a most important matter affecting the country ? Or is it possible that the government shrink from their duty ? If so, I would remind them that here again there is a contrast between their attitude and that of the Conservative administration, because so far back as 1883 Sir Leonard Tilley said :

If we fail to make satisfactory arrangements with the governments that do not place the natural products and the manufactures of Canada on equal terms with those of any other country, we will ask parliament, at the next session, to impose a duty of 10 per cent additional on their products until they grant us such terms.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That is what we are doing now.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). Where ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That is exactly what we are doing now ; imposing a material difference—not exactly 10 per cent—between the duties on German goods and British goods.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). That is a most unworthy statement.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It happens to be a fact, and I suppose therefore the hon. gentleman thinks it unworthy.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). It just shows the size of the calibre that suits the Finance Minister.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The House can judge of calibre between us.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). It is just about his size. What he does is actually to put Germany on an inequality with one other country in the world and leaving her exactly equal with every other country in the world. That is a most unworthy statement of the Finance Minister, and I would be tempted to use even the stronger word 'evasion' in reference to the unfortunate remark made by the hon. gentleman.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not happen to think so ; we will have to differ.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). I do not doubt at all the difference would be in my favour. Then we are to assume that the duty apparently has been discharged by the government. We now have it on the high authority of the Finance Minister that they have dealt with this question, and, therefore, I presume I need not waste my time in arguing further on the question.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Hear, hear.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). We know from the Finance Minister that they have done all that is necessary under the circumstances. They are apparently satisfied. Germany can go on and discriminate against Canada and I presume the government will still impose that 10 per cent—as the Minister of Finance says—discrimination against her in the same vigorous and effective manner in which they are imposing it now. Hurrah for this government. It is a great day for Canada that its interests are so well guarded.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend had better explain what he would do about it.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). I have already explained what a predecessor of this Finance Minister would do about it, and although I am not in a position to promise too much, I venture to assure the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Fielding) that so far as he does at any time stand up and strike a blow in the interest of Canada as against any foreign country, he will have the support of the Conservative opposition of this House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have gone, somewhat inadequately perhaps, over the various features of the budget speech that attracted my attention. I regret very much to find that the charge which has been made at times against this administration, not only by members of the opposition but by the independent people of the country, is borne out by the facts as we see them to-day. The great merit of this administration since 1897 was in their capacity to follow. Their great good fortune was that they succeeded an administration which lived a long time and which gave that feature of stability and firmness to the tariff which the Finance Minister (Hon. Mr. Fielding) spoke of as a good thing that attracted his commendation and approval. But, Sir, that quality of stability and permanency in the fiscal system of Canada has not altogether grown up during the years which the hon. gentleman has been Finance Minister. It has been a characteristic of that system since 1879, and that these last four years have not been an unfortunate exception to that stability is due to the fact that he and his friends very properly determined to follow in the footsteps of their predecessors and in consequence to abandon every profession and every pledge they made while in opposition. In every department of government these gentlemen in office have acted most wisely in continuing the course of their predecessors. They have disturbed nothing. In connection with this, perhaps I may read an extract from the speech of the Minister of Finance in 1897, when he found it necessary to turn that sharp corner which they had to take. He said :

> Every man who invested a dollar in the national policy——

That is, I suppose, in the industries fostered by the national policy, because I do not think this was a policy game, although it had a policy name.

> Every man who invested a dollar in the national policy did so with his eyes wide open to certain important facts. He was well aware that from the beginning down to the end the national policy was condemned by one of the great political parties in Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wonder what party that was.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Cape Breton). You will find out by-and-by.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). It will be in the sweet by-and-by when we pass from this sublunary sphere. I think it has gone to that limbo in which ghosts and disembodied spirits play their part.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Cape Breton). I will be able to tell you one hon. member who condemned it.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). How does he vote now ?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Cape Breton). He is on the opposite side of the House.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). He probably is and votes for this revenue tariff-protective administration.

Mr. BENNETT. And bounties on iron.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). And bounties on iron, no doubt. I go on with the reading of the extract :

He was well aware that every effort had to be put forth by governmental influence and such influences as the manufacturers themselves are well aware of——

I wonder if the manufacturers are well aware of these influences now. I have reason to think that during the last campaign in the country the manufacturers were well aware of these influences and were looked to by the government to exert themselves.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. More so than ever.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). Even to a greater degree perhaps. I quote again :

—in order to obtain from the public an apparent endorsement of that policy.

Apparently that endorsement was satisfactory because it has passed current with the gentlemen who came into power ; it was discounted in full.

Now, the manufacturers knew of this and they must have known that when they put their money into these factories they were taking their risks. There was a speculative element in the whole national policy business, and the men who played the game and gathered in the winnings ought to be prepared when the turn of the tide comes, to pay the losses and try to look pleasant.

I am surprised to find that my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Fielding) speaks so familiarly in the language of a certain element of sports in which I did not know he was so well versed.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. He probably visited New Glasgow occasionally.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). I quote again from the Finance Minister :

I wish to emphasize the fact that it never has been the policy of the Liberal party, as declared by any member of the Liberal party occupying a responsible position, if they came into power to destroy at one movement all the manufacturing industries or so change that policy as to place them in peril.

What a lovely thing it was that all the time these gentlemen were going about Canada denouncing protection and the bloated monopolists, and the thieves, and robbers, and praying no doubt night and morning for the salvation of that unhappy victim who had been bled white—is it not a lovely thing to know that during all that time these hon. gentlemen were carrying in their breasts this lovely reservation ; this saving grace, this clause that saved them ; that it was never their idea when they came into power to destroy by one fell movement the policy of protection. And here I take it there is another saving clause apparently. They are not to destroy it by one movement, but they are to destroy it by a very great number of small movements, and by a graduation so imperceptible that we will not get to the end of it when that period of 25 years has expired which we have been talking about. The Finance Minister goes on to say :

We denounce the principle of protection as radically unsound and unjust to the masses of the people. And we declare our conviction that any tariff changes, based on that principle, must fail to afford any substantial relief from the burdens under which the country suffers.

That issue we unhesitatingly accept, and upon it we await with the fullest confidence the verdict of the electors of Canada.

What issue was that ? It was the issue of a gentleman who believed in free trade, who denounced protection, but who, with his healthy and wholesome reservation, thought that his creeds, his convictions, did not pledge him at all to destroy the manufacturing industries of the country or place them in peril, or change the policy that existed. That is the issue—a lovely issue, a double-barrelled issue; an issue which placed him not between the two horns of a dilemma, but between two comfortable seats on either of which he might reach office. The Finance Minister calls that an issue. Yes, it is a very satisfactory one for him and his party; they are in power, the industries of the country have not been interfered with, and the policy has not been disturbed. I do not know that he will find any party in this country ready to grapple with him on that issue, unless possibly some third party arises that would be willing to do so. The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Robinson) might be prepared to take up that issue; but as long as we are limited in this country to the two great issues of a revenue tariff on the one hand and protection on the other, it will be difficult to find a party ready to join issue with a party which believes in both of these things at once.

Now, a great feature of my hon. friend the Finance Minister's policy when he was in the government of Nova Scotia was to do nothing—to draw his salary and stay in office; and possibly his coming to this government marks the adoption of such a policy here. We will see whether this system, which worked so well in a small field, will be equally successful in the larger one, and whether this government will succeed simply by staying in office and drawing their salaries. While I am prepared to look as favourably on this government as any man in Canada who is an opponent of theirs, I do begin to fear that there is a little truth in the criticism which has been directed against them, that they lack initiative. What have they done or originated since they came into power in 1896 ? What have they changed ? Well, they changed one thing: I believe they turned down the fast Atlantic service, and they have not yet revived it. I have no doubt, however, that true to their system of sooner or later carrying out those features of their opponents' policy which they come to believe are popular with the public, they will ultimately revive that project. But what have they themselves initiated ? What new departure have they made ? I ask for an answer, and there is no answer. Nothing; they have made no change; they have shown no originality, no inventiveness, no ingenuity. I believe their whole idea is to do just as my hon. friend the Finance Minister did when he was in the government of Nova Scotia—avoid running up against anybody's prejudices or doing anything that would provoke opposition, but hang on to the sweets of office as long as possible.

There is one great party in Canada which has never been known to be satisfied with simply doing nothing. The Conservative party had its faults, no doubt, because no man or party is faultless; but it was a party which had thrown upon it the burden of developing a great country, and they developed it. They had to take upon themselves that task at a time when this country was comparatively poor, a task which might have daunted the legislators of a much older and richer country, and they performed that task, I need scarcely say, in the face of a great deal of opposition from hon. gentlemen opposite. They wrought out everything of value which we have in Canada to-day—our system of government, our canal system, our railway system, our judicial system. Everything of value which we have in Canada to-day was set in motion by the Conservatives. There is not a single thing in Canada to-day, except that preference into which these gentlemen fell or blundered, to show that they are in power, except the fact that they are drawing their salaries and occupying their offices and that their names appear attached to certain public documents. Now, there is work for them to do. There is a tremendous task lying immediately in front of the government of Canada, and that is to go on and develop and perfect that system of international preference which we who are Imperialists long to see and under which this country will grow up as one of a great band of sister nations associated with the mother country. We want to see the trade between the mother country and all the colonies developed. The Finance Minister says it cannot be done—you cannot get this preferential trade. Why not ? He says you cannot get it because Lord Salisbury is not in favour of it, because Mr. Chamberlain is not in favour of it; and he rests his opinion of Mr. Chamberlain's views on a newspaper article which referred to what occurred in an informal interview which a gentleman of Ottawa had with Mr. Chamberlain. But are we to cease exerting ourselves to secure this great and desirable result simply because certain statesmen of the mother country express themselves unfavourably to it ? No. That was not the course pursued by the Conservative government. Hon. gentlemen know what obstacles the Belgian and German treaties were in the way of preferential trade, and how the government of Canada for twenty years asked that those obstacles should be removed, and were met with a constant refusal. They know how, when the colonial convention met in Ottawa, a formal request was made for their removal, and how that was refused also. Then, hon. gentlemen opposite had the good luck to come to the day of reaping after all that sowing, and in their time these treaties, which we were told could not be abrogated, were denounced by the British government. These gentlemen, by their preferential tariff, blundered into such a position that it forced the hand of the mother country——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BELL (Pictou)—and the mother country, in kindness, to help them out of their difficulty—because at that time the preference, instead of being a preference to Great Britain, was extended, through the blundering of these gentlemen, to no less than twenty-three countries. Laugh now, if you please. I think there are quite a number of new members in this House, Mr. Speaker, who laugh a little out of place. The preference was extended to twenty-three countries, not one of which had extended corresponding benefits to this country which were supposed to be necessary in order to get the preference. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that it was not a blunder that compelled him and his government to admit the goods of all these countries into this country under the preference, while they maintained hostile tariffs against us ? One happy result was the abrogation of the German and Belgian treaties by the British government, and the result of that abrogation shows that the Conservative contention that Great Britain would not suffer was the correct one. Both Germany and Belgium were willing to renew the treaties without the objectionable feature.

Let these hon. gentlemen make another move and see whether they cannot blunder into another such situation. They may not do it by design, but may by accident, but if they do not move at all, whatever chance we might have of taking advantage of the present opportune moment may be lost. Theirs is a great work to be accomplished, and that work will not be done if these hon. gentlemen will restrict themselves to considering simply what Lord Salisbury or

Mr. Chamberlain wants or even what the people of England want. We are rapidly attaining the position in this world in which our sister colonies and ourselves stand on a position of equality, so far as wealth, industry and energy are concerned, with the people of the mother country, and I should not be at all surprised if it would be the happy function of my right hon. friend and those associated with him to show the way to the statesmen of Great Britain of accomplishing a policy which will make all parts of this great empire one in self-interest as well as in sentiment. We have solved problems in Canada that might well have daunted the statesmen of any country. We have, in the course of a few years, with a handful of people, created a great empire without any help from Downing Street. We have shown what a comparatively small people can accomplish. Then let these hon. gentlemen on the government benches not be discouraged by a simple refusal to be heard in Downing Street, let them leave Downing Street severely alone, and approach the people of Australia and the other British colonies in different parts of the world, and let all these branches of the one great family make common cause and approach unitedly the British government. I have given my right hon. friend credit for more ability than he thinks he possesses, for I believe that with the assistance of the premiers of the other colonies he would be able to formulate a scheme by which the mother country and all her colonies could enter into the full enjoyment of a common preferential tariff. The task lies at the hands of this government, and I hope that when we next meet, the government will be in a position to show the people of Canada that they are in sympathy with the great mass of our people, because our people do believe in the advantage of preferential trade and a fiscal system that would knit into one whole all the English-speaking colonies. I hope that the government will show themselves alive to the necessities of the hour, and will come here next session, if not with a complete scheme, at least with the facts collected which will enable the people to arrive at some conclusion as to the best method of accomplishing what the great majority desire.

I am sorry that it has been my painful duty to tear away that vision of golden enjoyment in which the Prime Minister and his supporters are now revelling. It is too bad that I should have been able to show that when this country was not half as rich as it now is, it could boast of as large surpluses and show a much better use made of the money, and at the same time show a considerable reduction in taxes.

I congratulate my hon. friends on the fact that they are living in such good times. I also congratulate my hon. friend the Minister of Finance on the fact that he has not lost the shrewdness for which he was noted in our province. Like an experienced sailor, he is evidently quite aware that a gale is brewing. He sees the skies darkening, the waters foaming, and is taking in a reef and preparing the crew for rough weather before long, so that they may not be too much disturbed when the winds break on the vessel and the salt seas flow over it. But the hon. gentleman's views have changed considerably. When he was in opposition, and a reaction set in, and the tide of prosperity changed, he and his friends said that was a proof of misgovernment, that the country was being robbed and everything going to the dogs.

On this side of the House, however, we do not take that position. We are prepared to admit that it is perfectly natural the tide should turn, and are pleased that the Finance Minister should see the change coming, but we would be better pleased if we saw some preparation for the change in the estimates. No doubt, however, this administration finds it hard to make the expenditure any smaller than that in which they have been indulging during the last four or five years.

The hon. gentleman speaks of this approaching period of depression, not as the result of misgovernment—as he would have done were he in opposition—but as a necessary period of rest and recuperation, and upon the existence of which he is actually in a position to congratulate the country. Why, it is almost worth the money it has cost Canada to see how these gentlemen have changed their views. Depression is no longer an evidence that the country is being mismanaged and misgoverned, but is merely an evidence that the country is resuming a more healthy condition and getting ready for greater exertions in the future. How is it that that view of the question never struck that wonderfully wise man the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) during eighteen years? It may have struck him, he may have been fully impressed with it, but if so he kept his opinion profoundly secret. When on this side, he was always prepared to denounce and never to praise, but things have wonderfully changed since the hon. gentleman obtained office, and to-day we have him admitting what he would have never acknowledged previous to 1896, namely, that Canada is getting rich.

My hon. friend the Minister of Finance pointed to the deposits in the post office savings bank, and to the note circulation as evidences of prosperity. Well, I have been pretty observant in political affairs, and I never met during the years the late government was in power any Liberal speaker who was prepared to admit that there was anything in such matters. They would all tell us that undoubtedly the country was being bled white for the benefit of the bloated manufacturers and that the deposits in the savings banks and the note circulation did not mean anything. It is really gratifying to find these hon. gentlemen converted to more rational views.

But, I fear that my hon. friend the Finance Minister may not have anticipated the full force of the approaching gales. He is still figuring on a very large surplus. I hope he may get it, but there are certain indications that the stringency coming may be more severe than the hon. gentleman anticipates. There are certain things which indicate the coming change. The hon. gentleman spoke of the wonderful development of our exports. Well, I have not the advantage of access to the latest documents as has the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but I have access to the customs returns to the end of November, and I find that while the exports of bullion from the Yukon amounted to $14,000,000 or $15,000,000 over the same five months of the preceding year, and while there is a small excess in manufactures, every other department of our exports has fallen off quite largely—the forests, animals and their products, agricultural products, the fisheries, every one is diminished. There is another thing even more important, a point of which Sir Leonard Tilley took good note when he anticipated the decline coming in 1883, and that is the probable great decrease in prices. We have had good times in Canada, marvellously good times. This is due to a variety of circumstances. The first is the one great general cause, the swing of the pendulum upwards, which is world-wide. The second cause has been the war between Spain and the United States. Then there are the war in the Transvaal, the good crops and the Yukon, with its enormous development. And lastly, there is the enormous increase in prices. Prices, since these hon. gentlemen came into power, have advanced 20 per cent according to Bradstreet's table—from 68 to 88. That state of affairs is not going to last long. At an early day we are going to see a change. The apparent shrinkage of the exports of this country and the shrinking prices that will accompany it will, I fear, bring a state of affairs worse than my hon. friend the Minister of Finance expects. I hope it may not be so. In that, I am sure, I voice the opinion of hon. gentlemen on this side. While hon. gentlemen opposite, when on this side, did take pleasure to a certain extent in pointing out all the losses, all the bad balances that took place in the history of Canada, I do not think there is a man on this side who will not rejoice to see the country prosperous even beyond the expectation of the hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Speaker, there are very many other points to which I would like to address myself, but I observe that it is six o'clock, and I will conclude my remarks.

At Six o'clock, House took recess.

Mr. BELL (Pictou).

After Recess.

House resumed at Eight o'clock.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 20) respecting the Nakusp and Slocan Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Prior.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 60) to incorporate the United Empire Life Insurance Company.—Mr. Birkett.

Bill (No. 62) to incorporate the Pontiac Colonization Railway Company.—Mr. Murray.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

Mr. CHARLES S. HYMAN (London). Mr. Speaker, I am sure that members on this side of the House, and I am equally sure that members on the other side, are pleased at the courteous manner in which the debate, so far, has been carried on. I can only trust that to the end of the debate, we may have the same courtesy, the same kindly feeling, between the two parties in this House; that we shall continue to recognize as we ought, though we may differ as regards certain principles, that, as representatives of the people of this country, we should all endeavour to work out the destiny of the country to the best of our powers. The courtesy of debate has been very largely contributed to, I feel sure, by the happy statement that the Finance Minister has been able to make with regard to the finances of Canada. It must have given the hon. minister great pleasure, not merely as representing the people of Canada in the important office of Finance Minister, but as speaking on behalf of his party, to be able to make to the House the statements he did in his speech. It must have been a matter of congratulation to him to be able to announce that the revenue of the country for the year ending 30th June, 1900, had been $51,029,000, and the expenditure only $42,975,000, thus giving the very gratifying surplus for the year of no less than $8,054,000.

And still greater, Mr. Speaker, must have been the hon. gentleman's pleasure to be able to tell the House, that, notwithstanding the normal current expenditure, and notwithstanding the large expenditure on capital account, he was enabled to reduce the debt of this country by no less a sum than $779,000. Now, we have had a somewhat lengthy speech this afternoon from the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) and he was pleased, during his remarks, to make some reference to the fact that the great province of Ontario had condemned the present government. I do not know whether this hon. gentleman is aware of the facts of the case, but if he has carefully studied the subject, if he will, for a moment, remember, that, in 1881, this great province was gerrymandered from one end to the other, if he will remember that not only was it gerrymandered in 1881, but, that the process was repeated in 1891, he may possibly find same reason for the vote which was cast in the last general election in that province. I may give this crumb of comfort to the hon. gentleman, that if he were to take the vote that was polled for the different Liberal candidates in the province of Ontario in 1891, and if he were to apply that vote to the different constituencies as divided for the local legislature, he would find the Liberal party would have a distinct majority from that province in this House. But, fortunately, as the poet might say, there are others. The province of Ontario is not the only province in this Dominion, and if that province did condemn the government, probably for the reasons I have given, what shall we say of the province from which the hon. gentleman himself comes ? What shall we say of the province of Nova Scotia ? Surely the policy of the government is not condemned in the province of Nova Scotia, but, on the other hand, the government came from the province of Nova Scotia in a very much stronger position than before the election. What shall we say of the province of New Brunswick ? The province of New Brunswick did not condemn the government. What shall we say of the great province of Quebec ? The province of Quebec certainly did not condemn the government. What shall we say of the North-west Territories, from which not one member opposed to the government sits in this Chamber ? And what shall we say of the province of British Columbia in which the government have a decided majority ? I think that this country has grown to be too large, that it has passed the time when provinces and provinces only can be considered, and I think that the policy of the government, as pronounced upon, not by any one particular province, but, by the people of this country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, is shown to be acceptable by the majority of members we have on this side of the House. I am not going to follow at any great length the hon. member for Pictou, but, as far as I could follow his speech his main charge was directed to what he was pleased to call the inconsistencies of the government. Now, there may be hon. gentlemen in this House who might with some degree of fairness make that charge against the government, but I do think that when we come to look somewhat casually into the speeches that the hon. gentleman, who now so glibly says the government is inconsistent, has made, it will be seen that the charge will stick more closely to him than he succeeded in making it against the government. I have before me a copy of the lecture delivered by the hon. gentleman in the year 1891 in which he says :

> I consider the argument of the free trader unanswerable. I believe at this moment that if Canada took a liberal step in the direction of free trade it would go a longer way to place her upon the road to the greatest prosperity. The reasons why I consider Canada should turn about and adopt a free trade policy are : (a) that we might free ourselves from the dominating influences of the United States; (b) on account of the failure of the national policy; (c) because of the startling revelations of the census.

Surely, it does not become the hon. member, who gave, no later than 1891, vent to such sentences as I have read, to spend probably three-quarters of the time of his speech trying to find inconsistencies on the part of the government. But the hon. gentleman was not content with that. Again, in 1896, he made another speech from which I quote :

> The great issue for this election is the trade and tariff question. I avow myself an admirer of the national policy, and am prepared to support it in preference to any so-called free trade policy which could be put forth.

Now, he deliberately, thereafter, and in his speech to-day, charged the Liberal party with having appropriated their policy—I presume, meaning the so-called national policy. While it may be true in part, the very most we can be charged with, if such is the fact, is petty larceny in any case. The hon. gentleman, after having accused the government of appropriating their policy, says, that, so far as the Conservative party are concerned, they stand by the old policy. If we have appropriated their policy and if the hon. gentleman as a member of the Conservative party, stands by that policy, I would like to know why he should take up the time of the House so long in condemning that which he stands by. But, I take issue with the hon. gentleman even upon that question ; I say that the policy is not the same policy and if he will carefully go into the different items of the tariff he will find considerable differences. He will find that in more than 140 items in the tariff there have been reductions, and large reductions, and he will find, that, if he were to apply the old policy to the imports of last year, the government would have taken from the pockets of the people something more than $3,000,000, but herein, I say, lies the greatest difference. Notwithstanding the fact that the Conservative party were in power for so many years, notwithstanding the enormous majorities, that, during most of the time, they had at their back, did they ever succeed in making any preferential arrangement, or giving any preference to Great Britain ? Therein lies very largely the difference between the old policy of protection of the Conservative party and the new policy of the Liberal party. The only two tariff items to which the hon. gentleman referred were the tariff on oil and the bounties. So far as the tariff on oil is concerned, under the old government, the tariff was 7 cents a gallon and under the present government the tariff is 5 cents a gallon, a reduction of very nearly 30 per cent. As regards the bounties to be paid on iron and steel, I fancy the great difference between the policies of the two parties lies in this, that, while the bounty was inaugurated by the Conservative government, there never was any finality. The Liberal party took the matter in hand, and very properly said that while they would still continue the bounty for a certain number of years there would undoubtedly come a period when these industries could exist and flourish without that bounty. And so they have changed the policy in that particular, and have taken, I think, a very wise course indeed.

Now we had, as the chief financial critic of the opposition, the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) who I am sorry is not present, and one of his chief complaints against the present government was that of increased expenditure and extravagance. But I did not hear during the whole course of his remarks that he took exception to one single item of expenditure that the present government have made. Now, I do not think that the hon. gentleman chosen as the chief financial critic of the opposition, is entitled to a great deal of credit when he makes general charges of extravagance, but will not take the responsibility of laying his finger upon one single item to which he takes exception. Of course we know perfectly well why he did not do so. We know that if he objected to any particular item it would probably have a political effect against his party in some particular locality. Therefore, unless he is willing to share some of the responsibility for objecting to some particular items, his opinion is not entitled to much respect.

The hon. gentleman stated that so far as the Canadian farmer and exporter were concerned, they were at a great disadvantage in Germany on account of the abrogation of the treaty, and of Canada having been removed from the favoured-nation clause. I was somewhat surprised, after listening to his speech, to turn up the figures of our trade with Germany, and to find that the exports from Canada to Germany in 1896 amounted to $757,000 in round numbers; while in 1900, after the abrogation of that treaty and the exclusion of Canada from the favoured-nation clause they had grown to $1,715,000, or 130 per cent. So I do not think that his criticism in that respect amounts to very much. With regard to our imports from Germany, I find that in 1896, we bought $5,931,000 worth, while in 1900, we bought $8,383,000 worth. So that while our purchases from Germany increased 41 per cent, our exports to that country increased 130 per cent.

The hon. member for Toronto laid down some very strange propositions, and one proposition that he laid down with a great deal of fervour, was that the time had come when the bonusing of railroads, especially in the older provinces, should cease. One particular railway that he happened to mention runs from the town of Amherstburg in western Ontario to Ridgetown. He did not object bonusing that part of it, but he did object to that road having been bonused by the present government from Ridgetown to St. Thomas. Now, what are the facts of the case ? That road was projected a number of years ago, that road was bonused from Walkerville to Ridgetown, not by the present government, but by the late government; and if the Minister of Railways and Canals were here he would bear me out in the statement that when a deputation asked for the continuation of that road from Ridgetown to St. Thomas, one of the strongest and the most effectual arguments they used before this government was that the late government had practically pledged to them a bonus for the distance between Ridgetown and St. Thomas. Now, I have no desire in the absence of the hon. gentleman to impute any motives to him; but one cannot forget the fact that so long as that railway stooped at Ridgetown, so long was it a feeder of the Canadian Pacific Railway, of which he is a director; but the very moment that that road was continued to St. Thomas, instead of being a feeder for the Canadian Pacific Railway it became a competitor of that road. I say that under these circumstances one cannot avoid joining the financial critic of the opposition with the director of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Now, Mr. Speaker, during the course of this debate we have had several references to the preferential tariff, and I think that the Minister of Finance has succeeded in defining very clearly the differences between the two parties on this important measure. Now, if I understand the policy of the Conservative party, it is this: They are not prepared to give the mother country a preference in Canada unless we receive an equivalent from the mother country. They want an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth. The Liberal party on the other hand simply go to the mother country and say : We know that you are under a large expense on behalf of Canada, we know that your army is kept up, not only for the protection of Great Britain, but for the protection of greater Britain; we know that we have the protection of your navy, we know that in every English consulate on the globe a Canadian citizen has the same protection as a British citizen, and that protection means a great deal. We say to the mother country that while we would like a protection in her market we will not wait, until she is willing to give that preference before giving her a preference in our market, but we will give her the preference in our market at once. Now, Mr. Speaker, which of the two policies is more likely to attain the object of securing a preference in the markets of the mother country? I believe myself that the time will come, in view of the growing Imperialism which we see on every hand, when we will obtain a preference in the British market; but I do say unhesitatingly as a member of this House, that I think the means adopted by the Liberal party will achieve that end very much sooner than the means adopted by the opposition. It must have given the Minister of Finance, particular pleasure to have noted the tremendous expanse of trade during the last few years. The hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Fielding) referred to most of the items bearing on this increase of our prosperity, but with the permission of the House I will mention briefly some of the comparisons which he omitted.

Turning, in the first place, to the imports into Canada, I find that in the year 1878 they amounted to $93,081,000; in 1895 they amounted to $110,781,000, and in 1900 they had grown to the great volume of $189,622,000. During the seventeen years of the so-called national policy, with all the development which that policy was said to have brought about, the import trade of this country grew by $17,700,000, but in the five years that this Liberal government has been in power the imports of this country grew by no less a sum than $78,841,000. In other words, during the seventeen years of Conservative rule they succeeded in increasing the imports at the rate of $1,000,000 per annum, while during the five years the Liberal party have been in power the imports have increased by no less a sum than $15,768,000 per annum.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. HYMAN. If we turn to our exports, we find a no less favourable condition. In 1878 the exports of this country amounted to $79,323,000; in 1895 they had grown to $113,638,000. So that during the seventeen years of the Conservative regime the exports of Canada had grown by $34,315,000. Then came the advent of the Liberal government to power, and from that period until the 30th June, 1900, the exports had grown to $191,894,000, or a total growth of $78,256,000. Let us analyse this a little further. In the seventeen years of Conservative rule, the seventeen years of national policy with all that the members of the opposition would have us believe it implied, they succeeded in increasing the exports of Canada at the rate of $2,000,000 per annum, but, Sir, the present government—whether they stumbled upon it, as the member for Pictou would lead us to believe, or whether they did it by design—have succeeded in increasing the exports of this country during these five years by no less a sum than $78,000,000, or at the rate of $15,651,000 per year.

Let us now look at the total trade of Canada and make a comparison between the years the Conservative party were in power and the five years of the Liberal government, and no less a satisfactory state of things will be found to exist. In 1878 the total trade of Canada was $172,405,000; in 1895 that had grown to $224,420,000; but in 1900 it had grown to the enormous sum of $381,517,000. During the seventeen years of the Conservative rule there was an increase of $52,015,000, or about $3,000,000 per annum, while during the five years of Liberal rule it increased by no less a sum than $157,097,000, or somewhat in excess of $31,000,000 per annum—$3,000,000 a year in the seventeen years' Conservative rule; $31,000,000 a year in the five years of Liberal rule. But says the hon. gentleman from West Toronto (Mr. Osler): You have been spending a great deal too much money. Well, Sir, I submit it is a good business proposition, and one that even the hon. member (Mr. Osler) would likely concur in: that the larger one's trade grows the larger sum is required for the carrying on of that trade. And although I am not prepared to admit, nor is there any necessity to admit, that the expenditure of this government has increased to any very large extent, still, it would be a wonderful thing if it had not increased, and increased almost in comparison to the increased volume of trade. Let us assume the position of a large merchant, or an aggregation of merchants, and if their trade were to grow from $224,000,000 to $381,000,000 in the course of five years, surely that merchant, or that aggregation of merchants, could not be charged with extravagance in carrying on that business if it were shown that there was some slight increase in the way of expenditure during the period of this immense growth in their business. If there was one thing in which the late government did pride themselves on, it was the tariff as applied to manufacturers. It was stated by them that the national policy or the protective tariff was largely, in fact directly, in favour of the manufacturer. There is one test by which the manufacturer can show his strength and it is not so much by his success in the protected market, as it is his success in carrying on his business where he is brought into competition with the world. Therefore, we would naturally suppose that if we on this side of the House are open to the charge, that by the destruction of the national policy we have materially lessened the power of the manufacturer of this country to go abroad and sell his goods in competition with the whole world, there might be some facts to prove the statement. But so far from that being the case, we are prepared with figures to prove that the Canadian manufacturer is in a far stronger position in this respect under the present government than he was under the government that held sway for eighteen years with their so-much-boasted national policy. In 1878 the manufacturers of Canada exported $4,127,000 worth of goods, and in 1895 they had increased their exports to $7,768,000, or an increase in the seventeen years of the national policy, of $3,641,000. Then the Liberal government took office, and we find an enormous increase in the ability of the Canadian manufacturer to compete with the manufacturer of the whole world in the markets where competition is keenest. We find, Sir, that in 1900 the manufacturers of Canada exported no less than $14,224,000 worth of products. During the seventeen years of Conservative rule the increase was $3,641,000, but during the five years of Liberal rule the increase was no less than $6,435,000. During the seventeen years of Conservative rule, the manufacturers of Canada, notwithstanding the fact that to a very large extent they were the supposed pets of the government; notwithstanding the fact that to a very large extent the whole policy of the government was supposed to help the manufacturers; they were only able to increase their exports, and thereby show their ability to compete in the markets of the world, to the extent of $214,000 per annum, but in the five years since that date they have shown their ability to compete, and compete to the extent of an increase per annum of $1,291,000.

It must also have given the hon. Finance Minister the greatest pleasure to state to this House the high standing of Canadian credit in the financial markets of the world. He was able to make a statement which I am sure aroused the pride of every Canadian, namely, that the 2½ per cents which he himself had placed on the English market had risen in value, while the consols, the strongest of all securities, had materially declined. I think there was no statement made by the hon. Finance Minister in his excellent presentation of the budget which could give Canadians more pleasure and more joy than the one relating to Canada's financial standing in the English market. I may be pardoned, if under the circumstances, I repeat the details: that the 2½ per cents, which sold at 91½, were now quoted at 92, while consols, which at the time the 2½ per cents were sold at 91½ were worth 115, have dropped at the present time to 97¾—a drop of nearly 17 points for consols, and a rise of Canadian securities during the same period of nearly ½ per cent.

I am sure it gave the members of this House particular pleasure to hear the statement of the hon. Minister of Finance in regard to the Yukon. If there is one hon. member on this side of the House against whom the attacks of the opposition have been strong, it is the hon. gentleman who has charge of the administration of that district; and I am sure it speaks volumes for his care, his prudence and his judgment, that after the three or four years since that country commenced to develop, we find that it has not cost the people of this country a single copper for all the development that has taken place there. I say there was no statement made by the Finance Minister which gave more pleasure to members on this side of the House, because we know the bitter attacks which have been made on that hon. member, and we respect him so highly that we are glad the Finance Minister was enabled to make that report to the country.

There is another department as to which the Minister of Finance was able to make an announcement which also gave particular pleasure; that is, the Post Office Department. We know that the hon. Postmaster General (Hon. Mr. Mulock), when he succeeded in inducing his colleagues to reduce the postage, made a bold stroke. I myself, and I have no doubt a number of other members, thought it would mean a large shrinkage in the receipts, and therefore a larger deficit in the department. But I was delighted, as I am sure we all were, to learn from the hon. Finance Minister yesterday that in the month of January the receipts of the Post Office Department had exceeded the expenditure. I trust and hope that the prognostications which were made by the hon. Postmaster General last year or the year before will be fulfilled. I believe that he is so careful in his statements that before very long we may safely look for the receipts of the post office to be sufficient to carry on the business of that large department.

There was a statement made by the Finance Minister which may not have given so much pleasure to hon. gentlemen, not merely those on this side of the House, but to those on the other side: that was, that in the wisdom and judgment of the government, there should be no tariff changes during the present session. As a business man, and one knowing something of the principle and the workings of the tariff, I must say that I concur most heartily in the judgment of the hon. Finance Minister and his colleagues in not making any changes in the tariff during the present session, for I think we should have a longer period in which to give it a fair trial. I have no doubt that the time will come when some change must be made in the tariff, and I am perfectly sure that the hon. Finance Minister and his colleagues will then most carefully consider what is in the interests, not of any particular class, but of the country as a whole. I know that some sacrifices will have to be made. No tariff could be applied to a country so diverse in its interests and its character as Canada, that would satisfy everybody; but we on this side of the House, and I think the country generally, are prepared to make those sacrifices, and I am prepared to leave in the hands of the government the choice of both the time and the manner of such alterations in the tariff as may have to be made.

Now, it seems—and I am very glad that it is so—that this is to be a session of short speeches. I will not detain the House any longer, except to refer to what the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) said in his closing remarks, that this government had a work to do. I think, Mr. Speaker, that this government have a great work to do, and they are perfectly able and competent to carry on that work. They have grasped Canada's position better than any government that has been in power heretofore; and I am sure they are prepared to do that great work, perhaps not to the entire satisfaction of the hon. member for Pictou, but to the satisfaction of the majority of the people of this great country. Speaking for myself, Mr. Speaker, I am a Canadian; I am proud of being a Canadian. I love Canada, and I do trust and hope that the future development of this great country will be thoroughly in accordance with its greatness. I may be hoping for too much, but I hope that we will soon have a fast Atlantic service and see steamers plying between this country and the mother land, that have been built from Canadian steel. I hope to see steamers built that will be a credit to Canada, in which every plate, bolt and rivet will be the product of Canada and Canadian workmen, and I hope to see the present government bring about that result.

Mr. E. D. SMITH (Wentworth). I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I rise with a great deal of diffidence to speak on questions so important as those now under discussion. The policy of the government and the finances of the country are, I presume the most important questions that can engage the attention of parliament, and I trust that in the few remarks I propose to make I may meet with the indulgence of the House.

The statement made by the right hon. the Finance Minister in his speech yesterday showed a state of affairs that, it seems to me, calls for the earnest attention and discussion of every citizen of this country. The hon. gentleman said that the expenditures for the year ending 30th June next, out of consolidated fund, would be $46,400,000. This is a tremendous sum, and it certainly behooves us to consider what justification there is for such a large expenditure. Before discussing that feature of the budget speech, however, I wish to point out that even if it could be shown that so heavy an expenditure is necessary in the interests of the country, it is one which no one could possibly have anticipated from the present government, if we are to accept the professions which these hon. gentlemen made when in opposition as having been made in good faith. What were those professions? I would crave the indulgence of the House while I read a few extracts from the speeches of the great leaders of the Liberal party, when in opposition, so that the country may see what these gentlemen really did pledge themselves to, and how miserably they have failed in carrying out the promises of economy they then made.

The right hon. the First Minister, in 1890, speaking upon the expenditure of the country, said:

> Moreover, they tell us that if we were in power we could not retrench and economize, but I do not believe it would be a very difficult task to economize to the extent of one, two or three millions, and, as Mr. Mills told his constituents a few days ago, possibly to the extent of four millions a year.

There is a definite statement. It is very easy for hon. gentlemen to make general statements that the government are conducting the affairs of the country extravagantly and that the expenditure ought to be less, but here is a definite statement that the expenditure at that date was greatly in excess of the requirements of the country. That was in 1890. Our expenditure then was $35,994,000, and our expenditure the year now closing is $46,400,000, or an increase of considerably over $10,000,000. And yet the right hon. gentleman said in 1890 that the amount we were then spending, which is $10,000,000 less than what we are spending to-day, was an extravagant sum by some millions.

The population of this country has of course increased during these ten years, and it is natural to expect that we should have an increased expenditure. Our population has probably increased, roughly speaking, 10 per cent. Well, add 10 per cent to the expenditure of 1890, and we will have a sum of about $39,000,000; and according to the right hon. the First Minister $39,000,000 would be an extravagant sum to expend to-day—some millions more than the requirements of the country demands. But what are the facts? Instead of $39,000,000 or some millions less than $39,000,000, we have to-day an expenditure on consolidated fund alone of $46,400,000.

The hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright), a gentleman well versed in finance, who used to pose as the financial critic of the opposition during the eighteen years he was out of office—let us see what he said:

> In the House I have said before, and I repeat it now, that $38,000,000, let alone $40,000,000, is, in my judgment, a monstrous sum for the people to be called on to provide. It is a matter of history that when the United States mustered 20,000,000 strong, its total expenditure for federal purposes was barely $22,000,000.

He did not say whether he was speaking of the expenditure out of consolidated fund or the total expenditure. If he meant the expenditure from the consolidated fund, that amounted to $36,946,000 during the last year of the Conservative administration, and that the Minister of Trade and Commerce considered a monstrous sum. Yet this same hon. gentleman has sat silently in his seat and sanctioned by his voice in the councils of his party an expenditure, from the consolidated fund alone, during the past year of $46,400,000. And for what purpose ? Not to build great public works or great public improvements, but simply to carry on the ordinary affairs of the country, simply to do those same things which were done in 1896 with nearly $10,000,000 less money, and which amount the hon. gentleman then said was a monstrous sum to provide.

If the expenditures being made by these hon. gentlemen in power can possibly be justified, it does not lie in the mouths of the leaders of the party to justify them, because they professed, when in opposition, that a sum $10,000,000 less was a monstrous and extravagant amount to provide.

I might read one or two more extracts. The great Liberal party met in 1893 in this city, and formulated a policy. One of the planks was :

> We cannot but view with alarm the large increase in the public debt and in the controllable annual expenditure.

Well, what was the controllable annual expenditure in 1893 ? It amounted to $36,814,053. According to the collected wisdom of the Liberal party, not the utterance of one individual party in it, but as laid down by that party in convention assembled, $36,814,053 was a sum altogether beyond the requirements of this country to expend. And yet that party to-day is expending just about $10,000,000 more than that. The present hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Hon. Sir Louis Davies) said :

> The Liberal party says that several millions may be lopped off the present expenditure without injury to the public service.

The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said :

> The Liberal party, if in power, could at once reduce the public expenditure and effect other savings to the extent of five millions per annum without impairing the efficiency of the service.

The hon. member for North Norfolk, I am bound to admit, in the address he scattered amongst the electors of his riding, apparently still has this idea to a certain extent. He differs from the government slightly, but at least sufficiently to appear to be independent, so that the opposition in his county withdrew and allowed him to make a safe entry into this parliament. He criticised the government in that manifesto for not carrying out their promises, and, in that respect he is consistent.

Now, let us compare for a moment these expenditures. For the five years commencing with 1892 and ending with 1896, that is, the last five years of Conservative administration, the expenditures on consolidated fund amounted to $186,246,120. What have they risen to ? In five years that are just closing, they amounted to a total of $208,461,066, an increase of a little over $22,000,000. This is for carrying on ordinary affairs of the country, not for building great public works or effecting any important and permanent improvement. This is the amount required by these economical gentlemen who were going to do it for millions less. The fact is they required twenty-two millions more in the five years just closed than was required by the extravagant Tories in the five years previous. Now let us turn to the total expenditure. It is easy to keep down the expenses on consolidated fund if large items that were formerly charged to that account are chargeable to capital, therefore, in order that we may prove our case fully we must take the total expenditure. And it would be scarcely fair to compare one single year with another. Let us take five years of Liberal-Conservative rule as compared with five years of Liberal rule—that should make a fair comparison. In the last five years of Liberal-Conservative administration, the total expenditure was $210,202,852, whilst in the five years now closing the total expenditure was $247,539,129, or an increase of $37,336,277. Now what has become of this $37,336,277 ? What have we got to show for it ? If we had great public works more than we had before, if there had been an enormous development of the country and huge expenses necessary, there might be some excuse of this tremendous expenditure even from these gentlemen who professed to believe that the sum spent previously was monstrously too much. Why, this additional expenditure is more than half of what the Canadian Pacific Railway cost. What would have been thought of any hon. gentleman had he risen in his place in this House five years ago and asked that the total expenditure for the public service or public works, or anything else, should be increased $33,000,000 over what had been under the previous administration? He would have been said to be almost insane. But the hon. gentlemen who have been ruling the destinies of this country for the last five years have made that enormously increased expenditure. Now let us compare this with the methods adopted by the Liberal-Conservative party. They were in power for eighteen years. The hon. Minister of Finance in his speech goes back eighteen years. That scarcely affords a fair basis of comparison. Let us go back for five years and compare the five years of Liberal-Conservative administration previous to their getting out of office to the five years previous to that and see how it stands —let us see if they carried out their promises. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that when the great public works, the great arteries of commerce, such as the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Intercolonial Railway and the great Welland canal, were being built, the Conservative administration were charged by their opponents with incurring an expenditure that would be far beyond the means of this country, that bankruptcy and ruin would follow such enormous expenditures. Sir John A. Macdonald and the other great leaders of the Liberal-Conservative party thought differently; they thought that the country could stand the strain and that the expenditures would be justifiable. They incurred those expenditures, and the country received the benefit. In replying to their critics, they said that when the great arteries of commerce, so necessary to this country were completed, we will call a halt; we will then try to live within our income and to keep the total expenditures of this country from increasing. Did they do it? In 1887, the total expenditure was $41,504,152. In 1891, the total expenditures were $40,538,534. The total of the five years from 1887 to 1891 was $210,674,843. This, it will be observed, was after the great arteries of commerce I have referred to were built. In the next five years, the last five years of Conservative administration, the total expenditures were $210,202,852, a decrease of $471,991, as compared with the previous five years—and this notwithstanding that the population increased and the requirements of the country increased. Carrying out their promise, the leaders of the Liberal-Conservative party kept the expenditure down, not entirely within the income, but sufficiently to prevent an increase. And it must be remembered that during the last five years we had our hard time. The hon. Minister of Finance went back eighteen years in speaking of our debt, and tried to make a comparison between the debt annually incurred under a Liberal-Conservative administration and that annually incurred under his administration of finances. Now, I think the Minister of Finance was scarcely fair in going back eighteen years. It seems to me that, had he been just in his statements he would have been satisfied with going back seven or eight years. In going back eighteen years, he took in the total expenditure incurred in building the Canadian Pacific Railway, in which period $52,512,613 was spent. At that time also $10,000,000 were allowed to the Canadian Pacific Railway for the release of a certain portion of the land grant. In that period the debts of the provinces, an altogether unusual expenditure, amounting to $10,291,052, were taken over, making a total extraordinary expenditure over and above anything of the same nature incurred by the present administration, of $73,000,000. I think it was hardly fair for the Minister of Finance to include those things in his statement.

Now, I propose to extend the period and go back eight years under the Conservative administration, and let us see how the matter stands. In the eight years from 1888 to 1896 the Conservative administration had annually increased the debt at the rate of $2,997,000; under this administration it has increased $1,749,093, or a decrease of about $1,200,000 annually in the debt. That is to say, the debt has increased annually $1,200,000 less than it did during the eight years of Conservative administration. But what are the circumstances? During these last five years we have had a plethoric revenue. The world has experienced the best times it has seen in this generation; Canada has shared with that prosperity, and no one is more delighted to know it than we are on this side of the House. During that period of good times the revenue has been redundant, $31,115,384 more have been taken from the people during the last five years than was taken during the five years previously; and the debt has increased within $1,200,000 a year as fast as it did under the Conservative administration, when hard times prevailed in this country and all over the world. We all know that during that period hard times prevailed in the United States even to a greater extent than in Canada. During that period over 400 banks toppled over in the United States, and in this country only one. In England, although possessing the greatest amount of skill and capital of any country in the world, although her ships were carrying her commerce over all the seas, even she felt these hard times severely. There were proportionately more men out of employment in England, more distress prevailing in all industrial ranks, than there was in Canada. We could not help but feel those hard times, however prices fell, and consequently the revenues fell. The quantities of goods we imported fell off and the duties collected fell off proportionately. So I say that a comparison between the annual increase to the public debt during the two periods is infinitely in favour of the Conservative administration. Now, what have these gentlemen on the ministerial benches done to increase the revenue? According to the Minister of Trade and Commerce they have not increased the duties, in his opinion the duties are a little lower now than they were before, but I will deal with that point a little later. What I want now to impress strongly upon the House, is the fact that in spite of the enormous taxes taken from the people of $31,000,000 more than by their predecessors, and in spite of the $7,000,000 that have been borrowed during the past five years, we have nothing of importance, no great public works, no new and valuable assets to show for it. It seems to have been actually wasted, or at least the major part of it.

Now a word with regard to the trade and commerce of the country. The hon. Minister of Finance is very canny, he did not attribute, as has been so often done, to this government the greatly increased trade of this country in exports and imports. He probably has learned wisdom by experience. But the hon. member for London fell into the trap that the hon. Minister of Finance avoided. It is true that the trade of this country has increased, it is true that our exports and imports have increased enormously, but what has that got to do with the administration ? Even though our exports and imports were double what they have been, what would that have had to do with the administration ? Have the hon. gentlemen sitting on the Treasury benches caused those exports and imports to grow ? If they can show that it has been through their effort that our farms and our mines have produced more, then we will be glad to give them the credit for it. Let us examine some of these exports in detail. In 1899 we exported $3,562,794 worth of coal, and during the past year $4,599,602. Now, I would like to know what the government has done to increase the export of coal ? Have they found a market for our coal in any other country in the world which we did not possess before ?

Mr. KENDALL. The Nova Scotia government did.

Mr. SMITH (Wentworth). We are now discussing the policy of the Dominion government. In 1899, of gold-bearing quartz, we exported $3,272,702, and last year $14,-148,543. What have the government done to increase our exports of gold-bearing quartz ? I thought it was due to the energy of the miners, I thought something was due to the men who dug, and delved, and brought up from beneath the surface of the earth these minerals and exported them. But the hon. member for London wants to claim the credit of this increased export for the present government. In sundry ores our exports increased from $48,000 to $144,-000 ; of building stone, from $55,000 to $115,-000 ; the total produce of the farm increased $29,663,000 ; our exports of animals to Great Britain increased from $8,194,928 to $9,093,-317. I would like to know what the government in power has done to cause an increase in the exports of any one of these articles.

Then the hon. member for London stated that our exports of manufactures had increased. I would like to know what this government has done to increase the exports of our manufactures. Have they made it more profitable for the manufacturers in this country to produce the articles of their industry ? Have they made it easier for them to export their products ? Have they found in any part of the world a better market for the manufactures of this country ? Will they point out any new market or any better market that they have obtained for us, any market in which we have better terms than we had before ? Is it the United States ? These gentlemen, when they were in opposition, promised that if they were returned to power they would find us a better market in the United States. Have they done it ? Have they found a market for us in Germany ? No, in Germany and in many other countries, we are now finding it much more difficult to introduce our products than before, and that is one thing for which the government in power can claim credit. The hon. gentleman for London finds consolation in the fact that our exports to Germany have increased in spite of the large increase in duties imposed upon our products as compared with what they were before the preferential tariff came into force.

To say, as the hon. gentleman for London has said, that, notwithstanding the large increase in duties, there has been an increased importation into Germany of goods from Canada, is logically equivalent to saying that we would be better off if every country in the world raised their duties. I do not thinik that even such sophistical gentlemen as those occupying the benches on the other side of the House will agree with the hon. gentleman when he makes that statement. Neither he, nor any other hon. gentleman who has spoken on the other side of the House, has been able to point to a single market that has been procured for the people of Canada by the adoption of this policy. Every one knows that it is now more difficult to find markets for our goods than before. Now, if the government are in any way responsible for the increase in our exports, surely they are also responsible for the decrease. In 1898 we exported $17,313,916 worth of wheat, while in the next year our export of wheat was only $7,784,484. We exported flour, in 1898, to the value of $5,425,760, and last year to the value of $2,791,885. Of barley, in 1897, we exported $566,505 worth, while last year the export fell off to $110,040. Of oats we exported, in 1899, $3,266,388, while in 1900 we exported $2,-143,179 worth. Our total exports of agricultural products in 1898 were $75,834,858, and in 1899 they fell to $68,140,758. The total exports of Canada fell in 1899 to $138,462,037 from $145,594,885 in the year previous. According to the hon. member for London, the government are in some way responsible for the increase in our exports. If they are responsible for the increase in our exports, surely they are responsible for the decrease in our exports. The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), or some one of the three hon. gentlemen who spoke on the other side of the House, challenged hon. gentlemen on this side of the House who have spoken, and those who are to follow, to state on what ground we criticise them, to state what our policy is and what we propose to advocate. We do not propose to emulate them in the extraordinary expenditures they have incurred during the past few years. That is one of the things in regard to which we must give hon. gentlemen opposite credit for having branched out and done something new and original. They have increased the public expenditure. Their adoption of the present preferential tariff is also a change, and these are the principal changes that these hon. gentlemen have made in the manner of conducting the affairs of the country. But, there are other questions besides these which have been mentioned, and one of the most important, it seems to me, is the transportation problem. The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) was content, in his speech, to rest upon his oars. It seemed to me as if hon. gentlemen were satisfied to go on for the next five years in the same course that they have been pursuing during the past five years. They challenged us to propose something new, but they did not propose any changes, any new policy, or any retrenchment in the matter of public expenditure. There is a question, as I said before, which appears to me to be more important than almost any question that could engage the attention of this House, and it is the transportation problem. The hon. Minister of Finance would not touch upon it, but it seems to me that this is a question which deserves the attention of the House. It is one thing to grow products and to manufacture articles; it is another thing to find a market for them. These are two very important things, but what is the use of products and what is the use of markets unless you can carry these products to the markets safely and cheaply. This is a great question, and we expected to have a declaration from the government as to what their policy is on this question. The hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) brought in a resolution to this House, and it seemed to me that it was a very pertinent resolution, one asking that the government should now take up this great question of the transportation of the products of the country, and lay down a policy upon it. We have been waiting long enough for a policy on this question. The government are spending large sums of money to build up different ports in different parts of this great country, but they have not so concentrated their energies as to mark out some great line of action which should be pursued. It is proposed to expend $5,000,000 in deepening the harbour at Port Colborne, it is proposed to expend enormous sums of money in improving the harbour at Montreal, it is proposed to spend large sums in deepening the St. Lawrence river and making it a first-class outlet for ocean-going vessels, and we have had intimations of money being spent and proposed to be spent in various other directions, but no definite or straightforward line of action seems to have been laid down by the government. It is the duty of the government to state their policy. It is not the duty of the opposition, but rather the duty of the government, if they are earnestly endeavouring to administer the affairs of the country in the best way possible and in the best interests of the country to lay down some definite line of action and follow it out. Whether the expenditure of this sum of money at Port Colborne is desirable or not is a question. According to statements made by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) the other night, it would seem that grain from the great North-west Territories and the North-western states, can be carried as cheaply by the Booth line to Montreal, or almost as cheaply, as he has any hope of having it carried by the all-water route. If this is the case, if it is true that wheat can be carried as cheaply by the rail line from Parry Harbour, or any other harbour on the Georgian Bay to Montreal, then, these expenditures—and hon. gentlemen require some criticism of their expenditures—of $5,000,000 is unnecessary and unwise, and not in the best interests of the people. It devolves upon the government, not upon us, to find out which of these two great lines is likely, in the near future, to be the cheaper and better line to carry the provisions of the great North-west, that, in time are destined to assume enormous proportions, to the seaboard. It has also been proposed, and it seems to me very feasible, that a line of railway, running in an air line almost from Parry Harbour to Quebec, might be the cheapest way to send the products of the west to the seaboard. If that is the case, then, we ought to devote our energies to immediately developing that line. It devolves upon the government to ascertain promptly whether this line, or whether the line from Parry Harbour to Montreal, or whether the route from Port Colborne to Montreal is the cheapest line and the best line, and when they have made up their minds which of these is the best, it is their duty to go to work vigorously and put that line in a condition in which it will carry these products at once. They have been dallying with this question for a great many years. It is a good many years since they proposed to incur this expenditure in the harbour of Montreal. I think the harbour of Montreal ought to be improved; certainly it has been a disgrace and a shame to this country that the harbour of Montreal should have been in the condition in which it has been during the past. It cannot in any way compare with the harbours in the United States in facilities for loading or unloading vessels. If the citizens of Montreal are not energetic enough to spend a sufficient sum to make a good harbour in their city, it is the duty of the Dominion government to do so, and I quite approve of such an expenditure. Whether or not Montreal will be the export point for the products of the North-west, it will certainly serve a large portion of the province of Ontario and we should have proper docks there. But there are other things to be looked to besides providing cheap transport facilities. We will have to provide safe transport facilities which will enable us to carry perishable products in good condition to distant markets. It is one thing to have the products, another thing to have the markets, but neither is of any use unless we can place those products in proper condition on the markets. The province of Ontario and portions of Nova Scotia are better adapted for the production of apples than any other place in the world. I believe that in Ontario and in the Annapolis valley we can grow apples with greater perfection than in any other part of the world, and that is making a very broad statement. In Ontario we have 10,000,000 apple trees, the product of which will soon be worth at least $10,000,000 a year. If in days gone by these apples could have been carried to the seaboard and thence to Britain, as they could and should have been carried, we would have, not 10,000,000 apple trees in Ontario, but 15,000,000 or 20,000,000 trees, and the farmers of Ontario as well as Nova Scotia would have a crop at the present time infinitely more profitable than the ordinary grain crop. Where apples can be grown successfully, then, if they are marketed at a reasonable price as they can be in England, they are infinitely more profitable to the farmer than either grain or dairy products. If the steamship people will not provide proper facilities for carrying apples, and if the railway companies are also neglectful, then the duty devolves upon the government. During the last ten or fifteen years the apple men of Canada have done all in their power to induce the railway and steamship companies to provide suitable arrangements for carrying this perishable product in good condition. It was impossible to move the steamship companies, because the apples are harvested at a time of the year when an enormous quantity of other products are going forward, when the steamers are all loaded to gunwales and the steamship owners cared little whether they carried apples or not, and so they snapped their fingers at the apple men. Finally the Fruit Growers' Association, as well as individuals, asked the government to do something, and I shall give the Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Fisher) credit for making an effort. It is a small thing that has been done and it was done at the last moment, but I am not one to refuse credit where credit is due, although the little that has been done is but a small part of what ought to be done and what could be done. I would remind the House that the quantity of apples exported from Canada is no small item. During the past ten years we have shipped to Great Britain $18,000,000 worth of apples. Now, as the export price of these apples regulates the price in the home market, if we had secured the price in England that we would have secured had they been landed in sound condition, it would have increased the price of all the apples sold in this country. We lost no less than $5,000,000 on the apples exported, and as the amount exported was not more than one-third of the quantity grown, then we must have lost $15,000,000 on the total apple crop of this country, which hon. gentlemen will see means a large sum to the farmers of Canada. It is not only the immediate loss but the prospective loss that has to be considered. The farmers became discouraged because of the low price they received for their apples in consequence of the bad condition in which they arrived in England. Some years the apples rotted on the ground; some years they sold for 40 and 50 cents a barrel in the orchard, when, if they could be properly exported to Great Britain, they would have brought from 75 cents to one dollar a barrel. The year which was particularly unfortunate in this respect was one of the most unprofitable that our farmers ever experienced for their grain and dairy products, and if they had obtained 25 or 50 cents more per barrel for their apples, it would have been a God-send to them. However, they obtained such a low price for the apples that they became discouraged, and neglected their orchards and to-day there are thousands of acres of orchards in Ontario that are going to waste, the initial reason being that in the years when we have a large crop, the apples cannot be exported to England in good condition. In order to show the great loss to Canada from the defective facilities for carrying our apples across the ocean, I shall read from the report presented to a committee of this House two years ago by Professor Robertson. I may say that Professor Robertson was induced to make this report on account of a bundle of actual reports of sales of large quantities of apples which I had the honour to send him. I was trying to induce the Minister of Agriculture to take action in this matter, and I sent these account sales to Professor Robertson, who states in this report :

> With that letter came a bundle of account sales of last fall which accorded so thoroughly with this, that Mr. Smith inclosed them to me. I made a careful summary of them, which I will give to show the condition in which our apples arrived in England, not a few barrels, but in large lots. Dealing first with that lot of Nova Scotia apples, all that is on the one set of account sales sent by forty-three shippers and sold in London. There were 950 barrels sold as tights, five barrels of slacks and nine barrels of wets.

The House will see that nearly all these apples shipped from Halifax on a certain steamer arrived in a sound condition. I wrote to the manager of that steamship line to find out how it was that the apples he carried landed in good condition, while the apples carried on other steamers were half rotten, and the statement he made to me was, that his vessels were specially constructed for the shipment of apples and the captains were instructed to look after the ventilation of the holds, and to see that the appliances for ventilation were properly used on the voyage. Professor Robertson further says :

> Taking the shipments of Canadian apples last fall, which are Ontario mainly, a few perhaps from Quebec, sold in Liverpool by two different sets of salesmen; taking a quantity of 14,416 barrels going by seventeen different steamships and sent forward, as near as I can make out from the brands, in about 185 different lots—the brand is sometimes so much like another brand that it may have been the same—but that is a very wide range, you see, of data from which to make a calculation. There were nearly 15,000 barrels on seventeen steamships sent forward in 185 different lots.

The account sales show this, that out of the total quantity there were only 5,928 barrels sold as tights. There were 2,793 slacks, 2,446 slightly wet, 1,997 wet, and 1,252 wet and slack. That is to say, rather more than one-half of the apples shipped in these lots were sold as slack, slightly wet and wet. The difference in price realized by these apples is very great. The only way to get any fair information on this is to take a lot of apples sent by one ship and pick out the apples of the same class sold as tight, and the others of that variety sold as slacks or wet. Going over the list and taking out the apples of the same variety under these conditions, the slack on the average sold for 2 shillings and 7 pence less than the tights. The slightly wets for 3 shillings and 8 pence less than the tights, the wets for 7 shillings and 3 pence less than the tights, and the wets and slacks for 9 shillings and 11 pence less, or nearly 10 shillings, and of these wets and slacks there were 1,252 barrels.

This is a statement that ought surely to be convincing. Here was a large quantity of apples going forward in which it is shown that the loss incurred was more than 75 cents a barrel. Therefore, I think I am within the mark when I say that the loss in the last ten years on all the apples grown in Ontario which have been shipped to the old country has been 50 cents a barrel.

Mr. WADE. Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to state what the crop of apples was in Ontario in 1896, and whether the orchards are larger now than they were then ?

Mr. SMITH (Wentworth). I presume there are more acres planted at the present time than there were then, although I believe the orchards are to-day in a very much worse condition. Now, what has the government done with regard to this matter ? As I stated before, the Minister of Agriculture, in pursuance of this statement by Prof. Robertson, sent a circular to a number of these steamship companies, and endeavoured in this way to have the holds of the vessels ventilated. But the steamship companies have not ventilated the holds of their vessels. Some of them may have done so; but from all the evidence I have been able to gather, there is no proof that these exhaust fans, if placed on the steamers, have been operated. It is one thing to put an exhaust fan in the hold of a vessel, but it is another thing to operate it while the vessel is crossing the ocean. I am led to the conclusion that the steamships, even those few which put in the fans, did not carry their apples in good condition; and I am bound to conclude that the fans have not been in operation. I expected to have a statement of the sales from those ships in which exhaust fans had been placed; but I have not yet received it. However, I have a statement of a large quantity of apples that went forward during the past year, and I am bound to say that the condition of these apples was as bad as before. Let me give a few examples to prove what I say :

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. May I ask the hon. gentleman what season he is speaking of ?

Mr. SMITH (Wentworth). This season. It is possible that a few barrels may be slack owing to the carelessness of packers. I know it has often been charged in committees where this matter has been discussed and even outside, that the fault is altogether with the packer. I am bound to deny that statement in toto. I know that there are some packers who are green at the business and who do not pack properly; but they form a very small percentage, I believe not over 5 per cent of the whole. There may be a larger percentage of packers who foolishly think that by putting small apples in the middle of the barrels, or putting in apples of an inferior grade, they may make some money; but that does not affect the conditions in which the apples arrive. A barrel of apples, with big ones at the end and little ones in the middle, will go across the ocean as well, so far as being wet or slack is concerned, as a barrel of the best apples grown. So that the charge made against the packers of apples is not in accordance with the facts; but the statements which I have given prove that the fault lies with the steamship companies, and partly with the railway companies. I know that Prof. Robertson has shown that apples have landed in Montreal in such a condition that the temperature inside the barrel showed eighty-five degrees. These apples put in the hold of a vessel where the temperature may be ninety or one hundred before they get across the ocean, are certain to arrive in bad order. They would arrive in worse order from the fact of their being landed in Montreal in that heated condition. It devolves upon the Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Fisher) to do something to compel the railway companies to carry these apples and other perishable products of the farm, in ventilated cars. We load our apples and other perishable products, that do not require to go into cold storage cars, into box cars which have no ventilation whatever, and in which the heat is ten to twenty degrees greater than the temperature outside. If the railway shippers and the growers of apples have asked the railway companies time and again, as they have done, to provide better cars and the companies refuse, it is the duty of the government, particularly of the Minister of Agriculture, to see that these railway companies provide suitable cars. It may be asked how would we provide ventilation. Well, there is a number of appliances that could be utilized which would enable the railway companies to have the temperature inside the cars at least as cool as outside. These appliances cost very little, and it only requires a little pressure from the government on the railway companies to make them do this. This matter might perhaps come within the jurisdiction of the railway commission proposed to be established, but in any case it comes within the province of the government, and the hon. the Finance Minister might very well have considered this question of transportation, which is of infinite importance to our people, in his budget delivery.

Let me say a word with regard to some of the questions brought up by the hon. gentleman who preceded me on the opposite side. If there is one department, which the government claim credit for having carried on economically, it is the post office. I do not know that during the last election there was any one department that they did really dare to claim having carried on economically except the post office, and concerning the management of that department, there has been a great deal of boasting. I am bound to say that it has not been carried on so badly as some of the other departments. What are the facts ? The hon. the Postmaster General takes great credit for having reduced the postage from three to two cents and for having, in spite of that reduction, a deficit less than that which existed under the Conservative administration. The hon. gentleman prides himself on that as an admirable condition of affairs, but I must take exception to his claim. In the year 1896, when the rate was three cents, the receipts were $2,964,014. In the year 1898, when the rate was still three cents, the receipts amountd to $3,527,809, or an increase in two years of $563,795. Then the two-cent letter rate came into operation, and the receipts decreased ; but it is fair to assume that if the three-cent rate had remained in force, the rate of progress would have been maintained. Hon. gentlemen opposite claim that the progress of the country has been greater than it was in the previous two years, that the imports and exports and the trade of the country generally have been greater in these two years than in the two previous ones, and it is fair to assume that a greater amount of money would have gone into the post office had the letter rate not been reduced. Under the three-cent rate, the receipts increased $563,795 in two years, and had that rate continued we would have had receipts amounting to $4,091,604, but instead they were but $3,183,784 or a falling off of $907,620, caused by the reduction in rate. In other words, had the three-cent rate remained in force, instead of having a deficit of $461,000, we would have a surplus of $446,000. These hon. gentlemen, however, say that this is not a bad condition of affairs. They say that we have relieved the people of this amount of taxation. They say that we have taken from the people $900,000 of taxes and that it is very satisfactory to know that we did not require that amount of money ; but a few minutes later the hon. gentleman said that he expected during the coming year he would have to borrow at least $1,000,000 in addition to the enormous revenues which he is wringing from the pockets of the people. Well, if he had allowed the three-cent letter rate to continue, he would have had about $1,000,000 extra, and would not be under any necessity to borrow. However, if this decrease in the letter rate were really a relief to the people generally, it would perhaps be a good thing, and even as it is, I am not going to severely criticise the step taken. But I want to point out that we have lost $907,000 by that reduction, and further, that the saving made has been made by business men. Personally, it has saved me some hundreds of dollars annually, but 999 other men, who only send a few letters every year, have saved but a few cents, and that amount must come sooner or later out of the pockets of the people. It is idle to say that because our revenues are sufficient to meet our expenditures this year, we do not need that $900,000. Surely, when we have a debt of something over $260,000,000, it does not lie in the mouth of the Finance Minister to say that we do not require any money ?

Let me say a word, Mr. Speaker, about that great question which has agitated the people for the past twenty years—the question of protection. It is somewhat amusing at times to see the frantic efforts made by hon. gentlemen opposite to prove that they are still free traders. I must say that I was rather amused by that great financier, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright). He has been accused of having renounced his principles, and he made a huge effort to-day to show that he had not renounced any of his principles. He admitted that in 1878 he had proposed an increase of duty from 17½ per cent to 20 per cent, but he pleaded that 20 per cent was not a protective tariff and that he had not in any sense renounced his principles when he proposed an increase of 2½ per cent.

Now, the hon. Minister of Finance, in his budget speech, said that during the four years' administration of the gentlemen now in power, the duties had been reduced by 2·30 per cent and he maintained that that reduction changed this from a protective to a revenue tariff. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce maintained, only yesterday, that even with an increase of 2½ per cent, his position was not altered but he was still a revenue tariff man. This point has been discussed a good many times, but, if the House would bear with me for a few moments I would like to say a few words upon it. I want to prove that hon. gentlemen opposite, in spite of their actions, at one time declared themselves free traders, and that they still say that they are free traders or believers in a revenue tariff only. In 1893, at the convention that I have already mentioned, one of the planks in the platform was as follows :

> We denounce the principle of protection as radically unsound and unjust to the masses of the people, and we declare our conviction that any tariff changes based on that principle must fail to afford any substantial relief from the burdens under which the country labours. This issue we unhesitatingly accept, and upon it we await the fullest confidence the verdict of the electorate of Canada.

The present Prime Minister said at that same convention :

> We will tax for revenue, but not one cent for protection.

Would he say that he is not imposing to-day one cent of taxes for protection ? The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that none of our taxes now were imposed for the purpose of protection ; but I do not think there is any other hon. gentleman on the other side who feels the necessity of maintaining his free trade principles who would go so far as to say that our tariff was a tariff for revenue and not one cent for protection.

> Taxation is an evil that nothing but the requirements of government can justify. When we are in power—and I don't want to sell the skin of the bear until the bear is shot ; yet I think the Tory bear is about to be skinned—we will free the people from protection, which is a fraud and a delusion and a robbery.

Has he done it ?

> For it is robbery to take money from one man to give it to another.

On another occasion he said :

> I will not be satisfied until the last vestige of protection has been removed from the soil of Canada. Our great reform is to put away from the soil of Canada the last vestige of protection.

Once more, he said :

> If the Liberals are successful, they will cut off the head of protection at once, and trample on its body.

The present hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Hon. Sir Louis Davies) said :

> We have been attacking this policy year by year. This is an accursed system, a system accursed of God and man.

The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce on one occasion said :

> I say our protective system was a huge mistake, in so far as it was honest at all, and in so far as it was not honest, it was a huge scheme of robbery.

Again, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce said :

> I stand by the declaration I have made, that protection is nothing less than a deliberate, legalized and organized robbery; and, more than that, if they do not stamp it out, it is a very high road to political slavery first and industrial slavery afterwards.

Again, he said :

> Our policy from first to last has been to destroy the villainous system of protection by free trade, a revenue tariff or continental free trade.

Surely these utterances are sufficient, combined with those that we have heard in this House, to convince the most sceptical that these hon. gentlemen were, at any rate, at that time, staunch believers in free trade or a tariff for revenue only. They have been in power for more than four years. Have they carried out their principles ? Are they establishing a revenue tariff, or a free trade, or continental free trade ? No, the tariff to-day, in its main and essential elements, is a protective tariff as much as any tariff as ever existed in this country. The duties may not be quite so high, but that fact does not destroy the protective elements in the tariff. It is not necessary that a duty should be a certain amount to make it protective. I maintain, and I think that every hon. gentleman who has made a study of political economy will agree with me, that the system we have is a protective system pure and simple. It is true that hon. gentlemen opposite have tinkered with the tariff. They have cut off a frill here and a flounce there, to make the people believe that they are carrying out to some small extent the principles that they have advocated. But in its principles the tariff is a protective tariff. And that tariff is being carried into effect by gentlemen who do not believe in it. Are they the men to carry out the principles of protection ? Is it not right that the people who believe in protection should carry it out and not the party who have professed, all their lives, as the Minister of Commerce professes to-day, that they do not believe in it, but believe in a policy of free trade ? The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce told us one of the main distinguishing features of a protective tariff. He said that a protective tariff was one that reduced the revenue while a revenue tariff was one that increased the revenue. Let us consider this. Surely the hon. gentleman will not deny that the United States is a protective country ; surely he will say that the duties levied there are based upon the principles of protection. Yet, what do we find ? In 1894, the United States imported $257,645,702 worth of dutiable goods; and in 1900 they imported $463,759,330 worth, or nearly double the amount imported in 1894. Yet, the Minister of Commerce would tell us that the United States have a revenue tariff because it increased the customs revenue of the country.

Now, let us go over some of the items of our tariff and see if they are protective. The hon. member for London (Mr. Hyman) said that he could point out 140 items the duty on which had been reduced. I challenge the hon. member for London to take the tariff for 1897 and the tariff before that and go over them with me, and I will undertake to show an item on which the duty was raised for every item that he can show on which it was lowered. True, they made a reduction on some items coming from England after that date. Take a few items and see whether they are protective or not. We bring into this country $21,700 worth of fresh salmon, the duty on which is 25 per cent. Is that for protection or for revenue ? We bring in $292,974 worth of furniture, the duty on which is 30 per cent—and this is an item which is not affected by the preference, because furniture comes almost entirely from the United States. Is that duty a revenue or a protective duty ? We import lamp chimneys to the amount of $117,915 from the United States, and none practically, from Britain. The duty on these is 30 per cent. Is this a revenue duty ? In rubber boots and shoes, our imports are $57,591, on which a duty of 25 per cent is charged. Pronged forks—of these we import $10,986, the duty is now 25 per cent. It was 35 per cent. And this reduction, they console themselves, makes it a revenue duty instead of protection. Surely no hon. gentleman who is really in earnest will maintain that the reduction by 10 per cent of a 35 per cent duty makes it a revenue instead of a protective duty.

Let us take the item of biscuits, $19,781. The duty was raised by 2½ per cent. I do not know whether it was done in the interest of the Minister of Customs who has a large biscuit manufactory in Brantford, but certainly in that respect we do not get any benefit from the preferential tariff. Then, tallow candles, $31,275; carriages and buggies, $43,014. These receive no advantage from the preferential tariff, and they pay a duty of 35 per cent. Thirty-five per cent upon cutters, 25 per cent upon the old farm wagons, $78,033; 25 per cent upon farm wagons and drays, $26,203; 25 per cent on sleighs, $5,684—all these goods are bought from the United States and get no benefit from the preferential tariff. 'Bicycles and tricycles, 30 per cent, $496,129; childrens' carriages, 35 per cent, $19,914; carpet sweepers, 30 per cent, $28,826; clothes wringers, 35 per cent, $13,255, all from the United States, none from England. Bituminous coal, duty 53 cents a ton, $3,609,389. They did make a little reduction of 7 per cent a ton, and therefore they think they have converted themselves from protectionists into free traders.

An hon. MEMBER. What is the duty on English coal ?

Mr. SMITH (Wentworth). On hard coal it is the same as it was under the late administration. Duty on electric motors, 25 per cent, $120,299; railroad engines and locomotives, 25 per cent, $398,118; steam engines and boilers, 25 per cent, $103,187; fanning mills, 25 per cent, grain crushers, 25 per cent, windmills, 25 per cent, $15,537; portable engines, 25 per cent, $74,703; portable saw-mills, &c., 25 per cent, $15,779; threshers and separators, 25 per cent, $78,264; sewing machines, 30 per cent, $154,753; axes, 25 per cent, $41,547; typewriting machines, 25 per cent, $91,898; saws, 30 per cent, $73,297; jewellery, 30 per cent, $393,382; boots and shoes, 25 per cent, $427,906. Here they bring in hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of goods, and not one cent of preferential tariff in their favour because they are all brought in from the United States, no similar goods are brought in from Great Britain. Lubricating oils, under 25 cents a gallon, 5 cents a gallon, $81,422; wall paper, 35 per cent, $70,137. I might go on and enumerate a long list of other articles that we bring in from the United States on which the duty is highly protective. There is the matter of coal oil. The hon. member for London took great credit to the government for reducing the duty on coal oil from 7 to 5 cents. I want to draw his attention to a little slip he made, the duty on coal oil was not 7 cents under the late administration but 6 cents, and these gentlemen changed a protective duty of 6 cents to a free trade tariff of 5 cents a gallon on coal oil. Will the Minister of Trade and Commerce dare to stand up in this House and maintain that a 5 cent duty on coal oil is not a protective duty ? Will he dare maintain that it is a revenue tariff or approaches it in any sense ? I do not think that with all his courage, and everybody knows he has a great deal, and it requires a great deal of courage for an hon. gentleman in his position to swallow the principles that he has advocated for twenty years, but even he will not dare to maintain that a 5 cent duty on coal oil is a free trade or a revenue tariff duty. I do not object to these duties that are protective, I maintain that in many cases they are not high enough. The difference between hon. gentlemen opposite and hon. gentlemen on this side of the House is simply that we believe in the principle of protection, and if we were in power we would carry it out to the full extent, while our friends opposite do not believe it but still they are carrying out the principle in such a manner as to make it odious to the people, if they can. Now, I think enough has been said and will be said to convince the people that the hon gentlemen occupying the treasury benches are carrying out the principle of protection simply and solely for the sake of maintaining themselves in power. Sir, I make the statement that it is no credit to the hon. gentlemen who are administering the affairs of this country that they are carrying out a protective principle which they do not believe in, simply in order that they may maintain power. It is no more creditable to those hon. gentlemen to carry out those principles in order to maintain office than it is to the wretch who, at election times, is willing to sell his principles for a five dollar bill. We know that during the last campaign there were many thousand electors, many hundred of thousands, I fear, who were willing to sell their principles, and that is one feature of the financial administration of this government which a portion of the people of this county appear to relish. But not many relish an increase of $16,000,000 in five short years to the total expenditure of this country. But there is a feature of the financial administration of this government which they exhibited a few days prior to the 7th of November, and which a small portion of the people relished to an immense extent, to such an extent that, combined with the abominable race cry that was raised in the province of Quebec, it enabled the hon. gentlemen to put themselves once more in the seats of power. I say that they have no right to claim that they have the endorsement of the people of this country for their extravagant policy during the last five years, and their proposed extravagance in the future. They have no ground to claim that the people have condoned their faithlessness in changing their free trade or revenue tariff policy to a protection policy. They obtained power at the last election by influences altogether foreign to those which I have mentioned, and it is not to their credit, nor to the credit of a small section of the people of this country, that such a condition of affairs should exist.

Now, a word with regard to the preferential tariff. It is maintained by hon. gentlemen opposite that because our imports from Great Britain during the last two or three years have increased, therefore Great Britain is returning the compliment which this government made her in giving her manufactures a preference in our market. The Minister of Finance pointed to largely increased receipts of goods coming from Great Britain as a proof of that. Now, here is a statement which varies a little from that made by the Minister of Finance. The total amount of dutiable goods coming from Great Britain into this country in 1898 was $22,556,479 ; in 1900 it was $31,561,756, an increase of $9,500,277, or 40 per cent. The total amount of dutiable goods coming from the United States for home consumption in 1898, was $38,063,966 ; in 1900, $53,897,561, an increase of $15,833,601, or 41⅓ per cent, or 1⅓ per cent more increase on dutiable goods for home consumption coming from the United States than coming from Great Britain. Therefore, I say that there is a positive proof that the preference given to England has not effected the great purpose they expected it would. I am not going to maintain that the preference given to England has not been the means of bringing some more goods to this country, but they have come here to the detriment of the manufactures of our own country, to a certain extent. But I want to point out that in spite of this preference the increase of the dutiable goods coming to Canada for home consumption has not been quite so great as it has been from the United States.

What is the inference to be drawn from that ? The inference is that the preference we have given to England of 33⅓ per cent, in the main, does not place England upon any better footing than the United States are upon to-day. On some items, no doubt, she is in a better position, but, in the main, in the total, there is proof that the preference has only placed England on a level with the United States, because the manufacturing in many lines of goods has been done more cheaply in the United States than in England. Each year the United States is wresting from England supremacy in the making of some lines of goods ; the United States can manufacture large lines of goods cheaper than they can be manufactured in England, and it is for that reason that the hon. gentleman's preference does not place England in a very much better position than the United States. Let us take Germany. The hon. member for London mentioned the imports into this country from Germany, and he did not realize that he was putting up an argument against the contention that the preference tariff has induced larger importations. In 1898 we imported from Germany $5,151,719 worth of dutiable goods for home consumption, while in 1900 we imported $7,465,447, an increase of $2,313,726, or 44 9-10 per cent, nearly 5 per cent more of an increase in these two years in the importation of goods from Germany than in the importation of goods from England with a preference of 33⅓ per cent in their favour. Now, what about the trend of the imports from Britain ? We have been comparing two years ; now let us see how it is working out. I want to show hon. gentlemen that the thing is growing worse instead of better. I shall now compare 1899 with 1900, and show that the thing is growing worse, and that we are increasing our importations from the United States more largely than from Great Britain. Comparing 1899 with 1900, from Great Britain, in 1899 we imported, of dutiable goods, $27,521,508 worth, while in 1900, we imported $31,561,756 worth, there being an increase, as between these two years, of $4,040,248, or 14⅔ per cent. Now, take the United States ; we imported of dutiable goods from that country in 1899, $44,471,824 worth, and in 1900, $53,897,561 worth, there being an increase of $9,425,737 worth, or 21⅙ per cent, as against an increase of 14⅔ per cent of importations coming from Great Britain. The tendency appears to be, that, year after year, in spite of the preference we are giving Great Britain, our imports from the United States of dutiable goods entered for home consumption go on increasing at a greater rate than do our imports from Great Britain. The hon. Minister of Finance took credit to himself when he was speaking for the preference tariff, but, when asked by an hon. gentleman on this side of the House to give the figures and to make a statement of comparison with the United States, he said that it was scarcely fair because a large portion of these goods came in free. I have taken the dutiable goods alone and compared them with the importation of dutiable goods from England, and the result shows that the importations have increased from the United States to a greater extent than the importations from Great Britain. I can gather no inference from that but that the preference we have given to Great Britain only places her on a par with the United States, or in a worse position than the United States, and why ? Because, before this preference was given, hon. gentlemen opposite raised the duties to a large extent on the class of goods that we import from Great Britain. Now let us have a comparison of the actual duties levied on dutiable goods coming from Great Britain and coming from the United States. Great Britain has 33⅓ per cent in her favour ; let us compare what the duties are on goods coming from that country with the duty collected on goods coming from the United States. In 1890 we brought from the United States $53,897,561 worth of dutiable goods, on which we paid $13,491,872, or an average rate of 25¼ per cent. In the same year we brought from Great Britain $31,561,756 worth of goods and paid duty to the amount of $8,074,541, or an average rate of 25½ per cent, or ¼ per cent more on the goods coming from Great Britain than on the goods coming from the United States, in spite of the preference tariff.

Now, I have spoken perhaps very much longer than I should have spoken, being as I am, a new member of this House, but, I felt, Sir, that I could not sit in my place without saying at least a word in regard to the expenditures and in regard to the operations of the government during the last four or five years. I also felt it my duty to offer the suggestions which I have presented as to the line of policy which I think we should adopt in regard to our transportation facilities. I would be very glad to support and assist the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), or any other member of the government, who makes an honest effort to improve the facilities of this country and to bring about such a condition of affairs as will best promote the welfare of the people. Speaking for myself, and when I speak for myself, I am sure I speak for every hon. gentleman on this side of the House, I would say that I did not come here to criticise the government for the purpose of making political capital. I come here, as every other hon. gentleman on this side of the House does, with an endeavour to help the members of the government as far as possible to carry out such a line of policy as will inure to the best interests of the country. Whether they take our advice or not it is their own concern. If they take my advice in regard to improving our transportation facilities, I can assure hon. gentlemen, that, if they do it wisely and prudently, they will have my support. I will not detain you, Mr. Speaker, or the House any longer.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, I beg to move the adjournment of the debate, and in doing so, I would like to give the House notice, that on Monday, I will move an amendment to the resolution that the Speaker do leave the Chair. The motion which I will make will be this :

That all the words after 'that' in the proposed motion be left out, and the following substituted therefor :

That, in the opinion of this House, the welfare of this country requires a pronounced policy of adequate protection and encouragement at all times to the labour, agricultural, manufacturing, mining and other industrial interests of Canada;

That, in the opinion of this House, the adoption of a policy of mutual trade preference within the empire would prove of great benefit to the mother country and to the colonies, and would greatly promote the prosperity, unity and progress of the empire as a whole, and that the present time, when the Commonwealth of Australia is laying the foundation of its fiscal system, is particularly opportune for taking prompt and energetic steps towards the furtherance of this object.

This House is further of opinion that equivalent or adequate duties should be imposed by Canada upon the products and manufactures of countries not within the empire in all cases where such countries fail to admit Canadian products and manufactures upon fair terms, and that the government should take for this purpose all such available measures as may be found necessary.

I hope the right hon. gentleman will have no objection to the debate being now adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER. Very well.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of the Prime Minister, House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, March 18, 1901.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 75) respecting the Canadian Northern Railway Company.—Mr. McCreary.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

Mr. W. M. GERMAN (Welland) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 76) to amend the Criminal Code, 1892. He said : Mr. Speaker, prior to the last session of the Dominion parliament all convictions made by police magistrates in cities and incorporated towns had to be returned to the clerks of the peace of the different counties where the convictions were made. Last year, at the instance of some person, an amendment was made to the Criminal Code whereby it was allowed that police magistrates in cities and incorporated towns should not make these returns to the clerk of the peace. It was suggested that in the city of Toronto, for instance, the police magistrate tried obout 7,000 cases in a year, and that it would be hardship to him if he had to make a return of all these cases to the clerk of the peace in the city of Toronto. Though the police magistrate does try 7,000 police court cases in the year, the fact is that under section 55 of the Act, he would only have to make returns in something like 2,000 cases. The way the matter works out under the amendment of last year is this. In each county there are from four to six or seven police magistrates in the different incorporated towns. All of these magistrates make more or less convictions, and try more or less cases each year. They try more now than formerly by reason of the fact that the jurisdiction of police magistrates is extended, so they are able to try almost any case that can be tried at quarter sessions by the consent of the person accused. The result is that a great many trials, under the Speedy Trials Act, with the consent of the person accused, take place before the police magistrates. If these returns are not made to the clerk of the peace, and if it becomes necessary, after the trial, at any time within six months, or a year, or two years, to get a record of the proceedings, it is impossible to know where to find the record. Unless you happen to know before what police magistrate the person accused was tried, you know nothing as to where to go to find the record of the case which you may happen to have under consideration. You inquire from the police magistrate and he tells you, perhaps, that he did not try the case. You, in the same way, apply to the others, and, of course, you will eventually be able to ascertain before whom the trial took place, but it is a great inconvenience to every person who has anything to do with the administration of the law throughout the country. When returns are made to the clerk of the peace you know that there is one central office where all these records can be obtained and that you may go there and find the papers. The clerk of the peace is a government officer. He is bound, under the law, to have a vault for the protection of these papers. Police magistrates are not so bound. They can keep the papers in a secure place if they choose, or they can keep them in an insecure place and allow them to be lost if they see fit, so that you have no regular system of any kind if the amendment to the code made last year is allowed to stand. I think it could not have been very carefully considered, because, otherwise, the amendment would not have been allowed. I think when the matter comes to be looked into it will be found that the ends of justice and the convenience of the public will be best served by having these returns made to the clerks of the peace in the different counties, as was necessary previous to the amendment of the law.

That is the object of the amendment which I propose. I think I am correct in saying that only one police magistrate in the province of Ontario, or in the entire Dominion for that matter, suggested that this change should be made, and I do not think that the opinion of one single police magistrate in all Canada should be sufficient reason for putting the general public, and particularly the members of the profession who have to do with the administration of the law, to a great deal of inconvenience. I believe that when the Bill is considered in all its phases it will be found to be a wise and judicious and proper thing to amend the Act by striking out that clause which was introduced last session of parliament.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DRAINAGE ACROSS RAILWAYS.

Mr. A. McLENNAN (Inverness). In the absence of Mr. Stephens, I move for leave to introduce Bill (No. 77) to amend the Railway Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. McLENNAN. The only explanation I can give in regard to the Bill is that it is in an improved form, the Bill introduced for several years in succession by the former member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) in reference to drainage along and across railways.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—RETURNED NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

Mr. S. HUGHES (North Victoria). Before the Orders of the Day, I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Militia to a matter which has been brought under my notice. Possibly the most concise way to lay the case before the minister is to read a letter which I have received and concerning which I have notified the hon. gentleman. The letter has reference to Corporal H. S. Moodie, and another non-commissioned officer, and I believe this case is similar to that of other non-commissioned officers who have returned from South Africa. A friend writes me as follows :

On leaving St. Johns depot in October, 1899, to join the 2nd (S.S.) Royal Canadian Regiment, Corporal H. S. Moodie was a lance-corporal and was promoted to corporal on board the ss. Sardinian, which rank he held until his return in October last, when he was taken on the strength of the depot with the rank he held in the 2nd Battalion.

On return all N.C. officers who had received promotion while in South Africa rejoined their depots retaining the rank they held in the 2nd Battalion.

Now, an order has been received by the commandant of the depot at St. Johns, Que., to say that N.C. officers who had received promotion while in South Africa would retain their rank as supernumeraries in their depots, without pay, they only to draw pay for the rank they held prior to leaving for South Africa, and any pay they had drawn in excess of the rank pay they were drawing before leaving for South Africa is to be refunded. Sergeant Allen's time expires on the 16th inst., so that he has to go away under this injustice, not having time to get satisfaction or have the wrong righted.

There are two here who are affected by this order, viz.: Sergeant Allen, who was promoted from corporal, and H. S. Moodie, promoted from lance-corporal.

Moodie's case is much more serious, as his term of service expires on the 21st of April, and he intends accepting his discharge.

You may see by this action that all Moodie's good conduct pay is absorbed by having to refund 20 cents a day since rejoining, which amounts to $33.

Moodie had an application in for rejoining the South African Constabulary, and was accepted.

He applied to purchase his discharge; this was refused at the last minute, after he had disposed of all his civilian clothes, and surplus kit at a great loss, and now as he has only a few weeks to serve, the government takes all his good conduct pay he has earned for the last few years, and will then turn him out on the world absolutely penniless.

There are a number in each depot similarly affected.

It is not necessary that I should read the balance of the letter.

Mr. SPEAKER. Do I understand that the hon. gentleman will conclude with a motion to adjourn ?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). If necessary I will do so.

Mr. SPEAKER. It would be more regular.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I shall conclude with a motion to adjourn the House. I would draw the attention of the minister to another aspect of this case. A large number of the soldiers who have been with the regiment in Halifax have recently taken their discharge and they are very dissatisfied because they had to leave in their civilian clothes. Some of them state that the order was that they should not only hand in their overcoats, fur caps and boots, but also their ordinary kharki uniform. It seems rather hard that the men should be sent home at this season of the year without their overcoats, or without being in position to get civilian clothes. Many of these men, I suppose, disposed of their civilian clothes when they enlisted or returned them to their homes. I saw some of the men on the train in their light kharki uniform; in fact it was a mixture, some having civilian and others military caps. I would suggest to the minister that each man should retain the overcoat and the other parts of the uniform that he had worn for a year. The orders to the contrary have caused a good deal of dissatisfaction. I do not wish to find fault; in fact I am not sufficiently posted on the details at the present time, but as other men will be returning, I trust that the minister will look into the question. I beg to move the adjournment of the House.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Hon. F. W. Borden). I am quite unable to answer at this moment the question which my hon. friend (Mr. Hughes, Victoria) has put. It is true he sent a note to the Militia Department this morning, but I did not happen to be in my office at the time, and as I only knew of the substance of the note by telephone I have had no opportunity to make inquiry. If the hon. gentleman will be kind enough to send me such portions of the letter as he has read with the name of the writer, I will promise to give an answer at the earliest moment.

As to the Halifax men, I understand from the general that these men have been treated as all men under similar circumstances are treated, and in fact better, because they have been allowed to take their uniform away with them. It is presumed, I suppose, that when men enlist they have civilian clothes, and that these clothes would be available when they are discharged. We have not only allowed the men to return in their civilian clothing, but we are giving them the uniform they were wearing at the time their services terminated. I will get fuller information on that matter also.

Motion to adjourn the House negatived.

NORTH BRUCE ELECTION.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Before the Orders of the Day are taken up, I wish to bring to the attention of the House an item which appears in the Wiarton Canadian, and to ask a question in connection with it. It is headed :

' Shameful Tactics ; Contemptible Act of the Grit Combination ; Conservative Mail Clerks Transferred to Prevent them from Voting ; '

And reads as follows :—

The Grit machine has commenced its work in connection with the North Bruce by-election, and the act that has been perpetrated this week by the Tarte-Laurier combination is one of the most contemptible in the history of party politics, but it is one that will be a boomerang——

Mr. SPEAKER. I wish to call the hon. member's attention to the fact that questions which may be brought up before the Orders of the Day are only questions of privilege. I do not see that the article which the hon. member is reading involves any question of privilege.

Mr. SPROULE. If you had been good enough to allow me to get through, Mr. Speaker, I was going to show where the urgency came in, and how it was absolutely necessary to bring the matter to the attention of the House at the present time.

Mr. SPEAKER. The article which the hon. member is reading appears to have reference to an election. It is not a question of privilege.

Mr. MACLEAN. These men want to vote.

Mr. SPEAKER. I heard enough of the article to see that it does not involve a question of privilege as that is understood by the rules of the House.

Mr. SPROULE. As I understand, I have a right to bring the matter up either as a question of urgency or a question of privilege. I bring it up as a question of urgency, because the election takes place the day after to-morrow, and the question concerns the right of individuals to use the franchise.

Mr. SPEAKER. Perhaps there is some misunderstanding in regard to questions of urgency. I suggested the other day that when any hon. member wishes to bring up a question of urgency, it would perhaps be advisable for him to have an understanding with the government as to the bringing up of that question. The general rule is that no question can be brought up without two days' notice having been given. Besides I do not see that there is any great urgency in the question now brought, up, and I think it should not be allowed.

Mr. SPROULE. In the first place, I could not give notice because the matter only came into my hands a few moments ago. Surely I am in order in trying to show why this is a question of urgency.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question has been decided so far as I am concerned. I do not consider this a question of urgency. The question may have been brought to the attention of the hon. member only a few moments ago, but he might give notice of it, and then it could be brought up at a future day.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Might I rise, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of obtaining a thorough understanding of your decision? As I understand, the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) is trying to bring to the attention of the House certain alleged conduct of the Post Office Department, which will result in depriving certain electors of North Bruce of the right to vote the day after to-morrow. The matter has been brought to his attention only a few moments ago. He regards it as a matter of urgency. If it is not brought to the attention of the government to-day, it will be too late to bring it to their attention at all, as the election takes place the day after to-morrow. If, under these circumstances, you decide as you apparently have decided, that the matter cannot be dealt with as a question of urgency in the House, we shall bow at once to your decision; but it may involve consequences which you may not have fully taken into consideration. I would respectfully suggest, with all deference to your ruling, that the hon. gentleman had no other course under the circumstances than to attempt to bring the matter to the attention of the House at the present time, because, as you yourself will see, it would be idle for him to do so at any later day.

Mr. SPEAKER. Perhaps there is some misunderstanding in regard to the rule. No question can be brought up before the Orders of the Day except by giving notice of motion. It has been allowed sometimes to bring up questions of urgency, without notice, but they are not regular. Even questions of urgency should not be brought up without notice, except with the unanimous consent of the House. I was simply drawing the attention of the hon. member to the fact that I did not think this was a question of privilege, and I did not see that it was of so much urgency that it might be brought up just now.

Mr. MONK. Mr. Speaker, if I may be allowed to make an observation, is not this a question of privilege? Would not the alleged fact that certain electors are going to be prevented from exercising their franchise be an infraction of one of the most important privileges of this House? I have not looked up the point; but it seems to me under the circumstances that it might well be considered a question of privilege—a privilege not of a member, but of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. A question of privilege might affect the seat of a member. This question does not appear to affect the seat of any member, and therefore I do not think it should be considered a question of privilege. Orders of the Day.

SUPPRESSION OF THEATRES AND GAMBLING HOUSES IN DAWSON.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Hon. Clifford Sifton). As I wish to lay on the Table of the House certain correspondence in answer to an inquiry by Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, I beg to move:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all correspondence and papers relating to the issue of an order for the suppression of theatres and gambling houses in Dawson City.

Motion agreed to.

SOUTH AFRICAN CONSTABULARY UNIFORMS.

Hon. E. G. PRIOR (Victoria, B.C.) Mr. Speaker, I am not unmindful of the ruling which you have given to-day, nor of the one you gave a few days ago in regard to a matter brought up by myself; but I wish to draw the attention of the Minister of Militia (Hon. Mr. Borden) in particular to a matter which I consider of the greatest urgency; that is, the uniforms which have been issued to the South African Constabulary, who are to leave here in a few days. At present they are clothed in suits of dungaree or blue jean with woven toques, which are altogether derogatory to men of their standing. I can assure the government that both the non-commissioned officers and men feel very deeply their being obliged to wear such clothing when being enlisted and whilst in town. It is all right on shipboard, but it is not the style of uniform that Canadians should be asked to wear in town. Especially is it noticeable now that we have the Strathconas here in their picturesque garb, going about our streets; and these men in the constabulary feel very badly about it. I do not blame the government, as I am informed that the government are not paying these men, but that it is for the Imperial government to provide them with uniforms as the men are under their pay. But I do think that our government might have made some different arrangements so that the men of the constabulary might be clothed in a more suitable uniform. They certainly should be provided with khaki uniforms and puttees, and at least a small forage cap. I am informed on good authority that to clothe these men in a becoming uniform would not cost more than $5,000, and I feel perfectly certain that if Mr. Chamberlain or the Imperial government were cabled on this matter they would willingly provide the funds to furnish a suitable uniform. If they would not, then I think that Canada could afford to provide for these men, who, I am glad to say, are as fine a body of men as you could find in the world, $5,000 so that they could go out of the country in creditable shape; they will have to land in Cape Town wearing this miserable clothing, and there they will come face to face with the Imperial troops. They will be a laughing-stock, and I am sure that nobody in this House or this country wishes that. I would make an appeal to the government that they should look into this matter. I am informed that in twenty-four hours these men can be provided with khaki uniforms, and I trust that the Minister of Militia (Hon. Mr. Borden, King's), who, I regret to see is not in the House at this time, will give this subject careful and immediate consideration.

QUESTIONS.

ST. JOHN HARBOUR WORKS.

Mr. GANONG—by Mr. Wilson—asked:

Referring to page 7401 of 'Hansard' for the year 1899, in which the Minister of Railways said, 'With these two deposits amounting to thirty-four thousand dollars there would be a diminution by that amount in the cost of the work, assuming that the contract being awarded to Connolly, they were prepared to enter into it for this sum'—

1. In what year and where does this amount appear in the public accounts ?

2. If it does not appear in the public accounts, has it been returned to the contractors ? If so, in what manner and on what dates ?

3. If not reported in the public accounts or not returned to the contractors, what disposition has been made of the amount ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair):

1. This amount does not appear in the public accounts.

2. No. it has not been returned to the contractors.

3. The cheques for the amount have been sent to the Department of Finance. My attention has been recently called to the fact that they were still remaining with the accountant in my department.

LIGHTHOUSE—HAWK ISLAND, N.S.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

What are the particulars and dates respecting the calling for tenders and contract for lighthouse at Hawk Island, county of Richmond, Nova Scotia ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). In the absence of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Hon. Sir Louis Davies), I would answer the hon. gentleman's question as follows :

Tenders for the construction of lighthouse on Hawk Island, Poulamond Bay, Richmond county, N.S., were invited by bills sent to the agent of the department at Halifax, and to the post offices at Poulamond and Arichat, to be put up in conspicuous places. Three tenders were received, viz.: Peter McLean, Cannes, $942; Alex. McCuish, St. Peter's, $1,373; Edward Doyle, Poulamond, $1,397.

The manner in which the case was dealt with is set forth in the following memorandum from the acting Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries, Mr. Hardie, dated Oct. 23, 1900 :

The minister approved of the acceptance of the tender of Mr. Alexander McLean, carpenter and builder, Cannes, for the construction of a wooden lighthouse, with outbuildings, on Hawk Island, Poulamond Bay, N.S., for the sum of $942.

Before informing Mr. McLean of the acceptance of his tender a letter was received from him, dated 29th Sept., requesting that the contract might not be awarded to him as he omitted to charge for masons amounting to $167.

As the amount omitted in Mr McLean's tender if added to it would still make the tender considerably lower than the next, which is one from Alexander McCuish, of St. Peter's, N.S., amounting to $1,373, inquiry was made of Mr. McLean as to whether he would accept the work if $167 was added to his original tender. He writes to say, under date 19th inst., that he will be glad to do the work, but it is now too late in the season to carry it on this fall, and that it would be the last of November before he could get lumber, so that he could not possibly finish the work before the 1st of January. He states that if it would suit to have the work completed on or before the 1st of June he would undertake the work at the price stated, viz, $1,109. The chief engineer recommends that the time be extended to the 1st of June and the work given to Mr. McLean at the amount stated, and I concur in his recommendation.

The matter is submitted for the minister's approval.

(Sgd.) J. H.

The minister approved of this recommendation and the contract was made accordingly.

I.C.R.—NUMBER OF HANDS EMPLOYED.

Mr. MORIN asked :

What was the number of hands, including the staff employed by the government, on the Intercolonial Railway, on the first day of July in each year during the years 1892-3-4-5-6-7-8-9 and 1900 ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair) :

The number of persons, including staff, employed by the government, on the Intercolonial Railway, on the first day of July in each year during the years 1892-3-4-5-6-7-8-9 and 1900, is as follows :

1893	4,376
1894	4,146
1895	3,982
1896	4,193
1897	4,386
1898	4,740

BUILDINGS IN OTTAWA LEASED BY GOVERNMENT.

Mr. BENNETT—by Mr. Hughes—asked :

1. How many buildings not public property, are leased, rented or occupied in the city of Ottawa by the Federal government ?
2. Where are they situated and what rental is paid for each ?
3. By whom are the buildings severally owned?
4. Does the government pay taxes on such properties ? If not, who does ?
5. If no taxes are paid, under what provision of the law is exemption obtained ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) :

With reference to questions 4 and 5, all property which is leased by the government in the city of Ottawa is not subject to taxation. The government pays no taxes. This is done under British North America Act, section 125.

As to questions 1, 2 and 3, the information had better be moved for in the ordinary way.

CANADA EASTERN RAILWAY.

Mr. WALLACE asked :

1. Has any promise, statement or assurance, written or oral, been given by the Minister of Railways and Canals, or by the Premier, or by any member of the government to Alexander Gibson, or to any person, with respect to the intention of the government as to the purchase of the Canada Eastern Railway ?
2. If so, what promise, statement or assurance has been so given, and when was it given and to whom ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair) :

I am not aware that any member of the government, other than myself, has made any statement or had any communication on the subject of the acquiring of the Canada Eastern Railway as part of the Intercolonial; nor do I believe that any such communication has taken place.

During the past four years, boards of trade in different sections of the province of New Brunswick, municipal bodies and the city and town councils of Fredericton and Chatham have declared themselves strongly in favour of the policy of the government taking over the Canada Eastern Railway, and both political parties in the provincial legislature have joined in a unanimous memorial to the government, in favour of the acquisition of this road by the government.

The railway intercepts the Intercolonial at Chatham Junction with one terminus, and crosses at the other terminus the St. John river, at Fredericton, over the new steel bridge, to which the Dominion government has contributed $300,000, which sum, with interest, remains as a lien upon the structure.

From time to time, both publicly and privately, when this question has been brought up by these various bodies and by business men, I have not hesitated to acknowledge that, in my opinion, speaking for myself alone, it would be in the interest of the Intercolonial that the Canada Eastern road should become part of the government railway system, and I have stated that I would, personally, advocate action by the government in this direction ; but I have never made, nor profess to make, any offer to the Canada Eastern Railway Company, or any person in its behalf, for the purchase of the road, nor has the company, or any person on its behalf made to me any offer for the sale thereof.

CORNWALL CANAL SUPERINTENDENCY.

Mr. PRINGLE asked :

1. Is Mr. J. H. Ramsay overseer of the Cornwall Canal ?
2. Has any notice of dismissal been served upon him ? If so, when does it take effect ?
3. If notice was served, what was the reason for serving and what charges (if any) were made against him ?
4. Was any investigation held ?
5. If so, was Mr. Ramsay given an opportunity of defending himself ?
6. Has any successor been appointed ?
7. If so, whom ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair) :

1. No.
2. Yes, 1st March, 1901.
3. No charges made. For improvement of service.
4. No.
5. No. 4 answers this.
6. Yes.
7. Mr. Frank Lally.

I.C.R. ELEVATOR AT ST. JOHN.

Mr. GANONG—by Mr. Wilson—asked :

What are the names of the persons employed in connection with the Intercolonial Railway elevator at St. John ? What is the nature of their duties, and what wages do they receive, respectively ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair) :

The names of persons employed at the elevator at St. John, the nature of their duties and the wages they receive, are as follows :

J. A. Perley, foreman, $75 a month; W. H. Daniels, weighman, $60 a month; Jerry Daley, engineer, $75 a month; F. P. Sinclair, clerk, $38 a month; W. Terris, fireman, $1.35 a day; A. Sterling, night watchman, $1.20 a day.

I. C. R. ELEVATOR AT HALIFAX.

Mr. GANONG—by Mr. Wilson—asked :

What are the names of the persons employed in connection with the Intercolonial Railway elevator at Halifax ? What is the nature of their duties, and what wages do they receive, respectively ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair) :

The names of persons employed at the elevator at Halifax, the nature of their duties and the wages they receive, are as follows :

William Peddle, day watchman, $1.25 a day; Allen Macdonald, night watchman, $1.20 a day.

P.E.I.—COMMUNICATION WITH MAINLAND.

Mr. HACKETT asked :

1. Is it the intention of the government to put the pier of Cape Tormentine in thorough repair this season, in order that the steamer Stanley plying between Summerside, Prince Edward Island and the mainland may land mails, passengers and freight there ?

2. Has the government decided to commence forthwith the construction of a pier at Carleton Point, on the Prince Edward Island side ? If not, why ?

3. How many boats are employed by the government for the carrying of mails and passengers between Cape Traverse and Tormentine this winter ? How many men to each boat ? The names of the men and the wages paid each ?

4. Were the boats in readiness to perform the service when the first detention of the winter steamers took place, so that mails and passengers would not be delayed ?

5. How many days elapsed in the month of February of this year without having mails from Prince Edward Island, and who is responsible for the inconvenience and loss in this connection ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) :

1. Repairs are now being carried on.

2. No decision has been arrived at upon this subject.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). As the remainder of these questions relate to the Department of Marine and Fisheries, in the absence of the hon. minister (Hon. Sir Louis Davies), I answer them as follows :

3. Ten boats, five going each way when practicable. Six men to each boat, including the officer in charge. Captains are paid at the rate of $75 per month, coxswains at the rate of $55 per month, bowmen at the rate of $50 per month, and waistmen at the rate of $45 per month. The same men are not continuously employed.

4. Yes, the boats were ready, but on account of continued snow storms and gales of wind it was impossible for the boats to cross.

5. Eight, from the 5th to the 13th February. I am informed that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries during this period made several attempts to cross the capes and each time had to return to Charlottetown as the boats could not cross on account of the weather. He came over on the first boat that was able to come across with the mails.

DAWSON PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

1. What is the cost of construction for the different public buildings, respectively, in Dawson?

2. Which of them were built under contract and which by day's labour under government supervision?

3. If by contractors, who were the contractors?

4. From which building, if any, were tenders asked?

5. What were the amounts of the different tenders?

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) :

1. Telegraph office, to date, $10,000 ; and post office, to date, $50,246.68.

2 and 3. Both by day labour.

4. Instructions were issued to call for tenders for the construction of the post office and court house, tenders to be opened by Messrs. Ogilvie and Charleson in Dawson.

5. A telegram was received from Mr. Charleson, as follows : McLean Bros., $295,000, unaccepted cheque for $2,000 ; Yukon Saw Mills Co., $165,000 ; Mathewson, $142,079 ; others higher. It was ultimately decided to construct those buildings by day labour under the supervision of the resident architect, Mr. Fuller—and, to date one building (the post office) has been constructed.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES' FREIGHT RATES.

Mr. GAUVREAU asked :

Is it the intention of the Department of Railways and Canals to grant to the permanent employees of the Canadian government railway system a reduction of freight rates over said system for the transportation of fuel for personal use only and household goods when an employee is obliged to move from one point to another, as is practiced on all company railroads where the employees thereof have a heavy reduction of freight, so long as they stay within the limit of the rules laid down in said allowance?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair). This concession was tried some years ago but on account of its abuse by many of those persons to whom the concession was granted, it was discontinued. It is not now proposed to revive it.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S FOOT GUARDS.

Hon. Mr. PRIOR asked :

1. What amount has been expended during the past five fiscal years on accoutrements, clothing and arms for the Governor General's Foot Guards, showing each year separately?

2. What amount has been expended during the same time on the band of the said regiment for clothing, instruments and music, showing each item and year separately?

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria) asked :

1. What is the maximum grade on the Intercolonial Railway between (a) Montreal and Halifax, and (b) Moncton and St. John?

2. Has the government made an estimate of the sums of money necessary :—(a) to reduce the grades on the Intercolonial Railway to one-half per cent? (b) to double track the line from (1) Moncton to Halifax; (2) Moncton to St. John; (3) Truro to the Straits of Canso or other good port in that locality?

3. If the cost of any or all of these projects is known, will the government state the amount in each case?

4. What is the horse-power or tonnage of the most powerful engine running on the Intercolonial?

5. How many tons of freight, under present conditions, could that engine haul from Montreal to Halifax?

6. How many tons of freight could a similar engine haul from Montreal to Halifax, provided the line had not more than one-half per cent gradients?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair) :

1. (a) The maximum grade on the Intercolonial Railway between Montreal and Halifax is 65 feet.

(b) Between Moncton and St. John, 45 feet.

2. Attention has been given to the subject of reducing grades, &c., but no estimate of any entire division of the line have been made. The same may be said with respect to the double tracking of any portion of the line.

(a) No.
(1) No.
(2) No.
(3) No.

3. The cost is not known.

4. The Consolidation engine, which has four (4) pairs of driving wheels coupled. Total weight of engine and tender is 129 tons.

5. This engine will haul 1,000 tons weight over the present grades from Montreal to Halifax.

6. A similar engine could haul 1,450 tons from Montreal to Halifax, provided the line had not more than one-half per cent gradient.

MR. D. J. O'DONOGHUE.

Mr. INGRAM—by Mr. Clancy—asked :

1. What is the date of the appointment of Mr. D. J. O'Donoghue, and by whom was he recommended?

2. What amount of salary does he receive annually, and what are his duties?

3. Did the government pay his removal expenses from Toronto to Ottawa? If so, how much did the government pay?

4. By what authority did the government pay his removal expenses? If by order in council, will the government lay said order in council on the Table of the House?

5. If by order in council or otherwise, what precedent has heretofore existed for paying the removal expenses of any new appointment?

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) :

1. On 30th March, 1900.

2. $1,500 a year as a special officer to decide on a scale of fair wages to be paid employees on government contracts. And claims and other matters referring to the fair wages conditions in contracts.

3. Government did not pay for Mr. O'Donoghue's removal expenses.

I. C. R. SECTIONS.

Mr. MARTINEAU asked :

1. What are the limits and extent of each of the several sections of the Intercolonial Railway between Lévis and St. Flavie?

2. How far does the St. Valier section extend in St. François, and how far in St. Valier?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair) :

1. The sections run from 4½ to 7½ miles in length.

2. St. Valier station is on the 120th section. This section extends from ¾ miles east of St. Michel to 1¼ miles west of St. François.

THE UNION MUTUAL, OF PORTLAND, LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. GAUVREAU—by Mr. Talbot—asked :

Whether the life insurance company, 'The Union Mutual, of Portland, Maine,' has deposited in the hands of the government the amount required by law for the security of its Canadian policy-holders?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). Yes.

DEPUTY RETURNING OFFICERS.

Mr. GAUVREAU—by Mr. Talbot—asked :

Whether the government are aware that the deputy returning officers in the province of Quebec at the last election—or a large proportion of their number—have not as yet been paid their mileage allowance? What has been the cause of the delay in this matter? Is it the intention of the government to provide an immediate remedy?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). The government are aware that there has been some delay in adjusting these accounts. The Auditor General states that out of 2,439 claims received from deputy returning officers in the province of Quebec, 2,133 have been finally dealt with, leaving 306 claims for mileage, about which the returning officers have been asked to furnish explanations. The explanations are being considered as promptly as possible after their receipt.

The delay in dealing with the election accounts was due to the necessity for employing the whole staff of the Audit Office on the preparation of the audit report. Since the report was completed the examination of the election accounts has proceeded without interruption.

INTERCOLONIAL AND CANADA ATLANTIC FREIGHT RATES.

Mr. KEMP asked :

1. What was the rate per 100 pounds from Parry Sound to St. John, on export grain carried by the Canada Atlantic and Intercolonial Railways last November and December?

2. What was the rate per 100 pounds accruing to the Intercolonial Railway from Montreal to St. John as its proportion of the through rate from Parry Sound?

3. What was the quantity carried?

4. What is the estimate of the net gain or loss to the government railway in connection with handling this export grain?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair) :

1. Rate per hundred pounds from Parry Sound to St. John, on export grain carried by the Canada Atlantic and Intercolonial Railways last November and December :

Grain.	Average Rate.
On wheat	9⅜ cts. per 100 lbs.
On rye .....10·7	cts. per 100 lbs.
On corn .....10·9	cts. per 100 lbs.

2. The rate per 100 pounds accruing to the Intercolonial Railway from Montreal to St. John as its proportion of the through rate from Parry Sound, is as follows :

Grain	Rate.
On wheat	5·6 cts. per 100 lbs.
On rye	6·3 cts. per 100 lbs.
On corn	6·4 cts. per 100 lbs.

3. The total quantity of grain carried was 395,720 bushels.

4. It has not been the usage on the Intercolonial, nor is it customary on any railway to furnish the public an estimate of loss or gain to the railway in any particular shipment or shipments, nor would it be possible to do so with an approach to accuracy. Many varying elements would need to be taken into consideration for the purposes of such an estimate : such as the capacity of the cars ; power of the locomotive ; the rate and quantity of return freights supplied to the cars carrying the grain ; terminal charges and delays in transport, which more frequently occur during the winter season, before even an approximate estimate could be attempted to be made.

GRAIN ELEVATOR AT HALIFAX.

Mr. KEMP asked :

1. How much did the grain elevator cost, built by the present government, at the city of Halifax ?

2. How many bushels of grain have been shipped therefrom ?

3. How many men are employed at said elevator ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair) :

1. The total cost of the grain elevator at Halifax is $159,728.75, outside of value of several lots of land, and including city of Halifax contribution.

2. 763,425 bushels of grain have been shipped from the elevator at Halifax since it was first built.

3. Two men are employed at the said elevator.

MAIL SERVICE, ALLISTON AND ROSEMONT.

Mr. LENNOX asked :

1. Who has the contract for carrying the mails between Alliston and Rosemont, in South Simcoe ?

2. What is the date of the contract, or renewal, and the amount paid ?

3. Were advertisements for tenders issued at date of last renewal, and if so, when ?

Hon. JAMES SUTHERLAND :

1. John Joseph Holland is the contractor for the mail service between Alliston and Rosemont.

2. The contract at present in operation began on the 1st April, 1897, and terminates on the 31st March, instant. This contract was renewed with Mr. Holland for four years from 1st April proximo on the same terms and conditions.

3. Tenders were invited in 1897, due to be opened on the 19th February of that year. Two were received, from J. J. Holland at $234.75 a year, and from J. H. Johnston at $238 a year. Mr. Holland's offer being the lower was accepted, and a contract made with him at that rate. This is the contract now in operation. The former rate was $238 a year.

LOBSTER LICENSE, ANTICOSTI.

Mr. KAULBACH asked :

Is Mr. M. G. Daggett, to whom license was granted for packing lobsters on the Island of Anticosti, an employee in the service of Henri Menier, the owner of the island ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). Mr. Dogget, or Dagget, I am not sure of the name, the person referred to, is an agent of Mr. Menier.

WELLAND CANAL, LOCK 24.

Mr. LANCASTER asked :

1. Who was the successful tenderer for strengthening the wall at the head of lock 24, on the new Welland canal, for which tenders were advertised on January 18 last, and what is the amount of the tender accepted ?

2. From whom were other tenders received, and what was the amount of each respectively ? When was the contract let, and to whom, and for what amount ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair). The contract has not yet been executed, and until it is, it would not be in the public interest to give the information asked for.

WELLAND CANAL—QUANTITY OF WATER.

Mr. LANCASTER asked :

1. What quantity of water per minute in cubic feet is being passed through the Welland canal at Welland ?

(a) What portion of this is required for the feed of the new canal for purposes of navigation ?

2. What is the maximum quantity of water per minute in cubic feet which can be passed through the canal at Welland, without being detrimental to navigation, according to the latest reports by the engineers ?

3. What quantity of water per minute in cubic feet is now passing into the old Welland canal ?

4. What quantity of water per minute in cubic feet can be passed through or down the old Welland canal ?

5. What quantity of water per minute in cubic feet was granted the Cataract Power Company by lease, in 1896 or 1897, and what amount since, and when ?

6. What quantity of water per minute in cubic feet is now passing the guard lock at Thorold ?

7. What quantity of water per minute in cubic feet is taken from the old Welland canal at Merritton and passed into the hydraulic race ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair) :

1. Some 66,000 cubic feet per minute. (a) Eighteen thousand (18,000) cubic feet per minute are reserved for the feed of the new canal for purposes of navigation.

2. Some 135,000 cubic feet per minute can be passed through the aqueducts without detriment to navigation, if that quantity could be discharged into the canal from Lake Erie without drawing down the summit level.

3. Some 45,000 cubic feet.

4. The quantity cannot be definitely stated until the various structures, upon the canal, are arranged to control and regulate a greater quantity of water than at present flows through it, which quantity can be considerably increased.

5. The Cataract Power Company was granted the right to draw from the canal 6,000 cubic feet of water per minute. No additional quantity of water has been leased since.

6. Some 34,500 cubic feet per minute.

7. Some 9,000 cubic feet per minute.

EMPLOYMENT OF CHINESE OR JAPANESE.

Hon Mr. PRIOR asked :

1. Has the government issued orders to their agents in British Columbia not to employ Chinese or Japanese on any public works or government steamers ?

2. Is the government aware whether Chinese are employed as cooks on any government vessels, in British Columbia ?

3. If they are so employed, is it the intention of the government to continue their services ?

4. Is the government aware that there are plenty of white cooks obtainable for such employment ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). No special instructions have been given, but it is understood that Canadian labour is to be employed on the government steamers where it can be obtained, and we are not aware of any departure from the rule.

CARRIAGE OF MAILS BY CENTRAL RAILWAY.

Mr. WILMOT—by Mr. Hughes (Victoria)—asked :

1. Is the Central Railway, New Brunswick, under contract with the Post Office Department for carriage of mails ?
2. If so, what are the conditions of such contract, including amount to be paid ?
3. Have these conditions been carried out, and has any money, beyond amount of contract price, been asked for or paid ?

Hon. JAMES SUTHERLAND :

1. The Central Railway of New Brunswick carries mails under an agreement with the Post Office Department.
2. To carry mails daily, each way, between Norton and Chipman, distance 45 miles, payment at the rate of four cents per running mile.
3. The conditions have not been carried out by the railway company, owing to a bridge disaster at Sargson in August last, but the railway company have substituted a stage, and performed the service. No money beyond agreement price has been asked for or paid.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—AXES FOR BRITISH TROOPS.

Mr. MONK asked :

1. Has the Canadian government any knowledge of a contract made by the British War Office with an American merchant for the supply of 3,000 felling axes for the British troops in South Africa ?
2. If so, was the contract made through the government of Canada ?
3. Who was the American merchant, and what was the price paid ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Hon. F. W. Borden). The government has no knowledge whatever of any such contract as is referred to.

NORTH BRUCE ELECTION.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Before the orders of the day are taken up, I desire to bring to the attention of the House an item which I think reflects no credit upon the government of the day. I will read from an article in the Wiarton Canadian of March 14, and starting out with these headlines :

Shameful Tactics.—Contemptible Act of the Grit Combination.—Conservative Mail Clerks Transferred to prevent them from Voting.

The Grit machine has commenced its work in connection with the North Bruce by-election, and the act that has been perpetrated this week by the Tarte-Laurier combination is one of the most contemptible in the history of party politics, but it is one that will be a boomerang of telling force on the mean and cowardly Grit party who dare not force a fair and honourable contest.

Two mail clerks, Messrs. C. Pearson and R. Nelson, whose homes are in Wiarton, and who have resided here for years, have been sent to London until after the election in order that they may not be able to vote. Both gentlemen are capable and competent officers of the mail service, and during their long term of service no complaint has ever been made against them, but they are Conservatives, and to prevent them from voting for the Conservative candidate on March 20, they are transferred to another division of the service until after election.

Was ever any act more cowardly ? These gentlemen whose homes, property and interests are in North Bruce, are forcibly disfranchised by a despotic government which dare not allow the people to exercise their free will.

And two other mail clerks whose families, whose homes and whose interests are in London, are brought down for the time being to do the work of these men. I do not know whether it is the Postmaster General, now on his way to Australia, who is responsible for this, or the acting Postmaster General (Hon. Mr. Sutherland), but if it is the Postmaster General, it is in keeping with the same tactics we have seen on his part during the late election. If it is the present acting Postmaster General, I respectfully submit that it is no credit to him. To my mind, one of the sacred rights of a Canadian subject is the franchise, he is undoubtedly entitled to exercise the franchise according to his own judgment, no matter whether he is in the service or out of the service, unless he occupies certain positions in which the law specifies that he should not vote. But in this case these parties have a right to vote. Therefore, I respectfully submit that they should have been allowed to remain where they were, and to vote if they felt disposed. I do not know whether they intended to vote or not, but if they felt disposed to vote, they had a perfect right to go and vote without being interfered with or molested. I can only say that if it is the acting Postmaster General who has done this, I would have expected better things of him; but it is quite in keeping with the tactics that have been adopted of late to prevent a free expression of the will of the people in the elections. We have a number of men up in that riding to-day who, I believe, are connected with the old Grit machine ; if they are not originators and manipulators of the machine. They are doing their fine work to the best of their ability, and in addition they have gone further and disfranchised men who have done nothing in the world to incur the displeasure of the government, except that possibly, as they were known to be Conservatives, they might exercise their right to vote the day after to-morrow against the government candidate.

Hon. JAMES SUTHERLAND (North Oxford). Mr. Speaker, the matter was brought to my attention on Saturday last by a telegram from a gentleman in Wiarton—I think it was from Wiarton, from the constituency anyway. I at once made inquiries and gave instructions to the deputy head of the department, that these gentlemen, if they had votes should be allowed to return and vote. I may say that this practice of continually bringing up rubbish out of newspapers, written in the heat of a campaign, seems to be out of place in this House.

Mr. SPROULE. Is that what the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Sutherland) calls rubbish ?

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think, from the first line that the hon. gentleman read, it is plain to see the kind of campaign that his party are running in North Bruce. It indicates the line of policy that they are adopting in this election. I wish to say that politics have had nothing to do with this matter at all. I believe it is in accordance with the custom of the department. They have instituted a new system of examination by which mail clerks are allowed an opportunity of becoming more proficient, and, without respect to party, they are promoted in the department according to their proficiency, as shown in this examination. The department have also adopted the policy of allowing mail clerks who have been in the service for some time, working on a short branch, to have an opportunity of increasing their knowledge and proficiency by being transferred to more important lines. As far as I am concerned, the first I knew of the matter was upon receipt of a telegram on Saturday, not from a Conservative, but from a prominent Liberal, drawing attention to the fact that the hon. gentleman states, and suggesting that these persons should be allowed to vote. I gave instructions that, if possible, arrangements should be made to allow them to vote, so that, there is no party consideration in the matter at all. I do not believe that the hon. Postmaster General (Hon. Mr. Mulock) knew anything about it. On the contrary, the matter occurred simply in the ordinary course of the department. I would be very sorry to think that this department would take advantage of their position to use their employees in that way. If it is possible, in connection with the service they are performing, they should be allowed to return and cast their votes for whichever party they may choose.

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON (Halton). What I am going to state is not newspaper rubbish that the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Sutherland) has referred to, in speaking of what the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) has read, because, I was in the midst of this election only a few days ago and heard for myself from one of the men who was sent from the London division to Wiarton, what had taken place. I may tell the hon. acting Postmaster General that he has done his party very good service indeed by issuing the order which he says he has issued to allow these men who were sent from Wiarton to London to come back and exercise their franchise. The feeling there was most intense, not only with Conservatives, but, with Liberals as well, and I have not the slightest doubt that if these men were prevented from voting, and no one supposed that the change was made for any reason other than to prevent them from voting, the Liberal party would lose many votes by the action of the government. I was there and I had an opportunity of ascertaining what the feeling was. I feel assured that the Liberals there consider that a great wrong had been done to two very honourable men who, I was told, did not take any part in elections beyond exercising their reasonable right to vote. They were men who were in no way offensive partisans. They were good citizens and those sent from London knew no reason why they were transferred from London to Wiarton ; neither do I suppose those who were transferred from Wiarton to London, could give any good reason why they were transferred. The reasonable assumption was that it was done wholly and solely for political purposes, and the simple designation of this statement by the hon. acting Postmaster General as rubbish, I think, will not go very far in the town of Wiarton, when his words are reported there. One can readily see the intensity of the feeling in that place when even a Liberal had to wire. They found that the matter was operating so strongly against them that a Liberal had to take the matter up in order to break the force of the injury which the action of the government was going to cause to the party in this election. I am very glad, even though the Conservative candidate may not secure some of the Liberal votes that this matter would have brought to him, that this great wrong has been righted and these men are to be permitted to go back and exercise that which is the right of every British subject. I hope there will be no neglect on the part of the acting minister in giving orders that these men shall be allowed to go back and exercise their franchise.

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to make a personal explanation. I did not say that the matter was rubbish ; I referred to the way in which it was written up in the newspaper. It is quite proper, I think, that such matters should be brought to the attention of the department.

Hon. Mr. PRIOR. A nice distinction.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Hon. Mr. Fielding :

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, when my right hon. friend who leads the government (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) gets into what we may refer to as a tight corner, he is very versatile and resorts to various expedients. Sometimes, as in the case of the custom-house officer last year, he even becomes pathetic. The Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) generally endeavours to get out of such a difficulty by asking a question. My hon. friend, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright)) generally endeavours to evade any trouble of that kind by indulging in sneers at the opposition. I do not think the hon. gentlemen, at whose speeches the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce saw fit to sneer, need pay much attention to those sneers under the circumstances. The hon. gentleman adjourned the debate at half-past nine at night, came back next day, told us that there was nothing in the speeches of these hon. gentlemen to answer, and then occupied an hour in endeavouring to answer them. I do not think that there is any particular occasion for the hon. gentleman to adopt that tone with us on this side of the House, because I know of no hon. gentlemen in this House whose armour is more vulnerable at many points than is that of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, and if I thought it was worth while to waste the time of the House with a discussion of that kind, I could very well devote five minutes to the hon. gentleman, but I believe that under the circumstances, the House will justify me in refraining from entering into any discussion of that kind, which is not very profitable, and which does not tend to advance public business in this House. Now, the hon. gentleman, in years gone by, has posed as something of a Diogenes in this country. He went about with a lamp looking for an honest man and a great many of us were inclined to place a great deal of confidence in his assertions in that role. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that, in the way in which the hon. gentleman has dealt with the budget which has been brought down by the hon. Minister of Finance, he has preserved very well the role of a Diogenes. Let us compare, for a moment, a few of the things he said the other day with what he said in days gone by. He told us that everything is very comfortable and very lovely in this country, and asked : Why should there be any change ? He admits that there is a probability of depression in the future, as the hon. Minister of Finance admits that probability, and he says :

We have had it clearly before our eyes, and we design to regulate our future conduct in accordance therewith.

Just, Mr. Speaker, as if some one skating on thin ice and being warned of the danger would say : I clearly realize the danger and as soon as I fall in I will govern myself accordingly. That is the position of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). Instead of preparing for the future in these years when our revenue is large, he advocates spending all the money we can get out of the pockets of the tax-payers ; he advocates spending some $8,000,000 more, and then he says : When the hard times come we will regulate our conduct accordingly. I might ask, in passing, why it is that this government which professes to take credit for the good times in Canada during the past four years, proposes to allow this anticipated depression in business to take place. Why does not this government, which has brought these prosperous times to us during the past four years, take good care that no depression should come to this country ? That is a fair question to the hon. gentleman when he takes, as he is inclined to take, credit to his government for these good times.

The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) contrasts the trade of Canada during the past four years with that of former years. There is one matter I might have expected the hon. gentleman to deal with which he neglected to deal with, and that is : That during the four years from 1893 to 1896 under a Conservative administration our imports from England amounted to $145,000,000 ; while during the past four years under a Liberal administration our imports from England amounted to $143,-000,000, or to be exact, there was a decrease in the last four years as compared with the former four years of $2,214,000. On the other hand the imports from the United States during the four years from 1893 to 1896 amounted to $224,000,000, and during the past four years they amounted to $343,-000,000, a total increase of $118,000,000. Now let us see what the hon. gentleman (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) said about matters of that kind no further back than 1897, when speaking on the Trade and Navigation Returns (Budget debate ' Hansard ' 1897, page 1244) :

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. These returns show that, in the very last year of their term of office, we exported to England, apparently, $66,000,000 worth of our products, we exported to the United States $44,000,000, we bought from England $32,000,000, and from the United States $58,000,000 worth. There, if you will, is a genuine practical discrimination to an enormous extent, against England and in favour of the United States, under the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite.

What are the facts to-day ? In the year 1896, we exported to England, $108,000,000 worth ; we exported to the United States, $69,000,000 worth ; we bought from England $45,000,000 worth and we bought from the United States $110,000,000 worth. Therefore, while the balance of trade (if you may use that expression) in our favour as between ourselves and England was $34,000,000 in 1896 ; it is $63,000,000 now ; and while the balance of trade against us with the United States was $14,000,000 in 1896, it is $41,000,000 in 1900. Yet, while the hon. gentleman (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) stated in 1897 that the facts then constituted a genuine practical discrimination to an enormous extent against England ; he now stands up in this House and tells us that a very much worse 'genuine practical discrimination' against England is perfectly delightful and pleasing to him and does not call for a word of criticism or a word of explanation. The view of the hon. gentleman in 1897 is borne out by what was stated in a leaflet published by the Cobdenite Club of London, England, which says :

> In spite of the preferential tariff the percentage of American goods entering Canada has continued to increase, and the percentage of British goods to decline. The tariff has therefore failed absolutely to effect the purpose for which it was intended.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us look for a moment at the financial statement on which the Finance Minister (Hon. Mr. Fielding), congratulated himself and the country to such a very great extent. He has shown us that during the past four years we have had a net surplus of $14,095,194, and he shows us by his estimate for the coming year a surplus of $6,350,000, or a total surplus during these five years of $20,445,194 ; and in addition to that, taking into consideration his estimate for the current year we will have an addition to the debt of $8,796,373 ; so that he will have expended not only his entire surplus but he will have expended on capital account more than $8,000,000 besides.

Now, my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Bell) referred to the surplus which Sir Leonard Tilley was able to present to this House in 1882, and also in 1883 ; but the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) did not show to this House as I propose to do, what the opinion of the Finance Minister (Hon. Mr. Fielding) was with respect to these surpluses in 1882 and 1883. The Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) congratulates himself upon the surplus now, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) congratulates the country. In 1882 it was not so. An editorial utterance of the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) in 1882 in the columns of the 'Morning Chronicle' (Halifax) was as follows :

> If these surpluses were created by the government in some magic way there may be in them a cause for thankfulness to Sir John Macdonald and his followers, but when it is considered that every dollar of the surplus is money taken out of the pockets of the people without a shadow of an excuse, money not required even by the reckless expenditure of the government, there is not much cause for rejoicing.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Are we to believe the congratulations tendered to the country by the Finance Minister in 1901, or are we to believe the criticisms of Mr. Fielding as editor of the 'Morning Chronicle' in 1882 ? If the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Fielding) has abandoned the views which he entertained in 1882, perhaps at some future time in this debate, he will explain to the House when he abandoned these views, and the reasons on account of which he did abandon them. But that is not all. The hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Fielding) went at the surplus again in 1883, and this is what he said about it in the columns of the Halifax 'Morning Chronicle' :

> That millions of dollars should be unnecessarily taken yearly from the consuming classes of the country, and this without being absolutely necessary, is a cardinal principle of the Finance Minister's, to which even his best friends do not unreservedly assent.

Perhaps the best friends of the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Fielding) who is Finance Minister to-day, do not unreservedly assent to his present proposition. He continued :

> They see that a surplus of millions at the capital is just so much money withdrawn from the trade of the country. How long can the Dominion stand the drain ? Certainly not many years longer.

In view of the depression which the Finance Minister says is probably coming upon this country, how many years longer does he think the country is going to stand this drain ? But, Sir, the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) is not alone with regard to that. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) has told us :

> Taxation is an evil that nothing but the requirements of government can justify.

Then he now stands up and tells us that he expects a surplus of $6,000,000 and upwards during the current year, and at the same time he says that there is not the slightest necessity for any change in this budget, that everythings is happy, delightful and comfortable, and he asks the opposition to suggest to the government some particular class of goods from which the duty should be removed, some burden of the people that should be lightened. Well, it was not always so with the hon. gentleman (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright). In days gone by he took the position that the doctor was not required to prescribe until he was called in to attend his patient, but now the hon. gentleman (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) thinks that the doctor should be called upon to prescribe before he is invited to the bedside of the sick.

Well, I will give the hon. gentleman a suggestion with respect to the taxes. Let us look at what the taxes on the people are. In the first place, there is a tax on tobacco, which is very large, and which has been increased by hon. gentlemen opposite. I find that we take out of the people, in taxes on tobacco, in customs, $486,000, and in excise $3,281,000. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that possibly the duty on tobacco, which was increased by them, might be reduced at least to the former amount. I find that in taxes on sugar a very large amount is taken from the people. During the present year, on sugar below 16 Dutch standard, no less than $1,828,000 was taken from the people ; and I desire, in passing, to mention to the hon. Minister of Finance that his taxes on sugar were considerably increased in 1898. In that year he took from the people in taxes on sugar $1,324,329, and in 1900 he took in the same way $2,286,123, an increase of nearly $1,000,000. The hon. gentleman admitted at the time that the additional tax which he was placing on the people amounted to at least $250,000. My hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace) suggested that it would be at least $600,000 ; and, if we are to judge from the figures which I have just placed before the House, my hon. friend was well within the mark in making that statement. Will the hon. gentleman explain why we have not some remission of the sugar duties ?

But, Mr. Speaker, we had some suggestions from the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce in days gone by as to taxes which should be lightened. In 1882, referring to Sir Leonard Tilley's surplus, he used this language :

> I ask how it was got. $1,100,000 was derived from two of the most odious and oppressive taxes which were ever imposed in any civilized country before, under similar circumstances at least, the taxes on breadstuffs and fuel. If he really wants to relieve the people, let him remove the taxes on breadstuffs and coal.

My hon. friend the Minister of Finance in the legislature of Nova Scotia, in 1885, took occasion to move this resolution :

> That while it is as a rule inexpedient to deal with Dominion questions in this House, in view of the obnoxious character of the duty on breadstuffs, the House must firmly protest against the imposition of such duties.

Now, I find that last year the government took out of the people in taxes on breadstuffs $371,000 and in taxes on coal $1,309,000. These duties were maintained by the Conservative party in the past, and fought for by that party all over this Dominion, on the principles of the national policy—that the people of Nova Scotia were bound to submit to duties of that kind for the good of the country as a whole, and that the people of Ontario were bound to submit to them for the same reason. But hon. gentlemen opposite are now in power ; here are their promises and pledges before them ; and here is a surplus of over $6,000,000 ; and will they be good enough to explain to the House why it is, if those were good principles in 1882 and 1885, they are not good principles now ; or why it is that, holding those principles, if they do continue to hold them, they have not seen fit to lighten the burdens of the people ?

Further than that, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce distinctly stated in his speech—although he differed in that respect from the hon. Minister of Finance—that this is not a protective tariff, but a revenue tariff. If this is a revenue tariff, on what principle does the hon. gentleman uphold the maintenance of this surplus ? On what principle does he contend that under a revenue tariff we should come down with a budget which produces a surplus of $6,000,000 ? Is a revenue tariff designed to produce a surplus of that kind ? I do not pretend to be so great an authority on economic questions as the hon. gentleman ; but I have always understood that a revenue tariff was designed to produce a revenue fitting for the requirements of the government ; but here is a tariff which is to produce a revenue in excess of the requirements of the government by no less than $6,000,000. The hon. gentleman says it is a revenue tariff, and yet he says there is not the slightest occasion for making any change in it.

I do not intend to occupy further time with respect to the remarks which have been made by the hon. Minister of Finance or the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce ; but I desire to come to the resolution of which I have given notice. There have been in the past two political parties in this country, with somewhat divergent views upon the tariff question. Since 1878, and indeed since before 1878, the Liberal-Conservative party has been maintaining the principle of protection to Canadian industries. Since 1878 the Liberal party has not had any one uniform principle of trade policy. Sometimes they have put forth the view that free trade should prevail in this country, sometimes that a revenue tariff should prevail, sometimes that we should have unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, sometimes that we should have commercial union with the United States. Since they got into power in 1896, they have to some extent modified the tariff, but I have never yet heard any authoritative statement from the hon. gentlemen occupying the treasury benches as to whether or not they still adhere to their free trade principles, or the free trade principles of some of them, or whether they have become avowed protectionists. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has challenged us to put our policy before the House.

Well, Sir, we are putting our policy before the House, and we shall be very glad indeed to hear what the Minister of Trade and Commerce has to say about it. Now, although according to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, they have not altered the protective features of the tariff, nevertheless we have had some changes, and we have had some warnings from these gentlemen. I will not trouble the House with going over all those warnings, but I will mention just two of them. In 1897, the Minister of Trade and Commerce said this :

> And lastly, what my free trade friends will remember and lay to heart, we have turned the ship's head in the right direction and towards the open sea.

That is, towards the open sea of free trade. Well, we shall be very glad indeed to know from that hon. gentleman, who apparently has not always been permitted to lay before the country his real views on points of this kind, whether the ship's head is still in the direction of free trade. Then my hon. friend the Minister of Finance told us :

> So far as protecting the industries of this country is concerned, eternal vigilance must be the price of protection.

In other words, the industries of this country are not to know from day to day whether they have protection or not ; the working men are not to know from day to day whether those industries will continue. They are not to know whether or not they shall be driven into exile into other countries to seek work or whether their wives and children will have bread in this country. But something, which the hon. gentleman describes as 'eternal vigilance,' is to be the price of that protection which the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce says does not exist ; and indeed we cannot find the hon. the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce agreeing upon the quality of the present tariff in any two speeches they have ever made in this House. I may say in passing that only on Thursday and Friday last these two gentlemen were in exact contradiction to each other. The hon. the Minister of Finance said, speaking of the delegation who had approached Mr. Chamberlain on the subject of Imperial preferential trade :

> Mr. Chamberlain told the delegation courteously, but firmly and emphatically, that the thing could not be entertained for a moment unless they were prepared to give up their protective tariff against Great Britain. That was the basic principle of Mr. Chamberlain's statement, and these gentlemen were not prepared to give that up nor would I have been prepared to give it up had I been in their place.

That is the statement made by the Minister of Finance, and against that we have the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, which he has reiterated over and over again. If, he said, any one maintains that this is a protective tariff, I differ with him. Which are we to believe ? Is this a protective tariff, as the great financial authority of the government at present tells us, or is it only a high revenue tariff, and not a protective tariff, as the former great financial authority of the government tells us ? Is the government at present a government which submits in its budget a tariff for revenue only or a government which brings before this House a tariff which does protect the industries of this country ? I leave these two hon. gentlemen, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce to settle between them their differences on that point. I am not able to reconcile their statements, and can only leave it to the House to determine what they mean.

I will not weary the House with quoting what has been said by the right hon. gentleman who leads the government (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce on this question in days gone by. The right hon. gentleman told the country at Winnipeg :

> I come before you to-night to preach to you this new gospel of free trade.

I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman—and I will sit down and let him reply if he desires—whether or not he comes before the House to-day to preach the gospel of free trade. I pause for a reply. The hon. gentleman does not seem inclined to give me any information on that point. He said :

> I denounce to you the policy of protection as bondage.

Does he still denounce the policy of protection as bondage ? He went on to say :

> Yes, bondage, and I refer to it as bondage in the same way as American slavery was bondage. Sir, our policy is freedom of trade, such as exists in England, such as is practiced in Great Britain.

Will the hon. gentleman rise and say that his policy is freedom of trade such as exists and is practiced in Great Britain.

The hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce was not backward in those days. That hon. gentleman has been a very considerable figure in political life in Canada for a great many years, and I am glad to say that I believe he has spoken for the right in many cases, and I wish I could say that he had persevered. But he then told us that a protective system was a huge mistake, and in so far as it was not honest, it was a huge scheme of robbery. No doubt, in so far as it was not honest, it was a huge robbery, but the question is in what respect was it not honest? Does the hon. gentleman think that the protection which the Minister of Finance tells us exists in the tariff is a huge scheme of robbery? What are the hon. gentleman's views on that point? He said further :

> Our policy, first to last, has been to destroy the villainous system of protection by free trade, revenue tariff or continental free trade.

But the Minister of Finance tells us that protection exists in the tariff to-day. Will the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce then tell the House that it is his policy to destroy that villainous system of protection or is he content to believe that everything is happy and pleasant and comfortable, and that there is no need for a change ?

I shall not take more time in discussing the past utterances of these gentlemen, but I will say that the policy outlined in the resolution of which I have given notice, and which I propose to move, is the same policy, in its main essential features, as that which was laid down by Sir John Macdonald in 1876, 1877 and 1878. It is a policy designed to protect the industrial interests of Canada. It is a policy intended to give work to the workingmen of Canada, to prevent our factories being closed, to prevent our people being forced to seek work in the United States, and to assist in developing the industries of this country. It is a policy, at all events, whether it be wrong or right, by which the Liberal-Conservative party is prepared to stand, and I shall ask the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce to tell us where they stand. I shall ask them to frankly and clearly say whether or not the government has now abandoned its policy of free trade and revenue tariff and believes in protection, or whether, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce has told us, the ship's head is still pointing towards the open sea.

The next branch of my resolution deals with the preferential tariff. In 1897 our chances were temporarily thrown away by the right hon. gentleman who leads the House, for a certain phrase which he used. He spoke of granting an advantage to Great Britain on account of the splendid freedom which she had granted us. Well, we all realize that Great Britain has granted us a splendid freedom, but did not the right hon. gentleman, when he promised the people of this country that he would obtain for them preference in the British markets, did he not know then that Great Britain had granted us a splendid freedom ? Had that fact dawned upon him only when he arrived in London, and did he not remember the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who said that we owed Great Britain nothing but forgiveness for the wrongs she had committed against us by her blundering. We had in 1897, a magnificent opportunity to obtain from England some advantage in her markets. We did not obtain that, and, of course, it is too late for us to discuss with advantage what might have been. The practical question now for us is, what can be. The hon. the Minister of Finance is very ready to fling across the floor of this House the question whether or not we are prepared to repeal the British preference. Well, it is very difficult sometimes, and might be regarded as very offensive, to ask or to take back that which has been given away.

The Liberal-Conservative party have never said that they proposed to repeal that preference; but they have said that they would never rest satisfied until, in addition to that and as compensation for that, we had obtained a preference in British markets. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance a question with regard to that also. Suppose, as some business men throughout the country think may be the case, that additional preference which he last year gave to British goods should result in destroying some of our industries, in closing up some of our factories, in paralyzing a portion of the business of this country, what would the hon. gentleman do about it ? He may not be prepared to answer that question now. It is just as legitimate a question as the one he put to us. It may be that there will be difficulties in this country, it may be that there will be very great difficulties in this country, on account of the step which the hon. gentlemen have taken. The only thing that we can say is that we shall have to deal with these difficulties as best we may, but deal with them in such a way as not to offend or to lessen the sentiment of unity of the empire which is so strongly impressed not only upon the people of this country, but throughout the entire British possessions. Now, I do not want any misunderstanding so far as the position of the party which I have the honour to lead in this House is concerned. I am prepared to stand for the unity of the empire, for the integrity of the empire, as strongly as any member of this House. I am prepared, for that purpose, to advocate and support the claims of any government that will spend its last dollar and send its last man in support of the integrity of the empire against any foe that may threaten disruption. But, Sir, I do not attach as much importance to some things that have been said in this House with respect to the effect of sentiment in the mother country on matters of that kind as has been expressed by some hon. gentlemen opposite. Why, they would have one believe that the British workman foregoes his pipe and his beer every evening in order that he may go out on the streets to find some goods of Canadian produce or manufacture that he can buy. But the extraordinary part of it is that when you turn to these hon. gentlemen and say: If sentiment has such a remarkable effect upon the mind of the British consumer as that, how is it that Britain will refrain from giving us a preference in her markets ?—then these hon. gentlemen turn to you and say: It is of no use to talk about that, the Briton, in matters of trade, is absolutely cold-blooded and devoid of sentiment. The Briton, apparently has sentiment when he goes out to buy his goods, but when we talk about a reciprocal advantage by means of an adjustment of his tariff which could be effected without additional burden upon the British people——

The PRIME MINISTER. Oh, oh.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax)—there is not the slightest sentiment in the Briton at all. My right hon. friend (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) laughs at that.

The PRIME MINISTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Well, I may say to my right hon. friend there have been business men in this country and in England, who have, probably, as good a practical grasp of the situation as my right hon. friend, and who say that the thing can be accomplished ; and, unless he is prepared to set himself above the opinions of these leading business men, he cannot say that this thing is impossible.

Now, is there any possibility of obtaining this preference ? So far as its benefits are concerned, I need not say one word. The right hon. gentleman himself has admitted the great benefit it would be to Canada. Every hon. gentleman who has addressed this House, every gentleman of any importance in public life who has spoken in this country on the subject, has admitted the great practical benefit it would be to the people of Canada if we could obtain an advantage in the markets of Great Britain. I will not weary the House by adducing arguments on that subject, because I believe that the advantage of such a preference is incontrovertible. But I will say a few words with regard to the possibility of obtaining it. Now, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance made a statement on this subject which is quoted in the Morning Chronicle, a Liberal organ in the city of Halifax, in its issue of the 28th of August, 1900. And this is what he said on that occasion :

> There are three points which Sir Charles Tupper would like to make, but in not one of them is there any foundation for his efforts. He continues to talk about the Conservative party obtaining a tariff preference for Canadian products in England ; that is to say that Great Britain would impose duties on foreign foodstuffs while admitting those of Canada free. This is an old cry with Sir Charles Tupper, but no one knows better than he does that it is arrant humbug.

That was an interview which the hon. gentleman, I think, gave to some person in Montreal. Now, I wish to point out to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance and to the House that if this is 'arrant humbug,' there are a great many business men in this country and in England, who have been guilty, with Sir Charles Tupper, of believing in this 'arrant humbug.' The maritime Board of Trade, a body which represent 1,200,000 people in the maritime provinces passed this resolution :

> Resolved that in the opinion of this board mutual preferential trade within the empire would greatly tend to cement the unity of the empire, vastly assist in developing resources of the several colonies and dependencies thereof, hold a restraining influence upon emigration, directing it from foreign countries to countries within the empire, and conduce to an equitable system of commercial intercourse between the empire and the nations of the world.

I suppose that these men, who are shrewd, level-headed business men of the maritime provinces were not dealing with what they supposed to be 'arrant humbug.' The Boards of Trade of Toronto and Montreal have passed similar resolutions. On the 17th of March, 1896, the right hon. Prime Minister said :

> My hope is—nay, my conviction is—that on the 23rd June, the Liberal party will be at the head of the polls, and that it will be the Liberal party with its policy of a revenue tariff that will send commissioners to London to arrange for a basis of preferential trade.

And any one who reads the speech of the right hon. gentleman on that occasion cannot doubt that what he was talking about was mutually preferential trade. So, as far back as 1896, the right hon. gentleman did not regard this proposition as 'arrant humbug.' Then, the premier of Ontario, (Hon. Mr. Ross) said—and he has dealt on more than one occasion with this subject, but I quote from his utterance of a few months ago :

> I see no reasons why Canadians should hesitate o look to Great Britain for some encouragement nd response on her part. True she admits our products free of duty, but then she confers a imilar favour upon foreign nations.
> Have we not a right to expect that her own subjects, though living abroad, will be treated more favourably than the Magyar or the Russian or the citizens of the United States.

So, it is quite clear that the premier of Ontario, even so late as 1900, did not regard this project as one that involved 'arrant humbug.'

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Will my hon. friend (Mr. Borden, Halifax) allow me a word ?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Certainly.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I did not, in an interview in Montreal or elsewhere, characterize preferential trade as 'arrant humbug,' but I said that for Sir Charles Tupper to pretend that he could obtain it through the Conservative party and by his methods was 'arrant humbug.'

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Then, I will read again what the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Fielding) said :

> There are three points which Sir Charles Tupper would like to make, but in not one of them is there any foundation for his efforts. He continues to talk about the Conservative party obtaining a tariff prefereence for Canadian products in England ; that is to say that Great Britain would impose duties on foreign foodstuffs while admitting those of Canada free. This is an old cry with Sir Charles Tupper, but no one knows better than he does that it is arrant humbug.

I did not read it all, but I will read it all now, so that there may be no mistake about the hon. gentleman's meaning.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There is none.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). No, and this further language will make it perfectly plain :

Everybody who has had a correct view of English public opinion has been and is still aware that such tariff legislation in Great Britain for the present or the early future is impossible.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I thank the hon. gentleman for reading it all.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What the hon. gentleman was talking about was an agitation in favour of preferential trade, and characterizing it as 'arrant humbug.' If it did not mean that, it meant nothing. Why could not the hon. gentleman in the same way characterize this resolution which I have read as an arrant humbug ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. So it is.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). He could just as well characterize the statement of the right hon. gentleman who leads the House as arrant humbug. These hon. gentlemen seem to forget that their leader stated so far back as 1896, not only that this proposal to obtain a preference was not an arrant humbug, but that the Liberal party were going to send commissioners to London for the purpose of obtaining it. Will hon. gentlemen cheer the characterization of their leader's words as arrant humbug ? They do not seem so ready. The present premier of Ontario says again :

Have we not a right to expect that her own subjects, though living abroad, will be treated more favourably than the Magyar, or the Russian, or the citizens of the United States?

Is that arrant humbug ? Hon. gentlemen seem to differ in their views, according to the person or the body which expresses a sentiment on this question. Then, Sir, there is another statement which I shall bring before this House, the statement of a gentleman who holds a leading position in the commercial life of the city of Halifax, and who was a delegate from Halifax to the Congress of the Chambers of Commerce in London, in 1900. On the occasion of a very full and exhaustive report of the proceedings of the conference with respect to this matter, he had this to say :

If the support of the powerful Australian Commonwealth could be obtained, it would have great influence with the British public, who are slow to adopt untried innovations in matters of trade, but on the other hand, will always listen to reasonable arguments if supported by solid facts and figures. If at the next congress, to be held four years hence, the colonies were practically unanimous a very long step would be taken towards the solution of a very difficult question.

That gentleman happens to be a Conservative, but I do not think any one in this House who knows him will say that he is not a moderate and shrewd man, of great ability and excellent judgment with regard to all matters of trade. Now, there has been some expression of public opinion in England with regard to matters of this kind. The Liverpool Journal of Commerce, in the latter part of last year, had this to say with regard to this subject :

. . . There is, however, a peaceful alliance which it is the country's duty to her colonies and to herself to make, viz. : a commercial alliance, and it behooves everybody with a stake in the country and a desire to see Britain flourish and maintain its commercial and shipping supremacy and its integrity as a nation, to do all in their power to encourage by all legitimate means reciprocal trade with the colonies, preferring the products of the labour of their enterprising brethren who are striving to bring honour and glory to the common flag by extending its sphere and increasing the value of the territories over which it floats.

Now, that is a fairly strong expression of opinion on this point.

Mr. HEYD. What does it mean ?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It means that it is desirable for Great Britain, as I understand it, to adopt in the early future a policy of reciprocal trade, granting to the colonies a preference and receiving from the colonies a preference in return. Now, Sir, the Saturday Review, in October last, had this to say on that subject :

If the modification of the public attitude towards Cobdenite views goes on during the next twenty years at the rate it has proceeded during the preceding twenty, there will be no difficulty in getting a party strong enough to effect commercial union within the empire by means of preferential rates.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. After twenty years.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The Saturday Review at that time had not had the pleasure of reading the hon. gentleman's speech delivered on Friday last. No doubt if it had had the benefit of his views, this particular paragraph might not have been written ; but being in entire ignorance of what the hon. gentleman was going to say some months afterwards, that periodical published what I have read. Now, Mr. Boyle, the United States consul at Liverpool, reported to his government as follows :

Beyond question, during recent years there has been a great development of sentiment in favour of an Imperial preferential tariff, and I do not hesitate to say that this sentiment has a far stronger hold, not only among the masses of the people of Great Britain, but even among the politicians, than the party newspapers and party leaders concede. It is a significant fact that for the last two years this question has been discussed more than any other at meetings of chambers of commerce and trade organizations of Great Britain and her colonies.

It is clear that this consul, in making that report to his government, did not have exactly the same view as that which has been expressed by the hon. Minister of Finance, that to consider any such question at the present time is merely arrant humbug. The Imperial Trade, Defence and Anti-Free Imports League has issued a pamphlet, in which they say :

If the incoming government fails to pass measures of fiscal reconstruction, giving the wheat, lumber and fruit of Canada, the wool, wines and minerals of Australasia, the tea and rice of India, and the products of South Africa an advantage over competing goods from foreign sources, it will amount to a criminal abandonment of the best fruits of the intertrading power of the empire.

And only in the latter part of last year, the United Planters' Association of Southern India passed the following resolution :

That considering the critical condition of the tea and coffee industries, this association do communicate with the India Tea Association, the Ceylon Planters Association, the Indian chambers of commerce, and the leading firms of merchants and brokers interested in tea and coffee, &c., in this country and in England and her colonies, with a view to ascertaining whether a movement in favour of a commercial combination of Great Britain and her colonies and India against the world (which would by a system of differential duties, afford some protection to British-grown products and manufactures) would receive support

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to weary the House by giving these extracts, but I feel it is my duty to do so. What I am asking in this resolution is that the House should declare that this is an opportune time for bringing that matter forward and influencing public opinion throughout the empire with a view to obtaining it ; and I am showing the House as well as I can that there is some opinion, not only here, but in England and in the other colonies in favour of this movement ; and that it will not be merely a forlorn hope. We remember the attempt which was made in 1894 to induce the British government to denounce the German and Belgian treaties. We know that at that time we were told in so many words by the British government that those treaties would not be denounced, that it was not prudent to denounce them, and questions of trade were dealt with, and the volume of the trade of Great Britain with Germany and Belgium on the one hand, and with the colonies on the other hand, was pointed out. These same questions are agitated now, and are referred to as affording an answer to any suggestions that we should make the attempt. But we know that the attempt to have those treaties denounced was successful ; and we believe that if this government and the other colonies of the empire were to put their shoulders to the wheel and make a vigorous attempt in this direction at the present time, we have at least some prospect of success. And if there is some prospect of success, why should this government sit silent and make no allusion to it in the speech from the Throne and in the budget speech, and simply say that it is arrant humbug and is not worth attempting ?

Now, there was a recent article in the 'National Review' which dealt with the subject from another standpoint, from the standpoint of the necessities of the British government at the present time. What was said in that article is this :

Beer and tobacco are already so heavily mulcted that they cannot carry greater imposts. Whence, then, are we to get the millions which will be needed if our national position is to be rendered secure? I answer that the political fads of the '50's and '60's and '70's must be discarded by a new administration. The condition which rendered them useful and salutary have long since passed away; yet such is the force of routine, such that inertia of mind to which allusion has been so often made, that men are still enslaved by them. And we shall have to fight for our lives, we must neglect no weapon. A tariff offers us at once a means of raising funds for naval armaments, of obtaining allies and of weakening the enemies who are plotting our fall. With a tariff, too, we can consolidate the empire.

This article shows that at least there is some volume of public opinion in England in favour of this view. Mr. Ford, the correspondent of the New York 'Tribune,' in commenting on this article uses the following language :

A reaction against free trade in England is now more likely to happen than a revolt against protection in either America or Germany ; and the consolidation of the empire, the great cause of Imperial federation may be the justification for the renunciation of time-honoured policies.

Then, we hear that the great Australian Commonwealth is now laying the foundation of its fiscal system and if we are to believe what we see reported in the public press we are to understand that that commonwealth is likely to adopt a moderate protection platform. We are also to understand that it is likely to adopt a system of a preferential tariff in favour of the United Kingdom, not of merely giving the United Kingdom a preference without any corresponding advantage, but a system by which England will be asked to give to Australian products similar advantages in the English market. In view of this movement in the Australian Commonwealth, is it not the duty of Canada, having regard to our own interests, to join with Australia in doing that, so that all the colonies of the empire may present their views to the mother country at the same time and in that way to assist in bringing about what all of us think to be so desirable ?

There is another suggestion which I have to make to the House. We know the condition of affairs in the British West Indies. We know that the trade of these countries has fallen off very considerably during the past few years. We know that the trade of Canada with the British West Indies has fallen off very considerable. In looking over the figures I was very much surprised to see to what a remarkable extent our trade with the West Indies has fallen off since 1895. I find that in 1895 our total trade with the West Indies was $8,681,622, while in 1900, it was $3,976,172, showing a decrease of $4,705,450. Our exports to the West Indies were, in 1895, $3,887,602, and in 1900, $2,870,343. Our imports from the West Indies were, in 1895, $4,794,020, and in 1900, $1,105,829. I believe the figures which the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) presents to the House in the Trade and Navigation Returns relate to the entire West Indies. As far as I understand they are not confined to the British West Indies, and the figures I have just quoted are taken from his comparative statement. Now, on the contrary, I find that the trade of the United States, so far as the British West Indies are concerned, is increasing. In 1895 the trade of the United States with the British West Indies was $18,708,500, while, in 1900, it was $22,236,974. Both exports and imports have increased, while on the other hand there does not seem to be a very healthy state of affairs in respect to the trade relations between Canada and the West Indies. The point I am coming at is that the best possible solution of the difficulties that the British West Indies are labouring under, is the adoption of a preferential tariff throughout the empire. During the year 1899, Mr. I. C. Stewart, of Halifax, a very enterprising journalist who was interested in the trade of Canada with the West Indies, made a tour of the West India Islands and investigated the cause of the decline of our commerce with the British West Indies. He came to the conclusion, after carefully studying the subject in the different islands and after discussing it with the leading business men in the different islands, that a remedy might be found for that unfortunate condition of affairs. He believes that preferential trade within the empire would settle this difficulty. He says:

> For a time I found it difficult to make up my mind as to what should be done, and I seemed to be inclined to despond of any possible solution of the trouble, but, as I thought more deeply on the matter, it occurred to me that we might help to develop this trade by assisting the West Indies to find a larger market. If we could not give them that larger market ourselves, and recalling the important place that Canada now holds in the councils of the empire, it began to impress itself upon my mind that Canada might be able to bring to bear some influence upon the mother country to induce her to take the necessary steps to provide a market among her consumers for the sugar which the West Indies can produce, and would be producing, were it not for the unfair competition of the bounty countries. Preferential trade within the empire would settle this difficulty at once.

Then, he goes on to point out his views in regard to the way in which that might be worked out. That is a subject on which hon. gentlemen in this House, who are better acquainted with the trade relations between ourselves and the West Indies and who are better acquainted than I am in regard to the conditions prevailing there, are better qualified to speak than I am. I give this as the opinion of a man who has studied the subject and who has arrived at that conclusion in regard to it. What I suggest in the resolution which I am moving, is that we should now make an effort to achieve this purpose and surely I have placed sufficient evidence before the House to show that it is not such a forlorn hope that the government should remain supine and hold its hands from attempting to accomplish this end.

The third point in the resolution which I have placed before the House refers to the condition of affairs which exists between this country and Germany at the present time, and I am bound to say that I was astonished to hear the hon. Minister of Finance practically justifying Germany in granting a discrimination in favour of other countries and against Canada. I could not interpret his language in any other way and I am also astonished that neither in the speech from the Throne nor in any remarks which have fallen from the financial exponent of the government has there been any reference whatever to so important a subject as that which concerns this country in its trade relations with Germany. The situation as I understand it is that after the denunciation of the German and Belgian treaties a modus vivendi, or temporary convention, was arranged between England and Germany and that convention practically gave temporarily to each country the same advantages which had been enjoyed by each country under the former treaty, except that Canada was excluded from it. Thus it is, that, at the present time, as has been pointed out in an article on the subject in the 'National Review' of November last, Germany having two tariffs, one a general tariff, and one a conventional tariff, grants to the United States, our keenest competitor in that market, the advantages of the lower, or conventional tariff and insists that Canadian products shall be subject to the duties imposed by the higher or general tariff. The hon. Minister of Finance and the government seem to think that this is a matter as to which we have no right to complain, and as to which it does not behoove them to say a single word. Well, Sir, they have very excellent authority as to what this act of Germany means. Let me quote to the House what was said by the Marquis of Ripon in his despatch to the Governor General of Canada on June 28, 1895 :

> It must not be forgotten that, as I pointed out in my other despatches of this date, whilst the grant of preferential tariff treatment is a friendly act to the country receiving it, it is an unfriendly act to countries or places excluded from it.

The position of affairs to-day in the empire is this : Canada gave to Great Britain a tariff preference; gave to Great Britain an advantage by which the goods of Great Britain came into Canada at a lower rate than the goods of countries outside the empire. Germany, disliking this action of Canada; disliking the denunciation of the treaty, consents to a temporary renewal of the convention or treaty between England and herself but insists that Canada shall be excluded from it. Now, I do not know whether or not this is a correct statement of the actual position of affairs to-day. I take this from an article which seems to have been written by a responsible man in the National Review of November last. I say, that if this is the condition of affairs the Canadian government were extremely remiss in not dealing with the matter either in the speech from the Throne or the budget speech, and announcing to this country whether or not the government of Canada propose to sit calmly down and submit to that sort of treatment from Germany; whether or not the government of Canada have made any protest; whether Germany is to be allowed—on account of a preference which we granted, not to any foreign country but to Great Britain and certain of her colonies—whether Germany on account of that is to be allowed to do a friendly act to Great Britain and the rest of the colonies of the empire, and to commit an unfriendly act against Canada. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) told us that he did not know what Great Britain might do in the goodness of her heart if we granted this tariff preference. Surely the minister would not think that this is a very ample return for anything which we may have done.

But look at the result, Mr. Speaker. In 1896 we imported from Germany $6.493,000 worth of goods; in 1900 we imported $8,883,000 worth. In 1896 we exported to Germany $757,531 worth of goods; in 1900 we exported to Germany $1.715.000 worth. Our trade with Germany is developing; it would develop still further if we were not thus handicapped, for look, Sir, at the facts with respect to the trade between the United States and Germany. The trade of the United States with Germany, so far as imports are concerned, has increased by $3,000,000 since 1896, and so far as exports from the United States to Germany are concerned the trade has increased by no less than $89,000,000 since 1896. Germany grants to the United States a tariff preference. Under the tariff preference the United States exports to Germany have increased $89,000,000 in the last four years. We, because we granted a tariff preference to Great Britain, are practically excluded from the benefits of that trade and the Canadian government has not one single word to say to the country when it brings down the budget, and the Minister of Finance has not one single word to say with regard to it in his financial statement. Indeed, when this matter was dealt with by my hon. friend for Pictou (Mr. Bell), the Minister of Finance practically justified the course which Germany has pursued. I do not think that this country ought tamely to submit to treatment of that kind. I do not know of any reason why this country should not discriminate against Germany if Germany discriminates against this country. I have endeavoured to look into the treaty conditions between England and Germany and I have not found anything still outstanding which would prevent Canada from dealing with this matter in that way. I have pointed out in the resolution a means by which we might deal with matters of that kind where we do not have fair treatment in foreign markets.

With respect to our trade relations with the United States I do not desire to say much. I entirely concur with what was said, and very wisely said, by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), that so far as our trade relations with the United States are concerned, we must use every possible effort to maintain friendly and cordial relations with that country. I know that it has been suggested by a gentleman on the other side of the House, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), that our best course would be to raise our tariff to 50 per cent, which he says is the tariff rate of the United States. I am not prepared to say at the present time that I concur with that; on the other hand, I do say that our trade relations with the United States demand the attention of this government. I think we might well have had some statement from the financial exponent of the government and from so great an authority as the Minister of Trade and Commerce with respect to that. Our resolution which we have brought before the House is broad enough to cover a matter of that kind, if it is thought wise to deal with it; but, as I have said, I do most heartily concur with the view that so far as the great country to the south of us is concerned, we should do nothing which should be misunderstood by that republic and which might provoke a breach of the very cordial relations which at present exists between the two countries.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry indeed to have detained the House at such great length, but I was obliged to do so because I had a great many extracts—more than I liked—to read to the House. Just one word in conclusion. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has taunted us with the suggestion that we are likely to remain in opposition, as he says, for the next 25 years. Well, I do not know that the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) is in a much better position to form an opinion in regard to that than the rest of us. But I would like to say this: I am sorry that the minister (Sir Richard Cartwright) did not see fit to put any higher ideal before members of this House and before any political party in this country, than the obtaining or retaining of power. I understood the hon. gentleman to suggest that such is the greatest possible good to any political party at any possible cost. There are, Mr. Speaker, things of more importance to any political party in this country than to obtain power or even to retain power. I think, Sir, that an honourable adherence to honourable principles professed in opposition or in power is a thing more to be regarded than even the obtaining of power itself. I think the upholding of the standard of public opinion in this country, the upholding of the standard of public life in this country, is of more importance to any political party than the obtaining or retaining of power. I think that to stand for the unity of the people of this country and to suppress any cry of race or creed that may be raised, is a matter of greater importance to any political party in Canada than is the effort to obtain or retain power. For my part, speaking for the party I have the honour to lead in this House, I say that we shall endeavour to carry out the principles which we have professed in this resolution and the principles which we have at all times professed in the past; of endeavouring to uphold the industries of Canada, to develop the resources of this country, to maintain the integrity and unity of the empire. In doing this, Sir, I think we shall be discharging our duty, and if we discharge our duty, I am sure that we need not fear the issue. Mr. Speaker, I beg to move the resolution of which I have already given notice, as follows .—

That all the words after 'that' in the proposed motion be left out, and the following substituted therefor :

That, in the opinion of this House, the welfare of this country requires a pronounced policy of adequate protection and encouragement at all times to the labour, agricultural, manufacturing, mining and other industrial interests of Canada ;

That, in the opinion of this House, the adoption a policy of mutual trade preference within the empire would prove of great benefit to the mother country and to the colonies, and would greatly promote the prosperity, unity and progress of the empire as a whole, and that the present time, when the Commonwealth of Australia is laying the foundation of its fiscal system, is particularly opportune for taking prompt and energic steps towards the furtherance of this object.

