SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honor to inform this House that when the House attended His Excellency the Governor-General this day in the Senate Chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a Speech to both Houses of Parliament, and, to prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy of the Speech, which is as follows:—

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

In fulfilment of the important trust committed to me by Her Majesty, I have recourse for the first time to your advice and assistance. It is a source of the deepest personal satisfaction to me, that I should have been called by Her Majesty to an office in which, as Her Representative I am enabled to take a part in the public affairs of the Dominion, and to associate myself with you in the performance of the honorable duties which you are about to approach.

I rejoice to learn that although the last harvest has been less productive than its predecessors, and although there are indications that the rapid expansion of your commerce has, to some extent, been followed by over-trading, the general condition of the Dominion is such as to justify me in congratulating you upon its prosperity.

The marked success attained by Canada at the International Fishery Exhibition in London, must be very gratifying to you, and has, I doubt not, been of great service in showing to the world the wealth of our Fisheries and the extent of our marine industries and resources.

The Commissioners appointed by my predecessor for the purpose of consolidating the Statutes affecting the Dominion, have pursued their task with diligence, and I am enabled to lay before you for examination about sixty chapters of the proposed consolidation. The remainder of the work will be prepared, and the whole of it revised during the present year, so that the final report will be ready at your next Session for your approval.

The number of immigrants to Canada during the past season has, I am glad to say, been greater than in any previous year, and is a proof that the better Canada is known the more it is valued by those seeking a home in the new world.

Arrangements are in progress to diminish the cost of inland transport, and I have reason to believe that the result will be a steady increase of valuable settlers, in the future.

During the recess, negotiations were resumed with British Columbia in regard to several matters upon which differences had for some time existed between the two Governments. One of my Ministers visited the Province last summer on a special mission with a view to the adjustment of all questions in controversy, and his efforts have happily been successful. Should your sanction be given to the arrangements then made, all occasions of dispute will have been removed, and the most cordial relations established between the Dominion and Provincial Governments. The papers will be laid before you and your consideration invited to measures enabling me to give effect to the agreement.

The rapid increase of population in the North-West renders some amendments in the North-West Territories Act expedient, and your attention will be called to this important matter.

The progress of the Indians in Manitoba and the North-West during last year has been, on the whole, satisfactory. The Bands included in the several Indian Treaties have for the most part betaken themselves to their reserves. A Bill for the further promotion of their interests will be submitted to you, as well as a measure applicable to the whole Dominion, for the purpose of encouraging the more advanced Indian communities to assume the responsibilities of self-government.

Mr. SPEAKER.

The Bill laid before you last Session for the representation of the people in Parliament and the assimilation of the electoral franchises existing in the several Provinces, has now been before the country for a year. The measure will be re-introduced and I commend it to your attention.

I would also urge upon you the expediency of providing for the regulation of factory labour and the protection of the workingman and his family. The measure submitted last Session, with some amendments, will be laid before you.

The rapid progress of the Canadian Pacific Railway has been maintained throughout the past year. Of the 2,833 miles of the main line between Pembroke and Port Moody, 1,738 miles are now constructed, rendering practicable the completion of that great work within the next two years. Although the time within which the Railway Company is bound to finish the road will not expire until 1891, my Government has thought it of the greatest importance for the settlement of the North-West and the development of our trade, that its completion from sea to sea should be hastened and the Company enabled to open the line throughout by the spring of 1886. With this view, and in order to aid the Company in procuring sufficient capital for the purpose by the disposal of its unsold shares, the Government agreed to receive a deposit of money and securities sufficient to pay a minimum three per cent. dividend for ten years on sixty-five millions of the stock. That arrangement was made on the belief that it would give steadiness and increased value to the shares on the market. A combination of unfavorable circumstances has prevented the fulfilment of these expectations, and the Company has not been able to obtain the required capital by a sale of its stock. The best means of preventing any delay in the great object of the early completion of the railway, demands your earnest consideration.

I am pleased to be able to state that the operation of that portion of the railway already opened, affords the most gratifying evidence of its soundness as a commercial enterprise and of its great value to Canada.

The large increase of the volume of traffic on the Intercolonial Railway over that of any previous year, without involving any burden upon the country, is a satisfactory proof of the continued development of trade between the eastern and western portions of the Dominion.

A provisional arrangement made with the Government of Nova Scotia for the retention of the Pictou Branch and the acquisition of the Eastern Extension Railway to the Strait of Canso, will be submitted for your approval.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The accounts for the past year will be laid before you. You will find that the expenditure has been considerably less and the receipts larger than the estimates, the surplus exceeding that of any previous year. The revenue of the first half of the current year, notwithstanding the large importations of last season, have been such that we may reasonably expect that the estimates for the year will be fairly maintained.

The estimates for the ensuing year will also be submitted to you. They will, I trust, be found to have been prepared with due regard to economy.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I feel assured that you will devote yourselves with earnestness and assiduity to the consideration of the subjects I have mentioned, and to all matters affecting the public interests that may be brought before you.

On motion of Sir John A. Macdonald, His Excellency's Speech was ordered to be taken into consideration, to-morrow.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

That Select Standing Committees of the House for the present Session be appointed for the following purposes:—1. On Privileges and Elections. 2. On Expiring Laws. 3. On Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines. 4. On Miscellaneous Private Bills. 5. On Standing Orders. 6. On Printing. 7. On Public Accounts. 8. On Banking and Commerce. 9. On Immigration and Colonization; which said Committees shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House, and to report, from time to time, their observations and opinions thereon; with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT.

Mr. SPEAKER laid before the House the Report of the Librarian on the state of the Library of Parliament.

ADJOURNMENT.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY PAPERS.

Mr. BLAKE. May I ask the hon. gentleman if he proposes to lay on the Table, without motion, the papers connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway arrangements referred to in the Speech?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They will be sent down as soon as the Speech is answered, by Messages from the Crown.

Motion agreed to; and (at 3:50 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 18th January, 1884.

PRAYERS.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House proceeded to the consideration of His Excellency's Speech at the opening of the Session.

Mr. MACMASTER. Mr. Speaker, the first clause of the Speech from the Throne is one to which hon. members will give their very ready assent, and I am sure that not only this House, but the country generally, will endorse the wise choice made by Her Majesty of Her representative in this country. We know that the noble lord who has been appointed Governor-General of Canada, though yet comparatively a young man, has achieved a high position in the public life of the Mother Country, and that he has been a member of Mr. Gladstone's Administration. We further know that he belongs to a distinguished family which has contributed to Great Britain not only a Chancellor of the Exchequer, but also a Prime Minister. I am sure the Canadian people will extend to the Governor-General a hearty welcome, and I have no doubt his administration in this country will be as successful as those of his immediate predecessors. We have had the advantage of late years, not merely of having the selection of Governors-General wisely made, and the benefit of the eminent services rendered by these Imperial officers in the colony, but also the unofficial services of many of those gentlemen after their term of office and their connection with this country proper have ceased. In this respect Lord Dufferin and the Marquis of Lorne, though acting unofficially, have been our most valued ambassadors in Great Britain, and have not ceased to take an interest in our country's affairs long after their terms of office expired. I may say, with respect to Lord Lorne and his royal wife that by their devotion to duty, they became endeared to the Canadian people, and will long be remembered with grateful affection by the inhabitants of this Dominion. In the case of Lord Dufferin, he equally won the affection of the people of Canada, and the contributions made to the Dominion's welfare, not only while he held office here but since his return to the Mother Country, will be gratefully recorded and remembered by our people. I am sure that in the great diplomatic triumphs achieved by Lord Dufferin since his departure from amongst us, no one has taken a greater interest than the people of Canada, no matter whether those efforts were directed to the pacification of the Egyptian, to the over-awing of the Czar, or the outwitting of the Turk—in all his endeavors he has had the sympathy and interest of the Canadian people. And I am sure that after the term of office of the present Governor-General, though it is rather premature to refer to that now, he, by his efforts here and work hereafter, will have equally succeeded in winning the best opinions of the Canadian people. The Speech from the Throne, Mr. Speaker, is of an eminently practical character. It may be divided into two main headings: first relating to administration, and second relating to proposed legislation. In this country the people and the representatives of the people are occupied with practical questions—questions intimately connected with the development of the country, with the building up of provinces, with the pacific work of civilization. In older countries, like the Mother Country, great interest may be excited over the mere discussion as to whether there should be an extra penny imposed on a quart of malt, but here our questions for discussion are broader, and I would fain believe, are more important, because I think it is more important to have a part in the moulding of a new and great nation than in discussing what are in many respects the petty affairs of older nations. I do not mean to disparage the important concerns of the Mother Country, but I do say that many of the warmest debates in her Parliament are upon subjects which, in this country, would appear of comparatively trifling moment. Among the subjects of administration upon which the country may fairly be congratulated are, first, the success which Canada had at the International Fisheries Exhibition, in London. It certainly should be a subject of congratulation for the Canadian people that by the indefatigable exertions of the Government, and more especially of the Minister who had charge of the Canadian exhibits, Canada obtained the second highest number of medals in that important competition—the United States obtaining first place—our country thereby acquiring an advertisement before the world of her great wealth and the great extent of her fisheries. The work of the consolidation of the Statutes affecting Canada has steadily progressed. This is a work which will greatly facilitate the labours of those who have occasion to refer to these Statutes, and I am sure that the assurance that it will be completed by the next Session of Parliament is one which will be received with feelings of gratification by all who take an interest in this subject. During the year, provisional arrangements have been made by the Government with the Governments of Nova Scotia and British Columbia, respectively; the first relating to the retention of the Pictou Branch of the Intercolonial Railway and the acquisition of the Eastern Extension Railway to the Strait of Canso. It is believed that this section of the road may be more efficiently managed in connection with the Intercolonial Railway, and that by this arrangement, which is favourable not only to the Province of Nova Scotia, but also to the Dominion, a more efficient train service will be secured to the people of Nova Scotia, and cheaper rates both for fares and freights. Of the arrangements with the Province of British Columbia, I have little personal knowledge; but we are well aware that for some time differences have existed between that Province and the Dominion of Canada. These it would appear, are now happily adjusted, and a measure will be submitted to Parliament by which they will be finally terminated. It is to be borne in mind that that outlying Province has not yet fully reaped the benefits which were anticipated from Confederation. The full benefits of union with the older Provinces will only be realized when our great Interprovincial Railway is finally constructed. Then British Columbia will fully realize the advantages of its union with the older Provinces; and, in the meantime, to that distant Province we must give our sympathy and our generous support; and I trust that the anticipations which the people of British Columbia reasonably entertain may, by the action of the Canadian Parliament, be fully and speedily realized. It is also a matter for congratulation that the Intercolonial Railway, as evidenced by the returns for the last year, is no longer a burden on the public exchequer, but that there is a surplus of receipts over expenditures. Among the subjects which are a fair matter for congratulation, there is none more important than that of immigration. In 1878 the number of immigrants who came into Canada and settled was 30,000; in 1881, 47,000; in 1882, 112,000, and in 1883, 133,000, showing a steady and unprecedented influx of people to settle in this country. With regard to the immigrants who arrived last year, 34,000 were from the United States, and 11,000 of those were returned Canadians. A very important trade, connected with cattle and sheep, has been developed in the last five years. The statistics of 1878 show no returns of the importation of pure bred cattle into this country; the year before last the importation of thorough-bred cattle amounted to 12,000, and last year to 21,000. This fact is one which will contribute to the improvement of our stock, and the increase of our agricultural resources, while it will also tend to stimulate the important trade which has sprung up in connection with cattle and sheep. Within the last five years this cattle trade has assumed almost enormous dimensions. In 1878 there were exported from Canada 19,000 cattle and 46,000 sheep, almost entirely of American product. During 1883 there were exported from Canada 56,000 cattle and 114,000 sheep, entirely of Canadian product. This industry will contribute greatly to the increase of the agricultural wealth of the country, and will afford the farmers and all who take an interest in the progress of agriculture, a new field for investment and increased opportunities for enterprise. I may say in this connection, that the Canadian cattle trade with England enjoys advantages over the trade of any other country. The United States are put upon what is called the scheduled list, and cattle exported from the United States to Great Britain must be slaughtered at the port of entry immediately after landing. But by a wise provision of the present Government, arrangements have been entered into by which Canadian cattle are not placed on the schedule list; they need not be slaughtered at the port of entry, but may be driven or carried to any of the British markets and treated in the same way as British cattle. This is a great advantage to the exporter of Canadian cattle, an advantage which, in money, is equivalent to one or two pence per pound of beef. During last year an incident occurred which demonstrated the patriotism and ability of the Minister of Railways, I am sure, not merely to the great satisfaction of his own political party, but to all people who prize the progress of this country, and who are interested in the prompt and efficient discharge of public duty. On one occasion three ship loads of cattle were condemned by the veterinary surgeons at home, but the Canadian High Commissioner seeing that the Canadian trade might be injured by these cattle being condemned, and Canada put on the scheduled list, repaired immediately to the scene of action, with an order for the re-examination of these three cargoes. The skill which that hon. gentleman possessed in his knowledge of the physique of that other great animal, man, enabled him to have a supervising eye over the acts of the veterinary surgeons and by his prompt and vigorous action, by devoting his personal attention to the matter, he succeeded in getting a re-examination, which resulted in showing that these cattle had been improperly condemned, and procured the removal of an order which would not only have damaged the cattle trade but the shipping trade as well, and impaired the success of this great Canadian industry. I think the thanks of the Canadian people, irrespective of politics, are due to the hon. Minister of Railways for the promptness and the efficiency with which he performed this duty. I do not desire to trouble the House with much detail, but I may say that the receipts for the year have been in excess of the estimates, and the expenditure has been less than the estimates. The result is, that on the transactions of the year there is a surplus of $7,060,000; and this is apart from the sum of about $1,000,000 realized from the sale of lands in the North-West. These two make a total surplus of upwards of $8,000,000, the largest sums united since Confederation. Now, Sir, a large portion of this surplus has been derived from importations—and with reference to that, I may say that there has perhaps been over-importation. Perhaps it would have been better for the prosperity of the country if our importations had not been so large; but that is a matter which will, in time, correct itself. However, a large surplus is not at all a bad thing to struggle with; and when we take into account the various circumstances to which I have referred—the large amount in our Treasury and the prosperous state of our finances—we may fairly congratulate the country on the substantial degree of prosperity it enjoys, notwithstanding the fact that the last harvest has not been so productive as its predecessors, and notwithstanding the over-trading which prevailed to some extent during the past year. Now, Mr. Speaker, referring to the legislation which is proposed, I would say that our experience in the North-West has demonstrated that changes can be made in the laws relating to that country with advantage, and a Bill is proposed to give effect to those changes. The growth of manufacturing establishments in the country will necessitate the introduction of legislation with the view of making better provision for the well-being of artisans and their families, not only in their own interest, but in the interest of the community generally. I am sure that the measure which it is proposed to introduce, in order to assimilate the laws relating to Dominion elections, will be favourably received. A measure of that nature was introduced last year, and was left over until the present Session for fuller consideration. It is an anomaly that the standard of qualification for voting at Dominion elections should be the diverging standards prevailing in the different Provinces. An effort should be made at the earliest day to render as nearly uniform as possible, the standard of qualification for voting at Dominion elections in the several Provinces of the Dominion. Then, Sir, it is proposed to legislate with regard to the Indians who are our heritage, and whom, by good faith, by fair dealing, and by keeping our treaty obligations, we have succeeded in retaining as our friends and allies, instead of making our vigorous enemies, as has been the case in the United States. The disappearance of the buffalo in the North-West, owing to his rapid slaughter, has induced the Indian to give up, to a great extent, his nomadic habits, and to betake himself to the more ordinary avocations of life. The Indians have, to a large extent, settled themselves on their reserves, and provision should be made for them in their new mode of life. Then, with regard to the Indians who are most advanced in civilization, and who have lived for a long time in close proximity to the whites, it is proposed to concede to them some measure of self-government, somewhat similar to the municipal system that prevails among the whites. I am sure that an enlightened Canadian Parliament will welcome a species of Home Rule for the aborigines of this country. There is no question, Sir, in which the people of this country have greater interest at this time, or indeed, have had a greater interest for a considerable time, than the construction of the Pacific Railway. That work is a national work; it is a Canadian work in which the whole people of this country are deeply interested. The construction of the road, as we are all aware, has been relegated by the Government and by Parliament to a company. That company has, with an energy unprecedented in this country, set itself diligently to work to fulfil the great contract it has undertaken, and I think there is united testimony from both sides of this House, and from all sections of the country, that the company entrusted with the construction of that great work has been honourable in its dealings and has faithfully and energetically endeavoured to carry out its agreement. The progress made with the road has been unprecedented. Of the total length from Pembroke to Port Moody, 2,833 miles, 1,738 miles have been constructed, leaving 1,095 miles yet to be constructed; and it must be a gratifying circumstance that the portion of the road constructed and put into operation has proved not only a commercial success to the contractors, but also of very great advantage to the country. I will not weary the House with lengthy details or many figures, but I may state that, in addition to the portions of the road constructed in the older Provinces, in addition to the portions taken over from the Government, in addition to the sections separated by a gap to the north of Lake Superior, the road to-day extends west of Winnipeg to the summits of the Rocky Mountains, in full operation a distance of nearly 1,000 miles. At the present time, what is literally a small army of workmen, numbering 9,000, with all the appliances for the construction of the railway, in the shape of machinery and horses, are engaged in the work of lessening the gap that separates the two portions of the road north of Lake Superior. Now, it will be perfectly obvious, not only to hon. members in this House but to the whole country, that the prompt construction of that road is of the first importance to the Canadian people. We know that the Northern Pacific road has been just completed. That road will become a vigorous competitor for the trans-continental trade. And there is another road, the Union Pacific, in active operation. The rapid development of the North-West and the settlement of the country, the expansion of our trade, and a variety of other circumstances, will make it necessary that the Canadian Pacific road should be completed, both in the interest of the country and the company, at a period long antecedent to the date originally fixed, 1891. It was the recent expectation that the road would be completed in 1886, and I am sure that if that expectation should be realized, it would result in the greatest advantage to this country. Let us not overlook the advantage which that road, when completed, will confer upon this country. When we recollect that the two American Pacific roads are not through lines, that they are only partially through lines, that they have to connect with other lines in order to reach the seaboard, and that ours will be the only trans-continental road extending from sea to sea under one management, and that it will be hundreds of miles shorter than either of the other Pacific roads with any connections they can possibly make, I think it will be perfectly self-evident to every hon. member of this House and to the country, that great advantages will accrue to this country and to the Canadian Pacific road when it is completed. That road will possess other incidental advantages which are not to be ignored. In the first place, it will pass through a larger area of cultivable land than either of the American Pacific roads. The agricultural lands on the western portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway extend from longitude 96 to longitude 114, equal to 18 degrees; on the Northern Pacific Railway from longitude 94 to 105 degrees, equal to 11 degrees; on the Union Pacific Railway, from longitude 96 to 105, equal to 9 degrees—showing the vastly greater extent of cultivable land that will be placed under tribute in close proximity to the Canadian Pacific Railway when it will be completed, than is traversed by the other roads. Furthermore, the mountain section of the Canadian Pacific Railway is vastly shorter than that of either of the American Pacific roads. For instance the Canadian Pacific Railway is embraced within a mountain section of 600 miles; the Northern Pacific Railway, within a mountain section of 900 miles; and the Union Pacific Railway, within a mountain section of 1,225 miles. From these facts, it is perfectly evident that our road will have a decided advantage in the competition for the trans-continental freight and passenger traffic, and that the sooner it can be put into operation the sooner will these advantages which I have foreshadowed result in great benefit, not merely to the company but also to the country. It was not to be expected that a road destined to become so formidable a rival to its competitors would be permitted to be built without vigorous opposition. Combinations have consequently been formed against the Canadian Pacific Railway by these interested roads. In self protection, its American rivals endeavoured to obstruct its progress, and the result of their combinations and machinations has been to prevent the Canadian Pacific Railway from disposing of its stock at a fair market value—at such value as they had fair reason to expect to so realize in order to apply the proceeds to the completion of their great work. Unfortunately a great depreciation took place in the value of American Railway securities, not merely in the New York market, but also in the other great money markets of the world—in Amsterdam, Paris and London—and this depreciation occurred at the very time when the Canadian Pacific Railway needed the proceeds which they expected to obtain from the sale of their stock. To meet this difficulty, the company approached the Canadian Government and deposited with it a sum of money and securities sufficient to provide for the payment of three per cent. of the five per cent. promised by the railway company on a capital stock of $65,000,000. It was supposed that this provision for a limited amount of the interest promised by the Canadian Pacific Railway would have the effect, not merely of steadying the stock in the American, English and French markets, but also of giving increased value to the stock, and that thereby money would be realized from the sale applicable to the prosecution of the work. Through a combination of circumstances this result has not been achieved, and the company has not been able to realize from the sale of their stock the amount they might fairly have contemplated. Under these circumstances, it is evident that it will be the duty of Parliament to apply its best wisdom and give its most patriotic consideration to any measure that in the interest of the country the Government may find it necessary to submit with the view of preventing any delay in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway that may result from the causes I have indicated. Parliament will, no doubt, give its best wisdom and consideration to this subject. That the Canadian Pacific Railway should be built well built, and wisely built and built it must be. The Roman Senate once said, and the voice of the Roman people re-echoed the fiat of the Senate, delenda est Carthago, "Carthage must be destroyed"—and Carthage was destroyed. I see the leader of the Opposition smiling at the Latin, and I hope it will give him the proper inspiration under the circumstances to which I am alluding. The Canadian people have announced to the world that the Canadian Pacific Railway must be constructed and that no unreasonable delay should be allowed to hinder the completion of this great national work, which will tend to stimulate trade, encourage settlement, promote the development of the North-West, unite the several Provinces of the Dominion more closely together, and advance the prosperity of the whole country. I do not know that it would be wise for me to enter into any particulars. As Cicero once remarked in his address on the Manilian law, I am embarrassed with the variety of argument that might be presented on this subject. I think it is sufficient to state the proposition substantially, in order to commend it not only to this House but also to the Canadian people. I wish to thank you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. gentlemen on both sides, for the kind indulgence extended to me while I have made these remarks. I suppose I would not be acting according to tradition if I did not apologize for the imperfection of my utterances, and I have neither reason nor desire to depart from tradition in this respect. I know that none more readily than hon. members who belong to my own profession will extend their sympathy to one who speaks without instructions on his brief, or the inspiration of a fee. I thank hon. gentlemen for the kind courtesy they have extended to me and I wish to thank the Prime Minister, and through him, the Government, for the compliment implied in asking me to move the Address in reply—a compliment I highly appreciate and which, on behalf of the constituency I have the honour to represent, I accepted. I have much pleasure in moving the following Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne:—

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, to thank His Excellency for his gracious Speech at the opening of the present Session, and further to assure His Excellency:—

That we receive with great pleasure His Excellency's kind assurance that in having recourse for the first time to our advice and assistance, in fulfilment of the important trust committed to him by Her Majesty, it is a source of the deepest personal satisfaction to him that he should have been called by Her Majesty to an office in which, as Her Representative, he is enabled to take a part in the public affairs of the Dominion, and to associate himself with us in the performance of the honourable duties which we are about to approach.

That we rejoice to know that although the last harvest has been less productive than its predecessors, and although there are indications that the rapid expansion of our commerce has to some extent been followed by over-trading, His Excellency feels that the general condition of the Dominion is such as to justify him in congratulating us upon its prosperity.

That the marked success attained by Canada at the International Fishery Exhibition in London is very gratifying to us, and has, we doubt not, been of great service in showing to the world the wealth of our fisheries and the extent of our marine industries and resources.

That we are glad to learn that the Commissioners appointed by His Excellency's predecessor for the purposes of consolidating the Statutes affecting the Dominion, have pursued their task with diligence; that His Excellency is enabled to lay before us for examination about sixty chapters of the proposed consolidation, and that the remainder of the work will be prepared and the whole of it revised during the present year, so that the final report will be ready at our next Session for our approval.

That it affords us much satisfaction to be informed that the number of immigrants to Canada during the past season has been greater than in any previous year; that we agree with His Excellency that this is a proof that the better Canada is known the more it is valued by those seeking a home in the new world; and that we trust the result of the arrangements which he informs us are in progress to diminish the cost of inland transport, will be a steady increase of valuable settlers in the future.

That we thank His Excellency for informing us that, during the recess, negotiations were resumed with British Columbia in regard to several matters upon which differences had for some time existed between the two Governments; that one of His Excellency's Ministers visited that Province last summer on a special mission, with a view to the adjustment of all questions in controversy, and that his efforts have happily been successful; that we trust that we shall be able to sanction the arrangements then made, and that by our so doing, all occasions of dispute will have been removed, and the most cordial relations established between the Dominion and Provincial Governments; and that any papers laid before us and any measures for enabling His Excellency to give effect to the agreement, will receive our earnest consideration.

Mr. MACMASTER.

That we feel that the rapid increase of population in the North-West may render some amendments in the North-West Territories Act expedient, and that our attention shall be willingly given to this important matter.

That we learn with pleasure that the progress of the Indians in Manitoba and the North-West during last year has been on the whole satisfactory, and that the Bands included in the several Indian Treaties have for the most part betaken themselves to their reserves; and that any Bill for the further promotion of their interests which may be submitted to us, as well as any measure applicable to the whole Dominion for the purpose of encouraging the more advanced Indian communities to assume the responsibilities of self-government, will be willingly considered.

That the Bill laid before us last Session for the representation of the people in Parliament and the assimilation of the electoral franchises existing in the several Provinces, which has now been before the country for a year, will, when re-introduced, receive the attention to which His Excellency commends it.

That we are fully aware of the expediency of providing for the regulation of factory labour and the protection of the workman and his family, and that we are glad to know that the measure submitted last Session, with some amendments, will be laid before us.

That we learn with great interest, that the rapid progress of the Canadian Pacific Railway has been maintained throughout the past year, that of the 2,833 miles of the main line between Pembroke and Port Moody, 1,738 miles are now constructed, rendering practicable the completion of that great work within the next two years, and that although the time within which the Railway Company is bound to finish the road will not expire until 1891, His Excellency's Government has thought it of the greatest importance for the settlement of the North-West and the development of our trade, that its completion from sea to sea should be hastened and the company enabled to open the line throughout by the spring of 1886.

That we thank His Excellency for informing us, that with this view, and in order to aid the Company in procuring sufficient capital for the purpose, by the disposal of its unsold shares, the Government agreed to receive a deposit of money and securities sufficient to pay a minimum three per cent. dividend for ten years on $65,000,000 of the stock, that arrangement being made on the belief that it would give steadiness and increased value to the shares on the market, although a combination of unfavourable circumstances has prevented the fulfilment of these expectations, and the Company has not been able to obtain the required capital by a sale of its stock; and that we feel that the best means of preventing any delay in the great object of the early completion of the railway, demands our earnest consideration.

That we share the pleasure expressed by His Excellency in being able to state, that the operation of that portion of the railway already opened, affords the most gratifying evidence of its soundness as a commercial enterprise and of its great value to Canada.

That we think, with His Excellency, that the large increase of the volume of traffic on the Intercolonial railway over that of any previous year, without involving any burden upon the country, is a satisfactory proof of the continued development of trade between the eastern and western portions of the Dominion.

That we shall willingly consider the provisional arrangement made with the Government of Nova Scotia for the retention of the Pictou Branch and the acquisition of the Eastern Extension Railway to the Strait of Canso, which, His Excellency is pleased to say, will be submitted for our approval.

That we thank His Excellency, for informing us that the accounts for the past year will be laid before us. That we shall be glad to find that the expenditure has been considerably less and the receipts larger than the estimates, the surplus exceeding that of any previous year, and that the revenues of the first half of the current year, notwithstanding the large importations of last season, have been such that we may reasonably expect that the Estimates for the year will be fairly maintained.

That we shall respectfully consider the estimates for the ensuing year to be submitted to us, and which will, we trust, be found to have been prepared with due regard to economy.

That His Excellency may rest assured that we will devote ourselves with earnestness and assiduity to the consideration of the subjects he mentioned, and to all matters affecting the public interest that may be brought before us.

Mr. BELLEAU (Translation). Mr. Speaker, the task which devolves upon me of proposing for the consideration of the House the adoption of the Address, it seems to me is one which should have been, and which always ought to be, entrusted to some hon. member of this House, whose experience in past legislation would afford him every necessary qualification to treat in a proper manner, the subject matter now under consideration. It seems to me that in a new country like ours, where we have so recently laid the foundations of a new political organization, that it should belong to one of our veteran politicians, to one of those who have traced the great lines of our Constitution, to come before you and explain how the legislation, now asked of this Parliament, is connected with past legislation; to explain to you its real meaning, and make you understand its character. It seems to me that this task should not have devolved on a young member, who, like myself, appears for the first time within these precincts. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, I well understand that it is not for me at the début of my political career, on my entry within these precincts, to criticise an old custom which has always been adopted, and which must have some good reason for its existence. This is the reason why I accepted the difficult task which has been assigned to me. Convinced as I am that, if I cannot instruct you by my experience, I will have at least the advantage of edifying you by the good disposition which I have manifested in accepting my share of the duties which are imposed on me as one of the members of the national representation. The document which is submitted for our consideration, Mr. Speaker, embraces matters which may be classed in three categories of different subjects; first of all, it contains a retrospective review of past legislation, and makes known its result on the general condition of the country. Secondly, it details the subjects which are to be submitted for our consideration and which may be divided into two classes: firstly, subjects which refer principally to the material prosperity of the country, and secondly, subjects which refer to the moral and intellectual condition of the population. The first sentiment which I see expressed in His Excellency's Speech, is also one which this House should make it a duty to express in the name of the country, that is the satisfaction which we experience with the selection of the new Governor General called to preside over the destinies of the country for some years to come. In appointing His Excellency the Marquis of Lansdowne to this important trust, the Home Government has given us another proof of the interest which it takes in the material development of the country. The choice of the most distinguished men, who have attained eminent positions in the Mother Country, gives us an estimate of the interest which the Imperial Government takes in us, and of its desire to see the material progress of this country keep pace with that of the United Kingdom. Before passing from this subject I believe it is my duty, and in so doing, I but echo the voice of this Chamber and of the country, to thank the late Governor General, the Marquis of Lorne, for the special interest which he manifests in our behalf, in England, today. During his beneficent administration of the affairs of the country, the Marquis of Lorne took the means to identify himself with our interests, to familiarize himself with our resources and wants; and now that he has returned to the Mother Country, I see that he seems to consecrate all his efforts, and all his energy to make known, on the Continent, the progress of our country, and to induce the surplus European population to come and settle amongst us. I thank him in the name of this House and in the name of the country. The time is well chosen to commence this propaganda. There has just been held in London a Universal Fishery Exhibition, in which our country had a most favourable and special opportunity of making known its resources. This exhibition, which was opened in the middle of last July, lasted five months. Twenty-five nations took part in it. It was opened by the Prince of Wales in person, an evidence of the interest which the English Government takes, not only in the development of her colonies, but also in the development of the interests of the entire world. Nearly 40,000 persons were present at the opening, and nearly 4,000,000 visited it during its continuance. Mr. Speaker, in so important an exhibition, in the midst of so many competitors, it is a great pleasure and a great honour to know that Canada came out of this exhibition third in rank. The gold and silver medals which we won were not, it is true, as numerous as those obtained by the United States; but this is explained by the fact that the Americans figured at the exhibition both as a nation and as individuals. For this reason the number of medals was greater in favour of the United States; but I believe there is an accord of public opinion that the Canadian exhibition, in its entirety, as in its details, was superior to that of our neighbours across the line. If we reflect, Mr. Speaker, that we have a capital of more than $3,000,000 invested in this industry, that we have a population of about 30,000 persons engaged in our fisheries, and nearly 800 ships and 11,000 fishing smacks; if we reflect that this industry yields to the country a revenue of $6,000,000 to $8,000,000, we will understand its importance and the great necessity to contribute to its development. And I venture to think that the result of our efforts will be to make known to the world the value of our fisheries, and, at the same time, ameliorate the moral, intellectual and material condition of our fishermen. I think, Mr. Speaker, that it is my duty ere passing from this subject, to bestow my congratulations, my compliments on the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, for the success which has attended his efforts at the exhibition. It is a worthy reward for the zeal and energy which he has displayed; and I think it is only just to associate with his name that of the hon. member from Gaspé, who is sometimes called the King of Gaspesia, a title which he justly deserves by reason of the devotion which he manifests in the interests of that section, and by the legitimate influence which he has there acquired. I observed a few moments ago that the times are favourable to push the work of emigration. In referring to statistics, and according to the information which I have been able to gather, I calculate, as the hon. member from Glengarry (Mr. Macmaster) has remarked, that the number of emigrants this year has been three times as great as it was two years ago, and this emigration has two special characteristics: firstly it embraces a considerable contingent coming from the continent of Europe, which is one of the best proofs of the interest taken in our country; and this will the more induce us to hope that this emigration directed to our continent, stimulated by the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, by the resources which will be found in our country, will go on increasing, and will eventually fill up the vast plains which we reserve for European emigration. Another characteristic of this emigration, is that of those 133,000 emigrants, nearly 40,000 came from the United States; and among these 40,000 there were 12,000 French Canadians who returned to the North-West, which means to our country. It is well understood Mr. Speaker, that not only in this House, but also in the Legislature of the Province of Quebec, a desire has been expressed that the Government should make some effort to repatriate our fellow subjects. I think that one of the most efficacious means which the Government could employ to attain this end, is to demonstrate to them that they have a better future in this country than in the United States; that here they can find the means to maintain themselves and their families, and that, at all events, if they cannot find these means in the Province of Quebec, that they can, at least, in the North-West. There, at least, they will have the consolation of being at home and of living under their own laws, and under the constitution of their native country. All this, Mr. Speaker, points to a very satisfactory state of things, and we are not surprised to see the Speech from the Throne announce that the financial state of the country is in a most prosperous state, and that the surplus for the past year amounts to over $7,000,000. The Speech from the Throne alludes in a few words to the question of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and at this time I should desire to have, for this great question, the experience which the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals possesses. I should like at this moment to speak with his experience and attainments, but I believe that hon. gentlemen in this House who have sat here before me, have already been made familiar with the resources of this great enterprise as well as the means to accomplish this undertaking, and I will not afford them any new information in telling them that in the year just ended the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has made wonderful progress. In reality it has constructed not less than 693 miles of railway, of which 553 miles are on the main line and 140 miles of branch lines. On the Western Division they have laid rails on 377 miles, bringing the line to the summit of the Rocky Mountains, a distance of 960 miles from Winnipeg. The company now proposes, at the commencement of the coming summer, to construct and put in operation a line of steamboats from Lake Huron to Thunder Bay, on Lake Superior. This will enable them to distribute the tide of emigration for a distance of nearly 1,400 miles from Port Arthur. These results could not be more satisfactory for the country; and if the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has not succeeded as well as it expected in floating its bonds in foreign markets, the energy which it has displayed, the devotion which it has manifested in the execution of this enterprise which has been entrusted to it by the country deserves from this House, that its efforts should be aided and seconded, and as my learned colleague from Glengarry (Mr. Macmaster), remarked that we make it apparent that we can assure the success of our national enterprises even against the hostile forces arraigned against them. We are also happy to learn, Mr. Speaker, that the Intercolonial Railway has been a source of revenue this year to the country. Constructed at first in a military and political point of view, the Intercolonial Railway becomes to-day a success as a commercial enterprise, and this is a subject for congratulation. Nevertheless I might remark, and I believe the Government will perfectly understand its duty in the matter, that this road, whilst a commercial success, must not cease to be a public enterprise, an enterprise for the benefit of the provinces which it traverses as for the whole Confederation. We must not forget that each Province has contributed alike to its construction, that each contributes to its maintenance, and that each Province ought to have the benefit of its natural advantages in the arrangement of its tariff. I will not further extend my remarks on what refers to the legislation relative to the material interests of the country, and I will briefly review the other subjects which are submitted for our consideration. The Speech from the Throne informs us that the Government has the intention of submitting to this House a measure, which has, for its object, the assimilation of the electoral laws in all the Provinces. It always seemed to me that it was an anomaly to leave the electoral franchise of the Dominion in the hands of the Local Legislatures, and if, so far, this state of affairs has not produced serious inconveniences, I think, nevertheless, that a measure of this kind is most opportune; if up to to-day this state of things has not caused serious embarrassments, one thing is certain, it is that our electoral franchise is in the hands of Provincial Legislatures which can change or modify them entirely, and determine that we the members of Federal representation in going forth from these precincts may find ourselves face to face with an election law altogether different from the one under which we were elected. I think it is the duty of this Legislature to take up the question of our electoral franchise, and all that I can say is that for my part whilst the legislation seems to me timely, I have only to express a hope that the Government in conceding to popular liberty, will at the same time bear in mind and make due allowance for the conservative character of our population. The development of manufactures in this country necessitates legislation for the protection of persons therein employed, we ought to profit by the experience of other countries; that experience teaches us that the development of manufactures in a great number of States, especially in the great manufacturing centres, has had the effect of injuring the moral and intellectual progress of the people; this Legislature will act wisely in taking, at the earliest possible moment, the means to protect women and children, who are generally the persons employed in the factories. The consolidation of the Statutes is an important service which the Legislature is rendering to the country, and we learn with a great deal of pleasure that this work is so far advanced, the report which will be submitted to the House will be received with a great deal of pleasure and we hope that it will be soon accomplished. Mr. Speaker, we also learn with a great deal of pleasure that certain administrative difficulties which might have arisen between the Central Government and one of the Provinces are on the way to an advantageous settlement. There is one feature of English statesmen which I have always admired: it is to find a solution for all difficulties, and settlement of all political differences by the means of diplomacy. There is an old adage "that for every evil there is a remedy." I think that this adage applies to politics as well as to other things; and I see with pleasure that our Canadian statesmen follow the noble example of English diplomatists. It is of the first importance that our rulers adopt, from the start, this manner of overcoming difficulties which may arise between the Provinces or between the Central and Provincial Governments. These, Mr. Speaker, in a few words, are the important subjects which are submitted for our consideration, and to which His Excellency the Governor General invites our attention. The appeal which is made is addressed to all hon. members of this House, no matter to what party they belong. We come from different parts of this great Confederation. We represent different interests, counties in Provinces whose resources and whose wants are different; but there is a common ground on which we can all meet. This ground is the general interest of this Confederation. We, Mr. Speaker, the members of the Province of Quebec, occupy a special position, a somewhat unique position, in this House and in the country. We are the minority; we have interests different from yours; we have our own language; we profess a different religion from you; our institutions, our usages, our customs, differ from yours; but I think you will bear us testimony that so far we have resolutely, loyally and generously embraced the idea which predominates in the organization of the new political constitution under which we live. Indeed, from our youth, from our infancy, we have learned from our public men to imbibe this idea; we have learned to defend and protect our own rights; but we have also learned to respect those of others. I need not mention any names, but there is one man whose memory is still fresh in this House; it is that of Sir George Etienne Cartier. That man would not for the whole world have abandoned one iota of the inheritance which his predecessors left him; but, Mr. Speaker, you can, at the same time, pay this testimony to him, that never, no never, was he backward when it was a question of defending, of protecting, of respecting the rights of those who were not his fellow-citizens. This House and the country has just rendered him a worthy tribute in decreeing that a statue shall be erected to him in front of these precincts. Well, Mr. Speaker, we, the members from Quebec, we have no other ambition than to follow this model—to follow the example set us by this man—example which is so well followed by those who represent him at the head of the political institutions of the country. We embrace these ideas, and we are here, within these precincts, with the sincere desire of loyally co-operating, of faithfully working for the material, moral and intellectual development of this beautiful country. Mr. Speaker, I thank you for the indulgence which you have extended to me. I thank, also, this honorable House for the attention they have bestowed on me, notwithstanding the fact that I speak a language which is not understood by a great number of the members of this House. Before taking my seat I humbly ask permission to second the motion now placed before the House by the hon. member from Glengarry (Mr. Macmaster).

Mr. BLAKE. Mr. Speaker, although the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Macmaster) closed his address to the House by declining to tender the traditional apology, I will not so far follow his example as to decline to tender the traditional compliment, and I will assure you, that so far as I could judge, he has not merely, on this occasion, been provided with that which he seemed to think essential to a gentleman of his profession—a brief—but he stuck to it with very commendable accuracy of thought and attention, and he paid, it seems to me, a poor compliment to those who entrusted him with the honor of moving the Address when he declared himself to be in want of that essential preliminary to an advocate's speech. My hon. friend, if he will allow me to call him so, who seconded the motion, opened his observations by complaining of the task imposed upon him as a young member, and he said that he thought from his point of view, as I understood him, it ought to be some of the older hon. members, who were more accustomed to these matters, who had had more to do with them, who were more responsible for them, who should be called upon to explain, in a fuller and more authoritative manner than he could hope to do, the topics which were under discussion. But the hon. gentleman, after having made that apology, which the hon. gentleman from Glengarry disdained to make, proceeded to discuss those matters in a manner which indicated, I think, that he was also fully equal to the task imposed upon him. There was, it is true, on one occasion at any rate, some slight discrepancy in the statements of the hon. gentlemen, but, generally speaking, Mr. Speaker, I may say that both of them adhered tolerably well to the text of the document which they were asked to give their assent to, and to which they were inviting the assent of this Chamber. That document is long, but, though long, it is, perhaps, quite as remarkable for what it omits as for what it contains. I entirely agree with the paragraph, and with the expressions upon that paragraph, which have reference to the nobleman who has been lately appointed to preside over us. It is a fortunate circumstance that for many years we should have had a succession of distinguished gentlemen as Viceroys of Canada, and it is a fortunate circumstance also, I think, that they are men who, having already approved themselves to be fit for that position, by the place they have taken in public affairs of the Mother Country, were yet men in the prime and vigor of life, fully equal to an energetic and active discharge of those functions which devolve even upon a constitutional Governor here, and of whom we may fairly expect that they come here to improve and increase their credit and reputation; to approve themselves capable of still higher positions in that public service to which they have devoted themselves; and, therefore, there is every inducement to their discharging, as those in the past have discharged, to the full their duty to the country. We do not expect, as I once before observed here, from those who come to rule over us, indiscriminate praise and eulogy, but we are entitled to expect, and I am glad to say we do receive, marks of an abiding attachment on the part of those who have remained among us for five or six years, towards this country, and a public exhibition of that abiding attachment and interest in the country, which certainly must be, as the hon. gentlemen have observed, of great advantage to us in the country to which we look for so much, in reference to our development, and our relations with which are so important. I feel, Mr. Speaker, very glad indeed to learn that some arrangements have been made, which the Government think they may with confidence submit to Parliament, for closing all questions at issue between the Province of British Columbia and the Dominion of Canada. It would be entirely premature to discuss, in any detail, the particular arrangements with respect to which the papers are not before us, but which, we are informed, we shall certainly receive full information about within a very short time. I was a little amused to observe, however, the principles upon which this settlement, in its main feature, was based, as publicly announced by the envoy of the Administration in the Province of British Columbia. I should have supposed that the settlement was based upon a fair and liberal consideration of what the claims were of British Columbia upon Canada, but I find that it was not so—that it was upon other considerations—upon the considerations of the claims of the city of Victoria upon the First Minister. I quote from the report of the speech of the Minister of Justice at Victoria, in which he announced that result:

“With reference to the Settlement Bill, as it is called by the Local Administration, Sir Alexander Campbell assured the deputation, reiterating the language of his colleague, Sir John Macdonald, that the Government of the Dominion has every intention to see that the line between Esquimalt and Nanaimo is constructed. This, Sir John A. considers a debt which he owes to Victoria, for the confidence placed in him by the electors, when they returned him as their representative.”

Mr. Speaker, an honest man pays his debts, but he pays them with his own money. But the hon. gentleman proposes to pay his debts, incurred in the constituencies which honor him with their confidence, at our expense, and this is formally announced in the course of the discussion which results in the settlement which is to be brought before us. I was a little amused, also, to observe that the arrangement involves a surrender to the Americans. I find that a large company is incorporated for the construction of the Island Railway, and that it is composed of sundry magnates who are very well known to fame, and who are interested, the hon. member for Glengarry may be surprised to hear, in the hostile railway—the Union Pacific Railway. I find the name of C. B. Huntington; I find the name of Mr. Gregory; I find the name of Mr. Stanford. I find names familiar to most of us, as magnates of the Pacific coast—kings of that country virtually by reason of their connection with the Pacific Railway—with whom hon. gentlemen opposite are contracting, and to whom they propose to surrender the coal lands and various privileges connected with the construction of the railway. They are useful persons to deal with, I have no doubt, as the publication of the recent correspondence in connection with the Pacific Railway proves, and I hope the hon. gentleman was extremely careful to caution his colleague when he dealt with these gentlemen—whose letters are before me in part, and I would read them if I had no other matters of importance to discuss—to caution him that such things should not happen in Canada as happened in railway negotiations with the same parties in the neighboring country. Now, the Speech alludes to the North-West, and the only reference that is made to the general condition of that country is a reference to the rapid increase of population which has taken place, and which is said to necessitate some further amendment of some of the laws affecting the territory. But the hon. gentlemen who were supplied with the brief on this occasion had, I think, in this particular, some reason to complain, because upon former occasions the brief contained the figures for the immigration to the North-West. Upon former occasions we were told at an early day, by the authority of the Government conveyed to those hon. gentlemen, what the figures were for the year. We have not got them for this year. Total figures have been given us; figures have been given us with reference to immigration from the United States, but we are not told what the increase to the population of the North-West was. Is it uncharitable in me to conjecture that it is because the figures given last year have not been verified by results? Is it because there would be an unpleasant contrast between the figures of 75,000, exclusive of the suggested Irish immigration en masse, which we were told would enter the North-West last year, and the results? I think we might know, even to-day, whether those steps were taken which for two or three years have been pressed on the hon. gentleman, and which last year he promised me very faithfully he would see fulfilled, for the admeasurement of the actual settlement in that country. Up to this time my opinion is, as I have said before, that the principle of calculation upon which he has proceeded is one which is purely conjectural, and which does not actually measure what the settlement in the country was. Well, we have not, as I have said, the figures, and so, although the Speech has told us that there is a rapid increase of population; although the hon. gentlemen were instructed as to the figures in other parts, we were not told how rapid that increase has been which interests this legislation. Now, there is nothing more, as I have said, on the North-West, but much more ought to have been said, and here it is that I complain a little of the silence of those who have proposed to assent to this Speech, as well as of the absence of a statement in the Address itself. We know that there is more to be said about the North-West; we know that there is disappointment; we know that there is discontent; we know that there is agitation and difficulty there; we know that many things which a year ago we pointed out, which for several years we have been pointing out, would tend to create discontent in that country, are creating trouble and discontent, and that no word is said as to the task which is to devolve upon this Parliament of considering these great questions, and of taking care that so far as they may be remediable the causes of that discontent may be remedied. Hon. gentlemen may say, no; it is nothing, it is merely a tempest in a teapot; it is something that is not serious. But I observe the Prime Minister of that Province, a friend of hon. gentlemen opposite, only the other day, at one of the banquets that are given to Members of Parliament in Winnipeg, and of one of which I believe the hon. Member for Provencher (Mr. Royal) was the fortunate recipient, followed immediately afterwards by a banquet, participated in by the hon. member for Wellington—I observed so late as the 9th of January the Prime Minister of the Province is reported to have said:

"At present we are on the verge of a crisis from which we must emerge in a better or worse condition. Not, however, until the masses were made aware of the situation would they stand up and maintain their rights. The time had arrived when Manitoba must be placed on a level with the other Provinces of the Dominion."

He referred to the cry that Manitoba was petted and pampered, and said:

"Not one new arrival had been in the Province three months before he who before was loud in its denunciations was equally loud in demanding its rights. The eyes of the farmers had been opened, and they were alarmed at the prospect. These matters would shortly engross the attention, not only of the Provincial but of the Dominion Parliament."

That is the statement which the First Minister made at a recent period in reference to the condition of that country, but of it we have heard no word, either in the Speech delivered to us or in the observations of the hon. gentlemen who have indicated the general run of the discussion for this Session. Now, we know that the policy of the administration in that country—one particular part of their administrative policy—could not be effectively criticised during last Session for the reason that the papers which were demanded were not brought down. I refer to the papers connected with the closing of land in southern Manitoba. They were asked for, and the order was promised, but they have not yet reached the House, and by consequence, it was impossible to engage in a discussion upon that subject. It is impossible to say that that order has been reversed, and that at a very late period the policy which had dictated, most improperly and wrongly, the closing of southern Manitoba to settlement, has been changed. I have observed that the ordinary sources of information on the part of newspapers which support the Government have praised each of these transactions. When southern Manitoba and the mile belt were closed, it was a wise and statesmanlike thing. When it was attempted to sell, by public auction, these lands, that also was a wise, statesmanlike and a proper thing. But when the policy for closing was reversed, when the policy of selling was reversed, and when once again they were opened, that was the wisest and most patriotic, the most sensible thing of all. Well, I believe it was. But it seems to me hon. gentlemen are easily satisfied if, with all these various policies in the course of a short few months, they are equally pleased as each one is presented. Sir, the policy did not last a long time, but it lasted long enough to do a great deal of harm. There were numerous persons who had settled upon homesteads in southern Manitoba who had a right to expect that the keeping of that country open would be continuous; who had a right to expect that the neighbouring lands would be opened for homesteading; who did expect, and who went there on the faith of it; who communicated with friends to go on and join them, and who were disappointed in their expectations, as were many of those who did go and attempt to join them, by the closing of the reserves. Of that step no explanation has been given. I think an explanation is due to the country, because I believe it is to be one of the not unimportant causes of the difficulties in the North-West, and to have created a set-back which will last much longer than the policy itself has lasted. Well, then, there were other difficulties which were attracting the attention of the people of that country, and have attracted the attention of the constituted authorities of that portion of it which extends beyond the bounds of Manitoba. We complained of the policy of locking up lands by the lavish arrangements which were made as to the acreage to be granted to various colonization companies. We pointed out the hon. gentleman was repeatedly informed that the practical results of the arrangements was that the companies asserted in some shape or other, and effected in some shape or other—whether by law or without law was immaterial to the purpose—some sort of control or check over those lands which were said to continue open to homesteading, and the general settlement was interfered with to a much larger extent than hon. gentlemen indicate. It was not very long after this policy was adopted that it, too, was reversed by the Government itself. It is not many months ago since, I believe, an Order in Council was passed suspending a further grant of lands for colonization purposes, and we know that the very great bulk of the companies which were organized have utterly failed. But there, too, their policy and the consequent opening of these lands for settlement or sale has not prevented a mischief from being done, because at a time when the eyes and expectations of numerous people were upon that country, and when there was a strong desire to settle, difficulties were thrown in the way of settlers and the progress of the country was seriously checked. I have said that the constituted authorities of the North-West have protested against the companies which were in active operation, and I believe amongst the remonstrances which were forwarded to the Government, is one which is from the North-West Council, in reference to the operation of the policy and the operations of a particular company. Well, there were other causes of discontent, to which also we have referred. We pointed out that the settler in that country, although when he first came there he would treat as part of his capital expenditure, as part of his investment, the expenses of transport and the necessary incidentals to the first settlement, yet would he be found seriously inconvenienced, as a rule, by these necessary expenses; that in that country, having the great advantage of the settler being able to plough without clearing, there were other initial expenses—expenses connected with buildings, fences, &c., which were to be set, to some extent, against that advantage, and that the remoteness of the country, the expenses of transport, and these initial expenses, certainly demanded the greatest consideration on the part of the authorities who believed, as I think this House at large believes, as I think the country believes, that what is really for the interest of the country is that the North-West should, at the earliest moment, be settled with a thriving, industrious, prosperous, and contented agricultural population. We pointed out that there would be financial difficulty in the way of the settler; and yet, in the face of that difficulty, great as it was, with the financial burdens imposed on him, the Government took the step of increasing those tariff burdens at the last Session. Then there was the further difficulty in connection with the disallowance of the Provincial railway charters within the bounds of the old Province of Manitoba; a course which, as I have pointed out more than once is, in my view, a derogation of the rights of the Province as a member of the Confederation, is not called for by the contract of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and is opposed to the express declaration made on the subject when the contract was being passed through the House. And the result of this difficulty, of the check in looking elsewhere which the Government has interposed, has been that the people of that country have now their eyes turned towards the Hudson Bay, and they are anxious, even desirous, that their boundaries shall be extended and their large obligations increased by the Government and Parliament, on the faith and credit of the people of a new Province, already struggling under considerable difficulties necessarily incident to the settlement of a new country, in order that a railway may be built to that Bay, and they may thus obtain some means of escape from the greivances which they feel to be so serious in regard to railway communication. I will not enlarge on the consequences of the scheme if it be successful. I am sure that after what has been said in regard to the Pacific Railway contract and the means of outlet and inlet to that country, the hon. Minister of Railways will be found assisting to the utmost of his power the Hudson Bay Railway; and whatever the consequences may be to us in the east, it is impossible that we can refuse to those people any means of ingress or egress open to them in that direction. It is quite true with respect to this very question of the monopoly and consequent high rates, that some redress has lately been accorded. Within a few days a very important reduction has been made in the tariff on grain carried over the Canadian Pacific Railway. And I am glad to know it; it is a fortunate omen. It indicates that the company is accessible to the remonstrances of the people, when sufficiently loudly expressed; but it indicates also that those complaints which were made as to the tariff were sound complaints. It indicates that the Tariff was too high; or else why was the reduction made? It indicates, therefore, that the grievance which we said would arise has arisen, and at any moment may recur. On the whole, this subject, to which the hon. gentleman has thought fit not to give any attention in the Speech from the Throne, and which the hon. members who moved and seconded the Address in reply, thought unworthy of notice, seems to be a very serious one, one of the most serious which we have before us. It seems to me that history is repeating itself, and that the same Government, presided over by the same hon. First Minister, which a number of years ago, in the early history of our connection with the North-West, imperilled that connection by its course of administration, has done much to thwart the progress and check the feelings of cordiality and kindness which ought to exist between other people of that district and the people of the rest of the Dominion. With respect to the Canadian Pacific Railway, the hon. gentlemen who have spoken have indicated that the Speech contains matter in truth on which we ought to congratulate ourselves. We have heard much of the immense exertions which the company have made, of the great work which they have done, and we are told it is of the last consequence that the railway should be completed within two years from the present time. Mr. Speaker, I consider the statement made in the Speech to be one of a grave and alarming character. It informs us that during the recess of Parliament the Government took the responsibility of arranging for the guarantee of the interest at a certain rate upon $65,000,000 of the stock of the railway, on receiving cash and securities. That was a transaction which, as I understand it, was not authorized by the law. The Government, no doubt, has power to sell terminable annuities, but their power to sell them is contained in legislation, which enables them to do that for the purpose of obtaining cash to pay our debts; and I do not understand that they have power to issue terminable annuities in exchange for anything else but that; and, therefore, in so far as this was a transaction in which what the Government received was securities and not cash, I am not familiar with any clause of any Act of Parliament which justifies that step. But if it were justified, it was a very grave step to take. It involved a very large transaction, and we have not yet before us any indication whatever as to what the securities were; what the quid pro quo was, what the consideration was, in respect of which the Government undertook this particular obligation. The transaction is said to have been justified, accomplished as it was within a comparatively brief date of the meeting of Parliament, by the importance to the country of steadying and increasing the value of the stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. And I have no doubt, as has happened before with other Governments—and it is the ordinary recourse under such circumstances—had it succeeded, its justification would have been said to have been its success; but it has not got that poor justification for a step of this description; for, instead of having succeeded it is said to have failed. And, indeed, I am unable to perceive how, if it were true that for every dollar guaranteed a dollar of tangible and available securities was handed over by the company, which might otherwise have been used, the transaction, although it might enhance the price of existing stock for the purpose of buying and selling, could not be said to have the elements of permanent success. If, on the other hand, we are to give without getting, that is a different transaction. But no new plan is indicated. We are told the particular plan which the Government adopted has failed, and we are told that we are to expect something or other in substitution for it. The reason that is given for this is a single reason: It is said that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are about to anticipate the period at which it was to complete the work, and that in order to anticipate that period the company require, at an earlier date, I suppose, and perhaps to a larger extent, cash than it would otherwise require. We all recollect the boasts that have been indulged in for the past two years, as to this anticipation of the work. We recollect the glorifications in which hon. gentlemen opposite indulged as to the standing and financial strength and connections of the corporators of the Canadian Pacific Railway. We recollect the sense of relief which they expressed themselves to feel and in which they asked the House to participate, and the country to indulge, as to the burden lifted off our shoulders and placed on the shoulders of men who were able, willing, and ready to bear it; and then when they came to be, as hon. gentlemen said, "better than their word"—when it was alleged that the company were going to anticipate the termination of the contract—we were told that while this would be good for the country, it was done in the interest of the company, because it would be good also for them; because they believed it was a wise policy to anticipate the period fixed for the completion of the Railway. They said, we rejoice at it and call upon you all to rejoice and fall down and worship the great Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Government which has created it and which is overshadowed by the glory of its doings. For two years it has been dinned into our ears that this corporation was about to complete the road. Now it turns out that the Parliament of Canada is to be called on to enable them to do it; that it is to the Parliament and the people of Canada they are to look for further assistance of an indefinite character to enable them to execute their contract in the form and manner which they deem to be most advantageous for themselves. Now, I have, on former occasions, standing here, pointed out from time to time what the position of the Canadian Pacific Railway was from the statements of the Government themselves, and from the statements of the company themselves. I have pointed out what the cost of their road would be, according to their own calculations; what the value of their subsidies of various descriptions was, according to their own calculations; what the balance would be, according to their own calculations. And hon. gentlemen opposite have said, well, it is very important, it is extremely valuable—we hope these speeches will receive a wide circulation; they are extremely favourable to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I, however, have been obliged to point out, and I did so last Session on more than one occasion, that it was not the magnitude of their subsidies or the excellence of the position accorded to the company under the contract which would relieve the enterprise from risk if prudent management did not attend its execution, and amongst the points of difficulty was this very one of a too rapid prosecution of the work. Speed means cost, and you cannot press a work beyond a certain point, as was proved in former discussions on this very subject, and as shown very clearly by the report of the former Chief Engineer of the road, without the cost being very largely enhanced. We are told that the speed has not only been great but that it has been unprecedented in the history of railway building; and if speed means cost what does unprecedented speed mean? It is clear that the work has cost more than it would have cost had it been prosecuted more slowly. You cannot suddenly obtain the supply of labour required for such a purpose to an extent double or treble what would be required for slower progress, without raising the cost of labour, and in that regard, as in other regards, as I have said, I repeat, speed means cost. The early completion of the work, its completion at so early a date as is talked of, of course accelerates the period of less profitable working. We have not all of us yet forgotten the statements by which the price to be paid the company was justified. It was said, there is to be a long period after the completion of the road before you can get any settlement and develop the traffic, during which the working will be unremunerative, and for which we have to compensate, in advance, by paying a larger price, and that is included in the sum of the price we paid. But accelerated construction, accelerated completion, means, of course, the acceleration of the point of that very unprofitable working to which hon. gentlemen allude. It means more. It does not merely accelerate the point of commencement, but it intensifies the character of the unprofitableness of the working, because the faster you build, the fewer years you allow for the development of the country, the development of the trade, the introduction of a population to sustain the railway when it is built, obviously the greater are the difficulties of working when you complete. Nor am I able to agree that the extreme rapidity which has been used and which is intended to be used, has done real good to the country. I am not able to agree in that view, and I think if the hon. gentleman would enquire in the North-West he would find that that sentiment is largely entertained. Amongst the difficulties of settling that country, is the difficulty of isolation, the sparseness of the settlements; and what has been done by the extreme rapidity of construction has been to increase that difficulty as well. People have been scattered over a wide expanse of country in which their difficulties have been made greater by this cause; and they have been induced to look rather to the chance of some fortunate location turning out to be a town site, or a mine, than to the steady development of the agricultural resources of the country, upon which its future must, after all, depend; which steady development will be greatly favoured by comparative density of settlement, and as seriously hindered by sparseness of settlement. Now there is a defence of course, and that defence is the boom; but I do not know that the boom has done the North-West much good either. I do not know that the great balloon which the hon. gentlemen set floating in the air, which looked so splendid and to which they directed all eyes, presents the same flourishing appearance to-day; and I believe the future of that country has, upon the whole, not merely not been helped, but has been seriously retarded by the course of inflation and speculation which their policy in this and other respects invited and encouraged; and that, therefore, it cannot be said in respect to the boom any more than in other respects that this rapidity of construction which induced the boom, and which we now learn is to be had at our cost instead of the cost of the company, was an advantage to the North-West. Hon. gentlemen say in the Speech that the reason of the guarantee is the need to sell the unissued stock. Without entering, on this occasion, into details, I must say that I do not find that statement very much in accord with the statements which are officially made by the president and by the vice-president of the company, from which it appears that their other resources, irrespective of the unissued stock, would be adequate to the construction of the road. It is said that the stock is not saleable at its fair market price. Now, I moved for, and the House ordered, papers on this subject, but the information which was ordered has not been brought before us. It should be brought before us. We know that the stock nominally is $100,000,000. We know that the original issue was said first to be sixty, but I believe that later information is more accurate, which places as the price at which the syndicate, to whom it was entrusted, received it at fifty, and therefore the stock is issued at somewhere about one half its nominal value. We know from the newspapers, if the market reports are to be trusted, that it has been selling at a premium which has varied from fifty to sixty, occasionally going up above sixty, meaning a premium of from ten to twenty or twenty-five. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that is not enough, that it should sell at the highest premium on its issue price, and as it will not, let us make up the difference. Now, I maintain that amongst the information which is essential in order to Parliament's intelligent consideration of any plan or scheme for the relief of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, is the full-est information of all transactions in connection with this stock. We have discussed the subject before, and I have pointed out the inferences which are to be drawn from such meagre information as we have. We have called for further papers, and I ask that these papers should be speedily brought down, and that, as part of the cause justificative of this proposed transaction, we should know how it is that $45,000,000 or $55,000,000 is the actual sum of what has been received for them. But that is not the only difficulty which, as it seemed to me, was brought on the company by the policy of that corporation, aided and encouraged and backed by the Government of the day, in taking that course. I have pointed out before, and I repeat, that this contract, large and liberal as were the subsidies that were granted, and extensive as were the privileges which were allotted to the corporators, was one of great magnitude—one which required the undivided energy and devotion of those engaged in it, to the completion of the contracted line; and I have pointed out that the time, the energy, the capital, the credit and the resources of the company have been largely devoted to objects not embraced within the limits of the contracted line. Some of these are more justifiable than others; but of all of them it is to be said that they are transactions in respect of which, if the company entered into them at all, it was to be expected that they would not be entered into to the detriment of any one of the elements of success to which I have referred, in the contracted line. Take the Canada Central; the Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental; the Laurentian; the St. Lawrence and Ottawa; the Atlantic and North-Western; the Ontario and Quebec; the Credit Valley; the Toronto, Grey and Bruce; the Hamilton and North Western; the London Junction; the South Eastern; irrespective of the Algoma Mills Branch, the North-West branches, and North-West lines—in most of these it is established that the company have meddled in one way or other; and in others it is asserted, and I believe rightly, that they have also meddled, in some to a greater, in some to a less extent. The capital involved in the acquisition of these various lines runs into the tens of millions, amounting to probably as much as $30,000,000; and I attribute a great portion of the difficulties in which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are now confessedly involved, to the circumstance that they have engaged in matters not contracted for in their contract, and that with the capital which was directly due to the performance of the contract, they have done much more than the contract demanded, and have done that more in their own interest. I pointed out also that the course which was pursued in proposing to construct another railway in competition with the other great railway of the country, through Ontario, would almost inevitably have the result it has had, and would invite the hostility of that other railway, to the detriment of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I regretted, and I repeat the regret, that that hostile attitude should have existed. I know not whether it now exists; but I maintain that it was hardly expected that it could be avoided when this competition, which was not necessary to the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway proper, was engaged in. In all these things, and for all these things, the Government have had a large part and have assumed a large responsibility; they have promoted, encouraged, and aided them; they have supported them by granting all the assistance, all the legislation that was desired to give these additional powers; they encouraged them by the method of distributing the subsidies in the original contract—by granting an inordinate amount towards the prairie section instead of reserving it for those difficult ends of the work which are yet to be completed, and in respect to which we are to be asked to deal still more lavishly. We contended that the subsidies should be distributed in accordance with the cost of the respective portions of the work. Hon. gentlemen opposite said: no, we want to put the company into a first-class position, and we will give them what is admitted to be a disproportionate part of the subsidy at the beginning. That is what they did, and the results have been just as we predicted. And, Sir, while this is so, while at this early period, after making the contract, the Government are obliged to make the melancholy statement contained in the Speech, we did not hear one word in connection with that statement in reference to the invitation to be given to us to modify the terms of the contract, or any proposal to annex any condition for the relief of the country by the removal or mitigation of those obnoxious portions of the contract which are more oppressive to the community than profitable to the corporation. Sir, I will not enter into other topics connected with the Railway. But as I take a view entirely opposite to that taken by the hon. gentlemen who have moved and seconded the Address, as to the condition of things developed by the paragraph, I felt it necessary to say so much. The Speech refers to the condition of the country, and it tells us that the harvest has been less productive than some of its predecessors, and that there has been, owing to the rapid expansion of our commerce, some little over-trading; but it asserts that there is a general condition of prosperity. I congratulate the hon. member for Glengarry upon the dexterous manner—borrowed, I dare say, from his avocations in the other sphere to which he alluded—in which he slipped over this remark. He did it very well. He felt that the least said the soonest mended, and he got on the ice and off of it as fast as possible. I do not know that he got upset, but it appears to me he ran a considerable risk of it. We remember the admirable exhibitions made by speakers on former occasions, when they were developing this part of the usual Speech from the Throne. If we remember the beautiful exhibitions afforded to us, first by the mover, and then by the seconder, as late as last Session; if we remember the length of time they took in their performance; if we remember the ease and grace, and the apparent delight and joy with which they dwelt upon the condition of the country on that occasion, and contrast it with the hon. gentleman's dart-in and dart-out again, we must feel that in this particular he knew his business; but we must also feel that the contrast is a little more serious—a little more serious, in fact, than even the Speech from the Throne has told us. In truth, the high Tariff policy of hon. gentlemen opposite has proved itself largely a failure. The period of good times, to which we were naturally entitled, came to us a little later on account of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, and it has left us much sooner than it ought to have done. We had two or three years of it, during which there were good crops, good markets, a good lumber trade, large railway and other expenditures; during which the people grew more wealthy, the importations crept up and the circumstances were such as hon. gentlemen were pleased to dilate upon in the debate on the Address. Now the conditions are changed. They are sadly changed. Why are they changed? And why are they changed so soon? I agree with hon. gentlemen opposite as to the deficient harvest; I agree that they did not incorrectly express the degree of depression which is due to that cause. There has been a very good harvest in very many parts of the country. There has been an abundant harvest in many parts of the country. In one section of the Province from which I come—over a large region of it—one of its main staple crops has, no doubt, lamentably failed; but other crops have done well in that section, and in the eastern portion of Ontario even that crop, so far as it was grown, has done fairly well. In Manitoba, as we know, owing to an unfortunate circumstance which we must all deplore, a portion, although not a very large portion, of the cereal whose cultivation is to be the staple of that country, was frozen, and there difficulty ensued; but barring these two points, there is no doubt that although the crop is not to be described as equal to its predecessors, we have not been subjected to the calamity of a very bad crop all over the Dominion. The crop is inferior, but not a failure, and has followed a very brief period of prosperity, during which we had good crops and good prices, and a good lumber market. Surely then, the great policy which was to do so much for this country; which was to give us steadiness of prosperity, steadiness of employment to our working men; which was to ensure to us a permanent condition of prosperity, in so far as anything can ensure it, ought to have carried us over one partial failure of a crop. But what has happened is very serious, and it is not to be accounted for by the crop. It is due to other circumstances more in the control of the Administration than is the crop. I have observed on former occasions, that while hon. gentlemen opposite, addressing the people in the country, would not absolutely tell a farmer that the crops were in their own hands, that they could cause the sun to shine, and the rain to fall, and the crop to grow, they had yet said—and the hon. gentleman who is now laughing has himself said:—after all, you had better vote for the Government that the sun shines on; Providence is kind to us: support us. “When the Grits come in,” said the hon. First Minister, “the weevil will come in with them.” Thus they have told the poor people of the country who have, some of them, confided in them, that there was some sort of high compact and alliance between them and the supernal powers under which, by means not to be disclosed to vulgar ears, yet none the less effective, good crops were coincident with the existence of a Tory Administration. I do not suppose they will take credit for that any longer. Even although they have failed so slightly, even although the crop has not been so very bad, I believe they are now much more disposed to attribute the alternations of prosperity and adversity to conditions beyond their control, and a crop beyond their control, than they were in former days. But I deny that the change in affairs is to be mainly, though to a considerable extent it is, to be attributed to such causes. It is to be attributed to the policy of the Administration—a policy, in the first place, of extravagant expenditure under which they took and spent; a policy, in the second place, of extravagant collection under which they took what even their extravagance could not enable them to expend, under which they determined to abstract from the people of the country, in these years that have lately passed and the current year, about $20,000,000, which will cost the people of the country—the consumers—by the time they pay it, something approximating to $30,000,000, and which they used in order to pay for this same Canadian Pacific Railway that once more dresses the Speech from the Throne; a policy, under which, instead of borrowing at four per cent. the $20,000,000 they wanted, they have caused the people to pay $30,000,000 at something like seven or eight per cent. They thus abstracted from the people, at the period they wanted it, something which made the difference between a good and a bad crop. In addition to a partial failure of one crop which we suffer from Providence, they have brought on us what is equivalent to the failure of another crop. They took what they did take unjustly and unequally. They did more. They invited and encouraged over-speculating and over-trading. They fomented the North-West speculations by the land arrangements which they made. The hon. Minister, instead of being a prudent pilot, told his crew that if he were only as young as they and in trade he would clap on full sail for a period of ten years of assured prosperity and then take in sail. How many of his crew have taken in sail since, although the ten years have not elapsed? How many of his crew have gone down under the sail which he told them to hoist and keep up for a ten years' voyage? They unduly stimulated every pet industry. What of the cotton industry? the sugar industry? the iron industry? and the glass industry? and a half a dozen other things I could mention which hon. gentlemen placed under their hot-bed system, and in respect of which they brought up numerous plants, and which have now largely withered. Their policy resulted in over-investment in manufactures, over-production, over-trading, over-importation; and had not others been wiser than the hon. Minister of Finance; had not others set that caution signal which he declined to set, the consequences would have been much more serious than they actually were. If they were not more serious it is due to this circumstance. I trust that the check which was administered by some leading men, who had a better knowledge of the signs of the times than the hon. gentleman, who were better able to judge the course of events than he—I say, the check they endeavoured to give the administration one and a half years ago, and have been repeating ever since, has mitigated the disaster which might otherwise have occurred. I trust it is limited to a period of stringency and dullness without being advanced as it would have been to a period of crisis and collapse. If it be so, it is due to others and not to the Finance Minister; and even as it is, it is bad enough. It was only last Session that the hon. gentleman who moved the reply to the Address adverted to the list of bankruptcies as an indication of the continued prosperity of the country. I pointed out to him that I thought he had not referred to the authorities or he would have followed, by anticipation, the prudent course which has been taken on this occasion and omitted reference to the subject. Although there was last year an increase instead of, as the hon. gentleman supposed, a diminution, still the amount was moderate. Though enough to warn people and cause them to be cautious, it was not enough to indicate a then existing condition of a very serious character. What is the roll call to day? You find that the number has enormously increased, about doubled, if I remember aright. You find that the amount of liabilities is between two and three times the amount of last year, according to one of the commercial reports, and between four or five times as much, according to the other; you find that, comparing our condition with that of the neighboring Republic, we have nearly twice as many, in proportion to those engaged in trade, who have succumbed under the excessive load which they were carrying under the hon. gentleman's advice, as they have on the other side. The hon. gentleman has adverted on former occasions to the bank stocks as an indication of the prosperity of the country. He said the other day, out in the country, that he did not do so during his Budget Speech last year, because he thought they were rather high. What does he think now? What does he think of the loss of some ten or twelve millions at least—I have not actually counted the figures, but that at least—in value since they touched that point? What does that indicate in relation to the condition of the country? What did a rise in stocks indicate? He said advancing prosperity. What does a fall so serious indicate? I leave it to him to answer. And then we might make an enquiry as to the condition of the pet industries. Pride and rejoicing were manifested in past years on the ground of their vigour and prosperity. The hon. gentleman spoke of them as things of which the country ought to be proud. It is true the people might be paying a little more, though they disputed that, but what was that when you found men engaged so vigorously in home production, and employing so many hands, and paying such liberal wages, and giving such constant employment, and making such large donations to charitable objects, and generally prospering so much? What is the condition of the pet industries to-day? Has that unhealthy stimulation which we said would take place under the hot-bed Tariff of high prices, done good or harm? Has it not had the result we predicted, and are we not reaping at an earlier day than even we predicted, and at a much earlier day than he expected, when he made his prophecies, the bitter harvest of his policy? What is the condition, under the National Policy to-day, of the great industry of flour-milling in Canada? How does it stand? How does the Tariff affect it? Has the hon. gentleman accommodated his little difference with the millers? Is he about to relieve them from the difficulties under which they say they labour and which prevent them, they say, from grinding American flour in Canada? Has the result of this Tariff proved itself to be a result sound and just as applied to this country in that regard? How is it with reference to the balance of trade? Why, I remember when the hon. gentleman pointed out with pride and glory, I think only two years ago—

An hon. MEMBER. Three years.

Mr. BLAKE. Three years was it?—that for the first time in the history of Canada the balance of trade was in its favour, that we had exported more than we imported, and he told us what he had accomplished, and he told us how he had accomplished it. And before that he had pointed out what his duty was in that regard. He told us at an earlier period that we had to attain to a different condition of things from that which had existed before. It is true it was not very bad. It is true the amount of our importations was not very large. But the hon. gentleman, in 1879, said: "Regarding the matter as I do, I think it is to be regretted that the volume of imports has not been materially reduced." Reduced from its volume then, reduced from the small volume that then existed. "I look upon the large imports ever since the Dominion was organized, showing a large balance of trade against it, as one of the causes of trouble with which we have to contend, one of the difficulties that it is our duty to remedy. They have been decreasing to a certain extent, but are still very large"—how do they compare with those of last year?—"showing distinctly and clearly, in my judgment, that they ought to be still further diminished. I think then, without entering into a discussion of Free Trade and Protection, so far as they affect England and the United States, we may fairly conclude that the prosperity of the one country, at this moment, is caused in a great measure by the large surplus in its favour, and the depression in the other, by the large deficiency." He then gives the figures, and concludes: "Under these circumstances, it appears to me that we should turn our attention to the best means of reducing the volume of imports from all parts of the world." Having declared his duty, having proposed to perform it, having rejoiced three years ago in the success which had attended his efforts, I want to know, to-day, what has happened to the National Policy? Is it asleep? Has it gone upon a journey? How is the balance of trade now? How was it last year and the year before together? How does it compare with the balance of trade in the year when he complained so much?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Very well.

Mr. BLAKE. I know, Mr. Speaker, what the hon. gentleman will do. I know him of old, Sir. He will take a lot of averages. He is great on averages. He does not mind the story that the figures tell, if you look at their consecutive order, but he will take them back and forth, and will take the average of a number of years. But we are speaking of the year 1879, when he spoke of the then existing condition of things, and the subsequent years, when he spoke of what it was his duty to do and what he had accomplished, and we are comparing the year preceding 1879 and the condition of things to-day, as to the volume of imports and the balance of trade; we are comparing it in its progressive manner. He had obtained perfection three years ago, but now I suppose he will average the three years, and say, "What have you to do with the returns of last year? Look at the average."

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No; we will take both.

Mr. BLAKE. Then, besides the other progeny of the hon. gentleman, he brought forth a little domestic loan this year. He thought the people did not know what to do with the rest of their money. After he had taken $20,000,000 or $30,000,000, as I have pointed out, from them more than was required, he said, "Gentlemen, there is something left in your pockets, and I believe that you had better let me have it at four per cent.," and the hon. gentleman's organs pointed out with a great flourish of trumpets what a wonderful and prescient Government this was, that proposed a domestic loan at four per cent., and how wise a step it was. Well, the advertisement issued, and the time elapsed, and there was what they call "an awful pause," and the news came out that the loan had failed; and then the hon. gentleman's organs said, "What a wonderful Finance Minister this is; he knew it was better for the country that the loan should fail, and it is a most fortunate circumstance that the loan has failed." But the hon. gentleman was not content with that, he was determined to give a crowning proof of his titles to our confidence, and, as the people would not take the loan at par, he put up the rest at a premium of two and a half per cent., and the organs said, "This is the wisest thing of all." Well, Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to believe that the farmers of the country are beginning to perceive the hollowness of the hon. gentleman's plans for making them rich. I am inclined to believe that the working men are beginning to see that his Tariff is not a Tariff which protects labour or which gives continuity of employment, as was promised. Why, if the hon. gentleman would enquire as to those operatives who have been dismissed during the last few months from some of these various pet industries, I dare say they would tell him some plain truths which would do him a great deal of good. It is quite true that his organs, true to their duty to him, to prove that he is always mindful of the workingman above all, pointed out that the workingman had been working too hard for some years, that he actually had become overworked and run down and wanted a holiday, and that it was the best thing that could happen to him, just as it was the best thing for the country that the hon. gentleman's loan failed, to have a little slack time at the mill, so that he might go home and repose himself in the bosom of his family, and spend some of his surplus earnings; but I have not heard that the workingman has sympathized much with that view of the case. In Toronto city, from which I come, there is a very great deal of distress; there is more distress than I have known there for many years, due in part to special and exceptional circumstances, to which I will have to refer, and due also very largely to other circumstances to which I have alluded, and if hon. gentlemen would read the reports of those who interest themselves in the charity relief organizations of that city, they would find an account very different from that which they may be disposed to give us. So of Montreal, in which the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Macmaster) I believe, resides. It was but the other day that I was reading a report of a St. George's Society, as to the condition of things there. As to London, I do not know what the hon. Postmaster General will say about it, but I find, positively, Mr. Speaker, I find that they are proposing to establish—what industry do you think, now? Why, Sir, a soup kitchen, and who do you think proposed it? Why, it is the hon. gentleman's organ, the leading Conservative paper in the western part of the Province, the London Free Press, which, on January 5th, remarked:

"The present cold weather must be severely felt by many. The poor, 'who are always with us,' have certain means of relief from the public. For many years past the fund provided for assisting the deserving poor has been ample and systematic in its administration."

Then they proceed to point out that there are immigrants who have come in, and then they say:

"The dead of winter is a period of peculiar hardship to the stranger without means. The case of these men suggested the establishment of a soup kitchen, and this is being done in Toronto. Why can't the same thing be done here. It is a simple, effectual and inexpensive way of feeding the hungry, and, we think, a natural and necessary part of the relief system for the winter months. The existence of a public soup kitchen would protect householders from the importunity of tramps, while it might greatly assist in the general relief work of the city. Once before a soup kitchen was established here with excellent results, its operation was regarded as a blessing, and large numbers took the benefit of it. We throw out the suggestion at this time, because any such attempt at Christian charity on an organized scale, in view of the hard winter weather, and the presence of many strangers, as well as citizens to whom such aid might be welcome, would seem to be in order."

Why, haven't I been at meeting after meeting in which I was told "no soup kitchens now!" Haven't I often heard Ministers of the Crown pointing to the circumstance that there were no soup kitchens now? I am not at all certain that the hon. Postmaster General himself, in some of those orations with which he has enlightened the Western Peninsula, has not alluded to the paucity of soup kitchens and to the fact that that industry no longer existed. And now, in the very city which he represents, his own organ proposes, as a necessary thing, as a sort of pendant to the National Policy, the establishment of a soup kitchen. And I observe that one of the aldermen has stated that there are at this moment in that city between 1,300 and 1,400 immigrants out of employment. I am very glad to hear that, although the sum stated of immigration does not come up to the moderate expectations, as they were called, indulged in last Session, it reaches so large an amount. We were told that we would have at least 150,000, and that, we were told, was an extremely moderate estimate; we are told to-day that the sum is 133,000. This is a very satisfactory approximation to the estimated amount. I am not quite so certain how these figures will stand scrutiny. My difficulty is increased by the discrepancy of the statement to which I alluded awhile ago, because the hon. member for Glengarry told us, that there were 34,000 of these who had come in from the United States. The hon. member for Levis stated there were 40,000. Where the 6,000 are, I do not exactly know. But, Sir, I pointed out last Session—and I will not enter into the figures to-day at all, as I will have occasion to deal further with the subject later on—that there must be something radically wrong with these returns or with the result deducible, from what information we can obtain. Whether you draw it from the census, or whether from the municipal returns, there is, to a large extent, a displacement of the native by the immigrant population, and the immigrant population, instead of being stationary, is, to a large extent, transitory. I say it is impossible to draw any other conclusion from the statistics which are before us, than that with reference to the figures which have been given. I repeat, also, what I have said upon a former occasion, that the yearly returns from the Province of Ontario, which are the only yearly returns to which I believe we have access, indicate that the ratio of increase of the population, during the four years which preceded the last four years, was much greater than in the last four years. And it is an extraordinary circumstance, that that holds good, not merely with reference to the rural population of Ontario, but with reference to the urban population also; and that during these four years, in which it has been said the prosperity of that Province was so greatly increased by the operation of the Tariff policy of the Government, the ratio of increase of the urban population is markedly lower than it was in the preceding four years that were stated to be years of retrogression. Now, this subject is treated in the Speech in a rather perfunctory manner. We are told, there has been a large immigration, and we are told further that improvements in reference to the facilities for inland transportation, or the cheapness of inland transportation, will help us in the next year. But, Sir, I expected much more upon this subject in the Speech, and I am sure that the hon. member for Levis, who spoke so strongly on the importance of repatriation, must himself have felt—though he did not deem it loyal to express it—a sentiment of disappointment in the fact that so little has been said upon this subject in the Speech. Mr. Speaker, of late years it is not only in the Speech from the Throne that we learn of the intentions of Ministers as to the legislation of the Session. The hon. Minister of Public Works, at a banquet that was given to him in Montreal in October last, pointed out what was to be done in this particular regard. I propose to supplement the information conveyed to Parliament in the Speech from the Throne by a few passages from this ministerial pronouncement. The hon. member declared that there were three great questions upon which the Government claimed the confidence of the community, three great measures of policy—the Confederation itself, of which he claimed sole credit for the Conservative party; the Canadian Pacific Railway, which he did not then tell us required our further assistance, and the National Policy. Let me read. The hon. gentleman says:

"And, gentlemen, this demonstration is also an approbation of the great measures which have been adopted by the administration of which I am a member. First, there was the Confederation Act, and since we returned to power, we have adopted the National Policy, and the great Pacific Railway measure, and finally, we have adopted another measure scarcely less important in respect to the encouragement of immigration into this country."

Adverting then to the history, according to his version, of the other three measures, he recurs to the immigration measure, and he says:

"But, gentlemen, our mission would be but half accomplished if we forgot that we have on the other side of latitude 45 a great number of our fellow-countrymen who would like nothing better than to return home and sit down to the family table and eat with us, and to earn their living under the institutions now existing in Canada. (Loud cheers.) I need not say, gentlemen, that it is with the greatest satisfaction and pleasure that I am able to announce to you this evening that the Government of Canada intend to take measures, and energetic measures, to recal into the limits of our own territory all our fellow-countrymen in the United States who desire to return and live with us. You will understand, gentlemen, that in a banquet like this I must be excused if I do not give all the details of the ministerial measure that we propose to bring down next Session. But in any case it is well that you should know that our compatriots in the United States, whether they be of French origin or of any other origin, they are not forgotten, and all that can be done to bring them back to this country we shall do most heartily."

This was heralded in October last by the Minister of Public Works as the fourth great claim to the confidence of the country, and he placed it upon a par with those three other claims to which I have referred: Confederation, the National Policy, and the Canadian Pacific Railway. He announced the formation of a scheme, the decision of the Government, the determination to bring down some scheme this Session to produce this end. Is this little peddling paragraph about cheap inland transportation the hon. gentleman's great scheme? Is it, or is it something else? And if it be something else—if it be something at all commensurate with the grandeur, not to say the grandiloquence of the language with which the hon. gentleman announced the scheme to his friends at Montreal, why do we hear of cheap inland transportation and hear nothing at all of the hon. gentleman's great scheme of repatriation? Why is the less inserted, and the greater omitted? Why, to an assemblage of Conservatives in Montreal, is a measure equal in importance to the National Policy, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Confederation of the Provinces to be announced, and Parliament itself not to be told a word in regard to it in the Speech from the Throne? Mr. Speaker, I said that there was distress in the city in which I live, and that it was partly due to special circumstances, not due altogether to those circumstances to which I had alluded. It is due to immigration. I am not about to discuss at this moment who is responsible for those circumstances, but I say that it is lamentable that the number of people that are there should be there under the circumstances under which they are there; and I repeat what I have stated on former occasions, that while this country ought to devise and encourage a system of immigration, while we ought to see that those whom we want are summoned and welcomed here, yet discretion is to be used; and the hon. gentleman's scheme of assisted passages, which he professes to us—though some of the documents I have seen do not appear to bear him out—is confined to agricultural labour, is, so far as I can make out, in its practical operation, extended to the bringing into the country, by virtue of Government funds, certain classes of people for whom we have not room, viz.: mechanics and artisans. I believe that a considerable number have been brought into the country under the auspices, and partly by means of the assistance given by the Government, who had been better in the country from which they were brought. The hon. gentlemen who have spoken, have referred to the proposed legislation of the Session. It is not very new to us, because we had those Bills before us last Session. I do not intend to say a word upon either of them that I said last year. At the opening of the Session I pointed out what I thought was the true view with regard to the Franchise Bill; I will not repeat those words to-day. The Bill has been before the House, it has been before the country, but it has not yet received the advantage of explanation and vindication at the hands of its proposer, and I will reserve, for the present, any remarks I may have to make, until we hear from him, his vindication of the various provisions. This only I will say, that when I spoke last Session I did not and could not know that the measure would contain a provision so objectionable, so arbitrary, so unheard of, as a provision which the hon. gentleman proposed then, and which I hope he does not propose to embody in the Bill he is about to introduce, namely, that with respect to the appointment of revising barristers. With regard to the Factory Bill, there is another reason for saying nothing just now, because the hon. gentleman states it is to be introduced with further amendments. I only express the hope that when introduced it will be found to give as efficient a measure of protection to artisans of whatever age or sex in this country as is given to artisans in England. There is an omission or two in the Speech to which I must refer. The Fishery Exhibition is mentioned, and the hon. gentlemen who have moved and seconded the Reply have spoken with great and lively admiration on the success of that Exhibition, and of the triumphs which Canada there achieved. But we have some fishery interests which are to be promoted in other ways than by attending Exhibitions; there are some fishery clauses in a treaty, which clauses have been denounced, and which are to come to an end at no remote period; and I think some reference to that circumstance and to an intention to take the House into the confidence of the Government as to the course proposed by them, and to indicate what the Government have done in view of the approaching termination of the Fishery Clauses of the Washington Treaty, would have been at least of as much consequence as the paragraph which has been inserted in the Speech: It is very well known that within the last two or three years more particularly, the chief market for our fish has been the United States, and it has become of very pressing importance that we should know what the results are to be of the termination of these Fishery Clauses. It is of importance that the treaty should not terminate without an earnest effort in advance to make proper arrangements, so that there shall be no gap, if it can be avoided; and I will add that it is of great consequence also, and the times appear to be more propitious now than in former days, that in those negotiations due attention shall be paid to arriving at some mode of restoring freer trade relations between us and our neighbours than have for some time subsisted. The hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) last year adopted the plan of referring to the judgments of the Privy Council in the Speech from the Throne, and we had a Ministerial exposition of a judgment of the Privy Council. But I am sorry to observe that that good custom is not followed this year. Some years ago, the Government, of which I happened to be a member, finding a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench of Lower Canada in favor of the Provincial right to escheats, decided to abide by that decision—which was in accordance with my own view of the respective rights of the Provinces and the Dominion—and acting accordingly we made no effort at that time to assert any right on the part of the Dominion. At a subsequent period that decision was concurred in and adopted by the Appellate Court of the Province of Ontario, and so strengthened, the case came before the consideration of hon. gentleman opposite. They decided to adopt another course. Centralizing, as I have often charged the hon. gentleman with doing—centralizing wherever he can, with his eye set always upon that one object of drawing to the general legislature and government, all the powers and functions which he can by any possibility draw to it, the hon. gentleman said, although the former Government adopted this view, although the highest court of Ontario adopted it, although the highest court of Quebec adopted it, we will fight them and endeavour to secure for the Dominion the right to escheat. He took up the case, he instructed the counsel, he paid the fees, the case went to the Privy Council, and the hon. gentleman was beaten. The result has been to establish the Provincial right in this regard contrary to the views he entertained, and in accordance with the views and judgment of the two Provincial Courts to which I referred. I congratulate those who are lovers of our Federal Constitution upon this vindication of one of its important elements—not that the question of escheats itself is of much consequence, but because it was, as I have said, the means of vindicating one of the most important elements of our Constitution. I congratulate them on the failure of the hon. gentleman in attempting to arrogate to this Administration and this Legislature, a power which was not its right. But when we have an important decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council settling a question of this kind finally and conclusively—not settling it in a manner susceptible of discussion, but settling it absolutely—why should not we be informed that our constitution has been definitively settled and expounded in one important matter?

After Recess.

MR. BLAKE. Another omission from the Speech, yet more inexcusable, having regard to the language of the Speech last year, is the failure to refer to the judgment of the Privy Council in the Hodge case, bearing upon the license question. And as the First Minister adverted to the speech in which he made the statement with reference to the effect of the decision in Russell vs. The Queen, I suppose I may without impropriety myself refer to it. The report of his speech which was delivered early in the month of June, 1882, from the Mail newspaper, is as follows:—

"The following question in writing was here handed to Sir John:—'What is your opinion of the constitutionality of the Ontario License Act?'"

"Sir John said that since Confederation his decisions had often been given as Minister of Justice on constitutional questions, and in no single case had his judgments been reverse. He believed that the Act was not worth the paper it was written on. The whole system of the Government appointing license inspectors to compel men to vote under penalty of losing their licenses was wrong and indefensible. Whenever the licensed victuallers brought the matter before the courts it would be decided that the Act was an usurpation, and had no force whatever, and he was surprised the question had not been pressed long before this. If he carried the country, as he would do, he would tell Mr. Mowat, that little tyrant who had attempted to control public opinion by getting hold of every little office, from that of a division court bailiff to a tavern keeper, that he would get a bill passed at Ottawa returning to the municipalities the power taken from them by the License Act."

Well, in the course of the debate on the Address, I took leave to point out that there were some serious questions to be settled before the views expressed in the Speech from the Throne ought to be adopted by Parliament; and in answer to the position which I then took, not in detail, because I pointed out that the judgment had not then been circulated, the hon. gentleman made some remarks. I had charged the Government with a centralizing tendency. I had charged them then, as I charge them now, with a desire to draw in here whatever they can of power and jurisdiction, and of diminishing so far as in them lies, the power and jurisdiction awarded by the constitution to the Provinces. In answer to me the hon. gentleman said:

"That subject was not willingly undertaken by the present Government. They were quite satisfied that the law as it obtains in the different Provinces should be continued. They were quite satisfied that each Province should, so far as the law would allow it to enact such statutes, deal with the subject of shop, tavern and saloon licenses. Neither the Government nor the Parliament of Canada, I take it, wished to interfere; and it was only when the decision which was given in June last on the Scott Act, a Dominion Act, and the subject was forced upon them, that they thought it their duty to bring it before Parliament. I never had any doubt that when the question was brought before the courts, it would be decided that the different Provincial Legislatures had no right whatever to deal with that subject except for revenue purposes—for the purpose of imposing taxation for Provincial or municipal purposes. I expressed the opinion in Parliament years ago, and last year I expressed it at a public meeting in Toronto or its vicinity. But while that opinion was strongly impressed upon my mind I took no steps, nor did the Government of which I was a member take any steps, for the purpose of interfering with the legislation of the different Provinces, or forcing Dominion legislation on the country, or trying to centralize such powers in this Parliament. On the contrary, the only centralization on that subject—the only time in which that question was in any way dealt with by the Dominion Parliament—was when the late Government was in power, and when they introduced the Scott Act."

Then the hon. gentleman proceeded to say, with reference to Russell vs. The Queen:

"It is quite clear to every lawyer, and any man who is not a lawyer, who reads that judgment, will see that the very reasons on which the Privy Council decided that this Parliament had the right to deal with the Scott Act, are the reasons showing that the Provincial Legislature of Ontario had not a right to deal with that subject under the Crooks Act, except as a matter of revenue for municipal or Provincial purposes. The hon. gentleman says that we should have allowed the matter to stand over until it was finally decided. Sir, if there be any value in that decision, and there is every value in it, because it is the law of the land, there is no check at this moment in the Province of Ontario against the unlimited, unrestrained sale of intoxicating liquors. This is not a matter we can play with. It is not a matter of policy; it is a matter of necessity. If we wish to prevent the unrestrained sale of intoxicating liquors we must legislate immediately; for I take it, that any man in this city or in any other part of Ontario can open his saloon and sell liquors, and there is not a court in the world can prevent his doing so."

In answer to these views, I took leave to say:

"He said that any lawyer, or any other man who is not a lawyer, who chose to read that judgment must see plainly from it, that the unavoidable result was no power was left with the Local Legislatures to restrict the number of licenses. Now, I do not draw that conclusion from the decision in Russell vs. The Queen. In the first place, that judgment does not deal in the slightest degree with, does not touch in any way upon, that very large part of Provincial rights which is comprised in the subject of municipal institutions. The decision is expressly stated to be upon the consideration of whether the power to pass the particular law which was before the Privy Council, viz.: the Scott Act, was vested in a Local Legislature in either of the then headings: the heading of property and civil rights, the heading of shop, tavern and saloon licenses, or the heading of local and private matters. The Judges expressly say that these were the points which were raised before them, and upon which they judged. They do not say a word about municipal institutions having been suggested or argued. Now, Sir, if hon. gentlemen sitting in this Parliament, if Ministers of the Crown, chosen from all the different Provinces, do not know what are the local laws touching the sale of liquor, what powers have been given to the different municipal bodies in that regard; if we require to-day to take the first step in order to inform our minds upon the mixed question of law and fact as to what are the laws and what mean the laws; can we suppose that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was inspired to know all about those municipal institutions and local laws which were not even alluded to in the argument and the judgment? Can it be seriously argued before a Canadian Parliament, that the single decision of four or five men—when the great question of municipal institutions was never even raised or discussed—has so finally concluded this question that it is no further arguable? It is absurd to say so. I maintain, that in the absence of a decision in which the whole question of municipal institutions shall have been brought up expressly, in which that mass of statutory learning which is required in order to know what the position of the municipal institutions of each Province was at the time of Confederation was not called for, in which the true construction of this phrase 'municipal institutions' was not fully debated and decided—no man, in the absence of such a decision, can say that this question, which, in the largest of the Provinces, in the next largest of the Provinces and in two or three more of them, was dealt with before Confederation, and for years after, as a subject of municipal institutions, is not to be found in the Confederation Act."

Once again I proceeded to point out what was done in the old Province of Upper Canada, under the heading of municipal institutions, and also in Lower Canada; and I said:

"I deny his construction of the decision in Russell vs. The Queen, and the argument in Russell vs. The Queen. I have read the stenographer's notes of the whole argument, and it seems to be unfortunate that in a constitutional case of this high consequence, the senior counsel, a man whose knowledge and power and eminence, everybody knows and respects—Mr. Benjamin—should have been absent, and that the brunt of the argument should have been borne by the junior counsel. Mr. Benjamin appears only at the close in delivering a short and a concise argument. I say the argument is not satisfactory; and the judgment is not satisfactory, even as far as it goes. But the question is, how far it goes? We are not to take it as far as the hon. gentleman says it is to be taken. The hon. gentleman says no lawyer reading that judgment will come to any other conclusion; he says no layman would come to any other conclusion. But lawyers have come to a different conclusion; judges have come to a different conclusion; courts have come to a different conclusion; and what the hon. gentleman declares no man would say, some of the highest and most respectable and esteemed judges of this land have already said."

And I pointed out in detail what the judgments were which bore out that proposition. After doing so, I said:

"For myself, I never will consent that one of the greatest powers given to the Provinces, shall be swept away by a court before whom this question of our municipal institutions was not argued or considered, before whom it was not contended that our powers in that respect were in question, and of which they knew no more than the messengers at the Table—I will not consent that the Parliament of this country shall, without my protest, arrogate to itself the power to take away from the Provinces that great right, until we find, on full argument and consideration, that such is the meaning of our Constitution."

Well, Mr. Speaker, making these observations upon the motion of the hon. gentleman to initiate this legislation, which I opposed on this and other grounds, I was answered from the Ministerial benches by an hon. member, who said, speaking for the Government:

"They do not ask this House to consider whether the license question may be dealt with by the Local Legislatures or by the Dominion Parliament. That is a foregone conclusion, and His Excellency says, he is advised upon that question that the Provinces have no right to deal with the question; and, therefore, this House being seized with the case, and being satisfied that the opinion of the hon. the First Minister is the true one, is asked only to assimilate the laws of the several Provinces and to see that an Act is placed on the Statute-book, which shall satisfy the several Provinces."

Again, he said, referring to my point, that the only excuse that the Government had for introducing the measure was the speech the hon. gentleman made in Yorkville:

"Well, what better evidence does this country want of the great constitutional knowledge of the right hon. gentleman than the fact that he predicted, three weeks before the decision was given, that the jurisdiction lay alone in this Legislature; that the Local Legislatures had no control over that question. That shows his great constitutional knowledge and his opinion of what the law really was, because, a few weeks afterwards, we find the Privy Council endorsing his view."

However, although we voted against the initiation of this legislation, and declared that it ought not to be commenced, at a later day, when the Bill was to be read the third time, we recorded another proposition, to which I desire to refer. That proposition was contained in a motion, moved by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Fleming) in amendment to the third reading of the Bill, to leave out the words for the third reading, and insert these:

"The Provincial Legislatures have since Confederation exercised Legislative powers in the regulation of the issue of licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquors, and the hours and certain other incidents of the sale.

"That the Appeal Courts of Ontario and Quebec have each decided in favor of the exercise by the Provinces of the Dominion, of the jurisdiction, and this Appeal Court has further determined that the judgment of the Privy Council in Russell and The Queen does not decide that the Provincial Legislatures have not this jurisdiction.

"That the questions involved are now under the consideration of the Supreme Court of Canada, and will shortly be brought under the consideration of the Privy Council.

"That the Parliament of Canada should not assume jurisdiction as proposed by the said Bill, until the question has been settled by the Court of last resort."

That motion also was defeated. Now, Mr. Speaker, let us understand clearly what determination we were called upon to take, for what reason and upon what plea. We were called upon to interfere with the regulation of licensing in the various Provinces upon the plea—not that it was a politic thing for this Parliament to assume that jurisdiction, not that it was a measure of policy or expediency at all, but upon the plea of necessity—that in order to prevent the unrestrained sale by anybody who pleased of intoxicating liquors wherever he pleased, it was necessary for this Parliament to intervene; not upon argument, for argument was not resorted to in this House, to prove the necessity, but upon the plea that the necessity was proved and established by the judgment of the court of last resort, which the hon. gentleman said was the final law of the land—upon the plea that the local laws were not worth the paper they were written upon—that they were usurpations; and in order to prevent these dreadful evils over which the hon. gentleman wept, resulting from the unrestrained sale of intoxicating liquors all over the country, he said we must act at once and act decidedly, else the country would go to ruin over the quantity of liquor sold by everybody and drunk by everybody else. Well, Sir, we pointed out that the hon. gentleman's interpretation of the judgment in Russell vs. The Queen, was erroneous; that it did not establish the proposition he laid down; that it could not establish it, because an essential element to a conclusive decision upon that subject was that the question of Provincial powers in municipal institutions should have been brought under the consideration of the court, and adjudged upon by the court, whereas that question was not considered or adjudged upon at all. However, the hon. gentleman who answered for the Government said that they took the opinion of the First Minister, that they were willing to take his opinion on trust, and that as he wished it, not merely as an expounder of the law, but as a prophet, it was particularly unfortunate that I should have challenged his judgment. But time brings about its revenges. There were allusions in the course of the debate, and in this motion to cases then pending—to a case before the Supreme Court of Canada at that time standing for judgment, in which judgment has since been delivered, and in which three of the judges, those who expressed an opinion on the question of jurisdiction, expressed the opinion that the Local Legislatures have regulative jurisdiction. There was a case alluded to which was about to be heard in the Privy Council. It was pointed out in a late stage of the debate that it was entirely unnecessary for the hon. gentleman to proceed so hastily, for he himself proposed that his Act should not come into force until May next, at any rate so far as the licensing power was concerned, and that he might well wait until the decision of the Privy Council was rendered. But he had some purpose to serve, and he insisted on Parliament coming to a conclusion. Parliament came to the conclusion he desired, and since then judgment has been delivered; and this is the second complaint I make of omissions. Surely this judgment has more importance upon the question before us last Session than the judgment in Russell vs. The Queen. The question which was before us last Session was, What are the powers of the Local Legislatures with reference to the issue and regulation of licenses? That was the question. The hon. gentleman said they have no powers to regulate licenses—that they had no powers except with reference to the raising of revenue for municipal or Provincial purposes; and he said: I prove it by saying that a particular judgment goes to show it. Now, we have got a judgment which shows this precise point, which is on the point which touches it, which deals with it, and, in spite of the hon. gentleman's infallible nod, concludes the point. And as the hon. gentleman would not put this judgment, which does not go to show, but which does show, into the Speech, I do not propose to move in amendment that it be inserted, because that would be contrary to the bienséance of parliamentary life, as we understand it to-day, but I will read it. After explaining, or attempting to explain, the decision in Russell and The Queen, and the principles on which that decision was founded, and coming down to the point in question:

"Their Lordships proceed now to consider the subject matter and Legislative character of Sections 4 and 5 of the revised Statutes of Ontario. That Act is so far confined in its operations to municipalities in the Province of Ontario, and is entirely local in its character and operation. It authorizes the appointment of License Commissioners to act in each municipality, and empowers them to pass, under the name of Resolutions, what we know as By-Laws, or rules to define the conditions and qualifications requisite for obtaining tavern or shop licenses for sale by retail of spirituous liquors within the municipality; for limiting the number of licenses; for declaring that a limited number of persons qualified to have tavern licenses may be exempted from having all the tavern accommodation required by law, and for regulating licensed taverns and shops, for defining the duties and powers of License Inspectors, and to impose penalties for infraction of their Resolutions. These seem to be all matters of merely a local nature in the Province, and to be similar to, though not identical in all respects with, the powers then belonging to municipal institutions under the previously existing laws passed by the Local Parliaments.

"Their Lordships consider that the powers intended to be conferred by the Act in question, when properly understood, are to make regulations in the nature of police or municipal regulations of a merely local character, for the good government of taverns, &c., licensed for the sale of liquors by retail, and such as are calculated to preserve in the municipality, peace and public decency, and repress drunkenness and disorderly and riotous conduct. As such they cannot be said to interfere with the general regulation of trade and commerce which belongs to the Dominion Parliament, and do not conflict with the provisions of the Canada Temperance Act, which does not appear to have as yet been locally adopted.

"The subject of Legislation in the Ontario Act of 1877, Sections 4 and 5, seem to come within the heads Nos. 8, 15 and 16, of Section 92 of British North America Statute, 1867.

"Their Lordships are therefore of opinion that in relation to Sections 4 and 5 of the Act in question, the Legislature of Ontario acted within the powers conferred on it by the Imperial Act of 1867, and that in this respect there is no conflict with the powers of the Dominion Parliament."

Now, what the hon. gentleman averred was that it was the case according to his opinion, and that it was judged by Russell and The Queen that a Local Legislature could not regulate tavern licences at all, that they could not pass any law to decide who should have a license, or how many licenses should be issued, or with reference to hours, &c.—that all they could do, was to impose a license fee for Provincial and municipal purposes, and that any body who chose to pay that fee, so far as the Local Government was concerned, must be entitled to a license, and could not be restricted. That was the hon. gentleman's proposition. I say that proposition is condemned conclusively by the judgment I have just now read. As I have said before, the hon. gentleman is a centralizer. I dare say he may ask this Parliament—having passed this law under his misleading, as a question of necessity alleged by him to prevent a great calamity, which more than any one in the Dominion he is desirous should be averted; having asked Parliament to pass this law, on the plea of the absolute nullity of the local laws regulating the sale of licenses—he may now ask Parliament to say: Oh, well, after all, it is not necessary, but it is expedient; it is politic; and as a matter of policy it is better we should keep the power which, under another pretext, we took in our hands last Session. But I hope—it having been now established that that large measure of power which has been exercised by Local Governments since Confederation, is embraced in its intrinsic and essential principles, within the phrase "municipal institutions," and therefore devolves expressly, by virtue of the British North America Act, upon the Local Parliaments—the hon. gentleman will acknowledge that he did not lead Parliament correctly on a late occasion, that there was not that necessity arising from the nullity of the local legislation which he asserted, that there was not therefore any fact or cause which was alleged for that law, and that he will not seek now to draw us into conflict with the Local Legislatures on some other pretence of concurrent, paramount, enhanced, or mystical power. It may be that he will. He always desires to centralize, but let those who are lovers of the Federal Constitution, who admire the Federal principle, who believe that the well-being of this Confederation depends upon the large measures of local liberties reserved to the different Provinces, in this widely extended, different circumstanced, and sparsely populated Dominion. Let those who entertain these sentiments resist the proposition which the hon. gentleman himself, last Session, disclaimed, the proposition that we ought to endeavour to intrude upon this question, to touch it at all, except from the necessity which he alleged, but which has now been proved not to exist. The hon. member for Glengarry made a quotation, and he said I smiled when he made it. I did smile. I think delenda est Carthago was not a very apt quotation on a proposition for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I will venture to say to the hon. gentleman what occurred to my mind when he made his quotation. Whether unwittingly, I have no doubt, for I am sure he desires with the rest of us, the good of his country—whether all unwittingly by his undeviating support of all these measures to which I have been referring, by the course he has insisted on being pursued with the results I have indicated—he may not have been unintentionally but none the less assuredly, accomplishing his motto with the slight change delenda est Canada. The hon. member for Levis called, in the course of his address, for a consideration of the peculiar condition of the Province of Quebec. He pointed out its special condition, its special relations to the rest of the Dominion, and called for a liberal consideration of its special rights. I would say to the hon. gentleman that when he has adorned this Parliament a little longer, he will find that if there is one thing this Parliament is disposed not to do, it is to meddle with Quebec; and he will find any danger which Quebec runs, is because it is not always the case that the hon. members from that Province—and I have one of them now in my eye—who are or make themselves the special guardians of its rights in this Parliament, are equally careful of the application of the same principles which they would desire to see applied to their own Province when the question concerns some other Province. I would desire him to remember that it is by a firm and careful adherence and a uniform and undeviating application to all the Provinces of the same hon. gentleman's principles of respect for the Federal principle of respect for the local rights, and by resisting, as endangering the whole fabric, any attempted infringement upon them in any one Province, that the views of my hon. friend will ultimately prevail; and that, so long as we find jealousy in respect of those rights when they affect a particular Province, and indifference, or even a disposition to assist in their impairment, when only other Provinces are concerned, so long it is impossible to say that what the hon. gentleman wishes, namely, the maintenance on a sound and immutable basis of the Federal principle, has yet been attained. Now, Mr. Speaker, when we met last year for the first time, I adverted to the many changes which had taken place in the constitution of the Parliament from the time we met before. Since that time several changes, even in this brief interval, have taken place—some of them expected, some of them unexpected. To one or two only I wish to allude. The hon. gentleman opposite has been relieved of the disagreeable and embarrassing necessity of making an election. He finds himself free from the necessity of choosing between the two devoted constituencies which claimed his hand, and both of which would have been delighted to stick to him if the law of this country had permitted. But that spouse of his, so faithful while she adhered to him, has been unfaithful since, and another man sits for Lennox. I regret exceedingly, and I am sure the hon. gentleman regrets, what his

Mr. BLAKE.

Toronto organ, with a fine appreciation of the fitness of things, calls "the temporary triumph of vice over virtue," which resulted in this election. Other faces we miss, and other faces reappear amongst us. I shall allude to one only. We have lost John Pickard, a man firm in his political opinions, but who possessed the rare good fortune, I believe, of not having a single person on unfriendly terms with him in this House, who was a friend to everybody and to whom everybody was a friend, who had the singular happiness of evoking during his life those universal expressions of affection and sympathy which are too often suppressed until the heart they would have gladdened is cold in death. I feel that I speak the sentiments of every man on both sides of the House when I say that we mourn his loss. As I have said before, and as I said last Session, this new Parliament, changed as it was greatly then, changed as it is now, had before it a future, a future which it had to make; and I ventured to express the hope which I forced myself then to entertain that that future would be a bright one. That future has since become, in considerable measure, a past, and those hopes are dim. But, though much be taken, much remains. There is yet time, and even now, after the experiences of last Session, I will repeat the expression of the hope that we shall take heed to the lessons of the year, that we shall endeavour to repair the errors of the past, and, if we cannot now achieve all that might have been achieved, we shall yet endeavour to do for our country what may, under present circumstances, be done for its best.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, if I cannot agree in all that my hon. friend, if he will allow me to call him so, has stated in his interesting speech, I can agree with him in the opening sentences in which he paid a just, graceful, I may say an eloquent compliment, to the mover and seconder of the resolutions which are now before the House. These are not merely ceremonial compliments, on the present occasion at all events, because, from the speeches of both gentlemen, we can perceive what valuable members they are of this body. I can also agree with the hon. gentleman in his remarks as to the illustrious individual who represents Her Majesty in Canada, and to his two predecessors. It is not, perhaps, the best taste, or would not be the best taste, for an adviser of the Crown to pay compliments to the Governor General who accords the Ministry his political confidence; but I may be permitted to say with the hon. gentleman, and to believe, as I do, that, when the term of office of the present representative of the Sovereign is ended, he will enjoy not only the affection but the confidence of the people in as great a degree as his predecessors. The hon. gentleman has spoken at greater length than is usual on the opening of a Parliament, and in answer to a Speech from the Throne. It has become in England, and is becoming in this country, the practice to consider the Speech a formality—a necessary constitutional formality, but still a formality—and to address ourselves with as little discussion as possible to the business for which we are called. The hon. gentleman has, however, much to the instruction, much to the amusement of the House, addressed us for some considerable period, and he commenced by stating that the Speech was remarkable for its omissions. Now, a Speech from the Throne is made for the purpose of conveying to Parliament an idea of the important measures that are expected to be submitted for their consideration. It is not expected to enter into all subjects that are not to be considered, that will not be considered, and that cannot be considered, that have been settled, or are so far aside from the business of the day as not to call for the attention of Parliament during the then Session. I can congratulate my hon. friend on the style in which he has addressed the House. It is a new departure, a new appearance of my

hon. friend. Why, in days of old, even in the last Session, he assumed the tone of a grave statesman, of a sedate politician, or rather a stern political economist. Now he has taken quite a new rôle, broken out in a new place, as the saying is, and instead of a speech on the various subjects of importance, he has treated us to a good deal of very pleasant badinage. I could not at first understand the reason for all this jocosity. I could not understand why the hon. gentleman had taken a new tone, had adopted a new rôle; but, as the speech went on, I began to understand it, when I heard him bring out, in the first place, the suggestion that there was a short crop; then that the Speech showed that there was overtrading; then that there was discontent in the North-West; then that the Premier of the Province of Manitoba had expressed his discontent; then, still further, that the speech showed some indications that there might possibly be a failure in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway; and, Sir, more than all, when the hon. gentleman alluded with such gusto to the fact that there perhaps might be a series of bankruptcies in the country. He revelled in the idea, Mr. Speaker. Oh! with what unction he brought out the fact that there was a proposal in the Mail to establish a soup kitchen to help the starving poor. The hon. gentleman got what he has been wishing for, he got what his party has been praying for, the hon. gentleman got the country at last to the only position in which by any possibility he or his party can get into power. He thinks the country will get into a wretched position and then, when it is in such a position—and he revels in the misfortunes which his press had predicted, which his press had desired, and which it exults in—then he thinks there will be some chance for the hon. gentleman opposite. The jocosity, the smiles, the badinage, the little pleasantries of the hon. gentleman are quite understood, and I have no doubt will be appreciated by this House, and by the country. The hon. gentleman was a little erratic in his taking up the various topics of the Speech. He did not follow them paragraph by paragraph, and I must to some extent follow him. I had not the opportunity that the hon. gentleman had of preparing these elaborate sarcasms, of making quotations of one hon. member from this side in November, another in October, and another in August. I have not an opportunity of preparing any impromptues like the hon. gentleman, so that I have to follow him in the way that he has taken. He alludes to British Columbia. He does not say that he objects to all that he has heard, or that he knows of the settlement made by the Government, the provisional settlement made with that Province. He is glad of course—he professes gladness—that all sorts of causes of quarrel, or discussion between the Province of British Columbia, and the Dominion have ended. I do not know that I am able to answer my hon. friend. We have lost a good many, as the hon. gentleman says, in this House. We have lost the only man that could answer him—my friend Mr. Bunster. He took care of British Columbia in his day, and he threw back the taunts and sarcasms of the hon. member when he chose to attack British Columbia. I, in my feeble way, must assume the position of Mr. Bunster. The hon. gentleman does not object, as I understand it, to any of the terms of settlement, so far as they have appeared in the public press; and he quoted a speech of the Minister of Justice, my colleague, stating that the particular arrangement of building the Island Railway was the payment of a debt due to Victoria because they elected me. Well, the hon. gentleman says very truly, that honest men pay their debts, but they pay their debts with their own money. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think the people of British Columbia, at all events, think that the Dominion owes them a great debt for returning me to be head of the Government instead of handing it over to the hon. gentleman; and I have no doubt that not only British Columbia, but the whole Dominion will accept, also, by a large majority, the belief that really Victoria did confer a benefit upon the Dominion by enabling me to appear here in my present condition as Minister of the Crown. The hon. gentleman took occasion—it was quite proper for him to do so, there is no reason why he should not—to allude to the parties who are, it is said, going to build the Island Railway, and he spoke about Mr. Huntington, and other American magnates who are coming in to build that road. Well, I believe I have the same sources of information as the hon. gentleman, and perhaps a little more. I believe that there are some American magnates coming in, and that Mr. Dansmuir, who is a Canadian millionaire, a British subject by birth, and one of the most enterprising men of the whole Dominion, is going to join them. I am very glad that such is the credit of Canada all over, and such is the credit of that particular portion of Canada which is called British Columbia, that we can at last, under the present Government, get American magnates to come in and invest their money. But, Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure that those same American magnates, during the reign of the hon. gentleman opposite, would not have come in; not a shilling, not a cent, not a nickle would they put into any Canadian fund of any kind so long as the Government, its revenues, its future, and its present, were under the paternal guidance of hon. gentlemen opposite. An hon. friend near me says I must remember that the debt was created by hon. gentlemen opposite. It was an obligation created by hon. gentlemen opposite; a promise made by them, an engagement made by hon. gentlemen opposite, which we are now carrying out. I do not choose to dwell upon that, because if we cannot put everything into the Queen's Speech, neither can we put everything into the debate on the Address, notwithstanding the hon. gentleman's eloquent exertions to do so. But, Sir, that is the fact: that this same Island Railway, this same obligation, was created by the Government of which the hon. gentleman was a member. The hon. gentleman then alluded to the paragraph relating to the North-West; that some legislation would be required in consequence of the rapid development of that portion of Her Majesty's Dominions; and he took occasion to say that there was a great omission in the Speech when there was no notice taken of the discontent that, he says, exists there. He specially quoted with the greatest pleasure—he had it carefully in his drawer, there it was pasted, with the industry, with the care that would do honor to my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Rykert)—there he had it, Mr. Norquay's speech, and he says, Here is the evidence of discontent; here is the evidence of the want of policy; here is the evidence of the misgovernment of that country. Why, Mr. Norquay is coming down—I believe he has come down—to ask for better terms. I remember the time when Nova Scotia came to ask for better terms, when it was represented to this House, and to the Parliament at that time, that Nova Scotia was discontented, that Nova Scotia was recalcitrant, that she was about to secede. There was an imminent danger of that, we were told. Yet, I think the hon. gentleman excelled himself in Opposition—and the hon. gentleman is powerful in Opposition—when, notwithstanding that discontent, notwithstanding the dissatisfaction that existed in Nova Scotia, notwithstanding the great danger there was from the beginning that she would secede, that hon. gentleman opposed strongly, ably and vigorously, the granting of better terms. Why, of course, Mr. Norquay comes down here. He is not coming, to use a very celebrated expression, to cry "stinking fish." He exaggerates, if possible, or, rather, he presses as strongly as he can, all the various reasons why better terms should be granted. I have no doubt that we will consider them. We will not treat the application for better terms in the same manner the hon. gentleman did that of Nova Scotia. We will give it every consideration—not frightened by threats, nor yet prevented from doing justice, if we think justice demands any action, by being told that we are conceding improperly the demands of the Province, as we were told in the case of Nova Scotia. The hon. gentleman says there are various causes of discontent, and these should all have appeared in the Speech. Among other things he says it was very improper to reserve the lands lying in the mile belt; and yet the hon. gentleman, forgetting that portion of his speech, attacked the Government afterwards for making too rapid progress in railway construction and for building the road so quickly that the population became scattered. The hon. gentleman urges that the people should not be allowed to scatter all over the North-West, but should be kept in one place, all of which would have been accomplished if his railway policy had been carried out. If we had only had the water-stretches system and the vigorous action of the Sir W. P. Howland Syndicate, then the hon. gentleman would have had what he wanted, not the scattering of a vigorous population all over the country, but the concentration of people in one place. They would have been compelled to have hung round Winnipeg, to have bought the land held by Winnipeg speculators at speculators' prices; they would not have been allowed to isolate themselves, for there would have been no railway to have carried them out to Brandon, Regina, Moose Jaw, or Calgary. The few people who would have gone to the country would have been obliged, I say, to have remained near Winnipeg for want of railway communication. The hon. gentleman would then have been satisfied; all his anticipations would have been realized. Instead of a population rushing in, 25,000, 50,000 and 100,000, they would have gone in in few numbers under the wonderful management, great foresight and vigorous administration of hon. gentlemen opposite. Yes, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman says he objected, and objects now, to the policy of locking up the mile belt. In the first place, both his Government and our Government were pledged that the North-West should pay the cost of its own railway. We saw and felt that there was no reason why the taxpayers of the Maritime Provinces, or of the old Province of Canada should, out of their own pockets, pay for railway construction in the North-West. Those hon. gentlemen felt, as we felt, that in order to develop that great country, we should make an advance, borrow money and loan it to the North-West, which was rich enough when its resources were developed to repay principal and interest for the advance which they wished Parliament to make. We did ask Parliament to make the grant. Parliament made the grant, but under a solemn pledge given by myself and my colleagues, that we believed and knew that by a proper and vigorous administration of the affairs of that country, not one farthing would be taken out of the pockets of the rest of Canada, and that the North-West should pay for and build its own railway. In pursuance of that policy, Parliament, in its wisdom, not aside 100,000,000 acres of land for the purpose of repaying to the rest of Canada the temporary advance of $:5,000,000 to build that great road. In carrying out that policy we were obliged, of course, to take care that while opening up the country and providing amply sufficient areas of land for all settlers, the plan should be carried out so that old Canada should not be obliged to be out of pocket ultimately. With respect to the mile belt, being then Minister of the Interior, adopted, to a very great extent, the advice and suggestions of my hon. friend who has just spoken. My hon. friend said—it will be found in Hansard, but I have not Hansard before me, for I am not a collector of speeches like the hon. gentleman or like my hon. friend behind me—but I remember his remark well, and I am quite sure he will not deny it—that while every settler should have the right to get his homestead, there was no reason why he should become a millionaire, and Government should take great care that town sites and valuable spots along the line should be sold at their value for the purpose of forming a fund to build the railway. The hon. gentleman pressed strongly upon the House the propriety, expediency and justice of selling the land along the line, so far as town sites were concerned, certainly, for the purpose of building the road. Everybody who has gone through the country—I have not had that experience—knows that from Red River to Calgary there are few points which nature indicates as being certainly the site of a town. The country is one vast prairie and there are only one or two points marked out by nature, I say, as future town sites, and as a general rule it is mere accident as to whether a place becomes a town or remains a mere rural section. It would therefore be quite impossible for the Government to find out where the town sites would most likely be. But there was another reason, which I had occasion to elaborate to some extent last Session. When the boom to which the hon. gentleman has referred prevailed in the North-West, there was a rush of speculators all along the line, and there was great danger of the honest and bond fide settler, who wanted to obtain a homestead in the vicinity of the railway, being crowded out by paid agents of speculators who sent out hired myrmidons by the dozen and even by the hundred to put up false, fictitious and fraudulent evidence of settlement. While the boom existed it was quite impossible to decide between the honest settler and the pretended settler in the pay of a speculator. These paid agents were scattered all over the country, as was admitted by the hon. member from Manitoba who spoke last year. Then men, under the pretence of being honest settlers, went upon land and put up a fence or threw up a few rods of soil in a perfunctory manner; these were the paid servants of speculators who were receiving a commission in addition to monthly wages, and there was danger that land would remain in the same state as the land in the immediate vicinity of Winnipeg remains, namely, held by speculators for advanced prices, greatly to the loss of that section of the country, and to the disadvantage of the city itself as well as to the honest settler. With respect to the land between the railway and the boundary line, not one single honest settler, not one single bond fide immigrant who has settled on any one lot, has been dispossessed, not one man has been disturbed. There must have been some little uncertainty in men's minds while a reserve existed; but that must, and will exist until the whole country is settled. That section was the most profitable and valuable portion of the whole of the North-West; that was the portion we had desired and intended to commence selling for the purpose of recouping the loan made by the people of Canada to the people of the North-West. Sir, that boom is over, the inflation was excessive; the reaction was correspondingly great for a time. I am happy to believe that is over now. I am happy to believe that prices have resumed their normal condition, that land is now held at fair prices, not at fictitious or speculative values. The moment the time came when the Government were satisfied, when the Department of the Interior had the evidence before it that the time had passed for speculators to rush in and put on the land agents, and thus procure a fraudulent settlement, and that those speculators had enough to do at home to meet their engagements without seizing on new lands and dispossessing bond fide settlers, that moment the Government, not a moment too soon and I do not think too late, withdrew their reservation. And what is the consequence? The consequence is that the real settler now goes in, not the agent or the speculator, not the land jobber or the land shark, but the real, bond fide settler, and whether he comes from the Mother Country or from older Canada he is certain to find his homestead, to choose his homestead, to enjoy his homestead. That, Sir, is my answer to the attack made on the policy of the Government. I consider that I am responsible personally for that policy; I am responsible also for the opening up of the lands; I am responsible in every way, and I am quite satisfied that the Government acted wisely in keeping out the land shark at the time it did, and equally wisely in opening up these lands for the settler at the proper time. Then the hon. gentleman attacked the colonization companies, as I believe he did on former occasions. Well, Sir, the colonization system was not initiated by the present Government. The colonization system, the granting of lands to capitalists for the purpose of inducing settlement, was inaugurated and carried out by our predecessors—carried out not to a very large extent, because they had not the opportunity, they had not the country, but they began the system and we have carried it on, and we have no reason to regret our having done so. In the first place, if we compare the Northern and Western States with the position of our own North-West, at the time we undertook the administration of affairs, we will find that the chief lands of the American North-West were granted to the American railways; that these railways have had agents all over the world, the best agents in the world, for the purpose of selling their lands. We had no large railway companies heavily subsidized at that time. The Government were using all the machinery they could possibly use, in the way of an Immigration Department, for the purpose of encouraging immigration. They could not do what private individuals or railway companies, or colonization companies could do. The Government carried out, to a very considerable extent, the policy of their predecessors, and that policy has, on the whole, been successful. There has been many and many an immigrant and settler who has gone in there through the agency of the colonization companies, who would not have gone in there but for these companies. Besides that, we had the commencement of the fund, and a very large and satisfactory commencement of the fund, out of which we have to repay to the Dominion Treasury the $25,000,000 pledged to build the Canadian Pacific Railway. The assertion that in any way settlers were kept out of the country included in the colonization grants, is mistaken. Everybody knows who has looked at the regulations and the Government system, that the even-numbered sections in every colonization grant, are open to the homesteader just as much as if the land had not been included in the grant. Any homesteader can go on the land of any colonization company, and say this is No. 8 or No. 4 or No. 6, or any even-numbered section, and despite the company he can sit down on his land and can claim his patent and obtain his patent for it. The plan of the Government is simply this: that so far as the odd-numbered sections are concerned, they should get a price for them; that the money should be put in the Public Treasury to pay for the subsidy, and that the colonization companies, in order to make it a matter of interest to them to act as immigration agents and find settlers, should get the odd-numbered sections at half price if they found settlers to settle on the even-numbered sections. The consequence is, that some of the companies have failed. Some of them were, I am afraid, merely speculative companies, had not a bona fide intention of looking for settlers, but merely went in for the purpose of making something out of it. Some of them, on the other hand, have gone to great expense, have laid out large sums of money, and have agents traversing England, Ireland and Scotland for the purpose of bringing out immigrants to settle these lands. That is the policy of the Government, and I believe it has been successful, and I have no doubt that within three or four years more—because these companies have scarcely had time to work out this system or generate the capital in order to do so—but in a few years the country will acknowledge that the system was a good one, and that such of the companies as were bona fide— as many of them were—became active, earnest, zealous, and successful agents in settling the North-West. The hon. gentleman alluded as one cause of discontent to the disallowance of certain local railway Bills. I would only ask the hon. gentleman to go to the people of Winnipeg and ask them whether they want any local railways running from the Canadian Pacific Railway west of them down to the Province line. Let him ask the people of Winnipeg, the place where the excitement has arisen, and he will find that any man who would venture to state that he was in favour of that system of allowing local railways to run wherever they pleased from the Canadian Pacific Railway to the frontier, would have very little chance of representing Winnipeg or the electoral district of which it is the centre. The hon. gentleman has said that one great cause of discontent is the high Tariff. Well, that is the old question of Protection against Free Trade. The people there are taxed no more by the high Tariff than the people in the other parts of the Dominion. The people of the other parts of the Dominion—I am sorry for the hon. gentleman's sake to say it, because I know it is a disappointment to him—are submitting to the National Policy in a spirit of Christian resignation and a spirit of Christian hope and expectation. Besides, when we talk to the people of the North-West we can say to them, Would you rather have Free Trade and a deficit and no railway, or Protection and a high Tariff, with the Canadian Pacific Railway and a surplus? and I think the people, en masse, if the question were put to them, would decide in favour of Protection and the surplus and the Canadian Pacific Railway instead of a deficit, no railway, and Free Trade. There would be the glorious privilege of buying American manufactures at their border, if American manufactures could be carried or transported by toboggans or waggons across the plains, in the absence of a railway. The hon. gentleman said that he did not wish to commit himself in any way with respect to the cry for a Hudson Bay Railway. There is a natural impatience in the North-West for want of transport, of course, and hence the cry for the Hudson Bay Railway. That Parliament is anxious to assist such an enterprise is shown by its chartering two companies. These two companies, I am glad to believe, are about to amalgamate, so that they will unite their strength to build a railway from the Pacific Railway—I suppose in the vicinity of Winnipeg—to Hudson Bay. That is the action of Parliament. The action of the Government has been this: in order to encourage that railway, if it has any vitality—and I do not mean to say that it has not vitality and a great future before it—I am not competent to speak as to that; but the Government, in order to encourage it, have agreed to give a larger land grant to that railway and at a lower price than to any other railway that has been subsidized in the North-West, except the Canadian Pacific Railway itself. They have agreed to give twice the quantity of land, and at half the price, that they have given to the Manitoba and South-Western, and the other railways which are projected through that country. Well, there is a natural feeling of impatience in the country, because the people cannot get their crops out; hence the great agitation for the immediate construction of the Hudson Bay Railway. They are now obliged to send their grain by foreign railways to eastern Canada. They are obliged to send it to the boundary line and there take the American railways. The American railways, of course, consider only their own interest. They have no interest in common with those people, and do not care whether they suffer or not. They put on just what tariff they please for their own purposes. But, Mr. Speaker, in two years the scene will be changed. There will be two routes through Canada. There will be the all-rail route running from Calgary through the whole of the wheat district and to the north of Lake Superior, direct to Montreal and the sea; and there will be, besides, the subsidiary line running from Winnipeg to Prince Arthur's Landing, and thence by steamers put on for the purpose, to eastern Canada;—two lines to carry off the agricultural wealth of the North-West. If these two lines are found to be insufficient, I have no doubt other lines will be established, and the Hudson Bay route, if it be the route, will have its turn. That is all I have to say with respect to the remark made by the hon. gentleman as to the Hudson Bay Railway. Now, Sir, I do not know why it is that the hon. gentleman is always against the interests of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I do not understand why, from the beginning of the proposition until now, he has been its steady opponent. He was opposed to building the line to the north of Lake Superior at all. At all events, he was strongly in favor of postponing it for years and years—it was to be built in the distant future, in the days of our grandchildren; whereas, Mr. Speaker, if you now ask the men most interested in the building of that road—if you ask a man like Mr. Van Horne, the chief manager of the company, a man who has had as large a railway experience, both in the United States and Canada, as any man on this continent, he will tell you that of all the portions of the Canadian Pacific Railway, from one end to the other, there is no portion so important in the view of the company as the line that runs to the north of Lake Superior—no portion so absolutely necessary to make this line what we wish to make it, a great arterial line, carrying the produce of Canada from one end to the other, from sea to sea; no portion more important than that part of the line which the hon. gentleman opposed with all his might and main, and with all his eloquence. And, Sir, as he failed in that, he has never forgotten his opposition. His opposition is consistent, steady. His amour-propre seems to be interested in fighting this railway. He cannot allow himself not to be infallible; he cannot allow himself to have ever made a mistake; he cannot allow himself to have been mistaken in the two great positions he used to take—first, that there should be no railway, in our time, north of Lake Superior, and second, that there should be no line through British Columbia to the Pacific Ocean. He cannot forget that he took these two positions; and, as they are both carried against him, as both of these portions of the railway are going to be built and are going to be the most profitable portions—

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman says hear, hear. He says the road has been built too rapidly. He did not want the road built rapidly. He wanted it to go on slowly, easily, with the old, honest jog-trot of a hundred years ago. He says it is going to cost a great lot of money. So it is. He says that immigrants are going to be scattered. They are going to settle in little quiet communities. They are going to be scattered over half that immense continent. They will be sitting around their fires, enjoying their domestic happiness, within easy range of the municipal institutions of Winnipeg, and listening to the church-going bell that rings along the Red River. Sir, supposing the hon. gentleman's plan had been carried out—and if the second syndicate had got the contract, it would have been carried out—what would have been the price of coal in Winnipeg at this moment? Why, Sir, by building that railway, by forcing it through to Calgary, by pushing it across the continent, the coal requisite for comfort, almost for life, which formerly cost $23 a ton in Winnipeg, is now sold at $7. The wealth of that western country is now shown to be so great that it has been the most favoured portion for the immigration of the past year, and will be still more the favoured country for settlement and enterprise in the year 1884. It is a country for cattle, for horses, for sheep; a country for gold, for silver, and more important, it is a country for coal; and that country would not have been opened, not a ton of coal, not a nugget of gold would have been taken out, not a horse or cow or flock of sheep would have been herded on those plains and those declivities, if it had not been for the rapid progress of that railway—that wonderful combination of wealth and skill and disinterestedness which is called the Canadian Pacific Railway. But the hon. gentleman says that the company have not only built the main line too fast, but have gone into other enterprises which they should not have undertaken. They should have confined themselves to building from Callendar to Calgary. So far as the Government are concerned, and Government aid is concerned, I can tell hon. gentlemen in this House that not a dollar of money, not an acre of land, has been given to the Canadian Pacific Railway except on the certificate of the Chief Engineer that the money has been expended on the main line. Not one farthing has been expended, or one acre of land granted, except for that purpose. I cannot go over all the particulars the hon. gentleman has mentioned, because I do not know them all, when he quoted half a dozen of railways. What the interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway may be in those, I am not able to specify. The time will come when this subject will be before the House and then full particulars will be entered into, but I say that the Canadian Pacific Railway would have been a failure, would have failed in its great purpose of connecting the Atlantic with the Pacific, if the road had stopped at Calgary. Of what use would have been the road unless it extended from Calgary to Ottawa and from Ottawa to Montreal. Of what value would it have been to the people of the North-West, if they did not know that their produce would be carried across this line without breaking bulk, without intermission, without delay, at the cheapest possible rate, and in the shortest possible period, from the place of growth to the ships that are to take it to England from Montreal or Quebec. The hon. gentleman has been unable to grasp the magnitude of this question. He has been unable, even with his mighty mind, to seize the importance of building this railway in one straight line from the Pacific Ocean to Montreal and Quebec. The hon. gentleman has cavilled at every step that has been taken by the Government in building this great road. He objected to building it north of Lake Superior; he objected to extending it from Calgary to the Pacific Ocean; he now sneers at this company for their enterprise, for the grand idea they are carrying out, in a grand way, in order to make this country a grand country, instead of giving them his sympathy; instead of forgetting party; instead of forgetting his old and mistaken policy; instead of remembering that he was a Canadian first, before a Leader of the Opposition, and granting his support, and his voice, and his great and deserved influence, in making this great Canadian line a success—the greatest line belonging to any one country in the world. If you consider the straightness of the line, the healthfulness of the country it goes through, the fertility of the land it traverses, and the energetic people who are settling on both sides of it, I do not know that on either continent there is any railway with the present magnificent position or with a future equal to that of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The hon. gentleman then backed back as to the bad harvest and the over-trading. We did not, in the Speech, desire to say—it would be untrue if we did—that this country was not prosperous. This country in the present year is prosperous. If you look at the amount of money deposited in the savings banks in 1883, you will find it is greater than in any previous year. If you will consult the wholesale merchants in the great centres of commerce, Montreal, Toronto, St. John, or Halifax, you will find, by their unanimous voice, that payments have been promptly made by the country merchant who supplies the agriculturist, and that they have been made with greater regularity than in previous years.