This House is further of opinion that equivalent or adequate duties should be imposed by Canada upon the products and manufactures of countries not within the empire in all cases where such countries fail to admit Canadian products and manufactures upon fair terms, and that the government should take for this purpose all such available measures as may be found necessary.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, from the first day of this session there have been rumours whispered from ear to ear through the corridors of this House and sometimes heard also in the streets of this city, that the new opposition of His Majesty, when once constituted and organized, would spring upon us a surprise in the shape of a new fiscal policy. As time went on statements were made in the press that this new policy would surprise the government and stagger the Liberal party as soon as it was announced. We have it now, fresh and brand new, from the lips of my hon. friend, and lo and behold, it is the same old national policy.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The PRIME MINISTER. The same old national policy, with a few adornments which, instead of taking from its native deformity, only add to it. It is the same old national policy which we have fought in past elections, and which, after an experience of some twenty years, has been twice rejected by the people at the polls. There was nothing new under the sun some three or four thousand years ago ; there is nothing new in the Conservative party to-day. I take the motion of my hon. friend, as you have just had it from his hands, and it reads as follows :—

That, in the opinion of this House, the welfare of this country requires a pronounced policy of adequate protection and encouragement at all times to the labour, agricultural, manufacturing, mining and other industrial interests of Canada.

I take up the famous resolution which was moved in this House twenty-two years ago, and it reads as follows :—

This House is of the opinion that the welfare of Canada requires the adoption of a national policy, which, by a judicious readjustment of the tariff, will benefit and foster the agricultural, the mining, the manufacturing and other interests of the Dominion; that such a policy will retain in Canada thousands of our fellow-countrymen now obliged to expatriate themselves in search of the employment denied them at home.

This is the policy repeated in the resolution of my hon. friend the new leader of the opposition ; and my hon. friend tells us, and apparently seriously, that the policy which he now reaffirms, has had a great success. But he forgets that though it was designed to keep our own people at home, yet one result of that policy was that his own province lost one representative in this House. The hon. gentleman also tells us that he wants to go back to the principles of the national policy and have them re-enacted. Let us cast a glance at what that policy has done. At the time the national policy was adopted in 1880, the trade of the country amounted to $203,000,000 ; in 1896, when it was put an end to, the trade of the country had increased to $239,000,000, an increase of $36,000,000 in sixteen years. In 1896-7, we adopted a new tariff—a revenue tariff, as I shall explain in a few minutes—and in the course of four years the trade of the country increased to $381,000,000, an increase of $142,000,000 in the four years. On this comparison of the results of the policy adopted by this government and the results of the policy proposed by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, I leave the people and the House to judge of the merits of the two policies.

It is refreshing, however, to hear the statement made by my hon. friend, in view of the attitude which has been maintained by his party ever since this debate has commenced. We have had the statement made by these gentlemen day in and day out that the present tariff is still a protective tariff, that there is nothing changed, that we have the same policy that we had up to 1896. If the tariff which we have at the present moment is the same protective tariff which we had formerly, what is the use, I want to know, of taking up the time of the House to argue that we should have a protective tariff? Why should we have this new proposition solemnly made by my hon. friend, 'that in the opinion of this House the welfare of this country requires a pronounced policy of adequate protection,' when these hon. gentlemen tell us that we have adequate protection to-day?

But, Sir, I care not by what name the policy of the present government is characterized. I care not whether it pleases my hon. friends on the other side to call it protection or free trade or a revenue tariff. There is only one difference between us and gentlemen on the other side of the House. We agree with them that the revenue of the country ought to be levied by means of customs duties; but there is this difference between us, that while they would levy those duties only for the benefit of individuals, we levy them for the benefit of the revenue first and foremost.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have been dilating on the idea that the present tariff is a protective tariff. So far as protection is an incident of the tariff, there is no doubt that it is. There is a great deal of protection yet in the tariff, and there must be a great deal of protection in any tariff of customs duties. If we impose a duty of 25 per cent on an article of any kind whatever, it is manifest that the manufacturer of similar goods in this country must have the benefit of 25 per cent in favour of his goods. So far there is a great deal of protection in the tariff; if I were to express my own mind, perhaps I would say there is more in it than I would desire. But we have to reckon according to the condition of things that exists to-day. We have to maintain a tariff of customs duties; but, again I repeat, the difference that exists between us and gentlemen on the other side is this. Our first consideration, in imposing duties, is to produce revenue and if, as an incident, the manufacturers derive advantage, they are welcome to it. But gentlemen on the other side imposed duties not with the view of levying a revenue and putting money into the treasury, but of putting money in the pockets of private individuals. There is the difference between the two policies. Which of these policies is to prevail in this country? Is it the policy of protection pure and simple of hon. gentlemen opposite?

Mr. MACLEAN. Hear, hear.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend says hear, hear. I am quite content to abide by the result. Is it to be the policy of protection pure and simple or that adopted in 1897, not based on protection, but in which protection is an incident? The result of the policy adopted in 1897, is that the country has never been so prosperous.

Mr. MACLEAN. But that is not free trade as they have it in England.

The PRIME MINISTER. If these hon. gentlemen when they quote my words, would do me the simple justice of quoting them in their entirety, and not clip out a part of any utterance of mine, they would find that at no time have the Liberal party ever pretended that, if they came into power, they would adopt immediately free trade as it is in England. But what we have said again and again is that while we believe in free trade as a theory, we know that we are bound to raise a revenue by a customs tariff, and it will take many years before we could have free trade as it is in England. But apart from this, there is this consideration to be borne in mind. There has never been a period of time in the history of Canada when our manufacturing industries were so safe and secure as they are at present. If you had a tariff based, as in the years from 1879 to 1896, upon a protection basis, you would have the duties continually changed from one year to another, as was the case in those days. You would have, as we had under the late government, an incessant procession of tariff tinkerers from the different cities of Canada to the office of the Finance Minister. There never was a year from 1879 to 1896—or at least there never was a period of three years—when there was not some tinkering of the tariff. One man would find that some invention in the United States or Great Britain had lowered the prices of the products he was making, and instead of exercising his enterprise and ingenuity to overcome the difficulty, instead of putting more money into his business, he came to the Finance Minister and obtained some modification of the tariff. Then what happened? It was then found that the man who was benefited by the change in the tariff was producing an article which was the raw material of some other industry. These other manufacturers came to the Minister of Finance again, and again there was more tinkering. But when the public at large understand that they have nothing to fear, when they know that the basis of the tariff is not to please this one or that one but to raise a revenue, they are aware that so long as the financial conditions remain as they are, there is to be no change in the tariff whatever, and instead of looking forward with dread to the deliverance of the budget speech, as used to be the case in former years, they know there will be no change and no reason to fear. They know that there will be no change in the tariff except when a general revision of it becomes necessary. This is the policy which we propose to maintain and upon which we take issue with hon. gentlemen opposite.

Now, I come to the other part of my hon. friend's resolution which is in these terms :

That, in the opinion of this House, the adoption of a policy of mutual trade preference within the empire would prove of great benefit to the mother country and to the colonies and would greatly promote the prosperity, unity and progress of the empire as a whole.

With regard to this policy, I am ready and willing, and even anxious to engage the issue with my hon. friends opposite. Let us understand, first of all, where we are. They want a mutual preference with England. Well, before we lay that policy before the Canadian people, let us understand well what is the object of the Conservative party. My hon. friend has said that they are protectionists, that they stand upon the old policy of protection. Protection against whom ? Against the United States ? Yes. Against Germany ? Yes. Against France ? Yes. Against England? Yes. Their policy is a policy of protection against England as well as every other country. This fact has been made plain to-day by my hon. friend. Before I go further I want it to be well understood on both sides that the main object which the Conservative party has in view to-day and which they will carry out, should they attain office again, is to maintain the policy of protection against Great Britain as well as every other nation in the world.

Mr. MACLEAN. Hear, hear.

The PRIME MINISTER. This was laid down only a few days ago by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell). My hon. friend delivered himself as follows on this point :

That question was settled in 1879.

He was speaking of the question of protection in favour of Canadian industries :

One of the objections made at that time to the establishment of a protective tariff in Canada was that it was an unfriendly act towards Great Britain, a country which depended upon its manufactures, which prized its foreign trade. It was argued then that possibly the British government might even disallow our protective tariff on the ground that it was striking at British trade. But the men of that day who passed the national policy, who put the national policy into operation, had considered all these things, they met the objection that it was an unfriendly act to Great Britain, they faced that bugbear, for bugbear it was, they were not frightened by it, and they faced that consideration in 1879, and settled it then. Their protective tariff was not hampered or impaired, or emasculated, by sentimental consideration for the manufacturers of Great Britain. Nothing of the kind was allowed to affect the efficiency of the national policy at that time, and nothing of the kind should be allowed to affect the efficiency of the national policy to-day. Therefore, I say if this administration is ever brought to their knees, when pressure of hard times will come to the manufacturing industries of this country, and bring them to that point where they will approach the government for relief, if this government is then going to maintain the position of a protectionist administration, it will have to look carefully into the effect of this preferential tariff.

If the hon. gentleman meant anything, he meant this, that so strong is the view of the party to which he belonged in favour of protection, that in its favour even the preferential tariff had to give way. There is no ambiguity in this policy. We know where we are. The policy of these hon. gentlemen is to maintain protection against Great Britain.

Before I go further let me say this, and I do not say it by way of rebuke or reproach, that if these hon. gentlemen believe that protection is the best policy for Canada, they are quite right in applying it against Great Britain. For my own part, although I am devotedly attached to Great Britain, if a conflict of interests were ever to take place between us, I would stand by my native land. Therefore if hon. gentlemen on the other side believe that protection should be maintained against Great Britain, I have no fault to find with them. But in the name of common sense I ask them if they believe in a policy of protection against Great Britain, what can they say if the people of Great Britain believe that a policy of free trade with all the world is the best protection they can have ?

Why, Sir, there must be the same rule on one side as on the other. If it is to be protection of Canada against Great Britain, it must be protection of Great Britain against Canada. Or, if the same rule should apply on either side, how are you going to speak of mutuality of preference where you have protection in Canada and free trade in Great Britain ? These gentlemen will go to Great Britain in order to proffer their policy of protection for Canada and a preference for Canada in the British markets. Why, they will be told by the people of Great Britain : You may believe in protection, but we believe in free trade, and if you will not give us a preference we will not give you a preference ; and if you maintain a policy of protection against us, we shall maintain a policy of free trade, which is most in our own interest. I know that these hon. gentlemen hope, and even believe, that the people of Great Britain are turning their backs upon the policy of free trade. They see the day coming, as they think, when Great Britain will become protectionist, as it was at one time. But if that is their hope, in what position will the Canadian producer be if the views of the Canadian Conservatives are to prevail in England ? Canada will be a protectionist, and so will Great Britain—and what mutual preference could you have under such circumstances ? Let us consider this case as we should then find it. I suppose that my hon. friend (Mr. Borden, Halifax) will obtain power some day. I will not discuss the exact time when that will come about. He found fault with my suggestion of a period of twenty-five years in opposition for him. Well, if he objects to that, let us say that he obtains power in fifty years. After that, he goes to Great Britain to present the view he has advocated here—for he cannot attain the object of his policy unless there is mutual and concurrent action by Great Britain and Canada. He goes to Sheffield, or Manchester, or Birmingham, or some other of the great business and manufacturing centres of Great Britain. He speaks before a meeting of working men, and says : We have a trade policy to propose to you ; the agriculture of Great Britain is inadequate ; it cannot feed you, and you have to import your food from all parts of the world. Canada cannot to-day, but by-and-by will be able to supply the whole of your food requirements : Give us a preference in your markets ; put a duty on corn, butter, cheese and everything that you eat that comes from abroad and that we can grow, but exempt from that duty all the products of Canada. The workingman would probably say : For the sake of the bond that exists between us I might put a tax on our food and exempt the products coming from your country ; but you know that I am a maker of manufactured products and I want a market for my goods ; I want a market in Canada ; and, since you want us to exempt your products from taxes, no doubt you will exempt our products from duty when we send them to your markets. But my hon. friend will say : No, I do not propose that ; I am a protectionist, and believe in protection for our Canadian manufactures ; therefore, I do not propose to exempt your products from a tax which affects products of all kinds ; but, while I do not propose to exempt your products from taxation, I want you to exempt our products from the tax which I wish you to put upon the products of other countries. Do you not think that the workingman will say : This is a rather cool proposal ; you want me to tax my food for your benefit, but you are not prepared to exempt my products from taxation for my benefit ; you want me to allow you to smite me on the right cheek and then have me turn the other cheek to be smitten also. Such a policy would not be received in Great Britain—it is not to be taken seriously.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

The PRIME MINISTER. It is not a thing to be discussed seriously.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

The PRIME MINISTER. Hon. gentlemen will insist upon that ; but, unless they are prepared to change their ground, they cannot hope to have a hearing before the British public. I have put forward the supposititious case of my hon. friend sending a delegation to Great Britain to make that proposition. But the thing has been done already. Time and again there have been delegations to make such propositions. In 1896 there were delegates to the Congress of Chambers of Commerce of the empire, who came before the British public with such a proposition. Mr. Osler, not then a member of this House, who was one of the delegates to that congress, moved this resolution :

Whereas, in view of recent events, and the attitude of other nations towards Great Britain, and of the fact that there exists within the British Empire resources in men and materials and arable land for its every requirement ;

Whereas, while the trade legislation of other nations is framed to subserve their local interests, all British trade and other legislation should aim to secure within the empire a union of interest of a federal character, and the policy of each British community should be designed to retain within the empire subjects whose labour would otherwise go to foreign lands ;

Whereas, Canada has already formed a basis for closer relations with the mother country and other colonies by building a highway across British America, by creating steamship connections between Vancouver, Hong Kong, New Zealand and Australia, by offering a large subsidy for fast Atlantic steamship service, as well as by her established precedent of confederation, making for British unity ;

And whereas, closer commercial relations between the mother country, her colonies and dependencies will be hastened by further subsidizing fast steamship services and completing postal, wire and cable communication with the different portions of the empire, thus making such routes for commerce, food supply and munitions of war the fastest and most secure from attack ;

Resolved, that in the opinion of this congress, the advantages to be obtained by a closer union between the various portions of the British Empire are so great as to justify an arrangement as nearly as possible of the nature of a zollverein, based upon principles of the freest exchange of commodities within the empire, consistent with the tariff requirements incident to the maintenance of the local government of each kingdom, dominion, province or colony now forming part of the British family of nations.

Now, mark this resolution. It is worded so as to convey one idea. It meant a zollverein—not as we usually understand a zollverein, because that implies free trade among the parties to it, but a zollverein modified by 'the tariff requirements incident to the maintenance of the local government, or each kingdom, dominion, province, or colony.' With this restriction, this motion could not be adopted. It had to be withdrawn. Then Sir Donald Smith—as he was then—moved this motion :

Whereas, the stability and progress of the British Empire can be best assured by drawing continually closer the bonds that unite the colonies with the mother country and by the continuous growth of a practical sympathy and co-operation and all that pertains to the common welfare ;

And whereas, this co-operation and unity can in no way be more effectually promoted than by the cultivation and extension of the mutual and profitable interchange of their products ;

Therefore, resolved, that this congress records its belief in the advisability and practicability of a customs arrangement between Great Britain and her colonies and India on the basis of preferential treatment, and recommends that steps should be taken by Her Majesty's government to bring about an interchange of opinions on the subject between the mother country and other governments of the empire.

Resolved, that in the opinion of this congress, the advantages to be obtained by a closer union between the various portions of the British Empire are so great as to justify an arrangement as nearly as possible of the nature of a zollverein based upon principles of the freest exchange of commodities within the empire consistent with the tariff requirements incident to the maintenance of the local government of each kingdom, dominion, province or colony now forming part of the British family of nations.

This resolution differed a good deal from the resolution moved by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler), but it contained the last paragraph, which meant that there should be a zollverein, or some slight modification of it. Even this the Congress would not accept, and defeated it. The resolution which was finally adopted is this :

That this Congress of Chambers of Commerce of the empire is of opinion that the establishment of closer commercial relations between the United Kingdom and the colonies and dependencies is an object which deserves prompt and careful consideration. The congress, therefore, respectfully represents to Her Majesty's government that, if the suggestion should be made on behalf of the colonies or some of them, it would be right and expedient to promote such consideration, and the formulation of some practicable plan by summoning an Imperial conference, thoroughly representative of the interests involved, or by such other means as Her Majesty may be advised to adopt.

So the whole subject was left in an inchoate state, after the representatives of Canada had gone to England in order to impress upon the British people the necessity of having, not an absolute zollverein, but a union in which all the parts would be free to have such a tariff as they wanted. This whole proposition had to be abandoned, and the scheme could not proceed any further. Again the scheme was attempted last year, and the hon. member for Toronto East (Mr. Kemp) offered the following resolution :

Whereas it is generally recognized that an advantageous commercial bond is the strongest link in national unity, and that the maintenance and strengthening of trade is the keystone of a state's successful development ;

And whereas the existence of an empire is largely dependent upon the material prosperity of its people ;

Therefore be it resolved : That in the opinion of this congress the bonds of the British Empire would be materially strengthened, and the union of the various parts of Her Majesty's Dominion greatly consolidated by the adoption of a commercial policy based upon the principle of neutral benefit, whereby each component part of the empire would receive a substantial advantage in trade as the result of its national relationship.

Further resolved : That in order to make the foregoing operative, the Chair should appoint, before this congress dissolves, a representative and proportionate committee of home and colonial delegates to devise a scheme of this nature, and report to this or a similar commercial congress, and that a copy of this resolution be officially forwarded to the home and colonial governments concerned in the proposition.

Even this proposition, mild as it was, could not be carried, but it was defeated by an amendment which, however, was withdrawn almost immediately. Then we know what took place, the Minister of Finance referred to it some time ago. A committee was appointed to call upon the Prime Minister and lay their views before him, but the Prime Minister would not even receive them. Baffled at every point, they thought they would go to Mr. Chamberlain, not officially, but in an informal capacity, in order to put their views before Mr. Chamberlain, and he answered giving opinions which are altogether the adverse to those which have been advocated in this House. Mr. Speaker, if we are at any time to obtain mutual preferential trade between Great Britain and Canada—and more than once I have stated that for my part I think it would be a great advantage for Canada—but if we are to obtain it, upon what conditions can we have it ? We can have it perhaps on one condition, but we cannot discuss it unless we have that condition, we cannot even discuss it as long as we have a protective tariff, or a customs tariff in Canada. That is the position which has been taken again and again.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The PRIME MINISTER. But it is somewhat difficult to convince hon. gentlemen, it is difficult to convince men who do not want to be convinced ; it is difficult to be heard when men will not hear you. It is difficult to convince men when they do not want to see. Hon. gentlemen opposite are like the pagan idols, they have eyes but they do not see, ears but they do not hear. Here is the language of Mr. Chamberlain upon this point, which has been quoted again and again, delivered before this very Congress of the Chambers of Commerce in the year 1896 :

But up to the present time we have not been agreed as to the methods by which this object may be reached. It appears to me that there are only three lines of progress which have been suggested to accomplish this great object. The first of them is a proposal that the colonies should abandon their own fiscal system and should adopt ours, that they should carry out fully the doctrines of free trade, that they should open their markets not only to us but to all the world, and that they should abandon entirely the protective duties upon which now they rest very largely for the revenues which they collect. That is a proposal which is supported by the Cobden Club, by the extreme, or perhaps I may say by orthodox free-traders, and there is no doubt a good deal to be said for it. I do not deny that possibly it might be to all concerned the best solution ; at the same time I am bound to point out that that would not bring about commercial union in the sense in which we have generally understood the word, because that would be in the direction of cosmopolitan union, but it would offer no particular advantage to the trade of the empire as such. But what is to my mind a much more fatal objection is the fact that, speaking generally, the colonies will not adopt this proposal.

I think he was speaking truly there.

We must consider it, therefore, as a council of protection, and if we are to wait until the colonies generally are converted to our views in regard to the advantages of free trade, let us recognize the fact that we must postpone the hope of commercial union to the Greek Kalends. General free trade in this country has been developed, no doubt, to the great advantage of this country for the period of half a century, but in spite of that it has made no converts. We do not find—again I am speaking generally because I know there are exceptions—that there is any considerable approach to our system on the part of the colonies, and there is no approach at all to it on the part of foreign countries. Well, I pass on to the second proposal which has been laid before a similar congress to this, which found expression at the great congress at Ottawa a year or two ago,—that is a proposal which has been favoured by some of our principal colonies and described with great force and elegance by leading colonists, and it is the very reverse, in spirit at any rate, of the proposal which I have just been considering ; for whereas the first proposal requires that the colonies should abandon their system in favour of ours, this proposal requires that we should abandon our system in favour of theirs.

That is bringing the proposition to its true basis.

It is, in effect, that while the colonies should be left absolutely free to impose what protective duties they please both upon foreign countries and upon British commerce, they should be required to make a small discrimination in favour of British trade, in return for which we are expected to change our whole system and to impose duties on food and on raw material. Well, I express again my own opinion when I say that there is not the slightest chance that in any reasonable time this country, or the parliament of this country, would adopt so one-sided an agreement. The foreign trade of this country is so large, and the foreign trade of the colonies is comparatively so small that a small preference given to us upon that foreign trade by the colonies would make so slight a difference, would be so slight a benefit to the total volume of our trade, that I do not believe the working classes of this country would consent to make a revolutionary change for what they would think to be an infinitesimal game. Well, you will see that so far we have only arrived at a deadlock. We have a proposal by British free-traders which is rejected by the colonies, we have a proposal by colonial protectionists which is rejected by Great Britain.

That is the true position.

We have, therefore, if we are to make any progress at all, to seek a third course in which there should be give and take on both sides—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The PRIME MINISTER. Hon. gentlemen had better wait a little before they cheer.

—in which neither side will pedantically adhere to preconceived conclusions, in which the good of the whole shall subordinate the separate interests of parts. And I admit that, if I understand it correctly, I find the germs of such a proposal in a resolution which is to be submitted to you on behalf of the Toronto Board of Trade. What is that resolution? I hope I correctly explain it. That resolution I understand to be one for the creation of a British Zollverein or customs union which would establish at once practically free trade throughout the British Empire, but would leave the contracting parties free to make their own arrangements with regard to duties upon foreign goods; except that this is an essential condition of the proposal that Great Britain shall consent to replace moderate duties upon certain articles which are of large production in the colonies. Now, if I have rightly understood it, these articles would comprise corn, meat, wool and sugar, and perhaps other articles of enormous consumption in this country which are at present largely produced in the colonies, and which might be, under such an arrangement, wholly produced in the colonies, and wholly produced by British labour. On the other hand, as I have said, the colonies, while maintaining their duties upon foreign imports, would agree to a free interchange of commodities with the rest of the empire, and would cease to place protective duties upon any product of British labour. That is the principal of the German Zollverein; that is the principle which underlies the federation of the United States of America; and I do not doubt for a moment that if it were adopted it would be the strongest bond of union between the British race throughout the world. (Cheers.) I say that such a proposal as that might commend itself even to an orthodox free trader. It would be the greatest advance that free trade has ever made since it was first advocated by Mr. Cobden, to extend its doctrines permanently to more than 300 millions of the human race, and to communities many of which are amongst the most thriving, the most prosperous and the most rapidly increasing in the world. On the other hand, it would open up to the colonies an almost unlimited market for their agricultural and other productions.

Now, that is the condition upon which the man who has been relied upon to favour the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, says that you can negotiate free trade within the empire. If hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House are ready to go to England and negotiate upon that basis, they may do so. They can agitate public opinion upon that basis, but so long as they go to England as protectionists it is the essence of absurdity—I can use no other word—for them to expect a hearing. That is not the only occasion upon which Mr. Chamberlain has spoken upon this subject. He spoke a few months ago at the last congress of the Chambers of Commerce which took place in June, 1900. In parliament, in 1900, on the floor of the House of Commons he spoke again on this subject. Speaking on the motion of the hon. member for Elland, he said :

The hon. member for Elland referred to a proposal which has been made by the London Chamber of Commerce for a fiscal arrangement with the colonies, which is, indeed, a proposal for an Imperial Zollverein. I have never done anything of the sort. It is one of those mistakes of which I am so largely the victim, and which perhaps it would hardly be worth while to contradict until the occasion becomes urgent. All I have done is to point out that, following the language used by Lord Ripon, my predecessor, if there is to be any kind of fiscal arrangement with the colonies, the only form which I myself think would be viewed with the slightest favour in this country would be an Imperial Zollverein, in which there should be free trade between the whole empire, and duties of some kind as against other countries. But I have not proposed that; I have only stated that that alone seems to be a proposal which might be seriously considered.

Allusion has been made very often to my trip to England and to the position I took there. The position I took there was this: I acted like a reasonable man, I saw at once that it could not be possible, so great is the free trade sentiment in England, to have a mutuality of preference so long as we continue to levy customs duties upon English goods. But, the moment we are ready—it may take a long time, but I hope that some day it shall come—to discard our tariff, the moment we come to the doctrine of free trade, then it is possible to have a commercial mutual preference based upon free trade in the empire. There is free trade to-day between seventy-five million people in the United States, there is free trade between forty million Germans, there is free trade between thirty-six million Frenchmen, and if it is possible to have free trade between 300,000,000 of British subjects you would have the greatest commercial policy the world has ever seen. But, how can hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House hope to have any hearing whatever so long as they go to England and say : We will protect ourselves against your goods and at the same time we want you to give us free trade for our goods ? The thing is absurd. That is the policy that hon. gentlemen are proposing.

I come to the third proposal of my hon. friend in his resolution. I may say that I am glad to hear the declaration made by the hon. gentleman on this subject, and I think it is a considerable back down from the terms he has proposed in his resolution. In his resolution the hon. gentleman says :

This House is further of opinion that equivalent or adequate duties should be imposed by Canada upon the products and manufactures of countries not within the empire in all cases where such countries fail to admit Canadian products and manufactures upon fair terms, and that the government should take for this purpose all such available measures as may be found necessary.

When I read this resolution before it was commented upon by the hon. gentleman, I assumed that it applied to the United States which maintains a high tariff against us, and I would not be prepared to adopt it upon this ground. I am glad that the hon. gentleman has taken a more sensible view and that he takes the position that however unfair we may think the United States tariff is against us, it is not practically enforced against us, because it is directed against and it applies to the whole world. However unfair we think it, my hon. friend thinks it would not be right for us to follow in the same direction and elevate our tariff as high as the United States tariff is.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Will the right hon. gentleman (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) allow me to interrupt him ? I said that I was not prepared at present to coincide altogether with the views of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), but that I thought that the trade relations between this country and the United States was a subject that might fairly claim the attention of the government.

The PRIME MINISTER. I might fairly claim the attention of the government. Well, I thought it claimed the attention of the opposition also, but I am wrong in believing that. My hon. friend says : I wash my hands of the whole thing, the government may consider it, but as to this I do not advise. I have no objection to advise as far as Germany is concerned, but as far as the United States are concerned I do not advise. Well, if the hon. gentleman will not advise, I will. I have no hesitation in facing the situation. And when hon. gentlemen opposite, because we must assume that my hon. friend is voicing the sentiments of his friends upon this subject, tell us that we should elevate our tariff to the height of the American tariff, I take issue with them altogether. The tariff of the people of Canada is to be determined by the people themselves not from any consideration of the tariffs of the United States or of other countries, but simply of the consideration of what best suits the Canadian people. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House cannot maintain their doctrine; they would be blocked at the first step that they would take if they were to try to elevate our tariff to the height of the American tariff. I will take one or two articles. The American duty on wool is 11 cents per pound. Our duty is practically nil; wool is practically free. Would hon. gentlemen opposite advise us to elevate our tariff to the height of the American tariff on wool? Would they propose to raise the duty on wool to 11 cents a pound because that happens to be the duty imposed under the American tariff? The thing is absurd. Hon. gentlemen know that it cannot be done and they simply placed before the people a proposition there which the hon. leader of the opposition recants but which may go abroad here and there because it may affect this or that interest. Let us face the situation bravely like men, let us resolve that whatever may be the American tariff we shall be guided only by the measure of what is in our own interest in this respect. In regard to the German tariff, I have a word to say to my hon. friend. I find no fault with the manner in which he has approached this question. This is a question of some importance and which deserves to be very seriously considered. Some years ago we found that the treaty of Great Britain with Germany was a great block in our path. It affected our commercial liberties. We could not give a preference to Great Britain because we would have to give it to Germany.

For years and years the Conservative party when they were in office tried to get these treaties abolished, but they could not succeed. When the Liberal party came into power they were at once successful in that direction. It is refreshing to hear the explanation given us the other day by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) as to the manner in which we accomplished that which his political friends failed in accomplishing for many years. He told us that by our preferential tariff we blundered into such a position that it forced the hand of the mother country. Well, I would not quarrel with the hon. gentleman as it is past six o'clock, but whether we blundered into it or not, yet if we did blunder into it, I call his attention to the fact that even when we do blunder we can accomplish things that he and his friends in power could not accomplish even by design?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The PRIME MINISTER. And so, if we blundered and if they designed, they failed in their design and we carried our point. Sir, if we forced the hand of England to denounce the German treaty it is not because we had any hostility against Germany; it is not because we did not want to trade with Germany, but simply because we wanted our freedom of action restored to us. In this we succeeded. My hon. friend (Mr. Borden, Halifax) told us truthfully that there were two tariffs in Germany; the general tariff and the conventional tariff; the general tariff being the higher and the conventional tariff the lower. Great Britain negotiated a new treaty and obtained the advantage of the conventional tariff. The United States to-day have the advantage of the conventional tariff, and I am not without hope that we also shall have some day the advantage of the conventional tariff. But before we bring this question to the angry discussion of parliament and of the country, my hon. friend (Mr. Borden, Halifax) will agree with me that we should exhaust every confidential mode of obtaining this object. And when we have adopted every confidential mode that we can adopt, then if we fail we shall have to come before the House and frankly say that we have failed, and we may have to adopt some other method. But until that time arrives my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) will, I think, agree with me that it is better to leave this matter to be dealt with confidentially between the Imperial government and the Canadian authorities.

There is one thing as to which I am glad to agree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden, Halifax). In his peroration he uttered some very noble sentiments which I trust shall find echo in North Bruce the day after to-morrow. The hon. gentleman told us that he was adverse to having anything like racial questions introduced. I do not know if his attention has been drawn to the paragraph in the paper which is his organ, if he has an organ in North Bruce, and which referring to the contest now going on in that constituency spoke of the 'Tarte-Laurier combination.' This 'Tarte-Laurier combination' referred to in that style in a Conservative paper published in a riding where a contest is now pending has a meaning which we all understand very well. It has a meaning the very reverse of the language spoken a moment ago by my hon. friend (Mr. Borden, Halifax) when he stated that he did not want any racial cry raised in this country. I trust that his words therefore will go to North Bruce to be pitted against the language of the newspaper which supports his candidate in that election.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at Eight o'clock.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE (West York.) Mr. Speaker, before you left the Chair this afternoon, we had a very interesting address from the right hon. the First Minister ; and we had a very able presentation of the case of the Conservative party by our honoured leader, the member for Halifax (Mr. Borden). I wish to make some remarks upon the speech of the right hon. leader of the government; and if at the present moment I do not take up all the points he referred to, I shall endeavour to do so at some stage of my remarks before I sit down.

The First Minister was exceedingly surprised to find that the Conservative party of this country adhered to the national policy—that that policy which they had inaugurated, and which they had continued during the time they were in power, should be their policy to-day, with changes necessary to the changed conditions of the country. And he might very well be surprised, because, looking at the record of the Liberal party in this House, we find that they never were consistent, they never adhered to the policy which they proclaimed. They proclaimed a policy of free trade, and they abandoned it ; they proclaimed a policy of commercial union, and they abandoned it ; and it was a surprise to them, judging by their own standard of right and wrong, and of consistency, that the Conservative policy should have adhered to the professions which they had made. He dwelt very much upon the contrast, as he called it, between the two political parties. He said the distinction was this : We arranged our tariff to produce a revenue ; they arranged theirs to put money into the pockets of a few people. Well, I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman, or the Finance Minister, who is here, what about the bounty on pig iron and steel ? They have made a tariff to give away $3 of the people's money to the manufacturer of pig iron for every ton produced, and $3 per ton more when that pig iron is converted into steel or wrought iron—a total of $6 a ton. Why it will be simply a payment of a million or more dollars per annum—and we are told that that is a policy for revenue. The Minister of Finance has told us that enormous sums will be paid out during the present year on this account, and increased sums during the years that are to follow. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman, is that a revenue policy ? There never was a more transparent fraud than the attempt to prove that their tariff is a tariff for revenue only. When you examine into it carefully, you find that it is a tariff for the purpose of helping their friends very largely. If we judge by the fact that during the campaign just over there were enormous amounts of money in every constituency where it was required, for the purpose of defeating the will of the people, we can say that the policy of subsidies was one which produced a very large revenue for the supporters and members of the government.

Mr. KENDALL. Some of us did not find it so.

Mr. WALLACE. I am sorry for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. KENDALL. So am I.

Mr. WALLACE. If the hon. gentleman was one of those left out in the cold because the money was not evenly distributed, there was lots to go round.

Mr. KENDALL. We had to fight the Canalian Pacific Railway Company, and we also had to fight the Dominion Iron and Steel Company.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman can tell that to the marines. I am not bound to believe it.

Mr. KENDALL. We will give the hon. gentleman a little more light later on.

Mr. WALLACE. The First Minister told us to-night that theirs was a revenue tariff, while ours was a protective tariff ; and then he discussed at great length the usefulness of going to England to get a reciprocal preference in the markets of Great Britain for Canada and the other possessions of the empire. He said you cannot go to England with a protective policy, and get them to give you any preference. But he goes there, he says, as a revenue policy government. But, Mr. Speaker, he had just told us that it was not a protective policy. We are not in power ; we cannot go. Hon. gentlemen opposite are in power ; it is they who would have to do it. According to his statement, they would go to Great Britain and say : We are not protectionists, but free traders ; we are coming to free trade as rapidly as we can ; and we come to you in Great Britain to ask you to give us a preference in your markets, as we are giving you a preference in our markets. The First Minister, in his whole speech, was dealing with a case which did not exist, if what he had said to the House a few moments before was true.

But he argues that you cannot have a protective policy and get a preference in British markets. Why not ? We go to Great Britain, and we say : We have taken off one-third of the duties as a preference to Great Britain ; we do not ask you to adopt a protective tariff, except in a moderate degree to give a preference to the other possessions of the empire. They have declared their willingness to do that.

An hon. MEMBER. When ?

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Chamberlain himself, in one of his speeches, said: You come to us with any proposition ; it is not for us to go to you to make an offer; but you come to us, and we will treat you in the most liberal spirit ; we will not make it a question of profit or loss for the British Empire, but we will deal with you as citizens of the same empire, we will treat your requests with the greatest consideration. He invited not only Canada, but the other possessions, to go there and make the offer ; and Canada in that matter had struck out the course for the others, because she was the dominant power, the premier representing about six millions of people. He said : We do not want any preference ; we are becoming a free trade country, and we do not want any preference in your market at all. He made a mistake ; he did more than that, Mr. Speaker—he committed a crime against the people of Canada ; because the Hon. Joseph Chamberlain had invited them especially to go to him with their requests, and there never could have been a more opportune time than that for Canada and the other possessions to have given and received reciprocal concessions which would have benefited the empire and placed all the colonial dependencies in a state of prosperity such as they never had seen before. The First Minister, when he told us that, was merely touching a question which he was afraid to meet. But what more did he tell us ? Of course, he told us the old story that never was the country so prosperous, never was trade so great, as at the present moment. That is the answer we always get ; but it did not go down with the people of Ontario at the last election, when we heard that cry on every platform, because they knew that the prosperity of the country was not due to the efforts of the Liberal party, but was in spite of their efforts. But there was another significant statement made by the First Minister. He said to the House to-night : We are not going to disturb the tariff; what we want is permanence and stability. In fact, he said, we are not going to have a procession of tariff tinkers coming down here to disturb the tariff of this country. Mr. Speaker, tariff tinkers have come down here. They came down in 1877 and 1878, and they said to the government of that day : Our industries are languishing and being destroyed ; the competition of the United States and other countries is destroying the manufacturing industries of this country ; our farmers are having their markets invaded by the farmers of the United States, and every industry in this country is being destroyed, and we come to you and ask for redress. But they were dismissed with a wave of the hand, and told that the government knew all about it, and the people did not know anything. The tariff tinkers, as the right hon. gentleman calls them, who came down asking for redress on behalf of the people, were sent home. The right hon. gentleman was a member of the government at that time himself ; he was one of those responsible for the sending home of these men who had come to complain of the gross injustice of the tariff of that day. But the people rose in their might and dismissed those high and mighty men who are to-day adopting the very same programme. The right hon. gentleman has said: We are not going to hear those tariff tinkers. The men from all parts of Ontario, who came down the other day to make representations to the government on behalf of the beet sugar industry, instead of having proper attention paid to their demands, are to-day told by the First Minister : Oh, you tariff tinkers, get out ; we do not want to see you ; just as soon as we wish we will make a tariff to suit ourselves. What is that tariff to be ? The right hon. gentleman has told us. He has told us that there will be no change until his government is ready to make a great change looking towards free trade. The woollen industry may be destroyed, other industries may be destroyed, but this great powerful government, intoxicated with their own vanity, drunk with the idea of their greatness, sends all complaints back with disdain and scorn and says to them : We do not want to see you; we know better than you the conditions of the affairs of this country, and we will make no change in the tariff. We will adopt the old Tory doctrine: Let everything stand as it is, no progress, no improvement, no wrong to be righted. This great government folds its arms and will do nothing until the time comes when it can move in the direction of free trade.

This is a warning that the people of Canada will read to-morrow with amazement. The right hon. gentleman told us that we cannot have protection and a preference. I should like to know why. We can go to Australia and can say to that country: You are making a tariff, which will probably be very largely a protective tariff, we will make a bargain with you. We will give you a preference in the markets of Canada over foreign nations, and we ask you to give us a preference in yours. You cannot send a man too soon to interview the commonwealth of Australia and see if we cannot make trade relations with that colony, which will be mutually advantageous to both.

At the conclusion of his speech the right hon. gentleman expressed himself as very much aggrieved because he said the racial cry was being raised, and he gave as evidence the heading of an article read by my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) : 'The Tarte-Laurier combine.' Well, 'The Tupper-Foster combine' was all right when the Conservative party was in power. Why then does the right hon. gentleman object to the Tarte-Laurier combine ? Is he getting ashamed of his colleague ? But what about the hon. gentleman himself ? Have we not read his speeches when he addressed his fellow-countrymen in the restricted sense, because we are all fellow-countrymen in Canada in the larger sense. But he never went to address a French gathering in which he did not refer to them as his fellow-countrymen, because of their French origin. I have read reports of his speeches, and in these he was wont to say: I am a Frenchman and am proud of it. The same blood flows in my veins as runs in yours, and I want your votes on the ground that we are all French. That is what the First Minister said time and again.

The PRIME MINISTER. I never did.

Mr. WALLACE. I read reports of his speeches time and again when he made that statement.

The PRIME MINISTER. Never.

Mr. WALLACE. Did the right hon. gentleman never say he was a Frenchman ?

The PRIME MINISTER. Over and over again, but I never said I wanted their votes because I was French.

Mr. WALLACE. I did not say that the right hon. gentleman told them that.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. WALLACE. I did not say that he told them that, but I say that was the logical and straight conclusion.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, why should he say it at all ? When I address an audience, have I ever told them that I am an Irishman because my father and mother came from Ireland ? Never in my life. Never have I gone to an audience and appealed to them in that way. I have appealed to them as a Canadian—not an Irish Canadian, or a French Canadian, or a German Canadian, but simply as a Canadian citizen —and because the programme I approved was the best for the citizens of Canada. But the First Minister has time and again said : I am a Frenchman, and I am proud of it, and the same blood runs in my veins as runs in yours. What was that said for ? Is it any difference that a Frenchman is First Minister of the Dominion ? What was the meaning of all that? Was there anybody attacking him because he was a Frenchman either there or anywhere in the Dominion of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes, yes.

Mr. WALLACE. I for one have never heard of it.

Mr. KENDALL. Let me tell the hon. gentleman——

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman need not tell me because I have heard him once or twice state some things that were not so, and I do not want to hear that kind of thing again. I say that such language in my opinion is unworthy of a Canadian statesman. It is raising a racial cry. What was this said for ? 'I am a Frenchman, and am proud of it, and the same blood that runs in my veins runs in yours.' It means one thing and one thing only.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as to some of the statements made by those who preceded the First Minister. We listened to the Finance Minister (Hon. Mr. Fielding) last Thursday with something of surprise at the change in his attitude. Hitherto he has always been jubilant, he has always been rampant, always spreading himself over the greatness of this Dominion and the prosperity that prevails throughout the country. The other day, it is true, he told of a surplus last year, and said that he had reduced the debt of the country by $770,000. He said that on two other occasions the debt of the country had been reduced. But he did not tell us, as in all fairness he might have done, that in one year, in 1882, the debt was reduced by three times as much.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Not so much—the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) might as well be accurate, seeing he likes accuracy.

Mr. WALLACE. My figures are accurate.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I stated that the debt was reduced by a large sum.

Mr. WALLACE. But the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Fielding) did not state the sum, he took care not to mention that it was reduced by several millions.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It was under a million.

Mr. WALLACE. No, it was over two millions. I said the hon. gentleman might have been more candid and have told the facts, instead of simply stating that there were large reductions. When the hon. minister announced his surplus and said there was to be a reduction of the public debt for the year, the cheers that went up from hon. gentlemen opposite no doubt did his heart good. But this was when he was speaking of the past. He was obliged to face the future. He said : Surpluses may be a very good thing, but we cannot have them always. As to the future, we are going to have a surplus of $6,400,000 next year, but we are going to have an expenditure on capital account of $10,300,000. This would mean an addition to our indebtedness of nearly $4,000,000. But the hon. minister, I do not know by what means figured it out at about two millions—he allowed less for the sinking fund, I suppose, or some little game of that kind. But that was quite a surprise to those behind him. They would hardly understand that the good state of affairs was not to continue. This sent rather a cold blast over the spirits of the new members. But there were some who were ready. The old campaigners were ready to cheer the minister whatever statement he might make. More particularly I noted that the gentlemen who sit immediately around the ministers, those five or six who are supposed to be anxious that ermine should be cast over their shoulders, those gentlemen who, if report is to be credited, have been clamouring to be appointed to judgeships throughout the country, did not hesitate, but cheered and applauded. They could applaud anything, they could do anything, to help the government out of a difficulty. When the emergency food question was up, they could swallow any quantity of the emergency ration. When it was necessary to burke inquiry into the Huron and Brockville elections, these gentlemen were selected for the task, and nobly they performed their duty. Their friends, Cap Sullivan, Duncan Bole and the rest of the gang were to be protected at all hazards, and these gentlemen protected them in the committee and in the House. And they are ready to do it again. They are ready to do anything. What do they care ? With a judgeship coming up, why should not they earn it ? So, things are not looking so well for the Liberal party for the future. The Minister of Finance tells us that we have been going up year after year and that we are now on the crest of the wave. And he said we were going to stay there. But, Mr. Speaker, you cannot stay on the crest of the wave—it is a physical impossibility. If you have ever been a navigator, you know that you cannot stay on the crest of a wave, you know that you have to go somewhere—and you go downward. That is the way that the minister of the nautical metaphor—he is going to go downward. He was warning the people. And why ? Because all his predictions and those of his colleagues were falsified. The hon. gentleman announced that in four years after they came into power they spent $21,300,000 on capital account. And, after the manner of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte), who said 'wait until you see us next year,' the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Fielding) took us into his confidence to the extent of announcing that he was going to spend about ten and a half millions on capital account this year if I took his figures correctly.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think it was ten millions.

Mr. WALLACE. That will make almost $32,000,000 spent on capital account. But these hon. gentlemen tell us: It is true we are spending large sums of money, but we are developing the resources of the country and are enabling the people to earn more. But, with this vast expenditure on capital account and this enormous increase in the expenditure on account of consolidated fund, the Minister of Finance feels bound to come and tell us: You must look out for squalls; you cannot expect that in the future we are going to have a continuance of this era of great prosperity; we are going to take a rest so that we may be strengthened and refreshed; and, at some time in the future resume our vigorous efforts. And so they see the signs that the prosperity which they did nothing to bring about and which they cannot keep from being overcome by an era of adversity—they know they are helpless—must inevitably decrease.

The Minister of Customs has furnished us with a report of the trade of the country during the past five months, from the 1st of July to the last of November. During those five months, as was mentioned by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell), there have been decreases in every item of the exports of this country except gold and manufactures, which I presume came from the Yukon, and in which there was an increase of about fifteen million dollars. That large production of gold in the Yukon was due in no sense to the efforts of the government. They had made no roads, furnished no facilities to open up and develop the country, and give the miners an opportunity. They had imposed a royalty of 10 per cent, handicapping the miners, which they now declare to have been a mistake, because they propose to reduce it to 5 per cent. There were increases in manufactures to the amount of $1,600,000. Our exports of fish decreased in those five months, compared with the five months of the previous year, by $836,000, the exports of the forest decreased by $1,380,000, the exports of animals and their products decreased by $1,567,000 ; miscellaneous decreased by $131,000, and bullion by $586,000; making a decrease in the great staples of the country of between four and five million dollars. No wonder the ministers are becoming alarmed, no wonder they are now sounding a note of warning because the export of the country is leaping up, the expenditure on capital account and for running the government has reached such enormous figures that the people are becoming alarmed.

Now, there is another reason. They said, and the First Minister repeated to-night, that when we were in power we were going to stop all emigration from the country, we were going to give employment to the people at home. So we did, and we prevented these men from going out of the country, because we built up manufacturing establishments and Canadians were employed in them. We opened up Manitoba and the North-west Territories, we sent tens of thousands of young Canadians up there who otherwise would have gone to the North-western States. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said last year that they had stopped all that. They have not stopped it. Last year household effects, which is the only test they can give us as to the emigration from Canada, amounted to $1,165,000, notwithstanding the great era of prosperity we are enjoying, and that is about the amount under the period of depression when the Conservative party were in power, in 1893-4-5. So, Mr. Speaker, there was reason why these gentlemen sounded a note of alarm.

They say : Look at the trade of this country, grown to greater proportions than ever before, the business of the country amounting to $381,000,000. The total trade of the country is measured by imports for home consumption and exports of Canadian produce. The hon. gentleman put the imports at $189,000,000. There were to be deducted from that, as the Minister of Finance himself admitted, $4,750,000 of American Indian corn, which they had put as a product of Canada and exported, and which they admitted was not the product of Canada, but simply grain going through in transit. Deduct that from the imports and the exports, deduct the wheat which went through in the same way to the amount of $4,370,000, and flax, $1,039,000, making a deduction altogether of $10,170,000. Now take the exports. There were $191,000,000, and they add to make up that sum, $5,500,000, which they say was short, that was not reported in the customs house. I do not believe they should have any such figure. I believe that the machinery we have in force to-day, with the enormous army of customs officials, and the fact that business is done better than it formerly was, prove that there is really no large amount to be added to exports. I deduct that, and you have $186,433,000. Deduct from that $21,000,000 for exports not produced in Canada, and you have a total showing of $165,000,000 of exports and $176,000,000 of imports. You have $10,500,000 of trade against the Dominion of Canada. The imports exceed the exports by $10,500,000.

Now, Sir, notwithstanding all that has been said about the balance of trade, the peeople of England to-day are inquiring what the balance of trade means. It means nothing more nor less, in the case of Canada, than this : If you import $176,000,000 and export $165,000,000, you are $11,000,000 short in your accounts.

Mr. KENDALL. Not at all.

Mr. WALLACE. You cannot demonstrate to me in any way you like that a country is becoming rich, especially a country like Canada, where the exports are millions of dollars every year less than the imports. Take an individual. He brings to his farm $2,000 worth of goods every year for consumption, and he sells $1,500 worth every year ; in a long course of years he will inevitably become poor, he will become a pauper, he will be driven off his farm. The same rule will apply to a nation. They ask us to look at Great Britain. Great Britain is becoming rich, although the imports are very much greater than the exports. That is true. But they are doing a great deal of business for other countries. They have the ships that carry the produce to and fro, they have the control of the banking business, they do the buying and the selling, and they have profits on all this business. But to-day they are asking themselves the question whether they are not living on the profits they have made in former years ; and they will come to the conclusion, when they examine into it, that they are living upon the profits that they have formerly made.

Now, there is another matter. When some hon. gentlemen on this side of the House called attention to the preference that we are giving to Great Britain and criticised it, the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) demanded from hon. members on this side of the House that we should get up and move for its repeal, which would be, in his opinion, disloyal and improper. The right hon. First Minister went over the same story to-night. It was something sacred, it was the symbol of the loyalty of the people of Canada to give a preference to Great Britain, and if the Conservative party dared to interfere with it they would be branded with disloyalty. I would like to know, and I would like somebody to tell me, when these hon. gentlemen were put in the position of claiming to be the loyal party in Canada. During every emergency the Conservative party have fairly stood up for the connection with Great Britain, when these men sneered at us, and when the right hon. First Minister told us that he preferred the American dollar to the English shilling, thus sneering at the connection between us and Great Britain. He was looking at the mighty dollar. Their whole course, from the time that they proposed commercial union, that would have allowed American goods to come in free of duty while British goods will have to pay a duty, has been disloyal. That was a disloyal position to take because it would end only in one thing if carried out, and that would be in severing our connection with the mother land. When we dared to say that we wanted a preference in the markets of Great Britain the right hon. gentleman told us that we could not have it, and declared that it was disloyal to even think of touching the preference that we were giving to Great Britain. Who are these gentlemen who are going to teach the Conservative party loyalty ? Is it the hon. Minister of Finance, who, in a speech which he made in Halifax—not in a speech but throughout a whole campaign—advocated the smashing of confederation, advocated the secession of the province of Nova Scotia from the Dominion, and not only advocated the secession of Nova Scotia, but asked the neighbouring provinces of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island to join with him in smashing confederation. Yet, that hon. gentleman comes to us and preaches loyalty. Here is his speech :

The interests of New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia are alike in this matter. All these provinces have been sacrificed to the confederation. I trust this question of separation from Canada will be brought up by independent members in both provinces, and fairly discussed. Bad as is the position of the two provinces in the union, it will become worse if Nova Scotia secedes. Maritime interests will be weaker than ever at Ottawa, and there will be little chance for the New Brunswickers and the Islanders to obtain justice. They will have everything to gain by joining Nova Scotia, and I am satisfied that if the movement be taken up with vigour in our sister provinces the demand for separation from Canada will be made, not by Nova Scotia alone, but by the three maritime provinces. But if New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island are content to occupy their present position, or the weaker one which they would occupy after the withdrawal of Nova Scotia, they must be permitted, of course, to take their own way. We shall take our way, and demand for Nova Scotia alone separation from the Dominion, though we would much prefer joint action, because we have always felt that the provinces down by the sea have a unity of interest, and that in co-operation we might bring about results which would go far to make the people of our country prosperous. I believe the people of Nova Scotia will at the approaching elections throw off the yoke of Toryism, and that in our province particularly we shall have a grand victory for Liberalism and repeal.

That is one of the hon. gentlemen who get up on the floor of this House and preach loyalty to us. I think he would have done much better if, looking at his past record, he had kept very quiet about that question. Then we have the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), and the two other hon. members who endorsed him the other night and took such a position that the right hon. gentleman had to repudiate it—as disloyal an attitude as an hon. gentleman ever took in the parliament of Canada.

The PRIME MINISTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. WALLACE. The First Minister laughs, and says 'hear, hear.' I am glad to have his approval in that matter. Of course, it may be that, as last year it was a little game played on the House and on the country. It may be that the hon. member for Labelle was put up to make that speech so that the Prime Minister could make his superloyal speech and spread himself in the House and in the country. It has been so stated, and the speech of the First Minister rather lent weight to that statement.

The PRIME MINISTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. WALLACE. We know what the right hon. gentleman said when the people were proposing to assist the mother land when war was declared in South Africa. We know the attitude he took then: We could not, we would not assist Great Britain. We had passed a resolution by a unanimous vote a few months before in the House of Commons. With what result? Why, the ink was hardly dry until circumstances compelled us to make a choice, and the right hon. gentleman made his choice that we would not, we could not go to the aid of Great Britain. The overwhelming voice of the loyal people of Canada made the First Minister turn about as he had often done before and therefore it came quite easy to him, and he consented to send a contingent to South Africa. Then, there is another hon. gentleman who professes loyalty to us—the hon. Minister of Public Works. He spoke in Guelph on Friday last. He made quite a speech, and gave us a lecture on loyalty, telling us how we should be good Canadian citizens, and he was going to invite himself to come to Ontario and have a constituency there. When I look at myself for a moment, I see that the electors of Ontario, and particularly of West York, are very generous. They do not look too particularly at their candidates, but, we must draw the line somewhere, and I think there is not a constituency in Ontario but would draw the line at the hon. Minister of Public Works. He has invited himself. I wait to see whether any constituency in Ontario will invite him. It would be particularly hard up for public works before that would be done. But, he says that he is going to come to Ontario, not only to tell them that he is going to be a candidate in Ontario, and that he has always deprecated the racial and religious cries that we now have to-day in North Bruce, but, he says that he is preparing to come even to the Orange order and ask the young men there why they are opposed to the Liberal administration. If he comes to any meeting of the Orange Association, or where the Orangemen are, I will guarantee that he will receive fair treatment. After he has done making his harangues in Ontario, which are very much different from those in Quebec, I have no doubt many of the audiences will ask him: Are you the Mr. Tarte who said, when a Canadian contingent was being sent out: Not a man, not a dollar will be sent? Are you the same individual? Are you the man who made a speech at Laval University a few months ago in which you said:

> One of the paramount duties of the French members of the House of Commons was to show that they were Frenchmen.

Are you the Mr. Tarte who said:

> I am a minister in a British government; I take the liberty to call myself French, but if it is desired that I should declare myself a British citizen and it is desired to prevent myself calling myself French, then I refuse to call myself a British subject.

They would no doubt ask him was he the Mr. Tarte who said these things. They would ask him: Are you the man who put up the tri-colour above the Union Jack on the ships under your command down in the St. Lawrence.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. WALLACE. Our friend over there says : 'Hear, hear.' There is another Tarte in the House. They would also say: Are you the gentleman who had an interview in Paris; a disloyal interview in which you said :

We have to make pretenses of our friendship and our loyalty to Great Britain because it would lead to difficulties if we did not.

They would also ask him: Are you the Mr. Tarte who denounced the Fox Bay settlers on Anticosti Island as murderers, without having a particle of evidence to prove it, and are you the gentleman who had to withdraw that statement, and withdraw it with very bad grace indeed. They would ask the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) all these questions and a great many more. They would also ask him: Are you the gentleman who in a court of justice a short time previous to the elections stated that you were not worth a dollar, and who afterwards said in the House of Commons that you had bought La Patrie with your own money for $30,000 cash, and had bought a royal residence almost, for which you had paid cash too. And then they would ask : Where did you get the money. They would load up the Minister of Public Works with so many inconvenient questions that I think he would be rather sorry that he came up there even if he got the good hearing that is proverbially characteristic of an Ontario audience. Therefore, I say, Mr. Speaker, that we do not require to have lessons in loyalty from the member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), from the Finance Minister (Hon. Mr. Fielding), from the First Minister (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier), nor from the Minister of Public Works. The record of the Conservative party is one of loyalty and consideration for the mother land.

Mr. BOURASSA. Except when Home Rule Bill is moved in England.

Mr. WALLACE. Except when Home Rule Bill is moved in England.

Mr. BOURASSA. Then comes the Kingston speech.

Mr. WALLACE. That Kingston speech that I made was an exact repetition of a speech of Lord Salisbury, which met with the approval of the British people. And my remarks met with the approval of the loyal people of Canada too and were approved by the parliament of Canada. I have said, Mr. Speaker, that these gentlemen opposite were not disturbing themselves very much in the interests of the people of Canada. The First Minister said : We should not be bothered with those tariff tinkers; they are a great nuisance, and the Minister of Finance told us how the bounties to be given on steel and iron were to be charged to capital account in the future and removed from being paid out of current account as has been usual in the past. The fact is that if we are going to give bounties the only proper way is to pay them out of current revenue, and not borrow the money to pay them. If you pay $1,000,000 in bounties on the production of $2,000,000 worth of steel or iron produced at the Sydney mine, almost the whole of that steel is sent out of Canada to Europe, and the moment it leaves this country Canadians receive no further benefit from it. We are told now that although this material is not going to be used in Canada it will be charged to capital account. If you construct public works out of capital account the people of Canada own these public works, and if you give subsidies to railways, these railways add to the wealth of the Dominion and are an advantage to the people, but this $2,000,000 worth of iron and steel that goes out of the country is never more seen here. All it is worth to the Canadian people is the labour it gives in producing it, and yet we are told that the bounties on it are to be paid out of capital account in the future. Well, why does the Minister of Finance do this ? It is because that next year the minister or this minister should have a surplus of a million dollars, he will say that his government is running the affairs of the country well so as to get that surplus, whereas if the two million dollars that he will pay in bounties were charged to revenue as it should be, he would have to face a deficit of one million dollars. But, the Minister of Finance wants to prepare himself for something that is coming, and so he wants to have the iron and steel bounties struck from being a charge on the revenue and placed in capital account. I protest against that kind of book-keeping.

Again, Mr. Speaker, we were told to-day, as we were told on Thursday last by the Minister of Finance, that the beet-root sugar men may look for no consideration from the government of Canada. We are told that the government would give them some benefit in letting them have their machinery free of duty. Well, that was done last year. As a matter of fact the question stands in exactly the same position as it was a year ago, because there is not a dollar's worth of beet-root sugar machinery made in Canada to-day. There is not a beet-root sugar factory in Canada, and therefore this pretended concession is no concession at all. It is a negative concession anyway, and it is not worth a cent unless the industry is established here. It costs the government nothing and it is worth just about that to the beet-root sugar industry. I was present at the deputation of the beet sugar men which waited on the government last week, and the members of that deputation made out an extremely strong case although they were told by the government that nothing could be done for them. We imported last year 366,000,000 pounds of sugar and syrups valued at $8,350,000, the freight on which from far-off lands would be certainly $1,000,000 ; making it cost to the people of this country, $9,350,000 ; and there was $2,380,000 of duty paid on it ; making it altogether $12,000,000 when it arrived in the Dominion of Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it has been proved by that deputation of gentlemen who were here, and who knew what they were talking about, and by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), who has made a most exhaustive examination of this question, that beet-root sugar can be made in Canada. We can grow the beets, and we can make the sugar. Beet roots grown in Canada have as large a percentage of saccharine matter as beets grown in any other country. The gentlemen desiring to establish this industry come to the government of Canada and ask for a bounty to enable them to establish factories. We were told that it would cost at least $500,000 to establish each factory, and that it would take about 30 factories to supply the Dominion. It is difficult to get these men to put their money into the industry, because if the Conservatives came into power to-morrow, I have no doubt they would strike off that $2,380,000 of duty to commence with. But the government turn a cold shoulder to them ; they do not want any tariff tinkers to come here to bother them ; they want to enjoy their well-earned luxuries and rest; no trouble or worry for them. We are to have $6,400,000 of a surplus, the Finance Minister tells us, and to give a small percentage of that to build up an industry in the country which will save $12,000,000, and give that $12,000,000 to the farmers and manufacturers of Canada, will never do. It could not be done ; it would never be done ; and the First Minister sent them about their business. He said : They are tariff tinkers, and we will give them warning to keep away for all time.

Another industry of enormous importance to this country has evidently been treated in the same way. In the Kootenay country they are producing enormous quantities of silver, lead and copper ores. They ask to have smelters and refineries established there. A resolution which was passed by the Trail board of trade, says :

> Whereas, there are at the present time no lead refining works in the Dominion of Canada, and the initial cost of establishing such a plant is very great, it is the opinion of the association that the Dominion government should encourage the establishment of such a plant by the grant for a term of years of a bounty of $5 per ton on all lead of Canadian origin smelted and refined in Canada.

We are robbed by the United States tariff to-day on our lead and silver ores ; and these people come to the parliament of Canada, as they have a right to come, and they get the cold shoulder and a point blank refusal. The exports of these ores last year were :

	Quantity.	Value.
Lead	19,800,000 lbs.	$ 678,000
Copper ore and matte..	13,000,000 lbs.	1,387,000
Silver	2,283,000 oz.	1,354,000

A total value of $3,420,000, not speaking of the nickel, which amounts to more than $1,000,000. For the last four months the production amounted to $2,500,000, showing how rapidly the production is increasing. Last year hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions, of dollars could have been saved to the people of this country if we had the smelting and refining works in Canada. All that is required is a subsidy of $5 a ton on silver lead ore, which is worth $60 or $70 a ton ; so that $5 per ton is equivalent to 7 per cent—that is all they ask. The Finance Minister thinks it is a very nice thing to give a bonus of 55 per cent on pig iron ; but 7 per cent is asked on lead ores, and it is refused. I would like the Finance Minister to tell us by what rule of fair-play the government give 55 per cent bounty on pig iron, and refuse to give 7 per cent on silver lead ores ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Will my hon. friend allow me to say that there is an application before the government on that subject ? I do not say what may be done with it, but it is not correct to state that the matter has been disposed of and the application refused.

Mr. WALLACE. The Finance Minister announced no tariff changes.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. This is not a tariff question at all.

Mr. WALLACE. The First Minister told us to-night that there would be no tariff tinkering, and we are told now that this is not a tariff question at all. I have in my hand the prospectus of the company which the Finance Minister knows something about—the Dominion Iron and Steel Company, Limited, of Sydney, Cape Breton, Canada—a company which an hon. gentleman has told us was working so strenuously against him that they got him elected. This company say in their prospectus that they are going to produce next year 400,000 tons of pig iron, 75,000 tons of steel blooms, and 325,000 tons of steel rails. They say :

> If the production from the company's works be as estimated, 300,000 tons of pig metal and 60,000 tons of steel blooms in 1901, and thereafter 400,000 tons of iron and steel per annum, made from Newfoundland ore, the bounties to be received from the Canadian government will be as follows :—
> 1902..... 2,075,000

And this is only one of the refining works of all those that are being established all over the Dominion. We are having them at Collingwood, at Midland, and in successful operation and prospering at Hamilton ; and we shall have them at many other points in the Dominion. This company, according to the prospectus, will be getting in 1902 $2,075,000 of the money of the good people of Canada ; and in what proportions are they getting it :

After crediting the value of the by-products from the coke ovens, the cost of our pig iron should not exceed $5.50 per ton, after everything has been reduced to steady practice.

On an article worth $5.50 they are going to get a bounty of $3, 55 per cent of the cost is to be paid by the people of Canada. It is a pretty liberal concession.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman's former leader (Sir Charles Tupper) wanted to make it $3.

Mr. WALLACE. The ost of our pig iron should not exceed $5.50 per ton and the government gives a bonus of $3 on every ton made from a Canadian ore.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It is not Canadian, the ore is Newfoundland ore, and the former leader of the opposition wanted to pay the full $3.

Mr. WALLACE. The late leader of the opposition was very anxious to have Newfoundland brought into confederation and treated as one of the family. But I find that the present government have not turned their hands to assist in any way in getting Newfoundland into confederation. They have treated her as a foreigner and an alien. They have done nothing to accomplish what we considered most important for the future of this country, for our fishery interests, and our interests in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and the late leader of the opposition was most anixous that something should be done. But I am speaking of the Minister of Finance.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Not correctly.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, let me read still further :

To encourage the manufacture in the Dominion of iron and steel, parliament has granted bounties as follows :—

On pig iron, per ton of 2,000 tons to the 21st April, 1902, from native ore $3 and from foreign ore $2; on steel, $3.

From April 21st, 1902, to 1st July, 1903, from native ore, $2.70 ; foreign ore, $1.80 ; steel, $2.70.

The next year, native ore, $2.25; foreign ore, $1.50 ; steel, $2.25. The following year, native ore, $1.65 ; foreign ore, $1.10 ; steel, $1.65.

And so on, reducing the bounty until it disappears entirely. This company estimates —and I assume it is stating the facts correctly—if not the Minister of Finance can denounce them for speaking false statements with intent to deceive the people of this Dominion—this company estimates that in 1901 it will have obtained from the Canadian government, $870,000 ; in 1902, $2,075,000 ; in 1903. $1.850,000 ; 1904, $1,450,000, and so on. No wonder that the Minister of Finance is going to take that little account out of the current revenue and borrow the money and charge it to capital. Then the bounty is not limited to the iron and steel industry in Cape Breton, but all the other refining works and smelters in Canada are to be treated on the same terms, and let the hon. the Finance Minister estimate any figure he chooses to add to this $2,075,000 and see how much he will have to pay out altogether.

Yet, when the beet-root sugar industry, that is going to start thousands of farmers in this country and make an expenditure of $12,000,000 among the people and save the money we send out of the country to-day, asks for a bonus, those asking it are dismissed and called a lot of tariff-tinkers by the high and mighty gentlemen who are ruling this country

The hon. leader of the opposition called attention of this House to the fact that the German tariff was distinctly hostile to Canada, and that Canada has to pay 50 marks, or 9·82 cents, a bushel more duty on grain than is charged American product On rye we pay 9⅛ cents more than the Americans. On oats we pay 4⅛ cents more, peas 3¼ cents, corn 2½ cents. This was brought about by the blundering of this government. They first gave Germany and Belgium a preference in the markets of Canada, and a year later they repealed that preference. Why did they repeal it ? Either they had not intended to give it to Germany or Belgium at all, in which case they were blundering, or else they changed their mind and took it away. By their conduct they angered the German people, and the result is that the United States have a preference of 10 cents a bushel on their wheat over Canada. We had opened in these two countries a great market, which was rapidly growing, for the wild goose wheat which they required for certain purposes, but when the Americans got the 10 cents advantage, the price of wild goose wheat, which had gone up higher than the fall wheat of Ontario, dropped again, because the markets were closed to it. So with many other agricultural products. The United States have a preference over us in those markets, and we have not heard that the Canadian government have taken any steps to have it removed. Have they gone to the German government or made any effort whatever to get the same fair treatment as the United States ? No, Sir. And yet we do not put up such a high tariff against the Germans as do the United States. We import eight and a half million dollars' worth of goods from Germany and only send one and three-quarter millions, so that we could make a very strong case, but I have never heard that this government have ever bothered their heads about it. Too much like tariff tinkering perhaps, and they do not want to bother with it, but just stay quiet and enjoy themselves.

What about the United States ? Our productions are largely the same as those of the United States. We permit American goods to come in at a moderate tariff. The leader of the opposition said to-night that it was his most anxious desire we should live on the most friendly and amicable terms with the people of the United States. I reciprocate that sentiment, but I think the best way to do so is to look very closely after our own interests. Let us make a tariff that will suit ourselves, and if the American people charge high duties on Canadian products, let us protect our farmers by charging high duties on their products. We charge a duty on eggs of three cents and they charge five cents a dozen. On butter, we charge 4 cents a pound, while they charge 6 cents a pound. On cheese, we charge 3 cents a pound, while they charge 6 cents a pound. On apples we charge, including the duty on the barrel, 40 cents a barrel, while they charge 25 cents a bushel, which would be nearly 75 cents a barrel. On beans, we charge 15 cents a bushel, while their duty is three times as much—45 cents a bushel. On peas, green, our duty is 10 cents a bushel, while theirs is 40 cents a bushel. On peas dry, the duty on our side is 10 cents, while theirs is 30 cents a bushel. On potatoes we charge 15 cents a bushel, while they charge 25 cents a bushel. On hay we charge $2 a ton, while the charge is $4 on the other side. On barley our duty is 30 per cent, which, at prevailing prices, would be about 12 cents to 14 cents, while they charge 30 cents per bushel. On corn meal our duty is 25 cents per barrel, while they charge 20 cents a bushel of 48 pounds, or at least two and a half times as much as the Canadian duty. Indian corn we admit free, while they charge a duty of 15 cents a bushel. On oats, our duty is 10 cents per bushel, and theirs is 15 cents a bushel. On oatmeal we charge 20 per cent or, say, 60 cents per barrel, while they charge 1 cent per pound, which would be about $2 a barrel. On wheat, we charge 12 cents a bushel, while they charge 25 cents a bushel. On wheat flour our duty is 60 cents per barrel, while theirs is 25 per cent, which would amount to 50 to 80 per cent more. In hops, we charge 6 cents, while they charge 12 cents. As to live stock, they charge duties, which, if not prohibitory, are enormously large. On horses, their lowest duty is $30 apiece. This is when the horses are worth under $150, but if they are over that the duty is 25 per cent, which would bring it to $347.50 or over. On cattle they charge 27½ per cent on those over a certain age. On live hogs, the duty is $1.50 per head. The effect of all these things is to shut the Canadian farmer out of the United States market, while the American farmer has easy access of the Canadian market, and takes advantage of it too.

This is shown by the fact that the exports of Canadian agricultural produce to the United States amount to about $6,750,000, the imports of agricultural products from the United States into Canada far exceed that amount. Then there is another point to which I would like to draw special attention—the grievance under which the market gardeners suffer. The early products of the season are those for which the highest prices are paid and on which the greatest profits are realized. Being to the south of us, of course, the American gardener has special advantages in this respect. The market gardeners here have built up a great industry ; they have hothouses and other property used in this business to an enormous amount, some of the establishments representing an investment of tens of thousands of dollars. This industry, in my opinion, should receive adequate protection. The government of this country are being asked to consider the market gardeners' grievances—and it is a grievance of the whole people of Canada. The American to-day gets the profit which the Canadian market gardener ought to get. We should look after our own interests. A few years ago, the duty on pork and beef was not high enough to protect us from the invasions of the farmers of the United States. Delegations came down here and represented the case to the government of Canada, and immediately the government put on a strong protective duty. The result is that to-day we have a pork and beef industry which not only controls the market of Canada but has built up such an export trade that Canadians are proud of it. We send to the markets of Great Britain millions of dollars' worth of the finest bacon in the world. This was accomplished by acceding to the request of the tariff tinkers, the farmers of Canada who came here and represented the case to the government. So, we want protection for the market gardeners. We want protection also for the agricultural implement makers. Last year we imported from the United States agricultural implements to the amount of $1,815,000, while we imported from Great Britain, excluding scythes and reaping hooks and shovel blanks, agricultural implements to the amount of $1,015.

This $1,815,000 worth of implements that we import from the United States should be made in Canada by Canadian artisans. But we shall ask in vain for any change, because the government do not want any tariff tinkering until they are ready to come down with the free trade tariff.

Closely allied with this is the question of looking for markets throughout the world. These hon. gentlemen told us that if they were brought into power they would secure markets everywhere. They told us that they would go to the United States, and before you could say 'Jack Robinson,' they would have a reciprocity treaty with the United States that would bring great prosperity to Canada. But they were in power two years before they turned their hands over on this question. They should have taken it up at once, because it was immediately after the presidential election. They waited until September, 1898, before they sought a conference. They met the other delegates, sat for a short time and then adjourned, and met again. To-day, after nearly five years of these hon. gentlemen in office, we are no nearer reciprocity than we were when they came into power. I think we may fairly ask that they wind up negotiations and tell us what they were doing, either proceed to get a reciprocity treaty or say they cannot. They have not been a business government, they have in that respect falsified their pledges to the people of Canada, they have been derelict in their duties.

More than that, there are markets elsewhere. There is a great trade in South Africa. What have these gentlemen done, what has the Minister of Agriculture done, who boasts about his cold storage, fussing around and doing nothing ? We had an interesting statement from the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Smith) the other night, who knows the business of the exportation of apples. We exported $2,500,000 worth of apples. That business is capable of enormous expansion. We grow the best apples in the world. We ought to have control of the markets of the world. The government is asked—and they are bound to do it if they do their duty—to supply cold storage and other facilities that are required in order to land these apples in the markets of Europe. Have they done so ? The Minister of Agriculture has been dancing around doing nothing in the interests of the apple-growers of Canada. I was saying that they should be looking for markets everywhere. In South Africa last year Great Britain sent $63,000,000 worth of products, the United States sent $10,000,000, and Canada only sent $66,547. The United States sent 150 times as much as we did, and Great Britain sent about a thousand times as much as we did. What steps have the government taken to build up a business there ? New Zealand, a country with an area of 104,000 square miles, against our 3,500,000, and with a population of about 800,000, compared with our 6,000,000, has decided to put on a monthly line of steamers to run directly to South Africa, in order to overcome the disabilities in sending merchandise by way of Melbourne and Sydney. Here is a country with one-seventh of the population of Canada, making these efforts to build up a trade with South Africa. Now, what are the materials sent to South Africa :

Agricultural implements and tools, $738,000 ; ale and beer, $503,958; apparel, $3,217,592 ; boots and shoes, $2,486,361 ; butter and cheese, $994,-829; carriages, $682,000; cotton and manufactures of, $4,738,000; hardware and cutlery, $3,978,000; leather, $595,000 ; machinery, agricultural and other, $5,204,000.

We are the great manufacturers of agricultural machinery in the world. We should be doing our share of that business, we are doing practically none of it, because the whole exports of Canada to that country were only $66,000.

Meats, salted and preserved, $1,168,000; provisions not elsewhere specified, $2,599,000; railway materials, $1,239,000; spirits and wines, $1,228,000.

They say Canadian whisky is the best in the world, and here is a million and a quarter of dollars worth sent over there, and Canadians hardly send a dollar's worth. Corby's IXL, Walker's Club, Gooderham & Wort's Unexcelled Brands, Adams & Burns' Diamond D, Seagram's White Wheat and all the rest of them—not a dollar's worth of all this going to South Africa. Why, we could supply the world with the best of whisky, and we are doing nothing. Of course, temperance men, like the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), would be delighted to see the liquor go out of the country, then it could not do any harm in Canada.

Stationery and printing paper, $1,294,000 ; wheat, $2,451,000 ; furniture, $1,351,000.

They say we have a great combination in the furniture business. They are going to extend their markets. What is the government of Canada doing to promote trade in any one of these industries ? There was over $93,000,000 sent to South Africa in 1899. I should not be surprised if there were more than double that amount sent in 1900 ; and yet the government of Canada is unable to say they have sent a single dollar's worth, they have not devoted one day to the consideration of getting a market for us in South Africa. Just as it is everywhere. We are honoured with having a government that is satisfied with drawing their salaries, that is satisfied to rest and be thankful, that is satisfied to be a fossilized unprogressive government, that says, as the First Minister told us to-night : We are just going to do nothing. As the Minister of Finance told us the other night: We are going to rest on our oars, on the crest of the wave. They cannot do it, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance cannot do it either. He will flop down so suddenly that he will wonder what was the matter with him.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Victoria). He will rise again. When you go down into the trough of the sea you will rise again to the top.

Mr. WALLACE. Well, I am afraid that the Minister of Finance will have lost his balance and flopped out of the boat, and there will have to be another crew. Then they will rise again, they will steer the ship of state in the right direction, and the people will be satisfied and thankful.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as to the resolution moved by the leader of the opposition to-day. I think the people of Canada will be pleased and proud to know that there is a party in this country that has got a policy and a programme. During the past election those gentlemen opposite paddled through without a policy. They have no policy to-day. What have the Minister of Finance and the First Minister told us? Have they given us a line of a policy: No, only a declaration that they have none; they have told us in the most savage, unfeeling and brutal way that they are going to do nothing, that they are not going to be bothered with those tariff tinkering people. I always thought it was the privilege of the humblest subjects of His Majesty to go to the foot of the Throne with a grievance. But the greatest citizen and the greatest interests of Canada are warned off. Don't approach his majesty, Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his government—keep off the grass. The First Minister told us to-night that mutual preference would be destructive to the policy of Great Britain. Would it? I beg to differ with the right hon. gentleman, though I do so with great diffidence, since he has laid it down so positively.

The people of Great Britain can give a preference in the markets of Great Britain to the productions of the various portions of the empire, to agricultural products, and still retain the policy that is existent there to-day. There are other necessaries of life beside bread and butter. The government of Great Britain receive from tea alone $19,581,000. They receive from the duty on coffee $844,000 or, £173,590 sterling. From currants, raisins and dried fruits they receive $1,859,000, or more than $22,000,000 from these three articles alone. All tea, whether high priced or low priced, pays a duty of 8 cents per pound. There is a duty of from 10 to 15 per cent on the highest priced tea, and of 50 per cent on the lower grades of tea. Tea is a necessity for the people; the poor man of England and the poor man of Canada is entitled to a cup of tea. He regards it as a necessity and he would consider it a great hardship if he were deprived of it. Suppose that a duty of $4 per bullock and 5 cents per bushel on wheat were imposed, taking the whole amounts imported into Great Britain, that would make a tax of $3,860,000 on beef, and $8,860,000 on wheat which would in the aggregate amount to $12,726,000. On tea they charge $19,581,000. Take $12,750,000 off the duty on tea and apply that to wheat and beef; is the English citizen, the English artisan or labourer any poorer, or does it cost him a dollar more to live? I say that it would not and it would give to Canada and other colonial possessions an enormous advantage over foreign and hostile nations. It would assist in building up the British Empire in the four quarters of the globe. It would give Canada an immense advantage in her competition against the United States. The 500 immigration agents that we have to-day could be dismissed and our North-west country would be filled up with the best quality of the farming population that can be found in any country in the world, and that would come from all the countries in the world. This would be the effect of having reciprocity, and if you went there with that definite proposition the people of England would not object to it. What will be the effect of imposing 5 cents per bushel on wheat or 23 cents on a barrel of flour? A barrel of flour will make 132 two-pound loaves and on six of these two-pound loaves the duty would be one cent. One-sixth of one cent on every two-pound loaf would be added to the cost for duty to be paid by the consumer. We will say that it is the consumer who would pay the duty although I do not admit it at all. We will assume that such is the case; the duty would be one cent for the whole six of the two-pound loaves. One-sixth of a cent a pound does not make any addition to the cost of the loaf to the consumer in Great Britain. He saves the duty on the tea, and he would be better off under that condition of circumstances than he is to-day. He would have less duty to pay and there is a practical solution of the question to present to the people of England. The practical question has never been placed before the British people, and as my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) says the cost would be less than I have said, because a large portion of the wheat that comes from British possessions would pay no duty at all. That is true, but, assuming that all of it had to be imported, what would be the result? It would not be many years until all the food supply of Great Britain, flour, beef, pork and all the provisions that we and other British possessions can produce would come from the empire itself, and as to the defence of Great Britain, as to her future prosperity, as to her safety and security in time of war, the blessings and benefits would be incalculable. As a measure of protection to the nation it would be worth ten times what it would possibly cost. There is a proposition right in the line of the resolution moved by our leader to-day which I am sure will commend itself to every farmer in this country, and to every loyal citizen in this country, because the prosperity of the farmer means the prosperity of the whole population. It would mean a rapid increase in the population of the Dominion. These hon. gentlemen have an army of immigration agents scattered all over the world. We are told, that one of these, the redoubtable Preston, was 300 miles beyond the Black Sea, that he discovered a new race of people and thought he is going to have them crowded into Canada. Well, Sir, we are getting a little particular; we have not been very particular in the past, but I think we will want to know the antecedents of those people that are to be brought here from the Lord knows where. The Doukhobors, Galicians and all those people have not proved to be the most attractive or desirable class of immigrants, because they never will assimilate and become Canadians. If these people do not come here to become citizens, to take a part in the duties of citizenship and to assimilate with the people, we do not want them here at all. I say, Mr. Speaker, that in the matter of looking out for markets the government have been derelict in their duty. In the matter of reciprocal trade with Great Britain they have been hostile to the best interests of the people of Canada. In the matter of reciprocity with the United States five years have passed and they tell us, that, in the future, at some time, they will go down to the city of Washington, or meet some place, and see if they cannot do something more. In the matter of the beet-root sugar industry they have disappointed the people of Canada. They have refused to give protection to an industry which would be the greatest that we have in sight in Canada to-day, and which would serve to promote the best interests of the people. They boast of having a great big surplus. What are they going to do with it ? Hand it out in subsidies to railways ? We were warned that there is to be added to capital account this year $10,500,000; there has been $21,500,000 added since these hon. gentlemen came into power, making $32,000,000 added to capital account.

What are we doing with this $32,000,000 if it is not to make the country more prosperous and to improve the condition of the people ? As was truly said by the member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler), a large portion of it benefited only the men who get the subsidies. We have the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) ramping and tearing about the country and telling the people that this government is going to build great works at Port Colborne and at Montreal and elsewhere. Well, the Conservative government had let the contracts for enlarging the St. Lawrence canals ; the Welland canal was completed to fourteen feet, and this government, when it came to power, had simply to stand by and see the contracts carried out—in two cases they cancelled the contracts and relet them. What have these gentlemen been doing for the last five years? They tell us that at Port Colborne they must spend five million dollars to enable that port to compete in the grain trade with the rival route via Buffalo. They tell us all this, but they have done nothing. They talk about building up the St. Lawrence trade so as to astonish the world, but the fact is that last year the trade by that route decreased. In spite of all their loud talk they cannot point their finger to one thing they have done to promote the welfare of the people. They have been a disappointment to the people of Canada. They have climbed into power on the racial cry, and that is the reason they are sitting on the Treasury benches to-day. Yet, they have the effrontery and the hardihood, as the Minister of Public Works did in Guelph the other night, to lecture the people of Canada on the iniquity and sinfulness of raising racial and religious cries in this country. Why, these men are in power to-day because they successfully raised that cry. They have fifty-eight out of the sixty-five members from the province of Quebec, not because their public policy was acceptable to the people of that province, but because of the racial cries that were raised by the Minister of Inland Revenue (Hon. Mr. Bernier), by the First Minister himself, and by all the ministers and all the members on that side of the House. They have fifty-eight out of the sixty-five members from the province of Quebec, and what does it mean ? It means, Mr. Speaker, that these hon. gentlemen have been making unworthy appeals in order to get back to power. But the people of Canada are no fools. The people of Canada are looking on and they are thinking the matter out for themselves. They see that this is unjust and unfair, and if the government are going to combine on racial lines it will undoubtedly and inevitably provoke combination against them. There can be nothing surer, and if the people of Quebec are combining on these lines, they are issuing a challenge to the other people of the Dominion. I warn the government that they cannot adopt that course, it is too late, because we doubt their sincerity. The government of Canada has to-day no programme and no policy unless it be that announced by the Prime Minister to-day, when he said that in the near future —not the near future either, but whenever it suits their convenience—they are going to bring down a new tariff, tending towards free trade. Well, Sir, we will meet them fairly on that issue. We are protectionists. We adopted the policy of protection in 1878 ; we stood by it straight through, and we are protectionists to-day.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WALLACE. Now, the Minister of Finance stated that there was a decrease of taxation and in order to suit his purpose he quoted the year of greatest prosperity since the Liberals came into power, and compared it with the year of the least prosperity when the Conservatives were in power. He just picked out these two years, but the fair thing for them to do, would have been to take the last four years of Conservative rule, and compare it with the the four years of the present Liberal rule. And adopting that method what do we find ? We find that the incidents of taxation in the Customs Department in 1893, amounted to $17.38 ; in 1894, to $17.13 ; in 1895, to $16.99 ; in 1896, to $18.28, or an average of $17.44½ duty on every one hundred dollars worth of imported goods, dutiable and free. Since the Liberals came into power, according to their own statement, there is an average duty of $16.87½, but to that the Minister of Finance told us we must add 43 cents for the corn which was in transit and which was marked as a product of the country. I shall add 57 cents for the same purpose last year, and in that way you get $17.12½ for the four years that these gentlemen have been in power, as the average rate of duty, and $17.44½ for the last four years of the Conservative government, or a difference of 32 cents on every one hundred dollars worth of goods imported, including dutiable and free, and the only fair test is to take both. There is therefore one-third of a dollar difference on every one hundred dollars worth of imported goods, showing conclusively that this Liberal government has imposed as high taxes upon the people of Canada, though with less protection, than we did. As was pointed out by the leader of the opposition, this Liberal government have put an enormous increase of the duty on sugar which last year amounted to $793,000 in increased duties. I have not estimated it for this year, but with the large increase in the importation of sugar, molasses and syrups, I have no doubt the increased duties will represent one million dollars this year.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Between $900,000 and $1,000,000.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, about that. This government has increased the taxes on sugar notwithstanding that they have a surplus of $6,500,000. What did the Conservatives do when they had a surplus ? This duty on sugar is a direct tax upon the people of the country. It does not encourage any industry. Every dollar's worth of that sugar has to be imported, and therefore this is a direct tax. The burden of taxation the people have to bear is one-third of a dollar less on every one hundred dollars worth imported, as between the four years of the Liberal government, and the four years of the Conservative government. Does that make a difference in policy ? Why, Sir, in 1890 the percentage of taxation on the people was $21.21 ; in 1891 it was $20.06, a reduction by the Conservative party of $1.15 per hundred dollars. Yet we made no boast about it. We simply said we had taken the duty off certain things and reduced the burdens of the people on those things which were not made in the country. In 1892 the percentage was $17.56, a reduction of $2.50 on every $100 from 1891. We took the duty off sugar, which was a direct tax on the people. Hon. gentlemen opposite have made a reduction of 32 cents per $100, and are crowing about it all over the country, and on the strength of that the Finance Minister takes the whole importation, and estimates a saving of $3,000,000. There never was such a fallacious statement made to the House. Last year the Minister of Customs tried to figure out in the same way that millions of dollars had been saved. It is a fallacious argument. You cannot tell to-day what the income would be on certain articles that existed half a dozen years ago. The importations are changed in their character. New industries are rising up ; conditions are changing ; people import one year one class of goods, and another year another class of goods. You cannot make an accurate calculation ; it is simply guesswork. If the calculation was made on the basis that they were saving about 2 per cent, it is not true. There are the figures, and I challenge the Minister of Finance to dispute them. If you take the four years, in each case you have to deduct the corn ; that is all I have deducted. Last year they deducted coin and bullion, but they did not this year, because the figures would be against them. I say we will rejoice to have that free trade policy brought down, when the government are ready for it. We are going to stand by our own policy, which built up this country, and which will continue to build it up and make it prosperous in the future.

Mr. B. RUSSELL (Hants). Mr. Speaker, I began to have a vague dread that the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat had lost the end of his speech, and that we should be kept here all night ; but as he has found it at last, I beg to move that the debate be now adjourned.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

GRAND FALLS POWER AND BOOM COMPANY.

Hon. JOHN COSTIGAN (Victoria, N.B.) I beg leave, with the consent of the House, to present a petition of the Grand Falls Water Power and Boom Company, asking for leave to introduce a petition.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Explain.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Under the rules of the House this company are precluded from introducing a petition asking for an extension of their charter, which expires in July next. The president of the company, Sir William Van Horne, has been absent in Cuba for a long time, and on returning, instructed the solicitor of the company to make the application. The solicitor only arrived here on Friday, the last day on which petitions could be received ; and the only way to get the petition before the Committee on Standing Orders is by petition asking the House to allow the petition to be received ; and this is a preliminary petition for that purpose.

The PRIME MINISTER. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago, when the last report of the Standing Orders Committee was presented, I made the remark, in reply to the hon. leader of the opposition, that I would for my part object to any more petitions being received ; but the statement made by my hon. friend that the gentleman who was pressing the charter had been away in a foreign country, and had only returned a few days ago, makes this petition fairly entitled to be received, and under the circumstances I think it might be received.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Under the circumstances I do not object to the reception of the petition.

Petition received, and referred to the Committee on Standing Orders.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Before the House adjourns, I would like to inquire when we are to have a meeting of the Public Accounts Committee ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). I was under the impression that it was called for to-morrow. I sent out a moment ago to see if there was a notice up, and there was none. The chairman is not present, and in his absence I am unable to say when the committee will meet.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Who is the chairman ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser).

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The chairman of that committee should be in a position to give sufficient time to have the committee meet at least twice a week. I brought the matter to the attention of the hon. gentleman last week, and I understood that we were to have regular meetings that often. If the hon. member for Guysborough is not able to give the necessary time to call regular meetings of the committee possibly some other mode may be found of dealing with the matter. Perhaps he could appoint some one to act as his deputy when he is compelled to be absent from the city, or is not able to find time to deal with the matter himself. But if we are to expedite the business of the House, we must have arrangements made for calling this committee, and we cannot accept as an excuse the statement that the hon. member for Guysborough is prevented from dealing with it. Although I am ready on all occasions to make all reasonable allowances, the hon. member for Guysborough, who is a personal friend of mine, we must have some one as chairman of the committee who is prepared to deal with it. I have heard this excuse given on his behalf, not only in this parliament, but in former parliaments. All I ask is that whoever is chairman of that committee will give sufficient time to it, so that we shall not have to stand up in this House and inquire day after day why meetings of the committee have not been called. I do not want to be put in the position to have to cast reflections on the hon. member for Guysborough or anybody else ; but I do desire that meetings of that committee shall be called, and called regularly, and I think the right hon. leader of the House and the hon. Minister of Finance will agree with me that in asking that I am not asking anything unreasonable. I would also like to ask whether we are to continue the debate from day to day for the present. I understand that we are.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, March 19, 1901.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS—EXTENSION OF TIME.

Hon. JOHN COSTIGAN (Victoria, N.B.) moved :

That that portion of the 49th rule which limits the time for receiving petitions for Private Bills be suspended in reference to the petition of the Grand Falls Water Power and Boom Company, presented this day ; praying for an Act to extend the time for the completion of their works, in accordance with the recommendation contained in the seventh report of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders.

Motion agreed to.

ALASKAN AND NORTH-WEST RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. N. A. BELCOURT (Ottawa) moved :

That the petition of John Mather and others for an Act of incorporation under the name of the Alaskan and North-west Railway Company, be referred back to the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders for further consideration.

Mr. URIAH WILSON (Lennox). I wish to know for what reason this motion is made. When this Bill was before the Committee on Standing Orders we had no evidence that it was properly advertised, or that the promoters had in any way complied with the rules of the committee or of the House. Unless there is some good reason this Bill should not be sent back.

Mr. BELCOURT. The reason is a very good one. The gentleman who had charge of the Bill before the committee had not in his possession the newspapers containing the advertisement, and my hon. friend (Mr. Wilson) was the means of having the Bill rejected on that account. The publication was made in a Dawson paper and every one knows the difficulty of getting Dawson papers here at this time of the year. Since then the papers containing the advertisement have arrived, and we are ready to show that the publication has been made.

Mr. WILSON. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Belcourt) should be able to show that the advertisement was published during the Motion agreed to.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 78) to incorporate the Union Railway Company.—Mr. Demers (St. John and Iberville).

Bill (No. 79) respecting the Lindsay, Bobcaygeon and Pontypool Railway Company.—Mr. Vrooman.

Bill (No. 80) to incorporate the St. Mary's River Bridge Company.—Mr. Dyment.

Bill (No. 81) respecting the Algoma Central Railway Company, and to change its name to the Algoma Central and Hudson Bay Railway Company.—Mr. Dyment.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Hon. Mr. Fielding :

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Mr. B. RUSSELL (Hants). Mr. Speaker, for the statement which I am about to make, I have probably the same kind of authority as my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace), who last addressed the House, had for a number of statements which he made in the course of his speech. My statement is that I have received confidential communications in regard to a conference that took place between the hon. leader of the opposition and the advisory board that assists him in conducting the affairs of this House——

Mr. HENDERSON. Oh, how clever.

Mr. RUSSELL—and that it was arranged among them that my hon. friend who addressed the House last night should visit North Bruce in the capacity of a peacemaker, for the purpose of setting at rest all racial, religious and discordant cries and all disturbing controversies which would otherwise have agitated that community. It was represented to him that the subject of the preferential tariff would come up for more or less discussion in the course of this debate ; and as he had given utterance to some equivocal expressions on that subject on the occasion of its first introduction into this House—expressions which might be represented as an approval of it, if divested as it is at present of those features connected with the Belgian and German treaties, it was not desirable that he should interpose in the present discussion of the subject ; moreover, that his presence as a peacemaker in the county in which an election is now being run would be of infinite value to this country ; and, in view of that circumstance, and in view of those negotiations and advices, my hon. friend had prepared a discourse marked by those characteristics of mildness, and breathing that spirit of sweet reasonableness with which he so frequently delights this House; containing those very amiable references to his antagonists, those complimentary allusions to the hon. Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte), and those pleasant remarks as to the right hon. gentleman who leads this House, so free from anything in the nature of innuendo ; those kindly observations with reference to the Minister of Finance ; and all suffused in that tone of Christian charity of which he is so admirable an exponent in this House. These things were not intended for this Chamber at all, but were intended for North Bruce; but, in some way that has not been explained, but probably will be later on, the hon. gentleman's connections failed, and so he did not get to North Bruce, whether on account of the snowstorm or for other reasons which may be supposed, and he was thrust upon this House, and was obliged to turn on the tap. He had no speech on the budget or on the preferential resolutions ; he had not prepared himself to discuss any of the questions which might legitimately come before the House ; and, therefore, he was obliged to give us, very inappropriately, the speech which was intended for the electors of North Bruce. That is the only explanation I can suggest for at least one of the features of the address he has given us—for the fact that in the main he steered entirely clear of the subject under discussion ; and it also illustrates the exceptionable reasonableness and sweetness of the discourse he gave us. I rejoice, and this House must rejoice, that we have in the public life of this country a gentleman who brings that tone into our discussions. The hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) desired that this should be a parliament of peacemakers. We have one of those peacemakers present ; we have had from him an illustration and an assurance of what is to come : and I trust the hon. member for Bonaventure will fold the hon. gentleman to his bosom. I must confess, Mr. Speaker, that I am very largely dependent upon the assurances which the hon. gentleman has himself given to us in the course of his speech, for taking that view of his remarks ; otherwise, I would have been inclined to recall a story which was told by the late Wendell Phillips, in connection with the anti-slavery agitation. Mr. Phillips was under the impression that the southern slaveholders, when crying out against those who were continually disturbing the peace of the country, were themselves the principal disturbers of the country's peace ; and by way of illustrating and clarifying his views, he was fond of telling a story of an old court crier who, when engaged in his official capacity in one of the courts at Massachusetts, used to fall asleep. When the voices of the counsel who were addressing the court rose to a louder tone than usual, the crier was aroused from his slumbers, and cried out at once, 'Silence in the court,' and immediately resumed his slumbers. This had occurred a few times, when the judge got tired of this interruption of the proceedings, and burst out in a somewhat indignant way, 'Crier, you are the only one disturbing the court, and if you will only stay asleep, there will be no more disturbance.' In the same way, if by some providential means, the hon. member for West York could be put into one of these slumbers which a gentleman down on Sparks street produces, I do think there would not be quite so much discord or trouble, noise, clamour and controversy as there happens to be from time to time in this community.

I endeavoured to follow the hon. gentleman in the course of his remarks last night, and I shall endeavour more or less to-day to follow them, but I am bound to say that his route was altogether too circuitous, it covered too wide a field to allow the possibility of my doing so. The discussion of all, or even one-half, of the topics the hon. gentleman saw fit to introduce in the course of his oration last night would occupy all the time at my disposal, or at the disposal of this House, from now probably until the end of the session, because there has been no subject under discussion in this parliament ever since it opened on the 6th February last, that my hon. friend did not import into this debate. I shall therefore endeavour, not to follow him all the way round, but to confine myself as much as I possibly can to the subject immediately under discussion. My hon. friend threw absolutely no light on this subject, although he imported a great deal of heat. It was heat without light. It was certainly of no purpose for him to repeat over and over again, as he did, and as he also did last year, the platitude that it would be an excellent thing for us if we could secure free admission to Great Britain of our grain and the imposition of a hostile tariff against the grain of other countries. If we could secure admission for our grain products into the markets of the old country free of duty and have all others excluded or subjected to a discriminating, and if possible prohibitory tariff, that would be a capital thing for us. I am sure it never needed any discussion or elaboration whatever to make good this contention and when the hon. gentleman repeated that platitude for the twentieth time he did not throw any light whatever on the question which this House is called upon now to consider, under the amendment of the leader of the opposition.

The hon. gentleman was asked how we could get that concession from the mother country—and that was the real point, surely, of any discussion that could be made on the subject. He was asked : How are you going to secure that concession ? and he answered at once : We can secure it because Mr. Chamberlain said that he was willing we should have it. Then he read—I wonder if the House will believe it without my verifying it—he actually read, in support of his statement, a paragraph from the very speech from which the right hon. leader of the House quoted the other day for the purpose of proving—as he did prove beyond all shadow of doubt—that Mr. Chamberlain had not expressed any such willingness and was entirely convinced of the impossibility of any concession of the kind being given. These were the words which my hon. friend from West York read :

> Let the offer——

My hon. friend did not tell us what offer it was to which Mr. Chamberlain was referring.

> Let the offer, said Mr. Chamberlain, come voluntarily from them, and I believe it will be considered in this country, not in any huckstering spirit, but will be entertained as part of a greater policy intended to unite in the closest bonds of affection and interest all the communities under the British flag and all the subjects of Her Majesty throughout the empire.

Those were Mr. Chamberlain's expressions, but in that very speech my hon. friend will see, if he takes the pains to read it, and I hope he has read it—but, no, I hope he has not, because, if he has, it would be extremely disingenuous conduct on his part to read the passage he quoted without reading the passages in which Mr. Chamberlain pointed out the impossibility of our having any such concession made to us under the conditions existing to-day. I shall read Mr. Chamberlain's expressions, which I only repeat because it has become necessary to do so in consequence of the turn the discussion has taken and the contentions made by my hon. friend. Mr. Chamberlain was discussing three possible solutions of the question of preferential trade within the empire.

The first proposition he discussed was that the colonies should abandon their duties, which were all in the nature of protective duties more or less. He said this proposition is not a hopeful one because not one of the colonies is prepared—they are certainly not all prepared—to abandon the tariffs they now have and which involve more or less a protectionist element, more or less an element which can be used, incidentally in some of them, purposely in others, for the protection of colonial industries. That was a proposition therefore which Mr. Chamberlain felt bound to dismiss from practical consideration. He went on to say :

> There is another proposition, and that is that the colonies should keep their tariffs as they are to-day, but that the Imperial government should so arrange its tariff that a duty should be placed on foreign wheat and corn coming into the British islands, while the colonial tariffs remain as they were.

Mr. Chamberlain said no, there is no possibility of that ever being adopted. That is a result to which the workingmen of the mother country could never be induced to submit. And therefore the second proposition was dismissed as impracticable and impossible.

He said, there is a third proposition. That is the proposition of a zollverein not exactly like the German zollverein because that was a zollverein between conterminous countries, but a zollverein, with such modifications as might be capable of application to the condition of things in our colonies. He said that is a hopeful proposition, but it involves the colonies abandoning all their tariff imposts which are of a protectionist character. In other words, the colonies would have to abandon all their tariff imposts which are unlike those of the mother country, that is to say which either, directly and purposely, as is the case in some of the colonies, or incidentally as is the case in ours, involve protection to colonial industries.

The right hon. gentleman who leads the House (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has shown us conclusively that it is absolutely impossible for the two parts of the resolution of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition to hang together at all, under the doctrine laid down by Mr. Chamberlain. My hon. friend insists that we must have a protective tariff applicable to the industries of this country, and in the same breath he undertakes to say that we may have that which, according to Mr. Chamberlain, is absolutely inconsistent and diametrically opposed to it, namely, a preference in the markets of the mother country. The right hon. the First Minister has pointed that out so conclusively and luminously that I am not going to further impose on the patience of the House by discussing a point so absolutely clear and which so entirely disposes of the resolution submitted to us by the leader of the opposition.

But the hon. member for West York retorts: that may be all right from our point of view, but how is it from your point of view ? You profess that you have not a protectionist tariff, but a free trade tariff, and therefore there is no inconsistency in your going to the mother country and asking that which, it is quite evident, we would be entirely estopped from asking from the Imperial government. Well, now I want to know who ever said we had a free trade policy in this country. I want to know who ever said we had a free trade tariff, if I may use that expression, in this country. I do not think that anybody ever said we had free trade in this country; I am prepared to say we do not have it.

My hon. friend has discussed this matter as if there were only two kinds of tariff, of fiscal policy, a policy of free trade, and a policy of protection. He certainly is altogether at sea when he makes a suggestion like that. We have not free trade in this country, we have not a free trade policy in this country, nor have we a protectionist policy in this country. We have in this country to-day substantially the policy with which we set out in the year 1867; that is to say, that instead of there being two kinds of fiscal policy as my hon. friend suggests, there are really three kinds, clearly and easily distinguishable. There is first of all—if I may take four or five minutes to explain a matter which is so entirely elementary—there is first of all a protectionist tariff, purposely and ostensibly framed with the object of excluding foreign goods coming from other countries, and which does exclude those products in so far as it successfully operates as a protective tariff. It is levied on goods which can be produced and which are produced in the country, and of a kind that are and can be produced in the country, levied upon them for the purpose of compelling the population to use those articles produced in the country, and for the purpose of excluding those which are produced in the foreign and competing country. That is a protectionist tariff. There is opposed to that what I may properly call a free trade tariff, such a tariff as they have in the old country, a tariff which carefully eliminates any elements of that sort, which is carefully designed for the purpose of ensuring that every penny of taxation that is paid, every penny of money taken out of the pockets of the taxpayers, is taken solely for the purpose of going into the treasury of the country. It is a tariff levied upon things, not which can be produced in the country, but which cannot by any possibility be produced in the country ; that I call a free trade tariff, the very opposite of the one I spoke of previously.

Then there is between these two a tariff such as we had in this country in 1867 down to the fiscal revolution of 1878, and which we are endeavouring to work our way back to, and have in a large measure worked our way back to, under the reformed tariff introduced by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, a revenue tariff which is designed to exclude as far as possible the element of protection; because, as Mr. Mackenzie pointed out many years ago, in our tariff there always was an element of incidental protection, and in our tariff to-day there is an element of incidental protection. But, as the Minister of Customs has often pointed out, that is an incident to the main purpose of the tariff, which is the collection of a revenue, and is not the protection of native industries. Now, then, this is the kind of tariff that we have to-day, and this is the kind of tariff, a revenue tariff with incidental protection, under which Mr. Chamberlain said it would be impossible for us to go to the mother country and ask for anything like a zollverein, or anything like a preference, or anything like such a scheme as is outlined in the resolution of the hon. leader of the opposition. The present tariff does afford incidental protection, that is to say, it does give a certain degree of assistance to native industries, it presents a certain obstacle to the foreign competitor, it does give a certain measure of advantage to the home producer as against the foreign competitor in the same manner as freights, insurances and other charges prevent an obstacle to the foreign competition and an advantage to the native producer. But it has for its chief purpose the collection of a revenue.

As I have said before, Mr. Chamberlain proved it impossible for us to go to the mother country and ask for preferential trade so long as we continue to maintain a tariff like that. We are prepared to stand upon that tariff, we are prepared to adhere to it. Our hon. friends opposite say it is really their own tariff, it is really their own policy, and I suppose therefore that they are also prepared to maintain and adhere to it. We all agree that it is impossible to adopt any other fiscal system or to abandon altogether all duties that could be made operative for the encouragement of native industries, and for that reason, I say again, it is absolutely impossible for my hon. friend to ask that we should accept his resolution, or to ask Mr. Chamberlain or anybody else to give us the benefit of a preferential arrangement in the English market, as matters stand at present. What may happen in the future, what may happen later on under the development of advanced Imperial ideas, what may happen in the course of a number of years, after this matter has been under consideration of the people of England and after it has been under the consideration of the people of Canada, opens up too long a vista, is too far remote for us to consider ; it is too far in the dim and distant future to be a matter of practical politics or command the consideration of practical men in a practical age, and in a business-like parliament such as I understand this to be.

But my hon. friend thinks it is a very easy thing. He can make a budget for the English Chancellor of the Exchequer just as simple as rolling off a log. If you take part of the duty off tea, take a part of the duty which is now paid by the Englishman on his tea, and every penny of which goes into the treasury of the country, and put it on the competing grain coming in from the United States, you have the whole thing done in a jiffy, no difficulty about it at all. He says that when you do this the workingman of England will have to pay no more than at present, he will be simply paying the same tax as now, and you will have this brought about by one stroke of the pen, by one item in the tariff propositions in the budget speech of an English minister. Very well, just let us analyse that for a moment. Of course if the discrimination against the foreign wheat was great enough, if the tariff charge was high enough to keep it out of the English market altogether, and if we could produce enough colonial cereals to feed the population of the British isles, then it is obvious there would be no tax collected from wheat at all, no tax collected from corn ; no tax collected from grain, and the consequence would be that the English taxpayer, the English workingman would have to make up that deficit by submitting to the imposition of a direct tax. But if it did not do its perfect work, and it would not do it for it could not possibly keep out the foreign grain altogether, not for years at all events, or until we were able entirely to supply the requirements of the country, then until that tariff which my hon. friend is going to give to the British Chancellor, is imposed and does its perfect work, then there will be a certain amount of corn brought into the British islands, there will be a certain amount of corn from Canada. Well, what would be the effect of that ? The price would be raised to the English consumer. Of course that goes without saying ; and my hon. friend agrees that this duty will be paid by the English consumer. He was somewhat in doubt about that, but I think there can be no doubt about it—the duty will be paid by the English consumer. But my hon. friend says that makes no difference, because he will only be paying on his breadstuffs, the same tax that he is now paying upon tea ; that it is only as broad as it is long to him, it will make no difference to him whatever, so long as he is paying the tax, upon what article or product he is paying it. But my hon. friend forgets that apart from the duty, apart from the increment of the price that would have to be added to the foreign corn on account of the duty payable upon it, there would also be the increased price at which he would have to pay for the corn which was produced in this country. I am certain that if he makes that proposition to any intelligent workingman in the old country, he will get his answer straight from the shoulder, so clear that it will be absolutely impossible for him to misunderstand it.

Mr. Chamberlain every time that he has had occasion to discuss this question, and he has discussed it in numerous speeches—I was going to say in innumerable speeches in the old country, he has discussed it in these foreign and colonial speeches that have been quoted in the debate—has presented this difficulty so straight and clear that I cannot understand how it is that my hon. friend, or any other hon. member on his side of the House who has a practical head upon his shoulders and practical sagacity and wisdom, can over and over again present this proposal which has had the bottom knocked out of it so many times. The hon. gentleman compares this case with the case of Australia. He says that the Postmaster General (Hon. Mr. Mulock) is about to go to Australia in a few days and that if he goes there he will find a country that is about to have a protective tariff imposed on it. I believe that it is likely enough that it will have. All the signs go to show that a moderate protective tariff will probably be the fiscal system of the Australian Commonwealth. He says, notwithstanding all that, are you not going to ask for a reciprocal arrangement between this country and the Commonwealth of Australia. I hope we are, and I hope, more or less confidently, that we will be able to obtain it and that by virtue of the arrangement that may be made by this government with the Australian Commonwealth a growing and profitable business may be built up between the Dominion of Canada and that new Commonwealth. My hon. friend says: If this is possible with Australasia, why not with England? Why not? Because there is no analogy whatever between the two cases. If Australasia were a country such as England is, a small country in its extent, or relatively so, with an enormous population, with a population of from forty to fifty millions of people, absolutely dependent upon their foreign trade, and upon the extent to which they can push their manufactured products in foreign countries and obtain payment for them; the foreign trade of which, as Mr. Chamberlain says, is the very breath of its life, and engaged in a life and death struggle with other and competing countries with enormous resources and enormous capital; the centre of a vast and delicate financial organism which it would be fatal to disturb—if the Australasian Commonwealth presented such conditions as these, then, he would have a similar proposal to deal with to that which he is presenting to the consideration of the House and which we are asked to commend to the consideration of the British minister. The situations are so entirely different, there is such a failure of analogy between the two things that I am amazed—if I may use a word which has gone out of fashion since the leadership of the opposition has been changed—I am surprised, not to say either amazed or astounded, that either the hon. leader of the opposition, or the hon. member for West York, who has held a position in the cabinet, who has held not only a position in the cabinet but one which brought him into close touch with questions of this character, should have presented an analogy of that sort that had no possible bearing on the question which is under deliberation by the House at the present moment.

Well, Sir, there is one other subject to which the hon. member for West York referred, and with which I will deal very briefly, the subject of bounties. He discussed the iron and steel bounties as if these bounties were being given, not for the benefit of this whole country at large, but from some partiality for the capitalists, for the individuals, and for the corporations that are engaged in the work of producing iron and steel. Was there ever a greater mistake made? Was there ever a greater sophistry presented to the House for its consideration than that? The hon. member the other night referred to the bounties as if there was something inconsistent between the maintenance of bounties and opposition to a protectionist system. I have always thought, and I have always said, that if there is any way at all in which it is proper for the government to grant encouragement to one industry at the expense of the general public, the peculiarly and pre-eminently proper way to do it is by means of bounties. Why? If you pick out any particular industry and say that it is desirable and in the interest of the country at large that that industry should be established and if you set yourself to the task of establishing it and do so by means of the imposition of a protective duty, what are you doing? You are admitting that it is a matter of consequence to the country as a whole, you are admitting that it is a matter of public interest, that it is a matter in which the whole public are concerned, or else, you have no business to be dealing with it at all, and, making that admission, you are, nevertheless, taxing the cost of establishing that industry only upon a narrowly limited circle of people who are to bear the burden of the tariff imposition which you have imposed. Is not that so? I say it is very obvious, and if we come to the conclusion, as this country came to the conclusion years ago, that it is to the advantage of the whole Dominion that the iron and steel industry should be established, not for the benefit of the dealers in iron and steel at all, but for the benefit of the people at large, then, I say, that the peculiarly and pre-eminently proper way to do that is not by the imposition of a tariff which will be borne by a particular class, or a narrowly limited circle of people, but which will be borne by the people of the country at large and in common. Therefore, I say that there is all the difference in the world between a bounty and a protective duty for the purpose of establishing an industry, and that much can be said in favour of the granting of a bounty which would have absolutely no application at all if one were dealing with the question of the imposition of a customs duty. That disposes then of what the hon. member for West York says in regard to lead. It may come to be considered in this country that lead is in the same position as iron and steel, that it is equally in the interest of the country to establish the lead industry, and if the government come to the conclusion that it is there will be no impropriety in granting a bounty on lead smelting, as they have granted a bounty on iron and steel production, provided that the money can be spared, because we are not bound to do two things at once. It may be very true that the lead smelters may be able to make out as perfect a case in favour of a bounty as the iron and steel men have been able to make out, and yet the government of this country may be compelled to say, under the circumstances, that they have exhausted all the surplus at their disposal, that they have pledged the resources of this country to as great an extent as they are able to do for the purpose of encouraging industries of that sort and that the lead men must bide their time. I was glad to hear the hon. Minister of Finance say that the matter had not been finally disposed of ; that it is still under consideration. I am certain that whatever resolution may be come to on the subject will be in line with the suggestions I have made and in accord with the principle to which I have just referred.

Now, I think I will not undertake to follow the hon. member for West York any further in the somewhat, if I may be permitted to say so, rambling and very circuitous route that was mapped out for us in the course of his speech on the tariff. I am certainly not going to follow him in those unamiable, unpleasant and undesirable topics which he thought it necessary to import into this debate. I have not the talent for them, I have not the genius for them, I have no liking for them, I have the most positive disgust for them, and I absolutely decline to enter into any controversies of the kind. I listened to the mover of the amendment (Mr. Borden, Halifax) with a great deal of interest to learn what it was possible for him to say in answer, as I know he must have felt, as a lawyer, it was incumbent upon him to answer, the difficulties that have been suggested from time to time, difficulties that have been so clearly presented by Mr. Chamberlain, who is his greatest friend in this matter, the greatest friend of this country, and the warmest advocate, in any exalted sphere, that has been found of the policy of a preferential tariff in favour of the products of Canada and of the colonies of the empire throughout the world. I say, that I did listen with a great deal of interest and earnestness to my hon. friend to ascertain what new thing the hon. gentleman was going to be able to say that would throw any light whatever upon this question of the preferential tariff, which I suppose is the central feature of the resolutions which he has presented to the consideration of the House. He is a very industrious man—we all know that. And I was quite sure that if there was anything in the whole compass of literature, ancient or modern, that could be brought forward in support of his resolution, my hon. friend's industry would enable him to find it. And what did he find ? Not a single statement, I undertake to say—not a single one—of an encouraging character from any English statesman of the first rank or even of the second rank. He did not even get as much as our lamented former colleague, Mr. McNeill, who represented North Bruce in the last parliament, used to get. He gave us scraps from newspapers and other periodicals. He quoted an utterance from the Saturday Review. I think one of the most encouraging of all was from a financial organ, admitting that there was a possibility that at some time in the future—twenty years from this, if I caught the phrase correctly—there might be a possibility of some change in the fiscal arrangements as now established between the mother country and the colonies. The hon. gentleman has undertaken to play the role on this question that used to be assumed by Mr. McNeill. That role is entirely unsuited to him. He is too hard-headed and practical a man to fill that role successfully—he has too much common sense and altogether too little imagination. He cannot indulge in those moonlit and mystical dreams with which the former member for North Bruce used to entertain this House. In spite of all his scraps from newspapers and his disjointed clippings from Mr. Chamberlain's speeches, though they were all patched together in a bag, he could not make the bag stand upright as the former member from North Bruce seemed to do. As hon. gentlemen will remember, it was a saying of Poor Richard, that you could not make an empty bag stand upright. This inter-Imperial preferential trade bag is absolutely empty and there is not a possibility of making it stand upright. As a former Minister of Railways in this country used to remark, 'there aint nothing to it. Our friend, Mr. McNeill, used to build himself—and rightly—upon Mr. Chamberlain. And the leader of the opposition, if he has anything in this new thesis of his of Imperial preferential trade, must also build himself upon Mr. Chamberlain ; because Mr. Chamberlain is the most advanced statesman in the British Empire to-day who has given the slightest encouragement to a proposition of that kind. If you do not find anything in favour of inter-Imperial preferential trade in this volume (Foreign and Colonial speeches) you will look for it elsewhere in vain. Mr. Chamberlain has discussed this subject with a wideness of range, and an accuracy of detail unexcelled by any other statesman, either Imperial or colonial. If with the genius, the ideas and the courage of William Pitt, it is impossible for Mr. Chamberlain to hold out any encouragement but such as he has given—the extent and force of which we now know, as presented by the right hon. premier yesterday—it is idle and purposeless, it is a sheer waste of time to seek for that encouragement in the utterances of any other Imperial statesman. I dismiss, therefore, that proposition, so far as it has been given us by the leader of the opposition and enforced by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) as one in which there is absolutely no substance, and upon which it is not worth our while to occupy ourselves further under the present circumstances of the country.

But there is another element in the hon. gentleman's resolution, another article in this new opposition creed. I believe they are revising their creed, as the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said the other night that his church were revising theirs.

Mr. MACLEAN. Somebody else ought to do the same.

Mr. RUSSELL. We are always ready to revise our creed when good reasons can be shown for it. I refer now to the last branch of the resolution, the proposal, if I understand it aright, that we should retaliate on all countries that do not treat us fairly :

This House is further of opinion that equivalent or adequate duties should be imposed by Canada upon the products and manufactures of countries not within the empire in all cases where such countries fail to admit Canadian products and manufactures upon fair terms, and that the government should take for this purpose all such available measures as may be found necessary.

We are asked by this resolution to retaliate in all cases. Yet, if I understood the remarks of the leader of the opposition, he was going to except from it our great neighbour, the United States, which certainly does not treat us with that degree of fairness, or generosity, at any rate, in the matter of tariff regulations, which we might reasonably expect. He is going to except the United States and apply the resolution to Germany, and to Germany alone. Now, one word as to retaliation. Of course, the temptation to retaliate when injured is one of the first instincts of our brute nature. We instinctively resort to the lex talionis which demands an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth. But while the first impulse, the brute instinct of the natural man is to retaliate, the civilized man pauses to reflect. He does not obey his immediate impulse. He first asks himself the question whether he is likely to accomplish by retaliation any useful purpose. Now, I think I can suggest why the hon. leader of the opposition excepted the United States, not in the terms of his resolution, but by his comments, from the intended operation of this principle of retaliation. We did retaliate on the United States some years ago. Our policy of 1878 was professedly founded, in part, upon the idea of retaliating upon the United States—of giving the United States, as it was pleasantly put, that sincerest form of flattery which consists in imitation—we would retaliate upon them for their conduct towards us almost continuously in recent years. But what did we get for our retaliation ? What was the consequence of our national policy ? Why, I do not need to refer to any higher authority than the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell), who addressed us the other day, for any answer to that question. He described the consequences very eloquently, indeed, very forcibly. It led to a condition of things in this country which was anything but pleasant for us, a condition of things under which we were losing our population, a condition of things so entirely the reverse of prosperous, that he could see no remedy but reversion on the part of this country to the principle of free trade. So, I suppose, this is the reason why we are not asked to retaliate against the United States.

Coming for a time to the remarks which the hon. member for Pictou addressed to the House, I was struck, as other hon. gentlemen must have been, with the fact that two speeches—I trust I shall not be considered presumptuous if I say two excellent speeches—one by the hon. member for Pictou, and one by the hon. member for South Wentworth (Mr. Smith), were entirely destructive of each other on some of the main contentions presented to the House. It occurred to me that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden (Halifax), with his keen perception for logical fallacies ; with his strong, clear and logical brain, must have reflected when he heard these gentlemen ; How happy could I be with either were the other fair charmer away. Each of these supporters of his made a good speech, but the speech of one, to a large extent, nullified the speech of the other. The thought occurred to me at first that these two gentlemen could not have consulted together before taking such divergent views on the preferential tariff, but on reflection it seemed more probable that they did compare notes. They had instructions from their leader of course to oppose the preferential tariff. This was common ground. But they must not both oppose it on the same grounds. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) was retained to oppose the preferential tariff on the ground that it was going to interfere with our manufacturing industries, and the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Smith) was retained to oppose it on the ground that it was not really a preference at all, and that it did not do any good to the people of the mother country. And so the hon. gentleman from Pictou (Mr. Bell), I presume, said to the hon. member for Wentworth : You know there are many Imperialists in Canada and there is a strong British feeling which heartily welcomed and cordially supports the preferential tariff, so you tell the people of the country, through the House of Commons, that this tariff makes no concessions whatever to the mother country, and that before the government brought in this tariff, which professes to give concessions to Great Britain, they took good care to raise the general tariff on the articles to which the preference would apply, and to raise it so high that the preference was only such in name, and no benefit was left to the mother land. And then said the hon. member (Mr. Bell) : I will play on the other string ; there are a lot of manufacturers in Canada who are nervous about their gains. They are afraid that they will not have such an easy time during the next few years as they have had in the past, and so I will say : This preferential tariff gives such concessions to the people of Great Britain that it is going to ruin the industries of Canada. And so these two hon. gentlemen played their two discordant tunes, the speech of the one completely nullifying the speech of the other. Which is right? My hon. friend from Pictou belauded the men who introduced the national policy in 1878. These, he said, were men of blood and iron like Bismarck, and they went on with their task without sentimental considerations. These were the men, quoth he, who said : If this tariff is not good for British connection, then so much the worse for British connection. These were the men who said : Driven out of the markets of the civilized world, the mother land is compelled to force her wares upon savages at the point of the bayonet. They did not allow any sentimental considerations to interfere with the maintenance of the industries of Canada, as this government has done by its preferential tariff. This was the drift of his reference to the subject. He argued that the time was coming when, in consequence of the concessions given to the manufacturers of Great Britain by this preferential tariff, many of the manufacturers of Canada would be driven out of existence. His remarks were quoted by the right hon. the Prime Minister the other day, and in consequence I need not make a more explicit reference. But look at what the member for Wentworth (Mr. Smith said, and you will find that he took an entirely different tack. He says :

> I can gather no inference from the figures I have quoted but that the preference we have given to Great Britain only places her on a par with or in a worse condition than the United States, because before this preference was given hon. gentlemen opposite raised the duties to a large extent on the class of goods we import from Great Britain.

We, therefore, see that these two followers of the leader of the opposition, speaking in this House on the same day and on the same subject, give such diametrically opposite views as to the operation of the preferential tariff, that it is absolutely impossible for a plain man like myself to know what to think about the matter at all. They presented the same differences of opinion in regard to details that they presented in regard to the main issue. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) said that relatively, under the operation of the preferential tariff, the trade of England had increased as compared with the trade of the United States and of other countries ; while the hon. gentleman from Wentworth (Mr. Smith) proved to his own satisfaction that England did not hold her own in the Canadian market with either the United States or Germany, in spite of the preferential tariff. What can a plain man who sits here at the feet of these oracles for the purpose of learning the truth, what can he believe in view of this divergence of opinion between them. All that is left for me to do is to go to the trade returns, and there I find, and I am bound to make the admission, that the trade of the old country, even under the preferential tariff, has not been able to hold its own relatively with the trade of the United States or of Germany ; certainly not relatively with the trade of the United States. But, supposing that to be true, what is the vital question which remains to be answered ? If in spite of the preferential tariff that we have given Great Britain ; if notwithstanding that the United States and Germany are handicapped by a tariff discrimination against them ; if in spite of that handicap in favour of the old country she has still a life and death struggle to preserve her own in our markets against the United States, is it not a vital question for Englishmen to ask themselves : Where would we have been were it not for that preferential tariff ? Surely the response to this question is a conclusive answer to the argument, that we have done England no good by the enactment of our preferential tariff. This much, at all events, we have succeeded in doing. If you look at the actual importation of dutiable goods, you will find that they reached the nadir point in 1897. You will find that the importation of dutiable goods from Great Britain to Canada reached absolutely its lowest figure in 1897, and since that it has been absolutely upon the ascending scale—I do not say relatively to other countries, but I do say that it has been on the ascending scale since 1897. If you look further to what is a more interesting set of figures than this ; if you look at the percentage of imports from England and the United States, and take the percentage of the dutiable to the total imports—the percentage of dutiable goods that we get from Great Britain compared to our total dutiable importations into the country, and the percentage we get from the United States of dutiable goods compared to the total dutiable goods imported into this country, you will find this very striking fact to be demonstrated, that we began in 1867 with nearly 65 per cent of our whole dutiable imports from Great Britain and only about 23 per cent from the United States, and that ratio has been continually declining as against Great Britain and continually ascending as in favour of the United States ever since the year 1867 down to and until the year 1897, when the percentage of dutiable goods imported from Great Britain went down to 30½ per cent, and the percentage of dutiable goods imported from the United States ascended to 46 per cent and a fraction. So that down to 1897, our percentage of dutiable goods from the old country was continually declining and our percentage of dutiable goods from the United States was continually ascending. Then, if you examine the figures of 1898, 1899, and 1900, you will find—and you may attribute it to whatever you please—I attribute it to the preferential tariff—that the declining ratio in one column and the ascending ratio in the other column were arrested in the year 1897. I think that is a conclusive demonstration of the operation of the preferential tariff—not as conclusive a demonstration as we would like to see of its operation in favour of the old country, but proving conclusively that it has operated in favour of the old country and that but for its operation the declining ratio I spoke of would have been reduced to zero, and there would have been hardly any proportion of dutiable goods imported from Great Britain into this country at all. Well, Sir, what does all this prove ? If it be true, as my hon. friend from West York and other hon. gentlemen opposite have said, that in spite of the preferential tariff England is not holding her own in our markets with the United States or with Germany, what does it all prove ? It proves what Lord Rosebery discovered, and told the English people in solemn tones the other day, that they are at this moment engaged in a hand-to-hand and life-and-death struggle with the people of the United States and the people of Germany.

Mr. MACLEAN. Hear, hear; free trade against protection, and the protectionists will win out.

Mr. RUSSELL. What I say is, if, considering the position we hold towards the mother country, and considering all that the mother country has done for us, we are not prepared, when we can do so without detriment to ourselves, and even though it were as we contend that it is not with detriment to ourselves, to give the mother country a preference, I want to know what sort of Canadians we would be if we had not a strong impulse to assist the mother country in that hand-to-hand struggle to preserve her trade from the incursions of competition from the United States and Germany.

My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Bell) complained that there was no originality or inventiveness in this government, and no originality or inventiveness displayed by the Finance Minister in his budget speech or in his tariff. Well, Sir, whatever complaints might be made of the hon. gentleman himself, I think no one will deny to him the merit of originality and inventiveness. He has invented a variety of fictions, which he presented to us the other day. The first he invented was as to the permanence and stability of the Tory tariff. Assuredly that was an invention, or at least a discovery—that the tariff which existed in this country from 1879 down to 1897 was a permanent tariff. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance very properly claims as a merit of the tariff that was enacted in 1897, that it has remained on the statute-book ever since practically without any change whatever—I believe absolutely without a single change ; so that merchants and manufacturers know what they have to depend on, and can make their arrangements accordingly. My friend Mr. McClure, who was in this House last session, showed me the changes which were made by the Conservative party in their tariff, and they ran up into the hundreds. I fail to remember accurately the very great number of changes that had been made in this permanent and inelastic tariff, which was introduced in 1879, and the permanence and stability of which has been the discovery of my hon. friend from Pictou.

Another discovery which my hon. friend has made is that of the grievance on the part of the wool men. Now, I have looked through our tariff to find out what grievance the man who deals in wool has. The hon. gentleman suggests that it is wrong to encourage the manufacturers of the old country by placing a burden upon some particular class of people in this country ; and the particular class of people in this country upon whom among others he says we have placed a burden by the preferential tariff are the men interested in the manufacture of wool. Now, I am not very much of a hand at tariffs——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. RUSSELL. That is correct; I am like my hon. friend the leader of the opposition —this is not my trade. I have heard a story told, I think of Richard Brinsley Sheriden, that he was coming home from his club one night a little under the influence of a certain kind of excitement to the physical and nervous system, when he saw a friend of his lying in the gutter slightly inebriated. With the instinct of humanity, the returning club man tried to lift his friend out of the gutter, but found that it was absolutely impossible to do so: so he said, 'My good friend, I cannot lift you out, but I will do the next best thing—I will lie down beside you.' My hon. friend the leader of the opposition is not an expert in tariffs any more than I am. I would be glad to help him out of his scrapes; but as I cannot do that, I will do the next best thing—I will get in alongside of him.

But I can read common ordinary print, and I looked at this customs tariff in the Canadian Parliamentary Guide and scanned it carefully with the purpose of finding out what is the peculiar and special grievance under which the dealers in wool and the manufacturers of woollen goods are labouring. And so far as I understand, every one of them is put on the highest ad valorem tariff which is to be found in the whole list. I cannot find one of them under 35 per cent ad valorem, from which, if you deduct the one-third preferential rate, you get down to 23 per cent. And, looking at the figures presented a year ago by the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), I find that, averaging the importations of wool into this country, they were the highest in the whole list. So that these people stand in our tariff in the most favoured position, and if there is any protection in this tariff—and I have admitted that incidentally there is—they get the fullest benefit of it. If there is any discrimination at all, it is in their favour, because they are put on the highest scale, and besides, they have, as others have, the freights and the insurance in their favour, and all the other obstacles which foreign competitors have to encounter. And, if, in addition to all that, they want something which nobody else has in this country, it is absurd to talk of their being subject to any exceptional burden. The case is just the opposite. It is the case of a particular class of people asking that we should burden all the rest of the community in their favour. My hon. friend must perceive that. I am sure he sees it, and I shall not waste time by discussing the point any further.

The hon. gentleman made another discovery and one which is greatly to the credit of the present Finance Minister. He discovered that twenty years ago—quite a long period in the history of a ministry or the history of a man—twenty years ago there was a Finance Minister in this country who was as good as the one who now administers our financial affairs.

Mr. MACLEAN. A great deal better.

Mr. RUSSELL. My hon. friend has discovered that there was a better Finance Minister, but he has not discovered that ever since Sir Leonard Tilley's day down to the present administration, there was another Finance Minister in that whole period of twenty years worth mentioning at all. He has to go back all of twenty years to find any Finance Minister who can at all compare with my hon. friend who now controls that department. I say that that is a high compliment to pay to my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding), but it is not a high compliment to pay to the hon. gentleman who filled that position in the late government (Mr. Foster). I know that the ex-Finance Minister is not a persona grata to the hon. gentlemen on the other side. We do not often hear his name; they never speak of him. But to return to Sir Leonard Tilley twenty years ago. Twenty years is a long time, half the time that the children of Israel were wandering in the wilderness. These hon. gentlemen are fond of going back to history. I remember that when Mr. Foster went down to the town of New Glasgow to deliver a speech in my hon. friend's (Mr. Bell) own riding in my hon. friend's interest—and I think that when Mr. Foster put himself out so much to accommodate my hon. friend, the hon. gentleman might have had some kind words to speak of him in this House—when Mr. Foster went to Pictou to deliver a discourse, which, I think, was entitled a discourse to the young men about to enter on their political studies—a discourse addressed to the callow fledglings of the Tory nest down in the town of New Glasgow—all his address was occupied with historical reminiscences. These hon. gentlemen all go back to history, no doubt for the reason that the best part of the Conservative party is underground. Its best part is historical, and the only life it has left is its historical life. Its epitaph has come to be written. There was a story told of two gentlemen who were discussing the rival merits of New York and Philadelphia.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Dispense.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not know whether the story is worth telling or not, but I tell it, not for the intrinsic merit it may have, but because of its applicability to the situation. After each one had cited the merits of his native city, the Philadelphian made his final boast that the Quaker City was better laid out than New York. Well, retorted the New Yorker, when New York is as dead as Philadelphia it will be just as well laid out. Well, Mr. Speaker, whenever the Liberal party is as dead in this country as the Conservative party, we expect it to make as comely a corpse and hope it may have a more creditable history.

My hon. friend, referring to this great Finance Minister who existed twenty years ago, said that Sir Leonard Tilley had so managed the finances of his day that he reduced the net debt of Canada from $36.17 per head to $35.75 per head, and the net interest from $1.64 to $1.50 per head, thus diminishing the annual impost on every individual by 14 cents. And contrasting that with the performance of the present Finance Minister, he said that the debt had increased from $63.33 per head, which it was when the late government left office, to $64.75 per head, and the net interest from $1.42 to $1.78. But the point on which I would desire enlightenment is how it came to pass that this debt, which Sir Leonard Tilley had reduced to $35.75 per head twenty years ago had been increased to $63.33 per head by his successors among hon. gentlemen opposite ? Why is this thus ? Of course, it must be due to the bad management of those incompetent Finance Ministers which these hon. gentlemen had as successors to Sir Leonard Tilley. Surely if it was a great credit to Sir Leonard Tilley that he reduced the debt to $35.75 per head, it is a great shame to his successors that they should have increased it so prodigiously and rapidly to $63.33.

Mr. Foster used to understand this matter pretty thoroughly, and I spent considerable time last year over his speech on this very subject. He made a far better presentment to the House than any of these hon. gentlemen opposite have made this session, and when I contrast Mr. Foster's effort with theirs I can realize how they must have sighed :

> For the touch of a vanished hand,
> And the sound of a voice that is still.

I can appreciate their feelings when they came to discuss the finance question and had to come from the Hon. George Eulas Foster down to——

I pause. I have no desire to say anything that could by any possibility be considered as unpleasant. But Mr. Foster made this calculation—a calculation more favourable to the Conservative party, I am bound to say, than the hon. member for Pictou made in regard to the debt. It is common ground, however, that the debt during the eighteen years of Conservative rule had been increased $118,000,000. My hon. friend (Mr. Bell, Pictou) made it out to be increased very much more than that, but he was several millions mistaken—it was only increased $118,000,000. But Mr. Foster said : It was all right to increase our debt by that enormous figure, because we were building our house and had to incur large capital expenditure. He went into the expenditures for which this debt had been incurred, and showed to his own satisfaction that they amounted to $142,600,000. He said : There is what you have to show for your debt. It is true you have a mortgage of $118,000,000, but look at the splendid edifice we have put up for you. Then he went on to contrast the capital expenditures under Liberal rule, and showed that we had only made a capital expenditure amounting to $11,000,000. But Mr. Foster did not attempt to draw any conclusion from what he had said, nor did my hon. friend on the other side. When I was at school, I used to study the rule of three, and my hon. friend, no doubt, did the same. The method, as he will remember, was to multiply the second and third terms together and divide by the first. Calculating according to that rule you will find what debt would have been put upon the country had the same ratio as under Conservative rule been maintained. And, if you work it out you will find that, according to the highest financial authority that ever sat on the other side during the Liberal regime, in proportion to our capital expenditures we added less to the debt than did the Conservative government. If you put $142,000,000 as the first term, $118,000,000 as the second term, and $11,000,000 as the third term, and work it out, you will see that we had a right to impose a debt of $9,102,008 before we could be called to account by those who favoured this expenditure by the Conservatives. And we did not impose any such debt upon the people. My hon. friend himself states the amount at $7,000,000. As a matter of fact, I believe it was stated last year allowing for about $2,500,000 used to pay floating debts of the previous administration at only $5,250,000. I care not what figure you take—as I have already said, I have no skill in figures. But in any case whether you take the larger or the lower figure we are some millions of dollars within the debt we would have a right to pile up against the people of this country before our record could fairly be challenged by those who approved of the record of Conservative rule.

Now, there was one other discovery the hon. gentleman made, but it is so stale and so hackneyed and shop-worn that I am almost ashamed to allude to it. That was the statement that we had blundered into the preferential tariff, that we did not know anything about the German and Belgian treaties, that we constructed our preferential tariff in such a way as to run up against these treaties without knowing they were there. If there was an intelligent schoolboy of ten years of age who did not know all about these German and Belgian treaties, he ought to have been whipped. Surely, every one in this country knew about these treaties ; and nothing could be clearer than that the administration and the leader of the government knew what was to be encountered in connected with them. They not only knew, but calculated upon it. As has been explained ad nauseam, they said : We will take chances. We shall never get rid of these restrictions upon the commercial freedom of the empire until we challenge these treaties and have the matter fought out. They framed their preferential tariff with that idea implicitly contained in it if not explicitly stated, and they fought the matter out. I shall not waste the time of the House by going into a long discussion over that. Everybody knows that it was this expedient and this expedient alone that led to the abolition of these restrictions on the commercial freedom of the British Empire. The hon. gentleman tells us that the seeds were sown by Sir Charles Tupper in the various interviews he had with the Imperial government and the articles he published in the Nineteenth Century and the London magazines. Well, as the right hon. premier said last year of some other seeds sown by the former leader of the Opposition, these seeds were absolutely sterile; They never produced any result. It was only when this government took issue with the Imperial government and compelled the consideration of the subject that the result was brought about. And when the measure was brought down, we were told that it was absolutely impossible to bring about that result. But it was brought about, and it was by no other agency than the introduction of the preferential tariff of this country. I will simply read one short historical review in the London Times of 1897—and with that I will take my seat—for the purpose of showing that this measure and this alone was the cause of the abolition of this restriction upon the commerce of the empire. This was written not during the controversy, but when that controversy was cold and dead, and when the writer could review it with the knowledge and impartiality of the historian :

The Dominion parliament met on March 28, and on St. George's day, April 23, a tariff Bill was introduced, of which the effect was speedily felt throughout the empire. The principal feature of the Bill was that it adopted one tariff as the general tariff of the Dominion and another preferential tariff for those countries which showed a desire to trade with Canada upon terms of reciprocal commercial advantage. Whatever the duties imposed by the general tariff, the duties of the preferential tariff should be reduced in proportion to them for one year by 12½ per cent and after one year, by 25 per cent. As Great Britain and the British colony of New South Wales were at the time of the introduction of the tariff the only communities trading on the required terms with Canada, the tariff Bill became in effect a Bill for the preferential treatment of British trade.

Surely this is an answer to the remarks made on the other side of the House on this subject.

The Bill, which was received with enthusiasm in this country, gave rise to a keen discussion as to the power of the colonial government under the existing treaties of Britain with Germany and Belgium to extend to the mother country any commercial advantages which was not given to these countries, and to all others having a claim to the most-favoured nation treatment. Legal authorities in this country were understood to hold the view that the treaties did, as a matter of fact, preclude all British colonies from giving to Great Britain preferential advantage over most-favoured foreign nations, and to that extent constituted an interference with the fiscal freedom of the empire. The theory of the matter was not put to the test of authoritative decision. In recognition of the strong public feeling which existed on the subject, the treaties were denounced in July, and an irksome barrier to the possible commercial union of the empire was thus, on the initiative of Canada, removed.

Sir, this is absolutely conclusive that if we are now in a position in which we can, with any possibility of success, approach the question of inter-Imperial preferential trade, the fact that we are in that position is exclusively due to the proceedings taken by this government on St. George's day, 1897.

Mr. A. E. KEMP (East Toronto). In rising to support the amendment of the hon. leader of the opposition, I will take occasion to refer to certain matters which have been brought up in connection with the introduction of the budget. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Russell) does not appear to be so strong a free trader as the right hon. the leader of the government. Now, Sir, permit me to draw the attention of those hon. gentlemen who have strong free trade proclivities, to the fact that out of our imports, which amounted last year to $189,622,513, $76,678,617 are free ; therefore, to that extent we have free trade in this country. Those free imports amount to 70 per cent of the dutiable imports, consequently there may be some comfort to the extreme free trader in contemplating these figures. I was somewhat disappointed yesterday afternoon in listening to the defence which the right hon. leader of the government made in reply to the speech of the leader of the opposition. I had thought that the experience of the right hon. gentleman in his responsible position as leader of the government, his experience in matters which came before the Joint High Commission which met at Quebec and later at Washington, would have taught him that the geographical position of this country demands a stable protective tariff, that without it this country cannot prosper, and that the attitude of our friends to the south of us is such that at all times we must of necessity protect our industries against their aggressive tariff policy. The right hon. gentleman, referring to the amendment, said :

As time went on statements were made in the press that this new policy would surprise the government and stagger the Liberal party as soon as it was announced. We have it now, fresh and brand new, from the lips of my hon. friend, and lo and behold, it is the same old national policy.

Now, Sir, what could the right hon. gentleman expect we would have brought down as an amendment ? Did he think we could shift and change our policy with every new moon ? I am convinced that this country will never accept anything but a protective policy ; that our hon. friends opposite need never look for any essential change in our tariff policy ; that we must of necessity always have a protective policy in this country. The right hon. gentleman proceeded : impose duties, not with a view of levying a revenue and putting money into the treasury, but of putting money in the pockets of private individuals.

Now, Sir, that sounds a good deal like those old speeches we used to hear a good many years ago. I say I am disappointed, and I am sorry that such sentiments have been given utterance to on an occasion of this kind, and after such an experience as we have had. Then, the right hon. gentleman went on to say :

But what we have said again and again is that while we believe in free trade as a theory, we know that we are bound to raise a revenue by a customs tariff, and it will take many years before we can have free trade as it is in England.

Further :

You would have, as we had under the late government, an incessant procession of tariff tinkerers from the different cities of Canada to the office of the Minister of Finance. There never was a year from 1879 to 1896—or at least there never was a period of three years—when there was not some tinkering of the tariff. One man would find that some invention in the United States or Great Britain had lowered the price of the products he was making, and instead of exercising his enterprise and ingenuity to overcome the difficulty, instead of putting more money into his business, he came to the Finance Minister and obtained some modification of the tariff.

Now, Sir, I submit, on behalf of the manufacturers of Canada, that this is a most extreme view to take of this question. I believe that the right hon. gentleman does not do the manufacturers of this country justice in making such a statement as that upon the floor of this House. I would like to know if the manufacturers of this country, when at any time in the past they found it necessary to come to this government to point out the difficulties under which they were labouring in connection with competition from foreign countries, had not quite as good a right to come here as any other citizens of this country. When you consider how many men there are in this country whose highest ambition it is to feed at the public trough, and who are constantly making pilgrimages to the various governments, I would like to know why the manufacturers should be singled out for reflections such as the right hon. gentleman has cast upon them. Sir, not only those who feed at the public trough come here, but a great number of others are constantly making pilgrimages to this government from time to time, seeking for blocks of work, without tender, work which they can get from the government. We see them in the lobbies of this House, on the streets of this city ; and yet, knowing that such men come here in great numbers, and for such purposes, the right hon. gentleman has chosen to refer to the manufacturers in the way he did yesterday. Then, there are another class of people who come here, we see them about the corridors of this House and on the streets of this city, coming from various parts of the country, some of them millionaires and multi-millionaires, coming here for subsidies to assist them in various enterprises, for subsidies to railways and other purposes ; yet we have not heard any one rise in this House and refer to those gentlemen in any such terms as the leader of the government employed in referring to the manufacturers. I say, Sir, that the manufacturer coming from his little town or the manufacturer coming from the city, who employs labour to a lesser or greater extent, has quite as good a right to come here and lay his case before the government as these wealthy speculators and subsidy-hunters ; they are just as important in the community in which they live, and they have just as good a right to claim the consideration of the government as any others.

Now, Sir, I take the ground that it should not be necessary for the manufacturers to make constant pilgrimages to this government in order to make representations in respect of the tariff ; I take the position that the policy of protection in this country should be so well established that people would not require to ask for changes. I think it would be a good thing for the government to employ a competent official, who would take the Trade and Navigation Returns and go through them carefully to find out what articles are coming into this country from foreign countries in competition with similar articles produced in this country ; and to inquire if those goods can be produced here, giving employment to our own capital, our own labour and our own energy. I say this government should pursue a policy of that kind, that is the policy which we on this side of the House intend to pursue; and then there would be no necessity for manufacturers to make pilgrimages to this government to ask for tariff changes. I say that our proximity to the great industrial centres of the United States renders such a policy necessary on our part, and if that policy is not pursued here, you will depopulate this country, and drive our people into the United States.

There is no great gulf, no great sea between this country and the United States, and when you remember that we are just on the fringe of the United States as it were and consider how easy it is for our people to go there, you will see how much more necessary it is that we should have adequate protection. The hon. Minister of Finance, in 1898, made a statement in this House which I could not understand, and I would like to read it. In his budget speech of that year, he said :

What a world of good might have been accomplished for the true interests of manufacturers in the Dominion of Canada if all the time, energy, labour and money that have been expended in the last twenty years in tariff watchings and wire-pulling at Ottawa, had been expended in the factories, in the development of business, in the discovery of new inventions, in finding means for the use of labour-saving machinery, in learning what might be done with waste products, in dealing with all those forms of industrial progress which had to be dealt with by the manufacturer when he has keen competition. We would therefore say to the manufacturer that if he desires permanency in the tariff, he must never expect permanency until the tariff gets down to a moderate point. To-day there are duties in the tariff so high that I am sure the government are not prepared to treat them as part of a permanent tariff. I say this in no spirit but that of friendliness to the manufacturing interests. While the manufacturers are in a fairly good position to-day, it would be a mistake for them to fail to realize the fact that Canada has turned her face away from the high tariff policy, and, though we may proceed slowly, whatever progress we make from this time forward, must and should be in the direction of greater freedom of trade.

These observations correspond entirely with the observations that fell from the lips of the right hon. leader of the government. Now, I want to say that the inference to be drawn from that speech to which I have just referred and from the speech which we heard from the right hon. leader of the government yesterday, is that the government are travelling in the direction of free trade. I do not think that in this country you could find a banker of any standing, a financial magnate of any standing, a man engaged in any great financial enterprise, or any important merchant, who would endorse any such proposition, irrespective of his politics. I wish to congratulate the hon. Minister of Finance upon occupying the position which he does during a period of great prosperity, and I also want to congratulate the ministry upon ruling over the destinies of Canada during a period of great prosperity shared by every civilized nation in the world. I shall not attempt to go into statistics in regard to the debt, or to the revenue and expenditure of this country, but there is one thing I would like to refer to, and it is that while the revenues have been ample, while we have been going through a period of inflation of values, this, coupled with the present ad valorem duties, has brought to the government very largely increased revenues. These revenues have been many millions greater than they were per year in any previous case, and yet we find that the government found it necessary not only to spend every dollar of these increased revenues, but that the debt of this country has increased during this period of great prosperity to the extent of about $7,000,000. At the opening of this parliament, I was very much interested in hearing the right. hon. leader of the government ask this side of the House a question. The question that he asked was : What is your policy ? I thought then of a resolution which was brought into this House in the year 1878 by the Rt. Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, and which the right hon. leader of the government read yesterday in his speech. Therefore, I need not refer to that resolution, because every one is conversant with it. However, Sir, I would like to refer to a resolution which was brought into this House exactly ten years later, and to which the right hon. gentleman gave his support. It was introduced into this House by the hon. gentleman who now occupies the position of Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). It is as follows :

> That it is highly desirable that the largest possible freedom of commercial intercourse should obtain between the Dominion of Canada and the United States, and that it is expedient that all articles manufactured in or natural products of either of the said countries, should be admitted free of duty into the ports of the other. Articles subject to duties of excise or of internal revenue alone excepted.
> That it is further expedient that the government of the Dominion should take steps at an early date to ascertain on what terms and conditions arrangements can be effected with the United States for the purpose of securing full unrestricted reciprocity of trade therewith.

I would like to ask hon. gentlemen opposite: which of these policies do they adhere to ? Do they adhere to the one laid down by Sir John Macdonald, or do they adhere to the one which was introduced at that time by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce ? There must be either one or other of these policies that they adhere to. Now, reference was made in the speech of the hon. Minister of Finance, to the fact that we brought into this country from the United States a very large amount of raw material which was used by our manufacturers, and that we brought it in free of duty because it suited us to do so, and quite properly. At the same time, I would like to point out that we also brought in from the United States $60,819,752 worth of manufactured goods, and that we are bringing from Great Britain about half that amount. It seems to me that the time has come when we ought to consider in what way the people of this country can benefit themselves by producing these articles which we import from the United States. I would like to know what benefit it is for an American commercial traveller to go through this country from one end to the other trying to sell American products. The only benefit that this country has from that kind of thing is the man's hotel bill while he is in the country ; he in no other manner assists in maintaining this country. I would like to ask hon. gentlemen to consider in what way we can so increase our tariff and so alter it that these goods which come into our country can be made in this country to a greater extent than they are at the present time. I am quite prepared to admit that you cannot shut them all out, and I am not in favour of a prohibitive tariff. But, we are harassed by the over-production of the United States. I have often been asked the question : Cannot your manufacturers in Canada compete with the United States ? I have invariably answered : Yes, we can on equal terms, but not in the ratio of seventy millions of people to six millions, not when we are handicapped. I would point, hon. gentlemen, to the fact that Canadians who have had to leave this country because of the great inducements held out in the United States of employment, because of the great opportunities there and the great scope, have been able to compete in the United States with the citizens of that country, that they are able to occupy responsible positions and that we are proud of them. Therefore, I say that the question is irrelevant, that it does not cover the case and that the question should not be considered from that standpoint. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has stated that the United States tariff is 50 per cent higher than ours.

Mr. CHARLTON. No, no—their's is 50 per cent and ours is 25 per cent.

Mr. KEMP. That would be 100 per cent —double ours. While a good many people talk about reciprocity in tariffs, I quite agree with the remarks of the hon. gentleman opposite who said we should regulate our tariff to suit our own conditions, irrespective of what other countries do.

Mr. CHARLTON. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon; I misunderstood him. It is 50 per cent on the basis of percentage on the relative duties, higher than ours; but I understood him to say 50 per cent on duties higher than ours; that is to say, if ours is 25 theirs is 75.

Mr. KEMP. I think the House understands the position and I will not refer to it any further. While a great deal of time is taken up both in the House and in the country discussing the extent of our foreign trade, little or nothing is said with regard to our interprovincial trade, and I think the Minister of Finance might very well have dealt with that feature of our commerce in his budget speech. I speak of our interprovincial trade which moves from east to west and vice versa, which our railways and transportation companies are designed to accommodate, and which is the chief reason for the existence of our manufacturing industries. That interprovincial trade has been built up enormously within the last twenty-five years, and in connection with it I would quote to the House an extract from a speech delivered by the Hon. George Brown in the Senate on the 22nd of February, 1875. The Hon. George Brown said :

> And nowhere can be found a more gratifying illustration of the grand results which flow from commercial freedom than we have in the progress of our Dominion since the accomplishment of confederation. Though the customs barriers against inter-traffic between the British North American provinces have only been removed since July, 1867, the united foreign commerce of the provinces has arisen from an annual average for thirteen years before confederation of $115,000,000 to the enormous amount in the seventh year after confederation of $240,000,000.

The Hon. George Brown in these words refers to the importance of our interprovincial traffic, and he also indicates that when we have prosperous interprovincial traffic we also have large exports and imports. This much we may be sure of, namely: that if we are prosperous within ourselves, we will also be prosperous in our trade to and from foreign countries. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that there is no class of people in this country who have applied themselves more diligently to their business and more faithfully to the task set before them of studying new process for creating new enterprises than have the manufacturers of Canada. I therefore repeat what I said in opening, that the language which has been used by some hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to our manufacturers is unworthy of being heard in this parliament. I believe, Sir, that we ought to encourage in every way possible the manufacturers of this country in their efforts to give employment to our people in all legitimate enterprises.

Now, Sir, as to this matter of preferential trade which has been spoken of time and again in this House, and in connection with which the right hon. the Prime Minister and the Finance Minister referred to what had taken place at a meeting of the Chambers of Commerce in London last summer. The Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) told us that the only important matter in reference to preferential trade that had occurred recently took place at the meeting of the 4th Congress of the Chamber of Commerce in London last year, and in view of what has been said upon that question, I think it well to correct the statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite lest they should create a false impression abroad. It is a very easy task for a member to get up in this House and tell of the difficulties in the way of securing preferential trade within the empire, but it is a very difficult task to bring forward a scheme which will remove these difficulties, and which would be in the line of what I might call constructive politics. I may state that the Rt. Hon. Joseph Chamberlain was honorary chairman of the Congress of the Chambers of Commerce which met in London in 1896, but owing to his numerous duties and to the fact that the Imperial parliament was in session he was unable to occupy that position last year. His place was taken by his under-secretary, Lord Selborne, who is now First Lord of the Admiralty. Extracts from the speech of Mr. Chamberlain in 1896 have been read, and I may be pardoned if I present to the House a few of the utterances of Lord Selborne. I quote from his speech :

There was a time when no one who took an interest in these fiscal questions, whether he was a member of the Cobden Club or an ardent protectionist, could discuss them without assuming an air of absolute infallibility. There has been more assertion of dogma in this question of free trade and protection than ever has been current among theologians. I believe free trade not to be a religion, but to be a policy.

Again, in speaking of the difficulties which had been overcome in bringing about the federation of the different Australian colonies, he said :

In Australia difficulties have been overcome, and therefore it does seem to me that, probably in a different way, they may be also overcome in the empire. Union in any political sense is one of the problems of the future.

The Rt. Hon. C. T. Ritchie, who was then president of the British Board of Trade, and who is now the Home Secretary, said on that occasion :

I hope Australia will follow the example of Canada and do what she can to promote British trade. We also hope that this is only the beginning of some closer commercial action in the future. I myself believe that the days of the strict Manchester free trade school are passing away.

Mr. HEYD. Give us the rest of his utterances at the same time; give his explanation.

Mr. KEMP. I have the official report of the Chamber of Commerce here and these extracts I have taken from the speeches of these gentlemen. I shall be very pleased to lend my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Heyd) this report and he can read it. Now, Sir, something was said in this House as to the deputation which waited upon Mr. Chamberlain, and as it is a question which in all likelihood will be discussed in the future as it has been in the past I wish to state the exact facts in regard to that matter.

The resolution which was brought into that congress was a resolution on commercial relations which had been prepared by the Toronto Board of Trade, and which was adopted by a committee of the congress after due consideration. There were several other resolutions, but the committee of the congress decided that for the purpose of discussion the resolution of the Toronto Board of Trade would meet the case better than any other. That resolution, as was pointed out by the leader of the government yesterday, was not accepted ; but an amendment was accepted asking the government to appoint a royal commission to investigate this question of preferential trade between the colonies and the mother country ; and a deputation was appointed to lay the resolution before the government. The reply which the Chamber of Commerce received from the Prime Minister was, as stated in this House, that the time for receiving this deputation was not opportune. It was not opportune because at that time the South African campaign was at its height ; the war in China was also at its height ; there was a very important session of the Imperial parliament in progress, which took up the time and attention of the Prime Minister and his colleagues ; and the country was on the eve of an election. I can quite easily understand, therefore, and I think hon. members will agree with me, that under these conditions it was inopportune for the Prime Minister to receive such a deputation, especially in view of the fact that the discussion on this question being one which enters largely into the politics of Great Britain, his reception of the deputation might be interpreted to mean that the Imperial government were about to adopt a protective policy, and this might cause their defeat in the elections which were about to take place. The deputation which was appointed by the congress was composed of thirty gentlemen from all parts of the world ; and I may say that each gentleman was supposed to bring with him some other gentleman, and also any members of the Imperial House of Commons, to meet Lord Salisbury. The letter was received, however, and the matter ended. The Finance Minister said in his budget speech that the deputation also waited on Mr. Chamberlain, and that he also turned them away. I wish to deny that statement. The deputation which went to Mr. Chamberlain was a deputation of three or four Canadian gentlemen who desired to pay their respects to him before leaving England ; and they went to him a good many days, perhaps weeks, afterwards. They were not sent by the congress. What transpired there was not given correctly by the extract read by the Finance Minister from the report of the representative who went from this city. I might say, however, that I am not in a position to state to the House what was said on that occasion, because it was thoroughly understood by Lord Strathcona and Mr. Chamberlain and the three or four of us who discussed this matter, that nothing should be said about it, because of the stand Lord Salisbury had taken. In order to confirm my opinion in that respect, I asked the other members of the deputation what their view of it was, and I have here letters from Dr. Parkin and Mr. Cockshutt, stating that their view of the interview was that it was of a confidential character.

I do not intend to take up much of the time of the House in discussing this question ; but I would like to read one or two extracts from papers which were supposed at the time to have given the best account of what transpired at the congress. The Saturday Review said :

The fourth Congress of Chambers of Commerce of the empire, whose labours were brought to a close yesterday, entrusted itself with a task whose importance it would be hard to overrate. Numerous subjects were handled, but there was one subject which transcended all the others put together in vital importance : it rightly occupied the greater part of the congress' time, and aroused by far the greatest amount of interest; the subject was the project for an Imperial customs union. Unfortunately, but inevitably, the subject also aroused a vast amount of prejudice and produced from a few delegates a flood of Cobdenite rhetoric, based upon out-of-date facts and worn-out arguments, which should have been decently buried years ago. There was almost a note of pathos in the speeches of the gentlemen from Manchester; for it was appropriately from that ancient home of the faith that the opposition to the customs union resolutions proceeded. Happily, however, their polemics were indignantly repudiated, not only by every one of the colonial delegates who spoke upon the subject, but also by not a few of the representatives of English chambers. And this circumstance is as noteworthy as it is gratifying. But a few years ago the mention of fair trade or preferential trade was scouted in this country by all except a very few thinkers, and the bare utterance of the word 'protection' sufficed to reduce any audience which considered itself representative of British industry or politics to a condition bordering upon hysteria. The newspaper reports of this week's proceedings at Fishmonger's Hall give hardly the faintest notion of the atmosphere which pervaded the discussions. It was necessary to be present in the hall in order to gauge the change which has already come over the representatives of this country's industry. Rhetorical periods about the glories of free trade and the purchase of everything in the cheapest market, which would, ten, if not five years ago, have raised outbursts of ecstatic cheering, this week fell absolutely flat, and, save for a belated voice here and there, were received in chilling silence. On the other hand, any reference to the dangers threatening British industry, to the need for the various parts of the empire to cement themselves together and, as one delegate expressed it, to stand shoulder to shoulder in matters of trade as well as in matters of warfare, evoked loud and significant applause.

I will only take up the time of the House to read a few lines of another extract from the Financial News of London :

It is not an exaggeration to say that this question absorbed more interest than that aroused by all the other topics combined. And it is significant that, next to the customs union, the sugar bounty debate (upon which a good resolution was passed, almost unanimously), excited the chief interest. The two subjects are so closely allied that a comprehensive scheme of commercial federation would dispose of the sugar bounty question by including it, as the greater includes the less. Preferential trade within the empire is as old as the empire; it began as soon as our colonies began, and was only abandoned when the Cobdenite fiscal policy established itself in this country in the middle of the century.

There were other expressions of opinion, which were referred to by the hon. leader of the opposition yesterday, on this question of preferential trade, and extracts from publications in various parts of the British Empire, showing how thought is moving along these lines.

Now, we have heard a good deal in this House as to what the attitude of this party may be in regard to the preferential tariff. In a discussion which took place on a motion made by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) at the beginning of the session, we were challenged as to what our position was. We were asked if we would do away with the preferential tariff, and if we would not move a resolution to that effect. I would like to draw the attention of the House, if I am not treading on ground which has already been gone over, to an interview which took place in Washington in 1897 between the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright), the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Hon. Sir Louis Davies), and a representative of the Associated Press. On that occasion they were reported in the Globe as having said to these gentleman in Washington. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright spoke as follows :—

On the other hand, nearly everything we need in the line of manufactures would, under reciprocity, come from this side of the line. Our manufacturers would naturally protest against this competition, but that is to be expected.

The hon. the Minister of Marine (Hon. Sir Louis Davies) is reported as having said :

We have in Canada to-day a large element whose influence is thrown in the direction of a more extended trade with the mother country as against the United States. We Canadians believe that our trade should flow through natural channels, and this natural channel inclines to this country. If you cannot trade with America, we shall be compelled to trade with Great Britain, and once these intimate relations are established with the mother country, it will be difficult to break them. On the other hand, the American manufacturer has nothing to fear: he has everything to gain by such an arrangement as we propose.

Thus, on the 8th February, 1897, these hon. gentlemen, who were thus appealing to the Washington authorities, were not very much imbued with the idea of preferential trade with Great Britain. And I think when we take into consideration the attitude of these gentlemen on that occasion, when we consider that on the 8th February, 1897, they were in favour of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, the preferential tariff with Great Britain, which they introduced that same year, was the most remarkable acrobatic performance, from a political standpoint, that this country or any other has ever witnessed.

The hon. the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Sifton) told us a few days ago what the preference was intended to do. He said :

When we give a preference, if it is to be at any one's expense, it is at the expense of the manufacturer and the workingman of Canada. We go a little further, and say that it is policy of the Liberal party of Canada to reduce the duties and to remove to some extent the burden of the excessive tariff which was imposed on imported goods by the late Conservative government.

If this utterance represents the ideas of hon. gentlemen opposite on the preferential tariff, I say it is wrong to place such a burden on the workingmen as is indicated in the speech of the Minister of the Interior. If the workingmen who are employed in the woollen industry of this country are suffering from the preferential tariff, the government should consider how they can alleviate their sufferings, and I understand that there are some woollen industries which are suffering and being closed down from the effects of the preferential tariff and the government has often been made aware of that fact.

But in discussing this question, we are asked : Would you withdraw from England this preference ? If you would, your loyalty is only lip loyalty. I suppose that what is in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite, when they ask that question, is the debt of gratitude which we owe to Great Britain. I believe we do owe the mother land a debt of gratitude and should fairly consider what it is, and I believe that we are not considering that question as fully as we ought. When I consider the responsibility that Great Britain has taken in the past in our behalf, when I think of the wealth of this country and how little we contribute towards our own protection, and the protection of our commerce, I cannot but conclude that we should be prepared to consider in what way we are going to assist in the future in defending the trade of commerce of this country and our sea coasts. We are not very near the millenium, and there is no reason to expect that we shall enjoy immunity from those responsibilities which weigh on other nations. Why should we enjoy immunity from the responsibilities that our neighbours to the south have to bear ? We find these aggressive people, whose industry we admire, every year spending a tremendous amount of money on defence, both coast and internal, and I would like to draw the attention of the House to our position in this respect. It costs Great Britain to maintain her army $5.40 per head ; it costs the United States $5.50 per head of their population. I believe in British connection ; I do not believe in annexation to the United States or independence. But if we were an independent country, we would have to spend, in the proportion in which Great Britain spends, $29,700,000 per annum on our army. If we were part of the United States, we would have to spend $30,000,000 a year on our army. But instead of spending $5.50 per head of the population, last year we spent about 40 cents. There is no nation in the world which spends so little as we do. All civilized countries have to spend from $2 to $5 per head on their army and navy and defences ; and this government should consider in what way we are going to maintain our position and assume the responsibilities we owe to the mother country. Only then would I deal with the preferential tariff ; and as Great Britain is not at this moment prepared to grant us a preference, I would deal with the preferential tariff on its merits. If these hon. gentlemen think that the debt of gratitude which we owe the mother country is being paid by the small benefit which the mother country receives on account of the goods which she ships us, that she might not send us if we had not this preferential tariff, they have a very small idea of what we owe Great Britain. Of our total commerce, which amounts to $381,517,236 imports and exports, and of which our imports are $189,622,513, only $26,094,101 comes under the preferential tariff, and therefore we are not giving Great Britain any adequate return for the privileges we enjoy of the protection of her navy and the prestige we enjoy of being a part of the British Empire. I say that we should divide this question into two parts and deal with the preferential tariff in one way and our obligations to Great Britain in another.

The next question I propose to refer to briefly is our position with Germany. We had been working up a very profitable export business with that country, and the prospects were that we would work up a very much better business in the future. But when the preferential tariff was announced, the German government tried to coerce us. They tried to make the world believe that we were not really a part of the British Empire.

There is no question, so far as I can judge, which excites German feeling to such an extent as the question of favoured commercial relations among the various parts of the British Empire. They almost go into hysterics when that question is discussed in Great Britain, or in any part of the empire. As soon as they heard of what we had done they discriminated against us. As I have said, I have been told that our produce merchants were working up a good trade with Germany, and that sometimes prices are more favourable in Germany than they are in Great Britain. We are doing a very satisfactory business with Great Britain, but that is no reason why we should not endeavour to obtain other markets, and markets which we can reach as well as the United States can. The produce of Canada which we sent to Germany last year amounted to only $1,108,163, and I am told that since these figures were made up for the Trade and Navigation Returns, even this small business has almost dropped off altogether. Our imports from Germany amount to $8,706,641. Since the preferential tariff went into effect our imports from Germany have increased in a greater proportion than have those from any other country, viz., 15 per cent. Our imports from the United States increased 13·90 per cent, and from Great Britain 13·75 per cent. Germany discriminates against the products sent to that country by our farmers. On wheat the discrimination amounts to 50 per cent, as compared with the duty charged on wheat from the United States. On oats the discrimination is 40 per cent, and on rye 50 per cent. Yet, the United States tariff against German products, I believe, is 50 per cent higher than that which we impose upon German proucts. At the opening of this session, I asked the government for the correspondence between themselves and the Imperial government with reference to this question. The government have been aware of this discrimination on the part of Germany. The boards of trade of Montreal and Toronto have drawn attention to it. When the right hon. leader of the government was in Toronto last fall he was approached on this subject, and he told those who waited upon him that the matter should have his careful attention, and that everything possible should be done. I think it is the duty of the government, before this session closes, to tell this House what they are doing, and to bring down the correspondence which has passed between them and the Imperial government on this matter. I do not think it is the temper of the Canadian people to be used by Germany in this way, and I think the government would be upheld in taking steps to straighten the matter out. We have the case in our own hands. I feel confident that if any nation in the world were to do against the United States what Germany is doing against this country, it would take the American people a very short time to arrange it and retaliate if necessary. They would put such a tariff in effect against German products as would bring Germany to an understanding of what her position was. I do not think that because we are part of the British Empire, and that the people of Great Britain are easy going in trade matters, we should submit to this injustice at the hands of Germany. We ought to have every market for our farmers that we can obtain. Look at the position of the United States on this question as compared with ours. The exports of Germany to the United States amount to $103,456,554, while the exports of the United States to Germany amount to $197,603,400—nearly double the exports from Germany. We have very much the same kinds of products to sell as the United States supplies to Germany, yet our exports to Germany, instead of being double our imports from that country, as is the case with the United States, amount to only one-eighth, and even that trade has dropped off to almost nothing at all. Germany enjoys the run of the British market, and of the market of every British colony, on the same terms as British producers; yet, because we give the mother country a preference, we are treated in this way. I urge upon the government to consider this matter, and to offset this injustice which Germany has seen fit to put into effect against this country.

We have been told by the Minister of Finance that we are on the crest of a wave of prosperity. I hope that his pessimistic view of the matter may not be realized. It looked as if the hon. gentleman was trying to prepare a soft place for himself to fall on. What has this administration done since 1896? Great professions have been made in reference to transportation facilities, and to the great good the country was to receive by the solution of this transportation question. I would like to ask hon. gentlemen opposite if there are any improvements they have made in the transportation facilities that have given the producers of this country any cheaper freight rates than existed when they came into power? I would like to have them point out any advantage that we enjoy that we did not enjoy before they took office. And I would like to direct the attention of the House to this fact, that in this province of Ontario, which produces the great bulk of the exports that go from this country, the freight rates are higher than they have ever been in the past. Unless the people of Ontario get an outlet along the great lakes, unless they can participate in the traffic of the canals, we shall have no relief. It may be a matter of local importance, but it is one of very wide importance as well—we have repeatedly urged the improvement of the harbour of Toronto in such a way as to allow the vessels of 14 feet draught, that use the St. Lawrence canals, to be able to come into the harbour; we have shown that Toronto is a great distributing centre, that more freight tonnage comes into and goes out of Toronto than comes into and goes out of Montreal; and yet we cannot get the government to move in this matter. We find all kinds of policies in regard to transportation, we find expenditures in all parts of the country, and yet the centre of the part of the Dominion where the exports are produced, and where they are gathered for export, is left without necessary improvements. There is another feature of the transportation problem, and one that I referred to a few days ago. That is, what I might almost call the calamity to the St. Lawrence route, of the transference by the Grand Trunk Railway of its terminus from Montreal to Portland. I do not know what the opinion of other members of the House may be with regard to this question, nor do I care. When I referred to it the other day, I was accused by the Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Blair) with introducing politics into the discussion of this question. I should be sorry to create such a precedent. But, I venture to say that the very liberal manner in which the government dealt with the Grand Trunk Railway when it took over the Drummond County Railway, had the effect I said it had. Calculated at 3½ per cent, the payments by the government of $140,000 a year, and $500,000 given to assist them in improving Victoria bridge, was in effect, a payment to the Grand Trunk Railway of $4,500,000, and this money the Grand Trunk Railway used to side-track Montreal, and to make Portland in the United States their terminus. I say that the government, when the Grand Trunk Railway stated publicly that their policy was to make Portland their terminus in summer as well as winter, should have inserted in their bargain a condition that would not tolerate that sort of thing, and I believe they could have prevented it.

Now, what do we find in the discussion of this transportation question? We find the Grand Trunk Railway are taking steamship line after steamship line away from Montreal, and they will continue to do so. Let me remind the House that every steamer that loads and unloads in Montreal, employs in labour and in the purchase of supplies for that purpose a sum of between $4,000 and $5,000; and the men who do that work come from various places down the St. Lawrence to work on the docks in Montreal, and the money is distributed among them. I say therefore, that instead of these men earning that money, it will be earned by aliens if the Grand Trunk make their terminal in the United States, as they intend to do. The government could have prevented this misfortune, and in neglecting to do so they have not shown ordinary business foresight. We have lost the German market, and we are not getting other markets which I think we should have. Now, Sir, we are sending to France only $1,372,359, while we are taking from France $4,464,938. The position of the trade of the United States with France is very much the same as that of Germany in respect of this matter. The United States import from France $72,781,212, and they export to France $82,553,335. Their imports are 90 per cent of their exports. The same conditions apply to Belgium and to Holland. We have also heard this session something about our trade with Italy, which amounts to only $400,000, while that of the United States amounts to $64,000,000 a year. I think it is the duty of this government not to rely altogether on the markets of Great Britain, but to seek out new markets. I would like to ask hon. gentlemen opposite what they have done in the last four years to open up new markets for the produce of this country as the United States have been doing. We have got direct steamship lines with Germany and Belgium and we should not remain in this position.

Then, there is the question of the effect upon our workingmen in the woollen and other industries by the operation of the preferential tariff. I think the government made a mistake in not propounding some policy to the people before the last general election. I remember when the right hon. gentleman came to Toronto to address our people on political questions, and when he was so well received. Sir, I am proud of the way the Prime Minister of this country is received when he comes to Toronto, and I hope he will always receive the same courteous and enthusiastic reception from the people of that city. He said there was then no burning question before the people of this country. I contend that there has been time in the history of this country when we should not have had a burning question up for discussion between the political parties. Still, that does not excuse the government for their inaction. Instead of simply marking time, I would like to have them look out for new markets, to see if they cannot increase our exports to Germany, to Belgium, to Italy, and to France. I would like to see hon. gentlemen opposite, instead of criticising our policy for mutual preference within the empire, urge upon the mother country and urge upon the colonies, upon Australia, which furnishes so great a field for our exports, the advantages of a policy of preferential treatment within the empire for the products of the empire. I hope that we will be able to secure with Australia a treaty affording each country a mutual preference. If this country and Australia were to join hands in such a manner, it would have a very beneficial influence upon the mother country, and help them to appreciate the advantages which they might derive from a policy of mutual preference within the empire.

I am in full accord with a remark that fell from the lips of the hon. leader of the opposition yesterday when he referred to the present position of the Conservative party in opposition. I do not consider that it should be the highest ambition of a political party to hold the reins of power, but rather to be on the right side of public questions. I would rather see the Conservative party of this country adhere to their principles, adhere to an aggressive policy for the development of the great natural resources of this country, the development of our industries in various lines, though they may happen to be temporarily excluded from power. I hope, Sir, that this government will make some movement in the direction which I have pointed out, instead of simply contenting themselves with marking time, and that in the future these questions which I have endeavoured to advocate will receive support from the opposite side of the House, and even a more effectual advocacy than I have been able to give them.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at Eight o'clock.

Mr. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington). Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Kemp), who concluded the delivery of his speech just as the House rose at six o'clock, is not now in his seat, but, that fact need not prevent me from stating that I listened with great interest to his remarks, and I trust that the hon. member will take it in good part if I tender to him my congratulations upon the manner in which he acquitted himself. It may seem, perhaps, something like the display of a patronizing spirit on my part to tender my congratulations to that hon. member, when, I myself, have had no greater experience in the debates in this House than he has had, but, I certainly felt quite as fully as he did the strangeness of the situation and passed through the trial which he must have passed through this afternoon, in attempting to address the House for the first time. While I do offer him my sincere congratulations, I cannot approve of many of the statements which he uttered, or many of the sentiments which he expressed, and I certainly disagree entirely with many of the conclusions which he reached. I had never the privilege of listening to a budget debate before the present debate was brought on, but I had always understood that the discussion upon the budget debate was properly confined, more or less, to matters appertaining to the finances of the country in particular. and to matters of trade and commerce, more particularly as such matters were affected by the fiscal policy of the country and as these matters themselves had an effect upon the finances of the country. But, Sir, I have been enlightened during the past few days as to the scope which is allowed in the discussion of these questions in this House. I do not propose to follow the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House through all the matters to which he made reference in his speech. I do not think that one is called upon to do so at this time. I believe there are other occasions when an hon. member can more properly discuss questions of transportation, questions as to the Montreal harbour, questions as to the improvement of the Toronto harbour. All matters of that kind he can discuss more properly at other times. However, upon matters appertaining to the trade of the country and upon matters appertaining to the finances, there is no doubt that the discussion was quite relevant to the debate which is now in hand. In my humble opinion, whatever may have been thought, or whatever may be thought, of the amendment which the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) saw fit to move, one thing, at least, may be said for it, and it is that it served for the time-being, at all events, to rescue the discussion from the position of insignificance, to which his own followers were fast consigning it. The hon. member for East Toronto opened his remarks by expressing his keen disappointment at the remarks of the right hon. leader of the government (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) during the course of this debate. If there has been disappointment on that side of the House, there have been other matters during the course of this debate which have given rise to disappointment on this side of the House. I think I express the sentiments fairly of this side of the House when I say, that, apart from the remarks of the hon. leader of the opposition himself, the discussion of this question by hon. members opposite has given rise to no slight feeling of disappointment, a disappointment which has arisen from the manner of discussion, from the criticism and the manner of criticism, because, hon. gentlemen seem to have failed in raising this discussion to anything like the level of a budget debate, to anything like the traditional dignity and importance of such a debate. The disjointed and apparently aimless criticism which has been indulged in by some hon. gentlemen opposite has upset all the preconceived ideas of some of us as to what a budget debate ought to be, to the ideas which were formed, not by actual participation in such a discussion, but more from the pages of parliamentary history in Great Britain, or from the pages of parliamentary history in our own country—from the pages of parliamentary history in Great Britain from the days when the Great Commoner assailed the budgets of the administration of a Walpole, or later on, when the younger Pitt, Canning, Burke, and Fox, did not think it beneath their dignity to give their best time and their best thought to the discussion of the principles of finance. It was on the occasion of the budget debate that these principles were discussed, and not mere petty details. Later still, when men of the stamp of Sir Robert Peel, and Lord Derby and Richard Cobden and John Bright, gave their time to the discussion of the financial policy of their country, they employed their best thought and effort in elevating the debate. Throughout the past century and a half at least of British history, the occasion of the budget debate has been an occasion for the discussion of broad financial principles, and not the discussion of mere petty details, and also, I think, it has been so in our own House. We may go back to the days of confederation, we may pass onward from that time until twenty-four years ago, when the late Rt. Hon. Sir John Macdonald moved his celebrated resolution in this House, known as the national policy resolution. While we may disagree as to the principle of that resolution which he then moved, we agree that his resolution was one which involved the discussion of a broad principle. It was a discussion worthy of the occasion, and so it has been down through succeeding years in budget debate. Hon. members who then occupied the opposition benches discussed the question from the standpoint of financial principles. So it has been through succeeding years, right down, one might also say, to the present year of grace when we were treated, not to a discussion of these broad principles, but to a rambling discussion of the details of government, covering almost the whole of this vast country. Having these matters before us, is it any wonder that we did suffer a little disappointment on this side of the House when we noticed hon. members opposite, in their discussion and in their criticism, degenerating into the merest kind of commonplace, what, all our preconceived notions led us to look forward to as a veritable battle of giants. I am free to admit that it may be to some extent my own lack of information in regard to the details of the finances of this country which has rendered me incapable of appreciating either the force or object of the criticism which has been levelled at the present financial statement. I have not been able to make up my mind whether the object of the critic was to detract from the credit which is due properly to the hon. Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) for his admirable financial statement, or whether the real object was one of self-indulgence, of a little self-glorification over some real or imaginary achievement which took place in the early days of the Conservative party. If the object of hon. gentlemen be the first of these at which I have hinted, namely, to detract from the credit which is due the government for their statement as to the finances of Canada, the weakness of the assault which they were able to make has only served to magnify the exceptionally strong position which the government is able to occupy upon that subject, but, if, on the other hand, their object be merely self-glorification over their own greatness of years ago, I am sure that every one in this House will admit that it is the prescriptive and undoubted right of an opposition to extract all the consolation it can from the memory of vanished greatness. But, there is a limit to all things, a line must be drawn, and the time comes when the House demands something more substantial than reminiscences of the last fifteen, or twenty, or twenty-five years.

I believe I have the right to inquire : Upon what principle this question is being discussed by hon. gentlemen opposite. If a principle at all is involved ; what is the principle ? Do they charge that the government in its past management of the finances of this country or in its proposals for the future, has violated some recognized economic principle ? If so, what is the principle that has been violated ? Do they charge that the government in its management of the finances has committed some fundamental error ? Then, what is the error ? Do they charge that the government has been reckless and extravagant or worse ? If that be the charge, then, as a matter of common justice, the government is entitled to have the charge laid in detail in order to be able to meet it. But, failing any charge of that kind, failing any criticism upon any principle, economic or otherwise, is it to be wondered at that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), as far back as Friday last, threw out a mild hint in this House that if hon. gentlemen opposite had nothing more substantial to offer in discussion than had been contributed up to that time, the debate might as well be brought to a close because further discussion was not only unnecessary but a positive waste of the time of the House. There is no doubt in my mind that the timely hint from the hon. minister (Sir Richard Cartwright) was an incentive to the hon. leader of the opposition to put forth some effort to rescue his followers from the humiliating position which they were likely to occupy, and as a result of that effort we have the amendment which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) saw fit to move. It would be charitable to say that that amendment is a creature of unfortunate circumstances. It is a sort of emergency ration which the leader of the opposition has laid before the House. No one can claim that it is an amendment born of any present financial condition in Canada, or justified by any trade condition now existent. When I read the first clause of that amendment I was struck with the idea that the draughtsman, by the language which he had employed, had gone beyond any meaning which he himself intended to convey. But when we remember that the draughtsman was none other than the leader of the opposition himself whose practice of the legal profession has long accustomed him to the use of language, and the use of it precisely and concisely ; we must conclude that the language of the amendment probably expresses his own ideas upon the subject. In order that we may understand each other the better, let us examine that first clause. Does it mean, as I believe it means, that there is not sufficient or adequate protection in Canada to-day ? Does the hon. gentleman mean by the words 'pronounced protection' that the tariff now in force does not afford sufficient protection ? If that is his meaning we can argue it upon that hypothesis. Is it the insinuation of the language he has used that there is not sufficient assurance or encouragement to industries in this country. If that be the meaning we can argue it upon that hypothesis. Certain it is that if such be the real meaning of the first clause of the amendment, it is nothing less than an absolute refutation of the statements made by him and by his followers in this House and in the country. Is it not a fact that for the past four years the Conservatives have charged that the tariff which is in force to-day is what they call the grand old national policy ? Has it not been charged by the gentlemen opposite in this very debate, that the tariff now in force is a thoroughly protective policy? Has it not been charged on the platform and in the press, that the Liberals were unable or unwilling to make a tariff of their own and that they boldly adopted the tariff of the Conservative party? Do we not remember those stories about the stolen clothes? Was our memory not refreshed a few days ago by the reference of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) to the footpad and the stolen purse. Has it not been the whole claim of the Conservative party up to the time this amendment was moved, that the present tariff in Canada is the tariff inaugurated by the Conservative party and is a protective tariff. Well, if it be correct that it is a protective tariff and that the Conservatives are responsible for it, is it not reasonable to suppose that they thought it adequate and sufficient when they brought it into being and kept it in force so long?

But, Sir, there is a wide difference of opinion upon the question of the tariff in this country, though it may be that the difference perhaps is more over a name or over language than over any real matter of greater account. I believe that with very slight change in the language of clause one this amendment could be made such a one as would commend itself to the judgment of every hon. member in this House. Strike out, if you will, the words 'pronounced protection,' which are objectionable to members on this side of the House. Do not say that we have a revenue tariff as we claim on this side and do not say that it is a protective tariff, as is claimed on the other, but merely make your amendment to read: That by the continuance of the present tariff policy adequate protection is given to the industries of Canada; and then you will have a fair expression of the best opinion of hon. members on both sides regarding the tariff. I do not know that anything in the politics of the country has ever been so persistently and so inconsistently misrepresented as the position of the Liberal party upon the question of the tariff. Hon. members opposite surely must know better than they say in regard to this. Hon. members opposite surely by this time have learned what is the Liberal position upon the question of the tariff. I did not know that the Liberal tariff policy went back as far as confederation, but I have heard to-day that ever since the year of confederation the policy of the Liberal party upon the question of the tariff has been, that we should have a tariff but it should be a tariff of revenue. We on this side of the House realize that we require a certain amount of money each year to conduct the affairs of the country. For the coming year it is to be about $46,000,000, but every year a large amount of money must be provided and the simple question is: How is that money going to be raised?

There are various methods of raising money for national purposes. It might be raised by the imposition of a direct tax; it might be raised in other ways; but the policy of the Liberal party and the present government is that the money necessary to be raised each year to conduct the affairs of the government shall be raised by means of a tariff, and that tariff shall be so adjusted as to produce sufficient revenue. That was the policy of the Liberal party away back in 1872. It was the policy of the administration of the late Alexander Mackenzie, and in the closing years of that administration, at a time when there was not enough revenue to meet the requirements of the public expenditure, it was proposed to increase the tariff—why? Not certainly for the reason suggested by hon. gentlemen opposite, in order that a certain degree of protection might be given, but solely to provide the Finance Minister with sufficient revenue to carry on the affairs of the country. That was the policy of the Liberal party then, and when they went out of power in 1878 they did not change their policy. In succeeding years the policy of the Liberal party on the tariff was the same. They said, we will maintain a tariff, but it will be a tariff for revenue and not for protection. The hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Kemp) quoted some articles on unrestricted reciprocity. It is true, at one time the Liberal party did advocate the principle of unrestricted reciprocity; but that was quite consistent with their advocacy at the same time of a revenue tariff; and I believe it is the uniform opinion in Canada to-day—and in this I believe hon. members opposite agree with me—that a very large measure of reciprocity between Canada and the United States in matters of trade is a most desirable thing, in the interests of both countries. But throughout, the policy of a revenue tariff continued. Then, Sir, in order that there might be no question at all about what their policy was, the Liberals of Canada from one end of the country to the other met in Ottawa in the year 1893 and solemnly laid down their policy in black and white, and spread it broadcast throughout the country, making it so plain that all men could understand it; and in that declaration they said they would have a tariff for the purposes of revenue. Did they not carry out that pledge within a few months after they came into office?

All these facts are just as well known by hon. gentlemen opposite as by hon. members on this side of the House. If that be so, why is there this persistent misrepresentation of the Liberal position on the question of the tariff? I could point out without any very great difficulty some Conservative inconsistencies with regard to the same matter. I can certainly point out inconsistencies in the Conservative view of the Liberal tariff. Why, Sir, when the hon. Finance Minister introduced his tariff in the spring of 1897, hon. members opposite almost to a man stood up and denounced it. They said, you have produced a ruinous tariff, the attack being led by the hon. gentleman who then led the opposition. He said : You will bring ruin to every industry of Canada if you maintain a tariff of that kind. That was their first position. But when they saw that the industries of the country were going to prosper under the new tariff, that there was going to be no stagnation, but advance and improvement, they changed their song, and said : You have stolen our clothes ; you are maintaining the old policy of protection.

Now, Sir, is it not a reasonable thing to ask that the present tariff and the policy of this government upon the question of the tariff should be judged by its fruits ? I submit that if you judge it merely as an academic problem, or by the results which it has produced in this country, you must come to the same conclusion, that the government are justified in maintaining it. I do not go so far as to say that the tariff is complete, that it is entirely without error. I know some details myself which in my judgment ought to be corrected. But, Sir, it would be a wrong thing at such a time, when trade has become established on certain lines, for any government to interfere with the details of a tariff which would cause unrest throughout the business community. One thing that the present tariff has given to the country, which it never enjoyed before, is stability in the duties levied upon the various articles.

The hon. leader of the opposition said, how can you argue that you have a revenue tariff when you have a surplus? and to back up his theory that a revenue tariff and a surplus are inconsistent, he quoted some utterances of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) away back in 1882, and read some newspaper articles of 1882 which he attributed to the hon. Minister of Finance.

To my mind there is absolutely no inconsistency at all in having a surplus with a revenue tariff. The hon. gentleman knows precisely how a surplus comes about. He knows that the revenue of the country is estimated before it is collected. He knows that the Finance Minister makes a careful estimate of his expenditure and his revenue, and there can be little doubt that if the Finance Minister wished, he could so adjust his tariff that there would not be much of a surplus. I do not think he could come exactly within the figures, but he could come relatively nearer to the exact amount required than he has come this year. But why not have a surplus? Why not be on the safe side in your finances ? If all the money that was required in this country were merely the common annual expenditure of the country, then it would be a wrong thing to have a surplus under a revenue tariff. But we require far more money than we get. Far more money is spent in Canada than is represented by the annual expenditure. Take this year for example : The hon. Finance Minister says he expects to spend about $46,400,000; that is the ordinary annual expenditure. In addition to that, he expects to spend about $10,500,000 on permanent public works and improvements. That brings the expenditure up to about $57,000,000 ; yet all he expects to receive during the year is $53,000,000 He could have pruned his duties to have brought his revenue down to the $46,400,000 if he had so desired. Then he would either have had to abandon the public improvements or he would have had to go and borrow the whole amount necessary to make them. Which course is he to pursue ? The course the government adopts is : We will permit the accumulation of a reasonable amount of revenue, and when it accumulates we will spend it on the public works of the country. We will carry on these public works, and if the surplus is not sufficient to pay the cost, then the small balance will be the amount by which our debt will be increased. I submit that that is good financing. I submit that it is right to provide a small surplus annually, in order that we may expend it in this way. Far better that we should do that than borrow the whole amount we may require and pay interest. That, at all events, is the plan which the Minister of Finance has adopted, and there is nothing whatever in that plan inconsistent with the maintenance of a revenue tariff.

I have also heard it charged that ours is not a revenue tariff, beceause we grant bounties, and bounties are the most extreme form of protection. Well, Mr. Speaker, the bounty system, I admit, is a protective system, and admit also that I am not opposed to the bounty system so long as it is kept within reasonable bounds That, I think, is the principle on which the present government is working. Here, for instance, is a particular industry which needs assistance, and is going to become a permanent improvement and of great value in the development of the country, and to this industry the government agree to pay a bounty. No doubt, that is a principle of protection, and I am so far a protectionist that I agree with that prinicple so long as it is kept within reasonable bounds. I was glad to hear the Minister of Finance declare, in reply to the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), that the subject of lead bounties was under discussion. Personally, I see no objection to a reasonable amount being expended in the development of the lead industry, just as such an amount is being expended in the development of the iron industry.

But, what objection is there, on the other hand, to charging these bounties against capital account ? One of the charges made by the hon. member for West York was, that we were charging these bounties against capital account and not against annual expenditure. Is not that the proper way? Are these bounties an annual expenditure? Are they not precisely in the same position as railway subsidies? Does not parliament vote railway subsidies solely on the principle that they are going to develop the country and will be permanent improvements? If parliament does not vote them on that principle, parliament should not vote them at all. They are voted on the ground that they are going to develop the country, and are in the nature of permanent improvements. Where is that money charged? It is charged to capital account. Where did the hon. member for West York charge such subsidies when in power? He charged them to capital account. Where did every government that was ever in power in this country charge railway subsidies they charged them to capital account. Then, why not charge bounties to the same account. They are not in the nature of expenditure going on from year to year, but will only go on for a few years and then cease. They go to improve the country in a permanent way and should be charged to capital account and not to annual expenditure.

These are matters which struck me during the course of this discussion, but there is one other to which I wish to refer before leaving the subject. I think it was the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Kemp) who said that the policy of the government was driving people out of the country, and that men were actually leaving Canada for want of employment. Is not that entirely contrary to the facts? Is it not within the knowledge of every hon. member here that men have come back in large numbers from the United States during the past four years? Is it not a fact that there has been such great mercantile and commercial and industrial development in this country that more labour was necessary than has been employed, and a great portion of the additional labour consists of Canadians, who were expatriated a few years ago but have now returned to Canada? In proof of that statement, take the wail of the New England millowners, that they cannot get operatives for their mills. And what reason do they give? They say that so many French Canadian operatives have gone back to Canada that the mills are short of hands. Take the farms of Michigan, which have been abandoned, and the lumber mills, which cannot get hands, and what reason is given for this lack of labour? It is that the men have gone back to Canada. Is it not within the knowledge of every hon. member, in the particular locality in which he may happen to reside, that many men have come back to reside in their own town who had gone from Canada to the United States in the last ten or fifteen years?

As between Canada and the United States, the movement of population has been entirely in favour of this country. It has caused serious talk on the other side of the line, not only on the question of population, but also on the question of the export of our food products to the old country.

I will not occupy your time further, but will merely advert to the remaining sections of the amendment, and shall do so very briefly indeed. If there is one thing for which I admire the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Kemp) it is his courage and persistence in carrying on the debate on that question of preferential trade within the empire, after the manner in which the fallacy of that clause of the amendment had been exposed during the past forty-eight hours in this House. We admire courage and persistence, but I noticed that it was all courage, and nothing to back it up in the shape of reason, because I failed to recognize a single new fact which the hon. member brought to the attention of the House while he endeavoured to convince us that we should give our support to the second clause of that amendment.

Are hon. members opposite sincere in their desire to have Imperial or preferential trade between Canada and Great Britain, as is proposed by the amendment? If they are sincere in that view, they should stop their denunciations of the one act of the Canadian parliament which has brought that greater question within the range of possibility. I refer to the preference which we now give to the goods of the mother land. I have heard it stated here, time and time again, during the course of this debate, that the preference we give Great Britain is no preference at all, that our imports from Great Britain have not increased, that our exports have increased, but not to a greater extent than those to the United States. That may be true, but there is reason for it. The recent increase in exports of the United States to Great Britain is not in connection with goods which Canada produces, but in connection with goods which the United States export and Canada does not. It is in connection with the production of iron and steel probably that the greatest increase is noticeable. But that is an infant industry in Canada, which is rapidly rising to be a great industry. But where we have disturbed our competitors and where the benefit of the preference is noticeable in Canada, is with regard to the agricultural or finished food products which we are exporting to Great Britain. In the matter of cheese, bacon, butter and the like, Canada has far outstripped the United States since the preference was inaugurated, and nobody recognizes that fact more plainly than our friends to the south.

I heard the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) express the most earnest solicitude on behalf of the Canadian farmer.

I was surprised to hear the hon. member for West Toronto do so. He seemed to think that the government of Canada had committed a grievous wrong on the Canadian farmer, because, one result of our preference to Great Britan was a discriminating tariff against Canada on the part of Germany. That may be one of the results. But did not the hon. member for West Toronto realize what a relatively small quantity of goods from this country seeks German markets and what a tremendously large quantity finds its way to British markets? Does he think the Canadian farmer is mourning over the condition of affairs now so vastly improved over what it was a few years ago? Why, if he had expressed his solicitude for these poor farmers, as he put it, five or six years ago, I have no doubt the farmers would have appreciated his sympathy. He has not a single farmer in his constituency, I am persuaded. But he did honour the constituency which I have the honour to represent by sending up some seed grain prior to the last election. That, at all events, is my information on the subject.

Now, is there anything more manifest than this—that the farmers of Canada are in a much better position than they have been in any time in the last fifteen years? Is there any better satisfied portion of this community than the agricultural population? I can tell the hon. member for West Toronto that if the appeal of the government in November last had been solely upon its financial policy and only to the farmers of the country, the result would have been that the ruin which has been wrought in the ranks of our opponents would be as nothing to the ruin which would have followed an appeal limited to the farmers of Canada. The farmers are prosperous, the farmers are satisfied. They do not want parliament or the government to interfere with that preferential arrangement in favour of the goods of the mother land for the sake of a few paltry hundreds or thousands of dollars that might have found their way into the German market on even terms with the rest of the world. I prefer to leave that question of German discrimination as the Prime Minister left it. I think that the mode suggested by the Prime Minister to the leader of the opposition was accepted by that hon. gentleman as the proper one for dealing with this question. It should not be brought up here for discussion; we should not get into heated debate over it, until the government has exhausted all its powers of bringing about a satisfactory arrangement with the German Empire. Until that time, I think, our discussion is out of place. But this reference to the German tariff is not more out of place in this discussion than other clauses of the amendment are out of place. Is there any reason why there should be a change in the fiscal policy of the country? It is true there are some manufacturers that would like better terms. The hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Kemp) felt very sore that any one should mention that the manufacturers had been coming to Ottawa to ask that changes should be made in the tariff. But it is a fact that they have been coming—numerous deputations have come. Manufacturers are only human beings and, like other men, they want to get all the assistance and all the preference they can. And if their coming to Ottawa has the result of securing for them special terms, they will continue to come, but they must not complain if some of their requests cannot be granted. Such sensible business men as the hon. member for East Toronto should not take offence at a mere reference to the class of which he is an honoured member. There is nothing in the affairs of this country, financial, commercial, or otherwise to justify any change in our fiscal policy; but, on the other hand, I submit that if you will judge this tariff, the revenue tariff of the present administration by the results that have been brought about, one and all will say that the government is perfectly justified in maintaining that tariff.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (East Simcoe). Mr. Speaker, I am sure that on this side of the House no fault will be found with the remarks made by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie). I certainly think both sides will thank him very cordially for the lecture he has read the House on the proper method of conducting debate. He started out by telling us that there should be a higher standard of debate in this House, and in a rather eloquent burst he portrayed the greatness of English parliaments in the past in which there had been Cobdens and Brights. I presume his modesty forbade him, in the presence of the ministers, instituting a comparison between those hon. gentlemen and the giants of the English Liberalism of the past. But he did make a striking reflection upon the ministers who were present and listening to him, when he held up Bright and Cobden as men who were always martyrs to principle. Certainly he could not lay it at the doors of these ministers that they had ever been true to any principle. Principles they may have known, but principles as things to be suffered for were put behind them long ago. Nature has been kind to them. They are like the famous American politician who said:

> A merciful Providence fashioned us holler,
> In order that we might our principles swaller.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Guthrie) early in his speech spoke in this high and lofty strain, and I would have thought that, coming from the constituency he does come from—South Wellington, a very grand constituency—he would have represented these high principles of propriety and of elevated public life there as he does here. But I notice that the other day a banquet was—very worthily no doubt—tendered to him, and he did not condescend to tell the people there of the high state of morality which should exist in politics and the high standard to be maintained; but he did tell the people that they were led up as sheep to the shambles. He explained that the reason why the constituency did not go Liberal in 1896, was because the Liberals had carried on a campaign of cash and wind——

Mr. GUTHRIE. I hope the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) will excuse me for interupting him, but I desire to say that I used no such expression.

Mr. BENNETT. I will read from the Toronto Globe——

Mr. GUTHRIE. I have read that report—it is wrong.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman spoke somewhat late in the evening and no doubt this banquet having been in the town of Guelph was not a cold water affair. He is reported as saying that in 1896 the Liberals of South Wellington had fought a campaign of wind and cash, but that his campaign had been one of hard work and hence success. If he was reported correctly, he paid a poor tribute indeed to the intelligence of his constituency in intimating that it was up for bargain and sale. In his speech of this evening the hon. gentleman went on to discuss the policy of the present administration—if policy it may be called. In one thing the hon. gentleman is to be congratulated. He has no unhappy past to look back upon. He is not like the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) or the hon. Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding)—he has nothing to apologize for, because he has not been committed to any principle. He has taken his stand, and, I think fairly well. He is a protectionist as long as the protectionist policy is favourable, but the moment it becomes otherwise he is willing, like the ministers, to set his sails to any varying wind. I propose to deal for a little time with some remarks he made with reference to some questions of the debate. He commenced by commenting on the amendment which has been moved by the leader of the opposition. He said he wished to know from this side of the House where this party stood. Well, if the hon. gentleman will take pains to read the resolution he will find where this party stands. He asks if this party is prepared to increase the protective duties on any particular articles; if they are, he says, here is the time and place to do it. Now, let us see what the resolution says :

> That, in the opinion of this House, the welfare of the country requires a pronounced policy of adequate protection and encouragement at all times to the labour, agricultural, manufacturing, mining and other industrial interests of Canada.

Surely there is no uncertain sound about that. It says the country requires a pronounced policy. From this side of the House no apology need go forth as to the past of this party. For over twenty-five years it has stood for a policy of pronounced protection. But here is this marked difference between us and hon. gentlemen opposite, that while we have to a great extent adopted and fallen in line with a protective policy, they have at all times intimated, and by insinuation threatened, that at the earliest possible moment this policy will be cut in twain, or shorn of much of its strength. But it is to be noticed that these hon. gentlemen always have an attachment in the shape of some friendly manufacturers of the same political faith, and the result is that these gentlemen remain protectionists in certain lines and relative to certain industries. Now, there can be no more marked line of conduct mapped out than there is in that resolution stating that the policy of protection must be a pronounced policy. And now we have the warning note that has been sounded by the Minister of Finance, when he told the people of this country, and more particularly the manufacturers, that the time has arrived when they must take in sail, that a commercial storm is coming on. That is a declaration not only to the manufacturers of this country, but to the labouring classes and the agricultural interests as well, and indeed to every interest, because every interest is dependent on the manufacturing interests of the country. I say in view of all these facts it is time for the country to see where the present government stands. If this government is honest in what it says, why have they not the courage to take the tariff as it stands to-day ? The First Minister said yesterday in the House that there was a certain amount of protection on many items, and to his mind that protection should be lessened and reduced. The Minister of the Interior speaking the other day made this remark :

> When we give a preference if it is to be at any one's expense, it is at the expense of the manufacturer and workingmen of Canada. We go a little further and say that it is the policy of the Liberal party of Canada to reduce the duties and to remove to some extent the burdens of the excessive tariff which was imposed upon imported goods by the late Conservative government.

He shows that there are dozens of cases where goods are coming in from the United States, and from that country alone, where the duties are to-day exactly what they were under Conservative rule. Then in the name of all that is honest when these gentlemen denounce that protection, why have they not the honesty to attack it and reduce the duties ? But they do not rest there. The Minister of Finance, speaking in the House a couple of years ago—I think it was on the occasion of the announcement of the preference—said that the manufacturers of this country must take notice from this time forward that they were not promised immunity from cuts in the tariff, that this might take place on any occasion, and that they should take heed. As I already remarked, the First Minister yesterday made the statement that there was already tariff protection beyond what there should be. I say, then, in face of these statements of these hon. gentlemen, it is time for us and for the country to understand where both parties stand. The amendment moved by the hon. gentleman who leads the opposition states clearly and explicitly that we are going to adhere to a pronounced policy of adequate protection, and there is not going to be on this side of the House from one quarter and from one section a defence of protection, and from another quarter hon. gentlemen standing up in their places and denouncing that policy, as they are doing on the government side to-day, and from different ministers of the Crown we hear these statements and insinuations that they believe that that policy should be cut in two. But, Sir, it is in keeping with the profession of hon. gentlemen ; they think one thing and they do directly the opposite.

Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman then dealt with the question of a tariff for revenue only, and he went over the old song that this was only a tariff for revenue. Why, Sir, fancy a city council or a town council yearly striking their rate, and at the end of the year having a surplus of $8,000 or $10,000. Would it be said that they had simply struck a rate for revenue and for revenue alone ? The fact of the matter is that these gentlemen are so held up by certain political friends of their own that they are bound in obedience to the wishes of those friends to maintain a high protective tariff on many goods coming into this country from the United States, and that is the reason for the high revenue that has been produced. There are other reasons no doubt for that revenue, one has been the increased values ; and no doubt falling values in this country is one reason why the Minister of Finance saw fit to sound the warning that he did the other day. Another point the hon. gentleman dealt with at considerable length was this: That the time had arrived in this country, in view of affairs as they stand, that we should endeavour to negotiate with the United States a reciprocity treaty. Well, I can only say that the hon. gentleman cannot have read the debates, and particularly the speech of his leader in this House, I think a year or two ago, when he made the statement that the time had gone past in this country for any reciprocity with the United States, that our markets was the market of Great Britain, and not the market of the United States alone. That is a difference between the hon. gentleman and his leader which they will have to reconcile between themselves.

But the hon. gentleman was happy in one thing : He laid down as his political belief and entire honesty of opinion that he was in favour of iron bounties. He was not like the Minister of Trade and Commerce, hampered with a past ; he had not stood up in the House and on public platforms year after year and denounced the policy of giving iron bounties. But the hon. gentleman goes further to-night and says that he is not content to give a bounty on iron only, but he proposes to give bounties on lead as well. That is another point in respect of which the hon. gentleman is to be congratulated on the fact that he has not a political past.

Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman said that we should endeavour to restrict ourselves to questions of trade and commerce, leaving out what might be termed extraneous matters, and I propose briefly to discuss some matters in that line. The First Minister yesterday drew a line between our policy as enunciated by our leader, and the policy of the government, in the course of which he made this striking statement.

> We agree with them that the revenue of the country ought to be levied by means of customs duties; but there is this difference between us, that while they would levy those duties only for the benefit of individuals, we levy them for the benefit of the revenue, first and foremost.

Now, if customs duties are only levied for the purpose of raising sufficient money to carry on the affairs of the country, then in the name of reason why do they tax people $8,000,000 more than is necessary for that purpose ? He went on to say :

> Our first consideration, in imposing duties, is to produce revenue, and if, as an incident, the manufacturers derive advantage, they are welcome to it. But gentlemen on the other side impose duties, not with a view of levying a revenue and putting money into the treasury, but of putting money into the pockets of private individuals.

Now, let us take the tariff as it stands to-day, and more particularly in reference to the articles which are imported from the United States, hardly a dollar's worth of which comes in from Great Britain, and consequently do not get the benefit of the preference. What does the Minister of Trade and Commerce say to his leader's proposition ? He almost admitted that the duty on furniture is the same as it was prior to these hon. gentlemen coming into power ; and will the Minister of Customs contend to-night that the duty on furniture is levied for the purposes of producing a revenue ? If it is levied simply for the purpose of protection and not for revenue, why do hon. gentlemen not cut down the duties on furniture, let us have less revenue from that source, and let us have the benefit of the lessened price ? Take the question of carriages ; if there was any one part of the population to which these hon. gentlemen, when in opposition, did appeal, it was to the farmers of the country. How the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce and the hon. Minister of Customs used to cry over the woes of the farmers ! The duty on coal oil was an abomination to them. If the hon. gentlemen only came to power there would be a revolution in trade matters, and the way in which the hon. Minister of Customs, who is present to-night, and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, hope to relieve the farmer is by increasing the duty on the cutter that he is bringing in from the United States. Was that to raise the revenue ? If taxing the farmer's cutter was for the purpose of raising the revenue, why did not the hon. Minister of Customs tax the jewellery of the rich in order to produce revenue ? The hon. Minister of Customs may follow in this debate, and it will certainly be amusing to hear the hon. gentleman try to reconcile himself to the position, that when he wants to raise the revenue, he does not increase the duty on the jewellery of the rich but increases the duty on the farmers' cutters. These hon. gentlemen wanted to increase the revenue, and as a result they have taxed the tobacco of the poor man, they have taxed the sugar of the poor and the rice of the poor, raising upwards of $2,000,000 of revenue by the increase on those articles. They are taxing the boots and shoes and some other articles which are not imported at all from Great Britain, upon which no preference is obtainable, but which come in from the United States, and these hon. gentlemen are not at all imposing these duties simply for the purpose of raising a revenue. but they are giving what they have to give, and what I am glad they have to give—protection to the manufacturing industries of the country. Had these hon. gentlemen been true to their pledges prior to 1896. they would have been swept out of Ontario and out of the whole Dominion on the 7th of November. The hon. member for South Wellington spoke of these hon. gentlemen having principles. We have found that their only principle is the principle of distributing amongst themselves loaves and fishes and hanging on to their salaries. If there was one question above all others that these hon. gentlemen have waxed eloquent over, it was the question of the duty on coal and iron. One could turn up in the newspapers of the time speech after speech delivered by the hon. Minister of Customs himself, in which he pointed out to the farmers that their agricultural implements were too high in price because of the duty on coal and iron. He said that high bounties were paid to the producers of iron, and for that reason agricultural implements were too dear. He said that if these men could not maintain themselves without these bounties and high duties, let them go to the wall. Now, the hon. Minister of Customs knows that he made that statement time and time again ; he knows that he waxed eloquent over it. The hon. gentleman sits there now, smiles benignly, and draws his salary, while he is false to his principles. There is another feature of this question, and it is that if these hon. gentlemen were afraid that by lessening the duties they would diminish the revenue, there was a good way for them to get out of the difficulty, and that was by making good the pledges of economy which they gave to the people. Why, they made the welkin ring from one end of the Dominion to the other. In regard to the number of cabinet ministers, they pointed to the example of the United States, where there is a less number of ministers, and they said : When we come into power there is going to be a lesser number of ministers, and all along the line large economies are to be practised. The hon. Minister of Customs knows how well that pledge was kept. As soon as the government achieved power, he was advanced from the position of a controller to that of a minister, and they paid him a year and a half of back salary, or, as an hon. gentleman says, two years salary. These gentlemen, who are compared with Cobden and Bright, with men who were willing to go out of office at any time by reason of adherence to their principles, have nothing in common with such statesmen. There is nothing in common between the two ; all their principles have vanished and gone to the winds. The hon. member touched upon the question of the British preference, but he touched that rather gingerly, and very little was said in reference to it. As the question is an important one to the people of the country, I intend to take up the time of the House for a few moments in regard to it. Where do the political parties stand on the question of the British preference ? The right hon. leader of the government was yesterday assailed by the hon. leader of the opposition in this, that he went before the electors, and, notably in his speech in London, committed himself to the policy of preferential trade with Great Britain. What can be meant by preferential trade if not a mutual preference conceded on either side ? These hon. gentlemen, realizing that this policy was a popular one, adopted it in the elections prior to 1896, went to the country, and told the people they were favourable to a preferential duty. We all know that at that time there was a strong feeling being worked up in England in that direction. Mr. Chamberlain's utterances on different occasions pointed to that fact, and when the movement was blooming, it was all swept away upon the occasion of the fateful trip of the right hon. leader of the government to England, when he declared in London, at the celebrated meeting of the Cobden Club, that Canada did not want a preference at all. So, these hon. gentlemen are in this position that they are averse to having a preference for Canadian products in the markets of Great Britain, while we stand committed by the text of this resolution to the principle of a mutual preference between this country and Great Britain, and by that policy we are prepared to stand. In the same connection, I would refer to the question of trade with Germany, and I beg to state that we are here to-night to say, and the Conservative party are a unit on that, I believe, and not only the party here, but, I believe, a very large number of Liberals throughout the country, are in accord with the sentiment, that any country, Germany, or whatever it may be, which pronounces against us by an antagonistic tariff, will be met by us, that we are not going to lie under such a rebuke, but that we are going to hit back, and hit back with double force. That proposition should be doubly favourable in the Dominion of Canada, by reason of the fact that everybody knows that under this so-called British tariff, which is a sham and a delusion, there is no country which is getting greater benefits in Canada than Germany itself. What is the position of hon. gentlemen opposite on this question? When they first came here with that policy they made the statement that the policy would work out all right, that Canada would only import British goods; but it was pointed out that the British market was being invaded by German, Belgian and other European goods, and that we would of necessity be importing these goods under the British preference tariff. It was then stated that a considerable portion of the work on these goods must of necessity be done in Great Britain before they would be entitled to the preference. It was easy to tell the House that, but a difference arose in the minds of the appraisers of customs at different ports of Canada as to what really was a considerable portion of the work, and the result was that hon. gentlemen were forced to announce a new proposition, and that was, that so long as 25 per cent of the work upon these articles was done in Great Britain, they would get the benefit of the preference. To-day, as a matter of fact, the preference is not upon 25 per cent in favour of Great Britain, but upon 75 per cent in favour of Germany. While Germany is prepared to strike at us, I say it behooves the people of Canada to strike back, and, speaking for myself, I say that I believe that the interests of the artisans and the manufacturers of Canada should stand higher with any governemnt of Canada than the interests of Great Britain or any other country. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Guthrie) made some very wild statements as to the beneficial effect on Canada of sentiment in Great Britain. He told us that our exports to Great Britain had gone up by leaps and bounds by reason of this preferential tariff, but if he had taken the trouble to consult the statistics he would know that the reverse is the case. He told us that we exported more cheese to Great Britain than we did a few years ago, but in that he was mistaken. He does not seem to know anything about it. Here are the actual figures on that score. In 1898 we exported to Great Britain 196,220,771 pounds of cheese, and last year we exported 185,759,750 pounds, a decrease in round numbers of 11,000,000 pounds. Where does the question of sentiment come in there? In 1898 we exported 8,429,249 pounds of ham, and last year we exported only 2,793,078 pounds. We do not seem to have sold more hams because of the sympathy in Great Britain for our preferential tariff. I might go on and quote further to show that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Guthrie) was far astray when he talked of sentiment increasing the trade between Canada and Great Britain. Why, the fact is, and every common-sense business man knows it, that the Britisher will buy the necessaries for himself and his family in the cheapest market, and he will not pay half a farthing a pound more for sentiment. I contend, Sir, that the preference to Great Britain is not in the interests of the people of this country as a whole. Experience proves that we import from Great Britain such commodities as are not used by the masses of the people, but rather by the classes, and therefore whatever benefit there is in the preference is a benefit to the more wealthy of the people of this country. Look at the Trade and Navigation Returns to prove that. In 1898 of silk and manufactures of silk we imported $1,413,973 worth, whilst last year we imported $3,151,697 worth. There is a marked increase in an article that is used by the wealthy classes of this country, and as a result the rich instead of the poor are getting the benefit of this preference. Take the importation of jewellery. In 1896 we imported $295,141 worth, and in 1899 we imported $578,785 worth. If you go through the returns it will be shown that the articles which are imported from Great Britain to a great extent are not used by the masses, but by the wealthy classes. The Minister of Finance in his budget speech announced that the time had arrived when the people of Canada should take heed as to the future. Any one who looks around the country and sees the existing conditions will know at a glance there can be no doubt as to that. In the town of Almonte a large woollen mill has been closed down. There are other woollen industries in the province of Ontario closed down to-day, and you cannot go into any town in the province, more particularly in towns where there are manufacturing enterprises, that you do not see signs of depression. In the once thriving town of Paris in South Brant there is advertised a house for sale with a recommendation that it would be a desirable summer resort. Has it come to pass that the once manufacturing town of Paris is reduced to a summer resort? In South Ontario, the once thriving town of Whitby, where the Joseph Hall agricultural implement works were, has a place advertised as a desirable summer residence for people living in Toronto. All over, the fact stares you in the face that the time has arrived when we have got to do what the United States are doing, namely, make for ourselves a protective tariff and by that protective tariff stand or fall.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT. There can be no doubt in the public mind as to where the two political parties stand on this question. The Conservative party stands where it always did stand, and that is: That so long as the great people of the United States are manufacturing as they are, there is only one recourse for the people of Canada, and that is to maintain a high protective tariff. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Guthrie) made the statement that had there only been the question of the policy of the government brought into the last elections in Ontario, the government would have made a better showing. He did not assign any reason why the govenrment did not have a larger following from Ontario, but he must know very well why the Liberal saddles were emptied in that province. Year in and year out for eighteen years the Minister of Customs (Hon. Mr. Paterson), the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) and others of their ilk, proclaimed for commercial union at one time, for free trade at another time, for unrestricted reciprocity with the United States at another time, but they were always the undying foes of protection in every shape and form. They pictured to the farmers that they were being bled white for the benefit of the manufacturers, and that they were bearing the heat and burden of the day, while the manufacturers were growing rich. The farmers took them at their word. They believed they were honest men.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. BENNETT. The farmers listened to them for years and believed them, but when the opportunity came these gentlemen deceived the farmers. The Minister of Customs (Hon. Mr. Paterson) knew the storm was coming. He saw the last Speaker of this House (Mr. Bain) quit politics because he had not the hardihood to go into his riding after his party friends had violated all their pledges, and that riding is represented to-day by a Conservative. Where is the former member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), who posed throughout all Canada as the apostle of economy. He too has been buried with the Liberal dead. I could go along those benches opposite and name the member from Ontario who year after year denounced extravagance and iniquity when in opposition, but who, when in power, practiced what they denounced. And where are they to-day? Well, some of them who for years in this House denounced the Senate as charnel house for dead and decayed politicians, have been fortunate enough to secure a resting place in the Upper Chamber; others have got comfortable positions in the government service, and the balance are trying to get there. The government met us in the fight and they defeated us.

But there is no man knows better in his heart than the premier himself that this government has got the greatest slap that any government ever got in the province of Ontario. The reason they got that slap was that the people of Ontario were prepared to take these hon. gentlemen at their word, and they were weighed in the balances, and were found wanting. The hon. member for London (Mr. Hyman) the other night said: 'If we have lost in Ontario, remember we have captured Quebec.' The hon. gentlemen are quite welcome to have Quebec on the terms they got it. They conducted a campaign of race and religion in the province of Quebec; and wherever they could introduce the same campaign in the province of Ontario, they did so, and did so successfully. They introduced it in Glengarry, which has a large French population, and that is the reason they carried that county. They introduced it in the two ridings of Essex, where there is also a large French population, and that is the reason they carried them. I was amused at hearing the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil), in seconding the address this session, express the hope that these cries of race and religion would be buried and put out of sight. That hon. gentleman was in my riding in 1897, when there was a by-election. I had been unseated. At that time the French Canadians—and there are about 500 voters in that locality—were sympathizing very keenly with their fellow-countrymen in Manitoba, who they thought were deprived of their school rights. The hon. member for Bonaventure came there. He did not appear in the English parts of the constituency, but he could be found in the French settlements day in and day out. And the hon. gentleman never came back to redeem the pledge which he made on that occasion. The pledge was this: He first asked that the government might be excused for not having passed a Remedial Bill in their first session, on the ground that they had not time ; but he said there was a session coming on in 1897, and if a Remedial Bill were not passed then, he would come back there and denounce the government at the earliest opportunity. The hon. member has not been there since. He will be like all the Liberal speakers who come into that part of the riding, firing the heather, as they do, with incendiary speeches on race and religion. I do not presume that he will ever come back. If he does, he will be the first of the kind who ever did. They always come with the same old story. Wherever they find a French Canadian population in Ontario, they are found making these incendiary speeches.

The hon. gentlemen have brought this fight on themselves. They have done it all through the province of Quebec, and I believe that as the people of Quebec rejected the Mercier government for pillaging the country, in the same way they will reject this government. These hon. gentlemen have won, but how have they won ? They have won by setting province against province. They have lost in the province of Ontario ; they have won in the province of Quebec. True, they have gained some advantages in some of the other provinces; but from the banner province of Ontario they have come back disorganized, broken up and battered in a way that no political party ever came from that province before. And when these hon. gentlemen again pass in review before the people of this country, then we shall be prepared to leave the issue to the people ; and the great issue that must divide the two parties in the next general election, so far as we on this side of the House are concerned, must be that Canada shall have, if it is in the power of a Liberal-Conservative government to grant it, that measure of protection to the artisans, the merchants, the manufacturers and the agriculturists, which will make Canada the happy and contented country that it has been under the benign influence of the national policy which was introduced by the Liberal-Conservative party in 1879.

Mr. C. B. HEYD (South Brant). Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose I should add much to the dignity of this discussion, if I were to follow the example which has just been set by my hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) who has just taken his seat. The strength of the blow which the government received in Ontario, or the manner of their victory in Quebec, or anything appertaining to the elections which recently took place, are matters very far removed from the subject of the debate. I am not aware that the fact that there is a summer residence to let in the town of Paris has much to do with the great question now engaging our attention. But I take exception to one statement which the hon. gentleman made, that the British preference was of no use to the people of this country. If it has been of no other use than to reduce the burden of taxation by 25 per cent on all British goods, that in itself would be a justification for the introduction of the preferential tariff. It not only brought about that reduction, but it also reduced the cost price of all goods with which imported British goods come into competition. But I do not desire to enter into that phase of the discussion. I wish to confine myself to the question before the House. I am quite willing to leave the foraging around amongst elections and the history of Canada since confederation to our friends opposite, and try to deal with subjects which are germane to the conditions by which we are surrounded.

I desire, before I address myself to the resolution, to find a little fault with some remarks that fell from the leader of the opposition—not because they were grave in themselves, but because they assume a gravity coming from one who occupies the position he does as one of the leaders in this House. He stated—and he appeared to reproach us for it—that our trade with the United States was assuming larger proportions every day. Now, I do not think there is any reason why he should feel sorrowful because our trade with the United States is growing larger every day. A trade that is growing larger, no matter with whom it is being conducted, results to the benefit of those who engage in it, or they would not continue it for a single day. Our people do not import largely from the United States because they especially like goods from the United States. We buy there, because we can buy there cheaper than we can anywhere else in the world, and cheaper than we can produce the goods for ourselves. The fact that we imported from the United States last year a hundred million dollars worth of goods is not a matter of regret to me, but one of great satisfaction, which would be only enhanced were the amount two hundred million of dollars instead of one hundred million. No trade can be carried on between nations that is not mutually profitable ; and the mere fact that the trade exists between the United States and ourselves is the best evidence that it is profitable, or it would not be continued. I go still further, and say that if we bought from the United States large quantities of goods and they did not buy a single cent's worth from us, there would be no evidence that that trade was not profitable to us ; because it does not matter with whom we do trade, it is always bound to be profitable. Let us take the two items of coal and corn. The United States is the only country in the world where we can buy coal and corn as cheaply as we buy them there. We can buy them there more cheaply than we can raise them here, and that is the reason why we get $5,000,000 worth of corn and about $5,000,000 worth of coal from the United States.

In those two items alone, roughly speaking, we get about $10,000,000 worth of goods. What do we do with those goods? Do we destroy or waste them? No, we simply convert that raw coal into heat and power, and the corn into cheese and bacon and butter. We become the manufacturers of these goods by the use of that corn and coal, and send the products to Great Britain, and that country puts them into the muscle, nerves and brains of her sons, who again re-export the outcome to Australia and the other various colonies, who in turn send it in another form back to the United States. In the meantime, what has taken place? We have converted $9,000,000 or $10,000,000 worth of the United States raw product into the manufactured article. We have sold it to the British consumers, who have converted it into another finished product, which they have sold probably to the people of Australia, who have reconverted it into another finished product, and they in turn sell to the United States something the people of the United States want. That $10,000,000 worth has gone around the world, and the nations that have handled it have made money in the transaction, and yet in the transaction the United States have not bought one dollar's worth from us. That is the secret of all trade. It does not matter whether our imports from the United States are greater than our exports, that must necessarily follow if our exports to Great Britain are greater than our imports. Those are some of the laws of trade, and, therefore, instead of being a matter of regret, it is a matter of great gratification that our trade was as great with the United States as it was during the past year.

The hon. gentleman also took exception to the statement of the Finance Minister with regard to tobacco. He said, that in the interests of the consumers of the country, the protective system introduced into the manufacture of tobacco should be removed. I object entirely to his ideas on that subject. If there ever was an item into which the principle of protection should be introduced, it is an industry that this country is capable of perfecting within itself, without the assistance of any outside country. We have the elements in our country, if properly encouraged, to grow the tobacco that the people want, and that kind of natural product which can be stimulated by protection, I am prepared to protect to a very high degree. What has been the result with respect to that tobacco industry? At the end of four years, it has been so stimulated that we now grow nearly one-half the tobacco we use; and if in a short period of time the promise put forth by that trade blossoms, as I expect it will, the growing of tobacco will be one of the established industries of this country, and the small sum which the people are now paying in the form of protection, they will be amply repaid in the very near future. Last year some $600,000 or $700,000 were spent among the farmers on the tobacco plant. Some twenty-five or twenty-six factories have been established for the purpose of manufacturing that tobacco, and those trade journals and tobacco dealers that a few years ago condemned the action of the government in protecting or encouraging this Canadian industry, are rapidly being converted to the view that the action of the government then was right, and that it inures to the advantage of the country.

I do not desire to occupy too long the time of the House. Many things have been said on the opposite side that deserve reply, but there are matters in this resolution of more importance than even some of the statements which hon. gentlemen opposite have made. The resolution says that:

> In the opinion of this House, the welfare of the country requires a pronounced policy of adequate protection.

The question then presents itself to my mind: Have we at present a policy such as our friends desire? If we have not, we certainly must have altered the policy which existed for eighteen years, and which the leader of the opposition says, in this resolution, he desires to restore and perpetuate. Yes, there was a change made in the tariff policy when the present government assumed office—a marked change. A tariff was adopted that was objected to by our hon. friends opposite. A policy was adopted that has resulted in an era of prosperity such as Canada never before experienced, and in order that we might realize the different conditions which prevail now, compared with those which prevailed during the last years of the protective policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, let me compare the results of the two policies during a short period of years, and see which is the best for the people. I can assure our hon. friends opposite that the people of this country do not care what you may call a particular policy. Call it free trade or revenue tariff or protection—call it what you like, it is the results that the people are after. And if these results are such that we have a condition of affairs in this country preferable to any we have had under the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite, it does not matter what you may call the policy to which that prosperity is due. Let me briefly draw your attention to the marvellous progress which we have made during the past three years, and then ask you if you are prepared to go back to the conditions that existed before the trade policy of this government was established. That policy has brought about a marked change in the financial conditions of the country. We were for years accustomed to add large sums annually to the national debt, but we have arrived at the period when the amounts added to the debt are gradually growing smaller; and, in my opinion, if we practice the economy we should, there is no special reason why we should materially increase our debt in the future. We have every evidence during the past few years of magnificent success. Exception has been taken to the fact that during the past years we have had such a marvellous surplus. I admit that too large surpluses are not a good thing for the people to have. But what are we going to do? There has been such a tremendous development in the country during the past few years that a surplus was inevitable. Was the government to rearrange the tariff every few years? Every time there is a surplus must the government take the duty off this article, and every time there is a deficit increase the duty on the other? We have either to submit to a surplus or to tariff tinkering, and of the two I would rather submit to a surplus. This surplus is something our hon. friends opposite do not care to contemplate, and, therefore, they take us back to 1882-3 in order to show us that during the regime of the late government surpluses existed as large as those of to-day. But they have not learned the lesson which different conditions bring about. They have not learned that under one tariff a government may have a large surplus, while the people themselves are getting lean, and that under another form of tariff, the governemnt will have a large surplus, while, at the same time, the people are waxing fat.

Now, let us take these two years 1882 and 1883. In these years there was a surplus of $14,000,000—there is no doubt about that. But go to the savings banks and see what was left to the people after the government got through. In 1882, the savings of the people in the savings banks amounted to $97,900,000, and three years afterwards they had fallen to $95,000,000. In other words, while the government had a surplus of $14,000,000, the people were $2,000,000 poorer than before. Is that the condition under which the present government has accumulated a surplus of $14,000,000? Oh, no. We have a surplus of $14,000,000 in the treasury, but besides this $100,000,000 has been added to the savings of the people in the savings banks. Therefore, the conditions are entirely different and they must not think that because they had no cause of congratulation over their surplus, we have no cause of congratulation over ours. But I do not wish to dwell on this subject too long. I might go on to show how trade has increased during the past three years and attribute that to the trade policy. I might show how the goods entered for consumption have increased by $138,000,000 during the last three years over the preceding years or over 40 per cent; that our exports have increased by $117,000,000 or 35 per cent. I could go further and show how our exports to foreign countries have increased from $35,000,000 to $65,000, or 70 per cent; I could show you how our exports of manufactured articles have increased from $7,000,000 to $8,000,000 during the first six months of 1900. I could show that the exports of Canadian goods in 1895, were $105,000,000 and in 1896, $110,000,000, while during the first six months of this year, they have already reached the sum of $91,000,000. I could show how the exports of 1895, were $99,000,000, and in 1896, $106,000,000, while, in the first six months of this year they had already reached $108,000,000—that is our trade of the first six months of this year is as great as the whole year 1895 or the whole year 1896. These are reasons why we should not make sudden changes in the tariff policy of our country. If we can show such magnificent results, it is exceedingly desirable that we should remain true to the conditions that have brought them about; and I am in favour of approving the present condition at least until it brings about such a state of affairs as we used to know under hon. gentlemen opposite in days gone by. Looked at from any standpoint you like, you find that the conditions of this country are most satisfactory in every respect; I do not desire unduly to prolong my remarks, but I would like to say a word or two with reference to the second part of the resolution which the leader of the opposition has placed in your hands, that referring to the preference:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the adoption of a policy of mutual trade preference within the empire would prove of great benefit to the mother country and to the colonies.

I take exception to that statement entirely. It would be disastrous to the mother country and it would be disastrous to Canada. In the first place, I object to this resolution on account of its indefiniteness. Each man can put his own construction upon it. If this resolution had been brought down in such a form that it would have expressed itself clearly to each individual, we should all see it alike. As it presents itself to me, it would be attended with disastrous results if we place upon it the only construction we fairly can, in view of what we know to be the attitude of Great Britain. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to think that all we have to do is to go across the water and ask our British friends for this preference, and we shall receive it. I would ask these hon. gentlemen, I would ask any speaker that follows me to mention the name of any British statesman on either side of politics that ever stated publicly that we could have mutual preference with Great Britain. I can give them the names of the leading statesmen of Great Britain who have said that this subject cannot be even discussed on any basis except the basis of free trade.

There is not an English statesman that has given any greater encouragement than that: We may give you free trade, but that is the only basis on which we can even discuss the matter. Are we prepared to discuss the mutual preference on the basis of free trade? Is there a man on either side of this House who would accept a mutual preference of that kind? And is there the faintest possibility of Canada getting a preference of any other kind than one based upon the principles of free trade? I challenge any hon. gentleman on either side of the House to mention the name of a British statesman who has ever given them the slightest encouragement to believe that they could get it on any other terms. The only man who has said that it was capable of being discussed even on the basis of free trade is Mr. Chamberlain himself. Lord Rosebery is against it, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, the Chancellor of the Exchequer is against it, the president of the board of trade is against it. All the great leaders of public opinion have spoken against this preferential policy; they have said that it would ruin the empire, instead of making it stronger; they have said it would be a standing menace to the nations of the world and would array against Great Britain and her colonies the powers of the world in a commercially hostile attitude. I can quote the words of Lord Rosebery and of Sir Michael Hicks-Beach and Mr. Ritchie, the president of the board of trade. And I will quote his words in order to set my hon. friend from East Toronto (Mr. Kemp) straight. To-day, I asked that hon. gentleman to read all of the address from Mr. D. Ritchie. He did not have it handy apparently or he did not want to read it. I will read it now, in order that the House may understand exactly what Mr. Ritchie did say:

He thought that the strict Manchester school was passing away, and although England would never depart from her free trade policy, she might arrange a closer connection with Greater Britain. How this was to be done he did not indicate.

That is what the hon. gentleman said on that occasion, and what was read to-day. But he said more than that. His language was considered by some who were present to have given encouragement to the idea that a preference would be given to some of the colonies; and, later on, at the same meeting he craved the indulgence of the audience to disabuse their minds of any such idea:

Mr. Ritchie subsequently asked leave to say that he in no way favoured the imposition of duties on any manufactured article imported into this country. It seemed to him impossible to conceive that a 5 per cent duty on our foreign imports would help the colonies, and he strongly supported the fundamental principles of free trade. So that his remarks about a possible plan for a zollverein was a mere pious wish.

That is a portion of Mr. Ritchie's speech that the hon. member for East Toronto did not read, and the impression that he tried to convey to this House that the president of the British Board of Trade was in favour of this, was misleading, because he did not give us that gentleman's opinion, who says himself that he is opposed to interfering with the principles of free trade. What does Lord Rosebery say?

Of all the mad things we have heard in our days, the re-enactment of the corn laws is the maddest we can possibly conceive.

What does Mr. Chamberlain say?

But the principle which I claim must be accepted if we are to make any, even the slightest, progress is that within the different parts of the empire protection must disappear.

What does Mr. Mulhall say, the great statistician who has just passed away?

Mutual trade preference in favour of the colonies of the empire would be ruinous to the latter, and would ultimately break up the empire.

We have here the testimony of the men of Great Britain who speak with authority, and who state that they cannot discuss the proposition except on the basis of free trade. We have the authority of such men as Rosebery, Mulhall and others that it would be ruinous to the empire. Yet in face of these strong declarations of these men who speak with authority, whose position in the political world of Great Britain gives significance to what they say, our friends opposite deliberately introduce a resolution which they know is entirely impracticable, because it would be injurious to the people of Canada. They know that we can get no preference in Great Britain on any principle but that of free trade. Are they prepared to accept that? Not one of them has the courage to say that they value a preference in Great Britain high enough to be willing to destroy the manufacturing interests of this country. I am quite willing to accept any trade advantage that any country is prepared to offer us, but I am not willing that the industrial establishments of this country, which have been encouraged and built up with great labour and at great sacrifice, should be destroyed in trying to get free access into the British markets. I am hostile, as a Canadian, to an arrangement of that kind.

I believe that the future has in store for us a better fortune than to be limited in our trade, even with Great Britain and the islands beyond the sea. I believe that the development that is taking place in this country of ours gives promise of a condition of affairs that will enable Canada to take a more important place in the trade, not of the empire only, but of the entire world. It is only recently that we are beginning to realize the tremendous potentialities of this Canada of ours, the magnificent natural resources that are the heritage of the Canadian people from the Atlantic to the Pacific. It is only now that capitalists are beginning to discover the magnificent mineral wealth stored up in the womb of nature, and they tell us that they are in a position in reference to steel, the great trade regulator, apparently, the great trade barometer of the world, where we can manufacture it $5 or $6 a ton cheaper than it can be made at Pittsburg. Within a short period of time we will be among the principal iron and steel producers in the world. Should we not halt before we tie ourselves up to a little bit of an arrangement that will stimulate our trade slightly with the islands beyond the sea, and will lose to us the tremendous possibilities that appear to be so near us in the future? I say yes. I say let Canada have her liberty. Let us keep the right to make what trade arrangements we like with Great Britain. Let us, if we choose, give to Great Britain a preference, and let us take it away if we find it to our interest. Let us make trade arrangements with Germany, if necessary, that will advance the interests of our own people; let us make trade arrangements with the United States, if necessary, that will add to the comforts and happiness of our people; but do not let us tie our hands with entangling alliances, even with Great Britain and those other Britons beyond the sea. I am a Canadian first, I want this Canada of ours to prosper. I do not want to be crippled in our liberty to do the best we can by nationality or by any other tie.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words more upon this question, but having quoted the testimony of those distinguished men that you have heard, that there is no possibility of getting a preference except upon the basis of free trade, it would be a waste of time to give my own opinion; and I would not have quoted those men but for the fact that they occupy positions so eminent as statesmen of Great Britain. It is simply a dream on the part of our hon. friends opposite to try to get through the second part of the resolution.

But what about the third part? Let me examine that for a few moments.

> This House is further of opinion that equivalent or adequate duties should be imposed by Canada upon the products and manufactures of countries not within the empire in all cases where such countries fail to admit Canadian products and manufactures upon fair terms.

Now, that is a resolution that appears quite reasonable, that is a resolution that I most heartily endorse. But, I claim it is a resolution that is not necessary to present here to-night. That is the law of the land to-day. Three or four years ago that was made the law of the land. That is exactly what we have been doing. But our friends opposite have been sleeping during the past four years, and now they trot out a resolution that they want us to endorse, and say that we should have two tariff policies, one for the people who use us well, and one for the people who do not. Why, that is the policy of the present government, that is what gave rise to the preference. We realized that Great Britain was the only country in the world that had been treating us as we thought right by admitting our goods free within her borders, and we selected her out from the world to enjoy a special benefit under our double-headed trade policy, a benefit that now amounts to 33⅓ per cent. Our hon. friends opposite remind us of Rip Van Winkle who slept for so long a time. They have been sleeping for four years, and now they try to make us believe that they have discovered a remedy for some of the ills that we are supposed to suffer from. No, this principle has been in force, it is the law of the land now; its wider applicability will doubtless engage the attention of the government. I am satisfied to leave our case in the hands of the government who, for the past four years, have managed our affairs with signal ability, with great fidelity and in the interest of the people. I have not the slightest doubt that the negotiations that are going on between our government and Germany will result in more good than the speech that was made by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) to-night on that same question. I am prepared to assist the government, I am prepared to leave the destinies of the country in their hands, and my reason for it is that during the past four years this country has been so exceptionally well governed that we can look forward with confidence to a continuation of that kind of government, and a continuation of that prosperity which this country has enjoyed from the time the present government took control of affairs until the present moment.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE (Marquette). Mr. Speaker, I do not propose following the hon. gentleman (Mr. Heyd) who has just taken his seat, as I had only the pleasure of listening to a very short portion of his remarks, and am, therefore, unacquainted with his arguments. However, I presume, they are much the same as those we have listened to from other hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, so that I may not be so handicapped as I otherwise would be. Nor is it my intention at this hour of the evening, and at this stage of the debate, to occupy the attention of the House for any great length of time, as the budget speech has already been so ably and fully dealt with by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House that very little is left for me to say of an original character. I will, therefore, say what I have to say in as succinct and concise a manner as I possibly can. The financial statement of this session differs from previous budget speeches that have been delivered in this House since 1896, inasmuch as it does not partake so much of the nature of a stump speech as those we have listened to from the hon. Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding); but, even yet, he has not arrived at that stage that he can cut himself entirely free from his old time proclivities in this respect.

However, this is a growing time, and we can at least congratulate the hon. Minister of Finance on his improvement along this line. He was candid enough to say that we are now on the crest of that wave of prosperity which has visited Canada during the last few years, a prosperity that, I may say, is not at all indigenous to Canada. It has been universal in its character, and it would be a strange thing, to my mind, if, in a country so favoured as Canada has been by the hand of a kind Providence, with her vast mineral wealth, with her great agricultural resources, with her fishing and lumbering industries, if, amidst this world-wide prosperity, she did not enjoy her share. While he has told us that we have reached the crest of the wave of prosperity, and that we may look for a contraction of our revenues in the near future, that we cannot expect our revenues to keep pace with their present rate of increase, our great expenditures, which have been going forward with leaps and bounds since the Liberal government came into power, will not, in keeping with this expected contraction of our revenue, suffer any material reduction On the contrary, he has intimated to us that his intention is to introduce an inovation in the method of book-keeping, by which as much as $1,000,000, which he intends to pay out in bounties on steel and iron, will be transferred from the consolidated revenue account and looked upon as capital account, in order that he may be able in future to make a better financial statement, and which will have the effect of destroying, for comparison's sake, future statements with those of the past. The contention of hon. gentlemen opposite that this great expansion which Canada has been enjoying of recent years is due to a new policy on their part is as ridiculous as it is egotistical. Is it owing to that policy that the highly-protectionist country south of the international boundary line is enjoying her great expansion of trade? Is it because of that policy that free trade England's commerce has gone forward with such great strides, and that she is experiencing such great commercial activity during these years? Do they also claim credit for the expansion of trade and great prosperity that have visited every country under the sun, with the exception of famine-stricken India? They might do so with almost as much reason as to claim that Canada's commercial prosperity is owing to any new departure on their part from the policy of their predecessors, which they roundly denounced with such vehemence for eighteen years. The only credit due this government in this connection is that they have followed in the footsteps of their predecessors, though the doing so has entailed the entire repudiation of their anti-election pledges and policy while they were in opposition. It is also owing to the fact that they have impressed upon capitalists the truthfulness of the statement that these hon. gentlemen, in advocating their free trade heresies and in giving these anti-election pledges along this line, were simply giving vent to so much claptrap intended to humbug the people, in order that they might reach the treasury benches. And, having arrived at the goal of their ambition they have thrown consistency to the winds, and have embraced the foster child of protection, which they previously declared had brought the country to the verge of bankruptcy under the Conservative regime. The cause of our national prosperity is not far to seek. It is owing to a succession of good crops, fair prices, caused by the world's demand, and hon. gentlemen did not increase the world's demand, the development by the investment of foreign capital of our vast mineral wealth, as well as the thrift, energy and enterprise of our population. These are subjects and elements over which the government had no control save the retarding of that prosperity to a certain extent by their obnoxious mining laws, and their general maladministration of the affairs of the Yukon.

Now, when our opponents are driven to extremities, they fall back upon that one-sided preferential trade with Great Britain, and give that as the reason of our prosperity; but, here again, they forget that while our imports from Great Britain have increased to a certain extent, we are increasing our trade with every country in the world. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) showed, the other night, that England stands eighth on the list of countries in this regard. While imports from Great Britain have increased to a certain extent during the past few years, they have increased in greater proportion from the United States. The explanation given by hon. gentlemen opposite is, that we import such a large volume of raw materials from the United States. But, as was shown by the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Smith) the other night, there has been an increase in dutiable goods of nearly 40 per cent in our imports from Great Britain, while there has been an increase in the imports of dutiable goods from the United States of over 41 per cent. Not only that, but the trade of the United States with Great Britain has increased in greater proportion than has the trade between Canada and Great Britain, notwithstanding the preference which England enjoys in our markets. The hon. Minister of Finance spoke as if there was some doubt as to the position of the Conservative party on the preferential trade question, and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard-Cartwright) stated that he expected that with a new parliament, and with a new leader, the Conservative party would have some new policy to bring forward. That hon. gentleman was so accustomed, himself, while he was on this side of the House, to bringing forth a new policy after each succeeding defeat, that he thinks we are going to adopt the same course. We all know the course that he pursued—unrestricted reciprocity, free trade, freer trade, commercial union, and what not. Whenever he was defeated upon the cry that he had raised, he would announce a new policy, and he thinks we are about to do the same. We know a good thing when we see it, and we are quite contented with the policy which was laid down in 1878, and which has been adhered to by the Conservative party, subject to the changed circumstances of the country. If we have been defeated in 1896, and in 1900, it was not upon our trade policy, but upon other issues that hon. gentlemen opposite would do well to leave unresurrected. The hon. Minister of Finance has asked : If the Conservative party are not in favour of this preference, why do they not bring in a resolution to repeal it ? That is simply begging the question. Surely the hon. Minister of Finance has not so short a memory that he cannot recall the resolution introduced into this House by the Hon. Mr. Foster, on March 20 of last year, and supported by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. It read as follows :

> That this House is of opinion that a system of mutual trade preference between Great Britain and Ireland and the colonies would greatly stimulate increased production in and commerce between these countries, and would thus promote and maintain the unity of the empire, and that nothing which falls short of the complete realization of such a policy should be considered as final or satisfactory.

There is nothing very indefinite about that. That was the policy of the Conservative party during the last parliament. It is the policy of the Conservative party to-day. That policy has practically been incorporated in the resolution introduced by the present leader of the opposition, with the additional clause that Canada should take precaution to protect herself against unjust discrimination and unfair treatment on the part of such countries as Germany. That is a policy that I venture to say would meet with the unqualified approbation of the people if placed before them, divorced from any other issue. The position of the leader of the government (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) on preferential trade has been one of duplicity from its very inception down to this present day. Did not the Prime Minister in the campaign of 1896 tell the electors of Canada that he was just as much in favour of preferential trade with Great Britain as was Sir Charles Tupper ? What did he mean by that ? Did he mean this one-sided preferential trade we have now ? Not at all ; he meant a mutual preference. That was what was understood by the Liberal party, and that was what was understood by the people of Canada. Not only that, but the Prime Minister declared he would be more likely to get this preference in the old country markets with his tariff for revenue, than would Sir Charles Tupper with his protective tariff. The Prime Minister called to his aid the Colonial Secretary as an authority, who stated that the time had now arrived when this very progressive step should be taken. The right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier also stated that if he were selected to be leader of a government, one of the first steps that he would take would be to send a commission to Great Britain to negotiate the basis of such a treaty. You would imagine that a gentleman having respect for his sacred word of honour, the leader of a great political party would have at least attempted to implement his pledges. Did he make the attempt ? No. Did he not go to Great Britain and in the very first speech he made on landing, at a time which was most opportune for this movement, when this Imperialistic sentiment was gaining force day after day, and week after week; when the premiers from the other colonies were there ; when the olive branch was held out by some of England's statesmen ; did not our Prime Minister, instead of embracing that opportunity to do something for his country, did he not betray his country, by telling them what Canada gave to Great Britain she was giving as a free gift, and not only did she not ask a return, but she actually did not desire any. And we saw the extraordinary spectacle of the Prime Minister of Canada actually advising the statesmen of Great Britain not to give us any such return, because it would cause a departure from the free trade traditions of England which had made her so great. We therefore, see the Prime Minister of England's colony advising the statesmen of Great Britain what should be their internal policy. Was that what the people of Canada expected from him ? Had Sir Wilfrid Laurier told the people of Canada in 1896, when he was seeking their suffrages, that if he were elected leader of a government he would give a preference to the old country in the Canadian market for their products, while at the same time he would advise English statesmen not to give us a preference in their markets, do you suppose he would be occupying the position he does to-day ? Certainly not. The Prime Minister had dwelt upon the great advantage such a policy, put into practice would confer on Canada, and when such a gentleman threw cold water upon the scheme in his very first public utterance. After arriving in England is it at all strange that since that time some discouraging remarks may have fallen from the lips of the Rt. Hon. Joseph Chamberlain. The set-back this question has received is due to the Prime Minister of Canada, and upon his shoulders the responsibility rests. In 1896 Sir Wilfrid Laurier was the advocate of what some Liberal statesmen of to-day call this absurd policy, and even now some of these gentlemen seeing that it is gaining force in public opinion are afraid to state that we will not have it, and have it in the near future. What did we find at the meeting of the British Empire Trade League, which was held in this building a month ago? We found that in the annual statement presented by Col. Dennison, the president of the association, he lauded this enterprise; he advocated an inter-Imperial preferential trade; he stated that the time was most opportune for making these advances because now that the Australasian colonies were becoming a federation, he felt confident the people of Great Britain would meet such advances from the colonies with very favourable consideration, and we found further that this report met with the approbation and the vote of every member of that league present, Grit and Tory alike. There was not a dissenting voice against it. In fact the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Russell) made a very eloquent speech in favour of what some of his friends term that absurd policy. What else did we see? We saw that the Hon. G. W. Ross, Prime Minister of Ontario, wrote a letter to that meeting strongly advocating this policy, declaring that he was in favour of it, and that he felt sure that this policy would at this moment meet with great commendation on the part of British statesmen. That, Sir, is a pretty good indication that a provincial election is looming up in the near future in the province of Ontario. We have had this hon. gentleman (Hon. G. W. Ross) making two or three speeches on this question, each contradicting the other, but adapting them to the occasions and audiences according to party necessities. He made a speech in favour of preferential trade a few years ago, and during the last election he went to the province of Quebec in order to help his political friends there, and he made a speech directly the opposite. It seems indigenous to Liberal prime ministers that they should have the faculty of making speeches on the same question, each differing from the other on different occasions. In fact they seem to be experts in this business, and wherever the bell wether jumps the flock follows. I have no doubt they surprise themselves at the celerity with which they adapt themselves to their contradictory and inconsistent course. Having, however, in view the fruits of office; having in view their reward, what do they care for consistency? The new and up-to-date Liberals believe in practical politics, and are not wedded to any theory no matter how high sounding the title of it may be. I have prepared a detailed statement of some of the imports into the province of Manitoba, and I have selected that province because it is an agricultural province, as well as the province one of the constituencies of which I have the honour to represent. It is also a province where the people have manufactures few and far between, and where they were told by Liberal speakers in years gone by what a great advantage it would be to put the Liberals in power, as they would be able to obtain the necessaries of life, and the necessaries of the farm at lower rates, because of the reduction of duty, and by the placing of many of them on the free list. I take the large agricultural machines and articles in which a great deal of money is invested by the farmers of that province, and the following table will explain the results:

I have heard Liberal members of this House tell the farmers that the duty has been reduced from 35 per cent to 30 per cent or 25 per cent on what kind of articles? Shovels, spades, pronged forks, and other small articles in which the farmers invest only a few cents every year; but of these large items, in which they invest a great deal of money, there has not been a single dollar's worth brought in under the preferential tariff, but they are subjected to duties ranging from 25 per cent to 35 per cent.

Now, passing from the trade question, I desire to discuss another feature of the government's policy. The government, and especially the Minister of the Interior, have taken great credit for what they are pleased to term the inauguration of a vigorous immigration policy. But wherein does their policy differ from that of their predecessors?

What new feature has been introduced of a meritorious character that would warrant them in claiming special credit for their efforts in this direction ? If spending about twice the amount of money as their predecessors did for immigration purposes ; if by largely increasing the number of agents and affording comfortable berths for numerous political friends ; if in order to pad out the immigration returns to make as good a showing numerically as possible for this large outlay, it is desirable to have the country flooded with thousands of Southern European immigrants who are totally unfitted for pioneer life in a new country, and who have in many instances become a burden on the public treasury ; if the system in vogue for calculating the number of immigrants who become permanent settlers in our country is the one formerly condemned by those now in power, as one entirely misleading and unreliable ; while no reliable method has been adopted to ascertain accurately the number of settlers who have actually remained in Canada ; if, I say, these are the features on which the government and its friends base their reasons for claiming that they are entitled to the approbation of the electorate, for this so-called vigorous immigration policy, then I am quite willing they should be judged on those grounds, and am not in doubt as to the verdict.

Mr. SPEAKER. I wish to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that he is going somewhat outside of the question, and I may be permitted to state now what the rule is. When the motion to go into Committee of Ways and Means is before the House, any question may be discussed ; but when some amendment has been moved, only the subject mentioned in the amendment can be discussed. If we turn to Bourinot, at page 549, we see the rule well stated :

> When an amendment has been moved to the question for the Speaker to leave the Chair, discussion should be properly confined to its subject-matter.

This rule has always been observed in England and has always been observed here also. I do not find anything in the amendment under which the question of immigration could be brought up.

Mr. ROCHE (Marquette). Would you mind reading the amendment, Mr. Speaker ?

Mr. SPEAKER read the amendment.

Mr. ROCHE (Marquette). I think my remarks are quite germane to that motion, which deals with the question of protection to our labouring classes.

Mr. SPEAKER. The immigration policy of the government and the question of protection are two different questions altogether. The rule has been observed so far, and I think it would be well not to bring into discussion any other questions than the questions which are dealt with in the amendment.

Mr. MONK. Surely—if you will allow me, without taking exception to your ruling—it is possible to refer to the condition of the labouring classes under the question of the protection of the labouring classes, which is mentioned in the amendment. Is it not possible for my hon. friend, under that part of the amendment, to refer to the classes in the North-west whose condition has been rendered so difficult by the importation of all these aliens into the country ? There is, I think, very great latitude given to those who address the House on an amendment to the motion to go into Supply or into Committee of Ways and Means. In fact, it has been the custom in the past, certainly since I have been in parliament, to allow the very greatest latitude on such occasions. We have perhaps drifted away from the rules in that respect, but we have discussed almost every grievance imaginable under such motions, and unless we depart from that custom, whether it is the rule or not, I think we should allow some latitude.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would not like to make any rule contrary to what has been the practice in previous years. In fact, I have looked over the authorities on the question, and it is very clear to me that when an amendment is moved to the motion that the House go into Committee of Supply, the question which should be discussed then is only the question which is mentioned in the amendment. Besides, I think the hon. member is quite mistaken when he says that it has been the custom in late years to discuss general questions under an amendment. The question was discussed in 1878 and in 1885, and it was decided in those instances in our Canadian parliament that when an amendment is moved, the discussion should be confined to the subject-matter of the amendment.

Mr. MONK. Of course, my hon. friend could wait until you put the main motion, and then repeat all the remarks he is making at present.

Mr. SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. MONK. It is for that reason, perhaps, that so much latitude has been allowed in the past, because my hon. friend would merely have to suspend his remarks until the main motion was before the House.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Mr. Speaker, I am sure there will be no question as to the accuracy of the ruling you have rather suggested than given. It may be that having called the attention of the House to the rule, you will not press it too closely, because the amendment is a somewhat broad one. While I know that the rule has been departed from, so far as I have any suggestion to offer, it would be that it should not be pressed too closely now, but that you should be content rather to state it as a reminder to the House. There can be no question, however, that the rule which you have laid down is a good rule, and that the more closely we keep to it the better it will be for the order of the House.

Mr. SPROULE. After the budget speech has been disposed of, and amendments are made to motions to go into Committee of Supply, my recollection is that we have been kept closely to the rule ; but until the budget speech has been disposed of, we have been allowed to discuss different questions. But when the budget speech is disposed of and a specific amendment made, then hon. gentlemen must confine themselves to the amendment.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That is the case now.

Mr. CLANCY. You have not made a ruling, Mr. Speaker, but merely suggestions. It seems to me that my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Roche) is fairly within the rules in discussing that special part of the resolution which relates to the labouring classes. He is pointing out that these classes are not being protected as it is suggested by the resolution they should be. And as an instance of the want of protection, he is pointing out that a very undesirable class of people are being brought into this country to displace our own labouring men.

Mr. SPEAKER. I merely wish to point this out to hon. gentlemen. Since the amendment has been moved, I have noticed that, in some instances, there has been discussion on matters which certainly do not come within its scope. I know that every member of this House is anxious to observe the rules as much as possible, and I thought it well to state the rule so that every one should do his best to follow it as closely as possible.

Mr. ROCHE (Marquette). I shall certainly try to keep within the rule, Mr. Speaker, and will make my remarks as brief as possible. In fact I would have concluded them by this had I not been interrupted. I was merely going on to point out that a large number of foreigners have been brought into this country to enter into unfair competition with our labouring classes and that many of our trade societies have been passing resolutions asking the government to cease this policy.

I wish to draw attention to the number of immigrants brought in during this past year and the unfair competition to which the people of Manitoba have thus been submitted. I find, according to the immigration returns, that during the past year 41,499 immigrants were brought into Canada. Of this number there were 15,916 Galicians, Doukhobors, and miscellaneous nationalities, leaving but 25,583 of the better class of immigrants. These have cost Canada nearly half a million of money, or $434,562.61.

Mr. McCREARY. What are you quoting from?

Mr. ROCHE (Marquette). I am quoting from the report for the year ending June 30th, 1900.

Mr. McCREARY. There were no Doukhobors brought in then.

Mr. ROCHE (Marquette). The report also claims that 14,215 settlers came in from the United States, but when we turn to the list of homestead entries, we find that there were only 1,307 entries made by people from that country and allowing 3½ persons to the family, which has been the custom in the past, that only accounts for 4,182 settlers, leaving upwards of 10,000 unaccounted for. And according to the evidence given before the Agricultural Committee by the superintendent of immigration, there has been no method adopted by which the department is aware whether those people remained in this country or not. As soon as they cross the boundary line the bonus of three dollars for every male over eighteen, two dollars for every female over eighteen, and one dollar for all under that age, has been earned and the check which the conductors keep of those people is the only evidence that they are supposed to become permanent residents. These people might stay in this country but a month or two, and then go back to the United States and we would be none the wiser.

To maintain the large staff of officials we have in the immigration service in the United States, Canada paid $86,171.18 during the last fiscal year. That is what those settlers from the United States cost us. We have over 400 agents on commission or salary, and when we take into consideration the large number of Doukhobors and Galicians, and miscellaneous nationalities amounting to 15,916, the greater portion of whom, notwithstanding what hon. gentlemen opposite may say to the contrary are totally unfit for pioneer life in a new country——

Mr. KENDALL. Did you ever see a Doukhobor ?

Mr. ROCHE (Marquette). Yes, the hon. gentleman does not resemble them at all. In my own constituency where several thousand of those Galicians are located in colonies, where they were dumped down so that they may retain their old habits, and refuse to become assimilated with the general public, there was, during the late campaign, no feature of the government policy which came in for so much denunciation at the hands of the electors, both Liberals and Conservatives as this feature of their immigration policy.

Mr. KENDALL. Doukhobors or Galicians ?

Mr. ROCHE (Marquette). Both. Our provincial government finds it necessary, because of this large influx of ignorant and uneducated people, to bring in a compulsory educational Bill at this session of the legislature and it is not right that they should be compelled to incur a largely increased expenditure for this purpose, that they can ill afford, on account of the policy of the Minister of the Interior. And I hope in this connection that this government will hand over to the province of Manitoba the school lands and the school funds now held in trust for that province and properly belonging to it, to be administered by the local authorities for educational purposes, as they are in a much better position to do so to better advantage than the Dominion government can possibly hope to be.

It has been claimed by our opponents that the days of the exodus are past, and our people no longer seek homes in the country to the south of us. But, I find on looking at the Trade and Navigation Returns that settlers effects to the amount of $1,095,536, were exported from our country during the last year, which is a pretty good index that the exodus against which they declaimed so loudly in years gone by, is still in existence.

Railway subsidies and steamship subventions which came in for so much denunciation at the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite when they were on this side of the House, I notice are still being voted as in the days of the Conservative administration only more so. Millions of dollars of public funds are annually voted for railways without any adequate return to the people, which has possibly done more to create that agitation for government ownership, an agitation that first arose in the progressive province of Manitoba, and which is gaining force every day in other portions of the Dominion, than almost any other act of the government.

In the matter of steamship subventions, our farmers were told that the country was bonusing vessels to ply between Australia and Vancouver to bring into unfair competition with our mutton the mutton from the Australian colony. They did not tell the farmers that before a pound of that mutton could be landed on Canadian territory it had to pay a duty of 35 per cent under Conservative administration. Actually Liberal campaigners hawked about cans of Australian mutton as an illustration of the unfair competition our farmers were being subjected to. After carrying on such a warfare you would imagine these gentlemen, on coming into power, would have taken the first opportunity either to abolish the steamship subventions or at least to raise the duties, and thus give more protection to our farmers.

Did they do so ? Why, on the contrary we see that steamship subventions are continued as much as they ever were in the past ; and not only that, but, mutton is being imported in increased quantities under the tariff which gives a preference of 33⅓ per cent. In looking up the Trade and Navigation Returns, I found that in 1896 we imported into Canada 22,299 pounds of mutton, the duty being then 35 per cent. Last year, ending 30th June, 1900, we imported the enormous quantity of 565,401 pounds, which paid a duty reduced by 33⅓ per cent. So, if our farmers were suffering and burdened by this keen competition in 1896, how much keener must that competition be when thirty times as much mutton is being imported under the reduction of 33⅓ per cent. When the tariff was submitted to the House in 1897 by the present government, it created a great deal of dissatisfaction amongst the western people, and even among the western representatives, because they knew the pledges upon which they had secured their seats. They knew that promises were held out to the people that they should get their raw material free. When the tariff was brought down the Liberal speakers had to do what they could to let themselves down easy. They told us that, of course, we could not expect the government, at one feel swoop—to use a favourite expression of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright)—to give us free trade. We were to have free trade on the instalment plan. But year after year has gone by, and now instalments are overdue. No further instalments have been paid, and free trade on the instalment plan has not been effected, and is not the shibboleth of the Liberal party to-day. Free agricultural implements was the cry of the past. We heard denunciations of the rebates on duties paid to the manufacturers of implements to enable them to send machines to farmers living in foreign countries thousands of miles away, to enable them to buy those implements cheaply, and to compete with our own farmers at an advantage. I find by the return brought down in response to a motion presented by myself that these drawbacks are still continued, and that, for the year ending 30th June last, they amounted to $245,151.46. Now, I might go on and comment upon the extravagance of the government, but that point has been so fully covered that I need not occupy the time of the House. We all know that the public debt, which, we were promised would be reduced, has been increased by $7,000,000 ; that the expenditures which were to have been reduced by one, two, or three millions, have gone up by fourteen millions ; that the taxation of the country, which was to have been cut down has also been increased by several millions—and still the carnival of extravagance goes merrily on. It is time that this government should call a halt to the useless waste of public money. If they are not able, during a time of great prosperity, when we have great expansion in our imports and our exports, when the trade of the country has been leaping up as it has been—if they are not able, notwithstanding that millions of dollars have been wrung out of the pockets of the people as a surplus by unnecessary and unjust taxation, to reduce our expenditure or to apply any portion of the surplus to reduce the national debt, how can we expect to effect such a reduction when we are sliding down the wave, upon the crest of which we now are, according to the Finance Minister. In the time of prosperity wise statesmen prepare for adversity. Otherwise the reaction that is sure to set in will create a commercial panic, and already there seems some sign of an approaching period of depression. While we are not pessimists—and, in that respect we differ from hon. gentlemen on the other side, for we do not believe in decrying the fair fame of our country for the sake of gaining a petty political advantage—yet, as citizens of the country, when we see the government drifting recklessly along, it is our duty to warn them of the approaching storm so that by cutting down their expenditure, and by judicious administration, they may fortify the country against commercial disaster. In accordance with my usual custom, I will not trespass long upon the patience of the House, but will content myself with these remarks, seeing that the subject has been so thoroughly threshed out.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of Minister of Finance, House adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, March 20, 1901.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 82) respecting the Rathbun Company.—Mr. Britton.

Bill (No. 83) to incorporate the Kootenay Central Railway Company.—Mr. Galliher.

Bill (No. 84) respecting the Alberta Railway and Coal Company.—Mr. Oliver.

Bill (No. 85) to incorporate the Alberta Central Railway Company.—Mr. Oliver.

Bill (No. 86) respecting the Trans-Canada Railway Company.—Mr. Malouin.

Mr. ROCHE (Marquette).

QUESTIONS.

THE DOUKHOBORS.

Mr. WILSON asked :

1. Have the Doukhobors settled in the neighbourhood of Yorkton petitioned the Dominion government, objecting to our land, marriage or registration laws?

2. If so, did the government refer said petition to Mr. Maude, the English Quaker who was chiefly instrumental in their immigration to Canada?

3. Is the government aware that the Doukhobors have issued an 'Appeal to all nations of the world,' asking if they will be given a refuge from Canadian tyranny?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Hon. Clifford Sifton) :

1. A petition was received from the immigration commissioner at Winnipeg, under cover of a letter dated July 10, 1900, purporting to be signed by twenty-nine of the Doukhobors, making certain objections to the land, marriage and registration laws.

2. The department sent a copy of the petition to Mr. Maude, in order that he might communicate with the signers of the petition and remove their misapprehensions in regard to Canadian laws.

3. The department is not aware that the Doukhobors had issued an appeal to all the nations of the world, asking if they would be given a refuge from Canadian tyranny. The department is informed that a Russian (not a Doukhobor) named Bojianski undertook to make trouble with the Doukhobors. He got up the original petition referred to, and has now caused to be printed a document, to which reference is made in the question, in a Winnipeg paper known as The Voice. The department has no reason to believe that the utterances of Mr. Bojianski represent the views of the 7,500 Doukhobors who are settled in the North-west, or any substantial portion of them.

COWAN'S BRIDGE, VICTORIA COUNTY, ONT.

Mr. VROOMAN asked :

1. Was a grant of money made towards assisting in rebuilding Cowan's bridge across Pigeon river, in the township of Emily, county of Victoria, Ont.?

2. Has said bridge been built?

3. If so, has the money been paid over?

4. If not, why?

5. If not, is it the intention to revote the grant ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair) :

1. In the supplementary estimates for 1899-1900, the sum of $1,500 was voted as a contribution towards the renewal of Cowan's bridge over Pigeon river.

2. No report has been received that the bridge has been completed.

3. The money has not been paid over.

4. Because no report was received of the bridge having been completed, nor an application made for an inspection of it. The appropriation lapsed on August 15, 1900.

5. The government is making further inquiries before deciding to ask parliament to revote the amount. We are led to make these inquiries in consequence of the statement that has been made to us that the hon. member for South Victoria, in the course of the recent election campaign, in the western part of the riding, denounced the government for having granted this aid, declaring that the expenditure was unnecessary and extravagant. We are endeavouring to ascertain as to the accuracy of this report, and inquiring again as to whether there is any doubt about the propriety of the appropriation before making up our minds on the subject.

B. C. IMMIGRATION INDUSTRIES.

Hon. Mr. PRIOR asked :

1. Has the attention of the government been drawn to an issue of 'The Province,' of Vancouver, B.C., dated November 24, 1900, in which a report of an interview with the Hon. Clifford Sifton, Minister of Interior, is given and of which the following is a portion, viz.:—

'I may as well tell you the importance of the mining industries of this province have never been so fully borne in upon me as during this last trip of mine. It is a subject of great scope and one that must be treated with all possible care and consideration. I shall therefore urge upon my colleagues the advisability of appointing a strong and thoroughly competent commission to inquire into the whole matter and report at an early date. The commission, if appointed—and I have every reason to believe it will be—would deal not only with mining but also with matters of smelting and refining; in fact, it would take up and report upon the whole connection which the mining industry has with the general business of the country, including of course its relation to the customs tariff and the bearing which that has on it.' Also the Minister of Interior stated that action on the report of the said commission might safely be expected within a year from that date.

2. Has the government decided to appoint said commission?

3. If so, when? If not, why not?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Hon. Clifford Sifton) :

1. No.

2 and 3. The matter is under consideration.

B. C. MINERAL RESOURCES.

Hon. Mr. PRIOR asked :

1. Is the government aware that Mr. J. B. McArthur, president of the Rossland Board of Trade and Chamber of Mines, and also president of the election committee of Mr. W. A. Galliher, M.P., made the following remarks at an interview which members of the Rossland Board of Trade had with the Minister of Mines for British Columbia, during last autumn, viz.:—

'Mr. Sifton is going to take up the question of the advertisement of the mineral resources of British Columbia, and in fact of the whole of Canada. I am not prepared at the present time to disclose all he says, but he is going to take it up energetically in connection with the Yukon. He is also going to take up the silver-lead question, and there is no doubt whatever in his mind that the government will protect that industry, and an important announcement will be made by him shortly, in fact, something will be done within the next sixty days.'

2. Was Mr. McArthur authorized by the hon. the Minister of the Interior to make such a statement?

3. Is it the intention of the government to afford adequate protection to the silver-lead industry?

4. As the sixty days mentioned are now long past, when may the important announcement by the hon. the Minister of the Interior be expected?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Hon. Clifford Sifton) :

1. The attention of the government has not been drawn to Mr. McArthur's statement.

2. No one outside of the government has been authorized to make any statement regarding the fiscal policy of the government.

3 and 4. The question is under consideration.

CANAL EXPENDITURE.

Mr. SMITH (Wentworth) asked :

1. What amount was paid by the government for construction or improvement of canals in each year ending 30th June, 1897, 1898, 1899 and 1900?

2. How much of this amount was paid on account of contracts entered into by the late government and not relet?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair) :

1. The amount paid by the government for construction or improvement of canals in each year ending 30th June, 1897, 1898, 1899 and 1900, is as follows :

Year ending	Amount.
June 30th, 1897..	$2,348,636.91
1898	3,207,608.29
1899..	3,899,277.31
1900	2,639,564.93

2. Of the above amounts, $4,132,251.32 was paid on account of contracts entered into by the late government and not relet.

VANCOUVER DRILL HALL.

Hon. Mr. PRIOR asked :

1. Is the government satisfied with the manner in which the contractors for the new drill hall in Vancouver, B.C., have so far carried out the work?

2. Is it not a fact that a considerable portion of the building fell down, owing to faulty material or workmanship?

3. Has the government had any report from their agent in British Columbia, or the clerk of works, in regard to this? If so, to what is the collapse of the building attributed?

4. Will the government insist on the contractors rebuilding the same without extra compensation?

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier):

1. The manner was satisfactory excepting that a part of a gable wall was built during a period of bad weather.

2. A portion of one gable fell out. The officer in charge of the works reports that there is nothing faulty in the design or material of the fallen portion.

3. The government agent in British Columbia has reported that one of the gable walls is the only portion which has failed, and this he attributes solely to a period of bad weather.

4. Rebuilding without extra compensation is provided for in the contract.

DUTY ON LUMBER.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (East Simcoe) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, duties should be levied upon lumber imported into Canada corresponding with those now existing upon lumber entering the United States.

He said: I caused this motion, Mr. Speaker, to be placed on the Order paper early in the session, but at the request of gentlemen interested in the lumber business, to a very great extent, in the province of Ontario, I refrained from moving it. I did so in deference to the opinion of these gentlemen, who believed that it would be in the interest of the lumber trade that the motion should not then be made, and the reason they gave for coming to that conclusion was that numerous representations were being made to the government for a change in the lumber duties. In view of the fact that the hon. Minister of Finance stated the other day in his budget speech that there would be no changes in the tariff during the present session, it may be rather superfluous on my part to make any remarks. I am prompted, however, to do so by a consciousness of the duty which I owe to my constituents, especially those interested in the lumber business. That business, not only in Ontario, but in the other provinces, is a very important one. In it millions of dollars have been invested and thousands of our Canadians find employment at remunerative wages. And it has been a matter of satisfaction in the province of Ontario, during the past few years, that the lumber industry has been encouraged by the local government to a great extent and is in a much better position than in former years. The improvement is due to the law passed by the Ontario legislature, which compels the manufacture in that province of all pine logs cut within its domain. That law has had a most healthy effect. Mills that were closed for many years are now in active operation, and a large number of new mills have been built, particularly on the north shore of Georgian Bay. While we have in Ontario a large output of white pine lumber, in the United States as well as Great Britain there is a great demand for that lumber, and the result is that we have had for a number of years past a large trade in that article, not only in Great Britain, but in the United States. But while the Canadian government has very generously allowed American lumber to come in free of duty, our lumbering interests are hampered to a great extent by the high tariff on lumber going into the United States.

Turning to the trade and navigation reports, I find that during the past year there was imported into Canada no less than $3,614,557 worth of the products of the forest. These imports came from various countries but more particularly from the United States. I shall not read the table in its entirety, but will ask hon. gentlemen to give their attention to this fact, that we are bringing into Ontario, into the Dominion, no less a quantity than $887,274 worth of oak. I have always understood that we have large hardwood areas in Ontario, and it seems rather strange that while the United States are imposing high lumber duties against us, we are actually permitting them to ship free of duty this large quantity of timber into our country. The effect of the introduction of that oak must be to lessen prices of our other hardwoods.

Coming to pitch pine, I find that no less than $398,211 worth was imported into this country. Now, pitch pine is a strong competitor with our own lumber. It is used largely for structural purposes, bridge-building, and in many other ways, and the result of bringing it into this country is to displace a certain amount of our own product.

Coming down further I find that of lumber hewn or sawed, square or sided, we imported $199,415; that, too, must stand on the basis of the other, displacing a certain amount of Canadian produced lumber. Coming down further I find that of shingles we imported $45,253; of staves, we imported $72,876. Now, I know that in the stave industry there is a considerable amount of business done in this country. In the riding of East Simcoe that industry has been developing for a number of years past, and it does seem unfair that we should permit the people of the United States to bring staves into this country free of duty while they are placing high duties against similar articles passing from this country into the United States. Then even in the matter of wood for fuel we brought into this country $28,421 worth. Surely we have enough fuel wood in this country without permitting the United States to introduce their wood here. While these importations amount to a very considerable sum, $3,614,557, I do not claim that they affect to a great extent the prices of our Canadian lumber, although in many instances it is alleged, I believe, by those who are interested in the trade, that they have interfered to a great extent with the prices. But the pernicious principle lies in this circumstance, that if we are to permit that trade to increase, it will in all probability go on year after year, and we will find to our regret that they will introduce a larger amount of this lumber into Canada in competition with our own than they are doing at present. Now, I will not give my own opinion alone on this question, but I will read from a report of a meeting held in the city of Toronto of the Lumbermen's Association of Ontario, of which Mr. John Waldie, a gentleman well known in Ontario as a lumberman, is the president. In an address which Mr. Waldie delivered to the association on the 29th of last January, he made these among other remarks :

> Lumbermen have always been free distributors of money, and as another result of the manufacturing condition attached to the business, it has elevated the people of Ontario in the eyes of our neighbours and strengthened the sentiment of national self-reliance amongst our people. We must continue to insist that our Dominion government shall adopt a tariff against lumber and all wood products entering into competition, remove them from the free list, and relieve the lumber industry from the unequal competition of lumber manufactured and freighted under more favourable conditions. To-day, labour, machinery and mill supplies are higher in Canada than in the United States, and when low transportation rates on lumber are given from the southern states, we in Ontario are placed in competition with the cheap coloured labour of the south; and lumbermen in new Ontario and British Columbia are at a disadvantage when competing with Oregon and Washington Territory for the trade of our prairie province. The advantages given and favours shown by the whole country to Manitoba while a young and struggling province are surely entitled to consideration, and that province now being of age, may fairly be asked to accept the general policy of the government equally with the other provinces.

From the newspaper report that I read at the time, I believe that Mr. Waldie's views were approved of unanimously by the gentlemen who were present, all of whom were interested in the trade. Mr. Waldie appreciated and seemed to comprehend that the only trouble the government might have would be opposition from the North-west Territories and from Manitoba to a proposal to place an import duty on lumber. In reference to that, Mr. Waldie makes the very pertinent remark that the province of Manitoba and the Territories should be quite willing to bear their portion of the brunt of any tariff legislation, and that if it bore heavily upon them they, in return for the concessions that had been made to them in the past, should be willing to put up with any such burden, if burden there should be. Now, I might also quote from the same report a memorial presented to the government by the British Columbia Lumbering, Shingle and Manufacturers' Association, to show that not only in the province of Ontario, but likewise in British Columbia, men who are interested in this great industry find that they are suffering from an unfair, unequal and unjust discrimination.

Since the Minister of Finance has announced his policy, I suppose the lumbermen will have to bow their necks to the inevitable, and they cannot hope for any redress. But it is not only on behalf of the lumbermen that I speak, but to a great extent on behalf of the mechanics and labourers who are employed in the lumber industry. No man, unless one who has lived in the lumbering district, can appreciate the great change that has been wrought in the province of Ontario by that most wholesome principle that has been adopted by the Ontario government. I, Sir, living in a town where the business of cutting lumber is carried on to a great extent, have had the pleasure of knowing that three or four hundred men have come back to the province of Ontario who had been living in Michigan where the lumber industry had gone, transferred from Ontario almost in its entirety. These men, after working in Michigan ten or fifteen years, are returning to their own homes and to their own friends. Now, in face of the fact that the American government seems determined to harass and to heckle, as they are doing, the lumber industry in Canada by these high duties, the duty on white pine alone being $2 per thousand, is it not high time that our government should intervene ? And is there any wonder that gentlemen like Mr. Waldie, the owner of three large mills in the town of Victoria Harbour, seeing the stand taken by the government of the United States against this industry, should be one of those who, even at the risk of being called tariff tinkerers, have come here, and I presume almost on bended knees have asked the government to intervene and to make this change.

Now, I do not know whether I am correct in making this statement or not, but I am informed by gentlemen who are in the lumber industry in the province of Ontario, that the time has arrived when the prospects of that industry are not so bright as they were a few years ago ; that to-day the lumber yards are filled to a great extent by high classes of lumber ; that the high grades are not in demand to-day so much as they were. While the lower grades have met with a ready sale, the high grades of lumber are not meeting with the ready sale that they would wish. Now, in view of the fact that millions of dollars are invested in the business, in view of the fact that millions of feet of lumber are lying to-day in the province of Ontario, and I presume in the other provinces as well, is it not high time that the government should ask themselves whether some measure of fair-play should not be accorded to these gentlemen who are in that business; and whether, since the people of the United States have turned a deaf ear to the applications of the lumbermen on this side to remove their hostile tariff, this government should not at least hit back against the American government to the extent of imposing duties as high as the duties that now prevail against our lumber passing into that country? For these reasons, I beg to move the resolution that stands in my name, hoping that before the close of the session in the event of the government making any changes in the tariff, should they be pleased to do so, the first and foremost among those changes will be one which will tend to produce the result that our lumber will be admitted free into the United States market, and if it is not admitted free of duty, that this government will then retaliate, if I may use that term, by placing equally as high duties agaist lumber coming into this country as are now imposed on our lumber going into the United States.

Mr. T. O. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). I am sorry that I cannot agree with the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) in his view of this question. He has mentioned that the province of Manitoba, and I think he read from a report that was sent out by the Manufacturers' Association, has now reached a stage in which they should give way and allow duties to be imposed on lumber coming into this country for the general good of the rest of the Dominion. It is not in the interest of Manitoba alone that lumber should be imported into this country free; it is in the interest of the Dominion at large. Some time ago I received a circular from this lumber association in British Columbia, and I wish to point out that it is only the British Columbia people who are asking to have this duty imposed on lumber.

Mr. CHARLTON. That is not so.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, I have not heard of any other. This is the only circular I have received from any institution of that kind asking to have a duty imposed on lumber. Any person who takes the trouble to read the circular will see that these people condemn themselves. The fact is, they are asking to have a duty imposed on lumber for their own special benefit, something that I for one, do not agree with. They say they believe they are the only manufacturing industry in Canada left without protection. I was under the impression that binder twine, barbed wire and other commodities manufactured in this country were placed on the free list. These industries can hardly be said to have protection. My hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) read from the Trade and Navigation Returns the amount of lumber coming into this country from the United States, the value being $3,610,252. I submit that most of the lumber thus imported is the raw material of other manufactures. There is an enormous quantity of this lumber used by manufacturers of furniture, and these manufactories are not in Manitoba and the North-west, but chiefly in Ontario. The manufacturers of furniture and other commodities of that kind have to export their goods to Great Britain, where they must compete with goods coming from the United States. Now, if a duty were placed on their raw material, the effect would be to drive them out of the English market. Thus the proposition to impose a duty on lumber would affect far more than the people of Manitoba and the North-west Territories. So far as Manitoba and the North-west are concerned, we object to a duty on lumber. We have there very little lumber, but lumber is absolutely necessary to the settlers for the construction of their houses, and it is most important that it should be as cheap as possible. In fact, it is one of our main arguments as a means of attracting immigration to that country that we have cheap lumber. The same thing applies to cordwood. In certain sections where they cannot get coal, they are able to get cheap cordwood from Minnesota and other places. I have never heard of any demand for a duty on lumber in that country. In my own town, we have three saw-mills, but I never heard of those who own them advocating such a duty. Perhaps they are even more interested in the matter than the parties who are bringing it forward. Take the province of British Columbia—they are favoured above every part of the country in their railroad lumber rates. I showed the other day that they paid a rate of 50 cents a hundred all over the province of British Columbia for a distance of over a thousand miles, while people within a distance of three hundred miles of the market in Manitoba have to pay 20 cents a hundred. Besides that, the British Columbia saw-mill men are in a position to manufacture cheaply. They have Chinese and Japanese labour, which enables them to manufacture at a lower cost than the people in any other part of the country. Therefore, these British Columbia manufacturers are the last people who should bring a matter of this kind forward. I am sorry that the hon. gentleman who brought this motion before the House has not shown the usual sympathy for the agriculturists, for it is the agriculturists who would be affected if this resolution were adopted and acted upon. Coming back to this circular, they say:

> The chief burden of our complaint is that our trade is unfairly discriminated against under the present tariff, being, we believe, the only manufacturing industry in Canada which is left totally without protection in our own home markets——

I have already pointed out the case of binder twine and barbed wire.

> —whilst contributing largely to the prosperous conditions of other manufacturers and producers —whose manufactures we use and for which we pay enhanced prices, consequent upon the protection which they enjoy under the present existing tariff from the competition and cheaper price of like manufactures and productions in the United States.

They go on to say :

Our industry contributes largely to the revenues of both Dominion and provincial governments in timber dues, and by customs duties on all machinery and supplies used in the production of our commodities.

It is well known that those who have acquired timber limits have often paid very little for them. It is true, since this government came into power these limits are put up to competition, and sold to those who bid the highest. But in the good old days gone by—and this was carried on in British Columbia to a considerable extent—parties who got timber limits paid very little for them, and the small dues they pay when the timber is manufactured is a mere bagatelle. One thing is certain and that is, that the man who acquired a timber limit seemed at once to step into the position of a lumber king. We know of men who one day, did not own ten dollars, but who managed, by a pull, to get timber limits, and became immediately worth two or three hundred thousand dollars. The signers of this circular speak of the large amounts they pay in customs duties on machinery. It is true that when they put the machinery into the mill, they may pay a considerable amount, but once it is installed, nothing is required except to replace a band-saw or something like that—a mere nothing. They admit in the circular itself that we can obtain cheaper lumber from Minnesota. They say :

We ask for our productions a mere living price, we are met with the reply that pitch-pine from the United States can be obtained at cheaper prices or that pine from Minnesota can be got at less cost.

If it be true that lumber from Minnesota can be got for less, I submit that the rule of greatest good to the greatest number condemns this proposal of an increased duty, because the people to be benefited are small in number compared with the farmers who have to buy this lumber. It is not reasonable to tax the great body of farmers to enable these few lumber manufacturers to get rich. These people say in their circular that they only ask protection from unfair competition. But they do not deny that if you put this duty upon the lumber, the effect will be to increase the price of the commodity to the consumer. They do not go out of their way to say otherwise, in fact they practically admit that that will be the effect.

But, still, they ask this parliament to pass a motion of that kind which will impose a burden on thousands and thousands of hard struggling farmers in the west, and they want that for the benefit of a few people who are engaged in the lumber industry. It is not only the people of Manitoba and the North-west Territories for whom I speak, but it is also the people of the older provinces. Take the furniture dealers, take the people who have to buy this lumber coming in from the United States for the purpose of making handles of forks because they cannot get it here, who have to get their raw material from the other side, and if this duty is imposed they will not be able to compete with the manufacturers on the other side. The hon. member for East Simcoe professed to sympathize with the labouring men, the artisans. I suppose he alluded to the men who worked in the mills in British Columbia. I think I have pointed out that the labouring men he is sympathizing with are the Chinamen and Japanese, who, to a large extent, are employed in this industry in British Columbia, and have driven white labour out of the British Columbia market. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Morrison) says this is not so, but we find gentlemen coming from British Columbia year after year asking to have the Chinese excluded from Canada because they are doing all the work that the white men should do in British Columbia. That being so we must take it for granted that these Chinamen, having got into the mines and upon the railways, have also gone into the saw-mills and industries of that kind, so that, these are the people that the hon. member for East Simcoe wants to protect. The men I want to protect are the hard working artisans in Ontario and other portions of the country who are employed in the making of furniture and commodities of that kind. I also want to protect the hardy settlers in the North-west Territories, who are trying to get along. These people, when they come in first, are not wealthy ; they cannot get everything they desire, and if you are going to impose a duty on the lumber that they require to erect their homes and stables, you will be driving people out of the country and preventing others from coming in. The first question that a man asks when he comes into the North-west Territories to look for a location is : How much can I get lumber for with which to build my house ? If you increase the price of it you will eventually force settlers to go across the line. I do not wish to take up any more of the time of the House, but I desire to say that I am opposed to placing a duty on any commodity. My hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Edwards) often says that he is a free trader. So am I. I do not believe in any duties, and more particularly do I not believe in protective duties. If the hon. member for East Simcoe had said that he was desirous, in the interets of raising a revenue, that we should have a duty on lumber, there might be some force in his argument, but, when he comes out flat-flooted and says that we want this duty imposed in the interests of protection, I want to say that I am opposed to protection on any article, and that I will vote against the resolution.

Hon. E. G. PRIOR (Victoria, B.C.) Mr. Speaker, as the motion moved by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) is one that is of vast importance to the lumbermen of British Columbia, I may perhaps be allowed to say a word on the subject. As the hon. gentleman has stated the lumbermen of Canada are badly handicapped, inasmuch as they have to compete in the American market against a duty of $2 a thousand on lumber, and 30 cents a thousand on shingles, whereas the American lumbermen can come in and compete against them in their own market and find no duty against them. The lumbermen of British Columbia particularly have to face, not only this tariff, but they also have to face a discrimination which is made against them by the shipowners who supply the ships for carrying the lumber into Puget Sound. The dues charged there for pilotage, the harbour dues, and insurance rates, I believe, are lower than in the ports of British Columbia, and therefore, the lumbermen have to suffer therefrom. In addition to that, at the present time, they have to pay a high rate of freight owing to the scarcity of ships, not only in British Columbia, but all over the world. I have here a few figures showing the shipments by vessel and railway in 1900 from British Columbia and the Pacific coast south. In that year there were 777,043,000 odd feet shipped. Of this British Columbia alone supplied only 85,000,000 feet. In the state of Washington there are 444 sawmills, with a capacity of 8,380,000 feet daily, employing some twenty-four or twenty-five thousand men, whereas, in British Columbia, there are ninety-seven mills with a capacity of 3,645,000 feet. Oregon and California have about the same capacity as Washington. The lumbermen of Washington and Oregon have a market of 75,000,000 people, their own market, and besides that they have Canada to which they can send their lumber free, whereas, our lumbermen cannot get into that huge market of seventy-five million people without paying the duty that I have mentioned, namely, $2 per thousand feet. It is contended by hon. gentlemen from Manitoba and the North-west Territories especially, and it was contended by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davis) who has just taken his seat, that it is not right for British Columbia in particular to ask that a duty should be imposed upon lumber, because it would heighten the price of the lumber that the people there require to build their houses and other structures. That hon. gentleman says that the lumbermen state in their circular that they are the only manufacturing industry in Canada that is wholly without protection, and he remarks that that is not so, because there is the binder twine, the barbed wire and several other industries that are not protected. Well, I cannot gainsay what he says in regard to that, but I may say that both of these industries have been pretty well knocked out owing to the want of protection, and there is no reason why the lumbermen should be knocked out in the same way. The hon. gentleman also says that the reason we are asking for a protective duty is that we may protect the Chinese. Now, there is no doubt that there are a certain number of Chinese and Japanese employed in the mills in British Columbia, but the reason that they are employed, instead of white men, is that the lumbermen are forced, owing to the want of protection, to work for such a small profit that they cannot possibly compete if they have to pay the wages which white men would naturally demand. The hon. gentleman says that he is a free trader. We all know that. He is a free trader in everything except where it affects his own pocket. I, in conjunction with the majority of the people in British Columbia, am a protectionist. We believe in protecting our own industries, and I think this House and the country, when they look at this matter in a fair spirit, will say that the lumbermen in the whole of Canada and in British Coulmbia, in particular, for which I speak, are in a position now in which they are entitled to demand from the government that that industry should be protected to a certain extent at all events. The reason that Puget Sound mills can cut cheaper than the British Columbia mills, is because they can get their supplies much cheaper. Supplies that they have to buy can be bought cheaper on the Sound than they can in the province of British Columbia, owing to the fact that a great many commodities, being manufactured on the Sound, have not to pay duty, whereas, these commodities, when imported into British Columbia, have to pay duty. We are not a manufacturing province, and although the goods may come from eastern Canada, there is a heavy freight rate to be paid on them. The lumbermen of British Columbia do not ask for protection in order that they may raise their prices to our friends in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, but merely for the purpose of being enabled to sell their lumber in Canada. As a matter of fact, prices in Manitoba and the North-west Territories have been very materially reduced. They have been reduced $5 a thousand on lumber, and from $1.75 to $3 on shingles.

I do not know that I can say much more in regard to the matter. I think I represent the opinion of the lumbermen when I ask that the government shall see fit to impose an import duty similar to that which the Americans impose, namely, $2 a thousand on lumber, and 30 cents a thousand on shingles. I had hoped, from information which I thought was authentic, that the Minister of Finance would inform the House in his budget speech that it was the intention of the government to impose a duty upon lumber. I believe that was his intention and the intention of the government up to within a very few days of the delivery of that budget speech, but for some reason or other, which no one outside of the cabinet seems to understand, the government altered their mind and left the lumbermen out in the cold. I can assure the government that the lumbermen, Liberals as well as Conservatives, are not satisfied with the manner in which they have been treated, and they will continue to agitate until their request is granted by this government or some other government.

Mr. JOHN CHARLTON (North Norfolk). The question before the House is of very great importance to a large interest in Canada, and of importance incidentally to all interests in Canada. The lumber interest ranks next to the agricultural interest in this Dominion in importance and in the amount of capital invested. I wish to present a few statements to the House which, in my opinion, would warrant the government, in the interests of the country, in imposing an import duty upon lumber coming from the United States to the extent of the duty imposed by the United States government on Canadian lumber entering that country. A policy has been adopted by the province of Ontario which has led to the transference from American points to Canada of a large saw-milling industry. A number of very extensive mills have been erected upon the north shore of Lake Huron, and parties who formerly manufactured lumber in the United States and found the market there free of duty are now manufacturing lumber in Canada, which, when sent to the United States, is met by a duty of $2 a thousand feet. These men very naturally feel that having been forced into Canada by the operation of a regulation adopted by one of the provinces, they are entitled to some consideration ; a consideration at least to the extent of giving them command of the local market in the country where they have established their industry. When their lumber is exported to the United States they are met by a duty, while their competitors in the United States send their lumber into Canada duty free. Now, while the Canadian millmen do not require protection against American lumbermen for the higher grades of lumber, yet, it is a great advantage to the Americans to be able to dump on this market lower grade lumber, of which there is a plethora in the American market, and which it becomes necessary to unload somewhere. This lumber is sent to this country and sold at depressed prices, and under conditions which demoralize the trade, and which inflict a serious injury upon the lumber industry of Canada. We have objections, of course, from Manitoba and from the North-west to the imposition of the duty which is asked for by this resolution before the House. We are too much in the habit in this country of giving undue prominence to special local interests and losing sight of the general interests of the Dominion. Two or three years ago, when discussing the lumber question with prominent members of the sub-committee of the Finance Committee of the Senate of the United States, I was very much struck with the view which was taken by these gentlemen with regard to the lumber duty. Both of the gentlemen with whom I was speaking avowed themselves to be in favour of free lumber. They declared that the states they represented in the Senate would be benefited by free lumber, and if they were governed by considerations of the interests of the particular locality whence they came, they would certainly favour to the utmost of their power the removal of the lumber duties. But, said they, we are governed in arranging the details of this tariff by broad national considerations ; we cannot afford to take into consideration the interest of one particular locality if the interests of that locality conflict with the general interests of the nation ; the lumber industry of the United States is a great industry spread over a great number of states, and we must bear in mind that the requirements of this industry are centred in some twenty-seven states, and so we must be governed by broad national considerations rather than by the desire to serve the purpose of our particular locality. That was a sound general principle, and upon that principle let my hon. friend from Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) allow the broad general interests of this country to be served, and let him and his constituents, if need be, submit to some slight inconvenience, for we certainly have sacrificed a great deal of money for that western country—not sacrificed, but appropriated—and we have the right to ask the people there to give due consideration to broad general interests of national importance and of national scope. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davis) tells us that lumber is brought from Minnesota into the North-west cheaper than it can be obtained from Ontario. This may possibly be the case, although I do not believe that if the lumbermen of Canada were given complete command of the market, there would be any material appreciation in the price of lumber. But if the lumbermen of Minnesota find a market for their products in Manitoba and the North-west, and if the imposition of a Canadian duty upon lumber will have a tendency to impede their operations and curtail their output, and make them feel that the duty is a detriment to them, I shall be glad to see them struck, because the head centre of opposition to free lumber in the United States originates in Minnesota and Wisconsin, and if these men can be made to feel that there are reciprocal arrangements in this matter, and that while the lumbermen of Canada are sufferers to the extent of $2 per thousand, that they will be sufferers to the same extent, they would see this question in a different light.

And if the trade relations between these two countries are ever considered again, I believe that the influence that would be exerted upon these negotiations by the imposition of a lumber duty would be a most salutary and a most powerful one. What we need, Mr. Speaker, in dealing with the United States, is to try and secure their respect, and we can never secure their respect unless we have a proper care for our own interests.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. We can secure that respect by caring for our own interests in Canada, in the same manner as they care for and protect their interests, and if we decide to protect a great industry in Canada as they have decided to protect that industry in their own country, we will secure the respect of the Americans; we will secure the operation of influences upon negotiations which will be of a very important character, and in addition to that, we will do an act of justice to our own people. Now, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend from Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) tells us that the movement in favour of the lumber duties is confined to British Columbia. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davis) is not well informed. The Lumbermen's Association of Ontario held its annual meeting in Toronto not more than three weeks ago, and that association passed, with one dissenting voice only, a resolution asking the government of Canada to impose a duty upon lumber imported from the United States corresponding to the duty imposed by the United States upon lumber imported into that country from Canada.

I venture the assertion that throughout the entire Dominion of Canada you will find the lumber interest practically a unit in the demand that this policy shall be adopted. We imported from the United States last year $3,600,000 worth of forest products. We imported from them large quantities of the low, coarse grades of lumber, the kind for which it is exceedingly desirable that our saw-mill men should have a market. We can sell deals in the English market without any trouble; we can sell sidings and the better grades of lumber there, without doubt; but the lower grades, such as hemlock and coarse red pine, are dumped on our market by the millmen of Wisconsin and Michigan, and supplant our own lumber at prices perhaps lower than it costs the American millmen to produce them, and they make their profit out of the better grades. This is a condition of affairs which is unfair to the lumber interest of Canada, and in a general sense is detrimental to the general interests of the country. The lumber interest affords a very extensive market for farm products, employs an enormous amount of labour, and puts into circulation a vast amount of money. That interest is one of great importance and beneficence in its operations in every sense, and it is an interest which deserves consideration.

Our hon. friend from Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) tells us that wherever a lumberman acquires a timber limit, at once you have a lumber king crowned. Well, Sir, the lumbermen of this Dominion have to struggle with various difficulties. Where they are men of energy and capacity, after long lives of business enterprise and effort, they may secure a competence; but there are just as many failures among this class of business men as any other. They do not all draw prizes. And these men have a right to ask from the government fair consideration for the interest which they represent.

With regard to the British Columbia lumbermen, as my hon. friend from Victoria has pointed out, the lumber interest of the state of Washington has secured a very large development. The mills of that state have the markets of California and the entire Pacific coast, which they enter free of duty. They have the market of the Sandwich Islands, which they also enter free of duty. They have all the common markets which our lumbermen have, and they have exclusive control of American markets. They are placed in the same position as the lumbermen of the east. After selling the better grades, they have on hand a certain class of lumber which they are willing to dispose of at almost any price. They have advantages in many respects in the matter of freight, in reaching the markets in the mining regions of British Columbia and the other regions of that province; and the consequence is that the British Columbia lumberman is threatened with ruin. Now, it is a matter of consequence to us whether that great industry of British Columbia shall be allowed to be sacrificed or not, on the theory of free trade in lumber. I do not believe that the interest of the lumberman, in British Columbia, in Ontario, or in other parts of this Dominion, is a matter of so small consequence as not to deserve, upon broad general principles, consideration and protection from this unfair competition at the hands of an industry in a foreign country at our doors, which excludes our productions from its markets.

The imposition of a duty upon lumber would, I believe, exert a powerful influence upon any future negotiations that may take place between this country and the United States. It would be an indication to the commissioners from the other side that Canada at last intended to stand upon its own rights and protect its own interests, and was abandoning to some extent the theory of free trade, which in its application in so many instances works so injuriously to the interests of Canada. Last year we actually bought from the United States, of lumber and farm products, $2,000,000 worth more than we sold to that country. Of farm products we bought nearly three times as much as we sold them ; we bought a vast quantity of manufactured goods ; and we were almost absolutely denied access to the markets of that country. Although we sold to them $25,000,000 worth of farm products in 1866, at the end of the reciprocity treaty, we sold to them last year only $7,316,000 worth, a little more than one-fourth the amount that was sold thirty-four years before. That country has taken advantage of our moderate tariff rates—12½ per cent upon the total imports from the United States, and 25 per cent on the dutiable imports—to pour in upon us $60,000,000 worth of manufactured goods, $110,000,000 worth of all kinds of imports, while allowing us the privilege of selling a beggarly $7,316,000 worth of farm products in that country, where we bought $18,000,000 worth from them. As a matter of sentiment, I believe in meeting these gentlemen. I believe in putting this duty on lumber as a matter of sentiment merely, if there were no other reason for it. But there are, as I have shown, powerful reasons for it, aside from the sentimental reason; and if we adopt the principle of putting a duty on lumber and protecting by that action a very important interest in our country, we shall certainly confer a benefit in the broadest sense on the Dominion of Canada, exert a salutary influence on any future negotiations with the United States, by putting ourselves in a position that will command the respect of those with whom we shall deal, and perform an act of justice to a great commercial interest. I believe that if the government, under all the conditions of the case, were to impose this duty, they would receive the approbation of nineteen-twentieths of the people of Canada, and would perform an act which they would never have cause to regret, but which would redound in all future days to their credit.

Mr. W. C. EDWARDS (Russell). Mr. Speaker, while representing an absolutely agricultural constituency and being a farmer myself, I at the same time incidentally saw a small amount of lumber; therefore, I think I may be permitted to say a few words on this question. And in beginning, I wish to say at once that my views are diametrically opposed to those of the two hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the other side of the House, and of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton), to my left. The mover of this resolution spoke first of the benefits that had accrued to Ontario by the imposition of a condition which caused the sawing of logs in the western portion of Ontario, instead of allowing them to go to the American market. Well, so far as that is concerned, I hold exactly the same views that I held years ago.

I am not one of those who believe that Ontario has benefited to any extent by the fact that the sawlogs in the western portion of the province are being sawn in the province to-day instead of on the other side of the line. This proposition may appear very ridiculous to some minds, but unless the conditions have very much changed, the round log, before it is sawn, is worth more money on the banks of the Georgian Bay than after it is sawn into lumber. The hon. gentleman to my left (Mr. Charlton) says no, but when he was contending for a condition of things which would allow those logs to go across, he contended exactly for what I am now contending. The hon. gentleman changes his base according to the new conditions as they arise, but I, however, hold to one principle upon this trade question, and that principle I hold even if it attacks the industry in which I am myself engaged. I have no faith in the man who believes in free trade in everything but in that which affects his own individual interest ; and who, the moment free trade attacks his own individual interests, then becomes a protectionist. The hon. gentleman to my left (Mr. Charlton) said a few moments ago that the broad principle should prevail, and what is that principle, in so far as he is concerned ? It is this, that free trade should rule in Canada except when the lumber industry is attacked, and then with regard to that industry protection should prevail. But, I will deal more particularly with that branch of the question later.

The hon. gentleman who moved the resolution (Mr. Bennett) spoke of the invasion of Canada by American lumber. Well, why does American lumber come into Canada ? Evidently because some of the people in Canada want it. Is there anything wrong in those Canadians buying American lumber who require it ? Again, it is argued that American lumber may be laid down in Canada cheaper than Canadian lumber can be purchased. Well, that may have some immediate effect on some of the Canadian saw-mill owners. But what about the other fellow ? What about the man who buys the lumber ? Is he injured by the admission of cheap lumber into Canada ? Not at all.

Again, the hon. gentleman spoke of oak. He said he is not a lumberman, and it is quite evident he is not. Do we require oak ? Oak to-day is one of the principal woods used in the finishing of our best houses throughout Canada. Have we got it? Not at all ; we are obliged to bring it from the United States. Is it then reasonable that there should be a tax upon it ? I think not.

The hon. gentleman next referred to pitch pine. Well, there are many purposes for which pitch pine is required in Canada and which no Canadian lumber can supply. And if our people want pitch pine, is it not reasonable that we should allow it to come in without a tax ?

My hon. friend next referred to the action of the Ontario Lumbermen's Association, and he spoke of Mr. John Waldie, a very respectable man indeed, but who is a free trader like my hon. friend to my left (Mr. Charlton). Of all men, Mr. Speaker, I think that the lumbermen should be large in their views. Lumbering operations are generally conducted on a large scale, which necessarily develops large ideas. I, therefore, think that lumbermen, above all men, should be too broad-minded and liberal to come to this House and ask for a petty duty upon lumber coming into Canada, especially when there is a far greater question which interests not only the lumbermen of Canada, but the producers of all our natural products, and a broad principle for which they should contend. I maintain that there is a policy by which very great injustice is done to lumbermen and to the farming classes and to all those who are developing the natural resources of Canada. Protection is the curse of the lumberman and the agriculturist and the miner, and of every man engaged in the production of our natural products. Are they not the men, therefore, who should combat for a far different condition of things—a condition that would do them even handed justice, that would enable them to buy their requirements as they have to sell their products ? I am a lumebrman, but the day will never come when I will ask for a small petty import duty on lumber coming into this country. On the contrary, so long as I am able, I will combat against the great injustice that is done to the lumberman, the agriculturist, the miner and the fisherman of Canada through our protective duties. I notice that hon. gentlemen on the other side laugh, and I know well what is in their minds. No doubt they are questioning my support of the government that pretends to be a free trade government.

Mr. HAGGART. Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS. Well, Mr. Speaker, there are free traders and free traders, and there are protectionists and protectionists. The narrow-minded, bigoted, small, picayune protectionist, wants protection on everything he produces, but in everything else he is a free trader. So far as free trade is concerned, I am sorry to have to make the statement, but I believe that both in parliament and the country we have too few men who study the question out to its logical conclusion. The farmers of Canada are blinded to-day, as they were years ago, with the pretense that they are protected. But they have not one single iota of protection. He never had one single iota of protection, and he never can have one single iota of protection so long as he has to sell his surplus productions in the markets of the world in competition with the products of the world. The lumberman is in exactly the same position, and so is the miner, and so is the fisherman—but let me say here, that the miner, so far as iron is concerned, is the only man engaged in the production of the natural products of Canada who has any measure of protection at all. Now, there are, perhaps, those who believe that by giving a bounty on the exports of the farmer, he would be placed in an equal position with the others who are protected. But that is not true. If the farmer is to be placed in the same position as the protected manufacturers of Canada, he should have a bounty on that which he produces and sells in Canada. If that were done he would be in the same position as the protected manufacturer. I am not one of those who will ever stand up in parliament or outside of parliament and pretend that the farmers have any protection—they have none whatever. Now, are there gentlemen who, under these circumstances would impose a duty on lumber, I would ask: What would be the effect on the farmer ? Is the farmer not sufficiently abused and trampled upon under the conditions that exist ? Would it be fair to place a further embargo upon him by imposing a duty upon lumber ? For my part, I believe it would be a grave injustice. Now, let us investigate this matter a little. Some hon. gentlemen may say: Oh, the lumberman of British Columbia is affected, the lumbermen in other parts of Canada are effected, but you are not affected. I say at once that I am affected. The American lumber coming into this city and into Montreal affects my interests prejudicially. And my hon. friends on the other side say that I want protection——

Mr. CHARLTON. They say they want to protect you.

Mr. EDWARDS. Well, if they will allow me to protect myself, I will do that as well as I can. I do not want any of the kind of assistance they propose. This matter of protection on lumber would affect the farmer injuriously, just as have all the other conditions of protection in Canada. Let us suppose that out in Dakota or somewhere in the American north-west, at a point near the border, there is a saw-mill, and that on the Canadian side of the line are a number of farmers who require lumber. It will cost them, perhaps, $2 or $3 per thousand feet to pay the freight on lumber coming from the nearest point in Canada. If you impose a protective duty on lumber, the consequence will be that these farmers must choose between paying the duty or paying the heavy freight charges on the lumber they require. I claim that this would be an injustice. It is perfectly impossible to place a duty on lumber coming into Canada without very materially injuring the farmers of Canada.

Now, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) spoke of culls and common grade lumber coming into Canada to-day at very low prices. Well, now, I can only speak of my own experience. The fact is that at this very point, Ottawa, one of the greatest lumber manufactories of Canada, the people are unable to get the common and cheap lumber they require. I myself, who manufacture a very considerable quantity of lumber, had to buy that class of lumber at other points last season and bring it here. So far as this district is concerned, therefore, that statement is not correct. The hon. gentleman also referred to red pine and hemlock coming into Canada. Again, I would like to answer the hon. gentleman. The fact is that the demand for red pine was so great during last season and the season before that everything that was to spare in the United States and Canada was absorbed by the British market, and everything that is to be produced the coming season in red pine in this section of the country is bought up for that market.

Now, I do not think I should take up the time of the House much longer on this subject, but I just say again that I am utterly opposed to any legislation of this kind. And I am sorry, and very sorry, to think there is a lumberman in Canada who is so small and contracted in his ideas as to ask for the establishment of a condition which, perhaps, might give him a little local benefit, but would be such a great injustice to the farmers of Canada and the people generally who need lumber, and who ought to be free to buy it where they can get it cheapest. In so far as the general principle of trade is concerned, what could be more contrary to reason and justice than the imposing of duties in order to benefit special individuals ? If you are to impose protective duties so as to help this individual and that individual, why, you must pass these benefits around and protect everybody, and when all are protected, in what position are you ?

An hon. MEMBER. The same as if they had no protection.

Mr. EDWARDS. You are in the same position as if protection had not been given to any. But, if all are not protected, injustice is done to some, while special benefits are conferred on others. For these reasons I oppose, and always will oppose, any proposition of this kind.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). The hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) started out by telling us that years ago he was a free trader and opposed the duty on lumber, and he wanted the House to understand that he had the same story to tell to-day, though he admitted that conditions had changed, and there might be some basis for argument on the other side. The hon. gentleman's statement reminded me of an incident that occurred in the experience of an assessor. A maiden-lady, when the assessor came around, gave her age as nineteen years. Five years later, when the assessor came and asked her age, she answered that she was nineteen. He said : 'Are you not the lady who, five years ago, gave me your age as nineteen ?' Her answer was, 'I want you to understand, my good man, that I am not the kind of a girl who would tell one story five years ago and tell another story to-day.' The hon. gentleman is not the kind of man who would vary in his story, even though conditions had changed, enough to justify a change even in his mind. I admire him for his consistency; but I would remind him that it is scarcely fair for him, an out-and-out free trader, as he says he is, to sit on one of the front benches, supporting a government many of whose members and supporters declare that their tariff is a protective tariff. He said that the narrow man, the small-souled protectionist wanted protection on everything. But carry out the argument, apply it by the same parity of reasoning to the hon. gentleman himself. He wants free trade in everything. What kind of man must he be ? The strictures that he applied to the protectionists would apply with equal propriety to himself, only on the other side. I was very much interested and pleased and amused by the speech of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). I have listened to that hon. gentleman in this House for a great many years, and up to the present he has always spoken strongly against protection, although at one time in his life he made a most admirable speech in its favour, I believe in the year 1876. I was reminded of the old couplet :

> While the lamp holds out to burn,
> The vilest sinner may return.

I thought he had got there at last. He said in the commencement of his speech that the policy adopted by the government of Ontario had led to the transference of a large number of mills from the United States to Canada, to the great benefit of Canada. That is a statement which, in my judgment, is absolutely correct. But I would remind the hon. gentleman, if he is within the hearing of my voice, that for the last 15 years, whenever he spoke upon the proposition to put an export duty on logs, he always argued against it, taking the ground that if we did put an export duty on logs sufficiently great to prohibit their exportation, it would not result in the transference of the lumber mills from the United States to Canada. It has done so, he admits it to-day. Now, the argument which he advanced to-day is a complete refutation of the arguments to which he has treated this House for the last 14 or 15 years, almost constantly. I do not condemn the hon. gentleman for it, on the contrary, I rather admire his frankness, I admire his good judgment, because I think he is beginning to see what he either did not see before or did not want to see, that is to say, the importance to the people of Canada, not only to the lumbermen but to the farmers and labourers, that our lumber should be manufactured in our own country as much as possible.

Now the hon. member for Russell says: What are you going to do if we shut out American lumber? And he gives us one line of that article, namely, oak timber. He says we require a great deal of it in Canada, that we have not got it in Canada, and that we are obliged to get it from the United States. If we put a duty on lumber we are going to be obliged to pay so much more for it. I would like to ask that hon. gentleman how much oak we imported last year. According to the Trade and Navigation Returns we imported 29,548 thousand feet, which cost $887,000. Now, that is not a large quantity.

Mr. EDWARDS. We imported 29,000,000 feet.

Mr. SPROULE. It is not millions in the Trade and Navigation Returns. I am quoting from the official return.

Mr. EDWARDS. The letter M after the figures shows you must multiply that number by 1,000.

Mr. SPROULE. Well, we would not be so badly off even if we were confined to Canada for our supply. There is a considerable quantity of oak in Canada, I know it is taken out every year in my county. But the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) treated this House to a capital argument in favour of protection. I was glad to hear him, because I believe his argument is correct. I only notice it because it shows the lack of agreement between hon. members on the government side, some of whom say that their tariff is a free trade tariff, while others say it is a revenue tariff, and some others say it is a protective tariff. The hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) complained bitterly that it would be a great injustice to the people of the North-west Territories to impose a duty on American lumber. Now, out of curiosity I looked up the Trade and Navigation Returns to see how much of that lumber was used in the North-west Territories. I find that of lumber there was brought in $7,505 worth; of laths, $170; of singles, $331.

Mr. DAVIS. I want to point out to the hon. gentleman that if you add a duty of $4 per thousand, the people would have to pay that much more for their lumber.

Mr. SPROULE. Well, that is a different argument, it is very fallacious, and would bear a good deal of explanation from the other side. But he asked what they were going to do if they could not get this lumber. Now, all told, they brought in last year without any duty $7,987 worth. Surely they could not suffer so severely if they had to pay duty on that small quantity of lumber. I am in favour of this proposition of the hon. member for East Simcoe, because I have always been in favour of reciprocity of markets, or reciprocity of tariffs. If the Americans will not give us the advantage in their markets for the sale of our products which we give them, then I say we ought to look after our own interests and take care of ourselves. If they put $2 a thousand on our lumber going into their markets, I have always held that it was the proper thing for us to impose $2 a thousand upon their lumber coming in here.

I am in favour of a reciprocity of markets or a reciprocity of tariffs, because that policy would assist every important industry in Canada. We have many lumbermen in our district of the country, and I know from them that the lumbering industry is not in the condition to-day in which many of them would like to see it. There is considerable stagnation in the market and a weakening of sales; some of them are suffering a good deal and they believe that their suffering is increased by reason of the privilege which the Americans enjoy to-day of throwing their lumber into our markets without paying any duty. I support this proposition because it is in the interest of the farmers of our country. The more you build up the lumber industry, the better markets you make for the products of the farm and the better prices you pay for them. We know that by experience. Since the Ontario government changed their regulations, the cutting of pine logs has been done in Ontario instead of in the United States. The hon. member for North Norfolk very truly said that it had resulted in the transference of a large number of mills and of labouring men from the United States to Canada, and that is giving us an important additional market for our farm produce. I say anything that curtails the market of the farmers in their own country I am opposed to, and I am in favour of anything that will maintain and extend it.

Now, the hon. member for Saskatchewan said that this was only a cry raised by the people of British Columbia. Not by any means. I was glad to see the hon. member for North Norfolk enlighten him on that point by telling him that the lumbermen's annual meeting, held a few weeks ago in the city of Toronto, passed a very strong resolution in favour of it; there was only one dissenting voice, and I presume that was the hon. member for Russell, who wanted to be consistent.

An hon. MEMBER. He was not there.

Mr. SPROULE. I was told that it was he who dissented. I do not know whether

I am right or wrong. He is there to speak for himself. He does not say whether he was in favour of it or against it.

Mr. EDWARDS. I did not hear the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule).

Mr. SPROULE. I was saying that at a meeting of the lumbermen in Toronto, there was a resolution passed in favour of imposing this duty, that there was only one dissenting voice, and that I wondered whether that was the voice of the hon. member for Russell or not.

Mr. EDWARDS. I was not present at the meeting.

Mr. SPROULE. Well, if the hon. gentleman had been there he would have made two.

Mr. EDWARDS. I do not think there can be a doubt upon that.

Mr. SPROULE. I take it for granted, from what the hon. gentleman said here. I merely mentioned this to show that the hon. member for Saskatchewan was entirely wrong when he said that this pressure had come entirely from British Columbia, but that, on the contrary, the great bulk of the lumbermen of Ontario are in favour of the imposition of this duty. I see by the Trade and Navigation Returns that a very large portion of the imported lumber came into the province of Ontario. But, I say that we should go farther still. We are doing something here, if we accept this proposition, that would be in the interest of the lumbermen and of the people of the country, but, we have still a very considerable movement of logs taken from the Indian reserves and exported to the United States free. I think that should be stopped, and that we should insist that they be manufactured in Canada. I regret that the government have taken no action in that direction. I regret as well, that, although the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding), in his budget speech, announced that no changes would take place in the tariff, he has not seen fit to take into consideration the urgent request of the lumbermen of Canada for the imposition of a duty. It comes from a very large and important class, it comes from a class who are carrying on a most valuable industry in this country, and, if I am correctly informed, they were led to believe that they would be most likely to have their request granted, although they had no definite promise of it. It seems to be another acknowledgment that, in the consideration of the tariff, the lumbermen of Canada are to be thrown down, because there is to be no tinkering with the tariff. The beet-root sugar men have been thrown down, because this is a free trade tariff, and hon. gentlemen cannot allow any tinkering with the tariff. The woollen millmen have been thrown down, because there is to be no tinkering with the tariff. There is to be no change, because this is a free trade government. The hon. member for Russell did not think so.

Mr. J. T. SCHELL (Glengarry). Mr. Speaker, I would like to add a few words to the discussion. So far as the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) is concerned, I shall not spend any time in answering his speech, because it has been altogether a disquisition on the question of protection. He has gone entirely afield from the matter before us. The resolution which was brought up is one asking for the imposition of an import duty on American lumber coming into Canada. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), I think, gave the whole case away when he said that the head centre at which he wished to strike was the lumbermen of Minnesota, and that he was quite willing to use Canadian laws for the purpose of striking with a vengeance the Minnesota men who blocked the legislation to allow Canadian lumber to go into the United States free. He is quite willing to place the whole of Canada in jeopardy by placing this statute upon the books of Canada because a few of the pine lumbermen of Canada wish this duty to be put on so that they can strike this head centre. He spoke about a meeting in Toronto, as if that meeting represented all the lumbermen of Canada. I do not think that is a fact by any means. It only represented a very few of the lumbermen. It represented the pine men of Ontario only. There was some attempt made to have a hardwood section of the board, but the hardwood men never attended to form a board to any extent, because they have always been overborne by the pine men. Beside the question of a pine industry in Canada, in the constituency of nearly every hon. gentleman from Ontario, and largely from all over the country, you will find small mills engaged in handling hardwood lumber, and engaged, in the eastern districts, in handling spruce lumber. We all know that there is a statute on the American statute-books which says that if we impose this $2 a thousand duty on American lumber, we are liable to be met again by an addition to the American duty of $2 a thousand. I would ask what is going to become of our spruce industry, what is going to become of our hardwood industry ? We know perfectly well that the market we have for hardwood is the United States. We do not export 2 per cent of the ash lumber we manufacture to any other country than the United States. We do not export 3 per cent of the hardwood lumber we manufacture to any country except the United States. The pine men are quite willing to sacrifice that trade, to sacrifice the North-west Territories, and to sacrifice the rest of the country in order to strike this head centre in Minnesota. I believe with the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards), that it is a very small size to which these great men have grown when they are willing to use for their own personal interest the farmers and consumers, in fact, the whole people of Canada. Reference has been made by the hon. member for North Norfolk to the suffering of the men engaged in the pine lumber industry from not being able to make sufficient profit. He knows perfectly well that shipping cull lumber is worth from $15 to $18 per thousand at any shipping point in Canada.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am afraid my hon. friend (Mr. Schell) is not very well informed as to the condition of the lumber market.

Mr. SCHELL. He knows very well that mill culls are worth here in Ottawa, $12 per thousand, while seven years ago they were selling at $4.50 a thousand. Since the improvement in the times, mill culls have advanced to this extent in price. Yet, these gentlemen ask that the farmers of this country should be required to support this extra duty of $2 a thousand that will jeopardize the hardwood industry for their own benefit. Who asked that this duty should be imposed? A few millmen in British Columbia, a few millmen about Rat Portage and the Georgian Bay, and not another man, from Prince Edward Island, all through the provinces of Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Ontario, not another single lumberman in this whole Dominion, except a small coterie about Toronto and the British Columbia men. I do not think that the sentiment of this House will be in favour of such a proposition if it comes to a vote. I do not believe it is in accordance with the principles of justice to ask to impose upon the people of the North-west Territories, and upon the people of this part of Canada, this burden which will bear so heavily upon those who require to import lumber. I am a manufacturer myself. Not only am I a seller of lumber, but a buyer of lumber, and I wish to state to this House, in reply to what the hon. member for East Grey said, that if you just go across the street to the Bank of Montreal you will find an illustration in support of the argument which I am presenting. When they put out the specifications for the Bank of Montreal they called for quartered oak. You cannot buy that timber in this Dominion to-day, either for the Bank of Montreal, or for any of the buildings that require to be finished in quartered oak. It is not to be had. There is a certain amount of oak in the hon. gentleman's section of the country, but it is of a very inferior class, which is not fit to be used for quarter-cut oak. Now, in regard to the question of poplar, in the city of Montreal, and in all the cities, you will find the specifications given out for buildings to be finished in American poplar. The hon. member for North Norfolk is quite willing to put a $2 duty on imports into this country, which will impose a burden upon the business of which I have spoken. I just wish to state this general proposition, that all the lumber brought into Canada is brought here simply because it cannot be got in Canada, or it can be brought in cheaper than it can be got here. They wish to put this duty on for no other reason than to raise the price of lumber $2 per thousand feet to the general consumers, and so far as I am concerned, I shall certainly oppose this resolution.

Mr. WALTER SCOTT (West Assiniboia). The hon. gentleman from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) said that the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) was sitting on the wrong side of the House because he was opposed to placing a duty on lumber. Where would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Edwards) sit if not on this side of the House, and in a front seat, with the party led by a government which on Thursday last announced their intention to keep lumber on the free list. I agree with the hon. gentleman from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) that in view of the announcement made last week by the Minister of Finance, it is superfluous to discuss this proposition at any particular length now. However, as the matter has been brought up for an expression of opinion, I wish, Sir, to join in that expression of opinion. Coming as I do from the North-west, and following the hon. gentleman from Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis), who truly expressed the view of the people of the North-west on this question, it may also be superfluous for me to announce that I intend to record my vote against this resolution. Sir, I am entirely opposed to the principle of protection. While I do not say that I am an out-and-out free trader; while I do not believe that in Canada at the present moment free trade is practicable, I do say that the interests of the country demand that the tariff shall be narrowed down to the lowest possible point, in the interests of all the people of the Dominion. For this view I find some justification in the fiscal happenings in Canada since 1897, when changes were made in the tariff which reduced it by at least some 10 or 12 per cent. If we take in conjunction with this fact, the further fact that every industry in our country has been vastly more prosperous since that 10 or 12 per cent reduction in the tariff, we find ample justification for the view which I express. I am, I repeat, opposed to the principle of protection, and I am particularly opposed to its application in the form of a reimposition of the duty upon lumber. I am not actuated by any ill-feeling towards the lumbermen of the Dominion. If this parliament could, without injuring the Dominion as a whole, do anything which would be of reasonable benefit to the lumber industry, I would be very glad indeed. If by adopting this resolution the advantage to the Dominion as a whole would overbalance the disadvantage to any particular class of our people, I would be willing to support the resolution. But, Mr. Speaker, it is my belief that the disadvantage to the consumers of lumber in Canada would be very much greater than any advantage that would accrue to the lumbermen by the reimposition of this duty, and therefore I oppose the proposition. In opposing the resolution, I am of course to a large extent influenced by the feeling of the people whom I have been sent here to represent. My attitude on this question is based on the welfare of the present and prospective settlers in the North-west Territories. A proposition which receives very general assent everywhere in Canada is : that the greater the progress that can be promoted in the North-west, the better it is for the whole Dominion, and as this duty upon lumber would greatly retard the progress of the North-west, I am emphatically opposed to it. I shall quote some of the prices of lumber which prevail at present in the North-west Territories, and the House will see that even without any duty the prices are extraordinarily high. For spruce or fir boards up to twenty feet in length—this is lumber which would ordinarily be classed as rough lumber and is about the cheapest kind of lumber that can be procured—the price is $24 per thousand and 50 cents per thousand extra for every two feet additional in length. For dimension and scantling timber up to twenty feet, the price is $24 per thousand. For ship-lap, measurement 1 x 8 and 1 x 10 to 18 feet in length, the price is $25 per thousand. For siding, ceiling and flooring, from $31 to $35 per thousand. For red cedar shingles, $3.75 per thousand. For laths, pine or cedar, $5 per thousand. Pine for finishing and cedar for finishing, from $50 to $60 per thousand. These are the prices which prevail anywhere, say between Brandon and Medicine Hat, on the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and possibly points off the main line have to pay higher prices. I say, Mr. Speaker, that it should be the duty of this House, in place of contemplating any measure which would be likely to bring about an increase in the price of lumber, to rather devote itself to the problem of endeavouring to devise some means to materially reduce the high prices which the settlers in the west have now to pay for their lumber. The application made to parliament this afternoon on behalf of the lumbermen of Canada, I think, the most peculiarly frank request for protection that ever has been made in parliament to my knowledge. It is usually the case that when manufacturers desire a protective duty on their products, they come to parliament with the plea that the duty will not increase the price of the article, but on the contrary that if they get the protection they will see that there is a contemporaneous reduction in price ; but our friends, the lumbermen, come to this House to-day asking for a duty on lumber, and they frankly tell us that if the duty is imposed it will likely result in an increase in the price of lumber. Although the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) endeavoured to impress on the House his belief that a duty of $2 a thousand on lumber would not increase the price to anything like that extent, I think my hon. friend from Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) proved pretty conclusively, from the circular of the Association of Lumbermen of British Columbia which was distributed among the members of the House a few weeks ago, that their idea, at all events, in seeking a duty on the article, is to be enabled to collect a higher price ; for in that circular they say :

> When we ask for our production a mere living price, we are met with the reply that pitch pine from the United States can be obtained at cheaper prices, or pine from Minnesota can be got at less cost, and that even our own description of lumber can be bought cheaper on Puget Sound, which may be possible, as they can produce cheaper, because all their supplies cost less.
> We have had to base the prices of our productions on those of producers who have advantages towards cheap manufacture which we do not possess.

I think it is fair to deduce from that statement that it is the intention of the lumbermen, should this duty be imposed, to take the fullest possible advantage of it; and we in the North-west Territories would expect to see the price of lumber to us immediately advanced to the extent of $2 a thousand.

If there is any doubt in the minds of the hon. gentleman who introduced this resolution or those who support it that that would be the result, I would quote for their benefit a statement that was made in this Chamber some years ago by a gentleman whose views on questions of tariff at one time, at all events, met with considerable respect. I wish to quote from a statement made by the Hon. George E. Foster, ex-Finance Minister, in this Chamber, in 1894, which will be found in 'Hansard' of that year, at page 198. He said :

> I say that in the initial years of a national policy, with a protective principle in it, it will have the effect of enhancing the cost of goods, and that at the first the cost of goods will be very closely up to the measure of the protection which is given. If it does not have that effect, why should it ever be adopted at all, and what is the good of it?

So, according to a late Finance Minister in this House, if the measure proposed here this afternoon would not have the effect of increasing the price of lumber very nearly $2 a thousand, what would be the use of adopting the measure at all ?

Some years ago Canada did impose duties upon this article, and I am going to quote another statement which was made in this Chamber by the Hon. Mr. Foster to show the condition of affairs as he found it in Manitoba and the North-west Territories under the system of duties which up to the year

1894, was in force in this country. The members of the House will recollect that Hon. Mr. Foster and a colleague went to the North-west in the fall of 1893, with the purpose of looking into the conditions of commerce and agriculture in that country, and with the avowed object of revising the then existing tariff; and at the next session of parliament a revision of the tariff was proposed by Mr. Foster. In the course of the speech which he made in the House at that time, there occurs this statement, to which I would beg to draw the close attention of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House and any hon. gentleman on this side who may be disposed to favour the proposition of the hon. member for East Simcoe. Mr. Foster said :

There was no one feature of our examination into the condition of things in the North-west which impressed itself so forcibly upon my mind as the combine which existed for the distribution and sale of lumber. Every town was parcelled out. One or two men were selected, to whom were given the monopoly of selling in each place. The prices were fixed, and if they sold a fraction of a cent under the fixed price, their privilege was taken away and given to somebody else. That monopoly bore heavily upon the people of the country, where lumber is essentially necessary in the building of barns and houses, and I came to the conclusion that if possible help should be given by putting lumber on the free list.

There a condition of affairs is described which I would ask any hon. gentleman in the House candidly to say whether he would like to have brought into force again in Manitoba and the North-west Territories; and the measure proposed here this afternoon is a measure calculated to cause a return of that condition of affairs.

Another plea that is made in behalf of the lumbermen is that they want the control of the Canadian market. I have taken some pains to look up statistics in connection with this industry, and so far as I have been able to ascertain, the lumbermen of Canada pretty well control the lumber market of Canada at the present time without any duty. Our exports of lumber amount in round figures to $25,000,000 a year. We import a little over $2,500,000 a year. The figures prepared in any of the departments of the government at Ottawa do not show what the total production of the lumber mills of Canada is; but so far as I have been able to ascertain by figures and calculations, I would place the total annual production of lumber in Canada at about $70,000,000. Of that, as I have said, we export about $25,000,000 worth and we import a little over $2,500,000; so that it would appear that the consumption of lumber in Canada amounts to about $47,500,000 worth annually. If these figures are correct, and I believe they are, then the fact remains that the lumbermen of Canada at this time have control of 95 per cent of the Canadian market; in other words, that the total importation of lumber does not amount to over 5 per cent of the total consumption of lumber in this country.

Another argument which appeals to me as being the most weighty one urged here this afternoon, is that we should impose a duty on lumber as an international measure—a measure which might have some effect upon our neighbours to the south. I am free to say that if I believed there was any real ground to hope that the imposition of a duty on lumber by Canada would lead the United States to give us reciprocity in that article, I might be willing to agree to the proposition ; but it seems to me, in looking over the fiscal history of Canada and the United States, that there can be found not the slightest ground of hope that this would be the result. It seems to me that the history of the last eighteen or twenty years is bound to prevent any one who carefully considers the subject from believing or hoping that we can by the imposition of a tariff, bring about reciprocity between Canada and the United States.

So far as regards the statements made of the large sale of imported lumber, I have just given the House in round figures the amount of sales, and it is about 5 per cent of the total consumption of lumber in Canada. But even if the amount were larger, that would not be a good argument in favour of the imposition of a duty. It would simply be proof that our lumbermen were charging a little more than they ought, because Canada is one of the chief lumber producing countries in the world, and our lumbermen should be able to sell at prices which would prevent competition by the imported article.

Let me refer very briefly to a remark made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), which would lead us to believe that, in his opinion, the members from Manitoba and the North-west Territories have rather outstayed their welcome in this House. He said that the older part of Canada had sacrificed or at least appropriated a great deal for the benefit of Manitoba and the North-west Territories ; and I think it is a fair deduction to make from his statement that he thought it was high time for the western members to cease making any requests or taking any stand in behalf of the west in this House. Well, in my opinion, and in that of the other members from the west, the boot is entirely on the other foot. True it is that in the last thirty years considerable sums have been voted by parliament to be expended in and for the benefit of Manitoba and the Territories, and true it is also that large subsidies have been voted for railway construction there. But when we come to analyse this expenditure, we find that if there is any room for complaint by any one that complaint should come from our western people. When the Canadian Pacific Railway contract was made, $25,000,000 and 25,000,000 acres of land were voted to that company. Something over half the subsidy was in land, most of which was located in the Territories, so that the people of Manitoba and the Territories themselves contributed more than half of Canada's total contribution to the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway. And with regard to the votes passed every year for the carrying on of government in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, it must not be forgotten that amounts are apportioned by the statutes to the other provinces for the carrying on of local government. And I am in the judgment of every hon. member who has studied the position, when I say that man for man the people of Manitoba and the North-west Territories pay a greater sum into the common revenues of the Dominion and receive less back from those common revenues than do the people of any other of the provinces.

Mr. HENRY CARGILL (East Bruce). As I have been always an ardent supporter of the national policy, Mr. Speaker, it will not surprise the House that I should rise to announce myself in favour of the present motion. I could give several reasons for this support, one of which is that I am firmly convinced that this motion is in the interests of the people generally, and not specially in the interests of the lumbermen. I am also very much encouraged by the announcement of the Finance Minister a few evenings ago that we are on the crest of the wave of prosperity in this country, and by the remarks of my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). I have always looked upon that hon. gentleman as one of the most shrewd, level-headed, practical business men in this country, and ever since I came to this House I have listened with interest to his speeches. And although I have not always agreed with him, I have never failed to recognize the ability with which he invariably presents his case. On this occasion, I am quite sure that the hon. gentleman has been voicing the sentiments of the lumbermen and the agriculturists of this country. Some hon. members from the North-west have stated that British Columbia alone is in favour of an import duty on American lumber. I have the honour of being a member of the Ontario Association of Lumbermen, and although not an extensive lumber operator, I have been engaged in lumbering many years. That association had its annual meeting, and unanimously came to the conclusion that it was necessary for the Canadian lumbermen to have an import duty on American products.

The hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) says that he is a free trader. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am a free trader. I am willing to trade freely with those who will trade freely with me, but upon no other conditions, and therefore, I say that the Americans, having imposed a duty upon Canadian lumber, the interests of our lumbering industry, which is second only to the great agricultural interest, demand the imposition of a duty upon American lumber.

In order to understand fully this question, I will have to give you a brief review of the legislation of the respective governments, provincial and Dominion, respecting the lumbering interests. In Ontario, limits have been sold by public auction, American purchasers and purchasers of all nationalities being invited to attend these sales. At that time, there was no restriction as to manufacturing logs taken from these limits. Sir William Meredith, who was then leader of the opposition in the legislature, wanted the government to stipulate that when any limits were sold the logs should be manufactured in this country. The government, in its wisdom, did not think fit to adopt this proposition, but continued to sell these limits. The government alleged as a reason why they did not wish to impose the proposed restriction that they would not be able to obtain as large a price for the limits as they would without that restriction. I suppose that that was all right. But let us see how the Canadian producer is discriminated against. Suppose that I am a Canadian lumber manufacturer and attend the sale and purchase a limit. An American attends the same sale and purchases the adjoining limit ; I invest, say, $100,000 in the erection of a mill, and providing plant to convert the logs on that limit into lumber. The American sends in his men and teams and removes the timber from his limit during the winter, takes it down the stream and transports it across the lake to his mill in the United States, say at Bay City or Saginaw. The offal of that mill, all the slabs and sawdust are valuable there. But I erect a mill on the Georgian Bay. The money that the American spends in taking out and transporting and cutting that timber is all spent in the United States. I employ Canadian labour, and every dollar I spend in taking out logs and converting them into lumber is spent in Canada. Suppose that the American, when he gets his lumber manufactured, does not find a suitable market for certain grades. He is permitted to ship his lumber into Canada, irrespective of quality, without payment of any duty. On the other hand, if I want to send my lumber into the United States I am met with a duty of $2 per thousand. That is not right. It is not fair or just to the Canadian manufacturer ; it means that he is discriminated against and a preference given to the American. After the subject had been agitated a great many years, the government refused to impose an export duty. But regulations were made by the Ontario authorities stipulating that in the case of all limits sold or to be sold, the logs should be manufactured into lumber in this country. That regulation is carried into effect, and the result is that the Americans who bought our Canadian limits and who were taking the logs out of the country and manufacturing them in the United States are to-day manufacturing them into logs in Canada. But the injustice to the Canadian manufacturer still remains. That $2 per thousand is there. It should be removed. I know that very important and influential deputations have waited on the right hon. leader of the government and his colleagues who have met for the purpose of hearing their grievances. I believe the matter was very forcibly and ably put before these hon. gentlemen ; and I hope that, notwithstanding the announcement of the Finance Minister a few days ago, that no tariff changes would be made during this session, he will reconsider the matter. He should come to the conclusion that the poor lumbermen of this country deserve well at the hands of the government, and that, not only in their interest but in the interest of this country, he should impose a duty on common lumber coming into this country. One hon. gentleman said that the United States was the only market we had for Canadian hardwood lumber. I beg to say that we cannot supply the demand in our own country. The Canadian furniture manufacturers have to import considerable quantities of hardwood lumber such as oak. There is no reason why, if I ship five or ten million feet of lumber to the United States and pay $10,000 or $20,000 duty for the privilege of doing so, the American lumberman, when he ships the same quantity into this country should pay no duty.

Mr. EDWARDS. May I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cargill) a question ? If the Americans place themselves on a par with the Chinamen, is Canada to do the same thing ?

Mr. CARGILL. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Edwards), I think, said that the Canadian lumbermen were of too large a calibre to condescend to approach this government and ask for the imposition of a paltry duty on lumber. Now, I think there are as good, as wealthy and as large lumber operators in the United States as there are in Canada, and they have not failed to condescend to apply to the authorities for an imposition of a duty on Canadian lumber going into the United States. The hon. gentleman also says that such a duty would be detrimental to the interests of the farmer, and that the farmer cannot be protected. I claim, and have always claimed, that the farmers of this country have had more consideration than any other class in the community. Their grievances have always been redressed when the government has been appealed to. I represent a rural constituency and have succeeded in being elected. And I have always stated to my constituents, a large majority of whom are farmers, that the farmer was the first man considered by any government. How do we protect the manufacturer ? By placing a duty on goods similar to those which he produces, in order to prevent those goods coming into the country in competition with his. How can we protect the farmer ? By putting a little duty on beef, on pork and everything that would come into this country were no duty imposed to compete in this market with the products the farmer has to sell. As I said before, the consideration of the farmer has always been first with the legislatures and the governments of this country. Why ? All governments are elected by farmers in this country, for the farmers are the majority. Of course, politicians are always looking for votes, and the way to get votes is to try to give the people who have the votes as great consideration as possible.

Reference was made to Mr. Waldie. I think Mr. Waldie is pretty well known in this country. He has had the honour of occupying a seat in this House. He is a very extensive lumber operator, and is president of the Ontario Lumberman's Association. I know that he headed large deputations to Ottawa on two or three occasions for the purpose of asking the government to impose a duty on American lumber. I do think and sincerely believe that the Finance Minister will eventually come to the conclusion that it is his duty to grant the request of the lumbermen, both of Ontario and of British Columbia.