We have all the indications of prosperity. The mere chance—the misfortune it is, certainly—of having an unsatisfactory crop, for the hon. gentleman says it is no worse, together with the fact that, in some instances, in our early experience, the manufacturers have made an over-production in some certain branches, has furnished the occasion of a cry; and there has also been ten or fifteen per cent. of frosted wheat in the North-West. It is a very strange thing that while that same frost cut down the crops in Minnesota and Dakota, and destroyed the whole of the corn crop through a large region in the Western States, you do not find the American press, the American statesmen, or American politicians, publishing to the world, and gloating over on the stump, the fact that their country has suffered in its production, and is not so prosperous as it has been in past years. It has been left to the Grits and the Grit press to defile our own nest. Much good may it do them. If they can persuade the farmer or the workman who, from over-production in a given mill or manufactory, has been obliged to work short time, that the National Policy is wrong, what care they—what care they about ruining the character of the country, depreciating its credit in the markets of the world, if they can only displace the National Policy Government and take its place? Hon. gentlemen opposite, like the individual depicted by Milton, who says it is better to rule in hell than to serve in heaven, would rather rule over a ruined country than sit quietly on the benches of the Opposition, seeing much against their will a people prosperous and a developing trade. But there are some wonderful omissions in this celebrated speech delivered by Lord Lansdowne the other day. Among other things he says the Washington Treaty ends in two years. It is of the very greatest importance to Canada that that subject should be dealt with by us now. Why, Mr. Speaker, I remember the time when every man in the Opposition called me Judas Iscariot and Benedict Arnold; I remember the time when I was hounded down; when I was called a traitor to the country, a traitor to its best interests, because I was in some degree, as one of the Commissioners, responsible for the Washington Treaty. It was called the "Washington Surrender,"—why, the surrender of Cornwallis was nothing to it. I was told I was a traitor. Benedict Arnold was a seraph to me. For the whole time from May, when the Treaty was signed, to the following winter, when we asked Parliament to confirm it, I was the victim of continuous attack. The language used was as plain and as honest Saxon as ever was used. There was no mincing; there was no circumlocution in the phrases applied to me. Of all the scoundrels who ever betrayed a country, I was the worst. And now I find the Leader of the Opposition, one of those gentlemen, who, no doubt to some extent, though always in a gentlemanly way, joined in these attacks upon me, says it is of great importance that that Treaty should not be allowed to drop. We must take it up, because there are great interests concerned, and he actually charges me and the Government of which I am the First Minister, with being guilty of a criminal omission, an omission he thinks he ought to bring up in the House in his place as a member of Parliament defending the interests of Canada, because we have not announced that we are going to take steps to continue that opprobrious Treaty. I remember the time when the then leader of the Opposition said, "And you have sold the territorial rights of Canada; you have given up the territorial rights of Canada for money, for money." Said he, "I loathe the idea of the money we get or will get under that Treaty." Yet we got $4,500,000. Non olet, if the hon. gentleman will allow me to quote Latin, though he objected to my hon. friend doing it, the money did not smell badly. They not only took the money which they loathed as a bribe to sell our best interests, our national honour, but they applied to Her Majesty the Queen to grant the title of Knight Commander of St. Michael and St. George to the Minister who was at the head of the Department that got the money. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of my hon. friend to one particular omission, which he dwelt on with great unction, which he dwelt on with special unction, and that is that, in my desire to centralize everything in this Government and the Parliament of Canada, I expended the money of the people of Canada in fighting out in England the claim of the Dominion Parliament to the escheats—estates forfeited by individuals leaving no heirs or representatives. That is the statement of the hon. gentleman. He said I was so anxious to centralize everything that I insisted upon that doctrine being carried out. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman did not design, I am quite sure, intentionally to misrepresent me, but there is a most unfortunate lapse in his memory. They say Mr. Gladstone has the same failing. He always believes anything he states at the time is true. Sometimes it is proved that it is not true, but at the same time everybody knows that Mr. Gladstone is a great statesman, and a saint, and a good man; and he is, no doubt. He is just as often as not wrong in his statements of facts, but he believes he is right when he makes a statement of any kind. The hon. gentleman says it is the Government of which I am a member that took up that question of escheats. Sir, from 1867 to 1873, when we went out, the Government took not one single step with regard to escheats. They never expressed an opinion in regard to that question where the escheats would go, and, although the hon. gentleman has got a lot of extracts, I challenge him or any man to state that anywhere from 1867 to now, at any time, he ever heard me express an opinion as to that contested question, whether the escheats went to the Provincial Government or the Dominion Government. I say I challenge the hon. gentleman or anybody to prove that, on any occasion, in Parliament or out of Parliament, I ever expressed any opinion on that question. It is a matter of little importance, as the hon. gentleman truly says. It did not give the Treasury anything, because everybody knows it is the practice, whenever there has been an escheat, if any relative, legitimate or illegitimate, if any friend, if any creditor of a person leaving an estate behind, can be found, the money is given up readily and willingly; it never has been considered a portion of the revenue of the country. It never has formed a portion of the revenue of the country. I do not believe that $5,000, I do not know that even $1,000, has ever found its way since Confederation into the Public Treasury from any escheat; therefore the charge that in any way whatever I desired in that instance to centralize the matter here is altogether erroneous; but, Mr. Speaker, I will go a little further. While no opinion was given by me as Minister of Justice, which I was from 1867 to 1873, strange to say, that the whole question arose on the decision of Mr. Mackenzie's Government; that the case arose on an opinion given by Mr. Lafamme, as the Minister of Justice of Mr. Mackenzie's Administration, declaring that the escheats belonged to the Dominion Government.

Mr. BLAKE. Mr. Fournier.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, Mr. Fournier; not Mr. Lafamme. It was Mr. Fournier, now a judge, made by the hon. gentleman, a Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada; and a very good judge, I believe, Mr. Fournier is—a man who does honour to the Bench; but he gave his opinion, as Minister of Justice, that all the escheated moneys went into the Dominion Treasury, and not into the Provincial Treasury. And, Mr. Speaker, when we came in, and this celebrated Mercer case arose, Mr. Mowat wrote here to know what we would do about it, and we came to an agreement that he might dispose of the money subject to the final decision of the question. Now, the question was raised by the Government of hon. gentlemen opposite. We had come to an arrangement carrying out the decision of the previous Government, and paying respect to that decision. We said: very well, you can keep the money and dispose of it in this Mercer institution or in any public way you like, subject, of course, to the final decision. It was absolutely necessary—we had not raised the question, it was sent home, not by the Government, we did not want to raise it, we never had raised it, but one of the persons supposing himself to be interested in the Mercer estate carried it to England—it was of great importance that the question should be settled, and our only intervention in the matter was that, in order that it might be finally settled and well argued, we agreed to support and stand by the decision of the previous Government, of which the hon. gentleman was a member—I do not think he was a member then—but of the previous Government, the Liberal Government; we agreed to stand by their decision. We could not, as a Government, I think, set aside the solemn decision of our predecessors, and we agreed to pay a fee to competent counsel, in order that the case might be fully argued. That will show the justice of the line of argument taken by the hon. gentleman against the Government. Then there was the great Hodge case. The hon. gentleman has quoted my speech and he has quoted his own speech. Well, Mr. Speaker, in my speech I went a little too far, there is no doubt. I am not like the hon. gentleman, infallible. But, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has never ventured to say that the McCarthy Act is ultra vires. The hon. gentleman has never ventured to say we had no right to pass that Act; he has never ventured to say that Act, when brought into full operation, will not have the force of law. His friend, political and personal friend, I have no doubt, Mr Bethune, has given a very strong opinion on that matter, and I think my hon. friend—not in his political capacity, but in his professional capacity—especially if he has got a hint of the fee that my hon. friend, the mover of the Address spoke of, would keep to his opinion that at all events the McCarthy Act was constitutional, and was not ultra vires. I am quite satisfied the hon. gentleman will not get up without a fee, and say that it is not the law of the land. Well, the Hodge case, I have no hesitation in saying, is not the last word of the question. I have no hesitation in saying that the Privy Council, for some reasons known to those behind the scenes, from the absence of those hon. members of it who usually take up questions under the British North America Act, avoided a decision, and the decision was this: that the Ontario Government, first, could make by-laws and regulations for the regulation of licenses; and, second, if they could do that themselves they could give that power over to the municipalities. That is simply the decision, but it in no way affects the decision in Woodward and Russell; in no way affects the decision in the Scott Act; in no way affects the language used by the Government of which the hon. gentleman was sometimes a member and sometimes not a member; sometimes a supporter and sometimes not a supporter. In 1878, when they put this language into the mouth of the Governor General—"It is very desirable," those hon. gentlemen said: they wanted to get up some new cry, not to say it is expedient, or it is right, or it is just, but something new, and they said: "It is very desirable that there should be uniform legislation in all the Provinces respecting spirituous liquors." Hitherto that trade had been regulated by Provincial laws or laws existing before the Confederation of the Provinces, although there had been lately a conflict of authority as to the jurisdiction of the local authorities. That was the announcement made in 1878, in the Speech from the Throne, by the hon. gentlemen opposite, and the same language may be applied to the McCarthy Act, that it is expedient that there should be one general law for the traffic of liquors over the whole of the Dominion instead of its being as heretofore regulated by different Provincial laws. We are going to carry out exactly what the hon. gentleman in 1878 gave his support to. But the hon. gentleman says we ought to have put this in the Speech. Mr. Speaker, if it were proposed to put a clause in that we were going to repeal the McCarthy Act, then there would be some sense in it, but the Government has no such intention. The Government know, as far as infallible man can know, that it is the law of the land, that it is expedient there should be one general law, that it is of great importance for the well-being of the community that there should be one general law, and they will, sub judice, take the chance of the courts disagreeing with us. I do not think the hon. gentleman will say that the courts ought to disagree with us, and that we had not every right and competency to pass that Act; and as to the expediency I only quote their language against themselves, that it is expedient. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I have tired you, at all events, I have tired myself. The hon. gentleman, perhaps, had better not have said much about the county of Lennox. That is sub judice, and, perhaps the hon. gentleman will find that neither he nor those who would like to have the support of the hon. gentleman who sits for that county now, will be so proud of it if the courts have a chance to get to a trial of the question. As for the gentleman who now holds the seat in this House, all I can say is that I wish him no harm. I know him, I know his friends, and I believe he is a very kindly gentleman, a gentleman liked by his neighbours, popular, and justly popular, as shown by the strong vote he has got. But whether he is going to hold the seat from which I was obliged to unwillingly to vamoise, is a question for the courts. I think the hon. gentleman had better have avoided an allusion to that matter. It brings up other questions. I will venture to say this, that if we had a sworn commission to try the validity of the seats of every man in this House, small in number, though strong in ability as the present Opposition is, their number would be decreased and ours on this side would be increased. I have no doubt of that, and if it was seriously challenged I would not fear the test.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Try it over again.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not want to lose my hon. friend. What would be the opposition from Lower Canada without my hon. friend? Why, the rouge flag would be paled, and those unfortunate degenerate bleus would be coming back here like a flock of sheep, not regulated, not controlled, not over-mastered by the great intellect, and the great morale of my hon. friend who wishes to have a new election. Now, my hon. friend in his speech wound up with an effective appeal to the hon. gentlemen from Lower Canada, saying, Take care if you desire Protection for your own institutions to see that the institutions of other Provinces are not attacked. Mr. Speaker, I went into Parliament in 1844, I became a Minister in 1854, and I have been supported by a French majority ever since that time. They have never failed me, and they have always had confidence in me, and I have, I believe, proved myself worthy of their confidence. Sir, I have suffered obloquy on their behalf; I have been attacked by those hon. gentlemen opposite in days gone by, when it was convenient for them to ride the Protestant horse, when they called me a slave to French influences, a slave to Romish influences, a slave to Lower Canada influences. It won't do, Mr. Speaker. All the blandishments of the hon. gentleman, if he put on twice the smiling countenance, and if he used twice the eloquent language that he has done and that he is able to do, will not make the people of the Province of Quebec believe that they are safer in his hands than in the hands of John A. Macdonald.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons an agreement made at Victoria, on the 20th day of August, 1883, relative to various points remaining unsettled between the Government of the Dominion, and that of the Province, together with the contract for the construction of a Railway on the Island of Vancouver, and accompanying papers, and recommends the same to the favourable consideration of your Honourable House.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
OTTAWA, 17th January, 1884.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 2) to amend the Criminal Law, and to extend the provisions of the Act respecting Offences against the Person.—(Mr. Cameron, Huron.)

Bill (No. 4) respecting Carriers by Land.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

LAND AGENT FOR CALGARY SECTION.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) enquired, Whether a Dominion Land Agent has been appointed for the Calgary section of the North-West? If so, when? His name, former residence and occupation; amount of salary; when did salary commence; where is his head office located; has he entered on the discharge of his duties? If so, when?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. William H. Hillyard, of Brandon, Manitoba, was appointed by Order in Council on the 23rd June, 1883, at a salary of $1,200 per annum. His head office will be at Calgary according to present arrangements; he has not entered upon the discharge of his duties because the surveys were not sufficiently completed to enable him to do so. Since the beginning of September he has been at work at the Brandon Land Office, and from that period his salary commenced to be paid.

LAND AGENT FOR ASSINIBOIA.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) enquired, Whether a Dominion Land Agent has been appointed, with his head office at Troy, or at any other point in Assiniboia? If such an appointment has been made, when was it made; what is the name of the appointee; his former residence and occupation; where is the office now located; what is the Agent's salary; when did it commence; has the Agent entered on the discharge of his duties? If so, when?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Dominion Land Agent has not been appointed with his head office at Troy. An Agent has been appointed for the Regina district with his head office at Regina city. The Agent's name is J. Macdonald Gordon. He was appointed in March, 1882, at which time he was residing in Ottawa, and occupying the position of a clerk in the Department of the Interior. He opened an office in a tent for a time at Troy, but since a building was prepared he removed to his present quarters. His salary is $1,200 per annum, and dates from the 1st of May, 1882. He entered on the discharge of his duties in the early part of June, 1882.

SALE OF SUPPLY FARM No. 20.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) enquired, Whether Supply Farm No. 20, on Fish Creek, near Calgary, has been sold; when, to whom, and for what price, and whether by private sale or public competition?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Supply Farm No. 20 has been sold to the Hon. Dr. Robitaille at a price of $3 per acre, by private sale, and not by public competition.

STATEMENT OF IMPORTS.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In the absence of Mr. Burpee, of St. John, I wish to move for a return similar to that which has been moved for by that hon. gentleman on two or three occasions,—a summary statement, similar to No. 2 in the Trade and Navigation Returns, of the goods imported for consumption, dutiable and free, in the Dominion of Canada, the amount of duty collected, and the rates of duty levied thereon, during the six months ending 31st December, 1883; also, a similar statement to No. 5, in the Trade and Navigation Returns, of the goods the produce and manufacture of Canada, exported from the Dominion of Canada for the six months ending 31st December, 1883. This, I think, has been regularly moved for and obtained during the last year or two.

Mr. BOWELL. Before the motion is carried, I would say to the hon. gentleman that some little time, as he well knows, must elapse before it will be possible to make out the desired return. We have to wait for all the papers from the different Provinces, and as the hon. gentleman very properly remarked in introducing the motion, the same resolution has been passed almost every Session for the last four or five years. But we have never been able to prepare the return and bring it down before the end of the Session, so that really it has been of very little use for the purposes to which it could be applied during the Session. I will, however, if possible, have the return brought down this Session at an earlier period, and see that it is made out with all possible despatch, but the hon. gentleman must not expect it for some weeks.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

That a Special Committee of seven Members be appointed to prepare and report, with all convenient speed, lists of Members to compose the Select Standing Committees ordered by the House on Thursday, the 17th instant, and that Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Leonard Tilley, Sir Charles Tupper, Sir Hector Langevin, Messrs. Blake, do compose the said Committee.

Mr. BLAKE asked that Messrs. Cartwright and Vail's names be substituted for Messrs Mackenzie and Laurier.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. BOWELL moved:

That a Select Committee, comprising Messrs. Béchard, Bergin, Charlton, Colby, Desjardins, McDonald (Cape Breton), Scriver, Somerville and White (Gardwell), be a Committee to supervise the Official Report of the Debates during the present Session.

Motion agreed to.

RETURNS.

Motions for the following Returns were severally agreed to:—

A duly certified copy of the complaint or petition of Eugène Gosselin, of St. Charles de Bellechasse, farmer, presented to the Dominion Arbitrators; also of all the record of proceedings before the said Arbitrators, including all evidence, accounts, protests and judgment in the said case and forming part of the said record.—(Mr. Amyot.)

Return in the form used in the statements usually published in the Gazette, of the exports and imports from the 1st day of July, 1882, to the 1st day of January, 1883, and from the 1st day of July, 1883, to the 1st day of January, 1884, distinguishing the products of Canada and those of other countries.—(Sir Richard Cartwright.)

Return showing (approximately) the number of immigrants who are supposed to have settled in the Province of Ontario in the years 1879, 1880, 1881, 1882 and 1883, respectively.—(Sir Richard Cartwright.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 5) to consolidate and amend the Acts respecting the elections of Members of the House of Commons.—(Mr. Cameron, Huron.)

MINISTERIAL CHANGES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman opposite has asked me to give an explanation of the Ministerial changes which have taken place since last Session. The only change which has taken place is this: The Hon. Mr. Macpherson, who was Speaker of the Upper House and a member of the Government, resigned his Speakership and was appointed Minister of the Interior in my place, I taking the office of President of the Council. There is a change in the administration of the Department of the Interior in this regard: that the Indian Department, instead of being under the charge of the Minister, is now under the charge of the President of the Council, myself. The Mounted Police Branch which is connected with the Indian Department, is also transferred to the Department of the President of the Council under the Statute. The Hon. Mr. Macpherson is now Minister of the Interior, and I am President of the Council and Superintendent-General of Indian Affairs.

Mr. BLAKE. I am very glad that the hon. gentleman has thought fit to disassociate himself from the very heavy office, adequately filled, of Minister of the Interior. I think that all of us who have been for some years in Parliament must have felt convinced that the office of First Minister is quite sufficiently exacting in itself without the addition to it of extremely onerous departmental duties, and that the necessary result of such addition is that one or other of the functions of the person filling that position must be more or less neglected. I hope that in the comparatively smaller sphere of departmental duties to which the hon. gentleman is now devoting himself, he will find it possible to administer with more successful result; in point of economy, at any rate, the Indian Department. We all know the mode in which our expenses have swelled for some years in that Department, and I look with some degree of hope to the exercise of greater economy in that branch now that the hon. gentleman is no longer embarrassed with the nominal, if not actual, control of the Ministry of Interior. But, while I say so much in approval of the course the hon. gentleman has wisely taken, I must renew the suggestion I have made once or twice with reference to Ministerial changes that have taken place under this Administration. The work of the Department of the Interior has very much to do with the revenue of the country, and is very largely of an executive and administrative character, in respect of which there ought to be the most immediate and active responsibility as between the Minister and the Commons. It is a description of work in which, particularly as the hon. gentleman has moulded and executed the Statutes, we have mainly but the privilege of obtaining information and of criticising the administration; but it is also important that should be done with the Minister in this House. It seems, therefore, unfortunate, that this important Department should have been transferred from this House to the other Chamber. The hon. gentleman has said that this is the only Ministerial change, and therefore, I presume, he thinks—and I do not intend to object to his mode of viewing the subject in that regard—that it is not fitting, under an enquiry as to Ministerial changes, to make any explanation with reference to the anomalous conjunction of offices witnessed since last Session in respect of his colleague sitting beside him; and I suppose it is in some other form we must ask explanations that are due this House and the country in that respect.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. With respect to the Indian Department I can only say I will give it the same attention I have given it hitherto. The House knows perfectly well, or they did not listen to the remarks and lucid explanations I have made on many occasions in other circumstances, that the expenses of the Indian Department were necessarily very great. The Indians were thrown on the Treasury in a destitute condition, and we could not allow them to starve; but I am glad to say, in the language of the Speech, that the reports this year are most satisfactory. The Indians have confined themselves to the reserve, and if they have not been as energetic as white men, they have made and are making rapid progress towards self-maintenance, which means a very considerable reduction in the annual expenditure. With respect to the Department of the Interior I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that the office of First Minister, extending over all the Departments, involves so many miscellaneous duties, it is important that he should be free from heavy departmental work. In 1878, when I took the two offices of First Minister and Minister of the Interior, the reason I did so was that the country was going to be the scene of large operations, and that some system had to be laid down for immigration, settlement of the new population, and opening up of the North-West generally; and this involved large principles and a vast policy for which the First Minister must be held primarily responsible. For that reason I accepted the double duty. Subsequently, when the work became more distinctly departmental, I obtained the able assistance of the Speaker of the Upper House, who relieved me in a most disinterested way of the excessive pressure of work, and he, with his usual thoroughness, has become thoroughly acquainted with the business of the North-West and the Department. It is true it would be well if arrangements could be made for the Minister to be here, but the next best thing has been done; all my present colleagues being actively employed in their Departments. Having initiated in a considerable degree the policy of the North-West, being acquainted with it, I shall be here as First Minister, taking the responsibility of meeting the House on all matters connected with the Department of the Interior, and I hope I shall receive—I do not ask the confidence—but the support on all proper occasions of my hon. friend opposite. With respect to the fact that the hon. Minister of Railways is acting just now as High Commissioner, I have no occasion to allude to that. That is not a Ministerial change. If any discussion is to arise on that point, both he and I had better wait until the subject is brought properly before the House.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I was going to congratulate my hon. friend on the promptness he has shown in calling us together early in the Session so that we might be able to adjourn by Easter; but if we begin at this rate of despatch I will have to withdraw my compliment. There are numerous subjects to which the attention of the Government might be directed at once, for instance the Bothwell or the Megantic elections, or the Government might show the same interest towards the other Provinces that they displayed last Session towards Ontario, when they devoted six weeks to the Ontario elections, by giving their attention to the state of affairs existing in Quebec. There are many other subjects, in fact, which we might discuss. Take, for instance, the Shields matter, and many other subjects which I could suggest. I will furnish any number to my hon. friend opposite, in order that he may set us to work. For my own part I am ready to work. I speak on my own account only, and, rather than adjourn now, I propose that we should do something on any kind of subject that the hon. gentleman might bring forward, and I would take in preference the Shields matter.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the hon. gentleman should move that we do something.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I was taken by surprise; I never anticipated this.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That would be a new step in the hon. gentleman's career, that we should do something. He has not yet succeeded in doing anything, and, if he wants to do something now, let him move. I shall move that the House do now adjourn.

Motion agreed to; and (at 3:45 o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 23rd January, 1884.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

That a Message be sent to the Senate, requesting that their Honours will unite with this House in the formation of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the subject of the Printing of Parliament, and that the members of the Select Standing Committee on Printing, namely, Messrs. Baker (Missisquoi), Bergin, Bourassa, Bowell, Desjardins, Foster, Houde, Innes, Landry (Montmagny), McDonald (Cape Breton), Somerville (Brant), Tassé, Thompson, Trow, and White (Cardwell), will act as members, on the part of this House, of the said Joint Committee on the Printing of Parliament.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before that motion is passed, I would like to make a suggestion to the hon. the First Minister. I think that Committee, if I remember aright, regulates the number of copies of our Sessional Papers that are issued in the year; at least, that is my recollection. The matter is one which, I think, would commend itself to him, and probably to most of us. I would suggest that, in future, we adopt the rule which I understand is adopted in England, that all gentlemen who happen to have been members of this House, and who choose to apply after leaving this House, or being unable to regain seats in this House, should have the various Sessional Papers sent to them,—should have that privilege on application. My attention was called to the matter during the last year. I had no cause to complain in my own instance, as my friends kept me admirably supplied with the Sessional Papers; but I know that many gentlemen who have been members of this House have made collections of these papers, and would like, without troubling their friends, to have them sent to them from year to year; and it would not add much to our expenditure in this direction if this were done only on application, as some gentlemen do not care to have them. I think it would be a very proper courtesy to extend to gentlemen who have had the honour of being members of this House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is a suggestion worthy of all consideration, and I would commend it to the best attention of the Committee on Printing, when they meet.

Motion agreed to.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE BILL.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, by the consent of the House, in order to expedite business, I will move for leave to introduce Bill (No. 7) respecting the Electoral Franchise. The Bill is substantially the same as that of last Session, and will be distributed as soon as possible.

Mr. BLAKE. I suppose the amendments are too trivial to deserve detailed mention on this occasion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They are not so important as to warrant me in taking up the time of the House in a long discussion.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced—and read the first time:—

INDIAN AGENT AT PENETANGUISHENE.

Mr. COOK enquired, Whether any Indian Agent has been appointed at Penetanguishene? If so, when, his name in full, amount of salary, when did salary commence, and what is the extent of his district?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes; an Agent was appointed by Order in Council of the 31st of January, 1883; his name is Henry Horace Thompson; the salary is $500 per annum; payment of the salary commenced on the 21st March, 1883, when Mr. Thompson commenced his duties; the Agency embraces the Christian Islands in the Georgian Bay.

INSPECTION OF NEWFOUNDLAND HERBING.

Mr. FORTIN, moved for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General for copies of all correspondence between the Government of Canada and the Government of Newfoundland, and between the former and some fish merchants or others on the subject of the inspection in Canada of Newfoundland pickled herring, imported into Canada; statements showing the quantity of Newfoundland herring imported in different ports of Canada, in 1883, the number of barrels and half-barrels of the said fish that have been submitted to our official inspection, and the result of such inspection. He said: Before putting the motion, I would like to address a few remarks to the House. I put this motion on the paper a few days ago and as it happened to stand alone on the Order paper it was remarked outside the House that it was a very small affair. Well, from one point of view it is a very small affair. I dare say, if I had spoken of salmon, trout, or of fly fishing, or of something relating to sport, many people perhaps would have been pleased. But, Sir, the herring fishery, from a commercial point of view, and from an economical point of view, if not from a political point of view, is of very great importance. History is a great mentor and tutor, and I will recall some facts of history. Some centuries ago, the famous Dutch Admiral Van Tromp swept the British channel, and dictated peace to the English; and Ruyter and other Dutch Admirals, for a century, had command of the sea. And who had they on board their vessels as seamen? Herring fishermen, and no one else, and they were recognized to be the best seamen in the world. It is well known that the herring fisheries of Holland gave to that country the mastery of the sea for centuries—not because of that particular branch of trade, but because the famous Dutchman, Beukels, had discovered a means of preserving herring by pickling them. At first sight this would not seem to be of much account. But, Sir, let me remind you that it created a revolution in the herring trade; let me remind this House that the great Charles V, the great King of Spain, and great Emperor of Germany, when he visited Holland, expressed his opinion that Beukels, who discovered this process of pickling herring, was one of the greatest benefactors of humanity; and he did not consider it beneath him to go and pay his respects at his tomb. Now these poor, humble, herring fishermen on our coasts and bays are well worthy of our attention. When we look at the statistics we find that in Norway no less than 750,000 barrels of herring are taken annually. In Scotland there are about as much more, that is to say 1,500,000 barrels of herring for the two countries, being equal to 300,000,000 lbs. of food. If we look at Canadian statistics we find there were taken last year on our coasts, 193,361 barrels of herring, that were pickled; 159,505 boxes of smoked herring, and 2,800 boxes of frozen herring, worth altogether over $800,000. These figures prove that herring is a very important factor in the fisheries of this country, and the Government, having introduced the National Policy, is bound to protect and develop that industry as much as possible—as much as any other industry or branch of manufacture. Well, I had the honour to speak in this House several times in regard to the inspection of herring. The inspection of herring not only enables the buyer to know what he is buying, but it obliges the fishermen to do their very best to have good fish, and, as a consequence, to get a better price for their fish. When I spoke in this House on a former occasion it was to ask the Government to repeal a law passed by the Free Trade Government, in 1874, which permitted Newfoundland herring to come into this country, not only free of duty, but free of inspection, whilst our herring was obliged to be inspected. We know that the inspection of herring in Canada costs from 20 to 40 cents a barrel. Now we know that inspected herring cannot be all classed as No. 1; sometimes it is classed as No. 2, or 3, or even less than that—and it is not always because the fishermen did not do their duty by the fish, but because the fish was small, not fat enough, or fresh enough. Sometimes the captain of the vessel which carried these barrels did not take proper care of them, and the pickle was lost, and the fish damaged. That law not only allowed these Newfoundland herring to come in free of the Canadian inspection, but it obliged our own inspectors to give it a certain character. They were obliged to stamp it Newfoundland, so that Newfoundland herring which came to this country to the extent of from 15,000 to 30,000 barrels every year, and bearing the mark of the Newfoundland inspection and all stamped No. 1, were sold as No. 1. The buyers in the western Provinces not only bought it as No. 1, but paid for it as such, while our own herring had to be inspected; and as a great many barrels could not rank higher than No. 2, our fishermen lost that way $1 a barrel, the difference of price between No. 1 and No. 2 herring, while the Newfoundland herring all sold as No. 1. Well, this state of things constituted a grievance, and the matter was brought before the House. It was sometime before our fishermen got redress, but they did get it. A law was passed which went into effect last spring, by which Newfoundland herring were submitted to the same inspection as our own—there was not the slightest difference. The Newfoundland fishermen and merchants pretended that their herring was inspected in Newfoundland; but our fishermen said their inspection was a fraud, and we proved that it was a fraud. During five or six years the Newfoundland merchants and fishermen were able to take advantage of that fraud, and to do great injury to our herring trade; and I know for a fact that several vessels, and a great many fishermen, went out of the trade. Formerly the Montreal market was supplied by Labrador herring, and by herring taken by people on the Magdalen Islands, or on the north shore, which state of things continued until they were driven out of the market by the Newfoundland herring. I will now give the House figures to prove that the Canadian herring trade has been protected to our fishermen by the recent Act. As I stated before, Newfoundland fish was inspected by the official inspectors of that colony; but as I mentioned in the speech last year, and also two years ago, any man could get a commission as inspector in Newfoundland—the captain of a vessel, the fisherman himself, and, of course, when he inspected his own fish, he marked them all No. 1. The fish came into Canada and were passed by the law of 1874. The new law was proclaimed in the month of June, 1883, and about 35,000 barrels of herring from Newfoundland came into Quebec and Montreal last fall. Some were inspected, not all, and I will give the House a statement of the result. I will begin with Quebec, to which only one cargo came. Here is the statement given by the inspector himself:

“Statement relating to the inspection of Newfoundland herring imported at Quebec, in 1883, by H. Grenier, Inspector of Fish and Oil, at Quebec.”

Only one lot was imported in that port by Mr. G. Patterson. All the barrels and half barrels were officially inspected in Newfoundland and were all stamped as No. 1 herring. The lot was composed of 1,226 barrels and 75 half barrels, and the result of the inspection was the following:—

“No No. 1 herring were found.”

No. 2.		No. 3.		Rusty.		Sour.		Total.
Brls.	½ Brls.	Brls.	½ Brls.	Brls.	½ Brls.	Brls.	½ Brls.
840	45	163	17	218	13	5	0	1,301

The inspector examined the barrels in the same way as he inspected Canadian herring, with the result I have described. A large lot came to Montreal. The following is the statement:—

"34,283 barrels and 2,617 half barrels of herring were imported into the Port of Montreal in 1883, all bearing the official inspection of Newfoundland, and all stamped No. 1 herring. Of these 18,435 barrels and 2,061 half barrels were inspected, and the following is the result :

No. 1.		No. 2.		No. 3.		Rusty.		Rotten.		Empty.		Small.
B.	½ B.	B.	½ B.	B.	½ B.	B.	½ B.
557	117	14912	1695	1,572	137	456	40	26	3	165	18	717	51.

These facts, in my opinion, and in the opinion of the fishermen, prove that justice at last has been obtained at last for our fishermen. Look at the state of affairs before this Act came into operation this spring. Our fishermen supported the National Policy, and they think many things are very high. On the other hand, the Government must give to all industries the protection they require. I do not hide my opinion; I never did. I would not have gone for protection alone, but I supported the National Policy. Our fishermen, I say, have supported the National Policy. The fishermen of Newfoundland have no National Policy. The fiscal laws there are only to collect a revenue sufficient for the Government needs, and consequently the people can live cheaper than we do. The Liberal Government, in 1874,—and it was a Free Trade Government acting according to their ideas—allowed Newfoundland fish to come into the Dominion, not only without paying duty, but without inspection; and, of course, plenty of herring came in, but it was Newfoundland herring. Our fishermen were thereby placed in an unfair position, because the market was glutted with Newfoundland fish. But this year buyers found the Newfoundland fish so bad, that they gave large orders for Canadian herring, and several cargoes of Canso herring, which is properly inspected, were imported into Montreal. If a merchant wants No. 1. or No. 2, he can order it, and he is sure of getting it now. This is the result of the Government measure. I approve of it, and the fishermen also approve of it, and I, and they, hope the Government will stick to their policy. I know there are merchants, especially commission merchants, who would like to see that law revoked, because a commission merchant is essentially a Free Trader. The more barrels of fish that pass through his hands, the more money he makes; he does not care much about our fishermen. I emphatically say that all those who have studied this matter—and all the fishermen—endorse the Government's measure, and hope they will stick to it. In making this request we do not ask much. At the present time Newfoundland levies a pretty heavy duty on flour and other products sent from Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and other parts of the Dominion. The only product they can send here is fish. They say: "We allow Canadian fish to come in Newfoundland duty free." But to send fish there would be like sending coals to Newcastle. So I hope the Government will maintain the attitude they have taken, and do something in other directions—to aid the fishermen and give them means to live and properly support their families in this country. Let me add these few words. There is in no other part of the world a fishing population so hardy and patriotic as is the Maritime population of Canada, and it is matter for regret that at the present day many of them have to resort to the neighbouring country to get their living. I regret to have to state that such is the case, although so many do not go as is represented. Let the Government not only protect the herring trade, but promote, in every possible way, the fishing industry, so as to furnish employment to our people.

Mr. KAULBACH. The position in which we in this Dominion have been placed in respect to the article of pickled fish in packages coming from Newfoundland, has been a source of serious dissatisfaction for some time to our fishing industry, fishermen, and fish traders; and it is very desirable, in the interest of the Maritime Provinces, that all Newfoundland pickled fish, imported into this Dominion, should be subjected to the same laws and regulations as respects our own catch—whether they had been inspected previously in Newfoundland or otherwise; or, in other words, that they should undergo inspection. This is necessary, otherwise the imperfect inspection of the imported article would interfere materially with our own prices at home, and when re-shipped and competing in a foreign market with our own, would naturally tend to very injuriously affect the price of our fish, notwithstanding our own being a genuine and better article. Apart from the reasons thus advanced, one would naturally ask what reasonable right have we to admit their fish into our ports free of inspection, when they tax us in the shape of duty upon every article of produce we transmit to them from our shores. It will be remembered that, under the Mackenzie Government, pickled fish was imported free of inspection and free of duty as well. Whilst speaking of the inconveniences from the importation of uninspected pickled fish from Newfoundland, I would ask this House if it would not be advisable to legislate also on the article of dried fish imported into this Dominion from that island, and have it subjected to an inspection as well; my object being to limit or lessen the importation of the article to our own ports, and thus to a certain extent protect the prices of our own in our home markets. Last year Newfoundland exported largely to the port of Lunenburg—a part of the constituency I have the honour to represent—and which materially reduced the prices of the article in our own market to the sacrifice of our poor fishermen. I might say, whilst on my feet, that I made a request in the last Session of the last Parliament, or the Session that I last attended, for a fish bounty to the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces. And I made an appeal to-day that the sum for distribution be increased. I feel satisfied that as the Government accorded me the request in the first instance when I asked it, they will treat me similarly in this case, and thus confer on the hard worked sons of toil, the fishermen, subjected as they are to so many risks and privations, a right as well as a benefit they so richly deserve.

Motion agreed to.

TREATISES ON AGRICULTURAL INDUSTRY.

Mr. GIGAULT, (Translation) in moving for copies of all "petitions to the Minister of Agriculture, praying that prizes be awarded for the best essays, treatises or other literary works on agricultural industry and mechanical arts, and that pamphlets and essays on agricultural industry and mechanical arts be circulated among the farmers and artisans, said: Mr. Speaker, it is an acknowledged fact that the existence of our agricultural schools has had a good deal to do with the improvement of the art of agriculture in this country; but, unfortunately, only a very limited number of students are admitted to these institutions. Could we not—ought we not to generalize, to a larger extent, the study of the agricultural science? Such is the question which I submit to the House, and which, owing to its importance, I should like to have discussed by others better able than I am to do it justice. In 1876, the French Government ordered an investigation to be made on the state and wants of agriculture. Information was gathered in foreign countries, and it was found that wherever agricultural science had been diffused, agricultural industry had progressed in proportion to the diffusion of that science. In fact, it is to be remarked that all the most enlightened Governments of Europe are trying to propagate this science. Thus, it is seen that in Germany there are 158 agricultural academies and 55 experimental farms. The managers of these farms distribute among the farmers, reports of all the experiments made on such farms,

In Austria, we find 69 agricultural schools; in France, 3 colleges; in Scotland 43 agricultural schools. This last-named country is the most advanced in agriculture, and a publicist rightly says that in the most humble college in Scotland, you will find a treatise on agriculture, and that the Scotch farmer owes to the fact of his reading such essays, the skill which he displays in his agricultural pursuit. In the United States there are to be found 32 agricultural colleges besides several model farms. In 1862, the American Congress, which occupies a position somewhat similar to that of the Federal Government in Canada, passed a Bill granting about 9,000,000 acres of land to the different States in the Union, on condition that each State should establish a mechanical or an agricultural college. As everybody knows, a board has been established in Washington to gather every information and take cognizance of every new discovery relating to agriculture. In Massachusetts a similar board exists, and it is so with several other States in the Union; and the French Consul in his report, made in 1867, to the agricultural investigation held in France, said that the diffusion of agricultural science in the United States had had a great deal to do with the improvement and increase of the agricultural production in the United States; and he remarked that this increase in the agricultural production was felt, not only in the western States, but also in the eastern States, where farming has been going on for many long years. Could not the Federal Government lend a helping hand to the Local Governments to propagate agricultural knowledge? I do not wish to say that agriculture has made no progress in this country; in fact, if I ventured to make such an assertion, statistics and facts would contradict me. Our agriculture has been enriched by the cheese industry, which has wrought a very happy transformation in our mode of culture. In fact, in 1867, we only exported cheese to the amount of $193,554; in 1871, our export of this commodity amounted to $1,109,906 and in 1881 it amounted to $5,510,443. Now if we examine our exportation of farm produce we find also that the increase of the agricultural production has been a great deal more rapid than the increase of the population and of the acreage of farms improved and tilled in the country. In 1871 our exportation of farm produce only amounted to $22,436,071; in 1881, ten years later, it amounted to $42,628,546. If we refer to the census which was taken in 1871 and 1881, we find that the total number of acres of improved land in Canada was, in 1871, 17,336,288 acres, and in 1881, 21,899,181 acres, or an increase of a little more than one-fourth, while our agricultural production has more than doubled during that period of ten years. Our Local Governments have done a good deal towards the improvement of agriculture by circulating agricultural newspapers and also by giving subsidies to schools; but, owing to their limited pecuniary means, I think that they have not done all that could have been done to promote to a larger extent the improvement of agriculture, I think that our Federal Government might do well to imitate the American Congress and to annex a Board of Agriculture to the Department of Agriculture. The direction of that Board might be put into the hands of our best agriculturalists, who would gather the information and distribute reports giving the new inventions and all information, generally, considered by them as useful to promote greater improvement in the system of culture heretofore followed in the country. Far from me the idea of pretending, Mr. Speaker, that theory alone will make good farmers, I say that skill in agriculture, as in any other calling, lies in a combination of practice and theory. I know that a theorist, having no knowledge or practice, is greatly inferior to a practitioner without theory. But on the other hand, it seems to me that the Government, by putting at the disposal of our farmers all the resources of modern science, would furnish to the farming community the means of giving back to the soil, exhausted as it often is, the elements of fertility of which it has been deprived by a production often too active, or by exhausting crops. It has been proved, Mr. Speaker, that often, and I may say always, the fate of the merchant or of the manufacturer is intimately connected with the success or reverses of the farming community. The crops have hardly sprouted from the ground, when both the merchant and manufacturer are figuring on the prospect of the yield; and according to the appearance of the crop, according to the hopes of the farmer, the merchant regulates his importations, and the manufacturer the production of his manufacture. Thus it is shown, that the interests of agriculture are the first of social interests. Thus it is clearly proved that agriculture is the basis of public prosperity, and when we find that to be the case, it seems to me that we ought not to be afraid to sacrifice something in order to improve the condition of those who till the land. The present Government has certainly done much for agriculture by favouring the construction of railways. By so doing, they have given to farmers great facilities for the sale of their products. They have, moreover, encouraged agriculture by the fostering of our industries, and by so doing they have given to the farming community a greater number of buyers and consumers; but it seems to me that they might crown this very patriotic policy by encouraging, in a larger measure, the diffusion of agricultural science. While discussing this question, let us not forget that four-fifths of our population belong to the farming class; that our agricultural resources are immense, and that to be developed they only want strong arms and intelligent labour to largely increase our public wealth. Mr. Speaker, the idea to which I now give expression is not a new one; it is contained in several of our Statutes authorizing agricultural societies, boards of art and boards of trade, to circulate and distribute books and essays on the agricultural and mechanical arts; but, unfortunately, owing to the want of means, it has been impossible to give effect to the provisions of those Statutes. I hope that the Federal Government, with the mighty resources at its disposal, will find the means to propagate the agricultural knowledge of which our farmers are in such great need, to increase the fertility of our soil.

Mr. LANDRY (Translation). Mr. Speaker, the statement just made by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault) makes it unnecessary for me to enter into the details of the question. However, I feel that it is my duty to say a few words in support of his speech, and to ask, on behalf of the farming community, that the Government may be pleased to direct some of their energy towards the progress of agriculture in Canada. Each year the Government prints a large number of pamphlets. We, the representatives of the people, receive a certain number of these to distribute among our constituents, and I think we might willingly dispense with some of these pamphlets, whose place might be taken by other works on agriculture and the mechanical arts. I am satisfied that these pamphlets would be received with much more satisfaction by our farmers than the reports on explorations or trips made in the North-West. I remember that not very long ago we had the report of the Scotch delegates who, at the request of the hon. Minister of Agriculture, visited the prairies of the North-West. These delegates have certainly done their duty, and they have made, on the incidents of their journey, a report as accurate as could be. But I have observed, not without wonder, that they had commenced their observations on the border of the Province of Quebec; they have not found it in their power to say one word in favour of this Province. To make up for this, they have praised up, perhaps beyond measure, Manitoba and the prairies of the North-West. I have seen one of these documents, the shrewd writer of which had discovered that in our rural districts, churches were larger than houses. Whether up to this day he has been able to find out for what reason, I have not yet learned; and while travelling in one of our country places he was very much surprised to find that there were still some stumps in the ground—at first sight he took them for natives of the place. Perhaps we do not deserve such a high compliment, but, at all events, this betokens the depth of his observations. I think that documents of this sort might well be left aside, and that our farmers would find much more benefit by receiving works on mechanics and the various agricultural industries. From this point of view, I think that the Government should grant the motion just made by my hon. friend. While we are discussing this matter, there is another question which I will submit to the Government. A few years ago professors of agriculture were appointed for Manitoba and the North-West. In the appointment of these professors an important element has been forgotten altogether, and the farmers of our nationality, who do not understand the language of Shakespeare, should have had some reason to ask, for themselves at least, the appointment as a professor of some one able to express himself in the language of Bossuet and of Racine. I have no doubt that the Government, now that they are aware of such a want in this professional staff, will, with their usual impartiality and the good will which they have always shown, give to the French element of Manitoba and the North-West, the consideration to which it is entitled.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN (Translation). In answer to the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault) I beg to say, on behalf of my colleague, the hon. Minister of Agriculture, that if there are in this Department any petitions of the nature of those mentioned in the motion just made, such petitions will be laid before the House; but he is under the impression that there are none. As to the remarks made by the hon. member for Rouville and by the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry), I beg to state also, on behalf of my colleague, that he concurs fully in the idea of circulating documents, treatises, or essays on agriculture and the mechanical arts. Quite often such treatises are not within the reach of our population and have not the practical bearing which these hon. members would wish to find in them; but the intention of the Government is certainly to act in the way these hon. gentlemen have just pointed out. As to the documents sent into Manitoba and the North-West, or in other parts of Canada where the French language is used, it is the intention of the hon. Minister of Agriculture that these people should receive therein the language with which they are most familiar, to wit, the French language; and I am convinced that it will be sufficient to draw his attention to the matter to cause him to avail himself of the first opportunity to comply with the desires of the hon. member who made this motion.

Motion agreed to.

THE EXCHANGE BANK OF CANADA.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved for a statement, in detail, of the account of the Government of Canada with the Exchange Bank of Canada, showing the various sums deposited by Government with, and withdrawn from the bank, with the dates of such deposits and withdrawals, and the amounts and dates of all payments of interest thereon, and the present state of the account, with a statement of the terms on which such deposits were made, and all correspondence, telegraphs, Orders in Council, bonds or other securities relative to any such deposits or withdrawals. He said: Before this motion is put, I desire to say a few words. I do not propose to enter into any discussion of the position of the affairs of that unfortunate bank, partly because the matter is now before the courts, and partly also because I dare say that if even a portion of the information I have received be correct, the attention of the Government may not improbably be directed to the state of the present law, and they may find it necessary to give some further security to the public in connection with banks. That, of course, is for the consideration of the Government themselves; but with regard to the Exchange Bank, I may say that it had a record which certainly called for considerable caution on the part of the Government in making additional deposits with it. I do not know how those deposits were secured—that we shall hear presently; but there is one point on which, I think, some information might be properly asked now and given by the hon. Minister of Finance; that is, with regard to the statement made—with respect to which some official explanation, or apology, or whatever it may be called, was offered apparently on behalf of the hon. gentleman—that a further advance was made to that bank, and that a bond for a large amount was taken from the gentlemen connected with it to secure that advance. I need hardly say that that is a very unusual proceeding, and one which is, I think, to be regretted—a proceeding which might lead to various complications, both local and otherwise; and in any case, I cannot suppose, that the hon. Minister of Finance wants to add to his other duties that of deciding upon the personal solvency of gentlemen who come to ask for advances to banks. I should be glad if the hon. Minister would, on the present occasion, put the country into possession of some of the facts in relation to this matter; at any rate, so far as the advance made on this particular bond is concerned. The minor details can, of course, be had later, and, if necessary, some action may then be taken.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I think it would be more convenient to have this subject discussed, if a discussion is considered desirable, after the papers are laid on the Table of the House, because those papers will contain a report of the matter, which I do not wish unintentionally to misrepresent. I may state, however, that the bank was in difficulty—there was, I think, an anticipation of something of the kind before Parliament rose last year—and a very considerable pressure was brought upon the bank and a considerable amount of money withdrawn. The bank applied to the Government, and the Government, after consulting the Deputy Minister of Finance, and looking into the matter, thought it safe, and in the interest of the public, to advance $200,000 to the bank at 5 per cent. interest, and on conditions similar to those on which advances were made to the Ontario Bank two years ago, and the Consolidated Bank. Some time elapsed, and it was found that the run continued, and it was doubtful if the $200,000 would carry them through. They made application to the Government for another $100,000, offering personal security in addition to the security that would be held under the Banking Act; and after considering the matter the Government accepted that additional security for the advance of another $100,000. A call was made for $100,000 of the $300,000 before the bank suspended. A second call was made, but before the day expired on which that call was made the bank suspended, or closed its doors. But I say nothing further until all the papers are laid before the House.

Mr. BLAKE. I presume, after the hon. gentleman's statement, that he will take care that the papers are laid on the Table of the House at a very early day.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Very early.
Motion agreed to.

THE STEAMER PRINCESS LOUISE.

Mr. WELDON, in moving for copy of contract and specifications entered into by the Government with Jotham O'Brien for the building of the steamer Princess Louise; statement of all amounts paid on account of the building of the said vessel; copies of all orders and instructions relating to the towing of the said steamer from Maccan to Halifax, and also any contracts, correspondence or documents in reference to the procuring and building of engines for the said steamer, said: Before this motion passes, I wish to say a few words regarding this vessel and the manner in which it was towed into the harbour of Halifax; and I think it is a matter which requires investigation. By a return laid on the Table of the House, last year, it appears tenders were invited for the construction of the hull, spars and rigging of a vessel of 500 tons, for the use of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. A number of tenders, varying in amount from $25,000 the lowest, to $72,000 the highest, were submitted. The lowest tenderer failed, and the contract was subsequently awarded to Mr. O'Brien of Maccan, for the sum of $29,000. At the time the return was laid on the Table, the contract was not signed, owing to the illness of the contractor, although the work was in progress. Whether it has since been signed, the hon. Minister can inform the House. So far as Mr. O'Brien is concerned, he is known as a ship builder of considerable experience, who has built some of the largest ships that have sailed out of the Bay of Fundy. The vessel was launched, I think, on the 30th November, and a tug boat, the Hercules, was sent from St. John for the purpose of towing her down the river to meet the Newfield, which took her in tow on the morning of Sunday, the 2nd December, to bring her to Halifax from Maccan, a distance of 300 miles at least, along a rocky and dangerous coast, and at the worst season of the year. In the afternoon a gale sprung up, and the result was that close at Digby, within sight of the light and within a few miles of the entrance to Annapolis Basin, the hawser parted on account of inferior equipment, and the vessel was cast on the rocks. Not only was she entirely dashed to pieces, but the melancholy loss of eight lives was added. I venture to say that no owner of a vessel in Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick, would have risked bringing a ship in tow in that condition from Maccan to Halifax at that season of the year when that coast is exposed to severe and violent gales, nor would any underwriter have been willing to take such a risk except at an enormous premium. That the vessel was not properly equipped for the voyage, we have the statement of the captain of the Newfield made before the Board of Enquiry. One of her anchors was unshackled, of course, for the purpose of enabling the hawser to be used, but when the port anchor was attempted to be used it was found also to be unshackled. The crew were unable to bend the sails, and when they attempted to get up the jib and a maintrysail, it was too late, as the vessel had already gone on the rocks. What makes this want of proper equipment more extraordinary is the fact that nearly opposite Maccan is the port of St. John, where the vessel could have been properly fitted out with all facilities, as well as in Halifax, and then have proceeded to England for her engines if necessary; and even so far as the engines were concerned they could have been obtained at the port of St. John as well. I admit that with regard to engines for ocean service, England stands unequalled but as regards engines for the working service connected with our bays, I think our makers compare favourably with the English makers. I need only mention Fleming & Sons, of St. John, and Burrill & Johnson, of Yarmouth, N. S., both of whom are now building engines for vessels employed on the same waters in which this one was intended to be employed. With regard to the equipment of this vessel, Capt. Guilford's statement is this:

"She ought to have been better prepared for the voyage before she left Cumberland Basin. Her bow anchors should have been shackled and her sails bent."

Again, in violation of the law she was sent out without proper side lights, and burning a bright light which the captain had caused to be put up in direct violation of the Statutes. She was also sent out on a dangerous unnecessary course of navigation, without being properly equipped, although the voyage was one which required that the vessel should be thoroughly equipped. The consequence was that when the hawser broke the crew were helpless. I hope the Government will take steps to ascertain without delay the causes whereby not only loss of property, but also loss of life, was occasioned.

Mr. McLELAN. All the papers in connection with the matter will be brought down. The hon. gentleman has referred to the contract, and to the delay that occurred last year in signing it. Subsequently it was signed, and it was carried out in a manner that elicited the commendation of the inspector who reported she was the best vessel that had been constructed in the Maritime Provinces. The latter part of the hon. gentleman's remarks refers more particularly to the next question that he has on the paper, respecting the unfortunate loss of that vessel. When all the papers are brought down the hon. gentleman, and this House, will be in a better position to understand and discuss this question. Owing to the melancholy loss of Capt. Brown, in whose charge the vessel was at the time, there are many questions put by the hon. gentleman that cannot be very well answered. The vessel was placed in charge of Capt. Brown. The Minister of the Department had every confidence in his skill and experience, and relied on his seeing that the vessel was equipped in such a manner as to be, to all appearances, safe. The captain's attention was called on the day of the launch to the fact that the chains coming on board had not been coupled together, but he replied that he supposed the operation of the windlass was quite sufficient to check it when he desired. The windlass did not work as expected, and the chain went out and was lost. I believe the whole equipment of the vessel was on board, and a few hours work would have bent the sails and placed her in a position to be managed by sails. Why the sails were not bent I am unable to say, and, owing to the sad loss of Capt. Brown, we cannot ascertain why he did not attend to this before starting. The hon. gentleman has referred to the fact that we have good mechanics in this country, and he asked why we could not have got the engines built here instead of in Glasgow. The hon. gentleman has stated that Great Britain is unrivalled in the construction of marine engines, and it was because we desired to have engines that were perfect, that were built by manufacturers who stand unrivalled in that work, that we decided to have these built at Glasgow; and we found that we should have less expense to send the vessel there to have them put in than to pay the freight that was demanded by shippers, the owners of steamships or sailing vessels, to have them brought to this country and placed in here. It was for the purpose of having the best possible engines that could be placed on board of her, and to have it done more economically, that she was sent over. The original intention was to have the engines brought to this country and put in here; but, owing to a failure on the part of the contractors to have them completed within the time agreed upon, it was decided to send the vessel over there, and this made it that period to which the hon. gentleman referred as a late period in the season. It was unfortunate that the work was delayed so long that it became late in the season and the stormy season of the year, but the whole matter was entrusted to Capt. Gilbert and Brown, men of long experience, and they were consulted upon this matter before any action was decided upon. Consultation was held with these gentlemen, who were the most experienced officers of the Department, who had had experience both in sailing vessels and steam vessels, and upon their advice the course was decided upon of towing the vessel to Halifax in order to sail to Glasgow to have the engines put in there. It was represented that the Newfield, at the close of her season's work, before laying up, could call for the vessel, and it was expected that she would call at St. John for the vessel at the close of her season's work and take her to Halifax; and there the new vessel could watch an opportunity for favourable weather to get clear of the land and sail for Glasgow. It was upon the advice of these gentlemen, who had long experience in matters of this kind, that the course was adopted which unfortunately resulted in the loss of the vessel and of the lives of most of those on board. The papers connected with this matter will be brought down at a very early day, and then the hon. gentleman will be in a position to discuss it more fully and with a better understanding of the case than can be done at present.

Motion agreed to.

LOCATION OF THE NORTH-WEST CAPITAL AT REGINA.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Mr. Speaker, there was a motion made during last Session of Parliament, by my hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Casey), asking for some of the correspondence and information referred to in the motion I propose submitting to you. That correspondence has not been brought down, although it was moved for at a very early period of the Session; and those of us who take some little interest in the North-West, and especially in the Regina region, were very anxious to see the correspondence that was moved for, and understand exactly the terms upon which the town of Regina was put in the market in the latter part of 1882. The hon. gentleman will recollect that some discussion took place upon this subject during the last Session of Parliament, and the hon. leader of the House, in his reply to the hon. member for West Elgin, if my recollection serves me aright, stated that the land was the joint property of the Government, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and the North-West Land Company, and that it was put in the market for the joint benefit of the three parties to whom I refer. My hon. friend complained of the mode in which the town of Regina was put upon the market, that it was put there by a lottery. The hon. First Minister repudiated all responsibility in connection with the mode in which the town site was put upon the market—that is, as to the lottery part of it. Now, I know that, however it may have been put upon the market, or by whose authority it was so put upon the market, it was put upon the market, and people were induced to buy upon certain representations made by the agents of the owners of the property, that is, the agents of the Government, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and of the North-West Land Company. Those representations were made at the time of the sale; they were made both before and after and at the time the land was sold by this lottery process and otherwise. One of the representations was that Regina was to be the future capital of the Province of Assiniboia; another representation was that it was to be a divisional terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway; another representation was that the North-West Mounted Police barracks would be stationed at Regina. These representations were clearly and distinctly made, and made with a view of inducing persons to purchase property there. I do not complain that the representations were not made in good faith at the time. Possibly they were made by the agents in good faith; but whether they had authority for making those representations or not from the Government here is one of the points I just wish to know, and I desire to know by the motion which was made during last Session of Parliament. Now, it is quite clear that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have not made Regina a divisional terminus. The divisional terminus is at Moose Jaw, forty-five miles west of the town of Regina. It is quite manifest that, to a purchaser of property at Regina, it would be of the first possible consequence to have the railway company interested in the town of Regina, to have it a divisional terminus, with buildings and repair shops, and things of that kind there. Now, there is nothing of that kind. The large buildings—and they are large and valuable buildings—erected by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are erected at Moose Jaw, and there is nothing at Regina except a small country station. It is equally clear, Sir, that the North-West Mounted Police barracks are not at Regina; they are two and a half miles from the limits of the city of Regina. The Governor's residence is a mile from the city of Regina, and the North-West Council fully a mile from the city of Regina. Now, upon the representation that the divisional terminus would be at Regina, that the North-West Mounted Police barracks would be at Regina, the Governor's residence there, and the North-West Council there, these people were induced to purchase—so they say. I have in my hand a petition signed by nearly every purchaser of town lots living in the city of Regina, all making that representation, that they were so induced to buy, and but for those representations they would not have purchased, and those representations have not been carried out. Now, I am not complaining of the Government in this respect. I do not know how far they are responsible, or are not responsible, for the matter; I do not know how far they have control over the location of the terminus. I know nothing about that, therefore I make no complaint against the Government on that head. I simply state the facts as they are represented to me by the purchasers of lots at Regina, and I state their ground of complaint. As to the erection of the barracks for the Mounted Police there, I presume that was under the control of the Government, and if so, and if the representations to which I have alluded have been made by the authority of the Government, then these representations have not been carried out, and these people have not been dealt with in good faith. Now, we can easily understand the importance to the people there of some expression of opinion on the part of the Government, at all events, as to the course the syndicate, or the joint owners of the property take with respect to the completion of the contracts of purchase. They say they have been dealt with in bad faith, they repudiate the sales that were made, and there were large sales made, involving considerable sums of money. They repudiate those sales altogether, and they ask the Government to deal with them in a generous and in a liberal spirit. They ask this syndicate, the joint owners of this property, not to compel them to pay for land that they purchased under certain representations, which representations have not been carried out. I ask for the papers that have been referred to here, in order that we may be able to understand the whole matter from beginning to end. If the Government have arrived at any conclusion on the matter, I shall be glad to hear it. If they have arrived at any definite conclusion I am quite sure the people in the neighbourhood of Regina will be glad to hear it, because the action of the Government, and the action of the railway company in not carrying out those representations, have very seriously retarded the progress and injured the prosperity of that place. We can easily understand that if a man goes up there to locate himself, under the belief that Regina was to be a divisional terminus and that the North-West barracks would be established there, and he finds it two and a half miles from the town, and the terminus at Moose Jaw, of course he is disappointed. A blacksmith, or a carpenter, goes there on the strength of the representations that the divisional terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway is to be established there, and he finds that terminus forty-five miles west of Regina, he is not likely to settle at Regina. Now, it is unfortunate that the representations should have been made, if they were not intended to be carried out—it is unfortunate they should have been made at all. I know, as a matter of fact, that people did purchase there, solely on the faith of those representations, and one can easily understand how great an attraction to any place would be the establishment of a Capital, like that of the Province of Assiniboia, where the divisional terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway would also be, as well as the North-West Mounted Police barracks, the Governor's residence, and that of the North-West Council. Now, these are all gone, and the people there feel very much disappointed, grievously disappointed, and they trust that, in some way, relief will be given to those who invested their money on the strength of those representations. In moving for these papers, I hope the Minister who has charge of this Department will see that the returns moved for last Session are brought down, as well as the papers I now ask for. I, therefore, move for:

Copies of all Orders-in-Council respecting the location of the Seat of Government for the North-West Territories at Regina.

Copies of correspondence having reference to the selection of Regina as the Capital of the said Territories.

Copies of all correspondence between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the North-West Land Company, or the Agents of the said Companies and the Government respecting the said Town Site.

Copies of any agreement or agreements between the said Companies or either of them and the Government respecting the sale of lots in said town, showing the interest each of said parties to said agreements had therein; the conditions on which the Government agreed to the said selection; the terms on which the lots in said town were to be sold. Also, a Return showing the number of lots sold, the aggregate price, the amount paid, the amount unpaid, the Agent acting for the Government in effecting sales, the instructions to such Agent, his reports; all correspondence from any of the parties aforesaid during the year 1883; all complaints or remonstrances respecting the violation of the conditions on which said lots were sold.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am sorry the papers were not brought down last Session. I do not really know now why they were not. There was a great amount of work thrown upon the Department in the way of making the returns that were so largely moved for last Session, and were so very generally granted. I shall see that the papers are brought down at once. I stated generally last Session that an arrangement was made between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Government that they should have a joint interest in it. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company being a commercial company, and of course, it being their interest to get as large a sum of money for the lots in the city as possible, the Government thought that they might well be appointed instead of an ordinary Government Land Agent, to lay out the town sites, in a joint interest, the expenses being in common, and the net proceeds being divided. Of course, I cannot speak as to the representations made at the sales on the spot, but after the statement made by the hon. gentleman I shall feel it my duty to call upon the Canadian Pacific Railway to get a statement from their agent as to what representations were made by themselves, by their agents, or by any official, or anyone that may have been employed in the matter. So far as the Government is concerned, the only understanding which was entered into and the only statement made was that the town of Regina should be the capital of Assiniboia and of the North-West until, in process of time, that country was divided into different Provinces, each of which would, of course, have its own capital. That was one statement or promise, and that has been carried out. The seat of Government is at Regina; the Lieutenant Governor is at Regina. I understand the hon. gentleman says that persons complain—he does not make the complaint himself—that the Lieutenant Governor's residence is in the environs, in the vicinity of Regina, and is not situated within the town plot or the locality which is at present laid out into town lots. But that complaint will not hold water for a moment. The residence is in the immediate vicinity of Regina, and Regina is made the capital. I do not think there was any breach of the pledge made by the Government of the day and by Parliament when Her Majesty selected Ottawa to be the seat of Government for the Dominion, because the Governor General's residence is at New Edinburgh, not in the city of Ottawa. And the same remark applies to Regina. It is convenient that the Lieutenant Governor's house should not be in the commercial part of the town, but should have some ground attached to it; and I suppose that the Governor's house with its grounds well laid out, will prove a substantial ornament and advantage to Regina. So with respect to the Mounted Police. It was stated that whenever the railway should be built, the Mounted Police, instead of being stationed in small detachments all over the country, should have their headquarters at Regina. And that has been carried out. The largest body assembled at one place is assembled at the Regina barracks. These are not within the town site, because it was found necessary for the efficiency of the force that there should be a very considerable tract of land about the barracks. The barracks are on the line of the railway, and all the promises made by the Government in this regard have been carried out. As regards representations that have been made and correspondence between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Government, and representations made by any officer of the company, these constitute an important matter. I will see that the papers are brought down without any delay, and then the hon. gentleman will have an opportunity of discussing with myself and in the House, the whole subject to which his motion refers.

Motion agreed to.

IMPORTATIONS OF WHEAT AND FLOUR.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I think the House should have information at a very early date with regard to the quantity of wheat and flour that has been imported into and exported from the various Provinces of the Dominion. Judging from a remark made by the Minister of Customs the other day, I thought that a motion asking for this information up to December 31st, might involve a little delay, as the returns might not have been received from all the Provinces. I have, therefore, prepared two motions on the subject, in the hope that the return asked for in the first motion may be given to the House immediately and the other as soon as practicable. I beg to move for a return showing the quantity of wheat and flour imported into and exported from the various Provinces of the Dominion, during the five months ending 30th November, 1883.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I further beg to move for a return showing the quantity of wheat and flour and corn and cornmeal imported into and exported from the various Provinces of the Dominion, during the month of December, 1883.

Motion agreed to.

DRAWBACKS ON GOODS MANUFACTURED FOR EXPORT.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I have had occasion at different times to make a motion similar to the one I am about to place in your hands, Mr. Speaker. I make this motion for a two-fold reason. In the first place, I desire that this return may be a continuous one, and I move it, therefore, from the date when the last one was presented to the House till now. In the second place, I move it for the purpose of bringing before the notice of the Minister of Customs a fault of which I think he has been guilty, with a view to its being remedied, though I certainly thought it would not have been necessary to have brought this subject again before the House. The hon. Minister must be aware from the returns placed in our hands for the past year, that the exports of our manufactured goods have decreased; that they have never since he has been in the position he now occupies reached the extent they did in 1878. I have pointed out repeatedly that our manufacturers have been hampered by additional duties being placed upon their raw material, which have enhanced the cost of the manufactured article, and that to compete successfully in the markets of the world with goods, the prices of which were so enhanced, becomes a very difficult matter. I have also pointed out that our manufacturers have to compete in foreign markets with manufacturers who are aided in their efforts by Consuls representing the nations to which they belong, an advantage that only those engaged in promoting a foreign trade can understand. I think it is too bad when our manufacturers are under the disadvantage of not having the assistance of a Consul of our own to take them by the hand as the Consuls do the manufacturers of other nations, and in addition to that, when our manufacturers are harassed in the importation of goods entering into the manufacture of articles to be exported, that the relief promised them by the Customs Department by way of drawback of the duty upon the articles so entering into the manufacture, has not been given them. Last Session I found that the Minister had varied the regulations with respect to affidavits which had to be made in favour of certain parties, and I pointed out a remarkable coincidence in the case of those parties, and I asked him—I did not charge him with having done anything wrong, for I thought his concession in their case was a right one—to extend those concessions to all other manufacturers, and I thought I had his promise that the regulations would be so altered. I am informed that this has not been done, at all events with regard to all manufacturers, and I call his attention to it now in order that, if he has been so much occupied with other matters in his Department that he has been unable to attend to this particular item, which is one of considerable importance, he may find time ere long to remedy it. I beg to move for a return of all claims presented for drawbacks on goods manufactured for export (not included in the last return made to this House), showing the names of all applicants, their place of business, the articles on which the drawback was claimed, and the amount of each claim, distinguishing between the claims which have been allowed and those which have been disallowed, and those under consideration and not yet decided, and giving the reason for such disallowance: also copies of all regulations made by the Department with reference to such claims, together with a copy of one allowed claim and the sworn declaration thereto of each exporter.

Mr. BOWELL. There is no objection to bringing down all the information for which the hon. gentleman asks. The House is now tolerably well versed, I think, in the complaints which have made at various times by the hon. gentleman who has made this motion. We have heard it in the same language, I think, some seven or eight times, and I have no doubt we shall have it repeated again once or twice before the Session closes. I am quite aware that he pointed out, or attempted to point out, that the exportation of certain manufactures had not been increased since the imposition of the present duties, which have been levied under what is better known as the National Policy. I thought I answered that question tolerably well on a previous occasion, when I pointed out the large outlet which had been provided for certain manufactures of the older Provinces in the North-West Territories and Manitoba, and also by means of the great interprovincial trade which has been created and worked up between the different Provinces; that though my hon. friend did not deny that the manufacturers were all busily engaged and had been so for the last three or four years the output of each of these manufacturers was greater than on previous occasions; and that the reason their goods had not been exported to the foreign market was the fact of a greater market existing within our own borders. I pointed out that we had in fact created a home market by this interprovincial trade, and also by the fact of keeping out to a certain extent those manufactures which otherwise would have been brought into the country. At that time I gave the figures as they then presented themselves to me, and had I supposed that the question was about to be mooted again, I think the statements which could be laid before the House would show that the trade has marvellously increased the last two or three years. I do not know what the hon. gentleman means when he speaks of the harassing of the importers in the importation of the raw material which enters into the various manufactures made in this country. I have simply to say that every case that has been brought under the notice of the Department, and under my own in particular, in which the manufacturers or the importers considered themselves aggrieved, has received my personal attention, not only by communication with them by the Department, but where they were of a very serious character, I have gone to the localities personally, and I have never yet failed to satisfy the people that the action of the Department has been under the law, and that whatever has been done has been done in the interest solely of the honest importer. I do not pretend to say—it would be absurd to suppose—that in working out a complex Tariff like ours, and with so many ports as there are in this Dominion, we could have perfect uniformity where we have so many collectors who take different views of even common orders that may be issued, which to an ordinary man one would suppose would be perfectly plain. I do not pretend or expect that the Department or its officers will ever arrive at that state of perfection in which they can issue orders which will be thoroughly understood by every one of the officers who have to put the law in force. With regard to the remark made by the hon. gentleman in reference to the varied affidavits, I have simply to make this statement, that every claim for drawbacks has been judged upon its own merits, and just as far as the law would permit the Department, just so far have they gone in order to encourage to the fullest extent the exportation of every conceivable kind of article manufactured in this country. I do not know to what particular case the hon. gentleman refers at the present time, but I do say that no manufacturer has made application for a drawback, or for information which might lead him to increase his manufactures or to make contracts for the foreign market, to whose case my attention has not been given, and in which I have not put the most liberal possible construction upon the law as it formerly existed and as it now exists. If there are any cases which my hon. friend has in his mind's eye, or of which he has any knowledge, in which this has not been done, I should be glad, on the part of the Government, to have my attention called to them. The hon. member is altogether mistaken when he says I have not given personal attention to all these matters. I do not hesitate to say that in every case in which these drawbacks have been asked for, or in which any difficulty has arisen between the manufacturers and the officers of my Department, my attention has been called to it, and I have investigated and read all the papers connected with it. I have yet to learn of any case that has not had the attention, not only of myself, but of the officers of the Department. I say further that the papers will show that even in the case to which the hon. gentleman referred during last Session, if he had not interrupted me in the manner he did, I would have shown that letters were sent to that particular manufacturer, asking him to amend his claims and the Department would meet his case so far as the law would permit, and that no answer was ever made to that request. Yet the hon. gentleman having this particular case in his mind's eye at all times—for it seems to haunt him on every occasion he addresses the House on this question—did not allow me to proceed to place him and the House in possession of these facts. Nor has that manufacturer yet made any application to amend the demands he had made, and which I have repeatedly pointed out could not be acceded to in the manner in which they were made. I can assure the hon. gentleman that no change has been made which would be detrimental to the manufacturer or that would hamper him in any way in creating a foreign trade, if he can find a foreign market for the output of his establishment. As we have no Foreign Consuls we have adopted the principle of accepting the declaration and certificates of the British Consuls at the different foreign ports, and also of the American Consuls where there are no British Consuls, so that the House will see that every facility has been offered that can possibly be offered in order to create an export trade. I shall be very glad to have all the information which my hon. friend has asked for, not only in this motion, but in the other, brought down at the earliest possible moment.

Motion agreed to.

RETURNS.

Motions for the following Returns were severally agreed to:—

Copies of all Departmental orders and advertisements as to the proposed Canadian Loan of four millions, with statement of the offers made with rates and amounts, the offers accepted, with rates and amounts, the amounts since taken and the rate, and also the rate at which balance of the loan is now held.—(Sir Richard Cartwright.)

Report of Capt. Scott, R. N., and assessors, upon the loss of the Steamer Princess Louise, and the evidence taken on the enquiry into such loss.—(Mr. Weldon.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 5:30 o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 24th January, 1884.

PETITIONS FOR PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. BEATY moved that the time for receiving Petitions for Private Bills be extended to Saturday, the 9th of February next, in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Standing Committee.

Mr. BLAKE. Mr. Speaker, of course every Session we decide that next Session we won't have these extensions, and then the first thing we do is to make them. Now, it does seem to me that the hon. gentleman, by proposing an extension for so long a period as to the 9th, is inviting the promoters of Private Bills to wait till somewhere about the 7th or 8th before putting in their petitions, and that it would be much better to extend, if it is necessary to extend at all, for a week than for a fortnight.

Mr. BEATY. The view of the Committee was that to extend to the 9th and make that final, would be better than to extend to an earlier date, and then extend again. This is intended to be the last extension as well as the first, as far as the Committee are concerned.

Mr. BOWELL.

Mr. BLAKE. If my hon. friend says that is an intention which is to become operative this Session, I shall be better pleased.

Mr. BEATY. Yes.

Motion agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 9) to amend the several Acts relating to the Toronto, Grey and Bruce Railway Company.—(Mr. Kilvert.)

Bill (No. 10) further to amend the Act to incorporate the South Saskatchewan Valley Railway Company.—(Mr. Kilvert.)

Bill (No. 11) respecting the Union of certain Methodist Churches therein named.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

Bill (No. 13) to repeal an Act to render Members of the Legislative Councils and Legislative Assemblies of the Provinces now included, or which may hereafter be included, within the Dominion of Canada, ineligible for sitting or voting in the House Commons of Canada.—(Mr. Ouimet.)

FRAUD IN RELATION TO PUBLIC CONTRACTS.

Mr. CAMERON. I have been requested by Mr. Casgrain to move for leave to introduce Bill (No. 12) to amend the Act for the better prevention of fraud in relation to contracts involving the expenditure of public moneys.

Bill read the first time.

BAYFIELD HARBOUR.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT enquired, Whether the attention of the Minister of Public Works has been called to the injury done to the Harbour of Bayfield by recent storms, and whether it is the intention of Government to provide a sum in the Estimates for its repairs?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In answer to the hon. gentleman I may say that my attention has been called to the injury done to the harbour at Bayfield by the recent storms. The question of providing a sum in the Estimates for its repairs is now engaging the attention of the Department.

SALARIES OF JUDGES.

Mr. McMULLEN enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce, during the present Session, a Bill for the purpose of equalizing and increasing the salaries of the Judges of the several courts in the Dominion?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am sorry to say that the Government is not in a position to give an answer to the hon. gentleman just now.

GRAVENHURST AND CALLANDER RAILWAY.

Mr. COCKBURN, in moving for copies of all correspondence with railway companies or individuals, respecting the construction or subsidizing of the proposed railway link between Gravenhurst and Callander, also copies of any agreements or proposals affecting the same, said: In making this motion I wish it to be understood that I am not actuated by any desire to embarrass the Government or to pry into the private affairs of companies or individuals. Circumstances that have taken place regarding this important scheme, constrain me to make some enquiry respecting it. Hon. gentlemen do not need to be told of the importance of this link or branch of railway which is intended to serve most important interests. Hon. gentlemen will recollect that this scheme has already been received with very great favour by the House, and a very handsome subsidy was cheerfully and unanimously voted for it by members on both sides. This scheme is so well known to the majority of people throughout the country that I need not enlarge upon it. It is one of very great commercial promise, both as a through line and as a local line, and a great many people throughout central and western Ontario, more particularly in the newer settlements of the northern country, are becoming very impatient, and are beginning to feel uneasy, about the subject. Notwithstanding that a handsome subsidy of $12,000 per mile was granted to this scheme some time ago, we find that nothing has yet been done—the first sod has not yet been turned, therefore a great number of people throughout that region are becoming very uneasy about it, and it is desirable that the Government and the House should take some steps to get the road constructed by making an arrangement with some company, or some person or other. I am not speaking in the interest of any party or railway company; all I wish is that this vexatious delay should be put an end to, and that something may be done as soon as possible. I stated before that this scheme is one of very great promise, not only as a through line, but as a local line; and I should think it would offer great inducements for any railway company to undertake, as there are already important settlements along the proposed line, much larger than most persons have any idea of. The line is upwards of 100 miles in length, and I know of no scheme so well calculated to produce so much benefit, at so small an outlay, as the scheme in question. I trust, therefore, that, if no private company is prepared or willing to enter upon the construction, the Government themselves will at once undertake the work as a Government work.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say that there is no objection at all to the motion made by the hon. gentleman. The Government will be very glad to bring down any papers connected with this matter at an early day. I may say, however, that negotiations are going forward with a view to secure the construction of the road, and, perhaps, it would be better to have those completed before the papers are laid upon the Table. The House will require no evidence of the importance that the Government attached to the construction of this line, when it is remembered that a proposition was submitted to, and approved by, the House, last Session, to grant a very large subsidy to this line. It will be remembered that we stated at that time to the House our determination to make no arrangement for the construction of this very important line of communication between Gravenhurst and the Canadian Pacific Railway, that would not preserve the entire independence of the line, and prevent its usefulness being interfered with by any local interest, as we wanted that line to remain entirely independent. The delay in securing its construction, I may say, has grown out of the difficulty of carrying out that assurance that was given to the House, and which the Government regarded so binding as to prevent their making any arrangements that would not meet that view of the case. I am in hopes, however, that at an early period we will be prepared to submit to the House proposals that will accomplish the object in view.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. LISTER moved for a return giving the name of each city, town and village, in the Dominion of Canada, in which public buildings, consisting of Post Office or Custom House or both, have been erected since 1st January, 1879; also giving the name of each city and town in the Dominion in which such buildings are in course of erection, together with the cost and estimated cost of each.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I move that the following words be added to the motion:—

With a statement showing the population of each such city, town or village, and also a statement showing the revenues derived from the public offices of each such city, town or village.

I hope the hon. member will have no objection to adding these words.

Mr. LISTER. I have no objection.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I see no objection to the motion made by the hon. member, nor to the amendment, but I desire that instead of the date being 1st January, 1879, it should be 1st January, 1874. If the hon. gentleman will amend his motion to that effect, I shall not oppose its adoption.

Mr. COOK. I request the mover of the motion to make it also cover buildings in course of construction.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

UNION JACQUES CARTIER RAILWAY.

Mr. HOUDE. Some weeks ago the press announced that a new railway line, small in length, but great in importance as a connecting link, had just been opened at the back of Montreal, between Sault au Récollet and Lachine, the Union Jacques Cartier Railway. The city of Quebec and the country lying between the north shore of the St. Lawrence and Montreal, particularly rejoiced in that fact, because it was to the people there the beginning of an era of through traffic, that is traffic without transhipment, with the west and New England States at all seasons of the year. But a few days later there came other news which spoiled the rejoicing caused by the first announcement: the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had cut off the communication between the Union Jacques Cartier Railway and the North Shore Railway. If I am not mistaken, an appeal was immediately made to the Federal Government, praying them to try to have that difference settled. It is in order to have the nature of that appeal made better known to this House and the public generally, that I move the motion of which I have given notice. As the case is now before the courts, I do not wish to say anything to prejudice it; but I believe I may be allowed to call the serious attention of the Government to the great injury done to many business men and farmers, by the fact that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have caused traffic to be stopped on the Union Jacques Cartier Railway, by refusing to carry the cars of the North Shore Railway from St. Martin to Sault au Récollet, and vice versa. The result of this is that the merchants of Quebec cannot have flour and other produce of the west shipped through to them, nor can exporters of hay, &c., on the north shore of the St. Lawrence, especially between Three Rivers and Montreal, have their cars sent through to New England, their usual market, which causes annoyance, and, in several instances, within my personal knowledge, heavy loss. It seems to me the Government would be fully justified in interfering to induce the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to better respect the public interests, while guarding their own, and to assent to some reasonable compromise. For instance, they might very well carry the cars of the North Shore Railway from St. Martin to Sault au Récollet and back, keeping a record of the number of cars so carried, and wait for the judicial authorities, now seized of the case, to finally decide as to the remuneration claimed for the service. If I am well informed, and I think I am, the other contending party would assent to such an agreement, which would surely be a fair one. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company ought not to object to it. At all events the Government should justly and legitimately protect a large portion of the public by making that great and proud concern, which I suppose they have some means of influencing, show themselves in a little more favourable light with respect to this matter. I hope, therefore, the Government will see their way to interfere, with the public interest in view, and that with the least possible delay. I beg to move for correspondence exchanged between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and any other railway company, with regard to the opening of the Union Jacques Cartier Railway.

Mr. GIROUARD. The motion which has been made by my hon. friend is one which interests a portion of my county. This railway runs from Lachine to Back River, passing through a very important parish at the back of the city of Montreal. It was built I do not say mainly with the intention, but certainly with the intention, of affording communication with the city of Montreal, and thence by railway in an easterly as well as a westerly direction. It so happens that in consequence of the decision of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company no trains are running on the road although it has been completed for some months. I think it is contended on the part of the Union Jacques Cartier Railway Company, that they have running powers over the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I believe this right is denied by the latter Company. I do not wish to say one word in favour of or against the pretensions of either party. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company may be right, or the Union Jacques Cartier Company may be right. But it seems to me it is a very extraordinary power to exercise on behalf of a company like the Canadian Pacific Railway, which to a certain extent is a national company, to say: We will not allow any trains to pass over our road; and I think that the Canadian Pacific Railway should allow these trains to pass, reserving to the courts of justice to determine the rates to be paid that company under the general provisions of the Railway Act, or under some special provisions which are alleged to have been made in the sale effected by the Quebec Government to the Canadian Pacific Railway. I do not know whether this Parliament has or has not jurisdiction in the matter, but whether it has or not I hope the Canadian Pacific Railway will see the impropriety of refusing to allow the trains of this company to pass over their line, though they may reserve the determination of their rights in the manner I have stated.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say with reference to this question, that there can be no objection to bringing down any correspondence in the hands of the Government. It is very unfortunate that the difficulty should have arisen, and that the trade of a very important section of the country should have been so materially interfered with, owing to the want of accord upon the question between the two companies concerned, namely, the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The Grand Trunk Railway Company made communication to me pointing out that they were unable to carry on their traffic through inability to run over a portion of the road built and owned by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and I immediately referred the question to the Department of Justice to ascertain if the Government had any power to interfere. The answer of that Department was that we possessed no power whatever; that this Parliament alone was in a position to give running powers to any one company to run over the line of any other company. That neither the Government nor the Railway Committee of the Privy Council were clothed with any power which would enable us to interfere. Having received that answer as to the question of law, I used my best offices with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in the matter, by suggesting to them my anxiety that there should be no interruption of this traffic. The statement made by the company was: We are quite prepared to allow traffic to run over our lines, but for the protection of our rights we require that the parties should agree to pay us a certain amount, subject to the final adjudication of what rights they may have. We do not wish to obstruct the traffic for a single moment, but the course we are taking is indispensable to protect our legal rights and enable us to obtain the consideration to which we are entitled. I am sorry that no means were found either by adopting that mode, or of allowing traffic to go on, subject to compensation by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, or by any other mode, until the matter should be finally determined. I believe it has been taken to the courts, and the only power which, under the circumstances, has any means of dealing with the question is this Parliament.

Motion agreed to.

DISALLOWANCE OF PROVINCIAL ACTS.

Mr. MULOCK moved for copies of all Orders in Council, reports and correspondence not already brought down, in reference to the exercise or non-exercise of the power of disallowance as to any Provincial Acts; with a statement of the dates of prorogation of each of the Provincial Assemblies; and of the dates at which the Acts of the Session were received at Ottawa; and copy of the despatches addressed to the Lieutenant Governors on the subject of the transmission to the Government of Canada of such Acts.

Mr. BLAKE. In this connection I would call the attention of the Government to the laxity of practice which so far as I can understand has grown up with reference to the transmission of the Acts of the Local Legislatures. It was found when I had the responsibility in this regard, that there were very considerable delays in the transmission of the Acts, and during that period an Order in Council was passed under which instructions were sent to the Lieutenant Governors of the various Provinces requesting, and so far as might be, enjoining them within a fixed period—I think it was six weeks after the conclusion of the Local Assembly—to transmit their Acts for the consideration of the Executive. It is very clear that at the earliest convenient moment, after the Acts have been assented to, they should be so transmitted, because, if an indefinite period is to elapse before the transmission, during all that time these Acts upon which the power of disallowance may ultimately be exercised remain valid, and, strictly speaking, until transmitted it is not possible for the Government to act upon them. Now, I am informed that in more than one instance a much longer period than six weeks, a period approximating to a year, has elapsed without the Acts of the Local Legislatures having been transmitted to the Secretary of State, and that, in consequence, it is stated, and I dare say correctly, that it is impossible for the Government to consider of these Acts whether or no they should be allowed. I would, therefore, in connection with my hon. friend's motion—which I have no doubt will pass, because except as to the latter part it is a customary motion, and as to the latter portion it is a proper one—call attention to these facts and suggest the propriety of the Government reminding their officers, the Lieutenant Governors, of the Order which was passed, and calling them to perform it so far as practicable.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I think the Dominion Government have a year from the receipt of the Bills in which to act.

Mr. BLAKE. Certainly; but what I pointed out to the hon. gentleman was that, until received, an Act which may ultimately be found to be objectionable and disallowed, remains valid, and by delaying forever to transmit the Act, you delay forever the exercise of the power.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Oh, yes.

Motion agreed to.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

Motions for the following Returns were severally agreed to:—

Statement showing for the time elapsed since the period covered by the Order of the House of Commons of last Session with reference to the Superannuation Fund: 1. The number of persons on the list for the year as entitled to the benefit of the Act; 2. The number superannuated during the year under the Act; 3. The number retired during the year on a gratuity under the Act; 4. The total amount paid into the fund from the beginning by those who were during the year superannuated, or retired on a gratuity; distinguishing between those whose superannuation was caused by the abolition of office, those who were superannuated otherwise, and those who retired on a gratuity; 5. The numbers of persons on the list for the year who died in the service; and 6. The total amount paid into the fund from the beginning by those who during the year died in the service.—(Mr. Blake.)

Copies of judgments of the Supreme Court of Canada, not already brought down, on the question of the legislative power with reference to the regulation of the sale of intoxicating liquors, and of the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of Hodge against the Queen on the same subject, and of the shorthand writer's notes of the proceedings before the Committee, and of any correspondence in connection with the case; and also, for copies of the shorthand writer's notes of the proceedings before the Committee in the case of Russell and the Queen.—(Mr. Blake)

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 4:05 o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 25th January, 1884.

REPORT.

Report of Minister of Railways and Canals.—(Sir Charles Tupper.)

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced, and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 14) to amalgamate the Board of Trade of the City of Toronto and the Toronto Corn Exchange Association.—(Mr. Beaty.)

Bill (No. 15) to limit the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in Appeal.—(Mr. Landry, Montmagny.)

Bill (No. 16) for the declaration of titles to land and to facilitate its transfer in the Territories of Canada.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

MANITOBA PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that this House do, on Tuesday, resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following Resolution:—

That it is expedient to provide that the Governor in Council may authorize the advance, to the Province of Manitoba, in aid of the Public Schools therein, of the sum of $10,000, the advance whereof, in the fiscal year 1880-81, was authorized by the Act 41 Vic., Chap. 13, and a further sum not exceeding $30,000, being $15,000 for each of the fiscal years 1881-82 and 1882-83; the said sums to be advanced out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund and to be repaid thereto with interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, out of the first proceeds of the sales of "School Lands" in the said Province under the Dominion Lands Act, 1883.

Motion agreed to.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. BOWELL, in moving to add the names of Messrs. Foster and Royal to the Select Committee for the supervision of the Official Reports of the Debates of this House, said: My attention has been called to the fact that it would be better to have another gentleman representing the French language upon the Committee, and also one from the Maritime Provinces; and looking through the list of members of the House, we thought the two members suggested would be, perhaps, as eligible as any others for the position. I suppose the House will have no particular objection to this motion.

Mr. BLAKE. This Committee, which is a House Committee, to discharge duties which are important, and may become delicate, with respect to the publication of the debates, has been, I believe, always, and I know certainly is to-day, composed of proportions which, as is proper, give the Ministerial side of the House a majority, but in the proportion of five to four. The hon. gentleman now proposes that these proportions should be changed to seven to four. I think that is objectionable for many reasons. It would be very much better to allow the proportions to remain as at present, and the hon. gentleman might, at least, have adopted the name of another member from this side of the House. I, therefore, suggest that the name of an hon. member from this side of the House be substituted for one of the two names proposed—I do not object to the names otherwise—in order to keep the majority as it is, and the two sides of the House as nearly as possible on an equality.

Mr. BOWELL. I did not hear the hon. gentleman suggest any name. There can be no possible objection to adding another name to the list, but I think the two names I have suggested should be placed on the Committee. If the hon. gentleman thinks his side of the House will not be sufficiently protected, there can be no objection whatever to adding another name.

Mr. BLAKE. The addition of another name, when the hon. member is proposing two additional names, will not retain the proportion. That is the reason I proposed a substitution instead of an addition.

Mr. BOWELL. If the hon. gentleman will reflect, he will remember that the representation of his side of the House on that Committee is much greater than on any other Committee of the House.

Mr. BLAKE. Certainly, and for obvious reasons.

Mr. BOWELL. I frankly confess I thought nothing of that matter. I suggested two names as being those of members who should represent the House on the Committee. If the hon. member will suggest a name I will move that it be added; but I do not feel inclined to withdraw either of the names I have suggested.

Mr. BLAKE. I suggest the name of Mr. Innes.

Mr. BOWELL. A very good name; and I move the addition of the name of Mr. Innes to the names mentioned in the motion.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

GOLD MINING IN THE N. W. T.

Mr. LISTER enquired, Is it the intention of the Government, during the present Session of Parliament, to introduce and pass an Act relating to the mining of gold and other minerals, excepting coal, in the North-West Territories?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In reply to the hon. gentleman, I would say that section 42 of the Dominion Lands Act, 1883, provides that lands containing coal or other minerals shall be disposed of in such manner, and on such terms and conditions, as may from time to time be fixed by the Governor in Council by regulations to be made in that behalf. The regulations relating to the mining of gold and other minerals, except coal, have been prepared, and are awaiting the consideration of the Governor in Council. They will be laid on the Table early next week. The regulations respecting the mining of coal have already been laid on the Table.

MINING ON BAKER CREEK, N. W. T.

Mr. LISTER enquired, Has any person been authorized by the Government to grant mining licenses in the North-West Territories? If so, name, date of appointment and salary. If no such appointment has been made, has a grant of land been made by the Government to the Healy or Dennis Company, on Baker Creek, or on the south side of the Bow River, south of Silver City? If so, when was the grant made, what quantity of land is covered by it, and what was the consideration? If no such grant made, has the said company or any other company, or any person or persons, received a license or been in any way authorized to mine for minerals in the North-West? If so, the date of each license and the quantity of land covered?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Department of the Interior is aware that Messrs. Dennis and Healy have made a discovery on what is known as Baker Creek. We have now an application from them in the Department for a mining location. No grant can be made to them, or anyone else, until the mining regulations are in force; then their case will be dealt with under the regulations. No person has been authorized to grant mining licenses in the North-West.

CANADIAN IMMIGRATION.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, What is the estimate of the Government as to the number of immigrants who have settled in Canada during the last year; of the number of immigrants who have settled in Manitoba and the North-West; and of the number of immigrants from other parts of Canada who have settled in Manitoba and the North-West?

Mr. POPE. The number of immigrants who came into Canada during last year and expressed their intention of settling here, was, according to the returns of our agents and others, 133,303. There were also reported on the line between Emerson and the Rocky Mountains, 1,000 people. In my opinion this number is underestimated, and such is the opinion of our agents. As to the number of immigrants who have settled in Manitoba and the North-West, that is placed at 50,400. I am not in a position to answer the last clause of the hon. gentleman's question, but I will hand him an answer.

BANK RETURNS.

Mr. MASSUE enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce, during the present Session, a measure to provide that the returns made by banks shall be examined and controlled by inspectors?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. In answer to the hon. gentleman's enquiry, I may say that the subject to which he has called attention is now engaging the consideration of the Government.

SUPPLY FARM No. 20.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) moved for a return showing all Orders in Council or Departmental Orders respecting the Mr. LISTER.

sale of Supply Farm No. 20 on Fish Creek, near Calgary, or authorizing the sale of said farm. Also, a return showing: 1. The number of acres under cultivation in said farm at the time of sale. 2. The buildings thereon and the cost thereof. 3. All applications for the purchase of said farm. 4. A copy of the conveyance or agreement entered into between the Government and the purchaser. 5. The price agreed to be paid for said farm, and how paid or payable. 6. And all correspondence between the Government, or the Department of the Interior, and any person, respecting said farm and the sale thereof. He said: On Monday last I drew the attention of the Government to this farm by making the following enquiry of the Ministry:

"Whether Supply Farm No. 20, on Fish Creek, near Calgary, has been sold; when, to whom, and for what price, and whether by private sale or public competition?"

In reply to that question the hon. First Minister answered:

"Supply Farm No. 20 has been sold to the Hon. Dr. Robitaille at a price of $3 per acre, by private sale, and not by public competition."

I must say I was somewhat surprised to hear from the hon. First Minister that this valuable property had been disposed of by the Government by private sale, and at $3 per acre. The farm, as I understand, is a large and valuable farm, consisting of, I think, some 5,000 acres, established some years ago by the Government as a supply farm; the object being to raise upon it grain to supply the instruction farms and the Indians. The farm has been in operation, and, so far as I can understand, in successful operation, for some years. A large number of men have been employed upon it, and a considerable amount has been expended in improving, cultivating, and building upon it. It is situated within a few miles of Calgary, in what is said to be one of the very best portions of the North-West Territory; the land is said to be first class land. Now, the exact amount expended upon the farm it is difficult to ascertain from the public documents. It is stated in one report that in 1880 there were 465 acres under cultivation, most of which was fenced; that there were buildings of some value on the premises; that other improvements had been made thereon, but to what extent it is a very difficult matter to gather from the reports submitted to the House by the Minister in charge of Indian Affairs. So far as I have been able to ascertain, I should say that we have expended at least over $10,000 on that farm which has been sold for $3 per acre by private sale to the Lieutenant Governor of the Province of Quebec. Now, as I said, Sir, the farm was established for a particular purpose, and, so far as one can gather from the reports, it has been a successful farm, adapted to the purposes for which it was intended. Judging also by the documents to which we have access, there was no reason whatever why the farm should have been sold, and certainly no reason that I can see why it should have been sold by private sale to Dr. Robitaille, the Lieutenant Governor of Quebec. The first report I could lay my hands upon was a communication from Norman T. McLeod, one of the Indian Agents in the North-West, to the Lieutenant Governor. In that report Mr. McLeod speaks of this farm, and of various other farms; points out the difficulty of operating them; and, of course, one would easily understand how, at that time, in 1880, there was considerable difficulty in operating them, isolated as they were and difficult of access. In Sessional Paper No. 14, of the year 1881, I find that Mr. McLeod, among other things, makes the following statement:—

"I regret having to report the almost total failure which has attended the operations on the two supply farms, at Fish Creek and at Pincher Creek, greatly owing to unavoidable causes. The spring was cold and late, and vegetation slow. The land was not in a state to expect a full crop from it, the greater part of it having only been broken for the first time in the spring, which caused the seeding to be backward. The seed intended for them was not delivered in time, and on the 23rd of August a heavy snow storm, followed by severe frost, cut off the late sown grain. The farm at Fish Creek was also visited by a severe hail storm in July, which damaged the growing crops considerably. These storms are said to be usual in this country. Notwithstanding these drawbacks, the farms in the neighbourhood, where the land was properly prepared and sowed early, have yielded fair crops of barley and oats, showing that these grains may be raised successfully; peas will also yield good returns, but there being no demand for them at present they are not cultivated to any extent. They would make a valuable addition to the food supply for the Indians. Wheat is more uncertain; but, I think, more from the inferiority of the seed used, and the want of care in preparing it before sowing so as to prevent smut, than from the unsuitableness of the climate and soil."

We find, however, that as the reports come down year after year these difficulties disappear, and in the end they are able to grow crops successfully; and this property is said by the Inspector of Indian Agencies to be a valuable property. I find that Mr. Wadsworth, Inspector of Indian Agencies and Farms, in his report to Lieutenant Governor Dewdney, dated on the 1st of December, 1881, and appearing in the Sessional Papers of 1882, speaks of this farm in these words:

"I next visited the Fish Creek Supply Farm, arriving there on the 5th May. Mr. J. J. McHugh was in charge, having reached there from Rivière Qui Barre some ten days previously. He was actively engaged in putting in the seed, grain, roots, &c.; although in some degree hampered by inexperienced workmen and lack of horse power he was making good progress. The quantity of land broken here is 465 acres, most of which is fenced; that the farm is very badly equipped for extensive operations is apparent. In a country where wages are high, and food enormously dear, it stands to reason that to farm profitably labour-saving machines must be extensively used, also that horses should be used instead of oxen."

You will observe that this report is dated on the 1st of December, 1881, and has reference to the proceedings of that year. You will also observe that the report speaks of 465 acres having been cultivated, nearly all of which was fenced. I find in the Sessional Papers for 1883 a report from the same gentleman to Lieutenant Governor Dewdney, having reference to the year 1882. He says:

"The crops on the supply farms have not been very good. There will be between one and two thousand bushels on the Fish Creek Farm, also a large crop of peas and barley. The peas I shall send for seed to the reserves next spring, as I think they will be good to grow for food. The Indians can make soup of them. At Calgary, the Sarcees were not so successful, but we managed to take in a good many potatoes and other seed for next spring from the Fish Creek Farm, and I hope, next year, to make a good showing on this reserve."

There is nothing there that would indicate that the authorities up there, who had supervision and charge of this farm, communicated to the Government that it was desirable that the farm should be sold or disposed of in any way. Mr. Wadsworth, in the same report, further says:

"Under the management of Mr. Doyle, this farm was in fine order; a large crop had been sown which promised well. My remarks upon the discontinuance of Pincher Creek Supply Farm will also apply here. I may state that it is a very valuable property, and should, if sold, realize a good sum of money."

Now, that is the report made by Mr. Wadsworth, the Inspector of Indian Agencies, to the Department, which must have been known to Mr. Dewdney, and to the Minister in charge of the Department; but there is no suggestion that the farm should be disposed of. On the contrary, in a previous portion of the same report Mr. Wadsworth speaks of the continued success of the farm, and says that ultimately it would prove of great advantage to the Indians of the North-West. Now, we were told by the hon. First Minister that the farm has been sold; that it has been sold to the Lieutenant Governor of the Province of Quebec, and sold at the magnificent sum of $3 an acre. It has been sold privately; the public were not aware that this farm was to be put on the market; nobody, so far as I am aware, knew except Mr. Robitaille and another Lieutenant Governor. I do not know why the Government sold this farm. I am not now enquiring why. They may have had reasons, but nobody knows what these reasons were. But what I do complain of is that this farm was sold at private sale, and for at least one-third of its value. That is the estimate of gentlemen who live in the neighbourhood of the farm—friends of hon. gentlemen opposite, men who live in the city of Calgary. These gentlemen have stated to me that the property was worth three times what the Government got for it. The hon. First Minister tells us that it was sold to Lieutenant Governor Robitaille by private sale. Will the hon. gentleman say that there is no other Lieutenant Governor interested in that sale? I am prepared to give the hon. gentleman my authority that another Lieutenant Governor is interested in this farm. I state, without fear of successful contradiction, that two Lieutenant Governors went out to that farm, inspected it, and made an estimate of its value. I know, further, that one of the Lieutenant Governors, whose name the hon. gentleman did not give to the House, was in negotiation for the sale of a portion of that farm after it was bought from the Government. I say that if that farm was sold nominally to Lieutenant Governor Robitaille, there is another Lieutenant Governor as deeply interested in it as Mr. Robitaille. I say that if that is so, it is an outrage and a scandal which the Government ought to get rid of. I do not say now that the hon. First Minister, or the Government, were aware of all the circumstances; I cannot say, until the papers come down, whether they were in communication with the other Lieutenant Governor, or not; but I do say that it is not consistent with the duty that hon. gentleman owes to the Government and the public, that a man in his position, who gets the first report about a particular piece of property, should avail himself of that information, and, either for himself or any other person, secure an interest in the property. Nobody, except the officials, is aware of what these reports contain until they are submitted to Parliament; and there is no doubt that he had full knowledge of the fact that the Inspector of Indian Agencies reported to the Government that this was a valuable property and would realize a large sum of money, else he would not have joined in purchasing it by private sale. I say no more until the documents come down. I state, not what has been told me by my political friends, but by friends of hon. gentlemen opposite in the city of Calgary, who complain bitterly of the sale of that property without public notice, and without the public having an opportunity of bidding for this valuable property. I contend that it is not a proper way of dealing with the public domain of this country, especially with such a property as this, upon which the Government had spent a large sum of money in cultivation, in erecting buildings, and in making other improvements. I ask the hon. gentleman if he knows that $1,500 was spent in building a bridge across Fish Creek, which runs through the property, in order to benefit the farm? Did the Government take this into account when they sold the property to Mr. Robitaille for $3 an acre? Does that cover the cost of all the improvements on the property? Even if it does, the Government have not received the value of the land, and they have practically given it away. Now, I say, in the first place, that it was unfair that this property should have been sold in this secret, underhand way—the public should have had an opportunity of bidding for it when it was put on the market; I say that it was sold for a great deal less than its value; I say that it was sold under circumstances which demand from the Government, if not from Parliament, a thorough enquiry; and I say that it was sold to Lieutenant Governor Dewdney, and another Lieutenant Governor, I believe, was interested in the purchase.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There can be no objection to the motion being adopted, and the papers will be brought down at once. I rather regret the hon. gentleman did not pursue the usual course of reserving any remarks until he had the whole case before him. He has not had that advantage. He evidently considered it was important to himself, and the rest of the House, to get these papers down in order that they might make up their minds on the subject, or he would not have moved for them. If he had all the information requisite to form an opinion, there was no necessity for his motion; but if not, he should have reserved comment until he could have spoken with some guarantee of correctness. There was evidently not a parliamentary animus actuating the hon. gentleman, when he said there are two Lieutenant Governors concerned in this, and that he would give their names if I asked for them; and wound up by saying that one of them was Lieutenant Governor Dewdney. He does not assert, but he insinuates, that Lieutenant Governor Dewdney is the purchaser of this place; and he insinuates this because two Lieutenant Governors drove out together and went over the farm together. That is the evidence he adduces to show that Lieutenant Governor Dewdney had an interest in the purchase of this farm. The hon. gentleman should remember that the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West, Mr. Dewdney, is the Commissioner for the management of Indian Affairs, and it was his duty to visit the farm. He was instructed to do so, and to report to the Government and the Department, as Commissioner of Indian Affairs. Therefore, in the performance of his duty, not as Lieutenant Governor, but as Commissioner, he went, in obedience to instructions, to make a valuation, and he did make it. That is the whole basis of the attack on Mr. Dewdney. Why this gentleman, because he is a public official, should be held liable to insinuations of that kind from an hon. member in his place, I do not see. It is a grave thing to make those charges. He has said that he heard from hon. gentlemen on this side that the people were very indignant over the matter. Well, this farm, a good many years ago, in the early settlement of that country, when there were few or no settlers, no means of getting provisions, and no railways, was laid out as a supply farm for the Indians. It was considered as a tentative matter, and the previous Government, I believe, laid this place out as a supply farm for Indians—the Blackfeet, and all those tribes stretching across the foot of the Rocky Mountains. The farm was not surveyed, but the site was taken up as an eligible one by the officers of that day, without reference to future surveys of any kind. The hon. gentleman will find, by the report of Mr. Wadsworth, that from some cause or other this farm has not been a commercial and financial success. The time has passed for the necessity of a supply farm of this kind, and the authorities of the Indian Department thought necessary to close this bill of expense which was annually a loss. It was closed, and the farm was transferred back to the Indian Department, ceasing to be an Indian farm. Then we had to consider what was to be done with it. It is a farm of some 4,500 acres more or less—I am not sure whether it has been surveyed yet or not; perhaps it has; but the moment it went back to the Department of Interior, it became, like other public lands in the North-West, open to homesteading and pre-emption, and also giving the Canadian Pacific Railway a claim to the odd numbered sections, a portion being within the twenty four mile belt. They had a right to their land, and if there were any school lands included, as I suppose there would be in those 4,500 acres, they were to be dealt with under the law relating to school lands. Over this farm were scattered buildings, principally of logs and of some years duration, which would be of little or no value if the farm were broken up in quarter-sections, except for the material they would afford the homesteader, who, mind you, was to get the land for nothing. If this land was not sold as one farm, it would have to be broken up into quarter-sections, and any homesteader could get land under the law upon entering himself for it as such. The hon. gentleman says this place ought to be put up at public auction. Well, we could not put it up as a whole farm at public auction, because the Government did not own it as a whole farm. Lieutenant Governor Robitaille, who took a fancy to the place, and who says as soon as his term of office is over he is going to transfer himself to the North-West to settle there—

Mr. COOK. Is he going to take his piggery with him?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I dare say my hon. friend will find a very hospitable reception if he visits him there in the North-West. It could not be sold as a whole farm, and Mr. Robitaille was told he could make his own bargains with the Canadian Pacific Railway for their lands; but that as far as the school lands were concerned he could not get them, as they must be kept to be dealt with under the law which prescribes the mode of selling school lands. It can only be sold by public auction, and only when it has been surveyed, and at a price equivalent to the price which is obtained for the neighbouring lands. Therefore he did not get this 4,500 acres. He only got those portions of it that belonged to the Canadian Government. He did not get the Canadian Pacific Railway lands; he did not get the school lands; and he only got the even-numbered sections when surveyed. Now, these buildings were, as I have stated, of comparatively little value, and we could not put them up to auction. It was of great importance to get some person who would buy the whole farm. Mr. Robitaille said: "I have seen the Canadian Pacific Railway authorities, and I think I shall be able to make a bargain with them; I will run my risk of that." I will read, Mr. Speaker, from a report of the Deputy Minister. When I saw, yesterday, that the hon. gentleman showed symptoms of making a speech, I brought the papers over here, though it is rather inconvenient to quote papers higglety-pigglety in this way, when they are not before the House. On June 28th, 1883, the Deputy of the Minister of the Interior, Mr. Burgess, made this report to me as Minister of the Interior:

"DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
"OTTAWA, June 28th, 1883.

"SIR,—I have the honour to direct attention to the fact that the Deputy of the Superintendent-General of Indian Affairs has notified this Department that the tract of land known as the Fish Creek Farm, situated near the junction of the Fish Creek with the Bow River, in the District of Alberta, North-West Territories, is no longer required for Indian purposes, and possession of the same has been surrendered to this Department, to be dealt with as may be deemed proper.

"The Deputy Superintendent-General of Indian Affairs further states that it is proposed to dispense at once with the services of the person now in charge of the farm buildings and premises.

"Permit me respectfully to submit that, in order to dispose of this property to the best advantage, it is desirable that it should be sold at once, as every day's delay means deterioration of the farm buildings and decrease in the value of the breaking and all the other improvements.

"Moreover the tract of land attached to the buildings having, up to this period, been cultivated as one farm, it would be in the public interest to sell it in one block intact, so that the full value of the improvements made thereon by the Indian Department may be realized.

"I have, therefore, the honour to recommend that the authority of His Excellency the Governor General in Council, as required by section 24 of the Dominion Lands Act, 1883, be asked for the sale by this Department of the farm (with the buildings thereon) known as the Fish Creek Indian Farm, as shown on the tracing herewith, and more particularly described as follows:—

Here follows the description—

"Subject, however, when the surveys of the land have been made and confirmed, to any rights therein which may accrue by law to the Hudson's Bay Company."

Yes, the Hudson's Bay Company—I said the Canadian Pacific Company—

"And the school endowment; and subject also to such rights, if any, in the odd numbered sections therein which may accrue to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, under 44 Vic., chap. 1.

"The price to be not less than $3 an acre."

That is the report of Mr. Burgess. Subsequently that report was adopted, and I may say here that we considered that $3 an acre was a very good price indeed. The nominal price of land by the Statute was $1 an acre, and to get $2 an acre additional for the old log buildings we considered was a very good bargain. The hon. gentleman says the land is worth more now. Well, Mr. Speaker, I believe there is just now a boom at Calgary, something like the boom that existed at Winnipeg a couple of years ago; but my hon. friend who sits behind me from the West Riding of Durham (Mr. Williams) has been over the ground, and says he would not give half the money for it. He has been over the ground, and on the farm, and has seen the improvements. On the 17th July, 1883, there was this further report from the Deputy Minister:

"DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
"OTTAWA, 17th July, 1883.

"SIR,—With reference to the Order in Council of the 7th inst., transferring to this Department the Indian farm situated on the Fish Creek, in the District of Alberta, North-West Territories, and authorizing the sale of the land, with the buildings thereon, as one farm, at a price of not less than $3 per acre, I have the honour to call your attention to the fact that the papers from the Department of Indian Affairs, which are now on record in this office, disclose that the Hon. Theodore Robitaille, of Quebec, made an offer of $10,000 some time ago for the property, and Mr. Dewdney, Indian Commissioner, who has had the best means of arriving at correct conclusions as to the value of the farm, recommends the acceptance of the offer.

"The area is 4,733 acres, and I suggest that Mr. Robitaille be given the opportunity of purchasing at the upset price named in the Order in Council, namely $3 per acre. As the land is not surveyed, and the respective rights of the Hudson's Bay Company, the school endowment, and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, cannot at present be ascertained, I further recommend that for the purposes of the sale the area at the disposal of the Government be, for the present, computed at one half the whole area, or 2,366½ acres; that the terms of payment be one fourth of the purchase money of that area in cash, and the remainder in three equal annual instalments, with interest at the rate of 6 per centum per annum.

"When the survey is made and the interests of all the parties mentioned in this letter have been ascertained, the payments to be subject to readjustment, by increase or reduction, as the case may be.

"This would not accord exactly with Mr. Robitaille's offer, as it is evident he expected for $10,000 to acquire the whole property from the Government direct, and the rate per acre would be higher than he contemplated. The proposition I make, however, is consistent with the policy of the Department, and in accordance with the provisions of the Order in Council transferring the farm."

This is a report from the Deputy Minister to myself. I believe it was the very best disposition of the property that could be made; I believe there has been a full value got for it and for the buildings; I believe that it would have only caused delay, without any good purpose whatever, to have advertized it, and put it up to auction. I am quite certain of that; we have had experience of that; we have been trying to sell the buildings at Fort Pelly; we have advertized them very largely, and we have not been able to get a bid for them, and the buildings are crumbling down. It is quite clear that the same result would have followed in this particular instance. This is the explanation. I am quite satisfied that the Lieutenant Governor of Quebec has not made his fortune out of this speculation; I am quite satisfied that, for the 2,000 and odd acres that the Government have sold to him, they are getting a high price, and much more than they would have got if it had been broken up into sections and homesteaded and pre-empted. The whole of the papers will be brought down with full particulars, and I shall have the opportunity of discussing the matter with the hon. gentleman again. In the meantime, I have not the slightest objection to the motion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It does not appear to me, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. the First Minister has quite met the statement of my hon. friend behind me. My hon. friend's objection was—and a most just objection it is—that sales should be made by private contract to gentlemen in the position of the Lieutenant Governor of Quebec, or any other party. Now, I heard something about this transaction myself. It was very freely canvassed and discussed in the North-West, and I will tell the hon. gentleman this: that I was credibly informed, and I believe it is the case, that one man, resident in the immediate neighbourhood of this same property, offered $10 an acre for any 200 acres of this 4,700—not to the Government, but to the gentleman to whom the Government sold it. I was informed of that on authority which I am inclined to believe was correct.

I have not seen the property myself—I do not know whether the bargain may be a desirable one or not; but I do believe that the people in the North-West, and the people in the country generally, will agree with me in thinking that it is not expedient that private sales should be made by the Department of large portions of the public property to Lieutenant Governors or any other parties. It may be all right; the Government may have got all this property was really worth; but it is quite clear to me—and I think will be clear to everybody who considers the subject fairly—that to allow this to be done opens wide the door to all manner of jobbery and to an improper kind of speculation; and that it is much to be regretted that a transaction of this kind should have occurred between a gentleman occupying the position of a Lieutenant Governor and the Department of the Interior.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I understand then, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman desires the inauguration of a new policy. He desires that the lands in the North-West should be sold by public auction. Why, Sir, not an acre has been sold by public auction. It is in accordance with the law that every acre has been sold by private sale. The only exception—and it is made a special exception—is in regard to the school lands.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think that at any rate the public ought to have known that that land was to be disposed of by private sale. Those people in the neighbourhood did not know that—no man appears to have known it, except the Lieutenant Governor of Quebec, and, perhaps, also some others.

Mr. BLAKE. It is quite one thing to talk of land being sold as this was, and another thing to talk of land being sold by private sale, in the way in which the hon. gentleman mentions. When he says this land was sold by private sale, and that land was sold by private sale, he knows perfectly well that the sales he speaks of were of properties which have been announced to the public as open to any man to take at a fixed price. Was that done here? Was the public made aware that this farm was open to anybody who chose to apply for it at $3 an acre? We know it was not. We know, therefore, this case differs from the rule in the North-West Territories entirely—unless, indeed, there be other exceptions which we have not yet learned.

Mr. COOK. There is one thing that must be taken into consideration. The hon. leader of the Government has stated that if I went to the North-West, no doubt I would be entertained at the Lieutenant Governor's residence. I want him to understand that I do not go to the North-West. A great many of his own friends go there, and probably he had given them an opportunity of getting entertained at the hands of the Lieutenant Governor of the Province of Quebec. Probably, also, he is just paving the way for that hon. gentleman for another appointment as Lieutenant Governor of that Province. I wish to give my hon. friend to understand that I do not require to be entertained, nor shall I have the opportunity of being entertained at the hands of the Lieutenant Governor, even if he should come down to Ontario with his farm and the piggery upon it.

Mr. ORTON. I do not know that I can throw much light upon this subject; but a matter came to my knowledge that I think will go to show how difficult it is for the Government to obtain fair prices for buildings erected on the public lands in the North-West. I understand that at Livingstone, some time ago, something like $40,000 was expended by hon. gentlemen opposite in erecting police barracks. A short time ago the present Government offered by public tender the section of land which was to form the town of Livingstone, on the old route of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and all the buildings, which cost something like $40,000. They were offered to public competition, and the highest tender received for these buildings and the whole section, was $2,000. The Government thought very properly, I think, that it was so small a sum compared with the immense amount that had been expended, that they did not sell that property to any of the tenderers. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think that experience goes to show that the Government were justified in thinking that if a large area of land were given to any one individual, it might approach nearer to reimbursing the money they had expended in such public buildings as were erected on the farm at Calgary. However, it seems very strange to me to hear my hon. friend from West Huron (Mr. Cameron), and my hon. friend from South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), say anything as to the possibility of any gentleman making any money out of the lands in the North-West, when we so well know that these very gentlemen took advantage—I do not say improperly at all—to speculate in lands in the North-West to a very large extent, under the land regulations, which, I believe, were in operation during the regime of the hon. member for East York—

Mr. MACKENZIE. No.

Mr. ORTON. Under Mr. Mills, as Minister of the Interior, when the regulations were somewhat as follows: That anybody could buy land at $1 an acre, and pay for it at the rate of 10 cents an acre for ten years. If I am properly informed, those hon. gentlemen together obtained no less than 30,000 acres of these lands—the most valuable lands in southern Manitoba; and they sold those lands at $9 an acre very shortly afterwards, realizing the very handsome sum of something like $200,000—so I am informed. I think that when these gentlemen have made so large an amount of money themselves, they ought not to be so very jealous if a few friends on this side of the House undertake to speculate in that country. I know very well a great many of those gentlemen who have speculated in that country have lost money by it. It is well known to-day that many people in Ontario, both friends and opponents of the Government, who have invested in lands in that country, have lost very seriously by it—though I hope it will not be so with these gentlemen. But it seems to me to be a fact that lands to-day are not as saleable in that country as they were under the boom, though I believe they are gradually improving. Though a healthy state of affairs is beginning to exist in that country, I think at the same time that good lands south of the railway, prime lands, could not under the present depression bring a larger sum than $3 per acre. And when we recollect that those lands in question are situated so very far away from any possible market, it does not seem to me that the sum is so extremely small, and I think the Government, on the whole, have made a very good sale.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). The hon. gentleman has stated that my hon. friend in front of me (Sir Richard Cartwright) and myself speculated in western lands under the Government of my hon. friend from East York. I wish to state that I never bought an acre of land while my hon. friend from East York was in power—not an acre of public land.

Mr. ORTON. I did not say you did.

Mr. CAMERON. I wish to state to the hon. gentleman that his information is incorrect—that I never had an interest in 30,000 acres, nor one-half 30,000 acres, of land. I wish to state to the hon. gentleman, further, that, to the best of my recollection, all the lands I ever bought in the North-West directly from the Government, were two sections, and I bought them from the Government of the hon. gentleman who sits before me on the other side of the House. I wish to state to the hon. gentleman, for his information, in order that he may be better informed in the future, that if I did buy land in the North-West, out of which I am glad to say I made a little honest money, I bought a large portion of it from a son of the colleague of the hon. gentleman opposite, who was in the Government of Canada for a number of years. I bought it of him second-hand; I paid a fair price for it; and, of course, as lands went up, I made a little honest money out of it. Now, I do not think the hon. gentleman has any ground of complaint against me. I do not think he ought to have made that statement without being better informed as to what the real facts were. I am sure if he had known that the lands that I bought were bought from a son of a colleague of the present First Minister, he would not have said anything on the subject at all. I bought no lands from the Government except two sections; I bought no lands from the Mackenzie Government at all; whatever land I did buy there, I bought second-hand, and perhaps to better advantage than some hon. gentlemen on the other side have bought. I did not buy any timber limits at $5 a square mile and sell them for $2,000. The hon. First Minister complains that I have made a statement of the facts on making this motion, whereas I ought to have waited until the papers came down, and then have made my statement. Sir, I have tried that over and over again in this House. There were, at least, twenty motions made by me last Session in connection with the administration of public affairs in the North-West, and to this day there is scarcely one of these returns brought down. It might suit the purpose of hon. gentlemen opposite for these motions to be made without a word of comment, and then wait for the papers coming down until Parliament is about closing. There were, perhaps, a hundred motions made last Session, most of them having reference to the affairs in the North-West, and not a single one of them has been submitted to Parliament as yet.

SIR RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I may also request the attention of the House for one moment. I am not going to trouble the House with any narrative of my private affairs. Those affairs are my own business, and not the business of my hon. friends opposite. But I will just say this, as a matter which is due to myself, and, perhaps, due to the hon. gentleman, as he has alluded to it—that I bought no land at all from the Government of the hon. gentlemen opposite, and I should have considered myself guilty of a very gross dereliction of duty, if I had bought any land at all while I was a member of the Cabinet. What I did do, if the hon. gentleman desires to know, was to purchase some lands on which the Government, I believe, had first mortgage, and which I took good care to pay for promptly. That is all the transactions I had with the Government—and I do not think that any one would suspect the Government of the hon. First Minister of giving me any undue or unfair favours.

Mr. ORTON. I did not accuse the hon. gentlemen of purchasing land from the Government of which they were supporters at that time, nor did I accuse them of buying land from the present Government. All I did state was that they had bought from a number of individuals large areas of land bought from the Government under the regulations in force under the previous and present Government for a short time; and we know very well that a great many in that country bought land at 10 cents per acre, as a first instalment, at $1 per acre. These gentlemen were very sharp in looking up individuals all over the country and securing land from them, and they made lots of money. I congratulated them on the fact, and I said, under those circumstances, they should not be so jealous of other individuals who paid a comparative good price to the Government for lands and made some money out of them.

SIR RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman stated that the hon. member behind me and myself had bought under the regulations laid down by Mr. Mills. We did nothing of the kind. At the time at which we purchased, Mr. Mills' regulations had been all abolished, and certain regulations adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite introduced.

Motion agreed to.

REPORTS OF THE HIGH COMMISSIONER ON IMMIGRATION.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of all reports of the High Commissioner on the subject of immigration to Canada, not already brought down, said: We have heard something of the doings of the High Commissioner with respect to the transport of cattle from Canada to England, but as yet not much information has been vouchsafed to the House as to what has been done in regard to immigration to Canada since last Session. Two gentlemen have filled that office, and have dealt with the important subject of emigration to Canada, on which hon. gentlemen opposite were so inflated last Session; and with respect to which I was glad to hear the statement of the hon. Minister of Agriculture a short time ago in support of the statement of the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Macmaster) made during the debate on the Address, that there had been a large immigration to this country. We know that during this period negotiations of an important description with the Home Government, and with corporations and individuals who were discussing various plans for immigration on a large scale, have been progressing. Such, at all events, is our public information, and I cannot doubt, as was the duty of the last and the present High Commissioner, some reports have been sent to the Department, under whose instructions they have acted in this regard. They should come down—and come down early—and with this view I move the motion. Are there some such reports?

Mr. POPE. I do not know; I will bring them down if there are any.

Mr. BLAKE. I am sorry the reports of the High Commissioner are of such little consequence that the hon. Minister does not even know whether they exist or not.

Motion agreed to.

PERSONS ENTERING MANITOBA BY RAIL.

Mr. BLAKE moved for a statement of the number of persons entering Manitoba by rail, during each month of the last calendar year; and of the number of persons leaving Manitoba by rail during each such month; also, for copies of all correspondence, reports, data and statements on which are based the estimates made by the Government of the number of immigrants who have come from specified countries, and settled in each Province of Canada, and in the North-West Territories, during the year; and of the number of Canadians who have left each province or territory or the Dominion, during the year. He said: I do not propose to enter at any length into the grounds of this motion. I stated them briefly last year when I made a similar motion, to which the hon. gentleman acceded. The motion passed; but, as happened with some other motions to which the hon. gentleman alluded a moment ago, it was fruitless in any other result.

Mr. POPE. I told you it would be so at the time.

Mr. BLAKE. No. The hon. gentleman said he could not give much information, but he could give some, and I did not even get what he could give. The hon. gentleman stated there would be a difficulty—or at all events at some period during the Session he stated that—in getting the number of persons entering and leaving Manitoba by rail, and he promised he would make an effort to secure that information for the current year. I trust he has made that effort, because I will repeat to-day what I have said on various occasions, that I dispute the accuracy of the calculations which he has made, and I dispute the accuracy of the data on which the calculations have been based with respect to immigration into Manitoba and the North-West. I stated that the hon. gentleman himself had resorted to a similar mode of ascertaining, approximately, the immigration into the United States from Canada, as that which I proposed he should resort to in obtaining his information in regard to immigration into the North-West. He did that for a purpose. For a purpose, he was able to ascertain the number of persons who had passed one way or the other by the great railway of the country—a particular point as to which there was a dispute. With respect to Manitoba and the North-West, the hon. gentleman's plan has been, as I understand it, to obtain a return from somebody who gets aboard the trains and is supposed to count the passengers, those who go in, and a certain percentage of deduction is made for those going out. With respect to the return of those who go in, I have conversed with several persons who have travelled to the North-West by train, and they have told me that on the occasion on which they travelled they did not discern this enquirer and the counting to which the hon. gentleman referred; and, therefore, I do not myself believe that it has taken place upon all occasions. I believe it is loose; that the plan does not accurately represent the number of those who have gone in; and if it turns out to hit, approximately, the number given by the railway returns, it will be the result of a happy guess or conjecture, rather than of a really accurate detailed account. Then with respect to the deduction made for those who go out. The hon. gentleman has persisted up to this year—I do not know what he will do this year—in assuming that 17 per cent. of those who have gone in is a proper calculation in order to arrive at the number who have left. This is based upon the supposed ascertained results of an early years when the movement of persons in and out was a very few thousands—I forget the number, but a number quite inadequate compared with recent numbers. It was before what was alluded to to-day, and so often in this House, by the First Minister and others, as "the boom," before the speculative period, before there was a very large number going in and out; and we all know that since that time many persons have gone into that country two or three times a year and returned. We know that a large number, even of those intending to settle, have gone into the country to prospect and have returned. We know that the calculation of 17 per cent. is wholly inadequate; and, therefore, even if you assume the calculation with regard to those going into the country to be correct, the deduction which the hon. gentleman has been making for the last two or three years is wholly inadequate, and so the results are inaccurate. For this reason it is I have been persevering for some time past in my efforts to obtain more accurate information with respect to those who actually have gone to settle in the North-West. I feel great interest in obtaining a return covering this information, for which, as I have said, I obtained an Order of the House last year, but without success, so far as obtaining the result of that Order. It is impossible to understand what the calculations of the Government are. It was only, I think, on 10th January, that a statement obviously official appeared in the Toronto organ of the Government, the Mail newspaper, giving the details of the movement of the immigration of the year, and stating it in the various details with the general result—I cannot say for a 1,000 or so, but if I rightly remember, a result of 110,000. Now, the movement he gives us to-day is 130,400, or 20,000 more. Of course, I do not know where the inaccuracy is, whether in the later or the earlier statement.

Mr. POPE. We gave you the returns we had at that time, and we give you the returns at the end of the year.

Mr. BLAKE. But the return was stated to be on the 10th of January, and that it was a return for the operations of the year.

Mr. POPE. Many of them were not in.

Mr. BLAKE. But the return was as I have stated. I once again insist on the importance of our having the opportunity, as a House of Parliament, of investigating the material on which the Government is acting—the data, and statements, and papers from which they draw these general results. Nothing can be more important to us than to be able to establish, as a fact, that there is flowing into this country as a permanent immigration of settlers here anything like the figures which the hon. gentleman states; and, therefore, it is of the greatest consequence that the material should be before us, so that we should be able to verify and speak with confidence in favour of the calculations of the Government. The hon. gentleman says, to-day, in answer to my question, that some 50,400 were the entrants into Manitoba. Even according to his own calculation of the deduction to be made, which is 17 per cent., that would give us something like 41,000 or 42,000 as his estimate of the emigration to Manitoba for the year, or of the settlement in that Province for the year. I do not believe there has been any such settlement from all I can ascertain. I believe that if there did go in the 50,000 that he speaks of, a great deal more than 8,000 left the country, if you calculate the various sources of exit and the various purposes of exit which applied during the year. From all I can hear, the figures of the hon. gentleman are exaggerated as to the settlement, if I am to assume that he is to apply to the calculation of 50,400 the deduction only of 17 per cent., and assume that the balance remained settled in the country. But even so, that balance of 41,000 or 42,000, contrasts but very unfavourably with the account which he gave us last Session: Last Session he stated with great confidence that altogether irrespective of the supposed immigration from Ireland en masse—the discussed arrangement for the coming out of 5,000 families—there would be 75,000 settlers in Manitoba and the North-West, for the year which has just elapsed. He declared that he expected to get in 40,000 from other countries than Canada—from European countries, and the United States practically—and the 35,000, being the balance of the 75,000, were to come from the old Provinces. His figures—assuming we apply the old deduction, which he has always applied—are not much more than one half this amount, and I believe those figures, so miserably contrasting with his promises for the year, are themselves, as I have stated, exaggerated. The hon. the First Minister declared that the estimates of the hon. gentleman were correct, that they were very moderate, that they were not at all exaggerated, and that he was quite satisfied that they would be realized. These were the statements, first, of the Minister specially charged with the matter, and secondly, of the hon. First Minister upon his particular responsibility, and this is the result of these statements, so far as they apply to the settlement of Manitoba and the North-West, according to the calculations of the hon. gentleman himself. I trust, Sir, that at an early day we shall have before us an answer to this motion. I trust we shall be shown what are the data upon which the Government brings down this general statement; that we shall be permitted to verify them; because I repeat what I said in the debate on the Address that all the calculations which are to be made from the various figures which are given—the figures of the census as contrasted with the hon. gentleman's figures of immigration and settlement year after year, the figures of the municipal census of Ontario—all the data we can obtain indicate that it is not possible that the results which he suggests can have actually been realized; that we can have added so much to the permanent settlement in our country, as he declares we have added, unless that permanent settlement has been effected by displacement of the native portion of the population approximately equivalent to it. That is not the case from these very figures. There has been a displacement, and a very considerable displacement, but not an equivalent displacement; and from all I can conjecture—and I desire to approach the subject with the assistance of the papers I now ask for—there has been no such permanent settlement from abroad—no such addition to our population otherwise, by the introduction from abroad either of Canadians or of citizens of other countries as the hon. gentleman calculates.

Mr. POPE. I might say to the hon. gentleman, as I said last year, that it will be impossible to give all the particulars asked for, but I will be happy to give him all the information I can. When that information is given, I suppose I shall find him doubting, as I find him doubting to-day. He will believe nothing that comes from the officers of my Department—nothing but what he sees with his own eyes. These returns are from disinterested parties; they are a count of the people going into that country and the people coming into this country. The people who make this count have no reason to exaggerate; still, the hon. gentleman will not believe them. It is true that I said last year that in my opinion there would be a larger immigration, and I believed so. I can appeal to my hon. friend as to the reasons which have prevented immigration—the reports and speeches which have been made by hon. gentlemen on the other side. I can appeal to the newspapers of these hon. gentlemen, and to what has been written in them, and ask him if that has not been enough to discourage people from going into the country. There has not been a single day in the whole season when any labouring man coming into this country could not find employment. In fact, Sir, I have not been able to half supply the demand of farmers for labourers; and yet reports are going to the other side of the water, daily and weekly, that people coming to this country can find nothing to do. That is quite sufficient to account for the falling off in the immigration into the North-West. But, upon the whole, the immigration has been nearly as large as I expected it would be.

Mr. BLAKE. Oh no, no!

Mr. POPE. Yes, nearly as large. There is a difference, but it is not a very large difference. Last year, there left Manitoba a considerable number; but there came in 15,000 more than left. I am not able to state exactly how the matter stands this year, but I shall be able to bring down the figures, and I hope I shall be able to remove some doubts from the hon. gentleman's mind as to the number of immigrants who came into the country. But let me point out that there is a difference between the immigration into the country and the actual settlers. There are labourers who also are immigrants, and when you take all together, you will find that we have not over-estimated. Every man who comes across the border reports to the Customs officers, in order to bring in his goods as settler's effects; and there can be no mistake about these entries. Then, we receive from our own agents invoices of the number of passengers in every ship; and there can be no mistake there. Whether there may be some of those who leave the country, I cannot say. Some may leave, but I cannot speak exactly as to the movement of population. If it should happen to turn out that the number who have left is not half of 17 per cent., that there is a very small percentage of the people coming out, I know the hon. gentleman would be pleased. I know he is a patriot, and regards his country above all party; I know he would be delighted to hear that no people have left that country at all. I am afraid I cannot say that there have not been a few; but I think I shall be able to show the hon. gentleman that 17 per cent. have not gone out this year.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman must remember that a new mode of exit from Manitoba has been adopted of late years; that there is a way of going out by rail, and I am sorry to say, a way of going out by trail; and he must put these two together before he arrives at his percentage.

Mr. POPE. I am not sorry that there is a way of going there by trail as well as by rail. I wish there were a thousand trails by which settlers could go into that country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. POPE. I am not out of order.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman is out of order in that he is speaking twice. I was replying to the motion and he misconstrued a material part of what I said. I asked him to remember that there were two ways of leaving the country, not of entering it.

Mr. BOWELL. I suppose settlers can go in by trail also.

Mr. POPE. I was replying to the hon. gentleman. I hope I did it effectually?

Motion agreed to.

CUTTING TIMBER ON INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of all Orders in Council, correspondence and departmental orders, with reference to the granting, cancellation and suspension of licenses to cut timber on lands of the Indians, near Fort William, on the Fort William Reserve, said: The reason I make this motion is that a letter has been transmitted to me which was addressed by a number of the Indians of the reserve to a friend of mine, in which they make a statement on which I base the motion, and to which I would call the attention of the Government. They say:

"It is necessary we should expose before you the whole case as clearly and concisely as possible. Some twelve years ago, that is the year the Red River Expedition took place, a certain Mr. William Plummer came to our reserve, when all the men, except three or four, were absent, having accompanied the soldiers. He exposed the object of his visit to those he found here. He had come, he said, to ask the Indians their consent to a license to cut timber on their reserve. Two of the men put their names to the surrender. A third one, as he declared afterwards, under oath, gave his name, but did not make his mark or touch the pen, saying he would do so if, after their return, he found his fellow Indians favourable to the petition. None of the signers had any authority in the band. The surrender form, with these three names on it, was left in the hands of the Rev. J. P. Choné, S.J., Missionary at Fort William. Then Mr. Plummer returned to Ottawa, after having given the Indians flour and tobacco, and told them to make their brethren sign the surrender when they had returned. Some time after, the absent came home and were called to the house of the missionaries, where the Rev. Father Choné told them of Mr. Plummer's visit and holding in his hands the surrender form, translated it and explained it to them. When they had consulted together for a few minutes they unanimously answered negatively, saying they would put their names to no paper, as they had not received what they had been promised before. They were told to reconsider the matter, but answered a second time in the same manner. Towards the fall, Mr. Plummer returned to Fort William and gathered together the Indians at the Hudson Bay Company post, the meeting taking place in presence of Mr. G. McIntyre, the then agent of the company at Fort William. Mr. Plummer proposed to all what he had previously proposed to a few. The consent asked for was unanimously denied or refused. He insisted several times, but invariably received the same answer. William Crow, who was then our First Chief, having remarked that his name was on the surrender, said to Mr. Plummer: 'Who has given you my name? You have stolen it.' Plummer blushed and answered nothing. Though Crow can write his name, another person has written it down, and nobody has witnessed the writing. Plummer, seeing his failure, became very angry, and throwing with violence on the table the surrender form he held in his hands, said: 'So I cannot obtain anything. Well, notwithstanding your opposition, the Government shall take your timber.' All returned home; two years elapsed before anything was heard about Plummer's threats; then we were told that a license had been granted by the Government to a man named Monk to cut timber on our reserve. Immediately we protested against it, and sent our protest to the Government. Our Chief has in his possession the draft of the protest drawn by Father Choné. From 1874 to the fall of 1882, three or four persons trespassed on our reserve, but all were easily stopped, except Mr. Oliver, who used to own a saw mill at Fort William. He cut a great number of our pine trees. Time and again we spoke to Amos Wright, who was then our agent, and to S. J. Dawson, the member for Algoma, begging of them to see that Oliver should pay damages for his trespasses. Finally, Mr. Dawson told us that Oliver had used the Monk license when he made timber on our reserve. We did not understand what he meant. In the fall of 1882, Mrs. Farjanya, of Montreal, Mr. Henry Valières, of Three Rivers, and Mr. Thomas Marks, of Port Arthur, formed together a partnership called 'The Thunder Bay Lumbering Company.' The news was then spread that they were to begin to work on our reserve, using the Monk license which had come down to them, it appears, as follows: Monk before ever having made any use of his license, advertised in the papers that he would sell it. A man named Stewart bought it. He then took the late Farjanya as his partner. When Farjanya died, his widow became the owner of one-half the license and bought the other half from Stewart. Then she took Henri Valières as partner, and they both formed the said company with Thomas Marks. We then protested against their entering on the reserve, and signified our protest to Thomas Marks. They, nevertheless, began to work. We then deputed to Ottawa J. B. Binesi, who was then our Chief, with an interpreter. On their way, they took with them Mgr. Jamot, Bishop of Peterborough. When they had reached Ottawa, they had an interview with Sir John Macdonald, and presented him our petition, begging of him that he would cancel the Monk license, granted under false allegations, and stop the Thunder Bay Lumbering Company from cutting our timber and our trees. One point was immediately obtained, namely, that they should make no more cordwood, as the license had been granted only for merchantable timber; but Sir John said that, before cancelling the license or stopping the company, an enquiry about the facts of the case should have to be made. T. J. Dawson was proposed by Sir John to do the work, and accepted by the deputation. But Mr. Dawson refused to act and was replaced by Mr. Caddy, a Government officer, residing at Fort William. This latter one immediately proceeded to make the enquiry, examining under their oaths a good many Indians, Mr. McIntyre and some others. All testified according to what we have set above. Mr. Caddy made his report without delay, and placed it before Sir John. We, therefore, expected an early decision, but on the contrary those we complain of were allowed to work during the whole winter, cutting about 10,000 logs per week. However, the right Rev. Bishop Jamot, and we ourselves, often asked Sir John to give his decision, considering that our case was so clear, but, nevertheless, we could not obtain justice. We saw that Sir John was favouring Marks on account of the support his party received from him in the elections, Marks having a great deal of influence in these parts. So we told Sir John in one of our letters we hoped that this question, having nothing to do with politics, would not be influenced by them, but our remark had no effect. Last spring, when the company's work was over, the time for renewing the Monk license came, but Sir John did not renew it, saying he wished first to examine our case. Mr. Donnelly came here to tell us he had notified Marks and others, on the part of the Department, not to cut any more timber on the reserve. However, towards the middle of the summer, seeing that no decision was given, we began to suspect they wanted to play us a trick; namely, that Sir John being afraid to see another deputation from us in Ottawa, had ordered our agent to warn us as we stated above, but that when navigation was closed, and we could no longer travel, then he would again allow Marks to work on the reserve. Consequently, we decided to send another deputation to Ottawa, and wrote to our Bishop about it. He answered us not to start before he wrote us again. Meanwhile, he corresponded with Sir John and Mr. Vankoughnet. The matter was delayed from week to week, until navigation had closed, and now that we cannot travel easily, Vankoughnet has written to Mr. Donnelly to allow Marks and his partners to use again the Monk license and they are hard at work. It is in this way that we are treated by him who should protect us. Evidently politics have a great deal or rather everything to do with the case. Marks is now being rewarded for the help he gave the Ottawa Government in the last Algoma election. We were told, some years ago, that the Government of Mr. Mackenzie was defeated, partly on account of the Neebing Hotel or Town Plot Affair. We do not know how far the charges made against it may have been true, but supposing they were, then on the other side, on the Kaministiquia River, just opposite the Town Plot, on our reserve, is to be found a pendant to the Neebing Hotel case. Once more, hon. Sir, we ask your help in order that we may obtain justice. If it were absolutely necessary to send one of us to Ottawa, we would try to do so, though our poverty would make it hard for us, especially in winter.

We subscribe ourselves, honourable Sir,
Your most humble servants,
JOHN PIERRÉ, 1st Chief.
his
MICHEL + St. GERMAIN, 2nd Chief. mark.