Now, the lumbermen have never had any protection. I remember well that when the national policy was first proposed in this country a good many years ago, the hon. member for North Norfolk was not in sympathy with it. I remember reading a very fine speech made by that hon. gentleman on that occasion, in which he contended that the national policy would ruin the lumber interest. For instance, he gave the increased cost of the saws, and rubber belting, and everything the lumberman was likely to use in his business ; the imposition of a duty would necessarily increase their cost and increase the price to the lumberman. Now, some gentlemen have said that the lumbermen have become millionaries. Well, I do not know many of them who have. I think probably if that statement had been confined to the limit holders it might have been within the mark. I do know several gentlemen in this country who have bought limits, and I presume they made money out of them. Limits are usually put up at auction, and the purchasers have got to pay a higher price than any one else. But, I think it usually happens that they only hold them for a short time, until they find some one else who wants them worse than they do, and they sell them at a profit of a few thousand dollars. But the lumbermen are unfortunately not in that happy position. We have got to go to the bush, cut our logs, hitch up our oxen, and draw the logs to the mill; and there is a great deal of hard work to be done before we succeed in making much money.

One gentleman said that the British Columbia lumbermen had not much to complain of, because they had to pay 50 cents freight per hundred pounds on the transportation of their lumber from British Columbia to Manitoba and the North-west Territories. That would amount to about $15 per thousand feet. Well, I think that the British Columbia lumberman who has to pay $15 per thousand feet in order to get his lumber to market in the North-west or Manitoba will not find much of a market there. That is a very high rate of freight to pay.

One gentleman said that only a small fraction of the lumbermen in this country were asking for the imposition of a duty, and he said that there were many lumbermen and especially the small millowners throughout the country, who did not want the duty. I admit that. But it is to be remembered that the majority of the sawmill men have a home market, they can sell their lumber in the nearest town, because there is generally some live industry in the town that uses all the lumber they can manufacture. Consequently we do not expect them to join in with the larger lumbermen who are forced, compelled in fact, to ship their lumber either to the United States or to Great Britain. Of course a large market has been created in Great Britain for what is called deals, a great proportion of the stock of that article finds its way to Great Britain. But there are many other grades of lumber which do not find a market locally, and it is that kind of lumber which comes in competition with lumber imported from the United States.

A few years ago I remember lumber took a jump upwards, when times were very dull. I remember one year several million feet of two-inch plank were brought from Duluth into the city of Toronto for sidewalks. The local dealers in the city of Toronto found they could bring lumber from Duluth and sell it cheaper than they could purchase it of Canadian lumbermen. No doubt that displaced just so much lumber manufactured by Canadians. I think on the whole that the lumbermen have made out a good case and that they are entitled to the consideration of this government. We hope that the government will consider the matter and impose a duty on American lumber coming into this country.

Now, the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) denied that there was any benefit to Canadians from the imposition of an export duty on logs, or the stipulation that logs should be manufactured in this country. He also stated that logs on the Georgian Bay were just as valuable as they were after they were cut up, and the manufactured article was piled up in the yard. That appears to me a very singular thing. We have some lumbermen on the Georgian Bay who cut immense quantities of logs and manufacture them in their mills; and if they can dispose of the logs for the same amount of money that they can dispose of the lumber when manufactured, I should not think they would go to the expense of manufacturing. The hon. gentleman imputes motives to people who stand up and want to protect their own industries. Well, I suppose most men are built that way; and he would be the greatest philanthropist I ever saw if he did not condescend to say such things on some occasions.

Now, I think I am about through with all the remarks which I have to make on this occasion, but, I thought it was my duty to express my views upon this question. In conclusion, I will say that I do hope that after the frequent interviews which the Prime Minister and his colleagues have had with these important deputations that waited upon them for the purpose of getting that duty put on, they will give heed to the representations which have been made to them. I can only feel, and I believe, that the government will do what I consider would be most beneficial to one of the most important industries in this country.

Mr. ROBERT HOLMES (West Huron). Mr. Speaker, allow me to say a word or two in connection with this motion. I shall not take up very much time of the House, because I do not propose to say very much. If the people of the country gave to the government of the day a mandate at the recent election, that mandate was that there should be lower duties instead of higher duties. I think, that, in many of the discussions that took place throughout the country in connection with the election, the question of lowering the duties instead of raising them, was, to use a common phrase, a burning question with the people, and I am glad that the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) has sounded a note of warning, not alone for the benefit of the government, but for the benefit of hon. members on this side of the House, who, I am sorry to say, are drifting into harmony with protection principles, as shown in their speeches on the budget.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name, name.

Mr. HOLMES. It is not necessary to give the names ; you can draw any inference you like. Any one who has listened to the remarks this afternoon from hon. gentlemen who support this resolution, will be convinced by the coolness with which they have approached the proposition. They tell us that the matter is for the general welfare of the country, that it is for the general welfare of the people at large. The agriculturists, of all other classes, are the ones who are to derive the benefit therefrom. They try to convey the impression that there is no selfishness in connection with this proposition. It seems to me that a duty of this kind, if it is going to affect anybody at all, is certainly for the benefit of the particular class in whose behalf the duty is being imposed. I am not surprised that the people of the North-west Territories should feel hostile to a proposition of this kind, because they are subject, perhaps, more than anybody else, to what would be the outcome of a tariff on lumber. The manufacturers in every part of the Dominion, the manufacturers in small towns, as well as in the large towns, would be affected by a duty of this kind. Manufacturers tell us, that the present competition is such that they have to reduce the cost of manufacturing to the lowest possible basis in order that they may compete, not alone with the manufactures produced in their own land, but with the manufactures that come in from elsewhere, and that, in order to do so, it is absolutely necessary for them to procure their raw material at the lowest cost. I agree almost entirely with the statement of the hon. member for Russell that we should guard as far as possible against an increase of duties and against an increase in the cost of manufacturing. It seems to me that the farmer bears the burden of it all. When the statement is made that the farmer derives a very great indirect benefit as the outcome of the protective system, the author of that statement is simply throwing dust in the eyes of the farmer. The farmers derive no actual benefit from any phase of protection. They are the burden-bearers, and if there is an increase of duty on lumber or anything else the farmer has to bear the burden thereof. Just let me say another word or two, and it is this : I think that Canada should not be influenced by the legislation of the United States upon this point, or upon any other point. I think that Canada ought to legislate for itself. We should legislate in the interest of the people of Canada because they are our first concern. It may be true, as it is said, that we are adjacent to another country with interests and resources very much like our own, but, I think the principle that should guide us in this House, is the principle of our own interests absolutely and entirely, regardless of the interests of the adjoining community. The policy that should be adopted is the policy of making the cost of manufacturing and the cost of living as low as we can consistent with the requirements of the revenue of the country. I think that the government are entitled to commendation instead of condemnation for their attitude in connection with the delegations that have come down here. We know perfectly well the pressure that is brought to bear upon the government by delegations that come down here representing their interests and asking that something shall be done for them. We know very well how hard it is for governments to resist the demands of deputations of that kind. We have, in the legislation of the past, evidence of the government having listened to the arguments that had been advanced, of having legislated in this direction, and then, having, the next day, to legislate in a counter direction in order to appease some rival interest. I think the government should be commended for not listening to the representations that have been made so far as the woollen interests, the lumbering interests, and other interests, are concerned, that have brought pressure to bear upon them in order to induce them to increase duties. I agree with the right hon. leader of the government (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in his admirable speech the other night, wherein he said that the policy of this government should be in the direction of freer trade, of freer trade relations, in the direction of reducing, as far as we possibly can, the cost of manufactured articles, and therefore, I think, that the government are entitled to credit from the fact of their not having listened to the representations that have been made and not having yielded to the pressure that has been brought to bear upon them. They would have met my views even more largely had they seen their way clear to make some reductions in the tariff. While hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House are tendering advice to the hon. Minister of Finance, it would have been a gratification to myself, I will say frankly, if he had seen his way clear to make a reduction on some articles which enter into the general consumption. There may be inequalities in any tariff, there may be matters that call for readjustment, there may be incongruities and to my mind there always are, and I think a man who is a protectionist out and out is placed in a contradictory position. He is called upon continually to extract himself from a difficulty of one kind or another because of the very policy he is endeavouring to support and to put into the tariff. A policy of protection is a policy of contradiction, and therefore, the position that those who support it are placed in, is such that they have constantly to excuse themselves for the position that it has led them into. I want to record my hostility to the proposition to place a duty on lumber, because I do not believe it is in the interests of the people as a whole, but that it is in the interest purely and simply of the lumbermen.

Mr. ARTHUR W. PUTTEE (Winnipeg). Mr. Speaker, my intention is merely to call attention to the interest of the North-west Territories in the motion which is under discussion this afternoon, and I do so because I think that the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) probably left a misconception in the minds of some hon. members in quoting the Trade and Navigation Returns. He referred to the very small amount of lumber that is imported into the North-west Territories. But, I think he has only told half the story, because Manitoba and the North-west Territories generally go together in such matters as this. The hon. member for East Grey was correct when he said that the total importation of lumber into the North-west Territories was 707,000 feet, of a value of $7,505, but, he omitted to say that we imported into Manitoba 21,540,000 feet, of a total value of $272,471. The total value of free lumber imported from the United States was $574,233. Therefore, Manitoba and the North-west Territories put together imported 48 per cent, or about one-half of the total free lumber imported into Canada. The hon. gentleman will find that the other province which imported largely was the province of Ontario, and Ontario imported 8,768,000 feet, at a value of $205,452. Taking that lumber all round, it was lumber of the better class ; whereas, the lumber imported into Manitoba and the North-west Territories is of the cheapest kind, averaging only $12.50 per thousand. It would appear that the lumber imported into eastern Canada is principally for manufacturing purposes, or for finishing and the like, while the lumber imported into the west is for the erection of farm buildings, and for use by the man who puts up his wood shed until such time as he can raise money enough to build a house in front of it. The total import of lumber last year into Canada amounted to 36,309,000 feet, and of this quantity, 22,247,000 was imported into the North-west Territories and Manitoba. You will see that Manitoba and the North-west Territories imports more than two-thirds of this lumber, so that if the duty were increased there would be a most outrageous tax put on the people of the North-west, the people who have taken up farms, the people who have small means, and many of whom find it very difficult to gain a foothold for themselves and families. I wish to call attention to another matter which is in exactly the opposite direction to this. I assert that there is altogether too high a duty on lumber at the present time, and that it is too much protected. I find that last year there was imported into Manitoba 3,377,000 feet of dutiable lumber, valued at $45,279, and the duty on that was $11,319. The point is just this : that the dutiable lumber is lumber that has been dressed on both sides, or lumber tongued and grooved, but if we are to have free lumber, then I say that the duty should only be charged on the increased value given to that manufactured lumber by the labour spent on it in tonguing and grooving. As it is now, lumber is dutiable because it has gone through some manufacturing process, and the duty is charged on the original value of the lumber as well as on the labour expended on it afterwards. That is a grave injustice to the people who want free lumber. I am altogether opposed to this motion, which proposes to put a duty on lumber, and I am quite sure that the North-west Territories, as well as Manitoba —which the hon. gentleman from East Grey very discreetly omitted to mention—are absolutely opposed to any such motion being adopted by this parliament.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 67) to incorporate the Quebec Terminal and Railway Company.—Mr. Malouin.

Bill (No. 68) respecting the McClary Manufacturing Company.—Mr. Hyman.

Bill (No. 69) to incorporate the St. Lawrence Power Company.—Mr. Logan.

Bill (No. 70) respecting the E. B. Eddy Company.—Mr. Champagne.

Bill (No. 71) respecting the Hudson's Bay and Pacific Railway Company.—Mr. Oliver.

Bill (No. 72) respecting the Kettle River Valley Railway Company.—Mr. Galliher.

Bill (No. 73) respecting the Vancouver, Westminster, Northern and Yukon Railway Company.—Mr. Morrison.

NOVA SCOTIA CLAIMS.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to remind the hon. Minister of Finance, with whom I exchanged a word on the subject, that, if my recollection serves me rightly, the government stated some days ago that so soon as the award in the case of the claims of the Nova Scotia government against the Federal government was made, the papers would be brought down. It would take some time, of course, to make a complete return, and I merely wish to say that I would be greatly obliged if the government would cause to be laid on the Table the order in council under which the reference was made, giving us in that way an idea of the scope of the reference.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think the answer to my hon. friend was given by the Prime Minister, and my recollection is the same as his. I will mention it to my right hon. friend, and I see no reason why the papers particularly mentioned by the hon. gentleman should not be brought down at once.

Mr. MONK. Can the hon. gentleman tell us what the amount of the award is ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I only know from the public press, which states that it is $671,000. I have not seen the document.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT.

On the order :

House in committee on Bill (No. 9) An Act to amend 'The Dominion Elections Act.'—Mr. Henderson.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think my hon. friend has already expressed his willingness to let this Bill stand until the government brings down its Bill on the same subject. I think it will be obviously more convenient that the several Bills dealing with this subject should be treated in this way, the hon. members in charge of them reserving their right to deal with them afterwards, if the government Bill does not meet their views.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am quite willing to let the Bill stand on that condition. I would be glad to have a copy of the government Bill, so as to ascertain that the provisions of this Bill are contained in it.

Order allowed to stand.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT.

On the order :

House in committee on Bill (No. 10) An Act to amend 'The Weights and Measures Act.'—Mr. Smith (Wentworth).

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue informs me that he has in contemplation to bring in at once a government Bill amending the Weights and Measures Act, and I would be glad if my hon. friend would adopt the same course with regard to his Bill that I have just suggested with regard to other Bills, namely, that the whole matter be discussed under the government Bill, leaving his Bill on the Order paper, so that if necessary he can move it at a later stage.

Mr. SPROULE. Can that be done if the government takes the only day which is left to private members, as I understand they intend shortly to do ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That is a very proper suggestion, and I think that before the government takes that day, there should be an understanding with regard to these Bills, so that the position of hon. gentlemen in charge of them would not be prejudiced.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I understand that when the government announced that they proposed to introduce legislation of a character dealing with a matter which is the subject of a Bill standing in the name of a private member, it was understood that if the government should change its plan, it should in good faith see that the hon. member who allowed his measure to stand at the request of the government should have an opportunity afterwards to bring it forward.

Mr. FIELDING.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I quite agree that if the hon. gentleman allows his measure to stand at our request, we should see that he has an opportunity of bringing it on later.

Mr. SMITH (Wentworth). May I ask if the government Bill embodies the principle of this Bill ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Hon. M. E. Bernier). I have a Bill pertaining to weights and measures to which may be added the provisions of the Bill now on the Order paper in the name of the hon. member.

Mr. MONK. If that be the case, why should we not go into committee on the Bill, and let it pass the committee stage ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Another reason is that the Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Fisher) is not here to-night, and I know that he wishes to take part in the discussion on this question.

Mr. SMITH (Wentworth). I should like very much that the Minister of Agriculture should be here, as I know he is well acquainted with the subject of this Bill.

Order allowed to stand.

ALIEN LABOUR.

On the order :

For resuming adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Clare : 'That Bill (No. 5) an Act to amend the "Act to restrict the importation and employment of aliens," be now read a second time.'

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think this stands in exactly the same position as the other matters referred to.

Order allowed to stand.

DOMINION CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS ACT.

On the order :

For second reading of Bill (No. 18) to amend the Dominion Controverted Elections Act.—Mr. Richardson, Lisgar.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). I think it will be better to let this stand, and it can be considered when the Bill of the government dealing with the same subject is before the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). I have no objection.

Order allowed to stand.

BEET ROOT SUGAR.

On the order :

For resuming adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Sproule : 'That, having regard to the large importations of sugar into Canada for home consumption, and that it has been demonstrated beyond a doubt that the cultivation of the sugar beet in the Dominion is not only feasible but is being successfully grown in many parts of the country at present; therefore in the opinion of this House, in order to stimulate the farmers of Canada to engage in the growth of this valuable product, and also to encourage the establishment of beet-root sugar factories, a bounty should be offered for all beet-root sugar manufactured in the Dominion during the next ten years.'

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). As the subject covered by this resolution is being discussed in the budget debate, I think the hon. gentleman would do well not to press this motion on the House.

Mr. SPROULE. As the budget debate covers the same question, I do not see the necessity of pressing this motion.

Order withdrawn.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—FREE TRANSPORTATION.

On the order :

For resuming adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Robinson (Elgin) : 'That inasmuch as almost every mile of railway in Canada has been aided, to a greater or lesser extent, by the Dominion government, the local legislatures, and the numerous municipalities through which they run ; and large sums of money have been given, as well as charters, conferring upon these railways a valuable franchise.

That inasmuch as the railways of the country are continuously seeking legislation for the advancement of some particular interest, or for securing some specific object ; which legislation occupies the time of this House at a considerable cost to the country.

That inasmuch as such legislation, in order to be effective for the purposes intended, should be well considered, both by evidence and personal inspection of the location affected, by the members of this House, to the end that the best interests of all parties concerned may be safeguarded.

That, in order that these ends may be satisfactorily attained, the different railway companies, for many years past, have given free transportation to all the members of parliament ;

And inasmuch as such free transportation, coming, as it does, from the railway corporations, no doubt with a view of affording every facility to the members for obtaining the fullest information as to the needs and requirements, both of the railway corporations and the country, and, notwithstanding such free transportation is uniform to all the members of this House, the object and intention is largely misunderstood by the people, and construed into corrupt intentions on the part of the railway corporations, thereby subjecting both the railway corporations and the members of this House to an unjust and unfair criticism, which they are not always in a position to defend.

Therefore, in the opinion of this House, the present system of free transportation is unwise and undesirable, and should be discontinued, and a system substituted which would be free from the charges of corrupt intention or from adverse criticism.

That inasmuch as the railway corporations receive more than adequate compensation for that service as now rendered ; this House is of the opinion that an Act should be placed on the Statute-book making it incumbent on all railway corporations receiving a franchise or government aid either in money or land, to furnish free transportation to all members of this House, upon the certificate of the Clerk of the House ; and that no mileage indemnity be hereafter paid by the government to the members while in attendance upon their parliamentary duties.'

Mr. ROBINSON (Elgin). I do not suppose I am entitled to speak again on this question. It was thoroughly discussed when before the House on a former occasion, and I would like to have a vote upon it so that we might see how many members there are in this House who hold the same opinion on this question as I do.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). I think it would be more satisfactory to my hon. friend to have a vote when there is a larger House than at present. He certainly could not expect to-night to get a very clear exposition of the views of the House.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The members of the government evidently anticipated a vote on this question, judging by their absence.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. And apparently the leader of the opposition also.

Order allowed to stand.

On motion of Minister of Finance, House adjourned at 8.20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, March 21, 1901.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

STATIONERY PURCHASE.

Mr. TAYLOR asked :

What are the names of the members of the firm of the Ottawa Supply Company from whom goods to the amount of $2,017.09 were purchased, as shown in the Auditor General's Report for 1899 and 1900, page S—41?

Hon. JAMES SUTHERLAND. S. S. Stratton.

MR. DAVID HODGE.

Mr. TAYLOR asked :

Has David Hodge, preventive officer at Mallorytown, in the county of Leeds, been dismissed ? If so, when? Were any charges preferred against him? Was an investigation held? Is it the intention of the government to appoint a successor to Mr. Hodge, if he has been dismissed?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Hon. Wm. Paterson) :

The services of Mr. David Hodge, acting preventive officer of customs at Mallorytown, were dispensed with on the 9th February, 1901.

No charges were preferred against him.

It was not considered that there is any necessity for an officer at that point.

It is not the intention of the government to appoint a successor to Mr. Hodge.

MR. A. FOSTER.

Mr. TAYLOR asked :

Has Mr. A. Foster, lockmaster at Jones' Falls, on the Rideau canal, been superannuated. If so, when? If he has been superannuated, who has been appointed as his successor?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair) :

Mr. A. Foster, lockmaster at Jones' Falls, on the Rideau canal, has not been superannuated. Speaking from recollection, I think he has applied for superannuation, but his application has not yet been entertained.

P. E. I. RAILWAY.

Mr. HACKETT asked :

1. Did the government receive a petition, during the year 1900, from the inhabitants of lots 7, 8 and 9 in Prince county, P.E.I., asking that a branch line of railway be constructed from the Prince Edward Island Railway, at or near O'Leary station, to the Gulf Shore, at lot 7?

2. If so, what action does the government intend taking in the matter, and will they construct this branch railway as contemplated and recommended by the late government?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair) :

It does not appear that any petition such as described in the above question has been received by this department.

SS. AMELIA.

Mr. HACKETT asked :

1. What is the nature of the contract entered into between the government and Leslie, Hart & Co., owners of the steamship Amelia, running to the Magdalen Islands?

2. What is the tonnage and class of boat required?

3. What is the accommodation for passengers?

4. What is the freight capacity and the facilities for handling same?

5. What is the speed of boat, number of trips required during season, and port of departure and ports of call?

6. Has any complaint reached the government about the service, and is the service to be improved? If not, why?

Mr. TAYLOR.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). In the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I beg to reply :

1. The service to be performed between the Magdalen Islands and Pictou is a weekly one, making each week one full round trip between Pictou and the islands and return, calling each way at Georgetown and Souris, in Prince Edward Island, at Amherst Island, Point Bossé, Etang du Nord, Grand Entry and Grindstone Island ; and once each month during the months of June, July, August and September trip to be extended to Bryan Island, and whenever the weather is unfavourable for landing mails at Etang du Nord, that for House Harbour and Etang du Nord, to be landed at Grindstone Island ; calls at Grand Entry need not be made after the month of September. The service is from the opening to the closing of navigation in each year ; and the contract terminates 31st December, 1901.

2. The tonnage is 356 gross, and 103 net. The vessel is classed 100 A1 at Lloyds'.

3. She holds a certificate for 250 passengers, sleeping berths to accommodate 20 passengers in the saloon, and the same number in the fore-cabin.

4. Her cargo capacity is 15,000 cubic feet, or equal to about 2,000 barrels. Have no special information with reference to facilities for handling the same.

5. Speed is about 12½ miles per hour. Number of trips, see answer to No. 1.

6. No complaint has reached the government about the service, which seems to be all that is required.

LONGUEUIL ORDNANCE LANDS.

Mr. MONK asked :

1. Who has rented the ordnance lands in the parish of Longueuil?

2. What is annually paid for the same?

3. Is the rental paid in advance?

4. Are there any arrears of rent due the government? If so, what is the amount of said arrears?

5. How many applicants were there for said lands, or portions of lands, and what were their names?

6. Were these lands advertised for sale, and when?

7. How many lots were sold?

8. If no sale took place, what cause prevented said sale?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Hon. Clifford Sifton) :

1. Joseph Lapointe.

2. Three hundred dollars.

3. Yes.

4. Fifty dollars of the rent for 1901 remains due and unpaid.

5. Two. Joseph Lapointe and A. C. Bernard.

6. Yes. July 17th, 1900.

7. No lots were sold.

8. The offers made did not exceed the upset price.

EXPORTS TO GERMANY.

Mr. SMITH (Wentworth)—by Mr. Taylor—asked :

1. What were the exports of the Dominion of Canada to Germany in the years 1897, 1898, 1899 and 1900 respectively, and what was the total amount of duty paid thereon each year?

2. What portion of these goods were entered at Hamburg, and what was the total amount of duties paid thereon in each year, 1897, 1898, 1899 and 1900?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Hon. Wm. Paterson) :

1. The total value of goods exported from Canada to Germany during the fiscal years 1897, 1898, 1899 and 1900, respectively, was :

1897	$1,045,432
1898	1,837,448
1899	2,219,569
1900	1,715,903

2. The Canadian Trade Returns do not show the quantity or value of goods exported from Canada which were entered at Hamburg, nor the total amount of duties paid thereon in each year, 1897, 1898, 1899 and 1900. The official record of exports from Canada as compiled from export entries show the destination of goods exported by countries, but not by cities.

CORRECTION OF 'HANSARD.'

Mr. SAM. HUGHES (North Victoria). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to make a correction. At page 1355 of the revised 'Hansard,' in the report of my speech of March 12 last, the names are incorrectly given. I was speaking of a woman who had reported that her house had been broken into, and she herself insulted by British soldiers. The name of the woman was Mrs. Schalkwyk ; and the name of the woman she afterwards said had been insulted was Mrs. De Wahl. In case of any question arising about the matter in the future, I wish these names to be correctly reported in 'Hansard.' Mrs. Schalkwyk was the woman who claimed she was first visited, and Mrs. De Wahl was the one who, Mrs. Schalkwyk said subsequently, was the one insulted. The report is also incorrect in this way—the soldiers did not approach either of the houses, but merely spoke to the lady from the road, and the admissions show this fully.

UNITED STATES CATTLE QUARANTINE.

Mr. JAMES CLANCY (Bothwell). I see the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Fisher) in his place. I would like to ask him if he will lay upon the Table all agreements and arrangements entered into between Canada and the United States relative to the quarantine of Canadian cattle entering the ports of the United States. I ask this in order that business may be expedited when we reach the hon. gentleman's estimates.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Hon. S. A. Fisher). The only agreement that is in writing is that which was made in 1897. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) can have that at any time. I will see to it that the agreement is laid on the Table.

EXPORTATION OF GRAIN—REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to call the attention of the government to the report of the Royal Commission on the exportation of grain, of which Mr. Horn was chairman. Some days ago, my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) inquired with regard to that report—which is a very important one, and one that we should have before proceeding with the estimates—and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) stated that it had not yet been received. I have no doubt that it is now in the hands of the government. May we expect to have it soon ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). It can be brought down at once ; I will give orders accordingly.

PROPOSED POLAR EXPEDITION.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier). I have another question to ask—with regard to the proposal made to the government to equip a vessel for a polar expedition under the conduct of Captain Bernier. I understand that proposal has been made to the government. May we expect that the government will consider it and give us its views with regard to the matter within a limited space of time ? The session is advancing, and those who take an interest in that expedition would like to know if anything is going to be done.

The PRIME MINISTER. Does my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) favour it ?

Mr. MONK. Personally, I do—certainly.

The PRIME MINISTER. It is a matter which the government has had under consideration, but I am not prepared to say that we have reached any conclusion yet. It is only fair and reasonable that we should give an answer at an early date, and we shall do so as early as possible.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou). I desire to call attention to the condition of affairs respecting the meetings of the Public Accounts Committee—the extraordinary infrequency with which that committee now meets. There is a universal desire in this House, I take it, that the business of the House shall be so expedited that our labours may be brought to an end within a reasonable time. I do not recollect any session when it was so difficult to get that committee together. There always seems to be some reason given for the committee not meeting. The absence of the chairman has been given as one reason, but that is not a good reason, so far as I can see, for the work of the committee being neglected. For the present, there is a vast amount of work to be done. It is ridiculous to suppose that the committee can audit anything like a quarter of the accounts it is their duty to audit, even if we sit for two months more. This week but one meeting of the committee has been called. I understand that the Finance Minister (Hon. Mr. Fielding), realizing that there had been delay in connection with the meetings, and also the anxiety shown on all sides to expedite the work, said that he would consider some way to bring about more frequent meetings of the committee. Another reason given for the infrequency of meetings of the committee is, that there are meetings of other committees to which members of the Public Accounts Committee belong, and the Public Accounts Committee must give way. As to that, I would only suggest that there has never been a meeting of the committee this year at which there has not been a very good attendance, even when other committees were meeting. And the committee, perhaps, is over-large for the public purpose for which it is formed. I mention this matter rather at length to-day because I know there is a determination on the part of certain gentlemen who belong to that committee to carry out the audit of two or three accounts, the work in connection with any one of which, unless we get together more than once a week, certainly at least twice a week, will necessarily be prolonged.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). I quite agree with my hon. friend (Hon. Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) that, with respect to the past, perhaps it would have been better ir we had one or two meetings more. As to the suggestion that it is desirable that we should have two meetings a week, I do not feel able to agree to that as a fixed policy, because other engagements might arise to interfere with it. For example, yesterday we had difficulty in getting the members together, though I admit that there was a fair attendance, but members were constantly leaving the room to go into the adjoining room, where the Railway Committee was in session. The meetings of these committees side by side had a very confusing tendency. I think it right that the committee should meet frequently, and without committing myself to two meetings a week as a fixed rule, I shall see to it that the members of the committee shall have ample opportunity to deal with the matters to which the hon. gentleman has referred. On the return of the chairman, who, I hope, will be here to-day or to-morrow, I shall ask him to join me in adopting means that reasonable frequency shall mark the meetings of the committee hereafter.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Hon. Mr. Fielding :

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to His Majesty, and the proposed motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

Mr. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure). Mr. Speaker, the very kind and generous treatment which I was accorded in this House on the occasion of my seconding the reply to the speech from the Throne has led me to take advantage of this occasion to address the House a second time upon the very important issues which are now being discussed. I know that participating in the budget debate is always, more or less, an ungrateful task—the task of handling figures, for a man who is not very conversant with them is not always a task of the most inviting character. But, the subject is one of such deep interest to the country at large that I believe the representatives of the people in this House should make known their views and the views of the people they represent. I have the honour, Sir, to represent a county down by the sea, not in one of the maritime provinces, but one of the last counties in the province of Quebec, a purely agricultural and fishing county. There are no manufactures there, but I hope that when the railway communications are better established, we shall have an important agricultural development.

In the meantime the people of the county of Bonaventure are deeply interested in the fiscal policy of the government. Perhaps they do not take the same deep interest in the subject as do some of the manufacturing centres of the Dominion, but they are anxious that any policy which will advance the best interests of Canada at large should be adopted by the government of the day. The favourite policy in the county of Bonaventure is reciprocity with the United States. There never was on that coast a more prosperous era than that which extended from 1854 to 1865 ; in fact that period was the most prosperous ever experienced by the province of Quebec. We all know that the present government have made determined efforts to bring about a better understanding with the United States ; we know that the hon. the Prime Minister secured the holding of an international conference, which after many months of prolonged sittings, was unable to agree. But, Sir, that task should not be abandoned. Nature, in placing us alongside the United States on a border of nearly 4,000 miles, surely intended that there should be closer communication, closer trade relations, closer business relations than exist at the present time. We know that a majority of the people of the United States favour a highly protective tariff. But changes are occurring every day and every year in the politics of the United States. A party may be in power to-day which does not favour reciprocity with Canada ; but we should not abandon the task of securing better trade relations with the United States. The present fiscal policy of the Dominion has been lately discussed upon every hustings throughout the length and breadth of Canada. The people of Canada to-day, I believe, are more conversant with our fiscal policy than they have been at any other time in our history. Since 1878, seldom has any other political question dominated the great question of our fiscal policy. Our people to-day are becoming better acquainted with the importance of a tariff which meets the requirements of the various sections of the country. I am at heart a free trader, and I would like to see, if it were possible, free trade to-day among all the nations of the earth. But, Sir, great and beautiful as is the theory of free trade, we all know that free trade is impossible in this country. We all know that a revenue must be raised, and the only way in which it can be raised according to our views is by a customs tariff. The present tariff is a protective tariff in a sense that it affords protection, but it is mainly a revenue tariff. That is the idea, so far as I have been able to gather, of the majority of the Liberals in our province, they favour a tariff for revenue purposes, but a tariff which will at the same time afford to our manufacturing industries that measure of protection to which they are entitled.

We have been told in this House that the present government have no policy, that the present government have stolen the clothes of their opponents, that the present government have adopted the policy of the opposition. Speaking for myself, I am willing to accept all that is good, no matter whence it comes, even if it comes from the Conservative party. That which was good in the old tariff should be maintained. But a tariff is like every other human institution, it varies according to the circumstances of the times. Not many years ago, within the recollection of men sitting in this House, the Conservative party were almost free traders. They supported a revenue tariff previous to 1872, when the French Liberals in the city of Montreal and in the province of Quebec forming the Parti National, had for their first and foremost plank protection to our native industries. Consequently there is nothing extraordinary in the fact that some Liberals should have remained protectionists, since we are the political heirs of those who, twenty years ago, were in favour of extending protection to our native industries. The upheaval following the Canadian Pacific scandal led the Conservative forces into opposition. Sir John A. Macdonald, with that cunning and astuteness in statesmanship which made him one of the greatest men this country has produced, saw that a party advocating the benefits of protection to the various industries of the country, would be popular, and he came out in favour of a high tariff. The Liberals of that day thought a high tariff was not in the interests of the country. The people decided in favour of a high tariff ; and for eighteen years this high tariff has prevailed. The Liberal party remained in opposition until there was a turn in the tide, until the people realized that this tariff was intended not only to protect the manufacturing industries, but, even more, to maintain in power the party which was then at the head of affairs. The city of Montreal prospered no doubt under that tariff, as did other sections of the country. But a turn in the tide took place, and when the people realized that this tariff was intended merely to protect the manufacturer at the expense of the farmer, at the expense of the mechanic, at the expense of the workingman, they declared in favour of a readjustment of the tariff.

The right hon. Prime Minister and his colleagues have been blamed for having maintained the tariff which we now have upon the statute-book. Mr. Speaker, what would have happened in this country had the Prime Minister and his colleagues, with one fell swoop, removed the old tariff and brought it down to 17½ per cent? There would have been disaster all over the land, and the Conservative party would not have been able to find words strong enough to denounce the Liberal government. The fact is that our friends opposite are blaming the government of the day for having acted wisely, for having framed a policy that was calculated to protect all vested interests, while at the same time promoting the best interests of all sections of the country. Sir, we all remember the dire predictions which were made from every hustings in this country by hon. gentlemen opposite that if the Liberal party ever attained power our tall chimneys would become smokeless, soup kitchens would be erected on every street corner in our cities, our workingmen would be driven to the United States to seek that employment which their native land refused them. Have those prophecies been fulfilled ? Sir, this country has enjoyed a greater degree of prosperity during the last four years than it ever enjoyed before in all its history.

Hon. gentlemen preceding me in this debate have produced figures to show that in sixteen years, from 1880 to 1896, there was an increase of $36,000,000 in the business of Canada, while during the last four years there has been an increase of $142,000,000. That fact is the best answer which can be given to the demands which are now being made for a change in the fiscal policy of the country.

The hon. leader of the opposition has brought forward an amendment which certainly affords a new policy to the Conservative party. That new policy, in appearance, is the old one which is brought forward in a new form. The first paragraph of the amendment now before us is in favour of protection. Where can you find more adequate protection than that which is now extended to the manufacturing interests of Canada ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure). Is there, at the present moment, a single industry in this country which is suffering unduly or unjustly from the effects of this tariff ? Sir, I do not believe it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure). It is disappointing, probably, to our opponents that the Liberal party have not afforded them the satisfaction of being able to declare that the fiscal policy of the present government has killed this industry or that industry. They have been robbed of that pleasure, of that satisfaction, and they are sorry, as an hon. friend observes. They have thought that the best way is to bring in a rider to the protection clause in this amendment proposing that we should ask for a mutual preference from England. Down in our province the Conservative party has at all times claimed to be the pillar of the church and the state. It has lived upon prejudice, while in other parts of Canada, it has lived, to a certain extent, upon the loyalty cry. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what, during the twenty, or twenty-five years, that the Conservative party held the reins of power in this country, did they do to bring about a better and closer understanding with the mother country ? What, Sir, have you heard in the old days of the national policy about bringing about a better understanding with Great Britain, bringing about a preference of any kind, or of any character, preferential trade, mutual or otherwise ? Sir John Macdonald, for the purpose of obtaining power, did not hesitate to introduce a tariff which was anti-British, which tended to remove Canada, as far as it could possibly be done by tariff, from its connection with the mother country. He had no idea then of bringing about a better understanding with Great Britain. He introduced a tariff which stood until it fell into decay in 1896. Our hon. friends declare, in another part of this amendment, that they are anxious to bring about closer trade relations with Australasia. If my memory is not at fault, there was a former Conservative Prime Minister of this country who made a futile attempt at bringing about a better understanding with Australasia. That will be within the memory of some hon. gentlemen. About the same time attempts were also made to bring about closer trade relations with the West Indies and other portions of the British Empire. There is no sane man in this House, or in this country, who would not employ all reasonable means to bring about closer trade relations, not only with Australia and the West Indies, but with every other country under the sun. We have brought about certainly an increase of business with Great Britain, but the task of the government, great as it has been during the last four years and beneficial as it has been to Canada at large, as shown in the enormous increase in our trade by $142,000,000 in four years' time, is not yet finished, and the efforts of the government must not stop at Great Britain. There are other countries where the farmer, the mechanic and the business man of Canada can find a market. Germany has been mentioned. Great as might be the German market, great as is the German Empire, there is a country lying alongside of Germany where Canada should have a market of the first order. I refer to France. France's natural condition today is such that she should have a large and increasing trade with Canada. We should have a trade there which should rank, at least, according to our population, in proportion to the trade which the United States have with that country. There is a great trade to be fostered with Belgium and with other countries in the eastern parts of Europe. No doubt the government are giving their attention to this point and are trying to increase as best they can our markets with these foreign countries. The last paragraph in the amendment refers to the duties on foreign goods. This may properly be described as advocating a reciprocity of tariffs. A reciprocity of tariffs is a thing which certainly might be in the interest of the country at a given moment, but it is one of those questions which has to be settled gradually as occasion presents itself, as it comes forward and the government, which have been in power for four years, cannot be expected in that time to bring about a complete revolution in the business affairs of Canada. As far as we are concerned down in our province, and I believe the same may be said of all the other provinces of Canada, the people are satisfied. The last elections were carried out not upon the policy which has been brought forth by the opposition, but upon other cries with which the members of this House are conversant, but, the people of Canada at large, I have no doubt, are satisfied with the present administration of affairs. They are satisfied with the fiscal policy. That policy has been clearly defined by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), by the right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), and by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). It has been said, very truly in this House, that there should not be any whimsical changes in the tariff of the day. If there is anything which unsettles business it is these changes in the tariff. These changes occurred very often under the late government, but they were not as complete as might have been desired by some friends of the administration. The permanency of the tariff is one of those things which is a guarantee in itself to the manufacturer, and through the manufacturer, to the workingman and to others who are interested in the progress of the country. Now, I have referred in broad general terms to the amendment which has been placed before us and I wonder whether the Conservative party really think that the country is going to accept this as a change in their old policy. I do not think so and the best reason for not thinking that is that it is nothing more or less than a repetition of the old policy except in the name. We have been told that during the eighteen years of the national policy Canada progressed to an extraordinary extent. Such may have been apparently the case in certain manufacturing centres, but the country at large made no progress. The country at large remained stationary and emigration remained unchecked. During the thirty years in which the Conservative party were in power in this country, thousands upon thousands of Canadians left the country and settled in the United States. It is an almost incredible fact, but nevertheless true, that there are in the United States to-day over a million of Canadians, that there are almost half a million, if not half a million, of French Canadians in the eastern states, and that there are more people from the maritime provinces in some of the eastern American cities than are to be found in the cities of Halifax, or St. John. These things occurred under the old wavering policy of the Conservative party, but that condition of things has changed for the better now. A change has been brought about, a wise policy has been inaugurated, a policy which has produced a better understanding among the various classes of the Canadian people, a policy which is keeping our people at home, which is keeping them employed, which is keeping the manufacturers busy and which is finding markets for our farmers.

We are told now that this new policy of the Conservative party is intended to benefit Canada at large. That is a matter for difference of opinion and for discussion; that is a question which cannot be settled off-hand; but I would like, Mr. Speaker, with your permission to answer certain statements which have been made by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), and by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) as to what policy was really endorsed by the people of Canada at the last election. These gentlemen opposite have told us that the race and religious cry was raised in the province of Quebec, and that it was that cry that carried the election. Our friend from West York (Mr. Wallace), who I know is very advanced in his ideas on the subject, when speaking on this motion the other night, said, alluding to the right hon. the Prime Minister:

> But he never went to a French gathering in which he did not refer to them as his fellow-countrymen because of their French origin. I have read the reports of his speeches, and in these he was wont to say: I am a Frenchman and am proud of it. The same blood flows in my veins as runs in yours, and I want your vote on the ground that we are all French.

Mr. WALLACE. Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Marcil) permit me. I said: I want your votes because we are French. I supplied that myself. I gave the quotation as read by the hon. member: The same blood flows in my veins as flows in yours. After that, as the 'Hansard' report will show, when the Prime Minister interrupted I stated that the words that were added were mine, and that they contained the only inference that could be drawn from his argument, else why did he use such language. I asked that question. The further report of the debate will show that.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure). When the hon. gentleman from West York (Mr. Wallace) used those words he was at once called to order by the premier, who denied having used them.

Mr. WALLACE. He was not called to order.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure). That is the report that 'Hansard' gives and the Prime Minister denied having used these words.

Mr. WALLACE. He denied having used words I did not attribute to him.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure). I could quote other portions of the hon. gentleman's speech which all tends in the same direction. Here, for instance, is some language used by the hon. member for West York:

> Why, these men are in power to-day because they successfully raised that cry. They have fifty-eight out of sixty-five members of the province of Quebec, not because their public policy was acceptable to the people of that province, but because of the racial cries that were raised by the Minister of Inland Revenue, by the First Minister himself, and by all the ministers and by all the members on that side of the House.

Mr. WALLACE. Hear, hear.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure). I should like briefly to refer to the vote in the province of Quebec at the last election to show that no racial cry ever dominated in that province. The Conservative party in Canada has had a glorious past. The Conservative party of former days was led by men—and I do not wish to be personal to those who are now at the head of that party—but in the past it was led by men who certainly accomplished a great deal for this country. Confederation was brought about through the efforts of Sir George Etienne Cartier, supported as he was by the almost unanimous feeling of the province of Quebec.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure). For thirty years the province of Quebec maintained the Conservative party in power, and during these long years was there ever a cry raised that the province of Quebec voted Conservative because Cartier was a Frenchman? Never, Sir, did we hear that. The province of Quebec in those days believed the Conservative party was the political party which could bring about the best understanding in this country, which could develop this young land of ours and lay the foundation of a great nation in the future. The Conservative party in those days had a dual policy. The French Conservative party in Quebec used the church; that is, impressed the people with the idea that it had the support of the church. That was one policy of the Conservative party, and the other part of the Conservative policy was furnished by the friends of the hon. member for West York.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure). To-day the conditions are changed. On the 7th of November last, Quebec voted in favour of the best men and in favour of the best policy. There was a man in the province of Quebec at the last election who had sat for over twenty years in this House; an estimable gentleman personally; a gentleman who aspired to the leadership of his compatriots, but that man had the ill-luck to link his fortunes with the member for West York, and so we saw the French and Catholic county of Beauharnois discard its former member (Mr. Bergeron) and elect an English-speaking Protestant Liberal (Mr. Loy) in his stead.

Mr. WALLACE. Would the hon. member permit me ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. WALLACE. I am asking the hon. member (Mr. Marcil) a question and not his backers. The hon. gentleman said that Mr. Bergeron linked his fortunes with mine. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Marcil) read the Toronto Globe he would have seen the report of a speech made by Mr. Bergeron in the city of Montreal in which he bitterly attacked myself. I presume, Mr. Speaker, that that accounted for his defeat in Beauharnois; and by a Protestant.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure). I am sorry that the member for West York had to be disavowed by his own colleague, but I am still more sorry that Mr. Bergeron ever allowed himself to link his fortunes with those of the hon. member (Mr. Wallace). I do not wish, Sir, to wander away from the amendment before the House, but I think I am justified in my remarks in view of the statements made by the two hon. gentlemen to whom I have referred (Mr. Wallace and Mr. Bennett). I do not wish the statement to be allowed to go broadcast through the country, without contradiction, that the province of Quebec voted upon racial issues at the last election. There are in this House eighteen English-speaking members from the province of Quebec, thirteen of whom are Protestants and the other five English-speaking Catholics. Without analysing the vote in detail, I may mention some very conspicuous instances to show that the French Canadians voted for the best men regardless of race or religious issues. We have in the city of Montreal an electoral division composed of St. Lawrence and St. Louis wards, the latter ward being overwhelmingly French and the former largely Catholic.

The French Canadians of that division could have legitimately asked to be represented by one of themselves ; but they gave way, and my hon. friend (Mr. Bickerdike) was elected by an overwhelming majority. One of the old historic counties of the province of Quebec, the county of Chateauguay, that piece of land which should be sacred to all Canadians, for there French Canadians saved the British flag to this country—that county, with its overwhelming French Catholic population, has been represented in this House since confederation by a Protestant. We have the constituency of Quebec West, which is overwhelmingly Catholic, represented in this House by one of the ministers of the Crown (Hon. Mr. Dobell). We have the county of Sherbrooke represented by my hon. friend (Mr. McIntosh), although the French Canadians are in a majority there, and could have insisted, had they so desired, on being represented by one of their own people. They preferred, however, to have an English-speaking Protestant, because they are represented by a French Canadian in the local legislature. That is an arrangement very often made in the province of Quebec. Then there is the county of Missisquoi, which for many years has been represented by an English-speaking Protestant. An English-speaking Protestant (Mr. Meigs) represents it in this House at the present time, and a French Canadian represents it in the local legislature. We have the St. Antoine division of Montreal, which ranks as a Protestant division, though its population is almost equally divided between Catholics and Protestants. The religious question was never raised there, and it is represented in this House by an English Protestant (Mr. Roddick). Then, the county of Quebec, nine-tenths of the population of which is French, and in which it is rare to find an English-speaking man, is represented in this House by the Solicitor General, one of the most prominent Irishmen in the Dominion. The county of Jacques Cartier, also overwhelmingly French, is represented in this House by my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Monk). The united counties of Richmond and Wolfe, two former English-speaking divisions of the eastern townships, where the population is almost three-fourths French, are represented in the local House by an English-speaking Protestant, and in this House by an Irish Roman Catholic. You have here eighteen constituencies in the province of Quebec, in which, with very few exceptions, had the French and Catholic vote been used as such, the French Canadians could have elected an almost solid representation ; but they did not do so. They voted for the policy first and for the men afterwards ; and why should they not ? Is there a man in this country who has not been at all times proud of the Prime Minister of this Dominion ? Are the French Canadians to be called upon to vote against him merely because he is a French Canadian ?

In the debate in this House the other day it was stated that race issues were being raised in North Bruce. I do not know whether they have been or not ; but North Bruce has evidently remained, according to last reports, true to its old policy. I hope the electors of North Bruce did not vote on racial lines. If they voted on party lines, they had a right to vote as they did, it is a free country.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to tell the hon. gentleman, as one who was there, that the racial question was never mentioned, so far as I know, either on the platform or off the platform.

Mr. HORSEY. The hon. gentleman is not omnipresent.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure). There has been an allusion by my hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) to the vote that was given by the French Canadians in the province of Quebec, and the hon. gentleman said the race cry had been raised in North Essex, that it might have been raised in Nipissing, and that it was raised in Glengarry. North Essex was formerly represented in this House by a French Canadian, and the French Canadians of that constituency might legitimately have hoped to be again represented here by one of themselves ; but they could not be better represented than they are at the present moment. The French Canadians are in a majority in the district of Nipissing, but they are represented by two English-speaking gentlemen—one in the Ontario House and one in this House. And I have the word of the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Schell) that the race cry was never raised in Glengarry, but that the French Canadians there voted on party lines, and that he owes his election largely to the Scotch vote in that constituency.

Now, our friends opposite tell us that the last general election was fought on the fiscal policy and according to the ordinary rules of discussion. I hold in my hand a Conservative dodger which was circulated in the county of Albert, N.B., where there is probably not a French elector. It is entitled : ' Conservative victory all along the line ; every province gives Conservative gains,' and one of the paragraphs reads as follows :

> It is the turn for an English-speaking premier, and every lover of fair-play says Tupper should have a chance to show what he can do.

Was a straighter appeal ever made to racial prejudice than was made on that occasion? The Union Jack dominates this dodger, my hon. friend remarks ; but the best friends of the Union Jack in this country have not been the men who have exploited the Union Jack, but those who have stood by it when it was in need of friends. And since the South African war has been mentioned, I wish to declare, as my own personal conviction, speaking as I do from my knowledge of the province of Quebec, that it was the most fortunate thing that ever happened to Canada that we had at the head of affairs the right hon. gentleman who now leads the government, when our opponents for party purposes raised the cry of sending contingents to South Africa. The vote which was given in this House the other night is the most eloquent tribute that could be paid to the genuine patriotic services which the right hon. Prime Minister has rendered not only to Canada, but to the empire at large.

I shall conclude these somewhat disconnected remarks by alluding to a charge which was made against me the other night by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett). That hon. gentleman charged that in 1897 I went into his riding for the purpose of raising the race cry.

Mr. BENNETT. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I would ask him to read from 'Hansard' exactly what I said and make his answer to that.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure). Here are the words of the hon. member :

The hon. gentlemen are quite welcome to have Quebec on the terms they got it. They conducted a campaign of race and religion in the province of Quebec ; and wherever they could introduce the same campaign in the province of Ontario, they did so, and did so successfully. They introduced it in Glengarry, which has a large French population, and that is the reason they carried that county. They introduced it in the two ridings of Essex, where there is also a large French population, and that is the reason they carried them. I was amused at hearing the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil), in seconding the address this session, express the hope that these cries of race and religion would be buried and put out of sight. That hon. gentleman was in my riding in 1897, when there was a by-election. I had been unseated. At that time the French Canadians—and there are about 500 voters in that locality—were sympathizing very keenly with their fellow-countrymen in Manitoba, who they thought were deprived of their school rights. The hon. member for Bonaventure came there. He did not appear in the English parts of the constituency—

Mr. BENNETT. Hear, hear.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure) (reading)—

—but he could be found in the French settlements day in and day out. And the hon. gentleman never came back to redeem the pledge which he made on that occasion.

Mr. BENNETT. Read the pledge.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure). I hope the hon. gentleman does not want me to read the whole of his speech. The pledge was this :

He first asked that the government might be excluded for not having passed a remedial Bill in their first session on the ground that they had not time, but he said there was a session coming on in 1897, and if a remedial Bill were not passed then, he would come back there and denounce the government at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. BENNETT. But you never came back.

The PRIME MINISTER. There was no necessity.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure). I was invited one day to visit the constituency of East Simcoe. I was told that on the borders of the Georgian Bay there was a large number of French Canadians, probably a thousand or more—people who had lived peaceably in the parish of Lafontaine and the town of Penetanguishene the last thirty or forty years. Lafontaine is one of the most extraordinary places I have ever visited. It is a purely French settlement in an English constituency. Those people, law-abiding, good citizens of Canada, industrious farmers—many of them are unable to speak or understand the English language. Where then is the crime in a speaker from another part of this country, from the province of Quebec, going up there to discuss the public questions of the day. My hon. friend tells me that I limited myself to the French districts of Lafontaine and Penetanguishene. Let me tell him that one evening, after speaking at one of those places and returning in company with Dr. Spohn, a former member of this House, I was invited to do a most extraordinary thing, and I did it. I was invited to address a public meeting in an Orange hall. I accepted the invitation, and I must say that I never obtained a more respectful hearing than I did that night. I do not know how these people voted, they probably voted for our friend who now represents the county, but I will give you, Mr. Speaker, the reason. It was —though I do not wish to be personal to a man who is not present—it was because of the unpopularity of our own candidate, Mr. H. H. Cook. I can inform the hon. member (Mr. Bennett) that if any other reputable citizen of East Simcoe had, upon that occasion, been the candidate of the Liberal party, the hon. gentleman would not have been returned to this House. I was often warned at some of these meetings that I could not bring forward Mr. Cook, who was then our Liberal candidate, because he was too unpopular. People would say to me : We are willing to vote for the government but we cannot vote for Mr. Cook. That was the reason which accounts for the election of the hon. gentleman. I am glad to notice now that the hon. gentleman and his late opponent in that election have become strong, steadfast friends. They are to-day concocting a scandal over the question of a senatorship.

Mr. HENDERSON. I rise to a point of order. I understand your ruling, Mr. Speaker, the other night, when the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Roche) was speaking, to be that hon. gentlemen must apply themselves exclusively to the amendment of the leader of the opposition. I rise simply for the purpose of information, because if this hon. gentleman is to be allowed to travel all over the question, when I rise to speak, I intend to do the same.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is true that the other night I stated the rule which should prevail, but those hon. gentlemen who were present will remember that hon. gentlemen on both sides asked that no restriction should be placed on the discussion, and of course I was in the hands of the House.

Mr. HAGGART. Hear, hear. Let him go on.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure). There is another point to which I wish to refer. The hon. member for East Simcoe spoke of a pledge that I made on the Manitoba school question. Well, I did not return to the county of East Simcoe for the very good reason that I was engaged elsewhere during the last election. Since visiting the division of East Simcoe, I was given the opportunity of visiting the province of Manitoba and participating in the local provincial elections there. I went into the houses of the half-breeds, I went into their schools at St. Boniface, St. Vital and the other places in the three French counties of LaVerandry, St. Boniface and Carillon, and I am glad to be able to declare to-day that the French Metis and the French Catholic population of that province never had as efficient schools as they now enjoy. If I am not mistaken, the hon. member for West York visited Manitoba at the same time. He probably went up there to support the Greenway government, which had done away with the Catholic schools, or something else. But what happened was this, that the people who were interested in the Catholic schools of Manitoba, the people whom the Conservative party had sought to hold up to this country as victims, voted almost to a man in favour of the Liberal candidates and the men who had opposed the Remedial Bill in this House and out of this House, voted to bring about the downfall of the Greenway administration. There is my answer to the challenge concerning my pledge on the Manitoba school question.

Further than that I have nothing to say. I hope that an early opportunity will be given me to return to East Simcoe.

Mr. BENNETT. You are very welcome, I can assure you.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure). And I will not only speak to the French of East Simcoe, but I hope an opportunity will be given me to speak to the Orangemen. We have Orangemen in the province of Quebec and some of them—the majority of them I must say—are, as a rule, peaceful, law-abiding citizens. They hold different views from ours on matters of religion and as to loyalty and the maintenance of the empire, and so on, but this is a free country, and I hope that as long as the hon. member for West York remains at the head of that distinguished order, he will inculcate among its members a love for this country.

Glancing the other day over Leggo's 'Administration of Lord Dufferin in Canada,' my attention was attracted to an address, which was presented, some thirty years ago, almost, by the then warden of the county of York, who now represents West York in this House. About that time Lord Dufferin, who was without exception the most illustrious Irishman Great Britain ever sent to Canada, made an appeal, subsequently to this address, to the Irish Protestant Society of Toronto. In that appeal he asked his countrymen not to bring to this country what has caused the misfortunes of Ireland for many centuries. I am sorry to say that the words of Lord Dufferin have had no effect upon the hon. member for West York.

Some days later, Lord Dufferin, on leaving these shores, on leaving the old city of Quebec, where he had been welcomed as French Canadians have always welcomed the representative of British authority in this country—Lord Dufferin, in parting, uttered these words at Laval University, and I shall conclude with his remarks. We should follow his advice and try to lay aside our racial antipathies, our racial divisions, and to bring about a better understanding among all classes of the community. I adhere to the declaration I made in this House when first I had the honour of addressing it—I desire that what little I may do in public life in Canada, what little I may do in this House, shall have the result of bringing about, if possible, a better understanding among all classes of the Canadian people. These were the words that Lord Dufferin uttered :

> At this moment the French Canadian race to which you belong is engaged in a generous struggle with their English fellow-subjects to see which shall contribute most to the advancement of the moral, material and political welfare of this country. There is not a student, a man of business or of science, a politician or an author of either origin who does not feel the inspiration of this noble rivalry. Upon the success of your exertions, upon the efficacy of your discipline and training, upon the character of the mental and moral atmosphere you create within your walls, will, in a great measure, depend the issue of the conflict. In that conflict I can heartily wish you success without compromising my impartiality, for it is a struggle wherein the defeated reap laurels as untarnished—benefits as universal—as those which crown the winners, since it is round the brow of Canada the wreath of victory will be twined, and into the lap of Canada the prizes of the contest poured.

Sir, there was the parting advice tendered to this country by one of the most illustrious men whom Great Britain ever sent here. And, as I have said to our friends from Ontario, men of another race, and another nationality—no, we are all the same, we are all Canadians, but of another origin—I would remind them that when they come in contact with the people they should try to bring about a better understanding, and inspire themselves with what we see in the province of Quebec down on the Plains of Abraham, where the fate of this continent was settled. There, Sir, beneath the protection of the British guns, stands a pillar of stone, and upon that pillar are graven two names, Wolfe and Montcalm—Wolfe, the victorious British general ; Montcalm, who died in the arms of defeat. Let us, in our efforts towards building up this country bear in mind that silent witness of the understanding which was brought about by our forefathers, so that we may perpetuate that understanding among the present generation of Canadians and transmit it to those who shall come after us.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (East York). Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I cannot take up the gauntlet thrown down by the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) and discuss the amendment of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) from the point of race and creed from which he has discussed it to-day. Nor can I, even in discussing so important a question as this, take advantage of this opportunity to tell the hon. leader of this House (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) what the echo from North Bruce was which he wished so much to hear when he discussed this question the other day.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend (Mr. Maclean) may tell me the echo from Prince Edward Island, perhaps.

Mr. MACLEAN. The right hon. gentleman (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) expressed a desire the other day to hear from North Bruce. But I can tell him that something is happening on his side of the House that is a surprise to us and a surprise to the country ; and if his followers continue to make protectionist speeches, such as that delivered by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) the other evening, that of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) yesterday, and that of the hon. member for Bonaventure to-day, when he was discussing the question on its merits, he will soon have no free traders behind him at all, but all will be on the protectionist, that is to say, on the Conservative, platform. In discussing this question, I wish to keep to the view of protection and free trade laid down by the Prime Minister. As he has challenged the relative merits of protection and free trade, just for a few moments I intend to discuss the principle underlying these two ideas. After that, I purpose discussing the attitude of the Liberals towards protection, the attitude of the Liberals towards mutual trade, and this new question of reciprocity of tariffs. Now, I have no hesitation in telling the House that I am a protectionist, and that, on that subject, I am, as the right hon. gentleman calls me, a stalwart. I have always believed in the principle of protection, and never in the principle of free trade. And when it comes down to a discussion of the two principles, we can say this—that protection has been vindicated, while free trade to-day is questioned in every quarter of the world. Now, what is the principle underlying protection ? Is it not this—that protectionists recognize the fact that life is a struggle, not only between individuals, but between nations ? The free traders tell us that underlying the principle of their theory is the brotherhood of man. Sir, there is no prospect of the principle of the brotherhood of man being accepted ; on the contrary, the nations, from one end of the world to the other, recognize that a struggle goes on among them, and that it is incumbent upon a nation to protect and maintain itself in that struggle as against other nations. Another principle that free traders go on is, that there ought to be competition, and that competition will settle all difficulties in connection with trade and commerce. As a protectionist, I say that the underlying principle ought to be a regulated production—it is this that will give the greatest value to industry, and not competition. Another thing that we protectionists say is, that the great object of a nation ought to be to keep its own work for its own people, and its own markets for its own products. The free traders tell us that the proper rule is to buy in the cheapest market and sell in the dearest. We take issue with them on that point also. And how would we who are protectionists say that a nation should attain the end to be sought ? By what we call national policy. We recognize that there is a struggle among nations, and that it is possible for a nation, through its fiscal policy and its legislation, to make itself strong so as to be able to hold its own and build itself up in that struggle. How does it do that ? That is a point upon which I wish to lay considerable stress. How does a nation, through its fiscal policy, make itself strong and build itself up ? In a number of ways. It seeks to transfer industries from other nations ; it seeks to develop the industries that it has at home, and it seeks to give diversity of employment to its people—and in that way it adopts what Sir John A. Macdonald called (and it is a good name for it) a national policy. The tools, the engines of that national policy, as directed to this end, are many, and I wish to enumerate them here to-day.

In the first place, the great engines or means used in a protectionist policy is a customs tariff composed of specific and ad valorem duties. The next thing is a tariff with a free entrance of specific raw materials, or a rebate of duties on foreign raw products not manufactured within the country importing them. Another thing that protection resorts to is drawbacks ; another thing is bounties on productions and bounties on exports ; another thing it resorts to is putting larger duties on raw products exported ; another thing is treaties of reciprocity, or reciprocity in preference ; another thing is maximum and minimum tariffs with friendly and unfriendly nations ; another thing is countervailing duties ; another thing is subsidies to railways and steamship lines, or giving low freights and cold storage to exports, and low freights for essentially raw products when imported. Still another thing adopted by every protectionist government to-day is the policy of promotion, or taking part in exhibitions, exhibiting in foreign countries its own productions, resorting to a consular service, appointing trade agents to build up trade, and in a hundred other directions making use of a promotion system. There are many other ways in which a national policy employs whatever measures will effect the end of building up the country.

Now, free traders pretend to ignore all these things. They say they do not believe in them, they say that the least government is the best—that is one of their great principles. They say a legislature can do very little to promote trade, and that the proper policy of a government is to do as little as possible in the way of promoting the industries of the country. On the other hand, we who are protectionists contend that it is the duty of a government to do everything possible, and to interfere, if necessary, as much as possible on behalf of manufactures with a view to building up the country. The national policy of interfering through legislation by parliament has proved a success. A national policy has proved a success, not only in Canada but throughout the world wherever it has been tried. Free trade is questioned to-day, and is almost a failure in the one or two countries that have adopted it. Now, what are the countries that have adopted the principle of protection ? Let me name some of them. There is the United States, the greatest country in the world to-day in the matter of production and export of its own productions. There is Germany, there is Russia, there is France, there is Italy, there is Canada, Australia is coming to it, South Africa will come to it, and every nation that is emerging or hopes to emerge and to take its place among the nations, is adopting a national policy and recognizing the principle of protection. All these countries employ these engines that are said to be paternal, that are said to be protectionist. But they are effective and accomplish the thing designed, they do build up a country, and every one of these countries that I have named has employed them, and is employing them, and intends to employ them hereafter to a much larger extent.

Now, England is the typical free trade country, and to-day I would like to ask hon. gentlemen opposite who declare themselves free traders, whether England has not employed many of these protectionist measures in the past ? She has employed them in the past, she may have disowned them for a time, but I believe she will employ a great many of them in the future. Englishmen are getting tired of this doctrine of this brotherhood of man, that the least government is the best, and they are casting about for ways in which they can help themselves. The Manchester school is dead. John Stuart Mill and all his free trade theories are nothing but ghosts. The little Englander party has disappeared from English politics. Many principles that Cobdenite free traders have advocated in the past are very much questioned to-day, and there are a great many people now who are ashamed to wear Cobden medals, even though the medals are bestowed upon them by the Cobden Society. The people of England see how things are going; and one of the most significant things we have seen in our day is the fact that the iron and steel industry is passing from free trade England to the protectionist United States. That is a most significant fact in regard to England's fiscal policy, it is a thing that is coming home to Englishmen, that is being discussed in all their boards of trade and chambers of commerce, that is being discussed in their papers and by their public men. It is a question to which they cannot at the present time find an answer. Perhaps we protectionists in Canada will yet be able to tell them where a remedy may be found. No protectionist to-day needs to apologize for his belief ; but the free trader finds all his former theories questioned to-day by his own supporters. Therefore, I say that protectionists have seen their principles vindicated, while free traders have seen every principle they have advocated disowned by other nations and questioned by those who heretofore have supported them.

Now, a national policy, or a principle of protection, is the policy adopted by nations who are rivals for the world's trade and have to struggle for their part of it. The principle of the brotherhood of men is for people who are brothers, but for those who are not brothers the principle does not apply. It may apply when the poet's dream is realized of 'the brotherhood of man, the federation of the world.' When the federation of the world takes place, that principle will be all right ; but so long as nation has to struggle with nation, the principle of protection has to be resorted to by every nation which wishes to hold its own.

Now, having laid down these general principles, I wish to discuss the attitude of the Liberal party on the question of protection. To find out where the Liberal party stands on this question, I must take the speech of the Prime Minister, made in this House on this very question ; and to ascertain his position I shall have to read a few sentences from his remarks. In the first place I will quote what he said about the Conservative party and the national policy :

> The same old national policy, with a few adornments which, instead of taking from its native deformity, only add to it.

And one or two of these adornments of the national policy the Reformers of this country are supporting to-day. He went on to say :

> There is nothing new in the Conservative policy to-day.

Well, there is something new, there is this new at least, that it is sticking to its principles and maintaining them on every occasion. It is also enlarging the principle of protection as applied to Canada, and enlarging it, as I will show later on, to the whole empire. Now, what does the hon. gentleman say, speaking for his party, in regard to protection ? He says that they are free traders, they are for a revenue tariff, while we on this side are protectionists. Here are his own words :

There is this difference between us, that while they would levy those duties only for the benefit of individuals, we levy them for the benefit of the revenue first and foremost.

Then he admits there is no doubt that protection is an incident of the tariff.

Still further on he says :

It will be many years before we can have free trade as they have it in England.

Now, we have these four statements, and I hope I have the attention of the right hon. leader of the government, because I do not wish to misquote him, I wish to put in one sentence what he says is his attitude and the attitude of his party in regard to the fiscal policy of this country. I take it to be this: The Liberals are against protection; they believe in free trade as a theory, they are for a revenue tariff which of necessity implies incidental protection, but, of such incidental protection the less there is of it the more is such a tariff desirable; and also, they regret that it will be many years before we can have free trade as it is in England, but that is the goal. Now, I think that is the platform of the Liberal party; that certainly is the statement which the right hon. leader of the government made, and this side of the House and the country will hold him and his party to it. On that platform we take direct issue with them. We say we believe in protection, we say we do not believe in a revenue tariff, but that we believe in a tariff that will protect Canadian industries, we do not want free trade as they have it in England. Free trade as they have it in England is not the goal of the party sitting on this side of the House. Not only does he justify the national policy in that statement, but he is perforce made to justify all those instruments of protection which I have already outlined. But is his practice on the lines of these precepts which he has laid down ? Let us take some of the means that I have enumerated in connection with the national policy and of protection and see where he and his party are. Specific duties are one of the great instruments of protection. Does he use them ? Having condemned them, has he removed them from the statutes of this country ? They are protectionist instruments pure and simple. Take other instruments of protection, take rebates and drawbacks, bounties on production, bounties on exports, rebates on exports, the prohibition of exports a policy which the right hon. gentleman's friends in Ontario have adopted in regard to the exportation of logs and which the hon. Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Sifton) proposes to adopt in connection with logs cut on Indian reserves, reciprocity treaties, steamship subsidies and cold storage on steamships, trade agents purchase of products and selling them abroad. Has he not employed every one of these engines of protection under this so-called revenue tariff ? He is either a bogus free trader or a protectionist who is ashamed to admit that he is a protectionist. Where is he ? He has not employed all of them ? There is reciprocity of tariffs, which is to come, there are countervailing duties, there the system of the maximum and the minimum tariffs which is to come, and there may be some other instruments of paternal government as it is called and he may have to come to them. But, all of the others he has employed up to date, and yet he says he is a revenue tariff man. Now, what is the difference in degree between this so-called revenue tariff that he says he upholds and a protectionist tariff which we claim it was in former days and which specifically it is to-day What is the difference in degree between the tariff which he upholds to-day and the one which he denounced when it was introduced into this country ? How are they going to get over that difficulty ? The late Minister of Finance told us that the difference between the old and the new tariff was 79-100ths of 1 per cent or something less than that. The right hon. gentleman claims that there is a marked distinction between the two policies, but will any one tell what the difference in degree, as to the incidence between the two tariffs, is ? Now, I want to make some reply to the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) and the right hon. leader of the government. Of this revenue tariff of which the right hon. gentleman says he is the champion, he states :

The result of the policy adopted in 1897 is that the country has never been so prosperous.

And then, he said :

Under our new tariff, our revenue tariff, the trade of the country increased in the four years from 1896 to 1900, $142,000,000. Under the national policy the increase under the same head was $36,000,000 for sixteen years.

On this statement of the results he left the people and the House to judge of the merits of the two policies. Why did the country boom when hon. gentlemen came into power ? Why did trade increase in volume? It must be for one reason and one alone, that hon. gentlemen declined to put into practice the policy which they announced they would adopt of wiping the national policy off the face of the earth. That is why the country has boomed. Up to that time capital had been frightened and labour intimidated. Men were of limited means and they were afraid to put their money into manufacturing enterprises, because they were led to believe that if the Liberal party came into power the national policy, as they said in East York when I contested that riding, would be wiped off the face of the earth. It is because they did not wipe the national policy off the face of the earth and because they adopted the policy of Sir John Macdonald, because the whole country was so united in supporting the policy of protection that no one in a responsible position dared to get up in his place and propose to remove it, that the country prospered. What would have been the state of the country if hon. gentlemen had carried out their pledges and had wiped the national policy off the face of the earth? Instead of smoking chimneys we would have had smokeless chimneys, we would have sent our labour abroad and driven our capital out of the country. There would have been no increase in trade. The glory of hon. gentlemen to-day is that they did not do what they promised, and because they did not do what they promised the country has prospered. What was the conclusion of the apology of the right hon. gentleman for being a protectionist? It was this:

It will be many years before we can have free trade as they have it in England.

And his Finance Minister, in 1897, as has been quoted already in the House, said:

So far as protecting the industries of the country is concerned, eternal vigilance must be the price of protection.

This is a nice statement to come from two hon. members of the government. One says that free trade as they have it in England is far away and the other tells the people that if they have protection it will only be by the exercise of continual vigilance. The national policy has vindicated itself in the minds of the men who first promoted it and supported it. It has vindicated itself in the minds of all, because the Liberal party have had to adopt it, have had to support it, have had to maintain it, notwithstanding that they would destroy it, and if John A. Macdonald lives today in this country, he lives not only in the principles of his own party, which we are maintaining to-day, but he lives as a present force, in this country, to-day, because the men who decried him and decried his principle of protection are claiming, as the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) and the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) have done, that the Liberal party are trying to maintain it in their own way. This is Sir John Macdonald's glory; it is a living glory and he is a most living force in the affairs in Canada to-day. Now, I want to discuss the question of the preference. The right hon. Prime Minister, said in dealing with that preference:

How are you going to secure mutuality of preference where you have protection in Canada and free trade in England?

Further on he said:

Canada will be protectionist and so will Great Britain, and what mutual preference could you have under such conditions?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Might I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean) if the policy, as enunciated in the amendment of the leader of the opposition, is what he described it just now: reciprocity in preferences?

Mr. MACLEAN. I am coming to that.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon gentleman (Mr. Maclean) has already stated that that is the policy of the opposition.

Mr. MACLEAN. I have been dealing with the record of the Liberal party on protection; I am going to deal with mutual preference now, and I am coming to the preference of reciprocity, and I will tell you exactly where we are as to that.

The PRIME MINISTER. I thought we knew it.

Mr. MACLEAN. The Minister of Customs has asked for information, and I am glad to give it to him. Now, the Prime Minister asked us: How free trade England and protectionist Canada could have a mutuality of preference, and he said: If England became protectionist and Canada remained protectionist there could be mutuality of preference. Well, there are numbers of instances on record which will answer the right hon. gentleman's question. Does he not know that the protectionist United States has, under its fiscal system, given a preference to free trade, or semi-free trade, nations, and that free trade England has given a preference to protected nations. It is all very well for the First Minister to make a fine rhetorical phrase in the House, but in common practice the thing is being done every day. The protectionist United States is making treaties with the South American republics and with Germany, and has sent her commissioners to France to establish some kind of mutual preference. There is an answer to the Prime Minister's question. It is possible to have this mutuality of protection between free trade and protectionist nations, but what we criticise the government for is the one-sided character of the preference they have given, and which I do not believe in, especially as towards England.

But what is the record of the Liberals when in opposition? They were in favour of giving a preference to the United States and against the mother land. They were in favour of unrestricted reciprocity, which its author, Mr. Erastus Wiman, defined it to be:

Free trade between Canada and the United States and the rest of the world, and involving discrimination against the mother country.

And Sir Richard Cartwright, speaking at Pembroke, October 21, 1890, admitted this was so, and said :

Some men, whose opinions I respect, enter objections to this unrestricted reciprocity proposition. They argue, and argue with force, that it will be necessary for us if we enter into such an arrangement to admit the goods of the United States on more favourable terms than those of the mother country; nor do I deny that this is an objection, and not a light one.

The present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) is on record as being prepared to give the United States a preference as against England, and he and his party now charge us because we do not believe in a mutual preference as between us and England, because it is a one-sided preference. Let us look for a moment at the efforts of the Liberal party in this country to establish unrestricted reciprocity between Canada and the United States. I shall tell the House what was the real origin of that unrestricted reciprocity movement in Canada fifteen years ago. There was then in the United States a very able, a very clever, man, and at that time, a very wealthy man. That man saw the rise of his friend and acquaintance, Grover Cleveland, from an unimportant position, to be president of the United States. This man, who lived in New York, became very ambitious, and he said to himself : If Grover Cleveland can be president of the United States, why should not I, who am as able a man as he is, be president. But when he looked into the matter he found that there was one obstacle in the way, and that was that he was not native-born of the United States. He was a Canadian-born, and so he started out to qualify himself to become president of the United States, as Grover Cleveland had become president. I am telling no fiction to the House now. Erastus Wiman saw that the only way in which he could qualify for the presidency was to become native-born, and the only way he could become native-born, was to lead his native Canada into annexation with the United States. He came over here on that expressed mission, and he captured the Liberal party and the Liberal newspapers, and for years he engaged them to gratify his ambition to become president of the United States. That is the real story of the unrestricted reciprocity movement in Canada from 1886 to 1894. And it was the present Prime Minister, the United States senator from Canada, as he was called in the United States, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who went up and down this country preaching in favour of unrestricted reciprocity, which really meant annexation. And these are the men who are chiding us to-day because we do not believe in a one-sided preference. I am stating an historical fact, and when the memoirs of Erastus Wiman are written, and when the archives of the New York Sun are laid bare, as they will be laid bare before the people, the Liberal party of Canada will be on record as favouring unrestricted reciprocity, which really meant annexation, and which, to Erastus Wiman, meant nothing else but annexation so that he could qualify himself to be come president of the United States. That being the record of the Liberal party, what happened ? They got into power, and they had to find an excuse to get out of the trouble they were in, and to illustrate their predicament, I shall refer to the ancient history of the children of Israel and the law of the scapegoat, and I want to direct the attention of hon. gentlemen to what that law is. I am glad to see my hon. friend from the west (Hon. Mr. Sifton) in the House so that he may hear it for once :

The Scapegoat.

(Leviticus XIV.)

5. And he (Aaron) shall take of the children of Israel two kids of the goats as a sin offering.

7. And he shall take the two goats and present them before the Lord at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.

8. And Aaron shall cast lots upon the two goats, one lot for the Lord, and the other for the scapegoat.

9. And Aaron shall bring the goat upon which the Lord's lot fell and offer him for a sin offering.

10. But the goat on which the lot fell to be a scapegoat shall be presented alive before the Lord, to make an atonement with him, and to let him go for a scapegoat into the wilderness.

21. And Aaron shall lay both his hands upon the head of the live goat, and confess over him all the iniquities of the children of Israel, and all their transgressions in all their sins, putting them on the head of the goat, and shall send him away by a fit man into the wilderness.

22. And the goat shall bear upon him all their iniquities into a land not inhabited: and he shall let go the goat in the wilderness.

26. And he that let go the goat for a scapegoat shall wash his clothes and bathe his flesh in water, and afterwards come into the camp.

Who was the scapegoat for hon. gentlemen opposite ? The Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier was Aaron the high priest ; the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) was the son of Aaron, and the fit man who was to lead the goat into the wilderness was the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright), and he never washed his flesh or put off his clothes and had them made clean in that respect, until that night when in the basement of this building that celebrated panegyric was passed upon him which was read in this House the other day. The scapegoat which these gentlemen employed, as an atonement for their sins in being ready to give a preference to the United States instead of to England, was the industries of this country, which they turned loose in the wilderness ; and the industry which most of all was made the scapegoat for their political sins was the woollen industry. That is their record on preferences. They are on record as being in favour of giving a preference to the United States. They are on record as sacrificing Canadian industries in order to give a bogus preference to the mother country—a bogus preference which I do not believe in. I would sooner take the word of Sir John A. Macdonald in regard to the views of the Canadian people in the matter of a preference to England ; and here are his views on that subject, contained in a letter written by him on April 6, 1891 :

> While Canada cannot promise a reduction of duties, she will be quite ready to give British goods a preference in our markets if our products receive a corresponding preference in England.

We hold that view to-day ; the people of Canada believe in it ; and the people of Canada will have no other preference than one which is mutual, as laid down in this statement of Sir John A. Macdonald. Sir John A. Macdonald never needed to sacrifice the interests of Canada ; he had no record which compelled him to do so ; and when it came to an issue between the rights and interests of Canada and the desires of England, he always put the interests of Canada first. If any hon. gentleman doubts that, let him read Pope's history of his life, as I have been reading it in the last few days, especially in connection with the Washington Treaty. He was besought day after day by the English members of the commission to sacrifice the Canadian fisheries ; but he said, 'I will not sacrifice them unless there is proper compensation,' and he stuck to that position to the last, and it is the position of every Conservative in Canada to-day, even in regard to England. We are ready to give concession for concession ; but we do not believe in a one-sided preference such as obtains to-day, which sacrifices Canadian industries and Canadian workmen, and which when analysed is not a tribute to the mother country, but only a tribute of Canadian mills and Canadian workmen to the mills and workmen of Lancashire. Surely, the woollen mill is as good an asset of the empire in Canada as in Lancashire. If it is, it should be kept here, and not transferred to Lancashire. That, I take it, is the feeling of the people of Canada ; that, I know, is the feeling of gentlemen on this side of the House ; and the day will come when the people of Canada will rise almost en masse to have the wrong put right, and to have a preference based on the principle of true mutuality, the principle of giving something for something in return. That is the record of hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to a preference ; and, in contrast to that, I have stated what I think are the views of Conservatives—that we believe in a mutual and not a one-sided preference, and we believe that a woollen mill is of as much value to the empire located in Canada as it is transferred to Lancashire.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. If not, what ?

Mr. MACLEAN. If it continues to injure Canadian industries, I am prepared to repeal that law any day ; and my vote can be had for its repeal to-morrow.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That is the policy of the party ?

Mr. MACLEAN. That is my view of it. I am speaking for myself, and the hon. gentleman will find a great many gentlemen here who will express the same view before this debate is over.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Is it expressed in the amendment ?

Mr. MACLEAN. And this so-called preference to the English manufacturers is not, as a matter of fact, given to them exclusively. The Germans are getting the best of our woollen mills, because on the woollen goods imported into this country 25 per cent of the work is done in England and 75 per cent in Germany; and the thanks we get from Germany is that they are turning Canadian wheat and other food products out of their markets.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Your policy is to repeal it ?

Mr. MACLEAN. My policy is to repeal the one-sided preference.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. And the amendment you offer ?

Mr. MACLEAN. The amendment we offer is exactly on my lines ; it declares for a mutuality of preference.

Now, I want to come to the third feature of the amendment, that is, in regard to a reciprocity of tariffs. An essential feature of the principle of protection in these new and later days is reciprocity of tariffs, or, to put it in another way, reciprocity of treatment. What our relations with Germany are has been already discussed. What are our relations with our neighbours of the United States ? The hon. gentlemen opposite spoke of our friendly relations with the United States. I do not believe they are friendly ; I do not believe they are neighbourly. How do the United States treat us, and how do they treat Great Britain ? What has happened within the last few days on the question of the Nicaragua canal ? The Congress of the United States, through their Senate, undertook within the last three months to abrogate the treaty defining the position of the Nicaragua canal, and to substitute in its place one of their own making ; and if they had succeeded in that, what would have followed ? But they did not succeed. Canada had for the first time a true friend in the Foreign Minister of Great Britain. Lord Lansdowne has become Foreign Minister. He knows the people of the United States, and he knows the people of Canada ; and he knew that if he had surrendered to the United States in regard to the Nicaragua canal, and had allowed the Senate of the United States to interpret the treaty to suit themselves, three weeks would not have gone by until the Senate of the United States would have passed another Act defining the boundary between Alaska and Canada. That is the way the United States, if they were powerful enough, would settle every question between us and them. They are not liberal toward us ; they never have been. They have not been friendly toward us in connection with their coasting laws. They have passed alien labour laws against Canadians. In every way they have been an unfriendly nation. And all the time we have been giving them our markets. Now, the day has come when the people of this country believe in reciprocity of treatment in the matter of trade as between the Americans and ourselves. I myself believe in tariff for tariff.

I believe in the lex talionis—an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth. There is no other way to bring the Americans to their senses and make them respect our rights in connection with our fisheries and the Alaskan boundary and in other respects. There has never been the slightest trace of magnanimity in their attitude towards us or any other smaller country. They are bulldozers, men of sharp practice, they take every advantage of an opponent, and yet the United States is the most vulnerable country on the face of the globe to-day. England could bring the United States to time in an incredibly short period. We import from the United States many things which we could just as well make at home, and England imports many things from that country which she could just as well get elsewhere, and which she could get probably better in her own colonies. And the day she announces to the world, and especially to the United States, that such will be her policy, on that day the American farmer will be brought to his senses and will put the screws on the tail twisters who live in the eastern states of the union. You will never bring the Americans to time until the American farmer finds that he is not going to get into the English market with his wheat and corn and pork and other products. Just as soon as England recognizes the fact—and she is rapidly coming to recognize it—that she is buying from the United States many things which she can make at home or get elsewhere, you will find Uncle Sam on his knees asking England for some kind of reciprocal trade arrangement.

Mr. GERMAN. I thought you were all for protection.

Mr. MACLEAN. So I am, and I say that Uncle Sam is in a position to turn England down just because England is a protectionist and has been foolish enough to give free access to the Americans into her markets, although Uncle Sam puts up a high barrier against the admission of her goods into his territory.

The hon. member for Hants (Mr. Russell), the other night, spoke about the position of England to-day, and depicted her as engaged in a life and death struggle with the United States and Germany. Well, the struggle is between free trade England and protectionist United States and Germany, and if England had the sense to adopt a protective policy, she would soon put an end to that struggle. We, however, are in a position, irrespective of England, to resort to reciprocity tariffs, and I believe that the sentiment of the Conservative party in this country to-day is that the only way to put a stop to our enormous purchases of goods from the United States, which we can manufacture in Canada, is to adopt the policy of tariff for tariff and preference for preference and nothing else. A man named De Witte, who is Finance Minister of Russia, has found out the value of such a policy in the trade relations of his country with the United States. He brought the American republic to time only the other day simply by imposing a retaliatory tariff. And to-day the manufacturers of the United States are doing, what the right hon. gentleman charged our manufacturers with doing at Ottawa—they are going to Washington and asking for tariff tinkering. The strongest representations have been made to Washington to abrogate the countervailing duty on sugar, and these representations are simply due to the course taken by this Finance Minister of Russia, the greatest living exponent of protection to-day, who has found a way of bringing the Americans to their senses, and that is by giving them tariff for tariff. Nations all the world over are finding out that the only way to bring a hostile rival to time is to extend to him the same treatment as he deals out to you—fair treatment for fair treatment, rough treatment for rough treatment, prohibitory tariff for prohibitory tariff.

The United States have a reciprocity clause in their Tariff Bill, and this great protectionist country is enabled by that clause to make trade relations with other countries. We should follow their example. The Liberals have repudiated in this House the efficacy of this doctrine of reciprocity of tariffs. The right hon. the First Minister spoke on this question as follows :

The tariff of the people of Canada is to be determined by the people themselves, not from any consideration of the tariffs of the United States or of other countries, but simply from the consideration of what best suits the Canadian people.

Further on, he said :

Let us face the situation bravely like men, let us resolve that whatever may be the American tariff, we shall be guided only by the measure of what is our own interest in this respect.

There the right hon. gentleman begs the question. The tariff that is in our own interest is a tariff that will keep out American productions and give work to our own people. We are bringing in a hundred million dollars worth of their goods every year, a great deal of which we could make better at home, and the only way to keep out these goods is to adopt a similar tariff to their own.

The hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) spoke of reciprocity, and the good time enjoyed under that policy down in the province of Quebec, and he hoped that we would again obtain reciprocity with our neighbours. Let me simply quote what his leader said last year in this House :

I have no right to speak of what took place in the commission, but I have a right to refer to what is now in the minds of the Canadian people, and if we know the hearts and minds of our people at present, I think I am not making too wide a statement when I say that the general feeling in Canada to-day is not in favour of reciprocity.

Mr. CLARKE. Who said that ?

Mr. MACLEAN. The Prime Minister. I wish now to quote the language of a distinguished authority, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), on this question of reciprocity of tariff. That hon. gentleman went down to Boston last week and made a speech there, and, I find, in the Hamilton Times of March 18th, this report of his speech at the Free Trade League dinner in Boston. The hon. gentleman said:

Canada May Reciprocate.

I do not hesitate to say that if the repressive and ill-liberal policy which has characterized the United States in their dealings with Canada, especially since the passage of the Dingley Bill, continues to be enforced, Canada, failing to secure reciprocal trade, will be likely to adopt a reciprocity tariff of the most drastic character. The greater part of the $62,000,000 worth of manufactures that she imports from the United States can be manufactured in the Dominion, and an increase of duties from her own standard of 25 per cent to the American standard of 50 per cent, would go far to secure this result, and the favourable influence this scale of duty would have upon trade with the mother country could be obviated by the adoption of the rebate of 40 or 50 per cent on the duties in the case of any country that admitted Canadian natural products free of duty.

The question as to what the future relations of the English-speaking people upon the North American continent shall be is one of vast importance. No person who took pride in our race and antecedents and hoped for its happiness and prosperity in the future could be indifferent as to this matter. The trade policy of the United States towards Canada for the last thirty years or more had been one which was not calculated to draw the two peoples together in bonds of amity and friendship. Its practical operation was viewed by the great mass of the Canadian people as unjust, its character was considered narrow and ill-liberal, its tendency has been repellant and its influence had widened the breaches that existed between the two countries, originated animosities and creating as far as its influence extended, a feeling that the reverse of that which the friends of the English-speaking race could desire. He trusted that we might be upon the eve of a change in this respect, and that the overtures which Canada was prepared to make to the United States, and had, indeed, been making for a quarter of a century past, might receive adequate and proper response from the great republic.

Now, there is what a distinguished member of the Liberal party said on this question of reciprocity of tariffs—that our twenty-five years' efforts to get better trade relations with the United States have failed, and we must resort to reciprocity of tariffs. And I agree with him. And the other day in a discussion with some gentlemen interested in the lumber trade, he is reported to have said :

And if the trade relations between these two countries are ever considered again, I believe that the influence that would be exerted upon these negotiations by the imposition of a lumber duty would be a most salutary and a most powerful one. What we need, Mr. Speaker, in dealing with the United States, is to try and secure their respect, and we can never secure their respect unless we have a proper care for our own interests. . . . . We can secure that respect by caring for our own interests in Canada, in the same manner as they care and protect their interests, and if we decide to protect the great industry in Canada as they have decided to protect that industry in their own country, we will secure the respect of the Americans; we will secure the operation of influences upon negotiations which will be of a very important character, and in addition to that, we will do an act of justice to our own people.

Now, if men in this country who profess to be free traders and to uphold free trade doctrines have felt obliged to retrace their steps and take the position now taken by the hon. member for North Norfolk, what have these hon. gentlemen to say when they decline to discuss the question of reciprocity of tariffs and when they say it is not in the public interest. To my mind, as I have said, it is in the public interest, and it is the only way in which we shall get fair treatment from the United States—and the sooner we come to the doctrine of reciprocity of tariffs the better. Hon. gentlemen opposite have taken the other planks of our platform; they might as well come to this one also and put in force not only against Germany, but against the United States. When we do that, we shall get fair treatment and we shall compel the Americans to respect us, to respect our boundaries and to respect our fisheries. And in no other way shall we ever be able to compel them to do it.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Hon. Wm. Paterson). Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean) apply that to all countries ?

Mr. MACLEAN. If it was essential for Canada to apply it to all countries, I certainly would do so. I am a believer in the maximum and minimum tariff. There are a hundred ways in which you can get even with a hostile nation—there are a hundred weapons put in your hands in these days—minimum and maximum tariffs, reciprocity of treatment, drawbacks, bounties and so on. If the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Paterson) will give me a specific case, I will give him a specific answer. But it is clear to me that the people of Canada, the government and the legislature of Canada, ought to be in a position in some way to bring the Americans to time and compel them to give us fair treatment and, if they do not give us fair treatment, to deny them the advantage of our markets.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Does the hon. gentleman mean that he would put the same duties on the goods coming from another country that that country puts on ours ?

Mr. MACLEAN. As I told the hon. gentleman, I would find a way to meet the antagonism of a hostile country. It would not necessarily be by imposing reciprocal duties. Perhaps the increase of our tariff on some articles by 10 per cent would do it.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I mean, in the case of Great Britain, would the hon. gentleman go in for reciprocity of tariffs ?

Mr. MACLEAN. I have already discussed that.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. And what is the hon. gentleman's answer ? Would he have us put the same duties upon British goods that they put upon ours ?

Mr. MACLEAN. Could we not, as the hon. member for North Norfolk suggested, give them the preference that we now do, or even more—40 or 50 per cent ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. But the hon. gentleman spoke of reciprocity of tariffs ?

Mr. MACLEAN. I propose reciprocity of tariffs as against the United States. But we could give England a preference of 50 per cent in order to trade more largely with her and to bring the Americans to time. Why, that is the government's own plan, it is the principle upon which they are working now.

I have endeavoured here to-day—and I am approaching a conclusion—to expound the doctrine of national policy and to show how that national policy can be improved and advanced. We on this side believe in national policy, we believe in protection, we believe in mutual preference and we believe in reciprocity of tariffs. But we also believe that the national policy that is suited to Canada can be extended and expanded into an Imperial policy for Great Britain and her colonies as against the world. That is the new doctrine to-day. Let me repeat it—that the national policy that is suited for Canada can be extended and expanded into an Imperial policy. And that Imperial policy, using these engines of national policy which I have enumerated here to-day, can be employed to build up Canada, to build up Australia, to build up England, to secure markets for the mother country to cause the colonies to become greater, to make Great Britain independent of the hostile nations by which she is surrounded. The right hon. leader of the government said the other day that he believed in that great free trade that would yet come between England and her colonies. Can it come in any other way than by the mother country and her colonies uniting in an Imperial policy for some kind of fairer or freer trade amongst themselves as against the outside world ? It can mean nothing else. Therefore, Canada is giving the keynote to the empire in this amendment—namely, that what we call national policy in this country can be so expanded as to apply to the rest of the empire. Hon. gentlemen opposite say it cannot come, they say that England will never come to protection. I have given some reasons why I think the people of England are moving on that line. And they will learn something from Canada, they will learn something from this debate. And the moment the English people see that there is something in it, the moment they see that the empire can be united as against outside nations, they will make some sort of preferential trade between us and them, and they will find some means of closing their markets to outside and hostile nations. Now, in what does statesmanship consist ? I wish to direct the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to this matter. Statesmanship consists in compromising in some way antagonistic principles. There is a principle of free trade, and there is a principle of protection, and each is advocated by certain doctrinaires. But the statesman finds some way of compromising these principles and of doing something for his country by that compromise.

But England, which has been upholding the doctrine of free trade, and we who are upholding the doctrine of protection, each in our own way, can find a common ground.

What is the common ground ? What will be the cry of the empire from one end to the other ? It will not be free trade, it will not be protection, but it will be fair trade under an Imperial fiscal policy. Fair trade is the keynote, fair trade is the cry in England to-day, fair trade is the cry in Canada to-day; fair trade is involved in every one of those principles which have been laid down here by the opposition. We want first of all to be fair to our own industries, to give them the protection they need. In the next place we want to be fair as between ourselves and the mother country, to give her something and to get something in return. Most of all we wish the empire to be united, to be joined to its colonies, to be fair in its trade with all the world, and all the world to be fair in its trade with the mother land.

Now, in conclusion, I wish to say that Canada has led the empire in many respects. Canada has been given credit for doing many things that were not thought of in England, but are now being worked out. I believe Canada to-day is playing a most important part in the history of the empire by showing that this principle of a national policy, which has been so successful in Canada, can also be employed, in some of the many ways which I have enumerated, by the people of Great Britain. I believe the empire can employ many of these measures and work them out, and thereby make itself stronger and lead the world, instead of losing her supremacy, as she is now doing. I believe she can thereby make herself great and hold her own in the fierce struggle of the nations which is the characteristic of the day. It is not the brotherhood of man that is the characteristic of humanity to-day, it is a struggle for existence between the nations. Let me refer to a paper read recently by the Minister of Justice (Hon. Mr. Mills) in this present government. He said the industrial struggle is so great that only four or five nations will emerge out of it ; Great Britain will be one, the United States will be another, Germany will be the third, Russia will be the fourth, and perhaps Japan will be the fifth, but all the rest must go under. This struggle is on, an industrial war the like of which was never known in the history of mankind, is on to-day. In this great struggle only that nation will survive that looks after its own interests, that resorts to these various protective measures that I have mentioned. Only that nation which will combine its industrial energies and develop them on the best possible lines, will come out of that struggle. It may be that Great Britain will have to go down, she will go down if she maintains her free trade doctrines and allows all outsiders to raid her markets. She must go down if she allows her iron and steel industries to pass into the hands of the United States, if she allows her woollen industries to go down, as they are going now, although we have given some of them back. But if she allows her great industries to be raided by an armed camp of hostile nations, who are becoming themselves intensely industrial, England will have to go down. But I believe England is coming to her sober senses, the doctrines of the Cobden school are being questioned. I believe England to-day is about to retrace her steps, and in some respects to resort to the principles of protection, to resort to the principle of a national policy, and in that way to renew her vigour and fortify herself for the great industrial warfare that is now beginning throughout the world.

Mr. WM. ROCHE (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, I hope that while I sit in this House, I shall not offer myself as an antagonist to anybody. But it seems to be the custom in this debate for speakers to follow each other from opposite sides. I do not consider myself equal to the hon. gentleman who has just preceded me (Mr. Maclean) in knowledge of the abtruse doctrines which he has expounded to us. I do not purpose to follow him through the labyrinth into which he has entered this afternoon, nor to attempt to refute, even if I could, the arguments and theories which he has advanced. Perhaps many of those theories would require a whole evening to discuss and elaborate. I am glad to see that the hon. gentleman has shown evidence of so much research. It does him infinite credit to have taken the pains to investigate the various features of the fiscal policies which we are discussing. I think that all the hon. gentlemen who have taken part in this debate on the other side have bestowed much study on the trade returns, and have evidently resorted to sources of information outside of this Chamber.

Another thing which I was pleased to notice was the fact that the hon. gentleman who has preceded me has studied the Scriptures. The subject which he treated this afternoon is one of deep interest, that was the subject of the scapegoat. If I remember the story aright, the scapegoat was set free in the wilderness. The hon. gentleman says that the industries of Canada are the unhappy scapegoat. Well, if he will let them free according to the divine ordinance concerning the scapegoat, I do not think we will have any cause to quarrel with him. If he will allow the industries of Canada to be free to pursue their own course and to work out their own destiny, we will not quarrel with him.

Now, the hon. and learned gentleman who offered the amendment, the leader of the opposition, referred to the old cynic, Diogenes. He told us that one day Diogenes went through the streets of the city where he lived with a lighted lamp, and when people asked him what he was looking for, he replied that he was looking for a man. Well, perhaps the hon. gentleman was reminded of the story when he looked around among his own followers, and saw the straits they were in. But there is another incident in the history of the great philosopher which it may be useful to refer to. On one occasion he paid a visit to the philosopher Plato. Plato had imported, which was as great a heresy, perhaps, in those times, as it is now, a very elegant Persian carpet. Diogenes, to show his contempt for it, stamped vigorously with his feet and said: I trample on the pride of Plato. Monday, I think, was the visiting day of Mrs. Diogenes. Plato returned the visit. Diogenes had got out his old carpet, and displayed it to Plato in order to shame him because of his luxury and refinement. Plato said to him: I see the pride of Diogenes through the holes in his carpet. Now, the hon. Minister of Finance has brought out his carpet, and has laid it down, all woven in silver and gold tissues, and for ornament in the middle of it, he has placed his $8,000,000 surplus. The learned gentleman from Pictou (Mr. Bell), whose talents I recognize, and the learned gentleman who leads the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax), looked into the old dust hole of the Liberal-Conservative party, drew out the old tattered carpet of the national policy and commenced to beat it. The learned gentleman himself took a sturdy whack at it, the hon. member for Pictou took another beat at it with a pretty long pole, the hon. member for York (Mr. Wallace) vigorously applied the lash to it, and my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean) this afternoon has given it a fresh beating; but, there is no use, because all that will come out of the old national policy carpet is dust, with a liberal assortment of microbes.

Mr. WALLACE. Was it a Liberal assortment of microbes?

Mr. ROCHE (Halifax). Yes, a liberal assortment of microbes. My learned friend from York will excuse me, as my metaphors are not as legitimate a subject of warfare as were the metaphors of the hon. Minister of Finance the other day. In regard to the speech of Mr. Bell, I wish to say a few words. He will excuse me for mentioning his name, and hon. gentlemen opposite will excuse me for mentioning names, because I am not familiar with the constituencies from which they come. I mean no disrespect to them, but I mention their names simply to indicate the gentlemen to whom I refer. Now, the learned gentleman from Pictou (Mr. Bell) admitted that we had this surplus of $8,000,000. He could not dispute that very well, but he admitted it with the best grace he could. When he could not exactly deny that there was a surplus, and I think he had no intention of denying it, he tried to excuse the surplus and to minimize the effect of it in the country by saying that there had been surpluses before in the days of Sir Leonard Tilley, and he found fault, not with the surplus so much, although he intimated that there was some inaccuracy in the calculation, and claimed that there was an excess of money collected from the country by means of the tariff; but, because of the use that was made of the surplus. And here there is a legitimate cause of dispute or of a difference of opinion. He said that Sir Leonard Tilley used the surplus for the reduction of the debt, that Sir Leonard Tilley had also the Riel rebellion to provide for, as well as the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that, having applied sums for the payment of this service and for the reduction of the debt, this was a precedent which should have been followed by the Minister of Finance. Now, there may be cause for difference of opinion on this subject. I do not think that the circumstances will be repeated. Under the same conditions, no doubt, the argument of the hon. gentleman might legitimately apply, but when conditions are different the argument cannot be made to apply. I do not think this governemnt will have another Riel rebellion in the west, and if I can judge from the sentiments of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean) who has preceded me, and the sentiments expressed by other hon. members in the House, the present government will not repeat the bargain which was made with the Canadian Pacific Railway. They will not pay $25,000,000, or grant the numbers of acres of land which the late government gave to the Canadian Pacific Railway. I beg the pardon of the hon. member for Pictou when I state that Sir Leonard Tilley and the Conservative government did not build the Canadian Pacific Railway. I believe that they gave a subsidy towards the building of that railway. I believe they made a donation of land, but they do not own the Canadian Pacific Railway at this moment. It may be that the Canadian Pacific Railway own them, but, from the expressions I have heard lately, and the opinions entertained on this side of the House, I do not believe the Canadian Pacific Railway will own this government. The hon. gentleman who spoke this afternoon laid down some of the essential features of protection, and he gave them with a certain amount of elaboration and in detail. My idea of protection is, that it is the whole of the inhabitants of the state giving, by their influence and by their authority, support to all the industries of the state, and support to all the employment of the people, and to do that in such a way as will employ the energies and resources of the people. Now, we believe that result is best attained by a revenue tariff. Protection, simply and in the abstract, is not the question which we have before this House. The theory of protection is not one which has been employed by the previous government or will be employed by this government. What took place under the national policy? The national policy was the greatest pretense which had ever been exhibited before any civilized people, the greatest hypocrisy, the greatest deceit. What did it profess to do ? It professed to protect the industries of the people. It professed to afford assistance, either positively or negatively, to all the industries of the country, and to all the employments of the people, whereas it did nothing of the kind. It did not assist all the industries of the country. There were a few industries selected that were made the subjects of special care in the measure of protection afforded, but the other industries of Canada were left, like the scapegoat in the wilderness, to find refuge in free trade, or to support themselves on the scant herbage of the deserts of eastern lands. That was the national policy. The people of Canada in 1895 were as sick of the national policy as the people of Canada would be sick of the proposals of my friend from York (Mr. Maclean) if they could be carried into effect. What was the cause of the success of the Liberal party in 1896 ? It was not the racial cry, nor that it attracted the national spirit of Quebec, nor that the Liberals were sufficiently numerous to overcome their opponents ; but it was because the people of Canada were tired of the national policy and distrusted what would become of the country under that highly artificial system. A number of pronounced Conservatives believed that the national policy had worked its purpose and run its course, and rather than it should be allowed to wreck the country they voted for the Liberal government to turn down the national policy and to revive a revenue tariff. That is the reason for the return of this government to power. It was because the so-called friends of the national policy abandoned it and left it to its fate. Now, this national policy which has been lauded by gentlemen on the other side of the House to such an extent, was originally called the American policy. After the conflict between the United States and England, in 1816, the war party in the United States, under Mr. Crawford and Mr. Calhoun, launched what they called the American policy. In 1824 it was introduced into the House of Representatives by that distinguished American statesman Henry Clay, who, in his speech, set out all the arguments in favour of protection as well as any of these gentlemen opposite could do. And Henry Clay enforced his arguments with all the acrimony he could against England. He had been an ambassador to Ghent and had seen the power of England. His country had grappled with the power of England in war, and now the Americans were prepared to grapple with her in peace by means of tariffs. This policy which in Canada is dubbed the national policy was dubbed by Henry Clay and his associates the American policy, and these Americans intended by it, to reduce the pride of England. They intended by it to share in the trade of England, and to participate in all the advantages which would accrue from the growing commerce of the world. One of the principal articles which was aimed at under that American policy was the woollen trade. Henry Clay pictures it in its decay and tells how they were to grow American wool, how they were to put a high duty on British imported cloths, and imported wool, and how they were going to drive the British manufacturers out of the markets of the world. That was in 1824, but where is Great Britain with regard to the woollen trade in 1900 ? Three-quarters of a century after Clay introduced his policy, Great Britain holds the woollen trade of the world, despite the efforts of the United States and despite their great American policy. And when these gentlemen opposite speak of their desire to aid the suffering mother land ; when they speak of their desire to participate in the struggles and the triumphs of the empire ; when they tell us that her interests are ours, and that England and Canada must stand or fall together, I ask them to look back to the arguments of Henry Clay when he inaugurated his policy for the purpose of crippling Great Britain, and I ask them to answer us : If these considerations apply to the present exigencies, and if they will not, before they propose such a policy for the future of Canada, pause, and remember that this policy originated in the United States with the intent to endeavour to cripple the trade of England. The learned gentleman from West York (Mr. Wallace) made war upon a metaphor used by the Finance Minister. The Finance Minister said that perhaps we had seen for the time being as great an era of prosperity as we shall enjoy, that maybe we were on the crest of the wave, that perhaps that prosperity might be temporarily checked, that perhaps we might go on afterwards to a period of expansion ; but in the meantime it might be wise to be cautious. The hon. gentleman from West York (Mr. Wallace) made war upon that metaphor and he said that if we were on the crest of the wave it was the experience of those who had made a sea voyage that when the ship is on the crest of the wave she sinks down rapidly afterwards. Well, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) may have been on the crest of the wave, but I would suggest to him that if the ship went down afterwards he will at least admit that he was half seas over on the occasion. The gentleman (Mr. Wallace) went on to enlarge at great length on the disastrous appearance of the country, and he stated that although we really appeared to be prosperous there were signs on the horizon that that apparent prosperity would soon come to an end. I think the reasons that the hon. gentleman gave for forming that conclusion were insufficient. I think that the leader of the opposition, if he applied his logical and mathematical mind to the subject, would say that they were conclusions formed on insufficient evidence.

What did the hon. gentleman give us as proofs on which he made that deduction? I do not believe that from his standpoint he could have made a more powerful address than he did. The subject was well considered; a great deal of his speech was on the spur of the occasion, and was given with that force which personal encounter evokes; he made, as he ought to make on every occasion, from his knowledge and experience in this House, a deep impression; and it was a pity to see a practical mind, an official mind like his, deluded by the insufficient evidence on which he formed his opinion. He may have had a great deal more in his mind, and he may have given us the result without stating the evidence; but while he stated that the trade in animals was decreasing and that the fisheries were decreasing, he did not give the amounts they were decreasing.

Mr. WALLACE. I did.

Mr. ROCHE (Halifax). I may remark that if our exports diminish in one or two articles, the resources of this country are so large and so varied, and the employments of the people are also so various, that any temporary diminution in the export of any one article is compensated for by an excess of others. That this is the true state of the case was exemplified and proved by the general trade returns of the country, showing that for the period of five years the exports of the country have increased gradually and steadily, and that during the last year they have increased; and, the same thing is true of the imports. Now, these are evidences to a statistical mind like that of the learned gentleman from West York, to prove that he must look further and search deeper for evidence to produce conviction in this House and in the country that the state of the country is a serious or alarming one. There was no such conclusion conveyed by the sentiments he produced; and I am not so silly as to imagine that a gentleman of his character, reputation and experience in the House and the country would bring forward a mere bald opinion without fortifying it with some statistical evidence to justify the conclusions he formed.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ROCHE (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock, I was arguing that the hon. member for West York, instead of forming a judgment from a sufficient number of facts, had rather dipped into the returns for the purpose of making out a case against the government and their policy. The hon. gentleman gave some statistics to show that his contention was borne out by a decline in the exports of fish and animals. I do not mean to insinuate that the hon. gentleman attempted in any way to mislead the House; but I simply say that he arrived at that conclusion from insufficient data. We know that the fishing industry is a most variable one, that it does not depend at all upon tariffs and cannot be affected to any great extent by the policies of governments, but that it depends on the coming of the fish around the shores. Those who live in fishing constituencies know that during the past year the catch of fish was large and general, but that the price declined. From the figures of the official reports, it might be shown that there was a real decline in that industry, whereas the quantity sold and exported may have been equal to that of previous years. In the same way with animals, if the calculation be made merely from the value of the exports in dollars and cents, it may lead to a deceptive conclusion. You require to look carefully into the number of animals shipped and at the state of the market, to judge whether it paid the producers of animals to export them to foreign markets or to have them consumed in Canada. The hon. gentleman drew the deduction that our trade was suffering and that our finances were in a serious if not dangerous condition by stating that where we exported $188,000,000 and imported $199,000,000, the difference of $11,000,000 showed that we were in debt. An hon. gentleman the other day gave some statistics of the shipment of apples to the old country, going carefully into the details—and perhaps I might take that as an illustration. You may select from the whole list of shipments one or two articles of export that show a decline in value or in quantity, while the general aggregate shows that others have been substituted for them, and the whole volume of exports has not declined. For example, suppose a man ships 1,000 barrels of apples at $2 a barrel, and suppose he pays $1 a barrel for freight; that is $3,000; and he obtains for those goods in the market to which they are despatched $4,000. You have a return of $4,000 which would be counted in the imports; whereas if a man ships 1,000 barrels of apples, and they were badly packed or suffered from any of those accidents which sometimes happen to such articles, he might have to sell them in the market to which they were despatched for $2 a barrel; so that he would only obtain $2,000, and the returns would only show imports to the value of $2,000. In the one case we only imported $2,000, whereas in the other case we imported $4,000. Thus, while the statistics of imports and exports in general indicate whether the trade of the country has been prosperous or the reverse, they are not an accurate criterion on all occasions. The balance of trade shown by contrasting the imports with the exports is sometimes a very delusive theory.

In this connection the hon. gentleman from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) gave some statistics, but they were culled and collected in the same way as these I refer to. He took, for instance, the exports of ham and cheese, and although those articles had largely increased in the four years preceding, yet when 1890 was contrasted with 1899 there was a small decrease. But that is not a comparison which can give a correct idea of the trade. You have to take a series of years and take the trade as a whole, and not select some particular articles in which there might be a decrease one year as compared with another.

Besides the amount in dollars and cents of our exports and imports may not represent the real value of the trade. The true value is the amount of profit derived from it, or the return from the material and labour used in producing or trading in the articles exported or imported, so that you cannot arrive at an exact estimate by the volume of statistics, although prima facie and on general principles that is the only means of estimating the production of any country.

The argument is advanced by hon. gentlemen opposite that the 33⅓ per cent preference has not accomplished the purpose intended, and has not come up to the expectations of those who inaugurated that policy. Well, I do not see how such a contention can be maintained, in view of the fact, which is unmistakable, that whereas previously our imports were declining, they have, since the preferential rate was established, recovered from that decline; and although the increase may not have come up to the full volume expected, nobody can say but that this preference has been effective in arresting the decline in our imports from Great Britain.

I fail to understand why hon. gentlemen opposite should lay such stress on the difference between British and American importations. Is it because they wish to encourage the introduction of articles of British manufacture to replace those of American manufacture? But why should they wish to displace the articles of American production? Is not $100,000 of profit derived from trade with our neighbour to the south just as good as if derived from our trade with the English manufacturers? But there are other elements which must be considered besides the mere question of dollars and cents. What has been the cause of the decline of British imports and the increase of American imports? Certainly not the lessening of any affection on our part for Great Britain. Not because we have lost the desire of dealing with British merchants or do not wish to encourage British trade, but because American producers are nearer to us and can give us articles at shorter notice. And there is this element further to be considered, namely, that the Americans have adapted themselves to the requirements of the times, and have taken advantage more promptly of the results of science and the latest achievements and discoveries in arts, and the application of new forces. They make better and lighter implements than the English. The English manufacturers adhere too much to the old style of cumbrous material, and do not consult to the same extent the requirements of consumers. Neither do they take so much pains to secure markets in the colonies and elsewhere as do their German and American competitors. They do not send out travelling agents with cuts of their instruments to solicit trade, as the Americans do. Owing to the rapidity with which his goods are produced and their adaptation to the circumstances of the country, the American manufacturer has to a great extent displaced the British manufacturer. That, however, is not going to continue. John Bull has no desire to see his exports declining. Although he exerts his material force in the acquisition of territory, he is quite as active in extending and securing by the arts of peace, markets for his manufactured products, and depend upon it he is still in the race. What science, skill, labour and capital can do to secure supremacy in the commercial world, he will be sure not to neglect. I have no fear for England.

To come back to a subject which was discussed this afternoon with a considerable degree of novelty and force, I would like to know if the hon. leader of the opposition coincides entirely in the sentiments expressed by the hon. gentleman from East York (Mr. Maclean). Is he prepared to go into a war of retaliation with the United States? Is he prepared to give his endorsation to that propaganda of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth? I should like to know if the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden) estimates, as the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) does, the value of American trade. In the locality from which I come, we attach a great deal of importance to the American trade, and I think the hon. leader of the opposition holds it in similar esteem. There is not merely the dollars and cents view to be considered. That trade has quite another value. We know that Great Britain values highly the friendship of America. We know that Great Britain depends upon the neutrality of the United States in carrying out her schemes of foreign policy. The other nations of Europe are antagonistic and ready to combine in order to limit the power and reduce the prestige of England, and Great Britain depends on the sympathy of our American neighbours. Is there anybody here then who would disturb that mutual good feeling?

When the statesmen of Great Britain counsel peace and good-will, would he like to stand on the floor of the Commons and advocate a policy of retaliation, of attack, of ill-feeling? We know that in every country there are men who are ready to stand up for an aggressive programme. We know that there are men—I would not like to call them fire eaters—who do not calculate on the results that may follow a little ill-feeling, who do not realize that that ill-feeling may be taken up by moderate men and so extend until the surface movement, the sentiment which carries everything before it, sweeps on and hurries the nation into an unfriendly attitude and sometimes into war. I am sure the hon. gentleman does not intend anything of that kind—he does not mean anything rash or provocative. I know that the learned leader of the opposition does not intend anything of the kind. How many millions is a friendly feeling in the United States worth to Canada? Is it not worth all the difference between our aggregate trade with Great Britain and our aggregate trade with the United States? How many millions would it cost Canada to put herself into a position of defence in case of any hostile feeling arising in the United States? Would not such a thing be disastrous to all our interests? What, then, could be worse in the interests of Canada than that it should appear that such a feeling had been expressed in the parliament of Canada or promoted by men who are known as public representatives and Canadian statesmen?

In the province which I belong to, and the neighbouring province of New Brunswick, almost every article of our productions finds a market in the United States. They take our lumber, they take our coal, they take our fish, and the kinds of fish that are not taken in any other market, they take our gypsum—in fact, they take a liberal proportion of all the articles we produce. All this does not interfere in the slightest degree with out trade with England—it is larger markets we want. What does the United States take from the province of New Brunswick? Their lumber and fish and many other articles of which they have an excess. We wish to maintain, therefore, the most friendly trade relations with the United States. Nothing should be done to irritate them or to provoke them or induce them to make prohibitory legislation, or in the slightest degree interfere with the volume of exports we send to that country. What do we do for the province of Ontario and the North-west? One would think, from the utterances of some hon. gentlemen in this House, that patriotism was a sentiment that commenced about fifty miles west of Toronto and ended about twenty miles east of it. If you go to Halifax and visit the large sheds of the Intercolonial Railway, you will see that the province of Nova Scotia takes a very liberal proportion of the productions of Ontario. We get our breadstuffs from Ontario and the west; we take Ontario's oats, bran and other grain, we take furniture, we take poultry, we take beef, we take dry goods, we take farm implements, and a liberal supply of them, we take carriages, we take musical instruments—we take every class of goods produced in Ontario. We take them liberally and without stint, and we pay a good price, and we pay for them when we get them—for they take good care to draw at short-sight. From Montreal also, we take the woollen goods which are produced in the manufactories of Ontario as well as a large proportion of imported British goods, some of which are imported through Montreal while others are imported direct. And what does Ontario take from us? Nothing. What does Montreal take? It takes some of the coal from Cape Breton and a very small proportion of the fish we have, and that is all. So, a large part of our goods find a market in the United States, and we wish nothing to be done to hurt their feelings, to irritate them nor to bring about retaliation or reprisal or in any way to lessen the friendly feeling and so injure the trade we carry on with that great country.

I said in my opening remarks that the national policy was a tremendous deception, and I wish to repeat that remark without intending to give offence to anybody who thinks that that measure was of great importance and value. It was a deception in this respect—that those who advocated it endeavoured to identify it with protection, that is to say, they tried to make it appear it was of the essence of protection to Canadian manufacturers. As a matter of fact, it was nothing of the kind. It did not protect the interest of the country generally, nor even all the industrial interests. It pretended to protect industries generally, but the actual effect of it was to select certain industries for special concessions. In other cases, the duties were high enough to extract a maximum of taxation from the consumer, but low enough to allow the articles to come in from abroad. If these concessions had been extended to all the industries, we could not have found such great fault with the policy. I do not find such great fault with the first proposition from the hon. leader of the opposition. Nobody can differ with him as to the point. If we could obtain the markets of the world to the extent of our productions while retaining the privileges of charging duties on articles coming in from other countries, of course, we could build up a most flourishing trade. But, unfortunately for us, the other countries have the right of making their own tariffs, and they do not wish to see Canada flourishing at their expense; they do not wish to see us enjoy a prohibitive tariff against all the rest of the world, because that would be too much of a good thing. They want to have a share of the profits of manufacturing, they want to take part of the trade, they do not wish Canada to enjoy all the advantages under a system of that kind. That would indeed be a jug-handled protection, with a good deal of the jug and very little of the handle.

Now, hon. gentlemen opposite have suggested to us, and dwelt upon it with a good deal of energy, that all we have to do is to ask with sufficient persistence from the Imperial government and we will be allowed to send our productions into Great Britain on the most favourable terms, and she will allow us to maintain a protective tariff against her goods. Now, suppose we went over to Great Britain for that purpose; suppose we sent an emissary over there in the person of the hon. member for East York. I presume he would not refuse to undertake the mission, if he could thereby secure a title to his name, and the right to embellish himself with an ermine robe. Suppose he went over there and had an interview with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach. Our envoy would say to him: You are importing into your country a large quantity of tea on which you collect a duty of £19,000,000. Sir Michael Hicks-Beach would say to him: I want to increase my revenue, I want to get a larger amount than £19,000,000. Our envoy would say: There is a duty can be placed on American grain of £12,000,000. Sir Michael would say: Do you wish to introduce your Canadian grain? And our representative would say: Yes, most certainly. Well, Sir Michael would say, if you bring in your Canadian grain, and that is the object you have in view, I cannot get my £12,000,000, because you will supply the market and keep out American grain. If you bring in part Canadian grain I will only have a portion of my revenue, and you will not effect the object which you have in view in bringing in your grain. What would become of the millions of manufactured goods which we send to the United States, if we were to erect a hostile tariff against the grain of the United States and their raw material? That would be an obstacle, because if there is one thing which the British public regards with immense satisfaction, it is the fact that in spite of all the efforts of the Americans, the cheapness of their production and other causes, the British manufacturers are able to send a large amount of goods into the American market. I think that would be an answer to the question. Of course, if we could procure that market it would be most invaluable to us. But these treaties have to be made, and these customs have to be met. The hon. member for York could not make an arrangement with the mother country without she were willing. They have the initiative, and I think this proposal, if made from Canada, would be answered in that way, that they could not afford to burden their people with an extra duty, that they could not allow the price of bread to be raised to their artisans by the loss of American trade. But, suppose that our emissary was persevering, and said to Mr. Chamberlain: Mr. Chamberlain, I am desirous to conduct a propaganda among your people, I would like to show them—not from sentiment, because sentiment is discarded in this case—that it is to their advantage to receive Canadian grain instead of American grain. Suppose that Mr. Chamberlain asked our representative to address a meeting in Birmingham. I dare say they could collect a large meeting there. Suppose our representative said to them: We propose to you workingmen that you should abandon your tea duty, and that you should use Canadian grain, and should put a duty upon American grain. It will not make much difference in your sixpenny loaf. I can imagine that after making such an address to a meeting of workingmen, one of them would stand up and say: What has that got to do with our loaf of bread? Do you propose that we should drink tea all the time, and that we should put a duty on our bread? What are you going to give us in exchange for putting a duty on American grain? Are you going to allow us to take our manufactures into Canada free of duty in return for the free entry of Canadian grain? No, sir, we will go back to our beer, we will not drink any more tea, and we will send our goods to the markets where they will be received on equal terms.

Now, if we had the power to compel other countries to receive our goods, and if we could at the same time enjoy protection upon our articles, we would be a flourishing community, no doubt.

The hon. member for East York went on to say that the duty on sugar coming to this country was too high, and ought to be reduced, that a large sum ought to be taken off the duty on sugar, a million dollars, I think he said. He went on to say: Suppose that we were in power, we would take off the duty. Now, I would like to know how that comports with the policy of the hon. and learned leader of the opposition, a pronounced policy of protection. One hon. gentleman wants to take the duty off sugar, and another advocates a pronounced policy of protection. How would a proposal to take the duty off sugar suit the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule), who gave us, the other day, an exhaustive speech on the beet-root sugar question? If our trade with Germany is to be maintained, how can we keep out sugar from Germany?

How do these two agree? The hon. member from East York says that about $12,000,000 are going to be saved to the consumers of this country, that the whole price of the sugar consumption is going to be saved because these beets are to be grown in Canada. It would be very consoling to the beet-root sugar producers that the German beet-root sugar importation is going to be maintained or increased on the one hand, and that on the other they are going to produce the beets which will keep out the article that constitutes the bulk of our trade with that great nation. Now, there was, about the year 1878, an election to be held in the city of Halifax, and two gentlemen, most excellent representatives of that city were seeking the suffrages of the electors. Both of these gentlemen have since been honoured with the title of lieutenant-governor. I allude to Sir M. B. Daly and the Hon. Mr. Ritchie, who were successively lieutenant-governors of Nova Scotia. I do not see any reason why there should be any fault found in such a succession. If all the members for Halifax have been honoured with high degrees and emoluments, I do not see any reason why the representatives of the city of Halifax should fail in the slightest degree in receiving these honours when their time as representatives in this parliament has passed. I do not object to hon. gentlemen opposite making them lieutenant-governors. But, in that election, in the cards which were sent out by the Liberal-Conservative party inviting support for these candidates who were most eligible and reputable gentlemen, there was the plank set forth that the national policy was to secure the protection and improvement of our languishing West Indian trade. What has become of that ? Where is that in this programme? The hon. member for East York is going to supply the whole consumption of beet-root sugar and reduce the duty on beet-root sugar, that comes from Germany. How does that allow our languishing West Indian trade to be restored ? There is no provision made for it. If the beets come into the consumption and displace the beet-root sugar imported it will also displace the cane sugar imported from the West Indies. The promises which were held out to us under the national policy in that respect have not been verified, because the trade has been diminishing until it has reached a very low point. It may be restored. I cannot say how it will be done, but I leave it to these gentlemen who are so much concerned about it to show us some feasible plan by which these conflicting interests can be reconciled, and by which our unfortunate province and city will receive the benefits promised to us in 1878 from an increase in our trade with the West Indies. I know that in the explanation which was given of the decrease of our trade with the West Indies hon. gentlemen have not taken into account the fact that two of our principal markets have been wrested away from us, that the Islands of Porto Rico and Cuba are in the possession of the United States, while they were formerly possessions of Spain, and the trade which formerly went to them has now to pass through United States channels. Are we going to antagonize the United States in regard to that trade? Are we going to have that trade shut out from us if we flaunt our tariff in the faces of the people of the United States, and if we do, may they not cut us off from the enjoyment of the trade with their islands ? This is of great importance to the fishermen of Nova Scotia and to the people of New Brunswick, and I would like to ask the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) how he would justify it before his constituents if, as the result of the adoption of his measure favouring such pronounced protection, that valuable trade should be cut off from the province of Nova Scotia, in order to carry out a theory which looks remarkably like a very utopian experiment. The hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), who spoke the other night, gave us similar reasons why our trade is in a very dangerous and languishing state, and why we should recognize the wisdom of calling a halt in our expenditures. He told us, that, in the year 1899, we exported $8,400,000 worth of hams, and that, in 1900, we only exported $2,700,000 worth. As in the case of cheese, I would attribute this to some local circumstances which do not indicate any permanent reduction in the volume of our exports. I think this does not indicate that we have lost any of our markets. It does not indicate that any neglect is chargeable to the government, it does not indicate a failure of transportation facilities, or of any of the conditions which are favourable to the reception of any of these articles in the market. It may be that the farmers have sold their hog products in other markets, or that more have been consumed here, or that they have found it profitable to raise other products. It may be that the decline in the export of cheese has been a decline in the quality of the cheese. It may be that the cheese is not up to the sample which was previously maintained. I am informed by farmers that some of the producers and shippers of cheese have been very negligent both as to the quality of the article and as to the way in which the packages have been sent to the old country. I have not derived my information from statistics, I have not taken my information second-hand, but I have inquired of the people who purchase these products in the market. I have inquired of the people in various employments about the reception which our cheese and dairy products have been given in England. The sentiment of regard for Canada has had a great effect because, throughout all classes of the population of Great Britain, amongst the merchants, the public men, the artisans, the ship men, the shipping merchants and the carriers, that sentiment is found to exist very strongly. So great is the regard for Canadian products that a great many of the shop-keepers in England take inferior American products and label them 'Canadian.' But, that sentiment, to some extent, has been destroyed by the fact that some dealers have sent over articles that were not what they ought to be, and the consequence has been that people, who were disposed to favour Canadian products in recognition of the preference which Canada has given to British goods, have found the quality of some Canadian goods not what it should have been, have regarded these goods as being fraudulent, and have rejected them on that account. The hon. member for East Simcoe went on to argue that the policy of this government was defective because a quantity of goods consumed by the poor man was subject to high rates of duty, while the luxuries which are consumed by the rich, come in at reduced rates. He referred to the article of silk, which had come in to the value of $3,000,000, which has now risen to the value of $5,000,000, and he regarded this as a proof that the preferential tariff is injurious to the working classes. I do not think this is a proof at all.

What lady in the land does not wish to have a silk dress ? What sweetheart of any gentleman opposite would think herself ornamented without a silk dress, and so it is that that which was formerly an article of luxury for the rich is now an object of common desire, and even the sweetheart of a workingman would feel herself degraded if her best gown was not of silk. One gentleman on the other side of the House thought the Liberal policy was defective because the importation of diamonds had increased while the import of articles consumed by the poor had decreased. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman is married or not, I hope he is ; but if he was going to bring a present to his wife at the close of this arduous session of parliament, and he selected a diamond, would he not be thankful that the duty was so low that he could afford to buy that diamond for the lady whom he loved. Now, Mr. Speaker, we must do something for the women ; we must do something for the ladies of the land ; for the working-women of the land. The diamonds which were formerly the luxury of the rich are now common property to the middle classes, and they try to save up money to buy things of that kind. The articles used by ladies for their ornamentation should be at least equally considered with the Corby's 'I.X.L.' or 'Seagram's White Wheat,' for instance, with which we regale ourselves and reinforce our energies.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I shall say a word about the racial cry. I regret that the racial cry should be raised by either political party. In my province in the amiable contest which took place between the leader of the opposition and myself to determine which was the more popular, because we had no great difference otherwise, there was no racial cry raised. We never said a disrespectful word of each other so far as I know, and I hope we never will. I esteem the talent of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden, Halifax). I hope he will render good service to his country and that honours will be bestowed on him in return. I wish him well. I wish every Nova Scotian well because the country is beginning to appreciate the merits of Nova Scotians, and I hope we will all come in for our appreciation in turn. The racial cry did not penetrate the province of Nova Scotia. No party in this country can afford to resurrect it, because it is dead and buried, and there let it rest. Mr. Speaker, I believe in the tariff policy of the government. I believe in the revenue system, and I believe that as a result of the Liberal policy the country is prospering in a steady and uniform way. I have confidence in the men who lead the Liberal party. I like their appearance since I saw them here ; I like their devotion to duty ; I like the way they grasp the details of their departments. I venerate the esteemed leader of the Liberal party.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. ROCHE (Halifax). I believe in the Liberal policy and I believe that that policy wisely administered along the lines of the natural resources of our country, will tend to great and lasting prosperity. I believe that our country under Liberal rule will go on in its career of progress and will become a valuable component of the British Empire. I believe that British statesmen and the British people will have confidence in our Canadian statesmen and in their policy, and that united hand in hand we will go forward in our great career of progress, peace and prosperity.

Mr. W. R. BROCK (Centre Toronto). Mr. Speaker, in entering public life as a representative of the people, I am very fortunate to be allied to a political party who have nothing to be ashamed of in their past, and who have no apologies to make for the present. The Conservative party of Canada do not require to announce their policy, or to say what changes they are going to make. The people of the Dominion know, as they have always known, what the Conservative policy is. The right hon. the leader of the government said in this debate, that in the streets of this city and in the corridors of the House there was great sensation and excitement at the rumour that something extraordinary was going to happen, for the Conservative party was going to spring something new upon the country, but he had found after all—and for my part I am happy he found it—that the policy we had to announce was the policy that had made this country prosperous for a quarter of a century. Sir, there was nothing to sneer at in that. The hon. gentleman from Halifax (Mr. Roche) stated that the people of Canada were sick of the national policy. Most extraordinary that. If the people were sick of it why have the present government retained so much of it? If the Liberals were sick of the national policy why have they made so few changes in it, as they themselves tell us? If the national policy nauseated the Liberals, why is it that every canvasser for the Reform party found it necessary to go into every factory in this country and to assure every manufacturer that if the Liberals got into power there was going to be no change in that policy.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BROCK. We know that a member of the Conservative party in the North-west took it upon himself to say that if he got into power he would reduce the duty on agricultural implements, and we know what a howl went up from the agricultural implement makers of Ontario, the friends of the present government. Yes, Mr. Speaker, these agricultural implement makers were friendly to the government and they have been rewarded for their friendship. By the appointment of a member of that great agricultural implement firm as a senator, the present government have done this country honour, because the gentleman they have appointed well deserves the office. We know how the Reform party repudiated the idea of adding anything to the burdens of the people of Manitoba and the North-west.

But I wish more particularly to address myself, as a business man, to a subject which I think I know something about, and in which I am largely interested, that is, the development of the industries of this country. I contend that when the right hon. leader of the government did himself so much honour and this country so much credit in representing Canada at the Diamond Jubilee, he made one of the great mistakes of his life, not only for himself, but for this country. An opportunity was then offered such as we never had before for making an arrangement, or approaching an arrangement, with the great empire to which we belong for obtaining a preference in their markets in return for the preference we were willing to give to them. I have noticed a good deal of jocularity on the other side of the House on this subject, and some argument that England would never do anything of the kind. Why, England is doing something of the kind every day. This country and other countries have preferences in the English market.

An hon. MEMBER. How?

Mr. BROCK. Great Britain bonuses steamship companies to help the postal system and the commercial interests of this country. In speaking of an alliance with the Conservative party—because that is involved in the resolution which is before the House—I am pleased to be a member of a party which need not be ashamed of its consistency when the history of this country comes to be written. Can hon. gentlemen on the other side say the same? Are they at one among themselves at the present time? Did we not hear the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Holmes) speak out strongly in favour of complete free trade? My hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Heyd) told the government the other day that they had made a great mistake in taking the duty off binder twine; and another hon. gentleman last night, in addressing the House, turned to the members on his own side and stated that they were not at one—that many of them were too much inclined to favour the national policy. Therefore, it gives me the greatest pleasure to know that we on this side of the House are at one in our policy. We are following our leader loyally.

The hon. Minister of Finance, in his admirable address, stated that amongst the items of income was a large increase of duty on manufactured goods coming into this country. The farmers, the manufacturers and every other interest in this country know what that means. It means the displacement to that extent of goods manufactured in this country by Canadian people. The gentlemen on the other side cannot be unaware of this fact. I think the hon. Minister of Finance and other members of the government have been waited upon by deputations representing some of the largest industries in Canada, who laid before them in the strongest possible light the serious position in which the government by their policy was placing them. When the government first announced the preference of 12½ per cent, I am free to acknowledge that it was hardly noticed. Many of us were so delighted with the idea of giving a preference to England that for the moment we were carried away largely by sentiment, and I must acknowledge feeling something of that sentiment myself; for it was the first time that we had any indication from hon. gentlemen opposite that their inclinations did not run with that of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, who would rather be allied commercially with the country to the south of us. Instead of hon. gentlemen opposite being sick of the national policy, I can assure them that the people who are sick in this country at the present time are the manufacturers—not in one line alone, but in many lines. Take the manufacturers of woollens, one of the largest industries in this country, having millions of dollars invested in plant, machinery and buildings, having educated thousands, I might say hundreds of thousands, of the most respectable mechanics in this country, and having given employment to large numbers of people, women as well as men. In injuring a large woollen mill in a town, you may say you are only injuring that woollen mill, and you may care very little for it, but remember, you are injuring every other industry in that town and in the surrounding country. There is a great deal of talk about getting new markets ; but my experience in a business career of fifty years in this country is, that the best market is the market nearest to your door. At the present time we have deputations coming here in regard to clearing a passage down the St. Lawrence, and getting rid of the high rates for freight and insurance. All these things have to be paid for by the farmers of this country, and the way to avoid them is to avoid these enormous imports which the Finance Minister is priding himself on. I was very much surprised when the hon. minister declared plainly and simply, but very strongly, that there would be no change in the tariff. I almost fancied that I detected a smile of gratification on his face at being able to strike back at the manufacturers of this country. What object has the hon. gentleman in striking at any of these great industries ? The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright)—I am sorry he is not here—is well aware that, by the votes and influence of the manufacturers of this country, his party were kept in the cold shades of opposition for nearly twenty years, and they cannot forget it.

An hon. MEMBER. Is it cold over there?

Mr. BROCK. Yes, you found it very cold This House knows very well that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has felt very sore at the action of the manufacturers of this country. We have his own express words, and he cannot get rid of them, that he would get back at the manufacturers. that he would do away with every vestige of protection. Is that not getting back at the manufacturers of this country ? The right hon. Prime Minister, in his address the other day, spoke of the manufacturers who were invading this House and this city as tariff tinkers. Well, Sir, I contend that this country should be governed on business principles ; and if it becomes necessary to deal with the tariff in the interest of the country, the tariff should be tinkered with. When gentlemen representing millions of capital and hundreds of thousands of people, come here and explain to the Minister of Finance how their industries are being injured, and when he has letters from the leading bankers of the country supporting their cause, the hon. minister passes them all by with a wave of his hand and sends them back home. I can assure this House that there is a very critical state of affairs in the manufacturing industries of this country. You know what credit means : you know that it requires money to carry on almost any business : and there is no class of business people who require more capital than the manufacturers of woollen, cotton and other goods.

Once the banks and the financial institutions lose confidence in them, these industries are injured to a greater extent than can be repaired by any tinkering with our tariff. There is surely some way out of the difficulty, hon. gentlemen will say, for I think even the Finance Minister will acknowledge that there is a difficulty. I think these hon. gentlemen have acknowledged that there is at any rate some measure of injustice, and I suppose they would ask a practical man what is the way out of the difficulty. There are several ways out of it. The worst way is to shut up the factories, but it is far better to have a factory shut than to run it at a loss. Another way would be to run the factories on half time, but everybody knows what it means to run on half time a factory fully equipped with machinery. If we cannot compete with the manufacturers of Yorkshire now, we could not compete with them if we adopt that course. There is another way and that is the one which will have to be taken. To begin with, we will have to reduce the wages of every employee, at any rate one-third. There is no escape from that. I have been in communication with some of the keenest manufacturers, some of whom, I am sorry to say, have been, for the last eighteen years, strong supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not know exactly where their political sympathies may be now, but when asked why they supported this government, they replied that it was because the party opposite promised them a market of 70,000,000 people. It was because they were promised unrestricted reciprocity. Support us, said these hon. gentlemen opposite, and you need not care so much for your Canadian market, as we will open to you a market of 70,000,000 people. Therefore many honest Reformers supported the government on this consideration. But I was saying that we will have to reduce the wages of our workingmen, and that is something which a really first-class workingman will not put up with. Botchers may, but first-class workers will not allow their wages to be reduced, and will go to the neighbouring republic, which enjoys the highest protection in the world, and holds out the largest inducements to workingmen. And I say that this government, in adopting the brutal measure they have, are driving these men out of the country, ruining thousands of manufacturers, and bringing desolation to many homes. I want you to understand, Sir, that in all the factory centres of the country, the leading men have their cottages and houses quite close to the factories. Take the town of Waterloo, there the workingmen have their houses in the town, some partly and some altogether paid for, and they are thus tied to the locality. These men will have to suffer considerably if forced to sell their property, because in most cases these properties will be absolutely unsaleable. You know what a closed factory means. Take one of these factories that is mortgaged to the extent of one-half its value, should that factory be closed the mortgagee could not realize the amount of his hypothec if he were to sell it.

No one who knows me for the last quarter of a century will say that I am inclined to be pessimistic. My ambition has always been to hold up the best interests of Canada. In all my business I have endeavoured to assert the interests of Canada in preference to those of any other country, and it is very poor encouragement to those who are trying to build up our manufacturing interests to find the government adopting a policy calculated to nullify all their efforts. What we are trying to do is to make Canada, not a cheap, but a good country to live in. Before 1896, hon. gentlemen on the other side preached the doctrine in every corner of the land that the duty of the government was to make this a cheap country to live in. Well, Mr. Speaker, prosperous countries are not cheap countries to live in. Just as soon as Germany became prosperous, living in it became more expensive, but you could not induce any German to go back to twenty-five years ago when that country was a cheap one to live in.

I cannot understand how any one representing a manufacturing constituency, or in fact any constituency, can justify himself in giving his support to the gentlemen on the other side, if he is really a Canadian at heart. The preference which the right hon. leader of this House has given to England in the markets of this country is no preference to Great Britain or the British Empire—it is no Imperial preference at all. As my hon. friend from East York has pointed out, are we not a part of the empire. Why, then, should we give the manufacturers in Yorkshire an advantage over the manufacturers in this country, and it is seriously to the detriment of manufacturers in this country that this preference is given. But it is not only a preference to the Yorkshire manufacturers. I know of cases where hundreds of pieces of goods have been brought into Yorkshire from Germany, partly manufactured. They were then run through a machine, weighted up a few ounces to the yard, finished and sent out to this country, and 75 per cent of the preference went to Germany. In many cases German manufacturers at present are sending many fancy goods to London, Eng., with a small machine to do a little finishing, after which they are sent out to Canada as British manufactures. It is impossible to get at all the details of the ways in which this thing is being done, but the door is wide open for that sort of practice. I know of one case where a large quantity of granite supposed to have come from Aberdeen, really came from Norway, and was then sent to Aberdeen, where a little work was done on it, after which it was exported to this country to the detriment of the granite industry of New Brunswick and the eastern townships of the province of Quebec. That is another industry which is being injured, and in which the establishments in many cases will have to be closed and a number of workingmen discharged. And all this is due to this preference for which hon. gentlemen opposite take so much credit.

These hon. gentlemen throw across the House the rather cheap question : Why do you not move a vote of want of confidence? Why do you not move to cancel the preference ? Well, if my individual opinion is asked, I would assuredly, inasmuch as I think it is an injury, consider it my duty to do away with it. You will not get any cheap popularity through Ontario by preaching that you are giving a great preference to England. In Ontario, the people who read and who have made what money they have by hard work and industry, will understand the pettiness of that pretended preference.

The difference, to my mind, between the two sides of this House—for there are really but two parties in this country, and I think everybody who wants to have any influence should belong to either one or the other—the difference seems to be that the Liberal members of this House say that our tariff at present is only a revenue tariff. The Finance Minister knows that that is not the case. If it be only a revenue tariff, why raise millions of revenue over your expenditure ? If these hon. gentlemen are free traders, why do they not practice free trade ? I know that they found great fault with the Conservative government some years ago for having given to every one in Canada a free breakfast table. You may call them free traders in that ; but the Conservative party had consideration for the people, for the manufacturer, for every industry in this country—most of all had they consideration for the farmers of this country. We hear a good deal of the differences of opinion amongst the lumbermen here, and I think that the Finance Minister has had his hands full arguing with all those different people who have come to see him and give him reasons why he should give them a preference tariff. I think the reason for the Finance Minister's position is that hon. gentlemen opposite, after years of inconsistency, are endeavouring now, if possible, at the expense of the manufacturers—as my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) says, making a scapegoat of the manufacturers—to cover themselves with a mantle of consistency. But it is too late ; they are too well known. When the history of the last ten or fifteen years comes to be written, and the people judge dispassionately between the parties, I would rather sit on this side of the House for twenty-five years than to take the place of hon. gentlemen opposite with their record. I would not like to hand down to my successors a reputation for making promises in order to get into power and neglecting to carry them out after attaining power ; a reputation for having advocated any number of principles and discarded every one of them. I say here, as a business man, that these hon. gentlemen sit on the Treasury benches without one particle of principle, except that principle of opportunism, which is the meanest kind of principle.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of taking up the time of the House except to put before the House, as I have said, my views as a business man ; views, that, I believe, are entertained by many business men whose sympathies in other respects, are with hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. I believe that these hon. gentlemen are going to find a great deal of difficulty in explaining their opposition to the amendment resolutions now before the House, for many of them have supported these principles not only privately but publicly for the last twenty years. But we know what politics are, we know the influence that is brought to bear when men come to this House. I can respect a man who comes here stating: I have been a supporter of the national policy as it was; I shall be a supporter of the national policy as it is. In taking that position, a man will have the respect of his own constituents, even if he has been elected as a Reformer.

Mr. HEYD. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Brock) allow me to ask him a question ?

Mr. BROCK. Certainly.

Mr. HEYD. How would a preference in Britain on certain Canadian products lessen the competition that the manufacturers are now subjected to in consequence of the British preference ?

Mr. BROCK. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Heyd) just consider the matter for a moment ? I have contended that the best market in any country, not only in Canada, a country, of immense extent, but even in a section of a country—is the market immediately at one's own doors. If we have fair competition to deal with, the Canadian manufacturers are not afraid of it. Put us on a level with the British manufacturers. The class of people they employ is different from ours, and the wages are about half what we pay. They have other great advantages. Take, for instance, the article of coal—they get coal more cheaply than we can get it, which is most important considering the great quantity that a factory uses, and, owing to the coldness of our climate we require more than they do. The manufacturers in Yorkshire—and any one who has lived there knows that I am stating the case accurately—pays for his money very seldom more than 2½ per cent—they get it at even less than the bank rate. I am happy to say that the paper of the merchants of this country is so good that the manufacturers can take it to London and have it discounted at one per cent below the market rate. Take the manufacturer here, particularly if he is hard up and wants the money, what will money cost him ? I suppose that the cheapest he can get it will be 8 per cent. If he does not want it very badly, I suppose he can get it a little cheaper. So, you will see that in advocating the case of the manufacturers I am doing it upon grounds of absolute justice apart from politics. And I do appeal to the Minister of Finance, who, according to the feeling throughout the country is himself the chief stumbling-block in the way. I do not know whether it is parliamentary to make an assertion of that kind, but that is the situation. The look on the hon. gentleman's face when he turned to this side of the House and said there would be no change in the duties, made me feel that he was the power in the cabinet that fought against the poor manufacturers. I would appeal to him to remember that they are Canadians and his fellow-countrymen, that he should represent them here and in every way endeavour to prevent injury coming to them. Even yet it may not be too late, even yet he may give us some measure of relief ; and I think I may appeal to him, not as from this side of the House, because the strongest appeal comes from hon. gentlemen on the other side—to forget his free trade theories for a time and practice a little of that protection which the leader of the opposition has put into these resolutions.

Mr. WM. ROSS (South Ontario). Mr. Speaker, I know that I have no apology to make for standing here, but I crave your consideration and the indulgence of hon. members while, for a few minutes, I discuss the questions which are so vital to the interests of us all. I am extremely sorry that I cannot agree with the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Brock). We do agree on everything else but politics. I have the pleasure of buying his dry goods, and he sells good dry goods ; I have the pleasure of knowing him as a gentleman and a friend, and he is a good friend and a gentleman. But I must confess that I do not admire his politics, and in that we agree to disagree. When he says that this government have been faithless, that they have not kept their promises, that the party they represent is not worthy the consideration of this country, I disagree from him entirely. He tells about the Conservative party having the same old policy. It is the same old policy—and considering the wonderful development of the country for the last four years, that party is likely to have the same old policy for many years to come. The hon. gentleman tells about the methods adopted in the last election in canvassing for votes in Ontario—that we went to the factories and promised that if the Liberal party was returned to power, there would be increased protection, or something of that kind.

Mr. BROCK. A continuation of the old tariff.

Mr. ROSS (Ontario). Very well, I am glad to be corrected. During the election I went into several factories in my constituency. I had the pleasure of going through the largest carriage factory in Canada, and one of the largest in the world. I had the pleasure of being permitted to speak to those workingmen and to ask them for their votes, and I am sure the question of a tariff change never came up at all. I addressed those men in that town and talked upon the public questions of the day, and in doing so the question of preferential trade came up. I supported preferential trade with all my might and main, conscientiously believing that it has been a good thing for this country, and that what was good for the Reformers was good for the Conservatives as well. Now, I know the hon. member for Centre Toronto is largely interested in manufactures. I know that he feels keenly upon this question, and I imagine that in his utterances with regard to it the instinct of self-preservation has, perhaps, come to the top. Are there no other classes in this country besides manufacturers ? Are there no farmers ? Are there no merchants ? Are there no labourers ? Are there no consumers in this country ? I say there are, and I mean to say that those classes of people need protection just as well as the manufacturers, and a great deal more. The member for Centre Toronto must have been thinking of his factories while he was advocating the principle of protection. I am sure he would be quite right looking at it from his view-point, but there are other view-points from which we may look at these matters.

He referred also to the presence of the Prime Minister at the Diamond Jubilee. We all know what took place there. We know that the first great advertisement that Canada ever received came from the visit of our premier to the Diamond Jubilee in London. We were proud of him, everybody was proud of him. The premier of Canada at that time stood foremost of all the foreign visitors at that jubilee—so we read in the newspapers. The hon. gentleman asked the question : Are gentlemen on the other side proud of the government and proud of their party ? I answer : We are proud of the government, we are proud of the party, and I propose shortly to give you some figures showing why we can stand up and face anybody, and say we are proud of our party, proud of our government, and proud of our policy. The preference, he says, means the displacement of a corresponding amount of goods in Canada. Now, that need not necessarily follow. It may follow to some extent, but not of necessity. He speaks of woollen goods. So far as I can understand, the objections to the tariff refer mainly to two or three items ; one is woollen goods, and the other is the item of oatmeal, and there are one or two other items in connection with the tariff which seem to be a little out of joint. Now, I do not think this whole country should be taxed in order that two or three trades should be benefited. That is not a fair policy to lay down. He says that if it becomes necessary to tinker the tariff it should be tinkered. We all know how the tariff was tinkered in days gone by. We know how, under the old policy of protection, manufacturers were here every session. Talk about railway promoters coming here ! I am told, and have read in the public journals, that scores and scores of manufacturers used to be down here every session asking the Finance Minister to tinker with the tariff. We know how uncertain the public was. One of the difficulties we had in buying goods was that we were never sure whether the duty was going on or off sugar, whether it was going on or off tea, whether it was going on or off tobacco, and all the leading staples. The tariff was not permanent. This constant tinkering is a menace to trade, and if by any means a staple tariff can be had in this country, it is an eminently desirable thing. The hon. gentleman says there is a critical state of affairs in the manufacturing interests of this country. Now, I do not understand it so. I have yet to learn that there is a general complaint by the manufacturers of this country. We have witnessed during the past four years probably the most wonderful development that any country has ever witnessed under similar circumstances. This development is still going on, we hope it will continue, and we expect it will continue for a long time.

The hon. member for Centre Toronto tells us that goods partially made in Germany are taken into England, and that 75 per cent of those goods are German and 25 per cent of them are English. Now, I think that is a matter that might be looked into. I understood the Finance Minister to say that the intention was to benefit British goods only. If it can be proved that these goods are coming in as the member for Centre Toronto says they are, that is a matter that ought to be inquired into, it is a matter in which we are all interested, it is a matter which I am sure should be attended to. I am sorry that the member for Centre Toronto takes such a gloomy view of affairs—ruined factories, towns all gone, workingmen's families ruined, and all that sort of thing. I apprehend such a state of things may come, because we know that there are cycles in commerce and industry, that good times are often followed by hard times. We know that these changes take place independently of tariffs, but let us remember the old adage : Never cross the bridge till you come to it. And I am prepared to-day to uphold the preferential tariff so far as we are yet acquainted with its results.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have been in this House about six weeks, and I have had the pleasure of sitting alongside of hon. members of the opposition. I have had the pleasure of making the personal acquaintance of most of them, and I assure you that they are a genial, fine lot of gentlemen. During these six weeks I have had occasion to admire the freedom which these hon. gentlemen enjoy. They put numberless questions, they are constantly rising in their seats and do most of the talking, and do not seem to have any trouble. None of their constituents are bothering them, and asking them to secure patronage—although I call this a trouble it may oftentimes be a pleasure. In fact, I was almost feeling a little jealous of their freedom from care. But, Mr. Speaker, from the day I heard the Finance Minister make his budget speech, when I realized the import of that budget, when I realized how this country had been going forward by leaps and bounds, I began to feel more satisfied, and even proud of my position. I was proud that the Finance Minister was able to make such a statement, I was proud of the government which could give such an account of their administration, I was proud of our party, and the result is that all the envy and jealousy has departed from me.

Mr. Speaker, I represent a county which has some manufactures, notwithstanding that the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) says that we have a summer resort. So we have, at Whitby. The county town of Whitby is beautifully situated, as the hon. member for East Simcoe knows well. We have a salubrious climate, an excellent position, a fine water coast, where some of the people from the neighbouring city of Toronto come down and build residences. Whitby is destined to be one of the greatest summer resorts on that whole coast.

I presume that I may speak for one of the towns in my native county, the same as the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) spoke for the town of Midland, the great gateway to the wonderful summer resort of this country. I have the honour of representing a county that has some important manufacturing industries, though it is largely of a rural character. The district which I represent is composed of four townships and three towns. One of these towns is the town in which I live, and there is no better town in the world, and that is saying a great deal. Another is the one which I have just mentioned, a large summer resort, and destined to be a still greater summer resort. The third town is the town of Oshawa, which we call Little Birmingham. It is one of the finest and smartest towns between Toronto and Montreal. I say this honestly, not jokingly, and I mean exactly what I say. There are manufacturing industries in Oshawa of which we are justly proud. I have spoken of the McLaughlin works, which employ 300 men, which cover a floor space of four or five acres and which expect to manufacture this year 10,000 buggies. That does not look much like as if the country were going to ruin. We have the malleable iron works at Oshawa, owned by the Malleable Iron Company. This industry is as busy as it can be and employs between 400 and 500 men. We have, besides that, the knitting factory, which, at the time of the election, was running night and day, and which could not turn out the knitted goods fast enough. We have the agricultural implement factory, the manager of which is an old school-mate of mine. During last summer he told me that business had never been so good. We have the canning factory, which turns out goods of an excellent quality and which is a most successful industry. We have numerous other factories which are incidental to these large enterprises. I might go on and mention them all, but I have mentioned the ones which I have named to show that the town of Oshawa was prosperous at the time of the election, that it is prosperous at the present moment and I hope that this prosperity will continue for years to come. In my riding we have a large farming community, and I want to tell the House that South Ontario turns out the best Shorthorn Durhams in Canada. I want to tell hon. gentlemen that I am going to boast a little now about my native place. If I cannot boast about that it seems to me a strange thing. Last fall at the Fat Stock show at Guelph our county carried off a great many prizes and won the sweepstakes for fat animals. I represent my county, I speak for it, and in speaking for it I think I voice the sentiment of a majority of my constituents when I say that the British preference is all right. I must confess that there may be occasions when the tariff should be changed. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) declared that he was a born protectionist. On the contrary, I was born a free trader ; I was reared a free trader, but I do not know that I am what you would call an out-and-out free trader myself. I have not departed from the principles of free trade, but, as I engage in the business of the country, I try to find out the necessities of the country and see what is best for the country, and, under the circumstances, I have come to the conclusion, that, if this tariff should be changed at all, it should be changed in the direction of lowering the duties. Now, the tax which each individual is bound to pay should be certain and it should not be arbitrary. A man should know exactly what he has to pay upon commodities which he consumes and these rates should run along for a series of years, it may be for three, four or five years. The tariff should be able to accommodate itself to the conditions as they exist. I do not mean by that altogether, a changing policy. That seems to be a contradiction, but, it seems to me, that, in looking at the tariff and in studying it, the English tariff is the ideal one. It is a certain tariff, continuing for several years, and it is only for revenue. A tariff should be productive and economical, and if these two considerations are kept in view, I think we would have an ideal tariff for the times in conjunction with the preferential tariff. I do not say that the preferential tariff is perfect. Far from it. In my own constituency my attention was called lately to one matter which seems to indicate that there is something wrong about it, but I think that can be arranged by the readjustment of the duties on the raw material and the finished product. A rearrangement of that kind might be very well effected, the country would derive a revenue and there would be some permanence and stability about the tariff. Now, it is claimed that the preference is one-sided and unjust. I think we can safely say that such is not the case. There are some complaints which have been mentioned, amongst them that of the woollen men which was brought to our attention by the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Brock). I do not propose to prolong my speech, this being my first one in the House, but, I would like to call attention to the imports into this country, especially to the imports from Great Britain. The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) referred to the imports from Great Britain. He said :

> In view of the discussions which have occasionally taken place in the House with regard to the increase of imports from Great Britain for home consumption, I have placed together the figures for a series of years :
> | | |
> |---|---|
> | 1895 | $31,131,737 |
> | 1896 | 32,979,742 |
> | 1897 | 29,412,188 |
> | 1898 | 32,500,917 |
> | 1899 | 37,060,123 |
> | 1900 | 44,789,730 |

There is no doubt that there has been a large increase in our trade with the old country under the preferential tariff, which, I think, is a desirable thing. Hon. members will say that it is all very well to bring articles into the country and to displace goods which are produced in the country, but, I say, that, if there is any country under the sun with which we should trade, that country is Great Britain, Great Britain which has fostered our trade, which has cared for us, and does care for us now, which contributes to our safety by her navy and her armies. We should be grateful to her and if in any way we can bind ourselves to her we should do so.

Now, take the question of exports from this country. A striking feature of the development of Canadian commerce is the growth of our export trade. The bearing of the tariff of 1897 upon the general promotion of trade has been in great measure for the common good. Let us look at some of the figures. In 1896 we exported products of the mines to the value of $8,059,650, and in 1900 to the value of $24,580,266, showing a total increase of $16,520,616. There are two very important items which contributed to that increase. The first important item is that of coal. In 1896 we exported $3,249,069 worth of coal, and in 1900, $4,599,602 worth, showing an increase in four years of $1,350,533.

Mr. KENDALL. There will be another clear million next year.

Mr. ROSS (South Ontario). The hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. Kendall) says there will be another million next year, and I presume he speaks only for his own county. In addition to that you know the untold wealth we possess in the Crow's Nest Pass, and we learn from the literature that is sent us day by day that the possibilities of coal production in that region are not equalled in any place on the face of the globe. We may therefore expect the coal trade to increase enormously in the near future. In conversation with Mr. Rogers, who is the manager of the company, he told me how his company had spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in the pursuit of that industry. Some people may wonder how the coal industry in British Columbia would benefit eastern Canada, but there is no doubt that it helps to distribute wealth, because thousands of dollars are expended for the purchase of supplies in this part of Canada, and the wages paid the workingmen goes into circulation all over the Dominion. Again let us take our export of gold. In 1896 we exported $1,099,053 worth of gold, and in 1900 we exported $14,148,543 worth, showing an increase of $13,049,490. This is largely due, of course, to the opening up of the Yukon, and the government can well take a great deal of credit for the manner in which law and order has been maintained in that country, as well as for a good deal of the development and progress which has been made there. The government, of course, does not take credit for all this production of gold, but they can safely say that the manner in which they have preserved the peace of the country has enabled that large quantity of gold to be mined, and further, that they have accomplished all this without a cent of cost to the older provinces. The tariff as applied there was that all the gold that came out of the country was assessed 10 per cent, and now that the country is becoming more self-sustaining and the output larger, that royalty is to be reduced to 5 per cent. That is the principle of the tariff we advocate ; a tariff that will some day, I hope, become exactly a revenue tariff ; a tariff that will not bear harshly on any particular section of the community, while being a benefit to all. The product of our fisheries during these five years I have mentioned have increased only by $391,318, and the hon. gentleman from Halifax (Mr. Roche) has told us the reason of that. Take the products of the forest. The total exports of the products of the forest in 1896 amounted to $27,177,686, and in 1900 to $29,663,668, showing an increase of $2,487,982. That is not a very great increase. It is not so marked as in the products of the mines and some others of our exports, but it is large enough to show that the trade is in excellent condition, and that the exports are at a very high water mark. The next item, the export of animals and their products, affects the largest part of our community, and its condition is quite gratifying. In 1896 we exported live animals to the value of $11,426,667, and in 1900 to the value of $12,201,595, showing an increase of $774,928, notwithstanding the embargo which was placed against the shipment of our live cattle to England. The total export of provisions or products of animals in 1896 was $21,200,808 worth, and in 1900, $40,063,218, being an increase of $18,852,410. This increase was largely in our cheese, our bacon, and our pork products, and notwithstanding the fact that during the last year the quantity of cheese exported had decreased the value of it to us has been greater. Take agricultural products in grain. In 1896 we exported $14,083,361 worth, and in 1900 that had risen to $27,516,609, showing an increase during the five years of $13,433,248. This increase has been largely in wheat and coarse grains, and we hope soon to see our vast prairies of the west growing a still greater quantity of beautiful wheat, for which they are so justly celebrated, and which will be transported to the seaports by our Canadian national railways, and shipped to the old land, there to be made into the best bread the world can produce. Notwithstanding this wonderful development in our agricultural and natural products, which after all, are the main source of our wealth, the manufacturers of Canada during this time have not ceased to be active. The export of manufactured goods in 1896 amounted to $9,365,384 worth, and in 1900 it had increased to $14,224,287, being an increase during the five years of $4,858,903, or nearly a million dollars a year. That, Sir, is very creditable for a young country like ours. There are many lines of manufactures in Canada which are capable of extension for export purposes. Do we not see that every country under the sun, having its own home market, is reaching out to the markets of other countries and endeavouring to increase their export trade. They want an oulet for the productions of the country ; and so we will help the manufacturers. Have we not the lumber, the ore, the agricultural products ? Can we not turn our cattle into dressed beef ? Do we not grow wheat, and can we not turn it into flour ? These things can be exported either in the finished form or in the raw state. Of miscellaneous articles we exported in 1896 $109,265 worth, and in 1900, $208,070 worth, showing an increase of only $98,805. We come to the grand total of exports of the produce of Canada, and we find that they amounted in 1896 to $109,915,337, and in 1900 to $170,642,369, showing in the five years during the reign of the party to which I am proud to belong an increase in our exports of $60,727,032. This is a record of which we ought to be proud ; and if I had no other justification, these figures are sufficient to justify me in asserting that the tariff which has been in force for the past four years has been for the benefit of our country.

Mr. A. E. VROOMAN (South Victoria). Mr. Speaker, I claim the indulgence of the House while I speak for a few minutes on some features of the budget which interest in a special manner a large, intelligent and important class of the people of this country ; I speak of the agriculturists.

But first I desire to do—as many of the speakers who have already addressed the House have done—congratulate the House and the country upon the present prosperity of the people of Canada ; and I am glad that I belong to a party who can rejoice in the prosperity of the people whether they sit on this side of the House or on the other side. Mr. Speaker, this was not always the case. It is hard to calculate the immense amount of injury which was done to this country by the propaganda of blue ruin which was carried on during the time the Liberal party sat on this side of the House. The exodus has been mentioned two or three times in this debate. It occurred to me, when I heard it mentioned, that those blue ruin speeches which were made on public platforms throughout the country and on the floor of this House, and were printed in the Reform press of the country, and thus found their way to the homes of the people, especially the farmers, had bred discontent in the hearts of the people and made them desirous of a change ; and as the migration of the people of Ontario and Quebec set in, and they began to trek towards the west, we found this curious fact—and I was an interested spectator, because it occurred in a very forcible and prominent way in the part of the country where I live—that a farmer going west, if he happened to be a Conservative, went to Manitoba or the North-west, while, if he happened to be a Liberal he went to Dakota or some of the other north-western states. From that I draw the conclusion that the farmers were influenced in this way by the kind of literature they read in their homes. And to-day we find that immigration agents are engaged in Dakota and Michigan, coaxing those people to come back to Canada. That is a fact which I gleaned from the report of the Minister of the Interior, in which he says :

> A glance over the reports sent in from time to time by settlers and delegates will show that a large number of those who have moved to western Canada from the United States are ex-Canadians, people who have gone from Ontario and Quebec to the States some years ago, and who have failed to secure what they looked for, and now that they find the rich lands of western Canada being opened up for settlement, are anxious to return to their home-land under their own flag.

I will venture to say in regard to this Canada of ours, that no man who goes out of it to find a home elsewhere can better himself, and if he has tried that experiment, he is glad to return.

Now, I am one of those who think it was not an unmixed evil for this country when the Liberals came into power. I think it is a fair thing, in a country with institutions and governed like ours, with the electors divided into two great parties, that the legislation of the country should be divided between the parties, and that each party should come into power occasionally as the country demands it. Even though the policy of the party in power might do some harm, it is better to do with that harm than to have such discontent in the country as would breed sedition and disloyalty.

I think it was a good thing for the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Brock) to address the House in the interest of the manufacturers, and I was glad when the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Ross) began to talk about the farmers, because it is in the interest of the farmers that I intend to talk to-night. I do not intend to give the House any statistics ; I simply want to talk in a general way about the farmers. I am closely in sympathy with the farmers ; I have had a great deal to do with them all my life ; I have lived among them ; I have practiced my profession among them, and I know perhaps more about them than most of them know about themselves. I can say for the farmers that they are perhaps of all classes in this country the class who work the hardest and who perhaps get the smallest return from their hard labour. They enjoy less of the luxuries of life ; they know less about the superfluous concerns of life : every day of their life is given to hard toil ; and they are not so wealthy as most other classes. Of course, their wants are few, and perhaps for that reason there is less attention paid to them. But it must be remembered that they are the producers of the country, and a man in a country like this who produces something is worth a dozen men who are looking for office. The farmers of this country form about one-third of its population.

An hon. MEMBER. Fifty-two per cent.

Mr. VROOMAN. I was not aware that they formed so large a proportion ; but that makes my argument all the stronger. And when they come to this House and petition the government by delegation or otherwise, I think they should receive the greatest consideration. While this is essentially an agricultural country, the province from which I come is par excellence the farming province of the Dominion, followed closely by the province of Manitoba. I represent a rural constituency composed to a great extent of farmers. We have one town of considerable size, with perhaps 7,000 people, where I live, and we have two or three incorporated villages. The farmers of that constituency as a class are well-to-do and intelligent people, who regularly read the papers, and are keenly alive to what takes place on the floor of this House.

As the province of Ontario is largely composed of farmers, we have had a number of reasons advanced by hon. gentlemen opposite to account for the way in which the government was turned down in that province. The hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) said it was because it was not properly organized, and that he was going up there to organize it. Well, that hon. gentleman has been absent some days, and it has occurred to me that perhaps he was up organizing in North Bruce. But judging by the result, I can assure him that he would do better to leave the organization of the Liberal party in the province of Ontario in the hands of the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), who will do the work much better, because the people of Ontario do not want the Minister of Public Works up there. Another hon. gentleman said that if the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) would look up the records, he would discover that there had been a gerrymander in 1881 and another in 1891. That seems to me to have been going a long way back to find a cause for the defeat of the Liberals in Ontario in the year 1900, especially when we consider the facts that in 1896 the Liberal party had been returned in that province by a considerable majority, and that the same constituencies which returned Liberals in 1896, rejected them in 1900. I do not think that any of the reasons given by the other side to account for the defeat of the Liberal party in Ontario are the true reasons. In my opinion if there had been no Liberal campaign in that province in 1900, and the election had taken place without any excitement and without any of the influences which a powerful government is able to exercise, there would have been no government candidate returned at all. How can we account for the fact that so many government candidates, who had been elected in 1896, were defeated in 1900 ? Most of these were men who had sat in this House during a whole parliament, and they had been elected on a special contract between them and their electors. They promised to do certain things. They promised to give the electors free trade, free barley ; they promised to reduce the expenditure and the public debt ; they promised to do away with railway subsidies and give us free markets in the United States. And after making all these promises, they came down here and became political acrobats and swallowed all their pledges without a wry face. When they returned to their constituencies for re-election, their constituents replied: Not for Joe. You may fool all the people some of the time, you may fool some people all the time, but you cannot fool all the people all the time.

I do not intend to detain the House longer, but I see members coming in who have been absent several days, and they might possibly be able to give us some report from the west.

Some hon. MEMBERS. How would the east do ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Compare the majorities in the two places.

Mr. BENNETT. How much did it cost the country.

Mr. VROOMAN. Let me take the constituencies that lie next to mine to illustrate my contention that it was not any mere question of sentiment which defeated the Liberal candidates in the last election in the province of Ontario. Take the constituency of North Ontario, in 1896 that constituency was represented in this House by Mr. Graham, who ran against the present member in 1900. Mr. Graham represented the Patrons and the Independents and the Liberals. He was a sort of trinity in unity, and had been returned to the late parliament by a goodly majority. He came down here and was a good party man, and when the government said : 'Thumbs up,' he promptly complied. But when he came back, he had to meet again his old opponent and was defeated by a majority of 500. The next constituency bordering on my own is West Durham, which Mr. Beith had represented for years. No doubt Mr. Beith was a very fine gentleman or his constituency would not have sent him here. But in 1900, when he again courted its favour, the people said : No, we do not want you any more. And they elected Mr. Thornton by a considerable majority. Why is Mr. Thornton not here to-day ? Simply because a partisan returning officer stepped in and said that the Conservative party should not be represented in this House if he could help it. The first thing the government should have done this session was to pass a Bill giving Mr. Thornton the seat. More than that, they should have applied the Criminal Act to the returning officer and had him fined $1,000 and put in jail as a warning to other officials not to tamper with their official duties. To the east of my county, there is the riding of West Peterboro, which sent a Conservative here in 1896 and again in 1900. Then there is North Victoria, which has the same representative to-day, supporting the opposition, as it had in 1896, so that all around me are counties formerly represented by Liberals which are now represented by Conservatives, and those which elected Conservatives in 1896 re-elected them in 1900. In my riding Senator McHugh was elected in 1896. He was a very popular and estimable gentleman, and he has since lost none of his popularity, but like the rest he made pledges which he did not carry out, and the people turned him down. All he had to say to them, when confronted with his broken pledges, was : Look at the good times. But the people refused to re-elect him, and the result was that he was left at home.

Mr. HEYD. No, he is in the Senate.

Mr. VROOMAN. Yes, and I may pause here to congratulate the government on having made that appointment. Senator McHugh was my opponent and is my personal friend. He is a gentleman whom I esteem, and I know he will make a good senator, and the people were pleased with his appointment. But I have no doubt he will be as good a partisan on the floor of the Senate as he was in this House.

In my election, the hon. Minister of Customs (Hon. Mr. Paterson) and the hon. the Postmaster General (Hon. Mr. Mulock) came in and took a hand. They paid a great deal of attention to the down-trodden farmer, and I was very much pleased to listen to the Minister of Customs, as with his persuasive tone and his patriarchial appearance, he declaimed to the unsophisticated farmer, who could hardly help believing him as he said : Gentlemen, when we came into power what did we find? We found the great Department of Agriculture at Ottawa, which presides over your interests, controlled by a professional man, a doctor. And what did we do ? We brought in a practical farmer, like yourselves, a man who is used to toil with his hands ; he knows how to sympathize with you. I was a little curious when I came down here to see the Minister of Agriculture. As the ministers came in at the door, I asked which was the Minister of Agriculture. And when he was pointed out to me, I smiled. I would suggest a reorganization of that cabinet, and I would give the portfolio of Agriculture to such a man as my hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Robinson). If that were done, you could go to the country and say to the farmers : We have for Minister of Agriculture a practical farmer, a man like yourselves. It was stated, I think by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) that when this government came into power in 1896, they introduced a new tariff, and that tariff was criticised—it was fought tooth and nail, as he said—by the Conservatives, who said that if it was brought into force it would ruin this country. They did oppose that tariff, and they did say that it would ruin this country. And, after the government had listened to the criticism, they withdrew that tariff in order to revise it. And they sought the help in revising it of a very estimable gentleman, a clear-headed man, the late lamented member for Centre Toronto, Mr. Geo. Bertram, a man I knew well and respected highly, a former resident of the town in which I now live. He changed that tariff for them and saved the government. Was it not a peculiar thing that the government should call in one of these 'scoundrels great and scoundrels small' to assist them in revising their tariff ? We know that when the Conservatives were on that side of the House, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) used to say that if his party got into power the tariff would be revised in the interests of the farmer. The farmers of Manitoba were told that agricultural implements would be put on the free list. But the tariff on agricultural implements remained just what it was before. But, the government said : We will have to do something for the farmers, for there are a great many of them, and some of them may vote against us. We must give them a sop of some kind. And so they put Indian corn on the free list. It has been a question among farmers themselves whether that was a good thing or not. If a farmer is a Reformer he is apt to say that it was a good thing, and if he is a Conservative he may argue the other way. But there is one thing I noticed —that the pork buyers have been advising their buyers to keep clear of the districts where this Indian corn is fed to make pork, because it destroys the pork for the British market. When this business government knew that the farmers had been seeking for years a market for their barley in the United States, why did they not, instead of taking the duty off corn at once, say to the United States : We will give you a market for your corn if you will give us a market for our barley. But that was not done. The interest of the farmers was lost sight of. Our farmers, particularly those of Ontario, have been for years and years looking for a market in the United States for their barley. That market was a great thing for them before the duty of 30 cents a bushel was imposed by the Americans. The government put another thing on the free list —binder twine ; and we hear on the floor of the House that some of the supporters of the government are not satisfied. One thing we know, and that is that when binder twine was put on the free list, the price of it went up. And when barbed wire was put on the free list, the price of it went up also. Some other things were put on the free list—mushroom spawn, for instance.

Some hon. MEMBERS. And ice.

Mr. VROOMAN. Was ice put on the free list ? I am glad to hear that. But I would like to ask how the farmer was helped by putting the duty on sugar ? There is a question which touches every man. A little additional duty was put on cottons also, and on tobacco. The labouring man likes to take a smoke at the end of his hard day's work. But when he sends out his little boy with a five-cent piece for a plug of tobacco, the boy comes back and says : I want another cent. It is true that to meet that, the manufacturers have cut the size of the plug down to fit the charge so as to leave it five cents. We have delegations coming to this government, and it is right that they should come. But when a delegation comes in the interest of the farmers, how are they received ? Farmers are not millionaires, but men of moderate means. There was a delegation came here the other day in the interests of the beet-root sugar industry, and this government gave them the go-by. But, I would refer the Minister of Agriculture to what the Minister of Agriculture in Ontario has done. Of course, I understand very well that the Ontario minister expects an election soon. Still, it is a wonderful statement he makes. He says that Ontario can grow 100,000,000 pounds of sugar annually. I think he knows what he is talking about, because he has been an efficient minister there for many years. This would employ a million and a half of people. It has been proven that the farmers can clear a profit of $43.50 per acre in raising beet root. And the Ontario government have agreed to give to that industry $75,000 annually for three years. But when the farmers came down here they got no help. Yet, the government could make concessions to a lot of Standard Oil magnates when they came here—millionaires from the United States. It was stated here the other night that when this government came in they reduced the duty on coal oil from 7 cents to 5 cents a gallon. Of course, that was a mistake—what was meant was that they reduced it from 6 cents to 5 cents a gallon. But concessions have been made to the Standard Oil Company, and the result is that oil was never so dear in Ontario as it has been since. The condition of things is this—if you go into a store with your can and ask the dealer for a gallon of American oil, he will give you what he calls American oil, but you never know whether it is American oil or not. I understand that the oil inspection of this country is practically no inspection at all. The Standard Oil Company has a monopoly of the oil business in this country. I would ask the government why they have not reduced the duty on coal oil so as to make oil cheaper. There was a time when it was necessary to protect the oil industry in the interest of the country. But now that it is in the hands of foreigners, why should we protect it ?

Now, as to this preference, I have looked at it, read about it, and considered it ; and, so far as the farmer is concerned, I cannot see that it is of any use to him at all. If it is true that many of his products were imported into England last year, but that would have been so in any case. There was an increase, because there was an increase in all branches of that kind of business. But the preference had nothing to do with it. If the farmers receive no benefit from the preference as it is to-day, they are on the other hand directly injured in the German market.

Now, when this government undertook to give a preference to England in our markets why did they not ask the English government to remove the embargo on our cattle? Before this embargo was placed on our cattle they had a preference in the English market, as there was at that time an embargo on American cattle. Every head of cattle taken into England from Canada was worth $10 or $15 more than a like animal from the United States. That embargo was put on our cattle ostensibly because there was pleuro-pneumonia among them, when in reality there was not. Before the embargo our cattle, after landing in England, were taken into the country and fed for two or three weeks on the rich grasses of England, until the beef attained a flavour like that of English beef, and became more toothsome to the fastidious palate of John Bull. Now, when our government gave a preference to English goods, they should have said to the English goverment : We have given you this preference in our market, now we want you to take the embargo off our cattle. But the Prime Minister says we did not want to ask anything in return from the English government, that what we were giving them was out of pure gratitude for the many favours we had received from them in the past and were still receiving.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in regard to the policy of mutual preferential trade, I think that nothing would be of greater benefit to the farmers of this country if we could obtain it. The moment that we get a preference in the markets of England every foot of land in this country would increase in value, all the products of the land would increase in value, wages would immediately go up. You could call in all your immigration agents, because all the best immigrants from the British Isles would come to this country. The volume of production would immediately increase, and in a short time the colonies themselves would be able to supply all the food products required in England.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have reminded us that the Minister of Finance did not claim direct credit for the good times. It is true he did not in so many words, but there was running through his speech an assumption that the good times were due, in part at least, to the legislation which this government had enacted. The First Minister, in a speech made, I think, at Bowmanville, touched upon this question in a very ingenious manner. He said that if Providence had blessed the people because the people elected a good government, no one need complain. Well, that was another way of assuming that the good times were due to the government. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that Providence has blessed this country, and it would seem as if Providence, knowing that the hon. gentlemen opposite had made pledges which they could not fulfil, had taken pity on them and had prospered the country so as to enable them to carry out their promises. But although Providence has showered all this wealth upon us, the government still refuse to take the hint, and therefore we are justified in expecting that Providence will punish them for their ingratitude. The Finance Minister in his speech the other day told us that he could see a little cloud arising no bigger than a man's hand. Well, you would suppose that if he was a judicious man, seeing this little cloud arising, he would begin to take in sail and trim for the approaching storm. But he does nothing of the kind ; and I believe that when he next looks up he will see the handwriting on the wall which will seal the doom of his government.

Mr. GEO. A. CLARE (South Waterloo). Mr. Speaker, I have been listening with a great deal of interest to this debate, which has been proceeding for the last three or four days, and I desire to address the House for a short time on some of the questions that are before us. In the first place, I wish, as a member of the Conservative party, to congratulate the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Ross) on being able to tell us that the town of Oshawa is very prosperous, and that the manufacturers in that town are in a prosperous condition. The Conservative party are always happy to know that any section or any town in this country is in a prosperous condition. I would like to say to that hon. gentleman, who I see has left the House, that if there had been a town in his constituency which was injured by this preferential tariff, it is likely that he would not be in the House to-day to represent that constituency. But fortunately for him and fortunately for his county, the carriage industry is not affected by the preferential duties, because there are no carriages imported into this country from England. He also stated that this government does not tinker with the tariff. But I would like to remind him that this government has already tinkered with the tariff in respect to this very industry, and has raised the duty 5 per cent in its favour. We are pleased to know that the malleable iron works in his constituency are in a flourishing condition, and why should they not be, when they get a rebate of duty on iron and steel used in the manufacture of goods for export? Sir, I have been trying to understand the position of the government on the tariff question, and I have to say honestly that so far I have been unable to do so. The right hon. the Prime Minister says that this is a revenue tariff; but the Finance Minister told us the other day that we have a large surplus, and are likely to have a large surplus next year. Now, I would like to ask him to explain how it happens that he has a large surplus under a revenue tariff. If it is only a revenue tariff, how does it come about that he is taking so many millions out of the pockets of the taxpayers?

Now, I would like to call the attention of the House for a few moments to what took place when we had a revenue tariff in this country, and when the Liberal party was in power. At that time everybody in this country, Conservative and Reformer, acknowledged that we had a revenue tariff. I remember when the artisans of this country, the agriculturists and the manufacturers all came to the government of which the Minister of Trade and Commerce was then Finance Minister, and asked for some measure of protection. The government refused to do anything, because they believed, and, I suppose, believed conscientiously, that their policy was the best for the country. Well, let us look at the trade during the few years that they were in power. In 1873 the imports to this country were $127,514,974, and the exports were $76,538,000. The aggregate trade in 1873 was $204,000,000 in round numbers. In 1878 the imports were $91,000,000, the exports $67,000,000, and the aggregate trade $159,000,000, or a falling off of $45,000,000. During that time deficits were the order of the day. Business was decreasing in every channel, manufactories were closed down, artisans and labourers were leaving this country for other countries looking for work, the grain and flour of the United States were competing with the natural products of the farmers of Canada, but, still, the party that were in power believed that a revenue tariff was the best for the country. The Reform party at that time declared that they would sooner fall than stand for the policy that we believed to be in the best interests of the country. At that time the county which I have the honour to represent was almost purely an agricultural county. The people there felt the hard times, North and South Waterloo were the two banner Reform constituencies in the Dominion of Canada up to that time. But the people believed that the government were not carrying out the policy which would best promote the interests of the country, and, for the first time in its history, the riding of North Waterloo, in 1878, sent a Conservative to represent it in this House, and the south riding of Waterloo elected a Reform supporter of the national policy. These gentlemen were elected to assist the Rt. Hon. Sir John Macdonald to carry out the policy of protection. They came here, Sir John Macdonald and his government brought down their tariff and almost immediately the times became better. I remember well, that, in the campaign of 1878, the Conservative party said in their arguments before the people that if you put us into power we will protect the interests of the country, with the result that factories will be built all over the country and you will see the tall chimneys grow. The Reform party used to take great pleasure in twitting the Conservative party and in asking where those chimneys were. Mr. Krantz, the member for North Waterloo, replied, and I remember the speech very well in which he showed that in the county of Waterloo, at any rate, the towns were growing, factories were being built up, and a home market was provided for the farmers on account of the growth of the towns. In that county the village of Hespeler had a population of about 1,000. I am pleased to say, that, to-day, that village is a town and has a population of close upon 3,000. The village of Preston at that time had a population of some 1,400 people. It is my native town, the home in which I take a great deal of pride, and I am glad to say that there are to-day about 3,000 people in that town. The town of Galt has more than doubled in population; Berlin has more than doubled in population, and I claim here that this is entirely due to the national policy. It is true that prosperity has kept up for the last four or five years since hon. gentlemen opposite have been in power, but, during the time that these hon. gentlemen were in opposition they attacked the national policy most bitterly. They advocated every conceivable policy, they advocated a revenue tariff, commercial union, unrestricted reciprocity, free trade as they have it in England, and, in 1896, on a side issue, they got into power. Would you not have supposed, Mr. Speaker, that when these hon. gentlemen got into power, they would have carried out some one of the policies they had advocated? But, not so. They appointed a commission. You would think that after eighteen years in opposition they would know the requirements of the country, but they appointed a commission for the purpose of finding out whether they could carry out free trade as they have it in England or not. I believe that these hon. gentlemen thought it was impossible to carry out that policy and they appointed a commission so that they could fall easy. I remember well the consternation that the Reform manufacturers were in immediately after the election. I remember that they came to me as a manufacturer and asked me to go with them to Ottawa to show the Reform party the policy they should adopt. I remember the furniture men, during the election, signing a letter, published in the Globe newspaper, stating that they could compete with the world, yet, Mr. Speaker, these very same gentlemen were down at Ottawa, during the first two weeks after hon. gentlemen opposite were elected. When the commissioners got through with their work, and when delegates from all over the country had interviewed the government, hon. gentlemen opposite brought down a tariff, and, lo and behold, to the great surprise and relief of the people of the country, we had a protective tariff as we had before. They swallowed themselves and all their policies, and brought down a policy of protection. They have broken every promise they have made to the electors. Instead of decreasing the expenditure by $3,000,000, or $4,000,000, they have increased it by over $10,000,000; instead of giving us the trade policy that they promised, we have protection. Of this policy I certainly do not complain, nor do the Conservative party, but it seems to me very laughable to see the right hon. Prime Minister of this country and the hon. Minister of Finance, all the members of the government, and all the members on the other side of the House, trying to explain to the country that this is not a protective tariff, but that it is a revenue tariff. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he believes the giving of a bounty of $3 a ton to the manufacturers of pig iron was a protective policy or whether it was a revenue tariff policy ? In regard to that matter I wish to say that, while it was promised to the agricultural community that they would have agricultural implements free of duty, instead of doing that, a dollar a ton has been added to the bounty which is taken directly out of the pockets of the people and is no benefit to them, although they have to pay it. In 1896, when the Prime Minister was in opposition, he spoke in the town of Galt, and there being mostly iron manufacturers in that town he tried to explain his free trade speeches. He told the Galt manufacturers that he would take the duty off pig iron so that they could buy that iron $3 a ton cheaper and thus be able to compete with the American manufacturers. In the town of Berlin the very next evening the Reform candidate, Mr. Snider, delivered a protectionist speech, and the Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier offered to adopt Mr. Snider and take him into his fold whether he was a protectionist or a free trader. To make this perfectly plain I will give the language which was used on this occasion. Mr. Snider, speaking at Elmira, said :

> It is true that in our constituency some of our manufacturers have been doing well. I believe that some of our industries, in Berlin and Waterloo in particular, have sprung up owing to the national policy. I believe that a few of the industries might not have been there if it had not been for the protection they have had. So far as protection is concerned, my views on the tariff question are these: I should not venture to support any government, if I should happen to be the choice of the electors of North Waterloo, and I should not want to go down and represent you with the idea in your minds that I would endeavour to help free trade, that is entire free trade, for I don't think we could possibly have it. I don't think our party, as a party, would think of introducing it at the present time.

And, Mr. Laurier speaking at Berlin the next day, said :

> I understand that some of my fellow-countrymen in this town of old protectionist views say that my friend Mr. Snider made a protectionist speech at Elmira yesterday. So far so good. If the protectionists of the towns of Berlin and Waterloo are satisfied with the declaration of Mr. Snider, if they claim he is a protectionist, let them send to Ottawa such a protectionist as Mr. Snider. 'What's in a name?' A rose by any other name smells just as sweet. I do not care what you call him. For my part, I am ready to admit him to the ranks of the Liberal party just as he is and will be, and he will be a good supporter, I am sure, of the Liberal cause.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Did he get there ?

Mr. CLARE. He was left by 300 majority. This shows conclusively that the great object of the right hon. gentleman was to get into power no matter how, and no matter what policy was to be carried out. However, Sir, it is very fortunate for the people of Canada that these gentlemen did not carry out the policy, or any of the many policies they advocated while in opposition. It does not matter to me at any rate which party is in power, so long as the affairs of the country are carried on economically and well, and so long as in the interests of the people the policy of protection is maintained to the strict letter of the law. In the matter of their preferential tariff the Liberal government has adopted a policy of their own, which will in time hurl them from power. The preference they have given to Great Britain, of 33½ per cent, is ruining the second largest industry in Canada, because next to the raising of foodstuffs the clothing of the people is the most important. The riding I have the honour to represent has five or six woollen mills, and if this policy of the government is continued it will entail great loss to the people of that constituency. The same remark applies to almost every other constituency in Canada, because most of them have a woollen mill or two within their limits. This policy will reduce the wages of the mechanics and workingmen in these factories, or else it will close them up entirely. I appeal to the government to reconsider their determination not to give more protection to these large manufacturing concerns. The right hon. the Prime Minister has told us that he gives this preference to the English people in order to show our loyalty and good-will towards them, and in the same breath he tells us that the workingmen of England will not pay one cent more for their flour and bread which can be shipped from this country. And so, the right hon. gentleman, just in order to obtain the good-will of England wants to have the wages of Canadian workingmen reduced, and our factories closed. That is the only logical way of looking at his argument. Mr. Speaker, we have been loyal to the British Crown ; we have been loyal to the British Empire ; we sent our soldiers to South Africa to fight the battles of the British Empire. We showed them that the soldiers of Canada are equal to any soldiers on the face of the globe, and these soldiers came out of the factories of Canada which were built up by the national policy. I remember when I was collecting for the Patriotic Fund in my constituency, the workingmen in the woollen mills were the most liberal in subscribing to that fund. I again appeal to this government to reconsider the position they have taken and to treat these workingmen as they deserve to be treated. Now, in reference to the increased quantity of woollen goods which have been imported into this country since the preferential tariff, I find that that increase is close on to $3,000,000, and every cent's worth of these goods should have been manufactured in Canada, and would have been manufactured in Canada had it not been for the preference given to England. In conclusion I call the attention of the government to the following fact. The correspondent of the Galt Reformer, writing on March 12 from Hespeler, a town which is entirely dependent on the woollen industry, makes the following statement :

> Another grist of our people are pulling out eastward towards New York state, part of them having gone to-day. The spring exodus bids fair to be a record-breaker.

I shall vote, Mr. Speaker, for the amendment proposed by the hon. leader of the opposition.

Mr. OLIVER moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of the Minister of Finance, House adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

Mr. CLARE.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, March 22, 1901.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PAPERS RESPECTING TELEGRAPH CONSTRUCTION.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I move that the papers brought down to this House under order, 18th February, 1900, respecting telegraph construction, be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts. Now that the hon. Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) has returned from North Bruce, I would like to call his attention to some papers that have gone astray—many things go astray. By an understanding between him and myself some accounts in connection with this matter were already before the Public Accounts Committee. They were not laid on the Table of the House, that being an unnecessary formality. But one of the officers of the Auditor General's Department, Mr. Reid, was subpœnaed to attend, as he was the auditing officer. Before attending the next meeting of the committee he was desirous of looking over certain books. On inquiry at the Public Works Department, information was given that these documents had been sent over in compliance with this order of the House, to be brought down. No doubt, they are under the charge of the hon. minister, and I would be very much obliged if he would give immediate orders so that the Auditor's officer may see the books. I do not wish that they be formally laid on the Table, as that is not necessary.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have a box full of papers in my room. They will be brought down.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. So far as I am concerned, the original understanding is quite sufficient. I know that the papers are of considerable bulk. If the hon. minister will allow the Auditor's officer to see these books of account, that is all that will be necessary.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. With the greatest pleasure.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 87) to amalgamate the Northern Pacific and Manitoba Railway Company, the Winnipeg Transfer Railway Company (Limited), the Portage and North-western Railway Company, and the Waskada and North-eastern Railway Company, under the name of the Northern Pacific and Manitoba Railway Company.—Mr. McCreary.

Bill (No. 88) to incorporate the Canadian Nurses Association.—Mr. Clarke—by Mr. Horsey.

Bill (No. 89) respecting the Grand Falls Water Power and Boom Company.—Mr. Costigan.

Bill (No. 90) respecting the Dominion Burglary Guarantee Company (Limited)—Mr. Bickerdike.

CANADIAN ORDER OF NURSES.

Mr. SPROULE. I move for leave to introduce a Bill to incorporate the Canadian Order of Nurses.

Mr. SPEAKER. I may say that a Bill has already been moved to incorporate the Canadian Nurses Association.

Mr. SPROULE. I merely raise the question whether the Bill was regular. I understand it was only introduced in blank, and consequently was no Bill at all.

Mr. SPEAKER. I did not see the Bill when it was presented a few moments ago, and I do not have an opportunity of seeing whether Bills are printed or in regular form.

Mr. SPROULE. The Bill introduced by the hon. member for North Grey is only a blank form, is, consequently, no Bill at all, and I raise the question of his right to introduce a Bill in that form. I understand the rules do not allow it.

Mr. SPEAKER. No doubt the rule does not allow a Bill to be introduced which is not in regular form. But, a few moments ago, a motion was made to the same effect as the one made just now by the hon. member; that motion was carried, and the Bill was read a first time without any objection being made to it. I did not look to see whether it was printed and otherwise regular; because the hon. gentleman knows that a Speaker is not always able to see whether a Bill is printed or not. Therefore, a motion having been carried of the same nature as that made by the hon. gentleman, I do not feel that I can admit this motion.

Mr. SPROULE. I rose at the time to take objection to it, but another gentleman was on his feet, and I was obliged to sit down, and could not enter my objection until the motion was carried. Therefore, I had to wait for another opportunity.

TRANSLATION OF THE DEBATES—QUESTION PUT BY MR. ETHIER.

Mr. J. A. C. ETHIER (Two Mountains). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called I rise to call your attention to a matter which concerns me personally and which is in the nature of a matter of privilege. Here are the facts which I wish to bring to the attention of the House: On Monday, March 18, I as a member of this House and within my right as such, prepared and placed in the hands of the Clerk of this House the following question:—

1. Is the government aware that, since the beginning of the present session, the translators of the Debates have each day translated into English all the French, and into French all the English by them received for that purpose from the Government Printing Bureau, notwithstanding that the amount of matter for translation is equivalent at times to as much as 128 columns of Hansard, in a single day?

2. Is the government aware that since the opening of the present session, the translators of the Debates have also corrected and returned to the Printing Bureau each day, all the proofs sent to them therefrom for that purpose, notwithstanding that such proofs amount at times to as much as 125 columns of Hansard, in a single day?

3. Is the government aware that, up to this date (March 18), the Bureau has sent to the translators of the Debates, matter for translation up to the 12th only, and proofs for correction up to the 11th only; and that of the French version it has paged and published the Debates up to the beginning of the sitting of March 4 only, notwithstanding that the amount of matter for translation in the hands of the printer is sufficient to bring the work up to the 14th at least, and the paging and publishing up to the 11th?

4. Is the government aware that the delay in the printing and distributing of the French Hansard is due to the management of the Printing Bureau and not to the translators of the Debates, who labour day by day and even Sundays and holidays, if necessary, in order to translate forthwith as it is received, all matter furnished to them?

5. Is the government aware that the delays and tardiness of the Government Printing Office in printing the French edition of the Hansard, is the means of depriving the representatives of the people, the press and the public in general of the advantages they should derive from the steady labour of the translators?

6. Is it the intention of the Government to put a stop to the delay caused by the Printing Bureau and to secure the paging and publishing, in due time, of the French edition of the House of Commons Debates?

This question was placed on the Order paper and it still stands there in my name. It will probably be put on Monday, when comes the time for calling it. It seems that, this question has started quite a controversy this week.

Mr. SPEAKER. (Translation.) Let me call the attention of the hon. gentleman (Mr. J. A. C. Ethier) to the fact that he cannot at this stage go beyond a mere recital of the facts alleged. I understood that he is now raising a question of privilege, but cannot go into the discussion of the facts without moving the adjournment of the House.

Mr. J. A. C. ETHIER. (Translation.) I do not intend to provoke a debate on a question of privilege as I reserve that right for a later stage. Nor is it my intention to go into a review of the circumstances which gave rise to this question ; but as the public press, and even certain committees of the House have grappled with this question, and as a certain writer in one of those newspapers has thought it proper to anticipate the position of the Debates Committee by misrepresenting the attitude which I had taken, in an editorial which appeared in the columns of that paper yesterday, I deem it my duty to set myself right.

Let me first quote from the last paragraph of an editorial of La Patrie, of March 11th, in reply to two editorials which had appeared in the columns of Le Journal, on the 27th of February, and on the 8th instant, respectively. This article, under the heading : 'The Translation of the Debates,' winds up as follows :—

Le Journal lays the blame on the government and makes it still more responsible for that condition of affairs than the translating staff. The matter ought to be throughly sifted and probed to the bottom once for all, and justice should be given to whom justice is due.

Now, on the 20th instant after this question had been placed on the Order paper and printed, La Patrie, in its daily parliamentary correspondence, struck the right note about the merits of this question.

But on the 21st, that same paper, not in its parliamentary correspondence but in an editorial under the heading :

'The Hansard trouble,' referring to my absence from the House—for, as a matter of fact, on Monday night I was absent from the House, and in so doing, I have only been using a common privilege to all members of this House, and for which I do not think I am called upon to offer any excuse or explanation. La Patrie, I say, made a statement which was not in accordance with the facts ; and it even contained an insinuation which would show, had it been made with premeditation, that the mind of its author was under a false impression. It reads as follows :—

Mr. Ethier being absent from the House yesterday, his question in connection with Hansard was dropped.

Well, Sir, I say without hesitation that the first statement in this paragraph is without any foundation whatsoever, and that the question placed in my name on the Order paper was not dropped. It still remains on the Order paper just as it stood on Monday, and I say that it is most unfair to put the public mind under such a false impression. Such a way of proceeding would afford me quite sufficient ground for complaint. But the writer goes still further :

Still, it may not be found without interest to bring together this momentary absence and the action taken yesterday by the Hansard Committee for the purpose of finding out who supplied the member for Two Mountains with the information on which was based the question placed in his name on the Order papers.

It is stated here that there is a report of the 'Hansard' Committee before the House, and one by which the writer was enabled to write such a paragraph as I have just quoted from the editorial published in La Patrie. I am not aware of any such report having been brought down. As a matter of fact, there is no such report from the 'Hansard' Committee ; and yet, the writer here seems to insinuate that the member for Two Mountains was afraid of the attitude the 'Hansard' Committee might take in connection with his question bearing on the translating of the Debates.

Were I called upon to give any explanation as to my absence from the sitting of the House on Monday last, I would say that such absence was not a momentary one, as stated by the writer in the article referred to, but, that having been called away on Monday by my professional duties I went home and returned to the city last night without troubling myself in the least about the position the 'Hansard' Committee might deem it proper to take as to the question placed in my name on the Order paper. The writer says further :

The Debates Committee takes offence at——

Mr. SPEAKER. (Translation.) I will ask the hon. gentleman to remember that he is not allowed to refer in this House to what took place before a committee. He cannot avail himself of what is published in newspapers in connection with the proceedings of a committee in order to discuss a report which is not yet before the House.

Mr. J. A. C. ETHIER. (Translation.) It is not my intention, Sir, to refer to any future report either of the 'Hansard Committee or of the Committee on Printing. I am only dealing with that paragraph of the editorial in which the writer makes the statement that the 'Hansard' Committee 'takes offence.' Now, Sir, I think that the writer here makes a gratuitous assertion when stating that the committee 'takes offence.'

Even were this allegation well-founded, at all events, I hold it to be the privilege of any member of this House who does not belong to any committee to obtain from the proper source information about matters which concern the House, the public and the press.

The House will agree with me, I think, that I had a right to offer a personal explanation bearing on statements which I take exception to as imputing to me motives which never existed.

However, I have to offer my congratulations to the writer in La Patrie on the last paragraph of his editorial which reads as follows :—

The treatment which the French Canadian press received at the hands of the Printing Bureau or of the Hansard Committee is one which is no longer tolerable, and it is high time that the responsibilities for such a condition of affairs were placed on the shoulders of the proper parties.

I hope, Sir, that prompt action will be taken in the matter so as to place the responsibility for such a condition of affairs where it rightly belongs.

I do not believe that the writer in La Patrie meant to be unfair to any one, and I am glad to be able to state here and now that the parliamentary correspondence of the 20th puts matters in the proper light and makes up for any inaccuracies that may have crept into the editorial referred to.

When I rose to give a personal explanation to the House, I only wished to rectify the statements contained in the two first paragraphs of the article referred to, and to tell the House and the country that the question put by me on the Order paper was not dropped, by reason of my being absent from the House; and in the second place, that such absence was not momentary, and that it was not prompted by any fear on my part of the attitude that any committee of the House might think fit to take with regard to this question.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Hon. Mr. Fielding:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to His Majesty; and the proposed motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

Mr. FRANK OLIVER (Alberta). Mr. Speaker, as the announcements of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) necessarily cover every department of the fiscal and commercial policy and administration of the country, it is only reasonable that the discussion of these announcements should wander far and wide, a privilege which has been very fully availed of by, I think, most of the hon. members who have taken part in the discussion so far. But, while our discussion may cover a great deal of ground, our vote is narrowed down to the point of whether we shall endorse the policy and administration expressed by these announcements, or whether we shall accept the resolution in amendment of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax). In deciding which of these motions we shall support it is not necessary, nor is it possible, that we should all absolutely agree with either the one or the other. In any country, and particularly in a country so widespread as Canada, there must necessarily be many points of view in regard to the policy of taxation, the trade policy and the fiscal policy of the country. I assume that members are elected to parliament for the purpose of representing those several interests and sections, not by endeavouring to force absolutely their particular views upon the whole House so much as to, as far as possible, find a common ground upon which they can stand to work together for the common good. I hope, then, that in discussing the budget from the point of view of the interests of the locality which I am particularly identified with, I will not be accused of any greater lack of patriotism, or any great sectionalism than any other hon. member, representing other interests, may be accused of. In discussing the question of taxation raised by means of a tariff, we find that the full meaning and purport of the taxation is not represented merely by the rate of duty nor by the average rate of duty. A certain level percentage rate of duty levied on all articles alike would be eminently unfair to those classes of the community who would be affected by the tariff through their purchases of necessities rather than of luxuries. A 10 per cent duty on everything would be a greater burden upon the community at large than a 30 per cent duty might be if applied to certain articles. So, too, on the protective side of the tariff because a tariff, in so far as it is a tariff, must necessarily be that far protective,—or, possibly, destructive—those industries which depend on an export market for their ultimate prosperity cannot by any possibility derive the same advantage from the protective features of the tariff as those industries which depend on the home market. So, there are very wide differences in the point of view both in regard to taxation and in regard to protection. I need not tell the hon. members of this House that in that part of Canada lying west of Lake Superior the purchase of necessities is immeasurably greater than the purchase of luxuries. I need not say that that part of Canada depends on the advantages it receives in the export market rather than on the advantages it receives in the home market for its ultimate success. Therefore, west of Lake Superior, the conditions of the country are favourable to low taxation on necessaries and low protection; in other words, the country west of Lake Superior is, in its own interest, necessarily a low tariff country. I need not say that the country west of Lake Superior is not the only part of Canada that is so interested. Wherever, in all this broad Dominion, the majority of the people are buying necessaries instead of luxuries, and wherever, in this broad Dominion, the prosperity of the producer depends upon exports rather than upon home sales, their position is necessarily the same as that of the country west of Lake Superior, and their interests are also identified with a low tariff.

In so far as the tariff which has been put in force by the present administration is concerned; in so far as that tariff has given to the consuming and export producing class of this country relief from the burdens which they formerly bore, in so far it necessarily has our support. In so far as it has not done that it necessarily must meet with our criticism. There are features of the present tariff which some of us do not consider satisfactory. We believe that there are articles upon which the tariff is unfairly high, and if it were possible for us to secure a reduction in these particulars we would take such means as would be necessary to secure that reduction. Having recognized the advantages which we have derived under the present tariff policy and administration; having stated the points on which we feel inclined to criticise that policy, the question for us to decide is : Where do we stand or how do we stand in regard to the alternative proposition placed before us by the leader of the opposition ? Is it to that proposition that we are to look for greater advantages than we enjoy under the tariff policy of the present administration ? I will not read the amendment to the House, because the House is no doubt familiar with it. It is divided into three paragraphs, and if I might be allowed to give my poor judgment in regard to the meaning of those paragraphs, I would say that paragraph No. 1 declares for a protective tariff for all industries in Canada ; that paragraph No. 2 declares for trade advantages to be given to all parts of the empire, and that paragraph No. 3 declares for a tariff war against all the rest of the world. For my part I am a protectionist in principle and in practice. I believe that it is the business of any government to protect the interest of the country over which it is called to govern, and if the leader of the opposition or if his friends behind him can show me a reasonable means whereby he can protect and advantage the labouring, the agricultural, the manufacturing, the mining and other industrial interests in Canada by a tariff adjustment, he can have my vote.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER. But judged in the light of past events; judged in the light of the events transpiring in this country since the adoption of the so-called protective tariff in 1878; our experience leads us to believe that so-called national protection means protection for one class and one interest of the community, and the sacrifice of every other.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER. It will be for our friends opposite to explain in what way they propose to advance the agricultural and mining interests of the west by changes in the tariff. They have not attempted to do so yet, and we would be glad to hear from them on that point. The so-called protective tariff; the mis-called national policy was framed in 1878. It was framed, we are given to understand, by a master hand and by a master mind; but that policy framed by a master mind and administered by a master hand never did give protection to the agricultural and mining interests of Canada any more than it did to any of the other of these interests and industries which depended upon the export market for their success.

As to the policy of mutual trade preference within the empire, I would be glad to know how our friends propose to adequately protect every interest within Canada, and at the same time provide for a trade preference throughout the empire. Do they propose to get something for nothing ? The world has changed, if they can get a preference throughout the empire without giving something in return. And then I ask them : What interest which they have pledged themselves here to absolutely and adequately protect, are they going to sacrifice, and to what measure are they going to sacrifice it, in order to secure this mutual trade preference throughout the empire? I would ask them further : What they propose to do about the trade preference that exists at the present time between Great Britain and Canada. I understand that our friends on the other side are not in favour of that trade preference, although they have not specifically declared themselves against it. We would like them to come off the fence and say just exactly what they are going to do about it, because I would like them to understand that the principle of preferential trade with Britain as it stands at the present time appeals to the views and the interests of that section of the people of Canada who depend upon the export market of Great Britain for their ultimate success. Under the present preference, we who depend for our success upon the export of our products believe that any measure that tends to improve our market in Britain is a benefit to us, and when we secure that preference in the British market, not by giving something, but by taking something—that is, the privilege of buying what we want at a lower rate of duty—I say that preference is good enough for us until we can get something better at any rate, and it has our endorsation not only as a matter of sentiment, but as a matter of practical business. In regard to the third paragraph of the amendment which declares for a tariff war with the world, I would ask again: If we are to regulate our tariff, not as is stated in the first paragraph for the purpose of protecting every interest within our country, but for the purpose of attacking every interest in every other country. It seems to me that there is as great difficulty in meeting both conditions as between the first and third paragraph as between the first and second. I believe in the principle of regulating our tariff according to our own needs and requirements and in our own interests I do not think it is a principle capable of general application that whenever any other country sees fit to put up a certain tariff against us, we should therefore put up the same tariff against it. For these reasons, while I still criticise the fiscal policy of the government and their administration in any particular wherein I consider they have not done the best that can be done for the well-being of the part of the country in which I am most deeply interested, I am compelled to vote for the resolution of the government instead of that of the opposition.

The amendment of the leader of the opposition is a statement of policy on the part of a great political party, a party which hopes again to rule the destinies of this country ; and I would be glad to understand exactly what is meant by what is said. When the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) was replying to the speech of the Finance Minister, he criticised the fiscal policy of the government, and it seemed to me with fairly good reason. He said that he thought a time when the revenues were swelling was a time when either the taxation should be reduced or the debt decreased. He said that in his speech, but it is not embodied in this resolution. I ask you to reconcile if you can the wording of the first paragraph of the resolution, which declares for pronounced and adequate protection, or in other words high duties, with the statement of the hon. member for West Toronto that a rising revenue should be accompanied by reduced taxation. If hon. gentlemen opposite will give us a policy which will appeal to the interests and provide for the well-being of the great producing industries and the great consuming classes of this country, then they can have the support of the representatives of those classes and those interests. But so long as they see fit to declare in this House, if not in resolution, at any rate in speech, that every interest of this vast country is governed by and involved in the one single and minor interest of manufacturing, just so long must they depend on the manufacturing interest for their support, and just so long will I take the liberty of returning to them the accusation of sectionalism and narrowness which has been levelled on several occasions in this House against the representatives of the western country, because they upheld western interests. I wish it to be always understood that the people of the west have no animosity towards the manufacturing interests. We wish them nothing but an abundant success. We are not sectionalists. We like to see this eastern Canada built up ; we are proud when we see it prospering. We like to see these tall chimneys rising ; we like to see those thousands of people employed in manufacturing ; we like to see those great pay rolls. That is one side of the question. But we do not like to see gentlemen who represent the manufacturing interest stand up in this House and assume and declare that the manufacturing interest must be protected at all hazards, and that every other interest is secondary to that—that the prosperity of this country is dependent on whether those gentlemen get a cent more or a cent less on their cottons and their woollens. So long as we are levying our taxation by means of the tariff, just so long are these gentlemen entitled to all the incidental protection which a revenue tariff will give them. They are more than heartily welcome to it, and any success which they can achieve under these conditions we shall rejoice to see them achieve. There is no sectionalism in that respect. But we are told—I have heard it stated from the front benches of the opposition—that so soon as any manufacturing industry is found to be languishing, then is the time to increase the tariff. The trouble with the manufacturers of Canada—if I may be allowed to be a judge—is that they have been living rather on the strength of the tariff than on the merits of their own case; and it is a happy thing for this country, instead of this being a time when one or more manufacturers can come down here and get another turn of the tariff screw in order to help them out, the time has come when these gentlemen have to stand on their own feet and fight out their own salvation, just as we in the North-west have to do. If any particular industry cannot maintain itself under the protection accorded to it by a fair revenue tariff, then let the industry be changed ; just as in the North-west, when wheat raising becomes unprofitable, we are told from every platform, in every newspaper and from every seat in parliament : Go into mixed farming. In the same way, if certain manufacturing industries cannot thrive under a revenue tariff, it is time for them to change to some other line of manufacture, instead of coming down to this House and putting themselves in the position of mendicants on our hands.

I do not want to go into a very extensive discussion of this question ; but one thing has attracted my attention in the plea which has always been put up on behalf of high duties in favour of the manufacturers. Whenever a demand is made for a high duty in favour of the manufacturers, or whenever an attempt is made to reduce a duty, these gentlemen of the manufacturing industries forthwith barricade themselves behind a breastwork of petticoats and pinafores. It is the wives and children of their operatives who are going to be injured by any change in the tariff ; and an appeal is made to humanity when no other ground exists to keep up the tariff. But when the tariff is kept up, when it is thought advisable to form one of these great combines or trusts, when business gets a little slack, or when somebody is making a big donation for a public library or something of the kind, and a cut is made in wages, we do not then hear anything about the suffering of the workmen or operatives in the factories.

Might I give a suggestion to these philanthropists who are so very anxious about their labouring men. Labouring men depend upon the necessaries of life the same as everybody else, and have less money with which to buy them. We have all heard about the iniquity with regard to coal oil, about the high duties on coal oil, and a good many of us believe that they are altogether too high. Well, coal oil is an article which absorbs a large part of the wages of these unfortunate operatives, but I have never yet seen or heard of a manufacturing association of Canada, or any representative of such associations, getting up in parliament and advocating a reduction of the duty on that article. No danger of their doing that, because that would be attacking the sacred principle of protection. It is with them a case of hang together, for if they do not hang together they will hang separately, and they support the duty on coal oil and every other high duty simply on the principle that the duties must be kept up, although it takes money out of the pockets of the operatives, which these operatives need so much.

The claim is made that the present tariff is the same as the old one, that the tariff policy of the present government is the same old national policy of the late government. If it is, why move this resolution ? Why not endorse the policy of the government by accepting the motion of the hon. Minister of Finance ? I assume that in moving this motion, hon. gentlemen opposite acknowledge that there is not only a radical difference between the tariff policy of the present government and that of the late government, but that the tariff policy of the present opposition differs from that of the present government, and differs because it does not give higher protection to manufacturing industries. If the resolution does not mean that, then it does not mean anything.

Another side of the question I would like to touch, and one I have not heard dealt with yet, is with regard to the great prosperity which has flowed over this country during the past four or five years. I read from the speech of the hon. the Finance Minister :

> But in summing up the affairs of the country, we are able to describe it as one of unexampled prosperity. Prosperity in trade and manufactures has brought prosperity to our national finances, and enables me at the close of the year to announce results which, it is not too much to say, form the most satisfactory financial statement that ever fell to the lot of a Minister of Finance to make in the Dominion of Canada. At a time of very considerable financial stringency, at a time, too, when our expenditures were being conducted on a very liberal scale, we found our revenues so generous that we were able to provide for all our needs without having to resort to fresh loans, or even to an issue of treasury bills.

I want to call the attention of the House to the statement, which has not been challenged, that we are to-day financially and commercially in a most exceptionally prosperous condition, and the question arises, is that condition likely to continue ? If it is, we are to be congratulated. If it is not, we are to some extent to be deplored. The hon. the Finance Minister deals with that question as follows :

> I think we have probably now reached about the crest of the wave of prosperity. I do not expect that we shall have any serious reverses. I think the business of Canada has been developed during the past four or five years upon very safe and sound lines. I think there has been, to a very large extent, an absence of that inflation which is so apt to mark a period of good times. I am of opinion that the business of the country as a whole has been so carefully conducted and is on such a sound basis that we are not likely to suffer any serious reverse, but I do not think it is reasonable to expect that we can go on increasing our business as rapidly as we have during the past few years. What may happen is that we might suffer a check.

I would be very sorry, Mr. Speaker, to hold out false hopes with regard to the future prosperity of our country. If we are liable to suffer a check, it is desirable that we should know it beforehand and prepare for it, and certainly the Minister of Finance is entitled to every credit for his prudence in calling attention to that unfortunate possibility. That point I propose to discuss in a few minutes, but the question I propose to consider now is, whence comes this great prosperity, because upon the source of that prosperity depends its continuance. That is a point which has not been fully brought out in this debate. Our prosperity comes not from the fact that we have been doing business, but from the fact that we have been doing an increased business. It is in the fact of the increase that our prosperity lies, and it is on the question as to whether that increase will continue or not, that the continuance of our prosperity depends. Where did this increase in trade come from ? Did it come by accident ? Did it drop from the clouds ? Where did it come from ? Have the farmers of Ontario produced so very much more crops during the past four years than during the preceding four years as to account for our increased export trade to the amount, I think, of $155,500,000 ? Is it due to the increase in our lumbering industry ? Is it due to the increase in our fisheries and our manufactures? No doubt there has been an increase, and a very satisfactory and desirable increase, in those lines. There is no doubt that the sound administration of the Finance Minister, and his sound policy, have aided in increasing the general trade of the country a very considerable number of millions of dollars. But, I submit, not to the extent of $155,500,000 in the period of four years. Where does that increase come from ? I claim that the increase of trade within the past four or five years is due to the development of the country west of Lake Superior. From there and only from there could that stupendous increase come, and from there and from there only did it come. I feel constrained to dwell upon this point particularly, because of certain slurs which I have heard cast in this House as to the propriety of certain acts and policy respecting that western country—not so much, I admit, in recent years as in former years. It was the accepted idea in the public life of Canada not so many years ago, that the development of the western country was a mill-stone around the neck of eastern Canada. And that idea, I am sorry to say, is held yet in a good many of the back townships of this eastern country. I draw attention to the fact that we are enjoying unexampled trade prosperity in Canada ; and I draw attention to the fact that the only possible source from which that unexampled trade prosperity could come was the development of the country west of Lake Superior.

Mr. SPROULE. May I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) if it was from there that the large increase of exportation in hams and bacon came, and also the increase in our export of wheat ?

Mr. OLIVER. Not the hams and bacon, but certainly the wheat.

Mr. SPROULE. And the cheese ?

Mr. OLIVER. No.

Mr. SPROULE. And the butter ?

Mr. OLIVER. Partly, but not altogether. I said that the improvement of conditions in eastern Canada did account for millions of dollars, under the wise administration and policy of the present government. I acknowledge that ; but, I ask, and I challenge the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule), did the increase in the exports of cheese and hams and bacon account for this increase of over $155,000,000 in our exports ?

Mr. SPROULE. A share of it.

Mr. OLIVER. Undoubtedly, but only a share of it.

Mr. SPROULE. The larger part of it.

Mr. OLIVER. Well, we will see about that later—for that is the very point. We do not wish, remember, to set up as sectionalists ; but, we will not accept the position that the country which is—I will not say the hope, it has been the hope for many years—the foundation of the prosperity that Canada is enjoying, prosperity that is keeping the factories of eastern Canada busy, and is causing this House to discuss day after day questions of transportation and terminal facilities—I say we will not accept the position that that country is a drawback or in any way a detriment to the welfare of Canada at large, or that any policy which tends toward the development of that country is not a good policy and a sound policy for the Dominion at large.

Mr. SPROULE. Nobody disputes that ; there is no need to argue it.

Mr. OLIVER. I am glad to have the support of the hon. member (Mr. Sproule). I hope I shall be as successful with his colleagues on that side. Prosperity has come because of this increase, and the increase has come because of the western development—that is, the larger part of it. It is the exports that pay for the imports, and, when we find out where the exports come from, we know where our prosperity comes from. I find, on looking over the Finance Minister's statement, that our exports increased from 1899 to 1900 to the extent of about $32,000,000. I find that of that increase of $32,000,000, the increase in the products of the mine represented about $11,000,000. How much of that came from Madoc or Marmora ? I find that the increase in the export of animals and their products amounted to about $9,500,000. I find that the increase in the export of agricultural products amounted to about $4,500,000. That is to say, out of this total of $32,000,000, the increase in these three items represented $25,000,000 ; and I submit that of the increase in these three items the greater part necessarily and actually came from the country west of Lake Superior. No man can argue that the mining industries of the eastern country produced $11,000,000 more for export last year than in the preceding year. No man can argue that there was $9,500,000 more of animals and their products exported from eastern Canada than there was in the year previous. No man can argue that there was $4,500,000 more of agricultural products exported from eastern Canada than there was in the year previous. The greater part of this increase, necessarily and as a matter of fact, came from west of Lake Superior, and it was this increase of exports from that western country that, as I say, kept your factories going and your wholesale houses busy. This is the secret of your prosperity ; and, inasmuch as the development of that western country is not ended, is only beginning, I believe that we are not necessarily at the end of an era of prosperity, but that, if a wise and careful policy is pursued, we shall find that we are but at the beginning of an era of prosperity which will grow greater even than the present.

I have given the increase of exports in three great lines. Now let us see the other side. I find that our exports of manufactures increased about $2,500,000—a very desirable increase, an increase that we are pleased to see and that we are proud of, but an increase that was a result of the prosperity of the country rather than the cause of it. Our fishery exports increased by about $1,250,000. Our exports of the products of the forests increased about $1,500,000. These are interests and industries particularly connected with eastern Canada. We find that in these items our exports have been increased to the extent of about $5,250,000, as against an increase of about $25,000,000 in the products of the mine and the farm. Had we been depending, then, upon the pleasing and satisfactory increase which has taken place in these lines, while we should have had fairly good times, we should not have had the unexampled prosperity which the Minister of Finance speaks of so fully in his opening remarks, and which is beyond challenge or question. Not only has there been an increase in our exports as between last year and the year before, but, taking the figures given us by the Finance Minister, we find that there has been an increase very much in the same proportion, in the period of four years from 1896 to 1900, as compared with the period from 1893 to 1896. As between these two periods the total increase of exports was $155,500,000. Of these exports $37,500,000 were of mines, and $83,750,000 were of farm and animal products, or a total of $125,250,000, of the products of the mine and of the farm. Manufactures increased $13,500,000, the products of the forest, $12,000,000, and the fisheries, $750,000. On the one side of the slate you have $121,250,000, and on the other side $26,250,000.

I claim that there is something more required in the administration of the public affairs of this country than mere tinkering with the tariff. The tariff is not everything, though I admit that the tariff is important, inasmuch as it touches every one in the matter of taxation. It affects, or can be made to affect, every current of trade. I do not wish to minimize the importance of the tariff, but I do think its importance has been greatly exaggerated in discussions of this subject. From the figures I have placed before this House, I think it is clear that a policy that will tend to the still greater development of the mining and agricultural interests of this country, which particularly belong to the country west of Lake Superior, is the policy which will maintain and increase our prosperity.

Now, as to whether this increase did come from west of Lake Superior or not, is a question I will briefly consider. Of course, we cannot separate, in the trade returns, that which came from one part of the country and that which came from another. It all goes out and all comes in through our great ports and our great wholesale centres, and everything coming in through these ports is credited to such ports and to the provinces in which they are found. Therefore, we have to go to other sources for our information as to the increased production of the western country. I find from the speech of the Finance Minister that from 1897 to 1900 the government collected a royalty of $2,000,000 upon the gold output of the Yukon. That royalty was levied, supposedly, at a rate of 10 per cent on all the gold mined over, I think, $2,500 to each mine. Now, I do not throw any aspersion upon the honesty of the people of the Yukon, nor upon the ability of the officials there; but I think if you will deduct the $2,500 exemptions, and if you will make a reasonable allowance for the dislike of people to pay royalty unless they are obliged to, and for the facility which the handling of gold allows to parties to escape the royalty, you will agree that $2,000,000 does not represent by any means 10 per cent of the total output of gold of the Yukon. Indeed, I think it does not represent more than 5 per cent of the actual output. There must have been not less than $40,000,000 of gold mined in the Yukon territory from 1897 to 1900, judging by the returns of the royalty collected. On that point I desire to say a word. I have heard it argued that because it did not cost $40,000,000 to mine the gold, that therefore the country did not profit to the amount of the gold mined. I can only say, as one who has some little knowledge of mining conditions, that the idea is a fallacy, and that the mining of $40,000,000 worth of gold in the Yukon territory does mean a transaction of not less than $40,000,000 worth of business in connection with the mining of that gold. It is an accepted principle that it costs a dollar to take out a dollar's worth of gold from the ground, and some think more than a dollar. If it were not so, gold would sometime become cheap; but it is so, and any man who has gone into gold mining as a speculation—and I think some of my hon. friends opposite will bear me out in the statement—is aware that it often costs more to take out gold than the value of the gold itself. The way it works is this: The richer the mine the greater the rush of people to it, and therefore the greater the waste of money by those who have joined in the rush; and of this waste of money the country gets the benefit in trade. So that although it did not cost $40,000,000 to mine that $40,000,000 of gold that was taken out of the ground, there was $40,000,000 expended, because of that $40,000,000 taken out, and the trade of this country or of some other country benefited to that extent because of that gold being mined.

It has been said that the United States has benefited entirely by the trade of the Yukon, that Canada has only benefited by the royalty that has been levied. I find from the speech of the minister that the customs duties levied on goods entering the Yukon in those four years, is about $1,000,- 000. Now, that $1,000,000 of duty levied on goods brought into the Yukon is not the trade that Canada got—is not the benefit that Canada got. It is the trade which Canada did not get. Taking a 33⅓ per cent duty, $1,000,000 of duty collected would mean $3,000,000 of outside trade, and the balance was Canadian trade, representing the turnover of our merchants, our manufacturers and our dealers in this country, and particularly in the eastern country. Because of those articles which paid the $1,000,000 duty I think I am safe in saying the greater part consisted of agricultural products from the western states. The manufactured articles which went into the Yukon in recent years, at any rate, have been essentially Canadian goods, and Canadian trade has benefited therefrom.

I find from the report of the Minister of Mines of British Columbia, dated June 30th, 1899, that the production of the mines has increased between 1895 and 1899 from $5,500,000 to $12,250,000. Now, just as in the case of the Yukon, so in the case of the mines of British Columbia. My hon. friends from British Columbia will pardon me for alluding to their province, but I think they will bear me out in saying that the rule which I have stated in regard to the Yukon holds good in a large measure in regard to the mines of British Columbia, and that for the $12,250,000 taken out in 1899 not less than $10,000,000 of trade was necessarily done in connection with the mining of that amount. I will not put it any higher. It may have been a great deal more, but it certainly was not any less.

Then, we come further east, and I find it difficult to get returns that will answer the questions raised by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), but, on looking into the Statistical Year-Book for 1899, I find the increase of crop in the province of Manitoba therein stated, and I find that there is a difference between the crop yield of 1896 and the crop yield of 1899 as between 32,000,000 bushels, and 59,000,000 bushels, a difference of 27,000,000 bushels, almost double in three years. I think my hon. friends from Manitoba and the North-west Territories will bear me out when I say that, although the production in the Territories is not yet as large, the proportionate increase is very much greater. So, the crop of Manitoba and the west has absolutely and actually doubled in the three years from 1896 to 1899, and that doubling has meant an increase in the crop of between thirty and forty million bushels of grain which is worth just that much money. Now, I ask you, whether, in this eastern country, it is possible for such an increase to be shown. It is not that this eastern country is not a good country, that it is not one of the fairest countries that the sun shines on, that it is not one of the finest countries in the world, but the opportunity for expansion is not here that is there. There can not be the increase where there is not the opportunity, and if Canada is to increase in her prosperity as she has done, then we must look to the development of the country west of Lake Superior, on the prairies and in the mountains for the future great prosperity and development of Canada, and we must be prepared to support a policy designed to promote the development of the country. Allow me to say that I am not one of those who are always calling for government expenditures in order to secure development. I believe that wise expenditures are ofttimes necessary, but wise and judicious administration is just as necessary as any possible expenditure of actual money. We had large expenditures in the period from 1882 until 1896, we had liberal expenditures, but we did not have results because we did not have wise administration, and it is greatly because of the wiser administration in regard to that country that we have enjoyed since 1896 that this prosperity has come about. With a continuation of a wise policy —I do not say that we have reached perfection by any means—with a continuation of an improved policy, we will have still greater prosperity, in that country and in this eastern country, from whence you must look to the west for your ultimate and final greatness and prosperity.

As other hon. members have wandered far afield from the letter of the resolution, so, I may add a word which I do not consider afield at all, but, as a final conclusion to what I have already said in regard to this eastern and western question. It was a principle held by the late government that it was not good policy to aid the movement of people from one part of Canada to another, as they put it. That it was not good policy to aid the movement of people from eastern Canada to western Canada. And we find to some extent, in fact, to a large extent, that idea is followed by the present administration as well as by the present opposition. It is against that idea that I wish to argue upon the present occasion. I say that if you are to have development, you must have opportunity. If you are to have development, you must give opportunity. You cannot make bricks without straw, you cannot expect a man in eastern Canada who is confined to the limits of a fifty, sixty or a hundred acre farm, or who is trying to wring a living out of soil that will not and cannot be made to produce to add largely if at all to the wealth of the country. That man, let him be the best man there ever was in the world, cannot produce the results that will be of general benefit to this country, that he could produce were he to transfer his energies to a wider and better opportunity. There is, and has been the idea that the progress of the west meant the injury of the east. I have read to the House to-day and have shown on the authority of the hon. Minister of Finance that it is upon the progress of the west that the progress of the east has depended, is depending and must necessarily depend. Then, I say, instead of standing by this idea that we must keep our people at home, that we must keep them fenced up in little, confined, rocky fields, in poor parts of the country, it is the interest of every man to induce people so circumstanced to change their situation and to take advantage of the wider opportunities offered by the western country. We have looked in the past to outsiders to develop our western country. We have, under the late government and under the present government, expended large amounts of money and we have advocated large policies for the purpose of settling that western country from the outside. Let me, in this House, say that what that country is from Lake Superior to the Alaskan boundary, it is, principally because of the exertions, the abilities and energies of the people of eastern Canada who have gone there to make their homes and to build up a new and greater Canada. It is because of what has been done, by the people who have gone out there from your midst, here, and who, because of the wider opportunities, have achieved greater successes. It is because of their abilities and energies that this addition has been made to our finances and to our prosperity. You have not lost by their going, but you have gained and you will not lose by the further going of such people to that country and building up there a market for your manufacturers, building up a market for your wholesale dealers, and providing traffic for your lines of transportation and great ocean ports, as they cannot cooped up as they are in many parts of this eastern country wearing out their lives in trying to wring a living out of the soil under circumstances that cannot yield them one. It is to our own people that we owe the development of our western country as far as it has gone, and now, when we see as we do see, the benefit that accrues to us from the development of that country, it is for us to unite and consider it, not as an outside place, but as part of a great Canada. It is our common interest to build up a country that will be great in the west and so be great in the east.

You may ask : What would you wish to have done in order to bring this about. I would wish to have a change in sentiment ; I would wish to have our public men look at this matter in the light I have viewed it to-day. Instead of men of light and leading in this eastern country holding to the idea that they must keep their people at home in eastern Canada—keep them settled on some rocky strip of land in New Ontario or some such region, I would ask them to realize that our manufacturers require a market, that our wholesale dealers require a market, that our railways and our ports require traffic. And how can we get that traffic so well as by transplanting our people from insurmountable difficulties here, to illimitable opportunities there. If we adopt such a policy, then, I say, we need not look for that check to our prosperity which the Minister of Finance has foreshadowed. There will we find a solution for the financial problems of this country ; there will we find a means to maintain and increase the prosperity which has so astonished us within the last four years. That prosperity did not come by accident. It came by hard toil, it came by enterprise, it came by sound judgment, it came by men who took risks, and it came from the efforts of men of our own blood and our own name who transferred their energies from this country in the east to that country in the west ; the men who have built up our western country as far as it has gone, but who have only touched the fringe of that vast empire that lies between Lake Superior and the Pacific coast.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART (South Lanark). I intend, Sir, to confine my remarks, in supporting the amendment introduced by the leader of the opposition, to the subject-matter which we are discussing. I am a firm believer in the recent ruling of Mr. Speaker, that it conduces to the dignity of debate that the rules of the House should be strictly observed and that there should be no wandering from the subject before us. Although there is a great deal of latitude permitted on going into Supply, the present is an entirely different occasion. This amendment, Sir, is an affirmation of the principles upon which the Conservative party stands, upon which they intend to stand, and upon which when the opportunity comes they will appeal to the people of Canada. The first part of that amendment is virtually an affirmation of the principles by which the Conservative party have stood from 1874 to the present day, namely : The protection of the mining, agricultural, and manufacturing industries of the country, or, in other words, the protection of home industries by high tariff duties on manufactures or products which can be produced within the country itself. That is a doctrine of political economy not belonging peculiarly to the Conservative party of Canada, but common to the progressive governments of nearly every civilized nation in the world. It seems strange that at this late day we are called upon to affirm this principle, but there is a departure from it here, and although the government have followed to a slight degree the principles of protection, these principles are not being followed up to the extent which we think is necessary to protect the manufactures of this country. Our opinions on this side of the House are entirely different from those of the last speaker (Mr. Oliver). He says that protection of the manufacturing industries of Canada is an injury to the agricultural, and other classes of our community, while we hold that the principles laid down by us in 1874, and which have been followed by most nations of the civilized world since, are the true economic principles for us as a young nation to follow. These principles are no longer sneered at as contrary to political economy, but, as I said, they are being adopted by every intelligent nation. These principles which are the true political economy upon which nations build their fortunes are affirmed in the first part of this resolution. Almost in the very words of this resolution the political economists of Europe say : That protecting the home industries of a country has the effect of giving markets to the agricultural classes, tends to build up the country and to place it in a position commercially to compete with other countries in the markets of the world. The latest convert to that proposition is the Russian Finance Minister, Mr. De Witte, one of the foremost financiers of the world. He has recently written on the subject, and his language so embodies the principles and the doctrines of the Liberal-Conservative party of Canada, and his arguments are so concisely put that I shall read an extract from De Witte's article to the House. He says :

> History shows that exclusively agricultural countries, even when they are politically independent and internationally powerful, are economically restricted to the role of tributary colonies to industrial countries which are, so to speak, their metropolis. In exclusively agricultural countries neither intensified agriculture nor the accumulation of capital is possible.

I draw the attention of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) to this language :

> A large spirit of enterprise is never found there. Technical knowledge is rare there, and as our own experience shows even the food of the people depends upon considerations now of one kind, now of another, and against which agriculture cannot contend. The best protection that can be afforded to agriculture consists in assuring for it a market at home for its products, and remunerative wages for labour which finds an occupation in the land.

The ultimate aim of the protectionist is, after all, the high ideal of the present policy in England. The ultimate goal is that your industries shall receive a status which is the prerequisite to your becoming a nation, and after they receive that status to abandon as nearly as possible all protective duties. But, Sir, we are far from having attained that status in Canada to-day. Look how Mr. De Witte's words correspond with the doctrine laid down by one of the ministers of the present government when he was addressing an audience in Boston, and when he pictured to them the advantage of commercial union between the United States and this country, saying, that it would tend to develop the industries of Boston and New York, and that our country north of the St. Lawrence would be a fringe of states added not politically but economically, which would in every way help to make the United States a great nation.

They ventured away from these opinions. They found that the people of this country understand what protection is. They found that a party can only govern this country for many years to come which is a party of protection to the industries of the country. We do not ask for a tariff which prevents manufactured goods of other countries from coming into this country. We ask for a tariff which will allow a moiety of the manufactured goods of other countries to come in and compete with the manufactures of this country. That is in the interest of the manufacturers themselves, and in the interest of the country in the raising of our revenues. What we contend is that the policy of the present government, by raising so large a revenue from customs duties, is having the effect of shutting up the factories of this country, notably the woollen factories. Look at the great increase in the importations of woollen goods—$13,000,000 worth, more than double what was imported in 1897. Say $8,000,000 worth of these might have been manufactured in the country, providing employment not only for the mills that are shut down, but for others. If I remember rightly, each set of looms produces an average of about $60,000 worth of material. Divide $60,000 into $8,000,000, and you will see the extent to which the woollen industry of this country would be increased if that quantity of woollen goods were manufactured here. There are other manufactures in the country in precisely the same position ; and when you once close an industry, you stop the progress of the country in that industry ; you stop the competition with countries ; because, after all, countries are just like individuals, striving for position, and the same law of existence applies to them. This principle of protection the Conservative party will apply to the mother country as to any other country in the world, for the first duty of this country is to the inhabitants of the country itself. The people of Great Britain know that, and they ought to be proud of a country which understands the principles of political economy, and which intends to develop itself in manufactures and every other industry, and to become more powerful commercially than it is at present, so as to be of more assistance in the end to that mother country which we pretend to assist at the present time by the preferential tariff adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite.

As to this preferential tariff, there is not a man in this House, whether he is a member of the government or not, but must admit that if we had differential treatment in favour of our goods in the English market in return for the preference which we give to English goods coming into this country, it would be an advantage to Canada. What is the argument against it ? It is that the various propositions on that subject have been brought before the Right Hon. Mr. Chamberlain, the Colonial Minister, and that the only one he would entertain was a proposition for a zollverein between the colonies and the empire ; and the right hon. leader of the government has made the statement that the fundamental condition of that zollverein is free trade between the different portions of the empire. I deny it. I think I can prove that the language of Mr. Chamberlain will bear a different interpretation. I need not read the whole statement, but I will read the portion which the right hon. leader of the government referred to in his speech the other day, and on which he relies, as does also the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Russell), for the position they take, that the people of Great Britain would entertain no proposition which was not based upon the principle of free trade between the colonies and the empire. Mr. Chamberlain said :

> Now, if I have rightly understood it, these articles would comprise corn, meat, wool and sugar, and perhaps other articles of enormous consumption in this country which are at present largely produced in the colonies, and which might be, under such an arrangement, wholly produced in the colonies, and wholly produced by British labour. On the other hand, as I have said, the colonies, while maintaining their duties upon foreign imports, would agree to a free interchange of commodities with the rest of the empire, and would cease to place protective duties upon any product of British labour.

Does the right hon. gentleman who leads the government ask us to believe that that means free trade between the different portions of the empire ? Was Mr. Chamberlain asking the colonies to do away with customs duties which are necessary for carrying on their governments ? No man who reads the language will put any such interpretation upon it. What Mr. Chamberlain meant was this : Put your duties as high as you like for the purpose of raising a revenue to govern and manage the affairs of your own country, but give a preference to England, or, in other words, have no protective tariff against Great Britain, and we will give you equal advantages in the interchange of goods between the different portions of the empire. The right hon. gentleman says that the principles of free trade are so engrafted in the minds of the British people and statesmen that they will not entertain anything else. Is he aware that the right hon. the Colonial Secretary stated in the English House of Commons that the principles of free trade, which apply between England and foreign nations, are not applicable at all between the different portions of the empire. The prospect of a preference to the colonies in the British market was held out to the right hon. gentleman as plainly as it could be by statesmen in England, who are very careful about what they say. They said : Make your proposition to us, and we will at least entertain it or consider it. The right hon. gentleman fully understood Mr. Chamberlain in this sense before he went home, for before the elections in 1896 he said at a meeting in some town west of here : We will be successful in November next, and if successful the first thing we will do will be to appoint a commission to go home and meet the right hon. the Secretary for the Colonies, who is a man of advanced ideas, and this commission will be sent for the purpose—of doing what ? Offering preferential treatment to British goods coming into our country without asking anything in return ? No, but to secure preferential treatment for our goods in the mother country. The right hon. gentleman understood what the Rt. Hon. Joseph Chamberlain meant, and his intention was to take advantage of the suggestion thrown out by Mr. Chamberlain. But what did he do ? Why, immediately when he landed upon the shores of Great Britain, he was seized by a sudden inspiration. By some unexplainable flash of intuition he became convinced of what was in the minds of the people of Great Britain, he saw at once what was the consensus of opinion among the British people, and felt that it would be entirely useless to make any proposition of the kind he had previously declared it was his intention to make. No sooner did he land than he made the announcement to the mother country : On account of the great advantages which you have given us, on account of the great things which you have done for us, we find that we ought to be generous, and we will give you a preferential trade without asking anything in return.

What could any statesman of Great Britain do under the circumstances ? Could you expect him to reply : You are foolish to make such an offer without asking quid pro quo ? No, that announcement of the right hon. gentleman closed the mouth of every minister of England, and absolutely precluded the making of an offer by any English minister of any interchange of tariffs or fair treatment to the colonies.

The right hon. gentleman, by that announcement, also hit a slap in the face to free trade doctrines. Is it not as much opposed to the free trade or open-door doctrine to give a preference to English goods in our market as anything possibly can be ? If the right hon. gentleman has any doubt on this question, I will read from a debate in the English House of Commons, which occurred in 1898, on a Bill introduced for the purpose of giving a constitution to the state of Rhodesia. A question arose as to the powers to be given to that state—which was not a self-governing, but a Crown colony—with reference to a customs tariff—whether it should be given power to discriminate in favour of British against foreign goods. This proposition of Mr. Rhodes roused the ire of the free traders in the House of Commons. Sir William Harcourt, followed up by Mr. Courtney, John Morley, and all the great authorities on the subject, denounced it as one of the vilest abandonments of the principle of free trade and the open-door that ever was propounded in a British House of Commons. The Secretary of State for the Colonies (Mr. Chamberlain) in reply, said :

> The right hon. gentleman would not allow a British colony to make a preference in favour of the mother country, and to make such a preference was considered by them as an abominable protectionist piece of business and a reversal of the free trade policy of this country. Both the right hon. gentlemen opposite agree to that.
>
> Then they are entirely opposed to the offer which we have had, and which was made to us by the free trade premier of Canada, and by which a preference of 25 per cent is given to British goods imported into Canada.

Then the Secretary of State for the Colonies went on :

> It is quite true that a self-governing colony can make any offer it pleases, just as Mr. Rhodes can, but it is for the Imperial government to say whether or not it shall be accepted, and if it be right for the Imperial government to refuse the offer made by Rhodesia, it would have been right for the Imperial government to refuse the offer made by Canada. We ought to have said to Canada: No, inasmuch as we are a free trade country, we cannot accept the offer, although, no doubt, you intend it most generously, unless you extend it to all other countries. That is the argument of the right hon. gentleman. Had he ever heard of an institution called the Cobden Club? Does he think the Cobden Club exists in order to bring about a reversal of our free trade policy? Yet the Cobden Club gave its gold medal to Sir Wilfrid Laurier. And we are told, forsooth, that we are unfaithful to the doctrine of the open door.

It seemed to me, when I heard that the Cobden Club gave this gold medal to the right hon. gentleman, that it was a reversal by the club of all the principles that were laid down as underlying the free trade principles which had been advocated from the time of Cobden down to the present day. The explanation given by Sir Wilfrid Laurier is that he was a member of that distinguished body. The explanation given by Mr. Courtney, in the English House of Commons, and Mr. Morley, was that they did not know of any such offer as this to the Imperial government, or they would have never given a medal to the right hon. gentleman. And the suggestion is made by the Secretary of State for the Colonies that if the right hon. gentleman is entitled to the Cobden medal, so is Mr. Rhodes who proposed a similar tariff in the case of Rhodesia. I would like to see both the right hon. gentleman and Mr. Rhodes walking down the streets of London as champions of free trade principles in England. Why, a child knows that the very principle of a preference to the mother country is an abandonment entirely of the open-door and free trade policy. Yet these gentlemen talk of free trade principles so permeating British society and the British people that they would not entertain any idea of a preference to the colonies in the home market and say it is only the stupid thick heads of the opposition in Canada who would make a proposition of that kind. But did it never strike the right hon. gentleman that there are other colonies at present offering England a perference in their markets and asking for a quid pro quo in return. Is not that being done by Australia ? If the right hon. gentleman wanted to carry out his anti-election promise, which he made when he had the statement of the Secretary of the Colonies that the free trade doctrine should not apply to the relations between the empire and the colonies, what has he done to carry out that pledge ? Has there been any correspondence with the Imperial government urging upon them that, as for three years we have given British goods a preference in our country, they ought to give us some return. I have seen no correspondence of the kind. I have heard of no correspondence of that kind. Has there been an interchange of ideas with the Australian colonies for the purpose of carrying out that same principle ? Not a word of it that I have ever heard of. Hon. gentlemen opposite rest upon their oars, and this pre-election promise, like so many others that they gave, is left unfulfilled. They occupy the Treasury benches because of the promises they made, but their performance is wholly different from their promises. They abandoned their policy of free trade. The people of the country have forgiven them for that. But the people will not forgive them for the abandonment of every other one of their principles, and especially that one upon which the people of the country have set their hearts—that if we give a preference to British goods, we shall have some advantage in return. I wish to read the statement of the Secretary of State for the Colonies to show that in the opinion of that right hon. gentleman the principle of free trade does not apply as between the mother country and her colonies. He said :

> I deny that absolutely, but I am delighted to find that the opposition are prepared to follow their leaders in this direction. I say it has no resemblance whatever to the policy of the open port and the policy of free trade. That policy is as between nations and not as between branches of the same nation.

This shows that the Secretary of State for the Colonies does not believe that the mother country is bound to the principle of free trade in the matter. He is willing to consider the question outside of the principle of free trade. Yet, not a single proposition has been made by any member of this government for the purpose of having carried into effect that which was supported by the consensus of public opinion in this country, that a preference should be given in our markets to the products of the mother country on condition of getting some advantage in the markets of Great Britain. There is a little paragraph following what I have read, which, perhaps, I might read for the edification of the right hon. leader of the House (Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). This is said by the Secretary of State for the Colonies :

> The right hon. gentleman suggests that we should treat them differently. No ! If we are willing to accept this favour and to thank Canada for it, and to give a gold medal to her Prime Minister for having proposed it, then, I think that the next thing is for the Cobden Club to give a gold medal to Mr. Rhodes.

This aroused the ire of Mr. Courtney, Mr. Morley and others. Mr. Courtney gets out of the difficulty by saying that the right hon. gentleman who leads the government (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) is something of an orator, but that he does not understand the principles of political economy :

> What my right hon. friend says is this: that as between different divisions of the same political organization—the British Empire——

This, it will be seen, is the interpretation that Mr. Courtney puts upon the words of the Secretary of State for the Colonies.

> —there is no departure from free trade, although there is differential treatment of one part of it as against the outside public. That is his point.

And here is Mr. Courtney's reply to the taunt flung at him that the Cobden Club had abandoned the principles, and had gone in favour of protection by honouring the right hon. leader of this government by giving him a gold medal :

> My right hon. friend has referred to the presentation by the Cobden Club of a gold medal to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, adding he was thus recognized by the highest authority as an eminent free trader. I am an honorary member of that club, but I have never been an ordinary member, and I have never associated myself with any of its actions; and when I read that a gold medal had been presented to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, I could not but think that the Cobden Club had committed a betise. Sir Wilfrid Laurier is a person of eminence and of great standing and a man who possesses fine rhetorical powers; but whether he is a master of political economy or of the principles of free trade, I do not know. But I am certain that his action in proposing to reduce the duties on British produce imported into the Dominion of Canada was not of a character which should have recommended itself to Mr. Cobden. I think that he would not have accepted it. Mr. Cobden would have known a good deal better than that, and he would have been the last to approve of it.

Now, the only argument of hon. gentlemen on the government side against the principles embodied in the second part of the resolutions at present before the House is that the English people will not entertain it, that the English people cannot do it. But these hon. gentlemen have never tried, they have never made application to Great Britain for a preference. How is there to be a closer union between the different parts of the empire unless it is based upon the principle proposed by Mr. Chamberlain, the only principle he entertained—a zollverein of tariffs ? We must make the material interests of the mother country and of the colonies identical. Of course, we are not going to part with any portion of the right of self government, even to the Imperial authorities. We have the right to govern ourselves, as have other colonies of the empire. There is no proposition for Imperial federation or for closer union of interests as between the different parts of the empire, but the proposition of Mr. Chamberlain of a zollverein of tariffs between the different parts of the empire. That is the goal which the Conservative party are approaching. The right hon. leader of the government and the Minister of Finance, in discussing the subject the other day asked this side of the House : If you are opposed to the preferential tariff, why do you not move to strike it out ? It never struck the hon. gentlemen that there was another way out of the difficulty. We can give protection against the manufactures of Great Britain coming into this country, and at the same time give preferential treatment to British goods. We do not abandon our protectionist principles, nor are we flying in the face of the preferential tariff. We can carry out the principle embodied in the second part of the resolutions without the abandonment of the preferential treatment of Great Britain. On the two parts of the resolution introduced by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax), I am in complete accord with him; and I believe that the universal sentiment of the people of this country is in favour of carrying out the principle of political economy as laid down by all the great men of the present day, and in every civilized country of the world, with the single exception of Great Britain.

If at any time the industries and manufactures of the mother country were being swept out of existence by foreign competition, you would think she would protect her own industries. A few years ago she stood at the head of the manufacturing industries. She had cheap labour, skilled labour, any amount of capital for the purpose of distributing her products to every part of the world. If rival enterprises were started in any part of the world, she was able to send her goods into that country so cheap that she could undersell them and stifle their industries, and keep the market for herself. The ultimate goal of every country in this world, as plainly laid down by Mr. De Witte, is to have industrial and manufacturing centres surrounded by an agricultural population which will furnish the food products for the purpose of keeping up those industries. That doctrine is the fundamental doctrine of the Conservative platform. As I have already said, it may be that for a time the purchaser will suffer ; but the result is always beneficial ; and, as Mr. De Witte has pointed out, the people who adopt that policy always become the wealthiest and most intellectual.

Now, as to the remaining clause of the resolution introduced by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition :

The House is further of opinion that equivalent or adequate duties should be imposed by Canada upon the products and manufactures of countries not within the empire in all cases where such countries fail to admit Canadian products and manufactures upon fair terms.

That opens a very wide field, it touches upon our relations with every other country in the world in respect of which Great Britain has bound us by the most-favoured-nation clause. It must apply to all, because no nation which has a most-favoured-nation clause with Great Britain could apply exceptional tariffs against this country, they would be void. They are similarly bound in their contracts with the empire to afford the same treatment to the colonies as to the empire. There are perhaps only three countries in the world to which we could apply that principle, namely, the zollverein of Germany, Belgium and the United States. Those treaties were denounced, and concerning the denunciation of those treaties I have some very interesting correspondence between the Colonial Secretary and the government of this country. It is in reference to the proposition that was introduced by the Finance Minister, offering most favourable terms not only to Great Britain but to any other country in the world that fulfilled the conditions. On this side of the House we pointed out the impossibility of anything of that kind being done. I remember the Minister of Marine and Fisheries getting up and, with that style of his which seemed to say that after he had opened his mouth nothing further could be said, he stated in the most positive manner that he had read carefully the most-favoured-nation clause of Great Britain, and that the argument of the opposition was groundless. I was wondering why the government dropped that particular clause in their tariff arrangements, and I find the reason in a despatch from the Colonial Office which completely upsets the ideas those gentlemen had when they first introduced their resolution, and brought them back to the position where they now stand :

But I should add that there is another question which is still more difficult, but about which I only wish to offer a word of warning to the representatives present. Besides these two treaties which are very special in their terms and which prevent the preferential arrangement, or which appear to prevent the preferential arrangement——

Because the Colonial Secretary was very careful not to bind himself by saying that it did prevent the preferential arrangement ; he wanted to leave a way of escape.

—we have a most-favoured-nation clause in all our treaties to which most of the colonies are parties. I may explain that under the terms of the Canadian resolution, if any foreign nation were to offer to Canada beneficial terms as defined in the resolution, Canada would then be bound to give to that country the same preferences as offered to Great Britain. Let me suppose, for instance, that it was a minor country like Holland, and assuming for the sake of argument that Holland offered these conditions, thereupon Canada will be compelled to give the same terms to Holland that she now offers to the mother country. She would then be bound by the most-favoured-nation treaties to give the same terms to practically every commercial country in the world.

Repeating the words of the Colonial Secretary, nearly the ipsissima verba used by the leader of the opposition when he pointed out to the Finance Minister what would be the result of the proposition he made.

It would be, I think, a matter of impossibility to denounce those treaties because that involves the whole trade of the empire. In some cases there is no term of denunciation in the treaties. But, of course, the whole difficulty can be avoided by any colony which desires to make preferential arrangements with the mother country, if that colony will confine its offer nominatim to the mother country, and not make it to a foreign country.

That suggestion was made to the Finance Minister. He found out the solution of the difficulty that he was in, and that is the cause of the change that he made in the resolutions after they were first introduced. But it never was the intention in this House, when those resolutions were introduced, to give virtually a 25 per cent tariff to the countries whose treaties we had denounced, to Germany, Belgium, and the rest of Europe. The result of the reduction in favour of Great Britain is virtually a reduction of nearly that amount in favour of the whole of Europe. Great Britain had practically the commerce of Europe at her disposition, and could carry her trade to all parts of the world, and could send even the products of Holland, Belgium, France and Germany into every part of the world.

What are these hon. gentlemen requiring under this preferential tariff ? Is it that 25 per cent of the original value of the article shall be finished in England ? I do not clearly understand the words of the order in council. I may be mistaken in that particular. Or, is it 25 per cent of the value of the article as it leaves the British shore? If it is the first proposition, suppose that an article costs $80 in Germany, and if 25 per cent of the finish is to be added in England, that would be only 20 per cent of the value of the article, and then you could add the cost of the package, the commission and all these amounts to the value of the article sent to this country and you will find that the amount of the finish, or the expenditure to be made on the article in Great Britain, itself, will not amount to more than 20 per cent, or 15 per cent of the value of the article. That, as I understand it is the practice of the custom-house. Then, virtually, nearly every country in Europe is at the present time entering into competition with the manufacturers of this country on terms nearly equal to those accorded to the British people. That is what the people of this country will not permit. Germany has a hostile tariff against the people of this country, other countries have hostile tariffs against us, notably Germany, but, notwithstanding this fact, the policy which we adopted, not only in favour of the empire itself, but in favour of the different colonies, has been availed of to the fullest extent by Germany and there is an increased importation of German goods into this country under this preferential arrangement. What is the result of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite ?—a prohibition, nearly, or at all events, a reduction to a large amount of the trade that we formerly did with the German people. Then, it is asked how the policy which we propose can be carried out. I heard the hon. Minister of Customs, the other day, ask the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean): Would you have a reciprocal arrangement with Great Britain ? Who ever contemplated such a thing ? There is no duty upon our goods going into that country and reciprocal treatment would be the taking off of the duty altogether on the goods coming into this country. We never contemplated any such absurdity as that, and the Conservative party have not fallen to such a depth of ignorance as to be propounding propositions the absurdity of which strikes the hon. Minister of Customs. What we propose to do is this: we know the difficulties in reference to the treaty arrangements by which we are bound to different countries in the world. Surely we can make such a tariff arrangement as Germany and France have, that is, a maximum and a minimum tariff. Why should we not apply that principle to our own country ? It may be mechanical and self-working, so that, under certain circumstances and rules, as a result of the tariff which any country may adopt in reference to our trade, our tariff would go mechanically into force. That is one way of getting over the difficulties, and I would like the hon. Minister of Customs, when he is answering, to express his opinion in reference to it.

Mr. HAGGART.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I am speaking metaphorically for the people of this country. The Tooley street argument in reference to the tailors may apply, but it is the habit and custom of this House to speak of 'we,' and when I speak of 'we' I speak as if I am here representing the people of the country. I speak for my country and I am voicing the opinions of my country.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Hon. Mr. Paterson). The impressions left on my mind by the speech of the hon. member for East York and the speech of the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Haggart) are entirely different, and, therefore, I wanted to know which view was the view of the party ?

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Paterson) makes a statement of fact which I controvert entirely. My views and the statement, as I heard it, of the hon. member for East York are quite consonant. He has an intelligent view of these matters and I, following in the wake of the hon. gentleman who spoke here the other day, am perhaps voicing in the concrete his opinions. These are the opinions that we hold in reference to this resolution. The hon. Minister of Customs, if he has any fault to find with them, or if he can find anything wrong with our principles, will be at liberty, in a short time, in discussing the matter, to show their fallacy, or falseness. Then, what is, after all, the resolution ? The resolution is an affirmation of the principles which, as I have said, since 1874 have bound the Conservative party. We state further that these principles have been departed from by the present government in order to make a revenue showing to the people, and that the present government are neglecting the manufacturing interests of the country. The right hon. gentleman (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier), in his argument, says that the people of this country are sick of changes in the tariff. In order, under the protective system, to afford sufficient protection to home industries, or to encourage the development of home industries, the tariff must of necessity be a changing one. Whenever we can manufacture articles cheaper in this country the tariff must be lowered a little to raise revenue and to afford competition which is a necessity in the interests of the manufacturers themselves. There is no fixed rate to be maintained. We will vary the tariff when we get in in order to carry out the system as we believe it should be carried out, to produce revenue in the country and to carry on, in accordance with the underlying principles of the Conservative party, the building up of the country, the building up of industries which can be in no way done but by the adoption of the principles which this party have advocated from 1874, down to the present day. We further contend that the first duty of the people is to the country itself. For that reason we are opposed to the one-sided arrangement which the right hon. gentleman made with the empire. There was no necessity for it. He, himself, made a statement before he went over to the old country entirely at variance with the policy which was adopted. His pre-election pledges to the people were in line with the second part of the resolution and the only way he gets out of his promise to the people is by presenting the argument, which was repeated by the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Russell), that the British government will not entertain a proposition of that kind and that no proposition of that kind will be entertained by any colony. They are making such propositions in Australia, and perhaps, before a couple of years have passed over the doctrine which the right hon. Secretary of State for the Colonies has laid down as the doctrine which will bind him in reference to the dealings between the different parts of the empire is that free trade principles shall not apply as between them. We have had statements made publicly in the House of Commons in England going to show that the Australian colonies are marching in that direction. Why is it that the man who made the nation, or woke up one morning and found that Canada was a nation, is not advancing the interests of the people by urging upon the Imperial government that free trade principles do not apply between the different parts of the empire and that they should give us something in return for our abandonment of the open door. and for our abandonment of every principle which the Cobden Club, and every free trader throughout the country has advocated for a number of years. I know that the conditions are altered, and that there is now no such limitations as there formerly was upon the assent to be given by the Governor General to tariff Bills. But, before that change was made, if you discriminated in favour of any country, the Bill would be retained, and you would not be allowed to do so. In some of the constitutions given to the different colonies, they are restricted in that sense. But, the information given to the people of this country through the Colonial Secretary was, that we should not discriminate even in favour of England. The Imperial government of the present day have abandoned that policy, and have come more than half way to meet the right hon. gentleman. Why is it he cannot see the signs of the times ? Why is it he cannot see the Imperial spirit which pervades the empire from one end to the other, and which can only be voiced in a zollverein of tariffs, as Mr. Chamberlain says, because England will insist upon the freest government in her colonies, and the only advantage must be an Imperial one, they giving us a preference in their markets in return for the preference we are giving them. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I shall have great pleasure in supporting the resolution which was introduced by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 35) respecting the Mather Bridge and Power Company.—Mr. German.

Bill (No. 36) respecting the Great Northwest Central Railway Company.—Mr. LaRivière.

Bill (No. 42) respecting the Klondike Mines Railway Company.—Mr. Fraser.

Bill (No. 48) respecting the Edmonton, Yukon and Pacific Railway Company.—Mr. Oliver.

GUELPH JUNCTION RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 23) respecting the Guelph Junction Railway Company.—Mr. Guthrie.

On section 2,

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Shall this clause be adopted ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. HENDERSON. Yeas and nays.

Mr. H. GUTHRIE (South Wellington). I think that, perhaps, a little further explanation upon this clause might be well before we are asked to pass an opinion upon it. There was not a very full meeting of the committee, so that the explanations which I made then may be quite new to many who are now present in the House. The Guelph Junction Railway is a road extending sixteen miles from the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway to the city of Guelph. Power is now asked to continue that road seventy miles further to Goderich. The road is practically the property of the city of Guelph. Its capital stock is $30,000, of which the city owns $20,000, fully paid up, the remaining $10,000 being in the hands of ten individuals, who are each entitled to $1,000, upon which each has paid 10 per cent, or $100. When the road was originally constructed in 1888, these ten men were active as directors. They were prominent business men and shippers in Guelph, all or nearly all large manufacturers, for whose benefit chiefly the road was built, because they wanted competition with the Grand Trunk Railway in freight rates. They were consequently the most active people in getting the road, and when the matter was submitted to the citizens, the citizens ratified it. When these men tried to sell the bonds of the road, no one would buy them, and they were taken over by the city of Guelph, which invested $173,000 in them, making a total investment by the city, in bonds and stocks, of $193,000, whereas the private shareholders had invested only $1,000 in paid-up stock. These private shareholders have changed considerably since the road was constructed. Three of the most prominent are dead, and two of the shares are now held in the United States; but the board has never changed. While the mayor of the city of Guelph, representing the $20,000 of stock, has the controlling vote for the board, he can only vote for five of these ten individuals who held the stock, as there were no other shareholders. The city of Guelph has taken the matter up. The board of trade of the city first passed upon it, then the city council passed upon it, both to the effect that the city should be given a larger selection—that as every ratepayer of Guelph was just as much interested in the road in reality as the stockholders, it would be reasonable to permit any bona fide ratepayer of the city of Guelph to be eligible as a director. A request was made before the Railway Committee that the Bill be amended in that way. Now, since the matter was first talked of in Guelph, the directors of the company have become active, and have complained that it is not fair to displace them now, after they have given their service freely for a number of years. That is true, but the service has been a very slight one, involving only the receiving of a cheque each year, and the handing of it over to the city. The road, as soon as it was constructed, was leased for 999 years to the Canadian Pacific Railway, the rental being 40 per cent of the gross earnings. Each year the Canadian Pacific Railway Company sends to the directors a cheque representing 40 per cent of the gross earnings, and the directors hand it over to the city. The bonds held by the city bear 5 per cent. The road has never paid any interest on the bonds, and there is a default in that respect amounting to about $10,000. If the city were disposed to be vindictive, it could apply to the courts and have a receiver appointed to collect this overdue interest but there is no intention of going to that extreme, and when this Bill to permit further time was coming before the House, the board of trade and the city council both thought that the cheapest and most expeditious way of obtaining the result would be to ask for the amendments which the Railway Committee have placed in the Bill. No real injury is being done to anybody; no one is to be deprived of any property. The stock now held by the directors is to remain their stock; they are still all to be eligible as directors; but the anomaly of the present position is very apparent. By the original Act the city council is allowed three representatives on the board, the mayor and two others; the stockholders have five representatives on the board; and the anomaly of the situation is that two-thirds of the stock has a minority on the board, and one-third of the stock, of which only 10 per cent has been paid, has a majority on the board. It would cure that anomaly to permit this amendment to pass. However, I understand that the city council would be quite willing to allow the stockholders a proportionate representation on the board, giving the city six representatives and the stockholders three. That would be a representation on the board according to the stock. All the city council desire is to appoint more active men as directors. If an amendment to that effect would be satisfactory, I think that would meet, probably, the views of both the citizens and the directors themselves, if their views are at all reasonable.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. In that case, you had better move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Therefore, I would move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. HENDERSON. Before the motion is put, I desire to say a few words on this Bill. The offer made by the promoter of the Bill may appear to be a very generous one; but, to my mind, it will not meet the views of the railway company which is interested, nor the views of the best business men of the city of Guelph. To give the directors only three on the board, while the city council has the privilege of naming six, of whom one will be the mayor, two aldermen, and the other three ordinary ratepayers, I do not think will be acceptable. The ratepayers selected by the mayor may be men of very small financial interest in the city, and very little interest in the success of the road. The present mayor will not always be the mayor of the city of Guelph, and while the rights of the railway company may be safeguarded at the present time, there is no guarantee that the same safeguards would surround the future board. I look upon the treatment which these ten shareholders are to receive as altogether unprecedented in the history of legislation in this House.

Here are ten men who made themselves liable to the extent of $1,000 each, on the distinct understanding that they were not expected to pay more than $100 or 10 per cent on their stock. These men had given their services to the railway company, and practically to the city of Guelph, for some twelve or fifteen years. They have never exacted one cent as compensation; they have given their services freely in the interests of the city and the people generally, and now this amendment seeks to place them in such a position that they will be liable at once, if called upon by a majority of this board, for the full amount, and only three of them can now be on the board. Even if the amendment suggested by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) be carried, they will be entirely powerless to protect themselves, and will be liable for the entire amount of their stock, which it was distinctly understood they never should be called on to pay. That would leave them in a very unfair position, and unless the promoter of the Bill will grant these ten directors absolute relief from the payment of the remainder of their stock, as well as recoup them the amount of money they put into the railway with reasonable interest for the past ten years, I fail to see how this House can pass the proposed legislation. I trust the House will deal fairly with these ten enterprising men, leading citizens of Guelph. It is true that three of them have passed away, but one of them, the late J. D. Armstrong, well known to many members of this House, is succeeded by a young man of enterprise, ability and means, Mr. Lindsay Torrence, who represents his stock. Another succeeds his father—I refer to Col. Davidson of Guelph. So that there are not three men who can not act on the board. I believe that one of the shareholders sold the stock to a person who since moved to the United States, and I am also informed that it is his intention to get back the stock, so that as a matter of fact most of these enterprising business men of the city of Guelph are still shareholders of the company, and still available to be elected directors on this board. No better material could be found for a board than the very men who at present hold the stock of the company, and to displace these men, or displace even all but three of them, and place citizens upon the board, who may have no direct interest in the railway and little or none in the welfare of the city, is a step we should pause before taking. How are you going to expect men of enterprise and means to put their money into any investment in this country, if, after they have done so and rendered themselves liable for a considerable sum, this House is going to legislate away all the rights and safeguards with which they were surrounded and treat them in a way they never expected to be treated by the city of Guelph. I can scarcely believe that the citizens of Guelph, if their sentiments could be voiced to-night, would agree to the legislation proposed. Therefore, I cannot agree to the motion that the committee rise, with the intention of changing the directors so as to give the shareholders three seats on the board instead of the six they have now. I hold that until refunded their money and released from all liability, they ought to control the board.

Hon. DAVID TISDALE (South Norfolk). It would be very unfair to pass this amendment, of which no notice has been given at all. The understanding was that these men, who took the risk, should control the board, and now it is proposed, without any notice, to make a change. If the city of Guelph thinks it in its interest to take over the road, these gentlemen should be first relieved of their liability and refunded the money they have paid with interest. I hope my hon. friend will not press this motion.

Mr. JOHN McGOWAN (Centre Wellington). I am thoroughly in sympathy with the opposition to this motion. These directors paid 10 per cent each on their $1,000, and the understanding was that they should have one paid up share and be relieved from all further liability, but under this amendment they will be still liable for the balance of their stock. These men should be paid back their money with a reasonable amount of interest.

Hon. JAMES SUTHERLAND (North Oxford). I can hardly agree with my hon. friends who have spoken on the other side. As I understand it, this scheme was really a municipal one, one that was promoted and encouraged and all the expenses paid by the city of Guelph. It is true that some residents of the city, in whose interests, especially this scheme was being promoted, became shareholders and paid into the treasury of the county $100 each.

Mr. COCHRANE. And did the work.

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND (North Oxford). No doubt they did a great deal of good work at the time, as was explained on a previous occasion. But many of these men have now passed away from this world, or for some other reason have lost all personal interest in this enterprise. Here is where I think a great injustice is done—these men contributed nothing except $100 each in connection with this matter ; but, as I understand it, the city of Guelph and the district are anxious that this railway should be extended ; and it may be quite possible that these men, not being represented on the board, may not have the same interest as the enterprising inhabitants of that city, or they may have some views with regard to this matter different from those of the people, and, by a majority vote, though they have but a small holding, they can override the wishes of the municipality which, as I understand it, holds a large majority of the stock in this enterprise and has contributed all the money to defray expenses. Any person with municipal experience knows that it is a common thing for men in large manufacturing or other businesses to contribute something in a small way, as was done in this case, to some important enterprise. The hon. gentleman from Centre Wellington (Mr. McGowan) refers to my hon. friend from South Wellington as pressing this matter. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Guthrie) is simply acting upon a petition under the seal of the municipal council of the city of Guelph, expressing the wishes of the council, and, I suppose, of the people of the city. I quite agree with my hon. friend that it should be made clear that the gentlemen now living or their heirs, or assigns should be relieved of any future responsibility. I thought that was the understanding. And I believe my hon. friend from South Wellington is quite prepared to ask an amendment to this clause so that there can be no doubt about these persons being relieved of future liability on account of their subscription.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Will the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Sutherland, Oxford) allow me a word ? I do not know much about this particular case, but a very simple way to achieve what he speaks of would be for these gentlemen to transfer their stock to the city in consideration of the amount that has been paid upon it.

Mr. SEYMOUR E. GOURLEY (Colchester). May I ask one question ? Why should a man who holds stock in a company be compelled to accept for it any amount that the city of Guelph may offer ? If he took it and became responsible for the balance, why should he be compelled to accept for it an amount fixed by another ? Take the case of the Bank of Montreal whose stock stands at $290 per share.

If I held a share of that stock for which I had paid $100, would it be fair to compel me to give it up on payment of $100 ? If we want to do that kind of thing in this case, there should be some way to assess the value, and, if you compel the holders to give up their shares, you should pay them what the shares are worth on the market to-day.

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND (Oxford). The hon. gentleman propounds a theoretical question, but I will tell him the exact state of affairs and will then ask him what he would do. He wants to know why a man should be forced to accept a low price for a valuable share. Of course, any legislation of that kind would be wrong. But, in this case, it is well known in this House or out of it that there is no value in these shares.

Mr. GOURLEY. I do not know it. There is no evidence to that effect.

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND (Oxford). There is plenty of evidence to show that there is no value in this stock. But, even if there were value in it, why should a few men or their representatives be able to block the will of a municipality, and the surrounding district, by stopping a public enterprise ? I do not know that that is the case there, but I do know that the representatives of the people have petitioned the government to grant this amendment and have given the reasons for it. I think we should be perfectly right, even if the principle which the hon. gentleman states were being violated, if we provided that the municipality that granted this large bonus and held the principal amount of stock should be free to carry out their enterprise in the direction indicated by the petition of the municipal council. As I understand it, a good many of these men are dead and the holdings have gone into the hands of other people. And if, owing to some arrangement made fifteen or twenty years ago, the enterprise has drifted into such an unfortunate position as indicated, it is the duty of parliament, on the petition of a municipality to place them in a position to get the benefit they should have.

Mr. COCHRANE. What unfortunate position have they drifted into ? I am a member of the committee and I have heard nothing of it.

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND (Oxford). In such an unfortunate position that a small minority of the stock can control the whole enterprise as against the vast majority of those interested as represented by the municipal council.

Mr. GOURLEY. But they have done the business thoroughly well.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. The hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Sutherland, Oxford) has not answered my point. Perhaps I did not state it clearly. As I understand it, when the bargain was made and all these risks were taken, they were willing to trust these gentlemen to control the board. Now, they say —and this is why I cannot see my way— we want parliament to change that without recouping these gentlemen. I would be perfectly willing to carry out this, if that difficulty were removed—pay these gentlemen their $100 and interest and take over their stock.

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND (Oxford). As I understand it, my hon. friend from South Wellington was ready to move this subsection :

> The directors of the said company may and shall, upon the request of the present shareholders of the company upon whose shares 10 per cent only have been paid, issue a fully paid-up share or shares to such person or persons in exchange for and to the extent of the aggregate amount paid by him or them upon his or their present shares.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. That does not cover the other point.

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND (Oxford). It does not cover the $100. But my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Tisdale) will see that there is nothing in that point, because the most of those for whom it is proposed are dead and gone.

Mr. COCHRANE. No.

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND (Oxford). There are some who are alive. But I understand that in the committee the statement was made and not disputed that many of them were dead and their stock assigned to those who did not take a personal interest in the enterprise. I am informed that three of the directors are dead and gone. One hon. gentleman suggested that there was no notice. I think parties interested had notice, for the simple reason that they were present here and were able to state their case before the committee. But the majority of the committee thought that the Bill should be reported in its present form.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair). I am sure there is no disposition on the part of this committee to take up a great deal of time on this matter.

We are all interested in pushing the work as rapidly as we can, and I suggest that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again, and that then a motion be made that the Bill be referred back to the Railway Committee. It is clear that some new proposals are intended to be made, the hon. member who is moving in the matter desires to amend the Bill as it passed the Railway Committee. The terms of that amendment, before agreed upon, will likely require to be thoroughly looked into. I think the Railway Committee would be the proper place to do so ; it would facilitate matters to send it back there and let us have the question settled there. I second the motion of my hon. friend that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again, with the understanding that when the Speaker is in the Chair a motion may be made referring the whole matter back to the Railway Committee.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am willing to accept the proposition of the Minister of Railways, but I think it should be accompanied with a promise on the part of the promoter of the Bill, or a statement of how far he will go in the amendment which he is about to propose. If he will say to-night that he will submit an amendment authorizing the city of Guelph to pay these men back their hundred dollars and interest on the money from the time they invested it, and indemnify them against any further claim, I have no hesitation in saying that the Bill will go through ; but it is only on fair terms of that kind that I think this House should permit that Bill to go through. I believe that will be satisfactory to the railway company, they will then step out of the matter altogether, they will have no further liabilities, their money will be returned to them, and it will be to a certain extent a matter of fairness to all concerned. Now, with regard to that petition, I am going to venture a statement which came to me pretty directly, that even the city council of Guelph was taken by surprise when this petition was presented to the council and approved of ; that the members of the council were not aware that such a petition was coming before them, they had no notice of it, and they were rather taken by surprise. I say that subject to correcttion, but the information I have is obtained from one of the directors of this road, so that we should not lay too much stress on the fact that the city of Guelph had petitioned for this change. I am willing that the committee should rise, and give the hon. gentleman time to prepare his amendment, either in this committee or in the Railway Committee, perhaps better in the Railway Committee ; but I wish to say before doing so that I expect he will go as far as I have stated, that he will be willing that these men should be recouped their hundred dollars and interest, and be relieved from any further liability.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It would be difficult at present I think to come to any understanding as to the terms of settlement. The hon. gentleman would have to confer with these people. It must always be in the power of the Railway Committee to pass a Bill in such shape as will be found just and fair all round. We are not going to be precluded from freedom of action in the Railway Committee by consents which may be arrived at. Let us see that justice is done in the legislation.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). I think we should go further than that. Before we refer this Bill back we ought to see that certain instructions accompany it to the Railway Committee to amend it in that direction.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We do not know what we will decide upon in the Railway Committee.

Mr. SPROULE. Then I want to say a word with regard to this Bill.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. My suggestion was to save time.

Mr. SPROULE. When the Bill is referred back with the understanding or instructions that it is done for a certain purpose, it would be easier to change it in the Railway Committee. In the first place, this Bill proposes what we have never done before, that is to allow the appointment of a director that is not worth a dollar. The Railway Act provides what is the qualification of a director. He shall own so much stock, he shall have an interest in the road, so that he shall be something more than a man of straw. But this amendment provides that a man may be appointed a director who is only a tool or a catspaw of the mayor ; he may not be worth a dollar, and not a dollar's worth of property in the world, so long as he is a citizen of Guelph. That looks suspicious on the face of it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He may be entitled to represent the town in its minor interests.

Mr. SPROULE. There is no provision that a director should be worth a dollar.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He is qualified to be an alderman.

Mr. SPROULE. There is no qualification in this amendment for a director. The Railway Act provides that no person shall be a director unless he is a shareholder holding stock absolutely in his own right and qualified to vote for directors at the election at which he is chosen. But this does not provide that he shall own a dollar's worth of stock; but any one may be picked up off the street to suit the mayor's purpose. Now, it must not be forgotten that the parties who are being crowded off the board to-day are the parties that took hold of the scheme when it was of no value, either to the corporation or to anybody else, they are the parties who engineered it, and financed it, and built the railway and gave the city of Guelph all the advantages it is receiving from the railway to-day. The parties who now desire this scheme were quite content to let the company go on and do the work and raise the money when it seemed to be impossible to raise the money to build a railway. But they succeeded in doing that, and putting it on a good financial basis, until the railway is a paying concern to-day, and now an effort is being made to force these men out who paid up all that was necessary for their stock, to force them out without giving them a cent for that stock or relieving them from the liabilities which they are under to pay the balance of that stock if they are called on. Now, the proposal made by Colonel McRae, I think, was a reasonable one. He said: If these parties want to get our stock, let them pay us back our money, take the stock from us and release us from any further liability. But they did not choose to do that; and will this House pass a law to compel men to abandon their rights and to give up their property without any consideration after they have made it valuable, when they are the only parties that have made a reasonable endeavour to give the city of Guelph the advantages of a railway that to-day is on a workable basis?

Progress reported.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS moved that the said Bill be referred back to the Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

Mr. SPEAKER. That can only be done at this stage with the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. HENDERSON. I dissent.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 78) to incorporate the Union Railway Company.—Mr. Demers (St. Johns and Iberville).

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on proposed motion of Hon. Mr. Fielding:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to His Majesty; and the proposed motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

Mr. F. B. WADE (Annapolis). If I had consulted my own feelings upon this occasion, I may say that I would have retained my seat, but, as a resolution is before the House, as an amendment has been moved and as a debate has taken place which has brought up certain questions of supreme importance, not only to the county which I have the honour to represent, but also to the province of Nova Scotia, as well as to the rest of the Dominion, I feel that I would not be properly discharging my duty did I not rise to say a few words. It is not my intention to delay the House for any great length of time. My purpose in rising is to address myself exclusively to two or three subjects which have been presented to our consideration during the course of the debate. The question which is raised by the first clause of the amendment of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) is the old question of protection, the old question of the national policy. That national policy was before the people for a number of years, it was tried, it was weighed in the balance, it was found wanting and the people pronounced against it upon two separate occasions with no uncertain voice. The tariff which was framed after that by the present hon. Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) has been before the people and has been endorsed by such an overwhelming majority of the electors as should satisfy that hon. gentleman. It was said, however, after the introduction of the tariff of 1897, that the people had been deceived by the Liberal party, that they went to the country in 1896, not upon the tariff which was framed by the hon. Minister of Finance, but on a free trade tariff as opposed to protection. Now, it does seem strange to me that hon. gentlemen will, at this late day, repeat that contention when it has been falsified over and over again. Every one knows—and there cannot be found an utterance of a solitary man who stood in the position of a leader of the Liberal party to the contrary—every one knows that the tariff which the Liberal party promised previously to 1896 was a revenue tariff, or as we call it a free trade revenue tariff, as opposed to the protective revenue tariff which was in force under Conservative rule. The distinction between these two tariffs is so evident, that I feel like apologizing for referring to it on this occasion. The Conservative tariff was designed for the purpose of protecting certain selected industries, whether it protected the other industries or not. It has been stated in this House that the Conservative tariff protected the manufacturers, but that it did not protect the natural industries of the country, and revenue was only an incident of that tariff. Now, the Liberal tariff is exactly the reverse of that. It is framed for the purpose of producing revenue, and if it incidentally gives protection to certain industries so much the better. That is the distinction between the two tariffs. We stood by this tariff, and on it we went to the country. But, as I have said, our opponents in the last election went before the people and told them they had been deceived by us. Our opponents said—it was pretty hard to follow their meaning too—they said in the first place to us : You promised the people free trade and you did not give them free trade; what you did give them is our old national policy. Well, we felt like saying to these gentlemen: If we have given the country your old national policy, what are you growling about, you should be satisfied; if we have put on your garments you should feel flattered, but you certainly have nothing to complain of; if we have made these promises the only people who can complain are the people we made them to and surely you should be the last to complain because you always said that you never would believe a word we uttered or credit a promise we made.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I submit that we made no promise of free trade, but that the promise we did make was simply the promise of a revenue tariff. When this tariff which was introduced by the Finance Minister (Hon. Mr. Fielding) in 1897, was placed before the House, the first authoritative utterance we had upon it from the Conservative ranks was the speech made by the then leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper). It is a very lengthy speech. I have read it all with great care as it appears in 'Hansard,' and I shall quote one passage from it to show what Sir Charles Tupper's idea was of the Liberal tariff introduced in 1897. He said :

> The result is that this tariff goes into operation, and the hon. gentleman (referring to the Hon. Mr. Fielding) knows that the industries of this country are already paralyzed in consequence, while hon. members opposite gloat over the destruction of Canadian industries. I was reading the wail, the sorrowful wail, of those industries in the Montreal Gazette, where one manufacturer after another declared that those industries were ruined, that their mills must close, and that they saw staring them in the face a return to the deplorable state of things that existed when the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House was in charge of the fiscal policy of the country. I say that a deeper wrong was never inflicted upon Canada.

That was the first utterance from the Conservative party with reference to the tariff of the Liberal government. Well, the wail did not materialize. The industries of Canada were not destroyed. On the contrary, the country became very prosperous under this new tariff, and the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) who was responsible for the words I have quoted attempted on various occasions afterwards to explain away how he came to make that statement. He and his friends said that the tariff was altered after the speech was made. It is true that the tariff was altered slightly. There were some necessary changes in the tariff the total effect of which upon the whole revenue collected during the next year was less than half a million dollars, and the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) and his friends told us that was the excuse for saying : 'Oh, this tariff as introduced was a thing that was going to destroy all the industries of the country, but with these slight changes it becomes the old national policy.' Now, Sir, I wish to assert in this House, and I think I have evidence before me to bear out the assertion, that the people of Canada previously to the election of 1896, were displeased and dissatisfied with this national policy. It was a disappointment to them. I do not know that I can prove this in any better way than by quoting the words of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell). Every one knows that he had been a strong admirer and supporter of the national policy, but he in common with thousands of others throughout the Dominion became disappointed and discouraged and disgusted, and in 1891, Mr. Bell delivered a most excellent lecture I am told in the city of New Glasgow where he resides, and he spoke these very forcible words on that occasion—because he is always forcible in his language as we all know. He said :

> I consider the argument of the free trade as unanswerable. I believe that this moment if Canada took a liberal step in the direction of free trade it would go a long way to place her upon the road to the greatest prosperity.

Now, that has the true ring about it. Well, Canada did take a step in that direction. We are told by the Finance Minister (Hon. Mr. Fielding) that the effect of the tariff he introduced has been to reduce the taxes that would have been collected under the Conservative tariff by one-eighth or by about 12½ per cent. But the hon. gentleman from Pictou (Mr. Bell) on that occasion proceeded to give his reasons for the faith that was in him and his reasons were most cogent, and they were reasons which must carry a great deal of weight. He said :

> The reasons why I consider Canada should turn about and adopt a free trade policy are : (a) that we might free ourselves of the dominating influence of the United States.

But, to-day my hon. friend (Mr. Bell) tells us that the only way by which we can free ourselves from the dominating influence of the United States is by adopting protection; protection pure and simple. The question therefore is: whether he was right in 1891, or whether he is right in this present year, ten years afterwards. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bell) gives another reason. He says :

(b) On account of the failure of the national policy.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is a terrible heresy coming from the gentleman who stood up here the other night to laud and defend the national policy.

(c) Because of the startling revelations of the census.

You see, Mr. Speaker, he voices the very arguments that we Liberals made use of, and he gives the very reasons that we assigned. We said the national policy was a disappointment ; we said the country did not prosper under it; we said the population had not increased as it should have increased, and we said that the national policy was not doing anything to remove us from the dominating influence of the United States. And so the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bell) was on our side of the argument in 1891, and I only quote his words as an authority for saying that there was dissatisfaction in 1896 against the protective tariff policy, or the national policy as it was styled.

But there was a new feature introduced in the tariff proposed by the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) in 1897. You know, Sir, that during all these years in which we wandered in the wilderness of opposition the Conservatives monopolized almost entirely the loyalty of all Canada. They appropriated the old flag and they would scarcely allow us to have a bit of it. They were very loyal in speech, but they never had done anything to prove their loyalty. But, when the Finance Minister brought down this preferential feature of his tariff by which he allowed goods from the mother country to be brought in at a lower rate of duty than goods from other countries which did not treat us as the mother land did, what did these hon. gentlemen opposite say ? In the first place their statement was : Oh, you have made a vast mistake, you never can work this out because of the German and Belgian treaties. In the next place, they said it would amount to nothing anyhow; it made no difference. Well, this Belgian and German treaty bugbear was removed, and ultimately they had to face the situation; ultimately they had to take a stand and say whether they were in favour of this preference to the mother country or not. They were driven to that; and what position did they assume ? They assumed the position of talking against it, but they never challenged it by a vote or a motion, and I doubt if they will do so, no matter how valiantly they may talk.

Now, I submit to all reasonable parties, that the granting of a preference to the mother country was a most wise step. I believe that plank in the platform of the Liberal party contributed most largely to the success of the Liberal party in the last election ; and for this reason. I believe there is abroad throughout the Dominion of Canada a sentiment of attachment to the empire, and I believe this—and I would be ashamed to believe anything different—that there exists in the breast of every honest Canadian, no matter what his race may be, a sense of gratitude towards the mother country for what she is doing for us. We are living here to-day under the protection of the British flag ; we have British guns at Esquimalt and at Halifax ; we have the British navy ready to defend us on all occasions ; we have the full use of British diplomacy and the British consular corps all over the world, so that no matter how humble the Canadian may be, no matter in what part of the world he may be found, if the government of the country in which he finds himself does not do him ample justice, or if it inflicts an injury upon him, the whole force and power of the British Empire is brought to bear to defend him. And who has paid for all this ? The British taxpayer. Have we ever paid one dollar ? Have we ever been asked to contribute one cent ? Never. And yet, Sir, when we have given to the mother country simply this reduction in the tariff which we raise against other nations which have tariffs against us, we are condemned. All our manufactures, all our foodstuffs, everything we have to sell in the markets of the world, are admitted into Great Britain free of duty. But when England sends her wares to us, we meet them with a tariff, and we have been condemned solely because we have given her a preference. Do any of these gentlemen ever pause to consider what would be the effect upon Canada if England treated us exactly as we treat her —if she raised the same tariff wall against us that we have against her ? It seems to me that some of the gentlemen who have spoken with regard to the industries of Canada have not paid any attention to that part of the question.

Now, I wish to address myself for a few moments to the terms of this resolution, in order to come to the matters which I have to bring to the special consideration of the House. The first paragraph of the resolution is this :

That in the opinion of this House the welfare of this country requires a pronounced policy of adequate protection and encouragement at all times to the labour, agricultural, manufacturing, mining and other industries of Canada.

I have listened for days with the greatest attention to almost everything that has fallen from the lips of hon. gentlemen opposite ; I have read, I think, most that has been said by the leading men on that side since the inauguration of the national policy ; and I have yet to discover where agriculture has been protected by the national policy. Perhaps I had better speak of the farmer of Nova Scotia, with whom I am most familiar, and I would like any hon. gentleman to tell me how the farmer was protected by the national policy, or how he proposes to protect the farmer, if he were allowed to put his policy into force. Is he going to do it by putting a duty on apples or meat or potatoes, or anything else the farmer produces? There is only one way he can protect the farmers of Nova Scotia, that is, by preventing the farmers of Ontario coming down there and making use of that market as a slaughter market. But, that cannot be done, for we are a part of confederation, and we must take the bitter with the sweet. Is it not folly to speak of protecting the farmer when it is impossible to do so? Then, how are hon. gentlemen opposite going to protect the miner—the gold miner, for instance? How did they protect him when they had the opportunity to do so? They protected him by increasing the prices of the things he had to consume, and that is the only thing they could do for him. The same remark applies to the fisheries, and the other industries of the provinces down by the sea.

This brings me to the consideration of one of the matters which I rose to speak about; that is, the question of transportation. The hon. member for South Wentworth (Mr. Smith), speaking here the other night, brought up the question of the transportation of fruit. It is a very important question, and, to a certain extent, I agree with some of the statements he made and some of the deductions he drew; but I entirely disagree with him as to others. In the first place, he told us, and in a complaining manner, that the great apple industry of this Dominion was going to the dogs because of the neglect of the government. He told us that the orchards of Ontario were going to waste, that apples were allowed to rot on the ground, and all that sort of thing. Well, I knew that his remarks with regard to the fruit industry of Nova Scotia were wrong; but I had no means of saying that his remarks with regard to Ontario were also wrong: but, having some curiosity on the subject, I went to the Trade and Navigation Returns, and I find that the hon. gentleman was entirely in error. I have made up a short statement from those returns, and, starting with the year 1891, I find that the exports of apples were as follows:

	Barrels.
1891	450,836
1892	690,951
1893	1,187,665
1894	278,238
1895	853,268
1896	567,182

Or an average of 671,000 barrels per year.

Then, I take the years following, and I find the exports were as follows:

	Barrels.
1897	1,668,470
1898	439,418
1899	1,075,068
1900	956,458

Or an average of 1,034,000 barrels per year.

Therefore, instead of there having been a decrease, as the hon. gentleman told us, there had been this large increase.

Mr. SMITH (Wentworth). I wish to correct the hon. gentleman. I did not say there was a decrease.

Mr. WADE. Well, I have his words here:

> It is not only the immediate loss, but the prospective loss, that has to be considered. The farmers became discouraged because of the low price they received for their apples in consequence of the bad condition in which they arrived in England. Some years the apples rotted on the ground; some years they sold for 40 and 50 cents a barrel in the orchard, when, if they could be properly exported to Great Britain, they would have brought from 75 cents to $1 a barrel.

I would like to draw the attention of the House to one other fact in connection with this matter, and that is the large quantity of fruit taken by England. I find that in the year 1891, out of 415,000 barrels of fruit shipped, Great Britain took 390,000. In the year 1892, out of 690,000 barrels shipped, Great Britain took 668,000. And in 1893, out of 1,187,000 barrels, Great Britain took 946,000. I would like to ask what would be the effect on this industry, if Great Britain were to impose a tariff against those apples similar to the tariff we now exact on her goods.

These figures in each case represent the crop of the preceding year.

The hon. gentleman from Wentworth (Mr. Smith), speaking of the transportation of these apples, said that only a small portion of the loss in shipping arose from the bad packing. I think that he is in error, if we are to take the report of the gentlemen who were appointed to examine into that matter. According to them, in the case of apples coming from the province of Ontario, the disaster to the business results largely from bad packing. I am not in a position to speak of the facilities of shipping by rail from Ontario to Montreal, but there is a report which shows the condition of the apples at Montreal and their condition when they got to the other side. In the great Annapolis valley, where the good apples are grown, the people are dependent for shipment upon one railway, the Dominion and Atlantic Railway Company, which carries the freight to Halifax or Annapolis where it is shipped on board sea-going vessels. Many of the apples from that valley have arrived in bad conditon, but not in as bad condition as those coming from Ontario, and I will show the reason why later. The people of that valley are labouring under the disadvantage of having only one railway, which therefore enjoys a monopoly. They are seeking, it is true, to have another railway constructed which will put them in a better position, but one of the hon. gentlemen on the other side has put his face against anything of that sort, and I will have to refer to that later on. At present there is a line of steamers plying between St. John and Halifax and the old country. These steamers are subsidized, but are not carrying the fruit as the farmers desire it should be carried. The subsidy is not given solely in connection with the fruit-carrying business, but is given as an inducement to the steamship line to run to those two ports. Last year there was a strong representation made that another line should be subsidized to run to the town of Annapolis, and it did make five or six trips, but the farmers found great fault with these steamers. They said they were not properly ventilated, were too slow and so on. The steamer owners, on the other side, said that the apples were not well packed, and so there was a dispute between the parties, just as there has been between the transportation companies and the producers and shippers for a number of years. The people of Nova Scotia, as far as I have been able to gather, have come to the conclusion that these steamers can be made to do the work, and do it properly, if they will incur a small additional expense. All that the people ask is that these steamers should be compelled to expend that additional sum by a provision in the subsidy contract, and that no subsidy should be given any steamship line unless it agrees to provide the necessary accommodation. There was a time when the farmers demanded swift steamers, equipped with refrigerators, but they have changed their views and have come to the conclusion that steamers, such as the new ones of the Withy Furness line, if provided with the proper kind of ventilation, would meet all the requirements. I would like to read a resolution passed by one of the agricultural societies in this connection :

It was moved by Dr. A. P. Reid, seconded by F. Miles Chipman, and after free discussion, was carried unanimously :

'That as shown by S. C. Parker's letter, we have this year suffered uncalled-for losses ; and 'That in the shipment of apples, though cold storage is desirable, it is not indispensable, for, as the atmosphere on the ocean in late fall and winter is rarely over 40° Fah., if the cargo were stowed so as to favour air currents and sufficient ventilation were carried on continuously this would suffice.

'But that this be properly carried out, it would need forced ventilation all the time, a government officer should have control of the loading and unloading, and one or more registering thermometers (locked so that records could not be tampered with), should be suitably distributed through the cargo. The government officer at the unloading could thus certify as to the condition of the hold of the vessel during transit, and if this were not satisfactory, the subsidy to be withheld and freight rates not collectable.'

That seems a very simple proposition, and one that could be easily carried out. It ought not to be difficult to provide these steamers with forced draft ventilation, so that the fresh air could be driven into the hold, and the foul air driven out.

I have another resolution of the Nictaux Agricultural Society, which I wish to lay before the House :

That in the opinion of this society, government inspection of apples should be compulsory in the interest of the fruit-grower, the foreign market and the credit of Canada. That if once established but few samples are likely to be rejected.

They were pleased to learn that the forced ventilation of the holds of fruit-carrying steamers was a probability, and they would recommend that the air be forced into the hold, not exhausted, as this latter method would bathe the fruit with air from the boilers and furnaces, and also other cargo, including bilge water, conditions not calculated to improve the keeping qualities or flavour of the fruit ; the vessels' compartments are no sufficient protection.

This is what the fruit-growers of Annapolis have been asking for. It is true that the fruit-growers' association, some months ago, passed a resolution asking that a royal commission be appointed to inquire into all these questions relating to the transportation of fruit, and that is a matter, I presume, which the government is considering. But in the meantime I can see no earthly reason why this reasonable request on the part of the fruit-growers should not be acceded to. Let me impress upon the House that the fruit-growers are of opinion—and I believe their opinion is well founded—that the granting of a subsidy to a line of steamers, unless the grant contains this provision regarding ventilation, is an injury to the fruit-growers, for the reason that the subsidy enables these steamers to keep out competition. That is a position which, I believe, will commend itself to the judgment of every hon. member who is conversant with this matter.

There is another thing in connection with transportation, and that is the question of inspection. I do not propose to say much about that, because there is a Bill before the House on which, when it comes up, this question may be discussed. As to whether that Bill goes far enough I do not know. I have the opinion of a man of authority in my county upon that point.

Producers say : Unless our fruit is inspected so that every man will have to pack his fruit honestly—shippers as well—our market will soon be ruined. And, as far as selling at home, speculators have adready been driven out for that very reason. If not too late, I think it would be advisable to have inspection come in force this next autumn.

The reason why these gentlemen are in favour of this inspection, I take it, can be gathered from the reports that we have on file. I would first refer to the report of Prof. Robertson. The first is his address before the Ontario fruit-growers. He goes into the question very fully and says that a number of trial shipments have been made, and gives the result of the inspection of these shipments as they came down to Montreal. That result is set forth on page 41 of this report. It is very long, and I shall not weary the House by reading the whole of it, but I would like to read one paragraph :

The inspector has no official power to disturb the fruit very much, so he did not disturb the barrels very much. He took a few apples off the barrel and looked down in them. Then, October 23, I will read you the comment on each lot in this report straight through: 'Fruit all No. 1'; 'fruit only medium'; 'fruit A No. 1, good barrels'; 'fruit A No. 1'; 'fruit poor and rotten'; 'fruit A No. 1'; 'fruit very poor'; 'fruit A No. 1, good barrels'; 'fruit very poor'; 'fruit poor stuff'; 'fruit rotten trash'; 'fruit A 1'; 'fruit fair'; 'fruit poor and bad barrels'; 'fruit only fair'; 'fruit A No. 1, good barrels.' That is the summary of all the car-loads reported on that one sheet.

Now, that is the result of the examination in Montreal. These were all Ontario apples. Now, let us turn to the report of the inspector sent to Halifax and St. John. I should have said, in quoting the figures from Nova Scotia and Ontario that Quebec gets the credit for a considerable portion of the fruit shipped from Ontario; and New Brunswick gets credit for a proportion of the fruit shipped from Nova Scotia, because it goes there in schooners. I will read you only two extracts from the inspector at St. John, N.B., and Halifax, N.S. :

'The ventilation in most of the ships might be fairly good if only such care in looking after it could be secured as most people give to the preservation of their own property. Extreme roughness in the barrels, received both in the unloading from the cars as well as in the stowing of the ships, cannot fail to injure the fruits, and it seems to me under present conditions very difficult to control. In St. John the apples are unloaded from the schooners alongside the steamers, and fare rather better in that respect than in Halifax, where they are unloaded from the cars and then rolled through the freight shed that in wet weather is often very dirty, and the barrels get blackened up very much. This, however, is easily remedied, but certainly somebody should have more control of the rascals that smash and tumble the barrels at their sweet wills.'

That is right, but who can control it ? Surely hon. gentlemen do not expect the government to go out and take these officials by the throat. They have no power or jurisdiction over them. But they can aid the producers to procure this competing line that they are now struggling for, doing that, they will place in the hands of the producers a means of protecting themselves; because, if one line will not carry the apples and handle them in proper way, the other line will get all the business.

'Then the loading of these steamers is done mostly at night off the railway. Barrels are rolled across the warehouse and loaded into the steamers outside. It is quite impossible in this rush to catch anything from the marks on the barrels.' There is what you find reported from intelligent, competent men, examining the fruit at our own ports before it leaves.

Now, it is not surprising that bad reports and bad sales come back from at least that class of fruits; and I have not picked on, and they did not pick on, any particular lots, but spent their time during September and October examining different lots, giving me a full report like that every week. There is something radically wrong to allow so much waste and so very great loss to go on in an important business like this.

Now, I cannot refrain from reading another part of this report, because it is flattering to Nova Scotia.

I want to say a little now as to what the agent we had found on the English side. He also was an independent man, outside of commerce. This is in regard to apples :—

'September 2.—A lot of Nova Scotia apples were sold to-day at from 15 or 17 shillings a barrel, and that in a market glutted with English apples of all kinds, including windfalls. I noticed barrels with a thick paper at each end, as I suggested in my report to you last spring. I noticed the barrel opened up with a much handsomer appearance than barrels without paper, which had a bruised and, in some cases, a dark, bruised appearance. Neglect of that little point caused shippers a loss of one shilling a barrel. The best Nova Scotian apples are far better than the Ontario boxed apples in every way. Nova Scotia apples are not sold as Canadian apples. As I pointed out to the convention last year, in examining account sales, the percentage of wastey and slacks in Nova Scotia apples was about 6 per cent, and the percentage in Ontario and Quebec—so-called Canadian apples—was something over 60 per cent.

These are striking things. I might go on and refer to the reasons for this. But, briefly, the reasons are that the fruit is better and better packed and the growers do not grow so many varieties.

The Nova Scotia people have some advantage; still they complain of the handling at St. John and Halifax, the rough handling; but the Nova Scotia orchards, perhaps, each produce a larger quantity of one variety than in Ontario. That is very important, and the Nova Scotia apples are nearly all handled by men trained to the apple business.

Now, these things show that there is a difficulty in the packing as well as in the transportation. The government is introducing this Bill for inspection, which I deem to be most essential to the successful transportation of the fruit of this country. If they do that, and, at the same time, so far as the farmers and shippers of Nova Scotia are concerned, if they have any intention of removing this subsidy from the steamship line running now, or they carry this Bill and at the same time either remove the subsidies to steamships, or if the subsidies be continued in making the contract they will introduce a clause requiring that these things be done, they will have gone a long way to satisfy the shippers of fruit in this country. At any rate, they will satisfy the present demand and do all that is believed to be necessary in order to accomplish the purpose sought.

Now, there is just one other matter I wish to refer to and that is the question of railway subsidies, because it is interwoven with this question of free transportation, as I have stated. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) solemnly declared—forcibly declared I should say—on behalf of the opposition, I assume, for he was sitting next to the leader of the opposition at the time, and that hon. gentleman seemed to be well pleased with his remarks and, though he and other hon. gentlemen have spoken since then, not a word of discredit has been thrown on his utterance, that it was time for the government to call a halt. It makes the hon. senior member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) smile. I do not wonder, when the hon. member for West Toronto was the one put up to say that thing. In Nova Scotia we commenced early to agitate for railways—away back in the fifties. If my memory serves me right the first legislation in that direction was passed in 1854. It was the policy of the government in that day to build and own the railway. In this they were strongly denounced by the opposition. But they went on with their scheme and, in 1858 they had a railway completed and in operation from Halifax to Truro and from Halifax to Windsor. And, when the government railway building was interrupted by confederation in 1867, we had completed the line from Truro to Pictou; and I have not the slightest doubt that had we not gone into confederation, the government policy would have been pursued, and every part of Nova Scotia, which, to-day is clamouring for railway communication would have had it years ago. But we came into confederation, and, necessarily, a different policy was adopted.

Mr. WALLACE. Why did not you secede with the Finance Minister ?

Mr. KENDALL. We might have done so if we had not got the railway extended into Cape Breton.

Mr. WADE. The Finance Minister does not seem to have seceded very materially.

The complaint that was made the other night by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) was that the Finance Minister is a gentleman who sticks to office, and I believe he does. He is not a seceder. When the hon. gentleman opposite talks about secession, I think he is ill advised on the subject. If he had been down in Nova Scotia and heard the discussion that took place on the question of secession, or rather on the question of better terms and the question of revising the union, he would be in a better position to talk upon the subject than he is now. If he wishes to know what the Nova Scotians said on that occasion, I do not hesitate to tell him, but that is beside my argument now.

When we entered confederation we had a certain quantity of railway built. The policy of the government was to keep on building railways, and I believe that if they had not been interrupted we would have had all the railroads we are now clamouring for. After we entered confederation a bargain was made with British Columbia by which this country undertook the burden of building the Canadian Pacific Railway. Then another condition of affairs existed, and we had to wait and take our chances to get our roads built. We are not complaining of that. I am not complaining to-night because the Canadian Pacific Railway was built, I am not complaining because we had to wait to get our roads. What I am complaining of is that after we have waited for roads which are in the interest of the country and should have been built long ago, we should now be met with the statement that there should be no more subsidies granted to railways, and that from a gentleman coming from the place he does, and representing the company he does. Now, let us inquire for a moment what has been expended on works of this description. I find that since confederation we have given in cash bonuses the sum of $48,130,000, in addition to some other things. We have given 39,725,000 acres of land for railroads, that is outside of the Intercolonial Railway. On canals there was spent before confederation over $20,000,000, and since confederation we have spent over $58,000,000. The construction of the Intercolonial Railway, including the purchase of the Drummond County Railway, has cost the country upward of $60,000,000. In addition to that, we have expended immense sums upon river and harbour improvements and upon canal improvements in order to build up the country and make it more prosperous. I was pleased the other night to hear the Minister of Public Works declare that he was going on with this policy of public improvements. I submit that it is the duty of the government to go on. They can get cheap money, they can get money to-day for a trifle over 2½ per cent interest, where a private individual has to pay double that amount. Then is it not their duty to go on with these public works until every want of the country is satisfied ? Is not this a fair proposition, that a section of country which to-day demands and requires a railway, fifteen years ago did not require it ? And would it be honest or fair towards those sections which have contributed towards opening up other sections of country by railways, to be told now : We are going to call a halt, we are going to give no more subsidies to railways, we are going to have no more public works. We have gone far enough in our public works, we have our railways constructed, now we are satisfied, and you have got to be satisfied. Now, where does this statement come from ? It comes from the province of Ontario, a province which is gridironed with Government aided railways. It comes from a province where the bulk of the money for canals has been expended ; it comes from the city of Toronto which has been made what it is by these great transportation systems which have been brought into existence by the liberal use of public money ; it comes from a director of the Canadian Pacific Railway, nearly every spike of which has been paid for by the Dominion of Canada. That is the position.

Now, I protest against that, I protest against it in the interest of the province that I come from, I protest against that policy in the interests of the county that I represent. The people of Annapolis county are clamouring for the construction of a railway from Victoria Beach to meet the Central, to connect with the Dominion and Atlantic Railway at Middleton. The people on the south shore of Nova Scotia are clamouring for a railway to be finished from Halifax to Yarmouth. A portion of that subsidy has been granted to the shore road, a portion of the subsidy has been granted by this government to the Victoria Beach road as far as Bridgetown and it only requires the granting of the additional subsidy upon the remaining 14 miles between Bridgetown and Middleton. Now, some hon. gentlemen, when I mentioned the South Shore road, said, hear, hear. Am I to understand that there are gentlemen opposite who claim that the South Shore road should be subsidized and completed ?

Mr. GOURLEY. Yes.

Mr. WADE. Well, I am glad to hear him say so, I am glad he has got the courage of his convictions. But what does the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach) say ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. He will say the same.

Mr. GOURLEY. We want 2,000 miles of railway in Nova Scotia the next two years.

Mr. KAULBACH. The county of Lunenburg wants all the railways it can get.

Mr. WADE. What about the South Shore Railway ? Does the member for Lunenburg favour the granting of a subsidy for the South Shore Railway ?

Mr. KAULBACH. If they will give us the Central road and that also, I will be greatly pleased.

Mr. WADE. The Dominion government does not own the Central road. I know where his interest lies, I know where his inclination would be, but he does not like to go against his leader.

Mr. KAULBACH. I am in favour of railways.

Mr. WADE. Are you in favour of the Dominion government granting a railway subsidy to the South Shore road from Halifax to Yarmouth ?

Mr. KAULBACH. I am not going to be catechised now.

Mr. WADE. That is all right, that is perfectly legitimate. Now, I regret that the hon. leader of the opposition is not in his place, because I was going to ask him the same question, and I wanted to bring to his attention the fact that the Board of Trade of Halifax the other day sent an influential delegation to the premier of the province of Nova Scotia urging him not to grant the ordinary subsidy that is usually granted to railroads in the province of Nova Scotia, but to grant extraordinary assistance to this South Shore railway. And who was the spokesman of that delegation? The same Mr. Campbell that the leader of the opposition so strongly eulogized here the other day, and from which eulogy I do not wish to detract in the slightest degree. Now, it seems to me that these gentlemen find themselves in the position that they must get upon one horn of the dilemma or the other. I am certain of this, however, that if the Conservative party had come to the conclusion that there should be no more railway subsidies, then it would only have been fair and honest on their part to have announced that policy before they went to the country last year ; and I think I am safe in saying that if they had announced that policy they would have had to search somewhere else for a leader. I submit we have a right to have these roads built : at any rate, we have the right to come to parliament whenever we want a public work in any part of this Dominion, and if we can show parliament that it is a work which is entitled to the assistance of the government, then I say in all honesty we should receive that assistance. It would not be just, it would be most selfish if any other system were to prevail. I regret very much that the hon. leader of the opposition did not define his position in this regard, but, perhaps somebody else will be good enough to do so before the debate closes. Now, I have only one other remark to make in closing. I listened some time ago to the very forcible speech delivered by the hon. junior member for Pictou (Mr. Bell). I think he had one well-grounded cause for complaint, and that was when he complained of the manner in which the hon. Minister of Finance always clings to office. It is true that that hon. gentleman went into the government of Nova Scotia in 1882 and stuck there until 1896. During part of that time the hon. member for Pictou was the leader of the opposition, which, under that leadership, grew most beautifully less. There was one peculiarity about his leadership of the opposition in the provincial legislature, and it was that he always spoke against every measure that the then premier of Nova Scotia introduced; but, he never voted against one, as far as I recollect. The hon. gentleman and his friends tried all these years to turn the hon. Minister of Finance out of that office, but he remained there until a friendly voice called him up to a higher sphere of operations, to a higher sphere of usefulness, and, judging from the temper of the country, from the high esteem in which that hon. gentleman is held, the high esteem in which his colleagues are held, and the high esteem in which his leader is held, I can give the hon. member for Pictou not the slightest reason to hope but that the hon. Minister of Finance will cling to office here until another friendly voice calls him to a higher sphere.

Mr. HAUGHTON LENNOX (South Simcoe). Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wade) who has just taken his seat, is, in some respects, to be congratulated, and I am glad that I can join with the trend of congratulations that have been extended from the other side of the House, during the course of this debate. Rather, I may say, that the riding of Annapolis is to be congratulated upon having as its representative a gentleman, who, for probably the course of half an hour or more, has, I will not say delighted the House, but, has endeavoured to entertain the House with subjects, which, I venture to say, have no more relation to the subjects we are debating to-night than they have to South Africa. The hon. gentleman, however, realizes, perhaps, that it is important to let his constituents know that he is pleading their case before this parliament, and whether the time is opportune or not, in season or out of season, he has decided to enter upon his pleading. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman belongs to the legal profession or not. I am inclined to think, that, probably, he may. The manner in which he advanced his special pleading, the manner in which he endeavoured to conduct a cross-examination, which is not usual in this House, the manner in which he multiplied cases, almost suggested to me that he must belong to the legal profession. I, myself being more in the nature of a farmer, know hardly how to grapple with the arguments put forward by the hon. gentleman. He made a difficulty between himself and the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver). The hon. member for Alberta asked: 'Why do you bring in these resolutions?' He said: 'If it is because of the old national policy principle that you desire to reaffirm, then there can be no sense in bringing in these resolutions.' On the other hand, the hon. member who has just spoken says, that beyond all question these resolutions mean the reaffirmation of the principle of the old national policy and nothing more, and I think I may say, speaking for myself, that I am quite prepared to agree with him. I understand that these resolutions aim at enunciating the grand principles that were inaugurated in 1878, adapting them to the circumstances which have since arisen, and bringing forward to the present day the principles of the policy then introduced, and which, for eighteen years, were so successfully carried out by the late administration. Circumstances have changed. The new administration have been in power for about five years, they have tinkered with the policy, they have introduced some innovations, and the circumstances of the country have so materially altered that it is necessary perhaps to add an additional statement to the old principles inaugurated in 1878, namely, that we recognize the fact that it is necessary for us to stand upon even terms with other countries, and to say that we shall not give a preference unless a preference is given in return. Now, the next case that the hon. member for Annapolis makes is the case of Nova Scotia against Ontario. We are not very much concerned with that. It is another of those 'apples of discord' that are sometimes thrown into the discussion. He shows us that the apples in Nova Scotia are ten times better than the apples of Ontario. I am not much concerned about that, nor is the House. Then, he comes to case number three. This is an old sore, I believe. He comes to the case of Nova Scotia against confederation. This is a matter of more serious import. It either means something, or it does not mean anything. It either means a complaint, or it means no complaint. Does the hon. gentleman wish the House to understand that Nova Scotia is complaining at the present time? It is not a matter with which we are concerned in the present debate, but he tells us that it is not secession. He mentions secession, and he says it is not secession. We are not concerned, I think now, when the present state of harmony is maintained, in knowing whether it was secession or what was the cause of the difficulty. It is sufficient, that, at the present time, this province is living in harmony with the rest of the confederation. Now, he also speaks in complaining terms of what the city of Toronto has got at the expense of his province and at the expense of the Dominion. He speaks of the province of Ontario. Has the hon. gentleman studied the railway history of Ontario? Does he know that throughout the Dominion there is no province that has, to the same extent, contributed to railway building as the province of Ontario, and, therefore, if Ontario has paid out its good money for the development of railways for its own benefit, and, incidentally, for the benefit of the rest of the Dominion, what right has the hon. gentleman, or any other province, to complain? I notice that my hon. friend says that he has devoted a large portion of his time to the study of the financial history of this country, and of the financial depressions that are incident to it. He could not very well get better reading. He tells us that he has studied also the speeches made on the Conservative side of the House. If he had studied them with an open mind, I venture to say that he would not only have gained valuable information, but would have been able better to understand the financial questions that are involved in the history of this country than he appears to be to-night. I think he must have gone in a dreamy state to the study of the trade questions of this country when he tells us that to-day we have nothing but a revenue tariff. Why, Sir, on every page of the tariff of this Liberal government there are evidences—I admit they tinkered and spoiled to some extent the tariff of the Conservatives—but on every page of the existing tariff there are evidences to a large extent of the principles of protection as opposed to the principles of a free trade or revenue tariff. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wade) 'wants to know;' and in that respect he is much like greater men; he is very much like the First Minister and almost every cabinet minister on the other side of the House. They all want to know, and God knows if they knew more about the correct principles of governing this country and put their knowledge into effect, Canada although prosperous to-day, would be abundantly more prosperous still. However, I like an inquiring mind, and I will give my hon. friend (Mr. Wade) the information which he seeks. He asks: 'Has agriculture ever been the subject of protection under any tariff policy in this country,' and he exclaims: 'How can you protect the agricultural interests of a country; how can you protect apples and potatoes and grain, and things of that kind.' Let me give him a little of that reading which, in the pursuit of knowledge, he has overlooked. Here is the tariff, and on page 9 of the tariff I read:

Animals (living), 20 per cent; mutton and lamb (fresh), 35 per cent; tallow and stearic acid, 20 per cent ad valorem; candles, 25 per cent; pearline, 30 per cent; feathers, 30 per cent.

Feathers are an agricultural product to some extent.

Apples, including the duty on the barrel, 40 cents a barrel.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wade) was very much troubled about apples, and here he sees that there is a duty upon apples. And let me tell the hon. gentleman and his friends that about the time of the elections last year, apples were only worth 50 cents a barrel in the orchards in Ontario, and probably in other provinces as well; and 40 cents a barrel is a pretty good protection on an article of that value.

Buckwheat, 10 cents a bushel; potatoes, 15 cents a bushel.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wade) was troubled about the potato, and the potato has often given trouble, and potatoes have a duty of 15 cents a bushel. Now, let me give the hon. gentleman oats.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LENNOX. Oats is another thing which sometimes we are greatly troubled about. The American oats comes into sharp competition with our oats, and we have a duty of 10 cents a bushel on oats, and a duty of 12 cents a bushel on wheat. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wade) not see now that agriculture is protected? Does he want to have that changed? After all the reading and all the deep study which he has brought to bear on the question, does he fail to recognize now that agriculture is protected? Well, as long as the lamp holds out to burn, you may turn from the error of your ways, and I ask the hon. gentleman if he recognizes even now that this government has allowed to remain in force some measure of protection to the farmer—but as I claim not enough protection for the honest agriculturists of this country. The hon. gentleman understands, and many of his friends opposite seem to understand it in the same way, that we are not at present in any degree working under anything but simply a revenue tariff. That has been announced by several prominent gentlemen opposite, and so I shall refer them to a few items of the tariff:

Locomotives for railways, 35 per cent; iron and steel bridges, 35 per cent; spring axles, 35 per cent; wrought iron or steel tubing, 35 per cent; iron or steel shoe tacks, 35 per cent; screws, commonly called wood screws, 35 per cent; gas meters, 35 per cent; shovels and spades, 35 per cent; skates of all kinds, 35 per cent.

And so you could go on and multiply them ad infinitum. It may be said that these are but instances, but the very gist of the argument of the hon. gentlemen opposite is that you are protecting and building up one industry at the expense of another, and so they can take whichever horn of the dilemma they like in that regard. Now, Sir, I think I have pretty clearly shown that we can protect agriculture, and that the Conservative party by the policy they inaugurated in 1878 did protect agriculture. And, Sir, one and all of us on this side of the House stand for the protective policy of the Conservative party, and the country stands behind that policy, and when I say this, I do not mean only those who voted for the Conservative members last election, but I mean that practically all the people of the Dominion are for adequate and reasonable protection for the various industries of this country.

Now, Sir, I wish to say a few words with regard to the question of preferential trade. Let me interject here, that I regret to notice that members of the House of Commons upon the Liberal side do not show a very keen interest in the affairs of this country when they follow the rule (which has been but too noticeable within the last few days) of staying in the House to applaud when Liberal members are speaking, and of gracefully retiring whenever a Conservative member rises. If we had a photograph for the people of Canada to-night of the empty seats of the ministers of the Crown, and if we had a general photograph of the empty benches opposite, there are those who would say that it would better become the members of the government and their followers to be here to listen to what is said in parliament. Whether the remarks made are feeble or not, it would be well for these hon. gentlemen opposite to listen to them, and weigh them with an honest mind; to take their medicine if need be, and stand up like men—not run away. Now, Sir, in reference to this preferential tariff. The arguments which have been put forward are these: First, in reference to retaliation; that if we repeal this one-sided preferential tariff, Britain may retaliate.

Does any hon. member of this House believe that? If he does, he is more simple than I take him to be. If he does, it is not what the intelligent people of this country believe. The hon. member who has just spoken has said: England allows our goods to go in free, and is it fair that we should build up a tariff against her? Does not the hon. gentleman know that England allows the goods of all nations to go in upon the same terms as the goods of Canada? And will the mother land deny to her children that right which she accords to all mankind? I do not think that argument is very well taken. Does he not know also that Britain continues to trade with the United States and other countries which build up hostile tariffs, and far higher tariffs against her than does the Dominion of Canada? Therefore, the idea of retaliation is about as weak an argument as can be advanced by a gentleman of the ability of the hon. gentleman who just sat down.

But, the hon. gentleman made, as many others have done, a strong appeal, if you measure it by words, upon the question of loyalty to Britain: Do something for Britain, and never mind other lands. It comes a little late in the day, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker. When these gentlemen were preaching continental free trade with the United States,—not with Britain; commercial union with the United States,—not with Britain; unrestricted reciprocity with the United States,—not with Britain; that was the time for them to wave the flag. But what did they do? They went on and on, from one state to a worse state of political economy, from day to day, until the public sentiment of this country became aroused, and they had to find something that would give a colour of patriotism to their policy; and then, for the first time, we heard these gentlemen preaching loyalty to Britain in commercial matters. I do not think that Britain wants—and when I say this I want to be perfectly fair to both parties—from either the Liberals or the Conservatives of this great Dominion any certificate of loyalty. Britain knows from many a day gone by, and she knows emphatically from the history of recent times in South Africa, that Canadians, whatever may be their politics, will unite at any moment to help the mother land. Whenever the empire is assailed, whenever the principles which underlie the empire are in danger, then all Canada will be a stepping stone and the ocean the bridge over which the people of Canada will go to help the mother land. Oh, let us talk sense; is this not a very different thing from talking on a business matter? If we are sending a gift to Britain, let it be a gift through and through; but when we are talking of business, as a member of the government has said, 'business is business.' I am sorry he is not in his place, but he is no worse than many of the others in that regard. When you are talking of a policy in reference to trade, I want these gentlemen to understand and take it as a warning, that business interests, like the wasp, have a business end, and they had better be very careful how they fool with it; because, if they go on playing with the trade of this country, bringing our expenditure up to the enormous figure at which it stands to-day, disregarding the lessons of the past, they will find that the sting of depression, failure and commercial bankruptcy will follow very soon.

Another argument is that of cheap goods for Canada; but I will leave this, because it has probably been answered, and it will be answered later on by an hon. gentleman who is to speak. I merely say in passing that I do not understand that the preferential tariff gives cheaper goods to Canada, and I pass to an argument which has not been much made use of.

Members of the cabinet have asserted in this debate that it is impossible to secure a fair trade with Britain on any other terms than the terms they have—in other words, that mutual concessions between Britain and Canada are absolutely impossible. But, let us remember that the gentlemen who are saying this are led by the right hon. First Minister, who when he went to Britain gave away all we had to give; and it is not until after he has done this and had said 'Canada wants nothing in return,' that they come and tell us that the grand advantage which would result from an arrangement of mutual trade preferences between Britain and all her colonies cannot possibly be obtained. This is of a piece with the action of these gentlemen in other commercial matters. It is of a piece with their action on the Joint High Commission which went to Washington. Did they go like business men? No. What they did was to give corn and wire fencing, and several other things, free to the United States; and then they wanted the United States to give them concessions, and of course they got no concessions.

Now, the resolution before the House has been read more than once. I want to ask the members of the government and their supporters: Do you object to the whole of it? If not, what part of it do you object to? We ask for adequate protection and encouragement to the agricultural, manufacturing and other interests of the country. Do hon. gentlemen object to this? If they do, we want them to put themselves plainly upon record in that regard, because the people of Canada want to know just where they stand. Then, the resolution says that the time has come when, in the opinion of this House, the adoption of a policy of mutual trade preferences within the empire would prove of great benefit. Do the hon. gentlemen object to this? If they do not, we will expect them to vote for it. Again it is said that the time is opportune. Is there a doubt about that? It is opportune, not only in view of the inauguration of the Australian commonwealth, but also because the policy upon which the rebellious states in South Africa are to be governed has not yet been settled. There is going to be an enormous trade in that part of the world. It is important that Canada should secure a measure, and a large measure, of that trade. It is within the competence of Great Britain, without disturbing her present fiscal policy at all, to give us a preference in these markets, and, therefore, emphatically, taking into account the situation in Australia and South Africa, this is a most opportune time for a movement in this direction.

Do hon. gentlemen opposite claim that they have reverted to the policy which obtained prior to 1878, when the Mackenzie administration was in power. I do not think that any of them will be quite daring enough to do that. The disastrous and ruinous conditions which then prevailed were so startling that it would be dangerous for these hon. gentlemen to announce that they had reverted to the policy of those days, which was a policy of tariff for revenue only. At that time our trade fell steadily, year by year, from $216,000,000 to $170,000,000 or an average of $30,000,000 a year, or 14 per cent during every year the reform party was in power. What is required now is not a one-sided preferential tariff, but a firm, well defined, protective policy, which will develop, upon the old lines, the various industrial interests of this country.

Let me read you a few figures which will dispose of the claim of hon. gentlemen opposite that the preferential tariff has been the means of increasing the trade of Canada with Great Britain. In 1897 our aggregate trade with Great Britain was $106,000,000 in round numbers. In 1900, it had increased to $152,000,000, or a gain of 43·21 per cent. That, you will say, was a substantial gain, and I began with 1897, because that was the year in which the government announced its policy. Until then they were hedging, and inquiring, and issuing commissions. Well, our trade with Great Britain increased 43 per cent in that period, but let us see how that increase compares with the increase in the aggregate trade of Canada with the whole world. If we find that the trade with Great Britain advanced much more rapidly than our trade with the rest of the world, then of course that would be an argument in favour of the preferential rate, but the facts show that from 1897 to 1900, our trade with the rest of the world shows an increase, not of 43 per cent, but of 49 per cent. So that although we did a fairly good trade with Great Britain, it did not keep pace with our trade with the rest of the world.

Then, how does our trade with Great Britain compare with our trade with other countries? We have no preferential tariff with Germany, at least no direct preferential tariff. But, we have an indirect and unjust preferential tariff with that country, by way of England, and also with a great many other foreign countries, who send their goods to England, whence they are shipped to us and get the advantage of the rebate. Well, our trade with Germany from 1897 to 1900 increased 33 per cent. Our trade with the United States, with which we have no preferential tariff, increased from 1897 to 1900, not 43 per cent, but 60·74 per cent—an increase far greater than that with Great Britain. Then take France, with which we have no preferential treaty, but we have a commercial arrangement; and if hon. gentlemen like to advance that argument, I would ask them do they pretend that France obtained a preference in Canada by reason of this commercial arrangement. But our trade with France increased 74·47 during the period I have referred to and our trade with Portugal increased 128·10. There are many other figures which go to show that our trade with Great Britain, under the preferential tariff, has not increased in the same ratio as our trade with many foreign countries with which we have no preferential arrangement at all.

Coming for a moment to the budget, the keynote of the budget speech is : 'We are having a good time.' The hon. gentleman who last spoke says that the Finance Minister will cling to his position. I think he will as long as he possibly can, and that is just in harmony with the keynote: We are having a good time, and as long as it lasts we will cling to the position. But the budget speech is notable for what it omits rather than for what it contains. Look through it for a financial policy, search from the first to the last page, and you cannot find any policy defined. It is simply a collection of figures, a blue-book coloured by the somewhat picturesque language of the Finance Minister.

But when we come to examine the figures, we find that they have been juggled with and not placed honestly before the people, so that the people may clearly understand our financial condition. Take the question of the surplus, and we find that, according to the hon. minister's statement, we have a surplus of $8,000,000. How does he show that surplus ? Why, he says, that we are prosperous. That I do not admit, in the sense in which the hon. gentleman states the opinion : I do admit that our trade is large, but there is a great deal of difference between a large trade and prosperity. But the hon. gentleman says that we have a surplus of $8,000,000. I deny that. The net result of the financial year ending 30th June, 1900, does not put one dollar of surplus in the coffers of the Dominion. The hon. gentleman tells us that the amount chargeable to consolidated fund for the year is $42,975,279.51. We have expended on railways, &c., as stated by the minister, $7,468,843.24; subsidies, including Crow's Nest Pass, $725,720,-35; South African contingent, $1,547,623.74. This makes a total of $52,713,466.84. The admitted revenue from all sources is $51,-029,944.02, leaving a deficit instead of a surplus, leaving us worse off than we were at the beginning of the year, to the extent of $1,687,472.82.

I do not care about the argument that some of these are unusual expenditures. I say that the time has come for honest, straight book-keeping in the affairs of this Dominion. And whether you like it or whether you do not like it, whether one party is in power or whether another party is in power, the people of this country have come to the position where they demand and will have a straight statement of their affairs, such a straight statement as a business man would give. We have taken in a little over fifty-one millions, and we have expended a good deal more than fifty-two millions, leaving us nearly two millions behind. Hon. gentlemen opposite say : Oh, when in power, you kept the books in much the same style. I do not care, I say again, for the traditions of the days gone by where they were wrong. I think the time has come when men should say : If we have been wrong in the past, now is the time to be right. We live in the present, and the history of the past can only be usefully resurrected in order to teach us to do better things in the future. In the present we are preparing for the future—the past can take care of itself. Now, whether the administration like it or not, the people are taking stock of the financial situation, the state of the accounts between the administration and the commonwealth. And what is that situation ? We have admittedly an exceptional revenue, due largely to exceptional circumstances and exceptional values ; mining has been booming ; we are on the crest of the wave, as the minister says. And on the other hand we are face to face with new problems in relation to transportation, involving, if we are to retain our trade instead of letting it be diverted to foreign ports, very large expenditures in the future. We are confronted with enormous expenditures, by reason of iron bounties. We are confronted with the fact that, as stated by the hon. member (Mr. Wade) who spoke last, the province of Nova Scotia is clamouring for more money for the building of railways, while a minister of the Crown lends a wiling ear to the claim. And we are confronted with the fact which is, perhaps, worse than all, that we have a Minister of Public Works who advocates freely the expenditure of money, and a Minister of Railways who has demonstrated that he also will spend largely. The people are asking how it comes that if we are on the crest of the wave of prosperity, every dollar, and more than every dollar of our revenue has been spent, and this in the face of the professions of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright), and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Hon. Sir Louis Davies), that the expenditures, that years ago stood at $38,-000,000, were too great. The people demand a halt and they demand of the government a more rigid economy in the expenditure of public money. Now, that the country is taking stock of the situation is emphasized by a little incident which was brought to the mind of the ministry last night, to them not a pleasurable incident—the news from North Bruce. I do not know whether the hon. Minister of Public Works succeeded in getting into North Bruce and delivering orations in the interests of this government or not; but I do know that there was a desire on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite to do all that could be done in North Bruce, and to present the policy of the government to the farmers of North Bruce in the best possible light. But I want to say—and the government and their following will do well to take note of it—that the people of North Bruce have been following the history of this administration, and following perhaps this very account that I have been referring to. Whether the Minister of Public Works spoke in North Bruce or not, a greater orator than he spoke on that occasion. The people of this country have spoken through the ballot box, and they will continue to speak until they have an administration which will administer the affairs of this country upon the principles laid down in the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the opposition.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.) What about Prince Edward Island?

Mr. LENNOX. I will tell the hon. gentleman about Prince Edward Island. The hon. gentleman who spoke to-night showed us a contract between Nova Scotia and Ontario. I want to tell the hon. gentleman that I come from a riding, old South Simcoe, which I regard as the Garden of Eden. It is in the province of Ontario. I think it is quite right that the hon. gentlemen from Prince Edward Island should appreciate that tidy little island. Yet, from my point of view, the vote of Prince Edward Island does not speak so loudly for the intelligence of the people of Prince Edward Island, as does the vote of the people of North Bruce for the intelligence of the people of Ontario.

I was going to refer to the fact that the government took an undue amount of credit for what they termed the prosperity of this country. Now, I want to ask those who are yet to speak, to explain to this House how that prosperity has been brought about. Was the foundation of that prosperity laid by the Reform party or by the Conservative party? Whether the government admit it or not, the people of this country, many Liberals as well as Conservatives, know and declare that the reason why Canada is prosperous is not because of anything done by the present administration, but in spite of the present administration; it is because the present government have not dared to put in practice any of the theories they advocated while out of power; for had they done so, disaster would inevitably have supervened. Canada is prosperous because the foundations of prosperity were laid by the Conservative party when the policy of protection was inaugurated. That policy was faithfully administered while the Conservative party was in power, and although the present government have rather weakened that policy than adhered to it in its entirety. the prosperity of the country has still flowed on. Why should these gentlemen take credit for what the Conservatives have achieved?

I am glad to see the Minister of Agriculture in his place, and I will illustrate my argument by a reference to that hon. gentleman, who represents the agriculturists of this country. We will suppose that the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Robinson) has two farms, both good, but one a little better than the other. The Minister of Agriculture comes along about harvest time, when all the work of preparation has been done, when the crop is about ready to be harvested. He gets possession of one of the farms, honestly, I will say, though I cannot say that the present administration honestly got possession of power in 1896. But the Minister of Agriculture gets possession of the better farm belonging to the hon. member for West Elgin. After the crops have been harvested the Minister of Agriculture comes along, and in that bland happy manner of his says: Why, my good friend, I am a better farmer than you are. Look at these crops on my farm, and look at your crops, and deny if you can that I am the better farmer. That is just what these gentlemen opposite are doing. They have been taking off the crops that have been sowed on ground prepared and cultivated by the Conservative party. They are enjoying a prosperity which has resulted from the magnificent public enterprises that the former Conservative administration inaugurated. I want to say to these hon. gentlemen that it is not all honour that they bring upon themselves when they stand here committed to the policy of protection, with a large revenue flowing in in consequence of a measure of protection. If our industries have not languished it is because the hon. gentlemen opposite have not kept the promises they made to the electors, and have broken all their pledges.

Now, I said that the budget speech was, perhaps, more notable for what it omitted than for what it contained. Of course, in speaking upon the budget I do so with deference, although I have, like my hon. friend who spoke last (Mr. Wade), endeavoured to familiarize myself with budget speeches. But, I understand that a budget is intended to outline the commercial and financial policy of the government, that in it we are to find great schemes suggested and great measures proposed by the administration. The hon. gentleman who last spoke dealt with the question of subsidies. Now, subsidies have been a burning question in this country for a long time, but the budget speech does not give us the slightest idea of the policy of the government in regard to that question. The subject of opening up new markets for the produce of the country, of developing the trade of this country and turning it into new and better channels, is not treated in the budget speech. The labour questions are not dealt with by it, although, to some extent, they have been dealt with by the House. But the encouragement of labour too is one of those matters which might well form the subject of discussion in a budget speech, and I venture to say that if the Minister of Finance had had the courage to tackle the question he would have dealt with it. But, there is one great question which is going to require more thought at the hands of the honest representatives of the people of this country in the near future than any other, and that is, the best way of bringing to market the great resources of this country from the west. A comprehensive policy upon this question is what the people require, and what an administration that is powerful enough and wise enough should outline at this time. Read the budget speech from end to end, and where do you get one idea, one indication of what the policy of this government is to be as regards the carrying trade ? We are developing mines, the products of which have helped to swell the coffers of the Dominion treasury. But, although this is the case, and although the farmers are putting forth every effort to develop new lines of industry, and looking to the best means of getting their produce to the markets of the world, the administration seem to have given the subject no attention.

Where a multiplicity of routes is suggested and with routes in almost every direction, with railway schemes looming up from almost every township, it is of the utmost importance that we should give our attention to this question and it was the duty of the government to consider this question well so as to be able to outline a plan clearly before the people, in order that those who want to invest money in future in commercial enterprises will know exactly by what means the products of this country will be carried to the ports of shipment. Coming from an agricultural district, there is one question that interests me still more immediately and it is as regards what is to be done for the people who seem to me—and probably I differ from some hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House in this regard—the backbone and stay of the Dominion of Canada. The class to which I refer are the farmers. What, in the budget speech is done for the farmer, what is done to give recognition and encouragement to the efforts which the farmers are putting forth for the development of the country ? There is not one step taken to benefit the farmer or to give him any encouragement. Oh, but, I am wrong ! There is something. Why, the farmer is allowed a benefit, percolating through the men who will build a factory to grind up the sugar beet. The farmer has received a concession at the hands of the present administration and the farmer should ask no more, but should be grateful accordingly. In order to encourage the beet-root sugar industry and so to benefit the farmers, the government have decided, as the only change that they will make in the tariff since 1897, that they will allow machinery to come in free for the period of one year. I congratulate, as congratulations are the order of the day, the farmers upon the magnificent treatment they have received from the present administration.

Now, I want to refer to some of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken, but, as the hour is getting late, and as these hon. gentlemen have all absented themselves, I am not going into it as extensively as I intended to. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), who is a very eloquent speaker, made some remarks that I think deserves a passing reference. He compared the resolutions brought in by the Conservative opposition to 'the emergency rations.' I want to tell that hon. gentleman, and I want to tell those who cheered the allusion, that whatever divergence of opinion we may have as regards the difficulty that arose over the emergency rations to South Africa, it does not come well from that side of the House to refer to that question in this way. I cannot say whether, in the inception of that matter the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence was to blame. That is a debatable question. But, I am here to say, and I say it with a feeling of the full responsibility, that the government cannot be acquitted of blame in this, that when the difficulty had been shown to them, when the wrong had been shown to have been perpetrated, when it had been shown that a crime, than which it would be difficult to find one more dastardly, had been committed with reference to our brave soldier boys in South Africa, there was a duty cast upon the government and that duty has not been discharged. Therefore, I say, it does not become the hon. member for South Wellington or any other hon. gentleman on that side of the House to say any more about emergency rations than they can help. Now, these hon. gentlemen differ so much amongst themselves as to what the policy of the government is that it is probably better to let them fight it out amongst themselves. For instance, the hon. member for South Wellington is in favour of bounties, and there is no more definite or distinct system of protection than bounties. He says he is for bounties up to the hilt. Then he proceeds to struggle with the questions of the surplus and to point out, or to try to show, that a surplus is not inconsistent with a policy of 'a tariff for revenue only.' He struggled with a ghost, because there is no surplus and he met ghosts because the ghost of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) and the ghosts of many other hon. members confronted him in that regard. I will read just a line in reference to the question of bounties from a statement by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Hon. Sir Louis Davies). He was making a tour of the maritime provinces and say in regard to bounties :

> This country cannot be made poor; it must continue in wealth and prosperity. But he was not satisfied to be contented with a mere existence, but desired to see Canada take the fullest advantage of its great resources. This could only be accomplished in one way, by means of free trade. This was the key with which they would unlock the golden door of prosperity. . . The Liberals maintained that any trade which required subventions to keep them alive, not only do not contribute to the natural wealth, but actually hinder the prosperity of a country.

This is pretty clear upon the question of bounties. I leave my hon. friend from South Wellington to fight it out with the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, although perhaps, it may very well be that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries has varied his opinion very much since that time. We had a very eloquent speech from the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil), and I must say that after the eloquent manner in which he seconded the address it was unfortunate indeed that he should be the first, and I am glad to say, the only hon. gentleman,who introduced the race and religious cry in this House. I followed the hon. gentleman through his somewhat labourious argument designed to show that certain constituencies in Quebec with an admittedly Roman Catholic majority had sent hon. gentlemen of another religion to represent them on the floor of this House. I did not know until then, living in the province of Ontario, and I regret it if it obtains in Quebec, that these questions are taken into account in the matter of elections. I have always found, in the province in which I live, that whatever a man's religion may be, or whatever his nationality may be, it cuts no figure in the question as to whether he should or should not represent a certain electorate in the Dominion, or any legislature, and I regret exceedingly to find that we should have an argument to show that in any province of this country, or in any part of this country, another state of things prevails.

We had a speech from the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Roche) which certainly had no very direct bearing on the question before the House. It was a speech which should not be lost sight of, because it was unique. The hon. gentleman congratulated us on this side upon the research and deep study which we have evidently given to the financial questions which are being discussed. I can endorse his remark there. We on this side of the House have brought to the consideration of public questions an honest determination to sift them to the bottom, to get facts and figures to support our arguments, and to submit them in a fair and honourable way. Having paid us this compliment, it would seem that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Roche) must have dived into the coal mines of his imagination, because he brought up a considerable amount of that material by which he tried to blacken the position taken by hon. members on this side. However, we must to some extent forgive him for he concluded by whitewashing us again. The hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) stated that the third paragraph of the resolution introduced by the hon. leader of the Conservative party (Mr. Borden), is a distinct declaration of a tariff war against the world. Do hon. gentlemen upon the other side of the House concur in that statement ? Surely any one who brings a fair mind to bear upon the question must recognize that the principle we enunciate is that we shall expect the same treatment from other nations that we are prepared to extend to them. There is no declaration of war there. Did not the hon. gentleman from Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), when he spoke on Mr. Bennett's motion, tell us that if we wanted to be respected by the people of the United States we must assert our rights and show that we are ready to maintain them. That is the principle of the amendment which the Conservative party have enunciated in parliament, and that is the principle which the people of Canada are prepared to maintain.