The House will excuse my attempting to read all the other names. I trust the hon. gentleman will see that these papers are brought down early and that he will do something to restore the confidence of those poor people in their protector and guardian. I understand that although they are not here, Marks is.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will be very glad to bring down all the papers at once. I do not know whether this will assure confidence in the signers of this letter, but I know that the Government and the Department have acted according to what they considered to be the best interests of the Indians. I have seen a statement similar to this before. One of the statements was that a Mr. Plummer went up there while most of the tribe were away at Red River, during the time of the war, and had succeeded in securing a surrender of this timber. This Mr. Plummer was the Indian Agent at Toronto, a highly respectable person, who had been an officer of the Department for many years, and whom, no doubt, the hon. gentleman knows very well. Instructed, I presume, by the head of the Department of that day, he went to get a surrender of this timber, in order that it might be put in the market and sold for the benefit of the Indians. The hon. gentleman knows that unless the timber is so sold, the Indians will connive at a trespass on their own property either for a little money or a little spirits, and thus their property is wasted. Mr. Plummer, at that day, went there and got this order for the purpose of putting the timber in the market for the benefit of the Indians. This is a matter of every day occurrence in the Indian Department, and is in fact the only way by which the Indians get anything out of their timber. Mr. Plummer has been, in consequence of these statements, called on to make a report. As far as I can learn, he had no interest in the matter, but merely did his duty as agent in getting this surrender. To show that the recollection of Indians, or their regard for veracity, is not very accurate, or that they have been misled by parties into signing documents of which they do not understand the value, I need only state this simple fact: The Red River Expedition took place in 1870 and the statement is that the Indians were all then absent at Red River, except the three or four who signed this surrender. Upon looking at the papers you will find that these poor people have only been misled by a year. The surrender was made in 1871, when the whole thing was over and the Indians had all returned. This excuse is got up for these people by some interested persons, most likely those who are plundering the Indians of their timber and do not desire that any person should get possession of it, but that it should remain as before, subject to be trespassed on by anybody. The surrender was made by these Indians in the usual way, according to the Indian Act of that date, the year after the expedition was made, when every Indian had returned for a whole season from this war, at which they said they had all been absent. I will bring down the papers and the papers will show that fact.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, no doubt it was very unfortunate that the license was granted in the first place, but it was not supposed at that day that the timber was so very valuable as it has now become, from its proximity to the railroad, and there is no doubt that, if the arrangement had been carried out, the Indians would have been great sufferers; their timber would have gone for very much less than its real value. In the statement the hon. gentleman has just read, there is a great deal that is true, and a great deal that is very much exaggerated. It is true, as the Indians say, that they have been the losers by this license, but it is utterly incorrect that they have tried to give a political character to it. It was this Monk license, which Mr. Marks had a perfect right to buy if Mr. Monk had a right to sell; but I believe the Government has now looked thoroughly into the matter, and that there is some new arrangement made—I only heard of it the other day—by which the Indians are to be remunerated by those who are taking the timber, and I am told that the Government has arranged matters so that the Indians now get $12,000 for the timber on the reserve.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear; that is so.

Mr. DAWSON. From all that I can hear, the parties who hold the license, Messrs. Farjana & Marks, between them have to pay the value of the timber to the Indians, and I think that is a very fortunate arrangement.

Mr. COOK. I should like to ask, Mr. Speaker, whether this license was not withheld last year, or cancelled? I know Mr. Marks was here looking after the interest of his license, and he was very much annoyed that the Government had cancelled his license. Now, I would like to know, Sir, if that license had been granted for the support that Mr. Marks gave to the Opposition candidate in the Algoma election for the Local Legislature. I would like to know if $12,000 is the price that the Government of the Dominion paid for the support of the candidate of the Opposition for the Local Legislature. That is a point that should be cleared up by the Government of the day. We know that, in different parts of the Province of Ontario, in the last election for the Local Legislature, they undertook to defeat the Government of the Hon. Mr. Mowat. We know by the courts what means were adopted for the defeat of that hon. gentleman; and, Sir, I shall be able to show in a few days how other men were brought forth as candidates in the Tory interest by the Dominion Government, by which they got subsidies and Government positions from this Government of the day here. I should like the hon. gentleman to clear up that one point: if $12,000 was the price of one individual supporting a Tory candidate in the Local Election for Algoma, how much did they all cost?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman is of an enquiring mind, and I am very glad to see he is. He says he wants to know whether the $12,000 of which my hon. friend from Algoma (Mr. Dawson) has spoken, was the price paid to Mr. Marks for his support. As I understand the statement of my hon. friend, the $12,000 is the sum paid by Mr. Marks for the timber. It is $12,000 paid by Mr. Marks to the Crown. It is not very often that a person is bribed by being obliged to pay money. People are sometimes bribed, I am told, and nobody understands it better than my hon. friend (Mr. Cook). Persons sometimes are bribed by getting money, but I never before heard of their being bribed by being obliged to pay money. This case, I may say at once, was a very troublesome one. There was a great deal of conflicting evidence. Some of the evidence was either wilfully, or inadvertently, or ignorantly inaccurate; but still it was my duty to see that the Indians should be protected, and the papers will show that the parties have been compelled, notwithstanding their strict legal rights, perhaps, if it were pressed, to have that timber under the terms of the original license, to pay a further sum of money. I will ask the House not to prejudge the case, because it is wrong that people's interests should be discussed without a full understanding of the case. The papers will be brought down at once.

Mr. BLAKE. Mr. Speaker, I am obliged to my hon. friend's assistant in discharging the duties of his office for vouchsafing some further information than the hon. gentleman chose to vouchsafe, or perhaps than he knew. I am sure none of us supposed, from what the hon. Superintendent General of Indian Affairs stated, that the question was settled. We were told that Mr. Plummer, in consequence of these representations, had been called upon to make a report, and that we would hear all about it. Now, it appears that the whole matter is settled, the sum has been fixed, and, on the payment of this additional sum, Mr. Marks and his colleagues are to have this license continued. Perhaps it was indiscreet for the hon. gentleman to better the instructions and give more full information than the somewhat older Parliamentarian who assists him in the discharge of the duties of the Indian Department was disposed to give. At all events, we are obliged to him for letting us know that there is no necessity for the poor Indians to come down to Ottawa, because the hon. gentleman has decided the case, whether fairly or unfairly to them, I do not know. It is true that it is not very easy to bribe persons by making them pay money, but it is very easy to give them a great favour by letting them have property at half or a quarter its price.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY LOCATION.

Mr. BLAKE. I will move a motion which is similar to the motion I moved at an early part of last Session, with a view of obtaining the information up to this time, showing the condition of the railway. I move for a map or maps, showing:—1. The location of the Canadian Pacific Railway, so far as approved or constructed. 2. Its location so far as proposed to Government, but not yet approved. 3. The location of any branches constructed, and of any now contemplated by the company, so far as the Government is advised. 4. The lands set apart for the company, but not yet granted. 5. The lands granted. 6. The lands applied for, but not yet set apart. As I said, it is verbatim the motion of last Session.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, the information asked for in this motion will be promptly furnished.

Motion agreed to.

ALLOWANCES TO CANADIAN MANUFACTURES REQUIRED BY THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. BLAKE moved for all correspondence, reports and Orders in Council not covered by the Address of last Session, relating to the allowances proposed to be paid to the Canadian manufacturers of certain goods required by the Canadian Pacific Railway; of all applications for such allowance, and correspondence in connection therewith; a statement of the calculations on which the allowances have been based, and the estimate in detail of the probable sums payable out of the Treasury in respect of each class of goods, assuming them to be made in Canada, to the extent of the company's requirements, and of the ad valorem percentage of all allowances on each such class. He said: This also is a copy of a motion which the House approved of last Session, but to which no return has yet been made, and to which, I presume, the Minister of Customs will lay the return on the Table at an early day. He has been good enough to make the intimation to me that what is proposed in this Address would be somewhat bulky, and I venture to make publicly the suggestion which I made to him privately, in answering that intimation, that if the other return is ready, as I presume it is, and if it is laid on the Table at once, I would be able to arrange for the elimination of any portion of the information sought by this motion which would not be essential to the obvious public purpose, which the motion is designed to serve.

Mr. BOWELL. There is no objection to the motion. As intimated by the hon. gentleman who made the motion, it would take some little time to prepare the papers. I was under the impression, if my recollection serves me aright, that I did furnish a synopsis, if I may so term it, or extract of the information asked for by the hon. gentleman at the last Session of Parliament. It has escaped my recollection as to whether full details were presented, but if not, I will make enquiry at once and see that it is attended to. But if the hon. gentleman requires, as he has intimated, all the information asked for in the motion just made, it would take some little time to prepare the return. I may mention to the House, as I did to the hon. gentleman, that there are no less than 220 of these claims, and in connection with many of them there has been a great deal of correspondence. So far as the Department is concerned, we should much prefer that the whole correspondence should be laid before the House, as it will then be seen that the greatest possible care has been taken, and that no more has been paid under those claims than they are absolutely entitled to by law.

Mr. BLAKE. I am a little disappointed at the hon. gentleman's statement, because he will remember that at the close of last Session he showed me what was called a return to the last motion, and it was found there was some misunderstanding on the part of some of his officers by which they had misapprehended the motion, and it was really no answer at all—it was not presented. The understanding was that the recess would be utilized—I think the expression was to the prejudice of all other business—to prepare these returns. I am afraid the recess has not been so utilized, and I do hope we will get the papers early this Session.

Mr. BOWELL. Just as early as they can be written up and copied.

Motion agreed to.

GRINDING IN BOND.

Mr. BLAKE moved for copies of all Orders in Council, departmental orders not covered by the Order of last Session, on the subject of grinding in bond, or of the regulations for grinding in bond, or for the import of wheat and flour of United States growth or manufacture; also for all correspondence with the authorities of the United States on the subject of transport of Canadian wheat into or through the United States, and of all regulations of the United States Customs authorities affecting such transport. And also, for copies of all correspondence not covered by the Order of last Session, with reference to frauds upon the Customs in the export of Canadian wheat or flour, in satisfaction or bonds given on the importation of United States wheat or flour; all reports, evidence and departmental action upon such frauds; statement of the extent thereof, names of the parties concerned, and a statement of the action of the Department thereon. He said: This also is a consolidation of two motions which were made last Session, to one, and perhaps to both, of which I believe returns are yet wanted.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Would the hon. Minister say whether there is any change in the regulation with reference to the equivalent of bushels of wheat to the barrel of flour from what existed some time ago; and if so, what the equivalent is now?

Mr. BOWELL. There has been no change in the Order in Council since it was brought down last Session; consequently, the equivalent in flour has not received any consideration.

Motion agreed to.

THE HIGH COMMISSIONER OF CANADA.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of all Orders in Council, correspondence, commissions and instructions touching the appointment of the present High Commissioner of Canada in London; and touching the discharge of the duties of the Minister of Railways during his absence in England as High Commissioner; and touching the discharge of the duties of the High Commissioner during his absence in Canada as Minister of Railways, said: It will be within the recollection of the House that during the course of last Session it was considered an open secret that the Minister of Railways was to become High Commissioner. I made enquiry on that subject, and the right hon. gentleman answered me in a diplomatic manner, by informing me that no offer had been made to the hon. gentleman, and consequently there had been no acceptance of the offer. Of course, an understanding had been reached, because, shortly after, the hon. gentleman himself, at an entertainment which was given to the gentleman recently deposed, I regret to observe—I refer to Mr. Mousseau, late Prime Minister of the Province of Quebec—quite sufficiently indicated that his existing relations with the party to which he is an ornament, were about to be severed. Well, that was the state of things, so far as the public were informed, at the close of the Session, and immediately after the close of the Session an announcement was made that that state of things had been changed; and that while the hon. gentleman was about to assume the office of High Commissioner, he was also to retain the office of Minister of Railways. Now, I think, that when an arrangement of this kind was made, it was not an unreasonable thing to expect that the earliest opportunity would be taken of making an explanation to the House of the reasons for the change—if it was a change—and the arrangement which was substituted for the original one, for no doubt it was an important substitution. We may differ as to the constitutional propriety, as to the convenience of that arrangement; but, whether we differ or no, there can be no doubt whatever that it is an innovation on our practice, and one of sufficient consequence to entitle us, I think, to explanations upon it. I do not intend, at the present moment, to do more than to ask for those explanations, and to indicate, in the briefest possible way, the points upon which I think, mainly, they ought to be given. It seems to me that is the more proper course. In the first place, there is the question of the relation of the High Commissioner of Canada to the particular members of the Administration. He is the agent of the Administration at large, but he is also the agent of the various Ministers to whom, individually, he has been in the habit in the past of referring. We have before us instructions given to Sir Alexander Galt, as High Commissioner. It will be remembered that with respect to the negotiations with France, and I rather think with Spain also, he received instructions from the Minister of Finance. The Minister wrote the Commissioner a letter, which is published, instructing him what to do. The Commissioner went and did not do it, but I suppose the failure was not his fault—he tried to do it. The Commissioner reported to the Minister of Finance what he had done under his instructions. He reported to the Minister of Agriculture what he had done upon the subject of immigration, and I dare say to other hon. Ministers also, with respect to matters on which, under their direction, he had acted for their different Departments. It seems to me it is unfortunate that hon. Ministers should pay so little regard to those reports that, as we have learned to-day, they really do not know whether they have been made or not; that an hon. Minister was not in a position, although two days' notice was given of the motion for the production of the Lord High Commissioner's reports, to tell whether there are any reports or not. We do not know whether some subordinate, some deputy-chief, has put reports from the Commissioner away in some dusty pigeon-hole. Whether the memory of the hon. Minister of Agriculture has become oblivious, we do not know; but the fact remains that he does not know whether reports have been made by the High Commissioner either to various hon. Ministers or to one hon. Minister. As to the Commissioner acting under the directions, and carrying out the views of various hon. Ministers, I suggest that the position of an hon. gentleman who is also himself one of the hon. Ministers, is exceedingly peculiar. It is an inconsistent position, as it seems to me; it is a position of servant and of colleague as well. As a Minister, he is equally responsible, according to the theory of our Constitution—however imperfectly that theory may work in England and with us to-day—with other members of the Government for all that is done; but as Commissioner, he acts under orders; he is told to go, and he goes; do this, and he does it—or at all events he tried to do it. Then, as I have said, our system is one theoretically of undivided responsibility, unless that responsibility is purged, of course, by the Government at large declining to accept it, and we know in that case the result to individual members; and I have said that this system is imperfectly worked both in England and here. Practically our system of responsibility is largely a departmental one. Both the House and the country at large are very much disposed to hold individual Ministers very largely responsible for the conduct of their Departments. Large questions there are, as the First Minister said the other day, in regard to which therefore, it is not inconvenient he should often direct; but a First Minister has a very special responsibility, and which, this statement of the hon. gentleman is incidentally a proof of my present proposition, that there is a great number of questions in respect of which a Minister acts independently, and in respect to these, neither the House nor the country is disposed to look very harshly upon undivided responsibility but is disposed to judge of the individual Minister. The punishment to-day for breach or neglect of duty, for error or misjudgment and for whatever may be called political crime or political action, which is objected to, is a loss of confidence by the House and the country; and it is, therefore, of great consequence that a Minister should be, as far as circumstances will at all permit, in a position in which he can discharge the duties of his office, that he may do them, and be held to that responsibility to which I refer. I may be told that when he does not perform them, somebody else does. It is quite true there are acting Ministers. The Minister of Agriculture knows how that is done—that it is done in a perfunctory sort of way. We know how it was done with respect to the location of the Canadian Pacific Railway last summer, during the absence of the Minister of Railways temporarily. We know all about it: I should not say we know all about it, but we know enough about it to be able to judge with regard to it. It is a mode of doing business which is unsatisfactory. It is fitting that the Minister of Agriculture should take charge of immigration and statistics; that the Minister of Railways should take care of his own Department; and arrangements by which acting Ministers take charge are arrangements only to be tolerated as arrangements of a temporary character, due either to illness or temporary absence on public business, necessitating the non-performance of the duties of the office by the hon. Minister who is responsible. It is quite different to make an arrangement of this description under which an hon. Minister leaves the House and the country before the Session is over and returns just about in time for this Session, being absent during an interval in which important questions with respect to the great railway which forms the main subject of this Department, were to be settled; questions of the route through the Rocky Mountains, for instance; the settlement of the passes, of the financial standing of the company, of the guarantee—the papers in regard to which we hope will be brought down in a few moments—and other questions of very great importance, all of which we have not fully before us at this time. I say it is of great consequence for the practical good working of the Constitution, for the realization of that measure of responsibility upon which the efficacy of responsible Government depends, that hon. Ministers charged with Departments should, as a rule, subject to as few exceptions as possible, perform the duties assigned them; and the absence of the Minister of Railways during the whole recess practically is, in the circumstances under which he has been absent, not consistent with the Constitution as we understand it, and its practical good working. Then the Session comes and this dual officer cannot be in two places at once, not being an Irishman or a bird, and he leaves London and comes here. What is to become of the High Commissionership? We are told it is a very important office, and one of growing importance; that it is an office which requires the ablest men and their utmost energies to discharge the duties. But the High Commissioner deserts his office in the month of December, comes out to Canada and will remain here some months, four or five months, no doubt, elapsing from the time of his leaving his office until his return. There is nearly half the year, therefore, during which we have no Commissioner. We have not an acting Commissioner, and there is only a clerk to discharge all the important duties. What! Are all the eggs addled? What about all the commercial treaties we have heard about during recent years? Is nothing going to happen? When I ventured to make a suggestion in regard to the office, I was told that there was not a moment on which a treaty was not on the carpet; that it was necessary to have a man ready to take advantage of the first opportune moment, and that an important concession by France had been lost by twenty-four hours delay. Yet the High Commissioner is here and can only act in London by cable. Thus, I have stated as briefly as possible, the difficulties, and the House is entitled to explanations as to the arrangement completed after the close of last Session, and now in force, under which the same person fills the office of Minister of Railways and High Commissioner of Canada.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There can be no objection, of course, to this motion, and the Government will be very glad to bring down any papers covered by it. The hon. gentleman objects very much to my hon. friend holding the two positions. One, that of hon. Minister of Railways, will, I believe, be a tolerably permanent position—for I think he may be expected to hold it for some years, if he chooses—and the other of a more temporary nature. When Sir Alexander Galt sent in his resignation as High Commissioner, it was found absolutely necessary that some person should be on the spot in England, on account of some matters which were of pressing importance, or threatened to be of pressing importance, and that, therefore, the Government should have an officer there at once. The Government asked Sir Charles Tupper to go to England for that purpose, and go he did. The arrangement in the first place was of a temporary nature, and it is not yet of a permanent nature; but it was of very great importance that he should go to England, as I have already stated. I think that the fact—the happy fact, the accidental fact, for which, of course, we cannot take any credit—the happy accident of my hon. friend having accepted the office of High Commissioner at my request, enabled us by his peculiar knowledge, professional and otherwise, to save the trade of Canada from a very great loss. I think we cannot over-estimate the value of the assistance rendered by him as High Commissioner in the saving of the cattle trade of Canada. As we are perhaps the only country which continues that trade with England, the gain has undoubtedly been a very great one. It is quite true that a Minister is, as a general rule, bound to perform his duties by person and in person, but after all it is a question of confidence in the Government. So far as the Government is concerned, it is a question for them to see that the duties of the different Departments are thoroughly well performed. I believe the Minister of Railways, enjoyed, and still enjoys, the confidence of the country and of the majority of this House as Minister of Railways. I believe also, that my hon. friend, the Minister of Agriculture, who performed the duties of Acting Minister of Railways, enjoys that confidence. We knew perfectly well that when this important business called away Sir Charles Tupper, for a time, from Canada, my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture, on account of his well-known acquaintance with everything connected with railway matters, was peculiarly fitted to perform the duties of the Department of Railways in Sir Charles Tupper's absence. I believe that the results have shown that every duty has been attended to; that there has been no injury or prejudice to the public service in the hands of my hon. friend, the Acting Minister of Railways; that he has performed his duty well and wisely; and I have no doubt that the Minister of Railways, when he left Canada, knew he was leaving his Department in the hands of a colleague in whom he had the utmost and most thorough confidence. When the papers are brought down, I have no doubt that this discussion will be renewed. I do not see, however, that there is anything in the argument of the inconsistency of my hon. friend being a member of the Government as Minister of Railways, and being an officer of the Government, while in England as Lord High Commissioner.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. As the hon. gentleman opposite has conferred the peerage upon my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, I can only give my humble sanction to the bestowal of that honour. It would, perhaps, be improper to unite these two offices for a series of years, but for a temporary purpose there is no inconsistency. The hon. gentleman knows that it is a matter of practice in England. There was no inconsistency in Lord Beaconsfield, or the Marquis of Salisbury, going to Berlin, or in Lord John Russell, a member of the Administration in England, taking part in the Treaty of Vienna, after the Crimean war, when he was Prime Minister and Minister of Foreign Affairs, and when, as we all remember, his action as Minister at Vienna was repudiated by the Government of which he was a member, the result being that the Vienna Treaty, which was ratified by him, was not ratified by the English Government. The question of inconsistency was never raised, for it was frequently the case in England. My hon. friend's knowledge of parliamentary and governmental history will enable him to supply from his memory innumerable instances of members of the Cabinet going on such missions, some of rather a protracted character, and keeping their positions in the Government of England while acting as servants or officers of the joint Administration abroad. It really, after all, is a question of fitness—each instance must be governed by its own circumstance. It may be that the Minister is, perhaps, the very best person in the public interest to relieve these officers for a time, and allow them to leave headquarters and go abroad on special missions for the good of their country. In this case, it is simply a question of whether it was really in the interest of Canada at the time, that my hon. friend should consent to go to England. I do not wish to draw on discussion just now, but I shall just read a portion of the Minute of the Council under which my hon. friend was appointed.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Does the hon. gentleman know of any case in which a British Minister was sent as resident ambassador to a foreign court?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. As a resident ambassador?

Mr. MACKENZIE. Yes. The hon. gentleman was our ambassador.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I recall one case, that of Lord Castlereagh, a member of the Government, who went in 1814 to Vienna and remained as Minister during a whole year. He was not nominally a resident ambassador, but he was resident there for a whole year, settling the treaties consequent upon the fall of Napoleon. There are other instances, though I cannot recall them to my recollection at this moment, but I am sure I can furnish my hon. friend many instances of the kind. The Minute of Council states;

"On a report of the 30th of May, 1883, from the Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald, stating that it would be necessary to appoint a High Commissioner in London in place of Sir Alexander Galt, whose resignation takes effect on the 30th of June, and that Sir Charles Tupper had consented to go to England to perform the duties of the office at present, without salary, Sir John Macdonald recommends that Sir Charles Tupper be appointed High Commissioner."

The commission framed on that Order in Council will be brought down, together with all the papers on the subject, and then if the hon. gentleman wishes to discuss the constitutional point and the expediency of carrying out the cast-iron rule that a Minister should not leave the country, then I will quite willingly discuss the matter and abide by any decision which the House may arrive at.

Mr. BLAKE. I never proposed to lay down the cast-iron rule that a Minister should not leave his office for any purpose. The hon. gentleman knows that he may challenge the opinion of the House on the question, for I do not know that a year has elapsed when Ministers have not left their offices; and we know that last year there was a perfect galaxy of Ministers in London at one time. For that reason I purposely abstained from raising that point. I do not say that there should not be a temporary absence for some particular purpose of health or public business; but the hon. gentleman has obviously felt that there is a difficulty—in fact, an impossibility—of justifying this arrangement as a permanent arrangement, for he has told us that it would be inexpedient as a permanent arrangement, and he justifies it only as a temporary arrangement. He says further that it is perhaps inexpedient that there should be an absence for a year, or during the whole period of the recess; but he says it is a question to be decided in each case by the circumstances; and when very serious public reasons called for the selection of a successor to our late High Commissioner, who was to proceed to England at once—and called, of course, for the selection of this particular person as the successor—he was justified in his opinion in proceeding. But the hon. gentleman went on to say that he would give us information as to the reasons for this appointment; and he read us an extract from an Order in Council which gave no such information. When he came to state the results of the hon. gentleman's mission, they were such as he described them to-day; and great as they may have been, remarkable as they may have been, wonderful as they may have been, they were those which the hon. gentleman did not take credit for foreseeing when he sent Sir Charles Tupper to England. It was not because he foresaw that there would be a difficulty about the live cattle trade that he sent the Minister of Railways—I beg his pardon, the High Commissioner; I am afraid we shall get into a number of difficulties of this kind this Session—that he sent the High Commissioner to England to display his knowledge of anatomy with relation to four-footed as well as two-footed animals. What was it for, then? What were the public, moving causes which led to an arrangement which the hon. gentleman indicates is merely temporary, to be justified only by some special reason? We have not heard them yet. But the hon. gentleman says: I will give you plenty of precedents—Lord Beaconsfield was at Berlin, Lord Salisbury at Berlin, and Lord Russell at Vienna, and Lord Castlereagh was at Vienna at an earlier period. But all these cases were different. As the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) pointed out, none of those gentlemen took offices under the Government, at all capable of being likened to the office of Canadian High Commissioner, as created by our Statute, and as related to the Departments of Government. When Lord Beaconsfield went to Berlin, was he to make a report to the analogue of the hon. Minister of Agriculture, who shows such little respect to our High Commissioner that he does not know whether he has received his report or not? Did either Lord Russell or Lord Castlereagh occupy such a position that a single Minister was to tell them what negotiations they were to undertake, or what they were to do? They occupied the highest places which a man can fill in the service of his country, except that of First Minister—and one of them was First Minister—the position of plenipotentiary acting on behalf of the country to complete a treaty—a transaction temporary in its nature, and of the highest possible consequence. The hon. gentleman says one of the members remained a long time. It is true, Lord Castlereagh remained a long time—because we know the condition of the continent at that time, when the question of the Holy Alliance was under consideration; we know the great convulsions that appertained to that time; we know the difficulties of the settlement over the Napoleonic relations; we know that there were great difficulties about precedence; we know there was a great deal for that diplomatist to do, and he took a great deal more time in which to do it than would be required to-day. Not at this conference, but at one in the Low Countries, were the difficulties such that it had to be held in a room with twelve entrances and a round table, so that there should be no question of precedence. But what we have to deal with is something of a more modern time; and if the hon. gentleman can furnish no apter precedent for the duties he has imposed on the High Commissioner of Canada than those he has cited, he has entirely failed in justifying, by precedent, if precedent were to justify, this transaction; and I doubt very much whether, when the papers come down, they will furnish more justification for it than his oral statement has done, or whether a further ventilation of the subject will prove this to have been a more expedient or constitutional course than it is shown to have been.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE moved for copies of all correspondence relating to any payments, claims or allowances on any account whatever in respect of the office of High Commissioner, not already brought down, and separate statements, in detail, with dates and sums of all payments made on any such accounts in respect of the office, during its tenure by Sir A. T. Galt, and by the present incumbent respectively, and an estimate, in detail, of all sums payable on any such accounts, up to this date, and yet unpaid; also, for copies of correspondence as to the letting of a residence for the High Commissioner, and statement of the terms and of the sums payable for rent, taxes and other charges, in respect of such residence and the date of the letting.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY GUARANTEE.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER presented a message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows:—

LANSDOWNE.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons for its information, correspondence relating to the guarantee by the Government of interest on the stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, so that means might be provided for the completion of the work by May, 1886.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE.

OTTAWA, 25th January, 1884."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 28th January, 1884.

LANGTRY vs. DUMOULIN.

A Petition was read from C. and H. D. Gamble and others praying that the Clerk of the House may be ordered to attend with certain Journals and Records before the Master in Chancery in Ottawa, in the matter of Langtry, et al, vs. Dumoulin.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved that the petition be now read and received.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved that leave be given to the proper officer to attend in accordance with the prayer of the said petitioners.

Motion agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 17) to repeal an Act respecting the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors, and the issue of Licenses therefor.—(Mr. Cameron, Huron.)

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BOWELL. Before the Orders of the Day are called I desire to explain that I misunderstood the question put to me by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) on Friday last, in reference to the equivalent of wheat for a barrel of flour. I understood him to ask whether any change had been made in the Order in Council with reference to the exportation of Canadian flour as an equivalent for American flour, and consequently the answer which I gave was not correct. A change was made increasing the quantity which would be taken as an equivalent for the American flour, and this was done on account of representations which were made to the Government that the wheat of this year would not produce as much flour as that of former years.

Mr. MACKENZIE. What was the change?

Mr. BOWELL. I think the difference was about ten pounds.

SECOND READING.

The following Bill was read the second time:—

PAYMENTS ON SETTLERS' LANDS.

Mr. FARROW enquired, Will the Government extend the time for payment to the settlers on lands in Manitoba? If so, what length of time will be given, and what rate of interest charged?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is not the present intention of the Government to change the time, but each case will be dealt with on its own merits.

GOVERNMENTAL EXPRESS SYSTEM.

Mr. FARROW enquired, Is it the intention of the Government to mature a scheme whereby they will take the express business of the country into their hands in connection with the Post Office business?

Mr. CARLING. It is not the present intention of the Government to mature such a scheme.

TWO CENT LETTER POSTAGE.

Mr. FARROW enquired, Is it the intention of the Government, this Session, to reduce the rate of postage on letters from three cents to two cents, as adopted in the United States?

Mr. CARLING. The matter is now under consideration.

THE VOLUNTEERS OF 1837.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) enquired, Has the Government had under consideration the valuable services rendered to the country by the Volunteers of 1837, with a view of recognizing in some substantial way such services? If so, what conclusion has been arrived at?

Mr. CARON. The Government have not yet arrived at any conclusion on the question.

GREAT AMERICAN AND EUROPEAN SHORT LINE RAILWAY.

Mr. McISAAC enquired, Whether any arrangement has been made between the Government and the Great American and European Short Line Railway Company, to settle the unpaid claims of contractors and labourers for work done on the line of railway between Oxford and New Glasgow for the said company? If so, when will such claims be paid? If no such arrangement has been made, is the Minister of Railways in a position to state whether and when payment can be expected?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Government have not made any arrangement to settle these claims, and I am not in a position to state whether or when any such payments can be expected?

NEGOTIATIONS OF COMMERCIAL TREATIES.

Mr. BLAKE moved for copies of all Orders in Council, correspondence and despatches touching the negotiations of commercial treaties, conventions or arrangements in which Canada is interested, and of all reports of the High Commissioner on the subject not already brought down; and particularly of all such papers relating to France, Spain, Brazil, Cuba or the United States. He said: It will be in the recollection of the House that during last Session, in the debate on the Budget, the hon. the Minister of Finance adverted to this general topic. He pointed out that, within three or four weeks before the time at which he was then speaking, an influential deputation had waited on the Government in reference to the extension of our trade with the West Indies. He said:

"Instead of asking Parliament, at the present time, to reduce the duty upon sugar or molasses, we propose to continue the enquiries we entered upon some time since with the view of extending trade with the West India Colonies. We have, in the past, experienced considerable difficulties, because these Colonies have very little revenue to spare. We find them anxious that we should give favourable consideration to their productions, but when we ask for a reduction of the duty on Canadian products, they hesitate, because they find it difficult to surrender the necessary revenue. In reference to Cuba, we proposed to the Spanish Government, through the High Commissioner in London, to ask Parliament for a subsidy for a steamer to ply between Canada and Cuba under the French flag, we paying the subsidy, if the products of Canada would be admitted on the terms which are extended to imports under the Spanish flag. That proposition, after some consideration, was refused. Other propositions have been before the Spanish Government for some time, and down to the present time they have not been successful, although, unlike the proposition in reference to subsidizing a steamer under the French flag, they have not refused them, and they are still under consideration. I can say, on behalf of the Government, that it is their intention during the recess to enter into negotiation with the West India Islands, and other sugar producing and coffee producing countries, to see whether any arrangement can be made by which we would be justified in submitting to Parliament, when we next assemble, reducing the duty on sugar and molasses on receiving as an equivalent for it a reduction of duty on the natural products and manufactures of Canada. In addition to that, we have been endeavouring to negotiate arrangements with France by which the products of Canada may be admitted on more favourable terms than they are at present. Down to the present time, while the negotiations are not broken off but are still continued, we have not been successful, and I desire here and at this time to state, on behalf of the Government, that, if we fail to make satisfactory arrangements with Governments that do not place the products—the natural products and manufactures—of Canada on equal terms with those of any other country, we will ask Parliament at the next Session to impose a duty of 10 per cent. additional on their products until they grant us such terms. This is the policy of the Government with reference to these questions."

For some time past we have been moving for papers indicating the progress of the various negotiations which preceded those which the hon. gentleman has mentioned in this speech; and a motion was also made for papers with reference to the negotiations down to that time. That address has not been answered, so far as I can ascertain, and I hope we shall have a clean breast of it, and a statement made of the papers with reference to any such negotiations as are closed temporarily or permanently. Of course, I can understand the inconvenience of bringing down papers with reference to negotiations which are actively pending; but if they are practically, if not formally, abandoned, there would seem to be no difficulty about bringing down the papers; and it is important that we should know how we stand. I hope, also, that the return will embrace all the papers consequent on the declaration of war which the hon. gentleman thought fit to make in the concluding passage of this speech; and that we shall learn, by the papers, or otherwise, how far the step which he announced in this public manner he was about to take has been productive of a more favourable consideration of his propositions than they had heretofore received. I thought then, and I think still, that it would have been a more prudent and politic course on his part to inform the Governments of these countries privately that he would feel it his duty to propose such a step in case he did not conclude the negotiations by next Session, than to make a public statement in Parliament of the character to which I have alluded. But it is possible that the course taken by the hon. gentleman may have produced effects which milder measures would not have produced. With these views I make this motion.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There can be no objection to the general proposition contained in this motion; but I would call the attention of the hon. gentleman to a paper laid on the Table of the House last Session showing the negotiations which had taken place with Servia, Belgium, and Germany, Roumania, Ecuador, Morocco, Egypt, Montenegro and Jamaica. At that time the Secretary of State for the Colonies, in answer to a communication from the Governor General, stated:

"There exists no objection to the publication of correspondence that has taken place with reference to commercial treaties concerning Jamaica, Germany and Belgium. As correspondence is never furnished which has reference to negotiations still under discussion without the consent of the Foreign Power with whom the treaty is being made, it would be necessary to obtain from the Governments of France and Spain their consent to the publication of any correspondence which has taken place on the subject of treaties, and I suggest that the placing of such papers on the Table of the Dominion House of Commons be delayed until the matters still under discussion are brought to a final conclusion."

I may state to the hon. member that the negotiations with Spain have not yet been brought to a conclusion. Further negotiation took place between the High Commissioner and the Government of France, which for the time being did terminate the correspondence; but there is no doubt that, on the return of the High Commissioner to England, the negotiations with Spain will be continued, and the negotiations with France will probably re-open. However, I think it probable that the correspondence with France may be in such a position that, without violating the conditions laid down in this despatch, it may be laid before Parliament.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE.

JUDICIAL SALARIES.

Mr. VAIL, in moving for copies of any correspondence on the subject of the increase or re-adjustment of the judicial salaries, said: It will be remembered by all who were present last Session, when the resolution providing for the salary of an additional Judge of the Appeal Court of Ontario was before the House, that the hon. First Minister stated that some pressure had been brought to bear on the Government for the increase of the Judges' salaries of Ontario and Montreal; and I inferred from that statement that some correspondence had taken place on the subject. The hon. First Minister further stated that the Government, during the recess, would take the matter into their consideration, and that they would be prepared, at this Session, to introduce some measure, or make some proposition with regard to it, for the approval of Parliament. The right hon. gentleman led us to believe that the salaries of the Judges of Ontario and Quebec were too low; and he rather intimated that there was a difficulty about increasing the salaries of those Judges without providing for similarly increasing the salaries of the Judges of the different Provinces. I can easily understand that. I can also understand that some of the Judges of Ontario may be very much overworked; but increasing their salaries will not remedy that. I find, by the Public Accounts, that the amount paid during the past year for the Administration of Justice, including pensions and miscellaneous, was about $670,000. Now, that appears to be a very large sum, and as such, if properly distributed, would provide satisfactory salaries for the Judges of all the Provinces. Of course, the right hon. gentleman did not intimate to us what measure he proposed to bring down to Parliament this Session; but I am rather inclined to think that the country will hardly be willing to submit to further taxation to increase the gross amount now paid to the judiciary. It is just possible that if some of the Judges in the larger Provinces are overworked, there may be some who are underworked; and I hope that the Government, in any measure which they bring before the House, will consider whether, without increasing the sum total, they cannot—and I have no doubt it would be a very popular move, by reducing the salaries of those Judges in the larger Provinces, who have not a great deal of work—increase the salaries of Judges in the Maritime Provinces, in order to put them on a proper and fair footing with the Judges of the larger Provinces. I never could see the reason why the Judges of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia should be placed in an inferior position to the Judges of the other Provinces, with regard to salary. I do not make this motion with the view of bringing on a debate at present. If the correspondence is in such a state that it can be brought down, or if there has been further correspondence since the last prorogation of Parliament, I think the House ought to be put in possession of it, so that hon. members may see on what the Judges base their claim for an increase of their salaries.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. My hon friend's motion is very general. He moves for any correspondence on the subject of salaries. I suppose there ought to be some limit as to date.

Mr. VAIL. Any correspondence which has taken place since last Session and since the Session previous.

Mr. BLAKE. Since the 1st January, 1882.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Very well. The hon. gentleman says it would be very popular in the country if a slice were taken off the salaries of the Judges of Ontario and attached to those of the Judges of the Maritime Provinces. I dare say it would be popular in some portions of the Dominion, but I am not quite sure that it would be popular in the Province of Ontario. The hon. gentleman says he could never understand why the salaries of the Nova Scotia Judges should be less than those of the Judges in Ontario and Quebec. I do not know that it is necessary for us to discuss that point now, for it was fully argued and settled—and they, no doubt, gave good reasons—by the Government of which the hon. gentleman was a distinguished member.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

HOME AND INDIAN INSTRUCTION FARMS.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I desire to get some information from the Government with respect to the management, for the last few years, of the home and instruction Indian farms of the North-West Territories; the measure of success which has attended that experiment, and the cost, as near as possible, to the country. I observe, in the report of the Department, that several of the agents have pronounced the farms a failure, and have recommended that they be closed up, and also that some of them have been closed. For instance, the farm at Rivière du Barre was recommended to be closed one and one-half years ago; the farm at Saddle Lake was also recommended to be closed by Mr. Wadsworth, in his report to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in the North-West Territories made in 1882; farm 24, on Fish Creek, is also, I believe, closed, although it has been, in some measure, a successful one. Mr. Wadsworth does not mention the grounds of this recommendation, but if my memory serves me right he has recommended the closing of this farm. Mr. MacDonnell, Indian Agent at Regina, says he has closed up farms numbers one and two under Treaty number four. Upon the whole, I gather from the report that all the farms, or a large number of them, are either closed up or about to be closed. I have not been able to find in the report what reasons actuated the North-West officials in recommending this line of action, and am therefore desirous of getting information on the subject. I am told that the farm at Dudley, and the farm at Battleford, and that at Qu'Appelle, have been closed this last year. Now, I desire to know the reasons for this course, and how far the experiment made—in my judgment a good and wise experiment—has been successful; and what has become of, or what is intended to be done with the large staff of officials necessarily connected with those farms. I am also anxious to ascertain how many Indians have been employed on them, and to what extent, if any, the Indians have been induced to settle down to agricultural pursuits. The last clause of my motion I have put in, because I understand Mr. Wadsworth has not yet made a report to the Department. He had not, on the 1st December, inspected any of the agencies south of the railway, and I doubt whether he has been able since to overtake that work. I desire, if this information be not in the volume itself which we expect to receive shortly, that a supplementary report be brought down among the papers asked for. I, therefore, beg to move for a return showing the number of home farms and Indian instruction farms closed, or that have ceased to be worked, since the 1st of January, 1882. 2. The location of such farms, and the name and designation thereof. 3. The reason why closed or ceased to be worked. 4. The name of the Superintendent, Manager and Instructor. 5. The number of men employed on each farm in 1882 and 1883, the names and nationality of such employes; specifying particularly the number of Indians so employed. 6. #### CHARGES AGAINST JUDGE HUGHES.

Mr. WILSON moved for copies of all petitions and other communications preferring charges in regard to the official conduct of D. J. Hughes, County Judge of Elgin, and asking for an enquiry into the same; also, for a copy of the report or judgment on enquiry into the conduct of the said Judge.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, I do not object to the first part of the Address, asking for petitions and other communications; but, in reference to the last limb of the motion, I may say that there is no report or judgment on the enquiry into the conduct of the Judge. If the hon. gentlemen will strike that out, the first part can go.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, I certainly was led to understand, and verily believed, that there had been a commission and a report after a thorough investigation—a report by the Court of Impeachment prior to the time of Confederation; and it is for that I move.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh! I did not understand.

Mr. WILSON. I suppose the hon. the First Minister will not object to bring that down?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh! no. I was under the impression that there was some late petition that was referred to, and I asked the Minister of Justice, and he said there was no report on the matter.

Mr. BLAKE. There are two things—there are late petitions, and there is a former enquiry. The hon. gentleman remembers the old proceedings in the Court of Impeachment in Toronto years ago. That is obviously what the hon. gentleman refers to in the last limb of his motion; but there are also late petitions.

INSPECTION OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND STEAMBOATS.

Mr. DAVIES. Mr. Speaker, last Session I made a motion for some documents and papers as to the state of repair in which the Northern Light was, and the contracts for the conveyance of mails and passengers between Prince Edward Island and the Mainland. I was not fortunate enough to get the papers, though I asked for them several times. I regret it very much, because I think that, if they had been brought down and a discussion had taken place upon the matter, some of the trouble which has since arisen would have been avoided. Since last Session, the Steamboat Inspection Act has been brought into operation in the Island, and the result has been the stoppage of the company's steamers and of the whole trade of the Island for a time, throwing the whole thing into confusion, and to the endless annoyance of the merchants and traders engaged in that trade. At the time, there was a general outcry against the whole proceeding, and even the Government press denounced the whole thing as an outrage of the worst kind. Whether it is so or not we shall see when the papers come down. I prefer passing no judgment until we have the full particulars; but it is absolutely necessary to have the facts at the earliest possible moment. The hon. Minister who has charge of the Department of Marine will recollect that the Steamboat Inspection Act of 1882 was brought into effect in the Maritime Provinces by the appointment of Mr. Coker; and the Act provides that he shall inspect all steamboats that carry passengers, and that they shall not carry passengers without his certificate. The facts as to the inspection of the steamboats between Prince Edward Island and the Mainland are these: Last year no inspection was made by Mr. Coker. The winter passed without his visiting the Island; but I am informed, and I believe credibly informed, that he wrote to the company instructing them that, if Mr. Sloggett, Lloyds' inspector on the Island, would inspect the boats that winter, he would be satisfied. That, I believe, was done. If Mr. Sloggett made any report to Mr. Coker, or to the Department of Marine—I suppose he would make it to Mr. Coker, by whom he was employed—I hope it will be brought down, and will be considered to come within the language of the motion I have made. Mr. Coker, the inspector, never came near the Island that summer, until the season was very far advanced. In the latter end of August—on the 28th, I believe—the gentleman paid a visit there, and it is charged, with what truth the papers will show when they come down, that he did not make any proper inspection of these boats, but simply came over in the boats from Shediac to Summerside, and from Charlottetown to Pictou. He made no report to the company of his inspection. Whether it was a cursory or a complete one I do not know, but he made no report to the company, stating any requirements which, in his opinion, were necessary to make these boats thoroughly sea-going; and it was not until the last day of September, or about that time, that the company received from Mr. Coker any certificate whatever of the capacity of their boats or of their right to carry passengers. Now, I do not wish to attack the Inspection Act at all. The principle of that Act I think to be an excellent one. It has been already passed upon by this House, and it has been received with universal approval; but the details of that Act are capable of being improved upon very much, as I think the unfortunate facts connected with this unfortunate service between the Island and the Mainland will show. On the 28th September, Mr. Coker forwarded his certificate, and, to the astonishment of the company and to the loss of everybody engaged in the carrying trade there, it was found that the certificate enabled the boats to run for only one month, that it expired on the 3rd of October. It is charged—and I think there is some justice in the charge—that the inspector should have made his inspection, if he was not overburdened with work, early in the spring, so that any repairs which might, in his opinion, be necessary to make the boats thoroughly sea-going, should have been made before the heavy part of the season came on. I believe his district comprises all the Maritime Provinces, and I am told, by those who understand these matters better than I do, that that is too large a district for any one to properly fulfil the duties of Inspector of Hulls. If he chose to rely on the report of the local inspector, then it was wrong, grievously wrong, of him to go there in the month of September, and stop the boats running altogether. If he did not choose to rely upon the local inspector's report, I think it was his duty early in the spring to have made such a report as would have enabled the company to put their boats in proper order for the fall work. As between the company and the Government, of course, it is a small matter. What I wished to speak about are the interests of the public at large. The public at large had no control over the inspector; the Department had, but I am not aware whether any orders were given to Mr. Coker, the Inspector, to go to the Island and inspect these boats early in the summer, or not; or whether he was left to his own discretion. If he was left to his own discretion, he exercised it badly and injuriously, so far as the general public was concerned. The result, so far as the public was concerned, was that the boats stopped running at the very time when the exports of the Island had to be carried abroad, when the passenger traffic was increasing, and when hundreds of people wanted to cross daily. At the very time that all our produce was ready for exportation, the two boats stopped running. I am instructed that application was made to the Minister to allow the boats to run, as freighted, and I am told that application was refused. I do not know—I do not say—that the Minister of Marine was to blame in the matter. As the matter now stands, he is obliged to receive the report of his inspector, and will either have to dismiss the inspector or else adopt his report. The boats were not only refused the privilege of carrying passengers, which may or may not have been right; but they were refused the privilege of carrying freight, and the whole communication between the Island and the Mainland was thrown into great confusion. The Department sent down the Napoleon III. to do the best she could; but the Island members know very well that the construction of that steamer is such that she is not capable of being laden and unladen with the same facility as the other boats, and consequently she could not do the work at all. Fortunately for the merchants there, a new steamer was purchased by the navigation company there from Glasgow, and she aided the Napoleon III. in doing the work. Now, my object in moving for the papers is chiefly to ascertain whether the reports published in the papers are correct. The repairs required by Mr. Coker to be done to the two boats, it is stated in the press, are, first, that the St. Lawrence should be strengthened by having two arches placed from one end to the other in the boat; and, that as regards the other boat, her guards should be raised three or four feet. That has been stated in the papers to be the language of Mr. Coker's report. If that is the language of his report, I believe there is a very unanimous opinion on the part of ship-owners, ship-builders, and shipwrights—of everybody who knows anything about the Island—that such repairs cannot be carried out with safety. As regards the St. Lawrence, there are two arches in her already, and I am instructed the third one cannot be put in. So far as the Princess of Wales is concerned, if her guards are raised three feet, constructed as she is, carrying her cargo altogether on deck, I am informed by those who understand the question thoroughly, that it will end in her upsetting. However, we will see when the papers come down. But I wish chiefly to call the Minister's attention to Mr. Coker's report. No matter what it might be, no matter how harshly it might reflect upon the company, his report is practically final, and from it there is no appeal. It is true, the Act gives an appeal to the Minister, but even that appeal must be practically worthless, because the Minister of the day is but a mere puppet in the hands of the inspectors—he must take their reports and act upon them. Practically, there is no appeal from the order made by these inspectors. No matter how arbitrary their orders may be, no matter how uncalled for the repairs which they insist upon may be, the ship-owner is entirely at the mercy of the inspector. In the case to which I especially refer now, the public also are at his mercy, because when these two boats were stopped the trade of the Island was stopped for a time. The Minister, as I said, sent down this other boat, and it did some good in helping us over the difficulty. But I wished particularly to call his attention, in the first place, to the absolute necessity that exists for amending that Steamboat Inspection Act, and providing for appeal somewhat similar to the provision contained in the British Merchants' Shipping Act of 1876. I believe the Government of Canada at that time were instrumental in having those clauses inserted in the British Act. It was felt it would be an intolerable hardship that Canadian ship-owners should be subjected to the arbitrary order of a simple inspector in England, and at their instigation, I believe, a court of appeals was established in every port, to which every ship-owner can appeal if he is dissatisfied with the order of the inspector. This court of appeal consists either of a stipendiary magistrate and two shipwrights, or of a local commissioner and two shipwrights—the latter to act as assessors. Now, if we had such a court established here in the chief ports of the Dominion, there would be no hardship, because even if the Government Inspector required very heavy repairs to be made, unless the facts justified it, the ship-owner could appeal to this court. This is not a local question; it is not confined to Prince Edward Island, but extends over the whole of Canada. Every ship-owner, every steamboat owner, is completely at the mercy of these inspectors. I, therefore, submit to the consideration of the Minister these two points: Whether the area of the district which is given to the inspector is not entirely too large; secondly, whether there should not be, in common justice, an appeal from his decision to a competent court. Now, as regards the inspector, the hon. Minister knows well, I believe, that at present he resides in St. John. These two boats are now being repaired in Charlottetown, but the inspector does not cross over—he cannot very well cross over at this time of the year in the ice-boat on account of his size and age, to inspect these boats—and the result will be that in the spring we may be in just as bad a plight as we were last year. I submit there should be an inspector appointed for the Island itself as one district, and one for Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. That is not too much to ask; and I think it is a necessity that such an officer should exist. The hon. Minister himself is a ship-owner, and he knows how absolutely impossible it is to make a thorough inspection of a steamboat in the summer. Last year, I am told, the inspector never opened a seam, never took out a plank of the steamboat he condemned in his report as worthless. I took occasion to go to a captain of one of the steamboats, who has been in service twenty years, and whose record is one of which any captain may be proud. He has never had an accident on his boat during those twenty or twenty-five years that he has been carrying the mails and passengers across those Straits. He never had an accident, and he reported to me, in conversation, that the boat never was in better condition than she was then when she was stopped—so far as he knew, and he made a very close inspection. It appears the inspector acted in a very arbitrary manner, from what I am told—I should be sorry to make a charge against him until I have seen all the papers. The inspector is known to myself and to the public, as a good shipwright, and he was for many years Lloyds' surveyor of the Island. I am simply stating the facts as I ascertained them in conversation with those who ought to know; and it is perfectly incomprehensible to me how the inspector came to the conclusion that these boats should be stopped. However, I hope the Minister will agree with me that it is high time the Steamboat Inspection Act, giving, as it does, those extraordinary and arbitrary powers to the inspectors, should be amended, so that ship-owners should have the privilege of appeal, from what they consider an unjust decision, to a court of appeal. I do not believe there is another Act in the world vesting a more arbitrary power in one man, than that Act does. The Minister knows that, according to Lloyds' rules, if a ship is to be inspected, in order to be re-classed, it is not left for one man to do. Lloyds' surveyor has to take another man with him. The report of two inspectors is necessary before a vessel can obtain her class. The same rule prevails under all British classification. There is a body to which appeal can be made if the report is considered unjust. The committee of Lloyds is behind that. Besides, under the English Act, it is provided that if the inspector makes an improper report and detains a vessel improperly, so that the owner loses money, the owner can recover damages in the civil courts. Here, vessel owners are entirely without remedy. The inspector goes over to the Island for a couple of days and gives what is charged to be a most cursory examination of the boat, goes away, sends a report stopping the vessel from running, and there is no remedy against him or the Department, and no appeal to any person whatever. The principle adopted in that Inspection Act is a good one. The travelling public have a right to have it guaranteed that the steamers on which they travel have been properly inspected by a competent officer. I think that is a capital provision; I only suggested one or two amendments to it—but I should like to see that provision applied to steamboats belonging to the Government when used for the same purposes as private steamboats. The Steamboat Inspection Act specially exempts from its operation steamers owned by the Queen. The Minister sent down the Northern Light to take the place of private steamboats. He stopped the private boats from running because they had not got inspectors' certificates, and he declared they were dangerous to life and property. The hon. gentleman not only stopped those private boats from running, but he filled the place with a steamer which the Government Inspector ordered to be placed on the slips for repairs only last summer. The same inspector who stopped the boats ordered that Government vessel to be placed on the slips at Pictou. She went there in pursuance of that order, but in consequence of instructions issued by the Department, she was taken away and the repairs, though declared to be necessary to make her safe for passenger traffic, were never carried out. The result was that the boat, which was considered unseaworthy, was used during the fall months, the most stormy portion of the year, in carrying passengers to and from the Island. I do not know whether the Minister of Marine is prepared to take full responsibility for the continuance of that state of affairs. I hope the reports will be brought down and that the Minister, at the earliest possible day, will take steps to have that boat placed in a proper state of repair. She is doing work now, or at least she was up till last week, and as the Straits have been pretty open, she has done fairly good work. It was stated in the public press, and also by the inspector, that she needs repairs to put her in a seaworthy condition. It is no secret, it is talked about openly by the people in that part of the Dominion, that the boat requires repairing, and that immediately. What I complain of on the part of the Government is, that while they stopped the boats of the Navigation Company, when the inspector's certificates expired—and for that I do not blame them, as I think under the law, they were bound to do so—they substituted a boat which does not possess a certificate, a boat which it is acknowledged is unable to possess one, and which has already been removed from her class at Lloyds; and this fact should be a strong reason to convince the Minister that she is not seaworthy or fit to carry passengers. I do not desire to detain the House further in regard to this matter, but I hope the papers for which I move will be brought down this Session. I think I made six or seven applications for similar papers last year and never obtained them. There is a large class of people interested in these papers, and it is necessary to obtain them in order that we may be able to judge whether the inspector has or has not properly discharged the duties which belong to his office during the past season.

Mr. McLELAN. The papers asked for by the hon. gentleman will be brought down with all dispatch. I am not aware that there were applications made to my Department for papers last year which have not been complied with. I will, however, ascertain if there are any returns for last year which have not been brought down. The hon. gentleman seems to think that the inspector for the Lower Provinces has too much work to perform. I have not had any complaint from the inspector that he is overworked or that there is more work than he can overtake. I will make enquiry into that matter and see whether additional assistance is required. If the certificates of the previous year had expired, it was the duty of the company to have made application to the inspector to have the boats inspected. It seems that, according to my recollection and the statement of the hon. gentleman, they were not inspected until August. The inspector then gave a certificate to run until 31st October. In that certificate the inspector notified the owners of the boats that they could run to that date only, and that surely should have been sufficient notice to the parties to have provided other boats. The Steam Navigation Company receive a large subsidy from the Government, about $10,000 a year, for performing the service. There is a large freight and passenger traffic by those boats, and with the receipts of that traffic and the Government subsidy, the company should have provided boats fit for the service. The hon. gentleman, I think, will admit, and the whole people of the Island will admit, that the Government are doing all that is necessary, by furnishing that subsidy, to enable good and satisfactory boats to be placed upon the route. Such being the fact, and the company having the notice of the inspector that those boats could not be permitted to run after 31st October, no complaint can lie against either the inspector or the Government. It can lie only against the company, who should have provided other boats to have taken the place of those which were declared by the inspector to be unsafe to run during the stormy season of the year. The hon. gentleman has complained of the lack of satisfactory inspection—that the inspector did not satisfactorily perform his duty in examining the boats. These are wooden boats which were built twenty years ago, and have run without accident so far. The inspector was familiar with them and made a passage over in one of them, and from his examination and his knowledge of the effect of twenty years' wear upon wood, he knew they were unsafe to run during the stormy season of the year. Late in October, the steamboat company made application to me to be permitted to carry freight after the 31st of October, and stating in that application the repairs that were necessary, and that they intended to make those repairs on the boat during this winter. The Board of Steamboat Inspectors, both of machinery and hulls, was sitting in Ottawa at the time I received that application. I referred the application to Mr. Coker, and through him to the board, and the answer came, as I expected, that they could not permit them even to carry freight, and the company was notified of that fact. The hon. gentleman says that the steamboat owners are entirely at the mercy of the inspector. I do not consider that to be the case. Under the law, there is an appeal to the Minister, and if the owner of the steamboat presents a case to the Minister in which an evident injustice has been done him, it would be the Minister's duty, either on his own motion or by calling in other inspectors or other assistants, to consider the case and rectify the wrong, if a wrong had been done. But in this case, the gentleman who made the application stated that their boats required repairs, and that this winter, after the season of navigation had closed, they proposed to make all those repairs which the Inspector had stated would be necessary in order to render them seaworthy; but neither myself, Mr. Coker, nor the Board of Inspectors considered that it was wise or prudent that the boats should run either with passengers or freight during that month. The promise to make them more seaworthy afterwards would do them no good, so far as the month of November was concerned, and so the permission even to carry freight was withheld. I am not in a position to state whether Mr. Sloggett knew anything about the position of those boats during the summer; he made no report to me officially, though he may have made a report to Mr. Coker. I had an opportunity of knowing Mr. Coker's opinion, and he did not go further than to say that the boats might be run with a half cargo. Even Mr. Sloggett, who is supposed to be more familiar with the condition of the boats than Mr. Coker, did not go further than to say that possibly, an arrangement might be made to run them with half loads. That could not be acceded to, and the only course that could be taken was to stop. I think the company, which has enjoyed the profits of the Government subsidy and the profits coming from that traffic for years, after having the notice which was given by the inspector, Mr. Coker, should have put other boats on the route so that the people of the Island should suffer no inconvenience by even a temporary interruption of the passenger and freight traffic. When I found that they were not supplying other boats, I sent down the steamer Napoleon III. to give such accommodation as her capacity afforded to the traffic between Pictou and Charlottetown, and I believe that, with the assistance of the Northern Light, she succeeded in keeping up the traffic and carrying it all without any great inconvenience to the people. I know there was a good deal of excitement at the time, but the Napoleon III. was sent down almost immediately on the stoppage of the other boat, so that no great inconvenience resulted. As to the Northern Light being put on the slip, Mr. Coker found that from her peculiar construction he could not examine her without her being placed on the slip, and without any communication with the Department, she was sent to Pictou for that purpose. When I ascertained that that had been done, I sent down Mr. McElhinney, a Government Inspector, who had sailed the vessel in the winter of 1882, and in the summer of 1882 had superintended the repairs made upon her, and who had also examined her last spring in the slip. After an examination of her, he was satisfied to give her a certificate without the necessity of putting her in the slip, and I ordered the vessel back to Charlottetown without being put in the slip at Pictou. Whatever repairs the Northern Light may require, from the difficult service in which she has been employed, will be effected so far as possible. The papers will be brought down immediately.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) I am glad the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) has amended his motion by including the Northern Light; and I trust that when the papers come down we shall find that that ship is reported by the inspector, as stated by the hon. Minister, to be in a good state of repair. She has heretofore been rendering very important service to the Province by keeping up the communication in seasons when ordinary boats could not do so. But if reports speak truly, she is not altogether up to the mark in many respects. We know that she has to meet a great many difficulties in prosecuting her work, by encountering ice, and she requires to be a more than ordinarily strong boat. Report says that such is not the case at present; that she is considerably weakened, owing to the very great difficulties she has to encounter; and seamen who are acquainted with ships, and the working of ships, say that the oakum, after a certain number of years decays, and that nothing has been done for the past few years to see whether it requires to be renewed or not. I am also informed—though I cannot say how correctly—that in her last passage to the Island she got a grip in the ice which showed that she is evidently become somewhat weakened. I trust that the hon. Minister of Marine will take the earliest opportunity, when the season arrives next year, to see that the vessel is thoroughly overhauled. I am told that to do that in a competent manner, it will be necessary to have her machinery and engines removed in order that she may be properly strengthened. I am glad to be informed that such is the intention of the Department. With respect to the Steam Navigation Company's boats, I have not much to say, further than that heretofore these boats have done their duty to the satisfaction of the travelling public, without any accident or mishap whatever. There is no doubt that a great deal of inconvenience has been suffered by the people of the Province, owing to the unseasonable time at which they were stopped running; but the Government, I am glad to say, showed a disposition to assist the public as far as possible, by putting on other boats to take their place. Their certificate having run out, the Government had no other course to take, consistent with their duty to the public in seeing that these boats were run under proper inspection. I trust that these boats being now thoroughly overhauled, the Government and the company may be able to resume a contract which they have heretofore carried out to the satisfaction of the people of our Province, at least.

Mr. McINTYRE. I am glad to see, from the remarks of my hon. colleague, that his opinions with regard to the Northern Light have undergone a complete change. I remember, prior to 1878, what the opinions of that hon. gentleman, as well as his friends, were with regard to this ship. I must congratulate the hon. gentleman on his change of sentiment, and in doing so I hope I congratulate some of his friends also. With regard to the condition of the Northern Light, I would refer to a statement made last year by Capt. McElhinney, before the committee appointed to consider the question of navigation between Prince Edward Island and the Mainland. He said that he considered the Northern Light, after the repairs she had undergone, as strong as she had been when new. Under these circumstances, I do not see why she cannot be run now as well as she was five or six years ago. As soon as there is any appearance of ice, the vessel is laid up, and that is the way our terms of Union are being carried out, which provided that constant steam communication should be maintained both winter and summer. I thought, when the committee was appointed last year, that we had heard the last of this discussion for some time. The Chairman, the hon. member for Prince County (Mr. Hackett) was anxious that the report should be presented as soon as possible, before the Supplementary Estimates were brought down. That was done, but I regret to say that we were disappointed when they did make their appearance, because no appropriation was made. Last fall matters were in a worse position than before. The Steam Navigation Company's boats were taken off, and for some reason the place of these boats was supplied by nothing less than a war ship, the crew of which were dressed up in navy blue and brass buttons, who seemed to have come down there more for the purpose of overawing these troublesome islanders than carrying their freight and passengers, which was uppermost in their minds. As soon as winter set in, it became too cold for her to run, but I think she got heat enough in Halifax, where she took fire. As usual, we had to fall back on the Northern Light, which did remarkably well until the close of navigation, and would do well yet if kept on the route. I have nothing to say with regard to the Steam Navigation Company's boats being taken off, until the papers are brought down; but as long as there are gentlemen here who are willing to give excuses for the shortcomings of the Government in this respect, we may expect that nothing will be done in the future, no more than in the past, towards the amelioration of our condition. As for our future prospect, I do not see a glimmer of hope as long as the present Government is in power.

Mr. McLELAN. I would say for the information of hon. members from the Island, that in addition to exercising care that the Northern Light is kept in as good a state of repair as possible, considering her age and the hardship of the service in which she is engaged, we provided a new boat to take the place of the steamer Glendon, and in view of this peculiar service, I had a vessel constructed of wood instead of iron, so that in case of accident to the Northern Light, by which that vessel might become disabled, the new one could be put on for this service. It is my intention to ask Parliament to provide means for so strengthening her that she shall be able to take the place of the Northern Light in case that vessel should become entirely disabled. I am told that with but very little additional expense, and very little change in the model, she can be made as fit for going through the ice as Newfoundland whaling ships. I think a vessel thus constructed will be able to attend to the summer navigation, and in case the Northern Light should become disabled, will be available for winter service.

Mr. DAVIES. I desire to correct one misapprehension into which the hon. gentleman fell, when he expressed the opinion that the inspector had given the company ample notice as to the repairs to be made. I think the hon. gentleman cannot have read the papers, or he would not have given the inspector that endorsement. In the winter previous, the company repaired those boats at Mr. Coker's request, under Lloyds' inspection, at a cost of about $9,000 each. Having complied with his request, they had a right to assume, when Mr. Coker found no fault during the summer months, that the work was done to his satisfaction. But when Mr. Coker came to the Island in August, he did not do, as most inspectors would do, and as Lloyds' required to be done—make his report to the owner of the ship at once; but he delayed his report and certificates for a whole month, and it was not until the last day of September, when it became impossible for the company to make the repairs which Mr. Coker instructed them to make, that he furnished a report to the Minister, which only extended their certificate one month. I submit that his conduct is wholly indefensible, and all the inconvenience and loss occasioned the Island merchants during the last summer, are due to lack of duty in this respect. I may possibly be wrong, and after full explanations may alter my opinion, but I entirely dissent from the statement made by the hon. Minister, that because Mr. Coker made a trip across in the boat, he was competent to give a report as to her condition. The hon. Minister, as a ship-owner, knows very well that an inspection cannot be made unless the boat is opened up and properly examined, and I am sure he would not give a fig for the report of an inspector who, after merely walking about the deck, pretended to give an opinion concerning her seaworthiness. I hope that the hon. Minister does not really believe that an appeal made from the inspector to himself is sufficient. I read a report, made by the President of the Board of Trade in England, upon the necessity of appeals, and upon that section of the English law which gives the right of appeal to the President of the Board of Trade. He declared, as the result of his experience, that the President of the Board of Trade was a mere puppet in the hands of his inspectors. The experience of the Board of Trade in England, as regards the inspectors there, must necessarily be the same as that of the Minister of Marine here. If an inspector made a report on a ship in British Columbia, how is the hon. Minister here to judge, when appealed to, whether that report be correct or not? The hon. Minister, as a ship-owner, knows well that an appeal should be made to persons duly qualified, who would make a personal inspection of the boat themselves. This is not a local question, but one that affects the entire shipping of the whole Dominion, and which the late Sir Albert Smith and the late Government thought so important that they sent a special deputation to England for the purpose of having such an appeal placed in the English Act. There it has worked admirably. I know an instance where the inspectors at the Port of Liverpool stopped a Canadian ship from sailing, and on appeal being taken to the local board, withdrew their stoppage order. It would be an intolerable nuisance to invest one man with the arbitrary power of decreeing whether a ship or steamer is fitted to carry freight and passengers, without giving the option of appeal to some competent tribunal—a tribunal in each shipping port of the Dominion, composed after the manner prescribed in the English Act. I hope the hon. Minister will consider this matter before the Session is over.

Mr. HACKETT. It was not my intention to say any thing about this matter, had the hon. member for King's not made a remark reflecting on the committee of which he was a member. When that committee was in session, it was considered important that it should make a report before Parliament closed, so that the Government might take action. I am glad to find that a great many of the recommendations made by the committee are being carried out by the Government. The railway has been built to Cape Traverse, additional vessels have been placed on the route between the Capes, additional hands are employed and the Government are using every exertion to carry on the mail service between the Island and the Mainland, in accordance with the terms of the Union. With regard to the boats running for the last fifteen or twenty years between the Island and the Mainland, at a very inconvenient season, I have not much to say. I do not see, when the matter was referred to a competent inspector, and when, on the 29th August he made an inspection and reported these boats to be unfit for the service, that the hon. Minister could do otherwise than prevent the boats from running. He was bound to do so in the interest of the public. While I am willing to give credit to the company for what they did in the past, I agree with the hon. Minister that when they knew, last December, that the boats would not be allowed to run after the 31st of October, they had sufficient time to make arrangements to replace their boats by competent craft. But this company, which has received a large subsidy from the present Government, and a subsidy previously from the Island Government, did nothing except make overtures to charter the Northern Light as a substitute for their boats. In so doing, they were not looking to the interests of the Island. The stoppage of communication at that time was a serious matter to the people, and caused a good deal of indignation. As is well known, the spring season on the Island is late, the seeding is late, and the harvest is late; so that the farmers have to bring their produce to market in the months of November and December. Therefore they were very indignant that communication with the Mainland, by the boats which formerly kept up that communication, should be stopped on the 1st of November, and this stoppage resulted in great loss both to them and the merchants. I must, however, admit that the Government did the best they could under the circumstances. They placed the Northern Light on the route between Georgetown and Pictou and Charlottetown, and then sent down the Napoleon III. for the purpose of assisting the Northern Light and the new boat, the Summerside, between Summerside and Shediac. The hon. member for King's makes light of the fact that the Napoleon III. was sent down for the purpose of keeping up communication, and wants to make it appear that she came down as a war ship. Well, it would be a compliment to the people of the Island that a war ship should be taken from her legitimate course, and placed on the route between the Island and the Mainland. But this steamer—a vessel of 700 tons used for the purpose of carrying supplies to the different lighthouse—is not engaged in warlike, but in peaceable operations, and is adapted to the carriage of a large quantity of freight, as well as a considerable number of passengers. The greatest inconvenience resulting last fall, was between Summerside and Shediac. The company placed a new ship, the Summerside, on that route, which was not adapted to the carriage of passengers at all. She was brought there for the purpose of carrying freight, and thus supplementing the other two boats in that respect. Every one acquainted with the geography of the Island knows that people travelling west go to the Mainland, cross from Summerside to Shediac, and thence to Moncton, where they take the train, so that the great traffic is at Summerside. This boat is not fit for that traffic, and consequently great hardships were suffered by the passengers; many of whom, I believe, preferred to cross in small sailing vessels and open boats, and as many as twenty and thirty men, women and children, have been huddled in these small boats, crossing over to the Mainland. This is not what the Government should do in carrying out the terms of Confederation. It was guaranteed by the terms that efficient steam communication should be kept up between the Island and the Mainland, and, when the people found that they had to take the same old means of conveyance, the same old vessels and boats that were used in this way some fifteen or twenty years ago, for the purpose of doing their business on the Mainland and crossing over, they were naturally very indignant, and there was much excitement on the Island at the time. That excitement has pretty well subsided, and I trust the Government will make some arrangement for a permanency of the service. It will be difficult for them to do that until they have completed the railways to the Capes, but those railways should be completed at the earliest possible moment; piers should be built on both sides, and I believe a ferry established there would be the means of keeping up communication pretty satisfactorily. This is not a mere local matter. It affects the whole Dominion of Canada, because the people of Prince Edward Island are large consumers of the manufactured goods of the other portions of the Dominion. I think from $1,500,000 to $2,000,000 worth of the products of other portions of the Dominion are sold in the Island every year, so that it is not a mere local matter, but one extending to the whole of the Dominion of Canada; and it is to be hoped, therefore, that the Government will take steps to place proper boats between Summerside and Shediac, and establish them permanently, so that there shall be no doubt as to their movements, as to when this boat is going out or that boat coming in, and that continuous and efficient communication shall be kept up between the Island and the Mainland, as guaranteed by the terms of Union. The people believed that, when once they became a portion of the Dominion of Canada, these terms would be carried out, and that they would be able to take advantage of the whole system of railways of the Dominion; and, while this is undone, while there is no satisfactory arrangement made, there will be excitement on the Island. There will be discontent, and it will be a fruitful source of trouble to the Government as well. I hope, therefore, that this is the last we shall hear of the matter in the House for some time, and that energetic action will be taken for the purpose of carrying out these terms.

Mr. YEO. I am very much pleased that this question has come up, of communication between the Mainland and Prince Edward Island. Summerside harbour is the great west port for freight and passengers of the whole Island, and we expected something better to be done latterly than was done in the past. If the Government had notified the steamship company in time to get other ships to take the place of those they had, the Government would not be to blame; but if they did not do so, they were to blame. I am very sorry for it, and it is a great pity. At the time the late Government was in power, the only thought was to get a change and get this present party in power, and the Island would be amply provided for in the shape of steam communication; but instead of that, we have suffered more latterly than we ever did before, and it looks as if it was going to be worse. It is very surprising that a gentleman like Mr. Coker could condemn two ships and order another on the slip, and as soon as she got on the slip order her off again; that his eyesight could condemn one ship and could not see through the other. There must be something in this Mr. Coker not condemning the Northern Light, because she has only run a short time, and either the company or the captain of that ship, who is a very fine man, must be afraid to run her; perhaps he knows the danger he is in. Last year we had an investigation here, and we were promised a railway, and we were to have it right away. That is a railway. The people of the Island have been working on it all the summer, and, when they expected to get their pay from the contractors, or sub-contractors, they were knocked out of their pay. I do not understand how it is. There is nothing this year has hurt Prince County so much as not being able to get its produce away. The Government has no interest at all in Prince County, it is true. There is communication from Charlottetown, but the greatest trade is from Summerside, where there is no provision whatever, only it is left to passengers to go in sailing vessels. Twenty passengers went out in a small vessel from Summerside in the morning; they were on board that vessel all day and all that night, and had to land back in Summerside again, the wind being ahead and it being calm. I think that is a shameful state of affairs, and I hope the Government will lose no time in attempting to carry out the terms, which I do not believe they have ever tried to do. Either give us better steam communication or, as I wanted them to do last winter, commence a tunnel without any further delay.

COAL CARRIED BY THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. McMULLEN. In moving the resolution of which I have given notice, I may say that I have been induced to do so by looking over the Trade and Navigation Returns. I find that during the year 1883, there have been imported into this country 400,000 tons more coal than the previous year, and I find that there has been $225,000 more duty paid. I am anxious to know how it is that the Nova Scotia coal mines have not contributed to a greater extent than they have, to the coal trade of this country. When the National Policy was inaugurated, hon. gentlemen opposite declared that by putting a duty upon coal, the coal miners of Nova Scotia would obtain the entire coal trade of this Dominion, and that the coal of Nova Scotia would find its way as far west as the cities of Hamilton and Toronto. I have been making enquiries with regard to the coal that has been brought to this city of Ottawa, and I find that the only parties bringing it are the Government, for the purpose of heating the Parliament Buildings. I do not think that any other person has brought coal to this city from Nova Scotia. All coal dealers west of here are buying their coal in the States, and paying a duty of 60 cents per ton, while Nova Scotia miners are simply supplying the trade east of here. I am anxious to find out why the miners of Nova Scotia have not made more effort to send their coal further west, and that is the reason I am asking for the returns mentioned in my resolution. We may possibly find that it is owing to the fact that the hon. Minister of Railways is imposing such very heavy tariff rates upon coal coming over the Intercolonial, that it is impossible for the Nova Scotia miners to pay those rates and compete with American coal. I will not say that is the case. I am not prepared, either, to insinuate that the hon. Minister of Railways would be guilty of such an act, when he has been such a strong advocate of the National Policy. I should rather infer that he would do everything in his power to encourage the shipment of coal further west. On the other hand, possibly, we might find out that we are not only paying Nova Scotia miners 60 cents duty per ton in order to encourage them to ship their coal westward, but that we are also giving them greater facilities over the Intercolonial than the ordinary expenses of running the road will warrant—though I am not prepared to say that such is the case. I want, also, to find out how much coal has been shipped over the Intercolonial, what rate per ton has been charged, what has been paid and everything of that nature. I certainly hold that before the hon. Minister of Railways makes his railway statement to this House, we should be put in possession of the information my motion asks for. We want these facts, to be able intelligently to understand and discuss the coal question. I may also say that within the last few years a large amount of money has been expended by the companies themselves to improve the facilities for the movement of coal over the Intercolonial, and I desire to know how far that expenditure has resulted in securing the object sought for: I hope the hon. Minister of Railways will allow these papers to be laid before the House in good time, so that we may be able intelligently to discuss the whole question when he makes his statement. I, therefore, move for a return of the number of tons of coal carried by the Intercolonial Railway, from points along the line, during the year ending 31st December, 1883, showing the place where delivered and the rate per ton per mile for the carriage thereof; also, the special rates granted, if any, to whom granted, from what place, to what place, the distance and the rate per ton per mile.

Mr. WOODWORTH. The hon. gentleman who has made this motion does not seem to have included in it the number of tons of coal that have been carried from the mines of Nova Scotia to the different ports of the Dominion by steamboats and sailing vessels. If he had supplemented his motion by adding that, I am sure there would have been no objection to the remarks he has made, for he would then show much more clearly the extent of the interprovincial trade in coal. I, therefore, beg leave to move, in amendment, that the following words be added:—

“ And also the number of tons of coal carried from Nova Scotia by steamboat and sailing vessel to the different ports of the Dominion.”

Mr. HESSON: I think that it is quite right we should get all the information the hon. gentleman asks for, in order to discuss this question intelligently. He appears, however, to be under the impression, from all the knowledge he possesses, that Nova Scotia coal has not been carried farther west than the city of Ottawa, and that the only coal brought here has been brought by the Dominion Government for the purpose of heating the Parliament Buildings. Now, Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman is of an enquiring turn of mind, he may be interested in learning that coal from Nova Scotia has been delivered very largely as far west as the town of Brockville, and has been consumed there by Grand Trunk engines. It has also been carried as far west as Toronto, in barges, where it has given great satisfaction. If the hon. gentleman desires to get information as to the working of the National Policy, and its effect in developing that very important industry in Canada, I think he ought to allow his mind to grasp the conclusion that it is also possible to export coal from Nova Scotia and Cape Breton by water as well as rail. Therefore, I second the amendment just proposed.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

SUPERANNUATION FUND.

M. McMULLEN, in moving for a return of the total amount paid into the Superannuation Fund during the time of service by each of those superannuated during the year ending the 31st December, 1883, said: The information asked for in this resolution is the only item required, in addition to the returns presented to the House, regarding superannuation, to enable us intelligently to understand the operation of the superannuation system.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 29th January, 1884.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced, and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 18) to incorporate the Pilots engaged in the service between Montreal and Quebec.—(Mr. Amyot.)

Bill (No. 20) to amend the Act incorporating the Ocean Mutual Marine Insurance Company.—(Mr. MacDougald.)

Bill (No. 21) respecting the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada.—(Mr. Curran.)

SELF GOVERNMENT AMONG INDIAN COMMUNITIES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, in introducing Bill (No. 22) to provide for the introduction among Indian communities of a system of self government, said: This is a Bill intended to meet a difficulty connected with the more advanced bands of Indians whose self government is now carried on in council, where they can discuss matters affecting their communities and where the chiefs have the principal power. In some of the more advanced communities the Indians are civilized to all intents and purposes, and it is thought well that there should be something more than a mere informal council where they cannot speak authoritatively. The Bill is tentative to a considerable extent. It provides that in such Indian communities as the Governor in Council thinks fit for the operation of this Act, the Indians shall meet on a certain day and elect six councillors; that those six councillors shall elect a chief councillor, who shall be what would be called a reeve among the white communities in Ontario; and that they shall have the same powers as are given to the chiefs under the Indian Act, and also certain additional powers of arranging among themselves for the improvement of their reserves. These are, shortly, the provisions of the Act.

Mr. BLAKE. This is not the title which was given to the Bill in the notice paper. I suppose that the title was perhaps thought rather more extensive than the purpose of the Bill warranted.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It was because I had not the Bill before me when I gave notice.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. gentleman had not seen the Bill, then.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, as I prepared the Bill, I ought to have seen it.

AGREEMENT WITH BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that the House do, on Friday next, go into a Committee of the Whole House to consider the following Resolutions:—

1. That it is expedient to make provision for giving effect to the agreement entered into between the Governments of Canada and British Columbia laid before this House by Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

2. That it is expedient to grant and appropriate seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars in aid of the construction of a railway and line of telegraph from Esquimalt to Nanaimo, according to the terms and subject to the conditions of the said agreement.

3. That it is expedient to grant and appropriate the sum of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars for the purchase from the said Province of the dry dock at Esquimalt, and such further sum as may be required to repay to the said Province the amounts expended by the Government thereof or remaining due at the passing of the Act authorizing this grant for work or material supplied by the said Government since the 27th day of June, 1882.

4. That it is expedient to authorize the grant to "The Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Company," incorporated, or to be incorporated, by the Legislature of British Columbia, for the construction of the said railway, of the lands and the appurtenances thereof, or rights connected therewith, that are or may be placed in the hands of the Government of Canada by that of the said Province in aid of or for purposes relating to the construction of the said railway, subject to the terms, limitations, reservations, and conditions mentioned in the agreement aforesaid.

5. That it is expedient to authorize the importation, free of duty, of all steel rails, fish-plates, and other articles of iron or steel, timber and materials for bridges to be used in the first construction of the railway and lines of telegraph mentioned in the preceding Resolutions.

6. That it is expedient to provide that the said railway and line of telegraph and the lands, franchises, and other appurtenances thereof shall, upon the completion and equipment thereof, and subject to the conditions, limitations, and reservations mentioned in the agreement aforesaid and the schedules thereunto annexed, and so far as Her Majesty shall have power to grant the same, but no further, be the property of the said company.

7. That it is expedient to provide that the Government of Canada may pay interest at the rate of four per cent. per annum on any money deposited by the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Company, as security for the due performance of their contract with Her Majesty respecting the said railway.

8. That it is expedient to make legislative provision for giving effect to the agreement aforesaid, and that the mover of these Resolutions have leave to bring in a Bill for that purpose.

Mr. BLAKE. I had supposed that the hon. gentleman on this motion would have given some general explanation of the arrangement and its effects, and particularly of that point as to which one cannot very well judge from the papers which have been laid before us, viz., what the real cost to the Dominion of the dry dock will be under this arrangement.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I shall be prepared on Friday to give full explanations; and, of course, at this early period of the Session there will be no object in hurrying, and the matter can stand over de die in diem.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT.

The following Report was laid on the Table:

Annual Report of the Department of Indian Affairs for the year ended 31st December, 1883.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

MANITOBA PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider a certain proposed Resolution (page 43) with respect to aid to Manitoba for Public Schools therein.

Mr. BLAKE. I suppose the hon. gentleman intends to make some explanation of this.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes. It will be in the memory of many hon. members, that some three years ago a proposal was made to Parliament and accepted by it, to make an advance of $10,000 a year for three years, to assist the Government of Manitoba in providing the necessary means for the education of the people of that Province. The first and second payments of $10,000 a year were made under the authority of that Act. The third payment was not made within the year, but lapsed; and therefore it is considered advisable that we should ask Parliament, not only for authority for the payment of that sum of $10,000, but also to advance $15,000 for each of the years 1881-82 and 1882-83, to aid the Government of Manitoba in defraying the expense of education during those years. Owing to the sparseness of the population, it has been very expensive to carry on the work of education in that Province; and the Government have thought it desirable to delay the sale of the lands reserved for educational purposes until they would bring reasonably high prices, and to ask Parliament to make these advances in the meantime, the Government of Manitoba paying the Dominion Government 5 per cent. interest until the advances are refunded from the proceeds of the sale of the lands. The Government assented to the proposition of the Government of Manitoba—in fact, the latter asked something more, but this is the arrangement we agreed to submit to the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Can the hon. gentleman state how much land has been sold, and what amount has been realized therefrom?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I am speaking from memory, but I do not think any lands have been sold. The Government proposed to sell some at auction last spring, I think, but the Government of Manitoba, if my memory serves me, advised us to postpone the sale, and I do not think any lands have since been sold.

Mr. BLAKE. From the hon. gentleman's statement, I understand that this Resolution is the result of a proposition made by the Government of Manitoba to this Government, to which they have either wholly or partly assented. I think when a financial or other proposition is made by the Government, based upon negotiations between them and a Provincial Government, it is the duty of the Government to bring down the papers which evidence the basis of the negotiations. If the Government of Manitoba have made a suggestion, and there has been correspondence which results in this proposition, we ought to have the papers, so that we could see what the views of that Government and of this Government were, and how far it has been the wish of the Dominion Government to meet the views of the Province. With regard to the proposition itself, I do not think any member of this House will be found to say that an arrangement arrived at with a just degree of prudence, for the education of the young people of Manitoba at this early period, should be received otherwise than with favour. No doubt we should, at the earliest moment, devise a general system of education for that Province. But with reference to the fund which we are creating, with reference to the lands which we believe we cannot trust the people of Manitoba themselves to administer, I think the hon. gentleman has not wholly recollected the circumstances as they have occurred to my own mind and as they have appeared in the public prints. I think that serious difficulties have been, and probably will be, encountered in carrying out the policy of the Government with reference to the school lands. If the hon. gentleman would refer to the Department he will find—at any rate the newspapers have said so—that the difficulty in the way of selling has been the fact of squatting on the land. A great many claims have been made by individuals that their rights, as they call them, as squatters on the school lands should be respected, and they complained that it was a hardship to sell these school lands by auction. In consequence of representations of that description, the sale which was advertised was postponed and has never been resumed. What I have to say is this, that if the system be continued of keeping the school lands locked up, and at the same time of allowing people to squat on them, you are just breeding trouble. The same objections which have been made before will certainly be made again with added force if you permit these lands to be so occupied. There, therefore, ought to be some business-like adjustment of the question as to the terms on which school lands should be opened for settlement, and some immediate arrangement of the business, so far as regards those persons who have squatted on school lands, should be arrived at, for this is one of those things that time will not heal, but will make worse.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman is correct in a certain sense in his recollections. The Government, under the Dominion Lands Act, advertised a public sale, and the hon. gentleman will remember that the Statute provides for the selling of school lands by public auction and in no other way. Some two or three years ago they were advertised for sale. As regards the major part of the lots there could be no objection, but with regard to others there were claims of persons who had settled on them, some of whom said they did not know they were school lands, and others that they had settled under the terms of the Dominion Lands Act of that day, which enabled them to settle, and gave them certain inchoate rights. In addition to all that there was a communication from the Manitoba Government, which is primarily interested in the sale of these lands at the highest price, that they did not consider the time an expedient one for putting these lands on the market. In consequence of these two difficulties—in the first place the claims of certain individuals, and in the next the remonstrance of the Manitoba Government—the sale was postponed; and I believe the Manitoba Government are now sorry that the sale was postponed. I think they would have got as good prices then as they are likely to get now. That is the position of matters. Under the Dominion Lands Act of that day, a doubt arose as to whether these parties entering upon unsurveyed lands, which afterwards proved to be school lands, had not certain rights, and that their rights would override the clause of the Act providing that all school lands shall be sold by auction. Those individual cases are now being judged by the officers of the Department, and the law was so amended that by no possibility, after the passing of the last Dominion Lands Act, could there be any claims set up for occupation, nor anything against the right of the country to have these lands sold by auction to the highest bidder, for school purposes. There has been no communication since, that I at this moment remember, except that the individual members of the Manitoba Government have stated that they are now of opinion the opening of the season next spring would be a good period for putting a limited portion of these lands on the market, and it is the intention of the Government to do so. My hon. friend understands, no doubt, the reason why the last $10,000 was not paid. It was mere neglect of the Ontario Government to demand payment, and under the strict terms of the Statute the money could not be paid. As regards the other terms of the Resolution, it provides that there will be a further assistance of $15,000 a year for two years. There was no written communication, for this reason, that Mr. Desrivieres, a member of the Manitoba Government, came down especially to Ottawa and was heard in Council. Of course, the Government said they had no doubt Parliament would grant the $10,000, and after hearing him we came to the conclusion we should make these two additional grants; he expressing the opinion of his Government that next season would be a favourable opportunity for putting the lands on the market, from which might be expected sufficient to go far towards furnishing the whole amount of the advance.

Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BLAKE. I suppose the hon. gentleman will bring down at an early stage any correspondence there may be on the subject.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I think the leader of the Government has stated that a representative of the Manitoba Government appeared before the Government. I have no recollection of any written communication.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. Premier was quite right in saying that the Minister of Finance had explained about that $10,000, and that no objection was made to it at all. In fact this is not the first time the hon. gentleman has asked for $10,000 to educate the people of this country.

Resolution ordered to be reported.

SALARY OF CARIBOO COUNTY COURT JUDGE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Legislature of the Province of British Columbia passed, in 1883, an Act establishing five County Courts, and of course it was expected that Parliament here would provide salaries for the five Judges. However it was thought by the Government here, especially by the Minister of Justice, Sir Alexander Campbell, that this was perhaps premature, that we had just provided two salaries for two additional Judges of the Supreme Court and that with the sparse population of British Columbia there was no necessity for five Supreme Court Judges and for five County Court Judges in that Province. When Sir Alexander Campbell was in Victoria this summer, he discussed that with the Government, and they came to an agreement that, for the present, they would only want the salary provided for one Judge—the Judge for the Cariboo district—the difficulty being that there was a difference between the Government and the Bench. The law as passed there provided that the Judges of the Supreme Court should live in various districts—should be distributed over the whole of British Columbia. They objected very strongly to that, and they have now come to an arrangement, a sort of compromise, by which the major part of the Judges are to live in Victoria, to form the Bench, and two of the Supreme Court Judges are to live in outer districts. Those two Judges of the Supreme Court, with this one County Judge at Cariboo, will, it is believed, be sufficient for the purpose, and, therefore, instead of providing salaries for the five County Judges under the Act of 1883, this House is only now asked to provide for the salary of one Judge. There will be or has been, I am not sure which, corresponding legislation altering the County Court Act in British Columbia, and doing away for the present with the necessity for four other Judges. I move that the House do now go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following Resolution:—

That it is expedient to provide that the salary of the Judge of the County Court of Cariboo, in the Province of British Columbia, shall be $2,400 per annum; that he be paid such travelling allowances as the Governor in Council may from time to time determine and that the said salary and allowances be paid out of any unappropriated money forming part of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Mr. BLAKE. Move it for Friday.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Now.

Mr. BLAKE. There is no object in that.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is no opposition.

Mr. BLAKE. I said there is no object at this period of the Session in going on without the usual notice.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Very well; Friday.

Mr. BLAKE. It is rather amusing, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman should tell us to-day that in effect we are to be thankful for his saving us the salaries of four County Court Judges.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; I did not say so.

Mr. BLAKE. I said in effect. The hon. gentleman said that, instead of being called upon to provide the salaries of five County Court Judges, we were called upon to provide the salary of only one County Court Judge, and he intimated that that was a very small demand; but most of us, who recollect the discussion which took place when the re-arrangement of the judicial system of British Columbia was made, and we were called upon to sanction it by the late Minister of Justice, will remember that this result was predicted at that time. Then there were five Stipendiary Magistrates, who had been discharging their functions in these districts, and they were pensioned off at an expense of, I think, about $8,000 a year, which pensions we are still paying. They were pensioned off in order that a system of Superior Court Judges, and Superior Court Judges alone, might be provided for the Province; and it was said that no increased expense would be caused, because that staff of Superior Court Judges would be wholly adequate to the discharge of the duties. I pointed out that the circumstances of the Province were such as to require, in the remote and interior part especially, local Judges, that there would be this difficulty to which the hon. gentleman has referred, that we would be called upon at an early day to replace by somebody else the persons we were pensioning off, and that, instead of the scheme being one of a permanent character, not involving a large additional expenditure, it was one that would have to be supplemented so as to cause that additional expense. That was in 1880, and now, in 1884, he proposes that we should in effect replace under another name a County Court Judge, one of those pensioned four years ago. I believe it is impossible, as I stated before, to satisfactorily carry on the Administration of Justice in that Province without local judges. I believe that a Judge, in one sense of inferior grade, such as these Stipendiary Magistrates or County Court Judges, would be probably quite adequate to the discharge of the duty at those points, but I think it is to be much regretted that the judicial system of that Province, by the conjoint action of the British Columbia Government and this Government, which holds the purse strings and pays the money, was at that time re-arranged as it is now, that then the County Court Judges were pensioned, and now a proposal is made to re-establish one of those County Court Judges.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken, Mr. Speaker, in supposing that I was appealing to his gratitude for only asking the salary of one Judge. My hon. friend is like Prince Schwarzenburg, who proposed to astonish the Czar Nicholas by his splendid ingratitude. We do not get any gratitude from the hon. gentleman for anything we may do for the good of the country. We do the good notwithstanding, and virtue is its own reward; but we are not rewarded by the gratitude of my hon. friend. He says he predicted some years ago that we would have to return to the County Court system; but years progress, Provinces grow larger, populations increase, and, if I remember aright, the chief objection taken by the whole of the bar and bench there was that the local gentlemen, the stipendiary magistrates, who had looked after the miners in early days and were gold commissioners as well during the rush there, were all laymen, that there was not a lawyer among them, and it was not thought satisfactory that they should have such large jurisdiction. I am not sure that they could not try capital cases, but at all events they had the jurisdiction of Superior Court Judges in their several sections, and it was not thought satisfactory. These gentlemen were pensioned off, I think, under the agreement with British Columbia.

Mr. BLAKE. No; it was agreed that they should be pensioned if they retired from office, but the pensioning arrangement was only carried out the other day.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I believe nearly all the salaries of those who are pensioned are being saved. Judge O'Reilly is now the Commissioner for settling the Indian reserves, and he gets the salary of his predecessor, Mr. Sproat, and his pension is saved. I think Mr. Elliott, another of these gentlemen, is in the same position. He is employed otherwise, and therefore his salary is saved. Mr. Trutch never was a Stipendiary Magistrate, but he was one of the pensioners, and he is also an officer of the Government, and his pension is saved. I am not sure about the others. However that may be, here is the system which was adopted, and I fancy in the future it will be a good system. It is the system of the Province of Ontario that there should be a Supreme Court for superior jurisdiction, and County Court Judges. The Supreme Court consists of five Judges. Two of them are to act for the present, until the country increases still more than it has—and I am happy to believe that it is going to increase very rapidly in the future—three of the Judges will remain in Victoria and sit in banc; the other two Judges will be on the Mainland, and be District Judges, and in addition to these there will be this County Court Judge, to be stationed in Cariboo. I do not think there will be, I do not conceive that there can be, any objection to the granting of this proposal.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

SUMS PAID TO THE HON. JOHN O'CONNOR.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for a statement in detail of any sums paid to the Hon. John O'Connor since the period covered by the Address of last Session, with dates and particulars; also copies of Orders in Council and papers showing the arrangements under which such sums were paid, said: I asked the hon. gentleman last Session to give some information upon this subject, but no information was vouchsafed. It seems from the papers we have that these sums were paid to cover remuneration and expenses in connection with the boundaries dispute between Ontario and Manitoba, but we have had no return of what the particular services were, or what the expenses were. So far as one can judge it seems to be an arrangement by which a provision of about $3,000 a year was made to a gentleman for whom the hon. gentleman thought it convenient to provide for otherwise than by placing him in the Administration.

Motion agreed to.

NOVA SCOTIA COAL IMPORTATIONS INTO THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of any despatches or correspondence concerning, or of any regulations or orders of the United States Government, under which Nova Scotia coal imported into the United States ports, is permitted to be used for ocean steamship purposes, without the payment of duty, and statement of any information in the possession of the Government on the subject, said: I have been informed there have been for the last twelve months, regulations made by the Government of the United States, or some of its Departments, under which coal imported from Nova Scotia into those ports for the purpose of being used on ocean steamboats abroad, is taken out of bond and exported—I cannot say, perhaps exported, but placed on board those steamships for fuel purposes in their trade. This is a very important step with reference to the Nova Scotia coal trade, and one in which we are interested. I ask that the Address may be ordered.

Motion agreed to.

IRON BOUNTIES.

Mr. BLAKE. I observe by the Gazette that the Act of last Session on the subject of a bounty on iron, has been put in force, and that must have been done on some Order in Council regulating the amount. I also observe that the hon. Finance Minister, being the other day in the city of Toronto, was kind enough to receive a deputation of iron manufacturers and persons interested in establishing in that city works for the manufacture of pig iron, who represented to him that his calculations were somewhat erroneous and that a larger encouragement was absolutely necessary in order to their establishing and carrying on in the public good, and for the public interest, that important manufacture. I observe that the hon. gentleman rather disputed the accuracy of the statements and calculations of the gentlemen forming the deputation, and declared, as the newspapers report, that he would, on his return to Ottawa, cause their calculations to be sifted by some of his own officers, and would communicate the result. I am anxious to know what the hon. gentleman's final calculations are upon that subject, and with a view to obtaining that correspondence as well as the Order in Council, &c., I move for copies of all Orders in Council, correspondence, memorials and representations on the subject of the bounty on manufactures of iron.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The Order in Council relative to the bounties, which has been passed under the action of Parliament last Session, will be brought down. With respect to the interview with the gentlemen at Toronto, the statements were not made in the exact terms which the hon. gentleman has stated. It was not asserted that the calculations of the Government were wrong.

Mr. BLAKE. Not at all. I said the Minister declared that the calculations of those gentlemen were wrong.

Sir LEONARD TILLY. Exactly. The facts were these: Certain gentlemen were very anxious to establish iron works in the city of Toronto, and made certain statements to me, in order to show what it would cost to produce a ton of iron in that city; and I thought the calculations they submitted were of an exaggerated character. I asked them to give me the statements in order that they might be investigated, and said that if I found them erroneous I would report to them. They said they would have the statements prepared and forwarded; but they have not honoured me with them up to the present time, so I have not had an opportunity of enquiring into them or giving any answer.

Motion agreed to.

SEIZURES AT PORTS OF ENTRY.

Mr. BLAKE moved for a statement showing the number of seizures made at each port of entry in the Dominion during the last fiscal year; also during the six months ending the 31st December last; the amount of fines exacted at each port during each of the said periods; and the manner in which the said fines were disposed of, giving the names of the officers receiving any portion thereof, and the amount received by each of such officers of the said fund. He said: I am told this branch has been peculiarly active during the past season.

Motion agreed to.

FISHING IN ONTARIO WATERS.

Mr. MULOCK in moving for a return of all regulations now in force under the provisions of "The Fishery Act" prohibiting fishing in waters situate in the Province of Ontario, said: In making this motion I beg to call the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to a certain Order in Council which I am informed has been passed and in force for some years. I am told there is an Order in Council prohibiting fishing in any waters of the Province of Ontario without a license or a lease from the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and that under this Order in Council certain convictions have been made, contrary to what is understood to be the true spirit of the regulations, and that parties have been put to the trouble of applying to the Department for a remission of the fines, great expense and delays at times occurring, and sometimes even their petitions were not favourably considered. I am informed that the Department do not intend to enforce that Order in Council to the full letter; but yet they have delegated the authority to abuse the privilege to persons probably not well informed as to the true policy of the Government in regard to the matter in question. From this it appears to me that it would be possible to modify such Order in Council, or, if thought advisable to preserve the sweeping character of the Order, it would at least be proper to instruct the fishery officers throughout the Province as to what acts the Department consider offences against the fishing interest.

Motion agreed to.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

Motions for the following Returns were severally agreed to:—

Copies of all applications for sales or leases, and all correspondence or reports touching, and also statement of all sales or leases made of coal lands in the North-West, not covered by the returns already ordered, and of the particulars of all conversions of leaseholds into freeholds of coal lands; and statement of the payments made under any leases, sales or conversions.—(Mr. Blake.)

Copies of all correspondence between the Government of Canada and the Imperial authorities, or with the Government of Manitoba, or any other parties, on the subject of the navigation of the Hudson Bay, not already brought down.—(Mr. Watson.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 4:15 o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 30th January, 1884.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. COURSOL moved that, as the time for presenting Private Bills to this House will expire to-morrow, the same be extended to Saturday, the 9th of February next, in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (No. 24) to incorporate the Halifax Steam Navigation Company, limited.—(Mr. Stairs.)

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

Mr. HOUDE, in introducing Bill (No. 25) to repeal the Liquor License Act, 1883, said: A Bill for a similar purpose has been introduced by the hon. member for Huron; and as there are, in the preamble of that Bill, recitals that I prefer would not be there, I have, therefore, introduced another Bill repealing purely and simply the Act referred to.

Bill read the first time.

FRAUD IN THE SALE OF PATENT RIGHTS.

Mr. MULOCK, in introducing Bill (No. 26) for the better prevention of fraud in connection with the Sale of Patent Rights, said: The provisions of the Bill are similar to those of the Bill introduced last Session, and are not, I believe, at all obnoxious. I will explain them if the House desires.

Bill read the first time.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY AGREEMENT.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, Which are the clauses of Statutes under the authority whereof the Government made the arrangements of 26th October and 7th November, and executed the agreement of 8th, 9th and 10th November, with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, laid on the Table?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I will, perhaps, give a more complete answer to a portion of the hon. gentleman's question by reading the memorandum placed in my hands by the Deputy Minister of Finance:

"The powers possessed by the Government of Canada to borrow money are spread over several Acts, but for convenience of reference are brought down each year in the Supply Bill. The manner in which the Government shall borrow money is set forth by 35 Vic., cap. 6, as amended by 38 Vic., cap. 4, which manner is also set forth in the Supply Bill. Setting aside 38 Vic., cap. 4, which simply reduces the rate of interest which the Government are authorized to pay on Dominion stock, the borrowing powers and the manner in which the money can be borrowed are contained in the Supply Bill of last Session and in the Act 35 Vic., cap. 6. By the Supply Bill of last Session (46 Vic., cap. 2) in addition to the powers possessed of borrowing for specific purposes, the Government of Canada had power to borrow for general purposes as on the 31st December, 1882, the sum of $19,676,443.57. This amount on the 30th June, 1883, by increase of savings bank deposits and other causes, had been reduced to $18,280,234.27 (Vide General Statements, Public Accounts, 1883, page lii.) The amount of principal money mentioned in the agreement with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to represent $975,000 half-yearly for ten years, was $15,942,645, and so far as that amount goes the Government of Canada were it appears to me within their borrowing powers. I find, on reference to 35 Vic., cap. 6, that, as I said before, the manner in which the Government can borrow money is detailed, and for convenience of reference I may recite the various modes as follows: a. By the issue of debentures. b. By the issue of Dominion stock. c. By direct terminable annuities. d. By the issue of Exchequer bills and bonds. On the debentures and stock a sinking fund may or may not be provided. In addition, the Governor in Council is empowered to raise loans in any of these ways I have mentioned, or partly in one and partly in another or others thereof. The Act in its preamble sets forth that it was expedient to amend and consolidate the enactments then in force respecting the public debt and the raising of loans authorized by Parliament, and so avoid the necessity of inserting any such provisions in the annual Bills of Supply; and up to the present time this Act has been taken as the basis on which all loans have been effected. I also find that in addition, by clause 3, the Governor in Council has power, as the exigencies of the public service require, to raise temporary loans in certain cases. It will be noted that nothing in the Act was to alter the provisions of the Act respecting Dominion notes or the priority or rank of the changes then in existence."

That covers one part of the hon. gentleman's enquiry. As regards the acceptance of securities from the Canadian Pacific Railway for deferred payments, the Government made the arrangement trusting to the support of Parliament, as the case was urgent.

ONTARIO AND QUEBEC ACCOUNTS.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, What is the amount claimed as the balance due on the account between Ontario and Canada, and on which side? What is the amount claimed as the balance due on the account between Quebec and Canada, and on which side?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The hon. gentleman has a notice among the Notices of Motions with reference to copies of the statements rendered to the authorities of Ontario and Quebec, as to their accounts with Canada, &c. There will be no opposition offered to that motion, and the documents will be brought down, showing exactly all the circumstances under which that statement was made. There is, therefore, no necessity to enter now into details which would not be as complete as the statement to which I refer, and which will be laid on the Table the moment the resolution passes.

THE CENSUS.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, When will the remaining volume of the Census of 1881 be distributed?

Mr. POPE. Next month.

CANADIAN PACIFIC GUARANTEE.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, Whether there has been any further correspondence with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company on the subject of the guaranty than that already laid on the Table; and if so, whether the same will be forthwith laid on the Table?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am not aware of there being any other correspondence than that already brought down.

PAYMENT BY THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY TO THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, Whether the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, or any of its officers, have intimated to the Government that it cannot or will not meet, or that Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

it will find difficulty in meeting, its obligation under the recent arrangement to pay a sum in cash on the 1st of February; and whether the Government expects to receive that sum as agreed?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say, Mr. Speaker, in answer to that question, that I do not think it would be in the public interest to prematurely enter upon a subject that I intend to submit fully for the consideration of the House at a very early day.

THE ARRANGEMENT WITH THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, Whether any understanding has been reached with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, or any of its officers, as to any modification of the arrangement lately made by the company; or as to any further concession to the company?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I must ask the hon. gentleman to accept the answer which I have given to the last question as the answer to this.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY POSTAL SUBSIDY.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, Whether any arrangement has been made with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company as to the sale or amount of their postal subsidy or remuneration for transport service? If so, when; and will the paper be laid on the Table forthwith?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, that subject will be fully submitted for the consideration of the House; but it is understood that the same postal subsidy and remuneration for transport service will be given to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, as to other railways similarly situated.

REPORTS ON THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY GUARANTEE.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, Whether there was any report or memorandum on the subject of the recent Canadian Pacific Railway guaranty other than those laid on the Table? And if so, whether the same will be laid on the Table forthwith?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am not aware, Mr. Speaker, of there being any other report of that kind.

DEPOSIT OF CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY SECURITIES.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, On what day the sums of money and securities mentioned in the Order in Council of 7th November, 1883, were paid to and deposited with the Government and charged with the sums mentioned? In what bank or banks and to what amount in each bank was the money paid? With whom were the securities deposited? Where are they now? Was any instrument evidencing the terms of the deposit and charge executed; and when? Was an instrument creating a charge on the postal subsidy and transport service charges executed; and when? Will any such instrument be laid on the Table forthwith?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The deposit receipt of the Bank of Montreal, Ottawa, is dated the 16th November, 1883, and is for a sum of $3,561,733, and a further sum of $148,507, being the equivalent of interest at 4 per cent. upon $15,942,645 for 85 days, from 17th August to 10th November. Although the deposit receipt is dated at Ottawa, the 16th November, the transfer to interest account was dated the 14th November, and the orders to purchase exchange for transmission to England were sent from Montreal to New York on the 13th of November. We purchased at that time in New York Exchange to the amount of £825,000 sterling. When I was in England, owing to the large claims that were made by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, from the expeditious manner in which the works were being constructed, which exceeded my estimate, I made arrangements for a temporary loan of about $1,000,000 or £200,000 sterling. This £325,000 was to pay back that temporary loan, and to redeem $196,200 of 6 per cent. debentures due on the 1st of January, and $3,000,000 was deposited in the Bank of Montreal at 4 per cent. interest. In relation to the postal subsidy referred to in the latter paragraph, the company made a proposal to the Government on this subject, which proposal was accepted and embodied in the agreement.

CONSOLIDATION OF THE STATUTES.

Mr. LANDRY (Montmagny) enquired, Whether the Government have appointed a French Canadian as a member of the Commission for the Consolidation of the Dominion Statutes; and if not, whether it is their intention to make such an appointment, and when?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Alphonse Ouimet, who is, I believe, a French Canadian, has been appointed a member of the Commission.

SALE OF LAND OR TIMBER IN THE BOW RIVER DISTRICT.

Mr. JACKSON enquired, Has the Government sold to an American syndicate, or to any other syndicate, person or persons since the 1st of March last, a tract of land or timber limits in or convenient to the Bow River country in the North-West? If so, the date of such sale, the name or names of the purchaser, or purchasers, the number of square miles sold, and the prices or consideration received by the Government for the same?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There have been no such sales of timber lands, but the Government made leases of certain timber berths in the North-West during last summer for disposal by public tender, and awarded them to the highest bidder in each case. Some of those who acquired berths are American lumbermen doing business at Eau Claire, Wisconsin. As to the last part of the question, if the hon. gentleman will make a motion the information will be brought down.

DAILY MAIL FOR ST. GILLES.

Mr. RINFRET enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to grant a daily mail to the Parish of St. Gilles, County of Lotbinière?

Mr. CARLING. I may say to the hon. gentleman, that the matter is now under the consideration of the Government.

ACCOUNTS BETWEEN THE DOMINION AND ONTARIO AND QUEBEC.

Mr. HESSON enquired, Whether the accounts standing between the Ontario and Quebec Governments with the Dominion Government have yet been finally settled? If not, why not?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will obtain the information he desires when we lay upon the Table of the House, in a day or two, a statement of the accounts between the two Governments.

PASTURE LAND LEASES.

Mr. CHARLTON moved, for a return showing the number of pasture land leases granted in the year 1883, the name of each lessee, the estimated number of acres covered by each lease, the term of each lease, the sum received and to be received upon each lease, and the total number of acres leased, and total receipts from leases during the year.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is no objection to that, nor to the other motions of which my hon. friend has given notice. I have a communication from the Department of the Interior stating, with respect to all those motions, that the information called for is to be found in the annual report which is now being printed. At least, in respect to the public lands, there will be no difficulty in giving the returns at once if the hon. gentleman wants them.

Motion agreed to.

LICENSES FOR THE SALE OF LIQUORS IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of all despatches and correspondence on the subject of the issue of licenses or permits for the importation of liquor into the North-West Territories; and particularly with reference to the tax or fee thereon lately imposed, and for copies of the forms of licenses; and statement of the number issued, with names, quantities and dates, and amounts collected, said: There are two points which require attention with reference to the subject of the motion I am about to move. First, I have read numerous accounts, and many circumstantial accounts, of what seem to be gross abuses of the power to issue these privileges or permits to parties entering the North-West Territories. I have no personal information on the subject, and speak only from the ordinary source of public information; but it is alleged very circumstantially that blank permits have been issued, permits for an indefinite quantity. A story was narrated in one of the papers of that country of an occasion on which the officers charged with the duty of searching the train found several persons in possession of moderate sized packages of prohibited liquors without permits; but after those persons were told to remain quiet, another gentleman on the train produced one of the blank or indefinite permits, and said all the liquor belonged to him, and the efforts of the officer to carry out the law were frustrated by that impudent declaration, under cover of a permit entirely indefinite as to quantity. The next clause in the resolution is with respect to the recent order or declaration—I do not understand by what authority it has been done—under which a tax or fee is charged, based upon the quantity and description of the liquor. I know not whether this has been done for revenue purposes or for the regulation of the traffic, with a view to paying the expense of the searchers, &c.; but it seems to me open to several considerations of no small magnitude in connection with this whole matter. I think, as I have taken occasion to express more than once in this House, that the power which has been granted and exercised by the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West, as to granting permission to bring liquor into the Territory, is one which should be very carefully guarded indeed, and the exercise of which should be restricted within the narrowest possible limits, and in respect to which, instructions should be given as to the mode in which it is to be exercised; and returns in detail of the number of permits, the persons, the quantities, &c., should be furnished to the Executive here, and by them to Parliament, in order that the practical operation of the Act, which is supposed to secure the prohibition of intoxicating liquors in the North-West Territory, may be ascertained.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. All the papers on this subject, at the disposal of the Government, will be brought down. I believe there has been, in days gone by, a good deal of improper licensing in the North-West. One cause was that permits issued were not returned. A person who held a permit used that permit to bring in several quantities. That practice has been stopped. There has been, I have ascertained, within a day or two, a further limitation in regard to the permits, and a tax has been imposed. I read only this morning a report on the North-West generally made by the Lieutenant-Governor, and it embraces this subject among others in connection with that territory. That report will be laid before the House at once. There is no objection to the motion being adopted.

MATTERS OF ESCHEAT.

Mr. BLAKE moved for copies of the shorthand writers' notes of the proceedings before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of the Queen and Mercer, and of the judgment of the Court in that case. Also, copies of all correspondence in connection therewith, and a statement of the costs incurred by the Government in Canada and in England in connection therewith. Also, for a statement of any proceedings taken by the Government since Confederation, in the nature of inquisition or otherwise, in matters of escheat in any of the Provinces, giving the dates at which the Government first intervened in each of such matters; the nature of the intervention, and a statement of the action of the Government, with dates; and for copies of all petitions, correspondence, Orders in Council and papers connected with all applications to the Government as to escheated lands, since Confederation, not already brought down. He said: The first part of this motion is framed with a view to ascertaining the particulars with respect to this case of constitutional importance which has come before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council; and the latter part is inserted in consequence of a statement made some time ago, which I do not intend further to discuss now, but which I think will be sufficiently discussed when the return is brought down—from which it would appear, if my memory serves me, that during the early years after Confederation there were numerous proceedings on the subject of escheated lands taken by that Government, under the auspices of the hon. First Minister, who was then Attorney General, in which he claimed and asserted the authority of this Government to interfere with those lands.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

AGRICULTURAL INDUSTRIES.

Mr. GIGAULT (Translation) Moved that a Select Committee be appointed to enquire into the best means of encouraging and developing the agricultural industries of Canada, and to report thereon to this House; with power to send for persons, papers and records; the said Committee to consist of Messrs. Bain (Wentworth), Orton, Foster, Landry (Montmagny), Benoit, Fisher, Irvine McDougald and the mover.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will have no objection to indicate the precise object he proposes to accomplish by this Committee; whether it is in the direction of improving and developing the tariff, or in the way of protecting and developing the agricultural industries, or in some other way.

Mr. GIGAULT (Translation). My motion itself explains the object which I propose to attain. The Committee whose formation I now ask, will have occasion to study the operation of the various departments of agriculture in other countries, to enquire if the results accomplished by such departments have been satisfactory, and having completed these investigations they make such suggestions which may appear to them to be useful in the interest of the farming community, and with a view to promote the improvement of agriculture in Canada. In Washington, the department was formerly organized on the same principle as ours; they simply dealt with the census and statistics, and it was not until after 1860 that it was thought expedient to make a change. A special Board of Agriculture was organized, a Commissioner was appointed, and from that time they commenced to distribute seeds imported from foreign countries. Works on the art of agriculture were also distributed, and the Commissioner on Agriculture, together with a great number of farmers, were perfectly enthusiastic in their appreciation of the usefulness and efficiency of the services rendered by the Department. Several new kinds of culture have been implanted in the United States, thanks to this organization, whose beneficial influence did a great deal towards improving the state of agriculture. A garden or experimental farm is also attached to the Department of Agriculture in Washington. These changes have wrought most satisfactory results, in the opinion of the officers of the Department and of a great number of persons. It will be the business of this Committee to enquire into the possibility, on the part of the Department of Agriculture in Ottawa, to adopt the system in part of the system followed in Washington. To improve the condition of those who till the land, it seems to me that it is impossible to make too many researches and enquiries, because our welfare and the future prospects of our commerce and industry both depend upon the increase of our agricultural production. Therefore, I hope that this House will favourably accept my motion and that the work of this Committee will be such as to promote the improvement of agriculture in our country.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I hope there will be no objection to adding the name of the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Massue), President of the Agricultural Association of the Province of Quebec, to the Committee. I move that his name be added.

Mr. FOSTER. In seconding the motion of my hon. friend, I would only hope that the information which he has given has been satisfactory to the hon. gentleman who asked for it. Presuming that information has been sufficient, I shall not follow in the line of remarks made by my hon. friend, but shall trouble the House with only a very few words with reference to why I second this motion. It is not necessary to say that the agricultural interest is, if not the most important, among the most important interests of Canada. Not only is it a very important interest, but it is more nearly related in the way of supplying a stimulus to all the other great industries of Canada, than perhaps any other one we might mention. The Dominion of Canada has expended a great deal of money and a great deal of energy in developing these very great interests—the shipping interest, the interest of railways and canals, and the manufacturing interests of the country; and yet it is not too much to say that all these different interests have as their object, and look towards, the development of the agricultural interests of the country as a source of supply and feeder for the trade and traffic which shall pass over them and be carried by them. Although it cannot be denied that these different interests have an effect on the agricultural interests of the country, it is possible for a Government, and it is possible for our own Government more directly, to aid the development of our agricultural interests by the gathering and diffusing of certain information which can be gathered and diffused as well in no other way. Another consideration which leads me to favour the appointment of this Committee is this: We all know that the Dominion of Canada occupies a very different position to-day from the positions occupied by the different Provinces before the Union. Those Provinces had different interests, were under different commercial tariffs, had a certain trade rivalry with each other, and did not possess that commercial standing in the markets of the world that they now possess after having been united in one Dominion. In addition, the Union has brought into play a keener competition. The United States have been spurred on to greater efforts to extend their trade and commerce in competition with the Dominion of Canada as a whole, than they were by any one or two of the Provinces taken separately. We find that the people of that country have taken very great pains to assist, by the collection and distribution of information, the agricultural development of the country. They have a well organized agricultural department, which has its various branches—agricultural, entomological, chemical, and others—each of which has its experts, whose knowledge and energy are devoted to the collection and dissemination of information in relation to those various branches. If, then, we are subjected to a keener competition with the United States as a Dominion than we were as several Provinces, it behoves us to do as much as we possibly can towards aiding our agricultural interests, by gathering and disseminating similar information. It must be borne in mind, also, that we possess singular facilities for carrying on this work. We have already a Department of Agriculture under the charge of a competent, able and practical Minister. We have all the methods for work organized and ready; and all that is necessary for us to do in order to arrive at what I am sure is the object of the mover of this resolution, is to have those methods brought into play for the collection of agricultural statistics, and for the dissemination of the information so collected for the benefit of our people. It may be said, Sir, that the agricultural interest, if left alone, can take care of itself. I do not believe, however, that such interests should be left to take care of themselves. The great difference between Governments at this age of the world's history, and Governments in former times, is that by the latter the great interests of the country were left to take care of themselves, while now they are not. Old Governments directed their attention chiefly to two objects—one to gather the taxes, and the other to carry on the wars. All the really great interests of the country were allowed to take care of themselves. Now-a-days, Governments take it as the rule of their conduct that all these interests should be gradually drawn within their purview, and should be assisted by all the talent and skill they demand for their fullest development. I think, therefore, that it cannot be urged, as a valid objection to this motion, that the agricultural interest can take care of itself. Neither do I think it fair to suggest that it should be left to Provincial supervision solely. In the first place, a great many of the Provinces do not possess Agricultural Bureaus. But even if all the Provinces had well organized Bureaus of Agriculture, yet we form a Dominion, and it would be highly desirable to get a view of the resources and capabilities of our country as a whole, and not simply of several Provinces in detail. It is from these considerations, Sir, that I am moved to support the motion of my hon. friend from Rouville; and I hope the Government will see fit to agree to it. I have much pleasure in seconding the resolution.

Motion, as amended, adding the name of Mr. Massue, agreed to.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIAL ADMINISTRATION.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) moved for copies of all Minutes or all Orders in Council, all resolutions or representations of the North-West Council sent to the Government of Canada, or the Minister of the Interior, on the subject of the administration of the affairs of the North-West Territories, and the complaints made by, and the grievances of, the inhabitants of such Territories; and all correspondence between the Government of Canada and the North-West Council, or the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories, or any other person, on the same subjects. He said: The North-West Council is composed of thirteen members—six nominees of the Crown, six representatives of the people, and the Lieutenant Governor; and this Council is invested with certain power and authority. It is said that these gentlemen are friends of the Government. I think there is no doubt but that three-fourths of the gentlemen, at all events, composing the North-West Council, are friends of the Government. Not long ago, the Council, after due deliberation, having sat in solemn conclave, passed certain resolutions, preferring certain charges or indictments against the Government with respect to the management of affairs in the North-West and the policy the Government have been pursuing in regard to the North-West. It is said the indictment contains sixteen distinct charges, every charge levelled against the Government. How far that is true or untrue, of course I do not know. I only know what has appeared in the newspapers. It is said in the newspapers that such an indictment has been preferred against, and transmitted to, the Government in Ottawa. I desire to know if such is the case; and, in common with the whole mass of the people, I desire to know distinctly the charges made by the North-West Council against their friends in Ottawa.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no objection to bring down this indictment, or these indictments, which the hon. gentleman speaks of, and shall bring them down. The hon. gentleman says they have been preferred by friends of the Government. My hon. friend has no confidence in the Government, nor in those who have; and having no confidence in the friends of the Government, he cannot have much confidence in these complaints. No doubt, when these complaints are laid before the House, I shall have the support of my hon. friend against those attacks made on us by our own friends.

Motion agreed to.

LAND AND TOWN RESERVES.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I make this motion more for the purpose of endeavouring to elicit from the Government a declaration of their policy with respect to the land and town reserves, than for the purpose of obtaining these returns, should they be very voluminous. The hon. First Minister knows that Moose Jaw, at all events, is not yet open for homestead or preemption. He may know that a large number of settlers from Ontario settled in Moose Jaw region, and, I believe, in the city or town reserve, before the railway was completed; that some of these people settled in good faith and have made valuable improvements; that owing to the lands not yet being open for homestead or preemption, these people are placed in a very difficult position. I know several young men from my own county—active, vigorous and intelligent—who went up two years ago for the purpose of settling in the North-West, and, having cast their eyes on the Moose Jaw district, settled down there in good faith, believing that their claims would be properly recognized, and that they would be dealt with in a liberal spirit. I know the cases of several young men whom I met while up there last fall, who have made valuable improvements on their property. One has fifty acres under cultivation, has built a valuable house, and has surrounded himself with all the comforts one could expect in a new region; but although he has been settled there two years, he has not yet been able to get his homestead or preemption. When I saw him, he consulted me, as an old friend of his father, as to whether it would not be advisable for him to give up all his improvements and leave the country altogether. I advised him strongly to remain, saying the Government could not fail to deal properly and fairly by him if his claim was represented to them. What I desire to know, as far as I can ascertain it from the hon. First Minister, is how are men of that class to be dealt with? I saw, by an article in the Mail, which appeared shortly after the new regulations were issued, that it is the intention of the Government to charge $5 an acre for the land in the town reserve. If this should be done, it will prove a great hardship and injustice to the early settlers, the pioneers, the men who went in there when there was not a soul in that section, and who have toiled there for a period of two years. If they will have to pay $5 an acre, they are clearly in not as good a position as the men who went in at a more recent period. There was no idea in the minds of the young men of whom I have spoken that the Moose Jaw Creek was to be one of the termini of the Canadian Pacific Railway, nor could they have known that it was to be one of the Government towns, though any one with eyesight could see that Moose Jaw was destined ultimately to be of considerable importance. But, apart altogether from one's observations, there was no other information to lead these people to settle there, except that the country was good, that the land was good, and the situation was a favourable one. There was no railway, and the railway was not located there. These young men to whom I have referred were there in the month of April, 1882. Well, the railway was not located at Moose Jaw Creek, or at Thunder Creek, until away on in the fall of that year, in August or September of that year. When I was passing through that country in August, the railway was not then located across Thunder Creek. The surveyors were there, but it had not been finally located. These men from my county located there—some of them, I may tell the hon. gentleman, are friends of the Government, if that makes any difference in a matter of this kind, though I don't think it does—and have remained there since, and by my advice remain there still, in the hopes that a measure of justice will be dealt out to them; and that they will be able to make their entries for homestead and preemption within a very short period. I cannot understand why the Moose Jaw region should not have been opened for homestead and preemption long ago. It is said that there was some mistake in the surveys. That may be so, and that may have retarded it to some extent the right to get entry; but it should not have retarded it for a whole year. The Regina region has been opened for homestead some time ago; the Moose Jaw region is not yet opened for homestead and preemption, and these men are there in this uncertain and equivocal position. If the policy of the Government is to charge the people who have settled in good faith in the town reserve $5 an acre, it is not a good policy. The railway passes to the north of the township on which Moose Jaw is located. If a man gets his land abutting on the railway for $5 an acre, it is not fair to make a man five miles from the railway pay the same price for it. I cannot see the reason why those settlers who went in in good faith, and have made valuable improvements on their land, and built houses on their land, should not get their homestead entries as other people in Manitoba have got theirs, by paying a nominal fee, and should not get their preemption entries on the same terms as others. It may have been their fortune, it may have been their good fortune, to have got there in good time, but that is no reason why they should be cut out of that good fortune by the act or policy of the Government. I hope the hon. gentleman will see that the region of Moose Jaw is put in such a position that the settlers will be able to get their homesteads promptly before the spring opens for industrial pursuits, and upon the same terms as others who have gone up into the new region have been able to get their land. I move for this return, not, I say again, with a view to ask the Department to bring down voluminous returns, if they are voluminous, but rather with a view of letting the people in that section of the country know to some extent what course the Government propose pursuing with respect to the land in the Moose Jaw region. I move for:

1. Copies of all Orders in Council or departmental orders, regulations and correspondence with the Land Commissioner or other Agents of the Government respecting the withdrawal from homestead and preemption of all lands in what is known as the Town Reserve at Regina, Moose Jaw, and other places in the North-West Territories on the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and respecting the re-opening of said lands for homestead and preemption, and the terms and conditions on which so re-opened.
2. All Orders, regulations and correspondence as to the claim of settlers and squatters on such lands, the name of the claimant, the nature of his claim, and how disposed of, and what disposition was made of the land claimed.
3. All Orders in Council or departmental orders or regulations and correspondence respecting the sale by public auction or private sale of such lands, to whom, when, and for what price sold, and how paid or payable, the upset or fixed price for each section.
4. All regulations and decisions of the Department respecting the claims made by settlers or squatters on such lands.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. gentleman has explained what he wants under this motion. A return made in the terms of it would be, as the hon. gentleman will see, a very voluminous and expensive one, would take up a great deal of time, and perhaps defeat the object the hon. gentleman has in view; but I shall call the attention of the officers of the Department to the statement made by my hon. friend in the Hansard, and they will see exactly what he wants. I do not believe, in the first place, that any one person who has settled in any of these town sites or in the Mile Belt has been removed or evicted. The claims of every person there, will be examined and judged on their own merits. Of course it is a matter of no consequence to the Government or the Department of the Interior whether A or B gets any specified lot. If the party who settles there has a legal right, of course that legal right must be maintained. If any party has an equitable right—and I do not mean an equitable right in the technical sense, but a moral right, a right in justice—to hold this land, that right will be maintained. The Government policy was announced, and met the approval, I think, of the other side, that, while the homestead system was a beneficial one to settle the country, there was no ground for making a present of a town site to a person who happened to cross it, and that the Government should fairly get the profit of these town sites to meet the expenditure which Canada has made in that country. The claims of these parties will be fully considered and adjudged according to justice and according to equity. Of course there is an infinity of cases—the hon. gentleman has been in that country and he knows—there are an immense number of bogus claims, where persons who have gone on, looking around wherever they thought there would be a town site, or a water privilege, or a crossing, or a ford, or a trail, or any chance of a town, have made merely nominal settlements and set up claims. Well, these have got to be carefully considered. It is of very great importance that the bona fide settler, going in there with a real honest desire to become a settler, and settling down upon any one lot, and commencing to improve it, should get, and I think he deserves to get, every encouragement; and, if he happens to have the good luck to settle on a property which afterwards proves to be a valuable one, that is his good fortune. The Government, of course, do not grudge him that good fortune. But, if they find that a place that is really known to every one to be a town site is claimed by a party who goes there really to keep out the bona fide honest settler, that man must be dealt with accordingly. As regards the delays at Moose Jaw, I think the surveys were not finally approved—the hon. gentleman perhaps knows more about it than I do, as to when the survey was finally approved. It is of very great consequence that no settlement should be made under a survey until that survey is a legal one, because it is known to everyone familiar with the old surveys in the Province of Ontario, what an immense amount of litigation and trouble and loss has been caused to various sections of the country by the existence of erroneous surveys, and by settlements under these erroneous surveys. The first thing is to have a correct survey, and then immediately afterwards, when the survey is approved, the patents should issue. I may say, Mr. Speaker, while I am on this subject, that the amended system of issuing patents which was introduced by the law of last year, has been perfectly successful. The previous process was a long, circuitous and expensive one—going from one Department to the other. Now, the Department has during the whole of this autumn been issuing patents at the rate of from 7 to 100 per day.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman one or two questions if he would permit me. I am speaking under correction—I am not certain of the fact—It was stated to me, however, that a proclamation had been issued with reference to this same Mile Belt, stating that parties would be evicted from it some time ago. If I am correct, and that was actually done, I should like to know whether that proclamation has been also formally rescinded. The First Minister will understand the reasons why I ask, because, no doubt, although, as he has now explained, it is not, as I understand, the intention of the Department to evict any honest settlers, still, if I am rightly informed, it was claimed, or officially stated in some way, that all parties on the Mile Belt would be evicted at one time.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There was no notice of the eviction, but there was a warning to the parties that the Mile Belt was reserved, and that they should not settle on it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They so construed it—I dare say they may have construed it wrongly. I would also like to ask whether he thinks these matters can be taken up within any reasonable time, and if so, what time? and who is specially charged with deciding those cases? Everything which lies along the Mile Belt, at any rate, is comparatively within easy access of the Commissioner, or his deputies. The hon. gentleman will understand it will be a matter of great importance to these people that they should know at an early moment what the policy is.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That process is now going on and has been going on for some little time. All these matters are to be decided by the Land Boards—The Land Boards consisting of a commissioner and a surveyor, or inspector; Mr. Walsh and Mr. Pierce. These gentlemen are besides inspectors of homesteads, and travel, not only along the Mile Belt, but elsewhere, for the purpose of verifying the settlements of each person and seeing if they have really been residents for three years, and whether they have made such substantial improvements as to entitle them to their patents. The patents are now issuing very rapidly.

Motion agreed to.

SALES ON THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY BELT.

Mr. WRIGHT, in the absence of Mr. IVES, moved for a return showing the average price obtained by the Government (exclusive of town sites) for land sold within the limits of the Canadian Pacific Railway Belt.

Mr. BLAKE. With reference to that motion, I understand that the great bulk of that land the hon. member refers to in his motion, is held for homestead and preemption. It would not be reasonable to take an average price on the whole acreage that has been disposed of by the Government under the homestead and preemption system, and that which may have been actually sold by them during either period, while they were selling land in that quarter. The hon. gentleman stated, I think, the other day, that very few sales had been made.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Very few sales.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps it would not be much trouble, under those circumstances, to give the sales.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no objections.

Motion agreed to.

SECTION B, CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. CASEY moved for copies of any agreement between the Government and the contractors for Section B, Canadian Pacific Railway, and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, in regard to the transfer to the latter of the contract for said Section B, and of any Orders in Council giving effect to said agreement; also copy of report of the engineers appointed to re-measure the work on said contract previous to said transfer, and the report of the Engineer-in-Chief in regard thereto; also, copies of all correspondence and agreements with the said contractors in regard to measurement and classification of work on said contract; or to compensation for the transfer of said contract, or for the right to run the said portion of the railway during construction, and of all Orders in Council in relation to any of these matters; also for statement, in detail, with dates and amounts, of all payments made to said contractors or to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company on account of the said contract. He said: The motion calls for some information suggested by the remarks of the hon. Minister of Railways during the debate on the Supply for this item last Session. The hon. Minister then stated that that contract had been transferred from the original contractor to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company—practically on the same terms—that a re-measurement had been made of the work, and a re-classification, as I understood. I suppose by this time the reports spoken of are made, and these arrangements must be concluded.

Motion agreed to.

FURTHER SUMS PAID TO CONTRACTORS FOR SECTION B.

Mr. CASEY moved for copies of estimates of further sums required to be paid to the contractors for Section B, Canadian Pacific Railway Company, on account of contract for construction, or of any subsequent agreement.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I was not present when the hon. gentleman moved the preceding resolution, or I would have stated to the House that I had already given instructions to have these papers prepared and laid on the Table.

Motion agreed to.

PULLMAN PALACE CARS ON THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. WELDON, in moving for any correspondence, documents, contracts or agreements with the Pullman Palace Car Company in relation to the company's cars running over the Intercolonial Railway; also any contract or agreement with express companies as to conveyance of express matter over the said railway, said: I understand that the contract with the Pullman Palace Car Company will shortly expire, and I desire to know whether it is the intention of the Government to continue the agreement with that company or not. There are grave causes of complaint in regard to the manner in which passengers are treated on those cars. I can speak from my own experience. On one occasion I took a through passage in a Pullman car, and when we reached Moncton I was told the car would go no further, and that I would have to go to Montreal to have the money refunded. A short time ago some passengers took passage on board one of these cars from St. John to Quebec. An accident occurred to that car, and they were refused accommodation in the other Pullman unless they again paid the full fare. These cars are, no doubt, outside the control of the Department; but I think in making any further arrangements some control over them should be given to the Department of Railways, so that improved accommodation and better attention may be paid to passengers. The same remark applies to express companies. If a company has a monopoly of the carrying of express matter over the Intercolonial Railway, the Government should have some control over the tariff of rates, because complaints have been made in regard to irregular charges imposed on such express matter. I, therefore, make this motion with a view to call the hon. Minister's attention to the subject.

Motion agreed to.

MAIL CONVEYANCE IN NEW BRUNSWICK.

Mr. GILLMOR, in moving for any correspondence, memorial or other documents from the Board of Trade in the city of St. John or other parties, in relation to the conveyance of mails on the night train on the St. John and Maine Railway to St. Stephen and Woodstock; also, as to conveyance of mails over the Grand Southern Railway to St. George, said: I make this motion in order to bring before the notice of the Postmaster General the inconvenience which arises from the mode in which the mails are carried through a part of St. John county and Charlotte county. The Postmaster General is, no doubt, aware that the Grand Southern Railway runs from St. John to St. Stephen, in the county of Charlotte, a distance of eighty miles, and that this railway passes through several centres of population in both counties. The Postmaster General will perceive the inconvenience occasioned when I state the manner in which the mails are carried. The mail leaves St. John for St. George by stage at 8 a.m., arriving in St. George at 6 or 7 p.m., if the weather is fine. If the mails were sent by railway they would leave at the same hour, 8 a.m., and arrive at 11 a.m., being three hours instead of ten or twelve hours. So with respect to the correspondence of commercial men, which is very important, with another commercial centre, St. Stephen. The mails now leave St. George, go to St. Andrews, twenty miles distant, lie over at night and arrive at St. Stephen next day at 8 or 10 a.m. If they were sent by train, they would go to St. Stephen in an hour and a-half, instead of from twenty to twenty-four hours. The mails from St. Stephen to St. George leave St. Stephen at 2 p.m., go to St. Andrew, remain all night, and arrive the next day at 9 or 10 o'clock. If sent by railway they would reach St. George in an hour and a-half. The mails leave St. George for St. John at 8 a.m., and arrive there at 6 p.m. If sent by train they would leave St. George at 11 a.m., and arrive at St. John at 1 p.m., being two hours on the way, instead of ten hours. I am sure the Postmaster General, when he looks into the matter, will see that he will confer a great favour on a large population in both counties by having the mails carried by railway instead of by stage. I do not think the cost will be much increased to the Department, while at the same time the public would be accommodated. The railway could accommodate some dozen offices right along the line—St. John, Spruce Lake, Prince of Wales, Musquash, Leanprean, Pennfield, St. George, Upper Mills, Dyers, Dumbarton, Oakbury and St. Stephen. The mails by stage to Dyers, Dumbarton, Upper Mills and Pennfield, which involve considerable expense to the Department, could then be dispensed with. This change would be a great convenience to merchants who get supplies at St. Stephen and St. John, and even now the railway is utilized for the sending of letters by parties who desire to get freight the next morning. I am quite satisfied that if the Postmaster General will look into the matter, he will find that the carriage of the mails by railway will be in the public interest, and will afford improved accommodation to a large population, and that, practically, without additional cost. I am confident the hon. gentleman will consider the subject, and I hope he will see that it will be in the interest of the public generally to make the arrangement I have suggested.

Mr. WELDON. I desire to call the attention of the Postmaster General to the carriage of mails to Woodstock and St. Stephen by the St. John and Maine Railway. There is at present only a day mail, and yet there is a night train. I understood there was an arrangement to carry a night mail. This is a very important matter to those corresponding with people on the upper part of the river. I also direct the attention of the Postmaster General to the fact that complaints are made that while there is a railway running into Richibucto, the mails are carried by stage. At this season of the year particularly, the mails are very irregular and much time is wasted on account of the roads being blocked. I submit that the mails on that section should be carried by the branch railway running from the Intercolonial into Richibucto.

Mr. CARLING. Arrangements have already been made to carry mails on the night train from St. John to St. Stephen and Woodstock. With regard to the mail on the Grand Southern Railway to St. George, an officer of the Department is now making an enquiry and will shortly make a report.

Motion agreed to.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

Motions for the following Returns were severally agreed to:—

Return showing the total number of acres of public lands entered as homesteads during the year 1883. The number of such entries, and the number of entries cancelled during the same period, with the total number of acres covered by such cancelled entries. Motion agreed to; and (at 5:15 o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 31st January, 1884.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY TARIFF OF RATES.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, Whether any tariff of rates to be charged on any part of the Canadian Pacific Railway has been proposed by the company since that laid before the House last Session; and if so, when? Whether any tariff has since that so laid before the House been approved by the Government; and if so, when?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have been requested by my colleague, the hon. Minister of Railways, to say that no tariff of rates has been proposed by the company since the tariff that was laid before the House.

AMHERSTBURG PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. LISTER enquired, Has the Government let the contract for the erection of public buildings at Amherstburg? If so, were tenders for the work invited? Who were the tenderers and what was the amount of each tender? Whose tender was accepted? What is the price to be paid for the work? Has the successful tenderer given security for the performance of the work? If so, what is the name of his surety and the amount of the liability?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The contract for the erection of public buildings at Amherstburg has been let. Tenders were invited for that work; five tenders were received. The names of the tenderers are: Patrick Navin, Wm. Toms, J. E. Askwith, C. J. O'Doherty, and Henry Lindock. The amount of each tender is as follows, in the same order in which I have read the names: The lowest, $17,909; the next lowest, $18,790; the next, $20,000; the next, $22,973; and the highest, $25,000. The tender which was accepted was that of Patrick Navin, of Amherstburg, Ontario, for $17,909, that tender being the lowest. The price to be paid for the work is the price mentioned. The successful tenderer has given the security required. He has deposited a certified and accepted cheque, amounting to five per cent. of the amount of his tender.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron), in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 2) to amend the Criminal Law, and to extend the provisions of the Act respecting Offences against the Person, said: I propose to move the second reading now, for this reason—this is precisely the same Bill that was up last Session and the Session before. On both occasions the First Minister gave his assent to the principle of the Bill, so that I propose to take the second reading to-day, and leave it for Committee of the Whole at a subsequent day.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I thought my colleague, the First Minister, would have been here, and I know that he wished to ask the hon. gentleman to be kind enough to postpone the second reading of the Bill to another day, Monday or Wednesday, as he thought proper, in order that the First Minister might have the opportunity of seeing the Minister of Justice in relation to the Bill. It may be the same Bill, nevertheless I know the First Minister wishes that, and I hope the hon. gentleman will consent to postpone the Bill.

Mr. CAMERON. Of course I have no objection; but the Minister of Justice himself in the Senate last Session assented to the principle of the Bill.

FRAUD IN RELATION TO PUBLIC CONTRACTS.

On the order for the second reading of Bill (No. 12) to amend the Act for the prevention of fraud in relation to contracts involving the expenditure of public moneys, being read,

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) said: That Bill stands in my name. I approve of the principle of the Bill, but it is not my Bill. It should be changed.

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes; it is Mr. Casgrain's Bill.

Mr. CAMERON. I moved the first reading in Mr. Casgrain's absence.