I had not the pleasure of hearing the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright), although he is the gentleman above all others whom I particularly desired to hear, because I believed it would be more difficult for that gentleman than for any other to deal with these financial questions. He is upon record on all the questions that enter into this discussion. Beginning his life with associations better than the associations which surround him now, beginning his life as a staunch Conservative, and having the variegated history that he has had since, if there is a pathetic picture upon the floor of the House of Commons to-day it is the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Trace him through the unfortunate circumstances which have compelled him to take the position he now occupies. See him leave the old Conservative party without a cause. See him next, as he was represented here the other evening, a believer in protection, but an enforced advocate of free trade. See him go through this country from one end to the other denouncing the policy that he loved and upholding the policy of free trade which was perforce to be his road to the portfolio of finance. And in the end see that hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) whom I certainly very much admire ; see him in the end landed not in the position he naturally expected, but stranded and relegated to a position which he did not covet. He has told more than one audience in this country exactly what he thinks of his present portfolio of Trade and Commerce. He has told them that it is a perfectly useless portfolio, that it should never have been created, that it is a department in which a man cannot earn one dollar of the salary which is paid him. See him occupying that position now, compelled, reluctantly, I hope to draw the emolument which is attached to that office, and no matter what our political opinions may be, it must be a pathetic picture to us to see him as he is. It is pathetic to see him obliged to stand up and state that the expenditure of this government is right, that the policy of this government is a free trade policy, in a word swallowing all that he has said, feeding as he does on husks ; feeding on the light literature he has spread broadcast through this country in his various speeches, and swallowing his record whole. I sincerely sympathize with the hon. gentleman. Mr. Speaker, I must apologize to the House—but the apology will only extend to a small portion of it in view of the emptiness of the Liberal benches. I do feel as a new member that though I have had a splendid subject and a magnificent opportunity, I have not availed myself of it, not from want or will, but because of want of ability to deal with these questions as efficiently as I would desire. In conclusion let me point to what I think is a fortunate thing in the midst of that which to some extent is a misfortune. I recognize that it is a very serious misfortune for this country that by a side issue, and by nothing else, that by a side issue and by a fluke this government came into power. But, while it is a great misfortune, a misfortune which I believe the people of this country recognize to-day, there is one thing upon which we should congratulate ourselves, and this is that we have just come to that stage in our political history when the people of Canada know exactly where we stand. For eighteen years, while the Conservatives were in power, and while the Conservative policy was calculated to work great good for Canada, there was still the great disadvantage that the members of the Liberal party, great and small, went up and down the country decrying our policy and thereby preventing it from having that full beneficial effect that it otherwise would. But that is not all. They not only did that, but by telling the people —and there were some people foolish enough to believe them sincere—that they were coming into power, and that when they came into power they would remove every vestige of protection and revert to the old free trade, which had ruined this country before. By doing so they retarded the prosperity of the country and prevented the building up of its industries to the extent to which they would otherwise have been built up under the Conservative policy. They told the people that they were coming into power, and would put into force one or other of the five or six policies which they had propounded, and that protection would be set aside. As the Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Fisher) said so eloquently on many occasions—referring to the Conservative policy of protection—this accursed system, a system accursed by God and man, and it was going to be wiped out.' So that people stood hesitating and doubting, and doubt means distrust, and distrust in commercial matters means ultimate bankruptcy. While a great many people did not believe them, yet it did, to a certain extent, retard the onward march of the national policy during those eighteen years. But, when they came into power, it was found that they had not the courage to inaugurate any of the policies they had been preaching. I ask the hon. members of the government, will they tell me which of the policies they advocated they have adopted ? Is it continental free trade ? I know they will say it is not. Is it commercial union with the United States ? I know they will say it is not. Is it unrestricted reciprocity ? I know they will say it is not. Is it free trade? That is the only one they can escape on. They will not say that it is. Is it a tariff for revenue only ? The Minister of Finance came down here the other day and said this : A year ago I told the people of this country that we would reach the fifty-million mark in revenue. The revenue required is for an expenditure of $42,000,000. On a tariff for revenue only the hon. gentleman takes from the pockets of the people of this country $8,000,000 in excess of what he says is required for the expenditure of the country. How can he say, under these circumstances, that it is a tariff for revenue only ? Is it free trade as they have it in England ? No. And so it comes to this, that take it whatever way you will, these hon. gentlemen were never able, during the eighteen years that they were out of power, to devise a policy which was workable in the interest of this Dominion ; and when they came into power they were in this position, that they had to send a commission out to try by questions, such as they fling across the House to try to draw our hands, to devise a policy which they were not able to devise for themselves. The result was that when they got the report of that commission, they had to adopt in effect the old policy of the Conservative party, and they have attached to it a clause with reference to preferential trade, which has had no effect except to make it more difficult for the industries of this country to prosper. In the cotton industry alone we find that the stock has dropped to-day seventeen points. So that the result which is going to follow from this preferential tariff is making its appearance already.

I feel that I have already spoken longer than probably I ought as a new member ; but you will recognize that it is much more difficult for us new members to speak than the old and hardened gentlemen who sit on the other side of the House, yes and some of whom sit on this side, but to our left. I would not for a moment say anything disrespectful of the members of the government. I think the time has come when we have it, as a firmly established idea, that protection shall be the main policy of this country. Good men are wanted now, and this is about all we want to have assured prosperity in this country. I say nothing disrespectful of the administration of this country, only I think they could be improved upon, some of them perhaps a great deal. I was walking the other day along Sparks street, when I saw an advertisement in a window. There was in the window a lot of fabrics of different colours, some of them gaudy in their appearance, and this legend was on them : 'They'll all stand washing,' and I may add, and watching.

Mr. SCOTT moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of the Finance Minister, House adjourned at 11.15 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, March 25, 1901.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

INLAND WATERS SEAMEN'S ACT.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Hon. Sir Louis Davies) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 91) to amend the Inland Waters Seamen's Act. He said : The existing Act defining the inland waters of Canada is very uncertain, and doubts have arisen as to what it really means. It says : 'All the waters of Canada above the city of Quebec.' The question was whether that was confined to the River St. Lawrence or whether it embraced the lakes, or whether it could embrace the waters of the great North-west Territories. I have brought in a Bill to define that the inland waters of Canada shall embrace all the rivers and lakes whose waters are navigable, excepting the sea-coasts, bays and harbours, from a line above Point des Monts and Cape Chat on the shores of the St. Lawrence ; and conferring upon the judge of the Supreme Court in the Yukon territory, and upon the judge of the territorial court in the North-west Territories, the same jurisdiction for the punishment of offences as is given to the judges of the Superior Court of Lower Canada, and to the judges of the sessions of the peace in the lower provinces, with regard to offences committed upon the high seas, within Canadian jurisdiction.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE SAFETY OF SHIPS.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Hon. Sir Louis Davies) moved for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 92) to amend the Act respecting the safety of ships. He said: When the Dominion Act was originally passed, many years ago, it then conformed to the British law. Since then the British mercantile law has been amended in very slight particulars, and owing to the construction of modern ships the spaces that are covered in and are not counted in the tonnage are not allowed by our law to be filled up with a cargo except by deals to the height of three feet, and I propose to amend our law so as to make it conform exactly with the Imperial statute in that respect.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Is that in respect to deck loads ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I may say to my hon. friend that the Bill does not provide for any compulsory inspection of deck loads. It simply amends our existing law so as to provide that the vacant space, which is now compelled by law to be vacant, the spaces covered in in steamers above the three feet of deals, may be filled up with such articles as hay or other light material. It does not otherwise touch the question of deck loads at all.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

INVESTIGATIONS INTO SHIPPING CASUALTIES.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Hon. Sir Louis Davies) moved for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 93) respecting inquiries and investigations into shipping casualties. He said : The Bill is the result of many communications which have passed between the Board of Trade in England and the Marine Department in Canada. Under the law as it now stands, we have power to investigate into the causes of any casualty which occurs in Canadian waters, even if the ship is commanded by an officer holding a British certificate, a British officer. The officers holding British certificates complained that the manner in which our investigations were held did not ensure to them that perfect fair-play which is ensured to them by investigations held under the British system.

The Board of Trade, after several cases had taken place, and the evidence been sent to them, intimated as their opinion that the investigation should partake more of a judicial character, and that the judge who heard the case and decided whether the officer should lose his certificate for carelessness, should have the advantage in all cases of competent nautical assessors to sit with him, and that the presiding judge should be a legal gentleman. The Bill has been drafted in accordance with the suggestions of the British Board of Trade. Inasmuch as grave doubts exist, and there is a difference of opinion between the law officers of the Crown on this side of the water and the law officers of the Crown in Great Britain, as to whether the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had appellate jurisdiction to amend, or alter, or modify the findings of the court, the present law removes that doubt, and declares that he shall not have that jurisdiction ; so that, if a judicial court, under this statute, finds that an officer has been guilty of neglect of duty, the finding and the evidence are forwarded to Great Britain, to the authority from which he receives the certificate, to be dealt with by them, and cannot be altered or amended by us.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is to British certificates that it relates ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Entirely to British certificates. These are the two main amendments to enable me to appoint county court judges at Halifax, St. John and some other places and to associate with them nautical officers so as to bring our law into unison and harmony with the spirit of the British law and to make it uniform.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I understand the hon. gentleman proposes this change only in regard to certificates issued under the British Board of Trade in England ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Precisely.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Our law as to men holding certificates issued by the Department of Marine here, remains as it is.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries retains the same power as he had before.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, but in regard to the court of first instance, are the general legal requirements necessary to the hearing of this case the same ; for instance, supposing the hon. gentleman were to take Capt. Smith, or some other officer, and appoint him to hold a preliminary inquiry ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not necessarily to hold the preliminary inquiry, but to hold an inquiry dealing with the certificate. We follow the same procedure as in England. The Bill provides for the appointment of a county judge, or a judge of some kind to act. An assessor would proceed with the court and Capt. Smith could act as the assessor to the judge.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Lisgar) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 94) to amend the Railway Act. He said : Mr. Speaker, for the last two or three years the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Blair) and myself have been endeavouring to get a clause inserted into charters in the Railway Committee, conferring upon His Majesty, or upon the government, power to expropriate a railway at any time that it is deemed in the public interest that such railway should be expropriated, and also providing that any bonuses which may be given to the railway may properly be deducted from the price agreed upon in regard to the expropriation of the road. Upon every occasion upon which we have endeavoured to get that clause inserted in a charter in the Railway Committee, we were met by the proposition that it is singling a particular railway out for special treatment, and that there would be no objection if a clause of this kind were made to apply generally. I thought it would be in the interest of the House and the country that a Bill of that nature should be brought before the House. I have brought it in as an amendment to the Railway Act, and it contains only three provisions. One of the provisions, as I have explained, is that when you take over the road, any subsidies which have been voted to it shall be deducted. I have added to that provision that this clause shall apply to charters granted from the date of the existence of the present parliament. I may say that I looked up the question of the expropriation of railways, and I find that in 1884, Mr. Gladstone introduced a Bill into the Imperial House of Commons which became law, providing conditions under which railways might be expropriated by the government. After thinking the matter over, to some extent, I decided that it would not be well to insert in the Bill any provision of that nature, but that I should simply ask the House to make a general declaration in favour of expropriation. I regret that I was not in possession of certain information when we last had the matter before the Railway Committee, because, I find that we are not establishing a precedent at all. The first Canadian railway charter that was ever granted to a company, the proprietors of the Champlain and St. Lawrence Railroad, provided that the government should have the right to expropriate the road at any time upon paying to the proprietors the amounts paid on their shares, plus 20 per cent. The Act incorporating the Grand Trunk Railway Company provided that the government might purchase the railway at the end of twenty-one years from January 1, 1853, upon certain conditions. The Act incorporating the London and Gore Railway Company, which in 1845 became the Great Western, provided for expropriation by the government at any time after forty years after completion of the work, upon repayment of the amounts paid on shares, plus 20 per cent. In many other charters there is an expropriation clause, so that I am not asking the House to establish any precedent whatever. I think it is desirable that this power should be made general. I am quite prepared for the argument that parliament has control of the railways now, but I think it is as well that we should serve formal notice upon all railway companies from this time forth, that their property may be expropriated by the Dominion, if necessary. Then, there will be no obtaining money from capitalists in the old land under false pretenses. They will clearly understand that a provision exists under which parliament may take these roads over. I think, in view of the trend of public opinion in favour of government control, or government ownership of railways, that it is particularly desirable that the Bill of which I have given notice shall be adopted. I move for leave to introduce the Bill, seconded by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Robinson).

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PRIVATE BILLS COMMITTEE.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved :

That the names of Mr. Wade and Mr. Pringle be added to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY COMMITTEE.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved :

That the name of Mr. Tobin be substituted for that of Mr. Godbout as a member of the Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the government if they would cause to be laid on the Table the order in council under which the reference of the claim of Nova Scotia in connection with the Eastern Extension Railway was made at an early day, without waiting until all the other papers are prepared.

The PRIME MINISTER. It is a mere oversight that I have not it with me now. I will have it to-morrow.

QUARANTINE REGULATIONS WITH UNITED STATES.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Hon. Sydney Fisher). In compliance with the request of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), I beg to move that an Order of the House do issue for a return containing the changes in the quarantine regulations between the United States and Canada.

Motion agreed to.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I beg to present the return.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou). I beg to call attention to the urgent necessity there is for holding a meeting of the Public Accounts Committee. I repeat the reasons which I gave the other day. There are two or three matters which it will be impossible to audit properly unless we have at least two meetings of that committee each week. We have only had about one meeting a week, and I was in hopes that there would be a meeting to-morrow. It is the desire of every one, I assume, that we should get through the business here as quickly as possible, but take the telegraph service in which some half million dollars is concerned, and even if we have two meetings a week, we will barely have sufficient time to make anything like a fair examination of these vouchers which are exceedingly voluminous. I have examined some of them and they certainly require explanation in the public interest. I am not at the moment familiar with the rights of members of the committee, but whatever they be, we have been deferring to the convenience of the members of the government, several of whom are on that committee. It is no doubt in the public interest that they should be present, and considering the government majority and all that we had to bow to their convenience. Possibly it is the right of a member of the committee to have the committee called together and to take his chances on a quorum being present. I wish to know if it is not possible to meet to-morrow.

Mr. D. C. FRASER (Guysborough). The week before last there were two meetings.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. One.

Mr. FRASER. Excuse me, two. Arrangements were made and we met on Wednesday, and the clerk called a meeting for Friday, but we only sat a few minutes. I was away on the last day, but it is not absolutely necessary that the chairman should be there. I find that Wednesday is the most convenient day for that committee to meet, and when we meet on Wednesday, then we can decide as to whether Thursday or Friday would be the most convenient for another meeting. I have no desire but to have two meetings a week, but as there are two other committees meeting to-morrow the Public Accounts will be called for Wednesday.

CANADA NATIONAL RAILWAY AND TRANSPORT COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill (No. 13) to incorporate the Canada National Railway and Transport Company.—Mr. Cowan.

Mr. MACLEAN. On section 2 I object to the name which it is proposed to call this company. In the committee I objected to the use of the word 'National' in connection with a private corporation like this on the ground that we should retain the word 'National' for the railways owned by Canada. The word 'National' is a very good name and instead of calling the Intercolonial Railway the government railway system of Canada, we should call it the National Railway System of Canada. I ask the government that they should in defence of their own road withdraw the word 'National' from the name of this company and use it hereafter as a distinctive name for the government railways of this country. I do not wish to cause the promoters of this Bill any trouble at this stage, but I would suggest to them that they should change the name. I would ask the minister (Hon. Mr. Blair) to request the promoters of the Bill to use some other name.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair). I do not imagine there would be any objection to striking out the word 'National' if you like. I did not think it is a matter of quite as much importance as my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean) thinks it is, but if it is agreeable to the House it could be called the Canada Railway and Transport Company.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That makes it all the stronger.

Mr. MACLEAN. I think it ought to be called the Georgian Bay and Toronto Railway Company, or some name like that.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Make a proposal.

Mr. MACLEAN. I would prefer the name should be given by the promoters of the Bill, but if they do not do so we can christen it ourselves.

Hon. JAMES SUTHERLAND (North Oxford). Mr. Cowan, who has charge of the Bill, is unfortunately ill, but I understood from the solicitor and from Mr. Campbell who was promoting the Bill that they did not object to a change in the name. We can amend it on third reading.

Mr. SPROULE. This is the proper place to amend it. I move that it be named the Toronto and Georgian Bay Railway.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. There will be no necessity for such a motion if the promoters will agree to a change in the name. I think myself it is just as well not to have the word 'National' in, but those interested should have the privilege of naming the company, and that can be done on the third reading.

Mr. SPROULE. That was discussed in the committee, and I understood that the promoter was not averse to the name proposed. It was not carried, but it was not seriously objected to.

The PRIME MINISTER. That may be taken up on the third reading.

On the question that the Bill be reported,

Mr. E. F. CLARKE (West Toronto). I desire to move the addition of another clause to the Bill, in accordance with the terms of the notice which I gave a few days ago. I move that the following be added as clause 14:

> His Majesty shall have the right at any time to take over the undertaking, property, rights and franchises of the company, and for that purpose the provisions of the Expropriation Act shall apply.
> From any valuation placed upon such property so taken there shall be deducted on payment the amount of any bonus or subsidy paid by the government of Canada to the company towards the construction of such line of railway or any part thereof.

This resolution is somewhat similar in terms to a resolution which was presented to the committee and the House when a Bill similar to this was under our consideration some twelve months ago. If this were a Bill asking for an ordinary local charter, for the construction of a road seventy-five miles long for the purpose of serving the municipalities through which it passed, there might be some valid objection taken to the insertion of this provision. But the charter asked for is not for the purpose of constructing a local road; that has never been sought for, and it is not required. Between the town of Collingwood, one of the termini mentioned in the Bill, and Lake Ontario we have already two roads—one running to the city of Toronto, ninety-four miles in length, and the other running to the city of Hamilton, about 112 miles in length. So that the two chief ports on Lake Ontario are connected with that important port on the Georgian Bay by two lines of railway whose greatest distance apart is not more than twenty-five miles. It cannot be said, therefore, that this third road is required for any purposes of a local character. That, I think, has been made abundantly clear again and again in debates which have taken place in this House on the transportation question, and by representations which have been made by the leading business men and organizations of the province of Ontario ; and if the committee and the House had not been impressed with the view that the road which we propose to charter was to form a link in a transportation route the most direct between the head of inland navigation and the sea-board, I think great difficulty would have been experienced in procuring a charter for the construction of this road. It is proposed that this shall be made an air line. The distance from Collingwood to Toronto by the present rail route is ninety-four miles. By constructing this line in the most direct way, it is expected that the distance will be shortened to seventy or seventy-four miles. Large bonding powers have been given in the Bill, because it is proposed that the road shall be constructed in the most substantial manner possible, with the heaviest rails, the most substantial road-bed, the latest and most improved freight cars, and the heaviest and best locomotives, for the purpose of carrying on the large business which we all hope and expect will be developed between the west and north-west and the sea-board in years to come. The board of trade of the city of Toronto for some years past, being impressed with the importance of this route as a competitive route against the railways, has been drawing public attention to the matter, and has been invoking the aid of the government for the purpose of securing the construction of a line similar to that which is proposed under this Bill ; and I have in my hand a copy of a resolution which was adopted unanimously at a general meeting of that board, held on the 2nd of February, 1899, and which declared :

> That, in the opinion of this board, the Dominion government should take into consideration the question of opening up this most important avenue of communication with the seaboard, and that, in connection with the canal system of this country, they should complete the shortest and most speedy route to the upper lakes by building an independent railway to operate in connection with vessels from Toronto, which is the most suitable harbour on Lake Ontario, and the nearest and most suitable harbour or harbours for the purpose upon the Georgian Bay, as a complement to the St. Lawrence canal system.

On June 1, 1899, the Toronto Board of Trade adopted unanimously the recommendation respecting the means to be adopted to create more Canadian bottoms on our lakes. Among the means which could best accomplish this object was the construction of

> A line of railway to be owned and controlled by the government, built across the portage to Georgian Bay, which is the natural receptacle of the grain of the United States as well as of western Canada, the ports of which are able to accommodate the largest vessels which traverse the upper lakes, but which cannot get in to Lake Ontario, thus making a short and speedy route to Chicago, Duluth and Fort William, with opportunities for return cargo, especially of manufactured products for the Canadian North-west. By this project centres of population, including points as far east as the maritime provinces, Quebec, Montreal and Toronto, become interested in a common aim to build up our lake marine and create an interprovincial marine trade.

I draw attention to these conclusions of the Toronto Board of Trade to emphasize the point, that in all the discussions which have taken place so far, this line of railway was not considered as a local enterprise but as merely a link, and a comparatively short link in the chain of communication between the head of Lake Superior and the city of Quebec.

When the matter was up for consideration twelve months ago, the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), who was deeply interested in this subject, made some remarks on the transportation question, introduced by the resolution of my hon. friend the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), and in the course of remarks made on the 28th March last, the hon. member for North Simcoe said :

> If this railway were built, the chain would be complete, and thus the natural channel through which this trade should go would be perfected, and the lower lakes, rivers and canals would be successfully joined with the upper lakes and canals.

The hon. member then went on to give statements showing the distances by the various routes now adopted between the head of Lake Superior and the ports of Montreal and Quebec, but I need not weary the committee by giving these tables of distances, as they can be found in the 'Hansard' of March 28th last. He concluded by making the statement that ' there seems to be no room for doubt that the route via Collingwood and Toronto is of all the cheapest and best.' But this route of course cannot be made available except by the construction of this air line for the purpose of joining together the ports of Collingwood and Toronto.

Now, the hon. member who represented Kent in the last parliament (Mr. Campbell), who is one of the promoters of this Bill, joined in that discussion twelve months ago and had something to say as to the advantages which he thought would result, not only to the producers of the west and the North-west, but also to the people of the province of Ontario, if this railway were constructed and this route established. Speaking on the same day as the hon. member for North Simcoe, the 28th March last, Mr. Campbell said :

> I am strongly of opinion that the great highway from the west should be by way of the Georgian Bay and Toronto. It is over 300 miles shorter than the route by the Welland canal. It is the shortest possible route to the seaboard, and it can be constructed at reasonable expense, as compared with the other routes. . . . . I say that if this route were adopted and a highway made from the city of Toronto to Georgian Bay, you would at once afford a competing line which would compel all the railways to reduce their freights, and thus you would add enormously to the value of the produce of the rest of Ontario.

I am sure that in view of the last statement which I have read, and which gives the opinion of the hon. member who represented the county of Kent in the last parliament, and which is the opinion generally entertained by those who have given this matter any serious consideration—in view of the fact that this route would become a successful competitor with the railway lines now in existence and result in the diminution of freight charges between the west and the sea board, it is surely not unreasonable to ask, lest any of these railways might become possessed of this route or charter, that a provision, such as I have suggested, should be embodied in this Bill. It is surely not unreasonable that the government should have the right at any time to take this road, if they should find that it was not serving the purposes for which the charter was given, so that the advantage of active competition with the railways might be afforded, not only to those exporting the produce of Canada, but also to those bringing goods into Canada.

The then hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) made this further statement:

I contend that the government should carefully look into this matter before they finally decide. I believe that the route from Toronto to Georgian Bay, which is over 300 miles shorter than via the Welland canal, will confer upon the people of this country enormous advantages that will greatly enhance the value of all the produce raised in the province of Ontario.

I need not take up the time of the committee at greater length on the importance of this link being retained by the government in the public interest. It is a matter of the most vital importance—if the hopes and expectations we all have as to the enormous development which will take place in the traffic of this country are to be realized—that this most important link in the most direct route of transportation between the North-west and the seaboard should be in the hands of the people of Canada for all time to come. If this clause is not inserted and if bonuses are given to this road, we may find that practically little or nothing will be done. Indeed, the charter may be acquired by one of the roads already in existence, with which this new road would compete, and thus the advantages of the establishment of this further line of transportation would be entirely lost.

Speaking for myself, I think that the clause, as amended, is one which ought to meet with the approval of the committee. It differs from the clause submitted last year in this respect, that it proposes to take over the entire enterprise, not the railway and appurtenances alone, but the railway and whatever vessels are connected with it in the navigation of the great lakes. It is surely not unreasonable to ask that if the government of the day gives a substantial bonus to assist in the construction of this railway, the amount of the bonus should be deducted from the amount payable by the government, should it decide to take over the road.

I therefore beg to move that the following clause be added to the Bill:

His Majesty shall have the right at any time to take over the undertaking, property rights and franchises of the company, and for that purpose the provisions of the Expropriation Act shall apply.

From any valuation placed upon such property so taken there shall be deducted on payment the amount of any bonus or subsidy paid by the government of Canada to the company towards the construction of such line of railway or any part thereof.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair). The question involved in the motion of the hon. gentleman was thoroughly threshed out before the Railway Committee, and I need not say that there was considerable diversity of opinion, first, as to whether the clause of this character at all should be introduced, and next, as to what its nature should be.

In the course of that discussion I expressed a certain view and framed an amendment embodying that view, and that amendment, which I proposed to the committee, is identical with that which the hon. gentleman has just moved. But it did not meet with the approval of the committee, and hence the hon. gentleman has felt it necessary to move it here. The question that is before the committee, it seems to me, is not a very large question, viewed from the standpoint of the promoters, nor is it one which, so far as I am capable of forming an opinion on the subject, ought in the slightest degree to militate against the promotion of the undertaking. I cannot conceive why any one who is satisfied that this enterprise had merit in it which would justify him in investing his means in it should hesitate to do so because this clause, if adopted by the committee, was found in the Bill. The first portion of the clause is little more than a declaration or notice that parliament may do, in respect of this particular undertaking what, unquestionably, it can do, without incorporating the clause in the incorporating Bill, in respect of any undertaking that may be set on foot through our legislation. Parliament, undoubtedly, as I view the law and the powers of parliament, can declare in favour of the expropriation of any property that it is deemed necessary in the public interest to possess, even though the company which may have constructed that work and may have received its charter from this parliament did not take its charter with any express provision to that effect contained in it. The committee thought, or a number of the members of the committee thought, it would be desirable to give the notice, and I could see no objection to such notice being given, because it would simply convey to the promoters and to those investors who might connect themselves with the enterprise that this parliament has this power, which, otherwise, they might not be aware of. I do not consider that portion of the clause the important portion, but rather the second portion of it. This second part, as hon. members will see, provides that, in the event of parliament expropriating, the amount paid shall be subject to reduction by the amount of any subsidy or aid which may be given by this parliament to assist the enterprise. Now, it seems to me that practically the sole question for this committee to consider is whether or not it would be a reasonable or appropriate clause to insert in the Bill or a proper condition to impose. Will any person hesitate to say that it would be a proper condition ? I question if there is a doubt in the mind of any one in this House that, if we grant a subsidy to this road, and if the enterprise is of the importance which hon. gentleman, on both sides apparently, declare it to be—though I have not seen much evidence to convince me of that, but assuming that to be the case—and for that reason it was decided to acquire it, it would be proper to deduct from the value paid for the undertaking the amount of any subsidy granted by this parliament. I am prepared, for one, and so declared myself in this committee, to vote for this amendment. I think it can do no harm to anybody. I cannot see why any one should think it ought to militate at all against the succeseful promotion of the enterprise. What reason could any person have for refusing to go into this enterprise under such conditions ? If they were going in merely for the purpose of getting the bonus as a benefit to be retained by them even though the property were expropriated, I can imagine they would hesitate. But we will not assume that that motive would inspire anybody who would put his money into the undertaking. These are my views as expressed in the committee and as still entertained, and I am prepared to vote for the amendment the hon. gentleman has moved.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES (North Victoria). I take the liberty of asking the attention of the Minister of Railways to an amendment to the amendment which I shall move. It is not necessary that we should here enter into a discussion of the merits or demerits of this road. But, if the government purposes taking over this road or any road to the Georgian Bay, I would respectfully submit that a road leading to the harbour of Midland, which is a much better harbour than that of Collingwood, and which would not require the expenditure of any public money upon it in order to fit it to receive the largest vessels, would be much preferable to one to Collingwood. More than that, the route to Midland could be extended to connect with the magnificent harbour of Parry Sound ; and as a grain route for the city of Toronto, I am satisfied it would be infinitely better than one from Collingwood—not that I would wish to draw these issues in here, but they have already been introduced and that is my reason for mentioning the matter. Still further, if the government is ever going to take over this road, by running to Midland and on to Parry Sound, there would be the beginning of a great national system of railways to the North-west which has been mentioned by my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Clarke). The government would have at its disposal, from Toronto to Parry Sound, a road in full running order, which would save the construction of another road in case the one to Collingwood was built. However, I mention this in passing. The amendment I propose, seconded by Mr. McCormick, is as follows :

> That after the word ' thereof ' in the amendment there be inserted the following : 'And there shall be further deducted on payment the amount of any bonus or subsidy paid by any municipality to the said company, which amount shall be refunded to the municipality.'

Mr. DAVIS. What have we to do with the bonuses voted by municipalities.

Mr. HUGHES (North Victoria). I may tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davis), that a former Liberal leader was not above endeavouring to influence the voters, on one occasion, by holding out the inducement to them, that, if they returned his party to power, not only would a bonus so voted on roads taken over by the government be refunded, but the question of repaying to the municipalities all the subsidies paid by them whether the government took over the roads or not would be taken up. If a municipality has voted a large sum of money—as many of them have done—in order that they might have competition, and subsequently, by amalgamation, the competition for which the money was voted has been denied or done away with, that municipality is certainly entitled to a redress of the grievance under which it labours. It is not necessary that anything further should be said on this subject.

Mr. MACLEAN. As regards these two amendments, I am glad to hear the Minister of Railways and Canals say he will accept that one proposed by the member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke). It was discussed in committee, and I believe that while it was voted down there, if we had had the support of the Minister of Railways at the second reading we would have got it through. I hope under any case it will be put through to-day. In connection with the remarks made here to-day by the Minister of Railways, and already made before the committee, I wish to inform the House, and to inform his colleague, the Minister of Public Works, that somehow the minister does not think much of this proposition. Then, why is all this money being spent on Collingwood harbour ? Surely that harbour is to be improved at the public expense for a definite purpose, and if it is not in connection with a railway complementary of the canal system of this country, for what purpose is the money being spent ? I cannot see. Now, I suppose this road, or a similar road, is an important link in the railway and water transportation of this country. I am surprised to hear the minister say, as he has said on two occasions, that he does not think much of this proposition. While I will vote for the amendment, I must take the opportunity to say that I think the government is making a great mistake in allowing this charter to be taken up by a private corporation. As I argued in the Railway Committee, and as I will argue now, the government should expropriate the Grand Trunk Railway between Toronto and Collingwood, and nationalize a road between Toronto and some harbour on the Georgian Bay—Midland, probably, or Collingwood. But, certainly they could find a harbour, and then they could take over the better portion of the Grand Trunk Railway, double track it, and extend it on to Parry Sound and Sudbury, by North Bay on to Hudson Bay, in connection with the system of the Ontario government. But here is a proposition to get this road, which is the best paying road in Canada, and it could be acquired for what will be given in the way of bonuses to this country. If the government would pursue the policy they have declared of doing great things in connection with the canals of this country, they would not rest a moment until they did have a national railway from the Georgian Bay to Lake Ontario, and connecting with the railway and river system of this country. I am surprised that this opportunity is to be let pass, as many others have been, without the government getting a substantial advantage to the country. As regards the proposal of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Hughes), I think it is objectionable to interfere on behalf of municipalities. I think municipalities ought to make their own contracts when they vote their own money to railways.

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND. Why not this parliament as well ?

Mr. MACLEAN. This parliament is doing it now. I know the hon. gentleman will say : Why not make a provision in the Subsidy Bill ? We have not made sufficient provision in the past in these subsidy contracts. These subsidy contracts are not stringent enough. If there are to be any more subsidies in this country, I hope the contracts will be much more stringent than they are at the present time

Mr. CALVERT. I am sorry my hon. friend from Essex (Mr. Cowan) is not here to discuss this Bill, as he is in charge of it; but, unfortunately, he is not able to do so to-day. I am a little surprised at the attitude of my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) and the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke), representing the interests of the city of Toronto, who have endeavoured to place an amendment in this Bill with a view of killing it. Now, the city council of Toronto passed a resolution last year when this Bill was under discussion, offering their assistance if the government of Canada would grant a charter to a line connecting Collingwood with Toronto. They wished to have an independent railway from Collingwood to Toronto, a railway that would bring grain from the west through by the city of Toronto. Now this company proposes to put a large number of vessels on the lakes, they propose to put eight large vessels drawing some 20 feet of water on the upper lakes. These vessels will cost $1,540,000. Then, they propose to put thirty-two vessels on the St. Lawrence with 14 feet draught, that will cost $3,000,000, or $80,000 each. Now, I always like to follow my leader, the Minister of Railways and Canals, and I would like to ask this question of my hon. friend : Providing this government grants bonuses at all, gives any money to the construction of this railway, and they retain the power of taking it back, what is going to become of the large expenditure in connection with these vessels? As I understand it, this parliament has never granted any money towards the construction of vessels, you simply pay a certain amount of money to vessels that do a certain work for the country, but nothing for the construction of vessels, and these vessels, which are estimated to cost nearly $5,000,000, will simply be in the hands of the promoters.

Mr. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). No, the clauses provides that they shall be taken over with the railway.

Mr. CALVERT. The clause provides you shall take over these vessels at what they cost. It simply provides that if the road is taken over, the amount of money granted by the government shall be deducted. But, you do not grant any money towards building the vessels, and are you going to take the vessels over for what they cost ?

Mr. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). They will be taken over at what the arbitrators decide.

Mr. CALVERT. If you propose to take them over for what they cost, these men will be placed in the position that they will have the vessels on their hands, providing that clause is put in. Can these people go to the money markets of the world and place their bonds and secure money for the construction of that road? We must also remember that under the policy of this government, on any money that is paid over to the railway companies, they pay 3 per cent interest; so that, we are not actually giving away money, they have not asked for any money yet, but if they do, the policy of the government is that they shall pay 3 per cent on that money. Now, the government can borrow money at less than 3 per cent, and they charge the railway company 3 per cent on all the money they receive from the government; so that is not a very bad investment.

Mr. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). How is the government going to get 3 per cent from the railway companies? Your proposition is, that if the government subsidized this railway, the government will get 3 per cent in return on the subsidy. Who from, and under what clause?

Mr. CALVERT. Under the Railway Act, as I understand it. In the Subsidy Act, where the money is paid over to the company, they have got to agree before they get the money to pay 3 per cent; the 3 per per cent is taken out of it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Calvert) is quite correct, because the subsidy regulations as now framed calls for 3 per cent.

Mr. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). Will the hon. member for South Norfolk tell this House whether the country has received 3 per cent on all bonuses?

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. I did not say that, I was only supporting the hon. gentleman's contention that 3 per cent is charged. If you look at the Subsidy Act you will find that it has been changed.

Mr. CALVERT. Such being the case, why should we single out this railway when you are making a general Act? I am in favour of making a general Act dealing with all railways alike, and I think it is unfair to the promoters of this Bill. This Bill passed this House last year, it has passed the committee this year, we have already voted down a resolution proposed by the minister to-day, and I think it will be most unfair to the promoters of this Bill to have anything of that kind placed in it. As I said, this is a strong company, they have a good directorate, men of means, and they propose to build a railway double-tracked, and to place a large number of vessels at both ends, so the enterprise will be one of immense importance to the people of this country. In the interest of the promoters, I would hope that the House would not vote for the amendment, but would vote to pass the Bill as it passed the committee the other day.

Hon. DAVID TISDALE (South Norfolk). Mr. Chairman, I want to define my position upon this Bill and I will do it as briefly as possible. I do not propose to commence voting for legislation not according to my understanding of the lines we have been pursuing in the Railway Committee and in the House in times past. I believe that either one of these amendments will be a departure from the well-understood principles that we have hitherto followed. This is simply, as I understand it, a private Bill for a private railway.

Mr. CLARKE. Not at all.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. According to my understanding it is. It has been introduced and passed so far entirely as a private Bill. I think I am quite right and I propose to try to be logical. If, at any future time the government see fit, whichever party may be in power, and it becomes a public matter to adopt the policy which has been proposed, they must stand or fall upon that policy. In the general Railway Act last year, or the year before, we had quite extensive alterations when the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) revised it and put in a number of new clauses that were in line with the policy of the government. If the government at the commencement of the session had made the announcement that they proposed to amend the Railway Act in this direction and apply the amendment to all the Bills that should be passed, there would be more logic in the proposition. I have always endeavoured, and I do not propose to change now, to legislate on legislative principles without departing from those in any special case. I say that the Railway Committee, having passed this Bill, which was introduced as a private Bill, I propose to vote against both of these amendments. I propose to vote against the amendment of the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) because municipalities, if they give bonuses to this road, ought to be allowed to give them on such conditions as they please, as we have no jurisdiction over them. We are asked to say that a municipality cannot give a bonus in spite of this. If we pass the amendment to the amendment, it will be equivalent to our saying that we will take it out of the power of the municipality to give a bonus without any reference to getting it back at all. I think the municipal councils are quite competent to take care of themselves, and that they will not thank us for trying to tie their hands before the event or before they come to consider the question of the bonus. As to the amendment, if it is proposed to change the general Railway Act and apply expropriation, we can then consider the question, but I do not propose, as far as I am concerned, to vote to put this condition in any one particular Bill. I will say, in passing, now, though perhaps it might be more properly said afterwards, that I do not think this railway is entitled to a subsidy from the government, but that is a matter that we must deal with at the proper time. We neither should assume that it will get a bonus, or not get one, because that is a matter upon which the government will take the responsibility at the proper time. Assuming that something is going to happen that we do not know will happen is something that we have no right to do in considering legislation of this kind. I have never legislated nor agreed to legislate in that way, and I do not propose to commence to-day. We can consider the question of the application of the expropriation power to Bills of this kind at the proper time. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) has introduced a Bill under which this question may be discussed. This Bill is nothing more nor less than a private Bill. Objections may be taken to the charter if any hon. gentleman wants to object to it, such as that the road is not necessary because it is paralleling an existing road, but, so far, we have never applied that principle and there is no objection to this Bill on that score.

Mr. CLARKE. If this had been an ordinary private Bill granting permission to construct a road 70 miles long from one point to another in a territory already served by two railways, would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tisdale) vote for the charter ?

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. As a rule, I will vote for a railway charter where the promoters ask for no public aid, but where they will undertake to construct the road as a commercial undertaking, unless it is interfering with some road under construction.

Mr. CLARKE. There are two lines under construction.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. Suppose there are three. The only circumstances upon which we object to a charter are when there is one road authorized already that is under construction and the time is not up. My view is that we should legislate on legislative principles. If we do not we become personal. If we become personal, or party, in regard to private legislation, then, God help this House. The only logical and consistent way is to treat all individuals under similar circumstances alike. That I have endeavoured to do in the past and I propose to do in the future.

Mr. B. M. BRITTON (Kingston). Mr. Speaker, I suppose that ordinarily I ought to oppose the Bill altogether, because it seems to me that there is only one point where grain ought to be transhipped to be sent down the St. Lawrence. However, I do not take so narrow a view as that in discussing the Bill which is now before the House. I am not opposing the Bill, but I am opposed to both of these amendments that have been presented to the House. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) has said that the first part of the amendment is not at all necessary, because parliament has at all times the right to expropriate undertakings of this kind. Then, there only remains the question of the latter part of the amendment. I am speaking of the amendment of the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke), and that is providing that upon expropriation the amount of the subsidy is to be deducted. This amendment provides for the expropriation by the government of the whole undertaking. I do not want to put it in the power of the government to make an expropriation such as this amendement contemplates. If parliament has such power, or ever should choose to exercise that power, it will be a matter which should receive the most careful consideration of the House . If any one should propose the expropriation of the vessels, such as the hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Calvert) spoke of, as being the intention of this company to build for service on the upper lakes and to carry grain to Montreal, I think that will be a new departure, so far as government works are concerned, that will hardly meet the approbation of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean). At least I hardly think so. It will be going a great deal farther than mere nationalizing the railway system of this country. I hope the government will not enter into competition with the private owners of vessel property by seeking to carry grain from the west to the east. I think this can be better done by private enterprise than by the government. Whatever may be said in reference to railways, telegraph lines, the telephone system, and similar enterprises, I do not think the argument applies to the government ownership of vessel property. Then, there is another thing. It strikes me as one of the strongest possible arguments that it is unfair discrimination against this company that such a clause should be put into their Bill. This is unquestionably a private Bill in reference to a company just such as we are incorporating all the time, and the logic of such an argument is irresistible. In view of the legislation which has heretofore been adopted by this House, I do not see what good reason can be given for incorporating in this Bill a clause which has not been incorporated in any other Bill in the past, and which it is not proposed to incorporate in any Bill in the future.

Mr. COCHRANE. Did not the company agree to accept this clause last year if we would pass the Bill ?

Mr. COWAN. No.

Mr. COCHRANE. Yes.

Mr. BRITTON. The company which was seeking incorporation certainly agreed to accept the clause at that time. They were forced into a corner and they wanted to get their Bill through, but notwithstanding their willingness to make the concession the Railway Committee would not allow the Bill to pass. I have no quarrel with the promoters for accepting that clause last year, but I agree with the hon. member for South Norfolk (Hon. Mr. Tisdale), that we should not force such a clause into this charter.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). This railway is declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada, and I am inclined to agree with the view of the Minister of Railways (Hon. Mr. Blair) that in respect to such works it would be desirable to pass a general law enabling the government of Canada to expropriate them.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. That is a different question.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not think it is a different question, and for this reason. You must begin at some time or other with a provision of this kind and there would be exactly the same reason against a general law that there is against this. If we are to start with the assumption that from henceforth the amendment which is proposed by my hon. friend (Mr. Clarke) shall be applied to all railways, then we must adopt that principle if we insert the clause in this Bill. I do not see any injustice in beginning with this company any more than beginning with any other company. I do not see any more injustice in doing this (provided we make it a principle which shall guide us in the future) than there would be injustice in passing a general Act; because any company coming after the general Act had been passed would be in the same position as this company and as all future companies under the principle I have indicated. I do not however agree with the terms of the amendment, and I do not agree with the views of the minister (Hon. Mr. Blair) with regard to the justice of this amendment. The latter part of the amendment is expressed in this way :

> From any valuation placed upon the said property so taken shall be deducted in payment the amount of any bonus or subsidy by the government of Canada to the company towards the construction of any such line of railway or any part thereof.

The objection I have to the amendment, and the objection I have to the argument of the minister (Hon. Mr. Blair) is this : that while it might be in some cases perfectly proper to deduct the subsidy, it does not seem to me that in all cases it would be proper to do so. This amendment refers to the Expropriation Act. We all know the basis on which you work out the value of an undertaking under the Expropriation Act. You do not work it out on the basis of what it cost the persons who have constructed the undertaking; you work it out upon the basis of what the property is worth at the time of its expropriation. The rule in England, and I think in this country, is to add about 10 per cent to that for the reason that the property is taken against the will of the owner. Suppose this property at the time it is to be expropriated should be worth only half of what it had cost to the persons who had constructed it ; it does not seem to me that it would be a just thing to deduct the amount of the subsidy in a case of that kind. On the other hand if the property should be worth immensely more than it cost to construct it, it might be a very proper thing indeed, that the government in taking this road back should deduct the amount of the subsidy. The question came up incidentally in the discussion in respect to the value of the Drummond County Railway. That was not a case of expropriation, but it was a case in which the government were taking over a railway at a fixed price. The view I expressed then and to which I still adhere, is that if you take into consideration as a basis of your purchase the actual cost to the owner, then it is a most proper thing that you should deduct the subsidy after allowing interest or a reasonable advance to the person whose property you are taking. I took the view then, and I take it now that if you are dealing simply with the value of the property it does not seem to me that it would be in all cases a proper thing to deduct the amount of the subsidy, and indeed in some cases if you do so it might work a very great injustice to the owners of the road. For that reason I would not feel inclined to agree with the latter portion of the amendment, while I am in accord with the views expressed by the minister (Hon. Mr. Blair), and by the hon. member (Mr. Clarke) with regard to the first part of it. It may be there is some fallacy in the view I have expressed with regard to expropriation proceedings, and I should be glad if my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Blair) would point out any error in that respect.

Mr. T. S. SPOULE (East Grey). The hon. gentleman from Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) objects to this clause because this is a private Bill, and because we have not done this heretofore. His reasons do not hold good in my opinion. We can never commence too soon to do a right thing and it is never too late to mend a bad principle. If we believe that this is a proper thing to do, then the fact that we have no precedent for it should not deter us. England has been carrying out the same principle for years. It is provided in England that every large vessel which is built according to the Admiralty requirements and which gets governmental subsidies shall be available to be taken over by the government at a certain valuation to be agreed upon in case of war. In this case we provided that this railway shall be taken over in the event of some important national necessity, and as we propose to give a subsidy in this case——

Mr. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). No, we do not.

Mr. SPROULE. If there is no subsidy given to this road, then the clause does not apply at all.

Mr. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). It does not have to apply. No harm is done.

Mr. SPROULE. This proposed amendment certainly presumes that we will give a subsidy.

Mr. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). Not necessarily.

Mr. SPROULE. It certainly does or else there is no sense in the amendment. Of course the first part of the clause declares our right to expropriate, and the Minister of Railways tells us that we have that right already, but the second part says we shall deduct the subsidy if we take over the road, and how can we deduct the subsidy if none is given. I repeat that the principle embodied in this amendment has been in force in England for half a century or more, in connection with the taking over of merchant vessels in case of war. These vessels are owned and built by private corporations and there is no difference between attacking a private corporation for the national need in England and attacking private corporation in case of national necessity here. The argument of the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) consequently does not hold good. I am not in favour of the amendment to the amendment which proposes to deduct municipal bonuses. A municipality in giving a bonus gives it for the purpose of securing a railway for carrying trade to and from the locality, and when the railway is built the local need for which it pays the subsidy is satisfied and is never taken away. It is only given by the people in the locality, who can always use this local convenience, and the cost of which is partly supplied by themselves. In that event I do not think there are just grounds why the municipality should ask for the money to be paid back. In addition to that, when a municipality gives a bonus, it costs nearly half of it to get the bonus carried; and thus a large part of it is practically lost and does not inure to the advantage of the railway. But in this case, every person in the country contributes a portion of the cost of the railway, both those who use the railway and those who do not. Therefore, when there is a national need that the railway should be taken under the control of the government, I can see no reason why the amount of the purchase price should not be reduced by the amount of the bonus given. The only reason is that stated by the leader of the opposition, which I confess has always been to my mind an argument against this principle. It was this. Suppose we give a subsidy to a private corporation, which goes on and builds the railway, and afterwards transfers it to innocent purchasers. The road runs down in the meantime until it becomes worth less than the original subsidy; so that if the government took it at a valuation, and deducted the amount of the subsidy, the innocent holder would have nothing. It seems to me that the proposal of the hon. leader of the opposition is a very good one for safeguarding the interests of the innocent holders—that the subsidy should be deducted only when the value of the property exceeds the actual cost. That could only be when it would become a matter of national importance that the government should take the railway under its control. The hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) says this is only a private corporation. There is no doubt that it is, and yet nobody would have given a charter to a private corporation to compete with others occupying the same ground, but for the national need. There are two private corporations occupying the same ground to-day; and yet we are giving this company this charter because this road is believed to be a part of a great highway of commerce that will be of national importance, not only to Canada but to the United States as well; because it is hoped it will attract a large part of the commerce of the United States. This road will serve not only the port of Collingwood, but any other ports on the Georgian Bay. At the present time there is a very important harbour being constructed at Meaford, and it has a sufficient depth of water to admit the largest vessels. Then, they have built a large elevator there for the purpose of securing a share of the trade of the upper lakes. Collingwood is only twenty-two miles from Meaford, and the road between the two places is almost as level as a floor. If this road becomes the national highway which we think it is destined to become, Meaford will be able to take advantage of it as well as Collingwood. It becomes the more important on that account, because it will be fed not simply by one good harbour, but by two. I think we should provide that when it becomes necessary in the interest of the country to take the road over, the government should not be obliged to pay the money which the country has put in to help to build it. That would be paying the money twice. For these reasons I am in favour of the amendment.

Mr. RUSSELL. I regret that I cannot agree with the last speaker in favouring this amendment. I opposed it in the Railway Committee, and I intend to oppose it here, for two reasons : first of all, for the reason which has been very lucidly stated by the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale), that this is exceptional legislation, and if it is a sound principle to adopt, it should be adopted in a general way. I do not think it is a sufficient answer to say that we must make a beginning, and that we might as well begin here as anywhere else. We might begin to-day by applying the principle to this Bill, and to-morrow we might discuss the matter more thoroughly and come to the conclusion that it is, as I hold it to be, an unsound principle. So that one day we would have a Bill with this provision, and the next day we would have one in which it was not contained.

Mr. SPROULE. Is it not a fact that the hon. gentleman supported this principle in the Bill of last year ?

Mr. RUSSELL. I have no recollection of having supported any such proposition, and if I did, that is no reason why I should support it now. On the contrary, I am always open to conviction. Supposing the proposition to deduct subsidies were proposed in a general Bill, there would be a great deal to be said on both sides of the question; the argument does not all lie on the one side. The point is this. When the government conclude to give a bonus for the construction of a railway, why do they do so? They do it in general, I believe, because they know that the dividends likely to arise from operation of the railway will not be sufficient to induce private capital to invest in the enterprise. In other words, the capital put in, together with the bonus, does not create a property as valuable as the bonus and the capital combined, and perhaps only creates one worth as much as the private capital put into it. I have in my mind a railway in the province of Nova Scotia into which the Dominion and provincial governments put subsidies amounting to about $500,000, and private capitalists put nearly $1,000,000, and they created a property which, if the government desired to take it over, would probably have been valued at less than $1,000,000—perhaps at $600,000 or $700,000. The result of such a provision in that case would be that private individuals would be asked to construct a property for the benefit of the whole country, and lose $400,000 or $500,000 of their own money in the effort to do so. I do not believe that is a right or equitable result, and I do not believe that the proposition applied as a general principle would be likely to operate as the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) supposes that it would. Instead of being any relief to the poor people who are sweating and groaning under the fardels which they have to bear in this matter of railway construction, it might increase their burdens, by making it more difficult to construct railways in this country. It is perhaps not necessary to go into the discussion of that subject at present; but I say it is not a sound principle, capable of application in every case, to deduct the bonus from the value of the property. It would be confiscating the property, and compelling private individuals to construct railways for the benefit of the country at large. In this particular case, it is absolutely indefensible, because it is proposed to make it an exception, instead of introducing the principle as a general one applicable to every one alike.

Mr. SPROULE. Is not the hon. gentleman at the present time advocating the taking over by the government of a provincial railway in Nova Scotia, and giving back to the province the bonuses given to it by the provincial government ? It is the same principle.

Mr. RUSSELL. When did I advocate that?

Mr. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). If we could get from the right hon. leader of the House a declaration as to whether he would be willing to accept, as a government measure, the Bill which I introduced this afternoon, and which, I gather from the remarks of the Minister of Railways, would have that hon. gentleman's support, this discussion might end here. The Bill I have introduced merely provides for the expropriation of any railway, when parliament decides that its expropriation is in the interests of the country, and provides further for the deduction of the government bonuses from the expropriation price, as proposed by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke).

I want to say a word with reference to the contention of the hon. member for South Norfolk (Hon. Mr. Tisdale) and the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Russell), that we would, if we should adopt this amendment, be creating a precedent. Hon. gentlemen will remember how frequently that argument was used in the last two or three sessions.

Mr. RUSSELL. I did not use the argument that you would be using any precedent. I am of the opinion that we would not and that it would not be observed as a precedent.

Mr. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). Perhaps the hon. gentleman did not use that argument, but the argument was generally used that it would be unfair——

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. I do not agree with the hon. gentleman.

Mr. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). I have no desire to misrepresent any one, but it was generally contended that it would be unfair to single out any particular company for the application of this provision, and that the proper way was to bring this up in the House of Commons as a general Act. I have a good deal of sympathy with that view, and it was in order to get a declaration from the House on the general principle that I introduced the Bill I did this afternoon. There may be some provisions in that Bill which the House may not think desirable, and I would be prepared to accept any amendment that would render it more workable.

With regard to the establishment of a precedent, this would not have the effect, because a precedent has already been established. In 1844, in the parliament of Great Britain, Mr. Gladstone introduced an Act, which is now in the statutes, containing just such a provision as the one proposed, namely, that at any time parliament may expropriate any railway.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. I did not argue for one moment that we could not pass a general law, and the hon. gentleman is misrepresenting me.

Mr. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). I am not making the slightest reference to the hon. gentleman at all. My observations are purely of a general character. I am saying that in 1844 a precedent was established in the British parliament. Also in the first railway charter which ever passed the parliament of Canada the Act incorporating the proprietors of the Champlain and St. Lawrence Railway, there is a provision for government expropriation at any time, on paying to the proprietors the amount paid on their shares, plus 20 per cent. In the charter of the Grand Trunk Railway there is also a clause providing for expropriation, so that if the government desired to take over the Grand Trunk Railway, from Collingwood down, we have the power to do so under the charter of that company itself. Then, in the Act incorporating the Great Western Company, originally known as the London and Gore Railway Company, there is just such a clause providing for expropriation. And if hon. gentlemen choose to look through the statutes, they will find many railway charters giving this power of expropriation.

We are asked, why single out this company to begin with ? Well, there is no desire on the part of any one to single out this particular company. It is promoted by a gentleman who has always been deservedly popular in this House and generally respected, and it is particularly painful to me to have to offer any opposition at all, because of my desire to agree with and assist that hon. gentleman. But we have to begin somewhere, and is not the present just as good a time as any other ?

I agree with the Minister of Railways that if this parliament, or any municipality or province, contributes to a railway enterprise, and the people desire to take that road over for its own benefit, the subsidy paid should be deducted from the price awarded. Why should we hand over the subsidy itself ? In giving a company the privilege to build a railway, we confer a valuable franchise, and if in addition we give a bonus, why should the people not be returned that bonus when taking over the railway.

Mr. COWAN. The government have not given bonuses to this road, and have ample power to expropriate any time they think fit. The hon. gentleman wants to expropriate before any bonuses are granted.

Mr. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). The Minister of Railways explained that point fully in the committee. He showed that there was no power in the general Railway Act, or even in the Expropriation Act, to deduct the government bonus. Parliament, of course, can exercise the right of eminent domain and expropriate anything, but we want to serve notice on all companies from this time out.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I did not say that.

Mr RICHARDSON (Lisgar). Well, some one used that argument. I repeat that it would be desirable we should serve notice that from this time forth parliament may expropriate any railway it may deem in the interests of Canada to take over. Then the men who put money into these enterprises will know that such a provision exists. They may not stop to think that parliament is supreme, and may exercise its right of eminent domain, but when put in a general Bill, such as the one I propose, they cannot plead ignorance. Unless, however, we have the promise that the Bill I propose will pass this session, we ought to insist on the clause suggested being put into this particular measure.

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have not heard any reason advanced why this should be made an exceptional case. Of course, the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke) said that this was not an ordinary road, but I do not think that any member of this House will admit that there is anything in that statement. During the past few years we have granted a great many charters very much more extraordinary, and they met with no particular opposition. What I want to point out is that some years ago, in order that we might have unanimity with regard to Bills of this kind, a committee was appointed, and a model Bill was adopted, and this measure is strictly along the lines of that model Bill. We have given charters in the past with very much wider and more extraordinary powers. But, for the sake of having uniformity, the most experienceed men in these matters got together and framed a model Bill ; and that model Bill has been pretty closely stuck to, except in cases where some good reason was shown for variation. In this case, I am safe in saying, no reason at all has been given. My hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Clarke) says that this is an important railway, and that the Toronto Board of Trade has had the subject before it. I will admit that the members of the board of trade have been squabbling about this road for a great many years. But, we have not found these members of the board of trade, nor the citizens of Toronto, coming forward to put a dollar into this enterprise. If it is such an important and extraordinary enterprise, if it is going to do such a tremendous trade, it is strange that these men who are investing money and raising money in other countries for railway enterprises, have not found it of advantage to themselves or the country to make or promote investment in it. The fact is, we had a little local squabble in Toronto. But we have had before the committee, Bill after Bill of a hundred times as much importance as this, we have had such Bills go through every session, and not a word along the lines of the proposed amendment. I can only come to one conclusion—that there is thought to be a special effort now to move a seductive looking amendment. I am prepared to say that there may not be something in the principle or policy involved in the amendment; but, I think that no one who seriously desired the future prosperity of the country would be able to announce off-hand whether he favoured the principle of that amendment or not. As has been ably pointed out by the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Russell), it is a question whether this, instead of being a movement in the public interest, if seriously and closely examined, may not be found to involve a most mistaken policy. I believe that what we want in this country is the development of our resources; we want people with capital, whether Canadians or outsiders, to invest in railway enterprises under proper conditions. We have had a great deal of experience in these matters, and, as a result of that experience, we adopted a model Bill. Subject to the conditions that our experience has shown to be necessary, we should give every encouragement we can to railway enterprises. If the time ever comes, after we have granted a charter in the ordinary manner, when the parties who have the charter appeal for a subsidy, or bonus or assistance, then is the time for any hon. member to declare on what conditions it is thought wise to give that assistance. It has been pointed out that charters have been granted in the past containing conditions of expropriation. But, when the model Bill was framed, such a condition was left out, because it was well known that it was unnecessary, as parliament has the power to expropriate these enterprises at any time desired; and, by putting in such clauses, you only handicap parliament, and, perhaps, injure the public interest. I think it is about time that the members of this House should recognize that the people of the country want the development of this country's resources, and that they feel the need of railways for that purpose. Let us remove, in any proper way we can, any burden under which the people unjustly suffer, but, for the mere advancement of a seductive idea which, it may be, may work up to our practical disadvantage, let us not impose conditions which are different from those we have had, or which are to be found in other countries. I gather from the remarks of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax), that if he were asked by a capitalist for his advice as a lawyer as to investing in an enterprise of this kind, he would say that this charter seemed to contain some unusual legislation, which might, as some members say, be harmless, but, on the whole, it would be better for the capitalist to have nothing to do with the matter. That is in accordance with the experience of every one who has tried to raise money upon the debentures or stock of any company such as this, whether chartered by the provincial or Dominion parliament. So, I do not see that any reasonable argument has been advanced why this Bill should be treated differently from any other Bill considered in this House. I am not prepared to say that the principle involved in the amendment is not a good thing, but it is one that should be most carefully considered before we adopt it, and, if it is deemed a wise policy, it should be adopted as a general policy and one applying to all roads. As to the enterprise itself, I do not think it is necessary to say anything. There are differences of opinion. If the parties interested in the district affected, and in the enterprise, can raise the money to develop that trade, it would be a great advantage to the city of Toronto, and, perhaps, a great advantage to the western country in giving a competing route for grain. If it is possible that this enterprise could be carried out, I say, in the name of all common sense, let us give these people the best possible Bill, and thus place them in a favourable position for floating the enterprise.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I desire to say, for the sake of clearness, that if I thought a stipulation of this kind would handicap any railway, I would have a different opinion from that which I entertain. I do not see how it could, from any possible standpoint, handicap this railway or any other, because the valuation which is to be placed upon the road must be the full valuation of the road, including and taking into consideration its prospects in the future. Further than that, the valuation which would be placed upon the road for expropriation would be about 10 per cent more than its actual value if the ordinary rules of expropriation were carried out.

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND (Oxford). May I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) a question?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Yes.

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND (Oxford). I would like to ask whether his opinion as a lawyer, is that the amendment would apply to the railway only or to the whole scheme, including the steamboats ?

Mr. GOURLEY. In the committee, we agreed that it should apply to both.

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND (Oxford). I say, on the face of it, that it does not.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Speaking offhand, I should say all the property was included, because it uses the words 'undertaking and property.'

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND (Oxford). The hon. gentleman will see that that is one of the difficulties. I am sure that no two lawyers in the House would agree upon the subject.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am not responsible for the opinion of any one else ; I am giving my own opinion. My own opinion is that the words 'undertaking and property' mean exactly what they say. But, I would like to make myself clear with regard to this matter. I say that a provision of this kind is proper in the case of every railway declared to be for the general advantage of Canada. I limited my remarks to that. I think it is quite proper that this should be contained in a general Bill—I speak for myself in saying that. I say further, that the remarks of the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Sutherland, Oxford) who has just sat down, seem to me to be destructive of his own argument. He tells us that a model Bill was agreed upon. Was it not as unfair to the companies first subjected to that Bill to be so treated as it is for this company to be made subject to this provision now ? The idea I suggested in the remarks I made was, that we should act upon this principle henceforth ; in other words, that we should insert a provision of this kind in a model Bill, a Bill which shall apply to all undertakings of this kind which are declared to be for the general advantage of Canada. The hon. gentleman will bear in mind that in making that statement I am not referring to the latter part of the amendment, because I do not concur with the principle of the second part of the amendment. I think that the second part of this amendment is not proper, and I will vote against the amendment as a whole unless that part is eliminated or modified. I would suggest that some such modification as this be made, and I will then be prepared to vote for it :

> But such subsidy shall not be deducted except to the extent by which such valuation is in excess of the cost of such property, together with a reasonable allowance for interest upon such cost.

If we have a provision of that kind I think the interests of the company would be perfectly safeguarded. As it stands at present I do not agree with it. I can see that great injustice might be done to the gentlemen who put thier money into this enterprise, if the amendment were adopted in the form in which it stands.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). We have spent some two hours upon this Bill, and I think the time has come that we should arrive at some conclusion upon it. The policy which I have always endeavoured to follow in matters of this kind has been that when legislation comes back from the standing committees of this House, and especially from the Railway Committee, which is one of the most, if not the most, important, is invariably to support the report of the committee, unless it be shown that some error has been committed. When there is a divergence of opinion, as there is in the present instance, as to what is the best policy to be followed by the House, I have always thought it was best to support the committee and adopt their report. If we undertook to reopen a question that had been settled in the committee, we should have a great divergence of opinion, and it is doubtful whether this House or the committee are the best places for settling questions of this kind. We are accustomed to put a great deal of trust in the Railway Committee, and I think on this occasion we can safely adopt their report as the best judgment that can be placed upon the question. For this reason I am disposed to accept the report of the committee, especially in view of the fact that this very question has been debated at great length and threshed out by the committee. The argument which has impressed me most is that advanced by the hon. leader of the opposition. The hon. gentleman says : If you are to introduce this legislation why not do so by a model Bill ? I may answer that some years ago, after a good deal of deliberation, we adopted a model Bill, this model Bill has been given to the committee to follow, and if we are to depart from the standing clauses which are to be found in this model Bill, it should be done only after due consideration. It should not be done in this Bill alone, but the new clauses to be introduced in the model Bill should be adopted by the Railway Committee itself and then be taken up by this House and adopted as the legislation of this country. I take much the same view as the leader of the opposition. He is not satisfied with the amendment which has been proposed, he would accept it in part but not in whole, and has proposed an amendment to the amendment. His amendment, I would suggest, would be at considerable variance with the policy we have hitherto followed. I am not prepared to say that it would not be in the right direction, but he will agree with me that before we adopt this amendment it should receive considerable attention from the Railway Committee. If it be thought proper to introduce new legislation of this character, for my part I would rather favour it.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I was not proposing this as an amendment, but as simply voicing my own opinion.

The PRIME MINISTER. I understand that, but it simply supports my contention that if amendments of that character are to be introduced at all they should be considered as part of a standard Bill. Coming now to the amendment itself, it is in these words :

His Majesty shall have the right at any time to take over the undertaking and the property rights and franchises of the company——

And for that purpose the Expropriation Act shall apply. We do not require to put that in any Bill. This parliament has the right at any time to expropriate railway property, the Canadian Pacific Railway, for instance. I think my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) will agree with me that we have an undoubted right to do so, and we can do so to-morrow. I do not know but the time may come which my hon. friend from East York is sighing for, when we shall have all the railways of this country under our jurisdiction, when we shall have the ownership of them. I am not prepared to adopt his principle to-day, but some time we may come to his conclusion, we may do what has been done in other countries. But if that time ever came this parliament would have to consider the clauses of expropriation, what rule of expropriation should be followed. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition stated a moment ago that at the present time we have a certain rule of expropriation, that is to say, that we take the value of the property as it is at the time we make the expropriation. We may expropriate a house which may have cost the owner $100,000, and we may only give for it $40,000 or even $20,000, as the marketable value of it at the time of expropriation. Whether we should have such a rule of expropriation as that to apply to railways is another matter. We should have to consider the question in all its details. I think on the whole the balance of opinion and of argument is that that rule should not apply in exceptional legislation under this Bill. But if there is to be exceptional legislation it ought to be carefully considered in a model Bill and not in a particular Bill.

Mr. MACLEAN. I wish to point out that we should never have had the confession that we have just listened to from the premier if this amendment had not been introduced to this Bill. He is coming to the government ownership of railways. I totally disagree with the right hon. gentleman, however, in the doctrine that those things should be settled in the committees, and that parliament should not have a voice. We only delegate our rights to that committee, and we can review their action at any time ; if we see fit to supplement their action we have the right to do so. Another thing I wish to point out is that there are no general principles underlying our legislation in this House. Our legislation in the past has been as erratic as a grasshopper's jumps. It jumps in every direction, and there are no general principles to be found. But we must begin some time. There is only one way to play upon the hornpipe and that is to play upon it, and you must begin by playing upon it, and we propose to begin some time the policy of taking over these railways, and the sooner we begin the better. I hope the amendment as proposed here to-day will be adopted ; and I desire again to take this opportunity to compliment the right hon. gentleman on the slight confession he has made of his views in regard to government ownership of railways.

Mr. S. E. GOURLEY (Colchester). I think the Prime Minister underestimates the importance of this discussion. We have discussed questions this session, hour after hour, not nearly so important as this one. I have heard the subject of transportation discussed here time after time, and I take this opportunity of explaining that while I have seconded this amendment, I am strongly in favour of bonuses to railways. I want bonuses for railways, and I will vote for railways through Ontario or through British Columbia and canals, too, if I am treated equally generously when I ask for railway subsidies in the county I have the honour to represent. I will vote for a dozen railways and canals, if they will enable us to take our share of the trade of this continent. Unless the Canadian people show more energy in the future than we have done in the past, we will never reach the position that God and nature intended us to fill. The people of Canada have been very slow during the last fifty years. If we had equalled the energy of our friends on the other side of the line, instead of having to-day a population of 6,000,000, we might have divided the population of the continent with them. While they have been building 200,000 miles of railway, equal to the railways of the whole world, we, little Canadians, sitting here, have built only 17,000 miles. There is the whole difference between the United States and Canada. They have built 200,000 miles of railway, equivalent to the railways of the whole globe, with the Canadian railways thrown in. They have conquered in their railway enterprises the sources of success, a success which is in direct ratio to the miles of railway they have built. We, little Canadians, sitting here——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. GOURLEY—not fully comprehending our destiny, have missed great opportunities. I have heard gentlemen say in this House that we are at the end of our railway enterprises. If I believed that, I would lift my hat to Canada to-morrow and emigrate to some more progressive country. We are only at the beginning of our railway building, and I hope in a few years to see the Georgian Bay canal built as well. We cannot allow the commerce of our country to go to the United States. I think if we doubled our national debt to-morrow, borrowed money at 2½ per cent, expended it to build railways, not giving it to boodlers or contractors, but expended it honestly, it would be the greatest achievement Canada ever accomplished. Now, I just wanted to say this, in order to explain my position, in regard to my seconding this amendment, which otherwise might be misunderstood. Let me say one word more in reference to the principle which I think is involved in the amendment. The hon. member for Hants (Mr. Russell) said that the principle ought to be made general. I agree with him, and I may say this, that in the Railway Committee I became alarmed at the trend of affairs; because I thought a most vicious principle was about to be introduced into the legislation of this country. Coming from the maritime provinces, I am not concerned about the rivalries of Ontario. I was only interested in seeing that the legislation of this parliament should not reflect upon the honour of the people. What I thought was going to happen in the Railway Committee was this: I saw a large element in the Railway Committee propounding the idea of requiring the subsidies to be paid back if we expropriated the railway. It is admitted that Canada has the power to expropriate, but, if we expropriated any railway, under any charter granted by this parliament, no lawyer, or honest man, would contend that we should take a dollar of the subsidies back unless notice to that effect was given in the charter. We have given no notice to the brokers, the bankers and the capitalists, who have taken our charter and given us their money, of our intentions in this respect.

The hon. member for Hants and other hon. gentlemen said: Do not put any notice in this charter; we will fix it in the general Act. But, what would be the result? This Act would be passed and the men who procured it would go to the brokers and bankers of London and get their money. No man would propose that any provision of the general Act should apply to that charter unless he were a criminal, or dishonest, unless that provision was already in the general Act, or passed concurrently with this. The difficulty is this: If you are going to propose that the general Act shall apply to this company you are going to make the provision retroactive, and if you make it retroactive in reference to this company, you make it retroactive in reference to all companies, and the result would be that the reputation of Canada would suffer. I want to build 50,000 miles of railway in this country in the near future, and this is not the way to achieve such a result. While I agree with the hon. member for Hants, I agree with him only in so far as that the principle should be general. If it is to apply to this Bill, notice to the public should be given now. I do not agree with my hon. friend from South Norfolk (Hon. Mr. Tisdale) that this is a private Bill. I have heard frequent discussion here about the transportation question, and it is a vital question, which must be settled ultimately, if the political power of this continent is to remain in Ottawa and not remain at Washington. When I looked at the map and saw that the route proposed by this Bill was going to cut off 300 miles and save us going round the peninsula of Ontario; knowing what Canada's sentiments are in regard to the transportation of the products of the west, I concluded that this proposal was worth trying, because we want to try every solution for the settlement of this question. We have tried one system, but, if necessary, let us try another; and, if the St. Lawrence canal system fails, let us build the Georgian Bay canal to-morrow. Let us build railways, until we do succeed in controlling the trade of this northern half of the continent. I hope the hon. gentlemen from Ontario and Quebec, when they talk about the transportation problem of this continent, will not hereafter think that everything begins at Collingwood on the one hand and ends at Quebec on the other. I would ask them to recollect, that when God made the ports of this country, that he made the ports of Halifax and St. John as well as the ports of Ontario and Quebec, and you people must try to recognize that we are legislating for the whole of Canada. I will vote money as readily for British Columbia or Ontario enterprises as I will for the construction of railways in the county in which I live. If I would not do that, I would be unworthy to occupy a seat in this parliament. When I hear hon. gentlemen talk about ending the transportation system at Collingwood on the one hand, or Quebec on the other, it strikes me as something that is not worthy of the discussions in this parliament. I propose, with the co-operation of my hon. friends from the maritime provinces, to introduce a discussion here, during the session, that will show some hon. gentlemen that the real transportation system of this continent will end at Halifax, and it is useless to talk about these little fresh water ports of Ontario and Quebec. You fresh water sailors up here appear to know very little about the ultimate possibilities of the transportation system of this young commercial giant of the north. If any hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, can show me that this amendment will interfere with the bringing of capital into this country, then, I am out of it. If this amendment will prevent this company financing this road, then, again, I am out of it. I want this road to be built. I do not care if there are fifty lines parallel to it. Let us try the experiment.

Amendment to amendment (Mr. Hughes, North Victoria) negatived.

Amendment (Mr. Clarke) negatived.

Bill reported.

GUELPH JUNCTION RAILWAY COMPANY.

On the order :

House in committee on Bill (No. 23) respecting the Guelph Junction Railway Company.—Mr. Guthrie.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. Mr. A. G. Blair). There was an understanding the other evening that this Bill should be referred back to committee. I beg to move :

That the order be discharged and that Bill (No. 23) respecting the Guelph Junction Railway Company be referred back to the Select Standing Committee on Railways and Canals for further consideration.

Motion agreed to.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 60) to incorporate the United Empire Life Insurance Company.—Mr. Birkett.

Bill (No. 14) to incorporate the Century Life Insurance Company.—Mr. Monk.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 75) respecting the Canadian Northern Railway Company.—Mr. McCreary.

Bill (No. 79) respecting the Lindsay, Bobcaygeon and Pontypool Railway Company.—Mr. Vrooman.

Bill (No. 80) to incorporate the St. Mary River Bridge Company.—Mr. Dyment.

Bill (No. 82) respecting the Rathbun Company.—Mr. Britton.

Bill (No. 83) to incorporate the Kootenay Central Railway Company.—Mr. Galliher.

Bill (No. 84) respecting the Alberta Railway and Coal Company.—Mr. Oliver.

QUESTIONS.

ALBERTON HARBOUR, P.E.I.

Mr. HACKETT asked :

1. Who authorized the removal of stones placed at great expense in the breastwork at Sandy Island, Alberton Harbour ?
2. To whom were the stones sold?
3. What price, if any, was paid for them?
4. To whom was the money paid?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Hon. Sir Louis Davies) :

1. No such authorization was given, and no such stones were removed.

2. No stones out of the breastwork at Sandy Island, in Alberton Harbour, were sold.

That answers the third and fourth questions. I may say to my hon. friend, that I think he is confounding the breastwork at Sandy Island with the foundation of the lighthouse.

PRINTING OF THE FRENCH VERSION OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. ETHIER (by Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure) asked : (translation)

1. Is the government aware that, since the beginning of the present session, the translators of the Debates have each day translated into English all the French, and into French all the English by them received for that purpose from the Government Printing Bureau, notwithstanding that the amount of matter for translation is equivalent at times to as much as 128 columns of Hansard, in a single day ?

2. Is the government aware that since the opening of the present session, the translators of the Dabates have also corrected and returned to the Printing Bureau each day, all the proofs sent to them therefrom for that purpose, notwithstanding that such proofs amount at times to as much as 125 columns of Hansard, in a single day ?

3. Is the government aware that, up to this date (March 18), the Bureau has sent to the translators of the Debates, matter for translation up to the 12th only, and proofs for correction up to the 11th only ; and that of the French version it has paged and published the Debates up to the beginning of the sitting of March 4th only, notwithstanding that the amount of matter for translation in the hands of the printer is sufficient to bring the work up to the 14th at least, and the paging and publishing up to the 11th ?

4. Is the government aware that the delay in the printing and distributing of the French Hansard is due to the management of the Printing Bureau and not to the translators of the Debates, who labour day by day and even Sundays and holidays, if necessary, in order to translate forthwith as it is received, all matter furnished to them ?

5. Is the government aware that the delay and tardiness of the Government Printing Office in printing the French edition of the Hansard, is the means of depriving the representatives of the people, the press and the public in general of the advantages they should derive from the steady labour of the translators ?

6. Is it the intention of the government to put a stop to the delay caused by the Printing Bureau and to secure the paging and publishing, in due time, of the French edition of the House of Commons Debates ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). (Translation.) The government has no information in regard to the matter referred to by the hon. gentleman. I would advise my hon. friend to apply for information to the committee itself, as they have jurisdiction in the matter.

CONSTRUCTION OF LOCOMOTIVES.

Mr. CLARKE asked :

When the contract was made with the Locomotive Works Company, at Kingston, Ont., for the construction of twenty locomotives, was there a clause inserted in it stipulating that the union rate of wages should be paid to the men employed in the works?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair) :

No labour clause inserted in this contract. In contracts for the furnishing of materials, cement, timber, fuel, oils, rolling stock, plant, and the like, where the filling of the government order forms a part, merely, of the contractor's general business, and is performed upon the contractor's own premises, the department does not attempt to assume any control over the works, or over the portion of the contractor's working staff that may happen to be handling parts of the departmental contract.

All other contracts contain a labour clause.

TORONTO POST OFFICE—STATION B.

Mr. CLARKE asked :

1. When was the building leased which is now occupied and used as station 'B' of the Post Office Department in Toronto.

2. What is the name and address of the person from whom the building was leased, and the length of time for which lease runs?

3. What rent per annum is being paid for the building?

4. What rent was paid by the department for the use of the building occupied as a branch post office in the Rossin House block, Toronto?

Hon. JAMES SUTHERLAND :

1. August 14th, 1900.

2. A. L. Bender, Toronto : five years.

3. Seven hundred and fifty dollars per annum—which includes heating.

4. There was no rent paid directly to the late postmaster at the York street branch office, recently closed, but a salary of $900 per annum and commissions was allowed him, which would total nearly $1,000, for the use of a portion of his store and attendance. The department supplied all fittings.

HORSES FOR THE BRITISH ARMY.

Mr. LaRIVIERE asked :

1. Has the following communication been received by the hon. the Minister of Agriculture from C. W. Peterson, secretary of the Territorial Horse Breeders' Association :—

'I am directed by the executive committee of the Territorial Horse Breeders' Association to call your attention to the fact that, although over 100,000 head of horses and mules have been purchased in the United States, and a considerable number in eastern Canada, for use in the South African campaign, for which satisfactory prices were paid, no attempt has apparently been made by the War Office authorities to secure any portion of this enormous number of remounts in the Territories, in spite of the fact that both the western contingents which left Canada for service in South Africa were mounted entirely on western horses, and that it has not been satisfactorily established that any difficulty was experienced in obtaining a sufficient number of a satisfactory type, although the notices given the rancher in both instances were entirely inadequate, owing to the hurried preparations.

It is well known to western breeders, and the fact is deeply deplored, that the impression evidently prevails in eastern Canada, that there are not enough horses raised in the Territories as yet for any practical purposes. This impression, however, is entirely erroneous. It is true that during the years of low values, breeding operations were largely discontinued, but it is also a fact that the absolute want of a remunerative and stable market for horses of certain standard types, is not alone working a distinct hardship upon a vast number of small breeders, but it is also exerting a most baneful influence upon the development of the horse industry here, as it effectually discourages breeding operations. No person will for any length of time expend money and labour upon high class breeding stock without a reasonable assurance of ultimate satisfactory financial returns from his efforts.

Vast portions of the North-west Territories present such topographical, meteorological and soil conditions that general farming or cattle-raising can never be successfully prosecuted therein. Such being the case, it necessarily follows that these enormous areas must eventually be devoted, if utilized at all, to the raising of horses, or, in the more favourable localities, to sheep-raising. It is, therefore, clear that the business of horse-raising must perforce ultimately develop into one of the most important branches of agriculture in the west. But even if these circumstances were not in themselves sufficient to bring horse-breeding operations prominently to the front in the Territories, the local conditions are such that no horse-producing country in the world could successfully compete against our cheap pastures rich in lime, and favourable climate, enabling horses to range out winter and summer, at little or no expense to the owner.

The present position of affairs is simply unbearable, and I am directed by my committee to urge you, as emphatically as lies in my power, to come to the rescue of our breeders in some way. The market for heavy draught horses is all that could be desired at present, but the conditions here are not nearly so favourable to the production of this class of horses as to the raising of light horses, and it is particularly in connection with the latter that government assistance is needed.

After devoting considerable thought to the matter, I am directed by my committee to suggest, as a feasible means of putting this industry on a proper footing, that your department should deal with it somewhat on the same basis as has been adopted in respect to the dairy industry in the Territories. An amount of money might be appropriated at the forthcoming session of parliament, sufficient to enable you to purchase, as an experiment, a limited number of horses in the west, conforming to the cavalry, artillery and mounted infantry standards, at a fair minimum price. At least two months' notice should be given to breeders here of the dates and places where your agent would purchase, and also full information respecting the types of horses required, and to what extent they would be handled. The association would undertake to look after the local organization, advertising, &c., and would otherwise render your department every assistance possible. Ample notice is absolutely essential, as horses are usually ranging out, and it takes considerable time to get them in and properly handled. This will not, under ordinary circumstances, be done until there is a sale in sight. Three months' notice would be better than two. In the meantime, negotiations could be opened up with the remount department of the British War Office, with a view to having a purchasing officer sent out, as soon as your department had gathered a sufficient number of horses, to inspect them and select all those coming up to the army standards.

There would doubtless be a certain number of culls no matter how carefully the horses had been purchased; but those would, in centres like Toronto, Montreal or Ottawa, in most cases, be worth nearly as much as your department paid for them, and if the prices offered territorial breeders for their animals were fixed at their approximate value for army purposes, less the cost of transportation and other expenses (which would still leave a very satisfactory figure), it is unlikely that any considerable loss would be sustained by your department in the whole transaction. Any trifling debit balance would, of course, be amply justified by the impetus which would be given horse-breeding operations in the Territories.

Even granting that the necessary financial arrangements could be made to enable this association to successfully handle such a scheme itself, it could not hope to do so as economically and efficiently as could be done by the federal government. You have in the person of the live stock commissioner an official well fitted to do the organization work required. At every considerable point in the Territories there is a mounted police divisional headquarters where assistance could be obtained in purchasing, holding and shipping these animals, and where an experienced veterinarian in the employ of the department would be available. In fact, the cost of handling the scheme in the hands of your department could be reduced to a mere minimum.

It is anticipated that if an arrangement such as outlined could be continued for five or six years under a government guarantee, the production of military remounts in the Territories would easily double, and if proper representations were made to the Imperial government, based upon actual knowledge of the number of suitable horses available annually and the record for endurance and constitution which western horses would, by that time, undoubtedly have made for themselves in the service, it should prove a feasible proposition to induce the War Office authorities to establish regular remount depots at various points throughout the west, such as are now maintained in the Argentine Republic by the British government in connection with the Indian army.

In conclusion, I am to express, in behalf of my committee, that its representations may meet with favourable consideration at your hands.'

2. Also a copy of the following resolution in support of the above, from George Harcourt, secretary of the Horse Breeders' Association of Manitoba and the North-west Territories :—

'That this association strongly endorses the proposal made to the Department of Agriculture by the Territorial Horse Breeders' Association, by which the department is asked to secure an appropriation for the purpose of purchasing annually in the west a number of horses coming up to the type of the standard required by the various branches of the army, to be resold to the British government.'

3. What action, if any, has been taken on these communications?

4. If no action has been taken, does the government intend adopting any line of action to the furtherance of the views of those associations?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Hon. Sydney Fisher). Yes, the communications mentioned have been received. These communications are under consideration, and the government are discussing and considering what can be done to induce the Imperial government to purchase horses in Canada for army purposes.

I.C.R—GRAIN EXPORTS.

Mr. WILSON asked :

Referring to the return brought down re St. John and Halifax elevators :—How much of the grain passing through said elevators, for export, was brought from points west of Montreal over the Intercolonial Railway? What were the quantities for each elevator, separately?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair). All the grain passing through the St. John and Halifax elevators, for export, came from points west of Montreal. The number of bushels of grain passing through the St. John elevator, for export, was 507,576. The number of bushels of grain passing through the Halifax elevator, for export, was 763,425.

THE DOUKHOBORS.

Mr. WILSON asked :

1. What were the dates on which the several detachments of Doukhobors arrived in this country?

2. What amount was paid them by way of bonus?

3. What amount has been loaned them ?

4. What was the expense in conducting them to their several locations?

5. How much was paid for their medical and other attendance?

6. What has been the total amount expended in connection with the immigration of the Doukhobors up to date?

Hon. JAMES SUTHERLAND. In the absence of the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Clifford Sifton), I beg to say :

1. First party, 20th January, 1899 ; second party, 27th January, 1899 ; third party, 9th May, 1899 ; fourth party, 5th June, 1899 ; fifth party, 21st July, 1899.

2. The sum of $35,817.78 was paid them by way of bonus—$32,008.18 of which was handed over to the Doukhobors' Committee in Winnipeg, to be expended on their behalf—the balance, $3,809.60 was expended by the government for provisions and charged to the bonus account. The allowance for bonus was at the rate of £1 per head. No bonuses were paid on these immigrants to the steamship companies.

3. Nothing has been loaned to the Doukhobors. Payments amounting to about $20,000 were made by the government for supplies, teaming and equipment, which will be refunded, and to secure payment of which liens will be taken on their lands.

4. The expense incurred in locating the Doukhobors was similar to the expenditure for this service connected with other immigrants. No distinct account is kept of the expense of locating different nationalities. It would be impossible to do so. A guide might have in his charge several immigrants all from different countries, and the cost has not been separated so as to show the proportionate sum chargeable to each nationality.

5. The accounts rendered for medical attendance do not give particulars, except in very few cases, as to the nationality of the immigrants treated ; it is therefore impossible to state how much has been paid for medical attendance on the Doukhobors as distinct from other immigrants.

6. Bonuses, $35,817.78 ; supplies, &c., $20,000 ; total, $55,817.78. In addition to this amount, there were ordinary disbursements incident to the transportation, locating and care of Doukhobors, which sums are included in the ordinary general immigration expenses, and are similar to the expenses incurred in connection with all immigrants, and no separate account is kept to show the proportionate cost of English, Irish, Scotch, Galician, Doukhobors or other immigrants.

MR. WM. STUBBS.

Mr. BENNETT—by Mr. Taylor—asked :

Has William Stubbs, of Caledon, Ont., formerly representing the riding of Cardwell in this House, been appointed to any position under this government? If so, what are his duties and the salary attached to the office?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Hon. Sydney Fisher) :

Mr. William Stubbs, of Caledon, Ont., has been appointed an official veterinarian of the Department of Agriculture for the purpose of testing cattle for export to the United States, and any other veterinary work required, at a salary of $1,200 per annum.

MR. W. E. O'BRIEN.

Mr. BENNETT—by Mr. Taylor—asked :

Has W. E. O'Brien, of Shanty Bay, Ont., been appointed to any position under the government? If so, what position, and what salary attaches thereto?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Hon. Sydney Fisher) :

Mr. W. E. O'Brien, of Shanty Bay, Ont., has been appointed a commissioner to represent the Dominion of Canada at the Glasgow exhibition, at a salary at the rate of $2,500 per annum, with $5 a day for living expenses, together with transportation expenses.

I. C. R.—DIVISION EXTENSION.

Mr. DECHENE asked :

Whether it is the intention of the Minister of Railways to extend the first division of the Intercolonial Railway from Montreal to Campbellton? If not, why not?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair) :

No decision has yet been arrived at to extend the first division of the Intercolonial Railway from Montreal to Campbellton.

MR. DUNCAN C. ANDERSON.

Mr. BENNETT—by Mr. Taylor—asked :

Has Duncan C. Anderson, of the township of Oro, in the riding of East Simcoe, been appointed to a position in the Department of Agriculture as a lecturer in British Columbia? If so, what is his position and what salary attaches to the position? What is term of service?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Hon. Sydney Fisher) :

Mr. D. C. Anderson has been engaged by the Department of Agriculture to give a series of lectures at Farmers' Institute meetings arranged for in British Columbia by the Department of Agriculture of that province.

His remuneration is at the rate of $3 per day.

His term of service is from March 4 to the end of the series of meetings on May 3.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Is Mr. Anderson in the employ of the local government of British Columbia ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No.

RICE IMPORTS.

Mr. CLANCY asked :

What quantity of uncleaned or unhulled rice was imported from Great Britain for consumption for the year ending 30th June, 1900, and the value thereof? Was 25 per cent of the value of such rice of British production? If so, in what way?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Hon. Wm. Paterson) :

The quantity of rice, uncleaned, unhulled or paddy, imported from Great Britain and entered for consumption in Canada during the fiscal year 1900 amounted to 10,647,075 pounds, valued at $132,221, of which amounts 10,609,779 pounds, valued at $131,450, were entered at preferential tariff rates.

Unhulled or uncleaned rice is treated as a natural product, unmanufactured. The certificate as to the proportion of labour entering into the production of manufactured articles is therefore not applicable to unhulled or uncleaned rice ; and such rice being the growth or produce of a British country entitled to the preference (as British India, Straits Settlements, &c.,) would be allowed entry under the preferential tariff when imported into Canada direct from Great Britain.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Hon. Mr. Fielding :

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to His Majesty; and the proposed motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

Mr. WALTER SCOTT (West Assiniboia). Mr. Speaker, when a vote is challenged on the motion to go into Committee of Ways and means, the question that faces a member of this House is not alone whether the policy of the government of the day is satisfactory, but also whether the member prefers the policy of the government or the policy propounded by hon. gentlemen on the opposition benches. And, on this occasion, the duty devolving upon a member of the House is made simpler by the fact that the leader of the opposition has condensed the policy of himself and his following in the shape of the amendment which is now before the House. As a further means of ascertaining exactly and entirely what is the policy of the opposition, we also have before us the speeches of members of the opposition, and, Sir, I think that any one who has followed the reports of the debate up to this stage must have been astonished at the impossible positions which our friends on the opposition benches endeavour to maintain—or would be astonished but for the fact that our friends have been endeavouring to maintain these positions for the last four or five years, and our astonishment now merges into a feeling of amusement. At once they tell us that the policy of the government involves too high protection, involves excessive duties, at least they complain that too much money is taken from the pockets of the people by the tariff that is in force, and at the same time they complain that the tariff is not high enough, and they think it necessary to place that view in the form that is now before us. In one breath they complain that the government of the day has been and is guilty of dreadful extravagance, but I notice that they entirely fail now, as they have failed in the last five years to take any practical exception to any material portion of the expenditures proposed by the government. As I say, in one breath they tell us that the Liberal party as represented by the government in this House is keeping in force the obsolete protective system which was inaugurated in 1878 and maintained until 1896. They tell us that the protective system is still in force, but at the same time they deem it necessary to frame and present an amendment, which, I think at all events, nails them to the position that the present tariff is not high enough. They bring in an amendment which, I suppose, they will support, and they will then feel free to to go out into the country and appeal to the manufacturers on the ground that the tariff in force is not sufficiently protective, and they will make the promise to the manufacturers that if the country will give them the opportunity they will put in force a tariff that will be properly protective. In one breath they tell us that the policy of the present administration is not a proper, a judicious policy; and, in the same breath, they tell us that the administration is simply applying the old policy which the Conservative party maintained in this country for something like eighteen years. In other words, they complain that the Liberal party has stolen the Conservatives clothes. They seem to wish to complain that the members of the Liberal party have become converted to Conservative doctrine. Admitting, for the moment, that that is true, is there any good reason for any patriotic Conservative to complain on that score? If a Conservative really believes that the principle of protection is a proper principle and that it should be applied in this country, is there any real reason why he should complain because a member of the Liberal party, or an Independent or any other citizen becomes a convert to what he himself, at all events, believes to be the true political gospel? Liberals, I think, have never urged such a complaint as this. In years past in this country there were contests over questions of principle. Something like sixty or seventy years ago there was a contest in this country on the question of responsible government. The Whigs contended for the principle of responsible government, and the Tories contended against that principle. Time went on and by-and-by the Tories became converted to the principle of responsible government. And, so far as I have been able to learn there never was a Liberal who complained of any Tory who became a convert.

The last hon. gentleman who occupied the floor in this debate, speaking last Friday evening, it seemed to me tried to include in his speech nearly all the impossible positions which the opposition attempts to maintain on the fiscal question. There have been hon. gentlemen on the other side who have taken one line of argument, and gentlemen who have taken a different line. But the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) himself managed to take both lines of argument. He proved, I suppose to his own satisfaction at all events, that the claim that is made by the government that there was a surplus in the last fiscal year of some $8,000,000 was an entirely mistaken claim. He proved to his own satisfaction that, instead of there being a surplus, there was a deficit, that the people of the country at the end of the last fiscal year were in a worse position than at the commencement of the year. And this, notwithstanding the fact, that, as I understand it, the public debt was reduced by $779,000 in the fiscal year. A short time after, he proved—also, I suppose to his own satisfaction—that the government took out of the pockets of the people $8,000,000 in excess of what was required to meet the expenses of the country. He also presented a considerable array of figures to prove that the system of protection was still in force and to prove that considerable duties were still in force in regard to agricultural products. He was, at that time, endeavouring to give an answer to a question, that had been asked from this side of the House. Some hon. gentleman on this side had invited any member of the opposition or any one else who believed in the principle of protection to show how the agriculturist and how the labour of this country might be protected. The hon. member for South Simcoe took up the tariff and showed that on a number of agricultural products, a considerable tariff was still in force. But that did not prove to me that these articles are protected or that the farmers reap any benefit from the protection of the tariff which is in force on those articles. For instance, there is a duty of 12 cents a bushel on wheat—I think that is the rate. But I feel certain that there is not one farmer in a hundred in this country who gets any advantage through that duty upon wheat. The mere fact that there is a duty upon wheat does not at all prove that the farmer who grows wheat receives any advantage from the tariff. But the hon. member had satisfied himself that the agricultural produce of the country was protected, and in the next breath he told us that after the Liberal government came into power they almost entirely wiped out the duties that had been previously levied upon the imported products of the United States, and had then gone down to Washington and asked for some reciprocity arrangements.

But there were some hon. gentlemen opposite who made a fair argument, and observed some logic in their reasoning. It appeared to me that one of the most logical speeches that I heard coming from the opposition benches was that of the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Kemp), who declared himself a protectionist and against the present tariff, because it does not afford sufficient protection. He told the House, what is a fact, that of the $189,000,000 worth of imports brought into this country last year, $76,000,000 of that total represented free goods. As to that fact, the hon. member for East Toronto and myself are in entire agreement, but our conclusions from the same fact differ pretty widely. That hon. gentleman declared that the tariff was bad so far as it involved this free trade principle; while I believe the tariff is good so far as it contains that principle. He stated that the people of Canada, by a very large majority, were opposed to the introduction of free trade principles into our tariff, and on that point also I cannot agree with him. I think, and certainly hon. gentlemen of the opposition are of this opinion, because they constantly charge the government with failure to obey the mandate,—that in the year 1896 the people of Canada gave a mandate against the principle of protection in our tariff; it is my opinion, but possibly there is room for a little disagreement, that in the year 1900 the people of Canada again gave a mandate against the application of the principle of protection in our tariff. At all events, the opposition, in complaining against the height of our tariff and then complaining that it is too low, must be considered as holding an untenable position.

One complaint I have to make against the amendment submitted by the leader of the opposition is, that it is not definite enough. It is framed in terms vague enough, I fear, to permit gentlemen representing that party to go through the country later on and make divers appeals to the people, similar to those divers appeals that they made last fall, when the people of Canada were asked to decide as between the Liberal and Conservative parties. We know that members of the opposition, and even leaders of the party, went through different parts of the country making entirely different pleas and entirely different promises. In one province, for instance, they promised to have a duty put on lumber, while, on the other hand, in other parts of the country, they were complaining against the small duty at present existing upon some classes of lumber. In the province of Manitoba, so prominent a leader as Hugh John Macdonald, for instance, promised that if the Conservative party was returned to power the farmers would be given the advantage of free agricultural implements; while, in other provinces, other Conservative leaders, among them Sir Charles Tupper and the Hon. Mr. Foster, made definite promises that if the Conservative party was returned to power the duty on agricultural implements would be increased. I give these instances as an illustration of the various tactics that were resorted to, and the various promises that were made by the different Conservative leaders last fall in various parts of the country. In the part of the country from which I come, the government was assailed because its leader was a Frenchman and a Roman Catholic. I state this without fear of successful contradiction, although I notice that since this session opened and since this debate began, certain prominent gentlemen on the other side have questioned whether it were true that racial and religious cries were resorted to by members of the opposition. I say that in the part of the country from which I come the electors were appealed to on the ground that the leader of the Liberal party, and some of his lieutenants, were Frenchmen and Roman Catholics. I believe it is a fact also, that in the province of Quebec, the Liberal party were attacked because one of the leaders was 'too British for me.'

Now, I say that I take issue with this amendment partly because it is not definite enough, and I take issue with it because it means, if it means anything, that the principle of protection in the present tariff ought to be increased. I take issue with the amendment because it means, if it means anything, that duties should be increased on agricultural implements, and that duties should be reimposed on such articles as binder twine, barbed wire and cream separators, many of which are used by the farmers in our part of the country. I take issue with it because it means, if it means anything, that the duties at present in force should be increased in respect to the whole line of articles which may be imported into this country. As I said at the commencement, the question that faces me is not entirely whether I deem the policy at present in force as satisfactory, for if I were obliged to give a candid opinion, I would have to say that I am not entirely satisfied with the tariff of the government as it stands, and any dissatisfaction I may have with regard to it is on account of the height of the duties imposed under that tariff. I notice that the Finance Minister, in his statement, partly foreshadowed a lessening of the revenues reaped under the tariff at present in force.

I have a specific to recommend if there is danger of a lessening of the revenue and the specific that I would recommend is to make a further cut in the tariff. I believe that in regard to some articles the tariff at present is to a certain extent protective, and I believe, too, that a protective tariff cannot be called a revenue tariff. If the tariff protects a certain line of manufactures it is a tariff which is not calculated to bring in a revenue. So, I would say that if there is to be feared a lessening of revenue under the present tariff, the proper way to obviate the danger is to make further cuts in that tariff. I will give an illustration from the tariff history of the country. Up to 1894 a protective tariff, a tariff of 35 per cent was levied against agricultural implements coming into this country, and in 1894 a reduction was made to 20 per cent on mowers and binders, a reduction equal to 43 per cent. Since that time the revenue has not lessened notwithstanding that the duty was cut almost in two. The revenue has not lessened, but, on the contrary, it has increased to an extent equal to nearly 500 per cent. In 1894, before the reduction and while there was a duty of 35 per cent, the revenue reaped from binders was $24,478.50. Last year, under a 20 per cent tariff, the revenue that was reaped was $160.860.40. Upon mowers, in 1894, when a 35 per cent duty was levied, the revenue reaped was $9.935.65. In 1900 under a 20 per cent tariff, the revenue was $71,111.40. The revenue reaped from the whole line of agricultural implements in 1894 was $77.921.86. Since 1894 the duties not only upon binders and mowers have been cut, but on other agricultural implements they have been cut from, I think, 35 to 25 per cent, and in 1900, under these lower duties, there was a revenue reaped, not of $77,921.86, but of no less than $357,-200.22. Carrying this argument a little further we find that there has been a general cut in the taxation on all articles brought in since 1897 of from 10 to 12½ per cent and that this cut was followed, not by a reduction of revenue, but, by an increase of customs duties of about 40 per cent or an increase from $20,000,000 to $28.-000,000. So the argument that is advanced by the opposition is fallacious; the mere fact that there has been an increase in the revenue, in the amount of money that the people have paid in customs duties, is not proof positive that any greater taxation has been levied, because, in regard to binders and mowers, while the amount of revenue which reached the coffers of the country was vastly larger this last year than in 1894, the fact must be plain that no additional taxation was imposed upon the people, or upon the farmers who purchased these agricultural implements, but, that on the contrary, there has been a marked lessening of taxation. While the rate of taxation was 35 per cent and while it did not yield money to the general revenues of the country, it was still levied upon the people; it did not come into the treasury of Canada, but it went into the pockets of the manufacturers. I take issue with the amendment when it strikes at the preferential arrangement that is now in force between this country and the mother country. I may say that personally I do not feel so much interest in whether the preferential arrangement is of advantage to the people of Great Britain as in whether it is of advantage to the people of Canada. It is because I believe that the preferential arrangement has been of great advantage to the people of Canada in lessening the taxation imposed upon our people that I stand by the preferential arrangement as it is at present upon the statute-book.

Before I sit down I wish to refer briefly to another question that is not allied with the trade or tariff issue, but which is a financial question, and which, I think, may be properly mentioned and discussed in this debate. It is not now, and I trust may not become, a matter at issue between the political parties. I allude to that coming change in relations between the North-west Territories of Canada and this parliament, and as I say that is a question largely financial, and so I think it is not out of place in this discussion. I shall preface the remarks that I have to make by the statement that I take it as a tribute to the far-sightedness and the statesmanship of the gentlemen who, in 1865, met in the city of Quebec and framed the arrangement which resulted in the confederation of the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, that, in the portion of the country which they then contemplated should become a part of Canada—I allude to the North-west Territories which at that time were known as Rupert's Land—there has never since the North-west became a part of Canada, and not up to this time, been a thought, or a suggestion, in the mind of any person in that country, so far as their future was concerned other than of becoming a province of the Dominion of Canada and a permanent part of confederation. Notwithstanding the fact that, in some respects some people there may believe that it would be to their immediate material advantage to be associated in a different way with the country immediately to the south so that they might trade with the cities of St. Paul, Minneapolis, and Chicago, which are much nearer than the cities of Toronto and Montreal, where they chiefly trade, notwithstanding that materially and immediately it might be, in a way, to their advantage to look to a different destiny, there is not at the present time, never has been, and I do not think ever will be any thought in the mind of any resident, or any citizen of the North-west, but to remain as a part of confederation and a part of the Dominion of Canada. The people in that country have for some years been looking forward to the time when a change should be made and when the part of the country in which they live should become in all respects equal to the other provinces of the Dominion.

Occasionally, in this House—even since this session has opened—there have been remarks dropped which might lead a western member to believe that the opinion is held down here that the western people are very impatient; that they are looking for their wrongs to be righted immediately; that they want things to move a little too fast; but, Sir, in regard to this question the people of the North-west cannot be accused of any undue haste. They have been heretofore working under such a constitution as the Federal parliament thought well to grant. They have now come to a stage when they feel that some additional powers are required and when some different arrangement ought be made so as to enable them to better carry on the work of local government. The difficulty they labour under is not so much constitutional as it is financial. So far as their constitutional powers are concerned the people feel that they might possibly get along for some time yet without any marked change. But they have come to a point in their history when they feel hampered as regards their finances. The members of the House all know the difference which exists between the financial relations of the provinces to the Dominion and the financial relations of the North-west Territories to the Dominion. Each of the provinces has a fixed financial status and the provincial subsidies are not voted by this parliament year after year, but are paid under statute, whereas with regard to the North-west Territories the grant which corresponds in a sense to the provincial subsidies, has to be voted each session by this House. To better explain some of the difficulties which arise under the present system, I will quote the words of the chief spokesman of the North-west Territories, the Hon. Mr. Haultain, from a speech he made in the legislature last session. He said:

> We might well go on developing under the territorial system for a long time to come if our revenue would only keep pace with our requirements. But the present financial condition is an impossible one—I mean the condition of being dependent upon the annual vote of parliament for the larger part of our income. We have already exhausted every means of obtaining any very large increase to that parliamentary vote. Even were any government so well disposed towards the Territories—and I think all governments are in a way—the conditions surrounding a parliamentary vote, the conditions which exist at Ottawa, prevent any adequate amount being given to us under our present institutions. I make that statement believing such to be the case. So long as the Territories remain in a dependent condition and receive their financial assistance as a matter of grace rather than of right; so long as the Territories remain in the position of having a large amount of money voted as a grant in addition to a number of other things which the provinces do for themselves, provided for them every year in the Dominion Supply, just for so long will it be impossible for the Territories to secure that suitable financial recognition without which even the present institutions cannot be successfully carried on. We have pretty well passed through the preliminary stages, and we have pretty well come to an end of our usefulness so far as our present condition will permit us. We have to a certain extent fairly well exhausted, in the broader sense of the word, the powers given to us under the legislative jurisdiction which we now possess. I believe the time has come for beginning the superstructure for which we have been laying the foundations. I believe we have laid these foundations well; and that so far as the institutions we have created; so far as the main body of our laws—which deal not only with the primary but even with many of the secondary wants and interests of this country—are concerned, I believe we have a good body of laws, and that very largely we have exhausted the more obvious uses and powers of the constitution which we have and of the powers which we possess under it. I do not say that further progress is impossible, but I do say that any very large amount of progress, or any very large amount of development, is not possible under the existing institutions.

I will not take up time arguing that the North-west Territories have pretty nearly arrived at a period in their history when a change must be made in their existing relations to the Federal parliament. The people up there, at least if they are properly represented in the legislature and if their chief spokesman the Prime Minister of the Territories, is to be relied upon; the people there have come to the conclusion that very shortly some change will have to be looked for. Before the local elections in 1898, the Hon. Mr. Haultain spoke at various points throughout the Territories on this subject, and I shall quote from the language he used at one place to show that even three years ago this change was looked forward to and that the present legislature of the Territories was in reality given a mandate to open up negotiations with respect to the subject. Speaking at Yorkton, the Hon. Mr. Haultain said:

> If the financial question is capable of other solution, I will be satisfied to remain as at present. The only thing there seems to be to do is to think at least of negotiating for provincial establishment. I feel convinced that it will be the principal work of the new legislature before the end of its four years' term to enter into such negotiations. With the greater development that now seems assured, the needs in respect of schools and improvement will certainly develop. Outside of direct taxation, there seems no possibility of a solution except by provincial establishment—not perhaps to-day or next year, but in the reasonably near future.

Last session in the legislature the following address was voted upon by all the local representatives of the people and unanimously adopted :

1. Whereas by the British North America Act, 1867, it was (amongst other things) enacted that it should be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's most honourable Privy Council, on address from the Houses of the parliament of Canada, to admit Rupert's Land and the North-west Territory, or either of them, into the union on such terms and conditions in each case as should be in the addresses expressed and as the Queen should think fit to approve, subject to the provisions of the said Act ;

2. And whereas, by an address from the Houses of the parliament of Canada Her Majesty was prayed to unite Rupert's Land and the North-west Territory with the Dominion of Canada ;

3. And whereas, in order to further the petition of the parliament of Canada, Her Majesty, under the authority of the Rupert's Land Act, 1868, accepted a surrender from the governor and company of adventurers of England trading into Hudson's bay, of all the lands, territories, rights, privileges, liberties, franchises, powers and authorities whatsoever granted or purported to be granted by certain letters patent therein recited to the said company in Rupert's Land ;

4. And whereas, in the said address it was represented to Her Majesty, as a reason for the extension of the Dominion of Canada westward, that the welfare of the population of these territories would be materially enhanced by the formation therein of political institutions, bearing analogy, as far as circumstances will admit, to those which existed in the several provinces then forming the Dominion ;

5. And whereas, the Houses of the parliament of Canada by their said address expressed to Her Majesty their willingness to assume the duties and obligations of government and legislation as regards these territories ;

6. And whereas, in pursuance and exercise of the powers invested in the Queen by the aforesaid Acts, Her Majesty, by and with the advice of her most honourable Privy Council, ordered and declared that from and after the 15th day of July, 1870, Rupert's Land and the North-western Territory should be admitted into and become part of the Dominion of Canada, and granted power and authority to the parliament of Canada to legislate for the future welfare and good government of these territories ;

7. And whereas, by the British North America Act, 1871, the parliament of Canada was further given power from time to time to make provision for the administration, peace, order and good government of any territory not for the time being included in any province;

8. And whereas, under the several authorities so given, the parliament of Canada has created political institutions in these territories bearing a close analogy to those which exist in the several provinces of the Dominion ;

9. And whereas, by the confederation compact the provinces which formed the Dominion, on the 15th day of July, 1870, were furnished with the means of carrying on local self-government upon certain well-defined bases ;

10. And whereas, the territories, being an integral part of the Dominion, and having had imposed upon them the duties and obligations incidental to the political institutions which have been given to them, and which said duties and obligations the parliament of Canada has declared its willingness to assume, are entitled to such Federal assistance for their maintenance as will bear due proportion and analogy to that given to other portions of the Dominion for similar purposes;

11. And whereas, repeated representations have been made in various ways to the government of Canada with the view of obtaining just and equitable financial assistance towards providing for the proper and efficient administration of local affairs in the Territories and for the public necessities of their rapidly increasing population ;

12. And whereas, such representations have been met by intermittent and insufficient additions to the annual grant, the provision so made by the parliament of Canada never bearing any adequate proportion to the financial obligations imposed by the enlargement and development of the political institutions created by itself;

13. And whereas, it is desirable that a basis should be established upon which the claims of the Territories to suitable financial recognition may be settled and agreed upon :

14. Therefore be it resolved, that an humble address to His Excellency the Governor General be adopted by this House praying him that he will be pleased to cause the fullest enquiry to be made into the position of the Territories, financial and otherwise, and to cause such action to be taken as will provide for their present and immediate welfare and good government, as well as the due fulfilment of the duties and obligations of government and legislation assumed, with respect to these Territories, by the parliament of Canada ;

15. And be it further resolved that, whereas, by the British North America Act, 1871, it was (amongst other things) enacted that the parliament of Canada may from time to time establish new provinces in any territories forming for the time being part of the Dominion of Canada, but not included in any province thereof, and may, at the time of such establishment, make provision for the constitution and administration of . . . . such province, His Excellency be also prayed to order inquiries to be made and accounts taken with a view to the settlement of the terms and conditions upon which the territories or any part thereof shall be established as a province, and that before any such province is established, opportunity should be given to the people of the territories, through their accredited representatives, of considering and discussing such terms and conditions.

That, Sir, is the succinct record of the history and the present claims of the legislature of the North-west Territories. And that the government here have been fairly seized of the fact that a change in the near future will be necessary. I infer from a statement that has been made in this House by one of the ministers of the Crown since the commencement of the present session, in answer to a question that was put by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean). The hon. member for East

York asked if any new provinces were likely to be formed in the North-west Territories after the census was taken, and this answer was given by the Minister of the Interior :

A deputation, consisting of two members of the North-west government, Mr. Haultain and Mr. Ross, were in Ottawa some time ago on other business, and took the opportunity of discussing this question. I may say that while during the last three or four years they have not addressed any official communication to the government, yet from time to time they have discussed with myself and my colleagues the question of giving the Territories provincial status, and lately they handed us a memorandum on that subject. We have not officially replied to that memorandum as yet, but expect to do so shortly. This is a matter, of course, requiring serious consideration. I may say, in a general way, that I am of the opinion that it will have to be dealt with in the very near future. The people of the Territories are as capable of self-government as any other people in Canada, and have shown their fitness by the admirable manner in which they have carried on their present administration. Of course, the financial question is a serious one. The subsidy required for the Territories in the course of a few years would have to be greatly increased, and there is the question of the control of public lands and matters of that kind which would have to be settled.

These various statements will obviate any necessity of my going into the question as to whether the time has come for this change. The representatives of the Territories think the time is approaching, and we may conclude from this statement of the Minister of the Interior that the government here are seized of the fact that the time is rapidly approaching when a change must be made in the relations of the North-west legislature to this parliament ; and as the census is to be taken this year, the data thus obtained will make it possible to intelligently negotiate, and will bring a favourable time for commencing negotiations.

I may refer briefly to the causes which make this change necessary. A country so large as the North-west Territories, with a sparse population, is always an expensive country to govern locally. During the last few years very material additions have been made to the population. Immigrants have been coming into the country in large numbers, making necessary further expenditures on education and public works. I believe that in one year as many as one hundred new school districts have been formed in the North-west Territories, and have had to be provided for by the local government. No argument is necessary to show that with such a condition of affairs the financial requirements of the local government are increasing very rapidly. As to the way in which the local authorities expend their money, statistics show that a very large proportion of their revenues is devoted to education and public works. The total amount at the disposal of the local legislature last year was $470,000. Of this, no less than $182,000 was voted for education and $178,000 for public works, including the construction of roads and bridges, sinking public wells, providing ferries and similar services, leaving only $110,000 for civil government, legislation, administration of civil justice, and so forth. In these figures I think we find full justification for the commendatory remarks made by the Minister of the Interior with reference to the territorial government.

I wish to refer for a moment to a question that has been raised with respect to some of the foreign settlers. The hon. member for Lennox (Mr. Wilson) asked a question in the House as to the provision being made for the education of the Doukhobors, a considerable number of whom are settled in the Territories, I assume from the manner of his question that he thought the government should devote a certain amount of money and take certain steps to see that the education of the Doukhobors was not neglected. I have not any very intimate knowledge of that subject, but I am aware that the members of the local government have had conferences with representatives of those people ; and while I believe that there is and will be a considerable amount of difficulty with regard to the education of the Doukhobors, owing to their peculiar customs and beliefs, still I think that the past history of the local government gives us warrant to believe that that government is perfectly competent to deal with whatever difficulty may exist.

Hon. members will readily understand that in a part of the country to which many foreign immigrants are coming year after year—and since the opening up of the North-west Territories, every year there has been an influx of a large number of people who may be classed as foreigners, people from the continent of Europe,—there must be problems of more or less difficulty to be solved by the local authorities. In the past, the local government has been found competent to cope with the difficulties which have arisen, and while a certain amount of patience may be required in dealing with peculiar people like the Doukhobors, we may take it for granted that the local government will be competent to grapple with any difficulties that may arise. I fear that the local authorities would take exception, and properly, to this parliament stepping into the domain of education, the power of dealing with which was many years ago conferred upon the local government. The difficulty of dealing with people like the Doukhobors, owing to their peculiarities, this House, of course, has a right to consider, and the consideration will further impress on hon. members the necessity of providing financial means to the local government to enable it to deal effectively and efficiently with these people.

I propose, Sir, with the permission of the House, to glance very briefly at the political history of the North-west Territories. The acquisition of these territories was contemplated by the statesmen who met in Quebec in 1865—the fathers of confederation ; and from one of the resolutions then passed, I extract the following sentence :

Provision being made for the admission, on equitable terms, of Newfoundland, the North-west Territories, British Columbia and Vancouver, on such terms as the parliament of the federated provinces shall deem equitable and as shall receive the assent of Her Majesty.

Respecting the contention that the expenditures incurred with regard to the North-west Territories, including the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway, should be wholly charged against the North-west Territories, let me quote another portion of the resolution as showing the view on this point held by the fathers of confederation :

The communication with the North-west Territories and the improvements required for the development of the trade of the great west with the seaboard, are regarded by this conference as subjects of the highest importance to the federated provinces.

Thus, the view held by the fathers of confederation respecting the expenditures which would have to be made in the North-west Territories, was that these expenditures would not be incurred so much for the North-west Territories as for the provinces which originally formed confederation. The territory was acquired following an address from the Canadian parliament to Her Majesty, praying that Rupert's Land and the North-west Territories might be united to the Dominion of Canada. The address recited that :

It would promote the prosperity of the Canadian people and conduce to the advantage of the whole empire, if the Dominion of Canada constituted under the provisions of the British North America Act, 1867, were extended westward to the shores of the Pacific ocean. That the colonization of the fertile lands of the Saskatchewan, the Assiniboine and the Red river districts; the development of the mineral wealth which abounds in the region of the North-west, and the extension of commercial intercourse through the British possessions in America from the Atlantic to the Pacific, are alike dependent on the establishment of a stable government for the maintenance of law and order in the North-western Territory; and that the welfare of a sparse and widely scattered population of British subjects of European origin, already inhabiting these remote and unorganized territories, would be materially enhanced by the formation therein of political institutions bearing analogy, as far as circumstances will admit, to those which exist in the several provinces of this Dominion.

The foregoing quotations show distinctly, first, that the North-west Territories were acquired for the benefit primarily of the confederated provinces ; second, that it was the intention of Canada to extend to the Territories a system of government bearing analogy to those of the provinces; and third, they include a guarantee that the Territories would be placed on an equitable basis compared with the other provinces. That I take to mean that we would eventually be given a constitutional and financial position, which would bear strict analogy to the positions occupied by each one of the other provinces. On the 15th July, 1870, the North-west Territories were admitted into confederation and became part and parcel of the Dominion. The history of the local government in that country since then I shall not take up the time of the House by going over, I may say briefly, that from time to time additional powers were conferred on the local authorities until now there is very little difference—practically none constitutionally—between the position of the Territories and that of any province. The Territories lack a few of the powers possessed by the provinces, as, for instance, the power to borrow money on the public credit, the power to charter railways, the power to erect and maintain such institutions as insane asylums. But they have authority over education and other matters; and so far as any power has been conferred upon them, they exercise it in exactly the same manner as similar powers are exercised out by the local legislatures and governments in provinces.

I do not wish to go into any of the details at present. My intention is merely to draw the attention of parliament to a subject with which this parliament will almost certainly have to deal in the very near future—almost certainly before the end of this term. But there are one or two details to which I wish to refer briefly. The question will arise whether one or more provinces should be created out of the present territories, namely, the two Assiniboias, Saskatchewan and Alberta. On that point I do not care to offer any decided opinion, and I do not know that there exists in the minds of the people any very decided opinion. My personal opinion is in favour of the erection of only one province, as I think it would be a mistake to create too many governments in that country, and I believe that one system—one lieutenant governor and one executive—would be sufficient to attend to the interests of local government in that country. The point is sometimes raised that the area is very large, which no one will dispute, but it is not larger than that of at least one existing province. The area of the four districts in the North-west Territories is about 302,000 miles, and that of the province of British Columbia comprises 383,000 square miles. The area is not very much larger than the area of Ontario, which is 222,000 square miles, and of Quebec, which is 228,000 square miles.

It is interesting in this connection, to remember that, prior to confederation the late Sir John Macdonald held strongly to the opinion that a legislative union for all Canada would be preferable to a federal union. If a man so far-sighted as Sir John Macdonald believed that the legislative interests of all Canada might be most satisfactorily dealt with by one legislature sitting at Ottawa, and if that proposition was possible, the proposition that the area comprised in these four districts could be governed in a local sense by one legislature is not at all an absurdity. Another suggestion has been mooted, one on which I have no hesitation in expressing a very decided opinion—a suggestion that a portion of the territory should be annexed to the province of Manitoba. The people of the Territories generally, would very strongly oppose the carrying out of such a proposition; and the people who, if it were carried out would find themselves in the province of Manitoba, would and do most strongly oppose the proposition. As I have explained, the relations at present existing between the legislature of the Territories and this parliament, and the whole constitutional and financial position of the Territories limit the resources of local government practically to the annual grants voted by this parliament, apart from the powers of direct taxation which have been conferred upon it. I do not imagine that this House would look with equanimity upon the powers of direct taxation being applied to any severe extent in that country. This House looks to a speedy settlement of that country, looks for a large immigration to that country, looks for progress in that country, and certainly the application of the power of direct taxation to a severe extent would not conduce to that progress or that early settlement or any very large immigration. Apart from the power of direct taxation, really the only resource of the local government of the territory is the annual grant voted by this parliament. I do not wish to complain that the annual grants have not been fairly generous, although in no year have they sufficed to fully and adequately meet the requirements. Looked at from all points of view, however, I think the yearly grants have been fairly generous. But a position has been reached where the need is growing so fast year by year that it is found almost impossible or entirely impossible to get the income from this parliament which is necessary. I will not weary the House with a statement of what the annual grant has been—that may be found in the estimates for the various years, which are on record. I will not go any further into the matters of detail, but shall draw the attention of the House to what I think should be a broad, general principle upon which the arrangements which will be made should be negotiated and arrived at. On the constitutional side, I imagine, the proposition is very simple. I have no doubt that this House will very readily confer upon the legislature of the Territories all the powers which have been conferred upon the legislatures of the provinces. But financially the case may be more complex. On the financial side there may be room for argument. Financially, the various provinces have been dealt with in this way—a yearly grant is made to the local legislature for purposes of government, varying from $80,000 in the case of Ontario to $30,000 to Prince Edward Island, also a per capita allowance of eighty cents per head. In addition, to some of the provinces, an allowance is made on account of debt, which, I expect, every member of the House understands and which I will not go into at present. And another source of income of the originally confederated provinces is that they are in possession of the public resources, public lands, timber and minerals within their borders. I do not wish to enter into a contentious discussion of the matter at the present time. As I said, it is a subject upon which there may be differences of opinion. The opinion has been sometimes expressed that the originally confederated provinces, by paying to the Hudson's Bay Company £300,000, purchased all the land and all the right in the land in the North-west Territories. That is a position in which the people of the North-west Territories will not readily acquiesce. Their idea and my idea is not that by paying £300,000 to the Hudson's Bay Company, the land or the right in the land was absolutely purchased. The people of the Territories believe that in that transaction Canada merely extinguished a questionable right claimed by the Hudson's Bay Company. The people of the Territories also claim this, that, even if that money is regarded as purchase money they are bearing a portion of the burden by paying their fair share of the interest of the money which was borrowed to pay that amount. I will not allude either to the question of the lands given away to railway corporations. That is a matter which may make the negotiation a little more difficult than it otherwise would be; but I may say that what the people will expect and what I think they have a right to expect—and this is really the point to which I wish to call the attention of parliament—is that they will be dealt with on exactly the same basis as the originally confederated provinces dealt with themselves, they will be put in exactly the same position as that occupied by the originally confederated provinces. If the proper principle is adhered to, if the principle of absolute equality is observed, if parliament places the new province upon an equitable basis, the local government will be given a proper grant for government, also the per capita grant, and be given anything that may be shown to be due as the debt allowance. And they will be put in the possession of the public resources, lands, timber and minerals, in the same way as the other provinces were put in possession of those resources. I believe that that portion of the confederation arrangement by which the original provinces retained control over their public resources, was looked upon by the fathers of confederation as the keystone of the whole scheme. On that point I will read a couple of extracts from speeches made by leading statesmen, either at the Quebec conference or in the parliament of Lower Canada at the time the Quebec resolutions were being considered. The late Sir John A. Macdonald said :

It will be seen that the local legislatures have the control of all local works; and it is a matter of great importance, and one of the chief advantages of the federal union and of local legislatures, that each province will have the power and means of developing its own resources and aiding its own progress after its own fashion and its own way.

The late Sir. A. T. Galt said :

It will be observed that in the plan proposed here are certain sources of local revenue reserved to the local governments arising from territorial domain, lands, mines, &c. In the case of Canada a large sum will be received from these resources, but it may be that some of them, such as the municipal loan fund, will become exhausted in course of time. We may, however, place just confidence in the development of our resources, and repose in the belief that we shall find in our territorial domain, our valuable mines and our fertile lands, additional sources of revenues far beyond the requirements of the public service. If, nevertheless, the local revenues become inadequate, it will be necessary for the local governments to have resort to direct taxation; and I do not hesitate to say that one of the wisest provisions in the proposed constitution, and that which affords the surest guarantee that the people will take a healthy interest in their own affairs and see that no extravagance is committed by those placed in power by them, is to be found in the fact that those who are called upon to administer public affairs will feel, when they resort to direct taxation, that a solemn responsibility will be exacted by the people in the most peremptory manner.

Since 1867, other provinces have come in. When Prince Edward Island was taken into confederation a grant was voted her for the very reason that she did not have any public lands. When British Columbia came in, the public resources were left to the ownership of the province and beyond that a strip of her territory, required by Canada for purposes connected with the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway, was taken over, and a purchase price to the amount of $100,000 annually is being paid to the province on account of this strip of land which the Dominion took over for Federal purposes. The people of the Territories contend that the public lands of that country are now simply held in trust by parliament until such time as provinces may be created in that area. They firmly believe that their contention is good. But even if a strict legal or moral right cannot be established by the people of the Territories to be given possession of their local resources. I appeal to this House whether it would not be unwise and impolitic to create provinces out there on any different basis from that on which other provinces stand. Entire equality is the only sure guarantee of the permanency of the Confederation structure. Is it not a fair proposition that the citizen of the Northwest Territories should be looked upon in all respects as equal to the citizen of any other province ? The proper policy for this parliament to pursue is to make the citizen of that country in all respects equal to the citizen of any other province of Canada. The subjects that come under the purview of the local government affect the people more closely than those dealt with by this parliament, and the best way to promote the progress of that country will be to give as much financial ability as possible to the local legislature to deal with their local affairs, so that education, public works and all local services may be dealt with efficiently and adequately. My opinion is that by no other means can parliament do as much at one stroke to promote progress and the true welfare, not of the Territories alone but of Canada as a whole, as by placing the main portion of Western Canada in a strong, efficient, capable position as concerns its local government. I think I have fairly established that the time is approaching for a change, that the present position of the local government in the Territories is not satisfactory financially, and even constitutionally is not entirely satisfactory. I will read one other extract from a speech by Mr. Haultain, the Prime Minister, delivered in the local assembly a little less than a year ago :

As I have already said, we must develop, whether we have provincial institutions in a year or two years, or even if we do not have them in ten years hence. There are certain things necessary for the proper carrying out of the work of this House; there are certain necessary extensions of our jurisdiction which must receive attention. Extensions have been made from year to year, but as the conditions of the country change and become more complex and as our population increases, so will the necessity for larger power become more pressing, and whatever postponement of the provincial question there may be, it is our duty, and it is an absolute necessity to the proper working out of the functions of this House, to ask for an extension of our powers not two years hence, but immediately.

Mr. Bennett : An extension of what power in particular?

Mr. Haultain : There is no reason why we should not have the regulation—possibly not completely, but to a greater extent—of our constitution. There is no reason why we should not have that because there are several points which are involved which make it difficult for us to deal with our election laws. For instance, we have no power to disqualify a man for membership to this House, and there are a number of other instances without going into details. We should, too, have the administration of criminal justice. There is no reason why we should not; there are many reasons, financial as well as others, why we should. We have already a certain amount of civil jurisdiction given us, and the position at present simply means that two sets of officials have to be kept in this country instead of one. There is no practical reason why the same work should not be done by us as is done by the Attorney General's Department in the provinces. We should also have control of the registry offices. The important power to legislate with regard to property and civil rights given to us in one section of the North-west Territories Act is largely curtailed by the Dominion parliament having undertaken to deal with the question of land titles under the Land Titles Act, and I need not remind the House how often we run up against the Land Titles Act in attempting to legislate on many questions. In much of our important legislation we have to deal with land and land titles, and it is a practical argument that if we had the power—as they have in the provinces—to deal exclusively with property and civil rights we should be able to make a great many improvements in much of our general legislation as well as improvements in the land titles system itself. I believe the land titles system under local administration can be made to be not only a self-supporting service, but can also be so conducted as to very largely reduce the number and amount of fees which are at present charged for the various services performed. There are other matters, but I need hardly dwell on them. I believe that—no matter at what time, remote or near, the larger question of provincial institutions is settled—we require an extension of the powers of this House immediately. Many of them we should have had some time ago. We have been asking for them ever since 1892—asking for them every year.

I have kept the House a great deal longer than I intended and I fear that I have, to some extent, wearied the House. I regret exceedingly that it was not some other hon. gentleman with more ability and more fluency who would have better presented the case and have performed the duty of placing it for the first time before parliament, but, I feel, at all events, that the question is large enough and that the country to which it refers is great enough to create pride in the mind of any one who has the privilege, however poorly, of studying and dealing with it. I trust that when the time comes, whether it comes next year, or the succeeding year, and I feel assured that it will come before the end of the term of this parliament, that parliament may deal with the question on broad principles and endeavour to place the citizens of the North-west Territories in a position entirely equal, in no way inferior, to the position which is occupied by the citizens of any other province of Canada.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). It is not my intention to enter into a discussion of the budget as the ground has been pretty well covered——

Mr. E. A. LANCASTER (Lincoln and Niagara). Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think the hon. member for Lincoln and Niagara has the floor.

Mr. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). I thought I was next on the list, Mr. Speaker. I put my name down a week ago.

Mr. SCOTT.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. member for Lincoln and Niagara has the floor.

Mr. LANCASTER. Mr. Speaker, for a long while, or at least, since the 7th November last, I have wondered a good deal how it was that the hon. gentleman who so well represented West Assiniboia in this House for several parliaments was not able to be with us during this parliament, and I am very glad to be able to say that I have discovered the reason. I think I have found it out. Evidently the hon. member who used to be in this House and whom the hon. gentleman (Mr. Scott), who has just spoken, succeeded in ousting from that position by obtaining enough votes to enable him to represent that constituency here, must have been defeated at the polls because he was not able to promise to do so many impossible things for the North-west Territories as the hon. gentleman who has succeeded him. I cannot think of anything else that had anything to do with the reversal in the allegiance of that constituency. I have listened to-night with a great deal of attention for an hour and twenty-five minutes to the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, to find out what he had to say about the fiscal policies, about the fiscal policy, if any, of the government, and about the fiscal policy of the opposition. I have listened for over an hour of that time to his discourse on entirely different matters and I give the hon. gentleman a great deal of credit and a great deal of thanks too, because it will serve as an example, as an illustration for me when I shall say a word in regard to the government fiscal policy, which I shall do in a few minutes in the course of my speech. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down has also assisted me by saying that nobody knows to-day, in spite of over a week's debate on the fiscal questions of this country, what is the fiscal policy of the government outside of the members of the cabinet themselves. We have been trying to find that out for four years and we did think, that, although they would not tell the people what their policy was, they would tell the members of parliament when we got into a new parliament after the elections. But, we have not discovered it yet from the members of the cabinet and we find that of those behind the cabinet no two of them agree for one minute as to what that policy is. We have the hon. gentleman who has just sat down discoursing to us; he wants free trade, and he illustrates his position by saying that he does not want a duty on wheat. But he does not say that he would remove the duty on wheat, and he votes for a government that keeps that duty on wheat and votes for a government that does not put a duty on corn. The people of Ontario are more concerned in having a duty on corn than the people of the North-west Territories are in having a duty on wheat. I know that it is denied that throughout the Dominion there are sectional feelings, I know it is denied that the province of Quebec votes in one way for certain reasons that it ought not to take into consideration, but, while on the floor of this House we find that all the members of the Conservative party stand together as one man on matters of policy, we cannot find hon. gentlemen opposite able to debate the question without bringing in sectional matters that particularly affect their own constituencies. So, if we want an excuse or a justification, for putting on the records of the House a declaration distinctly saying what our policy is, hon. gentlemen opposite have not only given us that excuse, but our regard for the honour of the country forces us to do so because we want to have a policy declared in such a way as to be understood by the ordinary every-day man in this country, so that he can tell his neighbour in Buffalo, or his cousin in Ireland, or England, or Scotland, what kind of laws he is going up against if he emigrates to this country. If we cannot have a policy that every one can understand in that way from the government, the next best thing to do is to have a policy from the opposition, so that if the people will be willing to bide a wee they will know what is going to be the policy of the country when the opposition become the government. If we wanted any reason for putting a declaration, or a resolution, upon records of the House such as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden, Halifax), whom I have the honour to follow in this House, has placed upon the records, we have it from the very proceedings, the very arguments which are made by hon. gentlemen opposite in their endeavour to support the government willingly in everything that is done, and everything that the government may do. In 1896—I do not wish to repeat, but it is necessary to make the argument consecutive—it is well known that the government got into power by making certain pledges and it is well known and never disputed that it did not carry out these pledges. In 1900 it was argued upon the hustings of every province—I will not speak specially for the provinces of Quebec, or Manitoba, or for the North-west Territories, because I was not there, and I cannot say what they did there, but it is fair to assume that the same arguments were made there as were made in Ontario, that there was more than one reason why the government should be turned out of office. It was argued that in public matters you could not trust them, and that was given as the reason why they should be turned out. The province of Ontario, which I think, I may say, without wishing to wound the feelings of hon. gentlemen representing other parts of the Dominion, leads the other provinces in civilization and progress, undertook to say by a very large majority that such things as were shown to have been done could not be done in public life any more than they could be done in private life, that the business of Canada could not be done on that basis, that the affairs of the country must be carried on in a proper and business like way. I have heard many reasons given by hon. gentlemen as to why the government is not better represented on the floor of this House from the province of Ontario ; but, if you look at it in any constituency you like, comparing it with another constituency and applying fair and proper reasoning to it, you will find that the reason which generally actuated the mind of the people, was whether they would or would not employ persons to carry on their business whom they had employed before and who had not carried out what they said they would do. I am not debating now whether free trade or protection is the best policy for the province. I believe protection is the best policy. I have always believed it, I believe it now, and I am caused more than ever to believe it by the fact that some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House admit that it is while all hon. gentlemen on this side of the House say it is. That does not carry a doubt according to the expressions of the cabinet, but it does carry a doubt according to expressions of hon. gentlemen behind and supporting that cabinet. For all these reasons we must conclude that protection is the best policy for this country. But, Sir, the question of whether protection or free trade is the better policy in our interests is not the question that most concerns us as a people. Sir, it is a question of the national honour of Canada ; it is a question as to whether we are to do business in public matters upon the same moral plane as we do business in private matters. I stand here to say that if my hon. leader were to-day to treat the public issues so lightly from a moral standpoint, as have the leaders of the Liberal party I would not come to this parliament to sit behind him and to vote with him on party questions. The hon. gentleman from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) who spoke in favour of protection the other night, was forced before the last elections to issue a special address to his electors in order to make himself safe and for fear the government would go down, and that he would go down with it if he did not show to the people that he was not going to be guided by that sort of political morality—if the word is permissible—which seems to find favour with the Liberals of this country. I say that we are here to-night, Sir, to decide whether the government of this fair Dominion will be obliged to do what it says it will do, or whether it is to be allowed to get into power promising that it will do certain things when in power, and then not only not do them, but come back four years afterwards and not pay the ordinary compliment to the people of telling them what they are going to do or what they are not going to do. This government in effect says to the people of Canada : We told you we would do such and such a thing in order to get to power, but now that we have power for the second time we will not pay you the compliment to say whether we are free traders or protectionists ; we will let you find that out for yourselves, and we will go as we please on this question so long as we have men behind us to vote to retain us in power. That is the position which the government places the people of Canada in to-day. I say that if we had no better reason to vote for protection and for a business policy such as that propounded by the leader of the opposition there would be sufficient to entitle this amendment to the support of the ordinary individual in the fact that the leader of the opposition has plainly laid down what policy he wants ; has nailed his colours to the mast, and will steer his course towards a plain business policy which every one can understand and rely upon. The gentleman from Annapolis (Mr. Wade) was frank enough to tell us the other night—and these confessions will fall unawares from the lips of gentlemen opposite—that when the Liberals were wandering around in the wilderness of opposition they did this and that and the other thing. Well, Sir, I can tell that hon. gentleman that although the Conservative party to-day is in the wilderness of opposition, we will never wander around ; we will always be able to blaze the trees as we go along, so that we can always be found and always find our way back. To-day in opposition we place upon record what our policy is, and even if it is not a policy that commends itself to every man who may be an utter free trader, it will at least commend itself to every man who has the interests of his people at heart, for he knows where we are going to take him, he knows our record is good, and he knows we never said we would do a thing and refuse to do it afterwards, even though we had made a mistake. Now, Sir, it has been asked me a great many times how it happened that the chief whip of the Liberal party in the last parliament was not returned to this House from a constituency that was supposed to be safe for the Liberals, and how it is that I came here in his stead. I have always thought it better to reserve the explanation as to that until the time arrived when I could state it publicly in the House of Commons. It is due to no qualification of mine, and it is due to no disqualification on the part of Mr. Gibson. The people of the banner electoral district of Lincoln and Niagara, the oldest settled part of Ontario, a place that first had a parliament building in the whole of this Dominion ; a place that first had a lieutenant-governor residing there—and were it not that I see some hon. gentlemen opposite smiling, I would say, a place that is in the forefront of civilization—a district ahead of the rest of the Dominion in age, if age counts for anything ; that electoral district has returned a supporter of the Conservative party to oppose the acts of the Liberal government simply and solely because the electors did not know what that government would do if it were returned to power on the 7th of November, for they knew that during its four years of power it had done nothing that it promised to do in the years prior to 1896. That and nothing else caused the constituency of Lincoln and Niagara to send me to this House. And, Sir, although perhaps I should not say so, I trust that my constituents will not find me wanting in representing their interests ; at all events, when I return to them they will never have to accuse me of making false pledges and of promising them something which I did not endeavour to have carried out.

The resolution before us, Sir, has been thoroughly discussed by gentlemen on both sides of the House. It has been explained over and over again by gentlemen on this side of the House, while the gentlemen on the other side do not appear to be able or willing to understand what it means. It is pretty well written, it is pretty plain English ; it is protection and it is a preference with Great Britain, that is to say, a mutual preference. My hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Scott), who last spoke, made an able and eloquent argument in favour of the North-west Territories, and I will take the liberty of pointing out to the government what this follower of theirs thinks a man should do in carrying out his duty. That hon. gentleman (Mr. Scott) evidently came here determined to see that the North-west Territories, and his district of West Assiniboia especially, should get full and ample justice at the hands of this parliament. Now, Sir, the rule that ought to guide us in business, be it great or small, should be the same rule in principle in small affairs as well as in great. That hon. gentleman (Mr. Scott) devoted the largest part of his speech to trying to prove to the government that they should give a preference to the North-west Territories in return for something which the Territories have done for us, as he says. Now, would not the same rule apply in the relations between Canada and the British Empire, and is it not the duty of the Prime Minister to go to England and get something else than Cobden medals for us in return for what we are doing for the mother land ? If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Scott) will apply to the government the same rule which he wishes the government to apply to the constituency which he so ably represents, then he should vote for this amendment moved by the leader of the opposition, because it asks in the interests of the Dominion of Canada just exactly what he wants in the interests of the Territories. As far as that goes we have got a very good example if we need it. I admit that we have not been in the habit of going across the floor to get examples. I grant you that we have never been quite so hard up as to have to go around looking to gentlemen opposite for examples for what we ought to do ; but I do say that we could go for an example to the member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Scott) who asks from this parliament for his constituents, what this resolution, in principle, asks from the mother country for the Dominion of Canada. We are told by gentlemen opposite that it was disloyal to ask England, disloyal to ask Her late lamented Majesty Queen Victoria, or our present noble King Edward VII., to give anything in return for the preference we give them. But, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Scott) does not say that it is disloyal to this parliament to ask us to give to the North-west Territories something in return for what he alleges they gave us. I believe, Sir, that the reasoning which I have endeavoured to follow in this respect will be the reasoning which will be followed by the people of Canada when next they get the chance, and that they will expect the Canadian government to do business with the mother land upon terms which are just and fair to the people of the Dominion. I have heard it argued in this debate that Mr. Chamberlain, representing the English people, will not allow us to do a certain thing, and therefore it is out of the question for us to try and do it. Well, does any gentleman in this House believe that Mr. Chamberlain will desist from trying to get the treaties he wants with Germany or Russia because some man who is interested in trying to dissuade him simply tells Mr. Chamberlain that he cannot get these treaties. He is on the other side of the contract. Where is the astuteness and the business ability of this cabinet ? When they go to England to make a deal with Mr. Chamberlain, they can only come back and tell us : It is true, we went there to get something in return for this advantage which we are giving to the mother country, and they gave us a Cobden medal, which we will lay on the Table, if necessary, and let you see it. Even if Mr. Chamberlain did regard that as a fair return, that is no reason why we should not go on and try to get just compensation for this country for the great advantages which we are giving to the mother land.

I want to deal for one minute with one or two things which have been said in the course of this debate, because they do not strike me as being correct, and my constituents would blame me if I sat silent and allowed such things to be said without rising to contradict them. It was said by the hon. member for London (Mr. Hyman) the other night, that the charge of inconsistency against this government might well be laid by some people. I suppose he says that in politeness, instead of using the stronger word which we might apply, and say they might be charged with bad faith. But he censured the hon. member for Pictou for laying the charge of inconsistency against them. That is the way hon. gentlemen oposite try to get rid of the main question in this debate. They take the ground that some one now supporting the opposition did wrong, and, therefore, no accusation of wrong-doing should be laid against the government. I submit that it is the government who are on their trial, and not the opposition. The opposition are not to be blamed for the sins of the government ; and because the government are fairly chargeable with inconsistency, it is no answer to say to the individual making the charge : Six or eight or ten years ago you made a different statement, when, perhaps, the individual was not in the House at all. That is not the kind of argument which I think ought to prevail in this House.

Of course, I am influenced a good deal by the learned lecture which the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) gave us, being a new member like himself, and not very much older than he is. He gave us a long discourse of twenty-five minutes or half an hour about our duty in conducting this debate. I have no doubt that if we could all do, as he said, stick to the question strictly, we would be able to get along better than we do. But, the hon. gentleman made some remarks about the farmers of this country and the preference to England which I cannot allow to go unchallenged, as I represent a good many farmers, some 4,000 or 5,000 having voted in my constituency in the last election. He said the farmers did not mind the loss of a few paltry hundreds of thousands of dollars. I suppose he believes that the possession of the Cobden medal is worth that much to them, and was a full compensation for their loss on account of this so-called preference to England. Well, he must be speaking for the farmers of South Wellington alone. I wish it to be understood that his remarks do not apply to the farmers of the constituency I represent. Although they are not stingy men, who insist on the last dollar in a business transaction, still they believe in doing business on business principles ; and if the government undertakes to do business for them, they expect them to bring back something better than a paltry medal. I do not doubt that the farmers of South Wellington are just as intelligent and as able to elect representatives as the farmers of my constituency. I am not insinuating for a moment that they are not. But, I do say, that when the hon. member for South Wellington made that remark, I believe he had not consulted the farmers of his own county, and when he goes home and explains it to them, if he can, he will get their orders not to make a remark like that again.

The hon. member for Hants (Mr. Russell) told us the other day that there was no life in this opposition. The opposition do not mind any little jokes being made at their expense, but these things get into 'Hansard,' and into the public press, and are read seriously, and for that reason we do not like them to be said. The hon. gentleman said also that this opposition had no practical head on its shoulders. Well, it seems to me the hon. member had better ask himself again, who has been doing the practical business in this parliament since February 6? He had better look through 'Hansard' and see who has initiated the legislation, and he will find that on nearly every question of public importance the opposition has taken the initiative, and the government has opposed, and has afterwards given in, as they did on the binder twine question. When hon. members opposite make assertions of this kind, which are not based on the facts, but are mere bluff, I warn them, be they young members or old ones, there will always be a member on this side ready to get up and point out what the actual facts are.

Now I wish to speak for a moment in regard to the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver). The other night that hon. gentleman declared that he was a protectionist in theory and in practice, if he could get the practice. Well, the practice is on this side of the House, and when the vote is taken on this question, I should think he would stand up and vote with us, and get the benefit of the practice of protection as well as the theory. He sits behind this government, and he declared at the end of his speech that he was going to vote with the government; yet, he is a protectionist. and he thinks this government is a revenue tariff government. The hon. gentleman declared himself to be a protectionist, and he knows that we on this side of the House have been consistent protectionists; he knows we are protectionists to-day, as we always have been, and he knows that our record has been to carry out, when in power, the pledges and promises we have made when out of power.

The hon. gentleman said that although he is a protectionist he will vote against this resolution. Well, Mr. Speaker, that is not the way to convince new members—if I may be allowed to speak for the new members—upon this side as to what their duty is. We would prefer to take the advice of the hon. gentleman who moved this resolution, and state in clean cut language what we mean, and if what we mean is the same as what is expressed in this resolution, then vote for it. I have no faith in the man who says: I do not believe in a free trade or a revenue tariff, and I do believe in protection, but as this resolution, which meets my views in favour of protection, does not come from my side of the House I cannot support it. I will vote for a thing I do not believe in and against that which I do believe in, in order to be upon the same side as the government. If this is the sort of argument used in the hopes of convincing this House—and I see no reason why we should debate in this House at all, unless in the hope of convincing some of those who differ from us that we are right and they are wrong—if that is the sort of argument to which the hon. gentleman from Alberta (Mr. Oliver) resorts, let me tell him that he will have to adopt an altogether different style of tactics, if he expects to convince us that when we want protection we must not vote for the resolution which proposes that policy.

Let me now, Mr. Speaker, discuss for a moment the question of British preference as explained by the government. In his budget speech, the hon. the Finance Minister said that we could not obtain from Great Britain the preference we wanted now, but that when we could get such a preference we will have it. It is no doubt not very difficult to understand that when we can get a thing we will have it. Any school boy would know that when we can get a thing which is good for us, we will very likely take it. Yet that was the summing up of this great policy of the government, as I understood the Finance Minister. We cannot obtain a preference because Mr. Chamberlain will not give it to us, but we are in hopes that by saying to him, we do not want it and are not going to make any row, if we do not get it, he will end by giving it to us, and as soon as he will give it to us, we will have it. That is the sum and substance of the Finance Minister's programme.

Well, what is the other side of the question? We, on this side, say: We can have it if we show the British government that we are entitled to get it and are resolved to get it. We contend that we can get it if we argue our case fairly, and that we could have got it, instead of the Cobden medal, had the right hon. gentleman asked for it. But the right hon. gentleman, not only did not ask for it, but declared that he would not. The people of this Dominion to-day, however, are asking for it; and in reply to this demand, hon. gentlemen opposite say it would be a good thing to get, but we will make no effort to get it. I suppose we ought to give them some credit for not saying that such a preference would be a curse and for not imagining that the people are so gullible as to suppose that it would be a serious injury to get something so evidently to our advantage. If there is an independent man on the government benches, if there is a man not hide-bound in his politics, if any gentlemen on the other side are still susceptible to reason, why not, in the name of common sense, vote for the resolution of the leader of the opposition? What matter whether the resolution comes from a Grit or a Tory, if it be in the interests of the country? Surely, in this parliament, the highest deliberative body in the country, we should do business on business principles just as it would be done in some school section or some little factory employing not more than ten men. We might then expect to have Canada obtain the same justice as any other country would, for I do not believe there is any other country which deals with Great Britain in this way—getting nothing in return for something substantial given. There is no country in the world dealing with Great Britain or with Canada which does not insist on a quid pro quo for what it gives. In fact the argument of the government simply amounts to this: We do not know how to do this thing, you think you can do it, but we will not even ask you to assist us. On the contrary, we will declare that it is not in the interests of the country to do it because we do not know how. That is the whole sum and substance of their position. I would appeal to these hon. gentlemen opposite to take a more patriotic course, a more loyal course to Canada, and support this resolution. Let them do as they did with regard to binder twine, in which they admitted we had got the best of them. Let them hedge before it is too late and support this resolution, and we will have a unanimous vote. The position taken by the government is simply a declaration of incompetence, and inability to do the first piece of business they ought to have applied themselves to, one which they have been professing to deal with for some years, and which they claim to have at their finger ends. Yet they have accomplished nothing and will not even try to accomplish anything. Because forsooth public men on the other side of the Atlantic say we cannot get what we desire, they say we will not worry them with trying to get it, and lay ourselves open to the charge of not being loyal. But has England ever accused her subjects of being disloyal because they did their duty to those who put their trust in them? Does King Edward expect us to deceive the people who have entrusted us with the administration of their affairs in order that we may show him that we are loyal? Would he not, on the contrary, prefer that the government should show its loyalty by carrying out the trust reposed in it? Would the most loyal man in England blame the parliament of the Dominion for asserting its right in a legitimate and proper way? The argument that it would not be loyal to ask from England anything more than we are getting is childish in the extreme.

The right hon. the First Minister drew a very pathetic picture. He depicted the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) going to England and talking to the workingmen and asking them for a preference, and he depicted their replying to the hon. the leader of the opposition: If we do this thing for you, what are you going to give us in return? And the leader of the opposition would reply: Oh, as we are protectionists people, you must not expect us to give you anything. But did not the right hon. gentleman, by this very illustration, convict himself of wrong-doing. Because what did he say when he went to the workingmen in England and gave them this preference in our market? Did he ask them for anything in return? He points out that the English workingmen would want something in return for what he gave us. But did the right hon. gentleman ask Mr. Chamberlain what he was going to give in return for this preference? No, he came away with the Cobden medal and that satisfied him.

But if this matter were put before Great Britain as it should be, if the right and justice of our case were made out, we would accomplish one of two things. We would either get a preference in return for that which we give, or we would be perfectly within our rights in withdrawing the preference we have given, and thus show that we are not children and fools. I do not wish to detain the House longer, as I know there are a great many hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House who wish to speak. But as I have said at the beginning, I could not allow some of the statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite to pass unchallenged. I could not sit in silence—my constituents would blame me if I had, I say, sat here in silence—while things were said which they no more than I could give assent to.

Before sitting down, I must touch upon one matter referred to by the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil)—touched upon by that hon. gentleman very improperly and indiscreetly, it seems to me, touched upon in order to make the most capital he could for the premier of the government which he follows in this House. In a speech devoted to questions of race and religion, brought in under the excuse of being allowed to wander far afield and not stick to the question of the budget, which is before the House, he appealed to every one on the floor of the House to witness that all here were proud of the Prime Minister. If he means to speak of the Prime Minister in his individual capacity, I have nothing to say against the hon. gentleman's remarks. But if he meant, as I understood him to mean, that every one was proud of the Prime Minister in his official capacity, then I feel it my duty to my constituents to say that I am not proud of the Prime Minister nor are my constituents proud of him. And why are we not proud of him? Because, Mr. Speaker, he had it in his power, occupying the position he does, at a most prosperous time and at a time when Canada filled a large place in the eyes of the people of the empire—not because of anything that he had done, but because he was fortunate enough to be the premier of the country at the time when the fruit was ripe which had been sowed long before he knew how to reap it—to do honour to his country and to secure great benefit to his country, yet he showed that he was not fit to be trusted with the affairs of the country. Because, when he was in England he did not try to secure the bargain for a preference with Great Britain, as he might have done, but he has shown that, since 1896, he has led a government that care not a whit for the carrying out of their promises, but are ready to appeal to the people to put them into power, promising that they will effect certain changes, and, when they attain power, care nothing about fulfilling their promises. When we go to the country, to sweep the country as we did in 1878, these hon. gentlemen hope to be able to tell the people that no objection was made to the things they have done—like this old story about the expenditure to which they say no one has objected. They would be very glad to be able to say that the hon. member for Bonaventure had called the whole House to witness that all were proud of the Prime Minister as a public man, and nobody in the House contradicted him. It is for this reason that I am obliged, unpleasant as it may be, to speak out for the grand old county of Lincoln and Niagara, and to declare that we are not all proud of the premier in his official capacity. We are not proud of a premier who promised to reduce the expenditure, who promised to reduce the public debt, who promised to reduce the number of cabinet ministers, but increased them all, who promised to do everything he could think of to catch a few votes, thinking that the people who had begun to say : 'We might as well have a change anyhow,' could be won by these promises to give him their votes, and that if he got into power he would not be obliged to redeem them. And, worst of all, being trusted a second time with power—for the people of Canada are a good-natured people, and they said : Well, the government slipped by the way-side once, but we will give them another chance—he has not even respect enough for the people to tell the people what their policy is going to be. It must be either because they know that the people will not believe them, or because they have no policy, and have been only waiting until the leader of the opposition should give them one that they can do business with. I think the Minister of Finance has given us a good hint. He does not give the opposition credit for pointing the way. But, in a couple of years he will say : Lo, and behold—as the premier said—we now have the same old policy as we had in 1878 ; the leader of the opposition has approved, and so have all his followers, and we will give it to you; now, gentlemen of the Dominion of Canada, voters and electors why not return us again to power ?—the combined wisdom of the opposition could not suggest any better policy than this we offer you, for here is the resolution that they proposed in 1901 ; we have acted upon that policy, we have got a preference with Great Britain, and you ought to return us to power, because we have given you the policy that the opposition wanted to give you in 1901 and which we then opposed.

Mr. JAMES J. HUGHES (King's P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker, not being accustomed to public speaking either in or out of parliament, I rise with more than ordinary diffidence, perhaps more than ordinary nervousness, to address this House for the first time, but I presume that the House will give to me that measure of generosity and kindness and forebearance that, I believe, it always extends to members who speak under similar circumstances. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Lancaster) who has just taken his seat, seems to have some grievance against the government, because he says he does not know what the policy of the government is. The government has been in power four or five years, and surely the hon. gentleman has intelligence enough to know what the policy of the government was in that time —and the Finance Minister, in his budget speech the other day, said there would be no change in the policy of the government, and I presume that the hon. gentleman, if he was present on that occasion, must have heard the Finance Minister making that statement. The hon. gentleman seems also to have a grievance against the people of Canada because they returned this government to power on November 7 last. That is unfortunate for the hon. gentleman, but the people generally have their way in these things. I understand that the hon. gentleman is the representative of Niagara. I presume he has lived for many years near the great falls, and, perhaps, the roar and rush of those mighty waters may have influenced his style of public speaking. It did not strike me that the hon. gentleman said anything new upon the question, or anything specific that I am obliged to answer specifically. In the few remarks I am to make, in a general way, I presume, an answer will be found to anything he has said. Now, during the progress of this debate I have obtained some information. I have found, amongst other things, that the opposition do not agree with the government on a great many points. I also found that the opposition do not agree among themselves on a great many points. And I think I have also learned that, generally speaking, or at least, on a good many occasions, each member of the opposition managed to disagree with himself. But, while there was this great divergence of opinion, there were some points upon which we all agreed—Liberal and Conservative, government and opposition—namely, that the country was eminetly prosperous, and that in the last few years the development of the trade of the country was something really wonderful, and far greater than at any previous time in the country's history. And I noticed that the government was under the impression that they deserved some little credit for some share of this prosperity, but the opposition were not inclined to give them credit for anything at all; on the contrary, they seemed to think that if it were not that this government was in power the prosperity might be greater. It seems to be a cardinal doctrine of the opposition that governments have much to do with the development or retardation of the country. These hon. gentlemen admit that the country has been progressing, and that the trade of the country has been greatly developed; but, they say: It has been due to Providence and the Canadian people. They seem to think that when the Conservatives are in power Providence and the people can take a rest, because the Conservatives will attend to all things terrestrial.

The opposition say that the present administration have increased the taxation and expenditure of the country, and have increased the public debt. In regard to the increase of taxation, the Finance Minister clearly showed in his budget speech that the reduction of taxation on importations of last year alone was upwards of $3,000,000. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), I think it was said that that amount was too high, and he went into a long and somewhat elaborate calculation, comparing the tariff of the present administration for a series of years with the tariff of the late administration for another series of years. He made, I think, a somewhat unfair comparison in that way; but at all events he was compelled to admit that the reduction in the taxation was about $2,000,000. The hon. member for South Wentworth (Mr. Smith), also speaking from the side of the opposition, figured out that in the Post Office Department the reduction in taxation last year was $1,000,000; so that, according to two hon. gentlemen opposite, the reduction in taxation last year was at least $3,000,000. That was a reduction which perhaps was not quite as large as we would wish to see on this side of the House, but at all events it was a pretty good reduction in the taxation of this country.

Now, in regard to the public debt, hon. gentlemen have figured it out that the increase during the present administration has been $7,000,000. But if you compare that increase in four years with the increase in the public debt of $6,500,000 a year during the time the Conservative party were in power, the increase of $7,000,000 in four years would only be half a million dollars more than for each year of the previous administration. The Minister of Trade and Commerce speaking the other evening upon this question, showed that for this increase in the debt Canada had received valuable consideration. For the $3,500,000 that was given in the subsidy to the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, Canada had received ample returns in the coal lands, which alone more than equalled the whole amount of the subsidy, while the trade that the building of that road has developed had already yielded in customs and excise duties an amount nearly or quite sufficient to recoup the treasury for that sum, not to speak at all of the advantage secured to the people of the North-west by a reduction in the freight rates, which is said to be worth $700,000 or $800,000 a year. In addition Canada has secured running rights over that road for any railways it may build. Now, there was another $1,500,000 well expended in sending troops from this country to South Africa, another $1,000,000 was the discount on the 2½ per cent loan which the Finance Minister floated in London, and which was purely money well expended, because it established for ever the 2½ per cent rate. The hon. Minister could easily have floated a 3 per cent loan at a premium, and thus have added nothing to the public debt, but the transaction would not have been nearly so good a one for Canada, so that altogether we have $6,000,000 of expenditure for which Canada has received ample return. Now with regard to the public expenditure, the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler), replying to the Finance Minister on the budget speech, complained that this government had enormously increased the rate of expenditure. In order that there may be no doubt about what he said, I will read his words:

> It is, of course, only natural that our expenditure should increase as our trade increases, but this increase in expenditure is far outrunning any increase in revenue, and there is not the slightest attempt on the part of the government or any member of it to keep our expenditure within our means.

Now, I take exception to that statement, although I do so with some degree of hesitation, in view of the great reputation of that hon. gentleman as a financier, but I think that statement is entirely contrary to facts. The increase in the rate of expenditure under the present administration is practically the same as it was under the previous administration, and under any government that is in power in this country, no matter whether Liberals or Conservatives, the expenditure is bound to increase as the country develops. I think it was the hon. senior member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), who, speaking some years ago, stated that the expenditure of this country must necessarily increase. I say that while the trade of the country is developing, the rate of increase in expenditure under the present administration is practically what it was under the previous administration, while the net revenue under the present administration increased about three and a half times faster than under the previous administration. I understand that the hon. gentleman from Toronto is director in a large railway corporation. Suppose that he could go before his shareholders at an annual meeting and show that while the business of the company had largely increased, while the net revenue of the company had largely increased, still the expenses of management had been practically what they were under the previous board of directors; that the expenditure had been practically what it was before while the increase in revenue had been three and a half times greater, I want to know if that hon. gentleman would not expect a vote of thanks from the shareholders of the company. The present government, I think, have received from the people of Canada a vote of thanks at the last general elections for the way they had administered the finances of this country during the previous four years.

Some members from the great province of Ontario have asked what this government have done for the farmers, what they have done to find better markets for the produce of this country. Now, Sir, allow me to read some figures which will show what has been done under the present administration for the farmers of this country:

EXPORTS.

Butter	$ 1,052,089	$ 5,122,156
Cheese	13,956,871	19,856,324
Eggs	807,086	1,457,902
Bacon and hams	4,381,968	12,758,025
Animals and their produce (total)	36,507,641	56,148,807
Apples	1,416,470	2,578,233
Fruits	1,716,278	3,305,662
Wheat	5,771,521	11,995,488
Flour	718,433	2,791,885
Total grain	8,096,808	18,057,233
Agricultural products	14,083,361	27,516,609
Total provisions	21,200,808	40,063,218
Manufactures	9,365,384	14,224,287
Exports the produce of Canada	109,915,337	170,642,369

In regard to apples, the hon. member for Wentworth said that for ten or fifteen years past the apple growers of Ontario had been trying to get the government to do something for the apple export trade, and they could get nothing until they applied to the present Minister of Agriculture, who was the first to try to do anything for the apple exporters of Ontario. The statement which I have given is my answer to the hon. gentlemen who have asked on some former occasions what the present government have done for the manufacturers and producers of Canada in order to obtain and develop markets for them.

Now, in regard to preferential trade matters about which we have heard a great deal and about which a great deal was said during the last election, it appears, according to hon. gentlemen opposite, that it is a very easy matter to get the British government to put a duty on corn, meat and other products of large importation into that country. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) in speaking upon this question the other evening, pretended to think that it was an easy matter to have this thing settled. In a very short space of time he fixed up a tariff, that, to his mind, would not only suit Canada but Great Britain and the other parts of the British Empire. He fixed this matter up, settled it to his own satisfaction and he then, in fancy, took a trip to the commonwealth of Australia. He arranged matters there for the commonwealth of Australia and then, having some more work to do he transported himself, in fancy, to the old country and showed the effete statesmen of that country what they needed for the mother land. He told them that it was a very easy matter to put a duty on corn and other foodstuffs going into that country, because, as he said, this duty would not increase the price to the consumer in Great Britain, but that at the same time it would increase the price of these articles to the producers in Canada. I have heard that the magicians of old were men that could do wonderful things, but I do not believe they could do anything so wonderful as that which the hon. member for West York proposes when he says that Great Britain could put a duty on articles from Canada going into that country that would not increase the price, but which at the same time would give the producers in Canada an increased price. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), not to be outdone in anything that was going on, rose in his place and showed that he had a goat of his own that he was going to ride or die in the attempt. He became severe with some of the bad men who were preventing him from buying the railway systems and steamship lines for $2, and he was going to show the people how they could be made rich by taxing themselves. In order to show how easy he could explain all these matters he threw off a few ideas of abstract wisdom, and in winding up the matter he said that the United States, a highly protective country, are driving free trade England out of the markets of the world in the manufacture of iron and steel. He drew from that the conclusion that it was because of protection that the United States were enabled to manufacture iron and steel cheaper than free trade England. Did it not strike that hon. gentleman that if the United States were able to manufacture these metals cheaper than England it was because of their great natural advantages? Canada is not a highy protective country as compared with the United States, and we have heard upon the highest authority that Canada can manufacture iron and steel for $6 a ton less than the United States. It would appear to me that if the hon. member for East York had taken the trouble to examine this question he would not have said that it was because of the protection that the United States have given these industries that they have achieved such great results but that it is because of the great natural advantages that they can manufacture cheaper. For the very same reason Canada can manufacture these articles cheaper. But, the hon. member for East York was going to make another arrangement. He is strongly in favour of repealing the preferential tariff altogether, or of making it as he says, more equitable, and I include with him in this position on this question the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Brock). These hon. gentlemen say that because of a preferential tariff, as it at present exists, and because of the reduction of 33⅓ per cent on textile fabrics and woollen goods the woollen mills of the country are to be closed up. The hon. member for East York said that for a preferential trade arrangement with Great Britain he was willing to increase the preference to 50 per cent. If the woollen mills cannot stand the present competition, what would become of them it it were increased to 50 per cent? And I dare say the hon. gentleman would even be willing to add, say 10 or 15 per cent more, in order to strike a bargain? If the woollen mills are going to be closed up because of the present preference, I suppose they would flourish if it were to be increased to 50 or 60 per cent? This is the kind of argument that hon. gentlemen opposite address to the House. I was nearly forgetting the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy). He appeared to have made a discovery in the remarks that he addressed to the House. He said that the government were taking credit to themselves, because, as a result of giving the preferential tariff to Great Britain, exporters of goods to this country, similar to those manufactured in Great Britain, were obliged to bring the price down to the amount of the preference and he entirely controverted that position. He said that it would never operate in that way at all. Am I right in making that statement?

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman asks if he is right in making the statement that I entirely controverted it. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman.

Mr. HUGHES (P.E.I.). Then, I am stating the case correctly as far as he is concerned. A little later on he said that if we had a preference with England and England would put a duty on corn, meat and other products coming from Canada it would not increase the price of these articles because all other countries exporting similar articles to Britain would have to come down in the price equal to the preference to Canada. It would appear, therefore, that the laws of trade and commerce would work one way in Canada, and in directly an opposite way in Great Britain.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman quite misunderstood me. It has been pointed out that we send a mere fraction, and must always send a mere fraction of the breadstuffs to England, and therefore the greater must bear the burden instead of the smaller. That is the distinction.

Mr. HUGHES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) is very strong in fractions. He has figured it out to his own satisfaction that the preference to Great Britain only amounts to thirty-five one hundredths of one per cent, but he and his friends say in the same breath that the Prime Minister went to England and gave away valuable concessions and got absolutely nothing in return. I leave it to gentlemen opposite to settle these inconsistencies and contradictions among themselves. I again come back to the statement made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) that the preference the present government gives Great Britain does not reduce the price of similar articles coming into this country from other countries, while on the other hand he tells us that if Great Britain put a duty upon corn and wool and meat and other products going into her markets and gave Canada a preference, then every other country sending similar articles into Great Britain would have to come down to the extent of the preference.

Mr. CLANCY. That was not it.

Mr. HUGHES (P.E.I.) Oh, yes, that was it.

Mr. CLANCY. I endeavoured to point out that the class of goods imported from other countries to this country were of a different kind, although they may be classified the same, and therefore could not come into competition; and that other countries had separate fields from Great Britain. There are two distinct fields, as the hon. gentleman knows, and therefore they cannot come into competition.

Mr. HUGHES (P.E.I.) The remarks of the hon. gentleman are on record and any person can read them. He may wish to make an explanation now, but we all know what he said the other evening. Some hon. gentlemen opposite have asked what the present administration have done.

Mr. CLANCY. I never asked that.

Mr. HUGHES (P.E.I.) Well, I can tell the hon. gentleman that this government since it came into power have made very great improvements and developments in the Post Office Department; they have reorganized and rejuvenated the militia of this country; they have extended the Intercolonial Railway into Montreal, and, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) said the other day, they have turned a dead railway into a live one; they have provided cold storage and transportation facilities so that the immense exports of products from this country have become possible; they have provided such facilities that the fruit and other perishable products of Canada at the Paris exposition were able to carry off the lion's share of the prizes in competition with the whole world. This government have done a great many other things since they have been in power, and I believe they have fully satisfied the people of Canada. I suppose they do not claim that they possess all the wisdom of the earth. They are not infallible or impeccable, but they are at least an earnest, honest, patriotic, progressive body of men who are giving their time and the best of what is in them for the true development of our country, and the people of Canada appreciate it. Well, Sir, some of these gentlemen opposite have been rehearsing their campaign speeches, and we were told by the hon. member from Wentworth (Mr. Smith) and the hon. member from West York (Mr. Wallace) and others, that the miserable and disreputable race cry that was started in the province of Quebec last year, had some considerable influence upon the elections. I do not know what influence the race cry may have had, but I want to say that that miserable and disreputable race cry was started in a very small corner of the province of Quebec, namely in the Star newspaper office in Montreal. Perhaps it had no influence in the province of Ontario, I hope it had none, but hon. gentlemen opposite are the best judges of the effect which the race and religious cry was expressly intended to have there. Now, Sir, as to the amendment before the House. In the words of an eminent authority, the language is delightfully vague. It says :

That, in the opinion of this House, the welfare of this country requires a pronounced policy of adequate protection and encouragement at all times to the labour, agricultural, manufacturing, mining and other industrial interests of Canada.

That, in the opinion of this House, the adoption of a policy of mutual trade preference within the empire would prove of great benefit to the mother country and to the colonies, and would greatly promote the prosperity, unity and progress of the empire as a whole, and that the present time, when the Commonwealth of Australia is laying the foundation of its fiscal system, is particularly opportune for taking prompt and energetic steps towards the furtherance of this object.

So there is to be high protection for the manufacturers, free trade for the farmers; riches for everybody, everything you want and if there is anything you want and do not see all you have to do is to ask for it.

This House is further of opinion that equivalent or adequate duties should be imposed by Canada upon the products and manufactures of countries not within the empire in all cases where such countries fail to admit Canadian products and manufactures upon fair terms, and that the government should take for this purpose all such available measures as may be found necessary.

When the leader of the opposition was speaking to this part of the resolution, he declared that he would not approve of bringing it into effect against the United States and, of course, it does not apply to Great Britain, or any part of the empire. Therefore, as 87 per cent of our whole trade is with Great Britain and the United States, this part of the resolution would be practically a dead letter. It would appear as if the resolution has been so worded that hon. gentlemen opposite can go throughout the country and take whatever meaning they like out of it. It is the hope of these hon. gentlemen that all those who are in distress and oppressed with difficulty, and under any affliction of mind may gather around the leader of the opposition and that he may become their prince in the cave of Adullam, and in this way he may perhaps gather around him a party sufficiently strong to some time in the distant future return him to power. For the reasons I have given, Mr. Speaker, and for many many others, I am a supporter of the present administration. I am both an old Liberal and a new Liberal, because I do not think there is any difference between the two. The hon. member from Toronto (Mr. Brock) told us that the Conservatives were not ashamed of anything in their past history. He is a very fortunate man indeed who has no skeleton in the family cupboard. I do not think that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Brock) has been a close reader of political events in the years 1891 and 1873 and 1849, or else he would know, that if all the skeletons in the political cupboards of the Conservative party were revealed, they would astonish even the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Brock). For the reasons I have given I am a supporter of the Liberal party, and I shall be obliged to vote against the amendment. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members for their patient hearing.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). Mr. Speaker, I do not propose, at this stage of the debate, to go into the figures connected with the budget. They have been elaborately dealt with by members on both sides of the House. I wish merely to confine myself to a few observations which have occurred to me as I listened to the debate, which I followed most patiently and carefully. The most striking feature of the debate, so far as I have been able to see, has been the declaration on the part of a number of Liberals, that while they are free traders in theory, they are still willing to support protection in practice. I must say that I have listened with regret to many declarations on the part of Liberals that they are willing to accept a protective tariff.

Now, it seems to me that if there is one thing which is desirable in this country at the present time, it is that we should get down to clear definitions. I think it is particularly desirable that we should have a distinct and authoritative statement as to whether the tariff which we have is a protective tariff or a tariff for revenue only. I think, Sir—and I am sure that you and hon. members will agree with me—that it is not a good thing, either in the interest of the country or in our own interest, that we should either practice any deception on the country or allow any deception to be practised on ourselves. Either this tariff is a protective tariff or it is a tariff for revenue only. My own conviction is that the tariff has not been scaled down to the point of a revenue tariff. I may say that this tariff question was discussed very elaborately in my constituency during an exciting campaign which was waged there previous to the election. Some speakers contended that the tariff had been scaled down to a revenue basis, and that the government, in revising the tariff in 1897, had wiped out entirely the element of protection. The position I took at that time was this. I gave to my audiences three statements with regard to the tariff. I quoted the statement which was frequently made by the Hon. Geo. E. Foster, who, as you know, was the financial critic of the opposition during the last parliament, that the total reduction in the tariff made by this government amounted to 71-100ths of 1 per cent. I merely gave his statement for what it was worth. Mr. Joseph Martin, a Liberal of rugged independence, a very prominent figure in this country, and one who occupied a prominent position in this House, made the statement at a public meeting in Winnipeg some years ago, that the reductions in the tariff amounted to less than 1 per cent. I gave that statement for what it was worth. Then, I remember listening to a speech which my hon. friend the present Minister of Customs (Hon. Mr. Paterson) made in the city of Winnipeg a little over a year ago, in which he made the claim, if my memory serves me correctly—and he will correct me if I do not present the actual fact—that the reduction had been 2½ per cent on the tariff, or 10 per cent if you bring it to cash. Therefore, I said there were three statements with regard to the tariff—the first by a Conservative, the second by a Liberal, and the third by a member of this government. Now, I put the matter in this way—and I think hon. members will agree that it was perfectly fair ; I think the country at least expected, from the ante-election pledges of the Liberal party, and from the Ottawa platform, that if we did not get free trade as they have it in England, which my right hon. friend the leader of the government declared to be his own ideal, we would, at any rate, get a tariff for revenue only. The question then arose, what is a tariff for revenue only ? Under the administration of the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, we had what I think the country regarded as a tariff for revenue only. That tariff, as you know, was a 17½ per cent tariff. In 1878 when the Liberal government of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie was defeated and the Conservatives came into power, they inaugurated what was known as the national policy, and imposed a tariff which has generally been regarded as averaging 35 per cent. If we were to get a purely revenue tariff, I think the popular expectation was that we should get a 17½ per cent tariff. Instead of that, if you accept the statement of my hon. friend the Minister of Customs —and we will take his statement, and disregard those of Mr. Foster and Mr. Martin —we have a tariff of 32½ per cent.

Therefore, what the country and this House have to consider is this : Is a reduction of 2½ per cent a wiping out of the element of protection from the tariff ? Now, I may frankly say that I do not consider that it is ; and, as I said at the outset, I believe if there is one thing desirable in the country at the present time, it is perfect frankness in regard to this matter. Either we have a revenue tariff or we have a protective tariff. I have never been disposed to be hypercritical of the government with regard to the reduction of the tariff. We had conditions established in the country extending over a priod of twenty years; we had industries in full operation, which had grown up under the protective tariff, and it was not reasonable to expect the government to wipe out the tariff, or even to cut it down at one swoop to 17½ per cent which was Mackenzie's revenue tariff. Therefore, I was never disposed to be hypercritical of the policy the government adopted ; and when the Finance Minister, in 1897, at the time the revision was made, warned the manufacturers that eternal vigilance would be the price of protection, and when he gave the country clearly to understand that there would be a general scaling down of the customs duties from time to time, I may say that as a western man I was disposed to accept that. I was disappointed, however, when the tariff was announced, for we had reason to expect that the duties would have been taken off agricultural implements and coal oil, and other necessities of the farmers. But, the country was in a very kindly mood, and was very generously disposed towards the government, and, as the people felt that there would be a scaling down of the duties from time to time, as intimated by the Minister of Finance, they were disposed to be satisfied. Even in the west, where the disappointment with regard to the tariff was very severe, the people were disposed to treat the government with the utmost generosity.

But what is the position now ? I remember very well my hon. friend the Minister of Customs, in that speech to which I have referred, turning to the vast audience in the city of Winnipeg and drawing their attention to the reduction of 2½ per cent and asking them if they were not now satisfied. Let me recall also the statement made by my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) in his speech at Perth, in which he said, that the tariff was a settled question and had been taken out of the list of issues in this country. And, during my campaign, I was able to quote a statement made by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) at a banquet in Valleyfield, where he assured the cotton kings that the tariff would not be interfered with. Therefore we may reasonably conclude that the settled policy of this government seems to be stability of tariff.

This session we hoped to have the duty on coal oil wiped out. That was one of the great issues during the last four or five years when the Liberal party was in opposition. That duty was made to do service on every Liberal platform from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and the people of the North-west had reason to expect that this very high duty would be removed.

From what I could learn, I feared that this session the former duty on lumber would have been reimposed, and I listened with great regret to the remarks of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) on that point. If there is one thing in the North-west which we need it is lumber. There are no pine forests in that country, and we have to get our lumber from Ontario or Minnesota, and if the duty were reimposed it would inflict great hardship on our people, who require a great deal of lumber in building granaries and stables and sheds to protect their cattle and horses in the very severe weather.

As far as I can judge, we are more likely to have the tariff raised than lowered, and if such be the case, I would like to sound a warning note to the Liberals of this country. I think it is fair to assume that, owing to the educative campaign which was conducted for twenty years prior to 1896, at least one-half of our people have been converted to the idea of free trade or at least a tariff for revenue only. But, we have to-day the spectacle of the Liberal party being gradually led along the path of high duties with a prospect of being ultimately delivered right into the fold of protection, body and boots. If that be the case, a warning note ought to be sounded. I believe that the great mass of the Liberal party in this country is sound on this tariff question. I do not believe that the people want protection, and it seems to me that official Liberalism stands in this position: The voice is the voice of free trade Jacob, but the hands are the hands of protective Esau.

I like to be perfectly frank. I think it is desirable that we should call a spade a spade, and if our present policy tariff be a protective tariff—and I believe it is—and if a protective tariff was bad for twenty years before 1896, it is equally bad at present. So far as I am concerned, representing a large constituency in the west, I hope that I will be given grace to raise my voice from time to time against the protective tariff. Exotic industries not indigenous to the country at all are protected by huge bounties. But the farmer is protected in no way whatever. The question of the duty on wheat was brought up to-night. One hon. member wanted to know if the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Scott) was willing to agree to the abrogation of the duty on wheat. Well, as far as I am concerned, I would be perfectly satisfied to have the duty taken off wheat altogether, and I believe so would the farmers of the west. The Ministers of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and Customs (Mr. Paterson) will recall that when they conducted an inquiry with regard to the operation of the tariff, in the council chamber at Winnipeg, a large deputation of farmers from all over the province appeared before them and declared in favour of taking off the duty on wheat. The people of the west do not desire protection, but if you are going to protect these industries in the east—the iron and coal industries—by giving them bounties, I would like to put in a plea for a bounty to the farmers of the North-west on growing their wheat.

The future of Canada lies in its vast plains to the west, and unless you make the conditions of that country such that the settlers will be able to procure their necessaries cheaply, you are not going to promote the success of that country as you should. I am no prophet, but I think those hon. gentlemen who have traversed our western plains, will agree with me that in probably a decade, the balance of power in Canada will be vested in that country. I remember well when the right hon. leader of the government was wont to make strong pleas in behalf of that country. I am disposed to believe that his heart still beats in sympathy with the people of the North-west, and I would appeal to him to-night not to allow the protective idea to prevail in our tariff.

Something is due to the North-west, if we desire that country to succeed as it should. And in that connection I would urge a plea against the introduction of too many European immigrants into that country. We have on the plains sufficient now of these foreign immigrants. Land is becoming scarce, such as we have in Manitoba, and we can well afford to hold these fertile plains for our own sons. Let us put there the best classes of people we can procure, people with broad ideas, people with good blood, people in whom we have confidence. Let us settle these people on the plains, and then we will have a population that will assist instead of retard us in our progress, a population which will be able to exercise intelligence in the politics of this country and work along the right lines when the time comes for them to receive the franchise.

Now, although not strictly germane to this question in view of the great latitude that has been allowed in this debate, I would like to say this—that I think it would be desirable to have the government enunciate a clear policy with regard to railway bonusing, the construction of railways and the extension of our canals. Take, for instance, the Trent Valley canal, into which, I think, some seven or eight millions of the country's money has been poured in past years. Let me remind my Liberal friends in this House that for all these years they contended against that expenditure as one utterly useless, and now we are going on pouring further millions into that enterprise. I think that is a mistake. We have now expended on our canal system some eighty millions of dollars; and thoughtful men who have studied the question of transportation in this country, I think, will agree that that money has, to a very large extent, been wasted. I do not think that our canal system has been satisfactory; I do not think there are any set of men in this country today who have a clear and intelligent view as to what the aim should be with regard to the canal system. I would appeal to the House, that, before spending more money, a definite scheme should be formulated so that at least we may cease to expend millions uselessly on the canals. As to the question of railway bonusing, I think that public opinion in this country is growing so strong, that in recent months if not in recent years feeling against this system has so increased that the people will not justify the giving of one dollar further of bonuses to any railway company, more especially in the settled districts of Canada. I think we should allow it to be understood that Canada has reached the stage when a franchise to construct a road is valuable even without a bonus. I do not think we should go further in paying for the railroads of this country and handing them over to exploiters to tax us heavily under the head of freight rates.

I would like to say one word with regard to the public expenditures of Canada. I may be accused of being a cheeseparer, but I am quite willing to be so classed. There was not a declaration of the Liberal party in which I more heartily acquiesced than that made by the Hon. Mr. Mills and endorsed by the hon. premier and also by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies). If you put us in power, said these hon. gentlemen prior to 1896, we will be able to reduce the amount charged for running the machine by two or three—and I think they went as far as to say four or five—millions of dollars. I think they were perfectly sincere in that. In discussing this question with a Liberal friend the other day, he said: 'Mr. Richardson, I do not think this country wants any reform, I do not think the people desire it; what they want is a liberal expenditure of money, and, for my part I have come to the conclusion that it is scarcely worth while trying to advocate any reform in this country.' If that proposition is true, it is an appaling one, and one that every member should take into serious consideration. It may be that our friends who sit on the treasury benches have come to the conclusion that they would not make the mistakes that Mackenzie made—if they were mistakes—and that the country desires a lavish expenditure of money. If they have conscientiously reached that conclusion, I think it is most unfortunate. I believe that we can save not merely three or four or five millions in the public expenditure, but possibly seven or eight millions. I believe that the departments are loaded up far beyond the necessities of the public service, and I believe that all along the line great savings could be effected. I believe, further, that in this time of prosperity, when Providence has smiled upon us—(I do not attribute good times to the action of the government, though I would not like to deprive the government of any credit due to them in facilitating the matter so far as in them lies)—now that we are having these years of plenty, we ought to take serious stock of our affairs and endeavour, as far as possible, to curtail the public expenditure and reduce the public debt. I believe the time will come, and come soon, when we shall not have as good times as we have now, and instead of large surpluses—on the possession of which I congratuate the country—we will have to face deficits. And it is well, in view of these possibilities, that we should exercise great economy in running our affairs. I believe with ex-President Cleveland that public office is a public trust. To my mind no statesman or philosopher ever made a better declaration than that. Without lecturing the House, I think we should get our minds fairly seized of that idea. And if the members of the government were fairly seized of that idea, I believe greater care would be exercised with regard to the distribution of bonuses and with regard to expenditures generally. I believe that the distribution of these bonuses is one of the causes, perhaps the principal cause, of the corruption that prevails throughout the country at the present day. I am not prepared to say that corruption is especially due to the operations of the Liberals or operations of the Conservatives; both parties are to my mind equally blameworthy. All men who are fair-minded know that corruption exists to a very large extent at the present time. I think it would be the duty of public men to put an effective veto on corruption. I do not see anything higher they could do in the interest of humanity than that corruption should be wiped out as far as possible.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.) Where is it?

Mr. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). If the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Ross) does not know that there is corruption in this country, it would be quite useless for me to attempt to enlighten him. I say that, inasmuch as these bonuses are the greatest sources, in my estimation, of corruption, I believe that the sooner we stop them and the sooner the government secures control of the railways and of transportation, the better it will be in the best interests of the country. For, after all, the loss of a few hundreds of thousands of dollars, in my opinion, is nothing compared with the demoralization of the people.

Now, I am sure hon. gentlemen will realize, in view of the statements that I have made, that it will be impossible for me to support the amendment. The amendment calls for adequate protection to our industries. I think our so-called industries have been protected entirely too much, and the period of protection has been already too long. I believe the time has come not merely for lopping away the mouldering branches, but for stripping the tree comparatively bare. I believe that most of these industries should stand upon their own feet without protection, and, believing so, I find it impossible to support the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition. I am not here to say that I think free trade is possible in Canada at the present. I believe, that for a long time to come at least, it will be necessary to raise our revenue by tariff duties.

My hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Scott) made to-night what I think was a very convincing argument, when he quoted the figures of the revenue received under the 35 per cent protective tariff on agricultural implements which prevailed prior to 1894, and the figures of the revenue received under the tariff revised by the Conservative party in 1894, that is, when the duties were reduced on agricultural implements from 35 per cent to 20 per cent. My hon. friend was able to show that the revenue increased five or ten times, I think; anyway, to an enormous extent. I was going to suggest to him that he would have made his argument even stronger had he taken the year 1899 instead of 1900. He shakes his head, probably he knows, having gone over the figures. The reason why I think the argument would have been stronger if taken from 1899 is, that last year, as hon. gentlemen know, we had a very serious crop failure in Manitoba, and there was a much smaller purchase of agricultural implements for that reason. I believe that had he taken 1899 he would have been able to make a better comparison. However, his comparison was sufficient to satisfy me and to satisfy all hon. members in this House that you can gather more revenue out of a lower tariff than from a high one; that you make nothing out of a protective tariff, you simply put money into the pockets of the manufacturers instead of into the public exchequer. This argument reminded me of the language I used to hear from the leader of the House in the old days, and which appealed to me especially as a young man, who was sitting at the feet of Gamaliel and receiving lessons with regard to protection and free trade. I may say that so far as my own view goes, I stand by the position which I have held for the last fifteen or twenty years with regard to the tariff. As a western man I do not see how I could take any other position, because if there is one thing that the country requires, it is to have the duties lowered or wiped out altogether from the necessaries of the settlers.

Mr. JABEL ROBINSON (West Elgin). Mr. Speaker, I shall have to speak this evening to a very thin House, as I see that a good many members are absent. Now, Sir, I think it would be well, if we really are the servants of the people, that our masters should send spotters to this House to see how their servants are attending to their duties, because I notice many seats on both sides of the House are empty. I think that is not what we get our indemnity for. I do not wish to be critical, I do not wish to be hard on the members that are absent, because they cannot hear me. I have sat here since this House opened, and I have noticed a great many times that the ministerial benches were occupied either by the Prime Minister or the Finance Minister; one of them is always in his seat, more often the Prime Minister. Now, if I have said anything that will induce a member to be in his seat regularly, I think I have accomplished something. As regards the question before the House, I do not suppose I can throw much light upon it. I must say, however, after listening to the discussion from both sides of the House, that it has turned more often on something else than either the budget or the amendment. The question has been discussed at great length from the political standpoint, and I think the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) is the only member that has spoken this evening from the Independent standpoint. I think it is my duty to take the same line. I was, as you know, elected an independent, and I intend to pursue that course as long as I sit in this House. I will support any government as long as they bring down good measures; as long as they are truthful, faithful and honest to this country I will support them.

Now, this question of the budget is a very difficult thing, perhaps, for a farmer to undertake to criticise. But if I criticise it at all it will be from the farmer's standpoint. You know that politics run very high in this country, they say there is more politics in Canada to the square inch than in any other country in the world, and I believe it. I was at a threshing bee some years ago, and I am going to tell you what I heard. I see it is in order to tell stories in this House, to talk religion, to do almost anything, so I will tell you a story showing the condition of politics in the section of country in which I live. Two farmers, both of them intelligent men, were discussing politics—there were over a dozen of us present. The two men grew quite warm over it, very warm indeed, and one of them broke out in language something like this : 'The Tories may all go to ——' he meant Hades, but he said another place—into the place where his Satanic majesty resides, I believe. The other gentleman replied : 'There is one thing certain, there will be no Grits in heaven.' I came to the conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that I would remain an Independent, because heaven was not made in vain, and the Independents will be there sure.

Now, there are a number of things in the budget that I think are all right. There are some things, perhaps, in the amendment that may be all right ; but I have been a free trader for over fifty years, and I cannot swallow the high protective duty in that amendment. I say this much, as I admire many of the actions of the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, for I believe they are in earnest, I believe they are trying to do as their constituents told them to do ; but when they advocate a high protective tariff, which means that the farmers of this country will have to pay higher for everything that they require, and probably get less for everything they raise, then I am sure I cannot possibly follow them. Then, they say that they are opposed to the preferential tariff with Great Britain. On that question I have my ideas. I stop and think of what happened in years gone by. I always thought that the Conservative party were the most loyal party we had. I thought they were true, and especially true to the mother country, but when I find that they stand out so strongly against the preferential tariff, I exclaim : 'Oh, how my idol is shattered.'

I am sorry for one reason that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) is not in his seat. He is getting old now like myself and it requires an active, smart, able, young man to fill that position because he has to look out markets for us. I am sorry, and I think he is sorry too, that he made a speech five years ago when he said that the office which he now holds, and to which he was about to be promoted, was of no use whatever, in fact, that it was like the fifth wheel to the coach. Further, he said, that if we raised more than $38,000,000 it would be a disgrace and a shame. I am reminded that the Psalmist said : 'Oh, that mine enemy would write a book.' The hon. gentleman's political foes say, 'Oh, that mine enemy would make a speech,' because it comes back on him and tells with great force against him. As far as the budget is concerned, it is a very difficult matter. If the Independents of this House were in power we would find it perhaps very difficult to arrange so that we could make both ends meet or come out within half a million of dollars of doing so. We would perhaps have as much difficulty as the members of the government have. However, we would be in hopes that we would have the balance on the right side of the ledger and have something more instead of having a deficit. We would rather have a favourable balance, but, we believe that it is the duty of the government to raise as much as they require to meet the expenditure of the country and that when they raise more money which is not required it seems to me that they should do what every good farmer would do, who had a mortgage on his farm. He would not go and spend the money on finery or on furniture. He would pay off the mortgage, but, instead of that we find that the government, in the last four or five years have added about $7,000,000 to the public debt. It seems to me that the government should at least live within their income and pay off something of the national debt. That is what I believe should be done with the surplus. However, they have thought otherwise. As far as this question of trade is concerned, I may say that those hon. gentlemen on this side of the House who are asking for increased protection, who advocate high duties on everything that is manufactured in this country, and who propose to prevent British goods coming in here in order to protect people who are engaged in business, take a position with which I do not agree. Of course, we do not blame hon. members who represent urban constituencies and are endeavouring to please their constituents, but, on the other hand, those of us who represent rural constituencies will not be justified in going back to their constituents and telling them that they have advocated a high protective tariff. I do not see how they can square themselves with their constituents. What does a high protective tariff mean ? It means that some few men are going to become immensely rich while the rest of us are immensely poor. If you cannot get a sufficient number of specimens of this class of people in our own country you only have to cross the border and you will find millionaires and multi-millionaires whose wealth is the result of protection. Carnegie does not know what to do with his money. He is bringing some of it to Ottawa. He does not know what to do with the money he has made out of the farmers and out of the fools in the United States. There are hundreds of men like him and it is all brought about by high protection in that country. We have been following here in the same footsteps. Hon. gentlemen on this side of the House want to continue in his footsteps.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. ROBINSON (West Elgin). An hon. gentleman says 'hear, hear.' Well, he is not a farmer ; he does not have to pay for it. Now, we are told that this government had the largest surplus that was ever produced in Canada. According to the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell), this is not the largest, and I have not heard his statement contradicted. I was expecting to hear it contradicted on the other side of the House. The hon. member for Pictou most emphatically says that there have been greater surpluses under some other governments than under the present government. However, I will leave that for you to settle amongst yourselves. I am quite content that the government should have a deficit in the post office. If the government have acted in any one way that is beneficial to this country it is the way in which the post office has been conducted. They have reduced the postage in Canada, and we all know how cheap postage encourages trade. I am satisfied the government are justified in doing it. As far as sending soldiers to South Africa is concerned, I am sure the country will endorse the expenditure of public money for that service. It has given us an advertisement and has shown to Great Britain where the hearts of Canadians lie. In regard to the tariff it was expected, and I was expecting it myself, that when this government came into power they would surely carry out the pledges they had given to us, and I would tell hon. gentlemen on this side of the House that if you were tomorrow to change places, it is quite possible that you may not be able to carry out all the things you are saying in opposition. I notice that I have the attention of the House and I thank hon. gentlemen very much for it. I am afraid I am wearying you.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. ROBINSON (West Elgin). I was in hopes that the government would carry out their free trade policy, but it seems that they found it almost impossible to do so. I have no doubt that they did the very best they could. But, if they do not carry out their policy and if they continue in the course of extravagance in expenditure and in the appointing of unnecessary officials, they will be sure to hear from somebody on this side of the House. Why, Sir, I have heard, and it is more than hearsay, that when the Conservatives were on the Treasury benches for eighteen years they appointed seventeen supporters of theirs from this House to offices of emolument.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. ROBINSON (West Elgin). You gentlemen over there laugh about that, but I find from the record that the present government have only been five years in power and they have appointed twelve of their friends from the House of Commons to office, so they went the Tories one better. It is a shame for any honourable man who is elected to serve for five years in this parliament to go begging and sneaking around the ministers to ask an office. It is a worse disgrace for the members than for the government which appoints them. Now, Mr. Speaker, I hope that will not occur again.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. ROBINSON (West Elgin). I do not pose as a critic generally, but I say what I think and I am not ashamed of it, and I am not afraid to meet any man, and you need not be if you do what is right. I just thought that this government when they promised so many things would have at least given to the farmers free coal oil. Coal oil is the farmers' electric light and the farmers' gas. He takes it in the morning to the barn to do his chores, and at night he burns it in his household. The mechanic, the labouring man, and the farmer use it, but the people of the cities care little about the price of coal oil, because they do not burn it. Now, five cents a gallon makes quite a big item to the farmer and we thought that this government would leave Mr. Rockefeller on one side and that we 'fellers' would get some help, but instead of that Rockefeller got it. I suppose there was some influence brought to bear upon the government, and that the monopolists were taken care of while the farmers got left. We thought that agricultural implements would be allowed in free, and although they were reduced to 20 per cent, still 20 per cent is quite a good deal from the farmers' point of view.

Mr. LANCASTER. Who reduced that duty ?

Mr. ROBINSON (West Elgin). Not you. I hope you gentlemen will not catechise me because you put me out, and when I get done you can speak as long and as fast as you like, but let me have a chance now. The average life of a binder is ten years. The first binder I purchased cost me $200, and the next $120. Capitalize the interest and see how much it costs a farmer for his binders. Now if this money went into the treasury of the country it would not be so bad, but it goes into the pockets of men who form trusts and put up the price of binders on the farmers, and the government gets no revenue. Consequently the government should take some action in this matter especially for the benefit of these poor people who live on the prairies.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. ROBINSON (West Elgin). You think I am making a point in your favour, but just wait a little until I get at you. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is nearly twelve o'clock and I must conclude.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. ROBINSON (West Elgin). I am the only man in this House except the Prime Minister that you gentlemen tell to go on and speak. When I came down here one gentleman said to me : You will have a very short session this time because all the long-winded fellows are left at home, but I find that we have got some long-winded men left, and all you have to do is to wind them up and they will go on as long as you like, and say very little when they have done. Now, Sir, I do not intend to give the government much advice. I am not going to wield the patronage in my county, and I would not if I had the privilege of doing it. Anyway, the government would not listen to me if I did give them advice, but if they expect to get the votes of the farmers of this country they have got to do as they promised to do. Let them carry out their pledges. The government, of course, are only men like the rest of us and they are subject to influence if the right influence is brought to bear upon them. When a man says he is above temptation I begin to think that he has not had sufficient offered to him. Perhaps the reason that I am honest is that I have not been tempted, and I do not expect that the government is going to tempt me. Now, Sir, while I have been sitting here for the last eight or nine days listening to this debate I have taken enough notes to fill half a bushel measure, but I cannot use them to-night, and as the budget will not be discussed again I think I had better keep them until next year's budget. There are several things here I would like to speak about. I am strongly opposed to the members of the government taking part in the elections, and you know that in the old country they do not allow a man who has a title to go on the stump and advise the people as to how they should vote. I should like to see the titled gentlemen in this country adopt that system, and if they did the people would have a great deal more respect for them. I noticed that all last week two of the ministers were missing, and it was quite a while before I found out where they were. I discovered at last that there were some public works to be erected away up in North Bruce, and of course they had to be looked after. Again, I found that the hon. member for West Prince, P.E.I. (Mr. Hackett) had a grievance, and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries Hon. Sir Louis Davies) went down to look after that. I do not think that kind of thing is right. Just before the election in East Elgin the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) was up there, and I am sorry he is not in his place because I do not like to say a word behind a man's back that I would not say before his face. The Minister of Public Works came up into our county with his jaunting car or some other car, and what for ? Well, to build a drill shed. Along about the 5th November he set to dig a hole in the ground and turned the sod with a silver shovel, and that kind of thing and the people became disgusted. Gentlemen, if you want to know why you lost East Elgin do not ask any more questions. It is too thin ; a great deal too thin ; it does not do. In the constituency I represent we have not got a five-cent piece of government money invested except it be a railway which last year you built parallel to another line and to which you gave $3,200 a mile. Unless you count that, I do not think my constituency has got a five-cent piece which the government have put into it. So we do not owe them anything ; and my constituents did not send them a supporter on that account, but they sent a man.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to detain the House any further; it is within ten minutes of midnight. I know that the rules of the House do not permit me to move an adjournment ; but I will give you my sentiments on this question :

That in the opinion of this House close trade relations between all the British colonies and the mother country would be the means of strengthening the empire, and that some system of fair trade, leading to freer trade, should be inaugurated ; that, in the meantime, all the infant industries of this country should be assisted until they are able to stand alone, but not after ; that all raw material used in manufactures shall be admitted free, as far as practicable—and I mean to include in that binders, which are part of the farmer's raw material ; that the revenue required for the expenditure of the country shall be raised on the luxuries of life as far as possible ; that 50 per cent instead of 33⅓ per cent be taken off the duties on all kinds of British goods ; and that a reciprocal duty be placed against all other countries whenever it is not prejudicial to the best interests of this country.

Now, this is something of my own getting up ; I did not consult anybody as to this. But if I had an opportunity of moving an amendment, that is what I would move.

I do not know that I should say any more, except to give you an illustration of what I mean by infant industries. There was a great big strapping boy, who had grown to be quite a big lad, and who had learned to swear before he was weaned. His mother had not weaned him for several reasons—I will not give them. His mother had company call one day. It was tony company, and she took them into the parlor. The boy was out playing in the mud and dirt, and he ran into the house where the mother was, and cried : 'Mother, I want some tit.' Mother said : 'Go away, you naughty boy ; what do you mean ?' He had learned to say bad words ; I suppose he had been playing with some Grit boys ; and he went in again more ferocious than before, and shouted : 'Mother, I must have some tit.' She said : 'You little dog, go away.' He persisted, and went in again and cried out to the mother ; and that night he got such a spanking that he was weaned, and never wanted any more 'tit.' So these infant industries are strong in comparison, but still they want 'tit.' Now, Mr. Speaker, I think it is time to close these remarks.

Mr. HACKETT. May I ask the right hon. leader of the government if he will agree to the adjournment of the debate? If so, I move that the debate be adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). There has been, I understand, a private agreement for the closing of the debate. For my part, I am quite willing to agree to the motion of my hon. friend, but, I suppose, considering the number of gentlemen who want to speak, that it will not be possible to close the debate to-morrow.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would have preferred, as far as I am personally concerned, that the debate should be closed to-morrow. If, however, it is the sense of the House that that cannot be done, of course I shall only have to submit. But, I think it is very desirable that it should be closed to-morrow, if it is at all possible.

The PRIME MINISTER. I do not think it will be possible. It would be better to understand that it will close on Thursday.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of the Prime Minister, House adjourned at midnight.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, March 26, 1901.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 95) respecting the Ontario, Hudson's Bay and Western Railway Company.—Mr. Dyment.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. W. B. NORTHRUP (East Hastings) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 96) to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1900. He said: Mr. Speaker, in the election law as it stands, clause 108, provision is made for the punishment of any person who secures a seat by inducing a candidate to withdraw from the nomination already offered by the promise of an office or employment of any kind. Whether by an oversight, or otherwise, there is no provision in the Act as it stands to prevent the purchase of a seat by inducing a candidate who has already accepted a nomination to withdraw in consideration of a promise of money. The object of the Bill is to make the provision in regard to bribery the same touching the securing of a seat by inducing a candidate to withdraw as it is defined in regard to other cases. This Bill is merely to amend the law to that effect.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

REPORT PRESENTED.

List of shareholders of the chartered banks of the Dominion of Canada, to the 31st December, 1900.—Hon. W. S. Fielding.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN.

Mr. E. F. CLARKE (West Toronto). Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to call the attention of the House to what seems to be the non-compliance with an order of the House, made on the 18th February, respecting the bringing down of all papers, telegrams, &c., respecting the pay of the men of 'C' Battery Canadian Artillery, which served in South Africa. On pages 5 and 6 of the return which has been brought down is to be found a report from Col. J. A. G. Hudon, commanding 'C' Battery, dated 25th January, 1901. The commanding officer in this report goes on to say, that:

> General Sir F. Carrington, commanding the Rhodesian field force, was of the opinion that all corps under his command should receive equal rates of pay, and recommended to the War Office that 'C' Battery should receive the Rhodesian rates. Early in October I received official information from the paymaster of the Rhodesian force that War Office authority had been received for 'C' Battery to be paid from the date of their departure from Beira on the 14th of April to the date of disembarkation in Canada. . . . The correspondence on the subject is in the battery store wagon, which has not yet arrived from Halifax.

It is of the utmost importance, Mr. Speaker, that this return should include the correspondence to which the commanding officer refers. It is important for us to ascertain the nature of the correspondence which took place between the officer commanding the battery and the general officer in command of the force. My motion was wide enough to cover this correspondence, and I ask if it is the intention of the government to have it brought down. The commanding officer wrote on January 25 that the wagon containing the official archives of the battery had not yet arrived from Halifax, and as two months have elapsed since that time, we may reasonably assume that the wagon with the correspondence has reached headquarters. The correspondence referred to by the commanding officer should be laid before the House at the earliest possible moment.

The PRIME MINISTER (Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am sorry the hon. the Minister of Militia is not in his seat at this moment, but I will call his attention to the matter as soon as he comes in.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Hon. Mr. Fielding :

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to His Majesty; and the proposed motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

Mr. EDWARD HACKETT (West Prince, P.E.I.). Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a few observations on the question now being discussed by the House, I desire to say that it is not my intention to speak at any length. I am thankful indeed that the right hon. the leader of the government so kindly consented to the adjournment of the House last night. I think his intention was to go on for some time longer, but he courteously consented to the adjournment, and instead of forcing me to speak last night, gave me an opportunity of addressing the House this afternoon. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the question under discussion now is chiefly : Protection to the industries of Canada. I had the honour of being a member of this House in 1879, when Sir Leonard Tilley introduced into the parliament of Canada the national policy. That policy was for the purpose of giving protection to all the industries in Canada ; protection to the farmers, to the fishermen, to the manufacturers, to the miners, to the lumbermen, and to all classes of our population. I need scarcely say that that policy met strong opposition from the hon. gentlemen who now occupy the Treasury benches, but who were then sitting on this side of the House. We have on record that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) made very strong speeches against the national policy at that date. He said it was blue ruin to the country, and he called it legalized robbery. We find also that his colleague, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Hon. Sir Louis Davies), who comes from the province of Prince Edward Island, said that the system of protection to Canadian industries was accursed of God and man.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh !

Mr. HACKETT. Yet, Sir, we find that that fiscal system has been supported by the people of Canada from that date to the present, that under that system Canada has gone on and prospered, that her industries have flourished, and that to-day the government of the country, although they pretend to be a free trade or revenue tariff government, are bound to sustain that underlying principle in their tariff of protection to Canadian industries. Sir, if this government had fulfilled their pledges ; if they had repealed the protective tariff of the Conservatives, they would not be in a position to-day to tell us that Canada was flourishing and prosperous. But, because they retained the principle of protection to the industries of Canada, the Minister of Finance was able to bring down a budget speech congratulating the country on its splendid financial position. Mr. Speaker, there is one thing we want in this country, and that is, honest government. I care not what party be in power, whether it be Liberal or Conservative or Independent, we want that party to be honest, and to carry out, as far as possible, the pledges they made to the people. There are two gentlemen who sit on this side of the House, but who are classed as Independents, and we heard them last night rebuke the government for not carrying out their pledges to the people of the country to reduce the expenditure by several million dollars a year, and to reduce the tariff ; but, still these gentlemen told us that they were going to vote against the amendment of the leader of the opposition. How can we have honest government in this country unless the Independent members, and indeed the supporters of the government themselves, demonstrate that they are opposed to conduct which tends to lower the standard of honesty and integrity in the government of this country. I listened to the hon. gentleman from Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) with a great deal of pleasure, because he made a very pleasing address, but he told us that while he was opposed to protection, while he believed that this government had not carried out its pledges; while he knew that the Minister of Customs (Hon. Mr. Paterson), especially in addressing a meeting in Manitoba, had gone back on his promises and pledges, yet, in face of all that, he announced that he would vote with the government on this occasion. Sir, it is lowering the tone of public opinion in this country for gentlemen such as the hon. member to announce their support of a government who have not fulfilled their pledges, and who are masquerading in the stolen clothes of the late Conservative government.

Now, Sir, I want to say a word in reference to the hon. gentleman from King's, P.E.I., (Mr. Hughes), who spoke last night. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes) made his debut in parliament, and he acquitted himself in a creditable manner, and coming from the same province as I do, although we are opposed in politics, I must give my hon. friend credit for delivering a very fair speech. But, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes) was not correct in his facts. His speech sounded all right, but when you came to sift it, you found that he was quite astray in his conclusions. He said :

Some members from the great province of Ontario have asked us what this government have done for the farmers; what they have done to find better markets for the products of this country. Now, Sir, allow me to read some figures which will show what was done for the farmers of this country under the present administration.

Then, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes) went on to show that our exports of butter, cheese, eggs, bacon, ham, animals and their products, apples, fruit, wheat, flour, &c., had increased from $109,915,000 in 1896, to $170,000,000 in 1900. He said that this government have increased those exports. Will the hon. gentleman pretend to say that it was this government that caused this great increase in the exports of the country ? Does he pretend to say that because we had fine weather, because the rain fell and the sun shone and the crops were abundant, this government did it ? Does the hon. gentleman pretend to say that anything that was done by this government in any way assisted the industrious, intelligent people of Canada thus to increase their products ? Sir, it was due to the energy, the enterprise, the industry of the people themselves, and not to this government.

I want to refer briefly to the cheese industry of the province of Prince Edward Island, which has grown largely within the last few years. Who established that industry there ? The late Conservative government. They sent Prof. Robertson down there, when there was only one small cheese factory on the island, and encouraged the farmers to start more factories ; but he was very coolly received by gentlemen who are now sitting on the Treasury benches. That industry is now prospering and flourishing to such an extent that in the year 1900 the farmers of Prince Edward Island were able to export $600,000 worth of dairy products, owing to what was done by the Conservative government, while nothing has been done by this government.

We in Prince Edward Island desire to have the means of transporting our products to the markets of the old world. We have been insisting on having cold storage provided ; but this government has done nothing for us in that direction. A day or two ago I asked the hon. Minister of Agriculture what he was doing in that connection, and he said the matter was now being negotiated. We have had this government in power now four or five years. When these gentlemen were in opposition they promised us cold storage. The system was introduced into this country by Dr. Montague, a late member of this House. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries, when canvassing the votes of the people for his candidates in Prince Edward Island, said, Return me to power, and you will have cold storage for the shipment of your products to the markets of the old world. But we have no cold storage. One year a steamer called at Charlottetown. Another year an old hulk called the Gaspesia, which had no cold storage accommodation, called there. For the last two years none have called. We have been told that in 1899 this was due to the American-Spanish war, which caused a great demand for steamships, and it was impossible to provide one to carry the products of Prince Edward Island to the markets of Great Britain. We were told last year that it was owing to the great demand for steamships on account of the South African war. This year up to this time the Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Fisher) says the matter is being negotiated. Sir, I would ask the hon. member for King's, P.E.I. (Mr. Hughes), to insist that the minister whom he follows so slavishly shall provide some accommodation for the farmers of Prince Edward Island.

Now, if there is one thing more than another for which the farmers of Prince Edward Island feel aggrieved, it is because this government has allowed American corn to come into the country free of duty. The growers of coarse grains, who have a large quantity for sale each year, find American corn coming in to compete with their products, which they have, in consequence, to sell at reduced prices. This is what this government have done for the people of Canada, especially for the farmers of Prince Edward Island.

Now, having said so much with regard to my hon. friend from King's, I want for one moment to refer to what was said a few nights ago by the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver). He made a very pleasing address. He discredited Ontario and the eastern provinces. He said, we in the west are the people—it is to the great west we must look for the future of Canada. He said that the exports of this country were largely made up from he products of Manitoba and the North-west Territories. This was a sectional cry. It was only intended for the hon. gentleman's constituents, and was not what ought to have been said in this House. We know that there is in that western country an area of the most fertile and valuable lands in the world ; and we know that its immense possibilities remained closed to the people of Canada until the Conservative party built a railway and opened up that great country. If that country has such advantages that it is able to compete with and discount Ontario, Quebec and the maritime provinces, it is because of the action of the late Conservative government led by Sir John Macdonald and having as his Minister of Railways, Sir Charles Tupper.

Another hon. gentleman who delivered a very pleasing address the other evening was the hon. member (Mr. Wade) who comes from the far-famed valley of Annapolis and represents that district. He spoke at great length, and he spoke principally of apples. We know that in the Province of Nova Scotia from the far-famed valley of Annapolis and the home of Evangeline, are produced the finest apples to be found in the world. We know that the people there are not afraid to compete with any other people, not only in Canada, but in any part of the United States. But what did the hon. gentleman say? Not satisfied with the advantages of his beautiful valley, which will be blossoming in a few weeks, spreading its fragrance around, he attacked the leader of the opposition, saying: These gentlemen fear Ontario, as they have a right to fear it, because the intelligent people of Ontario are rising in their might against them. The hon. member said to the hon. leader of the opposition that the only way you could protect the farmers of Nova Scotia was to prevent the farmers of Ontario slaughtering their products in the markets of Nova Scotia. I would ask the hon. gentleman if he is now in his seat, what product of Ontario has been slaughtered in the markets of Nova Scotia. The hon. gentleman is not present.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.) Butter, for one thing, pork for another.

Mr. HACKETT. With the best grazing lands in the maritime provinces in the district which my hon. friend comes from, need the farmers there be afraid of competition from the farmers of Ontario in the making of butter or beef? Is that the only article?

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.) No.

Mr. HACKETT. The hon. member for Victoria says that Ontario butter is forced on the market of Nova Scotia. Well, if so, they get a good article. Such a cry is a sectional one, unworthy of any member of this parliament. We are one people in Canada. From the Atlantic to the Pacific we form one people of Canadians, the products of one province are sold in another, and it is a very small and antiquated cry to pretend that the goods of one province are being slaughtered in the markets of another.

I want to say another word with respect to this fruit question. I do not know if the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) is in his seat, but let me tell the House that we are able to produce good fruit in Prince Edward Island. We have in that province facilities for growing good apples, pears and small fruits of all kinds. Some years ago an association was formed, composed of men holding different views on politics, called the Fruit Growers' Association of Prince Edward Island. This association was formed particularly to promote the apple industry, and those gentlemen were enabled to send to the markets of Great Britain apples that not only commanded the highest price, but were recommended by the English fruit dealers as very choice fruit. It was supposed that this government, in which the Island is represented by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), would do something for the promotion of that great industry in that province. It was asked to send down there some one who thoroughly understood the industry of horticulture, and who would instruct the people in pruning and grafting. It did send a man, concerning whom I asked a question the other day. I asked the Minister of Agriculture:

1. Who recommended a Mr. Kinsman as a scientific horticulturist to work in Prince Edward Island during the summer of 1899?
2. What amount did his mission cost?
3. Was the minister satisfied with the result of his work?

The Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Fisher) replied:

1. Mr. Kinsman was recommended by gentlemen whose acquaintance with him was sufficient to justify their recommendation and in whose judgment I have confidence.
2. His work cost $563.43 for expenses and $304 for salary.
3. The report which he gave of his work was satisfactory.

You will notice, Sir, that the expenses are very large in proportion to the salary, and you will notice also that this was a very evasive reply. The minister did not say that he was pleased with the work done by Mr. Kinsman, but that Mr. Kinsman's report was satisfactory. Evidently any report Mr. Kinsman might write out would be satisfactory to the hon. gentleman. But in the annual report of the Fruit Growers' Association of Prince Edward Island for 1899, what do we find? This Mr. Kinsman, who was a camp follower of the Minister of Militia and Defence (Hon. Mr. Borden), for whom that hon. minister wanted to get a job at the expense of the people, was sent by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to his friend the leader of the government in Prince Edward Island; instead of sending him to the president and the directors of the Fruit Growers' Association, the hon. minister sent him down to Mr. Farquharson, the leader of the government, intending thereby to advance not only his own political interests but those of Mr. Farquharson. Well, what did the Fruit Growers' Association say. They said:

Mr. Kinsman went over the stations several times, without eliciting any interest anywhere. And this was not remarkable; for, on his own admission, he knew little or nothing about grafting and very little about pruning. As might be expected, no enthusiasm at all was aroused in the work, the most important needs, those of pruning and grafting, being entirely abandoned; and the mission which should have benefited the province so considerably, was thus quickly turned into absolute failure by political contact.

I want the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries to mark this:

Representing all shades of politics in private life we deprecate as strongly as words can express the mixing up of politics with horticulture in even the remotest degree. As an association the F. G. A. knows no party, its aims being wholly and solely to advance the interests of horticulture for this whole province, without regard to any outside concern.

The failure of Mr. Kinsman's mission can therefore in no wise be put upon this association. The F. G. A. could, without doubt, had it been permitted, have turned it to some good account for horticulture, and thus have saved the large amount of money thrown away—money so very much needed for the fostering of horticultural interests in the province.

We feel, however, that at least one good end has been served by this complete failure;—politics and politicians can make no capital out of an invasion of the proper rights of agricultural associations.

A large amount of money was thus thrown away which might well have been spent to some good purpose. We can grow fruit in Prince Edward Island just as well as they can in the far-famed Annapolis Valley. All our people require is some instruction with regard to grafting and pruning, but instead of sending a competent man, the government send down a camp follower of the Minister of Militia to assist in promoting the political interests of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and those of his friend Mr. Farquharson.

I desire to turn for a moment to the budget speech made a few days ago. The hon. the Minister of Finance found his lines cast in very pleasant places, and as he was reading over the yearly surpluses, I could see the Minister of Trade and Commerce turning green with envy. For that hon. gentleman could not but remember that when he was Finance Minister he had no surplus to boast of, although he had increased the taxes, and was obliged to tell the people that he saw no means of increasing the revenue except by direct taxation. The prosperous condition of the country can, however, be easily accounted for. It is due no doubt to the fact that this government have retained the national policy. But the hon. gentleman made—I do not know whether wittingly or not—this statement:

When I remind this House that the increase in the whole eighteen years of the national policy was only $66,000,000, and when I show that in one year only of the present administration the increase was over $59,000,000, and nearly $60,000,000, hon. gentlemen will be able to measure the vast progress that has been made in the trade of the country.

That is an unfair comparison. As my hon. friend from South Ontario (Mr. Ross) said the other evening, we have cycles of depression and cycles of prosperity. If hon. gentlemen opposite had looked up the public accounts during the last fifteen years, they would have seen that there have been as great increases in the trade of the country as during the last few years. I find that the total trade of the country in 1873 amounted to $217,104,516. In 1879, it had declined, under the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, the Finance Minister of that administration being at present hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright), from $217,000,000 to $151,000,000. Would hon. gentlemen opposite say that the Minister of Trade and Commerce was responsible for that, because he was Finance Minister at the time? Then it was that the people of the country, feeling that something should be done to restore confidence and to place the business of the country on a sound footing decided, in 1878, to inaugurate the national policy as proposed by Sir John A. Macdonald. Under the national policy, we find that from 1879 to 1882, the trade of the country increased to $224,000,000, an increase of over $70,000,000 during those years. Hon. gentlemen opposite may say that this was owing to the great prosperity of the country, but it was owing also to the national policy stimulating the interests of the country, restoring confidence and re-establishing in the minds of our people the belief that we could build up a great nation on this northern half of the North American continent. After that, we had a period of depression. From 1882 to 1886, trade fell from $221,000,000 to $189,000,000. About 1893, we had a period of prosperity, and our trade rose to $241,000,000. All this shows that we have these cycles, these periods of prosperity and periods of depression. The hon. gentleman who says that under this government the trade increased by $60,000,000 owing to the action of this government is speaking in a manner which is far from justifiable for one addressing an intelligent body of gentlemen such as we have in this House. Why do we have this prosperity? We have here a great heritage won by the energy of our fathers, and, through the statesmanship of Sir John A. Macdonald, assisted by able lieutenants, means have been afforded for the development of our resources. These men built the Canadian Pacific Railway, they built the Intercolonial Railway, they built the Sault Ste. Marie canal, they improved the St. Lawrence canals, and thus and in other ways afforded the people of this great country means to transact their business and enabled us to stand on a par with our neighbours to the south of us. And hon. gentlemen opposite, coming into power, found these great public works completed and all this accommodation provided; and now they find it an easy thing to claim credit for the prosperity which has come to us. I challenge any hon. gentleman on the other side to show where they ever obtained a market for the people for the sale of a pound of bacon, a pound of butter, or a bushel of wheat, oats or peas. The prosperity of the country is not due to the government but is due to the policy and administration of their predecessors, coupled with the energy and industry of the Canadian people.

Turning from that for a moment, we find that this government, like some other people, use prosperity as an excuse for extravagance. Last year this government collected $51,029,994 of revenue, against $36,618,590 in 1896, an increase of $14,411,-404. And they boast a surplus of $8,000,-000. Having this great amount of money at their disposal, what are they doing to reduce the burdens of the people ? The hon. member from King's (Mr. Hughes) last night echoed the Finance Minister, who said that they had reduced the taxes of the people by $2,000,000. The Minister of Finance philosophizing on that subject, but speaking without facts and figures, said that if you apply the old tariff to the present imports, the people would have paid $2,000,-000 more than they did. But there are no facts to substantiate this statement, nor is there any fair comparison. But we find, looking at the blue-book compiled under the supervision of the Minister of Customs (Hon. Mr. Paterson)—that is where you find the plain statement of the taxes per head paid by the people. According to that table, we find it plainly stated that the amount of customs duties per head of population in 1896 was $3.94, while the amount collected in 1900 was $5.37—an increase of $1.43. Assuming that each family contains five people—and that is only a moderate family in this country—you will find that the taxes of the average family has increased between $7 and $8 under the present government. No hon. gentleman can deny it, for there are the figures plainly set forth in the book compiled by themselves. They boast of their surplus, but that surplus they have taken from the pockets of the people. They are taking money from the man who toils from morning till night for his family, in order that they may spend it in extravagance. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Hon. Sir Louis Davies) will remember that, in the province of Prince Edward Island before this government came into power he used to talk to the people a great deal about the taxes on cottons and to declare that we were building up monopolies and enriching great cotton lords, and that out of the pockets of the people of that province came much of the money for these wealthy men. But when the hon. gentleman came into power did he reduce the taxation ? I find that the duties paid last year on cotton goods amounted to $1,665,293.38. The people whom the hon. gentleman represents, mostly farmers and fishermen, had to pay a large proportion of those duties. There are no manufacturers of those goods they have to be imported from Great Britain and the United States, or from the older provinces of Canada where those manufactures are established. But, the hon. gentleman has done nothing to relieve the people of that tax. He has increased the tax on brown cotton used mostly by workingmen from 30 per cent to 35 per cent; he has increased the tax on printed cotton from 30 per cent to 35 per cent; he has increased the tax on other grades of those goods by 2½ per cent. He has done this for the purpose, as the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) said, of keeping alive the cotton mills of Valleyfield, to protect them to such an extent that they will not have to shut up. Hon. gentlemen opposite speak of a revenue tariff. Where does a revenue tariff come in in respect of these goods ? Have they any desire, as they pretend, to reduce the taxes ? We remember that when Sir Leonard Tilley and the Hon. Geo. E. Foster had surpluses, as these gentlemen now boast of, they commenced to reduce the taxes of the people; they did not take from them millions of money that were not required for carrying on the public service. We were told in those days that a surplus was a very bad thing, that it was wrong, that it showed inefficiency, incompetence, inability on the part of the Finance Minister when he took from the people more money than was required to carry on the affairs of the country. Yet the hon. gentleman boasts of a surplus of $8,000,000.

Not one thing has been done to reduce the taxation of the people in connection with cotton goods. I do not know whether my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Roche) is in his seat or not, I believe he is. He spoke to us the other evening about what a great thing it was to have a preferential tariff in favour of silks coming into this country. I presume that hon. gentleman is not a benedict, I take it for granted that he is a married man, because he says there is no greater present you can take home to your wife than a silk dress; therefore, you should be able to buy it cheaply. The hon. gentleman is a man of wealth, I believe he is possessed of considerable means, and there is no doubt that his wife is the possessor of many fine silk dresses. While I approve of his sentiment, while it is quite right for him to buy a silk dress for his wife if he can afford it, what will the poor workingman do who has to pay an increased tax of 5 per cent on the printed cotton that is required to clothe his wife and daughters ? Sir, the hon. gentleman may be right, let him buy silk dresses for his wife; but let me remind him that the labouring man, the farmer, when he wants to buy a piece of cotton to make a dress for his wife, has to pay an increased tax of 5 per cent; and if he wants to buy a piece of shirting for his sons he is unable to do so without paying this increased tax; and very often these men have all or more than they can do to provide their families with food and fuel.

Then the hon. gentleman went on to talk about coal oil. When hon. gentlemen opposite were on this side of the House they dwelt at great length on the enormity of the tax on coal oil. They said : Coal oil is used by the workingmen, and you have taxed it 5 cents a gallon for purely protective purposes. Put us in power and we will repeal that tax. Now, Mr. Speaker, what have they done ? The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright), speaking on this subject the other evening, said that the duty on coal oil in 1896 was 7 cents a gallon, and they reduced it to 5 cents. Now that hon. gentleman, with his means of information, ought to have known that he was making a mistake; it was 6 cents a gallon instead of 7 cents. This reminds me of a story that I heard told about two men who went out shooting. When they came back they were giving an account of their afternoon's sport, and one man said he had shot ninety-nine snipe. The other man said : 'Why didn't you say one hundred and make it an even number ?' 'Why,' replied the other, 'I did not want to tell a lie for one snipe.' But the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce is not so conscientious. He was willing to do the trick for one cent. He said the duty in 1896 was 7 cents a gallon, when the fact is that it was only 6 cents a gallon. The present government reduced that duty 1 cent a gallon, and in doing so, they allowed privileges to the Standard Oil Company, that octopus that is not only bleeding the people of Canada, but has its fangs in the throat of the people of the United States, and is sucking their blood. The government allowed that company the privilege of bringing their oil into this country in tank ships, and as a consequence the Canadian industry became of no importance, and it passed into the hands of Rockefeller and his associates. Whether the duty is 5 cents a gallon or 10 cents, the government have put the Canadian people into the clutches of that monopoly, and the Rockefellers are taking out of this country, through the connivance of the present government, over $2,000,000 a year of the hard earned money of our people.

Now, I want to turn to another question, one that seriously affects the people of Canada. What I am about to say I shall say in all sincerity, because I represent a people who are not a manufacturing people, who have to depend on their farms and on the products of the waters for their living. Those people are great consumers of tobacco. We know that when the workingman comes home at night there is nothing gives him so much pleasure as to take down his pipe and sit with his family at the fireside and have a smoke. But what have these gentlemen done ? I find that the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) put this question to the government :

1. What was the total amount of duty collected on tobacco for the year ended June 30, 1900?

2. How much of this amount was due to the additional duty imposed in the session of 1897?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Hon. M. E. Bernier) :

1. The total duty collected on tobacco, including license fees, $3,281,639.48.

2. Of this amount $971,977.60 is owing to duty placed on raw leaf in April, 1897.

Mr. HACKETT.

Here we have this government, who are posing as friends of the poor man, and who are taxing that poor man's pipe to the extent of a million dollars a year. They may boast of their surplus, but we have here the undoubted testimony of their Minister of Inland Revenue (Hon. Mr. Bernier) that last year the consumers of tobacco in Canada paid $1,000,000 extra on account of the tax imposed by these gentlemen. But why have they done it ? Have they done it for the purposes of revenue ? They pretend to be free traders, and yet I believe that they imposed this tax for the purposes of protection. It was not done for revenue. These gentlemen have got to get back into their boots, they have got to show that this taxation imposed on the country is either for a revenue or for protective purposes; and I am willing to stake my reputation here on the statement that this $1,000,000 is taken out of the consumers of tobacco in this country to protect the tobacco growers in the province of Quebec and up in the Ontario peninsula; and these hon. gentlemen cannot deny it.

Another question I want to refer to, and I wish the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Hon. Sir Louis Davies) were here to hear me. But it seems the air was getting too hot for him, and he had to leave the Chamber. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries used to dwell on the iniquitous tax on flour. Down in the province of Prince Edward Island we do not produce sufficient flour for our population, we have to import. The hon. gentleman (Hon. Sir Louis Davies) used to tell the people : When we come to power you are going to be relieved of this tax on flour, it is a duty that is going into the pockets of the farmers of Ontario and of the North-west. Now, what do we find in regard to flour ? Last year the amount of duty paid on flour was $145,707.18. Now that the hon. gentleman is on the Treasury benches, he is quite satisfied that the consumers in the maritime provinces should pay this duty on flour. But, there was another article, including breadstuffs, with which hon. gentlemen opposite used to find great fault in connection with the late tariff and that was the article of rice. We collected in duties, last, year, on rice $180,000, I regret that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Hon. Sir Louis Davies) is not here because I want to refer to an extract from a speech he delivered in this House in connection with this very article of rices. He said :

Rice is one of a class of articles which should be first removed from the taxable list. Further, this is an article not raised in the country, the duty is not required for protection purposes, and therefore the tax is highly indefensible.

It was an indefensible tax in 1890, but the hon. gentleman sits there and defends it in 1900, because he is drawing his salary as Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Now, having said so much in connection with this matter, I will turn to the question of the debt. The debt of Canada is a very important question. The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Robinson), who represents, as he says, the largest body of farmers in Canada, will remember that any increase in the debt of the country will have to be paid by the farmers of the country, because they are the people who have their homes here, who are not birds of passage, but who intend to remain here. The hon. gentleman will agree with me in that respect. It is their contributions that must go to decrease the public debt. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) also referred to that. We find fault with the hon. Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) because, in bringing down to this House a statement he did not state the facts fairly, justly and honestly. We find that he said here that the total increase in four years was $6,996,373, that the average increase per year for four years was $1,749,993, and that the average increase for eighteen years, under the Conservatives, was $6,563,075. That is not a fair comparison to make. You cannot take the last four years and compare them with the preceding eighteen years and make a fair comparison. During these eighteen years hon. gentlemen will remember that the Conservative party took up the great public works of Canada, and that they had to go to the markets of the world and borrow money to pay for these great public works. What have hon. gentlemen opposite done? The Crow's Nest Railway and the Drummond County line are all that they have added to the assets of the country, while they have for these services increased the debt nearly $2,000,000 a year during their term of office. A fair way of putting the case would be to take the increase in the public debt of the last four years of Conservative rule and compare it with the four years of Liberal rule. When I do that I find that during the last four years of Conservative rule the public debt was increased between $3,500,000 and $3,750,000. It should be remembered that during this time Mr. Foster had no surpluses. It was a period of depression, one of those cycles of hard times to which the hon. gentleman has referred. During that period he had no surpluses to apply to the redemption of the debt, but we find that he so economically managed the affairs of the country that he was enabled to show that the public debt had increased only about $3,500,000 a year. On the other hand these hon. gentlemen opposite, with their large surpluses, and having no large public works to construct, have increased the public debt by nearly $2,000,000 a year. That is the comparison, and it is unworthy of the hon. Minister of Finance to compare the four years of his administration with the eighteen years of the late administration.

I want to say a word about the expenditure. We find, as I said at the outset, that when you have money at your disposal coming in easily you are likely to have extravagance. Now is the time for the hon. Minister of Finance to husband the resources of the country to save the taxes of the people, because, as he says, we are on the crest of the wave, for the future we will go downward, and he should have something put by for a rainy day and to meet emergencies. He is not doing that. We find that under his management he has allowed the expenditure of the country, in four years, to increase by $6,000,000. This is reckless extravagance. If he had conducted the affairs of the country in an economical way and husbanded the taxes of the people, he would be able to make a better showing than he is doing to-day. He has added to the public debt, he has increased the public expenditure, and no one could make a worse showing before the people than that of the present administration. We were asked: Where has the money gone? Why do you not vote against it? What is the use of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House opposing votes brought down by hon. gentlemen opposite? They will carry them through with their majority, large as it is. What do we find in the Department of Justice? I will again appeal to the hon. member for West Elgin, because, if there was any one plank in the platform of the body that he represents that was emphasized, it was against the increase of judicial expenditure in this country. They believe that they have been taxed too heavily for the maintenance of judges and high-salaried officials. We find that during the last four years this government have increased the expenditure on the judiciary nearly $100,000 a year. Why was that done? It was done to find places for hon. gentlemen who occupied seats in this House, and who, like rats deserting a sinking ship, got away before the storm came on. These men have been provided with soft seats, and it has cost the people of the country $100,000 more than in 1896. Then, we find an increase in the controllable expenditure in connection with immigration. We find that the expenditure has increased from 1896 to 1900, four years, by $314,363.61. Here is an increase beyond all proportion, an increase that cannot be approved by the people of Canada. These hon. gentlemen may say: We have brought in immigrants, we have sent our agents to the confines of civilization, and a certain Mr. Preston, that I read about a day or two ago said that he had gone to some unknown people and was going to bring them to Canada. We have had enough of these people brought to Canada. The hon. member for Lisgar, who is fresh from that country, and knows the conditions there, rebuked the hon. Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Sifton) for bringing in this class of immigration. We do not want any more Doukhobors, Galicians, Bohemians, and other people of the class that have been discovered by Mr. Preston. We want in this country the blood and sinew of the old land, the men of England, of Scotland, of Ireland, and of France. We should go to the men, who, next to our own people, are the best pioneers, the men who have opened up the country. We want these men in this country, and if the government are going to spend our money in bringing in immigrants, for God's sake leave out these Doukhobors and other people like that. We have been asked, on this side of the House, to challenge any amount in connection with immigration, and accepting that challenge, I say that this increase of $314,363.61 in the immigration estimates is far beyond all consideration, and that certainly the people cannot approve of it. I find also in the department so ably presided over by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright), that there has been a tremendous increase in the expenditure. I do not know what the hon. gentleman is doing to increase the trade and commerce of the country, but I do know that when the late Conservative government established a commissioner of trade and commerce, not a minister, the hon. gentleman opposite exclaimed in the loudest tones of which he is capable against the creation of that office. But, the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) has dropped into it very nicely, and he fills it very well. Now, these expenditures are under the direct control of the government, and they must be held responsible for them. We find that the Department of Trade and Commerce, in 1895, cost $11,022, and in 1900, the cost was $55,501.06, an increase of $44,476. I want to know what value the Minister of Trade and Commerce has given to the country for that large increase? The Minister of Marine (Hon. Sir Louis Davies) told us the other night that he was sworn to do a certain duty, and that he would do it; but when I called his attention to the fact that the administration of the fisheries department in Prince Edward Island was costing two dollars now for the one dollar it cost in 1896, the hon. minister could make no reply. I know the demands made upon him. I know his camp followers, who have wandered around in the wilderness for eighteen years, are pressing him, and the minister (Hon. Sir Louis Davies) had to provide for these, and so he increased the expenditure of his department in Prince Edward Island by 100 per cent since he has been in office.

I wish now to refer to a great proposed industry in this country, namely, the manufacture of beet-root sugar. We had, in Prince Edward Island, last year, a gentleman representing one of the great beet sugar factories of the United States, who addressed the farmers in various localities, and told them if they would provide three thousand acres of land, the company he represented would provide that much more, and if the government gave a bonus of one cent per pound for three years, he would establish a beet root factory in the island. The same conditions exist in the province of Ontario in regard to this matter, and the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding), in his budget speech, said:

> We have been asked to consider the question of establishing the beet-root sugar industry in this country. We have been asked to grant bounties to that industry, and we have not been able to comply with that request. We found that the bounty system, adopted some years ago and put in operation, was not successful, and we are not quite satisfied yet that we would be justified in granting bounties to revive that business.

He ignored the application of the farmers of Canada for a bounty on beet-root sugar, and later on he says in his speech:

> We think, if the industry is to be put on a basis of business, if the industry is as promising a one for the Dominion as it should be, with the bounty which is allowed by the legislature of Ontario, and with this valuable concession, for it is a valuable concession, in respect to the machinery, an opportunity will be allowed for giving that business a fair trial in the province of Ontario.

If the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Fielding) does not want to give a bounty to the farmers of Ontario, I suppose I cannot help it, but I do say that it is the duty of the minister, and of the government, to come to the support of that industry and grant a bonus for a few years. The hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Fielding) told us that the provincial government of Ontario gave a bonus, and that was sufficient, but does he not know that the province of Ontario is paying a bounty on the manufacture of iron, and that this Federal government is also paying a bounty on iron in addition to that. Sir, the farmers of this country are asked to contribute towards that iron bounty. The hon. member for Vancouver has told us that $15,000,000 will be added to the public debt of Canada in the next five years, to pay the bounties on iron and steel, and we know that the farmers of Canada will have to pay a great part of that bounty. Is the Finance Minister going to turn his back on the farmers? While they have to pay for the bounty on iron and steel, is he not going to assist them with a bounty for this great beet-root sugar industry? I ask the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Fielding) to reconsider his position, and if he weighs it carefully, he will see that it is his duty to come to the assistance of the farmers of Canada in this matter. If he taxes the farmers to pay $15,000,000 in bounties on iron and steel, he should at least give them a small bounty on their beet sugar. In order to show the feeling that prevails in Prince Edward Island in connection with this matter, I shall read a resolution passed by the Charlottetown Board of Trade on March 7, 1900. This resolution was passed by a body of active, up-to-date business men, second to none in Canada. They know what they are talking about, and when they pass a resolution of this kind, I would impress upon the government that it is worthy of their consideration. The resolution is as follows :

And whereas, it is the unanimous opinion of the council of the board of trade of this city that the establishment of a beet sugar factory would be productive of enormous benefits to our farmers, labourers and business men by the investment and circulation of a large amount of capital, and would probably, from the great expansion of trade and the increase in transportation on our Island Railway (estimated to amount to 8,000 or 10,000 cars in each year), render it in a short time self-sustaining and a valuable asset to our Federal government.

Therefore resolved, that in view of securing to the island the establishment of a beet sugar factory, we urge upon the Dominion government the necessity of a bounty of 1 cent per pound for a term of three years on the beet sugar manufactured within this province, in order to foster and sustain this contemplated industry during the preliminary stage.

I trust that the government will pay some attention to that resolution.

One word with regard to preferential trade, and I have done. The resolution moved by the hon. leader of the opposition covers the whole ground. We are not, on this side of the House, opposed to giving a preference to Great Britain. On the contrary, while it may be a matter of sentiment to a great extent, we view it from a business standpoint also. Britain has done well by us, and we should do something in return, and we are not opposed to the preference ; but, I say here, that when that preference extends to goods that are in greater part manufactured in Belgium and Germany, and into which enter only 25 per cent of English labour and of English manufacture ; when these goods come in contact with goods manufactured in Montreal, Halifax or St. John, or any city in Canada, then, Sir, I stand by the people of Canada against any preference to Great Britain. A few days ago I received a circular from the woollen manufacturers of Canada, stating that their trade was injured through the importation of these cheap goods which are three-quarters manufactured in Belgium and Germany, and only one-quarter in Great Britain, and that these foreign goods were likely to drive our own manufacturers out of the market, and thus deprive Canadian workmen of the means of earning their livelihood. I say, Sir, that we, as part of the British Empire, while we are willing that the manufacturer in Lancashire and Yorkshire shall hold his position, we want the manufacturer in Canada to be above any and all of them. I believe that these woollen manufacturers would not have sent around this circular unless they believed there was danger ahead for their industry, and that being the case it is the duty of the government to at once take some action.

The hon. gentleman is on the crest of the wave, and he knows what it is to have breakers ahead ; he may find himself in the rought waters next year. I hope the government will take such measures as may be necessary to protect our Canadian manufacturers against the manufacturers of Belgium and Germany. In this connection, I am going to read another resolution which was passed by the Charlottetown Board of Trade. In that city there is no manufacturing to any extent ; and yet this board of trade, composed of commercial gentlemen, feeling that perhaps their fellow-countrymen in the different provinces might be oppressed, and seeing that, owing to the conduct of this government in connection with the railways, the trade of Canada was being diverted from St. John and Halifax to Portland and Boston, passed this resolution on the 7th of March, 1901 :

Resolved, that this council heartily endorses the suggestion of a member of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association which provides, ' that a customs rebate of 33⅓ per cent on goods manufactured in Great Britain be allowed only when said goods are landed at Canadian ports,' and pledges itself to use every means in its power to urge the adoption of the measure by the government.

Now, I want to say a word or two in regard to my hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil), whom I do not see in his place at the moment. I was much pleased at the manner in which that hon. gentleman addressed the House, not only on the last occasion, but on the occasion on which he seconded the address in reply to the speech from the Throne. In his first speech the hon. gentleman said that we did not want in this country any cries of race and religion, and yet the other day he brought up that subject again. Why did he bring it up a second time, if he comes here as a peacemaker ? I am not of the same origin as the hon. gentleman, though I am of the same creed. I am descended from a race of men who had to leave Ireland many years ago on account of persecution ; I belong to the Catholic faith ; but I see no reason why I should parade before this House my race or religion. Why did the hon. gentleman bring that subject up if he came here as a peacemaker ? We find it raised on every possible occasion on that side of the House. It is the stock-in-trade of these gentlemen ; it is what they build their hopes on—this cry of race and creed. I repudiate these attempts to stir up racial and religious feeling. When I had the honour of being a member of this House in 1879, the seat you so honourably fill, Mr. Speaker, was occupied by a man from the province of Quebec, of the same origin as yourself. Hon. Mr. Blanchet, and there was no talk then of race and religion. To-day you are filling the same place with dignity and honour, and why should these gentlemen at this time raise this question of race and creed? I will tell you why; because the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) in his paper, La Patrie, is fomenting it and stirring it up. What did we find in the province of Prince Edward Island? We found one of his satellites going among the intelligent French voters of my district, stirring them up, and saying to them: You must vote for Laurier and Tarte because they are Frenchmen. This man remained there more than two months, going around and holding meetings in out-of-the-way places, and circulating his stories amongst the intelligent Frenchmen of West Prince; but I am glad to say that they were too honest and intelligent to be seduced by him. Although they were Frenchmen, and proud of their compatriot, the leader of the government, and proud of the stand the French Canadians were taking in the province of Quebec, yet they stood true to their political principles. As I said, this emissary remained there from July to November, and when a ballot box containing a majority of votes for me at a certain polling district was stolen from a train and never turned up at Summerside, this man was on the train. I do not believe we have a man in Prince Edward Island base enough to steal that ballot box. I attribute it to the work of this man who was sent down by the Minister of Public Works.

Sir, I have occupied more time than I intended at the outset——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. HACKETT. I am flattered. My hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Robinson), the premier and myself are the only members who have been asked to go on. We in Canada own a noble heritage left to us by our fathers. Whether we are of French, English, Scotch, Irish or German origin, let us unite and work shoulder to shoulder to develop our country and maintain it, what it is at present, the brightest jewel in the crown of the empire.

Hon. R. R. DOBELL (Quebec West). Mr. Speaker, I need hardly say that it is not with any very great desire that I rise to prolong this debate, nor is it that I expect, as my hon. colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) said, to have the last word. But I am very pleased to have the opportunity of expressing to this House what I believe to be the universal feeling with regard to the speech made by my hon. colleague the Minister of Finance. I believe it will be hailed throughout the country with the greatest satisfaction. For myself, I regard that speech as unique. As I think the hon. leader of the opposition said, it had the characteristic of being short, and I wish all the members on both sides of the House had tried to follow my hon. friend's example in that respect. I shall do my best, however I fail in other respects, to earn the thanks of the House for making a short speech; also do my best to lay a few facts before the House. We have all listened with great patience to the various statistics that have been given us during the last two or three days, and for my part I do not intend to add one figure to those given. I do not believe in this method of piling up figures and then using them to arrive at wrong conclusions, nor do I believe in compiling vast quantities of words and delivering them without wisdom. I think, on the contrary, that when one rises to speak in this House he should weigh very carefully what he has to say.

The speech delivered by my colleague the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding), I look upon as exceedingly exhilarating. Its keynote might be epitomized under these three headings: That never was Canada so prosperous; that never were her people so contented; and that never was her future so promising. With that speech I would be content to face the country, confident that it would be endorsed by the vast majority of the people.

My hon. friend, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden), claimed that while the Minister of Finance was warning us that we had reached the full springtide of prosperity, he used the simile of a skater who continued at a rapid pace while the ice was marked dangerous. The Finance Minister, he said, admitted he was skating on very thin ice and yet kept on at full speed. But the hon. gentleman forgot that our Finance Minister was careful to look ahead and had provided for another twelve months with a surplus of $6,000,000. I do not think that many of us would desire that provision should be made for a longer period than twelve months, nor would it be wise to prognosticate what might happen in years to come. If the hon. minister gave reasons—and in my opinion he gave sound reasons—for calculating on another surplus during the next year, it seems to me it would be unreasonable to expect any prediction further.

The first criticism on the budget speech from the opposition side came from the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler). The remarks that hon. gentleman made at the outset, namely:

> I must congratulate the Finance Minister and the government, as I congratulate the country, upon the statement of prosperity which the hon. gentleman has been enabled to show to Canada—a prosperity which we one and all delight in.

Is one we can all cordially endorse, and if some one had then whispered to the hon. gentleman: 'Least said soonest mended; go no further,' and the hon. gentleman had followed the old maxim and stopped there, he would have given a lead to that side of the House which would have been very creditable to him. But he did not stop there. He went on further to remark that we were only trustees for the development of this country, in which remark I entirely agree. And what a country, what a heritage of boundless wealth, Mr. Speaker, we have in our trust. We admit, Mr. Speaker, that we are only trustees, having full responsibility for the development of an estate with its boundless possibilities of future wealth, which really is beyond the dream of avarice.

But, my hon. friend unfortunately just then ran off the track and came to grief, and I am sure his remarks will disappoint his friends, north, south, east and west. He claimed that the time had come when it is no longer necessary to bonus railways.

Well, I ask, is there an hon. gentleman in this House who can support that contention. The hon. gentleman tried to support his view by drawing a comparison between this country and the states of New York, Minnesota and Illinois. But is the comparison at all a fair one ? I find that the population of those three states amounts to 14,000,000, covering an area of 198,000 square miles. Surely there can be no comparison between these three thickly inhabited states, the greater part of which is under close cultivation, and such a country as Canada, the population of which is about five and a half millions, and the area 3,318,000 square miles. In the three states mentioned by the hon. gentleman there are seventy inhabitants to every mile, whereas in Canada there is but 1·6 to every mile.

I think it would have been wise if the hon. gentleman had gone a little more into detail before making such a sweeping statement. I would like to ask him why he did not particularize some other of our extravagances. I would like to know whether he would take exception to the bonusing of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, which, I believe, has repaid this country fifty-fold by the opening up of coal lands and the development of the Kootenay country. I would like to know whether he thinks we are wrong in carrying out the pledges which were made by the Conservative government many years ago and repeated every time when they were asking for the support of the people of Canada. For instance, would he repudiate the pledge by the late government to build the Quebec bridge ? Would he also condemn the opening up of the Rainy River district, and what is known as New Ontario, and which is likely to repay us for our expenditure a hundred-fold. It would be interesting also to learn whether the hon. gentleman approves of the loss of revenue we sustained by reducing the rate of postage to one-penny. Also whether he approves of the deepening of the St. Lawrence canals. Would he also begrudge the contribution required for the Pacific cable and for sending the contingents to South Africa. These are the chief items which have swelled the expenditure during the past twelve months.

Then take the iron industry, which is looming up, and which will possibly grow to be the largest iron and steel enterprise in the world. Evidently already hon. gentlemen opposite are greatly exercised over the extent to which the bounty given this industry may draw upon the resources of Canada. But the larger the call may be the greater will be the prosperity of that industry. Once established, that industry will be permanent, and who can tell what the result will be. The fact that the calls will be heavy the next two or three years will ensure the success of the enterprise. If they do not go to work and produce a large quantity, we will have a very small bonus to pay, but on the other hand, we will not have so flourishing an industry as we anticipated.

It would be like the other industry at Londonderry—it would survive for a few years, as long as it was drinking the pap, and would then die. But we hope for different results in this case. The expenditure that is being made there will ensure for us the future development of that iron industry ; and it does not much matter what it costs for a year or two, for our Minister of Finance has wisely provided that the bonusing should gradualy die out. I believe that that industry will be firmly established and will remain, and not only that, but that it will lead to ship-building and bridge-building, and will give us the iron for our railways and all the girders and other parts for structural work. All these works I have referred to are completed or are being completed, the future will lead to new calls upon us. Shall we shirk those new calls ? Shall we, as trustees, put the property that is entrusted to us in a napkin and bury it in the ground in order that we may have it for future generations ? No, I speak my own mind when I say that the only complaint that I feel can be justly made against us, is that we have not done nearly enough, that there are calls upon us throughout the length and breadth of this land to which we have not replied as promptly as we should have done. I believe that the navigation from Belle Isle to Montreal ought to have a great deal spent upon it, and I believe it should be so placed that no one could point a finger and say : This ought to be done, or that ought to be done. It would be money well expended. It would net us a very high return before long. Don't you think we have been supine in not opening that immense inland lake, Hudson Bay, with its 4,000 miles of coast line, with its inlets, like Chesterfield Inlet running into it, and also such harbours as the mouth of the Churchill river, which would give us easy access to the extreme North-west ? Another complaint, that if I were in opposition, I would make against the government is because of the little effort we have made to win the trade from South Africa and Australia. I maintain that it is the duty of the government, as trustees, to open up every avenue of trade that we can and make us independent of other countries. That is the very first principle of free trade. What protection does for us is to give us pampered industries, industries that cannot live by themselves, industries that will want a fresh bonus or fresh protection every year—you never quite reach the point where they have enough. But, if our manufacturers are treated like men, they soon learn that they must look around them and find fresh markets for their products; and they will be able to do it if they only try. I remember that some years ago the locomotive builders of England were crying out for some kind of protection. But the government did not listen to them. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) say that he found in England a great desire to introduce protection. I have not seen it in any single paper of any reliability. I find, on the contrary, that a certain member of parliament did bring up something of that kind, but he did not secure a following. The close of the hon. gentleman's speech redeemed the middle portion and he finished with this proposition. That it would be desirable to see if Quebec would not give far greater advantages to the country at much less cost than the very expensive work of deepening the river from Quebec to Montreal; and this should be taken up and fully considered before any more expensive work is done. If Montreal is considered the best place to make a national port why we must all cordially join in carrying it out; but I do not think the enterprise should be gone on with, without due consideration whether Quebec should be the best port for transporting the produce not only of our own Northwest, but for the produce of the larger portion of the grain and corn producing states of the American union. Now, I would like to say a word or two about the amendment which has been presented to this House by the leader of the opposition. I would like to read it, and, with permission, I will read the second clause first:

That, in the opinion of this House, the adoption of a policy of mutual trade preference within the empire would prove of great benefit to the mother country and to the colonies, and would greatly promote the prosperity, unity and progress of the empire as a whole, and that the present time, when the Commonwealth of Australia is laying the foundation of its fiscal system, is particularly opportune for taking prompt and energetic steps towards the furtherance of this object.

I would follow that anywhere, and I am sure that any hon. member would do the same. But let me read to you what this is preceded by. These two clauses remind me very much of the action of a twin-screw steamer under certain circumstances. If the captain wishes to turn the steamer, he orders one screw full speed ahead and the other screw full speed astern. What I have read you was the full speed ahead. I am sure that there is not a member of this government or this parliament who would not support that loyally and do everything possible to carry it out. But, here comes the full speed astern:

That, in the opinion of this House, the welfare of this country requires a pronounced policy of adequate protection and encouragement at all times to the labour, agricultural, manufacturing, mining and other industrial interests of Canada.

Now, I contend that that is the very way to destroy the energy and enterprise of this country. As I have said, with one screw full speed ahead, and one full speed astern, the steamer turns around and makes no progress, and that is exactly what would come to this country if we listened to that resolution. And that is quite reason enough for us to oppose it to the utmost of our power.

Now, reference has been made by several members of the House to what our premier said in England almost directly he arrived. If ever I listened to words almost prophetic and inspiring they are those words of our premier. I will read them because they are well worthy of being repeated. He said:

I claim for the present government of Canada that they have passed a resolution by which the products of Great Britain are admitted in the rate of their tariff at 12½ per cent, and next year at 25 per cent reduction. This we have done, not asking any compensation. There is a class of our fellow-citizens who ask that all such concessions should be made for a quid pro quo. The Canadian government has ignored such sentiments. We have done it because we owe a debt of gratitude to Great Britain. We have done it because it is no intention of ours to disturb in any way the system of free trade which has done so much for England.

Now that, I think, should be the aim and object of every member of this House. I heard one of my hon. friends on this side tell what England had done for Canada, and he told of some of the very important advantages which England had given to us and we now enjoy—the advantages of her power of defence, the advantage of her consular service, the advantage of the mother country as a great market for our products. But these are all minor things to the great benefit we have derived from Great Britain. Is there any example in history of any country doing what Great Britain did for Canada, and since then has done for others of her dependencies? A few years ago, she gave to the people of Western Australia—and I believe that at that time they numbered something less than 250,000 souls—that whole territory of Western Australia, and the means of establishing a government in it, without exacting one shilling for the transfer of the property. Recently, as we all know, Western Australia, Victoria, New South Wales and Queensland have been welded together in one great commonwealth.

For Canada, she gave us her counsel and her help to form a Dominion which would rival the mother country in the freedom of her constitution and in independence. And what did she exact from us in return? She has not exacted from us one iota in return for all the mineral wealth of this country, for all the forests, for all the public works which had been built at her expense. She did not charge us even the cost of the parchment by which she transferred this great territory to us; she handed it over to us with her blessing and the prayer that we would become prosperous and strong. Search through the history of 2,000 years and you will not find anything to compare with that. And yet we hear some hon. gentlemen talking of the duty of England to give us a quid pro quo amounting to a few thousand pounds, probably, a year, or we will say a few thousands of pounds. But nothing in the world that Canada can give to Great Britain would recompense in the slightest degree the debt that we owe her for the freedom and blessings which she has established for us and has ever helped us to maintain. Now, let us go on and see how much further we can reduce our preferential tariff on British goods next year. I see my colleague the Minister of Finance is watching me closely, he is afraid I am going to develop what may happen at the next session of parliament, but I will not do so.

Mr. WALLACE. Go on, don't let anybody shut you off like that.

Hon. Mr. DOBELL. There is one other point——

Mr. WALLACE. We were getting quite interested.

Hon. Mr. DOBELL. I am pleased to hear that from such an expert. Now, there is one difficulty in carrying out that part of the amendment calling for closer trade with Great Britain and her dependencies. Great Britain has told us distinctly and clearly that she cannot entertain any proposition for inter-Imperial preferential trade that is not based on free trade. I think that is perfectly reasonable. I think our premier was perfectly right in saying that he had no wish to interfere with the fiscal policy of Great Britain. How can we desire to interfere when Great Britain has placed us here and said to us: Adopt your own policy, we give you full leave to do as you like. We have done as we liked, and Great Britain has never shown the slightest feeling or irritation because we tax her goods while she lets ours in free. In closing I would like to read to the House a statement of my own views made fifteen years ago as to the best policy for this country. I do not place those views before you as voicing the views of my colleagues. I think this cabinet is very happily constituted in that, while we hold different views, we adopt the same policy of hastening slowly and working towards the goal that we hope to reach eventually. It may take a long time, but I think in twenty-five years more we will have a good chance of getting there. If the country will only be patient and give us twenty-five years more of power, you will see, I think, that we will reach a free trade level. Now, this is what I said:

> Incidental protection is all that this country requires. I mean by incidental protection the collection of such an amount of revenue at the ports of the Dominion as will enable the government to pay the ordinary expenses of administration, but not duties levied as a pure and simple protection. I believe the best, the simplest and most economical way of collecting our revenue, if it were practicable, would be by 'per capita,' and not import duty at all; that the country would thrive better, that it would be a cheaper land to live in, and that people would throng to it from all countries where distress prevailed.

I know perfectly well when I enunciate this view that free trade is not practicable. We have got to protect vested interests, and we know how largely those interests are wrapped up in the welfare of the country. I see the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) is smiling, but I say in perfect candour and frankness that we cannot make any sudden change. I think, Mr. Speaker, I have said all that is necessary for me to say on this occasion, and I will close with an expression of the hope that hon. gentlemen opposite will help us in working out the fullest possible measure of inter-Imperial trade.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier). It seems to me as this debate proceeds that it becomes more and more difficult to express any view which is absolutely novel on the question under discussion. But certainly there is one feature of the debate which deserves to be noticed, and that is the extraordinary divergence of views which the debate has revealed on the part of hon. gentlemen who sit on the government side of this House. We have on the one hand many strong supporters of the government who openly complain of the present fiscal policy, and declare that the duties are a great deal too high. We have my hon. friend the member for Russell (Mr. Edwards), who only a few days ago, though he sits at the present moment side by side with a protectionist Prime Minister, declared that this tariff was one he did not approve of, and that it should be reduced. Then there are other hon. members coming from the west who have expressed the same view very strongly, and the hope that before long a reduction will be made in the present rate of duty. That is one school that exists on the other side of the House. On the other hand we have heard hon. members contending that the tariff which we have is in reality a protective tariff, that in its essence, in its main features, it is the same tariff policy that held force in this country previous to the advent of the present administration. I listened with the greatest of attention to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright), and I was considerably surprised at his arguments. He says that we are living under a revenue tariff, and that that is really the character of the present tariff. Well, Sir, believing as I do with the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) and with all eminent writers on political economy, that any tariff which exceeds 17 per cent, and which brings into the public exchequer a larger amount than is absolutely necessary to carry on the public affairs of the country, must be a protective tariff, I was surprised to hear the Minister of Trade and Commerce maintain that opinion. I had expected that in presence of these three schools and with such divergent views, the hon. minister without portfolio (Hon. Mr. Dobell) was going to elucidate and explain these differences.

Far from it. I find that, for my part, I totally fail to apprehend the distinction he made, although he is, as we all know, a practical steamship man. He has shown it in the way in which he has managed this fast Atlantic business. This idea, which he expressed, of a twin-screw steamer, with one screw propelling forward and the other backwards, I do not understand at all. He, himself, has grave doubts as to the adaptability of that simile, and as evidence of that, he said that the only way to levy money for the administration of public affairs was by a per capita tax. Under these circumstances, I say that it is not surprising that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, when he delivered his speech upon the budget, asked us, implored us, as an opposition, to formulate some policy, and to express, as a united party, what our policy was. I take exception to that demand, and I say that in the mouth of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce that demand sounds like something strange and pathetic. I deem it that an opposition, fresh from the polls, a party recently defeated by the vote of the people, have some other duty extended to them than to bob up in parliament and formulate a policy. We have had a policy; that policy, I take it, has not met with the approval of the people, and under these circumstances, I think our duty is rather to ask these hon. gentlemen to unite upon a policy, to express a policy in order that we shall be in a position to criticise its application to the wants of the country, instead of asking us to formulate a policy at the present moment. I question very much, if, in the whole annals of British parliamentary history, in a country which has some knowledge, I take it, of the administration of popular institutions, whether we will find in any one single instance the spectacle of a party recently defeated at the polls presenting itself in parliament and formulating a policy. Is it in order that we should choose a policy for hon. gentlemen opposite to take from us and administer in a way in which we do not want it to be administered? No, Sir. I deem that it is our duty to sit here as critics, to see in what manner the government propose to apply the policy which they have, and in what manner that policy is going to benefit the country. But, there is something more. There is a lesson in this demand made of the opposition by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, in this sighing which he seems to have for the expression of a policy on our behalf. I would be reluctant, after the example he himself presents to us, to formulate a policy. Why? What benefit has it been to that hon. gentleman himself to formulate a policy in the past? Has it received any execution, has it brought him to any other place than to the place he occupies, to-day, himself, than this, to see a man of his known ability and experience occupying a position in this cabinet which he, himself, on many previous occasions, declared to be a useless one, and one that should be done away with? He had a policy; he preached strongly the policy of free trade. Have we got free trade? He is obliged to admit that the policy of which he was such an ardent pursuer, such a devoted defender, has been replaced by the policy of a revenue tariff. If hon. members will take the trouble to read the speech made by the right hon. Prime Minister, they will find that he is completely contradicted, that the right hon. Prime Minister maintains that our policy at the present moment is a protective policy that has as its ultimate object free trade. Did not the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce advocate strongly, in many different forms, closer commercial relations with the United States? What has become of that? Did not he advocate that point at one time, and in strong language, in language which, I am told, was most forcible, but which I never had the occasion myself to hear in this House, because I was not here when the hon. gentleman sat in the place which we occupy to-day? Did not he strongly advocate and declare necessary, because it had become a source of danger, a reduction in the public debt? Was not that one of his strongest policies at one time? Where are we to-day in that regard? We have increased the public debt by many millions since the hon. gentleman has had it in his power to control the policy of the country. The hon. gentleman had a policy also, and he expressed it freely, and that was a policy in which, as has been stated on this side of the House, many Conservatives throughout the country coincided. That policy was, that our yearly expenditure was too great. The hon. gentleman, and some of his colleagues, declared that the expenditure might be reduced by many millions. Has that declaration been of any use to him ? Has the party of which he is a member been guided by it since they came into power ? We know that it is absolutely the opposite of that policy that has prevailed, and we heard how the hon. gentleman has endeavoured to explain away the increase of $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 in the yearly expenditure of the government. My hon. friend who was so anxious and who thinks it so very necessary and indispensible that we should go forward and formulate a policy, was in favour of a reduction in the number of cabinet ministers. One might really say that the expenditure of the country in that regard has increased instead of diminished. My hon. friend subscribed at one time, in a solemn conclave of his party, to the proposition that the time had come to totally abolish railway subsidies. That was his policy, not only in this House, but, I think, he addressed public meetings throughout the country upon this point during the period when he sat on these benches. He also formulated that policy known as the policy of the Patrons of Industry. He formulated that policy in so many words, over his own signature. What has come of it ? We never have had such immense expenditures under that head as since the hon. gentleman has been in control of the administration of this country. My hon. friend will recognize, I am sure, that at one time his policy was the total and complete independence of parliament. Has that policy been carried out ? We all know that these hon. gentlemen have violated their professions in that regard, that they have placed a larger number of their supporters in office during the few years that they have been in power than was ever placed before they assumed the reins of office during the same period of time. But, I would proceed with an endless enumeration. Was not my hon. friend a strong supporter of the principle that public works should be executed by public tender ? What has he to say to the words which fell from the mouth of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries the other day, who, in his own dulcet tones, said to us : You cannot expect us to depart from the principle that we must help our friends when we are in office ? What has he to say of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), who has made it a principle to depart entirely from the rule that public contracts ought to be given by tender ? On the contrary, I maintain, and we had proof of it the other day, that public contracts are reserved for party friends. Under these circumstances, I think that the claim of my hon. friend, that we should formulate a policy, ought to be accepted with a great deal of diffidence on this side of the House, and with a great deal of doubt. Why, my hon. friend even went so far as to subscribe to the principle, that the important question of prohibition should be submitted to the vote of the whole electors of Canada, and that the government, who had an affirmative vote on that point, should accede to the will of the people. He believed that we should do as they do in Switzerland, and some other states, and proceed on these important points by a regular submission of the question to the votes of the individual electors, and be governed thereby. What has come of that policy ? It has been thrown to the winds, like every other principle or policy declared by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Under these circumstances, for my part, I feel great confidence in the principle of lying low, of waiting, and not of enunciating great theories and principles which I never intend carrying into practice ; but, taking my true position as a member of the opposition, waiting and seeing how these gentlemen intend carrying out the policy which they set forth, in such magnificent language, when they sat on this side of the House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as to the amendment which is now under discussion, I wish to be as brief as possible, and I lay before you this proposition : That by the preference which we are granting to Great Britain we lose in this country a sum stated in round figures to be $2,000,000 a year. I say we are losing that sum, because I defy hon. gentlemen opposite to prove to us that upon the articles exported from England and which reach here under the British preference, the consumer really gets the benefit of that preference. It goes as we all know —and hon. gentlemen opposite cannot establish the contrary—it goes to enrich the British manufacturer. It goes practically as a bounty to the manufacturers of Sheffield and Manchester and Bradford, as against our own Canadian manufacturers, and we consumers in Canada do not derive the benefit which we ought to derive from that preference. Under these circumstances the question arises : Whether this lavishness, this immense degree of favour extended to a class of people who extend no favour to us is justified in the present state of this young country. Is our financial position such that we can afford to make this distribution of wealth in England where it is not required, to the detriment of our own people ? Sir, we were told by the Finance Minister that we have a great surplus, and I would ask this House how it is that the announcement of such a large surplus as the sum of $8,000,000 should have left the people so entirely unaffected. The reason is that the people take very little stock in surpluses. They have very little belief in the reality of the existence of such a thing as a surplus, and I believe that the common sense of the people which considers rather what is the state of the public debt ; what is the amount which we expend annually ; I believe that is a sounder theory than the theory of book-keeping by which the Minister of Finance arrives at the conclusion which he was so proud to announce to the House. That is the reason that when the announcement was made by the Finance Minister, the people were found indifferent to it. Why, Sir, the day after the Minister of Finance had made his speech I found myself in Montreal. I met a number of people, and nobody, either Liberal or Conservative, seemed to attach any importance to the fact that the Minister of Finance had made that announcement. In fact, the only joyful people I saw were the little boys selling the Montreal Herald at the street corners, who were announcing in loud tones : We give away with each copy of the Herald a picture of the Hon. Mr. Fielding. And when I recall the fact that that newspaper received some $20,000 or $25,000 from the government last year, and when I saw that each one of these boys had received instructions to give away a picture of the Minister of Finance, I asked myself : Is this a pure unalloyed case of gratitude, or else is it, as the cynic says, a keen appreciation of favours to come.

Now, Sir, I said a moment ago that I believe the people of this country are not led astray by this announcement of a surplus ; that what they consider is the increase of the public debt and the amount of the annual expenditure, and the per capita increase of the rate of taxation upon the people. Taking these two points into consideration we have as a result incontrovertible, that during the administration of this government the public debt has been increased by over $7,000,000, and that in face of the fact that during the years which preceded their advent to power they declared that the increase of the public debt had become a great danger and that the first thing they would do would be to reduce it. We have had also, as a matter of fact, during the past fiscal year an increase in the per capita taxation (the amount of burden which weighs upon the people of Canada) of over $1.63 per head. That is what the people consider. And why is it that they pay so little attention to the announcement that we have a surplus ? It is because they know perfectly well, as we all know, that these surpluses are in reality not in the public chest, not as a rule invested in real capital—that is to say, in capital which directly or indirectly produces some revenue to the state—but that that surplus, to a very large extent, has been devoted to special expenditure from which under no circumstances whatever can the country expect any return. If you take the statement of the Finance Minister himself, we find that he gives the total revenue received during the past year at about $51,000,000, and if we add what he calls the ordinary expenditure of $44,002,323.56 to the special expenditure which he states we have to meet before the end of the year, and as these special expenditures amount to $9,742,187.33, then we find that we have spent during the year a sum of no less than $53,844,510.39. And the best proof of that expenditure is that in order to complete the amount required for the financial year of 1900, we will have to pass an additional money vote in this House. We cannot take that sum out of the surplus indicated by the Finance Minister ; we will require a special vote of the House for it, because we have more than exhausted the total revenue of the country. I will not go so far as to say that out of that capital expenditure there are not some amounts from which we can expect a return, but I say that if hon. members will take the trouble to carefully scan each item of capital expenditure in the Auditor General's Report they will find a vast amount of expenditure which properly ought to fall under the annual expenditure of the country, and not be charged to capital account. I believe, Sir, that until we have some authoritative definition by parliament or by some officer independent of parliament, or by some commission which will settle in a permanent manner what is strictly to be called capital expenditure, this confusion of the account will always exist, and the people will never be absolutely certain as to the exact state of the finances of this country.

Now, Sir, without taking up too much of the time of the House or going into too many details, if hon. members will take the trouble to turn to these items which the hon. Minister of Finance indicated to us as being capital expenditure—if they will look at the expenditure of some $200,000 in connection with Dominioin lands, they will see numberless items which ought properly be entered under the annual expenditure ; if they will turn to the militia expenditure, they will find that ammunition itself is classed as capital expenditure ; if they will look at the extraordinary transaction called the Yukon telegraph extension, which has been perpetrated by the Minister of Public Works, and examine one by one the items connected with the execution of that work—a work which was undertaken without tender, without any fixing of the prices beforehand, to my mind a scandalous transaction—they will find under the head of capital expenditure, drinking cups, pistols, ammunition, eiderdown quilts, tobacco. In fact, if I did not fear to trespass on the attention of the House, I would quote some of those items, and it would become evident that to call that capital expenditure is not only contrary to every sound business principle and principle of book-keeping, but contrary to every tenet of common sense. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) made the statement with the utmost complacency that it was very strange that people on this side of the House should find fault, because the Minister of Railways (Hon. Mr. Blair) had expended some $4,000,000 on the Intercolonial Railway, and had succeeded in deriving from that enterprise a revenue of $4,000,000 also. We all know that the Intercolonial Railway is in pretty much the same position to-day in which it has always been, and in which it will ever be, until the management of that road is taken completely out of the control of political influences. If members of this House will take the trouble to examine the capital expenditure incurred on the Intercolonial Railway last year, a work which has already cost us something like $60,000,000, they will find that in some $1,700,000 there are a number of items which no railway man of experience would class under the head of capital expenditure. Take, for instance, the construction of the elevators at St. John and Halifax, if you wish to apply the principle of capital expenditure producing some revenue. Are these works, which have cost something over $200,000, to be placed in the category of works producing a revenue for this country ? I venture to say that if we had the total amount spent on maintenance of these elevators and the total amount of grain handled by them, you would find that it has cost about as much to move the grain that has come to these elevators as it would cost to move it with a teaspoon. Under these circumstances, I venture to say that the placing under the head of capital expenditure of at least two-thirds of the amounts mentioned by the Minister of Finance is an error, according to the principles of sound book-keeping.

It is a mistake, I think, to say that the public, or even the press, which under ordinary circumstances is favourable to my hon. friends, has been totally gratified at their administration of the finances of the country. On the day after the day on which the hon. Minister of Finance delivered his budget speech, an article appeared in the Montreal Witness, a paper by no means unfavourable to the present government, which expressed, to my mind, the views of a very large number of people on the financial administration of the present government. I have not the quotation here, but the sense of it is that there is great dissatisfaction throughout the country at the failure of the Liberal party to carry out the pledges which they made so formally to the country before they assumed the reins of office, and that that dissatisfaction will go on increasing until practical measures are taken to reduce the public debt and the annual expenditure. The same view is expressed by the Huntingdon Gleaner, a paper of wide circulation published in the eastern townships, favourable to the present government, and one which on more than one occasion has expressed its dissatisfaction at the failure of the government to carry out its pledges. There is no doubt that this government has been above all things a fortunate government. We have had a run of extraordinary prosperity, for which the Minister of Finance takes credit. But if we look at what has been actually carried out in the way of improvement during that period of prosperity, what do we find ?

If you will take the extreme western limit of the country, the Yukon territory, where, according to a report which was laid before parliament several years ago, we had the authoritative declaration of Mr. Ogilvie that there were $100,000,000 of gold in sight, has the government actually derived every possible benefit which we had a right to expect from the discovery of that rich gold-bearing country ? The Minister of Trade and Commerce seems to be superabundantly satisfied from the fact that we have been able to derive from that country sufficient revenue to meet its expenses. But is that all we had a right to expect ?

In 1897, when that impossible scheme, which the Minister of Railways then submitted to this parliament, was under discussion, when we had submitted to us the project of important concessions to certain railway contractors who were to build a line of communication with the Yukon, the hon. the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) threatened the members who sat to your left, Mr. Speaker, with dire regrets in the future for venturing to oppose that scheme. Upon that occasion, I remember quoting from an English paper to the effect that we were pursuing in Canada a policy which had brought untold misfortune to other gold-bearing countries, namely, the policy of opening up that country to all strangers, of delivering over the richest gold finds in newly discovered regions to manipulators and speculators, and I ventured to prophesy then that the people of Canada as a whole, and the individual members of this community, would derive very little benefit from the Yukon. It seems to me that that prediction has to a very large extent been verified. The Dominion itself, under the showing of the Minister of Finance, has not realized anything like a sufficient amount to meet the expenditure of that section, and where do we meet individual Canadians who have derived great benefit from the Yukon ? They are very few in number. Speaking for my own province, I venture to say that you can count on the fingers of one hand the individuals who have enriched themselves in that land which, it was claimed at that time, belonged to us and to us alone.

Then with respect to agriculture, have we made any great reforms ? With the immense revenues at the disposal of this government, has the Minister of Agriculture succeeded in making any great innovations? Has he done anything in the province of Quebec to advance the cause of agriculture? The agricultural classes of that province, Mr. Speaker, have by their own individual efforts made immense strides of late years, and since this government has come into power they have appealed for the establishment of model farming schools in that province. One at least would be of some use to the people, but I venture to say that the Minister of Agriculture is not able to point out, in spite of the great revenue which this country has enjoyed since he has occupied his position, any one thing of consequence which he has done to promote that interest which he ought to have so much at heart.

As regards immigration, I venture to say that the system which has been followed is one which ought not to prevail. I think there is a great deal of truth in the observation made by my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), and the same opinion prevails in my own province, that we should now begin to consider the necessity of reserving the lands of the North-west for our own people or else select for those lands the very best class of immigrants that can be found on the other side of the Atlantic. Those who are familiar with the system of immigration in my own province maintain that it is better to spend $3,000 in bringing out five or six or eight or ten good immigrants to the country and in looking after them from the time they leave Europe until they are well settled, than in spending one-half the money in bringing out a horde of people whose habits and education are alien to our institutions. And in bringing out good settlers, we must not forget that they will not only themselves become a valuable addition to our population, but will be the most profitable immigration agents you could possibly have. Is that the policy followed out by this government? No, Sir, we are spending over half a million dollars a year on immigration, and that expenditure has become an immense engine of patronage. We have a number of agents scouring European countries to bring out immigrants whom it would be better to leave at home. Have we the splendid results pointed out by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright), when he said it was surprising to hear any expressions of discontent on this side, in view of the fact that 30,000 or 40,000 farms had been settled during the past year by the proper kind of immigrants. I say, Mr. Speaker, that that statement is not correct. I say that the policy of importing Doukhobors, people from eastern Europe, about whom we know little and of whom what little we do know is unfavourable, is a mistaken policy, and I think that the sooner Mr. Preston is called down from the position he occupies, the better it will be for the country. At present this gentleman is travelling through Europe at a salary of $4,000 a year and expenses. The other day he gave an interview to a Montreal paper in which he stated he was about to travel in eastern Asia and to visit the Moloccan race and expected to secure there a very large number of immigrants for this country. But who knows whether this race, which Mr. Preston intends bringing out, is more or less acceptable than the Doukhobors. We have already some idea of what that kind of importation means, and of what kind of ideas such people entertain. We had the other day a manifesto in which these Doukhobors complained of the laws of this country and declared that they believed in free love and other things of that kind. We all know that these men have most extraordinary ideas about the organization of society, and I consider them a great danger for this country. That is the opinion which prevails in the province of Quebec with regard to bringing out such a large number of these immigrants when we do not know, from our own experience, what kind of settlers they will make. The other day, in answer to a question from this side of the House, we had the Minister of the Interior repudiating the profession of faith made on behalf of the Doukhobor population and declaring that it was made by one whom he termed a Russian and not a Doukhobor. Well, I find in last Saturday's Witness an address to the Doukhobor population of Canada by one of their own race, one who signs himself their loving brother, and one who evidently is a leader among them—Mr. Leo Tolstoi. And if hon. members will take the trouble to look through that address they will find there an absolute confession of communism as an article of faith among that population. Mr. Tolstoi, after addressing these people as dear brethren and sisters, says to them:

> We do not fail against the teachings of Jesus, but confirm ourselves in it; to our own we provide food and a life without care, and we can assist the poorest when they are at the point of starvation. That is fundamentally wrong, my beloved. What one calls his property he will not only not let another have, but even defend it against him with all his might. And he who wishes to defend anything by force must be prepared to quarrel, and, in extreme cases, even to commit murder. Without force, without homicide, no property can be maintained. That we get along without violence and manslaughter, we thank those whose calling it is to guard and secure our property. Every proprietor needs soldiers and policemen; will you be proprietors, then your refusal was worthless to serve as soldiers and policemen; then you would have done better to perform such service instead of to covet only the enjoyment of the acquired goods.

And he goes on in this strain, but I will not read the whole quotation. As the Witness remarks in an editorial, this is neither more nor less than a profession of communism. Are we to be told that in the whole continent of Europe, with Great Britain, France, Belgium and Germany to select from, we cannot possibly find better settlers for this country than these men who profess communism and who declare, and who come here and are even imported, on the understanding that they will not bear arms for the defence of this country? I venture to say that the whole immigration system of this country ought to be remodelled, ought to be improved, and that we should bring to our shores only the very best that can be found in Europe, and under the best supervision. On this point, as upon many others, I do not think that, with the vast resources at the command of the government, they have done what might properly be expected of them. I do not think that, considering the wants of this country, we are in a position to make the sacrifice we are making, and which I mentioned at the beginning of my remarks, the sacrifice of about $2,000,000 a year under circumstances which seem to me totally unwarrantable.

Now, I do not think that, in the matter of bonusing railways, the government, having fallen from the high principles which they professed when they sat on the opposition benches, has proceeded with the greatest wisdom. We have at the present moment in Montreal a proof of my statement. We have there a railway which we purchased at a price which no man from Quebec will deny was a very exorbitant price. I speak of the Drummond County Railway. And we have gratified the Grand Trunk with an immense sum for the improvement of the bridge, and we are paying them an immense sum annually as rent. And what is the consequence ? We find that the Grand Trunk, after this immense sacrifice made by the country, is actually working to build up the port of Portland instead of maintaining the valuable port of Montreal. And what is the cause ? One of the principal causes is the failure of the government to insert in the agreement, at the time when these arrangements with the Grand Trunk were made, a clause which would protect the city of Montreal and protect that port upon which we have spent, are spending, and intend to spend, such large sums of money. With the resources which prosperity has brought to the government, have we really availed ourselves of every opportunity in the matter of expenditure ? We find every year in the estimates submitted to us large amounts for wharfs and public buildings. There does not seem to be a member on the other side who does not seem desirous of perpetuating his own memory by erecting within the limits of his constituency either a public building or a wharf. But, Sir, even with these immense resources, has this government solved, has it even attempted to solve in a manner beneficial to this country the great question of transportation ? I submit to this House that that problem, that difficult problem, which we are now called upon to deal with has been dealt with in a most inefficient manner by this government. We have to the south of us a people armed with immense resources. They are bent on securing the carrying trade of the west. They have money galore, they have brains and, so far, in that struggle to secure for our own country at least a fair proportion of the traffic of the west, I submit we have utterly failed. Divide, Mr. Speaker, into two parts the route which we must consider in dealing with this question of transportation. From Montreal to the west what have we ? We have not those improvements in the canal system which will become necessary if we are to rival to any successful degree our American neighbours. There is not at the present moment any possibility for a boat drawing fourteen feet of water to pass through the canals of Canada. In La Patrie, the day before yesterday, we find a letter from the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) admitting that it is impossible for a boat drawing fourteen feet of water to pass through the canals—and this in spite of the statement which was made here by the Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Blair). And, Sir, I venture to say, without claiming any special knowledge of that subject, that, until we have free canals in this country it will be very difficult for us to meet the Americans on the question of transportation. But, once you are in Montreal the errors committed by this government are still more flagrant. Very far from having made of the port of Montreal a national port, that port is a disgrace to that city. We have no elevator. That is the crying need of the city of Montreal. And how have these hon. gentlemen met the call, which, more than once, has been made by the city of Montreal for the erection of proper elevators in that place ? They have committed the greatest possible mistake. They made a contract for the erection of elevators with Mr. Conners. Anybody might have known that any contract having in view the erection of elevators in Montreal which depends for its success on American capital is bound to fail. It did fail. And we have no elevators at the present moment, in spite of the claims urged time and again by all the commercial bodies of that city. I tell hon. gentlemen opposite—and I believe they will come to the same conclusion before long—that the only way in which they can secure that portion of the trade of the west to which we are entitled is by making an arrangement with the carriers of the lakes to interest them in the port of Montreal. They are able, if they are interested in a proper way and without undue sacrifice of money by this government, to erect the elevators where required —not where Mr. Conner's elevator was erected, but at the place where the business men of Montreal required these elevators. What is required is an elevator situated in the middle of the port, available for the Intercolonial Railway, available for water-borne and railway-borne grain, and which can distribute to the ships about the centre of the port, without undue expense, the grain received there. Until we have these elevators, the system is incomplete. And unless the port of Montreal is provided, and provided very soon, with the wharfs which we require there, I venture to say that every effort we may make to secure the commerce of the west will prove unavailing. And, what is the condition when you leave Montreal and proceed to the ocean? Have hon. gentlemen who sit in this House taken the trouble to read the report of the inquiry held by the business men of Montreal into the condition of the shipping between Montreal and the ocean? Why, Sir, the underwriters' rates we have to pay are absolutely prohibitive and must favour the American channels of commerce to the detriment of Montreal.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MONK. When you left the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I was endeavouring to establish that with the immense resources which a period of great inflation and prosperity had placed at the disposal of the government, the government had failed to grapple successfully with some of the most vital problems that concern the future of this country. I gave as an instance the transportation question, showing that in my opinion the transportation question, so far as it is connected with the canal system, had not been dealt with vigorously, had not been dealt with by the government as it should have been, in view of the immense rivalry which we have to contend with from the other side of the line. I had spoken of Montreal. The condition of the port of Montreal at the present time, I said, was disgraceful; and that in the interest of a proper solution of that question the government should devote its energies, its attention, and perhaps some of its immense surplus, to placing that port in a position to compete successfully with the ports of the United States, which are drawing away the great commerce of the west. Well, Sir, I do believe that if the Minister of Public Works had had a free hand to place that port upon a proper footing, possibly things might be in a better condition than they are to-day.

But the trouble is that the transportation question interests too many authorities, there are too many who have to deal with the solution of that question to make a prompt and perfect solution of it. When you come to deal with the canal system, you have the policy, you have the ideas of the Minister of Railways and Canals; when you come to deal with the ports, the landing places on the upper lakes, you have to deal with the Minister of Public Works; when you come to the port of Montreal, things are still more complicated. You have the Minister of Public Works, you have the Minister of Customs, you have a body there called the Montreal Harbour Board; and when you leave Montreal, and even before leaving Montreal for the high seas, you have the authority, you have the policy, you have the ideas of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. It is my conviction that until that transportation question, so important to us, is confined either to the final decision of one man or of one body, there will be conflicts. Conflicts have arisen in the past, divergence of views, and the consequence will be that the trade and commerce of this country will greatly suffer. Once you leave the port of Montreal and go towards the ocean, members of this House who will take the trouble to scan the report of the shipping inquiry held in Montreal, the resolutions passed by the Board of Underwriters, the testimony of pilots, of disinterested men such as captains who come to our shores from Europe, you will find that from Montreal to the sea the system of lights is entirely inadequate. It is surprising to think that during these four years of plenty no improvement has been made in our signal service. The system of fog signals is condemned unanimously both by pilots and by the captains, and when you come to the channel there are defects at every step. So that between the port of Montreal and the ocean there is no reason for surprise whatever that the rates charged upon shipping, upon hulls as well as cargoes, are absolutely prohibitive, and militate naturally in favour of American enterprise.

As to the question of elevators, for my own part I do not believe that in Montreal the interests of our trade would be enhanced by the government building an elevator; neither do I believe, we have proof of it in the past, that the building of an elevator by an American capitalist depending upon American capital, upon the assistance which he may receive at Buffalo or elsewhere in the United States, can possibly have any but disastrous results. My own conviction is that we should interest in the shipping in Montreal the carriers on the great lakes. They could build a suitable elevator there with reasonable assistance from the government. They would be interested in supplying that elevator with grain and without the expense of too large a sum of money. By enlisting the interests of the carriers on our lakes, we would succeed in bringing to Montreal a very large proportion of the grain that finds its outlet through American ports. But even if we brought to Montreal the whole grain of the North-west, as things are in Montreal at present, we could not deal with that grain once it reached that port.

In connection with what might have been done during this era of prosperity, I think it is not improper to refer to the utter failure of the government to give us that service which, to my mind, is a necessary complement of the transportation question, which is its final solution, that is to say, the fast Atlantic service. It is a well known fact that when this government came into power in 1896, arrangements had been completed for a fast Atlantic service. There remained merely the question of formality to fulfil. The arrangements were binding between the Allans and the government, and the only thing the government had to do was to put the contract into shape and to have it approved by the Governor in Council. Well, Sir, what spectacle have we had ? I do not see here the minister (Mr. Dobell) who more particularly was charged with carrying out the pledge given, I think, in the speech from the Throne in 1896, that we would have a fast Atlantic service ; but the results which have been obtained are absolutely nil. The minister without portfolio has made many voyages to Europe. he has crossed the Atlantic many times, he has lured us like a mermaid with bottle-necked ships and plans of all kinds, but as a matter of fact the results obtained are absolutely nil ; and if he were not such an amiable man one would be inclined to say that he deserved himself to be taken upon some desert island in the Pacific ocean and there marooned for his negligence to carry out the scheme for which the government gave us such high hopes. But, Sir, during this period of inflation, when the commerce of the whole world has received such a great impetus, these gentlemen who have had the government of this country in their hands for several years, have made no serious effort to extend our trade relations with other countries. They have done nothing whatever to extend our trade relations with the sister colonies, with the great dependencies of Britain throughout the world. In that respect, as in many others, we are forced to the conclusion that they have failed to fulfil the promises which they made to the people of Canada. Take the United States. You know, Mr. Speaker, perhaps better than many of us, that in the province of Quebec in 1896, and ever since then, it has been stated that very soon we would have commercial arrangements concluded with the United States. It was the great boast of our hon. friends opposite when they were in opposition that if they could have the reins of power for a short time, we would very soon see improved trade relations with the United States. We have spent a great deal of money in connection with that commission, and that commission has sat very often. Have our trade relations with the United States been improved in any manner, or is it not the case that we have sacrificed our own interests to those of the Americans without any return whatever ? What is the positon today ? We are discussing a question of very great importance. If the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce is so anxious to know what our policy is he will find occasion in this resolution which is under discussion to discover what we think in regard to this feature of our trade relations. Italy shut us out practically from trade with that country when we had an incipient trade of great hope. We are shut out from the United States, and we are shut out from Germany. All the nations of the world, practically, are in a position of hostility in respect to ourselves. Hon. gentlemen opposite think that they have effaced all that by giving a preference to Great Britain, which has had for effect, to my mind, the placing of Canada in a position most unfavourable with other countries, and in not giving to our agricultural and other products a position of favour of any kind whatever on the British market. Let me point out that with that great reason and sense which are distinctive traits of the English race, such a concession has never been asked from us by them. But, we find that almost every session since this preference has existed, the hon. Minister of Finance looks to this side of the House, and seems to dare anybody to call in question the advisability of our giving a preference to England without receiving anything in return. We heard him the other day, when he looked to this side of the House and asked if there was any man who was unfavourably disposed towards that preference, and when he heard ' hear, hear ' from this side of the House, he seemed ready to brand this expression of view as traitorous. All I can say is, that my notions of loyalty and the notions which seem to prevail with the hon. Minister of Finance are greatly at variance. When England granted, as she so generously did, an absolute and entire measure of self government to her great dependencies, she gave us a mission, and that mission was to do all that in our power lay for the proper development of our own country. Taking that view, I deem it that when we are making a fiscal policy for this country, we ought to have regard in the very first instance to what is best and most suitable for our own country, irrespective of what the interests of England may be. That is my contention, because I believe that everything that will go to build up trade and develop this country, will go to the advancement and aggrandizement of the British Empire at large. In reality, Sir, the policy of these hon. gentlemen, in so far as preferential trade is concerned, seems to be a policy of despair and inaction. They say : We have taken a step, we have granted a preference to England, but, when we invoke the necessity of putting in force the other side of the question, the side which interests us as Canadians, they tell us that there is no hope or expectation. The hon. Minister of Finance told us, in Montreal, not long ago, that a hope of that kind must necessarily be ephemeral, and that those who advocated mutual inter-Imperial preferential trade could be nothing else than humbugs. This is a proposition from which I entirely dissent. I said a moment ago that the policy of hon. gentlemen was one of inaction. Surely no honourable man who has at heart the interests of the British Empire, and who lives under the flag which waves over us, would be prepared to say that he is disposed to deal harshly with England, but are we not going to move public opinion in England in the direction of our own interests ? What, I say, have this government done in that direction ? Absolutely nothing. We have communicated with England in the past. Those who read the constitutional history of this country will find that time and again we have made representations to the home authorities. We have made representations, for instance, on the instructions that were given under letters patent to the Governors General sent out to this country, we have made representations in reference to home rule, we have passed a resolution in respect to the Transvaal war, and not long ago we adopted a resolution in respect to a matter concerning, if I may use the expression, the internal economy of the British government, in connection with the coronation oath. But, when it comes to making representations to the home government in respect to the necessity and the sheer justice of giving us a more advantageous position in the home market, this government have done absolutely nothing. They have never taken a single step. I defy these hon. gentlemen to show us one single communication they have made to the home government in respect to what I consider to be the just demands of Canadians in regard to our position upon the British market. They have never moved one step in that direction. Well, this is a strange position for these hon. gentlemen to occupy. A couple of days ago, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, I believe it was, told us that, perhaps, in thirty or forty years, we might expect the realization of our hopes, but, we all know, that in England there is no better way of awakening public opinion than by just such representations as I say this government have failed to make. What did Lord Salisbury say after the convention which took place in Ottawa in 1894 ? I believe the resolutions of that convention were conveyed to him. He stated that the idea of mutual preferential trade was a grand idea, that it was a just idea in so far as we were concerned, but, he said, we are living in a country where popular government prevails; public opinion has not yet moved in that direction, go out and preach the gospel of mutual preferential trade, and when the public of Great Britain will have become aware of the justness of your demands, of the fairness of your proposals, I have no doubt this idea will then be realized. What have these hon. gentlemen done to move public opinion in England ? Oh, we have commissions to sit upon poor civil servants and employees, commissions that cost thousands of dollars, most of which money has been uselessly spent ; but, why have we not a commission, which would cost very little in comparison with the results to be attained, to inquire into this question of vital importance to us, a commission that would sit and do just such a work as was done by that gentleman from Nova Scotia who obtained the thousand guinea prize for an essay on fair trade. I forget his name, but he is well known in public life. Why have we not a commission to study the question, and bring the results of its studies both before the British public and the public of our own country ? I say that this inaction is guilty, and that it indicates that the government are not alive to the importance of our demand in that regard. Have we found any of the members of the government taking an active interest, a live interest, in the congresses of the boards of trade which have taken place since they occupied the Treasury benches, and endeavouring, through these congresses, to move public opinion in the proper direction ? It has been a policy of absolute inaction. We have a High Commissioner in England, we pay a considerable salary to that gentleman, and it is proper that we should have near the home government, a man in that position. It is, I take it, his chief mission to represent to the home government what our interests are, particularly in commercial matters. Has he received any instructions? Has he been requested to make this a cardinal question during his mission in Great Britain, and to endeavour to move public opinion there in the right direction. I defy the government to give us any proof that they communicated with our High Commissioner, asking him to interest the government of England on our behalf and to move public opinion in so far as he could in a direction which is favourable to our interests. The government have not sent representatives to the chief centres of England to test public opinion and to suggest to us the best means of directing it in our favour. And when we come to the press which supports the present government, we find throughout its writings the same policy of despair, and of flippant contempt for every effort made to secure the inestimable boon of mutual preferential trade. We find the Liberal press stating that any person who moves in that direction does not know what he is talking about, and that there is no hope that the present condition of things will change. If we are to believe these gentlemen opposite we are to remain exactly as we are. We are to have no favoured consideration in any of the great markets of Europe in which we might trade, while upon the British market itself we are to be placed absolutely on a par with every foreign nation which raises up a high tariff wall against British goods. Well, Sir, to my mind that position is one that cannot last for a very long time. Have this government invited the consideration of the other colonies to this important question which interests every one of the great dependencies of Great Britain ? No, Sir, they have not sought the support of one of the great colonies to help us towards the achievement of mutual preferential trade. Their policy is one of absolute inactivity. And as regards personal efforts of the ministers, I think the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) was perfectly right in saying that the government had absolutely stumbled into this policy. We who sat in the last parliament know that when the preference was first proposed the responsible representatives of the government stated that the preference was to be extended to every country in the world, and when they did restrict the preference to Great Britain they never endeavoured to attract the attention of the English government to what I consider a most legitimate demand on our part. When the right hon. the Prime Minister went to England he was the first to declare that we had no desire for mutual preferential trade, but that on the contrary we offered the preference as a free gift and we did not expect anything in return. Since then other ministers have crossed the ocean and what have they done in the way of obtaining this, to us admittedly inestimable advantage of mutual preferential trade. Last summer four of our ministers went to England, but they did nothing in this matter. Why, if we are to believe what the gossips tell us, three of those ministers went over on the war path. They went to France for the purpose of returning with the scalp of the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte), and they were busy with very different things than the securing of a proper market for Canadian products in England. And, Sir, they failed even in the object for which they crossed the ocean. The three ministers who are known in Quebec as 'the Three Musketeers' returned in one ship, and the Minister of Public Works apprised that there was some conspiracy directed against him returned in another ship. It reads almost like one of Marryat's novels or a chapter from Robert Louis Stevenson's Treasure Island, and what is strange, the Minister of Public Works got here before them, because while they were on the high seas shooting the sun and trying to find out where Labrador was, he had arrived in Quebec and had maintained the position which he thought —and probably properly thought—he was entitled to in this government.

When the British government concluded this modus vivendi with Germany, a modus vivendi under the terms of which we in Canada are sacrificed, did the Canadian government intervene to obtain for our products in Germany at least an equivalent position with that of British goods? No, Sir, they never moved. They never made any effort in that direction either before or since, and to-day we are in the unfortunate position in the German market, which was pointed out by my hon. friend (Mr. Osler) who replied to the Minister of Finance, and no steps have been taken to rectify that situation. I believe that the sentiment prevails through Canada as it prevails in my own province, that in giving a preference to England we are entitled in return to a preference in the British market. Last year when we discussed this question I communicated to the House a very able report adopted by the Chambre du Commerce, of Montreal, which is composed of men who belong to all political parties, businessmen and bankers, and they were unanimously of opinion that the present situation is one which can only be of a most transitory nature, and that we must have such a zollverein between the British dependencies and the mother country, as will secure for Canada a favoured position for her products in every portion of the British Empire. In supporting the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition, I am perfectly sure I am voicing the opinion of the people of the province of Quebec.

Before I resume my seat, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make an allusion to some remarks which fell from my hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Marcil) deemed it necessary to apologize for the vote of the province of Quebec in the last election, a proceeding which to my mind was absolutely uncalled for. I am not aware that any member of this House has made any reflection or any complaint as to the verdict given by the province of Quebec. I am pleased to say that even outside of this House I have not heard from any member of my own party any word of reproach. I have heard nothing but the kindest observations so far as the province of Quebec is concerned.

Mr. BOURASSA. What about the letter of the member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper)?

Mr. MONK. Well, what about it?

Mr. BOURASSA. Did you read it?

Mr. MONK. Did the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bourassa) read it?

Mr. BOURASSA. Yes.

Mr. MONK. Well, what is his opinion?

Mr. BOURASSA. He says the vote in Quebec was entirely due to racial feeling.

Mr. MONK. I did not read that; but I must confess that if that is what the hon. member for Pictou stated, he is not a resident of the province of Quebec, and in that regard I think he is mistaken.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONK. The fact is, Sir, we on this side of the House are in favour of freedom of elections, and we consider that the province of Quebec was free to vote as it liked. That great province during a long time supported the Conservative party—gave a most generous support to that party. Upon the question of the national policy, which is so derided by hon. gentlemen opposite, I do not think the province of Quebec has any reason to be ashamed of its record, because it supported that policy for many years. Speaking as a member of the Conservative party, I do not consider the province of Quebec as estranged entirely from us and our policy—by no means. In fact, I must state frankly that I believe elections in the province of Quebec are carried on pretty much as they are anywhere else. Public questions are studied and examined and judged by our people with great accuracy. That is my own personal opinion. In fact, I would go the length of saying very frankly that I do not believe there is any province in this Dominion where such a keen interest is taken in the great public questions, such as the one now under discussion, as in the province of Quebec ; and the great issues before the country were certainly amply discussed in that province during the last election. Of course, any man who would say boldly that considerations of race, so far, at any rate, as the right hon. Prime Minister being of the nationality of the majority of that province was concerned, were absolutely not considered by the electorate, would, I think be considerably mistaken. But in that, as hon. gentlemen will admit, there are limits, which it is easy for any man of judgment to establish in his own mind. But other questions were discussed, and to my mind it would certainly be unfair to that great province to say that in the verdict which it gave in the last election it was led purely and simply by racial considerations. The fact is there were other causes affecting the result of the elections in that province and it would be most unfair to say that that cause alone operated. Of course, hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House know that not only in the province of Quebec, but everywhere else, in the heat and struggle which accompanies an electoral contest, parties who are not very responsible sometimes give utterance to sentiments which savour of violence and perhaps appeals to prejudice. But I say truthfully that I am not aware that in that respect the province of Quebec is any worse than any other province. I will give you an instance. Any one who would calmly and coolly sit down and group together and print in a pamphlet, opinions which might hurt the members from the province of Ontario—any one who would cull articles taken from the Quebec press, supposing such articles existed, and group them in a pamphlet, and coolly circulate that pamphlet through the province of Ontario, would be considered as acting unpatriotically and without judgment. Hon. members know that in the heat of the last election there was issued a pamphlet which did us on this side of the House a great deal of harm. That pamphlet purported to contain —I never myself had time to verify it—articles from certain newspapers, purported to give chapter and verse for those articles; and it was circulated just before the election. I speak of it with some knowledge, because when I saw that pamphlet, I confess to you frankly, I thought I was a goner.

Mr. BOURASSA. When you had your friends' literature ?

Mr. MONK. We had our press literature, but we had not a red pamphlet. We know that in England, where elections are properly carried on, as far as they can be, things of that kind are sometimes resorted to. But that red pamphlet, I tell you frankly, I believe accounted for the defeat of some of us.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure). Does the hon. gentleman allude to pamphlet No. 6 ?

Mr. MONK. Oh, no ; it was a far more deadly pamphlet than that. At that moment, when I deemed that everything was lost, the man who came to my rescue was a gentleman who sits on the front row of government benches ; I speak of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) ; and I for one felt like crossing the floor of the House and giving him my thanks for the service he had rendered me. I do not know how he would take it, so I prefer giving him my thanks from this distance. When we got the manifesto of the hon. member for North Norfolk, in which he proposed over his own signature that a British corps should be sent to garrison Quebec, I thought he had rendered me a great service ; and I must confess to you, if it was raising the race cry, that I made good use of that manifesto. After I had used it several times, I thought the red pamphlet had lost a good deal of its virtue.

Mr. BOURASSA. Will the hon. gentleman add that in consequence of that manifesto the hon. member for North Norfolk was chosen by the Conservative party as their candidate in Ontario ?

Mr. MONK. I did not know that, and I am not aware of it yet.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. I can only say that the hon. member for North Norfolk is paired with a good Conservative this session on all party questions.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. He was not opposed by them.

Mr. MONK. I would not like the House to suppose that the election in the province of Quebec turned on these questions. I mention them simply as incidents. After we got that manifesto, the people in my county at any rate thought things were pretty well squared up, and they came to the conclusion that if, as alleged, the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) breakfasted off a Catholic every morning, then that the hon. member for North Norfolk dined off a Frenchman.

Mr. SPROULE. The diet seems to have agreed with them.

Mr. MONK. I could give numberless instances in which the population of that province was by no means governed by mere sentimentality. Hon. members from that province will bear me out when I say that there probably never was or will be a man who was a greater popular idol than the late Honoré Mercier. In 1890 he was in the zenith of his power, in 1892, as far as I could judge, the affection of the people for his person had not in any way changed, but on account of the acts of his government—acts for which probably he himself was not responsible—there was a vote which swept him and his friends from power. That with other incidents which I could quote prove that the people of the province of Quebec, when it comes to an election, exercise their better judgment and are not, as is believed in some quarters, entirely governed by feelings or prejudice of race and religion.

Mr. HUGHES (North Victoria). Are we to infer that there is a sweep coming soon now ?

Mr. MONK. I believe there is, but if I entertained the idea that that population was governed solely by feelings of that kind, I would despair almost of the advancement of this country. I would despair of an element which allowed itself to be governed entirely by such feelings ; and if I remain in public life, and give, such as they may be worth, my services to that province, it is because I entertain the conviction that such is not the case. I entertain a firm abiding hope in that population. Hon. members who are perhaps strangers to that province will believe me when I say that it is almost incredible the progress which the French Canadian population of Quebec have made within the last quarter of a century. Within the time I have attained the years of manhood, their progress in elementary education, in the higher education, in science, arts and literature, and in agriculture, has not been excelled, if equalled, by any other population in this Dominion. Their progress in agriculture alone is something which does them infinite honour. In every calling of life, banking, business, there has been progress ; they are a population gifted in an extraordinary degree by Providence—a population that has realized that there is no bar to their progress, and that is the greatest hope I have in them. They desire to go forward, they have no other home but this country, no other desire but to build up this country in common with other nationalities. Some people would perhaps say that they entertain the expectation of establishing here a dependency of France, but those who know the people of Quebec know that that idea never had any existence in their minds. The people of Quebec know as well as I do what the colonial rule of continental nations is, and I venture to say that they would not for a moment think of accepting the colonial rule of France, though attached, as they are, to that country, by tradition. They could not stand it for six weeks. And the annexation sentiment, which has existed in some part or other of this country at times, does not exist in the province of Quebec today. Our people have only one desire—this is essentially their home, their country—and that desire is to build up this country and to act in that respect in conjunction with other nationalities. This is calculated to give every man who has the future of this country at heart great hope, because these people are an important element, an element that must be counted with, and I believe that when important crisises come upon this country, when we require to stand together, whatever may be the reason, when we require to put our shoulders to the wheel in order to make this great inheritance which Providence has given us a grand and powerful country, they will not be found behind any other nationality.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Hon. Wm. Paterson). The debate, Mr. Speaker, which has gone on for many days, has been interesting and brought out many subjects which I would like to discuss, but I recognize the fact that there are others who desire to address this House on the policy of the government and that proposed by the opposition, and that it is desirable a vote should soon be taken, and therefore I shall endeavour to make the few remarks I have to offer on this occasion as brief as possible. I may say at the outset that, in my opinion, the concluding remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken are of a character which meets with my approval, and which I think will tend to the benefit of the country. With the tone of the hon. gentleman's speech I have no fault to find, but when he endeavoured to point out that on this side of the House it was difficult to ascertain what particular views we held with regard to tariff matters, it seemed to me that the hon. gentleman's remarks would have been more apt if applied to his own side. After stating that we on this side did not all hold the same views, as might be expected from a party supposed to act together, he very frankly told us that he had his own views peculiar to himself, and that while the opposition held certain views, it was no part of their plan or policy to let the country know what these were. We all believe, the hon. gentleman said, in lying low. Our policy, I understood him to say, is to let the government go on and not interfere, and if we have any plan that we think would be better for governing the country, if we have any policy that would conduce more to its best interests, it is no part of our duty to give the country the benefit of it, but we will content ourselves with just playing the part of critics on any course pursued by the party in power. Then I would ask the hon. gentleman, if that be the policy of his party—and he, as first lieutenant ought to be able to speak for it—how comes it that this amendment was brought in by his leader. The hon. gentleman is second only to his leader, he is the first lieutenant of his party, but did not happen to be in the House at time the resolution was introduced. That resolution was therefore seconded by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) and by it we are given the declared policy of the Conservative party. These hon. gentlemen then did not follow my hon. friend's advice, they did not lie low. But the hon. gentleman happened to be absent at the time, and in his absence that policy which he advocates was lost sight of, and we have now a declaration of what the policy of the opposition is. If the hon. gentleman desired that the course he advocates should be followed, he should not have left his seat.

Mr. MONK. Perhaps the hon. minister will allow me to say that I was here all the time.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Then I have done the hon. gentleman unintentionally an injustice, for I did not suppose, judging by the policy of lying low which he had advocated, that he could have been present when the policy of his party was being crystallized into a resolution.

Mr. HUGHES (North Victoria). Perhaps the hon. the Minister of Customs, as usual, was absent.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I think that the Minister of Customs is generally found in his seat. If then there is a difference on the other side with regard to the policy to be followed by the opposition, how can these hon. gentlemen expect that on this side of the House we should be perfectly agreed concerning every individual item in the tariff. Surely, it is not to be expected that any political party can be one in opinion on every one of the three hundred or four hundred dutiable articles in the tariff. Nor can it be expected from hon. gentlemen on the other side. I have not the slightest doubt that some gentlemen on that side believe that the duty on kerosene should be removed, that others think it should only be reduced, and that still others are opposed to any reduction, but believe, being true protectionists at heart, in making the duty high enough to enable the article to be produced in this country. Mr. Speaker, we have to act on general principles, and when these gentlemen ask what is our policy they ought to know it. It is the same policy which has prevailed during the past three years—the same policy which was in operation when parliament last dissolved and we went to the country.

What is the policy they offer? We were told that the amendment declared it, and that thus declared it was to be accepted. When it was offered, it was interpreted by the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite to be the same old policy that was adopted in 1876—twenty-five years ago. Here is a party, in this progressive country, this country that is going forward by leaps and bounds, that finds the height of its ambition, finds its course for the future in a policy that was adopted twenty-five years ago, but was since discarded and cast out by the people. I am glad they brought it forward. During the last election contest, I was on many platforms. The ablest financial exponent on the opposition side, Hon. George E. Foster declared their policy to be what the hon. gentlemen have formulated in the first part of their resolution—a reversion to the old policy—the national policy, and the old condition of things that existed in 1878. He gloried in the position. To illustrate it he told a story—he told it on platform after platform—about how the Conservative wigwam stood where it had always stood; the same winds sighed around it, and the same tunes were played in it as long ago; and he declared in the fulness of his heart, that he had come out into the country to take the Liberals who, he said, had been deserted by those who formulated the Liberal policy, to take them by the hand and lead them into the old Tory wigwam that had never changed. For my part, I asked every Liberal in this country who, for any cause, felt dissatisfied with his party and its conduct in the past, if he wished to march back into the old Tory wigwam of 1878. No. The Liberal party have moved forward, and the country has moved forward with them. Let these gentlemen who wish to go into their old wigwam go back twenty-five years and dwell there. This country will not go with them, nor will this government or party. Our motto is 'Onward.' Progress is what is wanted in this country. The hon. gentleman taunts us because we on this side of the House do not agree. He longs to see his party in power, that there may be unanimity of sentiment in the government. We have had some indications of the harmony that prevails, so far as views of public questions are concerned, among hon. gentlemen opposite in their speeches. Their chief financial critic, whose task it was to reply to the Finance Minister, and whose words, therefore, are considered as carrying great weight, made part of his utterance on that occasion—and words spoken on such an occasion are likely to be spoken with care—to the effect that the policy of the party opposite was, that these bonuses to railway lines should cease. But, we have heard from one or two hon. gentlemen opposite—yes, and from more—a most excited declaration, that it was this government's bounden duty to go on bonusing railways—especially in the province of Nova Scotia, said one hon. gentleman from that province. Here is harmony. Where are they in reference to this question ? Where are they in reference to the preferential tariff ? Are they not at sixes and sevens in this respect ?

Mr. TAYLOR. No.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman cannot have heard the speech of the leader of the opposition, when he declared he was not prepared to declare for the repeal of the preference, that it was an ungracious thing to do, and Conservatives were not bound to do so. Yet the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) declared that he is in favour of repealing it. And I take it that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk) who has just addressed the House, and whose policy is to lie low, comes sufficiently out of his cover to indicate, especially by the sentences in which he speaks of our losing $2,000,000 through the preference, that he is prepared to do away with the preferential tariff. But, they have not the courage to declare themselves. They do not take a stand which is worthy of a great Canadian party, that as a party they are in favour of the repeal of the preference. They ask what our policy is. Our policy is a revenue tariff policy, and coupled with that is a preference to Great Britain. And where do they stand in reference to these matters ? They dare not tell us. And, that being the case, they might well be excused from taunting members on this side of the House because on every little item of the tariff they do not happen to hold views absolutely alike. Let us contrast the two policies. We are happily in a position where we can institute comparisons. For eighteen years we had their policy, this policy they have laid down as a policy for the future. And we know its results. And you have had the policy of the Liberal party, as plainly declared, and as maintained in practice under this government, a policy of a revenue tariff, with a preference for Great Britain. You have had that policy for four years, and the people and parliament of Canada are in excellent position to say which policy they should choose. What have been the results of our policy ? The foreign trade of the country in four years increased $140,000,000. That is, our foreign trade increased in these four years by $30,000,000 more than it increased in all the years from confederation down to 1896. Last year alone, the increase in the foreign trade was within a few millions of being as great as in the whole eighteen years of their policy. In these whole eighteen years the trade only increased $66,000,000, while in one year, last year, it increased by $59,000,000. The exports of Canadian products, from 1896 to 1900, exceeded the exports for the previous four years by $155,000,000. The exports of the produce of the farm, from 1896 to 1900, exceeded the exports for the previous four years by $83,000,000. And these hon. gentlemen opposite wish to turn back the hand upon the dial of time, to go back to a policy that was tried for eighteen years, and the result of which was almost complete stagnation in this country, and ask the people of this country to approve that policy. One hon. gentleman asked me, what had the government to do with all this. I reply that the Liberal party have never claimed, nor have the government in any way claimed, that this government was entitled to the credit. These hon. gentlemen say : You may thank Providence for that, and not the government.

Humbly and reverently we recognize the hand of Providence in our national affairs and in blessing this country as it has blessed it among the nations of the earth, and we ask not that credit shall be given to us for the benefits conferred upon us by Providence. But I ask the gentleman who interrupted me by saying, What have you to do with that?—I ask if, during the eighteen years when they bore rule in this country, they were all years of stringency and of famine ? Was that the result of Tory rule in this country for eighteen years ? Will you take that position ? Did not Providence smile on this land ? You know it smiled upon it under Conservative rule as it does under Liberal rule. Did not the sun shine and the rain fall then just as it does under the present administration ? What, then, makes the difference ? Surely the conclusion is inevitable that the men and the party who are controlling affairs now know better how to use the blessings that Providence confers upon this country, and in a manner better fitted to the interests of this country. That is what we claim for the government, we claim nothing more. What means this great increase of exports of farm produce ? The hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) gave us one of the reasons, namely, that under this progressive government steps have been taken for filling up the North-west Territories. During the four years the Liberals have been in power that country has been filling up to a greater extent than during the eighteen years the Conservatives were in power. And you are finding the benefits. Mining regulations, liberal in their nature, facilities given for developing that portion of the wealth of this country, the Minister of Agriculture coming to this House and boldly asking for hundreds of thousands of dollars to perfect a cold storage system by which the products of this country are carried to the old country and there marketed at higher prices than they were under hon. gentlemen—these things account in part for it, and all other measures that have been taken by a government and a party alive to the interests of this country have contributed to these results. The member for East Toronto (Mr. Kemp), in the course of his speech, said :

While a great deal of time is taken up both in the House and in the country discussing the extent of our foreign trade, little or nothing is said with regard to our interprovincial trade, and I think the Minister of Finance might very well have dealt with that feature of our commerce in his budget speech. I speak of our interprovincial trade which moves from east to west and vice versa, which our railways and transportation companies are designed to accommodate, and which is the chief reason for the existence of our manufacturing industries. That interprovincial trade has been built up enormously within the last twenty-five years, and in connection with it I would quote to the House an extract from a speech delivered by the Hon. George Brown.

And he quoted from a speech of the Hon. George Brown, remarking upon the great increase in interprovincial trade after confederation, and laying down the rule that where you have a large interprovincial trade you have a large export trade. The hon. member for East Toronto, whom I recognize as an authority on commercial matters, commented upon it in this way :

The Hon. George Brown in these words refers to the importance of our interprovincial traffic, and he also indicates that when we have prosperous interprovincial traffic we have also large exports and imports. This much we may be sure of, namely, that if we are prosperous within ourselves, we will also be prosperous in our trade to and from foreign countries.

That is the sentiment of the hon. member for East Toronto. Now I am going to reason backwards, and by a parity of reasoning. He says when you have good trade at home, interprovincial trade and domestic trade flourishing, you will have large exports and imports, you will have a large foreign trade. We have not the means of measuring our home and domestic trade, the advances it has made. But I apply the test the member for East Toronto gave us himself to ascertain how we are in that respect, and when I say that there has been an increase in foreign trade of $140,000,000 in four years, the logical conclusion follows, according to that hon. gentleman's reasoning, that if an enormous increase took place in our foreign trade, how great must have been the increase that took place in our domestic trade. Now, I put this argument to that hon. gentleman, who is recognized as an authority on commercial matters. Reasoning backwards, I think every one will admit that what I have said bears out the conclusion that I have arrived at, that instead of the industries of this country being languishing and dying, while this foreign trade was going on by leaps and bounds as shown in the figures I have given you, the factories and machine shops throughout the towns and cities of this Dominion were working many of them long through the hours of the night, with double staffs in order to keep up with the orders that were lying upon their desks ; and I am gazing into the countenance of a member of the opposition who knows that what I am saying is true, as they do all.

The hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), whom it is always a pleasure to hear, who lays down propositions with great force, said that he could not find out exactly where we stood on the tariff question, because, he said, some of the members declared that we had a protective tariff, others declared that it was a free trade tariff, and he was at a loss to describe what kind of a tariff it was. Some hon. gentlemen on the other side declare that we have kept their old national policy, and that it has given the prosperity we enjoy to-day. Others tell us that we have destroyed that tariff, and that we are ruining the industries of the country ; and so the hon. member for East York, listening to the utterances of those around him, became bewildered and unable to decide what our policy was. He told this House what statesmanship was :

Now, in what does statesmanship consist? I wish to direct the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to this matter.

He was directing attention to this side of the House.

Statesmanship consists in compromising in some way antagonistic principles. There is a principle of free trade, and there is a principle of protection, and each is advocated by certain doctrinaires. But the statesman finds some way of compromising these principles and of doing something for his country by that compromise.

And I expected him to add : When some of my friends tell me that this is a protective tariff the Liberals have, and others tell me it is a free trade tariff, I am forced to the conclusion that it is one of those happy compromises that may be described as statesmanship. Our friends opposite say, when you quote the figures of the exports : Well, that is very true, there has been a great increase in the foreign commerce of Canada, but that is world-wide, it exists in the United States as well as in Canada. I admit that the United States is a mighty country, but when we institute comparisons between this land and the United States we institute a comparison with a country which, perhaps, taken all in all, has the greatest natural facilities and riches of any country in the world. But we do not shrink from the comparison. If you look up the figures you will find that the exports of domestic produce from the United States, exclusive of coin and bullion, increased last year over the previous year by 14 per cent. Similar exports from Canada increased at the rate of 23 per cent. That is comparing Canada with the United States greatly to the advantage of Canada. The grand aggregate trade of the United States for last year increased over the previous year by 13½ per cent. The same trade in Canada increased by 19 per cent. On the basis of a population of 76,000,000 the foreign trade of the United States last year was $32 per head, while for Canada on the basis of a population of 6,000,000 it was $63 per head. The grand aggregate trade of Canada increased in 1900 over 1896 by 60 per cent, while that of the United States for the same period increased by only 28 per cent. So, I give that as an answer to hon. gentlemen opposite when they think that they can wipe away the effect and force of these figures by declaring that the United States have equally prospered. If the two countries were equal it would be a grand thing for us to be able to say, which we were not able to say, under hon. gentlemen opposite, but, when we have passed them as we have, then, I am glad that we have had pointed to us that country so that we might institute the comparison that we have done.

Now let us look at the preference tariff and ascertain whether it is any benefit to us. Mr. Clancy, or the hon. member for Bothwell—I beg his pardon, for I desire to speak with respect of him as he endeavours to discuss a question of this kind on its merits—in discussing this matter made a statement, which, unfortunately, in the way in which it is phrased in the 'Hansard,' leaves an impression that I am sure, the hon. gentleman does not wish it should leave at all. Speaking of the increased trade with Great Britain under the preference tariff, he proceeded by making a comparison of the increase of our foreign trade with different countries, testing it by percentages and making out that the percentage of increased trade with Great Britain was much less than the percentage of increase with other countries, showing, that, therefore, we had not done so very much in the way of increasing our trade with Great Britain. I might point out that percentages are valuable as means of comparison when circumstances are somewhat nearly similar, while at other times you may institute percentage comparisons that are absolutely misleading and are of no value at all. If the hon. gentleman will pardon me, I am forced to say that I consider this one of the cases in which the remark I last made will apply. He quotes the increase of our foreign trade with Belgium, Italy, Australia, Portugal, France, Germany, other countries not classified, Great Britain, United States, South America, Holland and Newfoundland. He says that our trade increased with these countries to the following extent:

	Per cent.
Belgium	1,121
Italy	359
Australia	214
Portugal	176
France	136
Germany	126
Other countries not classified	71
Great Britain	61
United States	54
South America	43
Holland	34
Newfoundland	20

He comments upon that in the following words:

> That shows conclusively that the sentiment in our favour, of which these hon. gentlemen are boasting——

That is the sentiment in our favour as a result of the preferential tariff granted by Canada to Great Britain.

> —has had such little effect that Great Britain, as a consumer of Canadian products, stands only eighth upon the list.

I am sure the hon. gentleman did not want the country to infer that in the consumption of goods exported by this country, Great Britain stood eighth on the list of all other countries. That would be too patent a mistake for any one to make. He says that the percentage—he does not say that, but I suppose that is what he means—is eighth on the list. What are the facts, and you cannot go into that question of percentages without seeing that they are utterly valueless.

Mr. CLANCY. Are they not quite as apt and valuable as the percentages the hon. gentleman states himself in regard to the United States? While the percentage is low in the United States, the hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that the quantity exported is vastly greater than the quantity exported from Canada.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No, I think the hon. gentleman's point is not well taken, when there is the enormous trade that there is between Canada and Great Britain and the United States and Great Britain. While the aggregate trade of Canada is more nearly double per head of what it is in the United States, then, the percentage being applied, is a fair test and in fact it would be against Canada if it were anything, but when you take a case like this in which the hon. gentleman says that we increased our trade with Belgium by 1,121 per cent, and with Great Britain only 61 per cent, the comparison is utterly valueless, because the fact is that the total increase of trade with Belgium of 1,121 per cent was $764,387, while the increase of trade with Great Britain, with this less percentage, was $33,843,000. So, these figures are not to be used to establish the contention of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the hon. Minister of Customs give us the figures of the increased imports from the United States and from Great Britain along with the percentages? Just give us the figures of the increased trade with each country.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I have not that with me, but the hon. gentleman will be able to get it.

Mr. WALLACE. I think it would be opportune just now.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I think the hon. gentleman will find that when he gets these figures that the increase has been most satisfactory as far as Canada is concerned, and that they will bear out what I have said in relation to it. I have pointed out that these figures which have been quoted by the hon. member for Bothwell do not give a correct idea of the facts. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem now to be getting a little bolder in their attacks upon this preference. They will not say that they are in favour of repealing it. They fear the force of public opinion against them, but they seek to minimize the benefits that flow to us from it. An hon. gentleman the other night, while making a long speech, enumerated a great many articles in regard to which he said the preference was of no use to us at all, that we got no benefit from it, that there was no advantage even on goods coming from Great Britain, because the duties in some cases were made higher than they had been before in the general tariff and that, therefore, any benefit there was had been neutralized. In illustrating that a personal allusion was made to the Minister of Customs. I do not allude to it for that reason, because an insinuation cast out against any hon. gentlemen in this House is something that can be accomplished by anybody whose tastes run in that direction, and who are not too careful as to whether the statements they make are accurate or not. I simply use it for the purposes of illustration. That hon. gentleman said :

> Let us take the item of biscuits, $19,781. The duty was raised by 2½ per cent. I do not know whether it was done in the interest of the Minister of Customs, who has a large biscuit manufactory in Brantford, but certainly in that respect we do not get any benefit from the preferential tariff.

I leave the personal matter alone, but I use this as an illustration of inaccurate statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite. He says that we raised the duty on biscuits—he apparently means sweetened biscuits—to 27½ per cent under the general tariff, adding 2½ per cent to the duty which he says was done in my interests. If he will get an hon. gentleman who sits near him to figure it out for him, and it is a very simple problem, if he will take the total amount of duty paid on sweetened biscuits last year and divide it by the value that was entered, he will find the duty actually paid on these sweetened biscuits was 25½ per cent, instead of 27½ per cent, as it was under the old tariff of the national policy. There was 2 per cent less actual duty paid than there would have been paid under the old tariff in force.

But the point I want to make is : that it was not only biscuits that came from Great Britain, but there was a large quantity coming from the United States and other places, as well, and the whole quantity coming in under the higher rate from countries not under the operation of a preferential tariff, was reduced 2 per cent. If that is a sample of how gentlemen opposite make statements that are absolutely devoid of fact, and if these are to be read by the people and not inquired into, no wonder that certain sections of the people may sometimes be misled. The ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Haggart) made a speech in this debate, and we find that he does not take the same view as some of his political friends, who say that the preferential tariff has not reduced the cost of goods to the people of Canada. I may state here that when we introduced the preferential tariff it was not entirely out of love to Great Britain, and losing sight of every other consideration, because one of the main reasons why we proposed it was that it would lessen the taxation of the people. Now, while some of the gentlemen opposite say the preferential tariff has not reduced the cost of certain articles which you get from Great Britain, the ex-Minister of Railways (Hon. Mr. Haggart) told us that woollen goods were coming in from England to such an extent that there is danger that the large woollen industry of Canada will be wiped out of existence. I am bound to say that I have great sympathy with every legitimate industry in this country. I would be very sorry indeed if the effect of the preferential tariff would be the cause of gentlemen who have their money invested in the woollen industry having their fears realized in that respect ; but I hope and trust, and I have reason to believe, that with the energies of the people engaged in that industry, and with the capital at their command, they will rise to the occasion and fully maintain their position. I may say that one of the benefits that was derived by the reduction of the tariff by this government to a revenue basis in many lines of industry, was what it must inevitably always be, that it stimulated the energies of those who are engaged in different industries so that they brought their best brains to bear on their work ; bought the very best machinery to be obtained, and notably in this woollen industry they produced an article that is a credit to Canada. I know there is a feeling in the breast of some people that goods that come from a distant place must be better than those we get at home, but I hope the time will come that when Canadians go to purchase clothes they will ask to be shown Canadian manufactured goods, and I think they will admit with me that we have arrived at a point of perfection in this product which is a credit to the men who are engaged in the industry. In view of the energy and enterprise which the woollen manufacturers of Canada have displayed in their industry, I do not believe that it will be crushed out. It is certainly not the desire of any Liberal that a single one of the great industries of this country shall come to loss or suffer harm. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart), I think, grossly exaggerated the extent of the imports of woollens from the old country. There is no doubt that in this line Great Britain benefited by the preferential tariff, and perhaps to a greater extent than in many other lines, but while they have benefited in Great Britain, it, of course, has caused a reduction in the taxes paid by the people of Canada. The hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Haggart) said :

> What we contend is that the policy of the present government, by raising so large a revenue from customs duties, is having the effect of shutting up the factories of this country, notably the woollen factories. Look at the great increase in the importations of woollen goods, $13,000,000 worth, or more than double what was imported in 1897.

The hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Haggart) is wrong in these figures. I have the Trade and Commerce figures here, and the imports in 1897 of dutiable woollens—and that is all we are concerned with—amounted to $7,125,748, while last year the amount was $9,801,565. There is an increase since 1897, but in 1896, under the old policy, the dutiable woollens imported amounted to $8,670,691. I grant there has been an increase, but it is an increase not as great in proportion as the increase in the total imports of goods from foreign countries. If there are gentlemen present who are interested in the woollen industry by having invested in it, I would ask them not to be too hopeless in the matter, not to be discouraged, but to continue to display the energy they have shown in the past and I have no doubt that with the excellence of their goods they will find that the preferential tariff—which I grant presses more closely on them than on others—they will find that it is to the general benefit of the people of Canada, and that it has not been to their detriment either.

Mr. WALLACE. What did the minister say the woollen imports for last year were ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. According to the Trade and Commerce table, the value of dutiable goods for 1900 was $9,801,565.

Mr. WALLACE. It is more than that in your own report.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. This is the table of the trade and commerce, in which it is more condensed, but it will agree, I think, with the Trade and Navigation Returns.

Mr. WALLACE. The Trade and Navigation Returns give more than that.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken, but I will not speak positively on that point. They should agree, because the trade and commerce is a compilation of the trade and navigation returns, and although not made in my department, I have no doubt they are made correctly. Now, Mr. Speaker, allusion has been made to the iron bounties and we have been taunted by gentlemen opposite that we have carried out in this what they say is the very essence of protection. That was a policy adopted by the late government and maintained by the present government, the distinction being that while almost no progress was made under the old government, great strides have taken place under the system that was adopted by the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) when he brought in his bounty resolutions in 1897. In the course of his speech he (Hon. Mr. Fielding) alluded to the fact that in the payment of these bounties, after the 1st of July, he intended to make them a charge upon capital account or on a special account which will go to capital account, thus placing these bounties in the same category as subsidies to railways, and should not be charged against the revenue of any one particular year, for the reason that you should not charge a railway subsidy to ordinary expenditure, because that railway subsidy once paid you get the benefit of it for all time to come without further payment. So with the iron bounties. For five years, under a diminishing sliding scale, you are paying out moneys in order to develop an enterprise. At the end of five years you have the interest developed, and you have the resulting benefit for all time to come, without anything more being paid by the country. Therefore, it is not fair to charge against any one year the expenditure for a benefit which you are to have during all future years. I think, therefore, the proposition of the Finance Minister is one that will commend itself to the House. Under the system pursued by hon. gentlemen opposite—and it is a system we have followed in the department over which I have the honour to preside for the time being—these bounties have been paid out of customs revenue. That is, the customs revenue has been diminished by the amount of the bounty we paid to the iron manufacturers, which should never have come out of the customs revenue. We pay refunds out of the customs revenue ; that is, we have taken into the revenue moneys which we have afterwards discovered should not have been paid, and we have refunded them. That is right enough. But, these bounties are paid out of money that never came into the customs or consolidated revenue at all. They are absolutely grants out of the public treasury, and, therefore, should not form part of the current expenditure. What the Finance Minister proposes is, that these iron bounties shall appear in the open light of day ; that men shall not have to take up the Auditor General's Report and search through the revenue and refunds to find out what bounties have been paid ; but, that they will appear in one sum, so that, whether they amount to millions or hundreds of thousands, the people of this country will know what they have paid. This government does not seek to hide any of its transactions, but wants them all to appear in the open light of day.

I want to speak briefly about the average rate of duty, and the percentage of reduction made by this tariff. I will not argue the question ; it is not necessary to argue with hon. gentlemen opposite ; the time is lost in doing so. You can take the Trade and Navigation Returns, and find out for yourself. It is figured out in one of the tables on one of the early pages of the report, by clerks who have no object in making it appear other than it should be. If you take the total imports of dutiable and free goods, and divide them by the total amount of duty paid, you will find that in 1900 the percentage of duty was less than 16 per cent on the average on all the goods, dutiable and free, which came into this country, while, under the old tariff, in 1896, the percentage was 18·28 per cent. That is a reduction of about 2¼ per cent, not from 100, but from 18¼, which is equal to 12½ per cent reduction in the tariff. I give this as a rough test. I do not mean to say that it is an exact test. You may import more of one class of goods in one year than in another ; and if these goods have a higher rate of duty, your calculation may be somewhat upset ; but, as a rough test, this is of value. But, hon. gentlemen opposite, in criticising the tariff, say : Now that you have made corn free, there are some millions of bushels of corn brought in, and they are in the consumption column, while they have gone out to foreign countries ; you should take out these. In some cases they say, you should also take out coin and bullion. Well, that is fairly to be argued ; but, I must tell these hon. gentlemen that when millions of bushels of corn come into this country, to pass through our highways of commerce, enriching our shippers and railways, giving employment to the men handling it, I hold that they are valuable to this country. What are we sinking canals and building railways for ? Not only to carry the goods of our own country, but in the expectation of carrying a great portion of the traffic of the north-western states. Then, my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) wanted to know why the Finance Minister did not take out coin and bullion. Well, if you take out coin and bullion, there is shown to be between three and four million dollars of reduced taxation after these have been taken out. The hon. member for Bothwell shakes his head ; he thinks that is not correct : but, I can assure him that if he looks into it, he will admit that it is correct. The hon. gentleman said, alluding to the Finance Minister:

> In making his comparison this year he includes coin and bullion for all the years covered by his comparison. And why does he do so? Because to do so tells in favour of his own position, for the quantity of coin and bullion imported into Canada in 1900 was larger than in any previous year, and the effect of including them is to show a reduced percentage of taxation.

The hon. gentleman had not the proper faith in the honesty and fairness of the Finance Minister, or he would not have made that statement. The hon. member fell into this mistake. He looked hurriedly at the statement, and he saw that there was more coin and bullion imported this year than usual, and the Finance Minister, not having taken that out, he jumped to the conclusion that it should be out ; but, if the hon. gentleman will work out the proposition for himself, he will find that if coin and bullion had been omitted by the Finance Minister, the reduction would have been greater by ·10 of 1 per cent. The hon. member for Bothwell lost sight of the fact that the other goods which were included increased far more in proportion than the coin and bullion, and if you put them together, and make the reduction, the reduction would have been greater with the coin and bullion out than it was with it in. The hon. gentleman still shakes his head. I want to prove it to him, and I am going to give himself as an authority ; he will not deny that. To prove the accuracy of his calculation, I will quote the hon. member for Bothwell. In the statement made by him on page 1562, unrevised 'Hansard,' he gives the rates for 1896 and 1900, exclusive of coin and bullion, and Indian corn not remaining in the country, as 19·19 for 1896, and 17·21 for 1900. The Minister of Finance took credit for a saving of duty amounting to $3,292,230, after making due allowance for Indian corn. If he had deducted coin and bullion in making his calculations, he could have shown a saving of $3,300,977. Now, I think I have convinced the hon. member for Bothwell, for I have given himself as an authority on this matter, and he can work it out for himself.

If the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) were here, I would just like to make one observation by way of answer to an argument which is unworthy of the intelligence of hon. gentlemen opposite. But, time and again it is used. They say : You took $28,000,000 in your custom-houses last year, whereas we took only $19,000,000 when we were in ; so, you have wrung nine or ten million dollars more taxation out of the people than we did.

Hon. gentlemen opposite know that governments do not make the prices of goods in foreign countries. If the opposition got into power they could not rule the prices of yarn in the United States, or woollen goods in England, or wines in France or Germany. The law of supply and demand is what governs this matter. Should these hon. gentlemen get into power, they could not compel any man or woman in this country to go into a store and buy a dollar's worth or $10 worth of goods. People go into stores to buy goods to satisfy themselves and not to carry out any government policy. Therefore, what blame can be attached to the government if $28,000,000 went into the treasury this last year as compared with $19,000,000 the previous year. There is only one thing for which the government can be held responsible and that is the imposing of customs duties. And according as the government lower or raise the duties, they may be blamed or praised by the people. And I have pointed out that we have lowered the duties, and that if we have received a revenue this year of $28,000,000 instead of $19,000,000, we have received it under a reduced rate of taxation.

On page 1520 of the 'Hansard,' I find that the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) is reported as having said :

> Sir Leonard Tilley in 1882 reduced taxation by one and a quarter million dollars, and in 1883 by a like amount.

That is correct. But turn back to these years, and you will find that Sir Leonard Tilley also reduced the rate of taxation, but that while the average rate of duty was slightly decreased, the revenue increased. In 1882 the revenue exceeded that of 1881 by over $3,000,000. Will these hon. gentlemen opposite then say that Sir Leonard Tilley wrung $3,000,000 of taxation out of the people ?

The hon. member for Pictou says that Sir Leonard Tilley reduced the taxation. So he did, but none the less he collected $3,000,000 more revenue in 1882 as compared with 1881, and in 1883 there was an excess of revenue over 1882 of nearly one million and a half dollars. Will hon. gentlemen opposite argue that in those two years Sir Leonard Tilley wrung four and a half million dollars of taxes more out of the people because that much more went into the treasury, and that despite the fact that he had reduced the rate of taxation ? If they will not, then they have no right to bring a similar charge against this government. We have reduced the rate of taxation, but still the revenue has increased by millions of dollars, and that increase was not wrung out of the people, but was the free will gift of a prosperous community, augmenting in numbers as in wealth.

The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden), of whom I desire to speak with the greatest respect, for I think it will be admitted on all hands that he has imparted added dignity into the conduct of public affairs—that hon. gentleman, in introducing his resolution, spoke of the duty upon tobacco and the duty on sugar. With reference to the duty on tobacco, I need only point to the speech made by the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Cowan) last year, and also to that made by the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Heyd) this session, in which are pointed out the great progress made by this industry under the present tariff.

With reference to sugar, I think the hon. the leader of the opposition fell into a mistake. Of course he cannot be expected, owing to the multiplicity of his duties, to make a very close study of all these matters, but he made the statement that we had greatly increased the duty on sugar. Let me point out the mistake into which he fell, and into which he was led to some extent by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), who ought to have known better. The hon. the leader of the opposition made this remark :

> I desire, in passing, to mention to the Minister of Finance that his taxes on sugar were considerably increased in 1898. In that year he took from the people $1,324,329, and in 1900 $2,286,123.

That statement would lead one to believe that we had taken nearly a million dollars more out of the pockets of the people by the tax on sugar, and my hon. friend was rather led to that conclusion by the hon. member for West York. Now, there was in 1900 more duty to the extent of $961,724 paid on sugar, raw and refined, than in 1898. That is quite true. But we only imported 239,127,300 pounds in 1898, while in 1900 we imported 304,460,448 pounds, and you could not have an increase of 64,000,000 pounds of imports without getting more money into the treasury. But that does not mean that the increased revenue was due to any increase in the taxation.

Mr. CLANCY. Does the hon. gentleman pretend to say that there is not a higher rate paid now than in 1896 ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I will not hesitate to say that. If the hon. genteman had not asked the question and had waited a moment longer, he would have seen that, with my usual frankness, I would have done that without the question being asked. But I am leading up to this and am pointing out what was done in the matter of sugar. When the government came into power they found that the sugar duties stood in this position. They had previously varied in degree. They had been high. These hon. gentlemen talk of having put sugar on the free list in 1891-2. But all sugars were never put on the free list. What they did was to put all raw sugar under No. 14—sugars that are not fit to go on the table and be used in the family at all, but are only fit for the refiner and only bought by him—they put those absolutely on the free list, and on the refined sugar made out of these, they put 80 cents on the 100 pounds. In other words, while nothing went into the revenue at all from the raw sugar, of which hundred of millions of pounds were imported by the refiner, the refined sugar, which is the only sugar used by the people, was taxed 80 cents per 100 pounds. And if the protection theory that the duty aids the manufacturer holds good, that meant that the 80 cents, less the loss in refining, went into the pockets of the men engaged in that industry. That went on for a time. It was then pointed out that the duty was too high and the late government reduced it, still leaving raw sugar on the free list, to 64 cents per 100 pounds. They took off 16 cents. Well, if the refiner could live with 16 cents less protection, he could have lived on that reduced rate from the beginning. And if you apply 16 cents per 100 pounds to 250,000,000 pounds of raw sugar, you will find it amounts to some hundreds of thousands of dollars, which the people paid, under the 80 cents duty, over and above what the Conservatives themselves thought was necessary in order to keep the sugar refiners in existence. Before they left office, these hon. gentlemen re-introduced a measure putting a duty on raw sugar. They put a duty of one-half cent per pound on raw sugar, such as the refiner uses, and made the duty on refined sugar $1.14, leaving the refiner a margin of 64 cents as before. As the refiner paid 50 cents on the raw sugar, they gave him 50 cents extra on the refined, making it $1.14. The present Finance Minister left the same duty of 50 cents on the raw sugar, but instead of imposing a duty of $1.14 on the refined, he reduced it to the even dollar, thus giving the refiner a net protection of 50 cents per 100 pounds instead of 64 cents. Take that 14 cents per 100 pounds and multiply it by 250,000,000 pounds and figure out the saving for yourself. That makes a matter of some hundreds of thousands of dollars less paid by the people.