Mr. SPEAKER. As the hon. gentleman moved the introduction of the Bill, it must stand in his name.

Mr. CAMERON. I stated to the House that I was only doing it in the absence of Mr. Casgrain.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman moved the introduction of the Bill. Mr. Casgrain has not been in his place since then, and it could not be put in the name of an absent member.

Mr. CAMERON. Cannot it be put in the name of Mr. Casgrain now?

Mr. SPEAKER. He is not here.

Mr. CAMERON. Let it stand.

INTERNATIONAL FISHERIES EXHIBITION.

Mr. FORTIN, in moving for copies of the reports on the London International Fisheries Exhibition by the Commissioners of Canada who attended the said exhibition; with a list of the exhibits from Canada and the prizes obtained at said exhibition, and for all papers or correspondence relating to the said exhibition, said: Mr. Speaker, before the motion is put, I should like to address some remarks to this House. The London International Fisheries Exhibition may be said to have been worthy of the great nation which organized it, worthy of the nations which sent exhibits to it, and worthy of the object for which it was got up, which was to put in a central place, where they could be seen and studied by persons who are in the fishing business, and by commissioners and representatives of different Governments, articles of all kinds relating to the fisheries, relating to the preparation of fish, and all that with a view to advance the fishing interest, or, in other words, to render fishing prosperous and abundant, and to improve the preparation of fish. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the fishing industry cannot be overrated, and, in a country like Canada, where the agricultural element predominates, and will always predominate, I think it is not useless to make known the opinions of great thinkers and writers on the subject; and the following words of one of the greatest men of the age, Mr. Lacépède, I hope will not be found out of place here:

"The prosecution of fishing," said Lacépède, "preceded the culture of the fields. It is contemporary with hunting, but there is this difference between hunting and fishing, that the latter is natural to a civilized people, and that, far from being opposed to the progress of agriculture and of commerce, it assisted in multiplying their happy results. If, during the infancy of society, the prosecution of fishing furnished to a half-civilized people a means of subsistence at once sufficient and nourishing, if it accustomed them not to dread the dangers of the sea, if it made them sailors, it gives to a cultivated nation abundant homes for the poor, various tributes for the luxurious livers, preparations for the necessities of distant commerce, rich manures for less fertile lands; it leads men to cross the seas, to brave the ices of the Poles, and bear the fires of the Equator, to battle with tempests, it launches on the seas forests of masts, experienced mariners, foreign trading, and intrepid genius."

I will also read a citation from P. L. Simmond, of London, also a great writer. He says:

"It is not our purpose to speak of the inhabitants of the ocean generally, but only to restrict ourselves to the investigation of those which are of some use to man. Pliny enumerated ninety-four species of fish. Linnaeus increased the number to 478; but recent naturalists have described over 13,000 species, one-tenth of which confine themselves to the fresh waters. The human race derives almost incalculable benefits from them as is evidenced by the extent and value of the river, coast, and sea fisheries of the world."

And, Sir, may we not hope that at present, in this House and in the country, there is a proper appreciation of the value of the fisheries of Canada and of the trade to which they give rise? According to all accounts this London International Fisheries Exhibition was a great success, and we Canadians should be proud to know that Canada figured there with such preeminent honour. Thanks to our Government, thanks to the hon. Minister of Marine, and to the Commissioners who were sent there, the exhibits from Canada were numerous and very interesting, and enabled us to show the variety and quality of the fish we possess. We showed how the fisheries are carried on in this country, and we showed how we prepare fish for home consumption and for exportation. We also showed the world the extent of our trade, and our processes of preparing fish, and we know that many visitors at that exhibition made enquiries as to our method of preparing fish, and especially in reference to our pickled fish. But I wish to say that one of the principal objects of this fishery exhibition is to enable persons engaged in the fishing business to study it in all its details, to observe the exhibits of other countries, and to discover what individuals and what nations practise the best mode of fishing and the best mode of preparing fish, so that our merchants and our fishermen might adopt all the improvements that have been made, in so far as the circumstances of the country would allow. But in order that we might benefit by this great show, our Government should place within reach of our fishermen, and fish merchants, and of the public in general, all the information that could be gathered at that show by the hon. Minister himself, and by the Commissioners who were sent there, and that is the reason why I make this motion. To oversee the Canadian exhibit the Government appointed three Commissioners—one, Mr. Honeyman, a well known scientific man, who was to conduct the scientific part of our exhibition; Mr. Wilmot, who was entrusted with the part relating to pisciculture, and to river and lake fisheries; and Mr. Joncas, who was commissioned to look after the maritime fisheries, their organization, and the trade to which they might give rise, &c. I must not omit one fact, which is very creditable to the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. While at London he contributed to the organization of conferences, which were given in the hall of the great exhibition, on subjects relating to fisheries and the fish trade of the world. On the 2nd of July he presided at one of those confederate conferences, and I will read the following extract of a report thereof published in the London Canadian Gazette of the 5th July:—

"At a conference held on Monday, the 2nd July, at the Fisheries Exhibition, under the presidency of the Hon. A. W. McLelan, Minister of Marine and Fisheries of Canada, a remarkably comprehensive and interesting paper upon the various fisheries of British North America was then read by Mr. L. Z. Joncas, one of the Canadian Commissioners at the exhibition.

"The subject is a large one, but Mr. Joncas' practical knowledge of it enabled him to do justice to all of its branches, and he concentrated in his paper much information of great value upon all sections of the trade."

I hold in my hand a copy of this conference, which is well worth reading by all Canadians. I do not think I should do justice to the hon. Minister if I did not read to the House some of his remarks at that conference. He said:

"In commencing the proceedings, the chairman said Canada was comparatively a young country, and might not be supposed to be as much interested in fisheries as some of the older countries; and some persons who had heard of Canada, and the extent of the country, and the diversity of employments, would wonder why, with so sparse a population, there were any fisheries or fishermen to speak of, when fishing, as had been already shown, was so much more dangerous and involved so much greater risk to human life than any other occupation. It was true that they have a large extent of country, and there was employment for all those who were there, and for all the millions who might come upon the land, but it was also true that, although they had mining industries, and although in the North there were vast forests from which lumber was sent to various parts of the world. Although it was true that only a small portion of the soil was cultivated, yet it yielded abundance of the choicest food in its harvests, and flocks and herds for all the people of Canada, and a large surplus to export; and the men who lived by the sea side, and on the banks of the rivers, and by the lakes, found so great a temptation to engage in fishing that they could not withstand it. He believed they had as large a proportion of their people engaged in that occupation as any other country in the world. In the British Isles where population was teeming, and every pursuit was crowded by people desiring to work that they might have bread, a large number were engaged in fisheries, but yet in Canada with their sparse population there were four times the percentage engaged in fisheries as were found here in the British Isles."

Those are the patriotic words of our hon. Minister at that great exhibition, where Canada figured with such high honour. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, I ought to say also that this great London Fishery Exhibition was not the first exhibition of the kind. There was one held at Havre in 1868, which lasted six months, and which was patronized by the French Government. All civilized nations sent exhibits to this great exhibition with the exception, I am sorry to say, of Canada, which took no interest in it. The only Canadian who sent exhibits there was the hon. member for Montmorency, hon. Mr. Valin, who, of course, sent models of vessels, as that hon. gentleman is a shipbuilder and shipowner. Well, I attended that exhibition myself, where I learned a great deal; and I must say that it was there I learned for the first time of the extent and importance of the Norwegian fisheries, and of the extent and importance of the competition they were making to us in foreign markets where we send our fish; a competition that has increased even to this day, and that is threatening our foreign trade. I hope that the hon. Minister and the Commissioners who have reported will treat that question and other similar questions, especially the trade question, so that our merchants may be able to export to foreign countries and carry on a trade which will be profitable to them and profitable also to the fishermen. I think I have touched on every topic relating to that great exhibition, and in conclusion, I hope the Government will give to the House and the public copies of the report.

Mr. KAULBACH. For the information of this House, the country and myself—I representing the largest fishing constituency in the Dominion—I am desirous of seeing all papers in connection with the great International Fisheries Exhibition, held in London in July last, laid on the Table of this House, as I believe an invaluable amount of very serviceable information can be obtained from them. Little comparatively has been known to the world, up to the time of holding this exhibition, of the value and extent of the fisheries of Canada, and of the class of men who prosecute this industry. Happily can I state that in no part of the world is there to be found a class of men more zealous, persevering and courageous, than the fishermen of Canada. Men of undaunted courage, ready to buffet storms, suffer privations and face all difficulties. And whilst referring with pleasure to the fishermen of Canada, I can with equal delight and pride refer to our fishing fleet—a class of vessels unrivalled in style of architecture and beauty, presenting in fact at a distance the appearance of American pleasure yachts rather than vessels for profitable service, ranging in size from 60 to 120 tons, with all comforts on board pertaining to health that are required. One grand feature that I must not omit to mention is that the fishermen not only sail these vessels during the fishing season, but they assist during the winter months in the construction of them, thus enabling them to have an idea of, and a supervision over, the entire work, and a confidence that they need fear no difficulties as to their safety in the event of a storm. Our fleet in the Port of Lunenburg has grown so enormous within the last few years, that I was compelled last autumn, through the want of harbour accommodation, to ask for the use of a dredge to deepen its waters, which is now doing the work, and I hope it may remain till it is completed. The encouragement given by the Government to the ship building industry, and more particularly to this class of shipping, is invaluable not only to ship-builders, but to lumbermen, farmers, fishermen, traders and mechanics; and I hope the hon. Minister of Public Works will see the necessity of allowing the dredge to remain for the purpose mentioned, otherwise we will have to lessen or stop altogether the building of this class of vessels for the want of harbour room. The Canadians have made rapid strides during the past few years in building up our commercial greatness, we ranking at present fourth amongst the maritime nations of the world; and to whom is due in a great measure the praise? To our Canadian fishermen. Review the history of England and enquire the cause of her greatness, and we will find that the source of her unrivalled success is her commerce, and the basis of this success, the fisheries. Then, England owes her present naval greatness to her hardy fishermen employed in her fisheries. We have in this country 60,000 hardy men (one half of whom are Nova Scotians) who devote their time and their labour to the development of our fisheries, and as a result of their labours, spend millions of dollars of their hard earnings annually in our midst—a medium of ready cash—building up our merchant marine, and advancing our trade. Then we may reasonably look to the fisheries as the cradle for our future commercial strength. While speaking on the fishing and shipping industries, I would refer to a matter which would tend very much to the interests of the fishermen, and that is the opening up of a reciprocal trade between this country and the Brazils and West Indies—a matter which has been long talked of, and which, if carried out, would give a larger price to the fishermen for their fish, and a reduction in the price of sugar, molasses, &c. I have made some remarks on the same subject on a previous occasion, and I hope and trust that the Government will take such measures as will bring about its accomplishment. Canada took a deep interest in this exhibition and feels satisfied that owing to the active efforts put forth by this Government in sending the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. McLelan) to advance our ends, and whose services were invaluable, she is better known this day to the world than she ever was before, and the people will be glad to obtain an amount of knowledge in fishing matters from the exhibition papers to be brought down, which will probably be of great value to the fishermen of this country in developing this great industry.

Mr. McLELAN. The papers called for by the motion of the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Fortin) will be brought down at as early a date as possible. I may state that owing to the ill health of the chairman of the Commission he has been unable to complete his portion of the report, and some time may elapse before it will be handed in. It is very gratifying indeed to me to know that the exhibition which Canada made has been satisfactory to her people, and especially to those who had opportunities of seeing the specimens that were prepared and sent to the exhibition. We had very grave doubts, on undertaking the work, as to whether it would prove successful. The mover of the resolution has referred to other exhibitions, but in those Canada did not take part; and we felt we were at a disadvantage with the United States, England, and many other countries as they had large quantities of exhibits on hand from old exhibitions which needed only to be added to in order to make large and beautiful collections, while our time would be occupied in getting up an entirely new collection. Our efforts were mainly directed to making an exhibition of the food fishes of the Dominion, of which we have a great abundance and variety. I am happy to say that we presented a collection of food fishes which has not been excelled in the world, and obtained for that collection the highest prize given, and it was stated that if any higher prize could be given we were entitled to receive it for that collection. We were enabled to make this display by the labours of the various officers of the Department in different portions of the Dominion, and we had also the aid of the hon. gentleman who moved this resolution (Mr. Fortin) in collecting some of the commercial fishes of the gulf, and the fishes thus collected under his guidance obtained the gold medal and first prize. I was sorry that we could not have had the hon. gentleman's services to a further extent, as one of the honorary Commissioners, as I know that his attention has been much given to matters of that kind. I think he would have found that we had not a very great deal to learn at that gathering, for in my opinion and in the opinion of others who were connected with the exhibition, we are fully up to the rest of the world and up to the time. The papers will be brought down at as early a day as possible, though perhaps not so soon as the hon. gentleman might desire on account of the illness of the chairman.

Motion agreed to.

EXTRA CLERKS IN THE DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS.

Mr. LISTER moved for a statement giving the names of all persons in the Public Works Department, as extra or copying clerks, whose salaries are or have been charged to particular works, since 1881.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There is no objection to this motion. The return to this Address will be brought down at the same time as a return which is being prepared in reply to an Address moved for by the leader of the Opposition, and another moved immediately after. The answers to the three are all on the same subject and will be given at the same time.

Motion agreed to.

THE PROPOSED FACTORY BILL.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of all representations by and correspondence with the Manufacturers' Association, or the Trades and Labour Council, or any one on their behalf, or any other individuals or organizations on the subject of the provisions of the proposed Factory Bill, said: I observe from the reports of a late meeting of the Manufacturers' Association that there had been some correspondence with the hon. gentleman on the subject of the Factory Bill before or during the last Session of Parliament. I also observe from the reports of the Trades and Labour Council that there had been a communication by that body on the same subject. For these reasons I make the motion.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I think there was a communication from the first named association during last Session, either in writing or by a representative from the Association—I am not quite sure which, but I think in the latter way, but if so we have a memorandum or statement of the subject. About ten days or a fortnight since the members of the Trades and Labour Council asked me for copies of the Bill, but I have had no communication from them since. If I should receive any within the next few days I will bring it down with the representations from the Manufacturers' Association.

Mr. BLAKE. I know there was a communication either oral or written from the other organization last Session, because one of the gentlemen was good enough to call on me at the same time.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I recollect their calling at my house—I was ill at the time—and I think they had verbal communication with me but none in writing.

Motion agreed to.

DUTY ON FREIGHT CHARGES.

Mr. BLAKE moved for copies of all Orders in Council, departmental regulations, circulars and correspondence with reference to the question of duty on freight charges.

Mr. BOWELL. Would the hon. gentleman state for what period he would like this correspondence, because I can assure him there is a very large quantity of it.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman will understand that I do not ask for correspondence with reference to isolated or individual cases of duty on freight charges. The hon. gentleman knows, however, that a difficulty has been raised—a circular has been issued from the Department on the general question. There were representations made, I think, by the Toronto Board of Trade, or by some one on their behalf, with reference to circulars which have been issued from the Department, or instructions understood to be conveyed different from those which the collectors at the different ports were subsequently told to act upon. The hon. gentleman, I think, had the pleasure of passing an afternoon with the Board of Trade of Toronto, and this was amongst the subjects discussed.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman's motion is certainly much wider than his interpretation of it. I am very much afraid that had I brought down simply the circular issued by the Government, without accompanying it with the correspondence, he would have called me to account. I have had correspondence during the last three years, with Manchester, Liverpool, Montreal, and every port in the Dominion with reference to this matter. If the hon. gentleman will define what he wants, I shall be glad to lay it before him.

Mr. BLAKE. I endeavoured to explain that I was not anxious that the hon. Minister should bring down letters or complaints of particular grievances relating to duty on freight charges, but such correspondence as would elucidate the general principle on which the Department was acting. I presume that some of the correspondence the hon. gentleman has referred to might be important as elucidating that. But it is not a question as to the quantity in any particular case or package of goods, but rather as to the principle pursued in reference to those clauses in the laws which deal with the subject of freight charges.

Mr. BOWELL. I will endeavour to bring down such information as is indicated by the hon. leader of the Opposition; but almost all the correspondence, whether from individual importers, or importers collectively, or Boards of Trade, has treated on this question. I will include the memorial presented to the Government from the Board of Trade, if the hon. gentleman desires; but that has more particular reference, I can assure him, to modifications in the Tariff and to changes in some clauses of the Customs Act, than to this particular question. I will, however, bring down the circulars, together with the reasons why they were issued.

Motion agreed to.

EXPENDITURE FOR SESSIONAL RETURNS.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for a statement of the sum expended in each year, since the change of the system, by each Department, out of the lump vote for sessional returns, such statement to be under the same sub-headings under which previous to the change such cost was included, said: It would be convenient, I think the House will agree, for the purpose of comparison with former years, that the charges for preparation of sessional returns should not appear in such a form as to make the comparison inaccurate. For a great many years—I think until two years ago—the mode was to charge each Department with the cost of preparing sessional returns therein; but after that it was charged in a lump sum. The object of this motion is to obtain a statement, under sub-headings, of the expenditure in each Department.

Motion agreed to.

COST OF HEATING PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for a statement for each year, since the change in the system, of the cost connected with the heating of public buildings (including wages as well as fuel) now paid under a lump vote, such statement to show the cost under the same sub-headings as those in which it was formerly included in the Public Accounts before the change of the system, said: This motion is for the same purpose, and I think there is reason to justify it.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The change in the system was only, I think, for the present year, and that is most likely the reason why the statement which the hon. gentleman wishes has not been laid before the House; but certainly the intention is that such a statement should appear every year in the Report of the Minister of Public Works. Still, the motion may pass, and any information I can give up to this period will be brought down.

Mr. BLAKE. I think the change in the system has been gradual. I think the hon. gentleman the Session before last had charge of the fuel, and last Session he took charge of the engineers. He is progressive, but he progresses by degrees, according to my memory.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Well, it is a good thing to progress, even by degrees. But I think my hon. friend is mistaken. The engineers were, to a great extent, in my Department, and were appointed by my recommendation; but with reference to the fuel, the change only took place since last Session.

Motion agreed to.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

Motions for the following Returns were severally agreed to:—

Return giving the name of the person or persons who offered to sell lands at Amherstburg to the Government for Custom House and Post Office Buildings, the quantity of land offered and price asked by each. The name or names of the person or persons from whom the Government bought, the quantity of land bought and price paid.—(Mr. Lister.)

Copies of all correspondence between the Superintendent of Indian Affairs in British Columbia, or any other person, and the Dominion Government, respecting the recent troubles with the Indians at Metlakatla.—(Mr. Shakespeare.)

Copies of all correspondence and agreements between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, on the subject of immigration to Manitoba and the North-West, together with a statement showing the amount expended by the company in promoting such immigration, giving amounts paid, with dates, to whom paid, and nature of service rendered; also, estimate of the company of number of persons from foreign countries who have actually settled there in each year since date of charter.—(Mr. Paterson, Brant.)

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

MONTREAL CARNIVAL.

Mr. GAULT. Is it the intention to adjourn for two or three days during next week to enable us to attend the carnival in Montreal? I know many hon. members whose intention it is to be present at the carnival, and as in England the custom is to adjourn for the Derby, I do not see why the House should not adjourn for the carnival.

Motion agreed to; and (at 4:25 o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 1st February, 1884.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. All around the hat.

Bill read the first time.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved that the House do resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next, to take into consideration that portion of the Speech from the Throne at the opening of the present Session, in which His Excellency informs us that His Government has thought it of the greatest importance, for the settlement of the North-West and the development of our trade, that the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway from sea to sea should be hastened, and the Company enabled to open the line throughout by the spring of 1886; that with this view, and in order to aid the Company in procuring sufficient capital for the purpose by the disposal of its unsold shares, the Government agreed to receive a deposit of money and securities sufficient to pay a minimum 3 per cent. dividend for ten years on sixty-five millions of the stock, that arrangement being made in the belief that it would give steadiness and increased value to the shares on the market; that a combination of unfavourable circumstances has prevented the fulfilment of these expectations, and the Company has not been able to obtain the required capital by a sale of its stock; and that the best means of preventing any delay in the great object of the early completion of the railway demands our earnest consideration: And to consider the following Resolutions:—

1. That the Government may return to the Company the securities now held under the third section of the Act 44 Victoria, Chapter 1, intitled: "An Act respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway," and under the second section of the construction contract referred to in the said Act.

2. That the money subsidy hereafter payable to the Company, may be paid as the work on either the Central or Eastern Section of the railway proceeds, in the proportion which the value of the work done on such section, and for which payment is demanded, bears to the value of the whole work now remaining to be done, under the contract, on such section.

3. That the time for the payment by the Company of the sum of two million eight hundred and fifty-three thousand nine hundred and twelve dollars ($2,853,912) agreed by the said Company to be paid on or before the 1st day of February, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-four (1884) as part of the fund referred to in their agreement with the Government of the 7th day of November last, shall be extended to the 7th day of November, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-eight (1888), when the sum of four million five hundred and twenty-seven thousand dollars ($4,527,000) being the last instalment of the said fund payable by the Company to the Government will fall due, the whole with interest payable half yearly at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum as agreed upon at the time of the execution of the said agreement, and that the same shall then be paid to the Government, together with the said last mentioned amount; forming together the sum of seven million three hundred and eighty thousand nine hundred and twelve dollars ($7,380,912), bearing interest at the said last mentioned rate until paid.

4. That the Government may, out of any unappropriated moneys forming part of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada, make a loan to the said Company of an amount in money, not exceeding twenty-two million five hundred thousand dollars ($22,500,000) to be repaid to the Government on or before the 1st day of May, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-one (1891), with interest at the rate of 5 per centum per annum, payable half yearly, until full payment of the principal; and that as part of the said loan the Government may pay to the Company forthwith, such amount not exceeding seven million five hundred thousand dollars ($7,500,000), as shall be required by the Company to extinguish its present floating debt, the amount of such debt to be established to the satisfaction of the Government: and that the remainder of the said loan shall be paid to the Company as the work of construction proceeds, in the same proportion as that which is hereby provided for the payment of the balance of the money subsidy.

5. That as security for the repayment of the said loan, with interest as aforesaid, and as additional security for the payment of the said sum of seven million three hundred and eighty thousand nine hundred and twelve dollars ($7,380,912) and interest, falling due on the 7th day of November, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-eight (1888), the Government shall have a first lien and charge upon the entire property of the Company, real and personal, now owned or hereafter to be acquired or owned by them, including their main line of Railway, the extensions thereof, their branch lines of railway, the whole of their equipment, rolling stock and plant, and including all steamers and vessels; and also upon the land grant of the Company, earned and to be hereafter earned; saving always, however, the rights of the holders of the existing mortgages on the extensions of the line of the railway from Callander to Brockville and Montreal, as security for the unpaid balances of the purchase money of the lines constituting the said extensions; and subject to the mortgage upon the land grant, executed by the Company to secure their issue of land grant bonds. That the Government shall continue to hold and retain the entire amount of land grant bonds now in its custody or possession, subject to redemption under the terms of the said land grant mortgage, and with all remedies as to interest, voting power and all other matters in respect thereof, which would be held or possessed, or could be exercised by any purchaser of the said bonds: That all moneys received by the Government from the Trustees of the land grant bonds in redemption of such bonds shall be applied as follows, that is to say: All moneys so received in respect of ten million dollars of the said bonds shall be applied: Firstly, in extinction of the interest accrued and due upon the said loan, and upon the said sum of seven million three hundred and eighty thousand nine hundred and twelve dollars ($7,380,912); Secondly, on account of the capital of the said sum of seven million three hundred and eighty thousand nine hundred and twelve dollars ($7,380,912), and Thirdly, on account of the capital of the said loan:—And that the Government may make such arrangements as it shall deem expedient, for securing the payment to it, after the redemption of the land grant bonds, of the proceeds of all sales of lands granted or to be granted to the Company under the contract, to be applied to the purposes and in the order aforesaid. And that the remaining five million dollars of land grant bonds and money received from the said Trustees in redemption thereof, shall continue to be held on the conditions and for the purposes mentioned in the said contract.

6. That the Government shall cause a deed of agreement to be executed by the Company, and on behalf of the Government, providing for such remedies, terms and conditions for securing the application of the said loan to the purposes for which the same is hereby authorized, and the repayment of the said loan, and of the said sum of seven million three hundred and eighty thousand nine hundred and twelve dollars ($7,380,912) the whole with interest (including interest on any interest in default); for the release of the said lien and charge upon such repayment; for continuing the sale and realization of the value of the said lands, after the redemption of the land grant bonds,—the payment to the Government of the proceeds of such sales, and the discharge of such lands from the said charge upon payment of the price of sale thereof; as the Government shall deem expedient, such price not to be less than $1.25 per acre:—

Provided always that, among such remedies, terms and conditions, it shall be agreed and provided that upon default for twelve months in the payment of any half yearly instalment of interest upon the said loan, or upon the said sum of $7,380,912, or either of them, or in the payment of the principal of either of the said sums, when the same shall become due, in accordance with the provisions hereof, the right of the Company under their contract hereinbefore mentioned, to demand or receive any further cash or land subsidy shall cease and determine, and the said railway and extensions thereof, branches, equipment, rolling stock, plant, including steamers, and all lands and property of the Company, and all land grant bonds then in the possession of the Government, shall upon the occurrence and continuance for the said period of twelve months of such default, ipso facto, and without any notice or proceeding whatsoever, vest in Her Majesty, and shall forthwith, thereupon, be taken possession of by the Minister of Railways and Canals, on behalf of the Government of Canada, and each and every employee of the Company shall, from and after the expiry of the said period of twelve months, become and be the employee of the Government during pleasure, and shall hold and possess any matter or thing appertaining to the said Company then in his custody, as and for the Government; and the rates of interest, and the terms of payment hereby fixed, shall not be disturbed or altered by the terms of such agreement.

7. That the said Company be authorized to execute an agreement of the nature and purport hereinbefore provided for, and to charge its entire property and assets, in manner and form as hereinbefore described; and in such agreement to agree upon such further and other conditions as the Government may prescribe; provided that authority to accept the provisions of the Act to be passed in this behalf, and to the Board of Directors of the Company to execute an agreement containing the charges upon the said railway and property and the other conditions required or authorized by such Act, shall be granted by the shareholders of the Company, either by a resolution passed at a special general meeting of such shareholders, called for the purpose, by a vote of at least two-thirds in value of such of the shareholders as shall be present or represented at such meeting, or by an instrument or instruments executed by at least two-thirds in value of the whole of the shareholders of the Company, in person or represented by their attorneys or proxies respectively duly authorized in that behalf.

8. That until the payment in full of the indebtedness of the Company to the Government with interest, all moneys earned and to be earned by the Company as postal subsidy and for transport service shall be retained by the Government and shall be applied on account of the interest to become due from time to time upon the loan hereby authorized, and then to the payment of the principal.

9. That the stock of the Company, amounting to thirty-five million dollars ($35,000,000), now in the hands of the Government, shall be held by the Minister of Finance, and may be sold by the Company, with the consent of the Government, on condition that the proceeds of such sale, less the amount required to be paid to the Government to secure a half-yearly dividend thereon, at the rate of 3 per centum per annum, up to the seventeenth (17th) day of August, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-three (1893) inclusive, shall be applied, under the direction of the Government, either to the improvement or extension of the railway, or its equipment, or to the repayment of the indebtedness of the Company to the Government; and that if at any time the stock of the Company should reach a price which, in the opinion of the Government, would render it expedient to sell the said stock, or any part thereof, then and thereupon, on notice being given to the Company by the Government, requiring that the said stock, or any part thereof, be sold, and specifying the minimum price at which the same shall be sold, the Company shall cause the same to be offered for sale, and sold in conformity with such notice; and in default of their doing so, within a reasonable delay (which delay shall be in the discretion of the Government) the Government shall have the right to sell the same or any part thereof at or above such minimum price, and shall apply the proceeds thereof as it is herein provided such proceeds shall be applied in the event of the sale of such stock by the Company.

10. That so long as the said several sums of money loaned as aforesaid or any part thereof, or the interest thereon remain unpaid, no mortgage, lien, or charge of any description shall be created upon the railway, property or assets of the Company, or any part thereof; nor shall any stock be issued by the Company, pending such repayment, above or beyond the amount one hundred million dollars ($100,000,000) to which the same is now limited.

11. That legislative provision be made for giving effect to the said Resolutions, and that the mover thereof have leave to bring in a Bill for that purpose.

Motion agreed to.

MANITOBA PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that the report of the Committee of the Whole on resolution with respect to advance to the Province of Manitoba in aid of the public schools therein, be received.

Motion agreed to; Resolution reported, and concurred in.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY introduced Bill (No. 36) to authorize a further advance to the Province of Manitoba in aid of the public schools therein.

SALARY OF CARIBOO COUNTY COURT JUDGE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider a certain proposed resolution (page 69) respecting the salary and travelling allowances of the Judge of the County Court of Cariboo, in the Province of British Columbia.

Motion agreed to; resolution considered in Committee, reported, and concurred in.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD introduced Bill (No. 37) to provide for the salary and travelling allowances of the Judge of the County Court of Cariboo, in the Province of British Columbia.

Bill read the first time.

PETROLEUM IN MASKINONGE AND ST. MAURICE.

Mr. LANDRY (Montmagny) enquired, Whether the Government has given orders to the Geological Survey to make borings in the various localities of the Counties of Maskinongé and St. Maurice where considerable disengagements of natural gas have been detected? If it has done so, have its labours resulted in the discovery of petroleum? If nothing has been done, is it the intention of the Government to charge the Geological Survey with the making of borings during the present year?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Last summer, at a depth of some 48 feet, a ridge of limestone was struck, from the fissures of which, as in some other localities, an inflammable gas, carburetted hydrogen, issued. This is a local rather than a strictly public matter, but the subject is referred to in the Geological Branch of the report of the Department of the Interior.

ESQUIMALT AND NANAIMO RAILWAY.

Mr. GORDON enquired, Whether advertisements were published either in the Dominion or Great Britain, inviting tenders for the construction of the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway; if so, whether the attention of capitalists was called, either to the quantity of land to be given in aid of said railway, or to the reports of the late Mr. Richardson, of the Dominion Geological Survey, as to the value of said lands, especially as to the reported value of the productive coal measures of that portion of the railway reservation extending from Nanaimo to Seymour Narrows, and why the system of alternate sections in aid of railways has been departed from in the contract entered into by the Government with Messrs. Dunsmuir, Huntingdon, and others?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No advertisement has been published by the Government or any Department thereof, inviting tenders for the construction of the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway. We are not aware whether any advertisements were published by the British Columbia Government, under the authority of the Legislature, or otherwise, for this purpose; nor whether they have called the attention of capitalists to the quantity of land to be given in aid of said railway.

NON-ENFORCEMENT OF PROVISIONS OF THE INLAND REVENUE ACT.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, Whether any, and if so, which of the provisions of the Inland Revenue Act of 1883 have been directed to be left in abeyance, or not to be enforced? And if so, under what authority of law has this step been taken?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I am not aware that any of the provisions of the Inland Revenue Act of 1883 have been directed to be left in abeyance.

CERTIFICATES TO OFFICERS OF COASTING AND INLAND VESSELS.

Mr. BLAKE enquired under what authority of law were Collectors of Customs recently instructed not to enforce the provisions of the 7th and 8th sections of 46 Victoria, Chapter 28, respecting certificates to masters and mates of coasting and inland vessels?

Mr. McLELAN. The regulations required to be provided under the Act were adopted by Order in Council in July last, and were placed in the Customs houses, and the necessary officers for examinations were also appointed. In the Maritime Provinces it was found, towards the close of the season, that very few had applied for examination, and that very few certificates had been issued. It was represented by memorials from St. John particularly, and Halifax, that there was a liability of blocking the whole coasting trade unless some little extension were given; and, under the necessities of the case, I directed that an extension of three months should be given. In the meantime certificates have begun to come in for signature, and a large number have been signed and furnished to the parties who have gone for examination, so that very few will require to go without a certificate. We have no authority for acting as we did, but the law of necessity.

TRANSLATION OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. LESAGE enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make provision, as respects the translation of the Debates, that the translation may be as little delayed as possible, and may be completed within one week after the Prorogation?

Mr. BOWELL. This question is one which belongs altogether to the Committee appointed by the House to supervise the publication of The Debates. The attention of the Chairman has been called to this matter, and he has assured me that he will take every means possible to ensure the translation of The Debates into French at the earliest possible moment after the House rises.

SAMUEL E. ST. ONGE CHAPLEAU.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) enquired, Is Samuel E. St. Onge Chapleau, who has recently been appointed by the Government a Sheriff in the North-West Territories, the same person who was formerly an employé in the Department of Railways and Canals? If so, was he relieved of his duties as such employé, or was it intimated to him that he should resign? What salary or allowance does he now receive as such Sheriff?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This gentleman, who has recently been appointed a Sheriff in the North-West Territories, is the same person who was formerly an employé in the Department of Railways and Canals. He voluntarily resigned his office in the Department on his own mere motion. The salary and allowances he now receives are those provided by the Statute for Sheriffs in the North-West Territories.

KINGSVILLE HARBOUR WORKS.

Mr. LISTER enquired, Has the contract for the Kingsville harbour works been let? If so, who are the contractors? What is the contract price? Have the contractors given security for the due performance of the work? If so, who are the sureties, where do they live, and what is the amount of their liability?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The contract has been let; the contractor is Mr. Geo. J. Wilson; the contract price is $33,500. There are no sureties except the ordinary deposit, which is 5 per cent. of the contract price.

COLCHESTER REEF LIGHTHOUSE.

Mr. LISTER enquired, Has the contract for the Colchester Reef Lighthouse been let? If so, were tenders invited for the work? Who tendered? What was the amount of each tender? Whose tender was accepted? What is the contract price? When is the work to be completed? Has security been given for the due performance of the work? If so, who is the surety, and what is the amount of the liability?

Mr. McLELAN. Tenders for this work were publicly invited and received up to the 11th March, 1882. There were in all seventeen tenders, ranging from $15,500 up to $37,555. The lowest tender, that of James Moore, was accepted, and the contract awarded to him at $15,500. Mr. Moore was notified to accept, but declined, and the contract was then awarded to Mr. Frederick Thomas, Civil Engineer, of Ottawa, who had tendered for the work at the same amount as Mr. Moore. He accepted, and entered into bonds with the Department for the due fulfilment of the work. The sureties were Charles Magee and Edward Perkins, both of Ottawa, who are bound with Mr. Thomas for the sum of $31,000. The contract was afterwards assigned by Mr. Thomas to Mr. George Wilson, of Ottawa, who proceeded with the work, which, by the terms of the contract, was to be completed by the 15th of November, 1882; but owing to difficulties, caused by a storm, it is not yet completed.

THE CITY OF QUEBEC AND THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. LANDRY (Montmagny) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to give this year to the City of Quebec, the Capital of the Province of that name, the advantage of having an office of the Intercolonial Railway?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have already been in communication with the hon. members for Quebec Centre and Quebec West on this subject, and the matter is engaging the attention of the department.

Mr. LANDRY (Montmagny) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to take any steps, either by the construction of a bridge at Quebec, or by building ferry boats, to connect the Intercolonial Railway with the general railway system of the West, via Quebec?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That subject is receiving the consideration of the Government.

PORPOISE FISHING.

Mr. BLONDEAU (Translation) moved for copies of the reports, correspondence or papers respecting the porpoise fishery at Rivière Ouelle, county of Kamouraska.

Mr. CASGRAIN. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I will take the liberty to ask my hon. friend why he makes this motion. I have already heard of this affair, and I believe I might help him in his demand. If he would explain, in a few words, the object of his motion, I believe I would concur in the object he aims at. Therefore, I beg of him to give some explanations to the House on this subject.

Mr. BLONDEAU. (Translation.) In answer to the hon. member for l'Islet (Mr. Casgrain), I must say that as soon as I will have seen the documents asked for by this motion, I shall give him the explanations he desires. Until then, I could not say anything, as I have no information.

Motion agreed to.

UNITED STATES DESERTERS.

Mr. GUILLET moved for copies of all papers, Orders in Council and correspondence relating to the arrest, in Canadian territory, by a detachment of United States soldiers, of Henry Watson, said to be formerly a resident of the Province of Nova Scotia, and Franklin Switzer, said to be formerly a resident of Kingston, Ontario, and a person surnamed Ellsworth, who were alleged to have deserted from the United States Army.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We shall have very great pleasure in bringing down the papers and correspondence as regards the case of Watson and Switzer. As regards the case of Ellsworth I know nothing about that. I am glad these papers have been moved for because they will show that these two men were taken on British territory as deserters, and that upon representation to the American Government they were most properly surrendered by the American Government to the British Ambassador.

Motion agreed to.

MISSION OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved for papers or correspondence relative to the mission of the Minister of Finance to England, in 1883, for the purpose of making arrangements for the issue of a new loan, together with his report thereon to Council, if any were made.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The Order in Council bearing on this subject will be brought down; but there was nothing in writing with reference to what has taken place on the other side of the Atlantic. It was arranged with our agents at that time to place on the market, in November or December, which was considered a favourable time, £2,000,000 sterling, a portion to be used in the redemption of the debt which falls due January 1st, 1885, and the balance as might be required, for the payment of subsidies to the Canadian Pacific Railway or on Public Works chargeable to revenue. A subsequent arrangement made with the Canadian Pacific Railway rendered this loan then unnecessary, and it was considered desirable to defer it for the present. In making my financial statement, I will enter fully into explanations with reference to this matter.

Motion agreed to.

POSTAGE REDUCTION.

Mr. CHARLTON, in moving for copies of all correspondence and papers relating to any proposed or suggested reduction in letter postage in the Dominion of Canada, said: In reference to this matter I may say that although a three cent postage rate is undoubtedly a moderate rate for a country situated as Canada is, yet the reduction of letter postage in the United States to two cents renders it desirable, if not expedient, that we should adopt the same rate in Canada. It will be interesting to compare the postal returns to the United States prior to the reduction of the postage rate with those after the reduction; and if the circumstances here be similar to those there, the loss to our revenue by such reduction would not be so great as one would be inclined to imagine. The law went into operation in the United States in October, 1883—or it was in operation one full quarter of that year. Comparing the last quarter of 1883, from October, with the last quarter of 1882, in the United States, I find that the revenue of the latter was $5,837,000 against $5,654,000 for the former, or a reduction in revenue, under the new law, of $183,000, almost 3¼ per cent.—this in the face of a reduction of 33⅓ reduction in the rate. If the same circumstances would hold good in Canada—namely a reduction of 3¼ per cent. in the revenue upon a reduction of 33⅓ per cent. in the rate—as in the United States, the loss to our revenue would be a matter of small consequence to the hon. Finance Minister. The expenses of the Postal Department for the fiscal year 1883, amounted to $2,176,000, and the receipts to $1,801,000, showing a deficiency of $375,000. If the reduction of a three cent to a two cent postage rate would bring about here, as in the United States, a reduction of only 3¼ per cent. in the gross receipts of the Department, the deficiency would be increased by the sum of $58,500; making a deficiency of $435,000 instead of $375,000. No boon the Government would give the people of Canada would be more widely appreciated and generally distributed than a reduction in the rate of postage; and I am firmly convinced such reduction would not bear heavily on the revenue—the loss to the revenue being nearly compensated for by the largely increased amount of correspondence. I lay these figures before the Government; and I believe that upon full consideration of the matter they will find it expedient that the rate should be made similar to that in the United States.

Motion agreed to.

INDIAN ISLANDS IN LAKE ONTARIO.

Mr. PLATT moved for a return showing name and location of such islands in Lake Ontario, and other inland waters, as are held by the Government of Canada as Indian lands, together with a statement showing the area and valuation of each island, name of present lessee, amount of annual rental paid, and date of expiration of lease in every case.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would say to the hon. mover of this resolution that a return of this general kind will involve a great deal of labour and expense; that is, if we are to give all the islands included in the Thousand Islands, and the name and valuation of each. I do not suppose the hon. gentleman would desire this. If he has any specific desire in making this motion, if he desires that it should embrace any particular islands in any particular sections, I would prefer it, for the reason that this would be a laborious compilation, and a somewhat expensive one.

Mr. PLATT. I would be satisfied to add "such islands as are occupied by tenants or lessees," or, if the hon. gentleman prefers, I would be satisfied with such as are in Lake Ontario.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Very well.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And the River St. Lawrence, perhaps.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, there are a good many islands in the St. Lawrence.

Mr. BLAKE. Not many leased, are there?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. A good many. However, I have no objection, if it is pressed.

Mr. BLAKE. I think that is really a matter of public interest, the St. Lawrence islands.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would be glad to know from the hon. gentleman what he proposes, as head of the Indian Department, to do with the Thousand Islands that belong to the Indians. If I am rightly informed, the Indians preferred claims more or less valid to all the Thousand Islands that belong to Canada, and two or three years ago the Indian Department undertook to lease these islands. I do not mean to say that the hon. gentleman was responsible for it; but in one case, to my own knowledge, advertisements were made, then withdrawn, then very suddenly renewed again, and then some of these islands were disposed of, which was not a desirable thing, because I know of several persons who had been disposed to bid for them, and who, when the advertisement was withdrawn, naturally lost sight of them, and the public, or the Indians, were to a certain extent deprived of good customers. If the hon. gentleman could state briefly what his policy is, or what the policy of the Department is, in respect to these Thousand Islands, it would be satisfactory to those members at any rate who reside in the neighbourhood. I do not object myself to the policy of the Department, because I have seen, with great regret, that many of the most beautiful of those islands have been stripped, utterly stripped, of the timber which grew upon them, and afterwards fires lit upon them which converted them into heaps of charred rock, which for hundreds of years to come will not bear a shrub or a tree, I believe. Therefore, I approve of the principle on which the Government has acted, but I think the hon. Minister will agree with me, that, if these islands are to be leased, full notice should be given, for the sake of the Indians and for the sake of the public at large. There is quite a competition springing up for the possession of the best of these islands, and under proper restrictions it would be as well to get something for them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will be much obliged to the hon. gentleman if he will give me a memorandum on this subject. He says he is aware of advertisements being issued, and then recalled, and then re-issued.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think it was about three years ago, in the months of August and September.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will look that up.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will endeavour to get the detailed particulars.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The policy of the Government was, and is now, to offer annually a certain number of these islands for lease. As the hon. gentleman says, our islands are often stripped of their timber. People land—boatmen, and fishermen, and raftsmen—and there is no means of protecting these five or six hundred islands, little rockeries some of them, with one single tree perhaps, very picturesque, and adding a great deal, no doubt, to the beauty of the river. We had some local opposition, at Brockville and Gananoque and other places, to the disposal of these islands, but we have come to a pretty good understanding. For instance, the town of Brockville will have a certain number of these islands under lease for a sort of marine park attached to the town, and they will pay a rental to the Indians, and look after the adornment of the islands, perhaps erect picturesque buildings, cottages and chalets, as on the American side. The policy of the Government has been to offer a certain number of these islands for lease every year by auction. We tried it some three years ago for the first time, and, much to my surprise, because I had heard that there would be keen competition, there was scarcely any competition, and two or three islands were leased at a very small rate. I do not remember as to the results in detail, but I will look into it, and give a full answer to the hon. gentleman; and, if it is satisfactory to the House, the Government will continue the policy of leasing a certain number of these islands every year, so that those who desire to obtain a summer residence can bid for them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. With the permission of the House, I would like to make another suggestion to the hon. gentleman. As well as myself, he knows the character of these islands. There are some of them still, I think, in the hands of the Government, of pretty considerable extent. Now, it is the habit of almost all the people from Brockville, and lower down, and from Kingston, and considerably above it, to make frequent summer excursions to these islands. Camping parties are continually going out there, and it would, I think, be quite in accord with the policy usually followed to reserve a reasonable portion of the islands, under supervision of the Fishery Inspectors or other suitable parties, as a sort of public park, or public camping ground, if the hon. gentleman likes to call it so. That would be much appreciated by many persons who are in the habit of using these islands as a place of summer resort. It is not desirable that all these islands should be leased to private parties, who will naturally exclude all stray excursionists, or stray campers, of the kind I have mentioned. I do not know exactly how matters are on the American side, but I think the islands there have been mostly disposed of, and so no camping or excursion parties are permitted to land at all. I think it would be much to be regretted to put an end to them on this side. By exacting some trifling fee, the hon. gentleman might reimburse the public for the cost of one or two caretakers to look after them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. With respect to the larger islands, I think the remarks of the hon. gentleman are worthy of every consideration. There are many excursions there—some educational, some religious, some without either education or religion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Health excursions.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. And it would be well perhaps, in the larger islands at all events, to give them a camping ground. In regard to the smaller islands, that would not do at all. The spirit of proprietorship must be roused before you can get any price for them. A person who wishes to lease an island and make it a summer resort does not want persons to land and camp on it, and make fires there; as to the larger islands, I perfectly agree with the hon. gentleman.

Motion, amended by the addition of the words "such islands as are leased in Lake Ontario and the River St. Lawrence," agreed to.

PUBLIC HEALTH OFFICERS.

Mr. PLATT moved for a return showing the names of public health officers appointed in the various cities of Canada, the salary paid to each, copy of instruction issued to such officers by the Government, and all or any reports made by such officers to the Department.

Mr. POPE. There is no objection to the motion. I may say, however, that the health officers are named by the city corporations and appointed by us.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL FERTILIZERS.

Mr. MASSUE moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following Resolution:—

That it is expedient to pass an Act to prevent fraud in the Manufacture and Sale of Agricultural Fertilizers.

Motion agreed to; resolution considered in Committee, reported, and concurred in.

Mr. MASSUE introduced Bill (No. 33) to prevent fraud in the Manufacture and Sale of Agricultural Fertilizers.

SECOND READINGS.

The following Bills were severally read the second time:—

Bill (No. 10) further to amend the Act to incorporate the South Saskatchewan Valley Railway Company.—(Mr. Kilvert.)

Bill (No. 14) to amalgamate the Board of Trade of the city of Toronto, and the Corn Exchange Association.—(Mr. Beaty.)

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

Motions for the following Returns were severally agreed to:—

Copies of all Orders in Council, reports, correspondence and papers respecting the grant or payment of any subsidies to railways, not already brought down; and statements in detail of all such payments to h t d.—(Mr. Blake.)

Copies of all correspondence, despatches and Orders in Council in reference to subsidies or grants for the Province of Manitoba, the extension of its boundaries, the territory disputed between it and the Province of Ontario; its school lands; the public lands within the Province, and railway questions affecting the Province.—(Mr. Blake.)

Copies of the claims of Eustache Dorion, of the village of Lauzon, pilot, and Moise Leclerc, of the village of Lauzon, bailiff, presented to the Dominion Arbitrators, in December last, of all papers, documents and evidence forming part of the record in the cases, with a copy of the awards rendered by the said arbitrators.—(Mr. Belleau.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 4:40 o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

PORT OF LANDING FOR EUROPEAN IMMIGRANTS.

Mr. LANDRY, in the absence of Mr. BELLEAU, enquired, Whether the Government has made, or is on the point of making, any arrangements whatsoever for the transport to Montreal of European immigrants; and whether, in accordance with the said arrangements, the immigrants will be landed at Lévis or at Montreal?

Mr. POPE. In answer to the hon. gentleman, I would say that some of the steamships, usually the smaller class of steamships, have for some years brought immigrants to Montreal. The Government have not made any arrangement of that kind; but, as I have said, some of the steamships do it. I presume the great part of European immigrants who arrive in this country will be landed at Point Lévis as usual.

OVERSEER OF FISHERIES FOR DIGBY COUNTY.

Mr. VAIL enquired, Whether an additional overseer of fisheries has recently been appointed for the county of Digby? If so, what is the name of the person appointed? What is his salary? By whom was he recommended, and what are the bounds of his district?

Mr. McLELAN. An additional overseer of fisheries has been appointed for the county of Digby. His name is James A. Collins, of Westport, and his salary is $120 per annum. He was recommended by the Inspector of Fisheries for Nova Scotia, and the bounds of his district are the western division of Digby county, including Long and Brier Islands.

LETTER POSTAGE RATES.

Mr. THOMPSON enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to amend the Postal Law by providing that letters not exceeding one ounce may be carried at single postage rate?

Mr. CARLING. The matter is under consideration.

MAILS ON THE GRAND TRUNK, GEORGIAN BAY AND LAKE ERIE RAILWAY.

Mr. LANDERKIN enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government, this season, to give two mails daily to those post offices north of Palmerston, on the line of the Grand Trunk, Georgian Bay and Lake Erie Railway?

Mr. CARLING. The matter is now under the consideration of the Government.

SURVIVING VOLUNTEERS OF 1837-38.

Mr. TYRWHITT moved, that it is expedient that the Government take steps to ascertain the number of the Volunteers of 1837 and 1838 still living, their names, ages, and corps in which they served during said time, and their respective places of residence.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I presume that if this information is obtained and brought down, it would be to found a subsequent motion upon it, something like the motion which stands next to it on the paper, proposing to recognize the services of those volunteers. The volunteers of 1837-38 served some in Upper Canada and some in Lower Canada, and in both Upper and Lower Canada there were volunteers on both sides. I do not think, unless the House considers that there should be a grant made by the Dominion Parliament, or a recognition in some way of the services of the volunteers, that a case has been made out for the expenditure which would be incurred in collecting this information. It occurs to me, and to the Government, that the recognition, if it comes at all, should come from the several Provinces—that is to say, the Province of Ontario, formerly Upper Canada, should recognize the services of its volunteers, and the Province of Quebec, formerly Lower Canada, should recognize the services of its volunteers. I do not think the Dominion Parliament can be called upon to recognize the services of men who served, not only before Confederation, but before there was a United Canada, when there was an Upper and Lower Canada and no prospect or idea of their ever being one Province. This is a disappointment to myself, as I was one of the volunteers, and carried my musket, and I suppose I fought as bravely as most of my confreeres.

Mr. BLAKE. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that this is entirely a Provincial matter—a matter for old Canada or the Provinces of which it was composed. In the Legislature of Ontario in former days, during the régime of the first Government, a question connected with this matter came up, and the only person whose services were recognized, was one named Montgomery.

INGONISH BREAKWATER.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Victoria), in moving for all correspondence and all engineers' reports for the past two years, regarding the Ingonish breakwater, said: I think it a matter to be much regretted, for the sake of the locality in which it is situated, that this breakwater should have been carried away. I think this occurred once when my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Vail) had something to do with it; and I believe the same fatality occurred since my hon. friend beside me (Sir Hector Langevin) has had charge of the Department. At all events, between them they have made a bad job of it. It is only right that those who were connected with it should be hauled over the coals, whether they are on this side of the House, or on the other. Besides, it is necessary to consider whether it is worth while to replace the work or not.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Of course, these papers will be brought down. I must say, however, to my hon. friend, that it is true that the storms which partly destroyed the breakwater when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power have continued to destroy it, and that my intention was to drop the work altogether. It is evident that the breakwater cannot be maintained there without an expenditure so large as to be entirely out of the question.

Mr. VAIL. I rise to correct a misapprehension into which the House might fall from the remarks of my hon. friend from Victoria. The grant for this work was first made by the Government, of which my hon. friend opposite (Sir Hector Langevin) was a member, in 1873, and was merely continued by the Government of Mr. Mackenzie up to the time they left office.

Motion agreed to.

TIMBER LIMITS IN THE BOW RIVER DISTRICT.

Mr. JACKSON moved for a return showing the number of acres of square miles of timbered lands or timber limits sold by the Government since the 1st of March last, in or convenient to the Bow River country in the North-West, giving the name or names of the parties sold to, and the prices per acre received by the Government for the same. He said: I read in an American paper not long ago that a syndicate of American lumbermen have acquired a large tract of timbered land, or timber limits, containing a total of about 500,000 acres, in the Bow River district, in the North-West Territories. The same article stated that these gentlemen were very jubilant over their purchase, saying that they had bought those timber limits for very much less than their value. I desire to know who have been obtaining timber limits in this way; and, therefore, I make this motion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no objection to bringing down this return; but I would suggest to the hon. gentleman to add the words, "and the manner of sale," whether by public auction, or by private sale.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

EMIGRANT BUILDINGS AT LEVIS.

Mr. LAURIER, in moving for copies of all correspondence between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Government for the removal of the emigrant building and quarantine station at Lévis from Lévis to Montreal, said: Rumors have been circulated of late that negotiations are pending between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the removal of the emigrant buildings from Lévis to Montreal, with the view of gradually forcing all immigrants to land at Montreal instead of Quebec. These rumours have found their way into the press, and have caused constant uneasiness. I hope the Government will be able to say that they are absolutely without foundation.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Victoria).

Mr. POPE. I may say to the hon. gentleman, that the Government do not wish to force immigrants either to go away from Quebec, or to remain there. There is not, and has not been, any correspondence with the Pacific Railway Company, or any one else, respecting the removal of the emigrant buildings or the cattle quarantine from Quebec. It is, however, to be stated that steamships, that is the steamships of some of the lines, have landed immigrants at Montreal, instead of leaving them at Point Lévis. It is most important that we should have a cattle quarantine that is appreciated, not only by our own people, but in foreign countries. The importance will be understood when I say that whereas five years ago 900 cattle were brought there annually, the number now is 2,400. We have expended a large amount of money on these buildings, and no place in Canada can be more suitable for them than the place where they now stand, at Point Lévis. Never, with my consent, will they be removed.

Mr. LAURIER. I am quite satisfied, Mr. Speaker, with the hon. gentleman's statement, and I beg leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion withdrawn.

POSTAL STATISTICS.

Mr. HESSON moved for a statement showing the total number of post offices in operation in the Provinces now comprised in the Dominion for the year ending 30th June, 1867, the miles of mail route and total number of miles of travel, the number of letters and postal cards, the gross revenue and expenditure, with a similar statement for the years 1878 and '79, with the percentage of increase or decrease in each year, as the case may be. He said: In making this motion, I desire to make some observations. Through the kindness of some of the officers of the Post Office Department, I have been put in possession of some of the information I required, as tending to show what effect on the revenue we might expect from a further reduction in the rate of postage. After some careful enquiry, I have obtained a few particulars with reference to the revenue and expenditure of the Post Office Department in the Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada previous to Confederation. In 1859 the rate was fixed at three pence currency per half ounce, and at Confederation it was further reduced to three cents. So far as the Public Accounts show, the total receipts from post offices in 1866—after deducting a grant of $64,000 that had been made by Order in Council to cover the cost of legislative and departmental postage that had formerly been free—amounted to $313,726; the expenditure was $834,561, leaving a deficiency of $20,835. Coming to the first full year after Confederation, and after the introduction of the three cent rate, I find, from the Public Accounts, that the mileage was 21,920,000 miles, that the revenue was $973,056, and the expenditure $1,097,828, leaving a deficiency of $106,772. To get a fair idea as to the actual loss arising from the reduction of the postal rate during the first full year of its operation, we must take into account the deficiency that existed in the operation of the Department during the last full year ending 1866 prior to the reduction. That amount of $20,000 deducted from the $106,772, left $85,973 of a deficiency for the first four years after the reduction, representing about 10 per cent. of a loss accruing from that reduction. In addition to this it will be very interesting to note what the Postmaster-General said on the subject in his report of 1869-70:—

"The postal revenue for Ontario and Quebec for the quarter ending 30th September, 1869, was $215,036 as compared with $204,841 in the corresponding year of 1868—both under the reduced rates of postage—and if a continuance of this rate of improvement in collections could be counted on, the loss temporarily sustained in reducing the domestic postage charges would be soon recovered."

We have also to take into account a further reduction made in parcel postage which, in 1869, was reduced from 12½ cents per eight ounces to 6 cents per four ounces; and it will be found that this accounts for a large portion of the deficit I have mentioned. Glancing over the results of the last five years, we can safely conclude, I think, that it is quite within the power of the Government to go still further towards meeting the wants of the people of Canada by a still further reduction from a three cent to a two-cent postage rate per half ounce. In 1875, the number of post offices was 5,606; in 1883 it was 6,395, an increase of 689. In 1879 the mileage amounted to 39,598; in 1883 the postal route covered 44,643 miles, an increase of 5,045 miles, or about 1,000 miles a year for five years. The total miles of travel on all these routes was, in 1879, 16,56,034, and, in 1883, 19,465,121, an increase of 3,309,034. Again, in 1879, the total number of letters and postal cards carried was 21,930,000; in 1882, the last year for which we have published returns, it was 69,950,000; at the same rate of increase, the total, in 1883, should amount to 75,000,000, or an increase over 1879 of 23,120,000. These are very gratifying figures, showing, as they do, the very rapid growth of that very important Department. But when we look at the returns of revenue and expenditure, we find the comparison still more interesting. In 1879 the revenue was $1,534,363; in 1883, $2,264,384, or an increased revenue for five years of $730,000. Hon. gentlemen may say that the deficiency is very large, and may quote this deficiency as showing the undesirability of perhaps still further increasing it by a reduction of the present rate. But any hon. gentleman who will look at the Public Accounts will see that the expenditure, in 1879, was $2,167,266 and, in 1883, $2,687,391. While, however, the deficiency in 1879 was $632,903, in 1883 it was but $423,006. It will, therefore, be observed that while the growth of mileage of travel and the consequent increase of expenditure has been very large, we have still more than overtaken this increase of expenditure by our increasing revenue. Thus, while the deficit in 1879 was $632,903, in 1883 it was only $423,006, showing a reduction in deficit, caused by the increase of revenue in five years, of $209,896; or at the rate of $42,000 a year. Taking this into consideration, it seems to me that the Postmaster General would be justified in undertaking to bear this additional burden, if we can call it so, of reducing still further the postal rate. Hon. gentlemen will recollect that the celebrated Sir Rowland Hill estimated the cost of carrying a letter from London to Glasgow to be 1½d. If that is the case there is no reason why two cents may not be sufficient to carry a letter from one end of the Dominion to another, and still leave a fair income to the Department. It is not in the carrying of mail matter of that description that any loss is sustained; and besides, post offices are not established for the purpose of providing a revenue, but for the convenience of the people. They have been established on the same principle as that which has guided us in undertaking public works, not with the hope of obtaining a revenue, but in the view that the general business of the country would be so promoted by them that indirect advantages would ensue which could not be expected from a direct revenue. The necessity of a postal reduction is not probably felt so much in the towns and cities as in the country districts. No one who has had any experience of the early years, the pioneer life of Canada, can fail to remember how cheering it was to hear the sound of the postman's horn, how it seemed to revive in his heart memories and recollections of home, and how dearly he appreciated this means of communication with his friends in bygone years. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. the Postmaster General would favour this move, and if his colleagues will only sustain him in it, as I hope they will, the people will receive the advantage which I think they ought to receive from this reduction. I may observe in passing that, although a very large reduction was made by the remission of the tax upon newspapers posted from the place of publication, which amounted to something like $60,000, still we find the deficiency has been very materially lessened by the operations of the past year. If you deduct the $60,000—which was allowed, I might say, to the press of Canada, because it was a tax more directly upon them than upon the readers of the papers—from the surplus amount of $43,000, you get about $350,000, or $360,000 in round numbers; consequently, I do not think we have anything to apprehend from a reduction. I might just refer for a brief moment to some figures that I was enabled to obtain from the American reports, which show that the deficiency in the working of the Post Office branch of their Government was no less than $10,582,543 for the year 1860. Sir, in the face of that, we find that the service has since grown up to such an extent that it has produced a surplus revenue for them, and they have now been enabled to reduce the rate of postage for the people of that country to two cents. As we express a willingness to reciprocate with the Americans in other ways, I hope hon. Ministers will not be behind in meeting them on the same ground; and that it will not be said that it costs three cents to send a letter to the Americans when they can send one to us for two. In reference to the expense of operating the Post Office Department of the United States, I have gone into a calculation, and I find that it costs them eighty cents per head to manage their Post Office Department, whereas the cost to us here in Canada is only about sixty cents. I think that is a very favourable showing, and we have to congratulate ourselves upon it. I do not presume that it would be at all necessary for the Postmaster General, even in view of the reduction which is asked for, I believe, by this House and by the country, to starve the postmasters in the country; it will not be necessary for him to withhold a liberal increase in the Post Office staff in the great North-West which we are opening up so rapidly; and it will not be necessary to withhold the addition of a number of miles of postal travel during the coming year. The gradual increase will cover all that; and, taking the very worst view—and I have taken the worst view which is possible, keeping at all near the mark—the outside loss to the Department will not be more than $175,000 in the first year; and in three years it will disappear altogether. I think, then, that the House and the country will accept such a departure on the part of the Government as a great boon. They have given other remissions. They gave a remission of the duties on tea and coffee, articles which enter into every household; and that has been recognized by the people as a liberal movement on the part of the Government. Although our revenue has, perhaps, in consequence, been somewhat less than it was, I do not look upon that unfavourably. We know this has been a disastrous year; but we know things will revive again, and better crops and better times will come soon. I desire for a moment to call the attention of hon. gentlemen to this fact: that, although it may be said that we have a great North-West to supply with postal facilities, and that the probability is that the revenue there will be very much less than the expenditure, and a large loss will fall upon the country in consequence, I have tabulated a statement from the Public Accounts of 1882, showing that Manitoba and the North West Territories in that year were, I might almost say, self-sustaining in their postal service, the deficiency being only $22,868 for the postal year—a very small item indeed; and I am glad to learn, from information I have obtained and believe to be correct, that that country is so largely settled with an enterprising people, an educated people, a business people, that they have a large correspondence, and the more it is settled the more that correspondence must be increased; and I have every confidence that within five years the revenue from that part of the country will equal the expenditure, if not exceed it. I understand that the city of Winnipeg takes only the third place to-day—I question if it does not take the second place—in the postal service of the Dominion of Canada. That is a favourable showing. The Province of Ontario, for 1882, shows a deficiency of only $31,773. I might give some of the others which are less favourable, but it is not necessary to weary the House. I trust I have said enough on this matter to show that it is within the power of the Government to do this without very much affecting the general revenues of the country. I have tried to impress hon. members with this fact: that there is nothing which more goes home to the settlers occupying different parts of Canada than the postal service of the country. I observe that a reduction was made on postage between Canada and the United States in 1869 from ten cents to six cents, or at the rate of 40 per cent., and yet would it be believed that the revenue only fell short $41,653 for the year following? Now, we ask a reduction of 33½ per cent. as against 40 per cent., and in my estimate, I have given the worst feature of the case when I said it could not exceed 10 per cent. of the gross revenue from the postal service.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AT ST. THOMAS.

Mr. WILSON, in moving for copies of all tenders, reports and correspondence relating to the construction of the Post Office and Custom house at St. Thomas, giving the amount expended to date, also the names of all persons to whom any portion of the expenditure has been paid, together with the amount paid to each, and for what, said: In making this motion I desire to ask the Government the reasons why the work on these buildings at St. Thomas has progressed so slowly. I may say that during the last Session of the last Parliament the work on these buildings was commenced at St. Thomas. During the subsequent election campaign we were given to understand by the Government that they intended to prosecute the work as rapidly as possible, and that in a year or two we might expect to see a beautiful building erected there. During the campaign, however, a rumour obtained circulation—without, however, any foundation, so far as we could ascertain—that if the constituency was so unwise as to send an Opposition member to represent them in Parliament, we would very likely not have a Post Office and Custom house built there. The hon. First Minister, when appealed to on the subject, stated that of course the amount voted for that purpose would be expended, and that the buildings would be erected. Well, the constituency did return a member opposed to the present Government; and we find at the present time that the work is not progressing as rapidly as we think it ought. It may be, and I have no doubt of it in my own mind, that the Government is doing everything they can consistently do. I think the contractor, perhaps, is doing everything in his power to prosecute the work as rapidly as he can conveniently do so, though he complains that he found a great deal of difficulty last summer in engaging skilled labourers, for the reason that whenever the Government found any good workmen they were careful to engage them and pay them larger wages than we could afford to pay, and employ them on Government works elsewhere. It is with a view to obtain information on the subject, that I make this motion.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I was sure the hon. gentleman would attach no importance to those sinister rumours that the Government would only erect those buildings at St. Thomas, on condition of that Riding returning a supporter of the Government. Of course, we would never do anything of that kind. The hon. gentleman himself gives the reason why the works have not been carried on with Mr. Hesson.

the same vigour that he could have wished, and that is, that the best workmen were engaged elsewhere, and the contractor was not able to proceed faster. I hope the contractor will be able hereafter to find better workmen, and to fulfil his contract. The intention of the Department is that the contractor shall go on with his work with all due expedition. Of course, it is useless to drive a contractor to the point of causing him either to throw up his contract or lose a large sum of money. We must exercise a reasonable forbearance, but we must require him to use such diligence as will secure the work being completed within a reasonable time. The intention of my Department is that the contractor shall fulfil his contract, and I have no doubt that when the building is erected, the hon. gentleman will find it a credit to his county as well as to the Government.

Motion agreed to.

OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron), in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 2) to amend the Criminal Law and to extend the provisions of the Act respecting offences against the person, said: This is substantially the same Bill as was before Parliament in the Session of 1882, and again in the Session of 1883. The Bill was last year assented to by the First Minister, who thought it was a proper Bill, and that it ought to pass the House and become the law of the land, and that the offence mentioned in the Bill should be punished as a criminal offence. The Bill was referred to a Select Committee composed of several lawyers of both sides of the House, who reported in favour of it. It was referred to a Committee of the Whole, passed with some slight amendments, and finally received its third reading. The Bill was then sent up to the Senate. It was introduced, received the second reading without opposition, referred to a Committee of the Whole, and passed without any opposition, and without any amendment; but on the third reading, the Bill was rejected—and rejected, as I understand, because the hon. Minister of Justice, although assenting to the principle of the Bill, intimated that it would be better to let it stand over, because it might be consolidated with the criminal law that is now undergoing consolidation. That would be quite satisfactory if the clauses of this Bill could be made to form part of the criminal law, but I do not see very well how it is going to be consolidated with the Criminal Statutes that are now undergoing consolidation, unless it first becomes law by Act of Parliament, and it is for that reason that I introduce this Bill for the third time. I know there was considerable objections taken to the Bill last Session, especially upon the third reading. There were no objections upon the second reading; there was some slight ones in the Committee of the Whole; but on the third reading, considerable objections were raised by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. Now, I am not going to enter into the details of the Bill. As I stated upon that occasion, I believe the Bill ought to become law. I believe it is not creditable to us that this offence has not been made a criminal offence long ago. The offence is one that does not bear a detailed discussion in the House, and therefore I do not propose to discuss it in detail. We know, Sir, that in almost every State of the Union the offence mentioned in this Bill is made a criminal offence, punishable by terms of imprisonment, varying, according to the law of the State, from one to ten years. In some cases there is fine and imprisonment; in others, imprisonment alone. We know that in England, although there is no Statute Law prohibiting the offence and that it is not an offence under the common law, still it is an ecclesiastical offence so to speak, and is taken cognizance of by ecclesiastical courts. In Scotland it is a criminal offence—it is there made a serious offence—it is a capital felony, the punishment for which has been reduced within the last few years to banishment for life. Now, I see no reason why it should not be made a criminal offence in this country. It is said, and was said last Session by the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins) that this Bill should not be placed on the Statute Book because we cannot assume that any person will be guilty of the offence. All I know is, that such offences are committed. One cannot travel a circuit, I believe in either Province, without having cases of this kind occasionally coming up; and you, Mr. Speaker, know perfectly well from your own experience as a lawyer, that such cases do occur in the courts, that offences of this kind are committed, and that, with a view to punish the guilty parties, cases do come before the courts. At present, however, there is no way of punishing such parties unless the offence is committed by force, unless in fact it amounts to rape. I propose making the parties guilty of a crime if the offence is committed. I do not think we should be satisfied with the law as it stands; that is, that the person committing the offence of which I have spoken, unless rape is committed, shall go unwhipped of justice altogether. I see no reason, I say, why this should not be made a criminal offence. It is also said that we ought not to spread out this Bill on the Statute Book because it is, to a large extent, pandering to a sort of prurient curiosity which very often arises when investigations of this kind take place. If that were so, and if it were a good answer to a Bill of this kind becoming part of the law of the land, there are half a dozen offences which have been made such by Statute, the laws in regard to which should not appear on the Statute Book. It is impossible to deal with cases of the kind to which I have referred unless there is exposure in the courts, which, of course, one does not want; but it is far better to have the exposure than that criminals should escape justice altogether. As I have already said, I do not care about discussing the matter at length. The First Minister, than whom no one is better able to judge of the propriety of a law, from his long experience in Parliament, has given his assent to the principle of the Bill, and I content myself by moving that the Bill be now read the second time.

Bill read the second time.

EVIDENCE IN CRIMINAL CASES.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 3) to further amend the Law of Evidence in criminal cases, said: This Bill, which was also introduced during the last Session of Parliament, is substantially the same as that introduced last year. The provisions of it are simple and brief. It provides that in all cases of misdemeanor the defendant and his wife shall be competent witnesses, under certain restrictions and conditions specified in the Bill. Last Session the Bill received the assent of the First Minister, was referred to a Select Committee, which reported it with some slight amendments. I now propose to have the Bill read the second time, and referred to a Select Committee, composed of Messrs. Cameron (Victoria), Ives, Wood (Brockville), Fleming, Hall, and the mover.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no objection to the Bill going to the Committee, the names of which were shown to me by the hon. gentleman. I suggest, however, the addition of Mr. Ouimet.

Mr. TUPPER. I desire to oppose the second reading of this Bill. I do not intend to delay the deliberations of the House for any considerable time in speaking on it, and the only reason that prompts me in asking the House to refuse to pass this motion is, that during last Session, when the principle of the Bill came before us, there was a very decided expression of opinion given in regard to it. The Bill went into the Committee and never came out. Subsequently, the hon. gentleman who had charge of the Bill then, as he has now, made a separate motion in order to restore the Bill to the Order Paper. The expression of the opinion of the House was as pronounced then as it had been before; and my point is, without going into the question again, because on that occasion hon. members from Quebec and myself discussed the principle of the Bill and the whole question. We shall be losing time in further considering the Bill, if the opinions of hon. members are the same as they were last year. In addition to the matter discussed then, I took the opportunity of alluding to the fact that this Bill was, if anything, in favour of unduly assisting prisoners to obtain their acquittal. I contended then, and I contend now, that the advantages which surround prisoners are such as to completely secure for them justice in any court in the Dominion, and in any court where British laws are in force, and there was no reason, and no reason has been shown, for changing the present system which has so long prevailed in England and here. In that opinion I am borne out, to a certain extent, by the hon. gentleman in charge of the Bill. In 1880 he shared that opinion, and if his opinions then were correct, there is no necessity to pass this Bill. In opposing the introduction of the Bill to give prisoners certain advantages in calling witnesses before a magistrate in preliminary examinations, he said:

"We know well, at all events, those of us who have had any experience in the administration of the Criminal Law, that as a general rule it is a difficult matter to obtain the conviction of accused parties now, and we should not, by experimental legislation, enhance the difficulties of obtaining convictions."

Again, he said:

"It is well known to the practitioners in Criminal Courts that the chances are all in favour of the prisoner, and that for one innocent man convicted, 999 guilty men escape. As a general thing, the prisoner is tried by his peers, and he has the advantage of every technicality of the law that is open to him."

Now, of course, the hon. gentleman might contend that his object is not to give the prisoner any additional chance, but to enable the Crown more speedily to secure justice. But I contend, and any hon. gentleman who will look at the Bill must see, that it is a measure in the prisoner's favour, and, as I believe, unduly in his favour; that under the administration of such a law, an additional and improper chance is given to the guilty man to escape. I rose simply for the purpose of calling attention to the character of the Bill, and I shall conclude by moving in amendment: that the said Bill be not now read the second time, but that it be read the second time this day six months.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman who has just moved the six months' hoist gives as one reason why his amendment should be accepted, that a certain number of members last Session voted against the principle of the Bill; but he seems to have entirely forgotten the possibility that between last Session and this, hon. members may have changed their minds. I do not agree with the reasons which the hon. gentleman has given for declining to support the Bill. On the contrary, I think the Bill should become law and that in this age it would be well if its principles were enforced. We find that, in the United States, a precisely similar Act is in force in nearly all the States of the Union. We find that in England, within the last few years, parties to civil suits have been admitted as competent witnesses, and precedents set in England have become the law of this country. Only a few years ago a party to a suit, who was possibly the only person who was able to give any information upon the subject-matter in dispute, was excluded from the witness box, and, perhaps, his rights were thereby entirely ignored. The injustice of such a law was discovered and it was changed so that at present parties in civil suits are competent witnesses in their own behalf. I need only refer the hon. gentleman to the Scott Act, and to many other Acts of a semi-criminal nature, in which the parties charged are competent and compellable witnesses. As I said before, a similar law has been in force in the United States for many a year, and I assert without fear of successful contradiction, that criminal law is as well administered in the United States as in our own country. The hon. gentleman, I think, takes a narrow, contracted view of the case; he fears that some man who should be punished will escape. All who have had experience in criminal cases know that it frequently happens that the very man who could throw most light on a case is excluded from giving his evidence. I contend that there would be no difficulty in a cross-examination, in showing whether or not the prisoner had perjured himself. I think the Bill should at least receive a second reading, so that it might be calmly and dispassionately considered by members of this House.

Mr. IVES. As I understand, this Bill proposes to extend still further a principle which, for the last two or three years, has been acted upon in cases of common assault: that is, the examination of the defendant. I think it would be pertinent if some hon. members of this House, who have large experience as criminal lawyers, would state what has been their observation with respect to the working of the Law which we now have on the Statute Book, and in which we have admitted the principle of this Act. If this Bill applied, as I think last year's did, to all offences, both felonies and misdemeanors, I certainly would not vote for its second reading; not for the reason mentioned by the hon. gentleman, that it would give the prisoner a better chance to escape, but because I believe it would be a serious injury to a prisoner charged with a capital offence. The second section provides that if the prisoner does not ask to be examined, that fact shall not be commented upon either by the prosecution or the judge; but it would be utterly impossible, by any legislation, to prevent a jury drawing their own conclusion if a prisoner declined to offer his evidence under such circumstances. I think it would be very dangerous to extend this principle to felony; but so far from agreeing with the hon. gentleman who moved the amendment, that it would be an additional means of escape for the guilty, I believe it would be much more likely to operate in the other direction, and that a prisoner stepping out of a dock into a witness box would be much more likely to injure his case than to help it. In my own experience, the present law, permitting defendants in common assault to testify in their own behalf, is practically inoperative; but I should like to hear the opinion of lawyers who have large experience in criminal matters.

Mr. OUMET. It is admitted that it would be dangerous for a prisoner not to give evidence when the law allowed him to do it; and though the law may say that the jury and the court should not be prejudiced by that fact, it is quite certain that there always will be juries who are sure to be prejudiced by it. And here comes in a higher consideration which should be taken into account by this House: you force a man practically to give his own evidence in his favour, and, consequently, you will force him, in a great many instances, to perjure himself. Is not perjury something which should be carefully avoided in the community. I say that the sanctity of the oath is the very basis of our society. If you make perjury a common thing, an every day occurrence, the sanctity of the oath will be gone, and the whole administration of justice will suffer. What will be the consequence if perjury comes to be regarded by most people as of no particular consequence, more especially if we proclaim that a man must perjure himself if he does not want to be sent to gaol? This law will not aid a prisoner if he is not guilty; but if he is guilty, he will be induced to perjure himself, and that is a greater evil than the conviction of one innocent man out of a large number of guilty ones. I say that this Bill contains a very unsound principle, and one which we ought not to put on our Statute Books without careful consideration. For these reasons, I will vote for the six months' hoist.

Mr. WOODWORTH. My hon. friend lays great stress upon the theory that, if the person accused does not go on the witness stand and give evidence, his refusal will prejudice him in the eyes of the court. He, therefore, argues that the Bill would operate unfavourably to the prisoner. On the other hand, my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Tupper) enlarged on the idea that it would be undoubtedly in a prisoner's favour to allow him to testify in his own behalf. The two arguments hardly agree, and yet both hon. gentlemen intend to vote on the same side. I tell my hon. friends that they are both wrong. The practice would not be unduly in the prisoner's favour by any means; neither would it prejudice him if he did not go on the stand, because the second clause of this Bill provides:

"In case an accused person, tried before a jury, does not tender himself or herself as a witness, or become a witness on the trial, no observations shall be allowed to be made at the trial by the prosecutor or by the counsel for the prosecution, as to his or her not so tendering himself or herself as a witness, or not being a witness, nor shall the judge presiding at the said trial make any observations respecting the same."

Therefore, a prisoner's refusal would not prejudice him in the least. But how would the Bill operate unduly in favour of the accused? Every man is supposed to be innocent until he is proven guilty; but many a man is placed in a dock and tried for a crime of which he is not guilty, is environed by a lot of evidence got up for the occasion and untrue in many particulars, while he stands there with his lips closed, unable to tell the jury all he knows, and thereby relieve their minds of much doubt and difficulty, and enable them to arrive at a verdict according to the truth of the matter involved. Go into any court room, hear the evidence against a prisoner, and look at the prisoner. The natural mind of man tends to assume that a person who is placed in a dock and accused of a certain crime, is guilty of it. I have seen instances of this over and over again. But take that man from the dock, and place him on the witness stand, where the jury can see his demeanor, the play of his features, the light of his eye, and he is at once relieved from the imputation that would have rested upon him if he had remained in the dock. Cannot everybody who has attended our courts of justice confirm what I say? And certainly there can be nothing unduly prejudicial to the Crown in allowing a man to testify, when he is subjected to the most rigid cross-examination possible. If his evidence breaks down under it, the interests of justice are served. But would you have a man convicted when, by simply allowing him to open his mouth and testify, he could prove himself to be innocent. The object of the law is not to convict a man if he is innocent, but to convict him if he is guilty, and to find out the truth; and it is not possible for a guilty man to get free if he goes into the witness box to testify, under the cross-examination of experienced counsel. But my hon. friend says: oh, you are going to put a premium on perjury. Does not everybody know that in cases involving large amounts of money, people are now allowed to testify on their own behalf? And in such cases the incentive to avaricious people to perjure themselves is nearly as great as in cases of misdemeanor—in some cases greater; and no man of any sagacity or good sense dare go on the witness stand to testify falsely when he knows that he is going to be subjected to a rigid cross-examination. You cannot put down perjury in that way. Why, there is more perjury committed in making up the electoral lists of the various Provinces in one year than there would be in ten years under this law; and yet my hon. friend, who has been long in political life and seen all this, has a great horror of perjury. It is only a phantom raised by hon. gentlemen who are opposed to this Bill. We are not here, proposing this Bill as an experiment.

The same practice has been pursued in the United States courts, and yet in nine cases out of ten there is no suspicion of perjury. Of course, a man would give the best evidence he could for himself—he has a right to do that; but if he goes beyond that, he is liable to be convicted of perjury. If the only objection my hon. friends can urge against this Bill is that it will be provocative of perjury, they have a very small case to rely on. It applies only to misdemeanors, not to felonies. I know of cases now pending in the courts of Canada, in which, I believe, men are indicted for offences they never committed, who, if allowed to testify, under this Act, would sweep away the cobwebs of falsehood surrounding them and vindicate their innocence. I was not present last Session when this Bill was before the House; but I shall now have great pleasure in voting for it, in order that it may have a trial.

Mr. DALY. I take an entirely different view of the question from that expressed by the last speaker. The sympathies of a judge and jury, and of those in court are generally, I believe, directed in favour of, rather than against the prisoner, when he is seen at the bar. Such is the nature of most people, that when they see a man placed in that unfortunate position, their sympathies naturally go out towards him, and they are far from being inclined to condemn him unheard. This Bill should not become law, because it is the introduction of the thin edge of a wedge which, if driven home, will render impossible the proper administration of our criminal jurisprudence. The English practice, which we have followed for years, has stood the test of time, and I can see no reason now for altering it. If we admit the principle, that a prisoner under charge for misdemeanor can be permitted to give evidence in his own behalf, why should we stop there? Why should we not extend the same privilege to a man who is under charge for having committed felony? The principle is an erroneous one and should not be put on the Statute Books. I agree with the hon. member for Laval, that it will give a direct premium and an undue incentive to the commission of the crime of perjury. A prisoner charged with misdemeanor has, I consider, in spite of what has been said, a greater inducement to withhold the truth, or to state what is false, than one who is interested in a civil suit. His right to give evidence in a civil suit is, I consider, a totally different affair. While I believe the latter is right and proper, I do not believe that a man charged with misdemeanor should be allowed to testify in his own behalf. It must also be remembered that in every case the prisoner at the bar is asked to state what reasons he has to give, so that, although he is not allowed to give evidence, he can generally state his own case; and if he tells his tale with the appearance of truth, the judge will give to it all proper weight, although the statement is not given under the sanction of an oath. He has, therefore, the opportunity of showing to the judge his innocence, fully as much as he would have were he permitted to give evidence under oath. I think the criminal administration of justice would be better served by allowing this Bill to stand over for six months than by permitting it to pass.

Mr. BRECKEN. One of the arguments the hon. member for Halifax brings forward against this Bill is, that the old rule declaring a criminal not competent to be a witness in his own case, is found to work well. We know that the law of evidence is being continually improved. Not more than thirty years ago, before the passage of Lord Campbell's Act, the parties to a civil suit could not be competent witnesses, nor could any one in any way interested in the suit be heard. Every objection urged against this Bill, was urged against Lord Campbell's Act. In the first case tried at Westminster under that Act, I am not sure whether the Lord Chief Baron Pollock was not presiding judge, one of the parties to the suit was committed for perjury, and I believe the practice of committing such witnesses for perjury was continued for some short time. We might as well say that Lord Campbell's Act was a premium on perjury, because it furnished inducement to parties interested to deviate from the truth, and therefore should be repealed, as urge the same objection to this Bill. This Bill confines itself to misdemeanors. I have had, as Crown prosecutor in the Province I have come from, during many years, many opportunities of judging, and my experience is that this proposed law will lead to and conduce to the better administration of justice, by admitting parties tried for misdemeanor to be competent witnesses. The first thing to which we should direct our minds is the most efficient way of eliciting the truth. Whenever you have witnesses brought into a court of justice, no doubt perjury is committed; and I venture to say that in prosecutions under the Scott Act, scarcely a case comes before a court of justice in which perhaps there is not some deviation, more or less, from the truth, on the part of witnesses. If any line is to be drawn, we would have to be very careful and select in determining what men are competent to give testimony in a court of justice. As far as the person on trial for misdemeanor is concerned, it is obvious the prosecutor cannot compel him to be called as witness. The hon. member for Laval has stated that if, in the course of defence, a prisoner declined to be examined, though the counsel and judge are prohibited by this Act from making comments, still his refusal would have a prejudicial effect on the minds of the jury. Probably it would. I cannot conceive a case in which a man placed on his trial and competent to give evidence in his own behalf would decline to do so, thereby admitting that he has nothing to say in his own defence and no doubt such refusal would go against him. I can very readily understand that, where the evidence is very finely balanced and it is a difficult matter for the jury to make up their minds as to the credibility of witnesses on either side, if the prisoner declined to go into the box he would create an impression in the minds of the jury hostile to his case, but I do not think such an impression will run counter to justice. It is impossible to conceive that a man would sit quietly at the bar and decline to give evidence in his own behalf, if it were in his power to say anything in extenuation of or in answer to the charge for which he was indicted. If in a civil case, where a man's property and reputation may be at stake, he is considered competent to be a witness, I do not see why his mouth should be closed when a charge of misdemeanor is made against him. It will not do for us to go back to the venerable processes of law, as the law was administered in former days, in the conduct of criminal procedure. Not many years ago a criminal was denied the privilege of having counsel to defend him, and there are many other rules of law which have been applicable to the conduct of criminal prosecution, that, to-day, we almost blush to acknowledge. True, it is possible this may, in some cases, be an inducement to a man to deviate from the truth—to perjure himself; but that is a thing which legislation has not been able to guard against, and I do not see how this proposed law can injuriously affect the prosecution, since the prosecuting examiner has the power of cross-examining the prisoner. I remember once, and once only, seeing an instance of it. I was in a court of criminal justice in the State of Maine, listening to the trial of a young man for robbery. The prisoner stepped from the dock into the witness box and was examined, and, after his examination was through, if I had been on the jury, I would not have hesitated for a moment to give a verdict of guilty against him. I think it would not be detrimental to the administration of criminal justice if this Bill were placed upon our Statute Book.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I want to say one or two words in reply to what has been said in this debate. I would have discussed the question more fully had I not expected that the Bill would receive a second reading, would have been referred to a Select Committee, would have been reported by that Committee, and that, upon the report of that Committee, when we knew the shape the Bill would assume, we would be better able to deal with the whole question. The hon. gentleman who moved the six months' hoist based his opposition to the Bill upon two grounds. He said that last Session the same Bill was rejected by the House—that is, the Committee rose without reporting, and therefore the Bill was rejected by the House; that I moved to reinstate the Bill and the motion was lost, and that, therefore, Parliament having pronounced upon the Bill, it was losing time to discuss it again. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken. The House never pronounced upon this Bill. It was an entirely different Bill. You will recollect, Mr. Speaker, that I moved the second reading of the Bill last Session, that the Bill was then referred to a Select Committee at the suggestion of the First Minister, and that upon that suggestion five other Bills, two of the same kind and three of an entirely different kind, were referred to the same Committee. One of them, which was objected to by several hon. members of this House, was a Bill to enable Agnostics to give evidence in Courts of Justice. The Committee met on these Bills, and, though I think it was not wise of us to do it, we consolidated them into one Bill. When that Bill came before the House, some were opposed to the provision to give Agnostics the right to give evidence; some were opposed to allowing the defendants in cases of misdemeanor to give evidence, and some were opposed to other provisions of the Bill. The result was that all the opposition was combined, and the Bill was defeated. That it was ever before the House in the form in which it is now presented, I utterly deny; so that ground entirely falls from under the hon. gentleman's feet. It is said by the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet) that the Bill should not pass because it will offer a premium to perjury. That was always the argument when changes in the law of evidence were proposed. In the Province of Ontario and in England, when the law was changed to enable the defendant and the plaintiff, the parties to the suit, in civil actions, to give evidence, wiseacres like the hon. gentleman from Pictou (Mr. Tupper) and the hon. member for Laval rose and said the tendency would be that every single man put into the witness box, plaintiff or defendant, would commit perjury; that it was giving a premium for perjury—giving them a certain amount of cash to swear away their immortal souls. The Legislature was not influenced by that argument; and now, after so many years' experience, I would ask the hon. gentleman if he would go back to the old law, which existed before he was called to the bar, nay, were in existence before he was born, and prevent plaintiffs and defendants, in civil suits, from giving testimony. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, with your extensive experience at the bar, if you would go back to the practice of old days, when the men who could tell all about the case had their mouths shut and could not say a word. The cases I have provided for are of a quasi civil kind. They are not felonies, though I think it would not be ill to extend the provision to felonies; but I believe in progressing slowly, and that first we should try how the Bill will work in the case of misdemeanors. It is not a new principle in England or in Canada. The hon. gentleman knows, as my hon. friend from Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) stated, that we have it in the case of assaults and batteries, that the defendant can go into the witness box and testify and tell his story, and, when the jury have heard his story, they can judge whether or not it is a true story; whether or not he himself has been able to do away with the impression formed by the evidence given on the part of the Crown. We have it also in the Election Law, passed in 1874 by hon. gentlemen on this side when they were on the other side of the House. We know that, in penal actions, under the Election Law, a defendant has a perfect right to go into the witness box and tell his story, and the jury then have to judge whether or not the story is a correct one. The House assented to the principle of the Bill last Session. My hon. friend from Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) introduced a Bill which contained stringent clauses and imposed severe penalties, but allowed the defendant to go into the witness box and tell his own story. It has been recognized by Parliament over and over again. It has been recognized in England, where in certain cases the defendant is enabled to go into the witness box and tell his own story. If we have recognized it in civil proceedings and in criminal proceedings, if it is recognized in England to a limited extent and here to a limited extent, what reason has been urged against its extension to all cases coming within the technical class of misdemeanor? I know of none. As my hon. friend from King's (Mr. Woodworth) stated, a defendant is put into the dock, is tried before his peers for a criminal offence; a story is told by the witnesses for the Crown; it is a circumstantial story, perhaps clearly circumstantial; perhaps not a link is missing in the whole chain of evidence, and the evidence is sufficient to satisfy any reasonable man; but the man who can tell the whole facts is not allowed to do so; his mouth is closed. He desires to call himself, and tell his own story, and corroborate his statement by the evidence of his wife. What is the answer? The answer of common sense is, let them tell their story; but the answer of the law is that you cannot tell your story because, no matter how trivial the offence may be, you cannot say a word in your own behalf. Counsel may suggest doubts and raise difficulties and point out discrepancies, but the man who can tell all about it cannot say a word in his own behalf. I ask, I appeal to hon. members, if that is fair or just to a man who is perhaps being tried for a trifling offence that might be followed, if he were convicted, by a fine of $10 or twenty-four hours in gaol. Yet the law now says that man cannot tell his own story. In the Session of 1880, I gave some instances of the extreme hardship under which prisoners tried for these trifling offences laboured. I stated a case of an English Church clergyman, who kept a boarding school for young ladies. A conspiracy was formed by two or three of them to charge the gentleman with a criminal offence. Some of them went into the box and told a plain story, and all the ingenuity of counsel could not shake their evidence in the slightest degree. The unfortunate clergyman was convicted, and sentenced to a long term of imprisonment. Circumstances arose afterwards which led him to believe he could fasten the charge of conspiracy upon them. A charge of perjury was made against them, and evidence was given which showed, as the judge stated, beyond the shadow of a doubt, that the evidence given against him was false. The sentence was commuted, but the harm had been done. The clergyman's reputation was ruined. He had been in the common prison for six months, and, although he went there upon perjured testimony, he ought not to have been there at all. If he could have given his evidence in the first instance, that would never have occurred. He would have told a story which the jury, perhaps, would have believed, and he would not have been placed in that unfortunate position. I remember another case which occurred some twenty years ago, the subject of which was an unfortunate lawyer, and perhaps my hon. friends on the other side, when they hear the story, will change their opinions as to the propriety of calling the defendant in a case in his own behalf. In London, England, two persons went to an eminent solicitor and consulted him about obtaining letters of administration to a large and valuable estate. The lawyer gave his advice, relying on the plain and apparently honest story they told him, and the parties obtained the administration of this intestate estate. But after they got possession of the property, they absconded with it—at all events, they got out of London where they could not be discovered; and it turned out shortly afterwards that they were not entitled to the estate at all; that it was an entire fraud in their behalf. The owners of the estate, the real heirs at law, the men who were really entitled to it, instituted a prosecution against these two men and against the unfortunate lawyer. They were tried, evidence was heard, and they were convicted, and the lawyer was sentenced to ten years' transportation. An investigation subsequently took place, and the Home Secretary was entirely satisfied that in so far as the lawyer was concerned he acted, as all lawyers do, with perfect honesty and uprightness; that he ought not have been joined in the prosecution at all, and ought not to have been convicted. The Home Secretary at once ordered the release of the unfortunate lawyer. But he had already served six months of his banishment; his character was blasted, his reputation was ruined, and his professional prospects destroyed. The man's whole life was blighted and blasted because he had been convicted by false testimony, which he could have disproved if he had been allowed to go into the witness box. Now, Sir, if that man had been allowed to go into the witness box and tell his own story, as he was entitled to do, there could have been no conviction against him, for he would have been able to satisfy the jury, as he was able to satisfy the Home Secretary, that he was innocent of fraud. Therefore, I say that upon every principle of fair play, upon every principle of justice, we ought to carry the principle we have already incorporated into our Statute Law a little further, and allow defendants, at all events in cases of misdemeanor—those that are not of a felonious character—to go into the witness box and tell their own story. It is only simple justice that they should do so, and there is no danger to be apprehended from it. The hon. member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet) fears that every man who goes into the witness box, when he is a defendant in the case, will commit wilful and corrupt perjury. As I said before, the same argument was adduced by men such as my hon. friend from Laval, when it was proposed to make men competent to testify on their own behalf in civil actions. The same argument is always used, no matter what changes are proposed in the law. You will always find men who are fifty years behind the age—twenty-five years at all events—Rip Van Winkles, who are asleep while the world is progressing. But, Sir, the world will go on in spite of them, and will accept the principle that it is only fair and just that men should be allowed to give evidence in their own behalf in such cases as I have pointed out—that it is only fair and just that we should legislate in that direction. And, Sir, I ask this House to-day to do justice in the premises; I ask them to take only one step further in the same direction we have already gone. I could cite dozens of similar cases that have come under my notice in reading, where it was of the utmost possible importance that the defendants in these quasi civil cases should be allowed to tell their own story. I think, however, I have given enough to satisfy reasonable men that this Bill is not a dangerous one; that it contains no vicious provisions, and that there is no more danger to be apprehended of men committing wilful and corrupt perjury under this Bill than under the Bill that enables them to give their evidence in civil cases. Will my hon. friend tell this House that a man is more liable to commit wilful and corrupt perjury if he is charged on indictment with having obtained, perhaps, a dollar's worth of goods by fraud, when, if convicted, he would get twenty-four hours in jail, than another man is who commits fraud and in a civil action involving a million of money, and who, if convicted, would lose every dollar he has in the world? Surely there is just as much reason to apprehend that a man would commit perjury in the one case as in the other; so that I say there is nothing to be apprehended from the argument advanced by my hon. friend in extending the principle that is already laid down. I, therefore, trust that this Bill will be allowed to go to its second reading, and when it gets into Committee, if there are any objectionable clauses in it, they can be eliminated.

Mr. OUIMET. My hon. friend does not seem to be aware that in the Province of Quebec, a party is not allowed to give evidence in his own behalf, even in civil cases.

Mr. CAMERON. He ought to be allowed.

Mr. TUPPER. Before the question is put, I would like to remind the hon. gentleman that when he charges with being Rip Van Winkles, those who object to this legislation—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cannot make a second speech. Only the mover of the motion can do that.

Fisher,

Bill read the second time.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) moved that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee, consisting of Messrs. Girouard, Ives, Cameron (Middlesex), Hall, Lister, Fleming, and the mover.

Motion agreed to, on a division.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. BLAKE. Will the hon. gentleman say what business he proposes to take up to-morrow?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Canadian Pacific Railway resolutions.

Mr. BLAKE. I have pointed out to the hon. gentleman that much of the information ordered with reference to that railway has not been brought down, and what has been brought down has not been distributed; so it is extremely unreasonable to press those resolutions now.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Minister of Railways has given notice of his resolutions, and I believe he intends to proceed to-morrow.

Motion agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

TUESDAY, 5th February, 1884.

REPORT.

The following Report was laid upon the Table:

The Annual Report on the State of the Militia and Defense of the Dominion of Canada, for the year ending 31st December, 1883.—(Mr. Caron.)

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, in moving that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on certain proposed Resolutions (page 16) respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway, I desire to make a general statement as to the position of that great work. I am deeply impressed with the importance of the decision at which the House may arrive in regard to the Resolutions that I now have the honour to propose. A year ago, when discharging a somewhat similar duty, making a statement to the House in regard to the position that the Canadian Pacific Railway then occupied, I ventured to say that the most sanguine expectations of the promoters of that great enterprise in Parliament had been more than realized; that the work performed by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had been unprecedented in regard to the vigour with which it had been prosecuted, and the success that had attended their efforts. I am glad, Sir, to be able on the present occasion to reiterate that statement, and to say that the position occupied in respect to the progress of that great work is still stronger, still greater, to-day, than it was when I made that statement a year ago. At that time I ventured to affirm that if the Canadian Pacific Railway Company made the same progress in the future that they had made in the past, we had every reason to believe that the line would be open from ocean to ocean by the end of 1886. I am now glad to be able to say that, in consequence of the vigour, the unabated vigour, the increased energy, with which that work has been pushed, we are able to say that if in the future the same progress is made as in the past, we will be able to shorten the period for its completion by something like a year; that it is now believed to be quite practicable to complete the whole of that great enterprise by the end of the year 1885, and open the line for travel and traffic in the spring of 1886. I need not say, Sir, to the House that those who have watched the progress of that work, as I am sure every hon. member of this House has done, will feel the immense importance to this country of that which is practicable being realized at the earliest possible day. The contract entered into less than three years ago—because it is not quite three years since Parliament ratified the contract made with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company—provided that the Government should complete 428 miles of road from Port Arthur to Red River, and 213 miles from Port Moody to Kamloops, a total of 641 miles, by the time stated in the contracts for their completion, which was July, 1885. I am glad to be able to say that that which the Government undertook to do in relation to the portions of the work that still remained under construction by the Government will be fully realized. As I stated to the House when last addressing it upon this subject, in order to open the line for traffic in the spring of last year, it became necessary to transfer to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company a portion of the work which remained to be done on contracts 41 and 42, and work required to be performed on contracts 13 and 25, the first contract from Port Arthur, and on which a considerable amount of work remained to be done, in consequence of the long period that had elapsed after it was completed, the work required to be performed being necessary to place it in the condition in which the Government agreed to hand it over to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I stated to the House that it was intended to transfer those works to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in order that the road might be operated at the same time that the works of completion were in progress, and as the only practical means by which that important result could be attained. Those arrangements, as you, Sir, are aware from the contract which I have laid on the Table, were carried out. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company took over all the works requiring to be done by the contractors of section 42 at the prices contained in their contract, less 15 per cent. on the train work that the former contractors had undertaken and proposed to do, and to which, as it lessened the cost of the work which was to be done, the Government and the Company both agreed the contractors were entitled as a matter of justice. That work has consequently been completed, or is being completed by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company upon the same terms as it would have been completed, and at the same cost to the country, under the contracts that had been made with the contractors for section 42. The portion of the work that remained to be performed on sections 13, 25 and 41 was also agreed to be done by that Company upon the lowest terms, and at prices which similar work had cost in connection with those contracts. The sum of $286,000 had been paid in relation to that work performed by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company entirely outside of their contract for the whole line. I may mention here that I do not take that question into consideration at all, because that contract with the Company is precisely in the same position as contracts with any other private individuals or contractors, and has no relation to the question we are now about to discuss. I may say in reference to the works upon the 213 miles from Port Moody to Kamloops, that the progress has been of the most satisfactory character. As the House is well aware, the contractors for those 213 miles were Mr. Mills and Mr. Onderdonk, the latter being engaged in both. Of something over $9,000,000 of an estimate for the work on that section over $7,000,000 have already been executed, and with the force at their command and the progress they are making, we have every assurance that the work will be completed within the time stated in the contract; in fact the track will be laid from Port Moody to Kamloops, through the whole distance in September next; and within the time—and I think I might say considerably before the time—named in the contract the entire works will be completed. I am glad, Sir, to be able to say that the further information which we have acquired, down to the present time, when, as I have already stated, over $7,000,000 of the $9,000,000 proposed expenditure has been completed, shows that the cost of that work will not exceed the estimate which I have already given to the House. Then, Sir, the Company were bound under the terms of the contract to construct 650 miles from Callander to Port Arthur, and also to construct a line from Red River to Kamloops, a distance which by the present line is ascertained to be about 1,250 miles, making 1,900 miles in all, as nearly as possible. Trains are now running on 1,131 miles, although it is not yet three years since Parliament ratified the contract under which they are working. These facts have reference to the main line; but the Company have also constructed 239 miles of branches on which trains are running, making now in operation of main line and branches no less than 1,370 miles. A large amount of work has also been executed upon 160 miles of the line (in addition to the 1,131 miles) of the very heavy works north of Lake Superior. The Company have at this moment over 9,000 men employed in the construction of the portion of the line that remains to be completed in that region; and, as I have already stated, with the force at their command, and the appliances with which they are prepared to execute the work, we have every reason to believe that it is entirely practicable to complete that road from end to end by the close of the year 1885. Now, Sir, I may say with reference to the character of the work, that when the contract was entered into with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, it was feared by some gentlemen in this House that a sufficiently high standard was not created whereby the Government would secure the construction of that work in as perfect and thorough a manner as it was desirable it should be constructed. My answer to those criticisms was that as they were constructing it for themselves, and as the cost of operating the line for all time to come would depend on the mode in which the work was performed, we had in these facts a better guarantee than any possible standard of construction, that the work would be well executed. I think, Sir, it is not necessary for me to say to this House that the manner in which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have executed the work which they have performed is so satisfactory as to command, as it has commanded, the unqualified approval and admiration of every person who has visited and inspected this road and who knows anything of railway construction either in the adjoining States or in Canada. A great number of gentlemen, thoroughly qualified to judge of the quality of railway works, have gone over the line, and from them there has been but one opinion, and that opinion is that not only has the contract been fully and faithfully carried out but that it has been exceeded in every particular, and that on any part of this continent there is not to be found a finer road running through a similar country. The Chief Engineer of the Canadian Pacific Railway has visited the works from time to time, and he affirms, in the fullest possible manner, as also does Mr. Sandford Fleming, formerly Chief Engineer of the Canadian Pacific Railway, that it would be impossible to find a work executed in a more satisfactory manner than this work has been by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. It might, perhaps, be desirable for me to give a slight glance at the character of the work which remains to be done. From Sudbury Junction to Michipicoton the work is said to be light, the grading for the greater part is of a sandy nature; this distance is 210 miles. On the 140 miles from Michipicoton to Pic, the work is said to be moderately light, the cuttings generally of clay or sand with some rock. From Pic to within 35 miles of Nepigon, the work is excessively heavy, the grading being composed chiefly of hard rock; distance 95 miles. It is upon this heavy work, to a very large extent, that the strong force which I mentioned are now concentrating their efforts. The work for the remaining 35 miles to Nepigon is moderately light; the grading is about completed. Then, as regards the work in the Rocky Mountains, from the summit of the Rocky Mountains to the foot of the Mountains, the work may be classed as generally heavy, with some short distances very heavy; distance, 45 miles. From the foot of the Rocky Mountains to the foot of Selkirk Mountain the work is described as being light, the country being flat; distance, 30 miles. From the eastern foot of the Selkirk Mountain to the mouth of Eagle Pass, the work may be considered moderate for mountain work, the grading being largely through gravel; distance, 64 miles. The remaining distance from the mouth of Eagle Pass to Kamloops, 161 miles, is described as medium, the cuttings being rock, clay and gravel. This makes in all 780 miles remaining to be constructed north of Lake Superior and the part to connect the end of the track at the summit of the Rocky Mountains with the works which are in progress by the Government at Kamloops. The summit of the Rocky Mountains is 5,300 feet, and of the Selkirk Mountain, 4,316 feet. I may say, Sir, that down to the present hour the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have prosecuted their work with unabated vigour, and have, so far as carrying out the contract into which they entered with the Government is concerned, left no ground of complaint as to the mode in which they have proceeded. It is well known, Sir, to the House that in October last the Company applied to the Government for the purpose of obtaining their support to guarantee the interest on the outstanding stock of the Company—some $65,000,000. The first proposal, as the House is aware, was to obtain a guarantee on the whole $100,000,000 of stock issued, and it was supposed by the Company at that time—in fact, I believe they had reason to suppose—that no difficulty would be experienced in obtaining the amount of money necessary to guarantee the payment of a 3 per cent. dividend on the whole of their stock, the entire $100,000,000. That was subsequently found to be impracticable, and an amended proposition was submitted to limit the guarantee to all the outstanding stock, the $65,000,000, and to provide that the remaining $35,000,000 should be deposited with the Government, and no more stock issued except as the Company deposited the money necessary to furnish the guarantee of 3 per cent. It will not be necessary for me to discuss at any length the reasons which obliged the Company to adopt the course they did. It is perfectly familiar to the House that a demoralization in railway stocks occurred in New York in regard to all the trans-continental lines of railway, and everything connected with them, which rendered it impossible for the Company to sell the remaining stock—upon which they depended to obtain the money to complete the Canadian Pacific Railway with the promptness and vigour with which they were performing that work—except at a ruinous sacrifice. I do not intend, Sir, on the present occasion, to go at length into the causes that especially affected the Canadian Pacific Railway. I want, in making a calm, dispassionate, business statement of the position of that great work, and of the question as it now stands before this House—I want to avoid, as far as possible, raising any matter of a controversial character. But, Sir, I may say to the House, what is very well known, that in the United States, parties connected with the Northern Pacific Railway, the Central Pacific Railway, and the Union Pacific Railway—in fact, all the trans-continental lines of railway—parties, who a few years ago regarded the proposal to construct a Canadian Pacific Railway by the people of the Dominion as entirely illusory, and as a matter that need give them little concern—have gradually, but latterly very rapidly, been changing their opinions with regard to that great work. They have found that the vigour with which the work has been prosecuted has rendered the early completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway a question far removed from the region of the merely theoretical; and, Sir, they have learned, upon enquiry and examination, when their attention was drawn to the subject, that Canada possesses advantages with respect to a trans-continental railway that would render it a formidable rival, either of the Northern Pacific, or the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railway. And the result of the discovery of the greater advantages which a Canadian Pacific line of railway would possess, has been a great increase in the active hostility of all the trans-continental lines of railway—and, I may say, of all the lines in the United States connected with those trans-continental lines—towards the Canadian project. And, Sir, I wish I was able to say that the hostility to this great national work—for national work it is—was confined to those lines of railway that might be considered rival lines in a foreign country. I say, I wish I was able to say that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and this great national enterprise had not suffered from any hostility within, as well as without, our borders. But, Sir, it is well known that attempts to decry this great work, attempts to break down this great enterprise—aye, Sir, even if it involved breaking Canada down, as far as possible, along with it—have been entered upon, not only in the New York, but in the London markets, with very determined vigour; but, as I said before—and I do not intend to detain the House longer on that subject—the result is well known—the value of the Canadian Pacific Railway stock became so impaired and weakened as to render it impossible for the Company to obtain money from that source sufficient to enable them to prosecute to rapid completion their great enterprise. Now, Sir, the House will remember that when Parliament was providing for the means of constructing this great work, the Government who submitted the proposition to the House were told that we were granting an unduly large subsidy for its accomplishment. We were told that, in addition to the work we were performing to cost $28,000,000, we were giving $25,000,000 in money, and an inordinate quantity of land, when we added a grant of 25,000,000 acres, as so great a subvention was not necessary in order to provide fully for the completion of the work. Well, Sir, that land was estimated—I think I may say without much controversy—as worth about $2 an acre. Assuming, therefore, that that was all true, it would involve to the people of Canada, for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, a cost of $103,000,000. But our answer was this—and it has been thoroughly established by subsequent experience—that great as was the quantity, valuable as was the character of those lands, valuable as they would be rendered by the construction of this great line of railway and the branches which the Company proposed to construct in connection with it, it would not be possible for them to realize from those lands the money that would be required to carry on the work. That, Sir, has been abundantly borne out by the facts. With every effort that was possible being made to realize on the lands, the time came when it was apparent that, great as was the value of the property of the Company, it would be impossible alone by issuing the stock of the Company, to obtain the means to carry on the work. As I stated before, the resources of the Company became impaired, and if they threw the additional $35,000,000 of their stock on the market, it would be sacrificed without their obtaining the means expected. Now, Sir, it will not be necessary, with the papers before you, for me to refer to the mode in which the dividends guaranteed on the stock were provided. You are aware that the Company provided over $3,000,000 in cash, and you are aware that they provided for the payment of all the remaining money required to warrant the

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Government in giving the guarantee, by securities of the most ample description. I do not think there is any person in this House or out of it, who will be disposed to question the desirability, on the part of the Government, of securing the prompt completion of this great work, by giving their assistance in the form that was proposed. The Government has scarcely transcended the usual borrowing powers of a Government. So far as the $8,710,240 providing a guarantee for five years was concerned, of course no question can arise. That was entirely within the borrowing powers of the Government, and it was but a slight excess of that power—although certainly one requiring the approval of this House, and one which the Government felt every confidence in asking this House to approve—to accept undoubted securities for the payment of a portion of that money at a deferred period; thus enabling, as was to be desired, this work to be prosecuted with the same vigour as that which had hitherto characterized its construction. There is another point to which I might be expected to draw the attention of the House for a few moments in connection with the guarantee, and that is that in addition to the land grant bonds that were deposited to secure payment of the entire amount required to provide the guarantee for the whole ten years for which the Government became responsible, a postal subsidy estimated at $3,000,000 was taken as a part security. I am quite certain those who will take the trouble to look into that question will find that the Government were amply warranted in doing this—that in fact it was no novelty to use a postal subsidy in that way. It was known that we were now paying at the same rate to the Canadian Pacific Railway, as to other railways, a large postal subsidy; and that in a very short time, assuming the work to be completed, and even in the absence of the completion of the work, we should be paying over $120,000 a year for postal subsidy, which would represent the $3,000,000 that were taken as a security, without regard to the transport service they would perform for the Department of the Interior in connection with the management of Indian Affairs and the Mounted Police. But, I say, altogether apart from that, it is known that, at the same rate paid to other railways, they will become entitled to a subsidy of no less than $204,000 a year for the transmission of mails on the completion of the road, representing at an early day a much greater amount than the $3,000,000 that was estimated to be covered. Taking the second lien upon the $5,000,000 of bonds deposited with the Government to secure the operation of the line for ten years—and as I shall show by-and-by a security that certainly we now know never will be required to be called into operation, a first lien upon a further sum of $5,250,000 in bonds—abundant security was taken, independently of the postal subsidy, for the entire amount that the Government were required to guarantee. It thus became a question with the Government whether for the purpose, not of enabling the Canadian Pacific Railway to complete their contract—I wish the House to understand at the very outset that no change is proposed by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in regard to their contract—that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, taking into account the property they own, the lands that they possess—putting a more moderate estimate of value upon them than that of hon. gentlemen opposite, and one in which I think the House will be prepared to concur—putting the most moderate estimate on the value of their lands, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company feel that they are able to carry their contract to completion without the alteration of a letter. There is no proposal now submitted to the House to change a single line of the contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is to stand now as it stood on the first day when we laid it on the Table of the House. Instead of its value having decreased, every one knows that with every succeeding year the Canadian Pacific Railway has established itself in a stronger and stronger position. Every one knows that the experience in the sale of a portion of their lands—between three and four millions of acres already sold by the Company—leaves no room to doubt that in that subvention they have ample means for the completion of the work, with the additional means which they themselves have already provided in connection with its progress and construction. But the question that was submitted for the consideration of the House, and that was submitted for the consideration of the Government when the Company asked for this guarantee by the Government, upon depositing money and securities to represent every dollar of it, was whether that step should be taken, not to enable the Canadian Pacific Railway to fulfil their obligations and to carry out the contract they had made with the Government, but for the purpose of anticipating the time provided in that contract by over five years; and the Government believed they were consulting the best interests of Canada in adopting measures which, without cost and risk to the country, would accomplish so great and desirable an object as that of opening to the people of this country all that trans-continental line of communication from end to end in that brief period. It is well known that the Northern Pacific Railway Company, by making a great effort, have completed their line running from Lake Superior to the Pacific Ocean. It is well known that traffic once established in a groove is very difficult to be drawn from it and placed upon another line: and we regarded it, therefore, as the first consideration in the interests of the country—looking at this as a great trans-continental line of railway—that at the earliest possible moment there should be a line of communication for travel and traffic extending across this Continent on Canadian territory, and enabled to draw to its support all that travel and all that traffic which could possibly be drawn to it from our own country and the country which lies to the south of us. Under these circumstances, the Government adopted, with some modifications, the proposals made by the Company and provided for the guarantee. I need not tell the House that it resulted in failure—that all the expectations that the Company had formed, and that the Government had formed—and I am able to say capitalists without exception in Canada, in the United States and in England, had formed—to the effect that the result of that guarantee would be to give all the means required to the Company to enable them to carry on their work with such vigour and promptness as would secure its completion by the end of 1885, signally failed. They were found to be erroneous. But if the Company were wrong, if the Government were wrong, the error was one in which financial men and capitalists without exception on both sides of the Atlantic shared, because no doubt was entertained as to what the result would be. The war, however, against trans-continental railway stock was intensified, the efforts to bear the stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway were intensified, and then the result was that the project ended in signal failure—not only in failure but in disaster. Because, as it will be readily seen, the Company found themselves in this position: that having failed to obtain such increased value for their stock, as every person supposed they would obtain, they were left without the $8,710,240 of their cash deposited with the Government, an amount locked up which otherwise they would have had at their command for the purpose of going on with the construction of the line. So that instead of obtaining the object expected, the very contrary occurred, and the embarrassment and difficulty that had before been experienced by them in providing for a rapid and vigorous completion of the line was intensified. Under these circumstances, the Government submit the Resolutions that are now on the Table for the consideration of this House. And I think, after I have had an opportunity of placing in the most frank and open manner before the House all the questions connected with this Company, every transaction so far as I am able to judge that is interesting to this House in regard to their position, that the House will come to the conclusion that the Government are not only warranted in submitting, but that they would fail in their duty to the House and to the country if they did not submit the propositions that are now placed before you, not with a view to enable the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to derive advantage, or to realize larger returns for the property that they possess, but for the purpose of enabling the people of Canada to have finished within two years this great trans-continental line of railway, and to derive all the advantages that are calculated to flow from the prompt and vigorous completion of this work. Now, Sir, the Company ask that we should postpone, or rather I should say that the Resolutions before you ask that the Company may postpone, the payment of $7,380,912 for the guarantee for five years. But they leave with the Government ample security, as provided for under the original arrangement, for that postponement. Practically the proposal before the House is only a change of the payment of the $2,853,912 that was to be paid on the first day of this month. That is the change from the arrangement already made in relation to the guarantee. It is proposed to postpone the payment of that guarantee for five years, and to loan the Company $22,500,000, to be repaid on the first day of May, 1891. The conditions of that advance may briefly be stated as follows: In the first place, it is proposed that in future the payment for work done shall be placed upon a different basis from that which was contained in the contract. That is not a real but simply a nominal change in the terms of the contract. When the contract was made, it was provided that, upon the completion of every 20 miles, the Company should receive payment, according to the terms of the contract, on the 20 miles completed; but it is now found that, owing to the character of the work which remains to be done, it would be impossible, with any justice to the Company or to the Government, to carry on that mode of payment. Take the country north of Lake Superior, the whole distance is easy until you come to the 95 miles of enormously heavy work, and, if you paid them pro rata according to the contract for the number of miles done, you would not have left the money that would be required to perform the work on the 95 miles where it is inordinately heavy. So, in the Rocky Mountains, the 30 miles that is comparatively easy would not bear any proportion to the other work that remained to be done; and it is only proposed to make a change that is based upon the principle upon which payments are made by the Government in relation to almost all the other contracts—I think I may say to all the other contracts, on the canals, on railways, and on everything of the kind—which is to pay for the amount of work done. The whole section from Sudbury Junction, to which the line is now completed, to Nepigon, north of Lake Superior, it is provided shall be covered by a certain sum of money, and, instead of paying for each 20 miles as it proceeds, which, as I say, would leave you without the means of completing the 95 miles of the heaviest portion of the work, it is proposed to adopt the same principle that is adopted in relation to the payments on all similar contracts and almost all the works under the charge of the Government, to pay them pro rata as the work proceeds, according to the value of the whole work. In the whole distance there is a certain sum of money to be paid. The Chief Engineer makes his estimate of the cost of the work in order that payment be made for the work done in proportion to its value to the whole; and, having arrived at that conclusion, he gives his certificate that the work done, in regard to that which remains to be done, warrants the payment of a certain sum of money. As I have said, it was indispensable, in the interests of the Government as well as in the interests of the Company, that that change should be made, in order to provide pro rata, as was the intention, for the work performed by the Company for the Government. Then, Sir, it is proposed to advance this $22,500,000, not to pay a dollar of it to the Company except as the work is performed, in relation to the whole work remaining to be done; and so that, when the $22,500,000 is exhausted, together with the $12,710,788 of cash subsidy remaining in the hands of the Government, the Government shall have the certainty of the work being completed from end to end. The conditions on which it is proposed to give that advance may be briefly stated in this way. First, there is the charge already described for securing the payment of the guarantee at the end of the five years. Then, there is the forfeiture, upon default of the interest or principal for twelve months, of the entire property of the Company. There is the prohibition of any further charge upon the property, except for the sole purpose of repaying the advances. It is quite possible—and it may be necessary more specifically to provide for that, to enable the Company to realize the means of promptly paying the Government, when the opportunity may present itself—it may be found, in fact, quite desirable to provide that they shall have the authority to establish a charge upon the land grant, for the purpose of providing the means of wiping out their indebtedness to the Government, whenever a suitable opportunity may present itself. Then, there is the removal from the market of the balance of the $35,000,000 of stock remaining to be issued. That remains in the hands of the Government, and, with this entirely under its control, not a dollar of that stock, even if they provided the amount as arranged in the first agreement for the guarantee of 3 per cent., can be issued until such time as the Government agree, and then it can only be issued with the consent of the Government, for the purposes of the road, or for the purpose of repaying the loan to the Government. In order to take entire control of that matter, in order to place the Government in the position that if the value of the stock rose to a point where we thought it ought to be sold, and the money returned to the treasury by the Company that had been advanced, we have power to secure the sale of that stock and thus recover the amount of indebtedness to the Government. I need not refer to the proposal to relinquish the security of $1,000,000 for construction; because, Sir, I need not remind hon. gentlemen opposite that the object of taking $1,000,000 security for the construction of $100,000,000 worth of work could only be of one kind, and that was for the purpose of getting an effective guarantee of the bond fides of the Company, and securing ourselves against the possibility of their failing to go on with the work. The House knows that in every contract that we make, as the work advances, it is customary to give up the security that has been deposited for the construction of the work—5 per cent. the security deposited is given up to the contractors as the progress of the work warrants the Government in the conviction that the work will be carried to completion. So in this case, seeing that a large amount of money not received from Government sources has gone into this work, the Government feel that it would only be unnecessarily hampering the Company to lock up, without the slightest cause or necessity, this $1,000,000 that, to a very large extent, they are already entitled to receive back according to the principle we have adopted in the contracts of all kinds with the Government. Now, Sir, I may say that is the proposal—to postpone with ample security for its payment already placed in the hands of the Government by the Company, to postpone the payment of the $7,300,912 for the guarantee, and to advance, as the work proceeds, $22,500,000. Now, Sir, I will, no doubt, be asked if the Company have shown the Government that they have a fair and a legitimate right to ask for that assistance in order to ensure the completion of this work within two years. And, Sir, in regard to that matter I will lay before the House a frank statement of the affairs of the Company, as given by themselves, which, I think, will remove all doubt as to the position they have placed themselves in so as to entitle them to the confidence of the Government in regard to this application. I propose to give a statement of expenditures made by the Company, and the source from which they have obtained their money and receipts, which, I think, will satisfy every hon. member in this House how baseless are the statements that have been made broadcast over this country, that the moneys received from the Government, and from Government sources, have been used by the Company outside the contract for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway; and that, instead of taking the large, liberal, and generous subvention that this Government asked Parliament to provide for the construction of that road, and putting it into this great work, they have used those means derived from the Government for the purpose of engaging in outside enterprises apart from the Canadian Pacific Railway, and are thus not entitled to come to the Government and seek for any assistance, even for so desirable a purpose as that of securing the construction of this great work five and a half years before the time provided in the contract. The statement placed in my hands by the Company shows as follows:—

Now, Sir, I propose for a moment to review the character of those expenditures. But before doing so I may be asked: what evidence I have that this is an accurate statement of the expenditures and receipts of the Company? And anticipating this question, although of course I was bound to accept the statement of the Company as a fair and honourable exhibit of their actual receipts and expenditure, I felt it was right, on a matter of so much importance, to be in a position to give Parliament the most abundant and accurate information, and to show beyond the possibility of question that there was no doubt as to the accuracy of the statements placed in my hands as to the expenditure and revenue of the Company. And for that purpose the Government nominated one of the ablest accountants in the public service, a gentleman who had been employed by the late Government on financial questions of the gravest importance, as one of the ablest gentlemen whose services they could command—Mr. Miall, Deputy Minister of Inland Revenue, was asked by the Government to go to Montreal in connection with Mr. Schreiber, the Chief Engineer, whose familiarity with the whole question would be of great value in an investigation of that kind, for the purpose of making such an investigation of the books and statements of the Company as would assure beyond question the accuracy of the statements they had placed in my hands. I will read an extract from the report of those gentlemen, which, I think, will be found to be entirely satisfactory on that point.

Mr. BLAKE. I suppose the hon. gentleman intends to lay that report on the Table.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do; I will lay the paper on the Table. I think, perhaps, Mr. Speaker, as this is an important paper, I may as well read the correspondence. The following is the letter addressed by me to those gentlemen:—

“OTTAWA, 28th January, 1884.

“DEAR SIRS,—I have to request that you will, with all convenient speed, proceed to Montreal, with a view to investigate the books and accounts of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company so far as such examination may be necessary to enable you to verify certain statements of revenue and expenditure which have been laid before my colleagues and myself by that corporation.

“I am aware that an exhaustive and detailed audit would entail the labour of weeks, if not months. This is not expected. But you are required to make such examination as a prudent business man would desire to make before lending capital to or entering into terms of co-partnership with a respectable commercial firm. A copy of the Company's statements is transmitted herewith.

“I am, yours faithfully,

The following is the report made by those gentlemen on their return:—

“OTTAWA, 2nd February, 1884.

“To the Hon. Sir CHARLES TUPPER, C.B., K.C.M.G., “Minister of Railways and Canals.

“SIR,—In obedience to your letter of instruction (bearing date the 28th ult.) we proceeded to Montreal on the morning of the 28th ult.

“On arriving at the offices of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company we were informed that the President was temporarily absent from the city; but upon communicating to Mr. Drinkwater the nature of our errand, he at once placed a room at our disposal, and stated that all the books, accounts and vouchers would be cheerfully produced for our inspection.

“He then summoned the Chief Accountant of the Company (Mr. Ogden) and requested him to hold himself and staff in readiness to furnish any assistance or information required, when we forthwith proceeded with our investigation. We found the books of the Company under Mr. Ogden's able supervision, to be faultlessly kept, both as to system and detail; so that far less difficulty than we anticipated was experienced in establishing an independent trial balance as the basis of further operations.

“Working backwards from this point by a process of analysis familiar to accountants, sufficient detail was obtained not only to check the figures presented by Mr. Stephen, but also to examine into the details of each sub-head, where such examination was deemed to be necessary, and to prove that the general results were arrived at without the aid of any improper manipulation of accounts, directly from the original entries made in proper chronological order from the various subsidiary books.

“We do not wish to convey the impression that the nature of the expenditure under each sub-head has to any considerable extent challenged our attention. Such an examination would, necessarily, occupy a considerable longer time than was at our disposal and would have transgressed the limits of our instructions. Neither did we examine into the matter of the distribution of stock.

“As the result of our investigation, however, we have no hesitation whatever in submitting our opinion that the statements furnished by the President and placed in our hands for verification, represent truthfully the actual condition of the Company's affairs as portrayed by the books of the Company.

“It is understood that if any further information is required in respect of specific items, the books are still open to our further scrutiny, whenever you may so determine or require.

“The books of the land grant bond trustees were also placed before us, for investigation, and were found practically to agree with the statement made by the President.

“We have the honour to be, Sir,
“COLLINGWOOD SCHREIBER,
(Signed) “E. MIALL.”

Now, Mr. Speaker, having shown to the House the steps that have been taken to verify the Company's statement, I may ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments while I draw attention to the character of those expenditures. In the first instance, there can be no question as to the expenditure, $23,078,929, on the main line from Callander to the crest of the Rocky Mountains. Then we come to the expenditure of $3,759,793, being for Algoma Branch and Western Division branches, 295 miles being under construction in all. I think, Sir, that there is no hon. member who will not say that in the interests of Canada it would be impossible to find any expenditure to which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company could apply their money more important to the success of the enterprise, more important to the character of the work itself, or of more vital importance to the settlement and development of the great North-West. Every mile of those branches, constructed without any aid whatever from the Government, is calculated, I say, to serve the purpose that the Government had in view in making the contract—the development and advancement of the country, perhaps to a still greater degree in many instances, than a portion of the trunk line itself. I need not detain the House upon this item of $4,025,604 for supplies. These supplies are rails and other materials for the purpose of carrying on the construction of the work. Rolling stock, $6,130,792, is, of course, part of the contract on the main line between Callander and Port Moody, demanded under the contract, and every dollar is expended directly for the purposes for which the contract was made. The expenditure of $552,251 for lake steamers is also an expenditure made for the purpose of facilitating the development of the work of carrying on the traffic and business of the country; and of, at the same time, promoting the construction of the portion which remains to be completed. The plant, tools, and outfit for construction are, of course, incidental to the construction, $187,000, making for that service $6,870,045, upon which, I think, no possible question will arise. Then, we have dividend on stock, $2,128,000, which was, of course, incidental to the sale of the stock, and necessary to enable them to realize the $2,535,628 obtained by the sale of the stock, for the purpose of constructing the road. The interest, &c., paid on land grant bonds, $372,000, was, of course, a necessary expenditure to realize the money they received from the land. The deposit of $8,710,240 with the Government on the guarantee was an expenditure also made directly for the same object as the payment of the dividend on the stock—the object of furnishing money for the completion of the contract. The extension from Callander to Montreal and Brockville, $3,270,351; rolling stock, $900,000; shops, $516,032; tools and machinery, $352,230, and real estate for termini, $390,790, will be admitted, I think, by every person familiar with this question, to be expenditures of the most valuable character to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Every person is aware, Sir, that in the construction of a great trans-continental line, it was of the greatest importance to the character of the undertaking and to its standing, its position, and its success, that instead of commencing at an unknown point, such as Callander—which it would be impossible to make the financial men of the world understand; it was of the most vital consequence to the success of the work, in order to obtain the confidence of the public to carry it on to completion and to make it successful after it was completed—that they should bring that terminus at Callander down to the city of Montreal, where it could be fairly and honestly claimed that there was an inter-oceanic line, extending from the Atlantic communication on the one side to the Pacific on the other. I think, Sir, it will not be necessary for me to say one word to show that, in the interests of Canada and of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, it was impossible to make an expenditure which was more calculated to benefit the country and benefit the enterprise than the expenditure involved in carrying the terminus from Callander to Montreal. This makes an expenditure upon which, I think, there will be no difference of opinion of $54,728,500. Then, there are further items covering in all the sum of $3,966,865, for advances and accounts receivable; and these stand in a somewhat different position. It is quite true they are embraced, and they may be all held to be fairly embraced, within their charter. It provides for an extension to the seaboard, and the expenditure in connection with the St. Lawrence and Ottawa, and the South-Eastern are for purchases of the bonds of those roads and are, of course, a good asset held by them for the purpose of reaching the Atlantic seaboard from Montreal. The acquisition of the Atlantic and North-Western charter, and the expenditure under that charter of a considerable sum of money in connecting the Canadian Pacific Railway with the Grand Trunk Railway by a line around the mountain at Montreal, is, of course, embraced within their charter. The expenditure to secure a controlling interest in the South-Eastern Railway was, of course, for the purpose of enabling them to place themselves in a position to draw traffic to the Canadian Pacific Railway, from the Atlantic seaboard, whether at New York, or Boston, or Portland, or St. Andrews, or St. John or Halifax. We, looking at it from the Maritime Provinces, are extremely anxious that they should go to a Canadian port; and I am glad to know that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company attach the greatest possible importance to getting the shortest line to the seaboard that they can, by an open winter port in Canada. The expenditure in connection with that matter—whether by connection with the International Railway, and thus making the shortest line that can be obtained from a Canadian port, open at all seasons of the year—is an expenditure which I believe every person who wishes to see this great trans-continental line of railway successful in drawing down traffic and travel from every section of the country, would be only too glad to see them make. It may be said that they aim also at obtaining access to Portland, Boston, and New York. Suppose they do. I say the Canadian Pacific Railway would fail in their duty in the great enterprise in which they are concerned, would fail in their duty to Canada if they did not take every practicable and feasible measure of drawing every pound of traffic they can draw from any port in the United States upon a Canadian line to be carried across the continent. Under these circumstances, I say, the expenditure which is made in that regard is one which, I believe, will commend itself to business men—and I am sure it will to railway men—as a sound and prudent consideration. I only regret that they did not when acquiring a railway to the city of Montreal go on to the real ocean port of Canada in summer, the city of Quebec; and I believe that it will be found necessary by that Company, notwithstanding that they have reached ocean communication at Montreal—I believe the interests of the Company will involve the necessity of their securing direct and complete through communication with the great ocean port of Canada, for the summer season, at the harbour of Quebec. I have no doubt that every measure will be taken that can be taken to attain that important object. I trust that, by the shortest line to the sea, reaching ports in the Maritime Provinces by a shorter line than the Intercolonial, and by connecting the links which have been shadowed forth, in connection with this matter, they will never rest until they have come, not only to the harbour of Quebec for summer, but that, looking to the vital importance of having, as they will have, a great ocean port there in summer—the vital importance of having a Canadian port open throughout the whole year, winter as well as summer—they will never rest until they have established a route of communication to St. John, to Halifax, to St. Andrew's, and ultimately to Louisburgh. I say, Sir, the fact that when they have reached the harbour of Louisburgh, they will make it the interest of every man who has a letter to send or who wishes himself to pass in the shortest period of time from London to New York to go through that harbour, will compel the Company, in the interest of this great national work, not to rest short of attaining even that point as the ultimate object. But I have no hesitation in saying that the distance between Montreal and Halifax in winter can be so shortened by the measures that are in contemplation as to give every reason to believe that the Company will find it their interest, until Louisburgh is reached, to make Halifax at all times—in the winter at any rate—the great grain shipping port for the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now, Sir, with reference to the $600,000 of stock subscribed by the Canadian Pacific Railway in the Canadian North-West Land Company, that stands upon the same footing as many of these other measures. Why did they subscribe $600,000 of stock in the North-West Land Company? Every person knows, who has been watching the proceedings of the Company, that they made a large sale of land to the Canadian North-West Land Company, and it was of great moment that the stock of that Company should be subscribed—should be placed in such a position as its inherent value deserved, for the purpose of rendering the Company's land operations successful, and thus giving them the means for promoting the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The advance to the contractors in construction of $600,000, I understand to stand thus: A construction company was formed, embracing a large number of the members of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, if not the Company itself, with a number of outside individuals who were prepared to go into a construction company, and the works were carried on by it. I expect, in response to the application of the hon. leader of the Opposition, to lay on the Table of the House, in the course of to-morrow, the contract with that Company, which will disclose its exact character; but I may say that, so long as the means were found by the construction company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company combined, to vigorously carry on the work, it was carried on in that way. But, when the time came—when, owing to the stringency of the money market in New York, and the depreciation of the property of the Company, it was impossible to obtain the means to carry on the work—they fell back on the principle of a guarantee in order to obtain funds from another source, and they closed their accounts with the construction company, to whom it appears they had made advances at that time of $600,000. Then there is an item of sundry advances, carriers' back charges, and other matters, amounting to $473,281, which are incidental expenses connected with every great undertaking of this kind. The next amount is the sum of $184,614 paid in respect of securities deposited with the Government, in lieu of the $1,000,000 cash deposit, to secure the completion of the contract. As the House is aware, the Government agreed to release the $1,000,000 in cash, and to accept in its stead, $1,680,000 of Credit Valley Railway bonds. It was found by my predecessor, the late hon. Minister of Public Works and has been found by myself and the hon. Minister of Public Works beside me, necessary—in order to give additional facilities to contractors to complete their work—to exchange the original cash deposit for real estate or a security of some other kind; and this action of the Government was simply in conformity with the usual plan, adopted by the late Government as well as by this Government, in relation to all other contracts. And I presume—in fact I know—that this payment of $484,614 represented stock belonging to Mr. Stephen in the Credit Valley Railway, and if that deposit is released, this money will go back to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, to be used in prosecuting the enterprise. Now, Sir, having given as briefly as I could the character of these expenditures, I propose to show a little more in detail how the account will stand. On the main line, between Callander and Port Moody—on the eastern and central sections—with improvements made on the Government line west of Cross Lake, the expenditures have been as follows:—

I trust under these circumstances we have heard the last, either in this House or out of it, of the unfounded statement—as I have proved it to be from the figures that I have submitted to the House—that this Company has taken the money received under this contract from the Government for the purpose of building a line of railway from Callander to Kamloops and expended it on outside enterprises, apart from and without any reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway. If we have not, I think we ought to have reached that point in the discussion. I may draw the attention of the House for a moment to the property that is to be covered by the lien. The Canadian Pacific Railway have property which, if realized at its fair value, is abundant to complete their contract without any assistance from any source. Having an enterprise on hand that has established itself beyond controversy as an enterprise based on a sound commercial foundation, they are in a position to say that with anything like a fair realization of the value of the property they possess they do not require assistance from any person. They are in a position to say to the Government, we can fall back upon our contract, we can disband our force of 9,000 men now operating near Lake Superior, we can draw in our expenditure, and by 1st May, 1891, we shall be enabled to sell land enough to provide with the net revenue for operating, all that we require. We shall have the means of completing our contract; but if you want that great work completed by the end of 1885, we ask you, not to give us an additional dollar, but to advance to us as the work proceeds the amount of $22,500,000 for that purpose. I have told the House in the first place that they do not ask an additional dollar of subvention for the purpose of completing the contract they have made with the Government. I have told the House that the Company have the strongest confidence in the value of the subvention already given; that with the amount that can be obtained from the outside public, and that has been obtained from the outside public, they have the means of completing their contract. But while they do not ask the House to give them a single additional dollar they ask us to use the credit of this country—which, thanks to the management of my colleague, the hon. the Minister of Finance, never stood in a higher position—to obtain the means of accomplishing this great national work by the end of 1885; and that without imposing the slightest shadow of a shade of additional burthen upon the Government or upon the country for the repayment of every dollar by the time the contract was to be completed, the 1st May, 1891. I say that if this is the position in which they are—and I think, I may venture to say, that hon. gentlemen opposite will not controvert the soundness of that position, will not question the fact that the security offered to the Government securing this temporary advance in order to quickly complete this great national work is abundant—we should not hesitate a single moment in giving that measure our support. Let me draw attention briefly to the property that is covered by this lien by the Canadian Pacific Railway. I have already said that, if there is either one year's default in the payment of interest or default in the payment of the $7,300,000 at the end of five years to cover the guarantee, or of the amount on the first day of May, 1891, if, by the first of May, 1892, every dollar of interest and every dollar of principal is not refunded to the Government of this advance, they propose that we shall become at once the possessors of the entire property of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. What does that embrace? That embraces the entire property from the ocean terminus at Montreal to Port Moody on the Pacific, it embraces the line on which they have paid over $3,000,000 between Montreal and Callander, it embraces the line on which they have expended over $2,000,000 the branch to Algoma Mills, it covers the 269 miles of branches in the North-West, it covers the three magnificent steamers that they are placing upon the route between Algoma Mills and Port Arthur, and it covers the entire 21,246,000 of acres of land that remain at the disposal of the Government. I shall not elaborate this question, because I do not anticipate that any hon. gentleman in this House will say for a single moment that the security is not so ample, that the value of the property pledged is not so enormous, as to place the possibility of failure or the possibility of our not having every dollar of principal and interest advanced to this Company refunded, beyond a question of any contingency or of doubt. I may say that this road will embrace, of the main line from Montreal to Port Moody, 2,886 miles, it will embrace 112 miles of branches belonging to the lines between Montreal and Callander, and it will embrace 395 miles of branches in the North-West, making a total of 3,393 miles of road. Let us look for a moment at the character of that security. The entire charge to which the road between Montreal and Callander is subject is $5,323,333. The land grant earned by the Company and unsold at this moment is 10,002,305 acres, and the land grant unearned 11,244,295 acres, or a total land grant to which the Company is entitled when the road is finished of 21,246,600 acres, over the portion that they have sold. This land is subject to a lien of $5,000,000, charged as security for the operation of the road, and, as I have already told the House, we do not propose in these Resolutions to release that lien. There is a very great misapprehension, I find, in some quarters on that point. There is no proposal in these Resolutions to release that $5,000,000 of land grant bonds held by the Government as a security for the operation of the line for ten years. I may say that that is rather a matter of sentiment than otherwise, so far as the Government is concerned. We wish the contract to remain intact as we made it, and we, therefore, do not propose to release that lien, although we feel the most confident assurance that it is unnecessary to retain a single dollar of that $5,000,000 of bonds for the security of a road when it is already shown that, with its unconnected portions, labouring under the greatest possible difficulty, its net earnings have been some $978,000 within the last nine months. That the road when constructed will be a valuable property there can be no reason to doubt. That the road this coming year will earn a very large amount of net profit over and above the expenses of its operation there cannot be a question; and, when opened from end to end, it is perfectly obvious that the Canadian Pacific Railway will be placed upon a thoroughly sound and complete commercial foundation, as one of the best lines of railway communication that is to be found in the country. Let us look a little more closely at what this 3,393 miles of road presents. I have already said that the entire land grant of the Company, the 21,246,000 of acres in the hands of the Government, over and above the small portion required to deal with the outstanding bonds, will be a security to the Government; and all the money derived from that source will come directly to the Government. The land grant bonds issued are $10,000,000. Of this $6,667,000 have been destroyed or cancelled. There are held by land companies, against instalments of purchase money not yet due, $846,000, making $7,513,000 of bonds that are either cancelled or held by land companies until they make payments on the lands purchased, and they then come in. That leaves the balance in the hands of the public $2,487,000. The balance of purchase money of land bought by individuals not yet due, applicable to the redemption of this, is $1,363,500, leaving a balance of issue not provided for of $1,123,500 in all. So that, when this $1,123,500 of land grant bonds that are outstanding is provided for, the whole 21,246,600 acres of land stand in the position of simply representing securities in the hands of the Government, or money that is to come into their hands as the land is sold. The extent then of the property placed in the hands of the Government is 21,246,600 acres of land and 3,393 miles of road. Suppose an improbable contingency—I will not say improbable—I will say an impossible contingency. There is not an intelligent man in this country who does not know that it is not within the range of possibility, with a lien of such an insignificant character upon a property of such magnificent proportions as I have shown this property to be, that any other result can happen than that every dollar of the principal and every dollar of the interest will come into the hands of the Government before a default of twelve months is made. I might dismiss that subject at once and forever from any consideration, were it not that it is just as well to look at a phase of this question that I think has not, perhaps, attracted public attention, and that is, the position the Government would be in, if this Company made twelve months' default in the payment of the last dollar of this money advanced for their assistance, or of the interest upon it at 5 per cent. Now, Sir, I have spoken of the lands and the railway. What will that road cost us, assuming that to-morrow after this arrangement is made, assuming that to-morrow they make default, assuming that to-morrow the Company were to abandon the work, what would be our position? And, Sir, it does not matter whether default is made now or at the end; the position, so far as these figures are concerned, will stand the same. I will show you what this 3,393 miles of road will cost the people of this country in case of the impossible contingency of default. I will put the land on both sides of the accident, the land which they have sold, and which netted them $2.36 an acre on 3,753,400 acres. But, for the purpose of meeting the views of hon. gentlemen opposite as closely as I can regarding the value of these lands, I will call them worth $2 an acre. If we call the subvention that goes to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company of 25,000,000 acres of land worth $2 an acre, it makes, with that which we pay in cash, and that which we paid in completed road, $103,000,000; and that, I think, was the favourite calculation of hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, Sir, I will charge ourselves with the 3,753,400 acres of land sold at $2 an acre, making $7,506,800; I charge the advance on rails of $339,235; I charge the cash subsidy paid, $12,289,212; I charge the proposed advance of $22,500,000; I charge the lien on the Canada Central and the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway, $5,333,333, assuming we will have to pay it if the road came into our hands; I charge the guarantee dividend on stock postponed, $7,193,460; I charge the land grant bonds sold with no sales to redeem them, $1,123,500; I charge the estimated cost of the work the Government has to build at $28,000,000; I charge the balance of cash subsidy, $12,710,788, and what is the total? I challenge the scrutiny of hon. gentlemen opposite; I will lay this paper on the table, and I invite the closest scrutiny and investigation as to whether this is not a fair statement of the position we would be in if, to-morrow, or at the end of two years, they made default, or if at any period they made default. In regard to this question, I say that is the account; every dollar is charged there that by any possibility the people of this country would have to pay for that 21,246,600 acres of land and 3,393 miles of road, without any charge upon it of any kind from end to end. The whole total is $97,001,328. That is what the road would cost the people of this country. The paper is as follows:—

STATEMENT showing that should the Company fail to fulfil the terms upon which the loan is made, the Government will be seized of possession of the following property for the sums named below:—

Land .....	21,246,600 Acres.
Railway and branches .....	3,393 Miles.