Now I come to answer my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Clancy). A year or two ago the Finance Minister, desiring to help the West India trade, introduced what was in force under the late government for a time prior to 1895, the polariscopic test. That is the test you make by the polariscope as to the saccharine strength of the sugar, in which a low grade saccharine sugar does not pay as high a duty as a high grade, but pays in proportion to its saccharine strength. And the Finance Minister of that time, so far as he could forecast it, tried to maintain the same rates of duty prevail. By this polariscopic test some of the sugars went below 50 cents a hundred pounds, and some went above it, but the design was to have it run about as it had—50 cents on the raw sugar and $1 on the refined. In the operation of this polariscopic test it has turned out, as the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) has asked me, that there was last year a difference in favour of the refined of 56 cents, instead of 50 cents per hundred pounds. But we are still 8 cents per hundred pounds lower than they were. The difference is accounted for in part by this—that the tariff was changed in an effort to secure better trade relations with other British colonies; sugar from British colonies being admitted under a preference; and one of the Australian colonies is sending large quantities of sugar into the British Columbia market, which the people there benefit by and, as these come in under the preferential rate, the average has gone down. But let me point this out to the hon. member for Bothwell—that, under the actual operation, coming as near to it as we can, there is still 8 cents per 100 pounds less protection to the refiner than there was ; and 8 cents per 100 pounds on 250,000,000 pounds, he will find, will amount to quite a snug sum.

Mr. WALLACE. Does the government get more or less revenue per 100 pounds under the new tariff than under the old ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Under the present tariff we get more.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Under the preference we get less.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. On the whole, we get more. That is what we want—we want money to go into the treasury, not into the pockets of individuals. Last year, the average rates were—refined, $1.24 per 100 pounds, and raw 68 cents per 100 pounds—that is, we are putting 18 cents per 100 pounds more into the treasury on raw sugars than they were.

But I pass on, for I did not intend to speak so long on this subject. I come now to consider the question whether the opposition are prepared to say whether they will remove this preferential tariff or not. We have different opinions expressed by different hon. members opposite. The leader of the opposition said :

> The hon. the Minister of Finance is very ready to fling across the floor of this House the question whether or not we are prepared to repudiate the policy of British preference. Well, it is very difficult sometimes, and might be regarded as very offensive, to ask or to take back that which has been given away.
> The Liberal-Conservative party have never said that they proposed to repeal that preference; but they have said that they would never rest satisfied until, in addition to that and as compensation for that, we had attained a preference in British markets.

The hon. gentleman will not say that they wish to do away with it. But the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), when I asked him across the floor of the House, said that he would do away with it. And the hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk) who has just addressed the House, indicated that he was about ready to go that length. But the leader of the opposition would not go so far. In fact, he was afraid that what he had said might be interpreted to mean that they were not so much in favour of the old land and the old flag as they were. So he strengthened himself in this way :

Now, I do not want any misunderstanding so far as the opposition or the party I have the honour to lead in this House is concerned. I am prepared to stand for the unity of the empire as strongly as any member of this House. I am prepared, for that purpose, to advocate and support the claims of any government that will spend its last dollar and send its last man in support of the integrity of the empire against any foe that may threaten disruption.

But the hon. member for East York said in effect : Do not send any British goods here, because we do not want them; we will send our last man and our last dollar to preserve the integrity of the empire, but do not send your woollen goods here, for our loyalty won't stand that.

Mr. BROCK. Does the hon. minister mean to say that doing away with the preference would do away with the importation of British goods altogether ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No, I do not think it would. But I do think this —and I would say it in answer to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Brock)—that their policy, if carried out on the only basis on which Mr. Chamberlain said it could be carried out, and woollen goods were admitted free, that would close the woollen factories; and, for that reason, while we are prepared to accept a preference in the British market when Britain is able to give it to us, the distinction is that we say that this is a matter for the British parliament to consider—this parliament cannot legislate for the British people. And therefore we come to consider the question whether, until the British people adopt, if they ever do, this policy of preference for preference Canada shall continue to give them what we have given. So far as this party is concerned, we say we will continue to give it. That is plain. But what do hon. gentlemen opposite say ? That is what we want to know and what we have a right to know. What does the first lieutenant (Mr. Monk) of the leader of the opposition say ? I have made a fair statement, will he make one as fair ?

Mr. MONK. Well, I would drop it right off.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Now we have it. And the statement was applauded and cheered. Here is another illustration of the beautiful harmony that exists in that party. The hon. leader of the party says: No, it would be an ungracious thing, and the Liberal-Conservative party never said that it should be done. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk) coming out from lying low, declared for dropping it. We do not find unanimity even in the applause that greeted the remark of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk). I am glad that we know where hon. gentlemen stand on the question. They are opposed to the preferential tariff, but afraid to present a resolution calling for its repeal. Sir, we are in favour of it.

Mr. MONK. The hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Paterson) will understand me. I said I was opposed to it as it is now, but not opposed to a mutual preference.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I understand perfectly. But we say we are in favour of it as it is now. We take the ground that when we took that step and gave that preference, we benefited ourselves. We left the general tariff high, too high for some people, but we carried out our policy as announced by giving a preference to Great Britain. And, by doing that—hon. gentlemen opposite may smile—we believe that we touched the British heart. You cannot convince intelligent people who read the comments of the English press when that was done, nor can you convince those who have been to the old land and heard the expressions of opinion by people over there, that the preference did not touch a sympathetic chord in the British heart and so became a means of opening the doors of the march of commerce to our products. A large part of the increase of your exports and the extra price you have got for them are due to that feeling that was aroused in Canada's favour by the preferential tariff.

Mr. MONK. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him in what respect does that tariff preference benefit us ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. If he will ask the hon. member who sits beside him, the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Brock), he will get the answer that it has benefited the people of this country because they are buying their woollens cheaper than many of the mills could make them, and if it be considered an advantage to have a lower rate of duty, as the hon. gentleman has been blaming us for not having in view of the surplus, then it must be a benefit to us that we have this reduced rate of taxation. I say when you bring the question up as to whether Canadians will accept a preference in British markets, the Canadian people, the Canadian government, the Canadian parliament, will of course accept a preference if Britain sees fit to give it to us. But that is a question for the British people to decide, and we say that if ever the British people come to that determination, the strongest and most effectual step that ever could be taken to secure that preference will be found to have been the action of Canada in first giving a preference to the mother land and in maintaining it. I venture to say that if the time ever does come—and these gentlemen say it is coming fast, I shall not enter on the prophetic role, I know that things move fast in these days, I am not going to say the British people will never reverse their trade policy, I will not say that when the colonies are able to produce more nearly the quantity of breadstuffs that the British people require than they do now, I am not prepared to say what they may do—but I do say that when the time comes, if it ever does come, be it sooner or later, that the British people put protective duties on grain and produce, then if Canada comes in and asks them not to apply these protective duties against Canada, the Liberal government and the Liberal party who gave unasked a preference to the British people will be the party and the government most likely to secure that preference in the markets of England. It was not a party, the leaders of which say : We will take away from Britain what has been given to her, who will be entrusted with power, when that time comes, to negotiate with the British government to have Canada excluded from that protective tariff. The people of this country will recognize that and they will say : If we ever hope to have mutual preference, if it be coming, as the Conservatives say, then it behooves us above every other consideration to maintain the Liberal party and the government in power, for the act they did will give them an influence with the British government to secure this favour for Canada in the markets of Great Britain. It is not likely that favour can be secured for us by a party whose members will give no preference to Britain if it hurts us in the slightest degree, it is not the party who says : Send your last man and your last dollar, but keep out the last yard of cloth that comes into Canada from Great Britain. Can you get that preference ? Hon. gentlemen opposite have taken up the cue and have repeated time and again, though it has been answered, answered, answered, that we could have got this mutual preference when the Prime Minister went to England, and that failing to get it he lost the opportunity of a lifetime. Though they have been answered scores of times, yet they continue to repeat parrot-like this statement. No use telling them that the Duke of Devonshire never said what they attributed to him, no use telling them that the Postmaster General had the letter in the House and tabled it, I think, a letter written by the Duke of Devonshire's own hand, saying that what was alleged about him was not correct : no use telling them these things, they still repeat the cry that the Prime Minister could have obtained a mutual preference. Now, I propose to submit to this House an authoritative statement that the Prime Minister could not have got it, that no one could have got it at the present time, that no one can get it until the minds of the British people are prepared for it, and until British statesmen are prepared to take hold of it. I propose to give an authority that I think ought to be sufficient, so that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House will never repeat again that we can have this mutual preference for the asking. I shall give as my authority the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Kemp), the late president of the Toronto Board of Trade, who went to England last summer along with other representative men to a meeting of the Associated Chambers of Commerce, to consider questions of national importance, where the question of inter-Imperial trade was discussed, at which he was present, when he was one of the committee appointed to interview Lord Salisbury in reference to this matter, and one who, with two or three others, subsequently interviewed Mr. Chamberlain in an informal way, one who therefore may be regarded as an absolute authority, and the latest one who has heard from England what the minds of English statesmen are on this question, not years ago when the Prime Minister could have had it, as they say, but in the three years that have transpired since then, during which they say the feeling of England has been growing in strength. What did the hon. member for East Toronto tell us ? You will find his speech in the 'Hansard,' page 1693 and 1694. He is replying to the Finance Minister, who pointed out to him that Lord Salisbury would not agree to receive the deputation :

> The reply which the Chamber of Commerce received from the Prime Minister was, as stated in this House, that the time for receiving this deputation was not opportune. It was not opportune because at that time the South African campaign was at its height; the war in China was also at its height; there was a very important session of the Imperial parliament in progress, which took up the time and attention of the Prime Minister and his colleagues——

The Finance Minister pointed out, what was known to all in this country, that this deputaton appointed to wait upon Lord Salisbury to discuss this question were not granted an interview because the time was not opportune. It was considered rather an abrupt answer, and the member for East Toronto is explaining why it was inopportune—because the South African campaign was at its height, the war in China was also at its height, and there was an important session of the Imperial parliament in progress which took up the attention of the Prime Minister and his colleagues. Now, I do not think that those are very strong reasons for saying that the time was inopportune. There may have been a war in South Africa, but still the Prime Minister might have seen them. The Prime Minister of England was aware that Canada sent her sons to South Africa to fight with the sons of the mother land, he knew we took an interest in the success of the British arms in China, believing their quarrel was just. Though a session of parliament may be in progress, English statesmen always recognize it their duty to meet important men and to discuss important subjects of mutual interest. I do not see why the time was inopportune. The hon. member for East Toronto proceeds to state why it was that Lord Salisbury refused to receive this deputation. I am giving you his words, not mine, the words of one who was there :

—and the country was on the verge of an election. I can quite easily understand, therefore, and I think hon. members will agree with me, that in these conditions it was inopportune for the Prime Minister to receive such a deputation, especially in view of the fact that the discussion on this question, being one that enters largely into the politics of Great Britain, his reception of the deputation might be interpreted to mean that the Imperial government were about to adopt a protective policy, and this might cause their defeat in the elections which were about to take place.

That is the hon. member for East Toronto. He was there. Lord Salisbury would not receive them. He said the time was not opportune. He mentions why it could not be. The hon. member for East Toronto says that the South African war was on. Of course it was, but the business of government had to go on. The China war was on. Of course it was, but they received other deputations, and disposed of other business. This mutuality of preference, this inter-Imperial trade that the mother country and its inhabitants are burning to have established, could not be discussed. Minor subjects to that must have been discussed. Ah, but it was on the eve of an election, and if he even received that deputation it might be interpreted as an indication that they were going to introduce a protective policy, and that might, in the estimation of the hon. member for East Toronto—jeopardize the election. No, he does not speak of any possible alternative. He says that the only alternative was that it would assure their defeat. What is the use of hon. gentlemen opposite standing up and arguing that you can get this thing when you have the Prime Minister of England saying : Keep away ; it might be interpreted to mean that I am in favour of a protective policy, and even the appearance of this would be enough to secure my defeat in the election. Keep away from me. They rather smarted under that, I fancy, and they thought they would look around so as to have an interview with somebody. Mr. Chamberlain had always been advertised and quoted as a friend of this policy, and these gentlemen determined that they should wait upon him, not in their capacity as a deputation, but in their private capacity as individuals. They went there, not as a deputation. There was the hon. member for East Toronto, Mr. Cockshutt, of Brantford, Dr. Parkin, and a gentleman from Ottawa, whose report of the interview with Mr. Chamberlain was denied. I have waited to hear from that gentleman, to see what he would say in regard to the statement of the hon. member for East Toronto, that his report was not correct, when he declared that Mr. Chamberlain talked in quite a conversational way, and said that if these relations which were desired ever were to come about, they would have to come about through Canada abandoning her protective duties and placing the country on a free trade basis. Let us see what the hon. member for East Toronto says in reference to that :

The deputation which went to Mr. Chamberlain was a deputation of three or four Canadian gentlemen who desired to pay their respects to him before leaving England; and they went to him a good many days, perhaps weeks, afterwards. They were not sent by the congress. What transpired there was not given correctly by the extract read by the Finance Minister from the report of the representative who went from this city.

He says it was not correct.

I might say, however, that I am not in a position to state to the House what was said on that occasion, because it was thoroughly understood by Lord Strathcona and Mr. Chamberlain and the three or four of us who discussed this matter, that nothing should be said about it, because of the stand Lord Salisbury had taken. In order to confirm my opinion in that respect, I asked the other members of the deputation what their view of it was, and I have here letters from Mr. Parkin and Mr. Cockshutt, stating that their view of the interview was that it was of a confidential character.

The delegate from the Ottawa Board of Trade has told us that Mr. Chamberlain, in a quiet, conversational way, gave them to understand that it could only come about on the basis of free trade, which would mean ruin to the industries of this country, if they cannot stand, as hon. gentlemen opposite say, a reduction of 33⅓ per cent. But, mark you, the hon. member for East Toronto says, that even though he took the ground that he would secure for the people of England an absolutely free market for the manufactures of Great Britain, that when they did discuss it with Mr. Chamberlain it had to be kept hidden, it could not be done in the open, it must be confidential. The hon. member for East Toronto has told us the reasons which were given by Lord Salisbury. Even to discuss it on the basis of getting absolute freedom in our markets was impossible. That must be done in secret ; anything else might be interpreted as meaning that they favoured a protective tariff which might result in a defeat in the election. Keep it quiet, says Mr. Chamberlain, and every one else. That is the position of public opinion in England upon this question, when hon. gentlemen opposite, with an amount of brazen assurance that is remarkable, say that we can get this preference by simply asking for it. I give them their answer. I give them the statement made by the hon.

member for East Toronto in this House. It is in 'Hansard.' The last man in a position of authority who ever tried to interview British statesmen in reference to the matter was that hon. gentleman.

I must not detain the House any longer. The question of expenditures have been dealt with, and charges of recklessness have been made. One hon. gentleman says that we have increased the expenditure by $33,000,000 in five years. These statements are so extreme that the people themselves would be prepared to discredit them upon investigation. But, let me just show how it was that instead of $33,000,000 of an increase in the expenditure, the increase has been much less. I have a statement of the four years from 1897 to 1900, as compared with the four years from 1893 to 1896, and it shows that on consolidated fund account we increased the expenditure a little over $12,500,000, and that on capital account there was an increased expenditure of $4,000,000, making a total increase in expenditure in the period of four years from 1897 to 1900 as compared with the previous four years, of something like $16,000,000. Hon. gentlemen opposite hide from you the fact that the revenue that is derived from some sources does not mean taxation out of the pockets of the people to the extent they are speaking of. They do not point out the fact that while you have an expenditure of a million and a half extra on the Intercolonial Railway, not a cent of it came out of the pockets of the people by way of taxation, but out of the increased earnings of that road, and that while you have had an expenditure during these years of some $4,000,000 in the Yukon, it did not come out of you in the way of taxation, but out of the receipts of the Yukon. Hon. gentlemen do not point these things out to you. It is the taxation that is taken out of the pockets of the people of the country that they are interested in, and the rate of taxation, as I pointed out before, has been materially lowered by this government since we came into power. I just want to say a word more, because we are charged with extravagance in our expenditures of public money. Allusion was made to-day by one of the speakers, or perhaps the other night, to the charge that we had multiplied public officials, and it was asserted that we had run up the cost of the collection of revenue. That is true, to a certain extent, as far as the Department of Customs is concerned. I am prepared to admit that there has been an increase in expenditure. But, you cannot collect $28,000,000 of the money for the goods that represents at the reduced rate of taxation without adding to the customs staff, to say nothing of the improvements we have made by way of statistics, the prevention of smuggling, &c. For every additional bill of goods that may come into the country you have additional work for clerks, landing waiters and appraisers. You cannot bring the Intercolonial Railway from Point Lévis to Montreal and operate it without having some extra train hands. You cannot enlarge your postal service, and give facilities to different parts of the country without paying for it. There has been an increase, but people such as dwell in Canada will endorse an increase in the public expenditure for the collection of revenue, provided the public revenue has so increaseed as to warrant it. Turn to the Public Accounts, where it gives the cost of collection of revenue in the excise, the customs, the railways, the canals, the weights and measures, the post office, and in 1894-5, which was the last fair year's expenditure of the Conservative party—— for their accounts in 1896, in my judgment, were not fair accounts—and you will find in the last year's fair expenditure of the Conservative government, that the charges under consolidated expenditure for the collection of revenue amounted to $9,129,416, while the total revenue collected that year was $33,978,129. The cost of collection was therefore 27 per cent. Now, in 1900 the total charge for collection of revenue amounted to $11,044,526, but the total revenue collected was $51,029,994, the cost of collection being 22 per cent, or 5 per cent less than it was under the Conservative government in 1894-5. If the cost of collecting revenue in 1900 had been at the same rate as in 1894-5, the expenditure would have been in round figures $2,750,000 more than it was, and I think that is an answer to the gentleman who charges us with having increased the expenditure.

Before concluding, Sir, I wish to allude to the subject with which the hon. gentleman from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) closed his remarks in which he entered into the question as to whether there had been in the province whence he comes questions of race and creed introduced at the last election. I was glad to hear the words he spoke. They were a rebuke to men—I will not say in this House—but at all events they were a rebuke to a portion of the press which supports the Conservative party in the province of Ontario, and to a portion of the people there. I am glad he uttered these words. I re-echo the sentiment of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) given utterance to in this House on more than one occasion, and I cannot forbear quoting those words of his, which ought to find an echo in the breast of every man who is a lover of his country :

> As has been well said by the right hon. gentleman, this is a matter into which party consideration should not enter. This is a matter which should be above all party considerations, and I, for one, as long as I have any voice in this House or in this country shall protest against any question of race or creed being introduced into the party politics of Canada.

Grand sentiments these. In this debate that hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden, Halifax) dealt with this question again, and he used this language :

I think that to stand for the unity of the people of this country and to suppress any cry of race or creed that may be raised, is a matter of greater importance to any political party in Canada than is the effort to obtain or retain power.

Grand sentiments. He recognizes the fact that ought to be recognized by all : That you may hold to a high tariff or to a low tariff, but that you should strive for a united people ; a people animated with a common desire to advance the welfare of their country, and to promote its progress in every portion of it. Why should these race and religious cries be introduced in a grand country like this ? Why should an attempt be made to separate the people and to obliterate that united feeling which is absolutely necessary ; I will not say to the existence of confederation, but to the progress of Canada under confederation. I wish, Sir, it might be said that gentlemen on the other side, each in his place endeavoured to give effect to the noble sentiments uttered by the leader of their party. The hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) said in his speech the other day :

In the debate in this House the other day it was stated that race issues were being raised in North Bruce. I do not know whether they have been or not; but North Bruce has evidently remained, according to last reports, true to its old policy. I hope the electors of North Bruce did not vote on racial lines. If they voted on party lines, they had a right to vote as they did, it is a free country.

And here the hon. gentleman from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) arose in his place and said :

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to tell the hon. gentleman, as one who was there, that the racial question was never mentioned, so far as I know, either on the platform or off the platform.

I am bound to take the word of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), but not long before he uttered that statement he had a copy of this paper which I hold in my hand in his possession, and he brought up in the House as a matter of privilege, a statement contained in that paper, and when the Speaker ruled him out on that point he brought up, on going into Supply, an article headed 'Shameful Tactics,' which alleged that two mail clerks who had been sent, it was alleged, out of Wiarton to Owen Sound, so that they would not be present at the election. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) therefore had this paper in his possession. It is the Wiarton Canadian and Liberal-Conservative Banner of North Bruce. He read this extract from the paper :

The Grit machine has commenced its work in connection with the North Bruce by-election, and the act which has been perpetrated this week by the Tarte-Laurier combination is one of the most shameful.

That alone ought be sufficient to indicate to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) that there was an attempt to raise the race and religious cry. We who went through the contest in Ontario know how a sneer accompanied the utterance of these words on more than one occasion. But, if the hon. member for East Grey did not detect it from that, he might have turned to the editorial page and read this :

Who raised the race and religious cry in reference to the coronation oath ? Who but John Costigan, a member of the present Reform government.

Mr. WALLACE. It is pretty near.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. member for West York says pretty near. He does not wholly repudiate that reference, you see, as a man with a proper sense ought to, when a deliberately penned lie is read to him.

Mr. WALLACE. I said a little premature. We are looking for his advent day by day.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Again, perhaps the hon. member for West York will say this is not so far out :

Look at the construction of the present Grit government. Is it not nearly all French? Its majority is made up of French members, elected on the race and religion cry, and the cabinet is composed of a majority of representatives of Quebec.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Shame, shame.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I wanted the hon. leader of the opposition to be in his place to-night, because he said that so long as he had a voice left, he would protest against this kind of thing. I wanted him to be in this House to raise his voice in protest and to denounce the utterance of his banner sheet in this riding. As he truly said, it is important above any party consideration to preserve the unity of the people of this country; it is away above any party question as to whether you will have a 20 per cent tariff or a 25 per cent tariff. This paper goes on :

And yet they ask you to send a representative from North Bruce to assist this French majority in voting away Ontario's money for the benefit of Quebec, and have the effrontery to tell you that Conservatives raised the race and religion cry.

I am glad the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) never heard the thing mentioned on the platform or off it, when he had this paper in his hand at the time, and could read about shameful tactics; and I hope that when the hon. gentleman rises, as I believe he is to follow me, he will express himself as his leader did, for I take it that he is opposed to such utterances as this. When he rose to assure the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) that he had never heard the race and religion question mentioned, he left the impression that if any one had dared to mention it in his presence, he would have stamped it out. Now, they have formed a company in Wiarton to start a beet sugar factory. The people are interested in it, and anxious that this government should give it a bonus; and this paper says :

> The beet sugar factory agitators support the Conservative candidate in North Bruce. In parliament the French members and government opposed the granting of the bounty, and secured a postponement of the discussion. We cannot have the bounty unless the Dominion assumes the provincial debt of French Quebec, which only amounts to $32,000,000, and with their majority they can succeed in that outrageous demand. Will the electors of North Bruce sanction this by sending to Ottawa a man to swell this French majority? We trow not.

I read this with pain. The general elections were over, and this election in North Bruce was not a matter of life or death to the Conservative party; but this is printed in this organ which was supporting hon. gentlemen who were battling in that contest. I hold with the hon. leader of the opposition that above any question of obtaining or regaining power it is important to frown down this sowing of the seeds of dissention among the people of Canada who, differ as they may in their origin, have equal rights and equal liberties. To seek to raise a prejudice against any portion of our people because of their origin or their faith, is something that should be frowned down by every man who is a lover of his country; and when it comes to the penning of deliberate lies, which gentlemen opposite know to be lies, to the effect that a majority of this government are French members, when hon. gentlemen know that of the sixteen members of the cabinet with portfolios, only three are of French origin, then the ungenerous nature of such statements is apparent.

Sir, if they would give honour where honour is due, as honour might be given to that element in this House which is accused of seeking domination or undue influence, they should know that when the cabinet of the right hon. leader of the government was formed, himself a leading French Canadian, he had, I think, one colleague of the same faith and religion as himself, with portfolio, and one without portfolio; and besides, from his province, which sent a large majority of its representatives to support him, he had an English-speaking Protestant without portfolio, and an English-speaking Protestant with portfolio, and a Protestant of French origin with another portfolio. That was the composition of it; and when unfortunately, and to the regret of the people of this country, that French representative in the cabinet without portfolio was taken away, instead of filling the vacancy, as he was entitled in justice and fair-play to his own province to do, if it were disposed to take a narrow view of the matter, with one of the same origin and faith as the gentleman who died, he gave it to the province of Ontario and to a Scotch Presbyterian. And yet papers will be found to publish what I have read in your hearing against men who have acted in that noble way; and they venture to sneer at the names of Laurier and Tarte, as if there was something wrong and wicked about them, trying to sneer away men's reputations. Men in public positions have feelings like other men; and if they have done wrong, accuse them of the wrong and prove it against them; but do not sneer away a man's reputation because he happens to differ from you. I am one of the few members left in this House who took part in the selection of the leader of the Liberal party who is now Prime Minister of this Dominion, and I can tell you that when Mr. Blake left this country and it became necessary for the Liberal party to select another leader, the minds of the party representatives turned instinctively towards one of their colleagues, and unanimously asked him to take the leadership. He declined; he asked us not to press it upon him; he fairly besought that we should give it to some one else. He even then intimated that it was possible that he might not be as strong as some others might be, because he was not of the origin or the faith of the majority of the people of this country. Instantly every Liberal replied: We are not asking you to take the leadership of the Liberal party because you are of French origin or because you are of the faith of the minority; we are not asking you from motives of policy; we are asking you because we believe you are the one amongst us all who is fitted to be the leader; and the Liberal party, when they find the man best fitted for the position, ask his services without caring what his race or religion may be, and that is why we want you to lead us. And he assented to it. It is possible that he may be stung by these insinuations thrown out at times. It is possible that a man of high feeling must feel once in a while the injustice of such appeals. But I can only tell the right hon. gentleman that the right-thinking people of this country, whether Liberals or Conservatives, recognize in him the foremost man in Canada. I tell him that he has entrenched himself in the affections not alone of the French people—I am not speaking of them—but of the people of my own province. I give it as my unhesitating belief that he has entrenched himself in the affections of the people of Ontario as securely as in those of his own province. When I think of the services he has rendered to this Dominion, when I picture the honour he reflected on his country among that galaxy of statesmen gathered in the streets of London from every centre of the world-encircling British Empire, when I hear the shouts acclaiming him as he passed through the streets of that great metropolis, when I think of the standing which he gave Canada among the nations of the world such as she never had before, I cannot but feel humiliated that any paper in the province of Ontario should publish such an ungenerous attack, should use such unworthy language as I have read, should strive to stir up the most ignoble prejudices against the leader of this government, and all to gain a temporary party advantage in a by-election. I am glad that the hon. gentleman who leads the opposition took the manly stand he did. I was delighted to hear his first lieutenant (Mr. Monk) tell us that in the province of Quebec political questions are not decided on lines of race and creed, but on lines of public policy. That is the way these questions should be decided, and we on this side reciprocate and re-echo the opinion expressed by the leader of the opposition, that questions such as I have referred to should never be raised in this country. As far as it lies in our power, we will abstain from using them, and our best exertions will be made to show that appeals such as I have read are unworthy of any people who pretend to the privilege of Canadian citizenship in this fair Dominion.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). The tragic display, Mr. Speaker, to which the hon. gentleman who has just spoken worked himself up in his beautiful peroration, and the righteous indignation which he introduced into that fulsome eulogy that he expended on his leader, suggested to me that there was a little something indelicate about it. What it had to do with the financial policy of the government or the great questions of the day, I am unable to see. All through the hon. gentleman's speech, or at different times through it, the conviction was forced on my mind that the hon. gentleman imagined that noise was strength of argument, or that his argument was strong in proportion to its noise. If it was, he certainly treated the House to a very strong argument. But a careful analysis, I am afraid, would lead to another conclusion. The hon. gentleman, in his peroration, selected a subject that he thought would be attractive from its sympathetic nature, and one admirably suited to the occasion, and that was the race and religious cry, and in so doing he referred to some remarks made by the hon. member for East Grey a few days ago when the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) referred to the race and religious cry raised in North Bruce. I replied then that although I had taken part in that campaign, I had never heard race and religion mentioned on the platform or off it, and I repeat that statement here to-night. The hon. member the Minister of Customs took that as his text, and took up the Wiarton Canadian, and read the heading of an article that I brought to the attention of the House—an article complaining that the mail carriers in North Bruce had been taken away from home to prevent their voting in the by-election then going on. I read that article from first to last, and the hon. gentleman, holding it up, exclaimed in his righteous indignation with that fervour so peculiar to himself, and asked in thundering tones : Was there any race and religion cry in that, when you talk about the Tarte-Laurier combine ? Well, Mr. Speaker, that is a very common form of expression. We speak of the Ross-Hardy combine and the Mowat-Hardy combine. And our Reform friends used to speak of the Macdonald-Langevin and the Macdonald-Cartier combine. Therefore, there was nothing in that, in my opinion, disrespectful or severe from the race or religion standpoint. Why then should the hon. gentleman have worked himself up to such a righteous indignation over something that had not a solitary word of race and religion in it from first to last. The hon. gentleman did not dare to read it all, because if he had the House would have seen that all his indignation went for nothing, because there was not a word about race or religion in the whole article.

He then selected another article treating of French domination. Well, I would like to ask him if he could not have taken up many French papers in the province of Quebec during the last campaign and read articles that savoured very much more of race and religious cries than were contained in the one he quoted ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No.

Mr. SPROULE. I have seen many of them quoted and can assure you the language was much stronger and the spirit of the articles much more intensely imbued with the race and religious cry than any the hon. gentleman has read.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I can tell the hon. gentleman that it is not so. I would like him to quote any such papers.

Mr. SPROULE. I have not the papers, but have seen them quoted over and over again in other papers, and never saw them repudiated. Speaking of the race and religious cry, I passed through that campaign in Ontario last September, and I say, and say it frankly and in justice, not only to our own party, but to the French people of this country, that although I spoke in various ridings and on many platforms, I never heard the word Frenchman or Catholic mentioned on any platform in that campaign. The conduct of the government was discussed, their management or mismanagement of our affairs, their carrying out or failure to carry out the promises they had made, their extravagance, their unbusinesslike policy—but not a word about race or religious questions. And I should have considered myself beneath contempt if I had used such arguments or even allowed them to be used in my presence without rebuke. So far as I know, and I think I am in a position to know, such a cry was not raised in Ontario, no such argument influenced the election. I wish to say that in justice to the French-speaking people and to the English-speaking people. The English-speaking people would not want to win an election on such a cry. I am surprised that the memories of hon. gentlemen opposite are so short that they cannot remember how we were obliged to meet that same cry of French domination every year from 1878 to 1887. I have stood on platform after platform and have had to defend the Conservative party against the cry of French domination. I thought it an unworthy cry, and I met and fought it as best I could. The hon. Minister of Customs should not think that the memory of the people of Ontario is so short that they cannot remember when the cry of French domination was one of the most successful raised in the interest of the Liberal party.

Now, I wish to refer to some arguments that the hon. member used, before I speak on this question generally. The hon. Minister of Customs said that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) says that it is no part of our duty to give parliament and the country the benefit of our views of policy, and he criticised him adversely, because he did not do it. Does he forget that he sat behind his own leader for years when that gentleman was intrenched, as he said, behind the lines of torres vedras, and declared on platform after platform that it was the duty of an opposition to criticise the government, not to furnish them with a policy. To-night he sings another song—as an hon. gentleman beside me remarks, he cannot sing the old song. The hon. gentleman tells us that there are three or four hundred items in the tariff and that we must not expect the supporters of the government to agree upon them. We have had ample proof that they do not agree. During this debate, member after member on that side has arisen and declared that he favoured protection, or incidental protection, or bounties on iron, or bonuses, or some other of the various plans embodied in a protective tariff, while all the time admitting that they were prepared to vote against these things in support of the government. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) was in favour of protection. We remember that in 1879 his father was in this House declaiming against protection. I could not help thinking, when the hon. gentleman was speaking, of the adage about the boy being the father of the man. I do not think you could find half a dozen men among the government supporters who are in exact agreement as to the proper tariff for this country or whether the present tariff is a proper one or not. The hon. minister refers to the fact that the government is taunted with the imperfections of the tariff, but he asks us if we forget that the country has endorsed them and their tariff. I would remind the hon. gentleman that the great province of Ontario before which he laid that tariff so eloquently, both he and his friends, declared against them by a majority of eighteen or nineteen. He went to the country with a majority of twelve from Ontario and, after doing his best to convince the people that the tariff was right, he comes back with a minority of eighteen from that province. As he is one of the leaders of that party in Ontario, the fact that his own province has declared against him, notwithstanding his efforts to win it over to favouring his argument, should cause him to be less vigorous in his claim that the country has supported him. The hon. minister went on to speak of the development of our trade and to say that this was a justification of our tariff. He noticed the fact that the government were reminded that the increase in our exports was due to the beneficence of Providence and not to anything the government had done. He says they acknowledge all that Providence has done, but, if there had not been a wiser, businesslike government in control of affairs, that development could not have taken place to the same extent. But I have figures here to show that that development in the export trade was no greater than that which has taken place in similar trade in the United States, and that country did not have this wise and beneficent government to direct its affairs. It had the advantages of Providence the same as the hon. gentlemen over there had. But I only give this as an evidence that the expansion of our trade was not due to any business management of the government of the day, but was rather due to the fact that we had good crops, we had bountiful harvests, we had comparatively good prices for what we had to sell, and there was a revival of trade all over the world after the stagnation that had prevailed for several years in manufactures and industrial pursuits. Good times prevailed all over the world, and as a result we enjoyed an expansion of trade during that time.

Then he goes on to say that it was largely due to the Minister of Agriculture's cold storage. Now, how much had it to do with it, it would be interesting to inquire. I heard a statement made in this House the other night that amused me. An hon. gentleman, speaking on the other side, said: Do you suppose that the development of the butter trade, of the cheese trade, of the fruit trade, would have been so great but for the admirable cold storage system introduced by the Minister of Agriculture?

I wonder if the Minister of Agriculture thinks he was responsible for that development by his cold storage. I have no doubt that he endeavours to make the people of the country believe it, and his friends behind him try to make us believe it, when they resort to arguments like that. Now, in view of this contention, let me refer to the report of the Minister of Agriculture himself, where he gives a comparison of the exports of the country in cold storage for the last three years :

Of butter, while there were 209,175 packages sent out in cold storage in 1898, and 429,734 in 1899, in 1900 there were only 227,863. Of cheese, while there were 5,000 packages sent out in 1898, there were only 1,000 sent out in 1899, and not a single package in 1900. Of fruit, there were sent out 25,564 packages in 1898, 16,381 in 1899 and only 8,785 in 1900.

The cold storage had been responsible, as the hon. gentleman behind him said, for the great development in the cheese trade when there was an export of $19,000,000 worth. What, then, about this cold storage now ? Would the hon. gentleman not like to take that argument back and revise it ? Will he not refrain from addressing such an argument to the House, when the Minister of Agriculture's own report is so readily at hand ? Now, take fruit. In 1898, they sent out 25,000 packages ; in 1899, only 16,000 packages ; in 1900, only 8,000, one-third as much as they sent out in 1898. I give that as an answer to the argument of the hon. Minister of Customs, who attributes the great development in the exports of these lines to the admirable cold storage arrangements of the Minister of Agriculture.

Then, the hon. gentleman went on to tell us what statesmanship was, and he referred to some definition of it from this side of the House. He gave his own definition, and said that statesmanship consisted in compromising and harmonizing what was otherwise antagonistic. He read from a carefully-made statement of what statemanship is. I suppose he went into the library and culled out from standard authors his argument.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No, I was reading an extract from the speech of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean).

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman went on to define what he regarded as statemanship. His explanation of it reminded me of the story of a professor who was demonstrating to his class what chemistry was. He said : You will take an effervescent, you will add a deliquescent, there will be a precipitation, that is a conglomeration, that is a demonstration, and that is chemistry. That is about as intelligible a definition of chemistry as the hon. gentleman's definition of statemanship, and about as convincing. Then, the hon. gentleman spoke about the preferential tariff. It is true, he said, that it struck one or two lines, it is true that it has struck the woollen trade of this country. He says: I sympathize with the woollen industry, I am sorry if they stand to lose by it; but, I believe that by applying themselves with energy to the situation, and employing all the resources of their enterprise and their intelligence, they will be able to overcome these difficulties after awhile. Does not that savour a little of the answer given by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) to the manufacturers in 1878, when he told them that all they had to do was to work harder and eat less? It is practically the same answer. That is the solution he offers to the woollen trade.

Then, the hon. member went on to give us a dissertation with regard to book-keeping, why you should charge a certain item to capital account and another to current account. He selected the iron bounties as an example, and said the iron bounties was a permanent improvement in the country, because it developed the mines, and should, therefore, be charged to capital account. It was exactly the same, he said, as if you were to put money into a railway which would run on indefinitely in the future for the benefit of the country. Does he forget that when that bounty is paid on iron a large percentage of the article goes out of the country, and is of no further use to the country ? The only benefit it is to the country is the employment it affords to men in mining the raw material, and in manufacturing it, but after it goes out it is of no permanent benefit to Canada ; therefore, I say it should not be charged to capital account. There is no comparison between charging an item of that nature to capital account and an item that goes into the construction of a public building, or a railway, or something that must remain in perpetuity an asset of the country.

The hon. gentleman went on to tell us that the average rate of duty, from 1896, as compared with 1900, was much higher in the former period. He said it was 2¼ per cent higher in 1896 than in 1900. Now, I would not like to apply to the hon. gentleman what I once heard a speaker say on a public platform with regard to another, who had given a lot of figures to strengthen his case, and who had tried to clinch his argument by reminding his audience that figures will not lie. 'No,' replied his opponent, ' figures won't lie, but sometimes liars will figure.' I do not wish to apply that saying to the hon. gentleman, because I would be sorry to believe that he deliberately tried to misrepresent figures. But, I want to say that if he had wished to be fair, he would not have taken those periods. He took the very best year for showing a low percentage of duty in imports during the whole time his party was in power, in 1900. Does he not know that the larger importations of free goods would have reduced the rate of duty ? Does he not know that the larger importations of certain lines would do it ? He took the very worst year of the Conservative government to make that comparison. If he had desired to be fair he would have taken the four years of the Conservative administration and the subsequent four years of the Liberal administration. Had he done so, it would have shown him that during the four years his party was in power, the average rate of duty was 17·125 for the whole four years. Now, take the previous four years, and we find it was 17·445, or a difference of exactly 32-100ths of 1 per cent. Now, does not the Minister of Customs think he would have been much fairer if he had used the argument in that way, and given these figures to the House ? To take the very best year under their regime and the very worst under his, misleads the people and the country.

Then the hon. gentleman went on to speak of the efforts made by the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Kemp) and some of his associates in England to discuss the question of mutual preferential trade with Lord Salisbury, and he very properly said that Lord Salisbury said that it was not an opportune time to discuss that question. He gave his reasons. In the first place, the Australian colonies are endeavouring to confederate, and therefore they cannot join in the request made by Canada. In the second place, we have the South African war on our hands and this is monopolizing the attention of the British Empire as of the rest of the world. We have an election coming on in the near future, we desire to appeal to the country, and therefore it is not an opportune time. Was that not a reasonable and correct reply ? Certainly it was a correct reply. Lord Salisbury's aim was to appeal to the people of England upon the policy that was carried out in South Africa and he did not want to have it mixed up with anything else. He said that it was not an opportune time because he did not want to mix up these other questions which were comparatively irrelevant to the situation as it then existed. The vital question was whether the government were carrying out a proper policy in South Africa or not. That is the reason he gave, and a proper one it was, why he did not wish to grant an interview to the deputation. I wish to touch upon that afterwards, and I will say no more about it at the present time.

The hon. gentleman went on and gave us another evidence of the way in which they are conducting the affairs of the country. He said : We are told that the management of the affairs of this country is extravagant because we have appointed dozens and dozens of officers more than are needed, and the argument he adopts to prove this is by showing that it cost 5 per cent less to collect the revenue last year than in 1896. On its face it would appear prima facie to be a good argument along that line, but the hon. gentleman would be the last man not to see where the fallacy of that argument comes in. Does he not know that the larger the revenue is, the lower is the cost of collecting it ? A hundred customs officers could collect a revenue of $10,000,000, but if you require to collect a revenue of $20,000,000 it would not necessarily follow that you would have to employ 200 officers. The same men will do the same duty and collect the double amount just as easily as the smaller amount. So, the argument of the hon. gentleman is very unfair. Then, he took a year when the collections were very large, when the importations were large and when there was comparatively no increased cost in the collection of the revenue, compared it with the year in which a smaller amount of revenue was collected, divided it by the number of collectors, or struck the percentage, and in that way made a favourable showing. I will give the hon. gentleman another illustration: Go down to the station and you will find a conductor, an engineer and a brakeman, who are to have charge of a train carrying one hundred passengers. You will have the same number of men if that train carries two hundred passengers, and it will not cost a cent more to do it. If the hon. gentleman's argument is correct, it would cost twice as much to carry two hundred passengers as it would cost to carry one hundred. I do not propose to touch any more upon the hon. gentleman's arguments at the present. I may refer to some other portions of his remarks later on.

I wish to say a few words in regard to the speech that we were pleased to hear from the hon. Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding), who said that the country as a whole was in a prosperous condition, and that the people were amply employed at remunerative wages. This affords us quite as much pleasure as it does hon. gentlemen opposite, but, it was unnecessary to tell us that, because we all knew it. The people of the country knew it quite as well as the hon. Minister of Finance did. But we differ from the hon. Minister of Finance and his friends in their contention that this prosperity is brought about by their wise management of public affairs. We claim that it is not brought about by their wise management of public affairs, and it is proper to analyse and ascertain how far, if in any degree, they were responsible for bringing about these good times. The good times which we enjoy is the result of the cycle of good times coming after hard times. The whole world is enjoying better times. The surplus productions of the looms and factories had been used up after many years during which there was a larger output, leaving us with increased demands for these lines, and when the good times started the looms started again, the factories extended their business, the workmen were employed at larger wages, values were higher, and we had good times. In addition to that a bountiful Providence gave us good crops for several years. Does the hon. gentleman forget that the worst years for failure of crops we ever saw in the last quarter of a century were the few years preceding 1896? In our section of the country we never saw the like of them since I was a boy eight or nine years of age. One of the chief factors in bringing about good times is that the people are being employed at remunerative wages, and it is not the result of the management of the country by the government or anything of that kind. In what way do hon. gentlemen claim that they have brought about these good times? Will they tell us in what way? We have asked the question over and over again and have not received an answer. We asked them to give us the particulars, to specify what way they have brought about good times. Have they given the people employment at higher wages or have they done anything else to bring about this result? If they can say that they have done so, we will be inclined to believe that they are entitled to some credit for the good times. Good times are the result of ample employment for the people at remunerative wages, bountiful crops and a good market in which to sell. What have hon. gentlemen had to do in regard to making the crops bountiful? Sunshine, rain and atmosphere have accomplished that and they had nothing to do with it. What did they do towards getting us better markets? They have not got us a new market in any part of the world other than the markets we had when they came into power. How have they increased the value of the product of the people of this country where employed industrially? Did they increase the value of the product of the farmer? No, not by a single fraction of a cent. They cannot successfully claim that they are responsible for the good times by anything they have done in their management of public affairs. What have the government had to do with bringing about this development? Nothing, except so far as their additional expenditure of public money gave employment to the people. I admit that they have spent money a little more extravagantly than their predecessors, and that in that way they may have helped to give employment to the people. Their management of public affairs might be very well criticised at the present time, may properly be adversely criticised in many lines, but I do not deem it proper to detain the House for that purpose to-night, because this debate has been prolonged to such an extent that it would only be using time that I believe I can put to a better purpose in other lines.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Are you through with me?

Mr. SPROULE. Certainly, in respect to the hon. gentleman. I thank the hon. gentleman for his courtesy because he has shown a good deal more than is sometimes exhibited by some hon. gentlemen on that side of the House when we endeavour to answer them. The government claim that their system of revenue tariff based on free trade lines, has produced an overflowing revenue, and has given them ample means for the needs of the country. Well, their tariff system has resulted in one thing, and that is that it gives them lots of money to spend. But, if the hon. member for South Oxford (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) were in opposition to a government which pursued the policy which they are pursuing, he would no doubt apply the same argument that he did to the Conservative government when they had a surplus of $6,000,000, and when he said that every dollar that you take out of the people of the country more than is absolutely needed is a dollar that goes to impoverish the people, and a dollar of taxation based upon unsound economic principles. Therefore, according to the opinion of the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) in the past, the present Liberal tariff is all wrong in principle. These gentlemen opposite tell us that theirs is a revenue tariff approximating as closely as possible to free trade, but let us analyse that a little; let us ask ourselves: what is a revenue tariff and how should a tariff be framed for the sole purpose of getting revenue. When you impose a tariff solely for the purpose of getting revenue you impose it upon the necessaries of life which the people must purchase, and which the country does not produce. Therefore, a duty on tea, sugar, coffee, and such articles would be in the line of a revenue tariff. Nor does it necessarily follow in this, that you must impose a high tariff. I quote from Perry, a free trade writer who is one of the ablest authorities on this tariff question, and he says:

> While revenue taxes select by preference things wholly imported, protectionist taxes are placed of course on such foreign goods as are also and especially made or grown at home.

A revenue tariff taxes imported goods alone, but a protectionist tariff aims at shutting out foreign importations and, therefore, keeping the home market for the people of the country.

> Otherwise their plain and sole purpose would be thwarted, which completes the contrast between the two kinds of tariffs. For illustration, tea and coffee are the best things to tax under a revenue tariff.

Did this government tax tea and coffee? They did not. The hon. member (Sir Richard Cartwright) taxed them in 1876 when he was adhering to the principle of a revenue tariff, but his experience in that line did not cause him to repeat the experiment. He taxed tea and coffee two cents more in 1877, but he found still he could not raise sufficient revenue owing to hard times, and consequently greatly reduced importations. Then he acted on the correct principle of a revenue tariff, but this time he left tea and coffee alone, because the people had checked him severely for his policy in that direction before. Although he declared before the last elections that he wanted a revenue tariff, he did not put a tax upon those articles which can only be selected to produce a revenue tariff. Tea and coffee are fit subjects to produce a revenue tariff, because they are in universal consumption and are wholly imported, and taxes upon them do not raise the price of anything else in the country. Again, Perry in his 'Principles of Political Economy,' says :

> There is a tariff for revenue. The sole purpose of the tariff, as such, is to get money by this mode of indirect taxation out of the pockets of the people for the coffers of the government, in order to be then expended. . . . As the sole object is to get money for the national treasury, and as money can only be gotten as the foreign goods taxed are allowed to come in, such taxes must be levied at a low rate.

Now, a 17 per cent tariff is not a low rate, and a 20 per cent and a 30 per cent tariff is not a low rate. I quote this to show that when the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) declared that he was imposing a tax for revenue purposes only, he wandered very far astray from the principle upon which a revenue tariff can only be imposed :

> Such taxes must be levied at a low rate on each article taxed, so as not to interfere essentially with the bringing in of that class of goods with a profit to the importers, and not at all to encourage the smuggling of them in.

Perry goes on to say that when England raised taxes on a revenue basis she placed a tax on coffee, tea, chicory, chocolate, fruit, malt, pickles, tobacco, &c. She placed a customs duty upon these because they were necessaries of life which must be imported and on which the people could not get out of paying the tax. Therefore, according to one of the very best authorities on this question, the policy of this government cannot in any sense be called a revenue tariff. Now, as to the ways and means by which they are raising that revenue. In what respect does the principle of taxation adopted by this government materially differ from that adopted by the Conservatives ? These gentlemen tell us that they impose a tariff for revenue, but so adjusted and so imposed as to give us as nearly as possible free trade. The Conservative policy was, to distribute these customs duties and excise taxes so that they not only raised a revenue, but protected the interests of the people against foreign competition. That is the principle of political economy that divides the two political parties to-day more than any other. The member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) asked a very pertinent question when he said :

> Do these gentlemen opposite charge that the government in its past management of the financial affairs of this country, or in its proposals for the future, has violated some economic principle? If so, what is it?

My answer is in the affirmative. The Liberal government violated that economic principle of tariff, when they told the people of the country that they were imposing a tariff for revenue purposes, and when they framed their tariff on exactly the same lines as their Conservative predecessors who had a tariff for protective purposes. The Liberal party always held that a revenue tariff based upon free trade lines as nearly as possible, is the correct principle, and they say that they are pursuing that policy now.

Their contention is that their tariff is a tariff for revenue only, while it is to a great extent the same tariff as that imposed by their predecessors. Let us analyse it a little further. I may say in passing that a tariff may be at once a protective tariff and a revenue tariff. That was the kind of tariff which we had under the Conservative government from 1879 to 1896 ; but a tariff cannot be at once a free trade tariff and a revenue tariff, because they are entirely inconsistent with each other. Hon. gentlemen opposite have always claimed that the national policy was a protective tariff, while their tariff is a revenue tariff, on free trade lines. Let us suppose that the Finance Minister is talking in that way to an audience of farmers. I would answer him by saying, how can you say that when two cents a pound was imposed on pork coming into the country under the tariff of 1896 that it is a high protective tariff, and the same duty is levied still, when you now call it a revenue tariff. How could it be a protective tariff in 1896 and a revenue tariff in 1900 ? It was a protective tariff in 1896, is it not the same to-day, when you have exactly the same duty ? I would like him to explain that to the farmers of the country. Then, I would take some of the other lines. He would say to the farmers : We have changed the principle of taxation ; we have given you a revenue tariff based on free trade lines as nearly as possible. Then I would say to the farmers, ask the Finance Minister this question. There was 20 per cent imposed on agricultural implements in 1896, and it was declared year after year by the Liberal party that that was a high protective duty and that the farmers should have it reduced so as to enable them to get cheaper implements ; but the hon. gentleman has been in power for four years, and the duty on these implements to-day is 20 per cent, exactly the same duty that existed in 1896. If it was a protective duty in 1896, how can it be otherwise in 1900 ? On live hogs coming into the country in 1896 there was a duty of 1½ cents a pound. There is the same duty to-day. It was a protection to the farmers in 1896; will the hon. gentleman say that, although the duty is the same to-day, it is no longer a protective tariff, but a revenue tariff on free trade lines ? On meats brought into the country in 1896 there was a duty of 2 cents a pound, and it was declared to be a protective duty in the interests of the farmers. When the hon. gentleman went to his own province, he asked the people there, Are you going to stand a duty of 75 cents a barrel on flour that comes from Ontario, and 15 cents a bushel on wheat ? He said it was the most odious tax that could be imposed, and declared that the principle of it was wrong. But he came into power and introduced his own tariff, and continued these duties. If it was a protective tariff levied on the protective principle in 1896, it cannot be otherwise to-day ; it is exactly the same. On fresh meats there was a duty of 3 cents a pound in 1896, and there is the same duty to-day. If it was a high protective duty in 1896, it must be a high protective duty to-day. I take canned meats ; there was 25 per cent on them, and there is 25 per cent to-day. I take condensed milk : there was 3 cents a pound duty in 1896; there is 3 cents a pound to-day. If it was a protective tariff then, it is to the same extent to-day. On apples there was a duty of 40 cents a barrel then, imposed in the interests of the farmers, and it is 40 cents a barrel to-day. Therefore, I say that if the tariff was a high protective tariff in 1896, it is the same in 1900. Take hay, on which a duty of $2 a ton was imposed in 1896 ; the same duty exists to-day. On potatoes there was a duty of 15 cents a bushel then and there is the same to-day. On butter there was 4 cents a pound then, and there is 4 cents a pound to-day. On cheese there was 3 cents a pound then, and there is 3 cents a pound to-day. I merely cite these articles, because the farmer will be familiar with the argument and can analyse it for himself. It will enable him to see how he is deceived by the Finance Minister, who says to-day, our tariff is not levied on the same principle as the tariff levied by our predecessors ; it is levied as a revenue tariff on free trade lines, while our predecessors' levied their tariff for the purposes of protection. But I say that on every one of these articles the tariff that was a protective tariff in 1896 cannot be a free trade or a revenue tariff to-day. To that extent the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite are entirely fallacious. When they say that their tariff is a revenue tariff based on free trade lines, I ask, what do you think of the bounty system ? The father of the hon. gentleman who represents South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), when in this House in 1879, as the member for that riding, said that the bounty system was one of the most odious and extreme forms of protection that any government or any country could apply. But I was amused to hear his son, twenty-two years afterwards, get up and say : ' We do not object to these systems of protection, but we do object to those who use them to delude the people.' He said he did not object to the bounty system, although it is a system of protection, so long as it is kept within reasonable bounds ; and he went on to defend the bounty on iron. I thought how time brings about changes, because the father took the very opposite ground to that taken by the son. The rebate is another system of protection ; but this government are giving rebates just as their predecessors did. Drawbacks are also a protective principle. I remember very distinctly the father of the present member for South Wellington saying that drawbacks could be defended on no grounds. He was speaking of the drawback given to the millers who ground wheat being sent out of the country. Then he went on to try and get a little sympathy from the people of the maritime provinces by saying that the millers of Ontario are allowed to get a drawback on what they sent out of the country.

The millers of Ontario are allowed a drawback on what they send out of the country, but you are obliged to pay a duty of 75 cents per barrel on that flour when it goes down to you, and, therefore, it is wrong. I say that we do not object to the system of protection which these hon. gentlemen have adopted so much as we do to the fact that they have endeavoured to delude the people by telling them that the system is not what it is in reality—by pretending that they have adopted a free trade policy, or something very much nearer it than the policy of their predecessors, and that the taxes are not imposed on protective but on free trade lines as near as possible. What we on this side claim is, that in this tariff system which they have adopted, and which is to some extent protective—and to that extent we do not object to it—the protective element is very much impaired by the way it is carried out. How is it impaired ? In the first place, by the preferential rate. By that rate they have struck at one of the most important industries in the country. The Minister of Customs said that the woollen men had his sympathy, and that he was confident they would devise a means, with their energy and enterprise, of protecting themselves, and he hoped sincerely they would succeed in maintaining their status. The hon. member for South Oxford (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright), in 1877-8, was just as sincere in his regard for the manufacturers who were going to the wall at that time, but, like the present hon. minister, he did not raise a hand to relieve them from their difficulties. I say that the protective system of our tariff is very much impaired by the reduction on British goods. I have cited one line, but could easily cite others, which would furnish an argument quite as strong, to show the importance of the woollen industry. I need only refer to the fact that there is a capital of about $25,000,000 invested in plant and machinery, and the requirements necessary to keep this machinery in operation. About one-half of that is a turn over every year. That industry employs about 50,000 workingmen, to whom very good wages have been paid, until lately, when the establishments had to reduce the wages on account of their present condition. The output every year represents a value of about $30,000,000, but, at present, in all human probability, it will be reduced to about one-half on account of this preferential tariff. Will it be any satisfaction to the labouring men and others engaged in that industry to know that we have given a preference to England, when it is this preference which throws them out of employment? Will it be any consolation to them to know that in our generosity we have thrown off one-third of the duties imposed on British goods, when our generosity has prevented them earning bread for themselves and families? I do not think it will. Let me give the figures for one month to show what the preference is doing to these men. Take the importations of worsted fabrics in January, 1900, compared with January, 1901. In January, 1900, we imported worsted fabrics to the value of £82,871 sterling, and in January, 1901, the importations had increased to the extent of £105,440 sterling. Woollen fabrics, we imported in January, 1900, to the extent of £36,168 sterling, and in January, 1901, that import had increased to the extent of £50,871 sterling. Is it any wonder that the men interested in this industry are beseeching the government to protect them against this condition of affairs? Is it any wonder that they are imploring the government to give that great industry a chance to live, and not sacrifice it to their desire to show generosity to the old country. I have in my hand a copy of a letter addressed to the Finance Minister, and which shows the condition of that great industry to-day. When I read it, then the House will see that there is a strong reason why the government should not disregard with callous indifference the appeals made to them to save that great industry, and keep employed the workingmen engaged in it:

I beg to inclose herewith a paragraph taken from last week's Journal of Fabrics, showing the imports of woollen and worsted fabrics as compared with last year. You will notice a startling increase for the month of January, nearly 40 per cent, in woollen fabrics, and over 35 per cent in worsted fabrics. You will note also that there is a falling off in all other textile exports from Great Britain to Canada, except carpets, which is slightly increased, about 10 per cent.

When we interviewed you in Ottawa we told you that the 33⅓ preferential rate had not fully gotten into operation, and that we should feel it when the spring imports were received. Our worst fears are more than realized. Our future looks desperate. Surely there is some way in which you can afford relief. There were over fifty employees discharged at the Auburn mills, Peterborough, last week. Fifty more will be laid off this week, as the orders are being completed, and no new orders coming in. During the past month we have discharged over 200 employees at Hespeler alone. Lomas's mill at Almonte has completely closed down, and other mills are running on short time. The repeat orders for spring are of such a small character, and coming in so slowly that it looks as though there would not be in six months from now 25 per cent of the woollen machinery in operation that there was in July of last year. I cannot think that you will allow that condition of affairs to continue. It is a case of life and death with us, and matters should not be allowed to drift along until next year. Our help will be scattered. I am informed by Mr. Brodie that forty-seven men left Hespeler last week for the United States.

Yet, these hon. gentlemen say that their policy is giving employment to people and keeping them in the country. Forty-seven operatives, men who have learned their trade, who are valuable as consumers, who are good citizens, and who have been producing wealth every day, have gone across the line to enrich Uncle Sam, but to impoverish us to the same extent.

They left their families behind until they obtained work, when they propose to send for them. Our machinery will be lying idle and getting out of condition. Fixed charges will be running on, and there will be a very ruinous loss of capital before the end of this year. Our general manager informs us that owing to the state of his orders he will be obliged to discharge over 200 more persons by the 10th April—— —which will leave only 400 at the mill, where we employed up to quite recently, 800. I fear you do not realize the serious condition of the woollen industry, and the danger it is in of being completely extinguished.

Within three weeks two hundred in addition to the number already discharged, and yet the Finance Minister sits by and allows this to take place—does not move a hand to prevent it.

Woollen machinery is only fit for making woollen goods, and buildings are erected especially for the convenience of manufacturing woollens. It is all very well for people who have no practical knowledge of these things to say with a light heart—as many members of parliament do in their speeches—'why not turn your attention to something else?' Well, when everything one has got is invested in an enterprise, what can he turn his attention to? It requires capital and experience to embark in any manufacturing enterprise. Our capital is invested in the woollen industry, and our experience is in the manufacturing of woollen goods. I venture to say that you do realize that the woollen industry is the only one that has been hit and hit hard, and I may say, without the slightest exaggeration, is on the brink of ruin by the operation of the preferential tariff.

We do not object to the preference to Great Britain, we are prepared to support it, but the tariff should be so arranged that we should be put on an equality with the Lancashire manufacturer.

I can assure you that the situation is really serious, and the financial institutions who are supporting the various large woollen industries —what I mean by supporting is discounting their paper and making them advances—are becoming seriously alarmed. If they withdraw their confidence and refuse to continue to make advances, the mills will have to close down, and that is just what is in sight, I fear.

It looks to us, and to a great many of the members of the House, that the woollen industry has been singled out for the severest competition, not only by reason of the extent to which German goods are smuggled into Canada through Great Britain under pretense of partial manufacture in England. You will note that the several departments of the textile trade are relatively untouched by the preferential tariff. The silk trade, the linen trade, the jute trade, and the cotton trade all appear to be exempt from severe competition suffered by the woollen mills.

I greatly regret to say that many of the members of the House I have spoken with do not vote as they talk, as I have been assured by many of them, including some members of the cabinet——

Do not forget that.

—that they were protectionists, and that we ought to have some relief; but they vote the other way when relief is asked for. I hate to put it in that way, but it is a true statement of the case.

In making this appeal I do so in the hope that the facts already before you, and the additional information contained herein will be fully and fairly considered by the government, and that something will be done for us this session.

Now, is it any wonder that the men engaged in this trade have been almost on their bended knees beseeching the Minister of Finance for relief from their present conditions.

Mr. SMITH (Vancouver). May I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule), who is the author of that letter ?

Mr. SPROULE. There is no name on it. It is a copy of a letter sent to the Minister of Finance, but there is no signature on this copy. But the hon. minister knows who is the writer, and he will be able to give the name.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If I were reading the letter I should do so.

Mr. SPROULE. And if I had the name I would gladly give it, because it would strengthen my argument by showing that it comes from a reliable and intelligent source.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It is from a gentleman engaged in the woollen trade, and the name is no secret, I take it. The writer is Mr. Millichamp, of Toronto.

Mr. SPROULE. I suppose so, because it is on paper headed 'Millichamp, Coyle & Co., manufacturers' agents, woollens, &c.' In the face of all this, will hon. gentlemen opposite stand up and defend the beautiful preference they have given to England ? Will they defend it to the poor operatives who are out of work and starving ? Will they defend it to the men who are going across to the United States to find employment which, under the beautiful revenue tariff is denied them here ? Would they defend it if it came home to themselves, if starvation was brought to their own door by the unwise policy carried out by the Minister of Finance and his friends which they now laud to the sky ? I claim that this tariff is injurious, because, though somewhat protective, the protective element is very much impaired by the preference given to British woollen goods. We contend that it is further impaired by a strong bias towards free trade. It prevents the government extending protection to new lines which might be easily called into existence by a little aid. I will give you one instance. We have had before this House the question of the beet-root sugar industry. We know, from the information collected by the Ontario government and by this government and by the experiments that have been carried on for the last ten or fifteen years, that we have a country admirably adapted for beet-root sugar. All that is required is to have the same principle extended to that industry that has been extended to the iron industry. If this were done, we should have an industry that would give employment to thousands, that would bring in capital from abroad, and that would greatly benefit the farming community. Yet these hon. gentlemen are so wedded to free trade principles and to a revenue tariff that they will not lend a helping hand to assist these industries. I have do doubt whatever that if they would agree to give a bounty of one cent a pound on beet-root sugar for four or five years, inside of a few years we should have a large industry of this kind established in the Dominion.

The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce told us to-night that last year there were over 330,000,000 pounds imported into this country. To manufacture that 330,000,000 pounds would require between thirty and forty factories, and every pound of it could be made here in Canada. These factories would require an expenditure of $15,000,000 of money to build and to supply with machinery and plant. These thirty factories would employ over 10,000 operatives, directly and indirectly. These thirty factories would consume beets raised by thousands and tens of thousands of farmers, and the farmers would be engaged in a line of industry that would give them four times the profit they now get out of any line of industry that they are engaged in at present. I have complete figures in regard to this, but I will not detain the House by reading them. I only wish that the government would extend their principle of protection as disclosed in the bounty system ; they would thereby do great good to the farmers, and would start an industry here out of which the farmers would get 60 per cent of all the money expended. The farmers are an important class, their profits are small to-day, and I say the government could well afford to do something in their interests. But with that callousness that has characterized their conduct in connection with the woollen industry, they will do nothing in this respect either. They have introduced a tariff which they say is framed on a revenue basis, and they want to prove to the people that they are carrying out the principle of a free trade tariff.

We contend further that the government is doing harm by inspiring the manufacturers with doubt. I believe to-day the manufacturers are becoming frightened. They remember that the Minister of Finance said that the aim of this government is to follow the same principles of trade as prevail in England, that they cannot get down to free trade in a day. The farmers remind the government that they promised to give them a free trade tariff. So we did, reply the government, but it requires time, and we are working towards that end. Therefore, I say the manufacturers are becoming timid, they are not launching out to the same extent as they would do if they had confidence in the principles of the tariff. The government are wedded to their free trade ideas and will not readjust the tariff. From time to time we hear of industries struggling to maintain themselves, and I have given you an example in the woollen trade. I could give you examples in some other lines where competition is becoming so great under the changed conditions and changed values that employers are obliged to cut down the wages of their hands. I have in my possession a letter from Brantford from a gentleman saying a strike is going on in his business because they had to cut down the wages of their operatives. Why did they have to cut down the wages? Because the competition from abroad is so keen that they cannot hold their own, because there is not sufficient tariff to keep these imported goods out. Therefore these men say they are obliged to cut down wages, and this is from the town from which the Minister of Customs himself comes. The labouring men in his own town are fighting the fight of death.

An hon. MEMBER. What is the nature of the business?

Mr. SPROULE. The windmill business, carried on by Gould, Shapely & Muir. That is the reason they give. I say the government are so wedded to their free trade theories that although they see one line after another suffering, owing to changed conditions and changed values, they will not readjust their tariff. They say: We do not want any tariff tinkering, we are going to let it go on, we are going to show you that stability is one of the important features in our tariff. Now, Sir, I come to the amendment that is before the House, which I wish to deal with very briefly. The first clause reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the welfare of this country requires a pronounced policy of adequate protection and encouragement at all times to the labour, agricultural, manufacturing, mining and other industrial interests of the country.

This clause aims at reassuring the people of our continued belief in the value of protection to labouring men, to manufacturers, to miners, to farmers, and to the artisans of this country. We believe in the principle of a protective tariff which will keep Canada for the Canadians. We reassert that principle as a good one, we are not ashamed of it. The second clause in the amendment states that we are in favour of mutual preferential trade. But they say: That is folly, because you cannot get it. I ask them, Have you tried to get it? The First Minister read the other night several extracts from resolutions passed and speeches made in England when a discussion was carried on with the object in view of getting mutual preferential trade. He said these efforts did not eventuate in anything, and that we can never get it. Does he forget that the very same arguments were used with reference to the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway? We were told then: You can never build a railway, or if you do it will never pay, it won't pay for the grease of the wheels. Although the hon. gentlemen were in power, they would not try to do anything, and the people turned them out and put in another set of men who went to work, and the result has been a magnificent success. And so with mutual preferential trade, if these gentlemen won't try to get it, if they won't make any reasonable effort, then let them get out and give their places to men who will make an effort to get it. They say they believe it is right, then why do they not make an effort to get it. Ah, but they tell us, you cannot get it, the English people are not ready for it. When the hon. member for East Toronto went over to England and with others saw Lord Salisbury, Lord Salisbury would not even discuss it because the time was not opportune. Why would he not discuss it? Because the Australasian colonies were about banding themselves into a confederation. They have done so now, and they will soon be framing their tariff. So I say the present is an opportune time above all times in the history of Canada for these hon. gentlemen to make an effort. We have reason to believe that Australia desires the same principle of trade as we do, and that she will go in with us and with the other colonies. Then, I say it would be strengthening the hands of the mother country, it would have great influence upon the English people, if we were to make a move now. I believe it would produce a change in their mind which would eventuate in great benefit for us. But we are told that because the conditions were so and so two years ago, we can never get it. They tell us that the people of Great Britain will never consent to have their breadstuffs taxed. I have here a special despatch to the Globe, dated March 25, which says :

It is reported in many quarters that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will have to find such a huge sum of money in his budget that foreign grain coming into this country may bear some of the burden of the extra taxation. It is almost impossible to further increase the amount levied on many articles that now provide the national revenue, but with a strong and well-led opposition the taxation of imported breadstuffs would be a difficult question.

He says it is rumoured that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be obliged to put a duty on wheat. Does not that show that there is a change coming over the spirit of the dream that they have remained under so long in England ?

An hon. MEMBER. It is only a rumour.

Mr. SPROULE. It is only a rumour, but I take it that the correspondent of the Globe newspaper, if it were only an idle rumour, would not consider it worth his while to send it. He sends this as an important item of news as forecasting what is likely to occur, to the Globe newspaper. I believe that if we join with the Australian colonies and with the other colonies of the empire in an agitation, we will be successful. I feel as surely convinced as I am standing here addressing this House tonight that it will come in the near future. We may sit here until doomsday ; as long as hon. gentlemen do not ask it they will not get it. They say it is not our business, but it is the business of the empire. What does Scripture say ? 'Ask and ye shall receive.' Hon. gentlemen are not following out first principles. The hon. Minister of Customs may not have gone to Sunday school for a long time, nor the hon. Minister of Finance, and they may not recall this passage of Scripture.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Hon. gentlemen ask and do not receive. I am afraid they do not have the scriptural spirit.

Mr. SPROULE. We have reasonable hopes that it will come if we try to get it, and we would have got it, I have no doubt, had our party remained in power. Hon. gentlemen say that it is only the concern of the empire. It is our concern as well as theirs, and, in proportion as we develop the outlying portions of the empire, we develop the empire itself ; we strengthen and consolidate the empire and strengthen the loyalty of the colonies to the empire. It has been said here that the two principles of protection and mutual preference trade are antagonistic to each other. Not by any means. Cannot we put one duty on goods coming from the United States and another duty on goods coming from Great Britain? Cannot we give England a preference over the United States, and still have a duty on English goods and protect our manufacturers here ? All that is required is to adopt the principle of a maximum and minimum tariff which is being adopted by many countries in the world to-day, which desire to protect their own trade. They are not antagonistic, they are compatible and they are obtainable. I would remind hon. gentlemen that the world moves, that nations change their policy, that England has changed very much in her feelings during the last few years, and is likely to change more in future. What would it mean to the Canadian farmer if we got mutual preferential trade ? I shall take a few items from the report of the hon. Minister of Agriculture. If we had 5 per cent on the wheat that we send to England let us see what the result would be as compared with the wheat of the United States farmers. The farmers of Canada would have, on the basis of their exports this year, more than the American farmers, assuming that they exported the same amount, $599,774. They would have that much more than the American farmer because of the advantage which the 5 per cent preference would give them. That must be of some advantage to the Canadian farmer. It does not necessarily follow that because that duty would be on the Yankee wheat it would raise the price of breadstuffs in Great Britain. Suppose there was a 5 per cent duty on pork, and bacon ; if the Canadian farmer sent the same amount of pork that he sent last year and the American farmer sent over the same quantity of pork, the Canadian farmer would have $640,151 more for his pork than the American farmer would receive. Would that not be of advantage to the Canadian farmer ? Then, I take cheese ; if the Canadian farmer had 5 per cent preference on his cheese, and if the American farmer sent the same amount as the Canadian farmer did last year, the Canadian farmer would have $992,816 over the American farmer. Then I take butter ; if the Americans sent to Great Britain the same quantity as the Canadian farmer sent, the Canadian farmer would have upon that butter $256,107 more than the American farmer would have.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. And more than the Canadian farmer had this year ?

Mr. SPROULE. More than the Canadian farmer would have this year on the same quantity.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Would it give the Canadian farmer an increased price ?

Mr. SPROULE. It would give the Canadian farmer that much of an increased price over the American farmer.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Then, it would give the Canadian farmer an increased price ?

Mr. SPROULE. If we had that we would not have Canadians going to the United States to engage in farming, but, that movement would be reversed if by engaging in farming in Canada they could get 5 per cent more than the farmers pursuing their calling in the United States.

The MINISTER OF AGRICUTURE. Do they go there now. My hon. friend is not aware that our butter sells in England for a good deal higher price than American butter.

Mr. SPROULE. But it would sell for 5 per cent more.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Then, somebody must pay it.

Mr. SPROULE. It would be one of the most valuable aids to the immigration policy of the hon. gentlemen, who have 273 immigration agents, most of them in the United States, trying to persuade people to come to Canada.

Mr. McCREARY. There are more people coming in from the United States than there are going out. There are three special trains a week running from Calgary to Edmonton at the present time, carrying emigrants from Dakota, as I have official information to-night.

Mr. SPROULE. Would it not increase the number ? Do you object to increasing the number ? If your immigration agents can go over to the United States and tell the people that if a man comes to Canada he will have 5 per cent more for his produce than those who remain in the United States, it will be one of the strongest arguments that they could preach to them.

Mr. TALBOT. The hon. gentleman says that if butter, exported from the United States, was taxed in the English market 5 per cent, it would be a large benefit to the Canadian producer.

Mr. SPROULE. I say that the Canadian farmer would have that much advantage over the American farmer.

Mr. TALBOT. If the American butter is taxed in the English market, it would be an American producer who would lose it, and the Canadian producer would not get any benefit at all.

Mr. WALLACE. If the Englishman did not have to pay the duty, he would have no objection.

Mr. SPROULE. I maintain that if this system were introduced, it would be a great benefit to the people of Canada, and especially to our farmers. No intelligent man can successfully contravene that proposition. Why, the Prime Minister stated in London, Ont., that it would be a great benefit to Canada, and that if elected he would try to get it. But when he was elected, he did not try. He got a Cobden medal instead, and that quieted his ambition. I believe that mutual preferential trade would not only be a benefit to the people of Canada, but that it would be a benefit to the empire, because after a while it would cause the empire to be self-supporting within herself. It would stimulate our industries, and the acreage under crop would be increased, because of the better market, so that, in time, the colonies could supply England with nearly all she needs, and relieve her from the necessity of depending on foreign countries. To that extent it would consolidate the colonies in the empire, it would draw the colonies and the mother country more closely together, and it would make the people more loyal in every respect. The last clause of the amendment is in favour of countervailing duties against those countries which unfairly discriminate against us. Are we to sit idly by while Germany one day, and some other country the next, puts tariff barriers against us, and are we not to move hand or foot to help ourselves ? Are we not sent here by our constituents to look after the interests of our own country, and when we find nations raise high tariff walls against us, will we not have countervailing duties against them ? If we fail in this we neglect our duty to our country. I believe the principle enunciated in the latter part of this amendment to be the correct principle, and I suppose it from the bottom of my heart. It only requires a maximum and a minimum tariff, and the minimum tariff we can apply to every country that wishes to have preferential trade with us. I believe, Sir, that there is embodied in this amendment the true economic principle in connection with the ways and means of raising a revenue and conducting government in this country, and in that belief I shall vote for the amendment with all my heart.

Mr. TURGEON moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of the Minister of Finance, House adjourned at 12.35 a.m. Wednesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, March 27, 1901.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 97) to incorporate the Manufactures and Temperance and General Life Assurance Company.—Mr. Osler.

Bill (No. 98) to incorporate the Kettle River Valley Railway Company.—Mr. Galliher.

Bill (No. 99) respecting Le Crédit Foncier du Bas-Canada.—Mr. Geoffrion.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE—AMENDMENT TO THE FRENCH VERSION.

Mr. L. P. DEMERS (St. John and Iberville) (Translation.) asked leave to introduce Bill (No. 100) to amend the French version of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1890.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). (Translation.) Explain.

Mr. DEMERS. (Translation.) Section 59 of the French version is faulty. Under this section, as worded, in order that the payment of a bill of exchange may operate the discharge of the drawee or acceptor, it must have been made to a bona fide holder thereof, while, on the contrary, it is well known that the payment made in good faith by the acceptor discharges the bill of exchange. Therefore, good faith is required from the party paying it, and not on the part of the acceptor.

In the English statute, the wording is different, but still it is ambiguous, owing to bad punctuation. For instance, with reference to the regular payment, it reads as follows :—"It is made at or after maturity of the bill to the holder thereof in good faith."

At first sight, one would be led to infer, from the wording of the English edition, that the holder must be in good faith. This Bill does not contemplate any change in the English edition, because it tallies with the Act passed by the parliament of Great Britain, as any one can easily ascertain by referring to commentaries. At all events, the French version requires to be amended, and that is the reason why I beg to introduce this Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

EXPENDITURE ON PORT COLBORNE HARBOUR.

Mr. INGRAM—by Mr. Taylor—asked :

1. What was the total expenditure by the government on Port Colborne harbour since 30th June, 1896?

2. What is the amount expended each year on said harbour since 30th June, 1896?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair). There has been no outlay made by the Department of Railways in the harbour of Port Colborne. Any expenditure made there has been in connection with the entrance to our canal, of which the House already has had information.

I. C. R.—PURCHASE OF LOCOMOTIVES.

Mr. BELL (Pictou) asked :

1. Has the government entered into any agreement with any person or firm in the United States to furnish locomotives for the Intercolonial Railway?

2. What are the names and addresses of the persons or firms with whom such agreements have been made?

3. What are the prices agreed upon?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair) :

1. Yes.

2. The Dickson Manufacturing Company, of Scranton, Pa., the Manchester Locomotive Works, of Manchester, N.H., and the Richmond Locomotive Manufacturing Company, of Richmond, Va.

3. The Dickson Manufacturing Company, locomotives, $15,000 each ; the Manchester Locomotive Works, locomotives, $13,500 and $15,000 each ; the Richmond Locomotive Manufacturing Company, locomotives, $14,485 and $14,985 each. These contracts were entered into while the Kingston works were closed down, and before there was any intimation of their re-establishment.

I. C. R.—PURCHASE OF CARS.

Mr. BELL (Pictou) asked :

1. Has the government contracted with any person or firm in the United States to supply cars for the Intercolonial Railway?

2. What number and what class of cars have been contracted for?

3. What are the names of the persons or firms with whom contracts were made?

4. What are the prices agreed on?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair) :

1. Yes.

2. Six first-class passenger cars, three dining cars and four sleeping cars.

3. The Barney & Smith Car Company, Dayton, Ohio.

4. First-class passenger cars, $11,995 each; dining cars, $15,775 each ; sleeping cars, $19,255 each.

EASTERN EXTENSION AWARD.

Mr. FOWLER—by Mr. Taylor—asked :

Has the amount paid to New Brunswick on account of Eastern Extension award been charged by the Finance Department to capital account or current expenditure?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). No amount has been paid to the province of NewBrunswick in the matter referred to.

GORDON POINT, P.E.I.—PETITION FOR PIER.

Mr. LEFURGEY asked :

1. Has a petition been received by the government, during the years 1900 or 1901, from the inhabitants of Albany, Searletown and adjoining settlements, Prince county, P.E.I., asking that a pier be built at Gordon Point, lot 27, P.E.I. ?

2. If so, what action does the government intend taking with regard to the prayer of the petition?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Hon. J. I. Tarte) :

1. Yes.

2. No present action is intended, but the question will be carefully considered.

P. E. I. RAILWAY—PETITION FOR BRANCH.

Mr. LEFURGEY asked :

1. Did the government receive, through the Secretary of State, a petition, during the year 1900, from the people of Victoria, Crapaud, Tryon, Kelly's Cross, North Wiltshire and adjacent settlements, in Prince and Queen's counties, P.E.I., asking that a branch line of railway be constructed from the Prince Edward Island Railway, extending from or near North Wiltshire to Victoria?

2. If so, what action does the government intend taking in the matter, and do they mean to construct this branch railway as contemplated and recommended by the late government?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair) :

1. A petition has been received by the department.

2. It has not been decided to take any present action upon the same.

P. E. I. POSTAL SERVICE.

Mr. LEFURGEY asked :

1. Has the Postmaster General received any petition from the people of Abram's Village and Higgins Road, Prince county, P.E.I., for a daily mail service from Wellington Station to Abram's Village and Higgins Road?

2. Is it the intention of the Postmaster General to have a daily mail service inaugurated?

Hon. JAMES SUTHERLAND. A petition for a mail service over the route between Higgins Road and Wellington Station, via Abram's Village, was received in the department on April 28 last. On inquiry the depaartment satisfied itself that the present frequency of the service, tri-weekly, was not unsatisfactory to the mass of those interested in the service, but it was learned that the service might be improved by detaching the two outermost offices, viz., St. Chrysostome and Higgins Road from the route and serving them from Fitzgerald Station, which was much nearer to these two offices than is the Wellington Station. Tenders are now being invited for the two services mentioned.

Mr. FIELDING.

ATTACHMENT OF OFFICIAL SALARIES.

Mr. T. FORTIN (Laval) moved :

That, in the opinion of this House, the salaries of public officers and government employees should be attachable like those of ordinary citizens.

He said : In moving this resolution, Mr. Speaker, I cannot but feel a certain amount of diffidence and hesitation, having in my mind the history of the subject in the last parliament. The first attempt made to obtain legislation on this subject was in the session of 1897, when a Bill was introduced by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) ; but it only attained its first reading. Hon. members will remember that that was the session in which the tariff was revised, and nearly the whole time of the session was taken up with that revision. The same Bill was reintroduced in 1898. It was a very short measure, containing only two or three clauses. It was discussed at considerable length, but it found an untimely grave in the Committee of the Whole. If I remember rightly, the main objection to that Bill was that it was too short—that it contained no machinery for its enforcement. Another attempt was made in the session of 1899, when a Bill, prepared with some care, and containing apparently all the necessary machinery for putting the law in motion, was introduced and passed its second reading ; but that Bill had the same fate as the Bill of the previous session. The objections to that second measure were not of the same kind as those to the first. The first was found to be too short, unworkable and without the necessary machinery. The objection to the second was that it was too complete, that there was too much procedure in it, and the point was raised that it might be outside the jurisdiction of parliament for the very reason that it dealt with the necessary or incidental procedure for carrying out the law. With such a history before me, it might seem somewhat daring on my part to bring the subject again before this House. I have taken what I consider to be the mildest and least objectionable course. I merely want the opinion of the House expressed on the general proposition, whether it is fair and just that the salaries of public officials and public servants throughout the country should be subject to the ordinary laws applicable to the salaries of other people.

Should this proposition be accepted by the House, it will be an invitation to the government to prepare a measure, and I am sure that such measure would be as near perfection as possible. The idea embodied in the resolution is a very simple one. Is it just that public officials should form a special and privileged class or come under the ordinary laws of the country ? It seems to me that there cannot be two answers to that question. We are not living in the middle ages, nor are we living in India, where the conditions are exceptional, but we are living in the twentieth century, in a democratic country, where all citizens are supposed to be equal before the law. Therefore it seems to me an unanswerable proposition that civil servants should be subject to the law, just as are the ministers themselves and the members of this House and the Senate and the public generally.

What are the obstacles in the way of attaching the salaries of public officials? Judging by past discussions, there seems to be an opinion in the minds of some members that there is a statute providing that the salaries of civil servants are not liable to seizure. It may be well to remove any impression of that kind. There is, Mr. Speaker, no such positive law or statute. Why then are these salaries not liable to attachment? There are two reasons. The first is that the government is not amenable to the ordinary courts. You cannot sue the government, unless with its own consent, and you must adopt a special mode of procedure, known as the petition of right. Therefore, although you might have any number of Acts declaring the salaries of public officials liable to seizure, you could not enforce them without the consent of the Crown. The second reason is this. Parliament votes certain moneys for the payment of the civil servants, and these votes are embodied in the Subsidy Bill which becomes law. To allow the attachment of any part of the salaries voted by parliament would be to divert from its purpose money specially voted by parliament.

With regard to the first objection the remedy is very simple. All that is required is the consent of the government and parliament to submit the government to the jurisdiction of the provincial courts in such matters. With regard to the second objection, that could also be met by a similar law.

Of course it does not fall within the scope of the subject I am dealing with to enter into details of what the law should be. I merely point out that these two objections, which now prevent the attachment of the salaries of civil servants, could very easily be met.

Another question may arise, and that is whether this parliament has jurisdiction in the matter or whether the jurisdiction is confined to the local legislatures. When this question was first introduced in 1898 in this House, I had some doubts on the jurisdiction of this parliament and gave expression to them, and the question was discussed to a certain extent. In 1899 it was discussed at greater length; and after giving more particular consideration to the subject, I have come to the conclusion that this parliament has ample jurisdiction to deal with the question. That jurisdiction is to be found in the British North America Act. Subsection 8, of section 91, provides that the Federal parliament shall have the exclusive power of fixing and providing for the salaries and allowances of civil and other officers of the government of Canada.

Subsection 4, of section 92, provides as being within the exclusive powers of the provincial legislature:

The establishment and tenure of provincial officers and the appointment and payment of provincial officers.

Taking these two sections together I have come to the conclusion that the Dominion parliament and the provincial legislatures have exclusive jurisdiction with regard to the fixing and the payment of the salaries of their respective employees. There can be, therefore, no question that this parliament has the right, since we vote the money, to decide how the federal employees shall be paid and determine what portion of their salaries shall be attachable for ordinary debts and what portion not attachable. If any doubt existed, it seems to me that it would be removed by the first paragraph of section 91, which provides that all powers, not assigned exclusively to the provincial legislatures, shall belong to the Dominion parliament.

Although no decisions dealing directly with this subject can be found, since no law of the kind has ever been passed by this parliament, there are nevertheless some cases in which the question has been decided indirectly. In the province of Quebec we have a statute of the kind I would like to see adopted here, a statute passed in 1875. Under that statute, some cases have arisen in which the question arose whether salaries of Dominion officials fell under it. Now, the two cases on which I was able to lay my hands are the following. The first is Crevier and De Grandpré and Lamothe, a garnishee case found in 5 Legal News, page 48. The judgment was given by Judge Rainville, and I shall translate the part to which I particularly refer:

I am of opinion that the statute, 38th Victoria, chapter 12——

That is our provincial statute.

—does not apply to officers of the Dominion government. The exemption of salaries of these officers from seizure is a matter of constitutional law, and no provincial statute can affect the rights of employees of the Federal government.

This does not directly decide the point raised here, because the judge in that case was called upon to interpret the provincial law. The statement made by the judge goes a little further than the case really called for. But it is an expression of opinion from one of the judges, a judge with a high reputation for ability, as is well known in the province of Quebec. The same judge in the case of Evans vs. Hudon & Brown, 22, L.C.J., 268, held as follows:—

That the exemption of the salaries of public employees from seizure is a matter of public order, and the parliament of the province of Quebec has not the power to declare seizable the salaries of employees of the Federal government. And, therefore, the Collector of Inland Revenue in Montreal is not bound to make the returns required by 38th Victoria, chapter 12, sec. 5.

Another case came before the Court of Appeals of Ontario. It was a case of the same class, although it called for somewhat different adjudication. It was a question of taxation, the case being known as Leprohon and the city of Ottawa, 2 Appeal Reports, page 522. I refer to this case because, if I remember well, it was mentioned by the Solicitor General when this subject was before the House on a previous occasion. I understand that this case was cited as showing that the parliament of the Dominion of Canada had no jurisdiction in the matter. As I understand this case, the ruling in the Court of Appeals, would prove exactly the reverse—that the provincial legislatures have no jurisdiction ; and, as jurisdiction must be found somewhere in matters of this kind, the fact that it is beyond the power of the provincial legislature would prove that it is within our jurisdiction. The Court of Appeal, in that case held :

> . . . . a provincial legislature has no power to enforce a tax upon the official income of an officer of the Dominion government or to confer such a power on the municipalities.

The question that came before the courts was this : A special tax had been imposed by the city of Ottawa upon the income of the employees of the Federal government. The by-law, whatever it was, which imposed the tax, was contested by this gentleman, Mr. Leprohon, who was an officer of this House. It was held in that case that the provincial statute could not confer upon a municipality more power than the province itself possessed, and the legislature of the province had not the power to tax the salaries of any officers of this parliament. There was a reason which, possibly, was applicable to that case alone and will not be generally applicable to this subject. It was this : It was held by the judges that to allow a municipality to impose a tax upon such salaries, or to imposing a provincial tax upon the same, would be equivalent to diverting or appropriating for provincial purposes, in an indirect way, certain sums of money voted for Dominion purposes.

Now, assuming, therefore, that we have full jurisdiction, since we vote these salaries and since these officials are our officials. it seems to me I need add very little in support of the proposal now before the House. It seems to me, as I said, only just and fair that all persons in this country should be equal before the law. I will not rest the proposition upon the assumption that a majority of Dominion public officers do not pay their legitimate debts. I believe the contrary to be true, and that the majority of these officers do discharge their legitimate debts. But, though the majority of ordinary citizens pay their legitimate debts, yet, in all the provinces and in all civilized countries there are laws by which the party who obtains judgment can attach in the hands of third persons all sums due to the defendant. Even where the majority discharge their legitimate obligations these laws are made to facilitate the collection of sums of money that are due. It has been stated on previous occasions that a law of this kind would embarrass the government. I remember that a member of this government used that argument. That condition could only arise if there were a vast number of attachments served in the hands of the government, and, if this were true, to my mind it would offer the strongest argument in favour of a law of this kind. If there are such a large number of public officers, who, under the law as it stands, abuse the law and hide themselves under the law in order to escape the payment of their legitimate obligations, then, I say, we should amend that law. That such a law as this would embarrass the government, that, I say, is the strongest reason why a law of this kind should be adopted. Possibly there might be a special department ; and it might be created at the expense of those who make its creation necessary. Instead of being presided over by a minister of the Crown, such a department might be presided over by a commissioner, who might be properly called the commissioner of dead beats ! or something of that kind ! Seriously speaking, I have not the means of knowing whether that state of affairs exist or not. But, I do not believe it does. In this matter, I judge from the experience we have had in the province of Quebec in the last twenty-six years. We have a law there which makes a portion of the salaries of public officers liable to attachment. Though that law has been in force for twenty-six years, it has always given complete satisfaction. We have not heard any complaint from any minister in the succeeding governments of that province in all that time. The law is simple, and it is very effective. The knowledge that the salary of a public officer, who is supposed to retain his position for life, can be attached for years and years, until the complete payment of the judgment, is enough to prevent those officers going improvidently into debt that may bring about that result. Therefore, I take it for granted that there will be no such embarrassment of the government as has been referred to. It is possible that when we come to deal with the details and when the law is prepared for this House, it will be necessary to make provisions for past debts.

I do not see any strong objection to that, but for the future I repeat it, the very fact of the existence of a law by which the civil servant may see a part of his salary liable to attachment for debt, will prevent him from getting into debt. I may add, Sir, that this law is desirable in the first place on public grounds, and that it is also desired by a majority of the civil servants themselves. I am speaking within the hearing of a civil servant who told me the other day that all decent civil servants were in favour of a law of this kind, and that comprises, I dare say, a majority of them. Civil servants do not like to be treated, to a certain extent, as wards of the Crown. They are generally able to take care of their own interest, to manage their own business and to meet their legitimate obligations as well as any other class of the people. I hope on this occasion the House will express itself in favour of this resolution. I am glad to say that no question of form can be raised against it, and I hope no motion to postpone or shelve this matter will be presented. It is a non-controverisal question, it is not a party question, there are no politics in it. I may add that I have not the slightest personal interest in this matter. I have been asked by some gentlemen what object I had in pushing this measure. I may say that I have no direct or indirect interest whatever in it, not even professional. In a practice of about twenty years I do not think that I have taken more than one, possibly two, judgments against any public officer ; these have been satisfied, I am happy to say. But I am convinced that this is a good measure, and that it is a progressive measure. I am proud to believe that all the citizens of a free country like ours desire to be equal before the law, and all desire to be subject to the same law as regards the fulfilment of their financial obligations.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). It will naturally be expected that I should support a resolution of this kind, not entirely because I wish to return the compliment to the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Fortin), who rendered such valiant support to a Bill which I introduced upon two previous occasions in this House. One of the first things I did when I entered parliament was to introduce a Bill to correct what I think I will not be going too far if I call a scandal. It is well known that many civil servants have been able to evade the payment of their just debts because the law exempted their salaries from seizure. I had hopes that the premier would support me in the Bill I introduced the first session, and he gave me to understand that he would. I am not disposed to think that he had changed his mind in that respect, although probably he felt that the time was not opportune. However, in view of the manner in which my Bill was torn to pieces by the legal members of the House on successive occasions, I decided that I had better retire from the fray and leave the fight to other and abler members of the House. I wish here to congratulate the hon. member for Laval upon introducing this subject again, because I believe he is attacking an evil that should be rectified at the earliest possible opportunity. The hon. member, in view of the experience I had, has been willing to rest with the submission of a resolution to the House, without venturing to introduce a Bill. As he told the House, the first Bill that was introduced and which he strongly supported, was merely a declaration in favour of making the salaries of civil servants attachable. That Bill met with strong opposition from legal members of the House because there was no machinery provided in it. Acting in concert with the hon. member for Laval, we prepared a Bill the following session providing the machinery which seemed to be desirable, and that again met with the warmest hostility from some of the legal gentlemen, who criticised it because we did not confine ourselves to a simple declaration and leave out the machinery. However, it is a waste of time probably to go into these details now, but the experience of the past convinces me that it is almost impossible for a layman to get a Bill of this kind through the House. Therefore, I am content to take the position of a follower of the hon. member for Laval in this matter, and I am glad to give my support to the motion which he proposes.

I may say that no subject in which I have ever taken a public part seemed to elicit more universal endorsement throughout the country than the passage of the Bill that I introduced. I received resolutions from boards of trade and various bodies throughout the country commending the Bill, and expressing a hope that it would become law. I have always taken the position that I am not in any way attacking civil servants. I do not suppose that as a class they are any worse than others ; but I never could understand why they should be placed in any exceptional position, and why they should require special protection above any other class of the community. I remember that my Bill was opposed by the Minister of Justice on the ground that it might interfere with the working of the governmental machinery, that it was not desirable to have members of the civil service liable to be interfered with at any time, or taken away from their public duties and dragged into court. I have always held the view that that was a very poor argument. I do not see why our merchants should suffer because civil servants may not be taken into court the same as ordinary citizens are. In Manitoba we dealt with this question in a more radical manner. Shortly after the accession of the Greenway government to power, they passed a regulation by which a civil servant who refused to pay his debts or who might be garnisheed, would be promptly dismissed unless he paid his debts. If the present government would do that or follow some similar course, there would be no necessity either of passing this resolution or of enacting a law. I think that we ought to have a declaration from the government that if the resolution does carry they will give effect to it by the passage of a Bill, if not at this session, then at the next session. I therefore have the very greatest pleasure in supporting this motion and I want to congratulate the hon. member for Laval for introducing it. I want to say that in my intercourse with that hon. gentleman I have come to the conclusion that he is a real reformer and that he desires to be of some use in his day and generation. He would like to introduce some reforms in this House and in this country, and I hope that he will meet with better success in connection with this matter than I met with during the two or three sessions in which I undertook to deal with it.

Mr. T. B. FLINT (Yarmouth). Mr. Speaker, I think there is a great deal of objection to the passage of an abstract resolution upon a subject of this kind, because the essence of this whole question is as to the most convenient and proper method of carrying out the details. I do not agree with the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Fortin) that the civil service of the country are placed substantially upon any greater pinnacle of privilege than the ordinary debtor. It is just as well perhaps at the outset, in discussing this matter, to indicate some of the difficulties that are in the way of accepting the resolution. Now, let us take the case of a civil servant who may be indebted to certain creditors and let us see if the creditors, under any ordinary application of the principle of this measure, will be placed upon a footing of equality. If I am correctly informed the cheques for the payment of civil servants throughout the whole Dominion, from the province of British Columbia to the province of Nova Scotia, are issued at Ottawa from the Auditor General's office or through the department, and as a consequence in order to intercept any of these salaries which may be due the creditor in another province must have some law by which he can make service of a writ of attachment in the province of Ontario issued within the jurisdiction of these various provinces. I do not see how that can be brought about, how the Supreme Court, or a county court in Nova Scotia, or the Supreme Court of British Columbia, can, without legislation in the province of Ontario, make any writs of attachment from the courts of those provinces of any validity whatever where these attachments must be filed to be of any validity. In addition to that you are placing creditors upon an unequal basis. A creditor in Ottawa may be put to comparatively slight expense, may pursue a civil servant at Ottawa in this way, may levy upon his salary and press to secure the payment of his debt while the unfortunate creditors in a remote portion of the Dominion are not so placed, but, on the contrary, they are placed at a greater disadvantage, I do not see, without legislation in the various provinces, as well as legislation in the Dominion, that any legal process can be made by which such an attachment could be made available at the seat of government. If the financial conditions of the country are so changed that the salaries of civil servants are payable in various localities, within the jurisdiction of the courts of the various provinces, then some machinery may be available by which a measure of this kind can be given practical effect. I do not think that the hon. member for Laval has indicated any very substantial grievances as existing in the country.

Mr. MONET. The law is a grievance.

Mr. FLINT. My hon. friend (Mr. Monet) says that the law is a grievance. If we are to legislate upon ideal grievances and endeavour to bring the law into absolute consonance with our ideals, then, we will have undertaken, to a large extent, a useless task. We must legislate on positive and practical evils in a practical way. Let us see what remedies the creditor has as the law exists at the present time? A civil servant is indebted to his grocer, or to his tailor, or to any other merchant. The creditor can pursue him in the ordinary way, obtain a judgment, and seize his property. He can seize his personal property except such portion as is by law exempted in the various provinces.

Mr. McCREARY. What provinces are you speaking for?

Mr. FLINT. I am speaking of the provinces in which there are these exemptions. He can attach any debts that are due the debtor, or any moneys he has in the hands of any person or corporation except the money which is set aside by parliament for the salary of the civil servant. But, he has still a further remedy. He is competent, after he has attached all the assets which the civil servant has, he can—at any rate that is so in Nova Scotia, and I believe it is so in Ontario—bring him before a commissioner, or a judicial authority, and examine him as to the amount of his salary, as to the amount of his assets, as to his liabilities, as to his daily expenses, as to the condition of his family, and as to the condition of his affairs, and by order of the court he may be compelled, by drastic methods, to pay so much a week, or so much a month out of his income to meet the demands of his creditors. I think, that having gone that far, the machinery which already exists in the various provinces is sufficient, and in the absence of any very concrete case of abuse, I think that parliament would do well to wait for the introduction of a Bill dealing with the details before undertaking to pass a mere abstract resolution which, of course, binds us to nothing. I think it is open to question as to whether it is desirable that civil servants should be pursued in this manner for their debts. A civil servant may have been unfortunate in business, he may have accumulated in business losses, a large amount of debts, he may be a gentleman who has failed in business and has perhaps judgments amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars entered against him. A creditor can pursue a gentleman appointed to the civil service and rob him of his means of livelihood. There is no discredit in this country for a gentleman of the highest standing to become involved in debts, debts which have been incurred for other people, debts which have been the result of misfortune. Unless some concrete abuse is made apparent I do not think we are called upon, in addition to the ordinary means at the command of creditors, to provide that a portion of the income set aside for the living of civil servants should be taken away from them. The Superannuation Act deducts a certain portion of the bulk of the salaries of civil servants in order to make provision for old age. If, in addition to the ordinary means that are at the disposal of the creditor we add a new machinery, I think it should be carefully guarded so that a civil servant should not be exposed to be harshly treated by his creditors. There is a means already existing within the competence of the government, or of a department. If a civil servant is persistently endeavouring to obtain money under what may be called false pretenses, to obtain money which, from the amount of his salary, he knows he will not have the means of paying, I think there are in the department, or in the government, the means of meeting such an emergency.

The rule has been adopted in Manitoba, I understand, that if a charge is laid that an official is persistently and unnecessarily in debt and in a certain sense defrauding his creditors, he can be examined before a deputy or chief clerk and directed to make provision to pay his creditors. No abuses of a serious nature have been shown to exist here, and if they were so shown I have no doubt the government would apply some such remedy. My principal criticism of the resolution, however, is that while it might be impossible to enforce it at the centre of government, I do not see how any legislation you could pass here could bring attachments against civil servants in distant quarters of the Dominion within the jurisdiction of the courts at the seat of government. If this resolution is passed, those who are interested in framing legislation upon it will find themselves involved in great difficulties when they come to draw up a Bill. I sympathize with the idea that it is undesirable that one class of the community should be placed on a different footing under the law from another class, but I do not consider that the present law is of that nature. The existing law is for the protection of the Crown and to ensure that it shall not be unduly harassed and put to expense and trouble in collecting debts for private individuals. It is the Crown and the various departments of government, which under the law are endeavouring to protect themselves against the expense and nuisance of being made intermediaries in the collection of private debts between creditor and debtor. In the absence of any serious abuses the public interest cannot be injured by allowing this resolution to stand over.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair). I wish to submit one or two matters which it is important to consider before the House commits itself to this resolution. One would be disposed at first blush to accede to the proposition that civil servants and employees of the government should be placed on the same footing with ordinary debtors; but as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Flint) pointed out it is not because of any regard for civil servants as such nor with a view of conferring privilege upon them, that the law remains as it is. On the contrary, it is because after due consideration had no doubt been given to the matter, it has been concluded to be against the interests of the government and against the public interest that any change should be made in the law. My hon. friend (Mr. Fortin) proposes that the salaries of public officers or government employees should be attachable like those of ordinary citizens. Without dwelling upon any constitutional objections which there might be to the proposal, I wish to point out that the effect of such a law would be, not to harass the debtor, but to harass the government and to seriously militate against the successful administration of public affairs. Let the House consider in what position the Railway Department, for instance, would be placed. We have 6,000 men in our employment upon the railways and probably half as many more upon the canals, and if even a relatively small proportion of this army of servants were liable to a proceedings being taken against them in the courts, then in every one of these proceedings in the different provinces of the Dominion, the Crown would have to be made a party and endless expense and embarrassment would be entailed on those who have to administer the department. Pay day comes around, a man has incurred debt for the necessaries of life, proceedings are taken, the Crown is notified that the money must not be paid over to the employee, the employee cannot get his money which may be necessary to provide for his family and himself, and he may be incapacitated to perform his duties. Then the officers of the department would have to attend court, and the result of the trial would have to be awaited. My hon. friend (Mr. Fortin) says that we might have a head of a department at Ottawa who would be entrusted with duty, but one departmental head would certainly not suffice.

Mr. FORTIN. I merely said that as a joke.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Well, even so it would be necessary to arrange for some such principle as that. You would have to have officials in all parts of Canada to look after these matters, you would have to employ lawyers all over the Dominion to appear at the trials, because if you did not follow up these legal proceedings to their conclusion, the government would be unsafe in paying any money to employees who would be in debt, because they would be liable to pay it over again. We would never know when we could properly adjust a claim until the litigation had been concluded. The effect of it I do not think any man could foresee. Merely touching on the fringe of this question, I think the House will see how unwise a thing it would be to adopt any such law, and why it has been found convenient and necessary to continue the law as it is at present. On the Intercolonial Railway we have not been entirely unmindful of the claims of creditors. We have had a system in operation for a good many years under which, if a person who supplies necessaries to an employee gives notice to the department that that employee has not been paying, without any expense or litilgation being necessary, we direct the attention of the employee to the fact, find out whether it is true or not, and, if it is true, we insist that he shall pay the bill, if not all at once, by instalments from time to time. In that way we have not experienced any difficulty. We have very seldom any complaint from creditors on account of the non-payment of bills by employees on the railway; we do not require any such legislation; and if we have anything to say about it, we will not have any such law passed. It is not needed by creditors. The people in our employ know that if they continue to fall into debt or to withhold payment to their creditors when they are able to pay, we simply give them to understand that we can not retain them in the service. We exercise pressure upon them in that way, so that I do not think that there is any serious grievance. I would very strenuously oppose my hon. friend's proposal. Not that I would not like to see employees of the government placed in the same position as all other debtors; I do not wish them to have any advantage; but we must consider the public interest, and you are sacrificing the public interest on a plea which, as my hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) has very clearly pointed out, is not a well-founded plea. Any grievance which may exist in probably very largely local in its character.

Mr. BLAIR.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Can you say whether the Imperial government allow attachments of this kind ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I never heard of any such.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. They allow some kind of procedure.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There is a special provision in the English law, but not in this direction.

Mr. W. F. McCREARY (Selkirk). Mr. Speaker, as this is a matter which has been discussed in the province of Manitoba for many years, I deem it my duty to offer what I consider a solution of the question. For some years the salaries of provincial officials as well as Dominion officials were not garnishable in that province; but in 1889 or 1890 the local government brought in an Act providing that their officials might be garnisheed ; except that $25, I think, was to remain in the government's hands. Now, I cannot see that the hon. Minister of Railways (Hon. Mr. Blair) has given any argument against putting on the statute-book a garnishee Act similar to that of Manitoba. In my own practice in Winnipeg I have learned of many cases of real hardship in the case of merchants who were not able to bear the loss, on account of government officials failing to pay their debts. This failure is probably confined to 10 per cent or 15 per cent of the employees. The Minister of Railways claims that it would seriously affect the management of the railway system of Canada if such a law were passed. If he has 6,000 employees on the Intercolonial Railway system, surely the Canadian Pacific Railway Company must have twice or more than twice that number. There are thousands of officials on the Canadian Pacific Railway west of Port Arthur, and there is no trouble at all in garnishing their salaries. I myself have served a large number of garnishees on the Canadian Pacific Railway offices in Winnipeg, and the rule they adopt there is that the paymaster, Mr. Graham, notifies the court how much money he has in his hands belonging to the delinquent officials. If there is any dispute between the creditors, the court decides which of the creditors are entitled to the money. The same system could be pursued in the case of government officials. If a garnishee were placed in the hands of the government, I take it that the Auditor General would notify the court what amount of money was in his hands at the time belonging to the employee in question.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Hon. Sir Louis Davies). The Auditor General would not know.

Mr. McCREARY. Very well, the official whose duty it would be to know could easily notify the court how much money was in his hands belonging to the official. That did not occasion any difficulty to the Manitoba government. I know that prior to the Act being brought in, it was said that it would interfere with the officials discharging their duties ; but the effect it had was to make the small proportion of officials who were deadbeats come to time and pay their old debts, and made them see that they did not afterwards incur large obligations which they were not able to pay ; because the local government took it upon themselves, if two garnishees were served, to look into the matter, and if they saw that the debt was deliberately contracted by the official with the intention of never paying it, they discharged him. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company do the same. When the first garnishee is served, they call the official into their office, and warn him that this must not occur again ; and then, if a second garnishee is served, they discharge him. Of course, there may be circumstances, such as illness in a man's family, which they take into consideration, and they will probably see the lawyer who issues the writ and discuss the matter with him. But I claim that there would be no hardship to the employees on the government railways or to any other officers of the government if they all had to pay their debts. There are no class of officials better paid, as a general rule, than civil servants, and no class who do less work. I have been a civil servant for some years, and I know what I am saying. There are civil servants who work very long hours, who at certain seasons, when there is a pressure of work, work after hours ; but there are a large number of others who have a very soft snap. With regard to serving the process of garnishee, I think that could easily be solved by a lawyer from each province meeting and arranging the details. I think a registered letter to the proper department would be all that would be necessary, and the garnishee would attach from the time the registered letter left. I may tell you that a man at Calgary, 1,000 miles from Winnipeg, who wants to attach the wages of a Canadian Pacific Railway emyloyee, has to send his garnishment to Winnipeg ; yet it works all right. I think it could be worked as well in the case of government employees. There might be other means of serving processes, but that is one I suggest. Then, I do not think the Act should be retroactive, and there might be certain classes of debts to which it should not apply.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What kind would you suggest ?

Mr. McCREARY. For instance, our law says that a man shall be brought up on a judgment summons and imprisoned ; but only on debts for the necessaries of life, which would include his household furniture, his food, and other necessaries, and there is also sickness to be considered. If you look over the British law, you will find cases cited in which the British courts have held a diamond ring to be a necessary. It is difficult to say what necessaries are. They can only be determined according to the situation in life of the individual concerned. It is said that the present law gives redress to creditors. I do not know what the law is in the various provinces, but I am sure that the law of Manitoba to-day allows a man to live almost in luxury and not pay his debts. The exemption law in Manitoba is this : you can have free of debt your food for eleven months as well as the food for your family, all your household furniture, your personal property and your house, to the value of $1,500. If you are a farmer, you can practically be worth four or five thousand dollars, and no execution of a county court or a superior court can touch you. There is no use suing in our province, because you cannot realize on execution—it can't be done—the sheriff has gone out of business. I think it is the duty of a Liberal government to take this matter up and pass a law which shall be comprehensive enough to embrace all the provinces.

Mr. JACQUES BUREAU (Three Rivers and St. Maurice). I only desire to add one word to what has been said by the hon. member (Mr. McCreary) who preceded me. My reason for being in favour of the resolution is that I have not yet heard a good argument against it. The Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Blair) tells us that he could not manage his department if the salaries of his employees were garnisheed. If I understand aright, these men are paid on a pay roll, and I do not see why we could not garnishee in their case the same as when we take a garnishee action in the hands of a railway company for the money due their men. We do not have to serve the papers at Ottawa, or to serve the minister or the deputy minister ; we can serve them at the office on the line. One hon. gentleman has stated that this was intended for the purpose of pursuing debtors. Now why should civil servants be protected more than any other class in this country ? If they incur debts, why should they not pay them the same as we do ? Why should there be a preference and one class be exempted from the payment of their debts ? Of course, there are men who are unfortunate in the service, but so there are in any business. It is not reasonable to make the government service a hospital for the unfortunate. If men are in hard luck, let them make a compromise with their creditors. These civil servants are in a better position to pay than are most men, for they have always a steady salary coming in. We have this law in Quebec, and it works well. You do not have to harass the government or to have a commission or to apply to any deputy minister. All you have to do is to serve the officer in charge in the local place where the garnishment is taken, and he makes a return to the court that there is so much due to the employee, and the money is divided by order of the court. The government does not need to come into it at all. I do not see why the government should employ counsel in the matter. Of course, in my personal interest and the interest of the profession, I wish they would. I am in favour of this resolution, because I do not see why the civil servants, who, as the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. McCreary) says, usually have very little to do and get good pay, should be a privileged class in the community and should be exempt from paying their debts as other people must do. I do not see why the law should protect them by prohibiting seizure of their money in the hands of the government, when others are not so protected.

Mr. N. A. BELCOURT (Ottawa). When the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) introduced his Bill on this subject in the last House, I took a decided stand against the measure for reasons which I then enunciated. I took the ground then, and I think it still holds good, that the hon. gentleman had not shown that there was any real demand for this legislation. I represent a constituency which has, perhaps, more civil servants than any other in Canada, yet, though the subject at the time received a great deal of attention in the House, and probably outside of it, my constituents failed to disclose to me that there was any real grievance or any necessity for garnishing the salaries of civil servants. I think that if there was anywhere a real necessity for this Bill or a strong feeling in favour of it, it would probably manifest itself in the city of Ottawa. It struck me that the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Fortin) practically admitted that there was no demand for this law, for he said he could not point out where there was any substantial evil in the matter, but his motion was prompted rather by a desire to vindicate a principle, the principle of equality. If there is no grievance, it seems to me that it would be wasting time for this House merely to affirm the principle of equality, which no one questions. But I would have opposed the measure for the reasons of convenience to the public departments, and because, on its own merits, the measure would be illiberal and unprogressive. The tendency of this age is not to increase garnishments, not to make salaries attachable, but rather in the opposite direction. In the United States, I believe, there is no such thing as garnishment of salaries. And in this country we have gone from step to step until to-day those people who are said to be in an inferior position by reason of their salaries being attachable, practically are in no such position. In Ontario, every man's salary is exempt to the extent of $25. That is practical immunity from garnishment. The making of salaries of civil servants attachable will have but one result, which, I think, is to be deplored—it will encourage credit. It will tend to make civil servants seek and obtain more credit than they need. The tendency of modern days is to make business——

An hon. MEMBER. Cash.

Mr. BELCOURT. Cash—particularly when it comes to apply to the necessities of everyday life. A man ought to pay cash for his groceries, his dry goods and things of that sort. Another point is that those in business who supply commodities to civil servants know perfectly well that the salaries of those officers are not attachable, and they trust to the debtor's honour and his sense of justice for the payment of the debt. I think it is far better that that feeling should be encouraged and that honour should be the basis of credit rather than a mere formality which will be probably found more or less unpractical. Another reason why I oppose this resolution is that it is a sort of paternal legislation, which ought not to be favoured. Legislation that looks to minor interests of that sort ought not to be brought to this parliament, but parliament ought to give its attention to matters of greater necessity and import, leaving aside this paternal legislation, of which, unfortunately, we already have too much.

Mr. L. P. DEMERS (St. John and Iberville). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise to second the resolution of my hon. friend, the member for Laval (Mr. Fortin). We have heard it stated on the floor of this House, during this debate, that there were no real grievances warranting the passing of the proposed legislation. But, Sir, what are the facts? In 1895, my predecessor in this House, the lamented Mr. Béchard, introduced a Bill to enable the salaries of civil servants to be garnisheed. But that Bill found an untimely grave in the Committee of the Whole. Session after session, this question has been threshed out on the floor of the House, and why, Sir? Because there are found in every province, and more so in the province of Quebec, of which I speak knowingly, government officials who run in debt and cannot be called upon to pay. I was not in the least surprised to hear the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Belcourt) state that he was opposed to the resolution now before us. In view of the large interests he has to protect here, no wonder that he should take such an attitude; but I was surprised to hear him state that this was an illiberal and unprogressive measure, and one not in line with the spirit of the age, the tendency of our times, he says, being not to increase garnishments or to make salaries liable to attachment, but in an opposite direction. The hon. gentleman has, no doubt, not failed to notice that was from the opposition side that he received the warmest plaudits. Why, Sir, this is essentially a liberal measure and one well in accord with Liberal professions; for, if there is one principle held sacred by the Liberals, it is that, in a free country like ours, all citizens are equal before the law, and that is the reason why we are not willing to extend favours or immunity to civil servants which are not extended to other classes of the community.

In the province of Quebec, the debtor's property is held as a common pledge by the creditors. In our province, all citizens are equal before the law in that respect, and the Dominion government officials are the only class that are enjoying immunity and are exempt from the operation of the law. Now the House is invited to enact that it is desirable that the salary of civil servants should be attachable and that government officials should be put on a footing of equality with the other classes of the community in that respect. The hon. member for Laval is trying to do away with a privilege, and I hold that his resolution is essentially a liberal and progressive measure. The hon. gentlemen who oppose it are, therefore, taking an anti-liberal stand by the very fact that they are trying to maintain an antiquated privilege and one which is no longer in consonance with the spirit of the age.

In the other provinces, and chiefly in the province of Ontario, they have perhaps less occasion than we have in Quebec to complain of this evil, because the law of Ontario says that a man may be brought up on a judgment summons and ordered by the judge to pay a certain portion of the judgment out of his salary at so much per month. In former centuries, any creditor who failed to pay his legitimate debts was imprisoned, and in Rome they even went to the length of dividing the limbs of the debtor between his creditors.

In the provinces where the law provides imprisonment for debts, the civil servants may be proceeded against in an efficacious way. For instance, my hon. friend from Ottawa (Mr. Belcourt) has at his disposal a summary proceeding: all he has to do is to get an order from the judge against his debtor. Should that debtor happen to be a government official who has incurred debts, and if he does not satisfy his creditors, he is imprisoned, and in that way he is given a chance to ponder over the desirability of keeping out of debt. But in the province of Quebec, such summary proceeding is not available, as my hon. friend (Mr. Belcourt) knows very well, being a practising lawyer for our province as well as for Ontario. That is the reason why we have to come down here and ask the government to pass a law to enable the salaries of government officials to be garnisheed.

We have been told here that seizures of this kind will cause very considerable expense and inconvenience to the government, and that the ministers are already incumbered to a sufficient extent without having them overloaded with this garnishee business. But, Sir, I submit that the government being the servants of the people, one of the prime functions of the ministers is to give satisfaction to the demands of the various classes of the people which they represent here.

Hon. gentlemen also object to this legislation because of the difficulties that may be found in working it out. Judging from the experience of the railway companies and other great corporations, I do not anticipate any trouble from the enforcement of this measure.

If the principle at stake is a good and sound one—as the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) said it was—we ought to adopt it. I do not think that its enforcement will cause more trouble and inconvenience to the ministers than is being experienced by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company with regard to their employees.

In recording my vote in favour of this resolution, I am not only putting on record my own opinion, but I believe that I am also voicing the opinion of the province of Quebec. We are a unit in the province of Quebec in our approval of the provincial Act which enables the salaries of the officials of the local government to be garnisheed, and I may say here that this law works very well.

In my opinion, no solid argument can be urged against this parliament adopting a similar legislation to that which is embodied in the resolution now before us.

Mr. B. M. BRITTON (Kingston). The resolution now before the House declaring that, in the opinion of this House, the salaries of public officers or government employees should be attachable like those of ordinary citizens, would, if adopted, leave Dominion employees subject to any law, as regards the seizure of their salaries, that any province might pass, and consequently whatever law might be passed by any province as to the mode of attachment would be binding upon the different departments of the Dominion. That could not fail to be attended with a great deal of difficulty and confusion. What the hon. the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) has said with reference to his department would apply also, though perhaps not to the same extent, to the Department of Public Works, the Post Office and every other department. It, therefore, seems to me that the resolution should not pass.

In Ontario, until quite lately, the law with reference to garnishing salaries—I am not now referring to government employees—treated salaries exactly as other debts which could be attached for the satisfaction of judgments and of creditors' claims. But that law was amended, and to-day—as salaries are usually payable monthly—no salary not exceeding $25 per month can be attached, and in any case $25 per month is always free from attachment.

There was some outcry in that province with regard to civil servants. It was argued that their salaries should be also attachable, and in 1898 an Ontario statute was passed providing for the garnishment of the salaries of civil servants, but stipulating that, as in ordinary cases, $25 per month should always be left for the benefit of the employee. If the salary did not exceed $25 per month, it could not be attached at all, and if it did, it could be attached for the surplus over that amount. It was deemed only right that in the case of the civil servant as in other cases, he should be allowed to draw $25 per month for the benefit of himself and his family. Under that law, the creditor, whether a judgment creditor or not, serves upon the treasurer of the province or his assistant, a notice of the amount due him. If a judgment is recovered, then the treasurer is bound to retain sufficient to satisfy that judgment, provided there is an amount in excess of $25 coming to the debtor. If there is no judgment, then the debtor has to be served as well, and if he dispute the claim, the treasurer ties up the amount of the debt until the dispute is settled. That is rather complicated. But one thing which influences me in dealing with the resolution before the House is the fact that although there was a great outcry in Ontario for such a law, the creditors have not availed themselves of it to any great extent. Last year very few persons took advantage of it, and probably on that account not much inconvenience has resulted from its operation.

If, in the opinion of this House any remedy is necessary it seems to me that the amendment I am about to propose is all that is required. I would move in amendment :

That all the words after the word 'House' be struck out and the following substituted : Provision shall be made by the government by which the salaries of public officers and government employees, or a part of such salaries, shall, so far as consistent with the requirements of the public service, be made attachable or available for the payment of their debts.

That does not mean that a law shall be passed allowing these salaries to be attached exactly as those of ordinary persons in each one of the various provinces, which would seem to me very objectionable. A great deal of weight ought to be attached to the argument of an hon. gentleman representing a city like Ottawa, where there are so many civil servants. I understood the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Belcourt) to say that there is no demand for such a law by the merchants of this city, and that being the case, I do not think that any other city or town need worry much about it.

Mr. BRITTON.

Mr. W. C. EDWARDS (Russell). I suppose that this is a question which could be more properly dealt with by the lawyers in the House, but having some practical knowledge of the operation of a law of this kind, I desire to say a few words. I cannot see very much difference between the amendment and the original proposition. In each case the result would be the same, so far as the government is concerned. In each case the government would be considerably harassed by the attachments provided for. While certain creditors might benefit by a law of the kind, certainly the government all over Canada would be harassed by it. The statement made by the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Belcourt) I think is quite correct, that questions of this kind should rest as between creditors and debtors. No man earning his living by daily labour or in a similar way should become a creditor to such an extent as to require law of this kind to be made for him. If those who give credit place themselves in such a position as to require a law of the kind, then they should be left to suffer the consequences, the consequences should not be visited upon innocent parties. Speaking myself as an employer of labour, I say that we are continually harassed because of a similar law affecting labouring men. Parties give them credit in many instances unduly. The poor fellows get sick perhaps, or disabled, or get into difficulty, and their employer is put to a great deal of trouble in consequence. Let me mention one of the chief annoyances to which employers of labour are subjected. There are many labouring men who go around from one place to another seeking work, because of the danger of seizures no one will employ them. Some employers of labour in this country have adopted the practice that the moment a garnishee is served the man is discharged, and that makes it very difficult for the man discharged to find employment. As the law stands to-day, we are continually being served with these garnishees, and we have to be continually on our guard to avoid personal responsibility as a consequence. If that be so in our case, what would be the effect on the government all over Canada ? The result would be that shop-keepers and others who give undue credits would be continually harassing the government. In every department of the service from one end of Canada to the other you would have to have a staff for the purpose of looking after this special branch of the service. For these reasons I do not think that the resolution, even in its amended form, should pass the House.

Mr. FORTIN. I only wish to say that I will accept the amendment. It has never been my intention to ask the passage of a law by which the whole of the salary of the public officer could be attached or seized. I am well aware that the tendency of our laws is to provide that a portion only of a man's salary or wages are attachable. Such is our law in the province of Quebec, such is the law in France, and such is the law, I believe, everywhere. Therefore, if the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) and his friends attach so much importance to their amendment, I am willing to accept it, and I ask those who are in favour of the motion to vote for the amendment.

Mr. W. M. GERMAN (Welland). It is very questionable whether legislation should be enacted in this House which would embarrass the government more than they are now being embarrassed by reason of civil servants contracting debts. There is no doubt that government officials usually should be placed in the same position as other individuals so far as debts are concerned; so far as creditors' claims against government officials are concerned, the latter should be placed in the same position as ordinary individuals, with one exception. There is a difficulty attending the operation of the garnishment of public officials. The Dominion of Canada is some three or four thousand miles in extent from east to west, most of the government officials are paid from the city of Ottawa. A government official in British Columbia, or a government official in Nova Scotia who is paid his salary from the city of Ottawa, might get into debt to some one in his locality, and I can hardly understand how a garnishee proceeding could be served on the government respecting that man's salary if you say the garnishee summons must take effect from the time it is served, and it must take effect from the time it is served on the government, if it is served on the proper parties. How will the government at Ottawa be seized of the fact that that summons has been served, the effect of which is to prevent the government at Ottawa from paying the salary due to the employee? You cannot attach a salary until the salary is due. If the summons is served one moment before the salary is due, the summons is ineffectual, it is set aside by the court, the court would immediately say that the salary was not due at the time the summons was served. Consequently the summons must be served after the salary is due and before it is paid. I can see that there would be an enormous amount of difficulty surrounding the whole proceeding. In the case of railway companies in this country, it is true that if an employee fails to pay his debts and his salary is attached, it is the practice I know of the Grand Trunk Railway, of the Michigan Central, and I believe of the Canadian Pacific Railway, immediately to dismiss that employee. I am not so sure about the Canadian Pacific Railway, but I know that in the case of the Grand Trunk Railway and the Michigan Central, if an employee's salary is attached, he is immediately dismissed from the service of the company. They will not allow a servant to remain in their employ if they are served with a garnishee proceeding. Now, it would be very difficult for the government, because they are not in the same position as a corporation. If a government were to dismiss an employee the moment his salary was attached, serious embarrassment might be caused to the public service. A great corporation such as a railway company is an exceedingly cold-blooded institution. They care for nothing. They simply employ men who will do their work, and if they do not live up to the regulations and rules of their company, they are set aside at once irrespective of any consideration which may touch the heart of the ordinary individual. The government act, I apprehend, upon a different line from that. The government would consider as to whether or not an employee had reasonable grounds for not paying claims which had been brought against him. There may be exceedingly reasonable grounds. It has come well within my knowledge from practical experience that the railway companies, of which I have spoken, have dismissed men from their employ whose salaries had been attached. To my mind there was often a good excuse for the non-payment of the debts for which these men had been sued. It very often occurs, it is a matter of continual occurrence, that a man cannot pay spot cash, that he cannot pay at the time that the creditor demands his money, that he is not in a position to pay because of circumstances absolutely beyond his control. He may be an absolutely honest man who wishes to pay his debts, I know that has arisen on dozens of occasions within my practical experience at the bar; clients have come to me to look after their interests in connection with attachment proceedings that have been taken against them. The railway company act in a cold-blooded way when they treat their men in that manner. The government could not do that very well. They would not do that. They would necessarily have to inquire into the circumstances surrounding the liability and into the circumstances surrounding the ability of the man to pay. Consequently, to pass a resolution in this House declaring that it is necessary that a law should be adopted making these salaries attachable, I think, in the manner in which it is proposed, is an objectionable proceeding. If the hon. gentleman who proposed the resolution would bring in a Bill so that we could see the line upon which he was proceeding, we would then have something to go upon. Who is to be responsible for bringing in the Bill? A resolution simply propounded in this House is an indefinite affair. There is no person responsible for any subsequent proceedings. Let any hon. gentleman who desires to see legislation placed on the statute-book in this direction bring in a Bill, let it be considered and if thought desirable that the House should pass such legislation, the hon. gentleman who brings in the Bill will be responsible. I, myself, am of the opinion that government employees should pay their liabilities the same as any other person, but I do not think that the House should lay down the bald proposition that legislation of this kind should be introduced. I do not understand that any person is being very grievously injured. I have never heard of any person who was grievously injured by reason of the non-ability of government officials to pay their liabilities. I am inclined to think that legislation should rather be in the opposite direction and that no claims should be attachable. I think it would be more conducive to the establishment of a cash system in this country. The credit system in this country does more to make paupers than any other system that could be devised. I think if we are going to legislate, that we should legislate in a manner which would be more conducive to the inauguration of a cash system by making every man pay for what he gets when he gets it, instead of passing legislation of this kind. I feel that the House should not commit itself to this resolution at the present time.

Mr. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Gaspé). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a word or two, before the vote is taken, so as to put on record my views on the matter. It has been stated on the floor of this House, during this debate, that the subjecting the salaries of civil servants to be garnisheed in the ordinary way was a liberal principle, in accord with the spirit of the age. But, sir, if that is a liberal principle, there is another principle which is still dearer to me, and it is that of provincial autonomy.

Now I am of opinion that, were this parliament to legislate on the matter under consideration, we would be encroaching on the rights of provinces. Under clause 92 of the Union Act of 1867, subsection 13, the provincial legislature may exclusively make laws concerning property and civil rights. Now, such power being clearly vested in the provincial legislature, how could this parliament introduce a legislation to enable even a fraction of the salaries of the civil servants to be garnisheed ? How could parliament create a machinery for the enforcement of such legislation ?

In my opinion, the power of legislating on such matters is exclusively vested in the provincial legislatures ; and, for my part, I am free to say this : That although the principle advocated by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) and by the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Fortin) is, as they claim, a liberal principle, and the principle of provincial autonomy commends itself still more to my approbation. To my mind, upholding the sacred rights of the provinces is still more important, than giving my support to the measure under consideration, progressive and liberal as it is claimed to be.

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) If the hon. gentleman will allow me to interrupt him, I would like to ask him a question for my own information. Is it not true, as a matter of fact, that the exempting of the salaries or wages of workingmen is looked upon as a liberal principle nowadays, and as one quite in accordance with the spirit of the age ? Now, under such circumstances, how, I ask, could the principle under discussion, which aims at removing the prohibition against attaching the salaries of civil servants, be looked upon as a progressive and liberal principle ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. (Translation.) I am now dealing with the matter from a constitutional standpoint, and I do not care for the present to discuss any tendency of the Liberal party in connection with the matter under discussion.

I do not believe in exempting the civil servant from the ordinary liabilities of a citizen. I do not want him to escape the payment of his honest debts. I am not ready to carry liberalism to the extent of approving of public employees shirking their honourable responsibilities and refusing to pay their just debts.

Reference has been made to the railway companies, and among others, to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which has probably twice as many employees as there are on the Intercolonial. And yet, they say, there seems to be no trouble at all about garnisheeing the salaries, and no complaint is heard from the attorneys of the company upon whom the writs of attachment are served, either in Winnipeg, Montreal or Toronto. It works all right, they say. Well, during my short professional career in Montreal, I have had occasion to serve garnishee proceedings on the Canadian Pacific Railway Company respecting their men's salary. Then what happened ? Those employees immediately came to our office and told us that, if the garnishee summons were maintained, their services would be dispensed with by the company.

Now, Mr. Speaker, is it fair to assimilate the case of the employees of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to that of the civil servants ? Because the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have made it a rule not to allow a servant to remain in their employ, if they are served with a garnishee proceeding, does it follow that the government is bound to do the same ?

It is an axiom, I do not know whether in constitutional law or not, but at any rate, an axiom which is in vogue in Great Britain to-day, that 'Her Majesty's government must be carried on.' Now, I ask, are not the ministers of the Crown already encumbered to a sufficient degree in matters necessary to the administration of the country's affairs without having them overloaded with matters of this kind ? For this reason alone—and it is not the main objection to the Bill, because I think it would be ultra vires, inasmuch as it encroaches on provincial rights—I am bound to vote against the resolution of the hon. member for Laval.

Mr. H. BOURASSA (Labelle). (Translation.) Does not the hon. gentleman know that in the province of Quebec the government of His Majesty—although it is only a majesty on a smaller scale—manage to get through their work, although they have to enforce a similar law ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am quite aware of it.

Mr. BOURASSA. (Translation.) Then, why could not the higher majesty of Ottawa deal with the matter here ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. (Translation.) Here is my main objection to this resolution. I do not believe in this parliament dealing with matters which come within the jurisdiction of the provincial government, and this resolution would be an infringement of that principle. Section 92 of the Union Act of 1867 enacts :

Exclusive Powers of Provincial Legislatures—92. In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming withing the classes of subjects next hereinafter mentioned.

And subsection 13 :

Property and civil rights in the province.

Therefore, this is a matter of civil procedure, and, as I said, it is not within the scope of this parliament to pass legislation of this sort, and were we to deal with it now, it would be on our part an encroachment upon the rights of provincial legislatures.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Hon. Sir Louis Davies). Mr. Speaker, before the question is put I would like to say a few words in regard to it. I think that the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Fortin) was well advised in bringing the question before the House in the form of an abstract resolution, and I say so, because, when it was introduced into this House last session and the session before, it was reduced to the form of a Bill. It was found to be impossible to frame a Bill which would meet all of the many objections which could be brought against it. The hon. member for Laval seeks to evade all the difficulties by simply passing an abstract resolution, but, if we pass an abstract resolution we will only be face to face with these difficulties. The question which meets us is : Where is the constitutional power in this matter ? I held before, and that opinion I have not changed, that parliament has a right to declare that the common law which prevents the salaries paid by the King from being garnisheed, may be altered. We can do that. I think we can do that and thereby put salaries payable by the King or by the government on the same basis as others, but, that is as far as we can go. Then, comes the question: Who is to provide the machinery ? It does not seem that this parliament has any jurisdiction over civil procedure to provide how and in what manner these proceedings shall be enforced.

Mr. FORTIN. If the matter is within the jurisdiction of this parliament is the procedure incidental to it not within the jurisdiction of this parliament also ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fortin) is quite right that where a general subject such as insolvency or bankruptcy is referred to this parliament, we can legislate effectively upon it, but I do not see that because the 91st section of the Britsh North America Act says that the fixing and providing for the salaries of civil servants is given to this parliament, that therefore we have the power of determining how and in what manner the creditors can recover if they garnishee. I do not think that is an incidental proceeding. That is a civil procedure in my judgment.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Cannot you declare it to be an asset of the creditor, and then would it not come under your jurisdiction ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think it is well within the power of this parliament to declare that the common law exemption of this debt from garnishee proceedings should be removed, but when we do that we must leave it to the provinces to deal with the garnishee process. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fortin) thinks it is possible to frame a Bill which would provide the proper machinery——

Mr. FORTIN. It was done before.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, but the Bill which was submitted to parliament contained at least a dozen fatal objections and it was withdrawn. I do not believe there is any desire on the part of any one in this House to give an unfair exemption to civil servants, but I ask the hon. member (Mr. Fortin) if there is any real practical grievance existing.

Mr. FORTIN. Yes.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Then where is the evidence of it ? Have we had petitions praying for this legislation ; have any hon. gentlemen engaged in business expressed the opinion in this House that a great grievance exists ? Did the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fortin) listen to the words of wisdom that fell from the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards), who told us as a large employer of labour in this country, that he found the garnishee law most obnoxious and that the result of it was to throw many workmen out of employment, because their wages being garnisheed their employers would not keep them longer. We have heard from the member for Selkirk (Mr. McCreary) that so grievous had been the legislation of past years with reference to the property of debtors which was attachable by creditors, that the Manitoba government have been obliged to interfere, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCreary) says that so many exemptions now exist that the sheriff has gone out of business in that province. That does not show a desire to give greater facilities to the creditor to oppress the poor man, but rather to give the debtor a chance. If we pass a statutory declaration that the salaries of civil servants should be subject to garnishee proceedings, I submit that then each province would have to pass the necessary machinery to give effect to that law. One province might do so and one might not, or a province might make the machinery so intricate for the government that the difficulties would be insuperable. What would be the result of that in the case of the Department of Railways, in which the minister told us he had 9,000 men employed ? The province of Ontario has found it necessary to the practical working of the law, to make an exemption of $25, which as a matter of practice exempts nearly all the employees of the government. Assuming that the provinces can enforce their own law in this regard, how are they going to enforce it as against the central government at Ottawa in the case, for example, of employees in the Yukon, many of whom give orders on the Interior Department for the payment of their salaries to their families ? How can you garnishee these ? Suppose that in British Columbia my department has a hundred men employed on our ships and they are paid monthly, how am I to be informed that the salaries of these men are garnisheed ? What I submit is that instead of passing this resolution, the House might declare that in its opinion each department of government should take steps to ensure that the employees should pay their debts or be discharged. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways says that practice does exist in his department to-day, and that if it is brought to his attention or the attention of his chief officers that an employee persistently refuses to pay his current debts, that man is discharged. It has been stated here that the law works well with regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway, and that therefore it would work well with regard to the government, but the answer to that was given by one hon. gentleman who declared that it worked odiously as regards the workmen in these large corporations, because when their salaries are garnisheed they are discharged. These companies say that they cannot be dragged into court week after week and month after month in these garnishee proceedings, and so in self-defence they discharge the men. Would hon. gentlemen ask the government to do the same thing ? In my own department, when a poor sailor man gets into debt and his pay is garnisheed am I to discharge him instanter ? Do the hon. gentlemen want that ? I have great faith in the legal acumen of my legal friend (Mr. Fortin) to find some way out of the difficulty which presents itself, but it seems to me that if you pass a statute removing the exemption, then you will have gone to the extent of your jurisdiction in this parliament, and after that the process by which the salaries can be garnisheed must be left to the different provinces. That would involve us in difficulties so great that we would be very unwise indeed to bring about such a state of affairs.

When we have statements such as that made by so large an employer of labour as the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards), and that made by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) as to the methods which have to be resorted to by employers of labour to escape from the restrictions of the law, I think we may well pause before adopting either the motion or the amendment. In the first place, no grievance has been more than slightly alleged ; no petitions have come from the country for such a law ; and, speaking as a minister of the Crown of four or five years' experience, I am unable to say that in my department any real grievance exists, and I believe my colleagues can say the same. Then why plunge into an experiment of this kind ? I deny that the working of the garnishee process in the case of the great corporations has been such as to encourage us to apply that process to government employees. I think it would be hard on poor men, harsh and unjust ; and if we adopted it, we would probably be compelled to resort to what the Ontario legislature has been compelled to resort to, namely, so many exemptions that the improvement sought to be effected would prove to be practically inoperative.

Mr. JOSEPH ARTHUR ETHIER (Two Mountains). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentlemen who have opposed the resolution which is now before this House have urged an objection which I do not think well founded, and I wish to put on record my views on the question, before the vote is taken on the resolution. It was urged here that the legislation which is embodied in this resolution would prove unworkable and that the time is not opportune for passing it.

The hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) has dealt with the question from that standpoint and has quoted clause 92 of the British North America Act in support of his views ; but let me call his attention to clause 91 of the same Act which deals with the matters to which extends the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada. Subsection 8 in which are enumerated the classes of subjects within which these matters come, reads as follows :

The fixing and providing for the salaries and allowances for civil and other officers of the government of Canada.

Since under section 91 of the Union Act, the Dominion government is vested with the power of providing for and fixing the salaries, the assumption is that no other government and no other power can interfere with that matter. Therefore, provincial autonomy is altogether out of question here, and there is no attempt at encroaching upon the rights of provincial legislatures.

Another objection to the Bill is that there do not exist sufficient grievances to warrant the passing of such legislation. Now, in 1897, a Bill was introduced and discussed at considerable length. During the session of 1898 the same Bill was reintroduced. As early as 1895, the late Mr. Béchard had introduced a Bill providing that the salaries of public officers and government employees should be attachable. And have we not heard, a little while ago, the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. William McCreary) stating that in the province of Manitoba this evil was so prevalent that the government of that province, like the legislature of Quebec, had to bring in a law enacting that the salaries of their officials might be liable to seizure. I think it would be but fair to put the creditors of the Dominion civil servants on the same footing with the officials of those provinces.

As matters stand now, no creditor cares to take proceedings against any official of the Dominion government. You may sue them, you may get judgment against them, but what is the use of levying a judgment against a civil servant who has nothing in the world to depend upon but the salary he gets from the government ? No creditor would risk the payment of the judicial costs so long as the judgment he gets remains unsatisfied. But let the House adopt this resolution and then we will provide the best machinery to make this legislation workable and truly effective. Should parliament enact such legislation, it would secure to a creditor the right to recover from the civil servant as readily as he does from any one else.

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) Would the hon. gentleman tell me how he can reconcile that statement with the views expressed by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies)? I would like him to tell me who has the power to regulate the procedure in the civil courts ? Is that power vested in the Dominion parliament or in the local legislatures ? Now, supposing it were within the jurisdiction of the local legislature, would the hon. gentleman be ready to state that the provinces may issue writs against the Crown ?

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) This parliament would have to provide the necessary machinery for enforcing and putting the law in motion—in so far as their own officials are concerned.

I know of many civil servants in the service of the government here who, having resided in the province of Quebec and got into debt there, refused to pay their bills, because they know that under the law their salaries were not liable to attachment. Now, were such legislation as is now proposed crystallized into law, those employees could be sued at law. Besides, such legislation would not imply a slur upon the character of the civil servants who were willing to pay their honest debts. It could only affect those dishonest debtors who shirk their honourable responsibilities, and thus bring discredit upon their colleagues.

One of the hon. gentlemen who spoke before me endeavoured to assimilate the case of the government employees with those of railway companies, such as the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, who make it a rule to discharge their officials when a writ of attachment is served in the offices of the company, and when the judgment is not satisfied without the company having to interfere. There is no parity at all between the two cases. This resolution does not provide for the discharge of public officials who do not pay their debts, but it only asks parliament to give its sanction to the principle that any man in Canada who earns a salary of from two to three thousand dollars a year shall be on a footing of equality before the law with the poor workingman who is earning but a dollar a day. For these reasons, I think that the resolution, introduced by my hon. friend from Laval should pass the House.

Mr. P. O. DUGAS (Montcalm). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I have listened very attentively to the remarks fallen from the hon. gentlemen who have participated in this debate, and I may say that, out of sympathy for the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Fortin), the mover of this resolution, I am very sorry not to be able to support him.

In principle I am in favour of making not only the salaries garnisheeable, but, in fact, everything that belongs to the debtor. I have no sympathy with those laws passed by the provincial legislatures exempting from garnishment a portion of the wages of the workingmen. Those laws, I believe, have defeated the purpose for which they were framed. They have done the working classes more harm than good. I, for one, am a believer in the great principle grounded on equity and justice, in virtue of which the property and goods of the debtor are held as a common pledge by the creditors. Now, if a way could be found out of this trouble, and if it were possible to apply that old principle to government officials, I would be the first man to approve of such a reform. But, sir, I doubt whether such legislation is within the jurisdiction of this parliament and whether we can pass such a measure without infringing the constitution which governs us.

Mr. R. LEMIEUX. Hear, hear.

Mr. DUGAS. (Translation.) To prove what I say, I need only refer to clauses 91 and 92 of the Union Act of 1867.

Clause 91 deals with the distribution of legislative powers, and enacts in connection with the powers of this parliament that the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects therein mentioned and subsection 8 enacts :

> The fixing and providing for the salaries and allowances of civil and other officers of the government of Canada.

The jurisdiction of this parliament, therefore, does not extend beyond fixing and providing for the salaries and allowances of the government officials.

I do not see here anything that enables this House to pass an Act to garnishee the salaries of the servants of the Dominion government.

Section 92 of the Union Act deals with the powers of provincial legislatures, and enacts that in each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects therein enumerated, and among other matters, 'property and civil rights in the province' (subsection 13, section 92.) Therefore, under the constitution, this parliament is not empowered to pass a law to enable the salaries of civil servants to be garnisheed. Under the Union Act quoted, such a matter is clearly beyond the jurisdiction of this parliament, the legislatures having exclusively the right of making laws in relation to such matter. Therefore in passing such a legislation, we would be encroaching upon provincial autonomy. Moreover, how could such a law be enforced ? I see no way out of this difficulty. The judgments of the courts of the various provinces can only be executed within the limits of the province in which they have been rendered, and exclusively as to the goods and property situate within such province.

The province of Ontario would be the only province which would reap any benefit from the proposed legislation. The seat of this government being in the province of Ontario, no other orders but those issued by the Ontario courts could reach the government officials.

Now, if in addition to what I have said, we remember this old axiom of the English law, that "The Crown cannot be a garnishee," the only conclusion that can be come to is that the proposition of the hon. member for Laval cannot be accepted.

The hon. member for Two Mountains (Mr. Ethier) stated, a little while ago, that under section 91 of the Union Act of 1867, this parliament is empowered to enact such a legislation as the one embodied in the proposition of the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Fortin). Surely the hon. gentleman was not in earnest when putting such a construction upon subsection 8. This subsection merely says that this parliament is empowered to deal with the fixing and providing for the salaries and allowances of the officers of the government of Canada ; that is all. This does not imply the right for this parliament to pass a law to enable the salaries of government officers to be garnisheed.

For these reasons, although in principle I am in favour of making the salaries of public employees and the wages of workingmen liable to seizure, and in spite of all esteem and respect I profess for my hon. friend from Laval, I feel in duty bound to vote against the resolution, because such a legislation as the one proposed would be unconstitutional.

Mr. B. RUSSELL (Hants). Mr. Speaker, I should not have thought it necessary to take part in the discussion this afternoon but for the fact that when the subject came before the House on a previous occasion I deemed it to be my duty to oppose the Bill in which the proposal was then embodied, because I thought that the power of this parliament to deal with the subject was extremely doubtful, to say the least. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) agreed with me on that occasion in opposing the Bill ; but as the matter is now brought before the House, not in the form of a Bill, which there might be doubt about our power to pass, but in the form of a resolution merely expressing the opinion of the House that the salaries of civil servants should be attachable for the payment of their debts like the salaries of all other classes of the community, I thought we should have the support of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries for this proposal. But it seems that when a Bill is introduced on this subject, it is wrong ; and when a resolution is brought, it is wrong and should have been in the form of a bill. So it seems whichever way we go, we cannot fail to go wrong. The reason I expressed some doubt as to the legislative power of this parliament to deal with the question was that I thought a mistake had been made in the decisions of some of our courts as to the legislative authority of this parliament, notably in the case referred to, that of Leprohon against the city of Ottawa, where a claim was made on the part of the city authorities to tax a Dominion official in respect of his income. I think it is very important that this matter should be settled, as that decision was closely relevant to the question then before the House and now before the House. I would like very much if an opportunity could be given to have that question decided in such a way that we might ascertain whether there is to be any privileged class in the community. The reason I objected to the Bill two or three years ago was that it proposed to segregate the civil servants of the Dominion from all other classes by legislating against them in an exceptional way. I think that is wrong ; but I also think it is wrong that Dominion officials or officials of any kind should enjoy privileges and advantages that are not accorded to other people. I do not think public officials should be placed in an exceptional position, either adverse or favourable. Places in the public service are very eagerly sought after, as every member of parliament, on this side of the House at any rate, knows, and I think they should stand on the same footing as any other classes in the community. For that reason, I thought it was desirable that the decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal, I think it was, which seemed to place them in a different position from other classes of the community, should be reviewed. I thought, if it be not presumptuous to say so, that that decision was erroneous, because it seemed to be founded on an entirely false analogy. There was a judgment given a long time ago by Chief Justice Marshall in the United States Supreme Court with reference to the position of officers of the Federal government, and that decision, which was applied by the Ontario Court of Appeal to this class of appointments, was to the effect that if the state legislatures were allowed to tax the salaries of officials of the Federal government, the result might be that the States would have power to destroy an arm of the Federal government. If that was the case, then I presume that was a very proper decision to make, at any rate on political grounds, on which a great many of the judgments of the United States Supreme Court have been founded ; and it was a good judgment, because that was not a desirable condition of things, and was not contemplated by the founders of the Union. That is right enough for the people south of the line ; but my impression is that it has no application to us in Canada, because the Federal government here has a method of protecting itself which the Federal government in the United States has not, and therefore it it not necessary to invoke under our constitution any such principle of safety which might properly be invoked under the constitution of the United States. In Canada, if any legislation is passed by the provincial authorities which, although apparently within the constitutional authority of the provincial legislature, might have the effect of crippling the Dominion service, the Dominion government always has a right to effect a virtual veto of that legislation and to prevent it going into effect. The power of disallowance which we have in our constitution, I think, makes that class of decisions south of the line inapplicable to our conditions north of the line. It was on grounds of necessity that Chief Justice Marshall gave the judgment he did in that matter, and that judgment was the foundation of the decision given here in the case of Leprohon against the city of Ottawa. That political necessity does not exist with us and consequently there is not analogy between that case and our situation. Our provincial legislatures have the right to order a debtor —whether he is a civil servant of the Dominion or not—to pay a certain amount in proportion to his income, and following out that principle I am inclined to think that a provincial legislature would have authority to legislate with reference to this particular subject.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). How could a provincial legislature enact a law which would make the government of Canada a party to a suit ?

Mr. RUSSELL. I was about to refer to that difficulty. If, acting within its legislative authority, the Dominion parliament chooses to pass a Federal Act, that, of course, would override the provisions of any provincial Act. In Nova Scotia, a debtor—whether civil servant or not—may be interrogated as to his means of paying his debts, and the courts have power to order him to pay so much per month or per week. If our provincial courts can make such an order as that, I do not see why they have not the right to take into consideration the fact that the person against whom the order is made is the recipient of a large income from the Federal government, and make an order based on his income. But I understand that there are some decisions in Ontario to the effect that the courts of that province cannot do that.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. We can do that in Ontario.

Mr. RUSSELL. I think that is a good system. As to the abstract proposition that these salaries should be made attachable, by whatever legislature has the power, I do not see why there should be any doubt on that point. I do not see why civil servants should not be placed on the same footing as everybody else.

Mr. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure). There is a very general opinion in the country that some Dominion employees cannot be compelled to pay their debts. In this province, I believe, such employees can be brought before the courts and interrogated as to their means and then condemned to pay a certain amount out of their salaries per week or per month, as the case may be. And any civil servant who fails to comply with such an order is guilty of contempt of court and can be sent to jail.

In the province of Quebec, not many years ago, the wages of workingmen were seizable to the full amount, but one of our Liberal members from the city of Montreal managed, after some difficulty, to have the law amended in the local legislature by providing that only one-quarter of the salary of a workingman is seizable, and in such a case the seizure can be made continuous. That was satisfactory to some extent to the creditor, but has worked unfortunately for the debtor. It has enabled creditors to take out suits, pile up costs, turn a man out of employment first, and out of his home afterwards.

With regard to the resolution before the House, I do not think that the government should be placed on exactly the same footing as the Canadian Pacific Railway or other great corporations, but none the less, after the expression of opinion we have had in this House, some measure should be devised for subjecting civil servants to the same obligations as other people, and in doing that, I believe that the government will be acting in the interests of the civil servants themselves. One employee of this government told me it would be an excellent thing for the service if the salaries were seizable, as it would enable a certain number of them, who are residing in other parts of the country, to obtain credit, which now they are unable to obtain without having to resort to that class of moneylenders known as money sharks.

Mr. T. O. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). I do not propose to give a silent vote on a question of this kind.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Six o'clock.

Mr. DAVIS. I did not hear what the hon. gentleman said. I was just going to say that I must agree with the principle of this resolution, I do not see why civil servants should be exempt any more than other people. They are a well paid class; their salaries, as a rule, are better than those paid to persons in commercial employment. And, as an hon. gentleman suggests to me, they are paid better than members of parliament are paid for their time, and I do not know of any legislation that protects a member of parliament from the necessity of paying his debts. In the North-west Territories, we have had a great deal of trouble on account of these officials. Officers of the government who are paid large salaries seem to get the idea that they can run in debt here and there and cannot be called upon to pay. But I contend that their creditors should be in a position to levy on their salaries to get their accounts paid. The question came up in the legislature of the North-west Territories and was discussed at considerable length. The government of the Territories notified the members of the House that if they would not push the resolution to a vote, they would undertake to see that all the officers in the employ of the North-west Territories government should pay their debts or would dismiss them from the service. If the Federal government would take a similar position, it would meet the difficulty I believe. I do not know how many provinces have adopted this principle, except the province of Manitoba——

An. hon. MEMBER. And Quebec.

Mr. DAVIS. I was not aware that Quebec had also adopted it. I think the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) said that in Manitoba the government had taken the same position as the government of the North-west Territories—that is, if an officer of the government would not pay his debts, they would dismiss him. Whether the other provinces have adopted it or not, I think this is a proper principle.

If the Federal government are not prepared to make a statement like that made by the government of the North-west Territories and Manitoba, I think legislation should be allowed to go through, and I think we might expect in the future——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. DAVIS. I think the hon. gentleman will have to wait awhile for the question. I was going to say, Mr. Speaker, that I do not see why the civil servants should be exempt any more than other classes of the community.

At six o'clock House took recess.

After Recess.

Bill (No. 95) respecting the Ontario, Hudson's Bay and Western Railway Company. —Mr. Dyment.

VICTORIA DAY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 33) respecting Victoria Day.—Mr. Horsey.

On section 1,

Mr. SPROULE. I notice that the ministers have been holding a caucus over there for some time and that the House is not proceeding with the business. When the caucus is over I have a few questions to ask.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I was having a conversation with my hon. friend (Mr. Horsey). When the Bill was introduced the Prime Minister suggested that perhaps the phraseology might be amended to bring it into conformity with the Interpretation Act. The Solicitor General has prepared an amendment to meet that point, and we were discussing with the promoter of the Bill as to whether he would accept that amendment, or whether he would require time to consider it. The proposition of the Solicitor General is to add a paragraph to section 7 of the Interpretation Act by inserting after the word Sovereign the word 'Victoria Day,' and to make this apply to the Bills of Exchange Act. Of course that is a matter which involves some commercial considerations, as to whether this is to be a legal holiday in the sense of making it a public holiday for the government offices, or whether the banks are to be closed and so on. That is a matter of some moment. We are all agreed upon the principle of the Bill, but time might be taken to discuss these other points.

Mr. SPROULE. I was about to ask if the Bill would affect the banks, or contracts made by individuals.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the suggestion of the Solicitor General were adopted it would be made a bank holiday. My hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Horsey) thinks he had better have time to consider it.

Mr. SPROULE. Then had you not better move that the committee rise ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Very well, I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. In the absence of Mr. Stephens, I beg to move that Bill (No. 77) to amend the Railway Act be read the second time.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS moved that said Bill be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Railways and Canals.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT—EASTER ADJOURNMENT.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Hon. Sir Louis Davies). Mr. Speaker, there is a very thin House, and I understand that it is not the desire of either side to continue this evening ; therefore I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MONK. Before this motion is adopted, I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if the government has come to any decision in regard to the Easter adjournment. Many members on this side of the House are anxious to know the extent of that adjournment.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I believe the intention is to adjourn on Thursday evening at six o'clock until the following Tuesday at three, unless there is a very strong expression of the House to the contrary.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 8.40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, March 28, 1901.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

THE BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY.

Mr. E. F. CLARKE (West Toronto) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 101) respecting the Bell Telephone Company of Canada.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Hon. Sir Louis Davies). Explain.

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. Speaker, when the company obtained legislation in 1892 empowering it to increase its capital stock, a provision was inserted in the Bill that the rates then existing should not be increased without the consent of the Governor in Council. The intention of the Bill which has just been presented is to amend clause 3 of that Act, to compel the company to provide telephonic service on lines or streets where it has already established its system, to enable municipalities or individuals who have been charged rates higher than those in existence at the time of the passage of that Act, to recover any sums in excess that have been paid the company, and to reaffirm the provision that the existing rates shall not be increased without the consent of the Governor in Council.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS.

I. C. R.—SALE OF STEEL RAILS, &c.

Mr. BELL (Pictou) asked :

1. What quantity of serviceable steel rails and fastenings were sold from the Intercolonial Railway between 30th June, 1899, and 1st January, 1901?
2. To whom were they sold?
3. At what price per ton?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair) :

1. 3,043 tons.
2. Acadia Coal Company, Beauchemin & Loupiers, R. Weddell, Kent Northern Railway, Salisbury and Harvey Railway, Department of Militia and Defence, Dominion Iron and Steel Company, and York and Carleton Railway.
3. Prices were $20, $21, $21.50 and $22 per ton, depending upon place of delivery.

CANAL, ROUND BAY, N.S.

Mr. BELL (Pictou) asked :

1. Was a canal excavated at Round Bay, Shelburne county, N.S., during the year 1900?
2. Were tenders asked for the work or for materials or transport of materials?
3. From whom was material purchased?
4. What price was paid for timber?
5. What freight was paid on timber?
6. Is the canal now completed?
7. For what purpose was it intended?
8. Has it been found suited to that purpose?
9. Did any government engineer recommend the construction of the work?
10. If so, what was the name of such engineer?

The PRIME MINISTER. Stand, in the absence of the Minister of Public Works.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Hon. Sir Louis Davies). I would like to ask my hon. friend what that question refers to. The Minister of Public Works has no knowledge of it. There was a small expenditure of $75 in my department for cutting what I suppose you might call a canal, a passage through the sand bank into a pond. If that is the matter I can answer it.

Mr. SPEAKER. Stand.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—RECRUITING FOR CONSTABULARY.

Mr. FOWLER asked :

1. How many men from New Brunswick were accepted for service with the South African Constabulary?
2. Have any, and if so, how many, officers been appointed to said force from New Brunswick?
3. Were any applications made by militia officers of New Brunswick, or members of the first or second contingents from New Brunswick, to the Department of Militia and Defence for commissions in said constabulary? If so, by whom made, and if not granted, why not?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Hon. F. W. Borden). All the work in connection with recruiting for the South African Constabulary has been and is directly under the control of the Imperial authorities, who sent several officers to Canada for the purpose. The government, including the Militia Department, is not responsible in any way for the recruiting or the selection of officers. The machinery of the Militia Department has been utilized by the Imperial authorities to expedite the work of organizing the force and of their transportation. I am informed that about 125 men were recruited in New Brunswick by C. W. W. McLean, an Imperial officer detailed for the purpose, and only about eleven others offered their services in that province. One hundred and sixty-two applications for commissions passed through the Militia Department, seven of which were from New Brunswick.

JOSEPH PAQUET, PILOT.

Mr. CASGRAIN—by Mr. Monk—asked :

1. Was Mr. Joseph Paquet, pilot, of St. Jean, Island of Orleans, appointed by the government to any position in connection with the census?
2. If so, to what position, on what date, and what was to be his salary?
3. Has the said Mr. Joseph Paquet been dismissed from said position?
4. If so, on what date, and for what reasons?
5. On whose recommendation had Mr. Joseph Paquet been so appointed?
6. Who recommended his dismissal?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Hon. Sydney Fisher). Mr. Joseph Paquet, pilot, of St. Jean, Island of Orleans, has not been appointed to any position in connection with the census.

MANHOOD SUFFRAGE REGISTRATION.

Mr. LANCASTER asked :

Is it the intention of the government to reimburse the municipalities in Ontario the cost incurred in the registration of the manhood franchise voters for the general elections held in October and November last?

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The accounts received up to the present date for the manhood suffrage registration have been paid in accordance with the order in council of October 8th, 1900, which allows the same compensation as is payable for like services under the statutes of the province. If there are any accounts which have not yet been sent in, they will be dealt with on the same basis when received.

DRILL HALL AT BROCKVILLE.

Mr. LANCASTER asked :

1. To whom was the contract let for building the drill hall at the town of Brockville?
2. Were tenders advertised for?
3. Was the lowest tender accepted?
4. Who were the successful tenderers, and what were the amounts of their tenders respectively?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair) :

1. D. S. Booth.
2. Yes.
3. Yes.
4. D. S. Booth, $42,290.00.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask the government if I may expect soon the report that I moved for in the early part of the session with regard to the sale of school lands in Manitoba. The Prime Minister stated at the time that the report of the investigation that was being held would be soon put before the House. I understand the investigation is now closed.

The PRIME MINISTER. Will the hon. gentleman send me a memorandum of this ?

THE $4-BILL ISSUE.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (East Simcoe). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to call the attention of the government to a matter that is exciting considerable comment in the Toronto and other papers, and in order to put myself in order, if you consider it necessary, I will, before I sit down, move the adjournment of the House. It can hardly be said that the present administration have at any time evinced considerable sympathy for Canadian manufacturing concerns. With the advent of the government they took away from what was known as the British Canadian Bank Note Company, the business of printing postage stamps, and also $1 and $2 notes, as well as the $4 notes, and I may also add the printing of revenue stamps. It was pointed out at that time that the government discriminated very unfairly towards the British American Bank Note Company ; but it has remained for the government to issue through this American Bank Note Company, which is controlled by American interests, a new $4-note, which bears upon its face an imprint of the celebrated American Soo canal lock. Now, Sir, this government has spent some $4,000,000 in the construction of a large lock on the canal between Lake Huron and Lake Superior. I have been in Sault Ste. Marie, and as a Canadian I felt a little pride in the fact that this government had there such a magnificent lock. From time to time I have seen that the American people, through their magazines, and notably through the Cosmopolitan, publishing whole pages on the greatness of the American people as exemplified in the fact that they had constructed this immense lock at Sault Ste. Marie. Now, I contend that when we have any great works our own we should not endeavour to hide our light under a bushel, and having expended that large amount, and having constructed a lock that, in my estimation, can be fairly compared with the American canal lock, I think we should not try to suppress that fact, that we should give it all the publicity we possibly can. When I appeal to the government to withdraw this issue of $4 bills, that they have sent out, I fear I shall be appealing to deaf ears, because those hon. gentlemen from time to time show an inclination, go where they will, to patronize American concerns rather than Canadian ones. I recall the fact that last year I saw standing in the Central Railway station a whole train of cars, and instead of being able to boast that they were Canadian productions, made from our Canadian hardwoods and by Canadian labour, we were humiliated by the knowledge of the fact that these had been imported from the United States ; and it was only yesterday that the Minister of Railways and Canals, in answer to a question, made the announcement of the fact that nearly $200,000 worth of cars had recently been purchased in the United States. Now, we have to stand here and appeal to the hon. gentlemen to patronize Canadian industries. For myself, I hope and trust that they will have some Canadian pride among them, that they will endeavour to patronize Canadian concerns. It is a matter of fact to-day that while we have in Ontario first-class mechanics and first-class manufacturing concerns, the Minister of Railways and Canals turns his back on these and goes over to the other side to purchase that which we require. And it remains for this American Note Company, this importation from the United States, a company that has also imported its employees to come here to take the place of so many Canadians, a company which takes out of the pockets of Canadians so much money, and takes that back to their stockholders on the American side—it remains for this great concern to rub it into the Canadian people and to be able to advertise from one end of the country to the other that the Canadians are such an insignificant body of people that they are actually paying for the privilege of advertising this great American lock on the face of these Canadian bills. Now, I do not know how this happened. Surely it could not have been through the cognizance of the Minister of Railways and Canals himself that the new American lock and not the Canadian lock should be presented on the picture. Surely, if that hon. gentleman was consulted, why did he not insist, if a lock was to be shown on this bill, that it should be the Canadian and not the American lock ? But the Minister of Railways and Canals sits by unconcernedly and does not care which lock is represented. But it may have been a spirit of envy that prompted him in this matter, because the Canadian lock had been constructed under the rule of his predecessor, and probably for that reason he did not wish to see so magnificent a work pictured on a Canadian bill.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair). Would it make any difference in the hon. gentleman's view if he were to be made aware of the fact that, except from reading the reports in the newspapers, I never knew that any such bank bill had been issued bearing any such representation ? That does not come within my department.

Mr. BENNETT. I did think that the Minister of Railways and Canals would have taken sufficient interest in the matter that came before the council, such as the issue of a new series of bills, that he would have insisted on some great work connected with this department being depicted on that bill. He might have had, for instance, a picture of the new Victoria bridge printed on it, leading the trade of Canada to Portland, and assisted by this government to the extent of half a million dollars. But perhaps a spirit of jealousy also prevented his doing this, since it was the Minister of Public Works who led off in that matter. If this occurred through mistake or inadvertence, I am afraid all the blame must fall upon the Minister of Finance, and if he will promise that these four dollar bills will be at once withdrawn from the public gaze and be replaced by bills that will bear the imprint of the Canadian lock, he will be doing the country a service. But before the bills are withdrawn, I would ask the Finance Minister not to treat them in the same way as our postage stamps have been, because it is disgraceful to know that postage stamps are lying all over this Dominion, and in foreign countries as well, unused, and yet such stamps of denominations larger than a dollar will not be exchanged by the government for ordinary stamps in current issue, nor will they be redeemed. We have thus some reason to fear that with the view of making the surplus larger, the hon. gentleman may at once declare these bills non-redeemable. He may also rely on the American public, pardonably proud of the fact that the Canadian government have the picture of an American lock adorning their paper money issue, buying them up as souvenirs and keeping them for all time to come as an example of the gullibility, if it be gullibility, or the ignorance, if it be ignorance, or the kindness, if it be kindness, of the Canadian government in advertising the American lock at Sault Ste. Marie at the expense of the Canadian lock, although the latter is equally as good, if not a great deal better. I beg to move the adjournment of the House.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). Hon. gentlemen opposite are so much in the habit of talking economy and practicing extravagance that I am not surprised at them complaining of the action of this government in awarding the contract for the engraving of our Dominion notes to the party who put in the lowest and most substantial tender. It would have been much more in accord with the practice of hon. gentlemen opposite to award contracts to some party favourite at the cost of vast sums to the public. In this particular transaction, it was unfortunate for the hon. gentleman's friends that it was impossible to award them the contract, because, although given every opportunity to tender, they declined to supply the notes on fair and reasonable terms, and we made the contract with other people who have a great reputation for doing the best class of work. These people have built an establishment in Ottawa which is employing Canadian workmen and adding to the wealth of Ottawa and the Dominion, and giving the highest class of work.

As to the picture on the bills, I regret that my hon. friend has allowed himself to be imposed upon. This is a very large country, and I must confess that I have not had the opportunity of visiting that very enterprising portion of Canada known as the 'Soo,' and therefore cannot speak from personal knowledge. There would be some excuse, therefore, if I were imposed upon, but my hon. friend who comes from that portion of Canada has no excuse. He says that this is a picture of an American lock.

Mr. BENNETT. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I want to tell the hon. gentleman that it is not, and I will give him evidence he cannot gainsay. The picture on the four dollar note is the picture of the Canadian Pacific Railway steamer Athabasca coming through the lock, and we know that the Canadian Pacific Railway is too patriotic an institution to patronize any other than a Canadian lock. We know that the financial critic of the opposition is himself a director of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and are we to be told by one of his supporters that such an eminent member of the party opposite would dream of permitting his steamer, the Athabasca, to use the American lock ?

Mr. BENNETT. It went over there to coal up.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There is no need to go there to coal. There is a magnificent lock on the Canadian side, and when the picture was submitted to me of a Canadian Pacific Railway steamer passing through the lock, I knew that the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) was too patriotic to allow a steamer belonging to the company of which he is a director to go through the American lock, and accepted the picture. My hon. friend, I am afraid, has too easily allowed himself to be imposed upon.

Hon. DAVID TISDALE (South Norfolk). I had not intended to say anything on the subject, but I do know the American 'Soo' canal and the Canadian canal, and here is one of the bills, and there is no doubt that the picture on this bill is that of the American canal.

Mr. LOGAN. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is referring to a document, and the rule of the House is that all documents referred to should be laid on the Table.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think it is necessary for a private member to lay on the Table a document to which he refers.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. I do not understand the Finance Minister to have affirmed that the picture on this bill is that of the Canadian lock.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I gave my authority.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. The only authority the hon. gentleman has is that he sees in the lock on the bill what he believes to be one of the Canadian Pacific steamboats.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. A Canadian Pacific Railway steamboat.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. Though this may appear a laughable matter to hon. gentlemen opposite it is more serious than they imagine. For my part, if my party were in power, and the government which I supported issued a national bill of the Dominion of Canada, and on that bill deliberately put the picture of a public work of the United States, and not of Canada, unless they would withdraw that bill from circulation, I would cease to support them.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. I am surprised that there should be hon. gentlemen on the other side who should treat a statement of that sort in that manner. That is all I have to say. Hon. gentlemen on that side have a perfect right to treat any matter as they choose, and to treat as a subject only worthy of ridicule the fact that on the national money of the country, the government have put the public work of a foreign country. Why do they not make the thing complete ? I see here Their Excellencies the Earl and Countess of Minto. Why do you not put on President and Mrs. McKinley ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. I see on the back of this bill this parliament building, the pride of Canada. Why don't you put on the capitol at Washington ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. Put them all on. You have as much right to laugh at that as you have to laugh at this thing. I am not posing on this question. I saw it mentioned in the paper last night, that being the first I had known of it. I protest against the question being treated with such levity as is shown by hon. gentlemen opposite. When hon. gentlemen care so little for the emblems of their country, the public works and the institutions of their country, I have not much confidence that they have the same feeling towards the country itself that, I thank heaven, my bringing up and my nationality, that I have.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. Hon. gentlemen are welcome to shout. It may be that I am sentimental. I have got past the time of life, perhaps, when sentiment should be exhibited ; but I hope that I shall cease to live when these sentiments that I now declare cease to pervade my heart and my life and my conduct.