Which will Cost.

3,753,400 acres land (sold) say its value at $2 per acre.....	$ 7,506,800
Advance on rails.....	339,235
Cash subsidy paid.....	12,289,212
Proposed advance of.....	22,500,000
Lien on Canada Central and Q.M.O. & O. Ry.....	5,333,333
Guarantee dividend on stock postponed.....	7,193,460
Land grant bonds sold, with no sales of land to redeem them	1,123,500
Estimated cost of Government work.....	28,000,000
Balance of cash subsidy.....	12,710,788
Total .....	$97,001,328

Assuming the lands to be worth $2 per acre, the following would be the position:—

21,246,600 acres at $2 per acre.....	$42,493,200
3,393 miles of railway at $16,065 .....	54,508,128

Now, Sir, what more? What shall we do with the lands? I have charged the land they have used at $2 per acre, and put it on the other side of the account, and showed equally what the lands have realized, and what our position would be, and what the road would cost us. I credit the road with the 21,246,600 acres of land at $2 per acre, making $42,493,200 of cash that will come back to us out of the $97,000,000; and I take the completed road of 3,393 miles without a charge of a dollar upon it, from Montreal to Port Moody, costing the people of this country $54,508,128. That is the total. So, Sir, I say that in that position there is no intelligent man who will say, in the first place, that there is a shadow of ground for supposing that every dollar of this principal, and every dollar of this interest, will not be returned, as provided for in these Resolutions, to the coffers of Canada. And I say, further, that in case of that impossible contingency arising, we would stand in the position after selling the lands—at the value these gentlemen have put upon them, the lands that would come into our hands, along with the 3,393 miles of main line and branches from Montreal to Port Moody—at a cost to the people of this country of $54,508,128. Well, Sir, what will the Canadian Pacific Railway proper cost us?—that road, Sir, that hon. gentlemen opposite declared would cost $120,000,000. I need not remind the House that when we were discussing this question before, the hon. leader of the Opposition gave to the House a careful calculation of what it would cost the Government of this country to build a road from Callander to Port Moody, with not a mile of branches—the simple line from Callander to Port Moody; and the hon. gentleman stated that he had submitted the careful calculation in regard to this matter of his colleague, the former Minister of Public Works, who had been for years examining this question, and dealing with it as a Minister; and, Sir, these two hon. gentlemen came to the conclusion that the lowest amount for which the Canadian Pacific Railway could be built from Callander to Port Moody was—the hon. leader of the Opposition stated it—$120,000,000. He submitted the calculation of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) my distinguished predecessor, containing the result of that hon. gentleman's most careful and accurate calculation, which put the cost of the road from Callander to Port Moody at, more accurately, $121,700,000. Now, Sir, that is the value of the road, as stated by hon. gentlemen opposite—the lowest cost at which it could be built. It was true, Sir, I had estimated the cost of that line from Callander to Port Moody at $84,000,000, and my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, took the opportunity of reminding me that that was not a railway, it was nothing but a tramway. That was after I had stated to the House the character of the road we expected to be able to construct, and I was unable to controvert the statement of the hon. gentleman because it was true. I had stated that, in the position in which we were placed, we had no alternative but to go forward and do the best we could, and I showed that the smallest amount for which we could construct the most inferior line of railway that would give us communication from Callander to Port Moody, would be $84,000,000. I could not controvert the soundness of the hon. gentleman's calculation that the lowest cost for which a railway worth the name—as he called it—could be constructed was $120,000,000, or, to state more accurately the calculation of my distinguished predecessor, $121,700,000. Now, let us see what that is going to cost the people of this country under this Administration:

STATEMENT showing what the main line between Callander and Port Moody would cost the Government in the event of the Canadian Pacific Railway failing to repay the loan:

3,393 miles of main line branches and steamers cost.....	$54,508,128
The 457 miles of main line and branches between Montreal, Broekville add Callander, cost $23,550 per mile, amounting to .....	$10,762,736
The 395 miles of branches west of Callander at the cost shown by the Company's accounts.....	3,759,793
The steamers cost.....	552,251
Total .....	$15,074,780

Making a total of $15,074,780, which should be deducted from the above sum, $54,508,128, to arrive at the cost of the main line between Callander and Port Moody, showing the cost to Government of line between Callander and Port Moody..... $39,433,348

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear;" but I will invite him to place his finger upon the slightest flaw or error in this calculation. I will stake, Sir, my standing in this House on the accuracy of the statement I have presented; and if the hon. gentleman can show that I have not given a fair, frank and unvarnished statement of the figures and facts as they stand out in the public records of the country and the documents before the House, then I will admit that I have no claim to the confidence of the House in regard to the statement I am making on this question. I have said there is only one point which is a question of estimate at all. There are two points. The one is the estimate that the work with the supplies on hand can be completed for $27,000,000. Well, all I can say is that the Chief Engineer of the Department has gone carefully into that question, and, as the House is aware, has committed himself to the statement that he believes the figures of the Company may be accepted as accurate. With respect to the $28,000,000 of expenditures on works still under construction, I have given the House the figures down to the present moment, and I have no reason to believe they will be, to any considerable extent, increased. But I think the House will agree with me that there is a great difference between these amounts and $120,000,000, the estimate of the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Blake). And I may say, in giving the opinions of hon. gentlemen opposite, that the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) gave, on an important occasion, his estimate, saying there was no reason to suppose that the construction of the line, even if due time were given, could be brought within $100,000,000. I think, Sir, I have shown the House that between the estimates of the cost of this work on the part of the hon. leader of the Opposition, the leader of the late Government, and the Finance Minister of the late Government, and this amount of $39,433,348, there is a pretty large margin. Under these circumstances, the line from Callander to Port Moody, 2,541 miles, would cost the people of this country about $15,520 per mile, with ample equipment for service after completion. I need not discuss, I think, at any length, the question of the value of the land. I have placed the value of the lands sold by the Company at $2 per acre against the road, and have credited the Government with the remaining lands at $2 per acre, which hon. gentlemen opposite will not be likely to question. By reference to the speech made by the hon. leader of the Opposition it will be found that he estimated 11,500,000 acres of choice lands—as will be seen by Hansard, 1880, page 13—as worth $4.04 per acre, making $45,450,000; at $3.18, $35,775,000 and, addressing your humble servant, he said: "At your miserable $2, $22,500,000." So that the entire amount we are asked to advance to the Company by the proposed Resolutions for which there is not other ample security, is $22,500,000, which sum the hon. leader of the Opposition declared that 11,500,000 acres of land at my miserable figure of $2 would produce. So, I think, under those circumstances, the hon. gentleman is not likely to question the accuracy of the calculation which I have submitted to the House in which those lands are placed as worth $2 per acre. On 17th December, 1880, the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) gave the House the benefit of his calculation, and (page 16, Hansard), he said: "And 18,750,000 acres of selected land worth to-day, as lands are selling in the North-West, at least $37,500,000." And no person knew the value better than the hon. gentleman, because he was giving his attention to that question; and I am not at all certain, if I had been as free as the hon. gentleman to deal with lands in the North-West, I would not have been alongside him endeavouring to get the benefit of his judgment in making my selections. I am quite certain that from whatever quarter objection may come as to making this advance of $22,500,000 it will not come from that hon. gentleman who has himself declared, so long ago as 1880, before the contract for the rapid construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway was put in operation, when that country was comparatively dormant, when there was 100,000 less people located in the North-West than there are to-day, that 18,750,000 acres of selected lands were worth $37,500,000—that hon. gentleman, I say, will not question the ample character of the security, when instead of 18,750,000 acres we have 21,246,000 acres to cover any advance. There is no doubt that, however valuable the lands were then, they are much more valuable to-day. No person in this country has been more enthusiastic in regard to the value of lands in the North-West than myself. I never was more enthusiastic in regard to their value than I am to-day. I say that the value those lands had when the hon. member for South Huron made the speech to which I have referred, is much greater to-day, when there are facilities for access, not only by the construction of the trunk line, but by 239 miles of branch lines now in operation in the North-West. The hon. Mr. Anglin, your predecessor, said, on the 31st of December: "If the land is worth anything, if the country is worth settling at all, $2 must be a low average indeed." I may add that, so far as the sales of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have gone, they fully justify and corroborate the statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite as to the value of the lands, because, on the 3,753,400 of acres already sold, they have received a net price of $2.36 per acre. Now, Sir, I shall not have much more to say in regard to this question, except as to the value of the earnings of the road. I need not say to any person in the least degree acquainted with railway matters that, after all, the vital point, when you come to the question of value, is, what can the road earn? As to the ability of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to earn money, there was no doubt a large field for difference of opinion, for speculation, for calculation, as to whether the road would or would not be able to pay its working expenses. I will say nothing of those who were most despondent on that subject, but I will say that those who were most sanguine in this House and out of it, in regard to the character and position of the Canadian Pacific Railway as a commercial enterprise, were not prepared for the evidence which is already furnished, of the fact that all question as to the sound and commercial basis upon which that great national work is placed is completely set at rest. With the evidence already given of the power of the road to earn money, it is settled at once and forever that from this time forward, as the road advances, the receipts will be advanced; and that when we have this great trans-continental line completed from ocean to ocean we will be in the proud position of finding not only a great volume of traffic and travel drawn over the line, but that the railway will be in a position to make a more satisfactory return than was expected to those who had the enterprise and the courage, when it was a question of doubt, to put their means into this work and grapple with so gigantic an enterprise. I hold in my hand a statement of the gross earnings for 1883; and I find, estimating for the month of December, the amount not to be less than $5,420,931. It is true this includes an amount for the transportation of construction materials and supplies of $1,274,000. But there is no person at all acquainted with the development of the North-West who does not know that the development of that country, which is in its infancy at present, must be in the nature of things very rapid—so rapid that in every ensuing year more will be required in the way of transport to supply the demands of the population by the carriage of freight and passengers than the amount which is charged in this account for the transport of materials. But even deducting that amount and taking the actual traffic revenue, we have a sum of $4,146,913 as against $2,449,824, in 1882, an increase of $1,697,089, on the earnings of the road during the past year over the preceding year. Then, as I have already said, the earnings of the last nine months, and which I have treated as the receipts of the Company, are no less than $978,660. The announcement of that fact will show the House that the most sanguine expectations of the people who had most confidence in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway have been much more than verified by the actual facts as they are now before us. I shall only refer again for a single moment to the enterprise of the promoters. I refer to the gentlemen who originally formed the syndicate of the Canadian Pacific Railway; and I say, Sir, that the very difficulties with which they are now struggling, the very position in which they now find themselves placed, notwithstanding all that energy and enterprise and skill could do, is the best evidence of the courage with which they have grappled with this enterprise. It has been asked what money these gentlemen put into the Canadian Pacific Railway? Well, Sir, I have shown that if you deduct the last dollar received from every source, there is a large balance standing against the Company for money contributed, after all they have received from cash subsidy, from sales of their land and their town sites, from the net profits of operating the line and from the stock they could sell even at the low price at which it sold—deducting it all, you have a balance still standing against these gentlemen. And what is the fact? Of course there is no syndicate now; the syndicate ceased to exist, when they organized the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and subsequently put the stock of the Company on the open market then it ceased to become their property, and it is now with the shareholders that we have to deal. But I cannot forget that there would have been no Canadian Pacific Railway Company, there would have been no such gigantic progress as there now is if these gentlemen had not had the courage, the energy or the enterprise to risk their own money to the extent of $10,000,000, before asking the people of this country to put a single dollar into the purchase of stock. I say, that they had such confidence in this work that they imperilled their own capital; and if we had not had the good fortune to make this contract with men of great wealth, great resources, great energy and enterprise, and great experience, we would have had a most disastrous collapse in connection with this work, and all the progress and advancement and development which has taken place in connection with the rapid prosecution of this enterprise would not have existed to-day. I do not rest these Resolutions for a single moment on the low ground of any claim that these gentleman have. They have no claim. They made a contract and they received by the terms of that contract a magnificent subvention for the work, great as it was, that they were undertaking to deal with, and they have, no doubt, prospective profits of a large character before them. I do not ask for a moment that these Resolutions shall receive the consideration of the House on any such claim. I say, that if there was no disposition on the part of this House to meet their wishes and their interests in the slightest degree, these Resolutions must stand on the broader foundation of the interests of Canada itself. But, Sir, unless it can be shown, that apart from any claim, these gentlemen have that, in the interests of Canada, the means should be provided which are required to prosecute this work with the unabated vigour with which it has been prosecuted, then the Resolutions cannot commend themselves to the House. You will allow me to glance at a few figures—distasteful as they are to myself and to the House—which will show what has been the effect upon Canada of the prosecution of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

After Recess.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock, I had drawn attention to the important fact that in case, from any cause, the Company should fail to pay every dollar of the $22,500,000 to be advanced as the work proceeded, and for the purpose of carrying it to completion, or the interest thereon, the people of Canada would obtain the construction of the entire Canadian Pacific Railway—from Callander to Port Moody, for which Parliament provided a subvention (counting the land at $2 an acre) of $103,000,000—for less than $40,000,000; and I assumed that that being the case, such a contingency was entirely impossible—that under no circumstances could it be supposed that a Company, possessed of a property which I have shown to be of such immense value, would fail to provide for the payment of a comparatively small sum of money such as is provided for by these Resolutions; and, assuming that they did pay the money, Parliament and the country would obtain the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway on precisely the terms provided in the contract originally made with the Company. I showed further that such was the result of the operation of the line—yielding, as it has, a net profit of $978,660 within the last nine months from the disjointed and disconnected sections of the road, as they now are—that I might assume, as I think I had a right to do, that all question as to the commercial value of the enterprise was entirely set at rest, and that we might fairly come to the conclusion that the Canadian Pacific Railway might be regarded henceforth as placed upon a thoroughly sound commercial basis. I showed that the present Government had adopted the policy of their predecessors in regard to what is called the monopoly in the Province of Manitoba; that when the late Government undertook to carry on the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway as a Government work, they felt bound to protect the traffic of the road from being drawn off to lines to the south of us in the adjoining Republic, and had consequently refused to issue a proclamation which would charter lines within the Province of Manitoba to connect with American lines to the south. I said that the present Government, when we came into power, adopted that policy; that we felt, as our predecessors did, that, grappling with so gigantic a work as the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, we were bound to adopt every possible means of protecting our own line against having its traffic drawn to lines to the south—and, mark you, this was at a time when we did not contemplate at an early day carrying the Canadian Pacific Railway further than Port Arthur. I said further that when we made it obligatory upon the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to extend at once the line north of Lake Superior, giving us an all-rail route from Montreal to the Pacific Ocean, or from Callander to the Pacific Ocean, we felt obliged to give to that Company, upon which we imposed such onerous obligations, all the security that we had considered necessary, and that our predecessors in the Government had considered necessary, for the protection of the Canadian Pacific Railway. But I am glad to be able to state to the House that, although, true to that policy, the Government refused to give assent to the construction of lines within the Province of Manitoba to connect with American railways to the south, such is the evidence presented by the operation of the line so far as it has gone, such is the conclusion arrived at by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company itself in regard to the ability of a through line of the Canadian Pacific Railway to take care of itself, and by the inherent power of its own advantages to maintain its position notwithstanding any competition to which it may be subjected—although we have no power, under the contract, to touch any portion of the country in the North-West Territories, we are now in a position to review and to reconsider the policy of the late Government, and the policy of the present Government, as to the continued necessity for any long period of protecting the Canadian Pacific Railway against competition. I am glad to be able to state to the House that such is the confidence of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in the power of the Canadian Pacific Railway to protect itself, that when the line is constructed north of Lake Superior, the Government feel it will not be incumbent upon them to preserve the position they have hitherto felt bound to preserve, that of refusing to consent to the construction of lines within the Province of Manitoba, connecting it with American railways to the south. I can give no better evidence to the House and the country of the advanced position which we consider this great enterprise of the Canadian Pacific Railway has attained, than when I say that I feel it is consistent with what we owe to the people of this country and to that great national work, that the Government should not deem it incumbent on themselves to pursue the restrictive policy within the Province of Manitoba, which we have hitherto been obliged to maintain. When the House rose, I was about to draw its attention for a few moments to the effect the rapid construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway has had upon Canada, and I feel that it will not be wasting your time if, instead of giving you my own opinions in relation to that question or the general public sentiment with regard to it, I should for a few moments call your attention to figures and facts which place, I think, upon a foundation that nothing can shake, the evidence that the progress of Canada, under the rapid construction of this Canadian Pacific Railway, has surpassed anything that the most sanguine promoter of that great enterprise ever could have anticipated. Let me give you a statement of its effects upon the sale of land in the North-West. Our predecessors were engaged as actively as they felt was in the interests of the public service in the promotion of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. When we succeeded them we felt obliged, in accordance with the opinion we had always professed, to grapple somewhat more vigorously with that work; but we were not able, down to the time that it was in our power to make this contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway, to take such energetic action as I am glad to know has been taken by that Company since it received the approval of Parliament. I hold in my hands a statement showing the amount received on account of Dominion lands, homesteads, pre-emptions, sales, colonization companies, timber, grazing, minerals and miscellaneous receipts in Manitoba and the North-West Territories, and I asked the hon. Minister of the Interior to divide this so as to show, as far as possible, by contrast, the effect upon this important question of the contract made with the Canadian Pacific Railway. From the 1st July, 1870 to the 30th June, 1880, ten years, we received from all these services the sum of $817,426; from the 1st of July, 1880, to the 31st December, 1883, we received $3,572,836, giving the most palpable evidence possible to be given of the effect upon the development of the North-West Territories of the rapid construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. There is due during the next three years on pre-emptions, since 1880, in addition to the $3,572,836 received since the first of July, 1880, no less than $4,393,070. It would be impossible for me to give to the House more striking, more incontrovertible evidence of the effect upon the development of the North-West Territories caused by the rapid development and construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, than that furnished by the statement I have just submitted. Then, if you turn to the Department of Customs, what is the effect shown there upon the trade of that country by the rapid construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway? In 1880, the Customs receipts in Manitoba were $79,766, and in the North-West Territories, outside of Manitoba, $21,856; or a total receipt of Customs revenue in the North-West, including Manitoba, of $319,622. In 1882, the Customs receipts in Manitoba were $1,054,601, and in the North-West Territories, $51,755, or a total of $1,106,356. In 1883, they had risen from $297,000, in 1880, to $1,764,805 in Manitoba, and $68,137 in the North-West Territories; or a total of $1,832,942, in 1883, as compared with $319,622, in 1880. It would be impossible for any evidence to establish more conclusively the enormous and rapid development of any country, consequent upon any action taken by a Government, than these figures establish. The total amount of duty collected in Manitoba and the North-West Territories from January 1st, 1881, to December 1st, 1883, was $1,831,167 more than the total sum collected from June 30th, 1870, to December 31st, 1880. So that you have the striking evidence of a single year covering a larger amount of duties than the ten years previous. Now, Sir, I will draw your attention for a moment to the evidence given by another Department of the public service—that of Inland Revenue. It will hardly be necessary for me to allude to the fact that, under an Act which I had the honour of submitting to Parliament when Minister of Customs, in 1873, the Inland Revenue Department has not much to do, I am happy to say, in the North-West Territories, because, under that Act, we established what is called a Maine Liquor Law throughout the North-West Territories, which prevents the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors in any part of those Territories. The result of that enactment has abundantly justified it. It was with no small degree of satisfaction that I found, when it was proposed to take a section of the North-West Territory within the bounds of old Manitoba, that the people arose en masse against it, and protested against being carried into the Province of Manitoba on any other terms than that they could take the exclusion of intoxicating liquors which they then enjoyed in the North-West, and retain that provision when they became part of the Province of Manitoba. But in that Province, as you are aware, the Excise Department has had something to do, and the Excise revenue of 1879-80, was $65,841, with $1,567 for stamps in addition to Excise. The Excise revenue rose from $65,000, in 1879-80, and $96,000, in 1880-81, to $184,750, in 1882-83, and to $84,257 in the first six months of the fiscal year from July 1st to December 31st, 1883. From 1873-74 to 1879-80, six years, the Excise collected was $215,000, whereas, from 1880-81, to December 31st, 1883, two years and a half, it was $530,328. Then, if we come to another indication of the condition of the people and a very striking indication of the condition of the masses, of the people, the balances at the credit of depositors in the Government Savings Banks, we find additional evidence all pointing in the same direction. On December 31st, 1880, there were balances of $153,589. On December 31st, 1883, the balance had risen to $615,354, an increase since the contract was ratified with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company of over $400,000 of balances due to depositors in the Savings Banks. Then, if you take the evidence which the Post Office Department affords, you find the like gratifying indication of the remarkable progress of the country. I hold in my hand a statement showing the amount of mail matter posted at offices in Manitoba and the North-West during the period of one week in 1881, 1882 and 1883, and I am obliged to confine it to one week because I could not obtain the same general statistics in that Department as I was able to obtain in the others. In a single week in 1881, the letters and post cards mailed were 42,394, and the newspapers, books and samples, 6,552. For a week in March, 1882, there were 62,892 letters and post cards mailed, and 12,053 newspapers, books and samples. For the corresponding week in March, 1883, it had risen in a single year from 62,000 to 89,847, with 18,193 newspapers, books and samples. The money order business in Manitoba also exhibits a very striking illustration in the same way. The issues of money orders in 1875 were $26,452.85; in 1876, $29,139.73; in 1877, still less, $28,350.25. In 1878, when of course the change of Administration gave new life and impetus to the people, they rose to $46,751, in 1879 to $69,986, in 1880 to $172,396, and in six months to the 31st December, 1880, to $107,101, making a total from the 30th June, 1875, to the 31st December, 1880, of $480,000 issues of money orders in Manitoba. The amount of money order business done in Manitoba and the North-West Territories from the 1st of January, 1881, to the 31st December, 1883, was as follows: For the six months ended June 30th, 1881, $114,270; for the year ended June 30th, 1882, $398,241; for the year ended June 30th, 1883, $677,722; and for the six months ended December 31st, 1883, $347,854. From the 30th June, 1875, to the 31st December, 1880, the total issues were $480,000, while in the six months ended the 31st December, 1883, they amounted to $347,000, or nearly as much as in the whole of those previous years, and the total from the 1st January, 1881, to the 31st December, 1883, was $1,538,088. Now the most striking illustration perhaps of all, the most striking evidence of all of the rapid development of the North-West, that in which we are all the most interested, is the number of immigrants that we are enabled to attract into the country. We all know that we have in Manitoba and the great North-West Territories an unbounded field for development. We all know that in that country we have the great remaining wheat field not only of British North America but of North America itself. We all know that Mr. Consul Taylor, the American Consul for the last twenty years at Winnipeg, and a high authority, has publicly declared that three-fourths of the remaining wheat belt of North America lies to the north of the boundary line. We all know, in the first place, that the soil of that country exceeds in fertility the soil of any part, I may say, of the known world—certainly there is in the wheat bearing States to the south of us no parallel to be found to the fertility of the soil in the Canadian North-West. We know now, Sir, that we have 25,000,000 acres of magnificent farming lands that for fertility cannot be surpassed on any portion of the civilized globe. But, Sir, notwithstanding that we have that unbounded field for development, we were able to accomplish but little, and we never would have accomplished much, towards its development, but for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now, Sir, the best evidence we have that at this moment the eyes of the world, the eyes of those who, in the older and more thickly populated countries of Europe, are looking for a newer and better field for their labour and their exertions, is what is taking place now across the water. We know that their eyes are concentrated upon the North-West of Canada as they never would have been, and never could have been concentrated, but for the construction of a Canadian Pacific Railway. And, Sir, we know, not only that we have a field of boundless extent for development, but that in addition to the fertility of the soil, the character of the wheat that is grown in that northern clime surpasses in excellence the character of the wheat that can be grown in any southern or more genial clime. So, Sir, from every point of view from which we may be pleased to look, we see boundless possibilities in that country. We all regard every means for the development of that country as the means, and the only means, by which Canada can rapidly become a great and prosperous country, and attain such a position as every true Canadian must desire to see her attain, and that at a very early date. It would be impossible to over-estimate the effects that this rapid construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the measures taken by that Company to diffuse throughout the world information in regard to that country, have had in drawing immigration into it. Now, Sir, let me give you the figures touching immigration, and what do they show? Why, Sir, they show that the total number of persons who entered the North-West during the ten years previous to letting the contract to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, that is, from 1871 to 1880 inclusive, was 64,755. The total number who entered the North-West since the contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was signed, that is, during 1881, 1882 and 1883, is no less than 149,560 immigrants. The total value of the money and effects brought to the Dominion—and that is an entirely secondary consideration to that which is more valuable than money—that industry and labour which is necessary to create great national wealth—I say, even in that regard there is great progress, for the total amount brought in by settlers in 1875 to 1880 inclusive, as nearly as it can be ascertained in six years, was some $6,000,000; while during the past three years the sum taken into the North-West, at the lowest rate, can be placed at over $15,000,000. I leave these figures to the House as evidence of the effect produced in the development of the North-West Territories by the rapid construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now, Sir, a very important point in connection with immigration is the cost of carrying immigrants into the North-West. The first question asked by an immigrant in any part of the Continent of Europe or in Great Britain, when he proposes to come to this country is, what is the cost of my being able to get there? And the question of a few dollars in the difference of cost very frequently, as any gentleman who has any knowledge of the subject knows, diverts the immigrant from one line to another. Now, Sir, the published charge on the all-rail route from Quebec to Winnipeg, at the present moment is $31.50; the charge via the lakes and Duluth on the all-rail route from Quebec to Winnipeg is $25.50. The figures I have given are those that prevailed for some years, but an arrangement that has been in operation for the last two years, has reduced the charge from Quebec to Winnipeg to $21.64, and via the lakes and Duluth to $16.64. I believe, Sir, these rates have never been published. But, in consequence of the rapid progress made by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, it is now in our power to say to the immigrants on the Continent of Europe, and in the British Isles, that the rate from Quebec to Winnipeg, via Port Arthur, will be reduced this spring from $31.50 to $12, and from Montreal to Winnipeg, via Port Arthur, to $10. I need not say to the House what an enormous impetus this change in the cost of carrying immigrants into that country will naturally produce upon the volume of immigration that will be thrown into it. I desire, Sir, to say a single word here in regard to a point that has attracted some attention in a portion of the press of this country, and that is: that an arrangement has been made at a comparatively low rate for immigrants coming by New York, over the Erie Railway, and making connection at Brockville, thus reaching Winnipeg via the port of New York, at an unprecedentedly low rate. I may say, Sir, that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had nothing whatever to do with that arrangement. My hon. friend, the Minister of Agriculture, is responsible for that arrangement; and I will make a statement to the House that will satisfy every man in Canada that he would altogether have failed in his duty to the country if he had not adopted that course. Every person will acknowledge the immense importance of reducing the rate for immigrants from Quebec to Winnipeg from $31.50, the published rate, down to $12. Every person will see at a glance the enormous tide of immigration that will be brought into that country by that change. But, Sir, there was this difficulty, that if you made that low rate by the Allan steamers to the port of Quebec, and did not provide for a correspondingly low rate to the port of New York, the effect would have been this: At this moment, as you are aware, on the Continent of Europe, all the emigration service is performed by agents of steamships lines, and the moment that the rate was cut down to that low figure by the Allan line of steamers to Quebec, and there was not a corresponding reduction by New York, you would enlist the services of every emigration agent on the Continent of Europe and throughout Great Britain also, who was in the interest of the lines of steamers running to New York—not against the Allan line of steamers—for they dare not do that, but to denounce and decry Canada, as the only means by which they could serve the interest of the Allan steamers sailing to New York. It thus became absolutely essential in the interests of Canada that we should have not only this low rate of passage and this communication from Quebec, but that in order to retain our hold, and to strengthen our hold, which we are most anxious to do, upon the immigration from the Continent of Europe, we should prevent that which was otherwise inevitable, and that was that every agent for every line of steamships sailing to New York from Great Britain or the Continent, would from Monday morning to Saturday night, year in and year out, would have been denouncing Canada for the purpose of holding immigration to the port of New York. Under these circumstances, I am sure, Sir, there are no men in this country who would not feel that our policy was in the interests of Canada and in the interests of Quebec, for the moment you set every immigrant agent on the Continent of Europe against this country and thus prevent people coming by the Canadian Lines of steamships, you take most effective means to prevent the great tide and volume of immigration which, under existing circumstances, will naturally flow to Canada through the port of Quebec. Of course, we all know the importance of saving the distance as well as lowering the rate. Men who were obliged to go by Chicago to Winnipeg had not only to pay $31.50 instead of going through Canada for $12, but they were obliged to run the gauntlet of a long journey through the United States, during which every possible inducement could be used by agents of land and railway companies to prevent them ever reaching the Canadian North-West. That is one of the great objects attained by the rapid construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. That is one of the great objects attained by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in obtaining a line from Montreal through to Winnipeg, and in that way we have not only avoided exposing immigrants, who would otherwise be liable to be taken off our lines to other sections, by carrying them by a route entirely through Canadian territory, as they will be carried next spring; but they will avoid a circuitous journey of 500 miles longer and be taken by a direct line from Quebec to Winnipeg, through our own territory instead of round by Chicago. I want to place a very condensed calculation before the House in respect of the capabilities of the North-West. I am not going to deal with the question of a little difficulty that has occurred in consequence of the frost during the past season. It has been greatly magnified, greatly to the disparagement of the North-West and Canada. But they had frost in Ontario, Dakota and Minnesota, and even in New York State, and those who were not fortunate enough to get their crops in early have suffered to a greater or less extent. It only requires a little more prompt and energetic action on the part of the farming population in getting their crops in early in spring to avoid any contingency of that kind in the future, and of course it was an entirely exceptional year. But I may say that I believe there are few members of this House, much as our attention has been turned to the development of the North West, who have begun to contemplate in all its fulness what the capabilities of that great country are. I have spoken of its enormous extent, of the unexampled fertility of the soil, of the splendid description of wheat that can only be produced in these more northern and colder climes. But let me just ask the attention of the House for a single moment to a few figures which will indicate what the capabilities of that country are in regard to the production of wheat. One hundred thousand farmers, each farmer cultivating 320 acres of wheat land—has any hon. member made the calculation of what they would produce?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am glad the hon. gentleman has done so. I am glad his attention has been drawn to the fact that 100,000 farmers cultivating 320 acres each, or 200,000 farmers cultivating half that quantity each, and taking the product at only 20 bushels to the acre, instead of 27 or 30, which is the average in the North-West in favourable years, would give 640,000,000 bushels of wheat, or 50 per cent. more wheat than the whole United States produces to-day. You have only to look at those figures for a single moment to see what the future of Canada is, to see what a magnificent granary for the world is placed in our Canadian North-West; and when you remember we have six belts running through that fertile country that would each give 320 acres each to 100,000 farmers, you can understand to some little degree what a magnificent future awaits us in the development of that great country. And,

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Sir, I say that I believe Canada has just reason to be proud of the fact, and all history will give credit to the people of this Dominion, because they had the courage, the daring I may say, to grapple with the construction of a Canadian Pacific Railway. Sir, when the United States had a population of over 38,000,000, the world was astounded at the fact that they undertook to secure the construction of a trans-continental railway. It attracted the attention of the civilized world, and day by day it was heralded in the press as an astounding fact, that the United States had undertaken to construct the Union and Central Pacific Railway. Why, the Union and Central Pacific all told were nothing like as long as the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Union and Central Pacific only covered some 1,900 miles of road, while the Canadian Pacific Railway proper covers 2,541 miles; and yet four and a half millions of Canadians, which we were then, had the courage to undertake a greater work than that which was undertaken by 38,000,000 of people in the United States, and which attracted the admiration of the world. I say, and I say it fearlessly, that history does not furnish to-day an example of a more courageous, a more daring and more energetic enterprise than that which was undertaken by the Government of Canada, when they said: We have a magnificent North-West to develop. We have a great country, half of the continent of North America, placed under our control and management, and for which we are responsible; and with these responsibilities we will do and dare what only men who feel they can rely confidently upon the resources of a great country, half a continent, ought to dare and undertake; and if the present generation do not give us credit for it, in all time to come it will be regarded as one of the greatest accomplishments of the century in which we live, that we had the vigour and daring to grapple with that great enterprise. Providence has favoured us. God and nature have marked out on the face of the Canadian Dominion the shortest and best route for a trans-continental line of railway. Providence has marked out and placed within our borders and within our reach a line of communication from ocean to ocean, the shortest that can be found, a shorter connection with the east and the old world than any other. Providence has placed within our borders a line of railway, a larger portion of which runs through a more fertile country than is to be found on the continent of America. Providence has placed in our hands and under our management a line of railway in which the pass through the Rocky Mountains is lower, the Rocky Mountain section is shorter, and the snow-fall is lighter than on either the Northern or Union and Central Pacific. This road, when completed, makes it shorter for the man living in Chicago—to say nothing of our own people—who wishes to reach the Pacific Ocean, to take the Canadian Pacific Railway by the nearest approach he can obtain and pass to Port Moody, thereby obtaining a shorter line of travel than he could take to San Francisco within his own country. Under these circumstances the Government of Canada have discharged what they believed to be their duty to their country in grappling as they have grappled with this great question. I say, Sir, with the evidence that we have before us of the unexampled and unprecedented development which has followed our efforts in this regard, we would be faithless to our obligations and to our country if we neglected to adopt the simple means which are now propounded for the consideration of Parliament, of accomplishing the rapid and early completion of that great national enterprise. I know too well how thoroughly this question of the Canadian Pacific Railway has sunk into the hearts and minds of the people of Canada, to have the slightest doubt or hesitation in assuming that this Parliament will, on the present occasion, as it has on previous occasions, give a hearty and generous response to the proposal of the Government. We would be unworthy the position we occupy—the advanced position we occupy on this Continent in regard to this great national measure—if having put our hands to the plough we were to turn back, or for a single moment shrink from the plain and obvious duty which devolves upon us of carrying this great national work to completion at the earliest possible moment in our power. Let us contemplate, for a moment, what would be the effect of turning back at this juncture. We have obtained a position in the estimation of the mother country and of the world, we have obtained a status by the rapid construction of this gigantic enterprise that Canada could not have obtained in twenty years by any other means. With that fact, patent and lying on the surface, in regard to this great question, the people of Canada will demand at our hands that when the opportunity presents itself of obtaining without the cost to the country of a single dollar of additional subvention, the completion in two years of a work which otherwise would take until 1891—they will demand that without hesitation we should, in the interests of Canada adopt the course which is indicated in these Resolutions. As I said before, I ask this not in the interests of any body of gentlemen—not in the interests of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company—I ask it, Sir, from this House, as the people of this country will demand it from us in the interests of the country to which we belong, of Canada of which we are so justly proud. Mr. Speaker, I move that you do now leave the Chair.

Mr. BLAKE. I believe that whatever other predictions the hon. gentleman may have made in respect to the Canadian Pacific Railway in the past, which have hardly yet come true, whatever other predictions he may have made to-night, which may yet be falsified, one prediction he has made, which, I dare say, he has taken steps to see shall be verified, namely, that the Resolutions shall not be lost, but shall carry. Notwithstanding, it is my duty to point out to an Assembly, which, I am well aware, does not receive with acceptance the views which I entertain, some positions which, I think, are fit to be considered by the House, fit to be considered by the country, before a decision is reached on the important question which is submitted to us. It is an important question. The hon. gentleman has treated it as one of very small moment to a country of such ample extent, of such large resources, with a glorious present, with such a wondrous future as he has depicted, to enter into additional engagements involving thirty millions of money—as really not of much consequence. And when it is so absolutely certain, as the hon. gentleman has pointed out, that the engagement is only nominal, formal, temporary, sure to be redeemed, it is of less consequence still. But, Sir, I think the people at large will believe that before Parliament should have been called on even to take the initiatory step which the hon. gentleman proposes we shall this night take, it was right that we should have been placed in possession of more information—more detailed information; that more light should have been thrown on the situation in many respects than that which has been vouchsafed to us. It is not to be forgotten that for years past we have been moving for information upon important particulars connected with the progress and operations of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, answers to which have not even now been vouchsafed. It is not to be forgotten with reference to that the price which the stock realized, the mode in which it was distributed amongst the corporators, the values actually obtained for it, the prices in stock which were paid for certain works: it is not to be forgotten that with reference to the contracts which the Company have entered into, information has been asked, not this Session only, but in previous Sessions; guaranteed, so far as the Government were concerned—in words—guaranteed, so far as assent by this House was given—in words—but not followed by any effectual result; and that to-day we are asked to go into Committee in the face of these repeated and ineffectual demands for that information, which, in part under the law of the land, the Company was bound from year to year to supply, and in part, under the powers which this House and Government possess, it was on demand also bound to supply. Information has been given us this Session with reference to this proposal, and the usual papers have in part been laid on the Table. But the hon. gentleman presses forward the consideration of his proposal before these papers have been printed, before they become accessible to hon. members. I happen to have been able to read in manuscript some portion of it, and only some portion. I am not aware that any other member of the two hundred and odd who compose this Chamber and are supposed to take an interest in this question, have read any portion of these papers, save the letter of Mr. Stephen, which has appeared in public print. Of course I except hon. gentlemen who belong to the Administration and who had previous opportunities for reading, as they were responsible for these papers; but those of us who have not had that advantage are called upon, as I say, to take the initial step without having had a fair opportunity of seeing what the grounds are. The statement which the hon. gentleman himself has made to-night—the maze of figures into which he entered—varies in some particulars—not, perhaps, of any very great consequence, but sufficiently so to derange the calculation somewhat—from that which is presented in the letter of the President of the Company; and some more light, it is true, he has thrown on some of the details, in the speech he has made to us. But that light—partial though it is, dim though it is, microscopic though the gleam is that is thrown on the subject—is all in respect of points on which information has been repeatedly demanded, and, up to this time, practically refused. Now, Sir, the proposal is one of extreme gravity. To those of us who remember the discussion which took place when this contract was entered into—to those of us who remember the observations which from time to time were made by hon. members who sustained that contract, it comes as a very unpleasing surprise. Why, were we not told that the country felt uneasy as to the unknown quantity of the possible demands in reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway? Were we not told that the country was decided, and that Parliament, expressing the views of the country, was determined, that once for all it should be definitely settled what the limit of our obligations was? Were we not told that it was better for us to know how much it was, even though it was a large sum, and make up our minds to it, and have an end to the matter? Why, it was only a Session or two ago that an hon. member—I think the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Beatty)—recurring to the subject, then perhaps somewhat stale, said that the people were satisfied about it, because they felt such an ease at knowing the limit of their obligation. There it was, and we buckled ourselves to the work, and braced our shoulders to the enterprise, knowing the price of the Government sections and the amount of the cash subsidy, and knowing perfectly well that we should not be called upon for any more. Well, some two or three years have elapsed since the contract was made, and we are called upon to advance $22,500,000 cash—a sum very nearly equal to the original subsidy, and to pledge our credit for nearly $7,500,000 more; so that the element of finality, which was so paraded as one of the things which was to cause the contract to be favourably received by the House and the country, has pretty well vanished from the scene to-night. Were we not also told, time and again, of the enormous resources, wealth, and credit of the syndicate with whom the contract was made—that this was a consideration of the utmost consequence—that it was so important to enlist not merely Canadians, but capitalists in other countries, in the States, in England, in France, with such ample means that they were themselves able to build a Canadian Pacific Railway? Were we not told time and again that we were ensured in the successful completion of the contract by the enormous resources of credit, and of capital, and of confidence which had clustered round the corporators to whom hon. gentlemen opposite entrusted the work? It is not so long ago that this statement was very emphatically repeated. It was not merely at the time of the passage of the contract that it did good service; it was not merely in that House which I always thought—and I say it to its credit—was somewhat reluctant to accept the contract, that this statement was made; but at a later period—some time in November, 1881—the hon. leader of the Government made this statement at Toronto:

“What have we done? We went to England; we opened negotiations with capitalists of France, England and New York. We did not want to have only one string to our bow. We made a selection from these three great markets of capital, and we have formed the strongest and most enterprising body of capitalists that ever built a railway from the beginning of railways to the present time.”

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes, Mr. Speaker, it appears they have a sleeping partner, the Dominion of Canada.

“The whole country sees it. The whole country knows it. At this moment they are laying down a mile and a half of railway every day, and should no unexpected accident or misfortune happen, they intend and believe they will have the whole railway constructed from the Red River to the foot of the Rocky Mountains before the snows of 1882 fall.”

Well, they did not quite do that. They did not quite carry out the scheme which the hon. gentleman was sanguine enough to hope they would carry out, namely, complete the railway to the foot of the Rocky Mountains by the end of 1882.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Very nearly.

Mr. BLAKE. Well, they did not do it; and you may conceive how gigantic were their plans when that was their hope, although what they did do is set forth as wholly unprecedented. Now, it seems that this great combination of capital, the strongest that was ever formed—comprising the strength of Canada, of the United States, of England and of France—yes, the strongest that was ever formed from the beginning of the world to to-day—comes—to do what? Comes to ask us for some more money, in order that they may—earlier, it is true—but in order that they may implement the work which they contracted to perform; and it seems that the boast which, for the last year or two, has been resounding continuously in our ears—the statement which we have heard repeated time and again, that the Government and the Parliament which passed the contract were vindicated—vindicated triumphantly—because of the wonderful display of capital, of credit, and of energy on the part of the corporators—because they were going so fast and so far—because they were going to complete the railway at such an early date—is a statement which is to be taken with this rather large grain of allowance, that they will do it if we pay for it. Now, there is another point which was much discussed at the time of the contract, and in respect to which also this night vindicates our position. We heard the hon. gentleman point out—with an appreciation, some three years late, of what the interests of the country require—that it was important, in the interest of Canada, that there should be a new allocation of the subsidies for the construction of the road. It has now dawned upon his mind—he has now after three years of reflection and experience ascertained—that it is positively dangerous to Canada that the road should be paid for not by a pro rata but by a mileage rate. He says that in the interest of Canada—not at all in the interest of the Company, oh no!—it is important we should take care that the Company does not get an excessive subsidy for the lighter work that remains to be done, because if that should happen, when they come to the heavy 95 miles of which he spoke, where would be the money to build it. He forgot that they were already at the 95 miles, that they were stopped there and that the difficulty was not in the present condition of the contract, that the money would be gone in the lighter work before they came to the heavy, but that they were at the heavy work and they wanted to get part of the money allocated to the light which is to come after. But, as I said, it is about three years too late, and I am sorry we could not persuade the hon. gentleman at an earlier period of the soundness of the view he takes to-night. We argued that the subsidies should be distributed in proportion to the whole cost of the work. We declared that it was important, in the interest of the country that, if certain lands and certain moneys were to be paid to this Company for the work, they should get it in proportion as the total amount of subsidy was to the value of the work to be done at a particular point. We pointed out that the hon. gentleman was applying a different principle—and to that very portion of the work which would be earliest done he gave a wholly disproportionate part of the subsidy. We pointed out that thus the resources which were to be retained for the heavy work would be gone before the heavy work was reached, and we begged that the principle of pro rata distribution should be applied at a time when it might have been usefully applied. But the hon. gentleman could not be persuaded by us. Oh, no, he said, we admit that the subsidy is wholly disproportionate for the prairie part relatively to the subsidies for the other part of the work. There is no doubt, that we might arrange to pay according to the proportionate value of the work. But we deliberately decline to adopt any such principle. We intend that the earliest and lightest work shall have far more in proportion than that which is to be given for the late and heavy work. Now that the Company have come to the heavy work they want the position reversed. They have had all the benefit practically of the other position, of getting a disproportionate share of the subsidy on the principle of mileage rates assigned to the different sections, and having come to the heavy work, it is now proposed that another principle shall apply which shall help them out of that difficulty. I have said the resources which were due to the ends of the work are gone, and it is necessary to see that full inquiry is made, as to how it is that these resources have disappeared. That is the prime duty of this House before even approaching the consideration of the question whether it will give more. It was the prime duty of this House to watch that subject, altogether apart from the question of giving more—it was the duty of the House to watch it, having, as it had, the right to see what the contracts were and to consider how the work was really going on; but to-day, when it is indicated that to carry out the plans into which the Company and the Government have entered, it is necessary that this enormous advance should be made, it becomes obviously an imperative duty on our part to ascertain how the account for the past really stands; how it happens that so large a sum has been expended in the work which has been done. Now, for the prairie in the North-West, roughly calculating what the hon. gentleman's figures gave, I apprehend that independent of equipment, and, I presume, without ballasting, the road in the North-West, the main line, must have cost something close upon $18,000 a mile; and I have never been able to see how such a figure could be justified as the fair cost of constructing that line through that country. If you look at the price which the hon. gentleman has affixed to the branches in the North-West, you will find a very different statement as to the mileage cost there. I said the other day, and I repeat now, that a large portion of this expense is probably due to speed. You cannot build a railway at the rate at which this has been built without paying more for its construction than you would if it were built at the ordinary speed, or at a speed not so extraordinary as to be called "absolutely unprecedented." I repeat such speed as this means cost, and that it was quite impossible, whether with reference to location, whether with reference to economical arrangements for construction, whether with reference to the supply of labour or materials, the road could have been built as cheaply at the rate at which it was built, as it could be if a more moderate rate of speed had been adopted. But there is another question, and it is a question to which I have directed attention several times. How has it been built? By whom has it been built? I have called for information upon that subject. The law called for it. The Consolidated Railway Act made it the statutory duty of this Company to return to the Minister of Railways in each year, on the 30th of June, the contracts which had been made for the construction of the railway. That law was violated by this Company. They deliberately disobeyed it. They did not return those contracts. Parliament was informed of that violation. I asked repeatedly for the contracts. Eventually I moved for one contract and the instrument of association of the North American Contracting Company, but Parliament declined to have the law enforced and would not order the production of these papers. Parliament preferred to be kept in ignorance as to these things which the law had said should be disclosed. And to-night, although Parliament has recanted rather that view within the last few days, although we unanimously passed Addresses calling for the production of those contracts and representing that it was of high public consequence that this law should be obeyed and those contracts should be produced, still the law is not obeyed, still the contracts are not produced; and it is only in the speech of the Minister when he invites the House to go into Committee of the Whole to consider the proposition that we are let, to a small extent, into the character of the arrangements for construction. And the hon. gentleman now informs us that the work has been done by a contracting or construction company, in which were many members of the syndicate. So that the corporation has been contracting with its own members for construction. He tells us that that arrangement has now terminated, that it terminated when the supplies terminated, that it terminated when they could no longer find money to keep the construction company going; and amongst the sums embraced in the total of $58,700,000, which the President of the Company claims credit for, as having provided for the construction of the road, is a debit balance against the construction company, and in favour of the Syndicate, of $600,000; so that although they stopped operations because there was no money to pay them with, they did not do work within $600,000 of the money that was in their hands already, paid in advance. And it seems these were the arrangements, so far as light has already been thrown upon them, between the Company and its construction company. Now, Sir, I do not think I do injustice to the Company and its corporators in assuming, since the hon. gentleman has said that many members of the Company were corporators in this Company, that several directors of the Company were corporators in it. I may say I have no knowledge on the subject. I have moved repeatedly and I have been unable to obtain the information as yet. The hon. gentleman indicates that he will lay it on the Table, shortly: I suppose after we have decided what we shall do.

Mr. BLAKE.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. To-morrow, I hope.

Mr. BLAKE. To-morrow. Then we are not going to decide to-night, I hope. Whether I do injustice or not, I shall assume, in the absence of the information, that several of the directors of the Company are also members of the construction company. Now, what relation does a director of the Company who contracts with the Company, whether as a member of the construction company or not, occupy? As a director of the Company he is bound to consider whether the contract is a favourable one for the Company or not. As a member of the contracting company he is bound to consider whether the contract is favourable to the contracting company or not. It is a somewhat difficult task which he undertakes to decide, to hold the balance just, to do no injustice to the railway company, and to do no injustice to the contracting company, under such circumstances. Parliament has thought that men ought not to be placed in such an invidious position, and for fear that in the conflict between their interest and their duty, interest might prevail over duty, it has forbidden such arrangements; for in the Consolidated Railway Act of the hon. gentleman, it is provided that:

"No person holding any office, place or employment in, or being concerned or interested in any contract under or with the Company, shall be capable of being chosen a director or of holding the office of director: nor shall any person being a director of the Company enter into or be directly or indirectly for his own use or benefit interested in any contract with the company not relating to the purchase of land, necessary for the railway, or be or become a partner of any contractor with the company."

And if, therefore, it be the case that this contracting company is composed practically, to a large extent—of directors of the railway company which made the contract, I apprehend they have violated not merely the spirit, but also the letter of the law; and that we may look with not unnatural suspicion upon any such contract. The law also provides that no contracts for work of construction or maintenance, etc., shall be entered into until after tenders have been invited in advertisements given at least four weeks in some newspaper published in the place nearest to that at which the work is required to be done. I do not know how many hon. members saw the advertisement published by the Canadian Pacific Company calling for tenders. I do not know in what newspapers it was published. I dare say it was published; but I dare say it was published in newspapers which do not receive a very extensive circulation. I know I was never able to hear of any invitation to the general public to tender for the works of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company; and I am not surprised if, as a matter of fact, the works constructed by the railway company have been constructed by a contracting company composed largely of the directors of that corporation. Now, we pointed out when the contract was being discussed in Parliament the possibility of arrangements of this description, the possibility of a larger price being thus obtained for the work than the work really cost; and I say again that we are entitled,—especially are we entitled, in view of the refusal to inform us, in view of the defiance of the law to which I have referred, in view of the statement made at this last moment by the Minister,—we are entitled to full and searching enquiry into this matter as a preliminary to considering what further and more intimate relations we shall engage in with this corporation. It may be, although the contracting company has been dissolved, or has ceased its operations, that, if the fountains of Canadian liberality are opened once again, inasmuch as the hon. gentleman said it had stopped because the supplies had stopped—when the supplies are re-opened the company may be reorganized, and we may find that just so long as our liberality lasts the contracting company will be ready to spend the moneys which we liberally provide. But, I do not think that will be satisfactory to the people of the country, and I maintain that full enquiry upon this subject, searching enquiry, exhaustive enquiry, rigid enquiry, should precede, if this House is to do its duty, any recognition of any demands made by the Company, or any suggestion by the Government, that we should further involve ourselves with it. Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman has said that it is demonstrated that the public funds have been used, have been used altogether—and far more than the public funds—on the contracted line; and he seems to think that it is wholly unnecessary to enter into many considerations which have been urged as pertinent to the present position of the Company, in view of the figures which he laid before us. I pointed out in the past, I pointed out the other day, and I point out to-night, that there is much more than the question of cash in this matter; that there were two important questions besides; that if you ally to cash, credit, there was the question of the responsibility involved in the various other enterprises, to which the hon. gentleman has not made an allusion. There was also the question of the energy, the time, the labour involved in connection with those other enterprises; and besides all that, there was the grave question of policy involved, in a company in the position and obliged to make the demands upon public confidence, which the Canadian Pacific Railway was to be obliged to do, according to the programme now before us, in involving itself in enterprises not connected with the original enterprise at all, so disconnected with it that, large, wide, ample as were their corporate powers, they were not adequate to enable them to engage in those enterprises, but, having engaged in them in some sort, through the medium of their directors or otherwise, in the way in which we know companies often do in matters beyond their corporate powers, they were obliged to come here—I think it was last year—for legislation to enable them to engage formally and ostensibly in those other enterprises; and even that legislation, it seems, has not been found adequate to the occasion, for we have before us at this present moment another Bill to give them additional powers to go on further in this direction of enterprises not contemplated by, nor embraced in the original charter. I say, Sir, that you cannot conclude by any arrangement of the figures—even if they were accurate, as I think I shall point out that they were not, presently—you cannot conclude even by such an array of figures as he has put forward, if they could be maintained, that everything we were entitled to expect from this Company has been accomplished. We do not know that the difficulties in which they find themselves are not due to something by them done. Now, Sir, it has been my fortune upon more than one occasion—upon three or four occasions—to point out since this contract was let, what the position of the Railway Company was under it, according to the statements of the Government, according to the statements of the Railway Company itself, and as I conceived them. I have pointed out that they had, as I thought they had, a magnificent contract, that they stood in a wonderfully good position. But, I also pointed out, lately, that no matter how magnificent the contract, no matter how admirable the position, the enterprise was one of such magnitude as to require the undivided energy and devotion of those concerned in it, as to require great prudence, wisdom and capacity in the conduct of it, else these elements of fortune which, as I conceived it unquestionably possessed, might not avail to prevent results disastrous to the corporation. And I pointed out, before, where I thought dangers existed in the course and conduct of that corporation, and to some of these, in a vague way, the hon. gentleman alluded this evening. We contended against the wide powers with reference to the extension of branches. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that more railways than one in the North West Territories are a necessity. I have always said so. I told him so when he was proposing the Canadian Pacific Railway measure. I agree with him—though I was a little surprised to hear him say so—that some of the branch lines this Company has built are of more importance than many sections of the main trunk line. How he reconciles that with his general notions as to the trunk line, I do not know; but however he may reconcile it with them, I quite agree with the sentiment which he expressed, I think, twice this evening, that there are branch lines that are more important than some sections of the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway. But I contended with reference to the extension of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and with reference to its branches, that it was important that we should keep our control, and that we should decide for ourselves whether, and where such extension and such branches might be authorized. I felt that otherwise the funds which might have been devoted, and which prudence might require to be devoted, to the construction of the contracted line, might be diverted to other purposes; and I felt that each time the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, while this contract was yet incomplete, came to Parliament to obtain power to acquire or build an extension, or to acquire or build a branch, it would be pertinent to enquire, how are you getting on with your main contract? What is being done? How is the money holding out? Or, is it certain that this enterprise in which you are proposing to engage will not involve you in one way or another in such sort that the conditions of your contract may be imperilled? All that was cast to the winds, and Parliament decided, at the instance of the hon. gentleman, to give a practically unlimited power with reference to extensions and branches—not absolutely an unlimited power to build in all directions, because it did not include power to run up through the eastern part of Ontario, as has since been done—but short of that, an unlimited power. Well, now, it has been said that what has been done, in so far as the hon. gentleman discussed what has been done, is all right; that it was important for the country, and that it was important for the Company, that the money should be judiciously expended, and has been so—and upon that subject I will trouble the House a little later. With reference to the route, however, the hon. gentleman has not touched upon that subject to-night. Although he announced that he was about to make his general statement as to the progress of the work, he did not think fit to embarrass the discussion by details upon the subject of route. We contended that too wide powers were given as to the route, that they would probably be used in a way which Parliament might not approve, that the road would probably be deflected too far to the south for the national interests, and that the special interest of the Company, as a monopolist and a cheap constructor, might be found to overbear those considerations which had up to that time fixed the route in another direction. Those interests have prevailed, and the road has been run very far to the southward. At a very early period, the Company decided upon running the road by Calgary, which meant upon running it via Kicking Horse Pass, or some route in that neighbourhood. They decided upon so doing before it was found that any pass was feasible; they have stuck to that ever since, and we have not yet had laid before us such information as serves to show that even now a pass within the contract is feasible. On the contrary, the information laid before us indicates that no road can be constructed by that route within the meaning of the Canadian Pacific Railway contract; that the lowest maximum grades that can be obtained far exceed those maximum grades which are accepted as the standard grades, those, namely, of the Union Pacific Railway; and I maintain that without an Act of Parliament it is not within the power of the Executive to sanction the passing of the road by a route which does not give the grades which were prescribed in the contract, else the Executive alters, and does not execute, the contract. Well, then, Sir, much trouble has arisen already, and more trouble will arise, from the use of another power to which we objected, namely, the power of issuing stock for less than its cash par value. We pointed out that under this plan stock might be issued to an amount in excess altogether of the real requirements of the road, for considerations much less than its par and nominal value; that opportunities for the creation of speculative interests, for arrangements disadvantageous to the country in many particulars, might result from the exercise of such a power, and that ultimately the road would be loaded, as too many roads are loaded, with nominal capital far in excess of the money really required for its construction; and we find that that is so. It is true that no one, I do not believe that the hon. Ministers themselves, had the slightest idea of the extent to which that power would be used, because they would have been wanting in their plain duty to this House if, having the slightest idea of it, they had allowed the contract to go as they did. $25,000,000 was named as the maximum capital, and all our calculations and discussions were predicated upon the idea that that was the largest capital this Company would issue, the largest nominal capital. It might represent a much smaller sum in cash. But availing themselves of a general authority in the Railway Act, which was made applicable to them under the hon. gentleman's provisions, they not long after incorporation increased their nominal capital to $100,000,000. Now, no one pretended that they wanted $100,000,000 of money. It was with the view of issuing stock at a discount; it was in order to float the stock at something about fifty that $100,000,000 were created. It was not because they wanted $100,000,000, but because for certain purposes they preferred issuing a large amount of nominal capital to secure a comparatively small amount of real cash. Well, one of the incidental difficulties arising upon that was much discussed. For some time the hon. Minister of Railways held very strongly that they were entitled to pay 10 per cent. upon the whole nominal amount of capital, but ultimately he receded from that position; the threatened split in the Cabinet on that subject was healed, and the hon. gentleman acknowledged that it was what the road really cost, and not the nominal amount of capital that should govern, so far as we were concerned. But in the meantime difficulty had grown out of it, because the Company announced that they were about to agree to pay interest upon their capital during construction at the rate of five per cent. The law says that interest may be paid during construction at a rate not exceeding 6 per cent. upon the amount actually paid up; and the stock being issued as paid up stock, the Company assumed itself to be entitled to pay interest at the rate of 5 per cent. upon the amount paid up. I maintained before, and I maintain now, that that is an illegal operation; that the Railway Act, which is the only authority for their taking the capital of the Company, and applying it to the payment of interest during construction, expressly limits that somewhat dangerous power to a six per cent. dividend upon the amount actually paid upon the stock, and that to agree to pay $5 on every $100 when $46 or $50 only have been paid, is to evade—not to evade, but really to violate the law. Another difficulty growing out of this mode of the emission of the stock was the uncertainty as to what the real capital of the Company was. The country was deeply interested in that, because the obligation which we had entered into as to the non-diminution of the tolls was dependent upon that, and yet upon that until to-night, we have been utterly unable to obtain any information, and the information which we have obtained to-night is very general and not at all satisfactory. Suggestions were made at an early period that the stock was being emitted at sixty. I afterwards saw a statement that the issue price was really fifty to the syndicate which undertook the issue of the $30,000,000. I called the attention of the hon. Minister of Railways to that statement, and he said he had never heard any thing of the kind and indicated his own want of credence in the report. But, to-night, we learn for the first time what $55,000,000 of stock has realized, and we learn that it has realized only $25,358,000; or if you are to assume that none has been distributed, none has been issued at a greater discount than another part, the stock has been emitted at 46 net to the Company as near as may be. Ought we not to know to what extent the syndicate has increased its nominal holding of stock. They were to pay $5,000,000 in cash, the original capital. I have no doubt they did so. But what does that now represent in stock of the Company? No doubt it represents much more than $5,000,000. How much more? What did they take before they emitted the $30,000,000? What arrangements were made for the disposition of the $25,000,000 of stock, the only originally authorized capital? At what rate was stock taken, if stock in fact was taken, for the purchase of some part of the Canada Central Railway? All these are questions which are of deep interest to us, because we want to know what the Company has really obtained in cash for its stock, which is the measure of our liability, at least of our limitation as to the reduction of tolls. And we want to know it further, because it bears upon the considerations which are addressed to us in inviting us to sanction this loan to the Company. I have seen some organs of public opinion so ill-informed as to declare with respect to this proposition that the necessity of doing something for the Company was made manifest because its stock was actually selling at fifty-five, only fifty-five cents for a dollar, and when the stock had fallen so low it was quite clear that we never could allow the poor fellows to issue any more at such a rate as that. But, as I have said, those organs of public opinion were ill informed; they were deceived by the character of the operation. The Company emitted a nominal amount of stock far beyond what was required at a discount. They preferred to call the capital $100,000,000 instead of $50,000,000—it sounded better. They felt better to know that they had $100,000,000 instead of $50,000,000, and it gave them certain collateral advantages in issuing a large dividend or interest during construction and gave greater opportunities for a rise, because it was easier to get stock up from fifty towards par than if it was issued at par to secure prices considerably above par. I have shown the House that the stock of the Company has been emitted at an average price net to the Company of forty-six, and upon this they have agreed to pay interest at $5 on the $100, which means a rate of almost eleven per cent. per annum, payable half yearly. These poor people whom you are asked to assist—these energetic people who want to push this railway on for you so fast—took sufficient care of themselves to arrange at an early day that on these sums which they had put into the enterprise they should get about eleven per cent. while construction was going on; and stock is to be sold and subsidies are to be obtained and advances are to be gathered in, and land grant bonds are to be realized, in order that, during construction, eleven per cent. interest may be paid to the Company. Presently, they decided that they would finish construction very quickly, and then they decided they would have a guarantee as to interest. And they announced an arrangement whereby, even after construction, for a long period of years, the bulk of this dividend is to be actually guaranteed. It seems to me that when you find a nominal stock proposed to be emitted of $100,000,000, when Parliament supposed $25,000,000 would be extravagant; when you find that a part of that stock has been emitted at an average price of forty-six only; when you find arrangements made for the payment of a dividend upon that average price of about eleven per cent.; when you find the Company asking, in calculating the sum of this expenditure, that you should give it credit for making that provision for eleven per cent. upon its investment, it must be evident that these things require to be enquired into; that they require to be sifted and analyzed, and that we ought to get at the bottom of them. If we are to do that which the hon. gentleman not inaptly described in the instructions he gave to his engineer and the Commissioner of Inland Revenue—if we are going to enter into what he put into the alternative of either a large transaction of mortgage or a partnership with a firm; if we are to go into partnership with a railway company, we ought to see how it has handled its business, what it has done with its stock, how it has been distributed; we ought to discuss this question of dividend and ascertain its result. I shall show presently that our position is not to be quite so advantageous as that of a partnership. We may be exposed to the risk, but it is not likely we shall have any of the profits. Then we objected to the monopoly, and I think events have vindicated that objection. It has been shown to be a very serious obstruction to the settlement of the North-West. It has been shown to be a very evil thing in the present and for the future of that country. We objected very strongly to what we believed was a wholly unauthorized and unconstitutional extension, in practice, of the monopoly which the hon. gentleman inaugurated—I use the phrase advisedly—when he advised the disallowance of certain railway charters upon the principles upon which he did so. The hon. gentleman is very fond, when he can, of sheltering himself under the ægis of those whose past, as a general rule, he busies himself in reproaching and reviling and despising. But upon this occasion, he is entirely wrong in saying that the policy of the preceding Government furnishes an authority for his policy. There are two reasons against it. The first is, that what was done at that time—though it was not disallowance, but even supposing it equivalent to a disallowance—was done at a period when neither the route of the Canadian Pacific Railway nor the system of construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway—whether it should be by a Government or a Company—nor the terms of construction were settled; and I maintain, as I have maintained before, it is an entirely different thing to say you will control the railways of a country, through which you have a Government railway worked by the Government, and to say you will control them when you have handed that railway over to a private corporation. As long as it is a Government railway it is the people's railway, and the people cannot have a monopoly in its own concern—not an offensive or objectionable monopoly—because the interest to be served is that of the community that possesses the railway. Does any one suppose that rates too high for the good of a country could be charged by a Government having a railway? Why, look at this Dominion. Take the two ends of it, cutting off for the moment British Columbia—and I hope no hon. gentleman will suppose I mean permanently, but just for an instant—take the North-West at the one end and the Maritime Provinces at the other; take the Government railway, extending from Quebec to the Maritime Provinces and the private corporation's road extending through the North-West, and ask upon what system the services are regulated respectively, by what rules the rates are established, what are the practical results to the communities respectively through which those railways pass, and tell us, if you can, without a smile, that you will put both in the same category. Again, such a policy was a revocable policy. It might be modified and changed. The same public opinion which would control the rates would decide, at the moment, when more access should be obtained. What the hon. gentlemen did was, as far as they could, in the contract, to render it impossible that access should be obtained, and what they could not do in the contract they did by violating the spirit and executing the letter of the law, in disallowing all other railway charters in Manitoba. The contract itself says that in the North-West Territories, in those parts in which the Dominion of Canada has jurisdiction, no railways running in such a direction and within such limits shall be chartered for the next twenty years, and it says that in any new Province hereafter to be erected in the North-West, this prohibition shall be continued, obviously meaning that in the existing

Mr. BLAKE.

Provinces, no such prohibition could be made or was intended, obviously indicating that if such a provision had not been in the contract, the instant a new Province was formed it could exercise the constitutional right of chartering railways free of control. To prevent that, the contract contained the extraordinary provision that the constitution of a new Province, as yet unborn, should be hampered and restricted by a provision prohibiting it from exercising its constitutional right. In the face of that and in the face of the statement made by the hon. First Minister in the debate often adverted to, that we cannot check Ontario and Manitoba, he has been checking Manitoba ever since. Now, he tells us he is glad he is able to inform us to-night—I suppose he hopes to gild the pill for the North-West, as in another way he attempted to gild the pill for numerous persons to the eastward; but I think the gilding was put on pretty badly; I think I saw the pill show itself in several places, and I am surprised that the hon. gentleman, with all his old experience, was not able to accomplish the task more deftly than he did—he hopes to gild the pill by saying that, as soon as the railway is actually built, the Government will be able to review the question of reconsidering the policy, and they really think they will be able to stop oppressing Manitoba and violating the constitution at some period two or three years hence. Why? He is kind enough to tell us why. Because the Company think they will be able to do it safely. They think by that time, what with their powers, and their privileges, and their exemption from taxation, and the claws they will have stretched over the whole of that country, they will have it so entirely in their grip that it is really of no consequence what power you give the poor people. "Live horse and you will get grass;" but the hon. gentleman proposes that the horse shall die, and then he will put a feed of hay before him. As soon as the people of Manitoba are completely under control, he will grant these concessions, and he calls on them to fall down in thankfulness for the concessions he proposes to make. Now, Sir, we contended that the monopoly was a grievous one, inasmuch as it was calculated to produce high rates and to produce the usual results which are produced by monopolies; and that it was important, in the early settlement of the country, that power, free power, should be given to construct railways. Since that time, argument has been addressed to us to show that the rates were extremely moderate; that they were very reasonable; that they were all that could be expected; that, in a new country like this, it costs a great deal—as no doubt it does—to run a railway; that, in a country with not much return freight, it necessarily costs more; that, in a country the climate of which is somewhat severe, it necessarily costs still more; and that, therefore, the rates should be high in order that the railway might be remunerative. But these arguments are all lacking in this, that those who use them forget that it was one element of this contract that the road would be run at unremunerative rates for a long time after it was opened, and that, in consideration of that circumstance, large moneys and lands were added to the public aid that was to be given to the owners of it. We were told, when we contrasted the price with that which was to be done, "Oh, but you don't take into account the circumstance that the Company will have to run the road at a loss for a great many years; we've taken it into account as, as honest men, we should, and we are paying them in advance for that unremunerated running." Well, having paid them in advance for that unremunerated running, it is now argued that the rates should be such as to remunerate them, and therefore they are to be paid double, first in advance under the contract, and then by the people of the North-West—or, according to the statements which are made, the people of the North-West are to pay in both cases; because, if those statements are to be credited, the North-West is to pay the whole contract price out of its lands, so that it pays first in advance under the contract for cheap rates, and then pays dear rates after the contract has been accomplished. Now, I have been unable to observe that the speed with which this enterprise has been conducted has conduced to its success. I have been unable to observe that those who have been concerned in it have had such miraculous powers of intuition and of judgment and decision as to reach conclusions more rapidly than they need have been reached, and at the same time rightly. Hasty decisions have been taken, different plans have been adopted; and these have indicated, from time to time, the absence of that careful consideration, that prudence of action, which was essential to make this enterprise a success. Take for example what was called the Sault Ste. Marie Branch. At a very early period in the history of the undertaking, it was announced that the Company was about to build a branch to the Sault Ste. Marie. At that time other companies were thinking of striking for the Sault Ste. Marie, but the great Canadian Pacific Railway Company announced that it was going to build a branch to the Sault Ste. Marie. It was announced in public, and the hon. Minister told me, "Your views are about to be fulfilled; you said the Sault ought to be reached, and they are going to reach the Sault." Well, a little while later, the hon. gentleman received a communication to the effect that they had altered their views. They had sent in their plans in which they called this the Sault Ste. Marie Branch. They had now decided to make the main line by the Sault Ste. Marie; and they asked that their plan, which was called the plan of a branch, might be made the plan of the main line so far; and they announced that their engineers had gone over the road and found a practicable route, and it was a much better thing, although more expensive, for other reasons much better than the former route; and the hon. Minister acceded, with the reservation advised by his engineer that, until they had established on the ground the possibility of connecting Port Arthur with the Sault or the neighborhood of the Sault, the subsidy should be retained. Well, they were going on, and, at that same demonstration at which the hon. the First Minister made the observations to which I have alluded, he spoke at length upon this subject, and he told what a great thing it was for the country, what a great thing it was for Ontario in particular, that it was now arranged, and that the change of route was about to reduce the period of construction on the north shore of Lake Superior by many years. Not long after, the whole collapsed. There is no letter brought down—I know not whether any such exists—explaining it, but, without any explanation given to Parliament or the public, the plan is altered, and they determine to carry the main line through the interior, they go back to the old route; and then they determine to build a branch to Algoma Mills; and that is the plan upon which they have been working since; thus showing no less than three changes of plan, and indicating, as I have said, that this extreme haste of execution is very apt to lead to hasty, and very possibly, to imprudent and erroneous decisions. And we were told that it was of the last consequence that the Algoma Mills Branch and the connecting link to the eastward of it should be early built. We were told that it was going to be a great thing for us this coming year, that the immigrants should go by this short and speedy route to Port Arthur. We were told we should see the Canadian Pacific Railway carrying the immigrants by that route, a splendid route, so many miles from Montreal to Algoma Mills, then the twenty-four hours' voyage from Algoma Mills to Port Arthur, and so on. But the newspapers tell us—and I believe in this case they tell the truth—that that is not to be the route at all; that the steamers are to sail from the port of Owen Sound for Port Arthur, that the business is to be done from the port of Owen Sound and not from Algoma Mills this year; that the immigrants are to be carried by the Ontario and Quebec and the Toronto, Grey and Bruce to Owen Sound, and that the voyage is to be from that port to Port Arthur, and not by the other route at all. So it appears that, for the practical purposes of getting a route to the North-West within our own territory for immigrants, there was no necessity for that great expedition which was used in building the branch to Algoma Mills. If the branch to Algoma Mills is not to be the immigrant route to the North-West, what was the object of hurrying that branch and of expending the close upon $2,000,000 which have been expended in its speedy construction? If you find that the bulk of your immigration next year, that the bulk of your transport of passengers and goods next year goes, not by Algoma Mills at all, but by Owen Sound, will you not find that once again speed, rapidity of decision, has resulted in premature expenditure, in expenditure which, having regard to the other obligations of the company, and to the difficulties which it was possible would surround them, and which it turns out have surrounded them, had better have been deferred? Then Sir, the decision with reference to the southern route, to which, I have adverted, was, I greatly fear, a mistaken decision on another ground. I have never said anything upon this subject in public before, but I have collected such information as I could ask of everybody whom I met, who had passed over the western part of the railway, and I am obliged to say that the opinion unanimously entertained—I never was able to elicit any contrary opinion from any gentleman I approached—was that the appearance of the country along that southern route in the western part, west of Moose Jaw to the foot-hills of the Rocky Mountains, was far inferior to the appearance in other parts (far inferior to the territory that would have been passed through by the central route) and considerable apprehensions were entertained and expressed by every one to whom I spoke, as to the results to the Company of the inferiority of that land in quality and the difficulty with reference to want of water and to the dryness of the climate. Now, with reference to those eastern operations, which the hon. gentleman has not particularly alluded to—at least, to most of which he has not particularly alluded—I think they fall into different categories. There can be no doubt that there was a great amount of reasonableness in the view that the Canadian Pacific Railway should seek to extend its direct control as far east as the city of Montreal. There can also be no doubt that the contract itself, in terms, indicated the probability of such an extension. It refers to that extension particularly. It deals with the Canada Central. If I recollect aright, it deals with the other railways; but at any rate it indicated pretty plainly an intention, if possible, to get to Montreal. However, it is one thing to say that that intention was a sound one, and it is another thing to say that the means adopted, the bargains made, the arrangements entered into, were such as were prudent and wise. I have not been able to ascertain, from the information which has been laid before us, with an approach to absolute accuracy, what the cost of the railways which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has acquired in the east is. I have made a conjecture, to which I will refer later on; but, I say, that it is obvious that the purchase included numerous branches not very material at all to the main line, and that upon the main line expenditure and the main line mileage between Callander and Montreal, the cost of these railways, treating them as acquired for the purposes of the main line communication, will be an extremely heavy cost. The hon. gentleman has not on this occasion alluded to one of those purchases, which is generally treated as absorbed in the great purchase. I refer to that of the Laurentian Railway, a separate railway bought about the same time, and, as I showed last Session, from such information as I could obtain, purchased from Mr. Senecal at a price which realized to him an enormous profit, and which was far in excess of the mercantile value of the railway. I do not believe it has been any value to the Canadian Pacific Railway at all; and whatever value it may have to anybody, the price which I believed was paid was a price far in excess of the value of the concern. I pointed out the details of that transaction last Session. I maintain, when we are called upon to decide that this Company has so well and wisely expended its funds, that we have a right to lend it $30,000,000 more, that that transaction ought to be explained. I maintain that we ought to have information upon it. I maintain we ought to be told why it was that this link of railway was purchased, and at what price and under what circumstances. I believe it to have involved the throwing away by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company of something about $400,000, as near as I can conjecture. Now, sir, so much for the moment with reference to that which is ordinarily put together under the heading of Callander to Montreal. But with reference to other roads, not much information is given. It is true that, with trifling exceptions, the funds of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have not been directly expended in the Credit Valley enterprise, so far as is shown. It now appears that $484,000 of the Company's money has been spent in Credit Valley bonds, which are at present held by the Government as security for $1,000,000 of money. It is made plainly to appear, that there is $484,000 of its money spent in the purchase of these bonds. But, Sir, upon an occasion of this description, when we are called upon to consider what the obligations of that Company are, to which we are to lend money, I maintain that the hon. Minister has not discharged his full duty when he has failed to tell us how the Company stands in relation to the Credit Valley, the Ontario and Quebec, and that whole system. So far as the general sources of information and the Act of Parliament enable us to judge, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is becoming the lessee of those lines on terms which oblige it to guarantee five per cent upon the bonds which are outstanding. The bonds which are outstanding were sold, in the case of the Credit Valley, at, I fancy, somewhere from thirty to thirty-five cents on the dollar, and they have been made worth par—if the Canadian Pacific Railway guarantee will make them worth par—by the guarantee of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now, the Canadian Pacific Railway has agreed, in effect, that those roads shall earn five per cent. on their whole cost; and legislation is before us this Session (as well as I could understand the Clerk at the Table, who was reading the petition) for power for this Company to extend its railway through the western peninsula of Ontario, to the border; and other proceedings are being taken to enlarge the bonding system of the Credit Valley Railway. I do not know—we have no information at all before us—as to what the real extent of the obligations of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are, with reference to this enterprise. Those obligations may be light or they may be heavy—it depends upon the results of the traffic of these roads when they are completed. But I need hardly say that we may fully expect the completion of the operations through Ontario, of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, to result in a temporary advantage, at any rate, to a considerable portion of the community. I believe there will be a very severe competition there; I believe there will be very low rates of fare for some time; I believe the Ontario and Quebec system will be forced to run at rates, and under circumstances, which will render it extremely difficult for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, out of its earnings, to pay five per cent. upon the complete cost of that system. If so, the general assets and capital of the Company will be responsible for the deficiency. It is, I presume, responsible for the deficiency to-day, in the case of the Credit Valley Company, be that great or small. Then there is an arrangement made with the Toronto, Grey and Bruce Railway Company, under which that railway is leased by the Canadian Pacific Railway. Nothing has been said about that; we have not heard what the extent of this obligation of the Canadian Pacific Railway is; we know not what the traffic account of the Toronto, Grey and Bruce Railway is; we know not whether the probable traffic of that road will pay the expense of it. If it does not, that, of course, becomes an onerous obligation to the extent of the deficiency. Then there is the Atlantic and North-Western Railway, in which the hon. gentleman said a sum—I have forgotten exactly what it was, something under two hundred thousand dollars—had been expended by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in acquiring the charter, and so forth.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And building a road.

Mr. BLAKE. How much was built?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Round the mountain at Montreal.

Mr. BLAKE. I don't know how many miles were built. It would be interesting to know how much was paid for the charter. We pass so many charters, Mr. Speaker. Our hands are so full of them. So many hon. gentlemen are engaged busily during the Session in passing railway charters. We pass them with so much freedom. It is so very little difficult to pass a railway charter, unless it be in Manitoba, that what the worth of a commodity of that kind is, after it has received the valuable imprint of this House and the Senate, and the assent of the Executive, it would be interesting to know. I suppose the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, itself, would have no difficulty in getting such a charter as that of the Atlantic and North-Western. But some one else got it. How much did the Canadian Pacific Railway Company get it for, and for what purposes? Doubtless, in order to secure connection with the South-Eastern. There the hon. gentleman felt himself treading on somewhat tender ground, because he said that it was very important for the Canadian Pacific to acquire an interest in the South-Eastern. From his description of the road, it appeared to me to run almost everywhere. It seems to furnish the most direct means of connection with Boston, Portland, New York, Halifax, St. John, St. Andrews and Louisburg—I do not know whether I have got them all; but it seems that the Montreal, Portland and Boston Railroad was the one thing needful, or one of the things needful, to get to these different places. It seems, also, that they have to build a railway to get to Quebec. The hon. gentleman says they will build one immediately. I hope he will give his bail for that. It seemed to me the South-Eastern was of an extraordinary character, and from the capacities it possesses, I am not surprised that the Canadian Pacific gave $1,600,000 or $1,700,000 for a controlling interest in it. It is a valuable thing, and they seem to have got it very cheap. The hon. gentleman said it was important that we should have the Canadian Pacific Railway run to a winter port in Canada. He said, also, that the Company were of the same opinion. In point of fact, I do not know but that they have been expressing their opinion on that point to some members of this House very recently. In order to do it, it was necessary they should secure the Montreal, Portland and Boston Railway. It was probably with the same admirable intentions they were engaged a little while ago, in the City of Portland, negotiating with the municipal authorities of that city, for the purpose of acquiring the Portland and Ogdensburg Railway, which also, I have no doubt, possesses the same admirable faculty of being capable of being used to give connection with St. Andrews and the other Maritime Province ports. The hon. gentleman explained, with that lucidity and clearness which distinguished his utterances to-night, and which particularly distinguish his Parliamentary utterances upon this subject, how they were to reach these ports, except St. John, which he left out, or almost left out; and I observed, when he dilated on Halifax, how the jaw of the Finance Minister fell, as if he were saying to himself: "This will never do, he is making an awful mess of it; he is making too much of Halifax. The idea of setting Halifax up! He should have put all the ports on an equality. He should have mentioned them all several times, so that each one might be mentioned first." The hon. gentleman having gilded the pill for St. Andrews, Halifax and St. John, and having told the people of Quebec that they were to have a third railway—I wonder on which bank of the St. Lawrence, or whether in the middle of it—to reach their port as a summer port—having satisfied the different members, in that way, he went on to say that the Canadian Pacific Railway would have failed in its duty to Canada if it had stopped there. It ought to have gone further, and he there pointed out that admirable faculty which the South-Eastern possesses, namely, that it would not only reach these ports, but the United States ports as well. He said they ought to reach there in order to be in a position to take the commerce from the port of New York, to take the commerce from the port of Portland, to take the commerce from the port of Boston, and cause it to pass over their great railway, and that they would be wanting in their duty to Canada if they did not provide the facilities. Mr. Speaker, there was once a man who was asked if he would contribute towards a bonus to a road to run out of his town, and he said, "Never; I will contribute towards as many bonuses as you like for roads to run into the town, but out of it—never." Does the hon. gentleman suppose that if traffic comes from New York, Portland and Boston towards the west, over the Canadian Pacific Railway, the traffic will not go eastward to New York, Portland and Boston? Does he suppose his railway will run only one way, like the man with the bonus? It may be right—I do not say it is not right—but it would be trifling with the intelligence of this House to suppose this is other than a serious question with reference to the terminal point of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and we may as well face it. We may as well understand distinctly whether it is part of the policy of the Government and of Parliament that the resources which this Company possesses, by virtue of this contract, are to be applied—while yet we are to be engaged in pouring out of the public treasury $30,000,000 more—to creating an Atlantic terminus in the United States for the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now, Sir, this was not all. With reference to the expenditures, it turned out that the sum of $700,000 had been expended in what the hon. gentleman calls—I believe it is the technical word of the market—"sustaining" the stock of the Canada North-West Land Company; and there are divers other large items mentioned in the hon. gentleman's statement but not explained. But the hon. gentleman said: I felt it my duty, in dealing with this matter, to procure thorough, sound, good information. He felt it his duty to ascertain, to the bottom, how things stood, and so he employed his engineer and the Commissioner of Inland Revenue to go to Montreal and make an investigation into the accounts of the Company, such as would be suitable in case somebody else was going to advance them a large sum of money upon their property, or to become a partner in their business. That order was issued on the 28th of January, and the report was made, if I understood the hon. gentleman aright, upon the 2nd of February. What were they sent down for? To inform the hon. gentleman's mind? To enable him to understand what they were doing? To enable him to get that information which was necessary for him and his colleagues to arrive at a decision? Oh, no! Because they had already reached a decision. They reached a decision before the report came. An announcement was made; we had their policy declared to us, and therefore it was not for that purpose. But I suspect that it was because it was thought that we would accept this statement, and the hon. gentleman's officers and the officer of the Minister of Inland Revenue, were sent down to make a report with reference to the transaction under this state of things. The Ministers under whom they serve, concluded that they would enter into the partnership, that they would make the advance, and Parliament should have, they agreed, such information as would enable it to agree with the Ministers. The officers come down and they make enquiry, and it is expected Parliament will agree. They make the enquiry in two, or three, or four days into these transactions, involving so many millions of money; they make it in reference to a decision already arrived at. Is it not the most surprising thing in the world that these two subordinates of the hon. gentleman did not find that the accounts were all wrong, and that the transaction was one that he would not accept? I am amazed! It was so probable that they should have found differently from what the hon. gentleman had decided; it was so probable they should have differed from the Cabinet with reference to the proposition they were about to submit to Parliament, that it is really extraordinary we should have from them the report we have heard from the hon. gentleman tonight. Now, Sir, in that report they tell us that they did not enquire into the distribution of the stock; they tell us that they did not investigate the expenditure on the line; and if we are lending money upon the faith of a wise dealing with the stock, and upon the faith of wise expenditures upon the line, they did not investigate things that were extremely material. I have no doubt that these accounts are not falsified; I have no doubt that these accounts are kept as these gentlemen said they were kept; I have no doubt that there has been no falsification or fraud in the keeping of the accounts of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. But the question is, what their transactions have been? The question is, whether they have been prudent, whether they have been wise, what the nature of them has been. These were the questions which were to be entered into—these were the questions which were to have been investigated. But the investigators tell us: We did not enquire into the distribution of the stock; we did not enquire into the expenditures of the Company. Then, Sir, everything went well as long as the money held out. As I have said, the Company was lauded by everybody holding views consonant with those of Ministers, as possessed of all those capacities and faculties which Ministers credited them with. They could make no mistake, they did make no mistake; they were building faster than any one had ever built before; they were building better than any one had ever built before; they were building cheaper than any one had ever built before. The road was improving all the time in its prospects; the work was becoming easier; and it was found from day to day and from year to year that the difficulties were disappearing; that traffic prospects were becoming brighter. Everything pointed more and more to the extreme excellence of the enterprise. With this joyful news we were regaled in season and out of season, until the time arrived that another story was told; until the time arrived that the country was startled, in the month of October last, by the statement that the Government had agreed to guarantee the stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to the extent of three per cent. for the period of ten years. In the meantime the possessors of the fortunate contract, of this magnificent enterprise, had been dealing just as you would expect them to deal; they had been acting with reference to it just as you would expect them to act; and now suddenly, without a moment's notice, we are told that they are to get a Government guarantee. The first announcement was on the 27th of October, and it was that the Government had guaranteed the interest upon $100,000,000, and that they had received $15,000,000 in cash, and $5,000,000 was to be received on the 1st of February last, and $4,500,000 in undoubted security. That was the announcement when the details were given, but in the first instance, there was a simple announcement that the Government had made the guarantee as stated. Now, Sir, I have never been able to understand, and the hon. gentleman has not explained to-day, how it could be that if the Company gave cash, or the equivalent of cash, to an amount representing the present value of that guarantee, they would be any the better for the operation. It is not in the nature of things that they could be. It is impossible that they could be improved by simply taking a certain portion of their available assets and locking them up at a fair price to represent dividends for ten years. The hon. gentleman tells us that the greatest financiers of Canada, of New York, of London, all agree that this operation would have the effect of increasing the value of the shares of the Canada Pacific Railway Company. Well, all I can say is, that I should like some explanation as to how it is possible, on the assumption I have named, that tangible assets of the Company, fairly representing the worth of the guarantee, and which were handed over for the guarantee, could increase the value of the shares. He might as well tell me that by taking your money out of your own pocket and putting it into your hands to keep, you were increasing your wealth. He might as well tell me that by locking up a portion of your funds in certain investments producing only four per cent. you are better off. It is quite true that if that had taken place, which was for some time thought to have taken place; if the Government had given that gratuitous guarantee, if the Government had engaged the credit of the country for cash or its equivalent, that might have been an advantage; the then holders of the stock might have realized more for it, because persons might buy more readily when they understood that the Dominion of Canada was good, at any rate, for three per cent. upon the nominal value of the stock for ten years; and that would cost the company nothing. But, if that was the assumption, it was speedily to be disturbed. That was, apparently, the assumption, for the stock rose. In England, a cable was received by Morton, Rose & Co., the agents for the Company, announcing that the Government had guaranteed three per cent. on the $100,000,000 for ten years, and announcing also that the earnings of the Company were left free to supplement this dividend with interest at three per cent. That cable was, no doubt, unintentionally, very unfortunately worded, because the impression that it would convey—that it conveyed to me, and that it conveyed to others—was, first of all, that the guarantee was gratuitous—not that it was simply a deposit by the Company with the Government, of assets which the Government was going to hold, but that it was a gratuitous guarantee. I certainly did suppose when I read that cable, which declares that the earnings of the Company were left free for ten years to supplement the dividend, that no part of the earnings of the Company was charged to pay this three per cent.; but I find, when the papers come down, that the postal and the transport services, two elements of the Company's revenue are expressly charged to pay the dividend, although I am unable to reconcile with my reading of the agreement, the statement made upon the London market, and I presume upon the New York market, that this arrangement was such as left the earnings free. However, upon this understanding, the stock rose, and it rose to somewhere about sixty-four in New York and London. There was a considerable amount of speculation, and I believe that the market was what they call milked, and that a good many people lost a good deal of money in Canadian Pacific Railway stock. Who profited has not yet been disclosed. In a few short days it was found the Company had made a mistake. They said in their letter, written about eight days, I think, after the first proposal, that they did not want this arrangement. They proposed that the guarantee should extend to this $5,000,000 only, because they said they did not want to sell the $35,000,000 at once, and they said, also, it would cost them too much money. Is the House surprised, are the Government surprised; is the country surprised that some financiers, although not perhaps so wise as those who thought it was an excellent arrangement, should have declined to believe that the value of the stock was raised by a transaction of this description? The stock shortly fell, and full disclosures were made—no not full disclosures, but more disclosures as to the character of the arrangement. It was discovered that a certain amount of cash was paid, that more cash was to be paid, and that securities were given for the rest. The securities were not disclosed. According to the explanations of the hon. gentleman himself, the check and fall in the stock is attributed to the mystery and want of openness which had characterized the transaction; and I must say that so far as regards the Company itself and the Government in connection with this transaction, it was unfortunate in the last degree that it should have been carried out as it was carried out—carried out in a manner which enabled the imputation to be made with too much apparent reason, that negotiations with the Government had been made use of to profit private persons who were aware of them. I maintain there should have been absolute secrecy as to this arrangement, and no dabbling in the stock of the Company by any one acquainted with it, and that when completed it should have been made known, in all its particulars, to the public. The whole arrangement should have been made known. I say, so that the public could have become aware exactly what the Government were giving, and what the Company were giving to the Government, and judge for themselves what the effect upon the stock would be. But the First Minister, as the Montreal Witness informed us some time ago, is said by Mr. Drinkwater, Secretary of the Company, to have told the Company not to speak, and to have declared that he himself intended to make a full explanation in a few days, and in the mean time they should be silent. And silent they were. But the First Minister did not speak; he does not speak now. The transaction affected the Government otherwise. What a chorus of laudations were heard. It was described as a magnificent transaction, one in which the Government had achieved a financial success; an operation of a character capable only of being achieved by the present Finance Minister. Why, the failure of the domestic loan turned out to be a blessing in disguise, because the hon. Finance Minister did not want money, for the Syndicate would provide him with it. What did he want with $4,000,000 when $24,500,000 were to be provided by the syndicate of the Canadian Pacific Railway? What a lucky thing it was that he had not taken up a loan? He would not have known what to do with the money, because of those $24,500,000 he was going to get from the syndicate. Not merely was the money to be supplied which was intended to be taken from the pockets of his fellow-countrymen by making a loan, but the loans which were about to expire in eleven months, were also to be largely met. The situation was easier. The hon. gentleman would have to go to England, it is true, but only for a fraction of the sum for which he would have otherwise had to go, because the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, adding one more to the immense blessings which it had already conferred upon the country, was pouring out of its abundance into our coffers those sums, to enable us to redeem our indebtedness. Did those who described this transaction as admirably beneficial to the Government and the country, ever consider that if it was so good for them, it could not really be so very good for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company too; that it really could not advantage the Government so enormously and be also a great good to the other party to the bargain. A mere money transaction of this description cannot possess those conflicting characters. How changed the situation now is. In November last, we were congratulating ourselves that we had $24,500,000 of solid cash ready to be furnished by the Company to redeem our debts, and to-night we are discussing a proposition that we shall advance $22,500,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. If that is not a turn-about-face, from November to February, I do not know what a turn-about-face is. It was a splendid thing for the Company and the country that the former should furnish $24,500,000; it is now a splendid thing for the Company and for the country that the latter should loan them $22,500,000. The hon. gentleman stated that this transaction was almost warranted by the law. We have a new idea respecting the sanctity of Acts of Parliament, and the power of the Executive in these later days. It was only the other day that a solemn Act of Parliament passed by hon. gentlemen opposite, and which provided certain things imperatively, was dispensed with by those hon. gentlemen, and when I asked under the authority of what law I was told it was done under the law of necessity. We know that necessity knows no law, and as the hon. gentleman represented necessity, I do him no injustice in saying that he knew no law on that occasion. There was actually no Order in Council passed, but a Departmental Order was issued, informing Collectors of Customs throughout the country that they were required to disobey the law. In that view I am almost surprised to learn that the hon. Minister of Railways admits that they have a little transcended the power of the Government in making this arrangement. I am surprised he did not say that they were fully clothed with authority for it. Why should he not have done so? There is a law which authorizes them, in case they require cash to pay our debts or meet our obligations, to borrow that cash and issue terminable annuities in return therefor; and having that, is it not almost within the law that they should issue the securities without getting the cash? It is true that inconvenience would arise; because the object for which the transaction was carried out was to obtain cash, and if the cash was not obtained, the debts could not be paid. The hon. Minister says that the Government, in taking this action, but slightly transcended their powers. I say it was an exceedingly grave act; that it was an act to be done only under a sense of the gravest responsibility; an act to be done only in some emergency which would be of itself a justification for the breach of the law; that it was an act which is calculated, if slurred over as this act is slurred over, to throw doubt upon all the securities of the Canadian Government; an Act as to which the Ministers, before they entered into it, ought to have been satisfied, first of all, that it was absolutely required by some pressing emergency, and secondly, that it would have met the emergency. But, Sir, they were not satisfied that it was a pressing emergency, nor did it meet the emergency after all; for the hon. gentleman tells us that the result of his great coup was not merely a failure, but positive disaster; that it was disastrous to the Company that the transaction should have been entered into, because they did not improve the price of their stock by a dollar, and they did pay into the hands of the Government the $8,700,000. And they come down to Parliament and in the Speech from the Throne they tell us that they made this arrangement in October. They do not tell us that they transcended the law under the pressure of necessity and that they are about to ask us for a Bill of indemnity for that transgression of the law. They do not propose any bill of indemnity, but they say, we will treat this as an ordinary transaction and we will ask you to make it a little better for the Company. You will go into the committee, treat the agreement as a valid agreement, and the Company not being able to implement the agreement itself, we will ask you to agree to a postponement of the February cash to the end of five years. I say that that is no constitutional, no proper mode of treating transactions of this kind; and this Parliament will be wanting in its duty to the people it assumes to represent if it does not insist on transactions of this enormous magnitude, created in defiance of the law, being at any rate dealt with, with such due regard to their gravity as to call for that formal and full sanctioning of them on that ground of necessity which can be their sole ground of justification. The Government, however, were certainly persuaded, and they put the shareholders of the Company in a pretty good position. They agree to guarantee the dividends to the stockholders for ten years, and to do that to a large extent on credit, after having received the cash which was the price of the dividend. Here again is a little inversion of the order of things, as it existed. We were told when the Canadian Pacific Railway contract was passed, that we were obtaining from the Company security that they would complete the line; but now it seems it is proposed to us that we should give up the security to complete the line, and in lieu of it give them security to pay their dividends. This is an arrangement which is highly satisfactory, I have no doubt, when accomplished on credit, to the shareholders; but if it is not an alteration of the contract with the Company, I fail to understand what an alteration is. Now, Sir, the present proposal is that we should guarantee to the extent of a sum which is equal in cash to a present value of $7,300,000, and lend them $22,500,000 besides. Thus we are to engage $30,000,000. In doing so we are also to abandon the security for the completion. The Government is to occupy a very peculiar relation to the Company—a sort of double and inconsistent relation. First it is to guarantee dividends to the stockholders, and secondly, it is to be the mortgagee of the road. It is to guarantee the profits to the stockholders of the Company for ten years and to be the mortgagee of these very profits out of which the dividends can alone be paid. What is the result of that position? Very little cry for lowering tolls after this will be listened to by this Parliament, because the answer of the Company would be. Ah! gentlemen, very good. You are of course aware that you have guaranteed interest on our stock to the extent of three per cent; you are aware that you have lent us $22,500,000 for which we agreed to pay interest, and the only funds out which we can pay interest are the profits of the enterprise. If you choose to cut down the tolls, you understand that you cannot get—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is the sale of the lands.

Mr. BLAKE. Of course there is the sale of the lands, but what has been said about the sale of the lands. The dividend is to be paid all the time, and the interest. How will the Government be in a position, under these circumstances, to meet the suggestion of the company; that the interest of the country requires high tolls in order that the obligations entered into may be implemented without loss to the company by reason of the Company having a deficient revenue? Now, I do not intend to go into a great many of the estimates which the hon. gentleman has made. There will be ample opportunity for fully discussing these figures, which are not the same in some particulars as those which are given in the Company's own statement. The hon. gentleman has introduced, and rightly introduced, certain elements which were omitted to be expressly set forth in the Company's statement, as for example, the element of cash received for town sites, and the element of the income received from the earnings of the road. There are other items which should also be added, amongst them being the Winnipeg bonus of $200,000, which was received in the last year. It is better that the statement should be made once for all, with a full appreciation of the bearing of the hon. gentleman's additions and changes on the statement of the Company themselves—that it should be made in the most perfect form to night and repeated afterwards. A few general observations, however, may be made with reference to these calculations. Last Session I pointed out to the House the estimate of the Company, according to the report of December, 1882, of what the road would cost, embracing the line from Montreal to Port Moody and the branches, exclusive of the Government sections. What the Company said then was that the road would be built for $25,000,000 of subsidy, for land grant bonds to the amount of $20,000,000, and for $90,000,000 stock, which, at sixty, was equal to $54,000,000 in cash; that is, for in all, $99,000,000 of money. As late as April, 1883, the President of the Company published a letter in which he said that the cost to the shareholders of the 3,260 miles fully equipped, would be the $54,000,000, which he assumed would be realized for the $90,000,000 of stock against which they would have 17,000,000 acres of the finest wheat lands on the continent. This same estimate, practically repeating in April what had been stated in the December previous, was, that the whole line from Montreal to Callander and the presently contemplated branches would cost the Company $99,000,000, of which the Company would have to provide $54,000,000. Now, last Session I showed, analyzing that statement, that from this should be taken to get the cost of the main line contracted for, for the extensions and branches, about $3,000,000. I was unable to speak with exact accuracy, but that was the nearest approximation I could make, and I am not yet persuaded that there was any material error in that approximation. If there was, it was against the figures as I now present them. That would leave the cost of the contracted line $91,000,000, according to the estimates of the company in 1881. Now, in January 1884, a fresh estimate is presented, and that estimate is really worth the attentive consideration by Parliament, when it is called upon to rely upon this new estimate as proving that funds are now being provided with which the road will be completed. This estimate embraces these figures: Mr. Stephen states that the total expenditure of the Company has been $58,700,000; and that it will cost to complete, $27,000,000—and I add for equipment, $2,800,000 to that estimate; making a total cost of $88,500,000 to complete the whole railway.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It includes equipment.

Mr. BLAKE. I am very glad to hear it. Then the present estimate is that the total cost will be $85,700,000. Now, that amount is $13,300,000 less than the estimate of April last for the whole road; so that, if we assumed the estimate of $85,700,000 to be for the same subject-matter as the estimate of December, 1882, and April, 1883, we find a diminution in the cost of something like $13,000,000. But that is not all; for this new estimate of $85,700,000 embraces much more than the old estimate. It embraces the deposits for future dividends for years after the completion of the work. I leave, as supposed to be embraced in the old estimates, those dividends until the period estimated for completion—the two years remaining; but there are many years after completion for which the Company has already provided dividends out of this $58,700,000. For that, $5,000,000 is to be deducted. That sum embraces also that multitude of items—the seaboard extension items—to which the hon. gentleman referred, amounting to $3,500,000; and it embraces also the Credit Valley bonds of, say $500,000, making in all $4,000,000 in round numbers—that is, $9,000,000 altogether, of items which are embraced in the transactions contemplated by the last estimate, and not in the former ones. Deduct, therefore, $9,000,000 more, and you get a sum of $76,700,000 as the cost now estimated of the same work which was estimated at $99,000,000 nine months ago. Now, I want to apply these considerations to the estimate for the contracted line. I have shown what they were as applied to the whole line now contemplated. Mr. Stephen's figures with reference to the contracted line are these, in round numbers: Work done on the main line, $23,080,000; proportion of equipment—for I assume that the equipment was for the whole line, and therefore deduct some for the branches—$6,000,000; materials, $4,000,000; to complete, $27,000,000; and I add for interest and dividends, no less than $6,000,000; which, omitting the equipment, would give me $66,000,000 as the present estimate for the contracted line. The Company now think that the contracted line from Callender to Port Moody will cost them $66,000,000, as against $90,000,000, their estimate of so late ago as April last; that is, a saving of $24,000,000 on what they had agreed and are bound to this country to do,—including, as I said, in that estimate, the large sum of $6,000,000 for dividends out of capital, irrespective of earnings altogether. Now, these discrepancies are entirely confounding. It is impossible to understand them. The hon. gentleman has not attempted to grapple with them. He has not taken up the estimates which we were given last Session, and which we discussed and dealt with, and compared them with the estimates which he now brings forward, and told us how it is that $24,000,000 less is required to finish the contracted line than was required ten months ago. I think an explanation is required, and enquiry should be made on that point. I am not satisfied with these estimates. I am not satisfied with the statements made without a single particular given to us, except what is contained in a few lines which the hon. gentleman has read to-night. Now, then, if the contracted line is to cost only $66,000,000, the Company are to receive $25,000,000 in cash; from land grant bonds, $9,200,000—of which it has received over $9,000,000; bonuses and town sites, already received, $700,000—and they will probably receive further on that account, $500,000—making altogether $35,400,000. And they are to get from us now $22,500,000, making $58,900,000 from the public, as against a total expenditure of $66,000,000 on the contracted line. And they have already in their hands 10,000,000 acres, and are to get, during the progress of the contract, other acres to the amount of over 11,000,000 more—over 21,000,000 acres in all. That is the proposition, Sir. We contracted with them to build this railway. They tell us now that this contracted railway, the subject of the contract, is going to cost them only the sum which I have named. And we say that they have received from public resources over $35,000,000 and the loan is almost to make up the whole of the rest—and besides they are to get 20,000,000 acres of land, and what they may make out of their stock, while what they got out of their original stock, their first $25,000,000, would be enough to complete the work. It is impossible, under these circumstances, to contend against proposition that it is not the contracted line that has caused the difficulty. It is impossible, under these circumstance, to contend that if the energies of the Company had been limited and prudently applied to the contracted line, there could have been any question of this kind. The loan of $22,500,000 is not required for the contracted line under these circumstances; it is wanted in consequence of the general engagements into which the Company has entered. Now, as I have said, I cannot, without explanation, acquiesce in these altered estimates. I cannot understand upon what they are based. It is true that we are told that the work is much lighter than was expected—that the contract is going to be much more profitable than was expected. These do not appear to be extremely valid reasons for advancing more public money to the fortunate contractors, but the question, whether they account for so large a sum as would be represented by this estimate of only $27,000,000, being required to complete, is a very serious one. Now, if you apply the new proposition to the contracted line, as I have said, you will find that on any calculation of any moderate advance or application of the Company's own funds to that line, the public resources are adequate to carry on the work with reasonable rapidity. And the truth is, that under the proposed arrangement, it is not the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, but the Government, practically, which will be providing funds to build the contracted line. The president says that this $58,700,000, which he has provided includes the various items—which I do not challenge—which come from the public viz.: subsidy, about $12,300,000; land bonds, for which he gives credit for only a little over $9,000,000, but the account says that $9,200,000 have been received by the Company, and I suppose the rest is in the hands of the Government; bonuses and town sites, which he omits, $690,000; and the earnings to the 30th of June last, which I presume to be about $1,400,000, would make $23,600,000. And then he inserts as part of what the Company has provided their floating debt, the debt which they cannot provide for, and for which we are called upon to provide—for which we are going to give $7,500,000 of this $22,500,000 at once to meet this part of what the Company has provided, and which is included in the $58,700,000. Why have they not provided it? It is because they have not provided it that we are here to-night. We have to provide it. We are to lend them the money and take a mortgage for it. He includes also the $8,700,000 for future dividends. I do not think myself, that it is an absolutely necessary expenditure upon the Canadian Pacific Railway, so far. It may have been a very prudent thing for these corporators to say to us; "As our stock is at forty-six what it cost us, we would like to get 11 per cent. more while the work is going on, and we will insure ourselves three-fifths of that amount; but in order to insure ourselves that we will deposit it; we could not deposit it ourselves in a bank, because if any difficulty arose it would be taken away from us, but we will get the Government of the country to take it from us, and hold it for us, and pay it out to us in dividends from time to time, as the years roll on. We will hand over $8,700,000 of the present assets which otherwise could have been used in the work, in order that we may provide against a rainy day, in order that the Government and the country may provide for us—dole it out to us—from year to year, so that we may be secure of something." After having made that application of $8,700,000 of what has been raised one way or the other,—to include it amongst the $58,700,000 provided for the purposes of the railway, seems to me to be rather a broad proposition. Well, now, I deduct these two sums,—the floating debt we have to provide for, and the $8,700,000, which is locked up for the benefit of the shareholders in futuro; and I find that this, added to the $23,600,000 of public resources to which I formerly adverted, makes $39,800,000, leaving a balance of $18,900,000 alone as provided for by the Company for the work. And from this—dealing with the contracted line—there are other deductions. The expenditure from Montreal to Callander includes the various items which the hon. gentleman gave us to-night in that connection—$5,400,000; for branches, $3,800,000; sundries, $3,600,000; and Credit Valley Bonds, $500,000 more, which gives us a total of $13,300,000 to be deducted; leaving, dealing with the contracted line alone, only somewhere about $5,000,000 of money provided by the Company out of its own resources. Now, Sir, that is the state of things with reference to the contracted line, and that, slightly modified, is the state of things with reference to the whole line. And these considerations once again show how ridiculous it is to say that this money would have been wanted had the Company dealt with this enterprise in the true spirit and with reference to the obligations of the contract. It is because that spirit and those obligations have been departed from,

and because other things have been entered into, which may be useful, which may be profitable, and may be in the interest of the country, but which ought not to have been entered into to the detriment of the ability of the Company to perform its obligations to the public, that this money is required. The first thing for them to consider was: Can we perform our obligations to the public?—before launching out in these various ways; but the first thing they did was to launch out. They cannot perform their obligations, and they come to us to enable them to do so. If, however, it be the case that there is no satisfactory explanation of the reduction in the estimate of cost; if the cost is still to be estimated at what it was estimated only nine or ten months ago, then it is clear that the calculations of the hon. gentleman entirely fail. It is clear, also, that his suggestion as to the financing entirely fails. If you only apply these calculations of debit and receipt to the present estimate, you produce one result, but if you apply them to the estimate of cost of ten months ago, you produce quite a different result. According to the present estimate of cost, which reduces the cost of the railway so very far below whatever it was estimated to cost before, you find this result: The company owes $7,500,000; it wants, to complete the railway, $27,000,000, and it wants to pay its floating debt. It therefore wants $34,500,000 of money. What is it to get from the Government? It is to get its subsidy, $12,700,000, and a loan of $22,500,000, or $34,500,000 in money. It is therefore, according to the present estimate, to get every shilling that is necessary to complete the road from the country. It is to give, not merely every shilling necessary to complete the road, but every shilling necessary to pay off the floating debt besides. That is the statement; and these results being ascertained, it is possible, and I put it forward as a subject for enquiry, that this floating debt does not itself include the $5,000,000 temporarily borrowed on $10,000,000 of stock; and if so, the result of the payment of the floating debt would be to free the $10,000,000 of stock at the disposal of the Company. But meanwhile the hon. gentleman is able, triumphantly, to say, the road will be finished with this money—that is to say, if those estimates are correct. Why, the hon. gentleman who offered, with a lavish hand, to provide every dollar which is estimated to be necessary to finish the line from the beginning to the end, and to pay the floating debt, may well say, "I am making adequate provision for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway." Yet if the estimates be under-estimates, if they be not perfect estimates, if something like the cost of last year be the real cost, the account is quite on the other side, and large sums will have to be provided from some other source to meet the further demands. The hon. gentleman will say: Oh, they will get it out of the lands or further issue of stock, out of something from which they have failed to get it hitherto. But you, Sir, know the statement we have as to the condition of the road indicates there is no ground for believing in that result, because the loan is not to be repayable until 1891, which means it is not expected that very large resources will come from any other quarter before 1891; certainly not within the next two years; and if large resources are not to come from any other quarter within the next two years, then it is clear that if this estimate be an underestimate, if the estimate of last year be the correct estimate, more money will be wanted, and I think this night's proceedings will tell where that money will be asked from. The information we have had is, as I have stated more than once, wholly defective. I have pointed out enormous discrepancies in the estimate of the cost, extremely convenient in order to persuade Parliament to the view, that now at least, full provision is being made for the construction of the railway; extremely convenient in order to persuade Parliament to the view that it runs so risk of being applied to again. But no explanation is given of how it happens that those conveniently low estimates are so much lower than the estimates of only ten months ago. Of that we are entitled to some explanation. Then as to the sales. In 1882 the report made to Parliament was that there were 6,450,000 acres of land sold. The report made to Parliament was that there was $17,300,000 worth of land grant bonds to be redeemed by those sales. The report made was that there was $18,500,000 worth of land grant bonds sold. Up to June, 1883, in the statistical return for the year, laid upon the Table of the House yesterday, the railway Company report their sales of land grant bonds at $18,500,000. The paper laid before us reports the total sales of lands, instead of 6,450,000 acres, to be 3,750,000 acres; instead of $18,500,000 bonds sold, $10,000,000 only of bonds were sold—fewer acres by 2,700,000; fewer bonds by $8,500,000. This change in the circumstances of the Company is a great source of weakness. I attribute their difficulty to the failure their expectations in regard to those transactions which resulted in the former flourishing report. And what I complain of is, that with allegations on the part of the hon. Minister that he was coming forward to give a perfectly frank statement of the transaction, that he felt it his duty, and the Company felt it their duty, to let the whole cat out of the bag and give the House the whole story, a large part of the cat's tail has remained inside the bag. Eight millions of cash which was expected, has not been realized in this branch alone. The reason is the failure of the Canada North-West Land Company to fulfil its contract; and we hear now, what I was about to have referred to even without the hon. gentleman's statement on the subject, how intimately associated the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has been with the Canada North-West Land Company. This corporation, which is known, unfortunately, to too many Canadians, was created with a view to assisting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and was composed, in part, I believe, of some of its corporators. The people of this country, were told it was going to be the best thing of the boom. It was the real thing—the cream of the North-West. They were told—the people here were persuaded—that individuals in England were to take two-thirds of the capital, or $10,000,000, and Canada was to be privileged to have $5,000,000; but they were told that the demand was going to be so great that any man who wanted $5,000 must subscribe for $10,000, because he would never get what he wanted unless he subscribed for double the amount. By this means they procured subscriptions of $10,000,000, instead of $5,000,000, in Canada, and they were told the deposit was all that would require to be paid, and the greedy Britisher would be so anxious to swallow the stock that Canadians would be able to send it across and sell it at an enormous premium. Subscriptions for $10,000,000 were got here, and the list was sent to England and subscriptions, not for $10,000,000, but for $5,000,000, were obtained there. How much was obtained by others than the projectors I know not. The concern dragged. In my opinion this was because it was founded upon a false basis—upon a false opinion as to the amount of capital required to work transactions of this description. The subscribers expected that sales would be made so quickly that they could pay for the lands without calling upon the stockholders; and the public of England did not take to a company involving such a large amount of liability which they thought would be called upon. The stockholders here, who had been told that if they wanted $5,000 they would have to subscribe for $10,000, were told they had subscribed for $10,000 and not for $5,000, and some of them paid as long as they could, and then sold for a fraction of the $10,000; and the loss to the capital of Canada by the operations of this Company was several millions of dollars. Now, we learn that our money given to the Canadian Pacific Railway

Mr. BLAKE.

Company to build this railway, has been expended, to the amount of $600,000, in "sustaining" the stock of the North-West Land Company; that operations which, when they occur in banks, of bankers sustaining their own stocks, are treated very harshly, have been going on with respect to that Company. And the hon. gentleman says it was quite natural and proper and within their charter, because everybody knows how deeply interested they were in sustaining the stock. I do not think that was a proper application of the money at all. It was an application of the money which was to lead the investing public to believe the stock was worth more than it really was; to believe that there was a demand for it that did not exist. It was a mis-application of the funds of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Mr. Stephen says nothing at all in his statement of the outside land sales or of the bonuses, but the return to Parliament shows $200,000 of bonuses at Winnipeg, and I think $490,000 for town sites already realized. Then we did not get from him—though the hon. Minister has given some information—any information at all as to the working account, or as to the net earnings; and I was at a loss to understand whether the $2,128,000 which he represented as paid for dividends was provided for partly by the net earnings, or whether it was exclusive of the net earnings. I gather, though I am not sure I am right, from the hon. gentleman's statement, that the net earnings are included in the $587,000 spoken of by Mr. Stephen, and therefore he has given credit for them. But the statement would appear to show that that was money provided by the Company, though it was money accrued from the running of the road and ought to be set off against the interest paid on the capital so far. The hon. gentleman says the returns are satisfactory. I am sorry I cannot agree with him, and I am of the opinion, also, that on this subject we ought to have much more information. If I rightly read the return of the Canadian Pacific Railway for the year ending the 30th June, 1882, its profits on work over expenditure to that date are placed at about $840,000; and I see by the return laid on the Table of the House, its profits over working expenses last year are placed at somewhere about $537,000 only. The letter says nothing of that for a complete year, but it gives an account of the nine months which have elapsed immediately preceding, showing some $900,000 odd as the earnings of those nine months. One would like to know what this means. One would like to know what the true running account is; how far these nine months overlap the previous year; what is the meaning of the discrepancy in results between the complete year ending 30th June, 1883, and the complete year ending 30th June, 1882. Then it was not until this evening that, for the first time, we learned anything as to what the stock had realized. The letter gives no information about it. As I have already observed, we do not know now how the stock has realized that amount; at what the $30,000,000, issued to the public, was sold; how much the syndicate took, at what rate they took it: what, in other words, are the real merits of a transaction in which we have a very deep interest. Not one word is said in the statement furnished to the Government and by the Government to Parliament as to the relations of the Company with all the other roads to which I have referred, or their relation to the Hamilton and North-Western in which, in their interest, a large quantity of stock and bonds was purchased, as I have been told by those concerned in that transaction. No explanation whatever, either, is given by the president of the Company of the transactions with reference to the Laurentian Railway and the Canada Central, and the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental. The statements are rather difficult of apprehension. One statement is that there has been paid by the Company on those roads, $3,200,000. I think the hon. gentleman to-night said $3,333,000, and I presume the statement of the president was made up to the 31st of December. But taking $3,200,000, round figures, there are mortgages for five and a half millions of dollars, it is said, which would apparently make a cost of $8,700,000, for these roads. But if you will look at the statistical railway returns you will find there a statement that there is unpaid by the Canadian Pacific Railway on the Canada Central, in round figures, $4,000,000, and on the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental, $3,850,000, a total of $7,850,000. Add to this the $3,200,000 that have been paid and you find $11,000,000 as the cost of those roads, instead of the smaller sum to which I have referred. To this has to be added, I presume the equipment and other charges. The payment of $2,300,000 as interest on deposit and purchase money, equipment and other charges, will bring the cost up to a very high figure; but, of course, it includes the nugget of gold which the Company is so delicate in speaking about—the Laurentian Railway. We had no information until the hon. gentleman vouchsafed it to us to-night, as to the particulars of the expenditure of $3,500,000 for roads towards the seaboard and for other purposes within the charter. We find now that it is considered a purpose within the charter to spend $600,000 in sustaining the stock of a land corporation, or to buy stock in a United States railway; and I do not know what are the undefined purposes yet within the charter, when I find these are the defined and avowed purposes which are alleged to be included in it. There is much information which it would be important for us to receive with a view to really ascertaining the value of the statistics given—how much of the sum which is said to have been spent on the main line is due to the incomplete line and what the finished line has cost. A large sum is said to have been expended on the line which is not yet completed. It will not do, of course, to divide that indefinite amount over the mileage of that which is completed, because that would make an extravagant cost of the mileage of the completed road. But we have no statement of what the completed railway has cost in its different sections. We ought to know what each separate section or link has cost, so far as it has been completed. We ought to know what are the arrangements with reference to the more easterly part; we ought to know the class of arrangements with reference to the central part and those entered into with the North American Company with reference to the work recently terminated. Last year some information was given to us. We were told what the embankment was in the prairie section; we were told that the enormous quantity, for such a line, of 15,300 cubic yards of embankment to the mile had been made, but we did not know what was done in the other places this year. When we are called to advance $22,500,000 and to pledge our credit for nigh $7,500,000 more, we are not given so much information as was vouchsafed last year when we were told no demand would be made upon us. We see nothing in the president's letters about the contracts made. We have not the instruments of association of these contracting parties. Only two days ago I heard there were more than one. I heard there were two, perhaps three, different parties operating at different times; and since one of the firms has unhappily dissolved, owing the Canadian Pacific Railway $600,000, put in as providing for the work. It is really important for us to get at the bottom of the relations of the Company with its contractors. What dependence, under these circumstances, with no detailed estimate, with no division even of the cost, with no statement of how much of what is expected to be paid will be required for the eastern end, and how much will be required for the mountain end—what dependence can be placed on the allegation that the road will be completed for the estimated amount of $27,000,000, contradicted as this is by the estimates of last year? I doubt the estimates. I doubt their accuracy. I doubt their definiteness. I was startled last fall to find reported the opinions of the general manager on this subject; and they correspond so admirably with results as they are developed here to-night, that I propose to trouble you with some statements made to a reporter by the general manager some time about the period when the company reached the foot of the Rockies, this fall:—

“A reporter of the Montreal Star recently interviewed Mr. Van Horne with the following result:—‘We are,’ said Mr. Van Horne, ‘at this season of the year at the very height of our expenditure, and it is safe to say that we are spending $100,000 a day.’”

Then he states what they are doing and where they expect to be. He speaks also of the pass across the Selkirks, and so forth.

“‘Our line is now located through from Montreal to Kamloops, and, with anything like good luck, we will be through to that point where we join the Government work in about two years.’ ‘How much will it cost per mile through the Rockies?’ ‘We don’t know.’ ‘Have you not estimated the amount beforehand?’ ‘The Canadian Pacific Railway,’ replied Mr. Van Horne, bracing himself up and speaking as if he wanted the reporter to understand that he meant every word he said, ‘has never estimated the cost of any work; it hasn’t time for that; it’s got a big job on hand, and it’s going to put it through.’ ‘Well,’ said the reporter, ‘but if you haven’t estimated the cost of the construction through the mountains, how do you know that you have sufficient funds to push the road, as you are currently reported to have?’ ‘Well, if we haven’t got enough, we will get more, that’s all about it.’”

And so it is getting more. We are providing for it to-night. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company, Mr. Speaker, has not time to make estimates; it has got a big job on hand, and it is going to put it through; it does not know what its road will cost through the mountains, and if it has not got enough money it will get more. These are the views of the manager, and these are the views which we find have commended themselves to the prudence and judgment of the Ministry, and which are to be realized by this proposed resolution.

“‘And how about your eastern connections? What about the North Shore?’ ‘That and all other matters in the east are for future consideration. I think we will do well if we get through from Montreal to the Pacific in two years.’ ‘And how about your bridge and eastern connection to the Atlantic?’ ‘Now, come,’ said he, and I think he must have repeated this to the Minister just before he made his speech, ‘‘It does not do to give too much publicity to all our schemes, and might do us harm.’ ‘Rumor says you will get to the Atlantic by the South-Eastern.’’—I suppose it is the South-Eastern, unless that road is south-west as well as south-east—‘and that, as a matter of fact, you now control that road?’ ‘Not to my knowledge.’ ‘Then you will want the North Shore?’ The question failed to elicit a reply, and the reporter, seeing that he had probably obtained as much information as possible from the general manager, retired, forcibly impressed with the resolute frankness of character displayed by the man who is the administrative head of this great Canadian enterprise.’”

That is grand, Mr. Speaker. That is glorious. That is just what any of us would do if there was no bottom to our purses, if money was no object; that is just the way we would manage if we had the Dominion of Canada to back us, to bank for us, to give us a guarantee without the authority of law if we wanted it, and to give us twenty-two millions and a half more if we wanted it. What is the need of estimates? What difference does it make how much it costs? We have a big job and we will put it through. We have the Government at our back, and between the Government and ourselves we shall put it through. They will find the money; we shall find what we can, and they will find the rest. The president now says it is profitable to change the mode of estimating the subsidy. It was proper before to take the mode laid down in the contract. Now it is quite proper to adopt a mode which is the contrary to that laid down in the contract, the president believing it to be good for the Company, and the Government believing it to be good for the Government, and both being agreed that it ought to be done. It does seem to me that these statements furnish the ground for the proposition that we have not had sufficient information. I say that it was the duty of the Government, before they committed themselves to the proposal to advance this money and to agree to this guarantee, to have had a thorough investigation into the affairs of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, right to the bottom; I say it was their duty to have investigated most thoroughly the past, the present, and the future; I say it was their duty to have obtained full, ample information, to have got all the details, to have obtained the detailed estimate of the expenditure for completion, to have ascertained how it was that that estimate ran so very far short of the estimates of ten months ago, and to have established, to their own satisfaction first, and as a preparation for submission to Parliament, all the particulars to which I have generally alluded to-night, as a preliminary to their reaching a decision. They did nothing of the kind. They decided first, and then they sent down two gentlemen to report as to whether they were right in coming to a decision or not; and that report is made while Parliament is sitting, within a day or two of this time, as I say just in preparation for this resolution being brought before the House. The hon. gentleman has said that the main line—in one of his numerous calculations, the only one which in this connection I will refer to—would cost $49,300,000, but in this is included the floating debt of $7,500,000, and the future dividends of $8,700,000, and therefore it would not cost that amount according to any fair estimate of funds provided by the Company. He said also that in case of default the country would get the road for, I think he said, $54,000,000, and he staked his reputation upon the accuracy of that statement, and he repeated it time and again; and after the recess he repeated it once again, saying he had pointed out that we would get it for this sum—I forget exactly what it was—of forty or fifty millions, and that he had proved that fact, while it would cost ninety-seven or a hundred and three millions, for at one time he used the one figure and at another time the other. The hon. gentleman was wrong. He made a calculation of a most peculiar character. In summing up what the road cost to the country he charged, as a proper thing to be charged as paid by the country, the value of the lands that were sold, not indeed at the price they had realized, but at his assumed estimate of two dollars, and he put in seven millions and a half for the three and three-quarter million acres as fairly chargeable as part of what the country has paid, and, with that item introduced into the calculation, he ran his figures up to something approximating to a hundred millions. He did not put in, however, the land that was unsold as any part of the cost. Then, when he came to ascertain the ultimate cost to the country, he took the land unsold, converted it into cash by a wave of his hand, made $42,000,000 or $43,000,000 out of it, and deducted that from the cost he had estimated before. Sir, where did the land come from? If it came from us, it is to be charged as part of the cost before he can make his calculation. Sir, the calculation is defective, and he had better submit it to Mr. Miall or Mr. Schreiber. The hon. gentleman adverted to estimates which had been formerly made of the cost of this road. It is quite true that I submitted to the House, as the result of the calculations of my hon. friend the member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), based upon the estimates of the engineers up to that date, the probable cost of a first-class railway, from Callander to Port Moody, at the sum he mentions—$120,000,000. That is perfectly true; I do not understand that the hon. gentleman now finds fault with that estimate. He did find fault with it—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, no.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes, he said to-day that he could not controvert my argument about his estimate being too low because my estimate was true. I venture to say that I heard a great deal of complaint against my argument when I used it. I was told that it was extravagant, and the hon. gentleman thought it was too much altogether; but neither my hon. friend from York, nor myself, was responsible for more than this, that the estimates were the fair results of the estimates of the engineers laid on the Table of the House and printed in the Sessional Papers. I believed them to be so, and that was all we said. I say that the estimates of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company last year came exactly to that figure. They were to spend $91,000,000 on the road from Callander to Port Moody. The Government sections were to cost $28,000,000; and if you add $28,000,000 to $91,000,000, you get just about $120,000,000, as nearly as possible; and if you allow a trifle—if the hon. gentleman would be bending enough to-night to allow a trifle or so for the $5,000,000 for surveys—you will find that the estimate of the Company last year does accord with the estimates of the engineers made so long before. But while I felt pretty confident, under the circumstances, that the Company were probably right, my confidence as to their present attitude is altogether shaken, because they are departing from their own estimate and the estimate of the engineers. They say it will cost $24,000,000 less, and that $24,000,000 is not on a capital of $120,000,000, but on a smaller capital of $91,000,000. The hon. gentleman adverted to some of my estimates of the price of the land, made in 1880. I did not think he would have done it. I was prepared for a good deal, but not for that; because I thought he would have remembered—unfortunately he forgot—that this was a calculation applying to the proposal of the Government, and the estimate of the Hon. First Minister, as to the price to be realized from the land situate within certain distances of the railway. We applied these figures of the hon. First Minister, and out of his own mouth we convicted him of an extravagant contract. Now the hon. gentleman says, you estimated these figures. The hon. gentleman says that the earnings of the road are most satisfactory. Well, I do not know whether they are or not. I should be glad to think they were; I hope they are. But in order that we may know whether the result is satisfactory or not, we should have the earnings of this eastern or disconnected portion given by themselves, as well as the earnings of the other part, given by themselves. We want to understand the progression, the cause of the difference between the receipts of last year and this; we want to understand to what extent these earnings are due to the very high rates which were charged,—rates admittedly so high that they were lately reduced by 25 or 30 per cent. for east-bound grain. The hon. gentleman says there will be no default at all, and that if there is a default, what a good bargain the country will have. Well, as I have said, we have no proper data before us to-day to justify the reduced estimates of cost that are given us. Without verifying and establishing those reduced estimates of cost, we have no proof that the funds provided are of themselves adequate to finish the road in two years. It has practically been stated to us that the lands will not realize much in the two years, and it is not expected that much of the Company's stock will be sold in the two years. Other things are required to be done. More branches have to be built; an expenditure of that description is wanted; and the Government takes authority, under this contract, to apply the proceeds of the stock, &c., in extensions and other things on the road. I say, therefore, that the whole calculations depend emphatically on the accuracy of the surprising estimates which, unvouched and discrepant from former estimates, have been laid before us. There is a third alternative. The hon. gentleman says it is either pay or hand over the road. I say that you may and probably will find the Company knocking at your doors again for further aid. I say that if you set them the example of these lavish subsidies, dealing as they have with outside enterprises, going on in the magnificent method in which they are going on, committed as you are, not merely by taking this mortgage but by giving these guarantees, you are powerless to close your hands against their further demands; and I say that although you may put in all these terrible clauses about the Company ceasing to own the road if they make default; of the road being ipso facto the property of the Government; of the employees of the Company, by some wonderful process of transmutation, becoming the employees of the Government—though you may make all these propositions, which are in themselves enough to appal the stoutest heart, if he did now know the ways of a Canadian Government, yet the Company may make default and may not lose the road. We have had other companies which did not lose their roads under similar circumstances. We had the Grand Trunk, to which we made advances on a first lien, a very first lien, a splendid first lien, and where is that lien now? It is away down among the dead men. I believe it is seen in the Public Accounts and in our balances, but it is visible nowhere else. So it might be here. It is impossible not to recognize the lesson and the story of the past, when looking at the present, and trying to forecast the future. And in what position would the Government and Parliament be if at the end of these two years default should be made? Are you going to sacrifice the interests of those shareholders—those poor people who have spent money on the road, who have done so much good to the country, who have built a road faster than ever a road was built before and spent more money upon it than ever was spent before? Your charity and confidence and sympathy are immense: are you going to foreclose, hard hearted usurers that you are? You, who said yourselves that the security was worth two or three times the sum advanced, are you going to shut down and turn these people out of house and home, strip them of their palaces, take away their lordly equipages? Surely you will not behave so badly! That will be the appeal which will be made; that will be the appeal which will be listened to. The past tells us what the future will be. Now, then, the hon. gentleman has stated that the prosperity of the North-West is due to the rapid construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and he gave us a number of most interesting figures with reference to the development of that country in the last three years. We all rejoice in this development, and we are all familiar with the figures. We have had them before us many times. We know that the North-West has grown, but the question is not without another side to it. For example, the hon. gentleman told us that he had received from lands, from the first of July, 1881, to the 31st December, 1883, $3,572,000. We know that that included the early payments on colonization schemes, and therefore it does not represent anything like a permanent source of income from lands. But we know also that in the same period during which he gave us those large receipts from lands, we expended the following sums in the North-West: On Indians, $3,096,000; on Mounted Police, $1,135,000, and on Dominion Lands, $1,340,000, making a total of $5,571,000 in three items only, to be put on the debit side of the account. If, therefore, we are getting, we are also paying. If it were proved that this development was due to the extreme rapidity of construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, I could have perceived some force in the hon. gentleman's argument as indicative of the proposition that this entitled the Company to consideration; though he does not say that. He says it is simply because it is in the country's interest that he is now moving. But, Sir, I have denied before, and I deny to-night, that the extreme rapidity of construction did tend to this development. I maintain that it has tended to produce certain evils in that country rather than benefits, and that a reasonable rapidity of construction would have been conducive to more permanent good, entirely irrespective of the enormously increased expenditures occasioned by that extreme rapidity. Then, it was urged as important that we should go fast in the future—not for the development of the North-West. We have gone through the North-West already, and what is important for the North-West is immediate freedom of railway communication—moderate rates and more railways. That is what is wanted for the development of that territory—low rates and more lines; but what is proposed to hurry on is the building of the railway on both sides of the North-West—on the Columbia side and on the Ontario side—and therefore, even if you could argue that the great development of the North-West was due, not to the construction, but to the very rapid construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, it would be nonsense to argue that there would be increased development in the North-West by the rapid construction of lines lying far outside of that Territory. The hon. gentleman has said that the cost of transport is enormously reduced. I was glad to hear that cheap rates are to be given; but when the hon. gentleman compared the old all-rail rate of $31.50 from Quebec to Winnipeg with the new rail-and-water rate of $12, I do not think it was a fair comparison. In the first place, we took the old rate instead of the present all-rail rate, which is $16.64, and compared it with the new rail-and-water rate, which is $12. It is not an important thing, but every pound or two of expense counts to the immigrant.

Mr. BLAKE.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman must admit that I gave those figures.

Mr. BLAKE. Certainly, the hon. gentleman gave all the figures, and having given them, made this unfair comparison.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I gave the figures, but I said it was not a published rate.

Mr. BLAKE. Why was it not a published rate?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I gave the only published rate.

Mr. BLAKE. Does the hon. gentleman say it was not an effective rate? The Minister of Agriculture likes to ask us for a large vote, but he says: I will not tell you what I am going to do with it. That is the sense in which this was not a published rate; but the agents of the hon. gentleman at home knew that they were able to offer this rate of $16.64 for the last two years. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman says a new rate is being established. That is a good thing; but he takes the responsibility off the Pacific Railway Company and lays it on the Minister of the Agriculture, whose shoulders are broad, and who is apparently willing to carry it. I was glad to hear of this move being made. It is of the last consequence, we have heard, that we should keep Canadian immigrants on our side, for fear of their being diverted to the United States. I am glad to hear that there is no danger of their landing at New York, or, while travelling on their way, of being intercepted at Buffalo or elsewhere by the Yankee agents, but that steps will be taken to protect them against having any preference for the United States over Canada, and we shall be able to keep them in our own country. I have always felt a certain amount of humiliation myself that we should be obliged to bring in our own immigrants through a foreign country; though I had thought that the merits of our own country would have been sufficient, even in that case, to induce them to go through to their destination in spite of the efforts of American agents. How much advantage there might be, however, in bringing our immigrants by way of New York and Buffalo, I do not know. The hon. gentleman has told us that the capabilities of the North-West are enormous: which is true, and he has given us an estimate of them. He has told us that a hundred thousand farmers would produce 640,000,000 bushels of wheat. I should certainly be glad to see his figures realized; but it is new to my experience that a man puts every acre of his farm into wheat; and although the North-West is a great wheat country, I hardly think it is of such a character that every acre of every man's farm would produce an average yield of wheat every year. And I fancy that if it did so, this return of 640,000,000 bushels is a return which would be rather laughed at than otherwise by those who know practically how many acres it takes in a large country, with varied climate, to produce a given quantity of wheat. However, it is not necessary to publish fantastic statistics of that character to establish to the world (on the contrary, I think it is injudicious) the true merits of the country. What we want to do for that purpose is to get authentic statements from practical men of what the country can produce. Nothing can be more convincing than the statement of a man himself, who has gone there as a farmer, who has met with the initial difficulties, whatever they are, who can speak from his own experience of what the soil can produce, and who sees himself a happy and prosperous man, accumulating property. But, on the other hand, nothing can be more unfortunate, nothing can be more calculated to do detriment to that country than to find people discontented, gathering together and complaining of oppressive taxation, vexatious regulations, high railway rates and elevator difficulties, and who find that progress and prosperity are not being attained. It is not fantastic calculations, made on a magnificent scale, on a desk in an office, which only requires a pencil and paper to work out—it is only the actual life of the people living there, that will tell; and it is, therefore, deeply to be regretted, that we should have such actual results detailed as have, to a large extent, been published to the world during the last few months. I agree with the hon. gentleman in his remarks on the frost. That, no doubt, was an affliction which extended over a very large extent of territory, where it was more exceptional than in the North-West. We may fairly conclude that that was an unexpected contingency on a recurrence of which we need hardly count if due precautions, such as the hon. gentleman has referred to, are taken. Though we cannot deny that there is a liability to frost in some portions of that country, still that such a calamity, on a large scale, should recur is not to be expected; and I think it right to say that casual and unexpected as it was, it was extremely unfortunate, and if the expectations of the Government and of the country at large as to immigration are not fulfilled to the extent we would wish, I dare say it will be largely due to that unfortunate accident for which they are not responsible. But I do regret that while that occurred at a critical period, ever to be regretted, which we could not help, so many things have happened by our acts in this House and the acts of our Executive in the Council Chamber, which could have been avoided, and which, concurring with this unfortunate accident, have damped the hopes and weakened, to some extent, the energies of the people in that country, and diverted to a large extent the immigrants who would have settled in our North-West to go elsewhere, and give their energies to building up other interests. The hon. gentleman will remember that if the North-West wants anything, it wants reasonable rates, the right to build railways, and more railways, and that as speedily as possible. That is the kind of development that is wanted there, and that country is not so deeply interested in the construction of the ends. Now the whole object of this proposal is placed on a very simple basis by the hon. gentleman. He says that it is not because the Company want this money to fulfil their contract. He says, speaking somewhat more strongly than Mr. Stephen does in his letter, that it is certain that the Company do not want anything whatever to fulfil their contract, and by 1891 the road will be finished according to their contract, and will be operated afterwards, if we reject this proposition. But, he says, we want this road to be finished by the end of 1885. A while ago it was to be finished at the end of 1886; now we want it to be finished at the end of 1885,—and why? Partly to develop the North-West, partly to obtain, or earlier obtain, power to compete with the Northern Pacific Railway for the trans-continental traffic. Well, as to the grooves of trade, and so forth, I think that to-day they are much more easily changed than they used to be. I think if the Canadian Pacific Railway is built so as to offer a good access, a shorter line, and shorter communication altogether between the one side of the continent and the other, it will be very easily able to obtain its share of the traffic, no matter whether it is constructed a year or two earlier, or a year or two later. I do not at all believe that the traffic will be prevented from going there, if it is the best road, from the simple circumstance that its completion is delayed a year or two; and I say, by bending all your energies now to the construction of the railway to the north of Lake Superior, and from the Rocky Mountains to Kamloops—by straining every nerve to do that, you are preventing yourselves from doing what is most important in the interests of the North-West; and you are making arrangements to enter into a combination with the Company, identifying the Government as the endorsers of its dividends, as the mortgagees of its road, to such an extent and so intimately with the Company, that instead of securing the glorious result of October last—the Company assisting the credit of Canada—it is extremely probable that your arrangements,—which involve, the raising by this country, and the paying by the Canada Pacific Railway Company, within a period of two years, of something approximating $20,000,000 a year, because we have the unpaid subsidy to pay as well as the $2,500,000—will do much to depress and damage the stocks of Canada, instead of to improve them. There is really no tangible argument given for this extraordinary haste; there is no argument upon which we can rely; there is nothing that you can lay hold of and say: this is a reason why we should guarantee their stock; this is a reason why we should advance them $22,500,000 of money. On the other hand, the hon. gentleman holds out no hope of compensation; he holds out no hope of relief from the monopoly. He says, indeed: As soon as the road is finished, I think that I shall no longer unconstitutionally veto Bills passed by the Legislature of the Province of Manitoba—I think I may promise you I will no longer do that. But, he says, the contract must not be touched; we are determined not to interfere with or limit the contract in any way. But, Sir, the contract is being interfered with. The security for the completion of the road is being handed over. The mode of paying the subsidy is being altered from the terms of the contract. A guarantee of stock is being given, which was not a term in the contract; $22,500,000 of our money is being loaned, which certainly was not embraced in the contract. Suppose these terms had been put in the original Canadian Pacific Railway contract, would you have voted for it, Mr. Speaker? Therefore, are we not changing the contract? And yet the hon. gentleman is right in saying that the contract is not changed in one particular. Although this enormous aid is given in order that the road may be completed by 1885, it is not provided that the road shall be completed by 1885. You are providing them with all the money to do it, but they are just as free as they were before, in case it is not finished by 1885. Now, Sir, whatever might have been the case before now, particularly when Parliament is called upon, as I have shown, to alter the terms of this contract, in favour of this Company, and to grant them great concessions—to do great things for them—now is the time when we may fairly say: If you ask, you must also give; and when we should call upon them to give up that odious monopoly, which is going to do more than any other thing to injure the North-West Territories in the years to come. I say that this is an opportunity when such a stipulation may fairly be made, and when we may fairly insist upon the resources which we are providing and enabling to be provided by all these arrangements, not being applied to extensions, not contemplated by the contract, to the American seaboard to the east. The hon. gentleman has said that history does not show today a more courageous or daring instance of action on the part of a company or government than that of this Government when they entered into this contract. Well, it was audacious; and the very promises upon which they induced the Parliament of the country to assent to it, were audacious also, and this night is the falsification of those promises—as I show you when I point out how utterly and completely the company has failed to realize those expectations on the faith of which this contract was made;—because I do not believe the country will agree for a moment that it is simply in order to finish this road in two years that we are asked to engage Canada's credit for $30,000,000. When it is found that the work has been handled unfortunately, as it has been; when it is found that the Company, by its imprudent management, has excited animosities and hostilities which have been very unfortunate for the Company; when it is found that the road has been proceeded with, on account of this very speed, in an unfortunate manner; when the creation of its capital stock has been unfortunate, and the Company has deprived itself of the confidence of the world of capitalists, it must be evident that the object of the Company is not speed to complete the road, but to get the money from us. The hon. gentleman has made out a case which is daring, which is audacious, but let us be prudent in our action. Let us decide that no case has been made out for this transaction, that it is better to go on, on the terms of the contract as it is, without engaging the capital and credit of Canada to this enormous amount, when no advantage will ensue from the alteration of our position and the entanglements in which we will be involved by this proposal that is not contained in the alternative now before us. I affirm first, the House has not been treated with due respect in reference to the obtaining of information and details which ought to have been laid before us, in order that we might be able to judge; and secondly, upon such facts as have been laid before us it is plain further enquiry is necessary; that those things to which I have adverted with reference to the contracts, the stock, the acquisition of other roads, ought to be searchingly enquired into. It is better, in the interests of the Company, that they should be fully brought to light, and that all should understand exactly how the case stands, and that the system of mystery, of concealment, of half truths, which has gone on should not continue further. It would have been better for the Company if we had known the exact facts as to the guarantee when the guarantee was given, as to the stock when the stock was issued, and as to the acquisitions of other lines when the acquisitions were made; because what we did know imperfectly was magnified and a worse construction put upon the things than they might have borne if the truth was known. The directors of the Company are also contractors for the execution of their works, and we have no returns showing the particulars of those contracts or estimates of the cost of construction of the different sections. Even those friendly to the proposal must see that it is inadvisable to accept it. We are face to face with a condition of things, financially, which will be the subject of discussion in a few days, and it behooves us to be prudent—to pause before imposing additional engagements at this time on the country. Face to face with this state of things, we are asked to enter into those large engagements for which no reason has been given, and for which I pretend no countervailing advantages are offered. I, therefore, cannot give my assent to this proposal.

That the Order of this House of Monday the 4th inst., referring the Bill to incorporate the Pilots serving between Montreal and Quebec, to the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, be discharged, and that the said Bill be referred to the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the proper procedure in this case would be for the Committee to whom this Bill has been referred—namely, the Committee on Banking and Commerce—to look at it; and if, in their opinion, it did not affect the subjects referred to them, they could so report to the House, and the House would then refer it to the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills. I think in former years the practice has been that when a Committee has received a Bill which the members of the Committee believed was not properly referred to them, they have so reported to the House, and the House has acted on that report. But, of course, it is in the power of the House to act upon the motion.

Mr. AMYOT. I have followed the precedent of two years ago. On the 17th of April, 1882, on motion of Mr. Haggart, seconded by Mr. White, it was ordered:

“That the Order of this House of Friday the 10th March last, referring the Bill to incorporate the Saskatchewan, Qu' Appelle and Assiniboine Navigation Company, to the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, be discharged, and that the Bill be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.”

The reason I make this motion is that this Bill does not affect banking and commerce at all. It is only a private bill, to enable the pilots to regulate their affairs among themselves, with the unanimous consent of themselves. I may quote as a precedent the Act to incorporate the pilots below Quebec, passed in 1860, which was referred to the Private Bills' Committee. I may also refer to the Act to amend the same in 1862, and to the Act further to amend the same in 1866, as well as to the first Act passed incorporating the pilots, in 1852-53, all of which were referred to the Committee on Private Bills. I do not see why we should trouble the Committee on Banking and Commerce, who will have so much to do this year, with a Bill of this kind, which ought to go to the Private Bills' Committee. I have been told by old Members of the House that this Bill should be referred to that Committee; and as this House is the supreme master of its own decisions, it might properly grant the motion.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I understand from the hon. gentleman that this Bill is only to enable the pilots to make their own private arrangements among themselves.

Mr. AMYOT. Only.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Therefore it does not affect trade, and the hon. gentleman desires that it may be referred to the proper Committee—the Committee on Private Bills.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman, of course, runs his risk; but after all it is the action of the House. The Bill has been read the second time. We are presumed each to have read the Bill, and to be able to render an intelligent reason why it should be referred to one Committee, or to the other. I think the hon. First Minister it was who suggested a reference of the Bill to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, and it was so referred. I confess my impression was that it was a matter for the Private Bills' Committee to deal with, since it proposed an incorporation which was not designed ostensibly, at any rate, to interfere with trade and commerce, but which was simply a mere benevolent association of individuals. The hon. gentleman is quite right in making his motion to destroy the Order and have the Bill referred to the other Committee. The real, substantial question was whether we were in error the other day, or not.

Order discharged, and Bill referred to Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

HUDSON BAY ROUTE.

Mr. ORTON enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to send out an exploratory expedition to the Hudson Bay and Straits, with the object of ascertaining the feasibility of the route vid Hudson Bay to Europe?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The best answer I can give is, that I am under the impression that when the Estimates come down the hon. gentleman will be satisfied.

OYSTER POND BREAKWATER.

Mr. KIRK enquired, Whether the Government has expended the grant of $2,000 made last Session for Oyster Pond Breakwater, in the county of Guysborough, N. S. ? If not, is it the intention to expend it before the termination of the fiscal year? If not, why not?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Joseph Hedley, sen., has been appointed foreman. He has been furnished with plans and specifications for the work he has to do, and has instructions to proceed with the work, which will be completed on or before the 30th June next.

NEW HARBOUR AND INDIAN HARBOUR.

Mr. KIRK enquired, Has the Government caused, during the recess, an engineer to visit New Harbour and Indian Harbour, and report upon the probable cost of constructing a breakwater at each of these harbours, suitable to the wants of the fishermen, as promised last Session?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am afraid the hon. gentleman has made a mistake in saying "as promised last Session." Last Session the hon. gentleman enquired whether it was the intention of the Government to proceed with the works at New Harbour and Indian Harbour. He was informed that "when the time came to use the vote of $2,000 appropriated by Parliament, enquiries were instituted as to the total amount required to make it a really useful work, and it was found the amount was so large that the Government were not prepared at that time to proceed with the work." The hon. gentleman might refer to the answer given last Session, on page 78 of Hansard, 1883.

MORPETH HARBOUR.

Mr. JACKSON enquired, Has the contract for harbour improvement at Morpeth, in the county of Kent, Ontario, been let? If so, were tenders invited for the work; if so, who tendered for the same; what was the amount of each tender; to whom was the contract awarded, and what is his post office address?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The contract for harbour improvement at Morpeth, Kent county, has been let. Tenders were invited. There were six tenders received, viz.: John Mellagh, John Bruntren, John McKenna, J. W. Dinwoodie, Harry Buckner, John E. Askwith, and W. J. Douglas. The amounts of the tender were from $17,400 to $38,850. I would ask the hon. gentleman not to insist on having the amount of each tender, for the reason that the contract is now being prepared; and it is proper the contract should be prepared before we give the amount of other tenders. The successful tenderer is the lowest, Mr. John E. Askwith, of Ottawa.

EXCISE AT PERTH AND AT QUEBEC.

Mr. LANDRY (Montmagny) (translation) enquired, What is the amount of the sums collected by the Excise Officers at Perth during the fiscal year 1882-83? What is the amount collected at Quebec during the same period? What is the salary of the Collector of Revenue at Perth? What is the salary of the same officer at Quebec?

Mr. COSTIGAN (translation). Mr. Speaker, in answer to the honorable member, I must say that the amount of the sums collected by the Excise Officers at Perth during the fiscal year 1882-83, is $47,111.20 and that the amount collected at Quebec during the same period is $47,727.28; that the salary of the Collector of Revenue at Perth is $1,200 and that of the Collector at Quebec is $1,450.

THE AGRICULTURAL INTERESTS COMMITTEE OF 1882.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury) moved for a statement of all expenses incurred by the Committee, appointed during the Session of 1882, to enquire into and report upon the operation of the Tariff upon the Agricultural Interests of the Dominion, comprising the following: 1st. The names of the parties summoned and examined by the Committee, and the amounts paid to each such person for travelling and other expenses; 2nd. The names of the reporters and clerks employed to report evidence and prepare report, &c., of said Committee; 3rd. The party employed to print the same, the number of copies printed, and the whole cost of publication of the report, evidence and other expenses incident to the same; also, how and when said reports were distributed.

Mr. GUILLET. I cannot assume that this motion is made from any unfriendliness to the Committee, or its report. I cannot assume that; but I wish to point out that the report of that Committee was unanimously accepted, that there was no adverse report by the minority, that there was no adverse expression of opinion in this House; and I think that no expenditure authorized by the House has been more acceptable than that devoted to obtaining the information which that report furnished. It was a remarkable circumstance that there was no opposition to this report when it was presented, and it was also a remarkable circumstance that, when a motion was made to authorize the publication of 5,000 copies of that report in English, and 5,000 in French, it was opposed by the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite, and the motion was lost; and it was only at a subsequent meeting, when the supporters of the Government were in greater strength, that it was carried. It did seem as if hon. gentlemen opposite desired to suppress the information obtained by that Committee as to the operation of the Tariff. I desire to direct the attention of the House to the fact that there was opposition to the publication of the report and also to the fact that, at the ensuing Session, so satisfactory has that report been to the country, a desire was expressed that the evidence should also be obtained and published. A large number of copies were distributed throughout the Dominion, and I believe with the result of greatly increasing the knowledge of the people with respect to the operation of the Tariff on the agricultural industries of the country. I think, therefore, that the return is desirable, as showing how great an amount of information has been imparted to the country at so small an expenditure.

Motion agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF HON. J. A. MOUSSEAU TO THE BENCH.

Mr. LAURIER moved for: 1st. Copy of the petition contesting the election of the Hon. J. A. Mousseau, in 1882, to the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Quebec, for the Electoral District of Jacques Cartier, and particulars delivered in connection therewith; 2nd. Copy of the evidence adduced, and of the admissions made by the parties to the said petition, at the trial; 3rd. Copy of the judgment and report of the Court; 4th. Copy of the petition contesting the election of the said Hon. J. A. Mousseau, in 1883, to the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Quebec, for the Electoral District of Jacques Cartier, and particulars delivered in connection therewith; 5th. Copy of the Commission appointing the said Hon. J. A. Mousseau, a Judge of the Superior Court for the Province of Quebec. He said: My motive, Mr. Speaker, in making this motion, is to put the House in possession of all the facts bearing upon the appointment of Mr. Mousseau to the Bench of the Superior Court for the Province of Quebec. Many of these facts are already of common notoriety, and have been widely circulated through the press. I am sorry to say that some of them are, in my humble judgment, such as to render the Government liable to the gravest censure for having appointed Mr. Mousseau to that high judicial position, at such a time, and under such circumstances. I hope the House will understand that, in speaking as I do upon this matter, I do not in any way impugn the professional qualifications of Mr. Mousseau for the high position to which he has been called. As to those qualifications I have not one word to say, either for or against the appointment; but I desire to allude to the very grave accusation which rested upon Mr. Mousseau at the time of his appointment, and which, until it has been removed, ought, in the opinion of all those who value the honour of the Bench, to constitute a perpetual and effective bar against his appointment. It is a matter of common notoriety that at the very moment he was appointed a Judge of the Superior Court of Lower Canada, he stood before that Court charged with violations of the Election Law, and, moreover, with personal bribery and corruption. And now, Mr. Speaker, since this appointment has been made, we find this most extraordinary state of things in the Province of Quebec—that a Judge of the land is liable at any moment to be called upon to step down from the Bench where he sits, and to take his trial under the bar, like any other man, charged with a violation of the law which he has been appointed to administer. It is certainly a demoralizing state of things when a Judge of the land, who holds in his hands the life, liberty, honour and property of his fellow men, may be at any moment declared by the Court of which he is a Judge, to be unworthy of the rights of citizenship. It may be said, perhaps—and I do not know that any other defence can be made—that accusation does not imply guilt, and that no one is to be presumed guilty until he has been tried and found so by competent authority. We know, Mr. Speaker, that the maxim that no one is to be presumed guilty until he has been found so by competent authority, is a very stale maxim, and one of daily application; but, in my opinion, it would be a sad misapplication of it to invoke it in favour of a Judge of the land under these circumstances, and is the last excuse which ought to be made in his favour. It is true, also, that if the prosecution that is brought against him is continued, he may be honourably acquitted; it is possible the charges may be dismissed; and it is equally possible that they may be brought home to him. But, Mr. Speaker, I ask any one who can give an unbiassed judgment on the matter, whether, to say the least, it was not an act of most indecent haste on the part of the Government to appoint Mr. Mousseau as long as he was liable to be tried, and before he had cleared his own character which was impugned in the Courts of Justice. In speaking as I now do, I take what I conceive to be the most favourable view of Mr. Mousseau's position. I speak as if the petition against him had been just brought into Court, as if no evidence had been adduced, and no facts elicited. But, unfortunately, evidence has been adduced upon the petition, facts have been elicited, and that evidence and those facts made it all the more necessary for the Government to insist upon Mr. Mousseau clearing his character before he was appointed. It has been Mr. Mousseau's misfortune, since he left this House, to undergo two elections. When he ceased to be a member of this House and became Premier of the Province of Quebec, he had naturally to seek a seat in the Legislature, and he elected to run for the county of Jacques Cartier. As I said a moment ago, he has had to seek election twice, and upon both occasions he was opposed—not by a political adversary, but by one of his own political creed and persuasion. It was a sort of family quarrel, and, like all family quarrels, it was an intensely bitter one. Well, the result of the elections was apparently in favour of Mr. Mousseau. He was elected on both occasions, but on both occasions his election was contested. The first decision was given in the first days of May last. Now, it is a fact of common notoriety, which has been circulated throughout the length and breadth of the land, that Mr. Mousseau was charged with a very grave offence, an offence which exceeds ordinary offences committed in elections, and one which he was charged with committing while running as a candidate in the county of Jacques Cartier. A short time previous to the election three different parties had been prosecuted for a violation of the Revenue Laws in selling liquor without a license. These three parties had been fined and convicted, and their stock of liquor confiscated. It was charged against Mr. Mousseau, that in order to gain the support of these three persons, he had promised them that he would have their fines remitted and their liquor restored to them. It was further charged that the corrupt bargain was carried out, so far at all events as Mr. Mousseau was concerned in it; and that he, being then Premier of the Province, and Attorney General as well, had, in fact, caused the fines to be returned to those men, and their stock of liquors restored to them. Every one will agree with me that no graver charge could be brought against Mr. Mousseau, in his position as Attorney General, than such a charge as this. The trial came off, as I have said, in the first days of May. On May 3rd, one of the parties, who had thus been fined, was put in the witness box and examined. I now quote from the report published at the time, not by a partisan newspaper, but by an independent newspaper—the Star—and the report reads as follows:—

“ Andrew Leger, proprietor of Rapin's Hotel, Lachine, stepped into the witness box to be examined on behalf of the petitioner. Mr. Leger being one of the parties who had been fined on three occasions for selling liquor without a license, and whose fines were subsequently remitted by the Government, considerable interest was naturally manifested in the evidence to be given by this witness. His testimony was given in a calm, collected and straightforward manner, and was considered to be of a most damaging nature by all the legal gentlemen present. He deposed to keeping Rapin's hotel, Lachine; to being fined on two occasions $75, and on a third, $0 and costs for selling liquor without a license, which fines were subsequently remitted by order of Hon. Mr. Wurtele, Provincial Treasurer. Witness had seen Hon. Mr. Mousseau, the respondent, several times in connection with this matter.

“ Q. You had always, previous to this election, been a Liberal, queried Mr. Mercier?

“ A. Yes, but I voted blue this time, laughingly replied the witness.

“ Q. Did you ever speak to Mr. Mousseau about the elections?

“ A. Oh! yes, when he came to my place with Mr. Wurtele he asked me my name, and asked me if I was a Liberal or a Conservative.

“ Q. And you replied?

“ A. That I could be a Conservative if it was necessary, or a Liberal.

“ Q. Did Mr. Mousseau say anything about remitting the fines then?

“ A. As he said good-bye to me he turned to Mr. Wurtele and told him to do what he could for these gentlemen (meaning the three tavern keepers who had been fined.)

“ Q. Did this have any influence upon you in causing you to change your political views and vote for Mr. Mousseau?

“ A. Of course it always influenced me.

“ Q. When you so voted for Mr. Mousseau, did you believe your fine would be remitted?

“ A. Yes, I did, and I told my friend that I was going to vote for him. My brother-in-law, Mr. Chapman, also had conversations with Mr. Mousseau and Mr. Wurtele about my fine.”

And the report continues in this way:

“The cross-examination of this witness was adjourned until to-morrow to allow him to produce the letters he received from the Provincial Treasurer remitting the fine.”

As stated in the concluding words of the report, the cross-examination was adjourned to the following day for the production of the letter of Mr. Wurtele, Provincial Treasurer, who had remitted the fines and returned the stock of liquors. Yet, strange to say, that letter never was produced, and that witness never was cross-examined. What is the reason why those most damaging statements made by this witness never were contradicted, and why was the witness never cross-examined? The reason is that another witness was shortly afterwards put in the box, and he occupied the same position as Mr. Leger. He was another man who had been fined, and he proved that a similar promise made by Mr. Mousseau had been carried out by the Provincial Treasurer. After that Mr. Mousseau threw up the sponge. He offered to resign his seat if the petitioner would not press his disqualification. I now quote from the report of another paper, the Montreal Gazette of 5th May last, which runs as follows:—

“ At this juncture Mr. Lacoste rose, and addressing the Court stated that, on his advice, his client Mr. Mousseau had resigned the contested seat and moved the remaining witnesses be discharged.

“ Mr. Mercier objected, and asked to be allowed till to-day to decide whether to continue this prosecution.

“ Hon. Justice Torrance ordered that the witnesses be in attendance this morning, at 10 o'clock. The Court was adjourned till that hour. His Honour expressed the intention of the Court to maintain the hearing of the case with the strictest regard for fairness. The English Election Law, he stated, required proof not only of transgression of its letter, but also of its spirit, by the party accused, and such a case had therefore to be dealt with in a spirit of the utmost equity.”

On the following day the petitioner had concluded not to prosecute further the investigation of the charges of personal bribery and corruption brought against Mr. Mousseau, but to rest the case on his resignation of the seat. I again cite from the Star newspaper of May 5th:

“ After going to press yesterday afternoon, Pierre Godin, hotel-keeper of Lachine, testified that he had been sued by the Revenue Department three times and his liquor confiscated, but that the fines and liquor were afterwards remitted him about election time.

“ A large number of politicians and others were present in Court this morning when Mr. Mercier intimated to the Court that he wished to add the following declaration to his record:—

Mr. LAURIER.

“ ‘ Considering the declaration made yesterday in open Court, by the defendant, to the effect that he agreed to have the election annulled with costs, the petitioner waives that part of his conclusions asking the disqualification of defendant.’

“ This closes the case, which will, however, be called on Monday next.”

I must say that Mr. Mercier subsequently declared, in a public discussion to which I shall have to refer shortly, that he had abandoned the prosecution of Mr. Mousseau's disqualification at the urgent request of Mr. Mousseau's friends, who had appealed to his sympathy and his mercy.

Mr. OUMET. Five thousand dollars; that went a good way in sympathy.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). That does not improve the case very much.

Mr. LAURIER. If the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet) thinks that a man who says he has bribed another is fit to be a Judge, he is entitled to his opinion; at all events, we do not think so. I will come to that point in due time. The warmest friends of Mr. Mousseau, instead of setting up the plea, which he afterwards set up himself, that he had bribed an adversary to prevent his disqualification, should be sorry that Mr. Mousseau did not cause the letter to be filed, the witness to be cross-examined, and especially that the gentleman himself failed to go into the box and give his explanation of the transaction. All those circumstances—the failure to produce the letter, the failure to have the witness cross-examined, and the failure on the part of Mr. Mousseau to enter the witness box and give, like a man, what explanation he had to furnish, left a most painful impression that the charge was true beyond controversy, and that Mr. Mousseau dare not face it. Another election took place, and again Mr. Mousseau was back in his position. He was again elected, and again his election was contested; and his election was contested not only for personal bribery and corruption at the last election, but also—I say it in so many words—for the very charges which had not been investigated at the first trial. It may be said, perhaps, that these charges having been formulated in a former election, could not again be reopened and become the subject of a second controversy. It may be a debatable question whether they should or should not be permitted at a subsequent trial. I have no doubt that the report of the judge would assist materially in settling that point. But what I do leave to the common sense of the members of this House is that, in view of the subsequent conduct of Mr. Mousseau, in view of the subsequent charges and allegations, he could not easily prevent the petitioner from enquiring into the charges which were brought on his first contestation and were not fully investigated. And what is the reason? The reason has just been given by the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet) that Mr. Mousseau says that if the charges were not enquired into it was simply because there was collusion between him and the other side. At the new election Mr. Mousseau was met by the same adversary as on the first occasion. On the second election trial Mr. Mercier, leader of the Opposition in the Legislative Assembly, and counsel for the petitioner, who had also been engaged in the first contestation, was squarely accused by La Minerve, the chief organ of the Conservative party of the Province of Quebec, with having received a bribe of $5,000 for not prosecuting further the disqualification of Mr. Mousseau on the first petition. In justice to Mr. Mercier, I am bound to say that he has denied the charge, that he has instituted an action to vindicate his character, and that that action is still pending in the Court. But here is an assertion on the one hand, and another assertion on the other; and I shall put the case fairly in the interests of Mr. Mousseau himself. Here is the assertion of Mr. Mousseau, that he paid $5,000 to bribe Mr. Mercier, and here is the denial of Mr. Mercier; but in what manner does it help Mr. Mousseau in the present case? What benefit can Mr. Mousseau receive from his own assertion, if he should come into Court and produce witnesses to prove that a corrupt bargain had been made by himself in his position as Attorney General? Will he say: It is true I have accused him, but I have accused him falsely? But whether he accused him falsely or truly, there is the allegation that he committed a fraud against the law in order to prevent enquiry into the question of his own disqualification. Will he himself come before the Court uttering the self-accusation that he has himself committed a corrupt bargain; that he has committed another crime? If such a position as that can help him, I cannot understand it, for I never saw a case of a man being allowed to come into Court to prove his own villainy, or of a man entitled to derive benefit from allegations of his own fraud. Now, all those facts are notorious. They are all publicly known. They have been stated and reiterated in the press over and over again. I ask if it is not under such circumstances an outrage on public opinion to appoint a man lying under such a self-accusation to the highest judicial office in the Province? I say that the conduct of the Government is without excuse. I do not say that they should not have appointed him under any circumstances, but I say that they should not have appointed him until he had vindicated his reputation, and come out clear of any such imputation against his character. Moreover, if I am to speak my own mind as to the motives of the Government, I say candidly that I do not believe the Government would have made such an appointment under such circumstances, if they had not had a plotting hand in the deplorable state of affairs which now exists in the Province of Quebec. If the Government had not been plotting in order to keep their friends and minions in power, I do not believe they would have appointed Mr. Mousseau. I believe that the sense of propriety which has always animated the Premier, in making judicial appointments, would have been such that he would have insisted that Mr. Mousseau should not have been appointed until his character had been cleared. I do not pretend to affect any Puritanism; I do not parade ostentatiously any pretension of superior virtue. I know the failings to which even well meaning men are liable. I know that the Election Law is stringent and severe, and that many a man has been unseated and disqualified for offences which could not be strictly called offences against morals, but which were offences against the statutory law.

Mr. LAURIER. Do hon. gentlemen pretend to say that a man who is called to be Her Majesty's Attorney General, who abuses his authority and commits offences against the law, in order to promote his own corrupt ends, is not guilty of an offence against the moral law? I say it is an unpardonable malfeasance of office, when a man charged with an offence prevented the investigation and refused to take his trial by offering a bribe to the other side. Such a man only seeks to palliate one offence by committing another. I say, furthermore, that the appointment of such a man under such circumstances is an attempt upon the dignity and efficiency of the Bench. Against Mr. Mousseau, personally, I have not the slightest feeling. I would not do him the slightest injury, but I do not affect to be indifferent to the consequences which would follow if such conduct on the part of the Government were not brought to the bar of public opinion. We owe it to ourselves to preserve the dignity and efficiency of the Bench. There are certain things which should never be impugned, and the honour of the Bench is one of those things; and I say it is not sufficient that the Bench should be pure, but it must also be above suspicion. It is not so many years ago that the Conservative party were of opinion that a crime committed, not by the man himself, but by his friends, was a sufficient cause for his exclusion from a judicial office. It is within the recollection of all that a few years ago, at the General Election of 1878, the ballot boxes in the county of Jacques Cartier were interfered with by some over zealous friends of Mr. Laflamme. It is also within the knowledge of all that Mr. Laflamme himself was not privy to that offence, that he did not even profit by it, that it was done without his participation; but a few days afterwards one of the leading Conservative organs in the Province of Quebec, the Montreal Gazette, speaking of reports which were then circulating that the Government of Mr. Mackenzie intended to make Mr. Laflamme a Judge, spoke as follows:—

"Whatever may have been Mr. Mackenzie's intentions in the past, we feel confident that he will never so outrage the public sentiment of the community as to make Mr. Laflamme a Judge, after the exposure now made of the means by which his pretended election for Jacques Cartier was secured."

Now, Mr. Speaker, if gentlemen on the other side still adhere to the opinion which was expressed in their leading organs five years ago, they will not have condemnation strong enough for the present Government of Quebec. As I said a moment ago, that offence was committed—for offence it was—not with any sanction of the man for whose benefit it was intended. In this case Mr. Mousseau himself has been charged in a Court of Justice with having entered into a most corrupt bargain, with having prostituted the office with which he was entrusted; and you have it from his own mouth that his friends bribed the other side, and he benefited by it. Under such circumstances, I repeat that if hon. gentlemen still adhere to the opinion which was expressed in one of their leading organs, they cannot have censure strong enough for that Government; and I hope—it is perhaps a delusive hope—that they will support me in obtaining these papers at the earliest moment possible.

Mr. OUIVET. Mr. Speaker, if I rise to say a few words in answer to the hon. member for Quebec East, I do so not precisely to justify the Government—I suppose they do not need my voice to justify them, for I am sure they will justify themselves at the proper time—but I rise as a friend of one who has been one of us for many years, and whom a great many members of this House have learned to esteem and respect as a man of high abilities, and of high personal character. I am glad, Sir, that the hon. member should have had the courage—I might say the weakness—of ending his speech by saying that he had no personal feelings against the Hon. Mr. Mousseau, against whom, however, he had before made a strong appeal to the prejudices of hon. members of this House, who do not happen to know that hon. gentleman. I say that the personal character of Mr. Mousseau is high above all attacks that may be made upon it in this House, especially in his absence and behind his back, when he is unable to defend himself. I am satisfied that all the members of this House who have known that hon. gentleman, would willingly raise their voices in his defence. Although he has been persecuted and dragged before Courts of Justice for pretended infractions of the Election Laws of the Province of Quebec, although these accusations have been hurled against him for months, and have politically ruined him, I say that many of these hon. members who are around me now would gladly rise and testify to Mr. Mousseau's honour and respectability, and say they know better. They would say that, although he might have happened to come under the extreme severity of the Election Law, Mr. Mousseau, by his legal attainments, by his respectability, by his known honesty and high character, was well worthy of being made a member of the Supreme Court of Lower Canada. Now, Sir, let me say, in answer to some of the insinuations—I will not qualify them—made against the character of Mr. Mousseau, that this evidence which is so much spoken of has been submitted to a Judge of the land, the Hon. Judge Torrance, who, after having heard all that the witnesses had to say, rendered his judgment, and stated emphatically that if the case had been presented to him, even with the accusations which have been stated by my hon. friend, he would not only not have disqualified Mr. Mousseau, but not even voided his election. That, Sir, is enough to vindicate Mr. Mousseau's legal honour, because his personal character, as I said before, does not require to be vindicated, at least in this House. It is not necessary that I should go any further; but I want to go as far as the hon. member has gone. Not more than two days ago we were discussing in this House a Bill to amend the law of evidence in criminal matters. The object of the Bill was to allow a prisoner to give evidence in his own behalf; and every hon. gentleman who spoke in favour of the Bill—and the hon. member for Quebec East, although he did not speak, voted in that way—claimed that the fact of a prisoner not offering his evidence was not to be taken against him—that it was not even to raise the least suspicion of his guilt. We pretended, on the other hand, that the Judge, and more especially the jury, would consider such a refusal as an admission of guilt; but those hon. gentlemen said with the greatest emphasis: "Oh! it is nothing of the kind, the prisoner is not obliged to give his evidence;" and the fact that he does not give his evidence will not, in the mind of an intelligent man, be taken as a presumption of guilt. What is the argument now before us? It is, that because Mr. Mousseau did not think proper, or convenient, or consistent with his dignity, to step into the box and under oath give his evidence against a man who the hon. gentleman had to admit—although he said he was a Liberal, a member of his own party—boasted of having sold his vote; boasted that he had been corrupted by the friends of Mr. Mousseau—because Mr. Mousseau did not choose to lower himself to the level of that man, an hon. member is found in this House who will say that such refusal by Mr. Mousseau is a presumption of guilt. Evidently the hon. member has forgotten the vote he gave the other day. He has forgotten what he sanctioned only a few days ago; and although he pretends he has no personal feelings against the Hon. Mr. Mousseau, although he says he gets up only for the purpose of vindicating the honour and dignity of the Bench, I say that passion has made him forget the principle he laid down a few days ago. In his own mind, and in his own heart, he has forgotten to apply in practice the very principle he would like to see applied to the lowest grade of criminal on trial, who may be put in the box. The hon. gentleman has spoken of what he calls notoriety, or notorious facts. There are a great many notorious facts in this—I will not say trial, or contestation—but in this persecution, that has been followed up day by day against the Hon. Mr. Mousseau since he was sent down to Quebec to take the leadership of the Government there.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Who sent him?

Mr. AMYOT. Public opinion.

Mr. OUIMET. Who sent him? I suppose that the hon. gentleman who asked this question will never be requested by any party to be sent there or anywhere. The hon. gentleman, citing from old respected maxims of law, has said, with reference to the suggestion that $5,000 had been paid by the friends of Mr. Mousseau, to have the contestation discontinued, that he never knew a man to plead his own villainy. The hon. gentleman forgot again to apply the principles he advocated the other day. When he declared that the Hon. Mr. Mercier, the acknowledged leader of the Liberal party in Quebec, had accepted as a bribe $5,000 to discontinue these proceedings, he ought to have been possessed of this indignation which has been shown by him against the enormous guilt of Mr. Mousseau. In insinuating that these $5,000 were paid by the friends of Mr. Mousseau, and by a particular friend of the hon. gentleman, a leading supporter of his in the county which he has the honour to represent, Mr. Trudel, the hon. member has pleaded the villainy of his own party. It is a family quarrel. I do not know what the hon. gentleman would call it, but he is certainly quarrelling with his own friends, branding his own friends in the same way that he has been branding a man of lower standing—that man Léger—whom he pretends Mr. Mousseau bribed. The hon. gentleman says that the leader of his own party has been bribed, and he brings that up here and pleads the villainy of his own party. Not only do I regret the speech of the hon. gentleman, for the sake of the dignity of the Bench in our Province; not only do I regret it from a national point of view; not only do I regret it as a member of this House, and a friend of Mr. Mousseau, but I regret it for the sake of the hon. gentleman, and for the sake of his friends. On what basis does he make his charges? On papers which are not even before this House; in violation of the first rules of Parliament that nobody is to be allowed to speak, citing papers which are not produced. He ought not to stand up here and make these charges when he knows that Mr. Mousseau cannot be brought before this House, except on a motion for impeachment, when he knows that we cannot try him. But the hon. gentleman's view was to try and strike an old opponent, for, while Mr. Mousseau was a member of this House, he fought against the hon. member for Quebec East successfully. As I have said, we cannot try the Hon. Mr. Mousseau, unless we bring him before us on a motion for impeachment. I say that although there is a moral guilt in the act, if the charge is true; although there is something which the law condemns, the hon. gentleman knows very well that it all the hon. members of this House were to be brought up here and reproached with all the acts they have been committing, wittingly or unwittingly—I say it with intent—how many times during an election contest are we not approached by parties who have nothing else in view than to try and compromise us, than to try and commit us to compromising words, and afterwards, as was the case here, bring them against us. That was another villainy of the party to which the hon. gentleman belongs. Mr. Mousseau was supported by the Liberals in Jacques Cartier; he was supported by Mr. Mercier, Mr. Lafamme, and the leading men belonging to the Liberal party in Montreal, and they gave letters to their friends in the county, not only telling them to support Mr. Mousseau, but urging them to work for him. After they had employed their own agents in favour of Mr. Mousseau, those very agents, with a few exceptions, were the men who turned round and came to declare that there had been corrupt acts committed during the election. And I say, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member has very bad grace to come up here and bring before this House all the villainy that his party was guilty of in that election. I return to this fact, that the Hon. Mr. Mercier himself gave letters to his friends to support Mr. Mousseau; the Hon. Mr. Mercier himself was the man who helped to get Mr. Mousseau elected, and, after that, he, with his friends, turns round; he takes the case as counsel, he persecutes Mr. Mousseau; and I heard Mr. Mercier say on the hustings, during the last election in Jacques Cartier, that he had been following Mr. Mousseau step by step, and that, if Mr. Mousseau was again elected, the persecution would continue; and Mr. Mousseau would know that, if Mr. Mercier could not impose his terms upon him—because he wanted to be a member of Mr. Mousseau's Government—Mr. Mousseau would pay to the bitter end the penalty for his resistance to accepting him as a colleague and as a Minister in his Cabinet. Well, Mr. Speaker, that is only one of the few features, one of the few disgusting features, of all that persecution that has been going on against Mr. Mousseau; and I say, again, that we cannot interfere in that matter. I say that, from his legal attainments, from his personal abilities, from his high character as a man, as a citizen, Mr. Mousseau was worthy of being elevated to the Bench to which the Government chose to elevate him. I say that the Bench has acquired a worthy member, and, although his election is still before the Courts, and although I suppose a few hundred or a few thousand dollars might get him rid of that—because my hon. friends from the other side are always open to conviction, are always open to receive any nice offer—although Mr. Mousseau could get out of that very easily, the Bench is not disgraced, and will never be disgraced, by the presence of the Hon. Mr. Mousseau. And I feel, Mr. Speaker, that, in speaking in that way, I have the sympathies of all the hon. members of this House, not only on this side but on the other side, who have known Mr. Mousseau, and I for one congratulate the Government for having made the appointment.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of attention to the speech made by my hon. friend from Quebec (Mr. Laurier), and I have also listened to the answer which has been made by the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet). I do not know if that is the line of defence the Government intend to take upon the subject; but whatever may be the merits or demerits of Mr. Mousseau, the reputation and the name that he has before the Dominion at the present moment is the name he has acquired by his own acts. That these acts urged against him are true or false, is not the point at present for public opinion. There they are, and they are notorious at present before the public. Therefore, Mr. Mousseau enjoys, either rightfully or wrongfully, the name which he has before this Dominion to-day. Now, Sir, it is no use disguising the fact that the line of defence adopted by my hon. friend from Laval, of bribery on the part of the Liberal side, and that bribery made at the instance of his own friends, would in no way at all palliate what I may call, to repeat his expression, the disgusting bribery that has been made from his party on our side. Now, I will take things on another standpoint. The hon. member for Laval has leaked out—the fact is that, as we say, he has let the cat out of the bag—he has said that Mr. Mousseau was sent down to Quebec; and in fact we had Mr. Mousseau, who was then a Minister here, sent down to us from the Treasury Benches in Ottawa to the Province of Quebec, to succeed whom? To succeed the hon. Secretary of State, whom I do not see in his place at the present moment, and who I think ought to be there. If I have anything to say in reference to him, he ought to be there, but I will not be deterred. What was the effect of sending Mr. Mousseau down? It is a notorious fact, and I call the attention of this House and of the country to this: that it is a continuation of this undue interference by the Federal Government in the affairs of the Province of Quebec.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Gentlemen on the other side may laugh at it, but they may believe me when I say so, for it is so. We have had the pleasure of having Mr. Mousseau sent down to us as Prime Minister. He has been excessively successful in the mission he was sent there to fulfil, so much so that, at the moment when his administration was crumbling to pieces, it crumbled down of itself. Then the Federal Government interferes, and says: "We will take Mr. Mousseau under our protection, and find a nice little berth for him, in order that we may see as to the appointment of his successor also." Independently of the direct question as to the appointment of Mr. Mousseau, I say that it was an undue interference with our affairs, and it is a continuation of the interference which took place last year in Ontario.

This Government has a decided hostility, and shows it, to the Local Government of Ontario, and a decided affection for, and care of, the Government of Quebec. I think, when hon. gentlemen on the other side, who boast so much of their Confederation, reflect that this Government is trying to centralize all the power in themselves, and not to have a continuation of the Confederation, but to bring us gradually to a Legislative Union, they will see that they are following the due course which they had in view, or some of them had in view, at the time. Now, I object on this ground to this interference, because, if it continues any longer, it will destroy the bonds of this Confederation. There is nothing so well calculated to break up Confederation as this interference on the part of the Federal authorities.

Mr. LANDRY. Question! Question!

Mr. CASGRAIN. Well, if it is not the question I think it comes pretty near home to you. Now what have we seen? Take the previous Administration, that of Mr. Chapleau—it was merely what we might call a succursale, merely an agency of this Government. It is true that they came into power under circumstances that, constitutionally, did not quite meet the views of my hon. friend the First Minister; but then he laughed in his sleeve when he saw how well the game succeeded. Now, Sir, let me refer to the record of the leader of the Government with regard to judicial appointments. I readily grant him that up to this time he has maintained the dignity of the Bench. In one or two cases, perhaps, his appointments did not realize his expectations, but I will not blame him for that. On the whole, I can congratulate him upon having respected the dignity of the Bench; but on this unfortunate occasion, he made, I must say, in my opinion, a grave mistake. Now, as my hon. friend from Quebec East observed, these charges may be brought home to Mr. Mousseau, and then what shall we do in the Province of Quebec? Shall we impeach Mr. Mousseau before this House, in face of the appointment made by the hon. gentlemen opposite, and in face of the large majority ready to support the hon. First Minister? Mr. Mousseau will go on administering justice, but so long as he remains under the imputation of these charges, he will be, in my opinion, a disgrace to the Bench. Therefore, I must demand that all these papers be brought down in order that we may obtain possession of all the facts.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I regret exceedingly that the hon. member who made this motion did not think proper before doing so, to refer to the record in the Court, and thus do justice to a gentleman whom he has so unfairly attacked in this House when he is not here to defend himself. The hon. gentleman has made an ex parte statement, he has only produced certain documents, and relied upon them to make a charge against the Hon. Judge, Mr. Mousseau. I will not say the hon. gentleman's neglect was a wilful and deliberate one; but certainly before he brought so grave a charge against a Judge of the land, and before he charged the Government, and especially the hon. First Minister, with having made an appointment which was a disgrace to the Bench, I say the hon. gentleman ought not to have failed to consult every paper in the record, from the first to the last, and not produce here a portion only of the papers. My hon. friend from Laval has quoted the remarks of the hon. Judge Torrance when he rendered his judgment in the case. That was a very important point in the case, and ought not to have been omitted. It should have been laid before the House as part of the evidence, so that Mr. Mousseau might have benefited by it. But, Mr. Speaker, there is a great deal more than that. The hon. gentleman takes the record in the first trial; he takes the petition and the evidence, but he does not speak of the judgment. The judgment was favourable to Mr. Mousseau, but that is omitted. Then the second trial took place; that is to say, the contestation of the second election, and another petition is brought forward against the Hon. Mr. Mousseau, the elected member. That petition contained everything that is considered to be a violation of the law, and certain charges, I have no doubt special ones, were made. Well, the hon. gentleman refers to them, and he says: "These are the accusations." But, it is said, while these grave accusations, these accusations of personal corruption, are hanging over his head, and while the matter is pending in Court, and before any decision is given, this Government elevates Mr. Mousseau to the Bench. But why did the hon. gentleman go and look at the record and neglect to consult a very important part of it? If he had looked over the whole record he would have found Mr. Mousseau's answer, under oath, to the charges. He would there have found Mr. Mousseau's affidavit, which he ought to have laid before the House, as he has the petition. He ought to have spoken of that, and why did he not? I will not say that he concealed it purposely, because I cannot suppose that the hon. gentleman would do such a thing, but at all events he comes here, he, a member of Parliament, as if he had a brief from the opponents of Mr. Mousseau, to make against him, in this High Court of Parliament, the same charges that were made before the Superior Court of the Province of Quebec. Mr. Speaker, I say that is very unfair. It is very unjust towards the Hon. Mr. Mousseau—I will not say that it is unjust towards us; but the House will decide whether the hon. gentleman was warranted in bringing these charges before the House—because, of course, we will ask the House to reject this motion. I am sorry that this affidavit is not in English so that every hon. member of this House could understand it. It was drawn up in French, and signed by the Hon. Mr. Mousseau, and is attested by him before the Court. Now, this affidavit, in answer to the charges brought against him must go into the Hansard: it must go before the public. I think that is due to the hon. gentleman accused, it is due to this House, and it is due to us as a Government. The affidavit reads as follows:—

(Translation).—The said defendant, Joseph Alfred Mousseau, Queen's Counsel, member of the Privy Council, Attorney General and Premier of the Province of Quebec, and member sitting for the electoral district of Jacques Cartier, being duly sworn on the Holy Evangelists, deposed and saith:

That he is the defendant in this cause, and that on the 26th of September he was elected to represent the electoral district of Jacques Cartier, in the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Quebec, by a majority of from 100 to 110.

That he has carried on his election loyally and honestly, without infringing in any way whatever the electoral law—without infringing, in a word, any of the laws enacted against corrupt practices in Parliamentary elections.

That, in view of the uncessing and implacable war waged against him ever since the month of April now last past, he will be obliged to follow himself the trials of this case, step by step, and day by day, wherever such trial will take place.

That it is now impossible for him to attend to the present electoral petition, because the measures which he has to prepare, as leader of the Cabinet, for the next Session, will necessitate almost constantly his presence at the Seat of the Government.

That, without having the least desire to complain, he is bound to say: That when the first electoral petition was introduced against him, as a member representing the electoral district of Jacques Cartier, on account of his having no time to deal with such petition, statements have been made of which he has since discovered the inaccuracy and falsity.

That in this he alludes specially to the evidence adduced about certain words pretended to have been said by him at Lachine, in Léger's Hotel, in August, 1887, at which time he was a candidate for election, as a member to represent the electoral district of Jacques Cartier, in the Legislative Assembly of Quebec.

That from these words attributed to said deponent, it would appear that the said deponent had promised to remit to the said Léger, the amount of a penalty which he had been condemned to pay, if he, the said deponent was elected, which said remittance took place some time thereafter, and which said pretended evidence would have, it would appear, justified even the disqualification of the said deponent.

That the real facts relative to this incident are that the defendant has never uttered the words attributed to him; that, on the contrary, he has told Léger not to speak to him about these things with which he had nothing to do; that in election times it was always dangerous, and that if afterwards the Government remitted to Léger, and to twenty-five or thirty other hotel-keepers of various counties in the neighbourhood of Montreal, it was merely an act of sound policy and of wise administration.

That, in fact, twenty-five or thirty hotel-keepers, against whom there was nothing in the police records, and who had applied in proper time to get their certificates, had been the victims of the slowness with which the Municipal Councils had granted them their certificates, and from the time when these hotel-keepers had so made their application until the time when the municipal bodies had so granted them the certificates applied for, they had been prosecuted for selling without license.

Under such circumstances the Government was bound in honour, in justice, and in equity, with such evidence of good faith on the one hand and of surprise on the other, not to avail themselves of their position and not to exact from honest hotel-keepers, who had acted in good faith, both the price of a license and the price of a penalty for an infringement, which, in reality, was only apparent and not characterized by any evil intention.

That, in the case of Léger, as in that of several other hotel-keepers, application had been made to the Government in the month of July preceding, for a rebate of the amount of the penalty; that the certificate of the granting of the license by the municipal body had been sent to the Treasury Department, along with certain other documents, representing that the Municipal Council of Lachine alone was responsible for the delay, and that the former Government, that of the defendant, had already decided in fact that in such cases the Government ought not to exact the penalty.

That, consequently, in case that the defendant would be obliged to meet the facts of the first electoral petition above mentioned, it becomes more important for him to be at liberty to follow the present cause, as he has already said, step by step and day by day.

That the said defendant has also discovered, since the first electoral petition, a great number of other most important facts which will enable him to come out victorious of the new electoral petition in this cause, inasmuch as it will be allowable to mingle with it the facts of the first petition.

That the expenses of the defendant during the last election have amounted to $340.65, as appears by the statement received from his agent, M. Louis Allard, by the Official Gazette, and which statement is to be published by the said Official Gazette next Saturday, to wit: the 5th of January, instant.

That the defendant has made no other expenses for his election, and if, against all probability, he has forgotten any, they must be personal and insignificant expenses, such as telegraph despatches and other unforeseen expenses of that kind. And the above having been read deponent hath signed.

J. A. MOUSSEAU.

Sworn before me at Quebec, this third } day of January, one thousand eight } hundred and eighty-four.

T. H. OLIVER,
Commissioner of the Supreme Court,
District of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, this affidavit of the hon. Mr. Mousseau should at least weigh as much in the scale as the accusation that was brought against him in that petition. It should weigh a great deal more, because he is a man of position; and when he made this affidavit he was not only a Queen's Counsel and a Privy Councillor, but Attorney General of the Province of Quebec, and First Minister of the Province. This affidavit is dated 3rd January last. It is made under oath; and we know the meaning of that. If Mr. Mousseau dared to state under oath what was found out to be an untruth, he would be prosecuted for perjury, and he would deserve it. But the hon. gentleman has not hesitated, but has met the accusation brought against him, especially that accusation in the first petition, and for which three witnesses were brought in the first trial. Mr. Mousseau says he never uttered those words, and never did that act, and that he could prove such by witnesses. The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) would not give Mr. Mousseau the benefit of that document, and allow it to go before the House; and that is the reason why I say that the hon. member has not been fair—I do not say he has done it wittingly, or that he did it purposely with the intention of wronging Mr. Mousseau, but whether he had that intention or not, he has wronged him most grievously. He brings these accusations against him and does not allow a word said in his favour in the documents. He brings not only this motion before the House but all the charges, and does not allow a line in favour of Mr. Mousseau. He does not allow the judgment of Judge Torrance to weigh in the scale with the House and the public who will read this debate to-morrow, and he does not allow that gentleman to have the benefit of it. And, moreover, the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) should surely have brought this important document, this affidavit here. He must have known of it, and he will be glad, no doubt, that I have brought it before Parliament, and that it will be published, and will be the justification of Mr. Mousseau, and show, at all events, that there are two sides to this question, and that Mr. Mousseau was not afraid, and is not afraid, of the trial. The fact that the hon. gentleman failed to lay this document before the House shows that the idea is that the trial shall not go on before the Courts, but that as much damage as possible must be done to the reputation of the Hon. Judge Mousseau. I hope this House, after hearing the contents of this document and the explanations offered, will say that Mr. Mousseau should not be blamed, and that the Government has done nothing for which it should be condemned. They have appointed Mr. Mousseau; there is nothing against him. The charge brought against him was laid by one or two individuals, as is the case with all election petitions; and no doubt the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) has also suffered from petitions brought against him, and indeed, I have suffered myself. We all suffer from petitions being brought against us; but in the long run the public find that these petitions are in very many cases only brought to try and damage the member or prevent him going on an Election Committee, because that was the idea at that time. If a member's seat was contested, he could not be placed on an Election Committee; it was an easy way of getting rid of a strong man; but that was the way it was done. To-day these trials are held before Courts of Justice; but nevertheless if you want to persecute a man you persistently contest his election. This was evidently the case in regard to Mr. Mousseau. His election was contested in the first case, and it was annulled. In the second case Mr. Mousseau states under oath that the case of Léger could never have been upheld if the contestation of the election had been continued. I will not answer the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Casgrain), who has thought proper to have a fling at the Secretary of State, in his absence. I hope the hon. gentleman will reserve his attack on my colleague, the Secretary of State, until he is here; then let the hon. gentleman attack him face to face, and my colleague will be able to answer him, no doubt. I hope, after these explanations, that the motion will be rejected.

Mr. GIROUARD. I do not rise for the purpose of adding anything to what has been said with respect to the high character of Mr. Mousseau. Whatever may have been his political faults, I think everybody will admit that he is an honest man, and not only that he is an honest man, but also an able lawyer, and those are at least two qualifications of a good Judge. I rise to corroborate a portion of the affidavit of Mr. Mousseau, which has just been read by the hon. Minister of Public Works. It has been my good or bad fortune to represent in this House the county which Mr. Mousseau represented in the Quebec Legislature. Although I took no part in his first election, being then in the North-West, and although I took no public part in his last election, I think it is due to Mr. Mousseau, not as a friend of his, for we are not speaking here as friends, but as an act of justice, to mention that the story of this Mr. Léger is wrong and that I know it personally. The first contestation of Mr. Mousseau's election took place, I think, at the beginning of May, 1882. This Parliament was sitting when I arrived home—it was, I believe, the very day that Mr. Mousseau had resigned his seat before the Superior Court, and then we heard of this story of Léger's. I was one of the first to mention to Mr. Mousseau that Léger was examined and the settlement of his case was made long before there was any question of Mr. Mousseau coming to Jacques Cartier—was made, in fact, a few days before my election in 1882, in my own presence, by Mr. Lecavalier, then the local member for the county. I say this not only on my word as a gentleman but as a member of the House, and I assert that these are the facts. Léger had been sued for selling liquor without a license in the preceding winter. The Council had been deliberating whether five, or eight, or ten licenses should be granted in the village of Lachine; and when I speak of Lachine, I know what I am talking about, because I reside there. When the Council was deliberating whether the same number of licenses should be continued, this man, who kept his house open as before, was fined at the Police Court for selling without a license, as were others in that county and in other counties. We found that, under the circumstances, as he had finally got a certificate, it was a case for the Crown to remit a portion of the fine; and about the beginning of July, ten or fifteen days after the 20th of June, 1883, the day the Federal Elections were held, Mr. Lecavalier settled the case in my presence. I may say that I know Léger as well as I know any member of this House. I would not say that he committed a perjury, but I simply think he made a mistake. He may have alluded to the fact of his fine being remitted, but it is impossible that the language which is said to have been used, could have been used, under the circumstances. I say this as an act of justice in favour of a man who has been much persecuted for the last few years—a man who holds an important position in the country to-day. I think it is unfortunate that the member for Quebec East should have brought forward this motion. It is very important that the judiciary should have the reputation, before the whole public, of being pure, and unless a member of the House has the proof in his hands that a Judge is not going to do justice to his fellow countrymen—a member who is not prepared to take that responsibility, should bring such a charge as the one which has been brought forward by the hon. member for Quebec East.

Mr. LAURIER. It must be within the recollection of the House that the gist of the charge which I bring against the Government is, that they have appointed a man to be a Judge who is actually liable to be tried in the Court of which he is to be a Judge. It seems to me that this is the first time in the history of a civilized nation that a man actually charged, if not under trial, before the Court for a violation of the law of the country, has ever been put upon the Bench. It may be possible that Mr. Mousseau is perfectly innocent of all imputation against him, but until that is shown, why should the Government be in such haste to appoint him? Why should not the Government give him the chance of clearing his character before the Courts, before putting him on the Bench? In my judgment, and I believe in the opinion of the public of this country, the appointment of a man to a judgeship under such circumstances is a public scandal. In my opinion it is a scandal to bring a Judge, as Mr. Mousseau may be brought to-morrow, from the Bench and have him called down into the bar to answer the charges brought against him: to be examined and cross-examined. I say that this is lowering the dignity and efficiency of the Bench. This is the gist of the charge which I bring against the Government. I wish there were no more, but what makes the charge still more strong is that, so far, the presumptions are against Mr. Mousseau. The hon. Minister of Public Works said that I presented a garbled report to this House. I am not aware that I garbled any statement, and I am sure I have said nothing which was not a matter of public notoriety, and I have brought forward everything that was known. The hon. gentleman said that I did not bring before the House the utterances of the Judge, but he knows very well that any remarks made by a Judge in delivering judgment do not form part of the record. I have moved for the judgment of the Judge and the report made to the Speaker; and all the utterances of the Judge which I have been able to find will be found in the newspapers, and so far as I know, I have given them all to the House. They do not bear out the construction which has been put on them by the hon. Minister of Public Works and the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet.) If we are to believe these hon. gentlemen, Judge Torrance, in giving his judgment, said that if the trial had been prosecuted further there was nothing in the evidence adduced even to avoid the election, to say nothing of disqualifying Mr. Mousseau. I do not know what may have been the views of Judge Torrance, but if such were his views, they were not the views of Mr. Mousseau and his counsel, since, if we are to believe them, they bribed the other side to prevent a judgment being given. If the charges were so frivolous, if there was nothing in the evidence to avoid the election or disqualify Mr. Mousseau, why should they say that they bribed the other side? Why did he resign his seat afterwards? Why did he not go further? Why did he not wait for the judgment, after which the Government could have appointed him a Judge without objection from anybody? The hon. gentleman also said that I should have given the affidavit of Mr. Mousseau himself. This affidavit was not given at the trial. What was the object of it? When Mr. Mousseau was petitioned against the second time, he applied to the Court for a postponement of the trial, and then it was that he presented his affidavit. He stated to the Court that the business of the country would not allow him to go on with his trial at that time. In that affidavit he attempts to justify himself to some extent; but in my opinion his explanation is somewhat lame. In speaking to Léger he said, "Do not speak to me now, because there is an election; wait till the election is over." These are the words, so far as I remember the affidavit, and if they mean anything, they do not bear a favourable construction. There is in them an innuendo which is not altogether in favour of the Judge. And what took place? The motion of the hon. gentleman was granted; the trial was postponed; the investigation was not to take place; the charges were not enquired into; and in the meantime the hon. gentleman was appointed to the Bench. Under such circumstances, I think the affidavit will not go far towards justifying Mr. Mousseau. The hon. gentleman said that this motion should not be made, because the trial was not to be continued. I do not know what the intention of the petitioner is, but it is open to Mr. Mousseau to have a trial if he thinks it is better for him. Before I sit down, I wish to say a word with reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet). The answer he made was not even an attempt to justify Mr. Mousseau; but he tried to cast a slur upon the Liberal party. He said the Liberal party had accepted a bribe, and that I condemned my own friends as much as his. I do not care whether, in saying what I did, I condemned my own friends or not. I say if the Liberal party are guilty of bribery, the sooner it is investigated and proven, the better. The hon. gentleman says we are always open to conviction. The Liberal party from Lower Canada is not numerous in this House, but if it is not, it is because the weak-kneed in our ranks have found seats on the other side. If they can get any more of the same kind, they are welcome to have them.

SCHOOL OF NAVIGATION AT QUEBEC.

Mr. LANDRY enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to establish a school of navigation at Quebec; and if such is the intention of the Government, whether the school will go into operation during the course of the present year.

Mr. McLELAN. That is a matter which is now being considered by my Department and by the Government, and an answer cannot be given at the present time, it being under consideration.

PUBLICATION OF DEPARTMENTAL REPORTS IN NEWSPAPERS.

Mr. BLAKE. Before the Orders are called, I desire to call the attention of hon gentlemen opposite to an irregularity which now seems to have become chronic. A few days ago the Minister of Militia presented the Report on the Militia for the year, and in one of the Ministerial papers appeared, the day previous, a statement that the report had been presented on that day, and a résumé, written I suppose by prescience, of that report. To-day, the Minister of Railways and Canals has presented some most important papers to Parliament, and I find in the same Ministerial paper a despatch, dated yesterday, containing the substance of those returns. That, Sir, does not do. Either these returns are to be kept sacred from the journalists of both political parties until they come before Parliament, or an arrangement must be made by which all the journalists of both parties shall have access to them. When I find the Report of the Minister of Militia in a newspaper one day, and these very important returns another day, I think it time to draw attention to an impropriety that is growing into a practice.

Mr. CARON. Mr. Speaker, I quite agree with the remarks which have fallen from the hon. gentleman, and I hope the hon. gentleman will understand that the irregularity to which he has drawn the attention of the House can only have happened by a misunderstanding. My attention was drawn to it, and I ascertained that, in the Department, from the fact of my having been away one day, it was supposed that the Report of the Minister of Militia had been placed upon the Table of the House, the day before it was really placed upon that Table, and, in consequence, a copy of the report was given one day sooner than it should have been given.

Mr. BLAKE. To one person?

Mr. CARON. Well, the hon. gentleman has asked for explanations, and I take it for granted that he will believe the statement I am making. The mistake occurred, and I hope he will not consider that I meant any disrespect whatever to the House of Commons.

Mr. BLAKE. There is one other subject to which I wish to call the attention of hon. gentlemen. I moved some time ago for papers with reference to the appointment of the High Commissioner, and also for some information with reference to the contingencies and expenses attached to that office. I intimated the intention, and the gentleman said he expected, that that question would become the subject of further discussion when the material was brought down. I asked that it might be brought down early; but it has not been brought down. I find that the Minister of Railways and the High Commissioner are at present both in the House. I hope there is no difference between them. If there be, I hope they will agree together and settle it, and that the papers will be brought down to the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They are in perfect accord.

PUNISHMENT OF SEDUCTION, &c., BILL.

Mr. CHARLTON, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 6) to provide for the punishment of seduction and like offences, said: Mr. Speaker, in rising to move the second reading of this Bill, I am free to confess that the Bill has imperfections. It is not a Bill covering as wide a scope as I should desire. It is confined within narrow limits, and applies only to two or three of the most grievous of a class of crimes that all, in my opinion, should be dealt with by the Criminal Code. The Bill provides for the punishment of seduction under promise of marriage, of a feigned or mock marriage, and of enticement into houses of prostitution. I think the Bill perhaps is also deficient in the fact that possibly too much care has been taken to shield the male offender from any possible charge that is ill-founded. It may be doubted whether he, as a criminal, should be allowed to give his evidence, whether the provisions in regard to corroborative evidence are not too strong, so strong as in a measure to defeat the purposes had in view by the Bill. However, if the House accepts the Bill in its present shape, the principle, at all events, is admitted, and, in future years, experience and the wisdom of the House will dictate such changes as may be necessary in the law. This Bill, two Sessions ago was referred to a Special Committee. It was then a Bill of much wider scope than at present. That Special Committee reported the Bill in substantially the same shape that it is presented to the House to-day. Last Session the Bill was again introduced, and again referred to a Special Committee, whose labours were completed at a single sitting, and who reported the Bill with very slight amendments to the terms in which it was introduced. The Bill, as now submitted, has one or two trifling changes from the Bill of last Session. There are two additions, one making feigned or mock marriage a crime, and one making subsequent marriage of the parties or a bonâ fide offer of marriage a bar to conviction. The latter clause was in the Bill as reported last Session. It was struck out in Committee of the Whole in this House, but I find the advocates of the Bill in the Senate were almost to a man in favour of this provision. I have inserted it again. If it does not meet with the approval of the House, in the event of the Bill passing the second reading, it can be struck out in Committee of the Whole. There is one change made, one clause dropped out the clause with reference to the punishment of teachers. There was perhaps no feature of the Bill that met with more universal approval of the Committee than did this feature. It was held that, teachers having peculiarly intimate relations with their pupils, it was proper to incorporate in the Bill a clause making the seduction of a pupil by a teacher a criminal offence. This clause, Sir, seems to have met with the disapproval of that respectable and honourable class of the Canadian public, and some meetings were held denouncing it. I must confess it has a somewhat invidious look, although it was not aimed at the good teachers, at those who had never been guilty of the offence, but at those who abused their privileges and trust as teachers. However, the clause has been struck out. I would have been glad to insert a clause with reference to guardians, a clause with reference to overseers, a clause with reference to minors, but the same objection might be urged. In the case of guardians, it might be said it was an invidious attack upon them, and the same in regard to overseers, and, perhaps, it might be a difficult matter to insert a clause with respect to the seduction of minors. Therefore, the Bill is presented in the shape it now stands. The Bill provides that the evidence of the female, in respect of whom the offence is alleged to have been committed, shall be corroborated as to the offence first mentioned, both as to the promise of marriage and the seduction; as to the offence secondly mentioned in the first section, both as to the feigned or pretended marriage and the sexual intercourse, and as to the second section, concerning inveiglement or enticement, by other material evidence. The fourth section provides:

"In every case arising under this Act the defendant shall be a competent witness in his own behalf upon any charge or complaint against him, and upon his trial for such offence may, on such charge or complaint, insist that his evidence be taken."

The fifth section provides:

"No prosecution under this Act shall be commenced after the expiration of one year from the time of committing the offence."

The punishment provided by this Act is that any person who shall be convicted of any offence declared to be a misdemeanor under this Act, shall be imprisoned for two years in a penitentiary, or for a less term in any other prison or place of confinement. It will thus be seen, Mr. Speaker, that the term of imprisonment, the degree of punishment, is in the discretion of the court. The imprisonment may be for a limited period—the maximum is two years, the minimum is in the discretion of the court. The other features of this Bill met with the universal approval of the House last Session, and it is unnecessary for me to deal at length with them upon this occasion. Various objections have been urged, Mr. Speaker, against this Bill. One of the objections urged against it is that both parties are necessarily guilty. Well, Sir, I cannot conceive that in any case both parties are equally guilty. The man is the active, the woman the passive, agent to a great extent; and I must hold that in almost every case the man is much the guiltier party. However, the Bill provides only for cases of seduction under promise of marriage, for cases where the most cruel deceit is practised, and for punishment in cases of feigned or pretended marriage. Another objection that has been urged is that this Bill may compel a man to marry a woman of loose character. Now, Sir, the Bill provides punishment only for the seduction of a woman of previously chaste character. If she is a woman of loose character the provisions of this Bill will not apply. That provision punishes a man who seduces a woman of chaste character under the promise of marriage. If the woman is good enough to be engaged to him, she is good enough to be married to him; and this objection certainly does not apply against the Bill. I am one, Mr. Speaker, who believes, whether rightly or wrongly, that women are, as a rule, better and more virtuous than men. I believe that they have a higher moral organization, that they are not exposed in the same degree to the temptations that beset men in life; that they grow up in a more refined condition, and that their natural tendencies are better than the natural tendencies of men. I believe this to be the case, and I think that society believes this to be the case. Society, moreover, demands that woman shall be purer than man. It demands, on the part of the woman, greater care in her conduct than it does on the part of the man. Men may do with impunity many things that would blast the character of a woman. Society recognizes the fact that the good of the community, the good of society, the well-being of the family, rest upon the virtue of the female portion of society. And this being the case, society inflicts a sterner punishment upon the female than it does upon the male, in cases of the infraction of the seventh commandment. A female, if guilty of a violation of the seventh commandment, is driven from society. Her character is blasted; she has no place for repentance, even though she seeks it with tears. An offence of this character on the part of a man is considered one of a venial nature. He may still hold up his head in society, and with a certain class of men this offence is even considered creditable to him. But society visits its vengeance upon the woman; she never can recover her position. This is probably right, because society appreciates the necessity for female virtue; it appreciates the necessity that those who educate our children, that those who preside in our home, should be above suspicion. The estimate that society instinctively places upon this matter, Mr. Speaker, is very correctly indicated in the feelings that are evinced when a man becomes the avenger against one who has committed an outrage upon female virtue. Where a husband, or a father, or a brother girds himself to avenge the seducer of his female relative, the instincts of society prompts it to take that man's part. I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, there can be found a single instance in the history of Canada, or in the history of Great Britain, or of the United States, or of any other civilized community, where a man who has avenged a dishonour of this kind has been punished. There was a case in an adjoining township last year where a woman, seduced by a man under promise of marriage, and betrayed, and deserted by him, shot that man dead. She was tried for murder and the jury pronounced her not guilty. A few days ago a case occurred in the State of Pennsylvania, where a young man shot the seducer of his sister on a public street, shot him repeatedly. He was tried for murder, but the sentiment of the community was such that the man was acquitted upon a flimsy plea of emotional insanity. But in no cases of this kind that have ever come under my observation, has punishment been inflicted upon the man who has visited with vengeance the seducer of a female friend. I saw the other day a case in our Canadian newspapers, of a young woman of attractive appearance, a Swede, an orphan girl, without friends, and without knowledge of the customs of society in this country, who was betrayed in this manner. After betrayal she received a letter from her heartless seducer, informing her that he had concluded not to marry her. This girl, after the birth of her child, became insane, and was brought before the court and committed to an insane asylum. Now, Sir, that young man goes at large, there is no law in this land to punish him; but, Sir, the equatorial regions of inferno are too cold for his eternal residence, or the residence of any such dastard. It is a shame upon our civilization that there is no law upon our Statute Book that will punish cases of this kind. It has been urged against this Bill that you cannot make men virtuous by law. Well, Sir, if that is an argument against a law of this character, it is an argument against any law of the Criminal Code. The object of laws providing for the punishment of crime is not, primarily, to make men virtuous, but it is to hold up the terror of punishment over those who may be disposed to be otherwise than virtuous. We do not make men virtuous by enacting laws against the crime of murder, against the crime of theft, and we do not make men virtuous, primarily and necessarily, by a law against the crime of seduction under promise of marriage; but we propose to punish those who are guilty of this offence in order to deter others from committing it. The hon. the Minister of Justice, in the other Chamber, when this Bill was under discussion, gave it as his opinion that women who deserve sympathy would not enter court. Well, I think, Mr. Speaker, that that cannot be urged as a sufficient reason why a woman who deserves sympathy should not have a remedy provided for her by law in case she did choose to enter court. I am able to understand why the Bill should be opposed by the libertine, by the man who believes, as the Mahomedan does, that woman is an inferior being, that she was created as the legitimate prey of man, created for his gratification—that she, perhaps, is destitute of a soul. I can understand how a man holding such sentiments would trample upon a woman's rights, upon a woman's life—who would cruelly betray her and then ruthlessly cast her aside—I can understand how that man would oppose this Bill, and I would naturally expect to have him criticise it in a sense the reverse of complimentary. But, Sir, I am unable to understand how a father, whose daughter is the pride of his life, the hope of his family, beautiful and beloved—how a brother whose sister fills the horizon of his hope, who is all that is lovely in womanhood—I say, Mr. Speaker, I cannot understand how either that father or that brother can vote against this Bill, can vote against the clause which provides that a man who cruelly seduces the daughter, or the sister, by deceit, under promise of marriage, or after a mock marriage, should vote against a provision of this kind, proposing to fix a penalty to that crime. I noticed the other day in a newspaper which offered some criticisms upon this Bill, an assertion that it is a Bill to encourage the brazenness of disreputable females. On the contrary, it is a Bill to discourage the manufacture of brazen females; it is a Bill to discourage those crimes against society that result in making females of that character. It is said that this Bill renders men peculiarly liable to false charges, to charges made for the purpose of levying blackmail. Well, Sir, I suppose that men are liable to false charges in other cases, they are liable to be charged with other crimes they have never perpetrated. I can name an infallible preventative, if men will live pure, chaste lives, if they will live in accordance with the seventh commandment of the Decalogue, there will be very little danger of their being exposed to false charges and attempts to levy blackmail. The paper to which I referred a few moments ago criticises my views with reference to this matter as the "crystalization of the meanest form of cant." Well, Sir, I will set over and against the opinion of the eminent editor who wrote those lines, the opinion of an editor scarcely less eminent—that of Horace Greeley. Horace Greeley gave it as his deliberate opinion that the man who seduced an innocent woman was worthy of the punishment of death. On the one hand, we have the opinion of the flagellator of bull-pups and sluggers; on the other hand, we have the opinion of the prince of editors in the nineteenth century; and somewhere between the two extreme views represented by those two men, are the provisions of this Bill. This Bill is about as far removed from the opinion of the one as the opinion of the other; it is a compromise between the extreme opinions of those who believe that seduction under all forms should be most severely punished, and those views held by the editor of the Mail. But Horace Greeley was not the only man who did not believe that such opinions were the "crystalization of the meanest form of cant." The Roman Senate did not hold that view. The Roman Senate, centuries ago, provided a law much more severe with respect to seduction than any law upon any modern Statute Book. The Roman law provided, and that law remained in force for centuries, that the punishment of ordinary seduction should be the confiscation of half the estates of the offender, if of the better class, and if of the lower class, it should be corporal punishment and imprisonment. The canon law provided that the seduced should marry or settle a dowry upon his victim. The law of France contains the same provision, that either the victim of the seducer shall be married by him or that he shall settle a dowry upon her. The law of Germany punishes seduction with hard labour and imprisonment for six months. As I said in the course of the last discussion on this Bill last year, twenty-seven States of the American Union—I do not know about all of them, but this number, at least—have laws with respect to offences of this character. These laws vary in their nature in the different States, but there is not a solitary State in the whole number that does not punish offenders of the character mentioned in this Bill. In the State of New York, a law of this character was placed on the Statute Book thirty-six years ago, and it was placed there after years of agitation. One of the most potent arguments in favour of making this a crime, and the offender subject to punishment, was the fact that crimes of this character were usually avenged by the murder of the perpetrator of the outrage; and it was felt that when no jury could be found to convict those committing such murders, it was proper and just that the law should reach the crime of seduction, and accordingly the Statute was passed. That Statute in New York State provides a punishment for seduction under promise of marriage, by imprisonment for five years and a fine of $5,000, one or both, in the discretion of the court; and this law has been upon the Statute Book, as I have said, for thirty-six years. The constitution of the State which embodies that law has formed the model for the constitutions of various States to the west of New York. Very many of the western States have framed their constitutions on the constitution of the State of New York, and in all those States this provision is incorporated in the law. If this law were open to the objections urged against it, to the objection that it leads to false charges for blackmailing purposes, that the interests of the male are not sufficiently protected, and that the male is made the victim of adventures and procuresses—if cases of hardship had occurred under this law, are we to suppose there would be no movement seeking for its repeal? And yet there has not been a breath urged against the law, no movement for its repeal, no demand for its repeal, no sense of hardship felt under its operation. The law has been just, beneficial and salutary in its operation in all those States, and after 36 years' experience in one of the greatest States of the Union, and many years' experience in other States, we are warranted in the assertion that the law in its operation was conducive to the public good. We have in Canada a law with regard to seduction, a law providing that seduction on shipboard shall be punished. I am unable to understand why seduction on shipboard should be more heinous than seduction on land. I am unable to understand why a provision applicable to ships on the high sea should not also be made applicable on land; and the fact that the Government has passed such a law with respect to offences of this nature on shipboard on the high sea, is a sufficient reason for making it applicable to cases of a similar character occurring upon land. One of the opponents of this measure in the Senate last year, stated it as his deliberate conviction that, if this Bill became the law, the first attack which would be made against it would be on the part of mothers, whose innocent sons had been made the prey of designing females. I think the hon. the First Minister of the Crown in this House made a statement of a somewhat similar character. He said, I think, that within his own practice he had known numerous instances where young men had been keenly harassed and driven from their native land by the fear of false accusations on the part of designing females. I must confess I never have seen a case of that kind. I have seen cases, however, of quite a different character. I have a case in my mind at this moment of a young villain who seduced two girls under promise of marriage, who communicated to each of them a loathsome disease, and who fled his country, probably in fear of being harassed by accusations on the part of those girls. Such is usually the character of the offences committed by young men who abandon their country; but I have no fear whatever that innocent men, under the operation of this law, will have reason to regret its passage. I believe the offences named in this Bill are crimes. I believe they are crimes of greater gravity than larcenies or robberies. I believe it is a reflection on our civilization that there is no law adequate to the punishment of offences of this character, and believing this to be the case, believing that justice demands that offences of this kind should be made criminal, I move the second reading of the Bill.

Bill read the second time.

DUAL REPRESENTATION.

Mr. OUMET, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 13) to repeal an Act to render members of the Legislative Councils and Legislative Assemblies of the Provinces now included, or which may hereafter be included, within the Dominion of Canada, ineligible for sitting or voting the House of Commons of Canada, said: The House will allow me a few minutes to explain the bearing of this Bill. In 1872, there was an Act passed, chap. 15, to compel members of the Local Legislature in any Province where dual representation was then allowed, to resign their seats before becoming candidates for seats in the Dominion Parliament. As the title of this Act shows, all members of the Local Legislature, where dual representation was not allowed at the time, were disqualified to be candidates for, or to be elected to, this House. I may say that at the time this Bill was passed some Provinces had abolished dual representation. Some of them, however, had thought better to preserve it, and it was with a view of preventing the members of those Local Legislatures, where dual representation had been abolished, from running the risk of being elected as members of this House, and if they lost their election, continuing to remain members of the Local Legislature, that this Act was passed. Such candidates caused a good deal of trouble to the opposing candidate, without incurring any risk themselves. In 1873, another Act was passed which contains some more sweeping clauses. It was entitled, chapter 2 of 36 Vic., "An Act to render members of the Legislative Councils and Legislative Assemblies now included, or which may hereafter be included, within the Dominion of Canada, ineligible for sitting or voting in the House of Commons of Canada." This Statute abolished dual representation in toto for this Parliament, not only for those Provinces which had deemed it expedient to repeal dual representation, but it prevented entirely all members of Local Legislatures from being eligible as members of this House. The Bill, whose second reading I am now moving, only repeals the last Act which I have mentioned; that is to say, it leaves the Provinces to say for themselves whether it is better, in their interests, to preserve dual representation or abolish it. If the present Bill passes, the other Act abolishing dual representation for the Provinces in which it is not allowed will remain in force. Thus the Provinces will be enabled by this Bill to judge for themselves whether they should have dual representation or not. The reason for this is that this Parliament being the larger and stronger Parliament, has nothing to fear from local interference or local influences—nothing, to be afraid of, by allowing members of the Local Legislatures to sit in this House, in the way of these members bringing provincial influence to predominate in this Parliament. Another reason why I should like this change—for my own part it will not be for my benefit, for as I shall explain, I do not appreciate very much the privilege of being a candidate for both Legislatures—is that it would allow the Local Legislatures to take from this House, in moments of emergency, members who could render some service to them. On the other hand, it will enable men who believe they have some disposition for public life to devote themselves entirely to politics. I should say, although there is a strong prejudice against what we call politicians, that a man who gives himself entirely to politics, if he has the other qualities which enable him to render service to his country, if he is intelligent, honest, and patriotic, will be enabled to render greater service to his country: to make himself more prominent, more learned in the different questions which interest the Dominion or the Provinces, and therefore it will give to our country a greater number of men competent to deal with political questions and promote the prosperity of the people. On the other hand, I may say that if the number of men who are dragged into politics by necessity, sometimes by party necessity, were lessened it would be better for the country. At present, in some counties, the people, finding their liberty of choosing a candidate limited by the abolition of dual representation, are very often obliged to select men who do not feel qualified and do not care to go into public life. Such men are very often compelled to leave their business, which suffers in their absence, and after a few years of public life, they may happen to be defeated; so they find themselves almost ruined and they become a charge on the party and a charge on the country. That is not their fault. Political exigencies—and I think it is true of both parties—frequently require men of that stamp to enter a life which they are not qualified for and do not care for, and which after a few years leave them almost ruined in their private business. Although there are plenty of men who are willing to take the risks of public life, and although the number would be limited by this measure, I contend that it would be for the greatest benefit of the people. What I am going to say may seem to be a very sweeping assertion, but I believe that one of the evils of our political life at present is that there are too many men in politics, either as candidates or in some other way. These men either live from politics, or expect to live from it. If their party come into power they expect to live at the expense of the country. With the small population of this Dominion, the fact of there being so many men in public life is a real plague. I would not go so far as to say that we are too much governed; that we have too many Governments, or too many people in charge of those Governments; but I say that if we could limit that evil, it would be for the greatest good of the country. This is the principal reason why I ask this House to pass the present Bill.

Mr. BLAKE. I think that we ought to hear from the Government what their views are on this important question.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the House will be very much gratified to hear the opinion of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BLAKE. My opinion is unchanged.

FRAUD IN SALE OF PATENT RIGHTS.

Mr. MULOCK, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 26) for the better prevention of fraud in connection with the sale of patent rights, said: I would desire to mention some of the considerations which induced me to introduce this Bill. It must be within the knowledge of many hon. gentlemen that for a long time frauds have been perpetrated throughout the country, especially in the rural districts, in connection with patent rights, whereby many innocent and trusting people have been serious losers. The patent laws were never intended to provide an instrument by which fraud might be perpetrated; but the patents themselves, although in many cases most useful, open the way to fraud, and often they have no practical value, but are only useful in the hands of designing agents. Artful men are able, frequently, by the use of cunning arguments, to make use of the rights they have acquired from the Department, to receive valuable securities from people not sufficiently skilled either in law or in fact to determine whether these patents have in themselves any legal or practical value. The course commonly pursued in such cases by the agent who desires to sell—not the article patented, but the mere right to use this patent right—is to tempt an unsuspecting person into a purchase, giving him, as an inducement, credit for payment, and as part of the designed fraud, he takes security that is ultimately negotiable. He sells his right to make use of the patent, and receives in return a promissory note from the purchaser, perhaps under circumstances that between the two parties would be sufficient to prevent the vendor ever recovering on the note, but he is still able to negotiate, and as a rule does negotiate, such note before maturity and defeat the purchaser in any defence he would otherwise have. I do not think it is necessary to further argue the merits of the question than to simply say that in regard to this class of transaction the Bill provides that notes, given for such consideration, shall be marked across the face with the words, "given for a pat nt right," so that such notes shall bear on their face evidence as to the consideration for which they have been given. If, then, any valid defence should exist against payment, it will be continued against the purchaser, who, in fact, takes the note with such notice. In order to enforce this measure, there is a clause in the Bill providing that it shall be the duty of persons so transacting business to so mark the notes taken in security, and in default of so doing be guilty of a misdemeanor.

Mr. POPE. I suppose it is the intention of my hon. friend that this shall go to a Select Committee, is it not?

Mr. MULOCK. Yes.

Bill read the second time.

Mr. MULOCK moved that the Bill be referred to a Committee consisting of Messrs. Haggart, White (Renfrew), Hall, Laurier and the mover.

Mr. POPE. I would ask my hon. friend to put the hon. member for Jacques Cartier on the Committee.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

THE ESTIMATES.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY presented a Message from His Excellency, the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows:—

LANDSDOWNE.

The Governor-General transmits to the House of Commons Estimates of sums required for the service of the Dominion for the year ending the 30th June, 1885, and, in accordance with the provisions of the British North America Act of 1867, he recommends these Estimates to the House of Commons.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
Ottawa, February 7th, 1884.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that the Message, with the Estimates accompanying it, be referred to the Committee of Supply.

Motion agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF MR. S. J. ST. ONGE CHAPLEAU.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Mr. Speaker moved for: 1. Copies of all Orders in Council or departmental orders, and all communications and correspondence respecting the appointment of Samuel J. St. Onge Chapleau as a sheriff in the North-West Territories; 2. Copies of all complaints or charges made against the said Chapleau while he was an employé in the Department of Railways and Canals; 3. Copies of all Orders, decisions or resolutions of the said Department dismissing or dispensing with the services of the said Chapleau; 4. Copies of such portions of the evidence taken before the Railway Commission, as relate to the conduct of said Chapleau while he was such employé; 5. Copies of all correspondence between the said Chapleau and the Government, or any member of it, respecting the said complaint and charges, or respecting in any way his conduct while such employé, respecting his quitting the public service and respecting his appointment as such sheriff. He said: I would ask to have the motion amended by the addition after "Railways and Canals" of the words "Public Works." I am not sure, from the evidence given before the Royal Commission, whether the official was an employé in the Department of Railways and Canals, or in that of Public Works, or both, because one of the witnesses states he was a clerk in the Department of Public Works, and also a corresponding clerk in the Department of Railways and Canals. I suppose there can be no objection to adding the words I have just mentioned. Now, Mr. Speaker, it will be in the recollection of those of us who were in Parliament in the Session of 1879, that the Government advertised for tenders for the construction of a portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway. They called for these tenders for that portion of the road between the English River and Keewatin, and that portion of the road was divided, as I gather from the public documents, into two sections, and the tenders were in three different aspects. There was Section "A" extending from English River to Eagle River, Section "B" extending from English River to Keewatin, and Section "C" embracing both sections in one contract. That was the advertisement calling for tenders for the construction of the work. Now, the parties tendering were required to fill in two columns. The first column was for the completion of the work by the 1st July, 1883, and the second column for the completion of the work by the 1st July, 1882. Several parties, in pursuance of the advertisement submitted to the public by the Government, tendered for the construction and completion of this work. I only propose referring to three of the tenders, and I only do that with a view of leading up to the question that I propose very shortly discussing before the House. The lowest tender for the work, as I observe, was that of a firm called Morse & Co., who agreed to finish the whole work by the 1st of July, 1882, embracing the two Sections "A" and "B" for $5,699,707; or to finish it by the 1st of July, 1883, for $5,937,732. You see that they charge a larger sum for the completion of the work at the earlier period. Now this firm of Morse & Co., for some reason unknown to me—and that I do not propose to discuss at present—were passed over by the Minister of Railways; and the only tenders that were considered were the tenders of the other parties which I shall refer to in a moment. Now, the next lowest tender, and that for the whole work, was of Andrews, Jones & Co. Their tender was for $5,062,559, and the work was to be finished by their tender on the 1st July, 1883. These were the only tenders for the whole work that I propose to refer to. Then there was the tender for Section "A" by a person named Marks for $2,203,896. There was also a tender from a certain firm of Nova Scotia contractors called Fraser, Grant & Pitblado, for $4,130,707, for Section "B." Now, these two tenders for Sections "A" and "B" separately, in the aggregate amounted to $6,334,603. You will recollect I mentioned that Andrews, Jones & Co.'s tender was for $5,062,559—in other words, Andrews, Jones & Co.'s tender was less than the tender of Marks & Co. for Section "A" and of Fraser, Grant & Pitblado's tender for Section "B" both together, by the sum of $272,044. Now, this being the fact, one would naturally suppose—the usual course would be—that the man making the lowest tender would get the contract. I apprehend that is the way an honest Government always does—that it gives the contract to the man who puts in the lowest tender. Now, Andrews, Jones & Co.'s tender was $272,044 less than the other two tenders combined, but they did not get the contract. You will not find, perhaps, the reason why they did not get the contract, but you will find a sort of historical sketch of the facts in the public documents. From these we learn that on the 26th of February, 1879, the Minister of Railways and Canals notified Andrews, Jones & Co. that their tender was accepted, and he gave them a period of three days to put up their security. The cash deposit that he required as a security was $200,000. Now, Sir, these men appear to have been Americans, and their backer, that is, the financial man of the concern, was a person named Smith, who, I believe, lived in the city of New York. The Minister of Railways, as I gather from the documents, though I may be wrong in my impression—but I gather that he was aware of this fact, aware of where they lived, aware of who the man was that was putting up the money, and aware that communication had to be held between Ottawa and New York, aware that word had to be sent from Ottawa to New York, and from New York to Ottawa, before the sum of $200,000 could be put up. That these men were acting in good faith, I think, is beyond doubt; and the Minister must have been aware of all these circumstances. Now, Mr. Fraser, of Nova Scotia, the Minister's own friend, when he was before the Railway Commission, swears that the moment the contractors, that is Andrews, Jones & Co., received the notification, Mr. Jones started for New York to make arrangements to put up the money. The House will understand that the very moment they were notified by the Department that they were to get the contract, the business man of the firm—not the money man, because the money man was in New York, but the business man—starts for New York. He goes there with a view of having this money put up in time. Now, the Minister must have known that perfectly well, and anybody must have known just as well that allowing a man three days to go from Ottawa to New York and to come back again, for the purpose of getting his money, was an unreasonably short time. Mr. Fraser again stated in his evidence before the Railway Commission, that three days was a very short time. Now, Sir, I say that the Minister must have known that the time was short. He must also have known that these men were acting in good faith; because, in the three days allowed by the Department of Railways and Canals, they put up $48,950 security, and they asked the Minister for two or three days longer time to put up the balance. They did not get an hour; they could not get an hour; but within the three days that they asked for they put up an additional sum of $48,450, nearly $100,000 altogether, within four or five days; and they asked for two or three days more to put up the balance, but they did not get an hour. Well, I am not going to discuss at this moment why they did not get it, that is a matter that, perhaps, deserves discussion at a future period. Now, these things must have been known to a large extent to the Department. The facts that the money could not be put up within so short a time, and that these men asked for two or three days longer, must have been known to the Department. I do not say that the hon. gentleman knew it, I do not say the Government knew it, but it is a singular thing that at the very moment these men were begging for three days further time to put up the additional security, Fraser, Grant & Pitblado were negotiating for the sale of this very contract to McDonald, Manning & Shields, of Toronto, for the sum of $50,000: and they did, I believe, sell it to them for that sum. Now, Sir, you will understand that, in the first place, the two contracts—that of Marks & Co., and that of Fraser, Grant & Pitblado—amounted together to $272,044 more than that of Andrews, Jones & Co.; but Fraser, Grant & Pitblado sold their contract to McDonald, Manning & Shields, and the very moment Andrews, Jones & Co. were begging for time to put up the balance of the security, that very moment this negotiation was going on. Now, as I have said, there are some things that must have been known to the Department. There is something that, perhaps, was not known to the Department, but it turns out to be the fact all the same, by subsequent investigation. I presume, however, that the Minister at the head of this Department knew nothing about it. But it appears to be the fact, nevertheless, that at the very moment these negotiations were going on for the sale of this contract, at the very moment when these men were begging for two or three days further time to put up their security, an employé, high in the Department of Public Works or in the Department of Railways and Canals, or in both of them—this confidential servant of the Government, was doing—what, Sir? acting in the interest of the Government? in the interest of the Department? in the interests of the country? Not at all, Sir. At the very moment, I say, when these men were begging for more time, and when the other men, Fraser, Grant & Pitblado, were negotiating for the sale of the contract, at that very moment, this employé in the Public Works Department, was secretly, behind the back of the Government, and, perhaps, behind the back of those he was pretending to be friendly with, namely, Andrews, Jones & Co., was secretly colluding with a rival company to prevent what? To prevent the man that was putting up the money for them, their financial man, from coming to the Government and putting up the $200,000. That is the fact disclosed by the evidence, Sir. The individual to whom I have referred was an ordinary employé of the Government, who was in one of the Departments as confidential clerk, a corresponding clerk in the Department of Railways and Canals, a man who was living at the public expense and feeding at the public crib, who owed undivided allegiance to the Government which appointed him, and to the Department which he was called on to serve, a man whose sworn duty was not to betray the trust the Department reposed in him—that man at that very time was negotiating with Mr. Smith, the financial backer of Andrews, Jones & Co. to prevent him putting up the money, and have the contract pass to Fraser, Grant & Pitblado, and from them to Manning, Shields & McDonald, by which the country would lose $272,044. That is what he was doing, and what I state the evidence shows he was doing. Let us see what is the evidence upon that subject. I refer to the evidence taken before the Railway Commission as it is called, and, at page 305, you will find the account given by Mr. McDonald of this transaction. The evidence was taken in question and answer from under oath; and I am going to trouble the House by taking up a little time in reading some of the questions and answers, because I think this is a very serious and important case, and one which the country should understand. Mr. McDonald is asked the following questions:—

“4622. Have you knowledge of anything being given to any person not connected with the works?—Yes; I have promised to give something to a person myself.

“4623. In what shape?—If I succeeded in doing the work I would do something for him.

“4624. Have you succeeded in doing the work?—If I succeeded in getting the contract.

“4625. In what shape were you to do something?—I was to give him something.

“4626. What was the something?—A certain amount of money, if I succeeded.

“4627. Where does he live?—He lives in Ottawa.

“4628. What is his name?—Chapleau.

“4629. Which Department is he in?—He is in the Public Works Department. It was for nothing in the Department that I was to give it to him.

“4630. What were you to give him?—$4,000

“4631. Then, according to your promise you would now pay him $4,000 for having got the contract?—He was a personal friend of Mr. Smith's in New York. He told me that Mr. Smith could not come to put up the money, and I said: ‘Well, if he does not come to time and put up the security, I will give you $4,000.’ Whether he saw Smith or not, I do not know, but I know they were personal friends. He used to stop with him in New York, when he was there. I do not know whether he had any influence over Smith or not; I was led to expect so, as I was told that they were personal friends.

“4632. Was there more than one Chapleau in that Department?—No; not in that Department. He is the Secretary of Public Works at present, so it is very easy to know who he is. At that time he was correspondence clerk, I think, in the Railway Department, or copying clerk, or something, I do not know exactly his position, but he was in one of those Departments, writing all the time.

“4634. So that, at that time, he was connected with the Department which had charge of those contracts?—Yes. He was in the Department, but not in the office where tenders were opened. He had no connection with the Department where the tenders were opened. The tenders never came before him.

“4635. You mean that your promise had no effect upon the ranking of the tenders?—No; what I did it for was: if Smith did not appear there (because I knew he was a moneyed man, or I understood so)—if he did not put in his appearance there the others would not put the money up, and I knew Chapleau to be a personal friend, and I asked him if he could do something for me.

“4636. Did he inform you that he had any reason for supposing that $4,000 would silence Smith?—No; he did not lead me to believe that.

“4637. It was by way of a proposition?—I do not for a moment suppose that Smith was getting any of this money.

“4638. You supposed it was for Chapleau's own benefit?—Yes; if he would influence Smith not to come forward.

“4639. From his own personal friendship?—Yes; that is it exactly.

“4641. No more?—No.

“4642. When was that given?—It was given perhaps within the last six months. I cannot say exactly the date. I could find out by hunting up my cheque book.”

Here is the whole story out of the mouth of Mr. McDonald. He says that he agreed to give Mr. Chapleau $4,000, and the service he was to render for that sum was to prevent Mr. Smith putting up security for Messrs. Andrews, Jones & Co. This was given for an improper purpose, for a corrupt purpose. Why should a clerk, an employé in one of the Departments, lend himself to any contractor to use his personal or political influence with another man to prevent a firm from putting up money as security on a contract. That is not all. We have something further. We have the evidence of Mr. Chapleau himself, out of his own mouth. Let us see what he says on the subject. He says:

“12744. What do you say was the effect of this offer from other persons?—They were telling me that if I would only use my influence in that way with Smith it would be worth my while to do it—that I had a chance to make $5,000, and might as well do it.

“12745. Proceed with the evidence.—On the 26th day of February, Andrews, Jones & Co. were informed that their tender was accepted for section B, and a stated time was given him to deposit the acquired 5 per cent. security. Smith immediately left for New York. I may as well state here that previous to his leaving for New York he sent for me and asked me to inform him of the decision which the Government should arrive at in the matter of the application which he had made for an extension of time to put up that 5 per cent. security.—

12746. Was it arranged how you were to be informed of the decision on that subject?—No; as I was in the Department he asked me if I would ascertain whether the time was extended or not, and to telegraph him accordingly.

“12748. From whom?—From the Secretary of the Department.”

I do not think it was any part of his duty as an officer to go to the Secretary of the Department and fish out information, and communicate that information to an American in New York, who had put in a tender here. He undertook to do that, and according to Mr. McDonald he was to receive $4,000, and according to his own testimony, $5,000, for doing so. This witness further says:

“12765. Proceed.—I have never entered into any agreement with McDonald for any compensation for dissuading Col. Smith to withdraw from the tender of Andrews, Jones & Co. When I returned from Washington, however, he told me he would see that his firm should pay me $4,000, which I regarded as an expression of the exuberant feelings of a contractor at having secured a large contract, causing him to profusely scatter promises—the probability or possibility of the fulfilment of which he had probably never considered at all. Some months later, when I had received a cheque for $500 from him, there was no explanation accompanying it at all.—

“12766. Was that from him personally?—Yes.

“12767. He handed it to you?—He sent it to me.

“12768. I mean was it from him personally or by letter?—It was sent by letter.”

Here is an employé of the Department acting in collusion with one contractor against another contractor, and obtaining a promise of $4,000 for his services, of which he got $500 at the time; and he tells us in his innocent way that this was given in the exuberance of the feelings of the firm of contractors who had put in a tender which happened to be $272,000 more than another tender for the work. One is not surprised that there should be a little exuberance upon the part of the contractor at the prospect of thus securing the contract, because $272,000 are not picked up every day on the streets of Ottawa. The promise was made to Mr. Chapleau, and the promise was implemented; and this servant of the Government, this man who owed allegiance to the Government and the country, was guilty of that which, in my judgment, was a grave and serious offence. That is not all. We have the evidence of a member of Parliament on the same subject, who tells us something of the character of the operations in the Department. Mr. Haggart, the hon. member for South Lanark, gave evidence as follows:—

"14792. Are you aware of any person in any of the Departments of the Government being benefited by any transactions with others connected with the Pacific Railway?—No.

"14793. Either as Minister, Member or clerk or secretary?—No; nothing that I have heard of, except Mr. Chapleau's matter.

"14794. Do you know of anything, as far as he is concerned, beyond what has appeared in the papers arising out of the evidence before this Commission?—Nothing.

"14795. Have you any other information which you could give us by way of evidence concerning the transactions of the Pacific Railway or any of them?—Well, I am pretty thoroughly acquainted with the whole of the transaction, I should say, in reference to it between Winnipeg; and the letting of the contracts, the manner in which they were awarded and everything of that kind, I know everything pretty generally about it.

"14796. Is that knowledge which you have derived from investigating the records of the Department?—Partly so, and partly from conversations from Ministers and other things that way.

"14797. Was there any particular conversation that you think you could enlighten us upon?—Well, no; nothing particular.

"14798. Have you heard any Minister say anything about the letting of those contracts, about which there have been rumours of improprieties?—I have had conversations with them on the subject. There are charges of improprieties in reference to the letting of contract B. I have had conversations with Ministers on the subject."

Mr. Chapleau, I understood, from some of the contractors in Section B, had made a demand upon them for some money that had been promised him by John J. McDonald before the evidence was given. It is clear from this evidence that the hon. member to whom I have referred had the run of the Department in the way of getting information. Now, there is the evidence and the statement from the Blue Book, given on oath, that this man was in the pay of these contractors, that he was colluding with one of them for the purpose of getting the contract out of the hands of the other man. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what you would expect of a man whose duty it was to deal fairly and honestly with the public, and yet who acted in the manner I have described? But that is not all, though it is enough to damage the reputation of any man. It is enough to prevent this man from ever being received into the public service again, enough to have severed his connection with the Government and the service of the country, but it is not all. Not only was this Mr. Chapleau in the pay of McDonald & Co. receiving or being promised $1,000 or $5,000 to prevent another firm of contractors from putting up their money, but at that moment he was paid a monthly salary, he was a feed official of an American contractor to give information from Ottawa to that American contractor of what was going on here. What was the evidence on that subject? Here is the evidence of Mr. Chapleau. I am quoting out of his own mouth; I am not giving hearsay evidence, for he was called upon before that Commission to disclose the startling condition of affairs which was existing in connection with these contracts, a condition of affairs which aroused the indignation of every person of the country—not simply of every person opposing the Government, but the indignation of their own warmest friends and most devoted organs. What does Mr. Chapleau say about his being a paid monthly salaried clerk of an American contractor? He says this:

"12876. Do you know any person who manufactured explosives living in the United States?—Yes.

"12877. Who is that?—I know a Mr. Mowbray.

"12878. Where does he live?—He lives at North Adams, I believe.

"12879. Has he had any business transaction with any contractors of the Pacific Railway as far as you know?—From hearsay I understood that he had.

Mr. CAMERON (HURON).

"12840. Had he some arrangement with you at one time about helping him in his connection with these people?—Yes.

"12841. What was the nature of the arrangement?—The nature of that arrangement was that whenever a contract was given in which there happened to be a great deal of rock work I was to notify him, so that he could come to meet the parties and try to make arrangements with them.

"12842. How did he compensate you for that?—I do not exactly remember. He gave me so much a month for a while, I believe.

"12843. Do you remember how much?—I could not exactly say—$30 or $40, may be.

"12844. $75 has been mentioned?—I am sure it was not that much.

"12845. How did you get the information for him?—After the contracts were awarded.

"12846. I did not know that they had been awarded: how did you know?—As soon as a contract is awarded it is published in the press.

"12847. That is not answering my question, Mr. Chapleau. I am asking you how you know the particulars of the information which he desired to get from you, and I suppose he desired to get them as early as possible?—The information I was to give him was this: that when any work was awarded to anybody I was to notify him, and give him the names to whom the work was given.

"12848. Don't you know why he selected you in preference to somebody else?—I have not the slightest idea.

"12849. Don't you think it was your connection with the Department which had to let the contracts?—It might have been that.

"12850. Do you not understand that that was supposed to give him an advantage over people who did not derive their information from the Department, and that it was for that advantage he was paying you $40 a month?—I do not know that it would. Other parties had the same opportunities to find out that I had.

"12851. How much do you think you have received from him altogether for those services?—That I could not exactly say.

"12852. About how long has it been continued?—It is only three or four months probably."

There is the admission of this employé of the Government that he was in the monthly pay of this American, Mr. Mowbray, a manufacturer of explosives, and the duty he was called upon to perform for that monthly dole which he was getting from a foreign contractor was that he should give him notice of when the Department should have anything to set afloat before the people in the shape of contracts. Now, why should Mr. Mowbray get Chapleau and employ him at a figure ranging from $30 to $75 a month? Might he not have got in the newspapers the information as it appeared there? No, Sir. Everybody knows perfectly well, and nobody knew it better than Mr. Chapleau, that the object for which he was employed was that he might get the figures from the Department, so that he might reveal them to this foreign contractor. This is a position of affairs not creditable to any man, and not creditable to any man or set of men who would tolerate it. I am glad to say that the Government did not tolerate it, but put an end to it as soon as it came to their ears. Now, whatever may be said of Mr. Chapleau, there is one thing that can be said of his evidence: it is plain, it is open, it is above board, but it is daring and audacious. He deliberately discloses that he got this money from those contractors, and apparently he justifies the transaction. There is that merit if there is none else. When this matter became publicly known throughout the length and breadth of the country, it excited the greatest possible indignation; in fact so strong and powerful was that indignation that it reflected itself in quarters where you never heard of indignation being reflected against the Government before—I mean the Montreal Gazette and the Toronto Mail. Nobody ever heard of the Gazette or Mail saying anything against the Government or against any action of the Government except on this occasion. Let us see what they said on this subject. I shall first quote from the Mail, because it is the more modest of the two. The Mail says:

"Mr. St. O. Chapleau has tendered his resignation. In the face of the late revelations, in the face of his own evidence before the Commission, it was impossible that he could have remained in the service. His cause may serve as a warning if there are any who need warning."

Just here let me ask what was the result of these disclosures? Was he dismissed from the Department? Were his services dispensed with, or did he leave of his own motion, as the hon. gentleman says? Or does the Montreal Gazette, which is always posted on such matters, tell us the truth about it? Let us see what the Gazette says:

"Mr. Chapleau was entitled to the fullest opportunity of making explanations; on oath before the Commission. The moment he made them, it became evident that the transactions in which he had been engaged made it impossible that he could continue in the public service, and his resignation was required."

Required by whom? Now, we have these contradictory statements—the Mail says it was impossible that he could have remained in the public service; the hon. Minister says he left of his own motion; the Montreal Gazette says his resignation was required. Which is right? I leave the Mail and the Gazette to reconcile between themselves this little difficulty, leaving out of consideration the other parties connected with the matter. However, it appears that he ceased to be connected with the public service. One would naturally suppose that that would have been the proper conclusion of the whole matter, and that the place that once knew him would know him no more. But he turns up again—where? As the high sheriff of the great Province of Assinibois. After having been either dismissed as unworthy of the confidence of his employer, or having resigned because he could not help himself, this man is promoted to one of the most important offices in the gift of the Crown, and he is up there now. I should like to know what the people of the North-West Territories have done that they should have inflicted upon them, a man who was not considered fit to serve the public in Ottawa. I want to know what all this means. Is there any truth in the rumours that we heard in the corridors and in the streets of Ottawa, last Session, that this man Chapleau knew so much that it was not safe for him to be at large? Is it true that in order that the Department of Railways and Canals might be carefully and properly managed, it was necessary that Mr. Chapleau should be appointed to a high and important office? What does it all mean, I ask again? Do the Government rely upon their numerical strength in this House—do they rely upon their supposed popularity in the country, to set at defiance with impunity every rule and every principle of honesty and honour?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CAMERON. I know this does not suit hon. gentlemen opposite. I know that if there is a vote on this question, every one of them will vote to sustain the Government in what they have done. But that does not lessen the heinousness of the offence in the slightest degree. I say that no Government is justified in placing in a high office in the North-West, a man who has been guilty of the conduct proven against Chapleau; and I shall be very much surprised, not at the vote in this House, but if the sentiment expressed outside of the House does not convey a solemn warning to the Government that this sort of thing is not to be repeated, and if the appointment of Chapleau as high sheriff in the North-West Territories is not universally condemned.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There can be no objection to granting this motion and bringing down the papers. The hon. gentleman was good enough to tell me that he was going to make some observations upon the appointment of Mr. Chapleau, or rather on the occasion of making this motion. When he commenced his speech, I thought the hon. gentleman was about to use the motion as a means of bringing up the subject of the contracts on the Canadian Pacific Railway. I find, however, that that is not the case; the hon. gentleman says that is to be reserved for a future occasion. We shall be very glad, I have no doubt, to hear the hon. gentleman on that as on all other subjects. He is so kindly and pleasant in his manner that even those who do not agree with him always listen to his speeches with pleasure and instruction.

The attack he has made on the Government is simply this: that Mr. Chapleau, who was formerly Secretary of the Public Works Department, and who resigned his office, was afterwards appointed sheriff in the North-West Territories, and that it was improper to make that appointment. I have no hesitation in saying that Mr. Chapleau was guilty of a grave and gross indiscretion in his acts, when he was Secretary of the Public Works Department. It is true that on looking at the papers you will find that he betrayed no confidence, gave no evidence, was of no assistance to any of the innumerable contractors running about the Department—that he gave no information that was in any way of any value to any one who was trying to be a contractor. We know that it is an improper practice, but we know it is proved—I have known, and I have no doubt that hon. gentlemen opposite have known—that employes in the Civil Service have been occasionally giving information that they pick up in Ottawa through various sources. We know, for instance, and the hon. gentleman opposite knows, of various clerks who have been paid correspondents of newspapers in New York and elsewhere, and have been giving information to those papers. We know that, and they know that; and they know those men have not been removed, but it is an improper practice which should not be encouraged but which should be suppressed. But the gravamen of the charge against Mr. Chapleau which, I think, rendered me warranted in stating that he committed a grave indiscretion, was that he, being a clerk in the Public Works Department, allowed these contractors to approach him, and he rendered himself liable to the charge, and the supposition that he was open from pecuniary and mercenary motives to give information which he ought not to have given. In any other Department I do not approve of it, still we know it has been done, and perhaps is going on now, for all we know, and cannot be checked, that any clerk would write to a newspaper or to a New York contractor that such and such events are going on here. And Mr. Chapleau, being in the Department of Public Works, ought to have kept himself aloof from the very suspicion of giving to anybody information, even information which was open to the public, as he himself says this was open to the public. I shall not trouble the House with reading Mr. Chapleau's long explanation. It is in the evidence and hon. gentlemen can read it. I would invite the members of this House to look at his long statement. I think it shows this, that he was guilty of a grave indiscretion in allowing these people to approach him at all. It is clear from the whole volume of evidence that he did not betray one single confidence of the Department. He did not convey any matter or thing that could be of the most remote assistance to any one of the contractors that were at all interested in those contracts. The charge against him is that although he did not give them assistance, these men thought that they might be getting his assistance, might get behind the scene and might perhaps have an advantage over others, but that did not happen. Still it was a grave indiscretion. My hon. friend who was at the head of that Department censured him in conversation very severely. He spoke to him in such a manner that Mr. Chapleau thought it well to resign. He did resign, or most probably would have been removed from the situation he held. He is a man of great ability, a valuable public servant, a man of family, and it was ruin to him with his ability, with his position, the important position of Secretary of Public Works. He had every chance—a young, able, active, energetic man—of rising as high in the Civil Service as the Civil Service can allow. Though he resigned of his own motion, though there was no communication that he must resign he knew perfectly well that the matter was before the Government and he sent in his resignation, to use his own words, in order to avoid the necessity of any further investigation, any further embarrassment with respect to his appointment. He was thrown upon the world. He was under the censure of the world. There he was with his family thrown on the world, and I think his punishment was as great as he deserved. For two or three long years he was thrown upon his own resources. He had committed a grave indiscretion and his punishment was very severe, and after that warning the Government did not think that man was beyond the pale. He had committed grave indiscretions, but he had committed no crime; and the Government thought the punishment quite sufficient for the offence and they sent him to the office—the hon. gentleman says to the high and important office—of High Sheriff of Assiniboia. He was sent up there to the office created by the hon. gentleman. But there was the small salary of $1,000—$1,000, up there; $1,000, to live at Battleford—the salary was not nearly equal to that he had at the time he resigned. Not only is the salary inferior but he has no hope of any further salary from holding that office. It is a sinecure which was created by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Why did you not abolish it?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Because we are Conservatives and we desire if possible to have no great innovations in matters introduced by such a Reformer as the hon. member for East York. Mr. Chapleau succeeded Mr. Richard, a gentleman who sat in this House, a most respectable representative of the people, and he received his reward. He went up there to the North-West. He lived a little while at Battleford—the seat of Government of the North-West. He did not like the place and as there was nothing to do he saw no necessity of remaining there. He removed down to Winnipeg and when we came in we found that he was living there. After making a few enquiries we found that during the three years he had been in office, he had never been there. He found there was nothing to do except to draw his salary, and he came down to Winnipeg and made his fortune by speculating in town lots. So that the office is not so important as yet, it is not more important than the salary—a salary on which a person could drag out a miserable existence in the North-West. Though by-and-bye, I dare say, there will be some duties attached to the place. At this moment he lives at Regina where he may have some processes to serve, for contracts are being made there, and he will not have occasion to give information as to them. He will have to serve writs and attend to the different functions of a sheriff as the country advances. But, Sir, we considered that this officer, by the ruin of his hopes, by his practical dismissal from office, his resignation to avoid dismissal, by his remaining for two long years without anything to live on, had been sufficiently punished, that it was a sufficient warning to him, it was a sufficient warning to the whole public service, to the Civil Service; and yet it was not acting, I think, with undue lenity to give him one more chance of supporting his family. And I repeat that it was with very great regret that the Government ascertained that he had committed these faults which have been mentioned by the hon. gentleman, that he had acted as he had done, because those who knew his abilities looked forward to his being of the very greatest service to the public, from his energy, his ability, his wonderful skill and talent. The advantage of all that, he lost, and the Government are quite willing to take the responsibility of saying that, while that man was punished, while he was dismissed from a responsible office, and cut off from all chance of rising in the future, yet he was not to be made an outcast for the remainder of his life, and had received a sufficient punishment in the loss of his hopes, the loss of his salary, the loss of his office, the loss of his position. We did not think that we were committing any great sin, that we were committing any sin, in saying, "Go and sin no more; go up there: try and earn your position back again." He has got that position, and I have no doubt, whenever that office becomes, with the growth of the country, an important office, he will be found equal to the performance of the duty, and I do not envy those who sneer at the conduct of the Government in taking that charitable course towards this man. At all events, we are able and willing and capable of receiving that censure. The hon. gentlemen sneered when I said, "Go and sin no more." I would not give them that advice, because I do not think they would take it. They have no confidence in me, and they would have no confidence in the advice, however good it might be. We considered the man had been sufficiently punished, that the country had not lost anything by the impropriety of which he had been guilty. Therefore, after a very severe punishment, we have given him one chance more, and I believe it will be found hereafter that he has taken advantage of the warning, and will prove an able officer, ready and willing to perform his duty, and that he will never again appear liable to the censure of this House, of the hon. gentleman, or of the country. There can be no objection to the motion.

Motion agreed to.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

READJUSTMENT OR INCREASE OF SUBSIDIES TO PROVINCES.

Mr. OUMET (Translation), in moving for an address to His Excellency the Governor General, for copies of all correspondence between the several Provincial Governments and the Dominion Government, respecting the readjustment or increase of the money subsidies, paid by the latter to the former, in pursuance of the Confederation Agreement, or of any other arrangements since made; also, copies of all petitions from the several Provincial Legislatures to the Government, or to the Parliament of Canada, and of any memorials received by the latter from the several Provincial Governments, asking for aid or assistance in money, or otherwise; also, a statement showing all that has been granted, in money or otherwise, by the Government of Canada to the several Provinces since 1867, said: Mr. Speaker, before delivering this motion into your hands, I beg to crave the indulgence of this House, while I submit to their consideration certain remarks respecting the financial arrangements entered into at the time of the inauguration of Confederation, between the Provinces and the Government of the Dominion of Canada. When the Provinces agreed to the Federal compact, when they consented to associate, so to speak, they agreed to vest certain powers in the Federal Government, but to retain all the other powers, which they, the said Provinces, had previously enjoyed. In order to carry out this agreement, it was necessary to provide for the division of the revenue then accruing to each one of these Provinces. The main sources of this revenue were the Customs and Excise; but, as these sources formed the most important part of the revenue of the various Provinces, and as what remained was inadequate to meet the requirements of legislation, and other expenses of the Government, it was agreed that a proportion of those revenues which were to be collected by the Federal power, should be remitted to the different Provinces, to be used towards defraying their expenses. I have not with me the statement of the total amount of receipts for the year 1867, but after the first fiscal year, in 1868, the revenue of the Dominion, in Customs and Excise duties, amounted to $11,580,968.25, which sum, apportioned to a population numbering 3,090,561 souls in 1861, made $3.75 paid per capita by the Provinces to the Federal Government. It was agreed that the Provinces would receive out of the revenues a sum of 80 cents per head, which made an average of 21½ per cent. paid back to the Provinces by the Government of the Dominion. This proportion was established for two reasons, the first of which was based upon the fact that it was feared that, after the establishment of Confederation, the expenditure of both the central Government and that of the different Local Governments put together would greatly exceed the revenue then raised by each of the Provinces. On the other hand, it was feared that the increase in the expenditure would involve an increase of taxation. Actuated by these two motives, which we find reported in the debates on Confederation, and especially in the speeches delivered later on at Quebec and at Sherbrooke, by Sir Alexander Galt, who was then Minister of Finance, the Government decided that the proportion granted to the Provinces out of the revenue of each of them would be 21½ per cent., that is to say, 80 cents per head. I think I am justified in saying that the Provinces expected this proportion to remain always the same. In fact, Sir Alexander T. Galt, speaking at Sherbrooke, in answer to those who complained that the new system would necessitate an increase in the tariff, and that the Provinces would then be called upon to furnish to the central Government a greater proportion of revenue, pledged his word that such a thing would never happen. Well, I now wish to point out that this proportion has since been changed; that the revenue arising from Customs and Excise has greatly increased; that the tariff has been increased and that the proportion paid by the people of the Provinces has also increased. If we take the amounts stated in the Public Accounts, we find that in 1883 there has been collected in Customs and Excise duties, a total amount of $29,269,698, so that each person in the Dominion of Canada, according to the figure of the population, as stated in the census of 1881, that is to say, 4,324,810, contributes to these two sources of Federal revenue the sum of $6.80. As will be seen, Mr. Speaker, these sources of revenue to the Federal Government have increased in a proportion which is surprising. Now if we try to explain the increase of that revenue we find that it is due mainly to two causes: first, the rise in the Tariff and secondly, the increase of the population and of the amount consumed by the population. I submit that in both cases the terms or rather the conditions of the agreement entered into by the Provinces and the Federal Government in 1867 or 1865, are changed. Against their expectations, the Provinces are now paying a great deal more than they expected to pay and receive a great deal less than they expected to receive; thus, instead of receiving, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, a percentage of 21½ per cent. on the revenue of the Confederation, in 1883 the Provinces only received 10 per cent., or a little less than 10 per cent. of this revenue. Well, Mr. Speaker, when we find that to be the case, it seems to me that the Provinces have a right to ask themselves if, in view of this change of circumstances, they have not the right to alter the terms of the agreement entered into between them and the Federal Government, especially when these Provinces find that the population of the country as well as the increase of the Federal revenue, must be attributed to the expenditure made by them to develop their resources and to increase their population and their trade within the limits of their respective territories. I will say even more, when we know that in proportion as the Provinces make sacrifices to increase their own resources and revenue, that same revenue is diminished more and more, as it does not increase in the same proportion as their expenditure. For instance, this rate of 80 cents per head, according to the language used by the Minister of Finance, ought to be used especially towards defraying the cost of the administration of justice, the maintenance of hospitals and the subsidies granted to charitable institutions. Well, Mr.

Speaker, it is useless for me to tell this House that, as the population increases the expenditure must increase in proportion. In 1867, for instance, when the Province of Quebec had only a population of 900,000 and some hundred souls, the cost of the administration of justice in that Province was $322,236.24, and the maintenance of asylums only cost $97,946. It will be easily understood that in 1881—which is the most recent date covered by whatever accurate data are in my possession—when our population had increased to 1,350,000 of inhabitants, that expenditure naturally increased also. It is found that in 1881, the cost of the administration of justice was $437,000, and that for asylums the expenditure had increased from $97,946 to $213,828, so that during that period there had been on these two branches of the administration an increase of $231,135. Now, if I may be allowed to say a few words with regard to what the Government of the Province of Quebec has done towards the increase of population within the limits of their territory, the development of colonization and agriculture, the increase of trade generally, and the building of its various railways, I will say that the Province of Quebec has, perhaps, contributed in a greater measure than any of the other Provinces towards the increase of the Federal revenue, and during that time, what we received out of that revenue, which we enlarged through our sacrifices, practically decreased constantly, inasmuch as this resource remained always unchanged, while our expenditure constantly increased. I shall specially mention the expenses which the Province was obliged to incur for the special object of colonization. Our Province is not altogether in the same position as the other Provinces. Immigration, for which, however, we are paying our good share, yet without begrudging it in any way, the position of our Province is such that we reap but little benefit from the immigration coming from foreign countries into the Dominion of Canada, and in fact our Province has hardly been increased by immigration since 1868. So that we Quebecers are left to ourselves, and thus our Province is obliged to incur heavy expenses to open out new farms and improve those already cultivated. Now, then, those expenses necessitated by immigration and which have a direct and beneficial influence on the increase of the revenue of the Federal Government, do not hardly yield any profits, or rather any compensation, to our Province on the part of the Dominion Government. Well, the consequence which, to my mind, evidently flows from the facts I have just mentioned is this, that we have a right to compensation in proportion to what we furnish to the Confederation as a whole. And I speak from a general point of view; I make no exception in favour of the Province of Quebec. I do not ask for that Province anything that could not be fairly granted to her or to any of the other Provinces. I may say here, with a feeling of pride, that although our Government may be at the present time in a rather difficult position, the Province of Quebec is not obliged to come begging at the door of the Federal Government. We simply come here to ask what we consider to be our rights, and we are ready to uphold in any circumstances whatsoever, what we consider to be the rights of other Provinces. Considering that there has been a change in the circumstances under which the Government of the Dominion were to pay the subsidy to the various Provinces, I say that the subsidy ought to be changed also. I maintain that this subsidy ought to be increased so as to enable the different Provinces to command the resources required to maintain their independent existence, to develop their resources, increase their wealth, and by so doing increase the wealth of the Dominion. The practical suggestion I intend to submit, is not to ask the Government to give us the same proportion of 21½ per cent. of the revenue of the Government of the Dominion, but I should ask that the small proportion of 14¼ per cent. of this revenue be assigned to the different Provinces. This proportion is equal to $1 per head of the population, as given in the last census. This amount should be paid per capita, and should be made liable to change every ten years, according to the changes in the population, as it increases or diminishes. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is useless for me to draw the special attention of the Government on this matter. I shall utter no complaint. I will only say that the old Provinces of the Confederation have an undoubted right to claim such an increase, the more so since to-day, more than ever, we make enormous sacrifices to develop the new territories which form part of the Dominion. It is useless for me to say that I do not begrudge what is paid for others. We pay it because we think that it is in the interest of the Dominion of Canada, and we do not complain, but "charity begins at home," says the old French proverb, and I think the Government ought to consider it to be an act of justice towards the old Provinces, who are making such heavy sacrifices in the interest of the new ones, to give them a small share of the increase of taxation with which they are now burdened, so that they may use it to promote the development of their own resources. And, Mr. Speaker, while giving my views here, or rather while pleading for the old Provinces, I think I may speak from a general standpoint. Is it not desirable that these Provinces should have the means to increase their population, and to increase their wealth, so as to be able in the future to control, and offer a resistance sufficiently strong against those influences which we are creating in the new Provinces of the North-West, by pouring in our millions and pouring in all the immigration which we bring from abroad? I presume, Mr. Speaker, that these new Provinces will have enough of courtesy and of common sense to gratefully bear in mind who were the people who made those pecuniary sacrifices on which will be based their future prosperity and welfare; but, in politics, as in many other transactions in life, it is not prudent to depend too much on the gratitude of people to whom we have extended a helping hand, and we may have occasion to regret, by and by, that after having diminished our resources in the old Provinces, we shall have expended too much of our surpluses and of our money for the advancement and improvement of the new Provinces. From these various points of view, I think the House will receive with favour the idea I now express respecting the readjustment, on a fair basis, of the Federal subsidy to the different Provinces. It is not, as some of the newspapers have put it, a raid we are making on the Federal Treasury. We simply come to ask what belongs to the old Provinces, what they have a right to claim; not what belongs to other Provinces but what belongs to the new ones, because it is they who are paying the enormous amount which go to make up the Federal revenue. Another consideration is that the various Provinces now have to drain all the sources of revenue at their disposal. One of these sources—I am speaking especially of the Province of Ontario and of the Province of Quebec—consists of what is drawn from the price of timber limits to meet their necessary expenses. They are obliged to overdrain them a good deal more than would be consistent with prudence, and I think I may safely say that the same thing is done in the Province of Ontario as well as in the Province of Quebec. Well, would it not be desirable to put at the disposal of the Provinces a little more resources so that they may save the important source of national wealth contained in our forest lands? From a general point of view, speaking for the Dominion, I think that it would be very important that the Federal Government should take it upon themselves to give to the Provinces the means of avoiding and imprudently pushing to the extreme limits the sale and cutting down of timber in our forest lands. If we continue to drain this source of revenue as we are doing to-day, in ten years hence the exportation of lumber will be a thing of the past; in ten years from now our forests shall have ceased to exist, and this source of national wealth of which we now boast so much shall have disappeared from our country. Therefore, I think, that having in view the best interests of trade and the prosperity of the Dominion, it is important to give the old provinces their due, viz., the fair proportion accruing to them from the revenue they have helped to create.

Mr. LANDRY (Translation). Mr. Speaker, I take great pleasure in seconding the motion just made by the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet), because, if the views expressed by him are adopted by the Government, and if they are followed by the practical measure they suggest, they indicate a sure way of reestablishing the equilibrium sought to be created in the early days of Confederation, and which is now disturbed by the addition of certain new Provinces and by the very material changes in the Tariff. In 1867, when the four Provinces joined together to lay the basis of Confederation, it was agreed that the Federal Government would take upon themselves a certain fixed amount of their indebtedness. If we refer to the Federal compact we find that this sum amounts, for the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, to $62,500,000; for Nova Scotia, to $3,000,000, for New Brunswick, $7,000,000. But as these two last mentioned Provinces were not really indebted for these amounts there was inserted in the Act the following proviso:—

"In case the public debts of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick do not, at the Union, amount to $3,000,000 and $7,000,000 respectively, they shall respectively receive, by half-yearly payments in advance from the Government of Canada, interest at 5 per centum per annum on the differences between the actual amounts of their respective debts and such stipulated amounts."

By this provision of the law, Mr. Speaker, all the Provinces of Confederation have been put on an equal footing. By dividing each provincial debt, thus assumed by the Confederation, by the number of the inhabitants, we find an average of so much per head, which is about the same for each Province in the Dominion. But this equilibrium was soon disturbed, and as far back as the following year we see by 32-33 Victoria, chapter 2, that Nova Scotia has filed a claim here, and by this legislation, instead of being put at $8,000,000, as had been stipulated by the Union at Confederation, the debt of Nova Scotia was fixed at $9,186,756. Apart from this increase in the amount of its debt, Nova Scotia was to receive, during a period of ten years, beginning on the 1st July, 1867, a subsidy of $82,698 per annum over and above all other sums payable to that Province under the Act of British North America; and it was enacted as follows:—

"And such allowance shall hereafter be paid by half yearly payments in advance from the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-nine, the arrears thereof, up to the day last mentioned, being capitalized either in whole or in part, as the Governor in Council may determine, and the interest on the part capitalized being payable until the end of the said ten years, when the principal shall be paid."

Later on, in 1870, Manitoba entered into the Confederation. The Act which was passed on this occasion, 33 Vic., chap. 3, lays down the following conditions for that new Province:—

"Inasmuch as the Province is not in debt, the said Province shall be entitled to be paid and receive from the Government of Canada, by half-yearly payments in advance, interest at the rate of 5 per centum per annum on the sum of $472,090."

That was the amount required to put Manitoba on an equal footing as regarded the debt whose burden was felt by the other Provinces, and for which the Confederation had become responsible. There was also given a sum of $30,000, payable yearly, by Canada to the Province for the maintenance of its Government and Legislature. Here is what is said in clause 25 of the same Act:

"The sum of thirty thousand dollars shall be paid yearly by Canada to the Province for the support of its Government and Legislature, and an annual grant, in aid of the said Province, shall be made, equal to eighty cents per head of the population, estimated at seventeen thousand souls: And such grant of eighty cents per head shall be augmented in proportion to the increase of population, as may be shown by the census that shall be taken thereof, in the year one thousand eight hundred and eighty-one and by each such subsequent decennial census, until its population amounts to four hundred thousand souls, at which amount such grant shall remain thereafter, and such sum shall be in full settlement of all future demands on Canada, and shall be paid, half-yearly, in advance, to the said Province."

This last part of the clause I have just quoted, and which relates to the sum of $30,000, is similar to what we find in all the legislation made, as one Province after another joined the Confederation. As to the annual subsidy destined to the maintenance of the Local Legislatures, it already existed as far as the other Provinces were concerned. In the Act of British North America we find that Ontario received for its legislation expenditure $30,000; Quebec, $70,000; Nova Scotia, $60,000; New Brunswick, $30,000. Later, on in 1871, British Columbia joined us, and among other conditions of its admittance, we find the following:—

"1. Canada shall be liable for the debts and liabilities of British Columbia existing at the time of the Union.

"2. British Columbia not having incurred debts equal to those of the other Provinces now constituting the Dominion, shall be entitled to receive, by half-yearly payments in advance, from the General Government, interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum on the difference between the actual amount of its indebtedness at the date of the Union and the indebtedness per head of the population of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick ($7.77) the population of British Columbia being taken at 60,000.

"The following sums shall be paid by Canada to British Columbia for the support of its Government and Legislature, to wit, an annual subsidy of $35,000, and an annual grant equal to 80 cents per head of the said population (60,000) both half-yearly in advance, such grant of 80 cents per head to be augmented in proportion to the increase of population as may be shown by each subsequent decennial census, until the population amounts to 400,000, at which rate such grant shall thereafter remain, it being understood that the first census be taken in the year 1881."

Among the other conditions imposed by British Columbia, when it entered into Confederation, let me mention the building of a railway to connect that Province with the other Provinces of the Dominion, a half-yearly postal service, between Victoria and Olympia, a naval station at Esquimalt, an additional yearly subsidy of $100,000, in consideration of twenty miles of land given to the Government on each side of the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Government agreed to build a graving-dock at Esquimalt—at least they gave their security at 5 per cent. on a sum of £100,000 sterling for the purpose. Later on, by 36 Victoria, chapter 30, all of these original conditions were modified. There was a surplus to be divided between the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario amounting to over $10,000,000. The Provinces could not come to an agreement, and in 1873 the Government, by an Act sanctioned on the 23rd of May, assumed this debt of $10,506,088.84. The assumption of this debt by the Government rendered it necessary for them to give a compensation to the other Provinces which formed part of the Confederation, and here is the clause which provides for this compensation:

In the accounts between the several Provinces of Canada and the Dominion, the amounts payable to and chargeable against the said Provinces respectively, in so far as they depend on the amount of debt with which each Province entered the Union, shall be calculated and allowed as if the sum fixed by the one hundred and twelfth section of the "British North America Act, 1873," were increased from sixty-two million five hundred thousand dollars to the sum of seventy-three million six thousand and eighty-eight dollars and eighty-four cents, and as if the amounts fixed as aforesaid, as respects the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, the "The British North America Act, 1867," and as respects the Provinces of British Columbia and Manitoba, by the terms and conditions on which they were admitted into the Dominion, were increased in the same proportion."

Prince Edward Island had not yet entered into the Confederation; but it was not long before it came to us, and on the 28th of June, 1873, I believe, an Order in Council was passed decreeing its entry into the Dominion, and under its provisions Prince Edwards Island was entitled to a debt equal to $50 per head, that is to say $4,701,050. The Government agreed to pay to that Province the interest on that amount, besides an annual subsidy of $45,000, of which sum, however, the Government was to deduct the interest at 5 per cent. on a sum not exceeding $300,000, which the Government was to pay for lands, as Prince Edward Island had no public domains. But as long as the amount was not paid, the Government was to pay the whole of the yearly subsidy of $45,000. There was a second subsidy of $30,000 for the maintenance of the Legislature; then there was the annual grant of 80 cents per head, the population of the Island being estimated at 32,020. This grant of 80 cents per head was to follow the increase of the population as long as the population did not exceed 400,000 souls. We must not forget the interest on $4,701,050, the amount accepted as being the debt of the Island. There were also other conditions to which the Government acceded. At the present time, Mr. Speaker, if we refer to the last Public Accounts, we find that the Province of Ontario has received $1,196,872.80 as a Federal subsidy. If we divide that sum by the number of the inhabitants we find that Ontario receives 62 cents per head. This amount of $1,196,872.80 comprises not only the grant of 80 cents per head of the population of 1861, but also the sum of $80,000 for the Local Legislature. The Province of Quebec has received $952,252.80 for her share of the Federal subsidy, that is to say $839,252.80 for the grant and the balance $70,000 for the maintenance of its Legislature. By dividing this amount by the actual number of the population we find that the Province of Quebec receives 70 cents per head. Nova Scotia has received lately, according to the accounts for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1883, the sum of $393,753.01. If we divide the amount by the number of its population we find that it is now receiving 89 cents per head. New Brunswick has received $456,971.23. Divide this amount by the number of its population and you will see that it has received a proportion of $1.42 per head. Prince Edward Island, the sum of $161,674.07, which makes a proportion of $1.51 per head if you divide this amount by the number of the population of the Island. British Columbia has received a sum of $207,995.66, divide that sum by the figure of its population, and you will find that it receives annually a sum of $4.22 per head. Manitoba is now receiving $3.47 per head, that is to say the total amount of $227,153.04. Such, Mr. Speaker, is the actual proportion of the sums received by each Province forming part of the Confederation. At first sight, the discrepancies seem somewhat large; thus you have Ontario receiving 62 cents per head of its population; Quebec, 70; Nova Scotia, 89; New Brunswick, $1.42; Prince Edward Island, $1.51; British Columbia, $4.22, and Manitoba, $3.47. I know that in several of these Provinces, as New Brunswick for instance, a certain amount has been allowed by virtue of the 36 Vict., ch. 41, because, by the Treaty of Washington, the duty on the exportation of lumber has been abolished, and to indemnify New Brunswick for the loss it then sustained, there was voted for that Province out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, over and above the subsidy to which it was entitled, an additional subsidy amounting to $150,000 per annum. At the present moment we have yet to learn what different other moneys have been expended for each of the Provinces. I have a motion on this subject, and I think in a few moments I shall give new figures. But taking the question from a general standpoint, as the hon. member for Laval has done, I think the Government ought to do something for us. Let them examine the figures I have just given and they will see that the thing is becoming necessary. The position in which the two oldest Provinces of the Dominion now find themselves is such, that it seems to point out the necessity of a remedy. While I consider the question from the standpoint taken by the hon. member for Laval, I think that the intention of the fathers of Confederation, when they established the amount of 80 cents per head, was to remit to the Provinces the 21½ per cent. on the revenue which Canada could obtain by means of the Customs and Excise duties. Well, as the hon. member has said, and said so truly, this proportion is completely destroyed, and instead of giving this amount to the different Provinces forming part of the Confederation, the Federal Government only gives them 10 per cent. What the hon. member for Laval wishes to do is to strike an average, and I hope and trust that the Government will comply with the demand of the hon. member, a demand which, I hope, will be upheld by every member of this House. In view of this act of justice, whose beneficial effects would be felt, not only by the Province of Quebec but also by all the other Provinces of the Confederation. I second the motion made by the hon. member for Laval.

Mr. AMYOT. I do not rise for the pleasure of speaking in English, but I think it only fair and just to those hon. gentlemen who do not understand the French language, that I should explain to them in a few words the position of affairs as they have been set forth by the mover and seconder of this motion. When the Province of Quebec entered our great Confederation—and I may say that I am very happy to see before me the fathers of Confederation—it was understood between the several contracting Provinces who joined the scheme that sufficient revenue should be allowed the Local Governments to enable them properly to perform the functions which were allotted to them by the Confederation Act. The amount of 80 cents per head of the then population was thought sufficient for that purpose. At that time it represented about 21½ per cent. of the total revenue, and for the first years of Confederation that amount proved sufficient. Let us first enquire, what are the sources of revenue for the General and Local Governments respectively. To the General Government was given the power of raising money by any mode or system of taxation. To the Local Governments were given 80 cents per head from the Dominion revenues, and besides, the power of direct taxation within the Province in order to the raising of a revenue for provincial purposes; also the revenue arising from Crown Lands. Now, Mr. Speaker, by giving to the General Government the power to raise money by any mode or system of taxation, we abandoned the Customs and Excise duties—that very easy and ample means of raising a revenue—while we reserved an income of 80 cents per head and the power of direct taxation for provincial purposes. But since then the Courts of Justice have frequently declared that the Local Governments have no such power, or at least have practically so decided, and the Provinces have been to a large extent deprived of that source of revenue which was supposed to be a very fruitful one for the Local Governments. As to the Crown Lands, it is a well known fact that in Ontario and Quebec the revenue from that source is constantly diminishing. Allow me to remark here, Mr. Speaker, that I am not speaking as a representative of the Government of Quebec, but I come here as a member of this House, elected by a county in the Province of Quebec, and I may be supposed to be better acquainted with its affairs than with those of the other Provinces. In Quebec, as I said, the revenue from Crown lands is constantly diminishing, and it will be especially the case this year. The position of affairs is this: The revenues of the Local Government are constantly diminishing; the payment of 80 cents per head is still made on the basis of the census of 1861; the power of direct taxation is declared illegal; and the revenue from Crown lands is diminishing. Now let us look at the expenditure. If you take into consideration, Mr. Speaker, the numerous functions and duties that have been left to the Local Governments, you will find them to require great and constantly increasing expenditure.

Mr. LANDRY,

The fact is that the more this Dominion grows the more it develops in extent, the more do the expenses of the Local Governments increase. On the one side their revenues diminish, and on the other side their expenses increase. For instance, we have to support the provincial offices, and to provide for their officers; make arrangements for the sale of the public lands; establish, maintain and manage public and reformatory prisons; establish, maintain and manage hospitals, asylums and charitable institutions in and for the Province, other than marine hospitals; establish municipal institutions, &c. The Local Government is also charged with the administration of justice, including the maintenance and organization of provincial courts, both of civil and of criminal jurisdiction, including procedure in civil matters in those courts, and all the other matters of a merely local nature in the Province. I need not remind you, Sir, that pari passu with the increase of population is the increase of expense of the civil and criminal administration of justice. I need not remind you that with the extension of commerce there is an increase in litigation, and in the consequent expense of the civil administration of justice. In the first years of Confederation our expenses were not so large but that they were covered by the ordinary revenue; and the Province of Quebec even had a surplus for a few years of somewhat over $200,000. But in spite of the strictest economy and the utmost care, notwithstanding the efforts of the best men of both parties, our provincial expenses have become too large for the revenue; and it appears by the Public Accounts that for several years the provincial Budget has shown a growing deficit. I may, perhaps, be told that if the Provincial Government had not undertaken to build railways this difficulty would not have occurred. Well, Sir, last year we passed an Act in this House declaring that all those railways were for the general good of the Dominion. But, the revenue would still have been insufficient, even if we had not built those roads. It must be admitted, also, that all those railways contribute to the wealth and prosperity of the whole Dominion. Every piece of iron that was used in their construction, all the articles that were consumed or used by the workmen on those roads, contributed to the trade and general prosperity of the whole country, and assisted the Federal Exchequer. That, Sir, is the position to-day that the Province of Quebec occupies under Confederation. Our revenues are diminishing and will continue to diminish; our expenses are increasing and will continue to increase. All the successive Governments in that Province of both political parties agree as to the increasing cost of the administration of justice. Now, what is the position? Before throwing our millions into a new country, undoubtedly for the good of the whole Dominion, before creating new Provinces and bringing in ten, twenty or perhaps thirty millions of people, who will overwhelm the inhabitants of the old Provinces, we should pause a moment and look at this great work of Confederation, and ask ourselves in the face of the country—is our work good and is it sufficient? If we find it good, all right; if we find it not sufficient, we should make it sufficient. The time has arrived to do so, when we see large surpluses and prosperity; when we see the hope of good years in the future. When we see that some Provinces of the Dominion have not under the Confederation Act the necessary means of doing their work in the Confederation, we should pause and remodel that Act in such a way as to render it possible for them to do what they have been directed to do by the Confederation Act. We have said to them: administer justice. Let us give them the means of doing so. We have said to them: take charge of gaols and asylums. Let us give them money for that purpose. We have said to them, look after the education of the people. Let us give them money to do it. What would this Government do if the Provinces had not the necessary means to teach their people? What would become of Canada if the Local Governments had to close their schools? What would become of this great Confederation if we had to shut our asylums and leave the unfortunates without help? Are we in such a position, at this stage of the Confederation, that we are not able to repair a certain mistake that may have been committed? I do not accuse the good faith of the fathers of Confederation, of the great work which will always be quoted as the product of genius, but so long as man is man he will fail. It was not foreseen that when our expenses would be expanding our revenues would be diminishing. We address the fathers of Confederation and ask them to pause a moment in order to remodel the subsidies given to the Provinces, on a fair and proper basis, so as to give to every Province of the Confederation the means of accomplishing the objects for which they were created. I do not, Sir, appear here as representing the Government, only as a representative of my country, and I state here publicly in the face of the House and the country, the policy which I think should be adopted by this House. We must save every Province of the Confederation; we must save the Confederation itself. We have accepted the great scheme on the understanding that each Province will have sufficient means to carry out the objects for which it was established. That was the understanding. The good faith of the whole country was pledged to the Provinces, and we ask to-day the necessary means to carry that understanding into effect.

Motion agreed to.

THE EXCHANGE BANK OF CANADA.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the following Resolution:—

That it appears from papers laid before this House, that the Minister of Finance on the 12th and 16th days of April, 1883, advanced the sum of two hundred thousand dollars ($200,000) to the Exchange Bank of Canada, and thereafter, on the 12th day of May, 1883, advanced a further sum of one hundred thousand dollars to the said Bank, for which latter amount a letter of guaranty was taken from the Hon. A. W. Ogilvie, a member of the Senate of Canada, agreeing to indemnify the Government for any loss arising from the said advance.

That it further appears that the Minister of Finance was aware at the time of making the said advance that the said Bank was embarrassed.

That the said Exchange Bank of Canada had already within two years previously, been compelled to suspend specie payments and to reduce its original capital by one-half.

That it does not appear that the Minister of Finance took proper precautions or instituted adequate enquiries into the affairs of the said Bank prior to making the said advances.

That the said Exchange Bank of Canada has since become insolvent, and that a large sum of public money has in consequence become imperilled and will probably be lost.

That it was not expedient that the Minister of Finance should have advanced the said three hundred thousand dollars.

That it was not expedient that any sum of money whatever should have been advanced upon personal security, and especially on the security of a member of the Legislature.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I do not think it will be very easy to surprise me by any act of omission or commission which hon. gentlemen opposite may choose to perform; but I am free to confess that on the present occasion I am very much astonished indeed at the facts which the papers that have been laid on this Table disclose. I believe, Sir, that that feeling of astonishment, when the facts come to be thoroughly understood, will be shared by every man of business in this House, and by every man of business in the country. Now, Sir, I want it to be thoroughly understood as to the fault which I think the Minister of Finance has committed. Had this act been done in the ordinary course of business, had the Minister, after enquiry, after taking fair precaution and satisfying himself that it was consistent with public safety, made a deposit in this bank in due and ordinary course of business, and had thereafter a loss ensued, I would not for one have been disposed to censure him too severely, because, by reason of an error in judgment, an injury had happened to the public. But I contend that the case in the present instance is wholly and entirely different. What the Minister has done, as these papers disclose, as the official returns disclose, and as the whole evidence shows, is this: The Minister of Finance chose, after full knowledge and warning, to risk a large sum of public money in the attempt to maintain a bank which he was thoroughly aware was in a most dangerous position. From that, two very evil results have occurred: A serious loss to the public; and, as I shall presently show, I fear considerable loss may have occurred to innocent parties who, trusting the knowledge and experience which the Minister of Finance might naturally be supposed to possess, have, on the faith of the Government deposits, imperilled their property in this bank subsequent to the date of this advance. Now, Sir, the facts are substantially recited in the motion in your hands; but in order that there may be no mistake, I desire to call the attention of the House to a statement coming from the Department of the hon. Minister himself, which I find in these very papers. I find, Sir, that on the 13th of November last the Deputy Minister of the Department of Finance addressed the following letter to the Department of Justice:—

“ OTTAWA, November 13th, 1883.

“ Sir,—I have the honour to call your attention to the following facts:—

“ On the 12th April last, the Exchange Bank of Canada, Montreal, being in difficulties, Mr. Greene, one of the Directors, came to Ottawa to ask for assistance, and it was agreed that the sum of $100,000 should be advanced the Bank on deposit, and if that proved insufficient another $100,000 should be advanced it. Accordingly on that same day the sum of $100,000 was placed in the Bank on Special deposit withdrawable on thirty days' notice and bearing interest at 5 per cent., the Bank sending its deposit receipt No. 323 on the receipt of the amount. This sum did not, however, prove sufficient, and accordingly on the 16th April the president wrote asking for the advance of the other $100,000, which was paid to the bank on the 17th through the C. & D., Montreal, on the same terms as the first advance, and for this deposit the Bank sent its deposit receipt No. 328. On the 21st of the same month the President of the Bank wrote to me asking for the advance of another $100,000, to which I replied on the 23rd that the Government had fixed the limit at $200,000, and that I could not exceed my instructions. Afterwards Mr. A. W. Ogilvie, one of the Directors of the Bank, came to Ottawa, and on his written guarantee, herewith enclosed, the Government on the 11th May advanced another $100,000 to the Bank on the same terms as the previous advances, and the Bank sent its deposit receipt No. 346 in return for the same.”

Then he goes on to narrate certain transactions of the bank not immediately pertinent to the matter, and proceeds:

“ I have now received a letter from the President of the Bank asking for the return of the guarantee of Mr. Ogilvie on the ground that the amount guaranteed by him has been paid, and I have to request you to advise me whether under the circumstances above cited the guarantee has been discharged and should be returned, the amount paid by the Bank being applied by the request of the President thereof to the payment of the first and unsecured advance given to the Bank, deposit receipt No. 346 representing the amount secured by Mr. Ogilvie being still held by us.

“ I have the honour to be, Sir,

“ Your obedient servant,

“ Deputy Minister of Finance.

“ The Deputy Minister of Justice, Ottawa.”

Now, Sir, here we have the facts stated on the authority of the hon. gentleman's own deputy, confirmed in every detail by the other letters which have been brought down, and I want the House to consider what these facts disclose. It is perfectly clear that before the first initial transaction took place the Minister of Finance was doubly warned of the un-sound condition of this bank. The president of that bank does not, nor do the directors who had interviewed the hon. gentleman, at all appear to have concealed the fact that they were in difficulties. It is apparent that the hon. gentleman knew right well that the deposit he was asked to make was not a deposit in the ordinary course of business, but that he was asked to interpose the credit of the Government of Canada to save the Exchange Bank from closing its doors. This is perfectly plain and clear—no man with these papers before him will deny, nor, I think, can he pretend to deny it. I might say that the confession of the president contained in these papers was quite sufficient. But, Sir, there were other means in the hands of the hon.

gentleman of ascertaining, and ascertaining thoroughly and correctly, what the true condition of this bank's affairs were. That, I fear, was thoroughly concealed from all parties until that bank closed its doors. But, Sir, there was most ample proof in the hands of the hon. gentleman, published in the Gazette of the 7th of April, a week or nearly so before these advances were made, in the official statement open to all the world, and specially brought under the cognizance of the Minister of Finance, that this bank was in a most desperate condition, and I use the words advisedly. This official statement of the Canada Gazette shows that at the time the Minister of Finance was called upon to aid it, this bank with a paid up capital of $500,000 owed $2,980,000 liabilities, all told, or as nearly as possible, $3,000,000, and that it had in specie and Dominion notes, to pay this $3,000,000, the sum of $78,000. Now, Sir, I need not tell the House, I need not tell the hon. gentleman, I need not, I think, tell his supporters, that a bank which owes $3,000,000 and runs down its specie and Dominion notes to $78,000—and anything it had available was very small, as these returns show—that such a bank was in an exceedingly perilous position. The hon. gentleman must have known that fact. He must have seen that in the ordinary, natural course of circumstances that bank, on the very lightest demand made upon it, would probably have to close its doors. I say the hon. gentleman was doubly warned. But there was more than this. Had that bank's previous record been one of a kind to inspire the confidence of the public, I might have understood better than I do the course which the hon. gentleman saw fit to pursue. But this bank, which came with such an exhibit as I have pointed out; this bank, as the hon. gentleman right well knew, within about two years previous, had suspended specie payments, and reduced its total capital by one-half. I have here the Statute passed under the special inspiration and direction of the Minister of Finance, to whose office it specially belonged to see if this was granted, that it was a proper demand to grant; and I find that this Act, chap. 36, of the Statutes of 1881, states:

"Whereas, the Exchange Bank of Canada, by its petition, has represented that it has sustained heavy losses in the course of its business, whereby the value of the paid up capital stock thereof has been largely reduced, and that in order to enable it advantageously to continue its business and to realize the largest possible return for its shareholders, it is necessary that it should be authorized to reduce its capital stock by reducing the number of its subscribed shares."

There is the Statute showing that two years ago that bank was in difficulties and was obliged largely to reduce its stock. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman under these circumstances was in all conscience bound to take very special and extraordinary precautions, if he were convinced that it was clearly in the public interests that the public credit should be pledged to sustain the Exchange Bank. In the few words of explanation which the hon. gentleman gave on the occasion of moving to bring down these papers, he made use of an expression which I was sorry to hear from him. The hon. gentleman intimated that this was done—because that was the natural construction which ought to be placed on his words—under the advice of his Deputy Minister. Here is what he said:

"The bank applied to the Government, and the Government, after consulting the Deputy Minister of Finance, and looking into the matter, thought it safe, and in the interest of the public, to advance $800,000 to the bank at 5 per cent. interest, and on conditions similar to those on which advances were made to the Ontario Bank two years ago, and the Consolidated Bank."

Now, Sir, that is a remarkable statement. It is remarkable in two ways. The hon. Minister, in the first place, attempts, or appears to attempt—I should be very glad indeed to hear him correct me and say I am wrong in so understanding him—attempts to shield himself by intimating that this was done after consultation with his deputy.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Now, Sir, I do not think it is fair or right for a gentleman in the position of Minister of Finance to attempt to throw a responsibility of this kind upon any subordinate; but, Sir, having chosen to do so, I say, as a matter of practice, as a matter of sound constitutional precedent, he should at least have taken the precaution of officially instructing his deputy to report on that bank, and that report should have been put in writing and laid before us. Now, Sir, I have a high opinion of the hon. gentleman's deputy. I believe he is a very efficient and very excellent officer. But I say it is not a fair thing to ask a Deputy Minister to report upon a matter of this kind. It is outside of his proper province. It is a thing which requires an expert. It is not a thing which could be done by any man, no matter how competent, in the course of a short trip from this city to Montreal or elsewhere. But we do not find one word to show that there was any report at all. I cannot admit that there would have been a sufficient excuse for this—which is the very highest exercise of Ministerial responsibility—even had the Deputy Minister officially reported that he thought the bank was safe and that the Government might risk this deposit—particularly, under the circumstances, which were patent to the hon. Minister of Finance—which I conclude must have been before him at the time he made this special advance; and, Sir, I think the House and the country will agree with me.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Possibly the House may not. It is my business to lay the case, with the facts and arguments, before the House. Hon. gentlemen must vote as their consciences and their ideas of duty to their constituencies require them, and I hope they will.

Mr. RYKERT. So they will.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No doubt. In these remarks of the hon. gentleman there is an allusion made to a matter which I think requires the attention of the House. Apparently, Sir, this is not the first time that the Minister of Finance has interfered to protect banks. He states in the extract which I have read that this was done in the same way as it had been done twice before,—in the cases of the Ontario Bank and of the Consolidated Bank. Now, Sir, if that was done—if the hon. gentleman, under similar circumstances, believing that those banks were in peril, advanced, out of the ordinary course of business, large sums of money to them to assist them over a crisis, all I can say is that I think the hon. gentleman should have told the House that he found it necessary to do so; and he should—for reasons which I shall presently state—have asked indemnity for having so done. What the hon. gentleman has done in this matter, I repeat, is wholly and entirely apart from the ordinary course of his duty—is an exercise of a responsibility of the very gravest kind, and not at all a thing to be lightly done or to be lightly passed over by the House when it is done. I do not at all desire to deny that occasions may possibly arise when, to prevent great public disaster, the Minister of Finance and the Government may find it their duty to interpose, for the protection of a particular bank or banks; and I will say that if, after sufficient enquiry, and after sufficient cause shown, the Minister should do a thing of that kind, and should afterwards come down to the House and state the case fairly, I would be the last to oppose unnecessarily granting to the Minister or the Government, such indemnity as might be necessary in such a case.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am aware, Sir, that hon. gentlemen opposite are in the habit of treating the public funds of which they are the trustees, not as trustees usually treat funds entrusted to them, but for the advancement of their own private ends and purposes. We had an example this afternoon of the sort of way the hon. gentleman regards the charge of great sums of money belonging to the people of Canada. But what I am now discussing is a totally different question. I am discussing what ought to be the course of a Minister in an emergency when it may be proper to interpose the public credit for the prevention of public disaster. First of all, I say that is a case of rare occurrence. I say that no Minister should interpose the public credit unless on very grave grounds. In so doing, he undertakes about as grave a responsibility as any Minister ever can assume; and I am sorry to say, apparently, from the demeanor of the First Minister, that neither he nor his colleague properly appreciated their responsibility in this matter. As a rule, it is far better for a Minister to let a bank like this alone. As a rule, if banks make mistakes, there is no reason why the Government should interfere to save them and their shareholders from the consequences of their mistakes. Like private individuals, they must bear the penalty of their misdoings—and in time past, that was the practice of the Government of Canada, as no one knows better than the hon. gentleman who sits opposite me. I say that the Minister of Finance should interfere only in cases of very great gravity. I say, too, that if this was a case of very great gravity, he ought to have consulted his colleagues, and have obtained the sanction of an Order in Council.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Hear, hear.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Did he consult his colleagues?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I consulted my colleagues.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Did he obtain the sanction of an Order in Council?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think he did; I do not see evidence of it in these papers; but I think that in a case involving the credit of the Dominion of Canada, he might have obtained the sanction of an Order in Council, which is necessary for the appointment of the most petty official in the Civil Service. However, I am glad to hear—as from these documents I thought he had acted upon his own account alone—that he took even the moderate amount of caution which he says he did. But, Sir, my point is this—I say there was no sort of reason why the credit of the Canada should have been pledged in the case of the Exchange Bank. This was not a great bank, having very extensive transactions. It was a bank with a total capital of $500,000. We have, I suppose, at present some forty or fifty banks scattered throughout this Dominion. Is the hon. gentleman going to establish the precedent that whenever a bank gets into trouble, through mismanagement, as in this case, the Minister of Finance is to rush to the rescue, and interpose the credit of the Dominion in order to save the bank from the consequences of its own misdoings? We must remember, that on the face of it, at the time this advance was asked for, that bank was within an ace of closing its doors. No man who knows anything of banking affairs can look over that statement without seeing that the bank was in extremis, and if the hon. Minister chose to interfere in such a case, it was his bounden duty to have taken extraordinary precautions to avoid loss resulting therefrom to the public. I do not believe that the Minister of Finance fully understood the effect of his action. It is a grave thing for a Government to interfere; it is a grave thing for a Government to deposit a very large sum of money, and this is a very large sum of money relatively to the capital of the Exchange Bank, because I see that, at the time, the Minister had about $350,000 of public money, not to speak of deposits, held as security for contracts, deposited in this bank, whose total capital was only $500,000. Did the hon. Minister consider this? Did he consider that when he, the Minister of Finance, the man who has special opportunities of knowledge, who is supposed to be thoroughly conversant with all these affairs, more than any other member of Parliament, came forward and deposited the large sum of money—a deposit which was at once blazoned abroad—did he reflect that he was thereby—innocently perhaps, but still that he was—contributing to deceive all the other creditors of that bank? Did he consider that? I am afraid that did not occur to the hon. gentleman. I would be most unwilling to suppose that the hon. gentleman had contemplated the results of his action. Now, all the time, as this very correspondence shows, large sums of money were being paid into that bank on deposit, and the result of the hon. Minister's action was this, in all human probability, that a large number of persons put in money after the 12th of April, who never would have put their money in jeopardy but for the example of the hon. the Minister of Finance. Now it is quite possible that some, well advised, withdrew their money after that deposit. Such instances have been mentioned to me. As I say, I am not at all disposed to charge the hon. Minister with intentionally misleading the public, but I point out to him and the House, that the inevitable effect of his action was to deceive the public. The public thought, on seeing this deposit of $300,000 made, that the hon. Minister had surely satisfied himself that everything was correct in the case of the Exchange Bank. They could not avoid drawing that conclusion. Why, the hon. Minister's eyes ought to have been opened, I think, by the language that was used by Mr. Craig himself on this very subject. I notice that on the 21st of April Mr. Craig writes to the Deputy Minister as follows:—

"I find that I shall require another sum of $100,000 to place me in an independent position. I have paid $365,000 on deposits since the first of the month and have notices of withdrawal of $60,000 more. Most of the money withdrawn has gone into the Bank of Montreal, at least two-thirds of it. The drain on ordinary deposits has stopped,"—

Remember this was the 21st of April—

"but I must meet the deposits of which I have received notice, therefore I will have to trespass on your kindness once more. The knowledge that the Government were assisting me has had a wonderful effect in quieting matters."

Naturally, no man can wonder that the knowledge that the Government of Canada had chosen the Exchange Bank to deposit $300,000 had a wonderful effect on the minds of the depositors. But what has been the result? So far as it is possible to see now, the result of that unhappy action on the part of the hon. the Finance Minister on the 12th of April was this, that he enabled the bank to stay open until about the end of October; that in the interval very large sums of money were squandered by the officials of that bank, and those people who obtained deposit receipts after the 12th of April might most justly say to the hon. the Finance Minister and the Government, that they were deceived by their action. More than this, there is the strongest proof possible, in looking at the securities of that unlucky bank, that had that bank been wound up on or about the 12th of April, many hundreds of thousands of dollars would have been saved to the depositors which have been since lost by the shrinkage in stocks and securities which they held, apart from the misconduct of the officials. That was a misfortune. I am sure the hon. Minister will agree with me in deploring that that should have occurred, but those are precisely misfortunes which constantly happen when rotten banks are enabled, by adventitious assistance of this kind to keep open their doors after they ought to be suspended. Nor does it mend the matter very much when we recollect that several of those who are most intimately connected with the affairs of this bank were prominent supporters, two or three of whom I believe had seats in this or the other Chamber. So far the case is very bad, but it remained with the hon. the Minister of Finance, with marvellous ingenuity, to contrive to make the case considerably worse, and this was the way he selected to do it. After the $200,000 had been paid into the bank another demand was made. Now it is quite clear that by that time there must have dawned on the mind of the hon. Minister the conviction that he had been rash and reckless in making this advance to the Exchange Bank. We have proof of that here in the fact that he refused to advance another farthing without taking personal security—a letter of guarantee from the hon. A. W. Ogilvie, Senator of this Dominion. Now, let me pause for one moment to ask the hon. Minister what he considers his plain duty as a public man was when, on or about the 11th of May, he came to the conclusion, as he evidently did, that the $200,000 of public funds he then had put in the bank were imperilled and that the security of the bank was not good enough. His duty was to do his best to save for the public the $200,000. Instead of that, he advanced another $100,000, and to make himself safe he takes a personal guarantee from a member of the other Chamber. I say that was a most improper transaction. I say that if there be any man in the whole connection who deserves pity, it is Senator Ogilvie. I believe that he is a very heavy sufferer by this unfortunate bank. I believe he is a large stock holder and that the double liability is not likely to be enough to pay off the depositors, and in that way he will be a very heavy sufferer. He will also, if the opinion of the hon. Minister of Justice prevails, be a still heavier sufferer on account of this bond, this letter of guarantee. Does the hon. Minister of Finance think that is a proper position for a member of the Senate to occupy towards the Government, that he should be the guaranty of an advance of $100,000 from the Government of Canada to a bank? I do not know how far Mr. Ogilvie has imperilled his seat by his action. I do not know whether he is liable for legal proceedings in having become the guaranty or the surety of the Government. That is a matter for the legal gentlemen of the House to settle. But I say there is no use having an independence of Parliament Act on the Statute Book if such transactions as this are to be allowed to take place between the Government and their supporters. I say that the Minister has set a most mischievous precedent and that it is in the highest degree in the interest of the House and the interest of good Government that that principle should be reversed by the action of this House and by the tone of public opinion which, I have no doubt, whatever will condemn even more severely than I have denounced it—the placing of a member of Parliament and a member of the Senate in the position of guaranteeing that advance to the Government. I do not want to insist on the legal difficulties which may arise. That is an accident of the transaction; but, whether Mr. Ogilvie prove responsible or not, I say that the whole relation is utterly improper as between a member of the Senate and the Government of this country. Now, Sir, there is another consideration, not of so much importance, perhaps, as the considerations I have alluded to, but yet of some importance. Here we have about $237,000 of the public money locked up in the Exchange Bank. When are we going to get that back? The hon. gentleman, I fear, does not know. I do not think the liquidators know. We have not, that I am aware, any special lien on the assets of that bank. On the contrary, the circulation, by an Act of the hon. gentleman, is a first mortgage before all claims. That, I believe, is the position. Now, Sir, at this present moment, I believe, the deposit receipts of that bank, that is to say securities of exactly this class, are selling at 65 cents or 60 cents on the dollar on the streets in Montreal. That may be taken as a fair criterion of what is the general value of our deposit; and, if that be the case, we have to pay for our folly in this transaction—besides utterly failing to save the bank, besides hurting these unfortunate depositors as I have shown—a fine of not far short of $100,000. Does the hon. gentleman tell us that he believes that the bank is going to pay in full, or that he thinks that, in that case, their deposit receipts would be saleable on the street in Montreal at some 65 cents in the dollar? That, of course, we know, will await the pleasure of the lawyers who have got the matter in charge. Years may elapse before the actual results are ascertained. Some of us can recollect what was the fate of other Government deposits in other banks that suspended long ago, and I do not think that I am much out of the way in saying that the hon. gentleman will be very fortunate indeed if he escapes with a loss of only $100,000 on this transaction. Now, Sir, this is a plain question. This is a matter that any business man can understand and express an opinion upon. I do not think that the members of the Government—gentlemen who have anything to do with banks, gentlemen who have anything to do with large business transactions—I do not think that any of them, after looking at these papers, after hearing what the position of the bank was when this advance was made, will say that due or proper precaution was taken to prevent a serious loss arising to the public. I do not think that, on the question of policy, many will be found to rise and say that it was a wise thing for the hon. Minister to step in in such a case, and to pledge the public credit for the purpose of sustaining a small bank like the Exchange Bank under those circumstances. But, Sir, I point out that, if the hon. Minister is to be allowed to deal with the public money in this fashion; if this is to go unchallenged; if it is to be understood that a Minister of Finance is at liberty, when a bank is in trouble—when prominent supporters come to him, when they plead that they or their friends will be ruined if he does not assist them—if we are to understand that the hon. Minister of Finance considers it part of his duty to come to the relief of banks which get into trouble, he will add a very grave responsibility to the already grave enough responsibilities which attach to his office. I repeat, the hon. Minister of Finance, in dealing with public moneys, is simply a trustee of those public moneys. He has no right to deal with them as if they were his own, or rather to deal with them as he would never dream of dealing with his own; for I have far too great an idea of his acuteness to imagine that he would have put any of his own into the Exchange Bank under the circumstances. He is simply and solely a trustee of the public funds. He has no right to do with those public funds, to assist this or that friend, or this or that political supporter, anything which a trustee could not lawfully and rightfully do in dealing with trust funds put into his hands. What would the courts say to a private man who, having trust funds in his hands, had deposited them in the Exchange Bank with the full knowledge of the facts which the hon. gentleman possessed, which the Gazette returns alone disclosed? It may be creditable to the hon. gentleman's good nature, it may be creditable to his kindness of heart. I know well enough that it is a difficult thing, when friends and supporters come to a man, when they press him and appeal to his generosity, I know it is hard to refuse; but that is part of the duties of his office. A Minister of Finance must learn how to refuse to allow public funds to be endangered, and it is a very great misfortune that the hon. gentleman, on this occasion, was not sufficiently determined in so doing. Now, Sir, it seems to me that there is only one atonement possible for the hon. gentleman. I do not think, in such a case, that he is going to better himself by throwing the responsibility elsewhere. That is a responsibility which most properly and necessarily belongs to the hon. Minister himself. It is one of the highest exercises of his ministerial responsibility. I think that when, as these papers show, he chose to risk the public money in dealing with a bank which he knew to be in unsound condition, the least he could have done would have been to come forward, state the case frankly and honestly, and ask the House for a Bill of Indemnity for the error he had committed; and, if he had done that, Sir, I do not think that the House, particularly the hon. gentleman's supporters, would have dealt very hardly with him, or been difficult to persuade to grant it to him. Now, I hope—against hope, perhaps, but I hope—that the hon. gentleman is going to do that. I hope, as I say, he is going to make what atonement he can; that he is going to promise amendment; that he is going to submit to reasonable admonition in the matter; that he will pledge himself never to do it again. I hope so. In the hope that that may be the case, I have worded this motion in the mildest possible shape that the well-known facts will admit. I advise him to take example by the hon. gentleman who sits beside him, who told us this very afternoon that it was best to encourage men to sin no more. True, I did not quite agree with the hon. gentleman in thinking that we were to carry our ideas, in the way of encouraging men to sin no more, to the extent of looking upon it as a qualification for public office that a man who was selected for an important office in the most important section of the Dominion—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Order, order.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Order, order.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If I am out of order, I apologize, and that may be considered unsaid; but I entirely agree with him that this is eminently a case in which he may apply to the colleague beside him the advice he was going to apply to a subordinate—the advice to sin no more.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Mr. Speaker, I think this House will have concluded, when they heard the closing remarks of the hon. member, feeling that it was necessary to abandon the question that he had brought before the House to refer to what took place before we adjourned, that his case was not a very strong one. Mr. Speaker, it has been said by the Opposition press and by gentlemen in the Opposition—we have heard it before Parliament met and since Parliament met—that this was to be a stormy Session and a long Session. Well, we had one vote of want of confidence yesterday. We had the foundation laid for another vote of want of confidence this afternoon, and an intimation that a third was to follow shortly after; and now, Sir, we have a motion of want of confidence in the Government at present, and especially in the Finance Minister. I think, Sir, I will be pardoned by the House if I take a somewhat different course in replying to the hon. gentleman from what I would have taken under other circumstances. I had sent to me to-day a cablegram from London—not from the High Commissioner's representative there, not from Sir Alexander Galt—but from a gentleman occupying a high financial and important position, referring to a telegraphic despatch that was sent by Reuter and published in London to-day, that I was to be impeached to-day in Parliament, and wanting to know what answer I had to give, what explanation I could make. And this party says:

"These telegraphic despatches, coming through these sources, and from the United States, are always unfavourable to Canada. Some steps should be taken to prevent this unfair representation of the affairs of Canada on this side."

Well, I could not understand it; but when I left the House I was told that a telegraphic message had been sent here after the papers were laid on the Table, and after I had made my remarks here—reflecting upon me personally. The whole line that has been taken by the hon. member is of a somewhat personal character. He says he is very glad to hear that I did consult my colleagues; but when the hon. member got a little excited, when he got angry, he said just what the press in New York has been saying, and what the telegraph in England has been saying—

Mr. BOWELL. And just what he would do himself.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY—that advances for private ends and purposes were made. Now, Sir, under these circumstances, I feel called upon to narrate what took place with reference to this matter, and the reasons that influenced the Government in taking the course they did. I think on the 10th or 11th of April, Mr. Greene called at my house. I was ill, and was detained in the house for two or three days. He came to me early one morning and stated to me the object of his mission. He stated that owing to one or two circumstances that had taken place in Montreal, there was some distrust on the part of the depositors and note holders with reference to the condition of the bank; that it was expected there would be a run made upon the bank that day and probably the next day, and he came up here to see if some arrangement could not be made with the Government by which their position would be strengthened, and by which the run would be prevented. He also stated that the run might reach half a dozen other institutions of the same kind in the city of Montreal and in the Dominion of Canada, by which the public interests would be imperilled—by which the trade, commerce and business of the country would be imperilled. And I suppose, Sir, judging from the anxiety of the hon. member and others on the opposite side, that they would like to have seen that state of things, and would like us to have refused any application that would prevent such a calamity under such circumstances as these. Sir, I said to Mr. Greene: "I am confined to my bed; I cannot deal with this matter to-day; you must leave it a day or two; I hope to be out in a couple of days, and I will then bring this matter under the consideration of the Government." He then went on to explain the position the bank was in, its perfect solvency, and the returns the hon. member has referred to. I said: "Well, I cannot, without communicating with my colleagues, do anything." He said: "But to-morrow the difficulty might have occurred, the crisis might have arisen, and a delay of twenty-four hours may be most disastrous." I said: "Under these circumstances, I will send for the Deputy Minister of Finance and consult with him about it." I did send for the Deputy Minister of Finance; and I do not desire to avoid,—nor did I in the remarks I made—any responsibility, or shield myself in any way from any responsibility. I repeat here that my motive in sending for him was to obtain information as to the security, he having had more direct communication of these matters than any body else; and I wished to get his views with reference to the safety of the step which the Government was asked to take. I sent at once for the Deputy Minister and conferred with him upon the subject. I asked him, is this a proper policy? Is it quite safe? at least, is there any doubt about this money being repaid? In conversation with him I recalled the circumstance that two years previous the President of the Bank of Ontario, and the President of the Consolidated Bank, came to the Government and stated their position. It was then in the month of February or March. They spoke of the difficulties they were in, and said they would be relieved the moment navigation opened. This was the representation they made to me. They said that if we could give them assistance for three or four months, until navigation opened, they would be able to tide over their difficulties. That representation was made to the Government, and the Government gave the advance. The Bank of Ontario did go through, and paid back the advance with interest at 5 per cent.

The other bank also later on paid back every dollar and the 5 per cent. they agreed to pay us. Yes, and talk about our political friends! These were gentlemen that had no claim upon us as political friends. Sir William Howland was the gentleman who came here representing the Bank of Ontario. We did not look at it from a political standpoint; we looked at it in the light of the interests of the country, and we gave that assistance. In making my statement in regard to the Exchange Bank, I threw no responsibility on the Deputy Minister of Finance; I shirked no responsibility on my own part, nor on the part of the Government, in the matter. But I said, and say still, that I sent for the gentleman who had the means of knowing far better even than I did, the condition of these banks; who had been in confidential communication with them two or three days previously; who possessed the most reliable sources of information—I consulted him, and what did he say? He said that he thought there was no danger, whatever, in our making this advance. I then said: "I cannot leave my room. You go with Mr. Greene to the leader of the Government and communicate to him your views with reference to this matter, and he will confer with his colleagues and be able to decide as to what it is best to do. And you may say to the leader of the Government, and to my colleagues, that if they think that it is in the interests of the banks of the country, in the public interest, and in the interest of the commerce and trade of the country, that this assistance should be given, they have my support with reference to it." The Deputy Minister did go to the leader of the Government. I have not communicated with him since, but I have no doubt that he stated to him, as he stated to me, his perfect confidence in the safety of the bank; because he had said to me: "There is $500,000 of capital; there is $300,000 of a reserve"—though I see by the returns it was $400,000 at that time. "Then you have the double security of the stockholders;" and he considered, and I considered, that there was no risk. That money was advanced. It was understood that $200,000 would be the maximum that would be given. The hon. member says we ought to know that that bank was in difficulty; that as a member of the Committee on Banking and Commerce, I ought to have known it. We did know that they came to that Committee, and asked that their capital stock should be reduced. In order to assure ourselves of the position of the bank, we appointed a sub-committee of four or five leading men. Mr. McLelan, Mr. Weldon, Mr. McCarthy and Mr. Desjardins, I think, were on that sub-committee, together with the Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Commerce. They were instructed by the general committee to send for persons, papers and documents in connection with that institution, and ascertain whether the reduced rate at which the stock was placed was one which was perfectly safe; and that sub-committee reported—and the hon. gentleman opposite was a member of that committee—and its report was adopted by that committee on the report of the sub-committee, which had made a most searching and thorough investigation. We had reason to suppose, such being the case, that with $500,000 of capital and $400,000 of rest, it would be perfectly safe to make that advance of $200,000, which the Government agreed to give at that time as a maximum. $100,000 were paid with the understanding that the bank should not come back if that amount would carry them through. But sooner than the object for which those $100,000 were advanced should fall through, the Government would extend the amount to $200,000. A few days afterwards they came and said the bank was still in a tight place, though the pressure had been checked, and they obtained another $100,000. The effect of that advance was, no doubt, to quiet public anxiety; at all events, they met all demands made on circulation and deposits, and things went on. The pressure afterwards increased. Then the bank applied to the Government, asking for another $100,000. Its representative came to myself personally—Senator Ogilvie, who was a director of the bank—and Mr. Buntin, I think, came with him. They said they knew all about the bank, because they were directors—I am sorry to say they did not know all about it, and I mention this as evidencing that they thought they knew all about it—and they were prepared to give their personal security for $100,000 over and above the security we had under the position—we would occupy as having a claim on all assets under the double liability, which amount they said would carry the bank successfully through. Those gentlemen spoke in the most confident terms respecting the bank, and offered, as I have said, to give their personal security for $100,000. When Mr. Greene came to me, I said this was a matter for which I cannot assume responsibility. I said that this was outside the ordinary transactions of the Finance Department. Our money comes into the different banks in a variety of ways, reaching in the shape of revenue either from Customs, Excise, Post Office or other sources, the banks doing our business in different parts of the Dominion; or, as has been the case in the last year or two, when the Canadian Pacific Railway Company paid in $3,200,000, for which we agreed to give 4 per cent. interest, and it became our duty to see that we did not lose anything, then we sought deposits in the banks and obtained 4 per cent. to cover the interest we were paying on the money of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and in that way a considerable amount of money was on deposit in the banks. When this advance was made to the Exchange Bank, it was felt, on the part of the Government, that it would sustain the institution and carry it through, prevent a crisis and relieve the pressure on other banks in the Dominion; for we all know how sensitive public opinion is respecting the stoppage of a bank. The hon. gentleman says a bank may suspend for a time. It may; but will he say that a bank may not be placed in a sound position afterwards? Another bank which suspended and had its capital reduced, stands to-day in the position that its stock is quoted at 100 per cent., though unfortunately that institution was some time ago in difficulty. Under those circumstances, the advance referred to was made, and it was supposed that it would carry the bank through, and that the Government would be perfectly safe. I do not entertain the opinion that the Government is not safe now. It is true the money may be locked up for some time, though we might desire to use it three or four months hence. When I left for England we had $300,000 deposit in the shape of Canadian Pacific land grant bonds which we had to pay out as they were earned. We had to pay, owing to the rapid progress made with the work, large sums, and accordingly we had to draw on our deposits. I telegraphed to the deputy that: "The moment you reduce the deposits, not paying interest, down to a safe sum, call on the banks having money at interest." The House is aware that we cannot take it all out with safety, as we are always open to a call for $500,000 or $1,000,000 of gold. In statements made in New York and elsewhere, it is asserted that when a difficulty occurs, when it was found that the Government were being censured for having money there, I called on this bank to pay up when it was too late, and in order to accommodate my political friends, I gave them the opportunity of paying the amount by $5,000 and $10,000 at a time. This was done when I was in England, and it was done by the deputy, who took a lenient view of the case, and accepted $5,000 and $10,000 payments instead of demanding $50,000. And yet I am charged, though I was in England at the time, with having used my political influence to let the bank off, and thus sacrificing the public interest. Sir, this is a matter to be regretted. Knowing all that has transpired, the circumstances in which the bank is placed are to be regretted. We made the effort to save the bank and to prevent the difficulty that occurred. I will tell the House what was one of the results of the Government's action. The trouble arose in April and May, before the opening of navigation, and by postponing the crisis until later in the season—August, September and October—the difficulty was less than it would have been otherwise, because the other banks were stronger and in a better position than they would have been earlier in the year, when their liabilities were maturing and their creditors were not in a position, before the opening of navigation, to sell Exchange. The very fact of postponing the crisis a few months made the difficulty less than it would have been if the crisis had occurred in April. I never attempt to take responsibility, except in concert with my deputy, of placing money at interest and adopting a course to make the country safe. If we are paying interest to Savings Bank depositors, we endeavour to be recouped the 4 per cent. by making arrangements with the banks—to a large extent with banks possessing a large capital—because if we require the money they can repay it with less difficulty than small banks that have their funds loaned out to customers, and which would have to recall those amounts to make repayment. For the sake of safety, and other reasons, we seek banks with large capital, and endeavour to obtain interest on the deposits. There have only been three cases in ten or eleven years, and in those cases the Government felt they were perfectly safe, and in two cases they obtained one per cent. additional. But the money was not deposited for that reason, and when Sir William Howland, representing the Consolidated Bank, came to us, we thought, though we were obtaining 4 per cent., we should ask something more, and we asked 5 per cent. We obtained in the other two cases the principal and interest, though one was delayed somewhat, and in the other case I am not without expectation that every dollar, with interest, will be repaid to us from the securities we have, and the position we occupy with respect to the loan. I admit, with the hon. member, that it is not desirable to do it in every case, and I do not hesitate to say that, in cases, the Government hesitated considerably and reflected a good deal as to whether, in the interests of the whole Dominion, and of the commerce and trade of the country, as well as of the banks of the country, they should take the step which they finally decided to take. Before many days we will have an opportunity of discussing the effect of the failure of that bank on the stocks of other banks throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion, but I say that when you touch one of these banks we know how sensitive all the other banks are in matters of this kind. I think, however, that the House and the country will sustain the Government when, under such extreme circumstances, and for the purpose of preventing a run on the bank we took this step; because we all know, by looking at the returns, that if, to-day, two-thirds of the banks in the Dominion were suddenly called upon to redeem their circulation, where those banks would be, and where the business of the country would be. Under these circumstances, we felt that we were perfectly justified—feeling, at the same time, that we were safe in doing so—in endeavouring to save the country from the consequences which would follow from the breaking down, it might be, of two, or three, or four, or five of the banks. I feel the matter the more keenly because it has come more as a direct attack on myself. That, however, I can bear, but I know there is behind it an attack upon the Government. Though the hon. gentleman and myself are represented in Grip as rushing so lovingly into each other's arms upon his return to Parliament—I say, notwithstanding these cordial relations which exist between us, I do not think the hon. gentleman would strike me if he did not think he was striking the Government and those who are behind us. Under these circumstances and after this explanation, I feel confident that the House will consider that these resolutions should be voted down, and that the Government—whatever may have been the misfortunes of the bank—feeling that they were perfectly safe, as I believe now they are, were perfectly justified in dealing with the funds at their disposal in the best interests of the country and in the best interests of its banking and commerce.

WORKS IN EACH OF THE PROVINCES OF THE CONFEDERATION.

Mr. LANDRY (Montmagny)—(Translation)—in moving for a statement setting forth, in separate columns:—1. The amount of money expended in each of the Provinces since Confederation, or their entry into Confederation, up to the 30th June, 1883, on works of a strictly general character, distinguishing the sums chargeable to capital from those chargeable to income; 2. The amount of money expended in each of the Provinces since Confederation, or their entry into Confederation, up to the 30th June, 1883, for works of strictly local character, distinguishing the sums chargeable to capital from those chargeable to income; the statement to show for each of the Provinces in the Confederation, separately, the exact amount expended in each of them, said: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to make a speech in support of the motion I have just made, but the explanations just given by the Government, in answer to the hon. member for Laval, have encouraged me so much that I think it my duty, in the present instance, to call the attention of the Government on the motion I am now making. I have not been able to procure all desirable details, but by referring to the documents of last Session, vol. 17, page 143, I find the following figures indicating the amounts expended since Confederation, in public works, chargeable both to capital and to revenue: For the Province of Ontario, $39,019,673.46; in the Province of Quebec there has been expended $27,356,324.37; in Nova Scotia, $16,669,231.56; in New Brunswick, $23,768,019.61; in Prince Edward Island, whose entry into Confederation took place on the 1st of July, 1873, there has been expended since that date $2,301,561.51; in Manitoba, which entered Confederation on the 15th of July, 1870, there was expended since that date the sum of $6,802,038.18; in the North-West, which entered at the same date, $2,984,828.03; and in British Columbia, which came to us on the 20th of July, 1871, there has been expended $5,454,207.09. Thus we have a total of $124,656,743.32. If we divide this amount by the population of the Dominion, which amounts to 4,324,810 souls, we find that there has been expended on an average a sum of $28.52 per head. Now, if we examine in detail the amounts expended in each of the Provinces, we find that they average the following sums per head: In Ontario, $20.30; in Quebec, $20.12; in Nova Scotia, $37.83; in New Brunswick, $77.41; in Prince Edward Island, $21.13; in Manitoba, $103.12; in the North-West, $52.78; and in British Columbia, $110.23. Among these works are comprised the construction of the Pacific, of the Intercolonial, the improvement of our canals, and all public undertakings of a general interest to the country. From this standpoint, the Province of Quebec would still be entitled to an additional sum of $12,823,534.90, which should be expended within its limits. We do not intend to ask this amount to-night, but we hope that demands will be made to the effect that the Province of Quebec may have in the distribution of public patronage the fair share to which it is entitled and which rightly belongs to her. Now, if we consider those expenses from a mere local point of view, if we deduct from those expenses what has been expended until this day for the Pacific Railway, if we deduct the cost of the Intercolonial and of the improvement of our canals, we have as a result the following figures: There has been expended since Confederation in the Province of Ontario for works of a strictly local nature a sum of $6,289,035.94, which, in proportion to the population, makes a sum of $3.27 per head; in Quebec, for the same object, there was expended $1,871,094.83, or an amount of $1.37 per head; in Nova Scotia, $774,823.82, or $1.75 per head; in New Brunswick, $757,461.81, or $2.35 per head; in Prince Edward Island, $139,304.03, or $1.27 per head; in Manitoba, $256,593.89, or $3.89 per head; in the North-West, $141,799.97, or $2.51 per head; in British Columbia, $226,928.19, or $4.58 per head. By adding together these various amounts, we arrive at a total sum of $10,497,625.64, and if we divide this amount by the population of the Dominion, we have $2.42 per head. Now, the Province of Quebec has only received $1.37 per head, or in other words, for works of a purely local nature we are entitled to an additional sum of $1,426,978.35, or to a sum of $1.05 per head. This, Mr. Speaker, comprises all the expenditure made since Confederation, up to the 30th of June, 1882. My motion asks for a statement of that expenditure up to the 30th of June, 1883, and it is to obtain this statement that I put the motion into your hands. I hope that the papers will establish the justice of the claims of our Province and that the Government will remember it in proper time.

Mr. LANDRY (Montmagny).

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I may state to the House, that the return asked for by the hon. gentleman will be brought down as soon as possible, but it is one which must be prepared with great care. I suppose each member will have to see in each case, whether the work is of a local or of a general character. As I said before, the return will be carefully prepared and brought down as speedily as possible.

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 11 o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRESENTATION OF PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. BEATY, in moving that the time for presenting Private Bills be extended to Friday, 15th February, in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders, said: I may mention that the time for presenting petitions expires to-day; but, from a misapprehension, the Banking and Commerce Committee recommended that the time for presenting Bills be extended only till to-morrow, and we now recommend that it be extended till Friday next. The time for presenting petitions expires to-day, and will not be further extended.

Mr. BLAKE. This is also to be the last extension, I suppose?

Mr. BEATY. That is the end of it.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

The Order for resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of Sir Charles Tupper, "That the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider certain proposed Resolutions (page 84) respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway," being read,

Mr. IVES. Mr. Speaker, in continuing the debate upon the important Resolutions before the House, I shall endeavour to avoid, as much as possible, touching upon those points which were so ably and exhaustively treated by the hon. Minister of Railways in his speech of Tuesday last. But if, Sir, for the sake of the continuity of my argument, I should have to touch briefly upon some points to which he alluded, I trust I shall have the forbearance of the House. It will be my endeavour to lay before the House some additional reasons why the Resolutions should be adopted; and, at the same time, I shall refer to some portions of the speech of the hon. member who last addressed the House upon this important subject. Sir, the statesmen who promoted the great scheme of Confederation had in view a much more important object than the union of the four Provinces originally confederated. They had in view, Sir, the foundation here on the northern half of this continent, of a great power, of a great people, a power and a people that at some future day might be in a position to take rank among the great powers of the earth. Confederation itself, the construction of the Intercolonial Railway, the acquisition of the North-West Territories from the Hudson Bay Company, the encouragement of immigration, the improvement of our canals and water ways, the adoption of a national trade policy and the construction of a Canadian Pacific Railway, are all steps in the same direction, and mile stones, as it were, marking the progress we have made towards the acme of our ambition. It was early seen and recognized that the resources of the four original Provinces, and the area of those Provinces, were not sufficient to justify our hope of being able to accomplish the great object of our ambition. It was early recognized that it was necessary that we should have additional territory and additional resources. Looking to the history of the unexampled success of the United States to the south of us, our statesmen could not fail to recognize the great element of prosperity which their great West had been to the nation at large, as affording a field for the development of great agricultural resources, and offering a market for the manufactures of New England. And, Sir, hardly had Confederation been consummated when our statesmen, who had charge of affairs, took up the question of acquiring a great West for Canada. Though I was not a public man at that time, I remember very well that a large number of public men did oppose, and most strenuously oppose, the acquisition of the Hudson Bay Territory; but, Sir, I venture to say that you could not find, to-day, a single man of those who opposed that measure at that time, who would be willing to stand up in this House, or in any public assembly in Canada, and acknowledge that he had opposed the purchase of the Hudson Bay Territory. Well, Sir, after acquiring the great North-West, it was soon seen that it would be comparatively useless to Canada until it was peopled; and it was at the same time discovered that it could not be peopled without it were opened up by the construction of a Canadian Pacific Railway. In fact, Sir, I may say that it was part of the scheme adopted at the conference at Quebec, the acquisition of the Hudson Bay Territory and the construction of a Canadian Pacific Railway. And, Sir, both parties from the first have been thoroughly and firmly committed to the construction of this railway; and not only to its construction, but they have been committed to the construction of it by the same method and in the same mode. Both parties have declared it to be their preference that the railway should be constructed by a company, subsidized by Parliament; and both have declared, both by word and act, that in default of a company strong enough to construct the railway, the Government should continue the work to completion as a Government work. The Government of Sir John A. Macdonald, in 1878, entered into an arrangement with Sir Hugh Allan, and his associates, for the construction of this railway. Sir Hugh made an effort to raise the necessary capital; but, as every one knows, he failed. He was met by much the same opposition which has turned up against the present Company, and he had also to contend with this: that the country was then a comparatively unknown wilderness. Soon after his failure the Government of Sir John A. Macdonald resigned, and the Government of Mr. Mackenzie was formed, and continued in power for a period of five years. Mr. Mackenzie's Government at once set to work to find a company that would undertake the construction of this railway. He asked the public for tenders for its construction. He offered a large amount in land and money, and asked how much additional assistance in the way of guaranteed bonds any one would require to undertake its construction. But not receiving any offer, he continued the work, during the whole term he held the reins of power, as a Government work. On a change of Government taking place in 1878, and the return to power of Sir John A. Macdonald, our present leader, his Government at once set to work to find a company that would undertake the construction of this railway; and in the Session of 1880-81 Parliament approved of a contract which had been made between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Government for the construction of this railway. The leading features of that contract were, that the Government were to complete and hand over to the Company, as part of their subsidy, 432 miles of completed road between Thunder Bay and Winnipeg, 213 miles between Kamloops and Port Moody, and 65 miles of the Pembina branch, which was then completed, and in addition a cash subsidy of $25,000,000 and 25,000,000 acres of land. The Company was to complete, equip and operate the line from Callander to the Pacific Ocean, 2,555 miles, before the end of 1891. Of that total distance the Company had to build 1,910 miles of a main line. I have made this brief résumé of history for the purpose of emphasizing the statement that this railway is an enterprise in which Canada is specially interested, an enterprise that the Dominion of Canada and all parties in Canada are specially pledged to complete. A very obvious criticism upon the speech of the hon. member who last addressed the House (Mr. Blake), arises right here. Sir, he treated this question as if this railway were an ordinary railway; one to which, perhaps, the Government had given some assistance, in which the country was in a measure interested; but he did not speak of it as a railway which is a national necessity, as a railway, the completion of which, and the early completion of which, is a national necessity; nor did he speak of it as if it were a railway to which the country was pledged for its completion. I undertake to say that if strangers, unacquainted with the history of this enterprise, had been in the House the other night, and heard the hon. gentleman's speech, they would have gone away with the impression that this work was not one of any very particular or great interest to Canada. The course which Parliament should take with respect to the Resolutions before the Chair, depends very greatly upon this one consideration which I have been trying to insist upon. If this work is an important work; if the construction and early completion of this railway is a national necessity, then hon. members will be disposed to treat the Resolutions and propositions of the Government in a very different way from what they would if it were an ordinary railway, a railway in which Canada had some, but no especial interest. I undertake to say, therefore, that these Resolutions commend themselves to our favourable consideration; because, by some way or other, either by assisting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, or by doing it as a Government work, Canada is bound to complete this railway. The Company at once set to work in 1881. The first year they constructed 165 miles west of Winnipeg; in the summer of 1882, 420 miles; in the summer of 1883, 377 miles, and 66 miles of siding; making the total of main line in the West, already completed, 962 miles, or, with sidings, 1,028 miles. And this line has been well constructed, constructed not as a cheap colonization railway but as a first-class railway, as high in character as any railway ever estimated upon by any hon. member in this House. I was surprised to learn on investigation that the work west of Winnipeg for 900 miles had been as heavy as 16,320 cubic yards to the mile; this, of course, being caused by the determination of the Company to construct the railway high enough above the level of the prairie to render its operation not affected by the snow. The very greatest care has been taken in the construction of the railway to prevent difficult grades, and, except one short grade at the crossing of the Saskatchewan River, the maximum grade of the line west for 958 miles is only 40 feet to the mile; and the very best of material, including rails, has been used. In the West, also, the following branches have been completed: From Winnipeg to Pembina Mountain, 100 miles; from that line to Gretna, 13 miles; from Winnipeg to Selkirk, 22 miles; and from Emerson to the Pembina Branch, 23 miles, being a total of 158 miles, which with 1,028 miles, including the sidings, gives a total of 1,186 miles of railway constructed west of Winnipeg. At the close of the present season the Canadian Pacific Railway Company constructed and laid track for 101 miles from Port Arthur east on the eastern division, and also from Callander 100 miles; leaving the gap remaining to complete the eastern section only 447 miles, and the western division 290 miles. It is gratifying to know that even during the course of the present winter the work is being vigorously prosecuted; no less than 9,000 men are being actively engaged on the construction of the railway. The rate of progress which has been made justifies the House in the hope that the whole work, if there is no suspension, will be completed by the autumn of 1885. In addition to what I have mentioned on the eastern division, the Algoma branch, 96 miles, has been built, and three steel steamships placed on Lake Superior for the purpose of doing business between Algoma Mills and Port Arthur. Now, Sir, while the Company have been so energetic and active in the prosecution of railway construction, they have not been less active and energetic in their endeavours to induce immigrants to come to the North-West. I find, Sir, on investigating the matter, that an office has been established by the Company in London in charge of Mr. Begg, who reports that during last summer alone he answered no less than 18,000 letters of enquiry about Canada; distributed over 2,000,000 of maps, folders, and pamphlets, printed in twelve different languages; that he has established 5,000 centres for the distribution of immigration literature in Great Britain alone; that he has four travelling agents constantly upon the road, and that the Company is advertising in four hundred different newspapers, and are themselves gratuitously publishing an illustrated newspaper. Another very efficacious step was taken by the Company during last season, and that is they have exhibited the products of the North-West at important public gatherings, notably at Amsterdam, the Royal Agricultural Show at York, the Highland Show at Inverness, the great Liverpool and Manchester fairs, the fairs at Birmingham and Smithfield, the Fisheries Exhibition at London, at Canterbury, and at a large number of county fairs. All the work which has been done so thoroughly and efficiently in Great Britain, by a London office, is being done on the Continent by a continental office established there. Further, as if to carry the war into Egypt, the Company have kept agents travelling in New England and other portions of the United States, circulating immigration literature for the purpose of inducing immigration from the United States to the Canadian North-West; and I am happy to learn that at the exhibition of North-West products, made at the Boston annual exposition, last fall, much interest was excited, and good results are likely to follow. All this, with the unprecedentedly cheap rate which has been arranged for going into that country, should induce a very large immigration to the North-West. Now, Sir, I propose for a moment to make a comparison between the progress made by the Government on this railway, and the progress made by the Company. The Government commenced work in August, 1874, and, on the 1st of July, 1882, a line had been completed from Winnipeg to Port Arthur, a distance of 435 miles, which, with the Pembina Branch, which had been completed in 1874, a distance of 65 miles, made a total of 500 miles. West of Red River, the Government had completed 60 miles, which the Railway Company afterwards tore up and built on a new location, making altogether completed by the Government in eight years, a total of 560 miles, or 70 miles per year. The Company commenced work in the spring of 1881, and have completed to this date, of main line, 1,155 miles, and of branches, 256 miles, making a total of 1,411 miles, or an average of 470 miles a year. But the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House makes an objection here. He says that the rapid construction of this railway necessarily means increased cost. I do not believe that, under the circumstances of the case, the rapid construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway has meant increased cost. It is true that larger wages have been paid to the workmen and the navvies who have been employed on the railway. It is quite possible that the large demand for labour has raised the price per day per man above what it would have been if there had been a smaller demand. But that, Sir, is in keeping with our policy of increasing the price of the labouring man's wages, and on our side of the House we are not accustomed to object to anything which has that effect. But, Sir, there have been large offsets, large savings, by the rapid construction of this railway. It is a well known fact that steel rails have been cheaper during the last three years than they were ever known to be before, or are likely to be again. If the construction of the road had been proceeded with slowly, if the Company had intended to spread the work over the whole period covered by the contract, they would either have had to purchase rails at a cheap rate and hold them and pay interest on the cost, or to purchase them as they required them, in which case they would most likely have had to pay a much larger price. I contend that there has been in the saving upon rails alone, a sufficient sum saved to more than cover all the increased cost which has resulted from the more rapid construction of the railway. But, Sir, there has been a much greater saving than this. There has been the saving of six years of interest during construction; interest which amounts on the capital stock to no less than about $2,500,000 a year; and I claim, without fear of contradiction, that the saving in interest on construction for the six years, during which the road will be completed before the contract required it to be completed, is a much larger amount than anything which can be made out as the increased cost of construction. But surely, Sir, the House should not complain that the road has been constructed more rapidly than the contract required—this House should not complain even if there has been some increased cost to the country. The country will certainly settle more rapidly with a completed line than with a partly completed line; and it is perfectly evident that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company with a complete line, with an independent communication between Montreal and the West, can give better rates out of and into that country than could be obtained when we had to use the United States system in connection with the Canadian Pacific. Then, Sir, there is another point of advantage in the rapid completion of this enterprise. We have been observing, many of us with alarm and certainly with sorrow, evidence of discontent in the Province of British Columbia, over the fact that the railway was not going to be completed as soon as had been promised in the original convention; and surely it is a matter of congratulation that an earlier connection by six years between the remainder of the Dominion of Canada and British Columbia is obtained. Then, Sir, as was said the other evening by the hon. Minister of Railways, the phenomenal rapidity of the construction of the road is of itself a valuable advertisement, and draws the attention of the world, not only to the railway, but to the country. Another advantage is that we have six years sooner a continuous road, over which our immigrants can go from the east to the west; and though the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House said he felt humiliated when he heard this argument used, I am obliged to use it again to-day. He seemed to think it was speaking but lightly of the attractions of the great west, to say that immigrants coming from England or Scotland could be induced by American agents to stop short of Winnipeg or the North-West. I undertake to say that when a man living in the old country comes into this country, of the geography of which he is ignorant, not understanding in many cases the difference between the United States and Canada, it is possible for him to go to Dakota instead of to Winnipeg. It is saying nothing against the advantages of the North-West to say that our immigration is not safe so long as it is sifted through United States routes. Then, Sir, the last reason I shall mention why this House should rejoice at the early completion of this railway, is that it furnishes an earlier opportunity, by six years, for the commencement of the development of the trans-continental trade between China and Japan, and America and Europe. In six years sooner it gives us an opportunity of beginning to find an outlet for our manufactured goods in the world of demand which exists in Asia. There is no question but that a very large trade, in cotton goods especially, may be done in Japan and China by our merchants and manufacturers when they have equal facilities with the merchants and manufacturers of other countries. Sir, for a moment compare our position with the line completed throughout Canadian territory, with what it would be if we were building this railway slowly during the next six years. We are saving expense in sending immigrants to the North-West; we are saving the danger of losing them; and we are also saving the risk of the trade of the North-West being handed over to United States cities and United States merchants. To my mind, this of itself is a very important consideration. It seems to me that if we compel Winnipeg merchants, and the other merchants in the North-West, to open up accounts in Chicago, St. Paul and New York, it will be more difficult than the hon. gentleman seems to think to dis sever that connection, and afterwards obtain the trade for our own merchants and manufacturers. Sir, I ask, who should find fault with the early completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, in fact as well as in name—that is, of a railway north of Lake Superior? I can understand that the Minneapolis and Manitoba Railway Company and its shareholders, would find fault; I can understand that the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul, the Chicago and North-Western and the Grand Trunk, and their shareholders, would not like this arrangement. I can understand that the cities of St. Paul, Chicago and New York, the New England manufacturers, and the people of the United States, would not rejoice; and I can understand that the hon. gentleman himself would not rejoice, provided he is acting in the interests of his clients—the Grand Trunk Railway Company. But, Sir, if he is acting, as we are to presume he is, in the interests of the Dominion of Canada, he is bound to rejoice at the early completion of that road, as are the Parliament and people of Canada, and as are our merchants and manufacturers, at securing a direct connection with the rapidly increasing population of the North-West. The hon. gentleman contended that if the Company had proceeded more slowly with the construction of the railway, they might possibly have completed it from the proceeds of the sale of their lands, without coming to Parliament for this loan. That is quite probable. It is quite probable even now that, by suspending operations for six years, they might accumulate enough money from the sales of their land to complete the railway in two years, and thus fulfil their contract. But do the people and the Parliament of Canada desire to see a suspension of that work for six years? Do we desire to see a check to the progress of the country for so long a period as six years? There is no use in saying that if the Company had not done this, they might have done that. They have not proceeded slowly; they have proceeded rapidly and energetically, and they need assistance; and the question before the House is, shall we render them that assistance? The hon. gentleman also objects that they have been reaching out in different directions, obtaining connections east and west; and that if they had not done so, they would have had sufficient means in all probability to have completed the railway without coming to us for further assistance. I shall treat more fully that objection later on; but I must say here, that surely the people of Ontario ought not to object to a second trunk line through the peninsula of Ontario. The people of Ontario should not object to that which must furnish them with a relief from the monopoly, not in the North-West but in their own Province—a monopoly that has existed for the last thirty years. It seems strange to me that the hon. gentleman should so eloquently champion the cause of the people of the North-West, should so eloquently oppose a monopoly in the North-West, and yet so valiantly defend a monopoly in his own Province of Ontario. But should the House of Commons disapprove of an effort on the part of this Company to obtain additional business for the eastern division of their line? It is a well known fact that if the business of the eastern division of the line can be increased, even from Ottawa to Montreal by the Ontario business, lower rates of freight can be given by the Company to the Manitoba farmers than can be given if a small business is done on the eastern division of the line. It is also evident that, without feeders, reaching out into the older parts of the Dominion, the railway would have but a small chance of obtaining a fair share of the westward business; and therefore what the hon. gentleman blames the Company for, namely, the reaching out into the eastern part of the Dominion, for the purpose of obtaining business for their line both in the east and in the west, is something this House should not disapprove, but should certainly approve. I have now shown, or have tried to show, that the construction and completion of this road is a national necessity, and being a national necessity, the Resolutions before the Chair are to be considered in a very different light from that in which they ought to be considered if this railway were a mere ordinary enterprise. I have also shown, I trust, that the Company on their part have done their share thoroughly and well. They have built a better line than they agreed to build. They have built it much more rapidly than they undertook to build it, and certainly, in that respect, commend themselves to the favourable consideration of the House. I now propose, with the permission of the House, to adduce an additional reason why we ought to come to their assistance. That additional reason is the character of the opposition from which they have suffered, and against which they have contended. That opposition has been of a variety of kinds. There has been the opposition of the Liberal party in this House, and that opposition—I do not say directly, but indirectly—has been directed to prevent capitalists from buying the stock. I maintain that the opposition which has been directed by hon. gentlemen opposite against this enterprise has directly tended to depreciate the securities of the Company and to prevent capitalists from investing in these securities. That opposition, also, has the tendency to prevent immigration to this country—not that hon. gentlemen opposite intended it should, for I do not believe that, wittingly, they could take so unpatriotic a course—but the course they have taken has had that direct result. How have the members of the Liberal party in this House prevented capitalists from buying stock? They have done so by exaggerating the cost of the construction of the railway; by under-estimating the area of the fertile portion of the country; by magnifying the extent of the mountain portion; by telling us, day after day, that British Columbia is a sea of mountains; by minimizing the volume of emigration; by magnifying the so-called exodus, and by under-estimating the probable receipts from the sale of lands in the North-West. How have they prevented immigration to this country? They have done so by preaching that such high rates are charged by the Canadian Pacific Railway, under the monopoly clause, and that such high rates will be charged by that Company, that it is a matter of indifference to any one going into that country whether he raises a good or a poor crop; they have done so by preaching that the Government land regulations in the North-West are so unjust that it is impossible for immigrants to prosper under them, and that those who go there invariably leave for Dakota and Minnesota; and they have done so by lauding the beauties of Dakota and the delights of Texas. Even the other evening, the hon. gentleman, no doubt unintentionally, used some arguments which must have the effect of bearing the stock of this Company, when he told us, for example, that the land through which the railway actually passes—the prairie—is much less valuable than that through which it would have passed if it had gone further north. Well, I am not going to take up the time of the House with arguing that the land is as good where the railway actually runs as it would have been had it gone further north. I merely mention this to show that the effect of such an assertion will naturally be to lead the capitalists of the world to believe that this railway Company have in their land grant, in the railway belt, an inferior character of land. But it does not seem to me at all probable that, with the whole country before them to choose from, a country not covered by timber, but perfectly open for observation, and which had been fully surveyed, this Company when it had perfect liberty to go anywhere, would have located their line so that their land grant would be useless. The hon. gentleman, in the course of his argument the other evening, said that the competition between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, as the lessees of the Ontario and Quebec Railway, and the Credit Valley Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway, would be so keen that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company would find their rent charge to the Credit Valley Railway a very serious drain upon their net earnings. Without stopping for a moment either to attack or to condemn the statement which the hon. gentleman made, it is perfectly plain that that is no reason why the Resolutions before the Chair should or should not be adopted, but that the sole effect of a statement of that kind going abroad from such a source will be to lead the investing public to think that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are likely to be compelled to use the whole of their earnings in paying the rent upon their leased lines. The hon. gentleman also expressed his sorrow that he could not agree with the statement of the hon. the Minister of Railways that the earnings of the Company so far had been satisfactory. That is not a reason why these Resolutions should be adopted or rejected, and the effect of that must be, as I said before, to bear the stock of the Company. The hon. gentleman also referred to a supposed interview between the General Manager, Mr. Van Horne, and a reporter of the Montreal Star. I am informed no such interview ever took place. When the hon. gentleman read the statement I was unable to discover whether his object in so doing was to have an opportunity of creating a laugh in the House, or whether his idea was that this had some important bearing upon the Resolutions before the Chair. It is plain that what other effect it may have had, it must have had this effect, namely, that this road was being built in a haphazard manner through the country, without any reference as to whether it was going through good or bad land, and without any estimates whatever. If the General Manager said the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had not time to make estimates, what he meant was this: that the Company was proceeding so rapidly that, after they had ascertained the best location for the line, they went to work to build it without taking a great deal of time to estimate whether it would cost $1,000,000 or $2,000,000. For my own part, I do not see what difference it makes. I do not see what advantage it would be for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to have estimated the cost of any particular mile of road they have constructed in the prairie section. The important thing for them to settle was the best location. Having settled that, and knowing that they must build the road, I do not know what particular advantage careful estimates would have been. Then, Sir, besides the opposition of hon. members in this House, there has been the opposition of the Liberal press, which has been iterating and reiterating the arguments of hon. members in this House, on the points I have mentioned, and, being under less restraint, have gone one better, and have given the world the earliest information of blizzards and droughts and frosts in the North-West; and, for fear that the world would not observe these reports, they have always given them a prominent place on the first page, and have drawn attention to them by heavy headlines. Besides, there has been the publication of bogus experiences of supposititious individuals in the North-West; and these have been cut out and sent to a foreign press, subsidized for the purpose of discrediting the country and discrediting the Canadian Pacific Railway. Why, Sir, articles have been written, I am sure, for the very purpose of being republished in foreign newspapers. Take the Globe of the 5th of the present month, and you will find in it a letter supposed to have been written by a workman in that city out of work. I am not going to read the letter, but the writer makes the statement that 40 per cent. of the workmen in the city of Toronto at present are unemployed, and he says the Government are only betraying workmen by bringing immigrants to the North-West when fully 40 per cent. of the workmen in Toronto are at present unemployed. The Globe of the 6th, the following day, as if to give time for this letter to have its full effect, has an editorial headed "betrayed workmen," in which it calls special attention to the letter of the day before, and gives the impression to the public that this particular workman was one of those who were induced to come to this country to settle here. That was not the intention of the writer of the letter, but the impression is conveyed that 40 per cent. of the workmen in this country are out of work, and that it is the height of folly for any immigrant to come to Canada to-day. What could be more injurious or pernicious than this? If the Liberal papers of this country would only take a leaf out of the book of their neighbours to the south, they would never publish such articles. The political parties in the United States fight with all the rancour of the political parties in this country, but there is one thing they never do—they never foul their own nest, they never decry their own country. Why, Sir, if you will look at the Globe of the 5th, you will find the most astounding cablegram from England, headed "British opinion on the new bargain with the Canadian Pacific Railway—Investors in railways alarmed:"

Mr. Ives.

"The terms of the Canadian Government's proposed new arrangement with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have been announced here. They are receiving much attention from the press. The opinion is expressed that the Canadian Government is taking a course likely to damage the country's credit by linking its fortunes so closely with the railway. It is also thought that the proposed arrangement is in effect a gross breach of faith towards British capitalists who have invested in other Canadian railways. The subsidizing of the road in respect of works east of the original main line is taken to be an act of hostility towards investors in railways in Eastern Canada. This feeling appears to be gaining ground, and already it is rumoured that steps will be taken to express formally opposition to the scheme."

What these people are going to do, it is difficult to say. Whether a portion of the British army is to be sent here to turn us out, as Cromwell did the British Parliament years ago, it is difficult to say; but this much is certain—that the Parliament of Canada will maintain their right to manage Canadian interests without the assistance of the Globe correspondent in London. What is the pretence here? The pretence is that it is a breach of faith to the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company for the Government of Canada to assist in the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Why, pray? For the simple reason that the Canadian Pacific Railway, by means of the Ontario and Quebec Railway and the Credit Valley Railway, are likely to be competitors with the Grand Trunk Railway. I presume that the men who are making this objection, the shareholders in the Grand Trunk Railway, if they were shareholders in any other railway—in the London and North-Western Railway, for instance—would consider it a great breach of good faith if the Parliament of Great Britain were to allow a competing line with the London and North-Western. I was under the impression that there was more than one line of railway from London to Liverpool, and more than one line from London to Glasgow; and what, pray, would an English shareholder in the Grand Trunk Railway say if it were contended in England that it was a breach of faith to permit more than one line of railway to connect the same places? Yet, because people in England are shareholders in the Grand Trunk Railway Company, we are never to be permitted to construct any railway which by any possible chance can compete with that line. And these are the views of hon. gentlemen in the Opposition. They are supporting this view, that, although a monopoly is wrong in Manitoba, a monopoly must be preserved to the Grand Trunk Railway Company in the Province of Ontario. Sir, where are the reporters of the Globe, who used to go down regularly to the station, and observe the arrival of the train, and report in the Globe of next morning how many hours late the train was? Where are those reporters who used to give us such harrowing details of every accident that happened on the Grand Trunk Railway? Why, at the present day, you would not suppose such a thing as an accident ever happened on that railway line; and I cannot help asking where that sweet singer of Israel is who composed that ballad: "Ontario, Ontario?" It seems to me that, when an effort is made to rivet the bonds of the Grand Trunk Railway upon the Province of Ontario, when it is supported in this House by the whole force of the Liberal party, and is supported in the country by the whole force of their press, and after they have swallowed up the Great Western without dissent, and the Midland system, it is time that singer should compose another ballad in which the refrain would be: "Ontario, Ontario." I undertake to say, and it is evident from the course the Globe is now pursuing, that it is as much a part of the equipment of the Grand Trunk Railway as the rolling stock of that railway. Then we have the opposition of individual Liberals. We have the opposition of the party in this House, we have the opposition of the party press, and we have the opposition of individual Liberals; and the effort of the latter seems to be to foment discontent in the North-West by getting up meetings and getting up agitation among the people, leading them to suppose that they are being abused by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and by the Government. And, besides all this opposition, which we should not have at all, opposition from within, opposition which has done more harm to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and to the cause of immigration than all other opposition; besides all that, we have the opposition of every American line of railway to the construction of the eastern division of the Canadian Pacific. What do we see? We see Mr. Hill, one of the leading owners of the Minneapolis and St. Paul Railway, taking a prominent part in the formation of the Syndicate, taking stock in the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and taking the most active part in the organization of the Company, and in furnishing the money to organize it—up to a certain moment. From that moment he leaves the Company, he takes his money out of it, and he commences to fight it. What is the cause? The moment he left was the moment when he discovered that it was the determination of the Company and of the people of Canada that we should have a Canadian Pacific Railway in fact as well as in name—a line completed from ocean to ocean upon Canadian territory. Then we have the opposition of all the cities in the United States to this enterprise, all the cities which are interested in foreign shipping or in railways, the opposition of every railway in the United States that has a land grant to sell or is interested in the carrying of immigrants, and, as I have said before, the special opposition of the Grand Trunk Railway and its shareholders. And we even hear the credit of the Dominion itself attacked. These gentlemen have got so ambitious that they are not satisfied with bearing the stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, but are commencing to attack the credit of Canada itself; and I noticed the other day that the Marquis of Lorne, at a meeting he was attending in the interests of Canada, was obliged, as an initial step, to contradict a message from the city of New York to the effect that the financial affairs of the Dominion of Canada were in a very critical position. These opposing influences have been favoured at the same time by an almost unprecedented condition of weakness in the stock markets of London and New York, and this rendered it impossible for the Company to dispose of their stock except at an enormous sacrifice. Here is an additional reason why this House should receive with favour the propositions of the Government. The road is a national necessity; its early completion is a national necessity; the Company have performed their part of the contract well and thoroughly, and the hon. gentleman does not find a word of fault with the rate of progress they have made; and they have been opposed by forces which renders it in our interest, and renders it our duty, to support them. In November last, this state of things being represented to the Government, the Government made an arrangement by which they received a certain deposit of money and undertook to guarantee a 3 per cent. dividend upon $65,000,000 of the capital stock of the Company. Under any ordinary circumstances that should have sent the stock of the Company at least above 75 cents on the dollar; but under the circumstances actually existing, it not only did no service to the Company, but was actually injurious, inasmuch as it deprived them of the deposit of cash which they had made with the Government. Sir, with the permission of the House at this point, I would like, for a moment, to diverge from the line of argument in order to consider the value of Canadian Pacific Railway stock as an investment. At its present price of fifty-six the interest paid on the stock at 5 per cent. per annum is equal to a dividend of about 9 per cent. on the money invested; and taking the guaranteed dividend alone it is equivalent to an interest of 5½ per cent. Now, Sir, I propose, for a moment, to examine the question of a probable dividend after construction has been completed. To do this we ought to consider, first, the volume of dividend bearing stock; secondly, the probable earnings; and, thirdly, the income likely to be derived from the sale of the land grant; and we should enter into this investigation by making comparison with other Pacific roads. The road, when completed, is expected to have out a capital stock of $90,000,000, and it will owe as a funded debt about $5,000,000, making a total of debt and dividend bearing stock, of $95,000,000, for a total mileage of 3,304 miles. Now, Sir, compare this with the other Pacific railways. Take, for example, the Central Pacific Railway. Their main line, from Ogden to San Francisco, is 883 miles; the funded debt amounts to $61,258,680; the capital stock amounts to $59,275,500, and the total liability is $120,534,180. The Union Pacific Railway, from Council Bluffs to Ogden, is 1,042 miles; the funded debt is $75,132,512; the capital stock is $36,762,300; making a total of $111,894,812. The Union and Central Pacific combined have a funded debt and capital stock amounting to $232,428,992. The Northern Pacific has a mileage of 1,954, a funded debt of $68,850,000, a capital stock of $100,000,000, making a total liability of $168,850,000. Now, Sir, for a moment, compare the position of the Canadian Pacific Railway with these various other lines. The Canadian Pacific Railway, according to the figures I have given, would have to pay a dividend on about $28,000 to the mile; while the Central Pacific is required to pay interest and dividend, on about $136,000; the Union Pacific on $107,000 to the mile; and the Northern Pacific on $36,000 to the mile. Or, to make it more plain to the House, the Canadian Pacific Railway will pay dividends with one-fifth the earnings per mile that the Central Pacific would require, one-fourth the earnings that the Union Pacific would require, and one-third the earnings that the Northern Pacific would require to pay the same dividends. As to the past earnings, I claim that the result has been encouraging, if you consider the disconnected condition of the line and the extra expense entailed in its operation on that account. The gross earnings for the year 1883, were $5,420,913, with a mileage of 1,100 miles at the beginning, and 1,900 at the end of the year, or an average of, say, 1,530 miles for the year. This is an average of $3,536 per mile, notwithstanding, as I have said before, the incomplete and disconnected condition of the road, and the fact that it has been pushed somewhat in advance of settlement. On the eastern division the earnings for the year were at the rate of $3,464 per mile, or, less construction material, at the rate of $3,301 per mile. This has been secured entirely on the local traffic without any assistance from through traffic whatever, and it can easily be seen how largely the earnings will be increased when the whole of the line is connected. Now, as to probable earnings after the completion of the road. We have to take into consideration the Canadian business, in which I include the eastern movement of grain, and the western movement of manufactured goods, the movement of lumber from both west and east to the prairie section; and the distribution of fuel, together with the foreign business, such, for example, as the Chinese and Japanese trade with Europe and America. As to the latter business, there are three important advantages which the Canadian Pacific Railway will enjoy over any of the other Pacific lines—first, it will have a much shorter distance; secondly, it will have much easier grades; and, thirdly, it will have an independent position, the whole mileage being made upon one line of railway without change of cars. To illustrate the advantages that the Canadian Pacific Railway will enjoy, I will give you the following distances:—From Yokohama to Liverpool by the Central and Union Pacific Railways, the distance is 11,990 miles; by the Canadian Pacific Railway the distance is 10,977 miles, an advantage in favour of our line of 1,013 miles. Now, as to the matter of grades. The Northern Pacific has grades of from 118 to 130 feet per mile, frequently, over the mountain section, extending for 900 miles. On the Union and Central Pacific Railways you find grades of 116 feet to the mile, frequently, over mountain sections of 1,225 miles in extent. On the Canadian Pacific Railway there will be one maximum grade of 116 feet going west for a distance of twenty miles, and two of 116 feet coming east. From the summit of the Rocky Mountains to Lake Superior, coming eastward, the maximum grade will be 40 feet, and going westward 52½ feet to the mile. Between Montreal and the summit of the Rocky Mountains, either way, the maximum will not exceed 52½ feet to the mile; and the mountain section, instead of being 900 miles in length, as in the case of the Northern Pacific, and 1,225 miles, as in the case of the Union and Central Pacific, will be covered by a distance of 125 miles. In addition to this, and quite as important as either of these considerations, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company will be able to run its own line—to run its own cars from one ocean to the other; and I claim that these advantages are sufficient to draw to our line a very considerable part of the Chinese and Japanese trade. Now, coming back to the question of the movement of grain and cattle, I have no doubt that there will be a surplus for exportation. I have great faith in the possibilities of that country. I believe that it is now fully and clearly established beyond dispute that there is a very large area of country there, which is, at least, among the best wheat-producing countries in the world. Now, Sir, I have been curious to enquire what acreage of wheat and oats would be sufficient to furnish a paying business for the Canadian Pacific Railway, and what acreage the Canadian Pacific Railway will have to reach out for. Well, Sir, the railway belt alone contains 22,000,000 acres of good wheat land; and when you add to that the additional country which will be made tributary to the line by the branches of the railway Company itself, and the independent branches, you can form an idea of the immense area of country that will be served by this road. Now, Sir, supposing that three-fourths of the grain is exported, and one-fourth is retained in the country for consumption, at moderate rates for freight, how much grain would be required to be raised in Manitoba and the North-West to furnish a paying business for the Canadian Pacific Railway? Suppose, for example, that 20,000,000 bushels were raised—and that is a very much smaller amount than the hon. Minister of Railways mentioned the other night. Supposing that 20,000,000 bushels are raised, and that 15,000,000 bushels would be exported; that would furnish, at 400 bushels per car, 37,300 car-loads of grain to be moved eastward, this with the other business that would necessarily follow, such as the carriage into the country of manufactured goods, the distribution of lumber, and the distribution of fuel, would furnish, beyond all question, a dividend paying business for the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now, Sir, it does not require so large a country to produce 20,000,000 bushels of grain as some hon. gentlemen might suppose. Making a moderate estimate, supposing each farmer will have fifty acres in grain and that is not a large estimate for a western country, but a small estimate it will only require 20,000 people to be engaged in farming in the North-West and Manitoba, to produce a paying business for the Canadian Pacific Railway. And, Sir, the acreage last year under crop is estimated by good authority to have been 500,000 acres, or one-half the quantity under cultivation that is required to furnish business for the road. I estimate the probable acreage under cultivation next year at 625,000 acres, and say, in 1885, 900,000, or within 100,000 of the acreage necessary to be under cultivation to furnish a business that will pay a dividend on the stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. It is easy to see, if a population is settled in that country, that there must be a large business in the western movement of manufactured goods. There is an exceedingly large business already. It is easy to see that the distribution of coal and lumber will also make a large business, to say nothing about the mining boom in the mountains, of which we are beginning to hear, and the production of cattle and sheep on the North-West ranches. Not only will our line have the advantage over the other Pacific roads, as regards trade between Asia and Europe, but it will have the advantage in the transport of grain to Liverpool in point of distance. A comparison of distances to Liverpool, by the different Pacific railways, shows that our road has a very large advantage. For instance, by the Central and Union Pacific the distance is 6,762 miles; by the Northern Pacific, 6,841 miles; by the Canadian Pacific, 5,941 miles, or nearly 1,000 miles shorter than by any other Pacific road. What dividends do these other Pacific roads pay on their stock? The Central Pacific, with a debt amounting to $136,000 per mile, with a debt which requires the Company to earn $5 to pay a dividend where the Canadian Pacific Railway Company would be required to earn only $1, actually pays a regular dividend of 6 per cent. and has paid as high as 10 per cent. in one year. The Union Pacific pays 7 per cent. on its capital stock regularly. Besides all this, an additional comparison might be made with other railways in the United States running through a prairie country. The bonded debt of the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy amounts to $51,000 per mile; of the Chicago and Alton to $54,000 per mile; of the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific to $47,000 per mile. These roads are all paying roads, they are all competing lines running between the same points, and their bonded debts are two or three times as much as that of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company; and they all run through a prairie country and depend on the same class of business as the Canadian Pacific Railway will depend upon. Then the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have the sale of their land grant to steady the rate of dividend. An idea may be arrived at of the income that is likely to be derived from the sale of the lands by the following statement: The average of past sales has been $2.36 per acre. At the same rate the balance of the land grant would yield $50,000,000, against which there would be a charge of about $16,000,000, land grant bonds, $5,000,000 of which are deposited with the Government. This would leave say $40,000,000 which would be available from time to time after the loan from the Government has been paid off in steadying the rate of dividend until such time as the earnings of the Company from other sources would be sufficient. Then I say that, considering the 3 per cent. dividend guaranteed by the Government for a period of ten years, considering the fact that this railway is the great artery through an agricultural country of unrivalled extent and fertility, considering that it will have little or no bonded debt when it is completed, considering its advantages in point of grades and distances, considering its independent position, considering the value of its land grant—I think in a fair market, and without the opposition that we all deplore, this stock should bear a high price in the market as an investment. But, Sir, the guarantee did not avail in strengthening the market. It is a fight between the enemies of Canada on the one hand, aided by the enemies of the present Government, and Canadian interests; and the time has come when the Canadian Government and the Conservative party supporting that Government, have to take a hand in the struggle. And the question is, what course shall we adopt with respect to the Resolutions now submitted for our approval or rejection? There are three alternatives: we may suspend operations on this railway; we may oblige the Company, perhaps, to sell their stock at a sacrifice, or we may make the loan as proposed by the Government. There is one consideration which comes in right here, and that is, that we cannot under the contract, compel the Company to sell their stock or sacrifice their lands. We cannot compel them even to go on with the work. They have a perfect right, as I understand the contract, to suspend operations for five or six years, if they choose to do so, and then go on with the work, provided they complete it within the time mentioned in the contract. What would be the effect on the country if they suspended operations? It would be, in the first place, to discharge about 12,000 men, in mid-winter, and throw them upon the country for support. It would be to weaken the already somewhat weak nerves of bankers and capitalists, to put it mildly, and it would throw a blanket, and a wet one too, over every interest and industry in this country; and it would stop the wheels of progress as regards settlement, immigration and progress generally for an indefinite period. What would be the effect on the Conservative party, which is always an important consideration to the country? It would be this: The people would say, and would have the right to say, you approved of a contract, in 1881, for the construction of this railway; you came back to us for our approval or rejection; and we returned you by an overwhelming majority; then, you were not satisfied. In the Speech from the Throne, at the opening of the Session, it was plainly indicated that additional assistance must be given the railway Company; and at two bye-elections, taking place at points far remote from one another, which occurred after this declaration was made in the Speech from the Throne, we gave most unmistakeable approval of the proposition to further aid the Company; still, notwithstanding these unmistakeable declarations, you have come up to the hedge and refused to take the step which prudence and reason require you to take. The Liberals themselves could not have done worse or have acted less in the interests of the people. But what would be the result of selling stock at a sacrifice? It would be to add very largely to the proprietary interest, and it would make it impossible for the Company to give as fair and low rates of freight and passage as they would be able to give provided the stock is kept at a reasonable figure. What would be the result if this loan is made and is repaid, as we have every reason to say that it will be? The result will be that we borrow the money at 4 per cent. and lend it at 5, a transaction which would be a profitable one to the Dominion from that point of view. But supposing the loan should not be repaid, I desire to submit a statement to the House which I have prepared with some care, as to what the road would cost us in case it came into our hands under a foreclosure. I make the cost of the main line $75,891,900, in this way: Expended by the Government, $28,000,000; cash subsidy, $25,000,000; loan, $22,500,000; and 3,753,400 acres of land, actually sold, at $1 per acre, $3,753,400; land grant bonds sold and uncovered by sales of land, $1,123,500; allowing twelve months' interest for the default, $3,215,000, making a total of $83,591,900. From this should be deducted the branch railways, say, $4,500,000; for payments made in the purchase of the line from Callander to Montreal and Brockville, $3,200,000; total, $7,700,000, which deducted from the total, leaves as the cost of the railway, $75,891,900. But besides this there is another consideration which must not be forgotten. We have a line and an equipment at least $10,000,000 more valuable than the line and equipment which were estimated by the hon. Minister of Railways in 1880. In addition to all that, there is a saving to the Government of six years' interest during construction upon their cash subsidy of $25,000,000, and upon the money expended by the Government in railway construction, of $28,000,000; that is to say, the saving of interest for six years upon $53,000,000 amounts to $12,720,000. I do not mean to propose the reduction of this $10,000,000 and this $12,000,000 from the figures I have given as the cost, but I do mean to say that it is a fair subject for consideration. The Government are supposed to have got value for what they gave their money for when the road is completed, and if the road is completed six years before 1891, we are entitled to mention the fact, and there is a saving of interest during construction of six years on this amount. I will only refer to the fact that the cost of this road is going to come far under any estimate which has hitherto been made either by hon. gentlemen to my right, or hon. gentlemen in front of me. The estimate of the hon. member who last addressed the House, of $120,000,000, made in his speech of 1880, was not for a better road or a better equipment than that which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has built; and certainly the road and equipment, as I said before, is much better than were estimated for by the hon. Minister of Railways. Another important consideration is the value of the lands which Parliament in 1879 set apart and consecrated for the purpose of the construction of this road. We, by formal resolution in 1879, set apart, for the purpose of completing this road, no less than 100,000,000 acres of land; and whether you take the price at $1 or at a higher figure, it is certain that the cost of this railway, if it falls into our hands under foreclosure, will be largely within the value of the subvention which the House made for the purpose of the construction of this railway. I now come to the consideration of some additional points in the speech of the hon. member who last addressed the House on this subject. I took pains in reading his speech, after getting possession of Hansard, to distribute it under different heads, and I found when I had got the points distributed, that they fell under the following heads: Criticisms of the Syndicate; criticisms of the Government, and reasons why the Resolutions should not be adopted; and I am bound to say that, by far the largest part of the speech will be found under the heads of criticisms of the Government and criticisms of the Company. The first ground of criticism of the Syndicate was that the hon. member had no means of knowing how much stock had been given to the members of the Syndicate for advancing the $5,000,000 necessary to be paid in by the Company in organizing. Well, I have no means of knowing, but the hon. gentleman himself told us sufficient to lead us to know that there had not been a very large advantage given to the Syndicate in the sale or distribution of this stock. He told us that the net proceeds of this stock, after deducting all commissions, amounted to about 46 cents on the dollar; and we all know that the price at which it was emitted to the stockholders has been about, on an average, 50 cents on the dollar.

Mr. Ives.

Mr. BLAKE. Sixty cents on the dollar.

Mr. IVES. Some at 60, but more of it at less than 50. Therefore it is perfectly evident, by the hon. gentleman's own showing, that there cannot have been any particular advantage given to the members of the Syndicate in distributing the stock allowed to them for the $5,000,000 of capital which they furnished in the organization of the Company. I may say that in this matter Parliament has no interest except to know that an inordinate amount has not been given—an amount which would largely increase the proprietary interest of the road, and largely affect the question of dividends and rates. If the hon. gentleman is able to figure out that the stock, including all that was given to the Syndicate, has yielded an average of 46 cents on the dollar, instead of making out a case against the Syndicate, he has made out a case in their favour. I am aware that it has been usual with other great lines of railway, particularly lines constructed to the south of us in the United States, for the directors and promoters to make a large grab in the way of profits and stocks; and that having been the case with reference to almost all the American Pacific roads, it having been the case in respect to the Grand Trunk, I was not much surprised that the hon. gentleman directed attention to this subject. I am, however, exceedingly happy that he did not find the mare's nest that he was looking for. It is to be observed that the best evidence that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and the original promoters of that Company, have not been after a grab of stock, or of profits, out of this undertaking, is the character of the road they have built, the way in which they have carried on their work, and the fact that the stock has realized, under all the circumstances, as much as 46 cents on the dollar. Then the hon. gentleman objects to the fact that a construction company was organized; and he points his objection with the remark that the construction company ceased operations as soon as the funds gave out, and argues from that that its object was to rob the railway Company. In this matter also, the Government has no interest, unless the construction company was used as a means of robbing the railway Company. Now, Sir, it has been found necessary to carry on all great enterprises of this kind by means of construction companies. I am quite prepared to admit that there have been cases of abuse—cases in which the directors of a company have had an interest in the construction company, and have made their steal by that means; but it is none the less true that a construction company is useful, and, under certain circumstances, necessary. For example, the promoters of a great work like this have not money in hand with which to pay for construction. They have a right to emit stock and bonds for that purpose; but it is almost always impossible to induce the general public to invest in their stock or their bonds until a certain amount of progress has been made in construction. It is, as a rule, necessary to organize construction companies, giving them certain advantages in order to induce them to construct railways, and to hold back the stock and bonds until there is a market for them. In this case it so happens, not as the hon. gentleman stated, that none of the directors of the Canadian Pacific Railway were directors of the construction company, and it also happens that they had no more interest in the construction company than every other shareholder in the railway Company had. It is a fact, as I am informed, that a trustee for the railway Company represented it on the board of the construction company, and that that was the only interest anybody connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway had in this construction company. It is also true that only a small portion of the road has been constructed by a construction company—only one-third of the distance between Winnipeg and the summit of the Rocky Mountains. And I may here say that the object of organizing this construction company, was to induce certain capitalists, not members of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, to lend their strength and their financial credit to the enterprise, for the purpose of carrying on the work of construction; and it is an open secret that so careful were the railway Company of the interests of the railway—so impossible did those gentlemen who went into the construction company find it to make any money out of it, that they gave up their contract—not because the funds ran out, but because there was no money in it—owing, when they ceased, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the sum mentioned by the hon. Minister of Railways. It is another reason why the Company should receive the favourable consideration of this House—that these gentlemen have not allowed any grab, or made any grab, at the expense of this Company, or at the expense of the country. The hon. gentleman next argues that the Syndicate increased their capital stock from $25,000,000 to $100,000,000, and that they got the Government to guarantee a 3 per cent. dividend, in order that they might get 11 per cent. interest on the money they put into the stock. One word, I think, is sufficient in answer to that. If these gentlemen did that, they must have entirely changed their minds, because, instead of using the time until 1891 to draw that interest, they have so hurried construction as to cut off six years of that high rate of interest. But the hon. gentleman himself, in another part of his speech, furnishes an answer to this same objection. He tells us that it is perfectly childish to suppose that the guarantee could have appreciated the stock, or could have been of any advantage to the stockholders. If so, it is perfectly evident that his objection, which I am now commenting upon, is unfounded. The hon. gentleman next objects to the acquisition of the Atlantic and North-Western charter, and to the purchase of a controlling interest in the South-Eastern Railway. Now, Sir, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have an interest that the freight which they bring from the west to the city of Montreal, particularly in the winter season, should be carried to the seaboard at a reasonable rate; besides, the Grand Trunk Railway controlled the only bridge that crossed the St. Lawrence, and, at the time the Canadian Pacific Railway Company invested in the South-Eastern, controlled every line of railway leading from Montreal, except the South-Eastern. It is an open secret that it was a race between the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Pacific to obtain a controlling interest in that road. Although I am prepared to admit that it is a question about which something can be said on both sides, yet I think the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have an interest that their freight, brought to Montreal and proceeding to the seaboard, should not be left entirely at the mercy of the Grand Trunk Railway. But the hon. Minister of Railways gave another reason, and an exceedingly good reason, why the Company invested in a controlling interest in the South-Eastern Railway. It was that they desired to attract to it and to their own line business coming from the seaboard and going westward. It is perfectly evident that if the Canadian Pacific Railway Company confine their interests west of the river, or west of the city of Montreal, everything going from the east to the west will pass over the Grand Trunk; and therefore if the Canadian Pacific is to obtain any business south of Montreal, it is necessary that it should have feeders to bring that business to it. And for my part, I consider that, interested as the country is in assuring a large volume of business on this Canadian line, interested as the country is in low rates of freight on that line, we can at least pardon the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for having had the fore-sight to prevent the Grand Trunk from controlling the last avenue from the east, and thereby securing all the freight going from the east to the west. But the hon. gentleman made merry over the idea that the Canadian Pacific Railway could not use the South-Eastern as a feeder without it becoming at the same time a sucker; or, in other words, that if the Canadian Pacific Railway took business coming westward, from the South-Eastern, they must necessarily give other business to the South-Eastern. I do not see anything particular to laugh at in the statement of the hon. Minister of Railways. Take, for instance, the case of the Central Vermont which runs alongside the South-Eastern. The Central Vermont is under the control and in the alliance of the Grand Trunk Railway. It is a feeder of the Grand Trunk Railway. The business brought to Montreal from the west over the Central Vermont goes to the Grand Trunk Railway; but, because the business coming from the east goes to the Grand Trunk, it does not follow that the Central Vermont carries the freight of the Grand Trunk Railway to the seaboard. It is merely a branch of the Grand Trunk Railway, which carries its own traffic over the main line to Portland via Island Pond. So far as the Atlantic and North-Western was concerned, that charter contained the power of bridging the St. Lawrence, and it was a matter of importance to the Syndicate to obtain the right to bridge that river, and to obtain an interest in the South-Eastern. I now come to a question about which I hesitate saying anything, because it seems to me a matter entirely unworthy of mention in this House. I refer to the statement of the hon. gentleman that the gentlemen of the Syndicate had built lordly palaces and made magnificent benefactions, the insinuation being that they built these lordly palaces and made these magnificent benefactions out of their profits from the Canadian Pacific Railway. I claim that such a statement, unless founded on fact, is one which should not have been made here, and which should not attract attention here. It is a matter of fact well known to all that these gentlemen were wealthy before they ever had anything to do with the Canadian Pacific Railway, that they were in a position to build good houses and make large benefactions independent of the Canadian Pacific Railway; and it is also a matter of fact that the contract for this lordly palace, which the hon. gentleman thought worthy of mention here, had been let for some two years before its owner ever had or thought of having anything to do with the Canadian Pacific Railway. I think it is to be regretted that gentlemen of wealth cannot make benefactions to a worthy object, such as McGill College or a hospital, without mention being made of it in this House in the manner in which this has been referred to. The hon. gentleman next objects that the prairie section has cost more than any recent estimate; and the inference which he draws is that an excessive expenditure was made in its construction. What did it cost? It cost only $17,000,000 for the whole 958 miles, or an average of less than $18,000 per mile. I do not know whether an estimate of 1880 would be considered a recent one; but in his speech of 1880 the hon. gentleman estimated that this section of the road would cost $42,000,000, as against $17,000,000. The hon. gentleman also noticed a discrepancy in the estimates of the cost of the railway. He referred to the official memorandum issued in December, 1882, by Mr. Stephen, the President of the Company, and to a letter from Mr. Stephen to the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company in 1883; and he commented at very great length upon the fact that the estimate of the cost made by Mr. Stephen in this official memorandum and open letter to the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway was largely in excess of what is now estimated would be necessary to build this railway. Of course, that was a matter of considerable importance; but it so happens, on examination of this official memorandum and this letter to the shareholders, that there was no estimate of cost in it at all. It was not given as an estimate of cost. It was simply a statement by Mr. Stephen of the amount of proprietary interest in the shape of stock that would own the completed line and the unused land grant. It was simply a statement that $90,000,000 stock would own the completed line, and would own the unused land grant. The hon. gentleman also called attention to the fact that there was a discrepancy in the statement made by Mr. Drinkwater some months ago, and that in January last, as to the bonded debt of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company from Callander to Montreal. I am not in a position, at this moment, to answer the hon. gentleman on that point, but I have no doubt that some one else who will follow me will be able to do so. This much I have ascertained, that in the Railway Statistical Returns of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, sworn to on the 11th January, 1884, by Mr. Drinkwater, the Secretary of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the following is set down as the debt:—Canada Central bonds assumed by the Company, first mortgage bonds, $850,000; second mortgage bonds, $973,333; and the amount due the Province of Quebec on the purchase of the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway, $3,500,000; making a total of $5,323,333, as stated by the hon. Minister of Railways. A discrepancy was also noticed by the hon. gentleman in the return of lands sold by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company on the 30th June, 1883, and the present statement. The hon. gentleman himself explained the reason for that discrepancy. The reason was: that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company took back from the North-West Land Company 2,000,000 acres of land which had been previously sold. This was included in the return of June, 1883, but is not included in the statement now before the House. The hon. gentleman also commented on the fact that the Canadian Pacific Railway had expended a sum of money to sustain the stock of the North-West Land Company, thus giving an impression which is not founded on fact. I do not suppose he intended to do so, but the impression he conveyed was that the Company had gone on the market and had purchased shares to prevent the stock from falling. That is not the case. The Company never purchased a share directly or indirectly of stock in the North-West Land Company on the market. The amount put down, and which was mentioned by the hon. Minister of Railways the other night, is the original subscription of the Company at the time the prospectus was first issued. They never owned an additional share of the stock, they never purchased or sold one. So much for the hon. gentleman's criticisms of the Company. We now come to his criticisms of the Government. He comments upon the change of policy in the manner of paying the subsidy. He says he is happy to see that the Government have come to his views with regard to the correct method of paying the subsidy to the Company. There was excellent reason why the subsidy during the first years of construction should be paid out by a mileage rate. That reason is this: that, in the first years of construction, it was necessary for the Company to purchase railway plant, railway material and rolling stock; it was necessary for them to make large expenditures which would apply to the whole work, and it was necessary, therefore, to pay them more than a pro rata amount of the cost. But that time has gone by; they now have the plant and the rolling stock; and the Government, when the proper time has come to make the change—for, when the reason for the former state of things has ceased, the effect also ceases—the Government now change the policy, and adopt a policy which shall secure the completion of the railway, for the loan which it is now proposed should be made. In fact, it is a question of a practical and common-sense policy, a practical and common-sense Government, as opposed to a theoretical opposition. The next objection of the hon. gentleman is that the progress of the North-West has been retarded by the so-called monopoly clause, and the disallowance of Manitoba railway charters. I shall not take up the time of the House on this point, but I wish to observe that the only thing in which the country is interested is that there should be reasonably low rates, that the business should be done by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that the business should be held for the benefit of Canada. A sound National Policy applies as much to railway construction in the North-West as it applies to trade matters here. It is as necessary to have a National Policy in the matter of railway construction in the North-West as it is to have a National Policy in force for the benefit of the manufacturers and people of the Dominion of Canada. Sir, the older Provinces of Canada have been called upon to pledge their credit in large sums for the benefit of the people of the North-West, for the benefit of the immigrants who are going in there, and it is not too much to ask that such a policy should be pursued as will preserve to the manufacturers of old Canada the advantages of the market of the North-West. The hon. gentleman made a distinction between the railway constructed and owned by the Government and the railway constructed and owned by a company. Sir, there is no distinction whatever. The same policy should be pursued as it would have been necessary to pursue if the Government had owned the road; and, the moment that the line is completed, the moment that we are put fairly in connection with the people of the North-West, the moment that our merchants and manufacturers are given a fair chance with the manufacturers and merchants of the United States, then the time will come when this monopoly clause may be done away with, when the country may be opened to free railway construction and free railway competition. The hon. gentlemen had a good deal of sport over the idea that anybody, much less a Government, could have supposed that the taking of a certain amount of money and placing it in the hands of the Government would be of any advantage to the stock of the Company. His idea was this: that the amount of money necessary to secure the Government would be the same amount, whether it was in the hands of the Government or in the hands of the Company. Well, Sir, I cannot dispute that proposition; but I undertake to say that that money, in the hands of the Company, might possibly be expended in paying their floating debt, or in railway construction, and it would not very likely be reserved for the payment of a dividend for ten years to come; whereas, if it is placed in the hands of the Government, a 3 per cent. dividend is assured. If the hon. gentleman made a wager with me of $1,000, I should not be any better able to pay that wager if I put the money into the hands of a third party, than if I kept it in my pocket; but I do not hesitate to say that he would feel safer in regard to getting his bet if I placed it in the hands of another person than if I kept it in my own pocket. And the same principle applies to the setting aside of this money for the purpose of paying a dividend. The hon. gentleman also held that it was a mistake for the hon. Minister of Railways to reckon, among the moneys furnished by the Company, the amount of their floating liability. Well, where should he have placed it? Should he have placed it amongst the moneys furnished by the Government? The Minister of Railways was giving an account of the moneys furnished by the Government, on the one hand, and the moneys furnished by the railway Company on the other. He naturally did not put it down as having been furnished by the Government. Of course, the money has not been furnished in one sense, but it has been procured, it has been expended on the line, and, if the line fell into the hands of the Government, it would be as useful as any portion of the money that has been expended by the Company. What I mean to say, with respect to these floating liabilities and the right of the hon. Minister of Railways to reckon them as moneys furnished by the Company, is this: Suppose that liability existed to a man who had been constructing the railway in the North-West; the man continues to the last to be unpaid, but the railway falls into the hands of the Government; I ask if that is not as useful expenditure to the Government as any other expenditure that the Company could have made? So much for the hon. gentleman's criticisms of the Government. We now come to the reasons he urged why these Resolutions should not pass, for you will agree with me, Mr. Speaker, that the points which I have mentioned, which I have been trying to comment upon, are not reasons why these Resolutions should be rejected, or should be adopted. The hon. gentleman, however, said that he had his doubts whether

27,000,000 of money would be sufficient to complete the road. He says, however, that, if 27,000,000 of money would be sufficient to complete the road, we are asked to actually furnish all that would be necessary, because the balance of our cash subsidy and the loan will make up the amount. He also says that, if the amount is not sufficient, we shall see the Company back asking for more money. Now, if the $27,000,000 is sufficient, it will complete the railway; and it is not a reason why we should not adopt the Resolutions, that it is not sufficient. It is a reason why we should increase it, or, if the amount is too great, it is a reason why we should diminish it; and the fact that we are furnishing nearly all the money that will be expended to complete the road, according to this estimate, is no reason why the Resolutions should not be adopted. What should we do? We are taking over into our hands the control of all the assets of the Company; we are depriving them almost entirely of the power of raising money, and surely, doing that, we are bound to make a loan adequate to the completion of the railway. The hon. gentleman told us a great deal, but there were two or three things he did not tell us, and which it was important he should tell us. He did not tell us he would like to see the work suspended upon this line, nor did he tell us of any other or better way of providing the money to continue the operations. If the hon. gentleman could satisfy us that it is better to suspend operations, or could show us some other or better way of providing the money, he would have adduced an argument which would have very great effect upon my mind, at any rate, and I believe on the minds of all the hon. members in this House. That is the important question. It is still time for some hon. member of the Opposition to show us a better way of providing the means of completing this railway. If they can do so, it will not be necessary to use the influences of the lobby, which the Globe referred to in its issue of yesterday, and it will not be necessary to take the measures that these Resolutions shall pass and not be lost that the hon. member for West Durham hinted the hon. Minister of Railways had taken. Sir, the hon. gentleman's criticism of the speech of the hon. Minister of Railways amounts to this: the hon. Minister of Railways asserts that the work upon this line should not be suspended, and that this is the only feasible means of procuring the money to go on with it. The hon. gentleman answers to that: the road has been built through poor land; it might have been built through better land. The hon. Minister of Railways repeats that this road must be built; that it will not do to suspend operations upon it; and that this is the only way of procuring the money. The hon. member answers that there has been too large an issue of capital stock. The hon. Minister of Railways repeats the same assertion over and over again; and the answer of the hon. member is: that the Company have been building lordly palaces and making princely benefactions. That is the style of the answer which the hon. member who last addressed the House made to the propositions of the hon. Minister of Railways which are submitted for our consideration. Sir, in conclusion, what is the duty of the House in respect to this important matter? We should bear in mind that we are laying the foundation of an empire. We should bear in mind that the one great object for which we are sitting here is to advance the interests of the country. We should bear in mind that the North-West is the portion of country which we are to look to for development and growth. We should bear in mind that it is essential, and a national necessity, that that road should be built, and that the country should be populated. And, Sir, we should ask ourselves this question: Do we desire to see a suspension for six years of the progress of that work and the progress of the country? If we do not, is there any other or better way of procuring the money than the way proposed by the hon. Minister of Railways? If there is not, if the credit of Canada is sufficient to procure this money at a reasonable rate of interest, and if it is necessary to complete the road, then by all means let us complete it. Let us not put our hands to the plough and then turn back. Sir, in 1880, in addressing this House I ventured to express the hope that our great and respected chief would live to see the completion of that great enterprise. Since that day he has lived slower and the work has been progressing faster than I expected; and I think I may express the hope that he may not only live to see the railway built, but that when he leaves us, his deepest mourners will be a million of happy prosperous and grateful people settled in this North-West.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I agree entirely with the hon. mover of these Resolutions, and also with the hon. gentleman who has last spoken, in thinking that we have rarely, probably never, since Confederation, been called upon to deal with a subject involving more seriously the whole future destinies of this country than in the motion which is now before you. And, Sir, in the first instance, before I proceed to review the remarks of the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Ives), permit me to bring back the House to a consideration of the main questions which appear to me to be involved in these Resolutions. These, Sir, as I understand them, are two. First of all, are we really, fairly considering our position, looking at the demands upon us, looking at our true financial position, in a position to incur the risk of spending $30,000,000 more in assisting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company? And, in the next place, granting that we are in a position to spend this high sum, or to risk this high sum of money, has a sufficient case been made out by the mover of the Resolutions to warrant our assuming so grave a responsibility. To which may be added, perhaps, this third question: Have the extraordinary variations which have already been shown to have taken place in the calculations of the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, been so far explained as to warrant implicit confidence in the accuracy of those gentlemen's future calculations? Now, Sir, the hon. Minister of Railways, when introducing these Resolutions, put his whole case, I may say, on this one plea: that the Company required no aid at our hands, they were quite able to fulfil their contract according to its terms; but for the sake of shortening the time for the construction of the railway, it would be, in his judgment, well worth our while to undertake this great liability. The hon. gentleman who succeeded and supplemented him took a somewhat different view, but still not differing so materially from the hon. mover as to make it apparent to us that there was any cause assigned for increasing this great liability, other than the expediency of constructing the road within a period of two years. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, on the other hand, asked, and he asked with very good reason, why the whole policy of the Government should be so suddenly inverted. He asked why, instead of, as we were informed some six months ago, being about to receive a very large sum of money from the Company, we are suddenly called upon to lend them an equally large sum. We asked why we are required to do this in such indecent haste; why we are denied necessary information on which we could base a judgment of the expediency of this proceeding. He pointed out that papers containing that information, moved for by himself a whole year ago, had not been laid on the Table of the House; that documents of the most important character had been placed in our hands within a few hours and not yet printed; he showed in every possible way that the House was not in the possession of information which the House itself, by ordering the information to be brought down, had shown that it believed to be necessary to the proper discussion of this question. The hon. Minister was good enough to tell us that what we were called upon to do was a mere formality. All we had to do, he said, was practically to endorse the Company. Well, Sir, most of us in our private transactions have heard that story before. Most of us know to our bitter cost that we had better than and there have made a present of the money than to have put our name on the back of our friend's bill; and I am much afraid that something like that—in spite of the hon. gentleman's assurance, in spite of all the pledges and precautions that can be taken—will be the result to the people of Canada if these Resolutions pass. The hon. gentleman behind me said, and said most truly, that the whole value of the Canadian Pacific Railway to the people of Canada lies in its being the means of the development of the North-West. I entirely concur with that hon. gentleman; and my charge, and our charge against the Government of Canada, is, that by their misconduct in regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway, by their misconduct in regard to the land policy and divers other matters, they have contributed most seriously to impede the proper development of the North-West, and to prevent the people of Canada from reaping a title of the benefits which they ought to have reaped from the possession of that magnificent country. With all that the mover has said, with all that this hon. gentleman has said as to the resources of that country, as to the extent to which they might be developed, I fully and entirely concur; although, Sir, I think that the hon. gentleman, who I believe has been in the North-West himself, when he hinted that the members of the Opposition—and I think he alluded to my hon. friend here—were in the habit of alluding to Dakota and Texas at the expense of the North-West, might have recalled to his mind that it has been stated—rightly or wrongly, I do not know—that he, himself, after having examined the North-West, after having been so fully convinced of its magnificent resources, actually became a large proprietor in Texas. I do not blame my hon. friend.

Mr. IVES. I was probably convinced by the hon. gentleman and his friends.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As I say, I do not blame my hon. friend; but in this case, as in many others, I think, perhaps, that practice is a little better than precept. No, Sir, I am more liberal to my hon. friend than some of his friends are to friends of mine. I do not think it is a high crime and misdemeanor on his part that he should have invested a little of his money in American property, or American securities, particularly when I say that the Americans are likely to make a good thing, as many of them have made already to my knowledge, out of this same Canadian Pacific Railway. Then, Sir, my hon. friend proceeded to what he would call an historical narrative of the affairs of the Canadian Pacific Railway; and listening to my hon. friend, I recalled a piece of advice once given to me many years ago by a very eminent practical politician. I was once called upon to draw up a statement of the affairs of an institution. This practical politician suggested to me that I had better do it by way of an historical narrative; and upon my asking him what an historical narrative really was, the practical politician remarked that an historical narrative was the best way to tell a story. Sir, it has dwelt in my mind ever since; and when I hear a gentleman refer to an historical narrative it always returns to my mind that an historical method is the best method to tell a story. Now, Sir, I do not want to complicate this discussion by a reference to the unhappy events of ten or eleven years ago, which we all deplore, and which ought to be deplored; but I think so good an advocate as my hon. friend would have done well to say nothing about Sir Hugh Allan and the causes of his failure. These causes were not creditable to Canada, but I will not dwell on them now—I do not want to dwell on them now. If, however, we find, Sir, that too much is said as to the causes why the Canadian Pacific Railway, instead of being an unmixed advantage, has been a source of danger and peril to the people of this country, we too, Sir, may have recourse to certain past events, and we may have occasion to remind gentlemen that there were causes why the original contract for the Canadian Pacific Railway did not prove a success, which are not attributable to any act of the gentlemen on this side of the House. The hon. gentleman says that this road is a national necessity. Well, Sir, that is true; and no man ever recognized that fact more than my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Mackenzie). But when my hon. friend was at great cost, and under circumstances of extraordinary difficulty, engaged in endeavouring to open up that country, in a way which everybody, as this hon. gentleman truly said, now sees was his plain and bounden duty, we, on this side, can recollect how he was denounced—not to do him justice, by the hon. Minister of Railways, but by the very men who are now the colleagues of these hon. gentlemen—for his extravagance in going on with the road between Prince Arthur and Winnipeg.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, some of them did; and the press did pretty extensively. More than that, the Pembina Branch was denounced. It was said that he was going to make a connection with American railways; and I see before me some of the hon. gentlemen who specially denounced my hon. friend, because, Sir, he was going to create a monopoly by leasing the Pembina Branch for seven or eight years to certain gentlemen, who, if I remember aright, now have a monopoly for twenty years. It is true that this road is a national necessity; but it is a non sequitur that we are bound to construct this road at all hazards, within a time shorter than the contract calls for. But, Sir, if it be so all-important that this road is to be built in two years, how comes it that in the Resolutions before us, that in the speech of the hon. Minister of Railways, and in the speech of this hon. gentleman (Mr. Ives), we hear nothing about any obligation being imposed on the Company to build it in two years? I do not see the clause. Is it to be put in at a subsequent stage? We are told that the Company will build it when it suits the Company's convenience. I see plenty of obligations on our side, but none on the part of the Company; but if it is so important to build it in two years, why should not some obligation be imposed by these hon. gentlemen on the Company to do so? My hon. friend very properly pointed out that the grades of this road for some considerable distance west of Winnipeg were good grades, that they do not exceed 40 feet to the mile. But my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Mackenzie), if I remember aright, had laid out a line on which the grade would hardly have run to 40 feet, at least for a long distance west of Winnipeg. The question is not what are the grades over the prairie section, or even close to the summit of the Rocky Mountains; but what I should like to know, and what the House and the country would like to know is, what are the grades you are going to get when crossing those difficult passes in the neighbourhood of the Kicking Horse Pass? We have been informed—I hope incorrectly—but we have been informed, and it has been publicly asserted over and over again, that the grades in that region range to something as high as 116 feet to the mile for several consecutive miles; and I am informed by my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie) that the hon. Minister made that statement himself last year. That is a serious consideration. I should be glad if it should be found that this is a mistake, and I hope that better grades may be obtained; but if such grades are required it is a very serious argument against the propriety of the southern route, and against the propriety of having taken that particular Pass through the mountains. The hon. gentleman tells us that on the eastern section there was only a gap of 447 miles to be constructed. Well, Sir, only a gap of 447 miles may not alarm him; but it does seem to me—recollecting that that is about the length of the Intercolonial Railway as originally constructed by us—that a gap of 447 miles is a rather serious gap; and I may be pardoned in hinting that there is a possibility that that road will take a good deal more than two years more in construction. Now, Sir, I do not suppose that the hon. Minister or the engineers would deliberately deceive the House on this point. Every one of us, who has seen these great public works going on, knows that this question of time is a difficult question, unless, indeed, in the case of work done in an open country like a prairie country; and I submit that, even if we grant this large sum which is asked of us, there is little absolute certainty that the road will be finished in two, three, or even four years from this date. The hon. gentleman gave, as one reason for the increased cost of constructing this road, that there was a great increase in the wages of labouring men. Sir, there ought to be a great increase in the wages of labouring men, seeing that everything these labouring men have to purchase is, by the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, greatly increased in price; and I wish, with all my heart, Sir, that at this present moment it were true that the labouring men of Canada, from one end to the other, were in receipt of increased wages, instead of—as I fear too many of them are—without wages at all, or living on half wages.

An hon. MEMBER. They were in your time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, they were in my time. There is no doubt that at that time, when a great wave of commercial depression had spread over this continent, and when things were ten times worse in the United States than in Canada, we shared in that depression; and there is no doubt also, if the hon. gentleman wants to know it, that that depression was greatly aggravated by the misconduct of hon. gentlemen opposite, who piled up the expenditure of the country to many times more than was required, and left behind them many obligations to be carried out by my hon. friend beside me when he came into office.

Mr. RYKERT. What about the shield? Which side of the shield is that?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Sir, the hon. gentleman asks, do we desire to check the progress of Canada for six years? No, Sir, we do not desire to check it; and it is for that reason that we object to imposing these uncalled-for and monstrous burdens on the people. We can recollect what followed that insane line of policy in times gone by. We do not want to see it repeated now. Sir, the hon. gentleman was good enough to tell us that there were grave reasons why this road should be in difficulties; and foremost among these was the opposition which the Liberal party have given to the Canadian Pacific road. The Liberal party, Sir, neither in office nor out of office, have ever given opposition to the construction of the Canadian Pacific road, to the development of the North-West, or to the acquisition of that territory; but they have opposed, and always will oppose, those measures which, under pretence of opening and developing that country, are calculated to strangle and retard it. That is the position of the Liberal party; and it does not lie in the mouths of those hon. gentlemen—who, as I recollect, were very slow, even in 1867, if the testimony of one of their own colleagues is to be believed, to take any steps to acquire the North-West Territory—I say it does not altogether lie in their mouths, or in those of their supporters, to say that the Liberal party were ever indifferent to the acquisition of that territory. He says the course of the Liberal party has aggravated the cost of the road. Sir, we will discuss that question by-and-bye. He says they found fault with the high rates charged all over the North-West. He says they found fault with the land policy and the Tariff policy of the Government. Sir, it is true that we said, and say, that the land policy, the Tariff policy, and the high rates combined, have done a great deal to check the development of the whole North-West. We say that we are prepared to maintain it, we believe it, and it is true; and there is no better proof of it to be found at this moment than that all over the North-West, thinly scattered as the people are, we have seen them during the past three months meeting together in every village and hamlet, to formulate their demands for just that policy which the Liberal party have advocated. The hon. gentleman cannot see that it at all impairs our security, or injures the position of the Canadian Pacific Railway, that the Company should have undertaken great obligations with respect to other roads—obligations not properly coming within the limits of their contract. Now, Sir, that may have been a wise, or an unwise policy; but if these roads are not going to be profitable, if large sums are going to be drawn year by year from the resources of the Company in order to pay obligations on that score, I would like to know from the hon. gentleman, as a man of business, how it is no concern of ours, or how it does not, pro tanto, more or less impair our security. Sir, the hon. gentleman said one thing that I thought might well have been spared, if my ears served me correctly. He spoke of my hon. friend here as a man who had the Grand Trunk road for a client. Does the hon. gentleman think that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have no paid advocates on the floor of this House—no gentlemen who are concerned to promote the interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway—that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have no friends in court or in Cabinet? Does the hon. gentleman think that my hon. friend here is likely to be affected in the discharge of his public duty by what either one or other of the great railway corporations can say to him? If so, all I can say is that he might have learned better during all the years that they have sat together in this Parliament. But he admitted that although the attacks of the Liberal party were bad, they were not a circumstance to the attacks of the Liberal press. As to the Liberal press, he had hardly any words too strong to convey his disapprobation of their conduct towards the North-West and towards the railway. Now, Sir, I am not responsible, nor are my friends responsible, for all that the press of Canada choose to say. I do not think hon. gentlemen opposite would like to be held responsible—at least, I hope they would not—for all that their press choose to say about the North-West, or about other public subjects. But let me point out this: that if the Liberal press have felt it their duty, in the interests of reform, to expose the defects in the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, all the reforms which have taken place in the North-West, and all the reverses in the policy of the Government—and they have been only too few and far between—have come because that same Reform press have exposed the misgovernment of the present Administration and called out for reform; and the people of the North-West are indebted, and know that they are indebted, to the action of that press for many of the benefits which they have thus far received. Sir, these hon. gentlemen have curious notions of public duty. To listen to them, one would suppose that, no matter what facts come to our knowledge, we are bound to remain silent, because, if we say anything it may not suit the pleasure or the plans of hon. gentlemen opposite. Sir, we are bound, both in this House and in the press, not to say one word falsely against hon. gentlemen—not to say one word untruly in derogation of that country; and I do not believe the Liberal press, knowingly at any rate, have ever done so; but we are not to keep silent as to the misdeeds of the hon. gentlemen. On the contrary, we are sent here as members of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, for the express purpose—and it is no sinecure—of exposing those hon. gentlemen's iniquities.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). You had a hard race to get here.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think so. Hon. gentlemen opposite are good enough to clear the way for us. They resign, we are told, after the same way that some public servants resign when they get a broad hint to quit. Now, my hon. friend was good enough to hold up the American press as an example to us. It is creditable to the American press that they always have a keen sense of the honour of America. I would, with all my heart, that the whole Canadian press had the same sense of what is due to the honour of Canada, for if they had we would never see the hon. gentlemen sitting where they now sit. My hon. friend gave us many valuable details which I propose to study at my leisure. I have not time—not because I think them significant, but because of the somewhat elaborate character of those details—to go over them now. But he said one or two things which, I think, slipped out of my hon. friend's mouth in the hurry of argument. He hinted to us that there were other very important reasons why this measure should pass. Why, he told us you must pass this measure because, if you do not, look at the effect—not on the country—but the effect it will have on the Conservative party, so-called. There, I think, is the explanation, no doubt, of a good deal of the hurry and anxiety which has been displayed to saddle the country unnecessarily with an expenditure of $30,000,000 of money. Then he went into a little calculation which, I confess, I was astonished the hon. Minister of Railways did not favour us with. Why, cannot any man see what a profitable transaction this is going to be? The hon. gentleman opposite showed, by a process of his own, that this railway, on which we are spending about $103,000,000, as he said himself, is not going to cost us that after all, but is only going to cost us $30,000,000. I am not going to analyze that statement, but I am going to point out this to the House. This is going to be, no doubt, a very practical transaction. We are borrowing at 4 per cent. and are going to lend out at 5, so that there will be $300,000 a year on a capital of $7,500,000 to the good. I am astonished the hon. Minister of Railways did not include this $7,500,000 in the profits we are going to get out of the transaction, but no doubt he will do so afterwards. The hon. gentleman behind me tells us that, according to his calculation, the railway will cost $75,000,000. Well, it may cost somebody $75,000,000; but all I can say is that I can see no way by which, supposing we spend these $30,000,000, and the road afterwards should fall into our hands, it will cost us less than $98,000,000. It will cost us $28,000,000 for the sections we shall construct, $5,000,000 for the surveys and other incidental expenses, $25,000,000 we are going to pay in cash subsidy, $10,000,000 from our own lands—not the Company's lands—and add to these the $30,000,000, and you will find that whoever will build the road for $75,000,000—if it be built for $75,000,000—the cost to the people of Canada will not be one penny less than $98,000,000. If the hon. gentleman wants to know where I got the calculation of $100,000,000, he will find that his own statements brings out the result almost exactly and identically with this sum which I named some ten or twelve years ago. The hon. gentleman tells us that the cost is going to be far below his calculation. Well, it may or it may not. In all these matters I would recommend the hon. gentleman to wait till the road is finished, and until the bill is paid. Then, and not until then, will we know what the Canadian Pacific Railway has cost the people of Canada. But the hon. gentleman advances one rather extraordinary proposition. He tells us that the country has no interest in knowing what the construction company may have received for this road. Well, I cannot agree with that. I think, on the other hand, that the country has the greatest interest in knowing what the construction company has received; and what the road was likely to cost had the terms made with the construction company been carried out. Now, I made the calculation which I now submit under correction. A very few hours ago, for the first time, I had placed in my hands those important documents which show the terms of the contract with the construction company. Well, if I have made a mistake, if I have erred in this important particular, I must say that it is scarcely fair, on the verge of a great debate, to call upon any of us to make somewhat intricate calculations in order to see what were really the terms which were accorded by the Canadian Pacific Railway to this construction company. But as far as I can see, that Company were to have received, according to the statement placed on the Table by the hon. Minister—although I am sorry to say not yet printed for the use of hon. members—for what they call there the eastern section—which is not precisely the same as the eastern section mentioned in the contract—the $14,000,000 in cash and $20,000,000 in paid-up stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway. That distance I make 610 miles. There again I am open to correction, if wrong. Assuming the stock to be saleable at 60 cents on the dollar, that would equal $26,100,000 to be paid the construction company for the construction of that part of the eastern section to which I have referred. I find that we shall have built the western section, which extends from a certain point near the Saskatchewan to the Kamloops. I find that for that, the construction company were to receive $17,800,000 and $25,000,000 of stock in the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now that distance is 605 miles, as I make it, and the sum which, for the western section, the Company were to receive amounts, taking the stock as before at 60 cents, to $32,880,000. We are, as I say, at a great disadvantage. These papers have been given to us only within a few hours. We are called on to analyze them, to compare them, and without the proper information, to enter on this debate. But it appears from the statement of the hon. Minister himself, that the construction company were paid, for the work they did on the eastern section, the sum of $46,500,000, allowing the 40 miles west of Callander previously constructed, and allowing for that at the price of the Algoma Mills Branch, which was $20,000 a mile. Therefore, this follows: that the cost of finishing this eastern section, as described in this contract, would amount, taking the stock, as I say, at 60 cents, to $21,360,000, while in the same way we find that they appear to have received for the work they did on the western section, which again I observe is not the same as we would call the western section in the old contract, the sum of $91,300,000, assuming that the prairie work for 615 miles from Winnipeg had cost about $14,000 a mile. The result is this, and here I am going on the figures of the hon. Minister of Railways, that the total cost of the western section in money and stock, would have amounted to $32,880,000; the balance to build it would have amounted to $22,530,000; the balance to complete the eastern section would have amounted to $21,360,000, or a total to complete the two sections, and finish the railway, of $43,890,000, to which should be added for equipment, not included in the above, a sum of about $2,700,000, so that it would appear that, to carry out the contract with the construction company they would have to have received, according to that very contract laid on the Table, $46,590,000 more than they have received. Now, Sir, this follows: We are told that, including equipment, the present estimate is that the whole thing can be finished for $27,000,000 and, including the real value of the materials, less fuel and general stores, which appears to amount to $2,720,000, all the work could be done for $29,720,000. Now, Sir, there is a difference there, between the sum the construction company were to have received and the sum which the present estimate shows is required to close the road, of just about $17,000,000; and I have this question to put: If this contract with the construction company was a fair and reasonable contract, how are you going to finish this road for $29,720,000? If this contract was not a fair and reasonable bargain, then the Company were going to get about $17,000,000 too much, which would have remained practically a permanent first charge for ever, a source of high rates and a source of continually increasing difficulty in dealing with the road—a charge against, practically, the people of the North-West. Now, I do not say that that calculation is correct. I say that that is what appears to be the case on the face of the documents which have been laid on the Table to-day; and I say, if needed, there is a fresh verification of those discrepancies to which my hon. friend called attention between the statements of the President of the railway and the hon. the Minister of Railways and the estimates now submitted. Looking at the statements in that contract, I do not see, I confess, how this matter can be evaded. One of two things is clear. Either the cost was hugely under-estimated when the contract with this construction company was let, or else, if that statement be correct, the cost of this road will vastly exceed the $27,000,000 which the Minister and the president now think is all that is likely to be called for from us. The hon. gentleman also raised a question, if I remember aright, as to what profit the original holders of the stock were going to get if the stock was given to them at 40 cents in the dollar. Well, Sir, I observe that the statement is that they issued thirty millions so as to net 52½ cents on the dollar. Now, if this thirty millions were sold at 52½ cents, and the Syndicate got their twenty-four millions for forty, it does appear to me that there was a reasonable profit on the transaction.

Mr. IVES. Forty-six.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No; forty-six was the average on the whole fifty-five millions, and these papers, which I presume the hon. gentleman had as well as myself, admit that the twenty-four millions were issued at forty. As I said before, not having had the documents printed, and only having had a chance of looking at them two or three hours ago, I am open to correction if I make mistakes, but that is how I read them and that is how he will find it is written there. And, if this price, which is now fifty-six, is so disastrously low and ought to go up to sixty, let me remind him that there would be at sixty a moderate profit of about 50 per cent., if you make the purchase at forty. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think that, unless that discrepancy in the accounts of the construction company is explained, we have made out an extremely strong case for investigation and enquiry into this matter. As I said before, I do not know whether those statements are absolutely correct or not, but I do say that, if it appears prima facie, on documents laid on the Table of this House, that, apparently at any rate, the construction company were going to receive about $17,000,000 more than the road is now estimated to cost, we have great need to be careful and prudent in our dealings either with the Company that were going to put their affairs in the hands of this construction company, or of the Government which sanctioned that procedure and, until to-day, refused us all information as to what that company were doing or who that company were. And now, Sir, I come to what appears to me to be another and a more serious reason for pleading for delay. It is not merely the marvellous sumerset which the Government have contrived to make in this matter. Ten weeks ago, we were told that, among the other wonderful evidences of the financial genius of this Government, was the fact that they were going to extract $24,500,000—I like to be particular—from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which would put them in the proud position of saying to English capitalists, when the Minister went there to refund the Canadian debt of 1885: We can do without you; we and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have provided $24,500,000 with which to redeem all the debt that comes due in 1885. Now, a wonderful change has come over the spirit of the hon. gentleman's dream. Instead of borrowers of $24,000,000, we are to be lenders of $30,000,000, with results which, I fear, will not be altogether to his liking when he goes, as he shortly must, to visit the London market in the capacity of a borrower. I think it is quite right and quite proper that the hon. Minister of Railways should have, at an early day, laid these Resolutions before the House. I think we should have full discussion of them; but I think the Government owe it to the House, owe it to the country, and owe it to themselves that, before they go further in this matter, they should also have the regular annual financial discussion and exposition of the real state and position of this country. All these gentlemen, through the press and in the House, have been dwelling long and loud on the magnificent surplus which the hon. gentlemen had piled up last year. Well, if that surplus was properly obtained, on which, later on, though not to-night, I shall have something to say, it would have been just cause for congratulation; but the House knows now, and the country knows, that the surplus is very fast vanishing from us. The returns which were laid on the Table of the House, scarcely two weeks ago, show that our revenue on the 20th January was $2,000,000 less than our revenue of the corresponding period last year, and our expenditure $1,000,000 more. If that process goes on for another six months, the hon. Minister will have no very great amount of surplus to dispose of. More, Sir; we are asked to incur a great liability, and we ought in all conscience to know where to stand. To many, if not to most people, the situation appears to have elements of serious risk. Sir, we have seen within the last few years the most extraordinary fluctuations in the trade and commerce of this country. We have seen—not once but twice over—fluctuations, within a couple of years, of the imports to the extent of $34,000,000. We have seen the imports reduced from a sum even larger, I believe, than they now are likely to attain—we have seen them reduced by about $6,000,000. And, Sir, the hon. Minister has over and over again declared that his policy is to reduce the imports. He has told us many times that the object of his policy is to make our exports exceed our imports. If he succeeds in that policy—if, during the next year or two, our exports do exceed our imports, then the hon. gentleman, though he may be proud of the success of his policy, will have to confess to a reduction of many millions of Customs receipts. To have large Customs receipts you must have large imports, and it is part of the hon. gentleman's policy that we should not have large imports. He has constantly told us that the imports are too great, and they must be reduced. He has pointed to it as a source of danger; he has pointed, I repeat, to a year in which the imports and exports balanced, as a period in which he takes the most pride, as proving the success of his policy. And, Sir, I say that if his policy does prove successful, if he does succeed in effecting the balance of trade, which he has spoken of so often and so long, then the hon. gentleman will find himself with a largely increased expenditure, and a vastly diminished revenue. Moreover, Sir, I say that this is a time specially inopportune for going on the English market with a very large loan. The House will remember that, on the first of January next, we have to provide for the redemption of nearly $30,000,000 debt. That debt is at a high figure, and the hon. gentleman has publicly announced, and very properly, his intention of redeeming this debt. He went over to England last year to make arrangements for the redemption of this debt, and the issue of a Canadian loan on better terms. Now, I want to point out how dangerous a thing he is doing if he is going to assume all these liabilities within a period of two years. He has got, as it is, to pay $30,000,000. He has got, as it is, to provide the sum of $12,000,000 or $13,000,000 additional subsidy; and he now proposes to add to that a further loan of $22,500,000. Well, Sir, I do not mean to say that the hon. gentleman cannot borrow this $65,000,000 or thereabouts, within the space of two years; but I do mean to tell him that he will strain his credit somewhat in the operation, and that it is scarcely within the bounds of possibility that he will borrow these large sums of money within the time he requires on anything like as favourable terms as he could if he were to let this transaction alone, and borrow in the market as it stands, undisturbed by bringing in this further loan. Now, that is a proposition so plain that I am quite sure no hon. gentleman opposite will be disposed to dispute it; and it shows that this advance of $22,500,000 is, therefore, likely to cost us a considerable sum more than its nominal amount. He will fail considerably, I believe, of obtaining as good terms as we do obtain, and as we might obtain. I was in hopes the hon. gentleman might have been able to place our new loan on terms which would have involved a considerable reduction in the permanent charge to this country. He may, and I hope he will be able to do it still. But I point out to him, and I point out to the House, that his success in doing so will be greatly imperilled by assuming, first, the necessity of providing this additional $13,000,000 within two years, and next, of the necessity of needlessly borrowing $22,500,000 more. Sir, the House will recollect that for the last four or five years we have been piling up expenditure after expenditure at the rate, very nearly, of $2,000,000 a year. Now, Sir, you cannot go on doing that for ever. You may, under certain favourable circumstances, succeed in doing it without injury for two or three years together, but the end of that thing comes very soon. We have also been piling up liabilities. We have had to meet all sorts of demands. An Act was passed last Session which, I will venture to say, unless it is taken off the Statute Book, will cause ultimately an addition of many other millions to the indebtedness of the country. Then, we see from declarations in this House—we see in the newspapers of a certain Province, we see in every direction, that one of the great Provinces of the Dominion is seriously dissatisfied with its financial position, and that it is not likely to consent to this $30,000,000 being given unless other and greater concessions are made, unless other and still greater liabilities are incurred. If we give this $30,000,000 we shall have to give many other millions to satisfy the demands—it is not my purpose to discuss them now—which are likely to be made upon us by the supporters of the Ministry coming from that Province. Now, what is the pretext for all this haste? Surely this road, as Lord Lorne truly said, was as richly dowered as ever railroad was on the earth. The late Governor General of Canada, speaking, no doubt, as he had been inspired by his Ministers—and, perhaps, with the High Commissioner at his elbow, or not far off it—that nobleman declared publicly that he had unbounded faith, I think he said, in the future of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and he instanced, in proof of that, the extraordinary concessions—and he rightly called them extraordinary—the extraordinary donations that had been granted by the Government to that railway. Now, Sir, we have a right to ask, what has become of this $10,000,000 for land sales, of this $20,000,000 for stock sales? I have shown, with reference to the construction company, where some portion of that may have gone. Surely every supporter of the hon. gentleman opposite who chooses calmly to consider these matters, must see that we are needlessly imperilling what they say is a most excellent financial position, that we are needlessly taking very serious burdens upon ourselves, and I may recall to their minds, Sir, an offer from gentlemen who were quite as good as the gentlemen of the Canadian Pacific Railway—although I have a very high opinion of most of the gentlemen who form that Company—an opinion which is not always shared by hon. gentlemen opposite. I say, Sir, we can recollect when another company came down with an offer to build that road for many millions less money, and for many millions less land. They were refused, and the reason assigned was this: That the men with whom the Government were dealing were men of such unlimited and unbounded resources that it was wise to give them many millions more than the other company asked, and to give them most extraordinary concessions, and privileges, and monopolies, which have justly excited so much discontent, not merely in the North-West, but through the whole of the old parts of Canada. Now, Sir, I am free to confess that the energy which has been displayed by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has been very great. I am free to confess, Sir, that those gentlemen have shown wonderful spirit in the prosecution of their enterprise. But I cannot go the length of saying, with hon. gentlemen opposite, that they have committed no error. I think, on the contrary, they have committed the very common error of grasping at rather too much and thereby imperilling the very excellent bargain which I still maintain they originally made with the Government. What is the practical result of all this? Suppose we granted those $30,000,000, we know, everybody knows, that we bind up our credit to a great extent with that Company, and what is equally clear is this, that we encourage that Company to run all manner of unnecessary risk, to make a very unnecessary degree of haste, and in all probability to spend a great deal more money than it would otherwise really require to spend. I look upon this present demand, I say frankly, simply as an instalment—the first instalment; but I very much fear that there may be a second, a third and perhaps a fourth instalment that Canada may have to pay. Sir, I wonder if hon. gentlemen opposite ever look at the Public Accounts, or do they put implicit faith in their leaders, because if they ever do condescend to look at this document which I hold in my hand, they will find among the assets of the people of Canada a sum of $25,607,393.33, which, to my knowledge, has stood there for twenty years, and which represents a certain advance made to the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada. Sir, if this goes on, let a second line be put there with plenty of room below it, and begin with the advance of $30,000,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company of Canada. Now, my friends from the Maritime Provinces may not be as well aware of the past history of old Canada as I am, and my friends around me; but there is a lesson there for us on which we will do well to ponder. It is just thirty years ago, as nearly as I recollect, since the Grand Trunk Railway Company was applying to the old Parliament of Canada for concessions, almost exactly identical, demanded for almost the same reasons, and in almost the same language, from gentlemen who then acted as the Government of Canada. Sir, I can recollect myself seeing in the public prints—I was not then a member of Parliament—how the men who advocated those claims pointed out the vast importance it was to Canada to have that road pushed through at railroad speed, the vast importance and immensely good results that would flow, and how safe the people of Canada were in going through the mere form of endorsing the Grand Trunk paper and of lending their credit to the Grand Trunk Company; and we can all recollect what the result of that liberality on the part of the people of Canada was. It is true that the Grand Trunk has, in the long run, been of very considerable benefit to the people of Canada. But the early years of the history of the Grand Trunk show that it was terribly disastrous, not merely to the shareholders, but to the people of Canada. And why? Because of the ruinous extravagance and because of divers political complications into which it had got, and it was only when the Grand Trunk ceased to be the milch cow of certain political adventurers that it had a chance of restoring itself.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think the Grand Trunk is likely to be the milch cow of hon. gentlemen opposite, or of other gentlemen. As the hon. gentleman beside me remarked, they have other cattle on hand. The hon. Minister was good enough to quote my calculation as to the cost of the road to the country. Suppose the road is foreclosed; suppose that, after advancing $30,000,000, we have to take it, what is the result? It is this: Upon the hon. gentleman's own showing, that road will cost the country within a fraction of $100,000,000, which I estimated would be the cost under very much more disadvantageous circumstances. And here let me say as to all those calculations, that it is utterly absurd to apply a calculation made ten, eight, or even five years ago to the cost of construction to-day. Everybody who knows anything about the progress of the North-West knows that a few years there will do more than three or four times that length of time in an ordinary forest country, and consequently even if the estimate were incorrect, it would be no reflection on my hon. friend here (Mr. Blake) or my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Mackenzie) that we overstated the cost under a contract which was to be completed several years ago. But there is another very serious consideration which I commend to the attention of hon. members, especially of the North-West representatives in this House. It appears to me it has been so far utterly overlooked by the hon. Minister. That hon. gentleman stated, and stated most truly, that the construction of branch lines in adequate quantity in the North-West, was a matter of first rate importance. He said, and he said truly, that branch lines were often of greater importance than many portions of the main line, and there again I entirely concur with him. This point, it seems to me, has been wholly overlooked. I do not believe if you insist on the Company rushing the road through within the next two or three years, the Company will be able to spare a thought or a dollar, except on compulsion, on the construction of any branch line. You have taken away most improperly, as I conceive, from the people of that country, the power of constructing the branch lines for themselves, and the advocates of the Canadian Pacific Railway say, and there is truth in that plea, that by what you are now doing you will deprive them of any power to do anything else than go on with the prosecution of the main line. Judging from what we hear and know, if these Resolution pass, and if the Company is to construct the line within two years, then there appears to be no reasonable prospect whatever of the North-West being supplied with those branch lines which they have a right to demand either from the Company or the Government, because the Company and the Government had absolutely prevented the construction of those lines, except by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company themselves. Moreover, I say if you are going to do this, you should certainly readjust all the other terms of the contract. I cannot accept the concession indicated by the hon. Minister of Railways as a concession at all. As the hon. gentleman truly said, two or three years hence he proposes—he gave no pledge and put the Government under no binding obligation—to cease illegally and unconstitutionally exercising the veto power to the detriment of the Legislature of Manitoba. That is no concession at all. There is nothing in that which the people of Manitoba can accept as a boon or as something for which they should be called upon in any degree to be thankful; it is giving back what is justly theirs, and what should never have been taken away from them. Sir, probably the House will pardon me for going back on a subject on which I have recently been speaking. I feel very strongly the risks to which hon. gentlemen are committing this country. I have seen this country once or twice in a very good financial condition. I have seen that financial position utterly thrown away by reckless and insane expenditure, and by the reckless and insane incurring of liabilities.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I say that hon. gentlemen who support a Finance Minister who, in six years, from 1867 to 1874, added $10,000,000 a year to the annual expenditure, and left a further liability of $60,000,000, and who has since added $8,000,000 a year to the annual expenditure, should know well what great risks the country runs from such insane expenditure. But, Sir, these gentlemen have a record, at least some of them have—which it is well for the House to remember. Canada in 1853-54-56 was in a good financial position. It was in as good a financial position relatively then, as the Dominion is to-day. Sir, as I say, we chose to incur, rashly and recklessly, claims and liabilities for the great railway enterprises of that day, and what was the result? The result was that in 1853 the receipts of old Canada were $5,250,000, and the expenditure of old Canada $8,600,000; that they had a large deficit of 60 per cent in proportion to their expenditure; that in 1859 they had a deficit of $1,500,000. That condition of things went on through 1860-61-62, and only ceased when the present leader of the House was, for that and other offences, turned out of the Government of that day. There we all saw written, in pretty large characters in our history, what was the result, even in a very prosperous condition of things, of incurring those unparalleled expenditures. But hon. gentlemen can find out for themselves what would be the position of affairs if these same results are repeated to-day, as they are not unlikely to be repeated. It is our duty on this side of the House to warn them and the people of Canada, that although we do not undertake to make predictions either of seven years' prosperity or of seven years' depression; although we have not the spirit of prophecy descending upon us in that matter, still it is sometimes safe, as a warning, to point out what has actually occurred in the past, and that wise and prudent men would not altogether overlook those lessons, particularly at a time like this. Sir, I say that the whole business is a fitting climax to the antecedents of this railway. I have always held and I now repeat, although a great continental railway was a very desirable thing in itself, although I agree with the hon. Minister of Railways that we require a railway, that it is worth considerable sacrifices for, still I say that the terms of the original bargain with British Columbia, which was opposed by me, opposed by hon. gentlemen here present and others who are not now here, was an act of such indiscretion and folly that it has hung like a millstone ever since around the necks of the people; that it has led to national disgrace in one or two instances, and that at the present moment it is likely to entangle us in embarrassments of which no man can reasonably expect to see the end. I say, Sir, that there was never such a sacrifice of ends to means as was manifest in the policy of the present Government with respect to the Canadian Pacific Railway. The object of that Railway was and is—the one thing for which it was worth a dollar to the people of Canada—to assist in the development of the North-West. The policy of the Government with respect to that railway has been, intentionally or not, such as to make that railway almost a greater source of injury to the North-West than of advantage. I say, Sir, that so far as the people of the North-West and Manitoba are concerned, with the exactions, the monopolies and the restrictions which have been imposed upon them, it would have been better for them if that railway had never advanced a foot beyond Winnipeg, and that they had been allowed, by the aid of their own land, to construct their own railway. This is my deliberate opinion as regards the people of Manitoba and the North-West. I do not ignore the fact that we were bound at a reasonable rate, and on reasonable terms, to go on with our obligation and build the road for the benefit of the people of British Columbia, and also to connect it with the older Provinces. I do not ignore that fact; I do not underrate its importance. But as regards the people of Manitoba and the North-West, the impolicy of the Government, not only in regard to the railway, but their general land policy and their tariff have been such that it is doubtful, to those who know the country best and prize it most, whether the people would not have been better off had that railway not gone a foot beyond Winnipeg; if only they had been allowed any reasonable aid from their own lands to build their own railways thereof. Moreover, I say this: when you are asking to vote these $30,000,000, that does not measure your liabilities. We will suppose that there are no more instalments to pay, that this is the only demand made upon us, although if it be, it will be the first instance in the history of Canada in which such a thing has happened; but I say—and every man knows that I say the truth—that the Government are not going to carry it through without making compensations in various shapes and forms to a great many other interests in this country; and I shall deem it myself a fortunate chance if the $30,000,000 which we pay to the railway do not require before long to be supplemented by as much more in concessions to the other claimants on the public purse, who see the opportunity and are determined to use it, and who are now attempting, as we all know, to use it. I repeat again, that if ever there was a case for caution, for prudence, for hesitation; if ever men had reason for demanding delay, if ever we had the right to be fully informed as to the exact financial position of the country, as to the exact financial position of the institution which seeks our aid, it is now; and we shall be blind and deaf to the lessons of our past history and of our dearly bought experience in old Canada, if the House consents to pass this measure without fuller and more searching enquiry, and much greater information than it now possesses.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I am quite sure those of us who have been in the habit of listening to the hon. gentleman when he was in Parliament before, and who have contrasted the speech he has delivered to-night with the speeches he delivered then, must have come to the conclusion that he was arguing against his own convictions, from the time he rose until the moment he sat down. We all expected—in fact it was announced to us by the leader of the Opposition in the closing sentences of his speech—that the financial aspects of this question were to be dealt with by some one; and as the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has been brought into Parliament again, by the confession of the present leader and the ex-leader of the party, in order to deal with financial questions, we had right to assume that he was the person who would so deal with this particular subject. Sir, those who have listened to him to-night will agree with me, I think, in saying that he was certainly not doing himself justice in the manner in which he has treated this question. From the opening sentence to the close of his speech, we have had haphazard statements—statements which were evidently not the result of reflection; and, for one, I have come to the conclusion that the hon. gentleman, against his own convictions, believing that the scheme which is now before Parliament is, in the position in which we stand, the best scheme that could be adopted for the completion of this railway and for the interest of this country, was forced to implement the promise made by his leader, and to deal without preparation with the subject to which he has just addressed himself. Sir, what have we heard from that hon. gentleman? With the single exception of his reference to the construction company and the great profits that company would have enjoyed, had they gone on with the work, which they did not do, we have had scarcely a reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway at all. We have had references to other subjects. We have had references to the conduct and character and career of the Conservative party. The hon. gentleman has gone back to the history of old Canada. For the benefit of the hon. members from the Maritime Provinces he has gone back to 1852, in order to establish that from that date downward the career of the Conservative party, its policy in the administration of the affairs of this country was a policy to the detriment of the country and tending to extravagance in the expenditures of the country. And yet, Mr. Speaker, what will our friends from the Maritime Provinces say when I tell them that during the whole of those years that hon. gentleman was a humble follower of the Conservative party?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would just say that it is not true.

Mr. WHITE. Not only a follower, but a traditional Tory in this country—one of those old blue-blood Tories—one of the men who had nothing but contempt for those common-place people who are commonly called Radicals—that this hon. gentleman from the day he entered Parliament, and for many days after—until the leader of the Government committed the heinous offence of believing that another hon. gentleman would make a better Finance Minister than himself—until that day that hon. gentleman supported the party whose policy, he says, from 1852 onwards, was a policy tending to the injury of this country, and to reckless and extravagant expenditure. Sir, we had also some reference to the Grand Trunk Railway. The hon. gentleman alluded to the early history of the Grand Trunk Railway, and he held up the fact that we have not yet got back the guarantee which was given to that Company, as a proof that it is utterly impossible that we can get back this guarantee. Does the hon. gentleman know anything of the history of the Grand Trunk Railway? Does he know anything of the circumstances under which that guarantee was given? Will he pretend to tell this hon. House that there is any similarity whatever between the guarantee given to the Grand Trunk Railway and the advance now proposed to be made to the Canadian Pacific Railway? Sir, in 1852, the Grand Trunk Railway Company got its charter. At that time, as everyone knows, we were in the midst of a fever for railway construction. The then leader of the Conservative party, the hon. gentleman's leader at that time, declared that his policy was railways, sitting, as he did at that time, as leader of the Opposition. The Government issued, through Lord Elgin—and I presume the Government were to some extent responsible for the utterances of Lord Elgin, even in the despatches he sent to the Home Government—issued a paper setting forth the great prospects of this country. A prospectus was issued bearing, if not the direct, certainly the indirect endorsement of the Government of this country, promising to those people in England who should put their money into the Grand Trunk Railway, a dividend of 11 per cent. at least. The Government guaranteed £3,000 a mile for the railway, and took a first lien upon it as security. But we all know that when the road came to be built, when the results came to be ascertained, it was found that instead of its paying the 11 per cent. then promised, there was no percentage at all for the people who had embarked their money in the enterprise; and when the question came before the people and the Government of Canada, as to what was to be done with regard to that guarantee, it presented itself in this form: Here were men in England who, on the strength of a prospectus practically issued by Canada—backed, as it was, by the Governor General, by Her Majesty's representative in this country—put their money into that work, without any hope of getting it back again, and without any interest whatever, except the interest which they expected to get in the form of a dividend from the working of the railway. There was Canada, with a railway built with English money, and benefited by the rapid development of every interest in the country which followed immediately after its construction; and the question which presented itself to us, as honest men, was this: ought we to exact the pound of flesh? Ought we, who have derived, and are deriving all the direct and indirect advantages resulting from the expenditure of that money in our midst—from the expenditure of the money itself, and the development of the country through that expenditure—ought we to exact our interest before the people in England get a dollar? And the people of Canada did what I am satisfied, if the conditions existed, they would do again—what I believe, as honest men, it was their bounden duty to do—they took the ground that they would wait at any rate until the Company were able to pay dividends to their shareholders before they would exact their claim from the Company. It is true, that amount stands to-day among the public assets of this country; and I am not certain that, with the magnificent development of that railway—as a Canadian, I sincerely hope that that development will go on—the time may come when that Company will pay dividends to its shareholders, and when the claim of the people of Canada, under the circumstances, will revive. But what comparison is there between our position with reference to that matter and the relation in which we stand to this advance? Why, Sir, what is it which is proposed at this moment? It is this: We have a railway, a large proportion of which is built; its net earnings amount to nearly $1,000,000 a year; we have already given large subscriptions to it; we are under no obligation to anybody connected with it, and either directly or indirectly, to treat that Company otherwise than the terms of their contract require; and when we place this money at their disposal, taking security for its return, I say we do it without laying ourselves open to the danger that the people of Canada will not be repaid. But we have given to other roads, as well as to the Grand Trunk. The hon. gentleman knows that the Great Western got an advance at the same time, and he knows that a great portion of that advance has been repaid.

Mr. MACKENZIE. That has all been repaid.

Mr. WHITE. I do not know whether it has all been repaid, but a great part of it has been. It was the subject of correspondence between Sir John Rose, when he was Finance Minister acting for the Government of Canada, and the Great Western Railway Company, and a large portion was certainly repaid. The Northern Railway Company also received an advance and we got back the money or a large part of it—why? Because both of these railways were paying interest—were successful railways—and we were therefore in a position to enforce our claim. But in this particular case we stand in a position of advancing money to an organized company with a large mileage of railway already completed, and the only question which arises is this,—is the security upon which we advance it sufficient to guard us against the possibility of loss in the future? That is the only question before us at this moment. I do not propose, Sir, to deal with the question whether it is or is not desirable that this road should be speedily constructed. We know that the people of Canada have committed themselves to the construction of this railway. We gave out this contract in 1851. We have had a general election since that time. I do not know how it was in other constituencies, but I know that in mine I had the pleasure and the honour—and I esteemed it an honour, and it certainly was a pleasure—of a visit from my hon. friend, the member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), accompanied by the Premier of the Province of Ontario. We discussed for a whole afternoon the public affairs of this country; we had the Boundary Question, the Streams Bill, the Gerry-mandering Act; we had from the hon. member for East York some remarks with reference to the administration of railways by the hon. Minister of Railways, and with reference to some matters of detail connected with the public expenditure; but I think I am within his knowledge when I say that from the beginning to the close—I was not there at the opening, but a gentleman who was there told me what took place—this question of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which was to have been the question that would hurl the Conservative party from power as soon as the people should have the opportunity of dealing with it, was not once referred to. I did not hear many opposition speeches, I admit, because, with the exception of that meeting, my political opponents for some reason happened not to be at the meetings I held in the constituency. But what I have to say is this, that, so far as I can know, that question had practically passed out of the arena of discussion altogether, and the people of Canada were thoroughly satisfied that the best thing had been done that could be done in the contract which had been let for the construction of the railway. Under these circumstances—the people of Canada having determined that the railway should be built—do hon. gentlemen opposite think that they are going to have the people with them in saying that it is a matter of indifference when it is built, and in saying that it is a matter of no consequence, now that a very large portion of the railway has been constructed, whether the links between them are left uncompleted or not. I venture to say that there is no man in Canada who looks fairly at the future interests of this country, who desires the development of every interest in this country, who will not say that it is a matter of the very greatest consequence, now that the railway has advanced to its present stage, that it shall be completed at the earliest possible moment. Remember that when this contract was made it was a ten years' contract. I am not going to say that if the Company had gone on—as possibly that second syndicate might have gone on, had they been awarded the contract—slowly, carefully, tentatively, just spending the dollars as they happened to get them, waiting for the whole ten years to build the road, everybody might not, to some extent, have been satisfied; because no one believed, before this time, that a railway of this kind could have been built in five years. But we have learnt differently during the last two years, and to stop the construction of the railway to-day, to even lessen the speed at which it is being constructed, would be an admission of failure, and failure to the Canadian Pacific Railway cannot take place without resulting in disaster to the people of Canada. I do not say that the Government or the people of Canada should feel themselves bound up in the interests of the gentlemen who compose the Company or the directorate of the Canadian Pacific Railway; but I do say that we are so situated in Canada, that the construction of this railway has been so identified in the public mind, not only here but in Europe, especially in Great Britain, with the prosperity and progress of the Dominion, that the stoppage of the line must mean disaster to the country itself. The hon. gentleman told us that we on this side of the House had complained of the conduct of the hon. member for East York, when he was head of the Government, in building the line from Port Arthur to Winnipeg. That was not the complaint. What we did complain of—what was complained of everywhere—was that the hon. gentleman built the two ends and left the centre section untouched—not that he built, but that he did not build a railway. That was the cause of our complaint; and what we complained of in him then we feel that the public would be entitled to complain of us now, if, after having gone so far with the construction of this railway, we were to stop the work or lessen its speed, or to refuse, with reasonable guarantee for its repayment, such an advance as might ensure the desired speedy construction. Then we are told by the hon. gentleman, contrary I think to what everybody has thought heretofore, that the railway is not such a railway as we ought fairly to expect, and we have a reference made to the gradients in the Rocky Mountains which, he says, are somewhere about 116 feet to the mile. That seems a very heavy gradient, I admit. I believe it extends from the summit to the Columbia river, somewhere about 10 miles in length; but it is not as high a gradient as is to be found on the American Pacific Railways, nor as high as that which you will find on a railway which is to-day almost a controlling line in eastern and western transport—the Baltimore and Ohio road. On that railway there is a gradient much higher than this 116 feet. But I think that everyone will admit, who has been through this country—that is at least the testimony of everyone I have heard speak of it—that the railway has been substantially built, that the Company have built it in a manner indicating their intention to work it, and indicating their interest in its economical working after it is built. In that respect, at any rate, the people of this country have no reason whatever to complain. Then we are told by the hon. gentleman—and that, I admit, is a point upon which we require to have the most complete assurance and guarantee—of the difficulty of determining the time in which the railway may be completed through those difficult sections. He pointed out, very properly, that on the prairie section it is not difficult to determine how the railway might be built, and in what time it might be built, with the experience we have to-day; but that these sections which are now to be constructed are the difficult sections, and that therefore it required close calculation to determine whether we could build them within the time mentioned or not. I sincerely trust—I do not know what the intentions of the Government in the matter are—but I sincerely trust that when this bargain is implemented, that when this agreement is made, we will have in it some guarantee that the railway is to be completed in the shorter time proposed; and further, that provision will be made, by special supervision on the part of the officers of the Government itself, to see that the road is being constructed and the money being expended in such a way as will secure its construction within the stipulated time.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman will allow me to interrupt him, I will say that it is never possible to embrace within Resolutions of this kind everything connected with them, but it is the intention of the Government, as is indicated therein, to provide by the Bill which will authorize the agreement for the most adequate security for the completion of the road within the time stated by me to the House, and also to provide that not a single dollar of the money advanced by the Government to the contractors for the work shall be advanced except upon the evidence that such money has gone into the road.

Mr. WHITE. I am quite sure that the assurance of the hon. Minister of Railways on these two points will be exceedingly satisfactory, not only to this House, but to the country, because the only reason, as I can understand it, for undertaking this new obligation—and obligation it undoubtedly is—is the importance of having the railway completed within the shorter time specified in the letter of the president of the railway Company, and affirmed in the statement of the hon. Minister. The hon. gentleman has referred to this construction company as affording positive proof either that the Company gave a great deal too much to the construction company, or that the amount now estimated for the completion of the railway is an amount altogether inadequate. We have not, at this moment, I quite agree with the hon. gentleman, all the papers we would like to have for a discussion of a subject of this kind; but I do not regard that, as I shall show you presently, as a matter of so great consequence as the hon. gentleman does. But, Sir, I believe the fact to be that the contract with this construction company was entered into on the 12th December, 1882, that is, about fourteen months ago. Now, Sir, at that time it is well known that the Company were desirous of floating their capital, of floating their scheme; that it was, therefore, a matter of consequence that they should have a contract made, so that the public who would invest their money in this enterprise would know reasonably what the enterprise was going to cost. There has been since that time nearly 600 miles of railway built. There have been very considerable surveys made; there have been remeasurements, and there is very much better evidence and information now than could possibly have existed at that time. We know that, so far as this construction company is concerned, they were to have taken a certain portion in cash and a certain portion in stock; but, as I believe to be the fact, so far as their work went, the expenditures which they made were simply made for them by the Company, and when they were unable to float the stock which it was their business to float, the contract was abrogated, I think in the month of October last, before there was any question whatever of applying to Parliament for an advance such as is applied for to-day.

Mr. BLAKE. About the end of November.

Mr. WHITE. I am told the deed was signed in November. But, whether it be the one month or the other, what I say to the hon. gentleman is this: that it was before any question of this kind could have arisen. It was just at the time that the Company expected that the arrangements which they had made with the Government for the guarantee of 3 per cent. for ten years, would have carried them through, and that they would have been able to complete the contract by the sale of the stock on the open market. That was the position at the time they abrogated the contract. Now that contract is abrogated. It is not a contract to-day, and under the circumstances, I do not think it is a matter of so great consequence that we should have all the details of a contract which existed for only a few months comparatively—for less than a year—under which, as I understand it, money was paid only for work actually done, which was abrogated on account of the failure of the contractors to implement their contract by selling the shares, and which is therefore a matter which, in so far as this particular arrangement is concerned, is of no value or effect whatever. What we know is this, that we have the statement of the Chief Engineer of the Department of Railways as to what the cost will be of the completion of this railway. What we know further is this, that the money which is to be paid for it, the money which we are voting, is to be paid pro rata as the work proceeds, having regard to the amount required for the absolute completion of the road; and that therefore, we have, in these arrangements—first, in the report of the Chief Engineer, which confirms the reports of the engineers of the Company itself, and next in the fact that the money is only to be paid out as the work proceeds—a sufficient guarantee that at any rate the money will complete the railway as is proposed. But we have further than that. I believe that the difficulties which the Company have had up to this time in selling their stock upon the open market have been due very largely to the determination on the part of rival companies to prevent the completion of this railway. The moment you prove to these rival companies, and to all interested in these rival companies, that this railway is going to be built, the moment you prove to them that the Company have been able to make arrangements by which they are practically independent of the stock market altogether in the completion of the railway, that motive at least is gone for the depreciation of the stock, and, that being the case, the investing public will have the opportunity, quietly, without influences of that kind surrounding them, of investigating the character of this enterprise, its commercial value, the probability of its paying dividends upon the stock it has issued, and how it stands in relation to other trans-continental railways of this continent; and I believe that, before the two years are up within which this road is to be built, the stock will be at such a rate that it will be a question for the Government whether they will allow the $35,000,000 to be sold on condition of the $22,500,000 being repaid to the Government. But, independent of that, the assurance we have from the Chief Engineer of the Company, and the assurance we have had to-night from the hon. Minister, that there is to be proper supervision in the expenditure of this money, in such a way that it shall only be spent having regard to the completion of the railway within the amount voted, affords to us the most perfect guarantee that can be afforded in any business transactions, that the railway will be completed within that time, and for no further sum of money than is here proposed to be voted. Now, Sir, the question, and really the only important question is, what guarantee have we that this money will be repaid? Are we simply launching out $22,500,000 or $30,000,000—if the hon. gentlemen choose to assume that the second instalment of the purchase money of the annuities will not be paid—are we simply spending that $30,000,000 without any prospect whatever of getting it back? Sir, we have, first, the lands of the Company. Now, I think, in view of what hon. gentlemen opposite have said as to the value of these lands, in view of the extravagant statements they have made as to the enormous subsidies which have been given to this Company, based upon an estimate all the way up to $5 and $7 an acre, we may fairly assume that the average price received up to this time will be realized in the future for these lands. We find that the Northern Pacific Railway, which runs through a territory very much like that of our own North-West, inferior to it as it seems to me—because they have to take the land irrespective of whether it is fit for settlement or otherwise—during the last year sold upwards of 750,000 acres of land at an average price of $4 an acre, not counting in their town lots at all, for which they received something like $332,000. We have the evidence of our own Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which has sold up to this time its land at $2.36 an acre. They have sold up to this time land to the value of nearly $9,000,000. If we receive but $1,250,000 a year from the sale of lands—and remember that every dollar received from the sale of lands goes into the hands of trustees for the repayment of the interest and principal of the loan we are now advancing—we have the interest upon this $22,500,000 paid to us, and the loan is not a charge upon the people of this country at all. We are practically buying back, if the worst came to the worst, about 21,000,000 of acres of the lands in the North-West, which hon. gentlemen, in estimating the subsidies given to the Company, have told us are worth $5 an acre, and giving $22,500,000 for them. That is practically the first security we have. You will remember, Sir, that, when this contract was let, one of the charges made against the Government, one of the complaints made with regard to the contract was this: When it was compared with the arrangements proposed by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) while at the head of the Government, for the construction of this railway by a company, that gentleman's answer was: it is quite true we offered large subsidies, but we made a provision in the Act by which we could buy back the railway after it was built, at 10 per cent. over and above the cash that had been paid for it, less the subsidies in land or money which had been given to it by the Government. Now, Sir, suppose the worst came to the worst, what would be our position in this? We would practically be carrying out the very policy which hon. gentlemen opposite embodied in the Act of Parliament of 1874—we would be buying back the railway at very much less than the money put into it, deducting the subsidies received from the Government, whether in land or money.

Because, Mr. Speaker, until this money is paid back, until the country stands in the position in which it stands to-day, before we have voted this grant—until that is the case, not one single dollar can go from the sale of these lands into the pockets of the Company. It goes altogether into the Treasury of the Dominion. Under these circumstances, therefore, I think the land must be regarded as a valid security removing the arrangement altogether from the class of arrangements which we have made in the past. Then, Sir, we have, in addition to that, the $35,000,000 of stock. When the hon. gentleman was dealing with the contracting company he chose to assume that stock at 60 cents on the dollar. If that is a fair estimate, we have in that stock enough to repay us for the advance of this $22,500,000. And then, Sir, we have in addition to all that, a mortgage upon all the property of the Company, in addition to the property which we ourselves have contracted with them to build—because it should never be forgotten that the contract between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the people of Canada is for the construction of a railway west of Callander to the Pacific Ocean. Everything they do east of that is done simply as an ordinary business corporation, and Parliament has, in fact, little or nothing to do with it. We have contracted with them to build west of Callander, but we will have a mortgage, not only upon what we contracted with them to build west of Callander, but upon everything else which they have obtained, including their eastern extensions down to Montreal and Brockville, with their branches and everything connected with the railway. That I think would be looked upon by an ordinary loan company as a tolerably good security for $22,500,000—anything better it would be difficult to imagine. We are, therefore, simply advancing that money, and holding in our hands the assets which, from year to year, as they are realized in the sales of land, must pay us interest upon them, and of which, ultimately, the securities that we take are certain to secure the absolute payment. Under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, are we in a position to enter into this bargain? The hon. gentleman who last addressed the House referred to the financial position of Canada. He referred to the difficulties, to the dangers, as he said, in which we stood of running too much into debt. He told us the old story of how rapidly the debt of Canada had increased from 1867 to 1873. He told us of the terrible extravagances which had characterized that increased expenditure. He did not, of course, quote to us the famous circular issued in England, in which he pointed out to investors in that country that all these expenditures inured to the advantage of the country, and were all practically money-producing investments, directly or indirectly. But, he told us of the position in which we stood, and he referred to the fact that the hon. the Finance Minister would be compelled, within the next year or two, to raise by loan something about $50,000,000 in the English market. Well, Sir, what is that $50,000,000 to be raised for? We know that this year, by the Estimates that have been laid on the Table, in spite of all the large expenditures which have been made, in spite of this enormous increase of the debt—which I find has even been telegraphed to England and published in the Standard, to warn people there from having anything to do with Canadian investments—

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That was a false statement, too.

Mr. WHITE. Of course, there are no statements telegraphed to England but false statements through the American press just now, and through the ordinary channels of communication. As I was saying, we find that in spite of all this increase of expenditure from year to year, the estimates show a reduction in the charge for interest upon the people of Canada in connection with their debt, of nearly $250,000. That is the position we will stand in next year as compared with the current year. Then what are we to do? What is this money to be obtained for? It is true, the hon. the Finance Minister has to go to England, but he goes there to redeem $33,500,000 of the debt of Canada which bears to day 5 per cent. He will be able to make an arrangement by which it will be no additional charge upon the country. It is simply an exchange of 4 per cents. for 5 per cents., and if he succeeds in doing it, he will further reduce the annual charge upon the people of this country by $134,470 by that transaction. Is that the thing to be alarmed at? Is that an evidence that this country is over-burdening itself, is increasing its debt in such a way as seriously to imperil its future? On the contrary, Mr. Speaker, as regards $33,000,000 of that $50,000,000, to obtain which the hon. Finance Minister will have to go to England, it will not be an increase of our debt—measuring our debt by the annual charge upon the people, which is the true and proper way to measure it; it is actually a transaction by which we are to reduce, by over $400,000, the charges of that debt upon the people of this country. And, as to this $22,500,000—the balance of this money—that is a sum for which we are actually to receive five per cent. I attach no importance to the fact that we may be able to borrow money at 4 per cent. and loan it at 5 per cent. That may be an incident of this bargain. But what I do attach importance to is that this advance of $22,500,000; that this $33,000,000 which has to be borrowed on the English market; that this addition to our debt of $50,000,000 which we are asked to contemplate with horror by hon. gentlemen opposite, is an addition to our public debt which, so far from increasing our annual burdens, will reduce them by about $500,000. That is the position in which we stand financially, and I challenge the hon. gentleman to find a flaw in any single statement in connection with it. He may say: What evidence have you that you will get your 5 per cent. on the $22,500,000? Sir, we have the evidence of 21,000,000 acres of land to be sold to settlers who may go into the country, the money coming into the Treasury of the Dominion, to be applied to the interest upon this money. So that, Sir, there is nothing, as it seems to me, in the financial position of the country to cause us any alarm; but, on the contrary, I think we may congratulate ourselves, and I think the hon. the Finance Minister may congratulate himself, upon the prospect that when he goes to the elections of 1887, with this railway completed, and running through the Dominion to the Pacific, so that people who take the train at Halifax may go to Port Moody over Canadian territory without changing cars—when he will be able to show that accomplished, while the annual charge for interest upon the public debt is less than it was in the elections of 1882—I say I think he may fairly look forward to a position stronger than that which any public man has ever occupied before the people of this country. Sir, that will form a striking contrast to the position which the hon. gentleman occupied when he left office in 1878. He talks of increasing the public debt. Does he remember that during the five years he controlled the finances of this country the public debt increased about $40,000,000? Does he remember that every charge connected with the public debt increased enormously while he was Finance Minister? Does he remember that the people of this country were compelled to do without expenditures for those useful objects which a new and growing country like this always requires, because of the manner in which the finances were administered, and in which a policy was carried out of annual deficits instead of annual surpluses, as we have had since that time? The hon. gentleman tells us that in this country sometimes we have a great revenue and sometimes a small revenue. That is true. I think we had, for a while, a too great revenue. I do not hesitate for a moment to say so, and I have not hesitated to make that assertion. I was among the first to warn the merchants of Canada, as a journalist, against the danger of over-importing, and the possibility of that great boom in the North-West collapsing, as unfortunately it did collapse—but, I hope, only for a short time. But I think we may fairly say, with the prospect which the completion of this railway holds out to us—with the prospect of the settlement which is certain to take place in the North-West—we may fairly look forward, under our present Tariff, with a continuance of those reductions which the hon. Finance Minister has been able to make almost ever since the Tariff was introduced in 1879, to having such resources as will enable us to carry on those reasonable works of public improvements in every part of the country, which it must be the interest of the people of Canada at large to have. One of the objections, and it seems to me the objection of which I have heard most, to this arrangement, has been that this Company has busied itself with other enterprises; that it has overburdened itself by undertaking a number of other enterprises I have no hesitation in saying that, as regards the Ontario and Quebec Railway and the Credit Valley Railway, I think it would have been better off if it had not touched them; but I am not responsible for its having touched them, for, as an independent member of Parliament, I did what I could last year to prevent the arrangement under which those lines were taken over. I cannot, however, overlook the argument of the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr Ives), which is not an unreasonable one. Of those railways, the Credit Valley was already built, and the Ontario and Quebec was advancing towards completion. It was really not a question as to whether there should be opposition to the Grand Trunk or not. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company, as I understand their arrangement, have not put one single dollar of capital into either of those enterprises. The only enterprises into which they have put capital are those which properly belong to their great enterprise—that is, the enterprises which bring the traffic of the Canadian Pacific Railway to the seaboard at Montreal and Quebec. They have leased the other railways mentioned. They think they are advantageous to them. They believe this year they will be able, by the Ontario and Quebec, and the Toronto, Grey and Bruce, which they have also leased, to carry the traffic and the immigrants to the port of Owen Sound, and make of that port, what it has never been to the same extent, a great port for the transshipping of immigrants and freight between the great West and the eastern Provinces. The Company think that is advantageous, and they have gone into it. To my mind, having regard to this particular scheme, it is a matter of no consequence whether they acted wisely or unwisely in doing it. They have done it. The Parliament of Canada has sanctioned it. The people of Canada will get the advantage of competition through a great corporation, not through a miserable, small, struggling corporation, whose owning of a railway is, perhaps, one of the greatest curses which can befall the country through which it passes, but by this great corporation they will be saved from the monopoly which hon. gentlemen opposite fear so much in the North-West; and so far as we are concerned, in connection with this particular enterprise it is a matter which does not affect it in the slightest degree. But the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright), tells us that the construction of this railway has done more harm than good to the North-West; that the farmers of the North-West would have been better off if the Company had simply built the railway to Winnipeg and there stopped, and we had allowed them, with their own lands, to go on with the work and build the railway beyond that point. Why, we have been giving lands to private companies to build railways through that country; we have been affording opportunities to railway companies by granting subsidies of a valuable character to build railways there, and I am not incorrect when I say that the experience, so far as the rapid construction of the railways is concerned, and as regards affording railway facilities to settlers, has not been a very assuring one. It surely is little less than an insult to the House and to this country that any hon. gentleman should rise and say he believes that the farmers in that North-West country, with whatever grievances they may have to complain of, would be better off if they had not had a railway running from Winnipeg to the Rocky Mountains, as they have today. It has been a matter to them of the greatest possible consequence. It is quite true they complain of their grievances, and doubtless they suffer the incidents of settlement in a new country. But it seems to me, when I look back at the early history of this country, when I remember, as I have had recounted to me personally, the records of the fathers of some of the men who have gone into the North-West and are now meeting in convention for the purpose of declaring their grievances; when I remember how those sturdy pioneers went into the backwoods of old Canada with an axe over their shoulders and hewed out for themselves a home; how these men had to carry on their own backs their bags of grain to the mill, eight or ten miles distant, in order to have it ground and take back the flour with which to feed their families; when they had to go miles and miles and leave their wives and children in the forest clearing to get the nearest doctor in order that they might have the advantage of his attention when sickness occurred; when they were removed from all the advantages and associations of civilized life, and yet when you go to Ontario today and find those old men with their families round about them, and hear them tell the story of their settlement, one cannot but feel almost indignant that their sons should be grumbling because they have not a railway to their own doors. The grievances in the North-West, what are they? Hon. gentlemen opposite have manufactured the most of them; hon. gentlemen talk about the land policy and the evils connected with it and about people leaving the North-West to go to Dakota, saying, they might there find better land regulations than in their own country—those hon. gentlemen have done more to stir up a sense of grievance among the people of the North-West than any others. One would imagine, hearing them speak, even during this debate, that the land regulations of the North-West contrast most unfavourably with the regulations in the United States. Do they so contrast? What is the fact? Here is a comparison between the Homestead Policy of Canada and that of the United States, which will show which is more favourable to settlers. In Canada, the head of a family or any male person not less than eighteen years of age is entitled to a homestead himself. In the United States he must be twenty-one years of age before he is entitled to a homestead entry. In Canada, such entry may be for any quantity not exceeding 160 acres in any land open therefor; the even-numbered sections on about 80,000,000 of the most fertile lands being free for selection. In the United States, within the railway belts, a man is only entitled to a homestead of 80 acres. In Canada a man is entitled to a pre-emption of 160 acres. In the United States pre-emptions have been abolished. In Canada he obtains his patent at the end of three years residence. In the United States not until the end of five years. In Canada he may have a second homestead entry. In the United States he cannot have a second homestead entry. In Canada he may commute, by purchase, after a year's residence. In the United States he may commute by purchase, but it is recommended at this moment that that privilege should be restricted. Now that is a contrast between the land regulations of the two countries. We hear hon. gentllemen telling us, and in such a way as to induce settlers to believe it, that the people are leaving the North-West because of the land regulations, and are going into Dakota, where, presumably, they will enjoy better regulations. Let these hon. gentlemen say that something might be improved, that the Government might do differently from what they are doing; but in the name of all that is patriotic, in the name of all that is true, in the name of all that is decent, let them not say—or make their statements in regard to our country in such a way as to imply, when they say that people are going into a foreign country to escape the conditions here—let them not make them in such a way as to leave the impression that the conditions there are better than in our own country. The hon. gentleman was kind enough to say that the American press always had a keen sense of the honour of their own country, and I believe the public men of the United States always have a keen sense of the honour and prosperity of their own country. You do not find them complaining to the world of the character of the land laws of their own country; you do not find them giving to their enemies opportunities of quoting from their journals paragraphs which tend to prevent people from coming to that country. I heard of an editor at Fargo, in the northern part of Dakota, who, when driven from the lower flat of his office by the floods, went up to the upper flat and sitting on a high stool, and putting his feet on a chair, in order to keep them dry, proceeded to write. And how did he write: "Magnificent overflow of the Red River! Splendid prospect of the crops for the coming season!" That is the kind of spirit which makes the American North-West, and the opposite of it is the kind of spirit which is doing so much harm to our country. We have much more to fear to-day from the feeling which seems to prevail with hon. gentlemen opposite, that their only chance for success as politicians in this country depends on the ruin of the country. We have much more to fear in regard to this country from their doing everything they can do to depreciate the country and alarm the people who may be proposing to come here and share our lot—I say we have much more to fear from that than from the financial position of the country, or from our loaning on good security to the Canadian Pacific Railway $22,500,000, which we are certain, by the conditions of the bargain, to get back; and for one, Sir, I have no hesitation in saying—and I have no doubt whatever what the result will be when the matter comes to be discussed by the people of this country in future—that the Government would have been recreant to their trust if, having so favourable an opportunity to secure the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, they had, from timidity, from fear, from the danger of meeting with opposition to their scheme, failed to put forward their hand and secure for the people of Canada the early construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. WHITE.

Mr. CASGRAIN. It was not my intention to take part in this debate this evening, but I made certain calculations upon the figures which have been laid before this House by the hon. Minister of Railways, and I have found some discrepancies which I shall submit to the consideration of hon. members. I believe I shall be able to show that the figures which he has laid before us and which he has challenged us to examine contain grave errors. I find, in the first place, that there is a discrepancy between the figures of Mr. Schreiber and the hon. Minister of Railways as to the total receipts. The total receipts admitted by the hon. Minister of Railways are $52,994,702, while those admitted by Mr. Schreiber are only $21,318,222, making a difference of $32,676,480. It may be said that this discrepancy arises from the fact that he only gives the assets had from the Government. I take the whole assets and I take them and put them at $53,000,000, as they sum up in round numbers.

Mr. WHITE.

From the figures which I have, and which I believe to be correct, I intend to demonstrate that this Company are going to build the railway without expending one dollar out of their own pockets. If we deduct, out of the total amount of the $54,728,500, which is the amount given by the hon. Minister of Railways as the total expenditure from Montreal to Kamloops, we find that out of these sums must be taken a number of others for different purposes, among them being the extension from Callander to Brockville, $3,270,351; the sum of $900,000 for rolling stock for that extension, for shops and machinery, $516,032; for tools and machinery for the same, $352,230. Then there is real estate for termini, $390,790, as mentioned by the hon. Minister, and forming together the sum of $5,428,403. Now, Sir, there is another item for extensions and acquisitions east of Callander—that is to say the Atlantic and North Western, the Canada North Western Land Company, advances for construction and sundry advances in respect to securities deposited by the Government, making another sum of $3,966,865 to be added to that, making in round numbers the sum of $9,395,268 of moneys expended east of Callander. Another sum of money which has not gone into the construction of the railway is the amount deposited with the Government on account of the guarantee, $8,710,240, and another sum of $2,128,000, retained for a 5 per cent. dividend on the stock. These divers sums amount altogether to $20,213,508, which are to be deducted from the total amount of the expenditure, that is to say, $58,695,365. Well what is the balance that now remains in the hands of the Company? It shows a surplus of $14,532,834, which the Company would have had if they had not made any acquisitions east of Callander. I maintain that with this amount—and their investments east of Callander which must be profitable, and must yield them a certain amount of dividend—and with the other amounts that they will receive, over and above their total receipts of $52,994,702, they have sufficient, apart from the loan, to build the railway within two years. But why do they come here? They come because they have sufficient influence to get what they want. They come because they want to save the interest on their money—because they want to build the road as fast as they can, and have the revenue of the road for themselves. These gentlemen want to build the road without spending one dollar out of their own pockets, and I am going to demonstrate that they are going to do so. Now, Sir, we have already given them, in round numbers, $53,000,000. What are they going to get in the next two years, either in value or in cash? Perhaps the hon. gentleman will be astounded at the difference between his figures and mine, but I contend that investigation will lead the public to accept mine as true. In the first place, they will have the balance of the subsidy, $12,210,789. They will have the Government works now being carried on, which the hon. Minister of Railways places at $28,000,000, supposing that no extras will be added to the amount. They will have the proportion of $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 expended for surveys, of which I apportion to that part of the railway given to them, $2,500,000. They will have the net revenue of the road for two years, which I place at the same figure as my hon. friend who has just sat down—$1,250,000 a year, or $2,500,000 for the two years. Assuming that they will only get 5 per cent. dividend from their investments east of Callander—which in reality amount to $14,000,000, but which I place only at $10,000,000—they will get from that source $1,000,000. From postal subsidies, taking the amount given by the hon. Minister of Railways himself, they will get $3,000,000, as the value set thereon by himself. There is a small bonus of $200,000, an advance of $339,235 for rails not credited, and a further sum of $286,000, which has been paid on one of the contracts which the Government has turned over to them. These different sums, added together, make, in round numbers, $51,000,000, which, with the $53,000,000 already mentioned, make the total sum of $104,000,000, which the Company are going to have within two years; and yet they come before this House and say that they want money. No, they do not say that they want money, but they say they can get it. They say, we can build the railway, but we want to build it at once, and will build it in two years, provided you give us $30,000,000. I do not know whether they will build it or not if we give them the $30,000,000. Most likely, as it is their interest, and as the Company are powerful enough to do so, they will build it in that time. But there is more than that. They get their $104,000,000 at the end of these two years, and they want more. They want to build the railway without spending any of their own money. That is what they want. Now let us see what additional guarantee the Government is going to give them, or the guarantee they ask for, and which the Government is willing to give them. The Government is to give them 3 per cent. on $65,000,000 of their stock for ten years. Rightly calculated, this interest will be, for the ten years, $19,500,000. But now I would not place that full figure against them, because they place in the hands of the Government a certain sum in order to guarantee the payment of this interest. I put this amount at the sum of only $7,300,000. I put against them also the present loan which they ask, $22,500,000, and the sum released to pay their floating debt, which will amount to $7,500,000. All these sums together make up the small amount of $141,000,000 besides the $1,000,000 of guarantee returned to them. The hon. the Minister of Finance is accustomed to make calculations; but I think that my calculations, in this respect, are quite as correct as any that are made in his office. They are going to get $141,000,000, and they may be called upon to return hereafter—what? To return perhaps $30,000,000. Therefore, they will be, in cash, all round, in the receipt of $111,000,000 for the cost of the road. After having the road paid for by the Government, what more remains in their hands? There remains in their hands a quantity of land which they value at $2.36 an acre, and which, according to their own assumption, will give an aggregate value of $50,142,920. That is not all. They leave in the hands of the Government a further amount of $35,000,000 of stock. Well, that stock must be worth something. Take it, say at 50 cts., that will be what will remain in their hands—$17,500,000 when sold. The consequence will be that they will have, all around in cash, land and stock, the sum of $188,747,920, out of which they must repay $30,000,000. Now, that is a very large sum of money for the building of this road. They have expended, they say, so far, in its construction, $58,695,365, and they say to build it they have only to add $27,000,000, making in all $85,685,365, to complete the road. It is very singular that this estimation was the first that was made, even four years ago, by the hon. Minister of Railways, when he said in the Hansard, page 59, vol. I, of 1880, that the cost of the road would amount to $84,000,000. The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe has said that the railway will cost about that sum. But if it will cost $85,000,000 in round numbers, these gentlemen of the Canadian Pacific Railway will have, over and above the road itself, which will remain in their hands, a sum more than equal to its cost. This is the deduction that I make from the figures given by the hon. Minister of Railways. It is true that he has a peculiar mode of showing that this railway will not be paid these large amounts. But I maintain that each and every item that I have prepared in that statement can bear the same challenge that the hon. gentleman has asked for his own statements. The hon. gentleman pretends, with regard to the quantity of wheat that may be raised in the North-West, that were we to give him an army of 100,000 men he would repeat the miracle of the loaves and fishes, he would feed both continents for one year with 100,000 farmers cultivating 320 acres each. There are probably 10,000,000 farmers in the United States, and they do not raise half that amount.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman probably found that in my speech. That is exactly what I said. I said that amount was 50 per. cent more than the entire yield in the United States.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Does the hon. gentleman believe what he says? I do not intend any offence at all, but the thing seems to me so preposterous that I may express my opinion that the hon. gentleman does not believe it. The hon. gentleman may be able to perform miracles, but we only read of the miracle of the loaves and fishes once in the Bible, and it has never been repeated since. The hon. Minister's calculations are made for school boys, not for reasonable men; and on the same principle as the advice given to children to make their figures on the black-board a little larger, I would tell him also to do so that his amount may look bigger. I may say also that the little letter of instructions to Messrs. Miall and Schreiber to scrutinize the books, might as well have been dispensed with. That little ceremony need not have been gone through at all. The hon. Minister might as well have accepted the books and returns sent by the Canadian Pacific Railway without sending these two officials to go over them and report that they were all right. They may be very expert book-keepers, but I must say that if they pretended, in two or three days, to make a full and satisfactory report of the whole transactions of this company, they must believe us to be green horns. Now, Sir, there is another thing which strikes me also in the manner of introducing this measure. It reminds me of the Pacific contract when it was first introduced some three years ago. It was made first, as we then said, in the dark. It was put on the Table of the House at a particular period of the year, at a special time at which we were assembled here on purpose, and it was intended to pass it through in a hurry. Well, I see that the same dodge is resorted to on the present occasion. This good Government has been kind enough, during the recess, to enter into this bargain with the Syndicate, and now they come before the House and say to their friends and to the members of this House: We have passed this little bargain; you have got to take it as it is; in fact, you have got to swallow it. Grip gives a very good description of it. Shut your eyes and open your mouth, and swallow it. That is what gentlemen on the other side have got to do, and they cannot do otherwise. It is true that some of the Canadian members do not like the pill at all. If I may believe the rumors we hear in the lobbies, some of them are cabrés; they are baulky on the subject; some of them are kicking in the traces; but they will soon cool down. I never knew these Conservatives giving a bad vote to their party. They will swallow it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman says some hon. members are kicking in the traces, but are going to swallow it. What are they going to swallow? are they going to swallow the traces?

Mr. CASGRAIN. They will swallow everything, like the motion of yesterday. They say the motion is lost and the money too. That is what their friends say. Well, I admire the hon. gentleman; I admire his magnetic talent, of course I do. He has got a great deal of magnetism in him. Now, Sir, there is another characteristic in this loan which appears to me to be very singular: I always understood that, when a party wanted to borrow money, he would take the sum he wanted to borrow and not give an equivalent sum. He would not return at once the amount borrowed. But the Syndicate want to borrow a sum of money, and they say, out of that sum we will give you at once $8,000,000; we will leave it in your hands. Why do they not borrow at once the difference? It would simplify the matter very much in my opinion. But this would be rather unimportant compared with the fact that, in spite of this fine bargain made by the Syndicate with this good Government, the value of their own stock, and the credit of their own Company has not been enhanced one farthing; on the contrary, it has been depressed. I think the Government must have had a very baneful influence upon the stock. The mere idea that the Government was going to help them, or going to be partner with them in some way, had the effect of depreciating the stock at once. It is no credit to the Government that, in spite of promising something like 11 per cent. upon stock, it would not realize anything at all. There is another point that struck me in the speech of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals. The hon. gentlemen told us that the interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway, was to have a terminus on the Atlantic, and a terminus on the shores of the Dominion, and he went as far as Louisburg: in fact, I suppose he will find another way of crossing the Gut of Canso easily—it will be the same way, I suppose, as the production of wheat; it will be done by a miracle. Well, we are not going so far as Louisburg. We will remain on the main shore. We will go only as far as Halifax or as far as Quebec. It was hinted, and, I think, it may be received as a very broad hint of the future demands of the Canadian Pacific Railway, that, as I inferred from the speech of the hon. Minister, it is the intention, and not only the intention, but a matured project, of the Canadian Pacific Railway, to extend their line as far as the Atlantic; and by what route? Will it be by the International Railway, which is owned in part by the Minister of Agriculture, or will it be by the Intercolonial Railway, that they will reach the Atlantic? If they reach the Atlantic by the Intercolonial Railway, it must be with the connivance, or rather with the agreement, of the Government. Well, there are two ways of making this agreement. They may either lease the road or buy the road. As far as I can see, the intent of the Pacific Railway Syndicate or Company would be to buy the railway, or perhaps, as they have had already many presents from the Government, to ask the Government to cede them that railway. Perhaps they may be powerful enough to exact something of the kind from the Government or get it for a nominal sum. It does not, at the present moment, give a great revenue to the Dominion, and perhaps the hon. Minister of Railways would find it advantageous to the country and very advantageous to the Pacific Railway Company to sell them the Intercolonial Railway; and perhaps also they might induce the Syndicate to buy the North Shore Railway from the Grand Trunk Railway Company. Perhaps we might have the help, in that respect, of the present Secretary of State, who understands how to make a good bargain in respect of railways. Having that aid, I do not doubt the Canadian Pacific Railway could make a first rate bargain. It is all well enough to speak of patriotism, and all that. We may say this in this House to ourselves, but in regard to the Syndicate, which is composed of acute Americans, steady English capitalists, very close French capitalists also, a few German also, I would be at a loss to find any patriotic sentiment in any of them towards Canada. I do not believe one of them cares a rap for Canada, except about the money they are going to make in this country—not one of them. I do not suppose that Mr. Kennedy or Mr. Hill cares at all whether this Dominion increases or not, provided their railway progresses, and provided their railway pays. They will exact from us all they can, and, moreover, they will not be at all thankful. They have shown, up to the present moment, what the power of money can do—that to receive they have only to ask; and they will get this, and more too. I have read, for the first time this afternoon, from the papers laid on the Table of the House, about this construction company, which appears to be also a part of the Syndicate, or composed partially of the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I observe a statement made by Mr. Schreiber to the hon. the Minister of Railways, recapitulating the expenditure of $58,000,000 and the receipts of $52,000,000. There appears to be an excess of expenditure of $5,790,000. Although this expenditure may appear in the books of the Company, I would like Mr. Schreiber or Mr. Miall, who are such good auditors, to tell me whether this amount has not been made up already by the profits which the construction company has made by the Canadian Pacific Railway. If we were to look closely into the account, we would probably find that this $5,000,000, which appears as an expenditure, would be covered by the operations which some of the companies have made by the contract. Now, Sir, there is an old proverb which has been often quoted—festina lente—make haste slowly. This proverb has not been followed by the Company, and their course has proved, not exactly disastrous to the country, but certainly not favourable. As I said before, it is not because they want money at present, but because they say they cannot now command the money for future use. Suppose they did not get the money at all that they are asking of us, I have not the least doubt that those great capitalists would soon find elsewhere the $27,000,000 which they want. They could sell their stock, or they could wait a little while until they found the paltry sum of $27,000,000. But they command the situation, and they say: We want money, and we are going to have it; we will get our $30,000,000; we will build the railway, and when it is built we shall not have disbursed one cent of our own money. That is the long and the short of it, and it shows that they are more acute speculators than we suspected at first. I would also like to know in what position the second syndicate would have been, had they obtained the contract, if they had come before this Government and asked the same favour. Would the hon. Minister of Railways even have listened to them? Would he not say to them: You have made a contract and you must abide by it? But, Sir, we are told that if this railway is not built within two years, disastrous consequences will result. Well, I cannot see it, but perhaps I cannot see so well through my spectacles as others can. I cannot see how, by enhancing the privileges of this Company—which may be said to rule one-half of this Dominion—how, by increasing its privileges, we are going to benefit the Dominion. I think I see in this proposition, rather, an arrangement by which the Government hope to sustain themselves in power and to bolster up their National Policy. That is the view I entertain of the project of the Government in helping this Company to such a large extent. Now, Mr. Speaker, if I had had more opportunity to examine these papers, I might have made a stronger case. This is a very grave matter, indeed. The hon. Premier, I fear, has not realized its gravity. He has been leader of the Government for a long time, and he might have profited by this occasion to retrieve his many sins of omission and commission, which he has already confessed before this House. I will not say that he is at the end of his political career—and certainly I do not wish, personally, to see him out of public life—but if he had taken a statesmanlike view of this great matter, he would not have treated it as a mere party politician. He ought to treat this Company as he would treat any other company coming before this House, and then he would not have succumbed to the influence of this great Syndicate. On the contrary, he would have improved the occasion to retrieve his past errors, to render to the country its due, and to exact from this Company the odious monopoly, the vexatious privileges, that they are now to enjoy for twenty years to come. With these remarks, Mr. Speaker, I leave the matter before the House.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I do not intend to address the House at very great length, but I think it my duty, as representing one of the counties of this Dominion, as a member of this House, and as a Canadian, to give my opinions upon this question to the House and to the country. I am not sure that they will throw much additional light on this question, and I do not expect to make the case any more plain than it has been made; but I wish to place on record the reasons why I am about to give a vote, the most important I will likely be called upon to give during the term of the present Parliament. The Railway question is one that is not new to this House or the country. This is in regard to assisting a Company which has undertaken the stupendous work of building a railway across the Canadian half of the continent of America. This question has occupied the attention of the best minds in Canada for many years. It has occupied the attention, not only of the present Government and their supporters, but of members of the House generally; and very particularly the members of the late Government, who are now sitting on the Opposition benches and are leading the Opposition. In 1873, it is well known that the Allan contract, so-called, was made. That contract gave 54,000,000 acres of land and $30,000,000 to a company to build a railway from Lake Nipissing to Burrard Inlet. Everybody knows the fate of that contract. Everybody knows how it collapsed. Everybody knows the reasons why it collapsed, and that we were unable to gain what all parties in the State declared was a very great object to gain, namely, a railroad to the Pacific Ocean on Canadian soil. I need not dilate any further on that matter, but I wish to state as succinctly as I can, the history of this question as it is in my mind. In 1873 the Government of Sir John A. Macdonald was hurled from power and the Reform party, with the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) and the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) as leaders, took their places in this House. They placed upon the Statute Book without the slightest delay, in the Session of 1874, an Act whereby they were to give to any company to build this great road that the previous Government had been unable to build, $10,000 per mile and 20,000 acres per mile, for 2,797 miles, and they were also to give 4 per cent. for twenty-five years on such balance as was necessary to complete the road. Everybody knows, who has looked at the question at all, that that represents the following amounts: $10,000 per mile for 2,797 miles would amount to $27,970,000; the land at $1 per acre, to $55,940,000, and 4 per cent. upon such necessary balance, taking the Foster contract as the test—and I have the authority of the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), in the Session of 1881 (see page 362 Hansard, 1881, vol. 1), for doing so—would amount to $20,997,500. I have here his statement that the hon. Minister of Railways had not taken an unfair test when he took the Foster contract, and it was well known that Mr. Foster was not able to make anything out of his contract and had to abandon it at $7,500 per mile with a guarantee of 4 per cent. for twenty-five years. Adding those amounts together, they make the sum of $104,887,500. This was the amount which hon. gentlemen now in opposition, and who were leading the Reform party, placed upon the Statute Book as that which they would give to any company which would build a railway to the Pacific, a distance of 2,797 miles. That is a clear statement and it is a true one. Those gentlemen advertised in the public press of the day. In 1877, they advertised all over Europe. They tried their best to get a company to build the road, and I will give the hon. member for East York, then the Leader of the Government, the fullest credit for having endeavoured to get a company that would construct the road on those terms. But he failed, and he came to this House in 1879, and stated frankly that he had failed, that he could not get a single bonâ fide offer. Here are his words:

"The hon. gentlemen opposite, and the whole country, are aware that we solicited tenders in England for some months upon this ground, before hon. gentlemen opposite came into office; also that Mr. Sandord Fleming, the Chief Engineer, was instructed, while in London, to place himself in communication with contractors and financial men, and also to obtain the assistance of Sir John Rose, who, in many things, had been the active, energetic and patriotic agent of the Dominion, with a view to the carrying out of this scheme. But I am informed that, notwithstanding all our efforts, we signally failed in obtaining one single offer (there was one imperfect offer made) for the construction of the railroad on these terms, which were, the grant of 20,000 acres and $10,000 cash, per mile, with a guarantee of 4 per cent. upon such balance as might be represented as necessary."

These words are very emphatic and very specific, because they are not confined to the Foster contract at $7,500 per mile. Any sum which a company tendering with sufficient bonds would accept to build the road, they were prepared to give, whether it was $7,500 per mile, or $15,000 per mile. The then Premier then said: "No terms could be more explicit; it would be difficult to mention terms more favourable." I think the House will agree with me that it would be difficult to mention terms more favourable than 4 per cent. for twenty-five years, when the amount might be $10,000 or $20,000 per mile. That speech was delivered on the occasion when the present hon. Minister of Railways asked the House to pass resolutions in which the Government of the day were asked to hand over to trustees 100,000,000 acres of land to sell, at not less than $2 per acre, the proceeds to constitute a fund for the purpose of building the Pacific Railway. Time passed on. The Government were utterly unable to get a single offer to build the road on these terms. They passed out of power; they were scattered to the four winds of heaven, when they went to the elections of 1878. They came back with their shattered forces, and the "sulky leaders of the chase," to use an expression borrowed from Sir Walter Scott, came to the House to face their former opponents, who took their places on this side of the House. Again, the Government which I have the honour and pleasure to support, grappled with this question, and in 1879 they asked the House to pass certain resolutions setting aside 100,000,000 acres of land to build this road. Then, Sir, the hand of the Opposition was seen. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) in 1879 complimented the Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper, whom he mentioned by their names, as having supported him in his arduous duties and in the efforts he had made in regard to that road. I believe that these words were honest and sincere, and I believe that the hon. gentleman did make energetic efforts to build the road. These words are on record in the Hansard of to-day. But, what was the course of these hon. gentlemen? We would have thought that they would have endeavoured, as patriotic Canadians, to strengthen the hands of the Government in endeavouring to build this road which had challenged their greatest energies. They were appealed to and asked to lift this question above the mire of party; they were asked if there were not enough subjects for fighting in the National Policy; if there were not other chances which the Reform party might take without dragging this great question which affected every man, woman and child in the Dominion, and had baffled the energies of two strong Governments into the mire of politics—the bitter party rivalry which prevails in this country. They were asked, in language which I shall quote, and which, to cite another author, "should be written on the door-posts of every deliberative assembly," not to make this question one of narrow, party bigotry. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, speaking in 1880, said:

"We have such a question in the National Policy without a dragging Pacific Railway. If we are defeated on that issue, hon. gentlemen opposite will take our places, irrespective of the policy of the Pacific Railway. Having that line of demarcation between us, let us, on the great national question of the Canadian Pacific Railway, unite as a band of brothers, irrespective of old parties, showing not that we are Liberals or Conservatives, but that we are Canadians, and that in every word that is uttered, whether we sit on the Treasury benches or on the Opposition side of the House, we feel we owe it to Canada, to ourselves, and to our children, to do all that men can do to strengthen the hands of those who are engaged in a great national enterprise, upon the success of which the rapid progress and prosperity of our common country depend."

Never did more patriotic words issue from the lips of a public man, and they came from the lips of the man who was complimented by the ex-Premier as having given him every aid and assistance when he occupied his place on this side of the House. Look at the difference to day between the Reform party and the Liberal Conservative party on this great question. Has the Government received on any single occasion, aid or comfort from hon. gentlemen opposite in dealing with this question? No, Sir, the moment they came back from the country, unexpectedly to themselves, but not to us, for the by-elections had given forth the fiat that their days were numbered, they came back disgusted, dispirited, savage, not with themselves, so much as with the people. They were angry and they did not allow their better judgment and reason to prevail, but they allowed themselves to be swayed by the narrow prejudices and bigotry of party and of disappointed ambition, even in the presence of this great question. Accustomed as they were to public warfare, they not only refused to strengthen the hands of the Government on this question, but they employed scribes all over this country to oery the credit of the country, so as to render it impossible, if they could do so, for the Government to build the road. These resolutions of 1879 proving abortive, the Government again came down to the House, in 1880, and asked for leave to build the 125 miles from Yale to Kamloops. The Opposition said, no, you shall not build a mile of road. The leader of the Opposition, who said he had been resurrected, that he was a political ghost, with his great power of debate, with his practice at the bar, with all the powers of his mind, went to work in a six hours' speech, to show that it was impossible to build the road, and that after it was built, it would not be worth anything. It is the most melancholy sight that you can possibly see to witness the powers of a great mind prostituted to the task of sinking, if possible, a great public work and endeavouring to destroy the prospect of ever building this railway. I have taken the pains to look over the Hansard to see what these gentlemen said, my pen refused to go further in extracts. The effect is something like the man with the load of apples. He was asked why he was not profane, and he replied, that he could not do the thing justice. I do not believe there is a pen or a voice in this country that can do it justice. I have waded through the Hansard to find if there was, from these hon. gentlemen, one word of comfort, of patriotism, of assistance to the Government in the undertaking, but I failed to find it. I did, however, cull a few expressions which they made use of, and I might have culled enough to occupy the time of this House for a week, but I shall only ask for a few moments to read them. I want it done for all time. I wish to have them placed together, in order that when we come to the next elections they may answer, like a lawyer's brief when he lays it away for other cases of a similar character. When I am at a public meeting I will not have to cull them again, but I will be able to read them at once, or some one else can do it for me. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) stated, in 1879 (you will find this in the Hansard of 1879, vol. 2, page 1969):

"I believe that, if the country is to be settled, if a certain breadth, say twenty miles on each side, is to be made available, other lands must be given cheap, or for nothing, to attract people into the country. Because, after all, the money obtained for the land is not equivalent for the labour and prosperity produced by a large influx of immigrants. Those people will do far more to enrich the country than will the holding of the entire land for land settlement, at a high price."

Again, he said, on page 1905, vol. 2, of Hansard, 1879:

"We must, therefore, make up our minds if we are to settle that country that it will be done only at the expenditure of a large amount of money to aid settlers in going in and giving them land free after they get in. That is my conviction."

Again, in the same volume, on page 1970, he says:

"I am, therefore, very much surprised that the hon. the Premier should have declared that the late Government had lost five years. We shall see what the next five years will bring forth, and the result of the right hon. gentleman's engineering and planning."

Why, Sir, his words were hardly read by the people before there was a contract laid on the Table, declaring that there was a company ready to build this road for a certain sum of money. The hon. gentleman also said, on page 1901 of the same volume:

"He (Sir Charles Tupper) has not hesitated a moment to say, in the face of all this, that he expects to go to England and get the active sympathy of the British Government. As a Canadian, I fervently trust that the British Government, notwithstanding the ill-behaviour of Canada to Britain, will show us that consideration which they have always hitherto been disposed to show; but, at the same time, I must say that if I were a British statesman, and were to act in the interest of British commerce and British workmen, it would be impossible for me to extend a particle of consideration to the hon. gentleman's proposal."

That was sent to England. I need not stop to say how it was met. I need not stop to show that, side by side, almost, with his utterances, went over that famous despatch of the then Governor-General, or to show how the leader of the Government suddenly cut the debate short by saying to the then leader of the Opposition: Why, the Governor General is the agent of Her Majesty here; he is an Imperial officer, and has a right to send what despatches he pleases to his Royal mistress, and this House has nothing to do with them; and the hon. member for East York sat down and said nothing more, because he knew that it was true constitutional doctrine. What was that despatch? It was that owing to the fact that fifty-two millions of people in the country lying contiguous to our south had a protective, almost a prohibitive policy, he, as a free trader of the Cobden school, believed that it was necessary in the interest of the Canadian people, that we should possess a different Tariff from what we had prior to 1879. That despatch was sent home, and hon. gentlemen were very curious to know what it was, but were not so anxious to see it when it was published in all the newspapers. On page 1899, vol. 2, of the Hansard of 1879, the hon. gentleman says:

"I was glad to hear the Minister of Public Works declare that those initial contracts which we gave out to secure a railroad from Lake Superior to Red River were as much in the interest of British Columbia as if the expenditure had been incurred in that Province itself. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman is correct in that statement. It must now be quite evident to every person that the railroad must be a lamentable failure, unless means be adopted, in the first place, to throw a very large population into that country, in the centre of the continent; and, without means of access to those western prairies, equivalent to that of the United States to theirs, we never could hope to get a large population into that country."

Mr. Mackenzie, on the railway, page 1967, vol. 2 of the Hansard, says:

"The fact is I have been personally and politically a devotee to the settlement of that country and the promotion of the interests of Canada there. I have looked upon the North-West as the place that was to give solidity and power to us."

I will just refer again to the speech of the hon. Minister of Railways in 1879, when, in the glow of enthusiasm which has always characterized him, he spoke on this question—and I believe there is not a political opponent of his in Canada or elsewhere who will not say that on this great public question he has never swerved one single iota from the principles he enunciated when he first entered Parliament, and that he has been, in season and out of season, the patriotic advocate of this road and of his country; and although, Sir, it may be said that he has used extravagant language in regard to Canada, her capabilities and her immense resources—although that may be said by persons not acquainted with the country—I, for one, do not believe that it is in the power of any hon. gentleman here to use language which is too extravagant in regard to the future of this great country. But, Sir, even if he had used language which was extravagant, would he not be pardoned? Is not the Scotchman pardoned when he declares that the thistle is softer than satin? Is not the Irishman pardoned when he declares that the shamrock is the most beautiful emblem in the world? Is not the Frenchman pardoned when he takes pride in his fleur-de-lis? Sir, the extravagance of any man, on an occasion when he speaks of his country, would be pardoned as readily as when he speaks of his mother; and there is no man who has the sympathy of his race, and the love of his country, and who thinks for a single moment, who would not almost let a tear fall when he hears one speak of his love for his country and his love for his mother. The hon. Minister of Railways, speaking in 1879, on page 466, of the Hansard, referring to the hon. gentleman—the hon. Mr. Cartwright—he will pardon me for mentioning his name—I forget what constituency he was from at that time, he is from so many; they all want him—the hon. Minister of Railways said:

“I say the language the hon. gentleman used—the language that he unfairly, unpatriotically, and dishonestly used, because, Sir, it is not true—I say that language was unworthy the mouth of any Canadian statesman. I say that declarations on the floor of the Parliament of Canada, going to-morrow morning down to New York and Washington, that we are at the feet of the Americans—the declarations that we are as clay in the hands of the potter, that we live by their favour, that they have it in their power to adopt a policy that will crush us—I say that that was an unpatriotic statement, and I repeat that it is not true.”

One would have thought that the party of which the hon. member for East York was the leader, astray though they were, would have had patriotism enough to lift him far above the imputations of the hon. Minister of Railways. One would have thought that the leader of the Reform party would have got up and said: No; I mean no reflection on the credit of Canada, or on its capabilities as a home for immigrants. He did not say that he professed that he wanted to see this road built, and to see this country peopled. Now, what he said was this, as reported in Hansard, page 467, of the same volume from which I have already quoted:

“But the hon. gentleman says that the true policy is propounded for the promoting the prosperity of the country; he says that a Protective Policy is the one thing needful in order to make the nation great and glorious, and he has pictured to himself and to the House a great and magnificent country, flourishing and prosperous with protection. He says we have the best half of the continent; I only wish it were true, but the statement is rather an extensive one for the hon. gentleman to make. Every one knows, at least I supposed every one knew, that we have the worst half of the continent. We have a very good country, which we can make something of; but not by such exaggerated statements which only make us the laughing stock of other people.”

This is what the hon. member for East York said in answer to the Minister of Railways, a gentleman who had only just left—who had quitted, as it were, only a few hours before, his position as Leader of the Government, with eighty-five of a majority in this House—who had been entrusted by the people of this country with the wielding of its destinies, the shaping of its public opinion, and its advancement in influence and material prosperity—an hon. gentleman who, in 1874, had entered office amidst the plaudits of the people and who, down to 1878, led a large majority in this House. I was not then a member of this House, but I desired to understand this great question, to see exactly what position it occupied in the public mind, to ascertain what has been done and said on both sides, and I read carefully the speeches of the leading men on both sides. I say honestly now, in my place in Parliament, that were the people to take the time to read this record of the speeches in Parliament they would, I am confident, whether Grit or Tory, provided they had the love of their country in their hearts and sound intelligence in their heads, come to but one conclusion and that is, that the Reform party have not dealt with this question in a manner creditable to them as Canadians. Had they done so, they would to-day hold a position far higher in the estimation of the people of this country than the one they now occupy. Side by side with this declaration, I wish to read, in order that it may go down in Hansard, a statement quite as authoritative made by the distinguished nobleman who is now in the Mother Country doing his very utmost to make Canada better known abroad and to direct the stream of immigration to our shores. For five years he occupied the most exalted position that a man can occupy in this country. During this time he mixed freely with our people, he loved our winter sports, our northern clime, he enjoyed our glorious summers, and on his return to England gave the great weight of his social position, of his Parliamentary authority, his prestige as the eldest son of the House of Argyle, his great experience of our country, to the advancement of Canadian interests. I want to place this language alongside that of the ex-Premier, who, I am sure, would now like to see what he said then expunged from the Hansard, although the statement he made, he made as a public man, as the leader of a great party on the floor of this House, and however he may dislike the comparison, he cannot now object to having his words contrasted with those of this distinguished nobleman who lately governed our country. Here is what the Marquis of Lorne said in his speech at Birmingham:

“The great bugbear—for it is nothing more—present to the minds of many in contemplating a move to Canada is the alleged great and trying cold of that country. This is a fear which is not justified by the character of the climate. The climate is exceedingly healthy. Fevers, which are only too common in parts of the United States, are unknown. Men attain to great ages; and where, as is the case of some English and many of the French, many generations have lived on Canadian soil, we see the race more vigorous, if possible, than in the days of the first settlers. Cold it certainly is during five or six months of the year, but the cold is dry, and, except upon the sea coasts, is less felt than is cold here. The saying of the old Scotch woman is literally true. She wrote home to her people to say, ‘it was fine to see the bairns play in the snow without getting their feet wet.’ Throughout the winter the snow is dry and powdery. The Canadian seasons are very certain. It is sure to be steadily cold in winter and steadily warm in summer, and throughout the twelve months a light sun gives cheerfulness to the scene. In any case, what we desire is that the advantages of Canada should be known, so as to induce men to weigh them as compared with the United States. I, from personal knowledge, believe that Canada can hold her own in the comparison. In climate she has in her various Provinces vast areas as agreeable to men of our northern races as any America can offer. Her soils are as rich, her Government is more free, and the opportunities presented, not only for making a comfortable living, but for the attainment of comparative wealth, are as good. Sudden fortunes are, it is true, not so often made; but, on the other hand, there is far less poverty. There is an equality of fortune, taking the people as a whole, which can hardly be matched elsewhere.”

I ask if any Canadian can cite that before any assembly of his brother Canadians and not be cheered to the echo. For it is true every word of it, and yet the hon. the ex-Premier, the leader of his party, had the hardihood to state that the hon. Minister of Railways, in declaring that this Dominion was a fine country to live in, that it had great advantages and great prospects, and was destined to be the home of a great and prosperous people, was making his country the laughing stock of the world. In 1880, the hon. member for East York, as quoted in Hansard, vol. 2, page 1530, said:

“When the operations of 1877 were completed, and the profile of Burard Inlet Route was obtained, the completed profile was transmitted to England. . . . In the meantime we compiled in one volume, a mass of information about the country, its flora, fauna, soil, climate, geology, minerals, &c., and sent copies to all parties who might enquire concerning the work. We also had the Act of 1874 reprinted, and sent a sufficient number of copies to London, and distributed others here. We, in short, did everything in our power to make the country known."

That was very patriotic, but that was when the hon gentleman was Minister. Why did he, in such a short time afterwards, make the statement I have shown he did make? But in 1877 he had a powerful coadjutor when he was sending that work abroad, employing geologists, having the flora, fauna and soil of the country examined and spending tens of thousands of dollars in advertisements under his Act of 1874 to build the road. His Finance Minister then was the hon. gentleman who delighted the House to-night, the hon. member for South Huron. I shall show you how he assisted him. He assisted him to the utmost of his power, in the same patriotic strain that the hon. member for East York and the hon. member for West Durham assisted in 1880. The hon. the Minister of Railways, was speaking again, and on the question nearest his heart, and that is the development of this country by an iron road on our own soil. I read from page 149 of the Debates of 1877:

"The hon. gentleman opposite, in his statement to-night—and I was sorry to hear him do so—"

That was the hon. Finance Minister of 1877, the hon. member for South Huron I think he is now—

"has spoken in terms of disparagement of the railway undertakings of this country."

This was the very year the leader of the Government, the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), was spending $10,000 in advertisements to get somebody to build this road for nearly $105,000,000, taking the Foster contract as a criterion:

"The hon. gentleman intimated that the people who invested their money in promoting the railway enterprises of Canada would lose it. I say it was an unpatriotic statement for the hon. gentleman to make."

Would you not have thought that the then hon. the Finance Minister, occupying the exalted position he did—the custodian of the finances of this country, the man who was, above all others, to shape its fiscal policy, who was directly responsible for it, and who was sitting side by side with his leader, with an Act upon the Statute Book to build this road under the extraordinary rates they then estimated, though they tell a different story now—would you not have thought that he would have jumped to his feet and said: "I did not make any such unpatriotic statement; if I said so, I will withdraw it; I never thought so. We are advertising in England, we are advertising all over Europe and in America for people to build this road; we are spending $10,000 in advertisements, and I would never have said anything unpatriotic. I would never have said that men who invested their money in railways in this country would lose it because it is not true." He did not do it. He jumped to his feet—but it would hardly be believed, it would not be believed by the hon. gentleman's own constituents that he said it, unless the book were here to prove it; they would not believe it if they heard his speech to-night—he jumped to his feet and said: "They have lost it." That ended that affair. That went over to England, and it was no wonder that, in the bitterness of his heart, the Premier, in 1879, said that, although no terms could be more explicit or more advantageous, they failed to get one single offer, though they employed Mr. Sandford Fleming and Sir John Rose as their agents. The hon. the Finance Minister was saying at that very time that any one who invested a dollar in railways in this country had lost it. Nice men to build a road. While all these statements were being made, while Canada was being decieved as a country not to live in, while they were working might and main as party men to obtain a party advantage, not, seemingly, caring what became of Canada during the time, only to obstruct the Government in building the road, the very leaders of the Government who, they said, had helped them when they were a Government and wanted to build it—I say that, before the people were done reading the Hansard, if they had it, or reading the newspapers with these statements in them, the statement of the hon. member for East York as, pointing his finger to the hon. leader of the Government, the right hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, he says: "You say we have lost five years; we will watch you for the next five years and see what your engineering and planning will do; I tell you you cannot build the road; $120,000,000 will only build a colonization road; $121,000,000 he said—he went one million better;

Mr. BLAKE. Not at all.

Mr. WOODWORTH. Vice versa. I will prove it.

Mr. BLAKE. You will prove it vice versa.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I am obliged to the hon. gentleman for the interruption, for now I will prove it though it will take some little time.

Mr. BLAKE. You had better ask the hon. Minister of Railways whether you are right or not.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I will not ask him. I will stand on my own feet and make my own speech, and, while I honor the hon. Minister of Railways, and am proud of him as a Canadian, I do not think he would be proud of me if he thought I came before Parliament without being prepared for an interruption from the hon. Member for West Durham. I have got it here, Sir. I said he either made it $121,000,000 or the hon. member for East York made it $120,000,000.

Mr. BLAKE. For a colonization road.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I did not say so.

Mr. BLAKE. You did.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I beg pardon. I am aware that the hon. gentleman said that $31,000,000 would only build a colonization road, but he did not say that $120,000,000 would build a good road. Mr. Mackenzie stated as follows:—

"I am sure I am within the line in stating that these figures ($121,000,000), and that it will be impossible to construct anything that can be called a railroad, nothing else than a mere tramway, for the amount now given ($34,869,618), as the hon. gentleman says by the chief engineer."—(Page 1532, Han., vol. 2, 1880, McKenzie.)

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODWORTH. This is not the first time the hon. member for West Durham has interrupted me. He had the distinguished pleasure, and I do not doubt it was a pleasure to him, when I first spoke in this House, when I was on my feet in this House for the first time, to show that he understood men and understood their feelings; that he had fine feelings himself, that he was an excellent leader, a great man, and to show that he could successfully lead, looking at an hon. member, very much his inferior in debating talent, he, the old parliamentarian in the House, the trusted leader of his party, when I, the member for King's, Nova Scotia, was making a statement which was perfectly true—and the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., got up just after and said it was true, and look at the Hansard—he, the leader of the Opposition, said "order." The hon. member for King's sat down, as it was his duty to do, and the member for West Durham said:

"I do not rise to a question of order because the hon. gentleman has used any unparliamentary language, but because he is making a statement which is not true. If it were true the member for Queen's, P.E.I., could not be in this House; he could not be the retained counsel of Mr. Robertson, and have his seat in this House."

And Mr. Davies got up and said: "Yes, I was Mr. Robertson's counsel until I came into the House"—of course he was not in the House, acting as counsel—the very thing I had said. I did not get up and get into a rage with him, and say, I was a young member. I did not care about saying that. If I stay here long enough I will be an old member, probably. I hope always to see the hon. gentleman before me. We cannot lose him in our debates. He is too able a man to lose. I say that the hon. member admits that the sum of $120,000,000 would suffice to build the road, and the hon. member for East York mentioned $121,000,000. Then they spoke of another calculation entirely, which was $84,000,000. odd. But, after speaking of these other large sums, they did not discriminate and say that the $120,000,000 would build a first-class road, but they said: "You can only make a colonization road with this money." If the hon. member from West Durham had discriminated, if he had wished to be as fair as he was finical and emphatic, he would have distinguished between them and said that $84,000,000 would only build a colonization road, but that $120,000,000 would build a first-class road. But he failed to do it, and he, as a chancery lawyer, with reference to a suppressio veri of that kind, knows what he would say to a witness who was guilty of it, and to the court he was practicing before regarding such a witness. I say that before their words were scarcely read by the people of this country, when they promised to watch and see what five years would do, the House was suddenly called together in the fall of 1880. The contract was laid on the Table of the House, and the Government said: "You said that $7,500 per mile for the whole length of the road, viz.: 2,797 miles, and 20,000 acres of land per mile, and $10,000 per mile, would build this road but you could not get a man to invest a dollar in such a contract. Here is a contract that provides that for 25,000,000 acres of land and for $25,000,000 more money, and $28,000,000 worth of roads constructed, including the Pembina Branch, all making $78,000,000, a first-class road in every particular can be constructed." Did the hon. gentleman say then: "I have watched your engineering plans for five years to see what you would do and you have certainly astonished me. You are going at last to build this road that we could not get a man to tender for, although we offered nearly $105,000,000." No, he did not say that. Why, Sir, they made speeches by the hour, by the day, by the week—I was going to say, by the month. They declared this country was in a state of rebellion. They sent their missionaries—and very able men they were—to Halifax, St. John, Montreal, Toronto. Everywhere they took the stump. Did they get anybody to respond? No, Sir; and the hon. member for West Durham will tell us why? In a long speech, and an able speech, which I read with the greatest care, he told the reason why; and, Sir, let me say, as a Canadian, I feel proud of his abilities as a debater, and would be sorry to lose him from this House, or from public life. We are all proud of his abilities; but at the same time, he might learn some lessons in patriotism and statesmanship, and some lessons in conducting the affairs of this country, from his great opponents opposite. I find on page 99 of the Hansard, for 1880, that he uttered the following words:—

"I shall be very much pleased if the hon. gentleman is able to obtain a declaration from the members of the Syndicate that what is intended is that they are to get not less than 10 per cent. of the money they themselves put into the railway. That nothing that comes from the country—that the Thunder Bay Branch" for instance, is not included—that the railway in British Columbia or the Pembina Branch is not included—that the proceeds from the sale of lands is not included, that only that which, after the public resources are exhausted, they take out of their own pockets, is to bear this 10 per cent. If the hon. gentleman will say so, he will remove a large part of my objections to his contract. But he cannot say so; it is not in the agreement; it is not the contract; it is not the law."

The hon. William Macdougall, when a member of this House, also made a very able speech. This struck him in the contract as a very objectional feature. He was interrupted by the right hon. Premier, who told him that there would be an amendment to the Railway Act of 1879, providing for that very thing, and meeting the whole of this great objection. True to their promise, the Government amended the Act, and here is how it reads:

"The said word 'Capital' as used in the said sub-section (sub-section 2 of section 17 of the Railway Act of 1879) meant and means the paid up stock and share capital of the Company, with interest added for periods during which no dividend is paid, to the exclusion of all subsidies and bonuses, and as regards the Canadian Pacific Railway, of any debt of the Company contracted on the pledge thereof, or of any part thereof."

One would have thought that the member for West Durham would have said: "My objections have vanished; I will never say another word against the contract. I have already stated on my honour as a member, that if you would amend the contract in that way my objections would be removed." Well, after the Act had been amended according to promise why did he not say: My objections have vanished. He promised that a large part of his objections would be taken away. I do not know what the other part was; but this was the big part, and it was taken away from him by this Act. It is amusing to hear that hon. gentleman to-day coming to the House and saying that this country is going to be in a blaze on this very contract. Why, Sir, he and his friends said so before. They said so before, and in the most beautiful language that can be used. The hon. leader of the Opposition spoke of what the people were going to do with the Government the moment they could get hold of them—they were going to show them that they could not make a contract like this and be returned by the people. This is what the hon. member for West Durham said, on page 106 of the Debates of 1882:

"This contract is worthy, in my opinion, only our rejection. I shall not venture to hope that this House will reject it, but I do think that an indignant country, although you will not give it time now to raise its voice, will take the earliest opportunity to inflict a summary penalty upon those persons, offenders for the second time, who have once betrayed, when entrusted with power, their country's honour, and having been forgiven, have now taken advantage of the opportunity which a too confiding people conferred upon them, to betray, in the same transaction, her most vital and material interests."

And he sat down. He did not fall into the arms of any beloved friend, as Sheridan did in the Begum charge. He did not throw any dagger on the floor, as Burke did in the debate on the French Revolution. He did not get down on his bended knees, as Lord Brougham did in the House of Lords in the debate on the Reform Bill. He did not make any such theatrical exhibition at all. He made a most pleasant and dignified address, and he sat down and looked around him, prophetic like, after he had uttered those oracular sentences. He did go to the country, and he came back again—"but not the six hundred." Well, the hon. member for Cardwell wondered to-night why they had not said something about it. Why, how could they? They can say a great many things and say them well, but in the light of these facts it was a little too much. They could not say anything after the experience of 1882. I was sitting in the gallery, listening, and I could not help smiling, remembering the result of the elections of 1882, to hear the then hon. member for Bothwell declare, standing beside the hon. member for West Durham who had sat down: "Why," said he—and his words are there in the Hansard, page 1002 of the Session of 1882—"as true as the sun rises and sets, when the election comes we, on this side of the House, will be sitting on that side," and he has not sat on either side since. And the hon. the ex-Minister of Finance, now the hon. member for South Huron, followed his leader, the hon. member for West Durham, and with the splendid rhetoric he has ever at his command; with those flowing and rounded periods, he declared that the hon. the Finance Minister would never come back to this House again, and he was supported by the lamented Sir Albert Smith, whose demise we all regret. The Arabian Nights entertainment is not half so entertaining as this. Look back a little.

They declared that the hon. member for St. John would be buried politically ; but he has come back with an increased majority, and his majority is constantly increasing—more power to his elbow. Some of the occupants of the Opposition benches have not returned. Some are, however, here, thanks to the hon. leader of the Government, who looked after their comfort, and gave them constituencies which could not help returning them. And I would say just here that he is badgered and abused by gentlemen opposite more about the so-called infamous Gerrymandering Bill than anything else he ever did, and yet he was the warmest but secret friend of some of those hon. members who never otherwise would have returned to this House. It is the lot of good and great men that their deeds live after them, and that history and posterity will do them justice. I now come to speak of the $22,500,000 proposed to be advanced to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I have no doubt that hon. gentlemen opposite are more pleased than even I am, that I am able to do so. There are, however, a good many members from certain constituencies, who know very little about the history of this matter. But it is very necessary that those hon. members who have been anxious to hear their political leaders make speeches, and those who cheered to the echo anything said against the Canadian Pacific Railway Company or the credit of the country, should recollect the history of their party on this question and be thankful for the partial and imperfect glance I have given it. The contract of 1880, after receiving the assent of this House, as it has since received the verdict of the people of the country, was carried into effect by the Railway Company. They proceeded with the most marvellous rapidity known to build the rail way. They were engaged, as has been well said, in the greatest enterprise on the continent of America. There is no other trans-continental railway in America. After having proceeded with such vigour and built with such marvellous rapidity so many miles of road and expended such large sums of money, they come to this House and solicit a loan of $22,500,000. I must confess that when it was first announced I was apprehensive that the Company had failed, and the Government was about to give them $22,500,000. I confess that I felt we had not succeeded in getting a Company that could finish the road with the means at their command, and that the Company had utterly collapsed and failed. I had occasion to say not long ago, that if they had failed or should fail, there was neither tongue or pen that could paint the desolation and despair over Canada. It is said here, in the able speech of the hon. member for West Durham, and it was cheered to the echo by his followers, that the Government were silent partners, or sleeping partners, which, I think, was the expression used. I do not think the Government are sleeping partners, for they seem to be pretty well alive to the interests of the country. They have had a watchful eye on the Company, and it behooves them as partners, so far as the national welfare of Canada is concerned in this great work, which is to build up the Dominion, that they must be, from their position, not sleeping partners, but very active and energetic partners. As a strong party man, and as a Canadian in sentiment and act, as I have always been, and hope to die, I was afraid that the Government, of which I was a supporter, had made a mistake, and we would be called upon to give to the Company $22,500,000, and trust our luck as to whether we should ever get it back again. I expressed myself thus to several of my friends. I thought the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) was perfectly justified and right when he stated in his speech : "How do we know that the Company is going to build the road with that money; or that the hon. Minister of Railways is correct when he says the road will be finished by the end of 1886 ; or that the Company will not be back again with another application to Parliament, or that they will expend the money on the road ?" I think every member of the House, and every man in the whole Dominion will feel relieved when they read and hear that the hon. Minister of Railways to-night, in the course of the speech of the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) said that the Company would not obtain a dollar until they could show that the money would be spent on the work ; that ample security would be given in the agreement that they would build the road in the time he stated they would build it in his speech in this House. I think that should have been an answer, and was an answer to the spirited speech of the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright). I think that was as effectual an answer to everybody as the Premier gave to the objections of Mr. Macdougall the then member for Halton, when he stated that 10 per cent. was only on their own capital. It was a complete answer and should be as satisfactory as it was to Mr. Macdougall ; and now I expect to hear the hon. member for West Durham and his party say that, as the Minister of Railways has made this authoritative statement, since the Government has given this pledge, they will not debate this matter further, as it is quite as satisfactory as their explanation in 1881 was, in regard to their amendment of the Railway Act. We are asked to lend the Company $22,500,000. The member for South Huron says we know what endorsing paper is. He says that we know that to put our names on commercial paper means that we generally have to pay it. I do not think that everybody will endorse that statement ; I do not think the commerce of the country is carried on in that way, and I do not think a friend would be a real friend who would refuse to endorse from any such cause. Besides the cases are not parallel. We are not endorsing their paper in the sense of their having nothing to pay. I will read the words of the hon. Minister of Railways as to what security we have :

"That embraces the entire property, from the ocean terminus at Montreal to Port Moody on the Pacific ; it embraces the line on which they have paid over $3,000,000, between Montreal and Callander ; it embraces the line on which they have expended nearly $2,000,000, the branch to Algoma Mills ; it covers the 269 miles of branches in the North-West ; it covers the three magnificent steamers that they are placing upon the route between Algoma Mills and Port Arthur, and it covers the entire 21,000,000 of acres of land that remain at the disposal of the Government."

I think that is pretty good security ; and if they make one year's default in the payment of interest, the Government, without notice, can take possession of the whole vast property. Is there a member of this Parliament who dare in his place, if he knew that his speech would have the effect of stopping this work, make such a speech ? Why, Sir, the credit of Canada would be gone, and we would be in a most humiliating position in the eyes of the world. A vast number of men would be thrown out of employment on the road which the hon. member for South Huron described as a disgrace and a disaster to the North-West, and the desolation over this country, which would ensue, if that road should cease running, no tongue could tell. Why, Sir, it stopped for ten days on account of a strike out in the far west, and everybody knows that in those ten days the greatest consternation prevailed. I could not help remarking when I read the newspapers in the North-West, both Grit and Tory, and when I heard what was said by the people of that country, that they no longer spoke about monopoly or about the fearful exactions of the railway. On the contrary, their whole attention was centered on the question : When will the road resume running ? There was a body of engineers on this road who belonged to a certain secret combination, and who were like the old Highlanders when they heard the cry of the slogan or saw the cross of fire calling a gathering at Lanrick-Mead. The plough stopped in the furrow, the bridegroom left his bride at the door of the church; for these men left their engines without going to the stations for which they were destined; they left their engines on the open prairie, and did not care what became of the passengers. Sir, we did not hear anything then about monopolies, about the tariff of rates, or the cruelties of the Government. I think that if the hon. member for South Huron, with the interests he has in the North-West, who has given such fearful accounts against the Government against these monopolies, had been in the country at the time and had been told that the road would be stopped for three months, he would have been ready to give his solemn promise that he would not make another speech against the Government if the road would only go on. While I admit that there are grievances—as there will be in all newly organized countries, grievances which will be remedied—we must not forget that there are also benefactions. The people must not forget what has been done for them, or the energy which is being displayed to satisfy their wants, and to make for them comfortable and happy homes in that country. I was rather amused to hear the speech of the ex-Finance Minister. I like his dash and his fire. There is fight about him. There is a wild rush but not a great amount of judgment, from our point of view—from our national, Canadian, standpoint. But still he fights his battles like a fighter. He does not care very much whom he hits or where he hits. His mind and heart are in the work, and it is natural that they should be. I never knew a man who had cut the ties that bound him to his former friends who did not feel that he would like to give them a Roland for an Oliver at every opportunity. This is history repeating itself, and undoubtedly he has a marvellously forcible and clever way of hitting, and I listened to him with great satisfaction. But he made a very injudicious speech to-night, and he certainly got a very powerful and eloquent answer from the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), to which he could not make a rejoinder. He even attacked the friends of the Canadian Pacific Railway in this House; he said they, the Railway Company, had paid counsel sitting in this House. Well, I was called to order by the hon. member for West Durham last Session when I suggested such a thing as that an hon. member in this House was counsel for a suppliant for a seat in this House; but I did not hear any one call the hon. member for South Huron to order when he said there were men who were the paid counsel for the Company in this House. For my part, I do not believe that a man, because he enters Parliament, can throw off or is required to throw off, his professional obligations to his clients. Did he not know—I think he did, for he reads the papers very carefully—that there was an hon. gentleman sitting very near him who occupied the position of the paid counsel in this House of another corporation—of a rival corporation—of a corporation against which I do not intend—because I do not wish, and I would not if I could—to say one single word, for it is doing good work in this country. I believe the Grand Trunk Railway should be protected in its legitimate rights. I believe that everything that can reasonably be done for that Company should be done; but it is a rival of this national road—naturally so, commercially so—and I believe it was very largely, if not entirely, instrumental in preventing the Canadian Pacific Railway Company from getting a quotation on the London stock market until last summer. Well, I was wondering, with the Globe newspaper filled, as a party organ, with this great outrage on the people, of lending this money to this soulless, bowless, heartless corporation, that the hon. member for West Durham, being inspired with information from that source, did not make a more spirited speech than he did. He made an able speech, but there was not in it the fire of even the hon. member for South Huron. But I wish to read something to show why it was injudicious in him to speak of the Canadian Pacific Railway having paid friends in this House. The shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company have half-yearly meetings in London, and the President is called upon to make a statement of the affairs of the railway. His name is Sir H. W. Tyler, M.P., and he made a speech there on the 25th of October last, in which, after speaking of the prospects of the road and of a good many other things, he refers to certain arrangements made for the use of the international bridge, and of a dispute which the Grand Trunk Railway Company had with the Canada Southern Railway Company with reference to tolls. He goes on to say:

“As you know, that question has been in litigation in all the courts. It was decided against them in the first court. They went to the second court, and it was again decided against them; and they then went right up to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Mr. Blake, our counsel in Canada, came over, having prepared a suitable speech to deliver before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.”

This is not the authority of a reporter of a newspaper, who goes up to the manager of a railway, perhaps when he is a little busy and a little irritable, and gets a story all wrong, and sticks it into a newspaper, from which the leader of the Opposition afterwards reads it on the floor of Parliament as Gospel truth. It is not that case. It is the case of a member of the British Parliament and the President of the Grand Trunk Company saying, that they, the Company, have a distinguished counsel, a standing counsel, in Canada—

Mr. BLAKE. It is not true that I am a standing counsel of the Grand Trunk Railway.

Mr. WOODWORTH. You are standing now. Well, suppose he is not a standing counsel. The President of the Grand Trunk Railway calls him “our counsel in Canada.” I do not think he should get annoyed at me—

Mr. BLAKE. I am not annoyed. Nothing the hon. gentleman can say can annoy me.

Mr. WOODWORTH. The hon. gentleman smiles. I like to see him smile, he has such an innocent, pleasant and assuring smile. I am not saying a word against this; but I say that the hon. member for South Huron, with his wild dash and rush, does not see where he is firing. Looking over the Debates of 1880, I found on one page where the hon. member for West Durham, with all the ability of an English chancery lawyer, that this Government had given the Canadian Pacific Railway Company a fearfully advantageous bargain. He showed in two pages after that that this Company were impecunious, and that they had got everything from the Government to build the railway. It reminded me of the old woman's answer about the tub. In the first place, she said, she had not a tub; secondly, the hoops were off, it was full of suds; and thirdly, she lent it to a neighbour who had not returned it. The hon. gentleman takes care to leave nothing out. He reminds me of what a friend of mine said of a sportsman, who was so ardent that he did not see a feather without shooting at it. It is a wonderful speech, as the speech of a lawyer, but is it the speech of a statesman? Is it a speech upon which he would like his fame to rest as a statesman who took hold of a question and wanted, like a strong man, to carry it to the end. While it is an able piece of reasoning, it begins nowhere and ends nowhere, but remains as a splendid exhibition of what a man can do with his powers of reasoning on any given question, no matter how he mixes them up or how inconsistent with himself—that is all. I am sorry I had to read this extract from Sir Henry Tyler's speech, but I was forced to do it. I beg pardon for saying standing counsel; I will say “our counsel in Canada.” I do not wonder that the Grand Trunk Railway Company succeeded so well against the Canadian Pacific Railway when they had such a man for their counsel. They have a right to do it, and I do not think the hon. member for West Durham should have called me to order last Session, when he knew that he himself was a standing counsel. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up the time of the House to any very great extent, further than merely to recapitulate what I have said; for I have made these extracts within the last three or four days, and I had not looked at them until a few minutes before I rose, when I was asked to speak. My remarks are imperfect, but they have the element which I would like the speeches I have heard on the other side to-night to have—the element of truth. I challenge any hon. gentleman opposite to point to one statement I have made that is not true, for the simple reason that I have not travelled into deep water, but have confined myself to their utterances, as recorded in Hansard:

“Little barks must keep the shore, Larger ships can venture more.”

I have kept very near the shore on this occasion. I wish to recapitulate what I have tried imperfectly to evolve out of the multitude of speeches and political utterances, viz.: that the great Canadian people have declared that this road must be built from Lake Nipissing to the Pacific Ocean; that the Liberal Conservative party failed on that question in 1873; that the Reform party assumed office in 1874, with a large majority; that they passed an Act, and advertised for tenders under that Act, offering nearly $105,000,000 to any company to build the road, but without success; that in 1878 they went out of power and their opponents came in; that the moment this Government came in, at their very first Session, they put on record a Resolution placing 100,000,000 acres of land in the hands of trustees to build this road; that in the fall of 1880, they called Parliament together and submitted for its approval, a contract giving altogether in money and lands $78,000,000 to this Company to build this road, as against the $105,000,000 which the Reform party were prepared to give, but under which they could not get a tenderer; that this Company, under this contract, and notwithstanding the hostility it met, and all the efforts of hon. gentlemen opposite, and other people not responsible to this House, in the public press and on the public platform to decry Canada, they have been able to place upon record an advancement in railroad building unequalled in any other part of the world; that this Company were obliged finally, owing to the difficulty of obtaining funds on account of the depression of railway stocks all over the world, to ask Parliament to lend them $22,500,000 on a security no man can impugn; and finally that at the end of two years we will have a road from one end of Canada to the other. This is, briefly and tersely, a recapitulation of what I have so imperfectly said. At every turn this Company have been met by the hostile criticisms of hon. gentlemen opposite. Had they confined themselves to statements and charges in this House, where they could be met by the Government and their friends, nothing very dangerous or evil could result; but they resorted to insidious means. Scribes, with facile pens, but little patriotism, sent broadcast through the world, wherever the financial pulse beat, statements against Canada, its clime, its soil, and its laws—in every corner of the civilized world, wherever a telegram or paper could reach, such unpatriotic and injurious statements were sent; yet, notwithstanding all this, the Company have been in a great measure successful. I believe in my heart that had the same patriotic consideration been extended to this enterprise that the hon. the Minister of Railways displayed in a speech which will do him honour and his children after him, as long as Canada has a history—if they had shown that patriotic consideration, or a particle of it, which the hon. Minister called for and which they were bound to give, by their own record, in common gratitude to the men who helped them in many trying situations in the past, when they were professing their solicitude to build this road—this Company would never have been obliged to ask for this advance of $22,500,000. They would have been able to build this road without any assistance from this Parliament. The walls of Jerusalem were built by the Jews with one hand on the sword and the other on the trowel, but the enemies they had to deal with were enemies from the outside. In building the walls of our Jerusalem, our enemies are not outside. Our Amorites, Hittites and Amalekites, and all the other ites, are in Canada. It is they we have to dread more than any enemies of the outside, more than the people of the United States, though they are naturally our opponents, and naturally try to keep the tide of immigration from our shores. We have within our borders gentlemen who seize on every failure, who note every person who falls from affluence to absolute penury—in most cases by their own speculations and want of prudence and foresight—who gloat over every disaster, who would hail the darkness and blackness of poverty with the greatest satisfaction, rather than prosperity and happiness under the men who now administer our affairs. This was unmistakably evident in the speech of the hon. member for West Durham at the opening of the Session. It showed itself in the glow that lit up his face every time he spoke of depression, every time he referred to a fall in bank stocks, or to the closing of a factory. On those occasions the faces of himself and his followers beamed with delight, but the moment he had to acknowledge there was some cause for congratulation, they looked as if they had suddenly lost their best friends. Party politics have driven us to this pitch in Canada.

An hon. MEMBER. It drove you to that five years ago.

Mr. WOODWORTH. Yes, it drove us to the polls, and if the people had not spoken out against them they would have driven the country into the jaws of the American Republic before they stopped. It has come to this: that with four or five millions of people occupying half a continent; with the resources depicted by the distinguished nobleman, whose speech I have read, with a soil and climate unsurpassed, with a population of sturdy men and women, for it is well known that the men and women of northern latitudes have more courage, persistence, and energy, than those of southern, tropical climes. We have in our midst men who refused to see those advantages, and who, instead of aiding our country, decry its resources. You will look, Sir, in vain in Hansard to find a single statement from any hon. gentleman on this side of the House made during the five years of depression, when we were in opposition, in depreciation of our own country. You will look in vain, Sir, to find one single sentence or one single word, and, though they say: “When you were in power, you took advantage of us”—it is not true. When the hon. Finance Minister has to stand up in the House, and, in answer to a question of taking the duty off tobacco amounting to half a million: I have nothing to replace it but direct taxation; if I knew of a law to tax these people directly I would do so—

Mr. RYKERT. The income tax.

Mr. WOODWORTH. Yes, the income tax—who was it decrying Canada then? Was it the Opposition—now the Government? No; it was the men entrusted with power, who were appealed to again and again from the benches where they sit now to alter their Tariff, to cease supinely lying on their backs, or sitting in their seats, and saying we are flies on the wheel, only to try to do something. Whoever heard of them going to a factory? Whoever heard of one of them leaving his comfortable room in Ottawa and going to a factory and shaking a workman by the hand and asking him how he was getting on, and shaking the master by the hand and asking how he was getting on, and how he could assist him? If they had shown some sympathy, if they had done something they would have earned the gratitude of the Canadian people and their opponents. If the National Policy had done no good to the country, which could be shown by facts and figures, which the advocates of it can show that it has, I say that if this Government had done no more than for the hon. Finance Minister, and the hon. Premier, and the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, and the efficient and able Minister of Public Works, and the Postmaster General, and the hon. Minister of Customs, and the whole Government to visit the different factories and industries of Canada—yes, all of them have sometime or other, not just before an election, Mr. Speaker, to catch the people's votes; but after they had been entrusted with power, they immediately showed the faith that was in them and went to the factories and saw these people and did their best to help them—I say the hope they inspired in the breasts of those managers of the different factories who were hardly and sorely pressed, the hope they inspired in the breasts of the workmen that their wages would not be discontinued and they would not be out of employment; if they had done no more than make the enquiries they made and show the sympathy unto our struggling industries that they showed, they would receive and deserve the gratitude of the people of Canada. I say that these men, having attempted to repair the walls—and I will use the walls again for a simile, and for fearsome of my hon. friends opposite may think this is in Shakespeare, I tell them it is not in Shakespeare; and while they are building and repairing the walls of this great British Confederation they are opposed by the men within who should help them. Our foes indeed are those of our own household. Has it come to this, that, with a sparse population comparatively to the great area that is ours, ours by heritage—is it come to this: that we are driven by party politics to enter Parliament, and, from the moment that the Speaker takes his Chair down to the moment of Prorogation in the spring, it is one continual bitter party strife, decrying the interest of the country, because somebody else happens to be sitting on the Treasury benches? While I believe that the system of party is the best that can be devised, with all its imperfections, yet I say that we cannot afford, in the infant history of our country, to have as much politics as we have got, and to have men, merely for office—for it can be in no other interest, merely for the purpose of turning the ins out, to have them on a great national question like this sinking their patriotism, doing discredit to themselves, and injuring the country as they must and are doing. Suppose the hon. members opposite—the hon. member for West Durham, and the hon. member for East York—had risen in their places in 1880, when the contract was placed upon the Table of the House, and, in answer to the eloquent, fervent and heart-burning appeal of the hon. the Minister of Railways, had sunk all party politics in the presence of this great question, as he had done in Opposition, and had said: "We will help you, we will watch the Company, and we will help to build the road as best we can, and fight out, on party lines, the rest of the question belonging to the region of politics," these men would have risen and would have stood 100 per cent. better in the estimation of their own friends and the people of the country. Their supporters are not so much to blame. Party politics have whipped them into line, but they should not forget that we are Canadians first and politicians after that. You find in the House of Commons in England, when a great question is brought before that House, you often find the Conservatives and the Liberals—not the Radicals, but the true Liberals—working hand in hand. They do not take a party advantage when they can, because it might be disadvantageous to England and to the Empire, and the statesman there who forgets the voice of patriotism and seeks only a party advantage sinks into insignificance, whoever he may be, in the estimation of the people. But I repeat this again, that during this Session I am afraid you will find the same tactics revived; I fear, they have commenced now. I will close by saying the lines—I will not go to the reading room and copy them—they are not Mr. Smith's—but lines which I know my hon. friends, or some of them, have read when they were but schoolboys, and learned, and that are applicable to the state of things I would wish, and that we all would wish, to see. I will quote the lines of the old dead poet, Longfellow, on the building of the Ship of State, as it occurs to me at the moment, and in the line of thought that I have followed for the last few moments. The building of this great ship, this great Confederation, was the work not of party, but of patriotic Canadians of both sides of politics; but, having had it built, as I have said before, they should seek to be Canadians first and politicians afterwards. Without any more preface I will here recite those lines—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

"Thou, too, sail on, O, ship of state!
Sail on! O union strong and great!
Humanity with all its fears—"

An hon. MEMBER. Louder.

Mr. WOODWORTH. What does the hon. gentleman say?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Louder.

Mr. WOODWORTH. That reminds me of a short story. It is said that John Randolph, of Roanoke, who was a very witty man, and a very plain, blunt man, was interrupted, as I have been interrupted, while he was speaking as loudly as it was necessary to speak, and he stopped in his speech, and looked at the man in the crowd who had done it purposely for interruption, as of course I have not had it done to me, and he said: "When the archangel Gabriel shall place one foot on the sea and one on the land, and, with his silver trumpet, shall proclaim to the living and the resurrected dead, that time shall be no longer, there will be some long eared, long-nosed, wizen-faced, saffron-hued, sallow, lanky-shaped, knock-kneed, contemptible, suuken-eyed, son of a nobody, singing out 'louder.'" This is all in a parliamentary sense—and in a very parliamentary way I hope:

"Thou, too, sail on, O, ship of state!
Sail on! O union, strong and great!
Humanity, with all its fears,
With all its hopes of future years,
Is hanging breathless on thy fate!
We know what Master laid thy keel;
What workmen wrought thy ribs of steel;
What anvils rang, what hammers beat,
In what a forge and what a heat,
Were shaped the anchors of thy hope!
Fear not each sudden sound and shock!
'Tis of the wave and not the rock;
'Tis but the flapping of the sail,
And not a rent made by the gale.
In spite of rock and tempest's roar,
In spite of false lights on the shore,
Sail on, nor fear to breast the sea,
Our hearts, our hopes, are all with thee.
Our hearts, our hopes, our prayers, our tears,
Our faith triumphant o'er our fears,
Are all with thee! Are all with thee!

I believe, Sir, that these lines are applicable now, and if we would fain hush our party strife but for a moment, and let the strong tide of Canadian patriotism call out the best feelings of our political hearts, we would respond in the words of the dead, great American poet, that—

"Our hearts, our hopes, our prayers, our tears,

are all with this great Ship of State, no matter who is at the helm of it. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank the House, and I thank my hon. friends opposite for listening so patiently and attentively to these somewhat crude remarks, for which I must apologize, because, as I said, fifteen minutes before I spoke, I had not time to look at my voluminous extracts from the speeches and remarks of my hon. friends. I have not quoted one-half of them now, and no doubt the House will pardon me for not referring to the rest of them. But I could not give a silent vote on this question, and I felt constrained to give to the House, crude and imperfect though they were, some of the reasons why I meant to vote in favour of the Resolutions, why I believe the great party with which I am allied has the good of this country at heart, and have shown it by their measures that they have inaugurated and by the executive action they have taken.

Mr. DAVIES moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

RETURNS.

Mr. BLAKE. I wish to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Railways to what I have already spoken to him about privately, namely, that the return brought down the other day does not contain the enclosure that he professed to have brought down.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say, with reference to that, that the Secretary of the Department informs me that the application of the hon. gentleman was communicated to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and the Secretary of the Company has written to say that they had not the Act of Incorporation which, I think, has the names and addresses of the corporators. But they have communicated with the members of the Company in the United States, and as soon as the information is received it will be laid upon the Table.

Mr. BLAKE. The statement contained in the record is an extraordinary one, and I would ask the hon. gentleman to cause his officers to reconcile the statement they have now made with that statement on the papers of the House, which is, that the papers are closed. The hon. gentleman will see that in the margin.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman did call my attention to that. I have a note from the Department stating that the return contains all that was furnished by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in answer to our request.

GOVERNMENT BUSINESS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. With the consent of the hon. gentleman opposite, I beg leave to move:

That from and after this day, the Order of the Day for the consideration of the Resolutions moved by Sir Charles Tupper, respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway, shall have precedence next after Routine Proceedings, and the disposal of Questions put by Members.

Mr. BLAKE. Oh, no. The hon. gentleman knows that he cannot move that now, after the Order was called this afternoon.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would like very much to do so with the consent of the hon. gentleman. I intended to do so before the House adjourned.

Mr. BLAKE. I am quite sure the hon. gentleman did not intend to move it, or he would have done so at the opening of the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I must say that it is for the best interests of the country that a decision should be come to as speedily as possible upon this question. To a great degree, delay paralyzes the action of the Company; it introduces an element of uncertainty as to the future action of the Company, and affects every person concerned on the road, including the employees. Therefore, whatever may be the fate of these resolutions, it occurs to me that if the hon. gentleman would think for a moment of the interests that are at stake, he would allow this motion to pass.

Mr. BLAKE. I dare say it is for the best interests of the country that a decision should be arrived at promptly. I think it is clearly and more obviously for the best interests of the country that that decision should be wise and sound—be based upon full information, full consideration, and with full time for discussion. We have not full information, we have not had opportunity for full consideration upon that information, and we have not had time to discuss it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well then, of course, if the hon. gentleman objects, I cannot go on with it, but I throw the responsibility upon him and the Opposition.

Mr. BLAKE. No; the hon. gentleman cannot throw the responsibility upon me. If the hon. gentleman, having an opportunity, according to the Rules of this House, to move his motion, has not done so, he is himself responsible. He has let it stand instead of moving it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I want the hon. gentleman to move now and he says—stand.

Mr. BLAKE. But the hon. gentleman would not move when he could, and now he cannot move when he would.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 1:10 o'clock a.m.) the House adjourned.

AMOUNTS OWING BY QUEBEC AND ONTARIO.

Mr. LANDRY (Montmagny) enquired, What is the precise amount owing by the Province of Quebec to the Government of Canada? What is the nature of the Dominion claim, and for what objects was that debt of the Province of Quebec contracted? How long has the said debt existed, and what has been the annual increase thereof? Has the Dominion claim been contested? If so, what is the nature of the contestation?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. In reply to the hon. member, I may say that the most complete answer that can be given is furnished by the papers just laid on the Table of the House.

Mr. LANDRY (Montmagny) enquired, What is the exact amount owing by the Province of Ontario to the Government of Canada? Has this Federal claim been contested, and for what reasons?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I have to give the hon. member the same answer—the papers furnish the best answer to his question.

SALE OF LIFE ANNUITIES.

Mr. HALL enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government, in addition to the Savings Branch of the Postal Service, to introduce any system of receiving deposits in connection with the sale of life annuities?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. In reply to the hon. member, I may say that the Government are considering the subject; and I will be happy to have communication with the hon. member in regard to it, if he will afford me the opportunity.

JOHN CORBETT.

Mr. LISTER enquired, Is John Corbett an employé of the Government; if so, in which Department employed, and nature of employment or service, date of appointment and salary? If not so employed, when and why his connection with the Government ceased?

Mr. McLELAN. In reply to the hon. gentleman, I may say that John Corbett is in the employment of the Department of Marine and Fisheries; that he attends to the repairing of lighthouses and inspects new lighthouses; that he has been so employed since June 18th, 1880, at a salary of $100 per month.

ELGIN ROAD, COUNTY OF L'ISLET.

Mr. CASGRAIN enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to erect a station-house at the Elgin Road Station, county of L'Islet, on the Intercolonial Railway?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say, in answer to the hon. member, that I have received a number of petitions and communications from various members of Parliament on this matter, and it is now under the consideration of the Department.

COLCHESTER REEF LIGHTHOUSE.

Mr. LISTER enquired, Has the contract for the Colchester Reef Lighthouse been taken off the hands of the contractor? What amounts have been paid to the contractor on account of the work? When were the payments made?

Mr. McLELAN. In reply to the hon. gentleman, I may say that the contract for the Colchester Reef Lighthouse has not been taken out of the hands of the contractor. $5,000 have been paid to the contractor on account of the work: $3,000 in October, and $2,000 in August, 1883.

SICK AND DISTRESSED MARINERS.

Mr. KAULBACH enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to amend 45 Victoria, Chapter 19 of the Acts of 1882, intitled: "An Act to exempt vessels employed in fishing from the payment of duties for the relief of Sick and Distressed Mariners," so as to enable the fishermen of the Dominion to participate in the benefits of the fund, and the advantages of the Marine Hospital?

Mr. McLELAN. I have been collecting information from the representatives of fishing counties in Nova Scotia, and have obtained such information as I think will enable us to remedy the evil. I have a Bill in course of preparation, which I intend to submit, and which, I think, will meet the requirements of the case.

SECURITY FOR ADVANCE TO THE EXCHANGE BANK.

Mr. HOLTON enquired, Why did the Finance Minister not accept the personal security of Mr. Alexander Buntin for the last advance of $100,000 to the Exchange Bank of Canada when offered, as well as that of the Hon. A. W. Ogilvie?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The Government decided to accept security from either of these gentlemen. Mr. Ogilvie came and tendered his security, and it was accepted.

LEASE OF GOVERNMENT MILLS IN NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) enquired, Have any of the saw and grist mills, erected by the Dominion of Canada, in the North-West Territories, been sold, leased, or otherwise disposed of? If so, how disposed of, when, to whom, at what price, how paid or payable? Was the disposal by public auction, or private sale?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The saw and grist mills at Old Man's River was sold by the Indian Department to Mr. Peter McLaren, for $10,000, on October 22nd, 1881. The sum of $5,000 was paid down; the balance is to be paid by annual instalments of one-fifth, with interest at 6 per cent. The disposal was effected by private sale. Besides the pecuniary price the sale has been made subject to the following conditions: That the purchaser is to keep both mills in perfect running order; that he will grind Indian and Government farm produce at one-half the rate charged to other parties; that he will make the lumber required for Government and Indian purposes at $20 per 1,000 feet for five years; that the grinding of the grain and the making of the lumber for the Government and Indians shall have preference over any other work done at the mill; besides which, he was to take over the servants of the mill from the time of the contract.

SUPPLY FARM ON PINCHER CREEK.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) enquired: Has the Home or Supply Farm on Pincher Creek, North-West Territory, been sold, leased or otherwise disposed of? If so, when, and to whom, and at what price? Have the stock, plant, and farming implements on said farm been sold or otherwise disposed of? If so, to whom, when, and at what price? Were such sales or other disposals by public competition, or private sale?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Pincher Creek Indian Farm was leased on shares on the 8th of March, 1883, to Jas. L. Chipman, for one year from the 1st of April, 1884. The lessee is to have three-fourths and the Department one-fourth for that year. The stock, plant and farming implements were transported to the Indian Reserve in the McLeod District. The lease was a private transaction, and was not made by auction.

IMPROVEMENT FUNDS DUE THE TOWNSHIP OF WALLACE.

Mr. McMULLEN enquired, Whether any sum of money accruing to the Township of Wallace, county of Perth, as Improvement Fund money was, on the arbitration between the Provinces, paid over to the Province of Ontario; if so, how much? if not, is there any sum or sums of money due the said township on account of said fund?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. An answer to the question of the hon. gentleman will be found in the papers which have been laid on the Table of the House.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

HENRY SMYTH, Esq., Member to represent the Electoral District of the County of Kent (Ontario), having previously taken the oath, according to Law, and subscribed the roll containing the same, was introduced by Mr. Patterson (Essex), and Mr. Wigle, and took his seat in the House.

QUEBEC SCHOOL OF NAVIGATION.

Mr. AMYOT (Translation), in moving for copies of all correspondence between the Dominion Government and the Government of the Province of Quebec, and of all other correspondence, in relation to the School of Navigation at Quebec, and asking for a subsidy from the Dominion Government for the said school, said: Mr. Speaker, some twelve years ago, thanks to the intelligent efforts of the gentleman who now represents the county of Gaspé (Mr. Fortin) a School of Navigation was established at Quebec. This school was subsidized during a couple of years by the Dominion Government. Later on, for one reason or another, this same Government decided not to continue this allocation. There was, and with good reason, quite an agitation among the trade and shipping interest of the country, and earnest entreaties were made praying the Local Government to continue to subsidize the school. This Government, true to the devotedness which they are known to have always shown towards all that can aid the advancement and progress of science and arts, extended a helping hand to this institution. They gave it the rooms, furniture, maps, stationery, and all that was required to keep such a school. They also granted to the institution, during a certain time, a yearly subsidy of $1,000. For the reasons we have explained the other evening, the Government of the Province of Quebec is not willing to continue to subsidize this school. However, we have the proof that the school has given excellent results. Thus, in April last, seven candidates attended the examination; three received certificates as masters, and four received certificates as mates, and since the establishment of the school at Quebec, eighty-two candidates have attended the course of study with the following result: twenty-nine applicants received master's certificates, thirty-four received mate's certificates and three received pilot's certificates; the other cadets are continuing their nautical studies and making the voyages required to obtain their certificates. Since the Local Government has ceased to subsidize this school, it has become necessary to close that institution, but we have deemed it our duty, in the interest of trade and navigation, to approach the Federal Government and to ask them to subsidize this school, whose existence is indispensable to our marine. We must bear in mind that it is the Ottawa Government who, during last Session, passed a law requiring, under a penalty of $100, that every ship of a certain tonnage should have on board a master and a mate having certificates. The Act 46 Vic., chap. 28, sec. 7, says, among other things:

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

"After the first day of January, which will be in the year of Our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-four, no sailing ship registered in Canada over one hundred tons register tonnage, nor any steam ship so registered, shall go from any port or place in Canada on a voyage to any other port or place in Canada, or in Newfoundland, or in the United States of America, or on a fishing voyage, or be licensed or allowed to ply on any Canadian water, unless the master thereof has obtained and possesses a valid certificate of competency or service as master for inland, or (as the case may be) coasting ships of the class and description to which such ship belongs, from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, or a valid certificate of competency or service as master for sea-going ships, from the said Minister, or a valid certificate of competency as master, for foreign-going ships, from the Board of Trade in the United Kingdom, or a valid certificate of competency as master, granted in any British possession and declared by order of Her Majesty in Council, published in the "London Gazette," under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping (Colonial) Act, 1863, or of any Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, containing such provisions, to be of the same force as a certificate of competency, as master for foreign-going ships granted under the Acts of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, relating to merchant shipping; nor shall any ship registered in Canada and over two hundred tons register tonnage, nor any steamship so registered and allowed by law to carry more than forty passengers, go from any port or place in Canada, on a voyage to any other port or place in Canada, or in Newfoundland, or in the United States of America, unless such ship carries also a mate who has obtained a valid certificate of competency or service as such mate, granted by some such authority as aforesaid."

The same section also requires a certificate for mates, and provides that any person violating this law will be liable to a penalty of $100. I do not pretend that this law is unwise. I know that the legislation of a country cannot be too anxious to ensure the safety of navigation, both as regards passengers and as regards the freight carried on shipboard; but on the other hand, if this Parliament has deemed it their duty to impose on the owners of ships having a register tonnage of over 100 tons, the obligation to have on board masters and mates having obtained certificates of competency, it also becomes their duty to put the sailors in such a position as to enable them to follow the course required to pass that examination. This law was useful; it was even necessary and its necessity was shown by the somewhat numerous disasters which took place in our Canadian waters, involving the loss of several ships. I am also glad that this law has been passed because it compels our sailors to acquire sufficient training to obtain certificates of competency. It is a guarantee for the public, an advantage to the sailors and a legitimate cause of national pride for our Canadian navy. This school will open out a new career to our young men, and will make them competent to be good sailors in the waters of any country in the world. At a given moment, our navy may acquire a great importance in a military point of view, and it is well known that in case of war, England recruits a great number of her best naval officers and men among the sailors of the merchant navy. The same thing will take place here, and even from this point of view only, we could not do too much towards favouring the development of the nautical science. But it may be said that this is within the province of the Local Governments. This objection is somewhat serious, and I comprehend all its gravity; but if the hon. Ministers and the hon. members of this House will only lend me their attention for a spell, they will understand that it is unfounded in fact. We have the land militia, which is wholly dependent on the Federal Government. Well, Mr. Speaker, has that Government ever entertained the idea that it was the duty of the Local Governments to establish military schools or to maintain them for the defence of the Dominion of Canada. I think this rule applies, and with much more reason, to the navy. If the instruction of the land militia is entrusted to the Federal Government, it follows that the instruction of the navy must also be entrusted to them. The sailors trained in the schools devote the remainder of their life to sea service. Could a similar statement be made respecting the services of the cadets of our military schools? Perhaps I may be told that the schools of navigation in various parts of the country are self-supporting. I know that such a thing may exist in certain Provinces, where the navigating season is a great deal longer and where the number of sailors is far greater; but it is not so with the school of navigation at Quebec, where the navigating season is shorter, and where for the time being, the number of sailors is too small to make it possible for a school to support itself with its own revenues. This may be realized when our navy shall have become more extensive, when our international trade shall have increased and shall have become fully developed under the influence of our National Policy; but, for the present, we have to create this kind of calling for our young Canadians in opening out to them this important and lucrative career. It may also be said: if the Government grants this subsidy to the Province of Quebec, they will be obliged to grant it to the other Provinces also. Well, Mr. Speaker, if the other Provinces need a subsidy, and if they ask it, I do not see why they should not get it. We have, in the Province of Quebec, only one school situated in the principal seaport. We have sustained it by dint of the greatest sacrifices on the part of the Province. Quebec, although it was not obliged to do it, has paid the expenses of the institution. As this expenditure ought naturally to be borne by the Dominion, Quebec ceases to make those sacrifices. But we ask Ottawa to continue the necessary work and to subsidize this school. The importance of this question, for the present, as for the future, is such that the Government ought to undergo this, to them, very trifling expense. It must be borne in mind that all we ask is the sum of $1,000, to pay the salary of a professor, chosen by one of the most competent men, the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Fortin), who has always taken such a deep interest in maritime questions. Therefore, let the Government place us in such a position that we may carry out the law passed by them, the law whose existence only began last year, and which has, already, been the source of great difficulties to the navigation between Quebec and Montreal. Even now, the owners of schooners are at a loss to know where to find masters and mates holding certificates, and it is probable that many of their schooners will be retained in the ports of Quebec and Montreal, for want of the certified sailors, which, by law, they are obliged to employ. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it is high time that we should facilitate the opening of this new career to second the efforts of the Local Government of the Province of Quebec, and to enable our young sailors to receive what training is necessary to put them in a position, not only to fulfil their duty in the merchant navy, but also, at a given time, to aid the forces of the country by furnishing the officers and crews needed by our war ships. The sum we are asking is not large and the Local Government, if I am rightly informed, is ready to give the rooms, maps and everything necessary for the school, except the salary of the professor which salary they are not now able to furnish. Being already aware of the good will of the Government of the Dominion towards all that concerns the training of our Canadians, both from a naval and from a military point of view, I have no doubt that our request will be well received and that we shall obtain for this school the subsidy to which, it seems to me, we have an undoubted right.

Mr. RIOPEL. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, after the remarks so ably made by the hon. member for Bellechasse (M. Amyot), there is hardly anything left for me to say, except that I fully concur with what he has just said respecting the motion which I now second. I shall, however, take the liberty of stating that if a School of Navigation is destined to produce a desirable improvement in one of the main branches of our national industry, it behooves the present Administration to see that such a school is established. It must be admitted, notwithstanding the high position held by our navy from an international point of view, that there is still room for improvement in the practical training of our Canadian sailors. There exists in this respect a want which, in my opinion, should be filled as soon as possible. The Government has already done much towards protecting and developing our shipping trade. Each year large sums are expended for the improvement of our harbours and rivers. We have one of the most complete semaphore systems known; our telegraph lines, established on the remotest coast, all render important services to navigation. And still what is the position of the Canadian sailor? He is left to his own resources to acquire the knowledge necessary for his calling. Is it not evident that he is often in an inferior position, and that he has great difficulties to attain the rank which a better nautical training would give him? Therefore, it is very desirable that the Government should come to his relief and afford him an opportunity to become initiated with the secrets of the hard work he is called upon to perform. Besides, the Parliament has already recognized the necessity of elevating the position of our sailors, and by virtue of an Act passed in 1870, and of another passed in 1883, all masters and mates serving on board Canadian vessels must be holders of certificates of competency. Now, whoever wishes to attain a certain end must be willing to take the necessary means, and the only way to have first-class sailors is to give them the advantage of acquiring that special knowledge which they require to succeed in their profession. We have heard with great satisfaction the statement of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, when he said the other day that the Government had under consideration the question of establishing a school of navigation at Quebec. We hope and trust that the Government will not stop there, and that the estimates for the next fiscal year will contain an appropriation with a view to the improvement of the condition of a class so useful to our fellow citizens—the hardy toilers of the sea.

Mr. VALIN. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I fully endorse all that has just been said by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) and the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Riopel). However, I must add a few words. It often happens that for want of a school of navigation at Quebec we are unable to find mates and masters, and very frequently ships are delayed in Quebec harbour, as it is impossible for them to pass the Custom House for want of mates and sometimes for want of masters. The Federal Government has already taken a step in favour of this school by appointing, last year, a good Canadian captain of the merchant navy to examine the candidates. As to the school itself, I do not know whether the Government has helped it or not, but I join my colleagues to ask the Government to put their shoulder to the wheel, because the French Canadians are in need of such a school, and because the want of it is deeply felt by the shipping interest of the country. This want is felt not only at Quebec, but also at the port of St. John; if we had this school we could furnish to the navy a greater number of persons whose services are indispensable, and we would probably also have a greater number of vessels, because the fear of not being able to find captains, stops the building of ships.

Mr. LANDRY. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to discuss the merits of this question; I simply wish to join my voice to that of the hon. members who have just spoken. As I represent a county the population of which is partly composed of sailors, I have at heart the interest of that class, and I think it my duty to ask the Government to favourably receive the just demands made to-day by the Province of Quebec. Not very long ago, I was glancing over the report of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and I found, if I mistake not, that we were the fourth or fifth maritime power in the world; but if this powerful navy of ours has not even a school supported by the central Government, I do not see how we can boast of it to our neighbours. If we wish to have a real navy worthy to be set up as a model for other nations, we must at least be able to educate sailors who will also be models among their kind, and from this point of view I think that the Dominion of Canada ought to have for the navy what already exists for the land force, that is to say, schools where the young men who intend to devote their life to sea service may acquire the necessary knowledge to attain this end. I am satisfied that schools of that kind would have a direct influence on the general welfare of Canada, by giving us men able to take the lead in our merchant navy and, at a given moment, to take a place in our military naval force.

Mr. McLELAN. A few years ago, I think in 1870, a grant of $1,000 each was made by the Dominion Government for the purposes of these schools, which was subsequently supplemented by the Local Government; but owing to the decrease of foreign shipping at Quebec, the number in training for masters and mates became gradually so reduced that the grant was discontinued by the Dominion Government, and by the Local Government, last year. The effect of the Act passed last year will no doubt be to bring in a large number of applicants. I may say that I have been gathering information bearing on this question for some time, and as soon as that information is obtained I will be able to decide whether or not I can recommend a grant from the Dominion Government.

Mr. BLAKE. I might mention that I have just learned that there is a fine vessel of the Imperial Government to be had very cheap. She is at Halifax, and I believe she will soon be broken up unless we decide to take her back again. I mean the Charybdis.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That would be silly.

Mr. FORTIN. As I had something to do with the establishment of the first schools of navigation by the Federal Government, I wish to make a few remarks to the House. When the Federal Government, I believe in 1870, brought in a measure which England permitted us to pass here providing for the examination in Canada of masters and mates, and thereby enabling them to take command—not only of Canadian but of British vessels, I told the then Minister of Marine, (Mr. Mitchell) that if they did not establish schools of navigation, such as they have in every civilized country—those boards of examiners would be, if not useless, without the influence that they would have if it were known all over the world that our mariners had not only passed a successful examination, but were trained in a good school of navigation. Well, the schools were established, notwithstanding some difficulty from the other side of the House; and I remember the leader of the Opposition opposing the passage of a vote of money for the schools because things were not in proper order. But afterwards we triumphed, and I was proud of our triumph, because we established good schools of navigation in the principal ports of the Dominion; we had good professors, and mariners were enabled to have every facility for study, and to pass excellent examinations. The result was that they were able to go into every port of the world, hold up their heads, and feel that they were as good masters or mates as those in any other part of the world. But it appears there were private schools in some of the ports which were jealous of the public schools; and, at all events, by some means or other, a kind of opposition sprang up against the Government schools in the Lower Provinces, and the Federal Government determined, in 1872, to abolish them. Hearing that that was the intention, I went at once to the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin), and complained very strongly against the action of the Government. The hon. gentleman was pleased to promise me that he would communicate with the hon. Minister of Marine, and I am glad to be able to say that our efforts were successful in getting him to keep the schools open, until hon. gentlemen opposite came in power, when they were abolished. I was not in the House at the time; I was in the Local House. What did I do? I went to the hon. Mr. DeBoucherville, who was then the Prime Minister of the Province of Quebec, and he was not long in learning that it was necessary for the Province of Quebec to have a school of navigation. He, therefore, re-established the school as a provincial school under Professor Seaton, one of the most suitable men in the world for his position. And sailors who had served their time could come to the school to be educated as first mates, as second mates, or as masters, and they found Mr. Seaton to be a good friend and a good professor. Now, I am sorry to see—I am much grieved when I see—the poor Province of Quebec unable to support a school, and obliged to come here and beg for $1,000 for the purpose. I am ashamed of it, but it is so. Now I have given these explanations, and the Government, and the House, and the country, will judge what ought to be done. My opinion always has been that the Province of Quebec should be able to give $1,000 for the education of a class of men who labour so hard, and whose lives are exposed to so many dangers. But still I would urge upon the Federal Government, as I have done before, to reestablish schools of navigation as they were in 1873—one at Quebec, one at Halifax, one at St. John, and one at Yarmouth. No $4,000 could be better employed, and I would tell the Government that they could do it if they had the will.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. As my hon. friend the Minister of Marine has answered the hon. members who have moved and supported this motion, perhaps I may be allowed to add a word or two. I regret that my hon. friend the member for Gaspé should have used the expression which he used just now about the Province of Quebec. The Province of Quebec has not come to the Parliament of Canada as a beggar. We are not begging here; the representatives from that Province have asked for this school as a right; and my Province is not here begging. The representatives of Quebec come here because they think they have a right to lay their grievances before the Government of Canada and the representatives of the people. That is the position which I understand has been taken by my hon. friends who have spoken on this subject, and I have no doubt that will be the spirit in which this Government will receive their representations. I have no doubt that my hon. friend from Gaspé used this expression unwittingly; but as this is the first time it has been used in this House, though it has appeared in a certain section of the press, I felt that I should protest against it, because the Province of Quebec is large enough, and proud enough, and strong enough, not to come here as a beggar, but to come as Ontario, the richest Province of the Dominion comes, to lay its grievances before this Parliament, and to receive that attention which it considers itself entitled to.

Mr. FORTIN. Allow me to make an explanation. The hon. gentleman is very hard on me; but I will not withdraw my expression, because it is the truth. I do not say that the Province of Quebec is a beggar, or that the people of the Province of Quebec are accustomed to beg; but I say that the people of Quebec are obliged to come here and ask for $1,000 to keep up this school because they say the Government is so embarrassed that they are not able to do so. Under Mr. Chapleau's Government the school was abolished, and when I learned it, I wrote a very strong letter to Mr. Chapleau to induce him to keep up the school, and he did so; and I am pretty sure that if Mr. Mousseau had remained, he would have kept it up too. But now it appears they will not keep it up, and they come here to ask for $1,000.

Mr. AMYOT. No, they do not come here.

Mr. FORTIN. Well, Sir, I always call things by their right names; I tell the truth, and I close these remarks by telling the Federal Government, what I told them in 1873, and many other times, that their duty is to keep up schools of navigation in all the chief ports of the Dominion.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I am very sorry the hon. member for Gaspé has brought in my name, saying that during my administration as Premier of Quebec I had abolished that school. My hon. friend's memory is failing a little, I am afraid—because I am sure he tells the truth, he says it himself, and we all believe him—when he says there never was objection in the Province of Quebec to keep up the school of navigation. The hon. gentleman should remember that the first time that he mooted the idea, as a good patriot, as we know him to be, I said that it was no more the duty of the Province of Quebec to keep up a school of navigation than it was for that Province to keep up a school of gunnery or a school of artillery. We held that since navigation was a matter within the jurisdiction of the Government in Ottawa it should be taken care of by that Government. Had the Quebec Government asked the Dominion to keep up a normal school in Quebec, the latter would have replied that education was under the protection of the Provincial Governments, whose duty it was to keep such schools open. The great anxiety my hon. friend displayed induced the Government for a while to keep that school open, meanwhile asking the Ottawa Government to take charge of it. My colleague the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries made a slight mistake in saying that the subsidy was dropped by the Federal Government when the school was kept by the Provincial Government. No; it was because the subsidy had been dropped by the Federal Government that the demand of the hon. member for Gaspé had been made. I was then Provincial Secretary in Quebec, and, strange to say, the school of navigation was under my Department. There were many students attending that school in Quebec, and my hon. friend knows that when he wrote me to prevent the school being abolished I told him that the Quebec Government could not in justice keep up that school, because it was not our duty to do so. When my hon. friend saw that I was threatening to tell the Federal Government we would no longer maintain the school, he insisted again very strongly on our continuing it, and, good naturedly, I yielded. The Province of Quebec did not ask, nor had it any right to ask, anything in that matter, except that the Federal Government should take care of an institution which properly came under its protection. I am sure my hon. friend will coincide with me in saying that I have stated the facts as they are.

Motion agreed to.

HUDSON BAY NAVIGATION.

Mr. ROYAL, in moving that a Select Committee be appointed to consist of Messrs. Scott, Ross, Watson, Dawson, Abbott, White (Cardwell), Baker (Victoria), Woodworth, Foster, Paint, Brecken, and the mover, to take into consideration the question of the navigation of Hudson Bay; with power to send for persons, papers and records, said: Every hon. member of this House is aware of the agitation that has been going on for some time in the Province of Manitoba with respect to the navigation of the Hudson Bay. This agitation arose in October last, when the farmers of Manitoba, after the frost of September, saw their grain run down in price by a combination of millers. After discussing many questions in connection with their grievances, or so-called grievances, it seemed to be the general opinion that the best way to escape what was called the monopoly of freights of the Canadian Pacific Railway would be to build a railway from Winnipeg to the Hudson Bay. This agitation led to a large meeting called lately in Winnipeg, at which speeches were made and resolutions carried, embodying the strong opinion of all present in favour of the construction of this road. The agitation also extended south of our own borders. The farmers of Dakota and Minnesota, as well as the farmers west of those States, had stronger grievances than ours, and at the Farmers' Convention held at Grand Fort a few weeks ago, which was attended by delegates from Manitoba, the project of constructing the Hudson Bay Railway was discussed. There was but one feeling on the subject, and that was a feeling of enthusiasm in favour of the project. I believe it was there said that if its feasibility was established not only would the Manitoba and South-Western draw every bushel of wheat grown as far as three hundred miles south of Winnipeg, but would also bring into our border the wheat grown in some of the western States of the Union. This question should be ventilated by this House and an authoritative decision respecting it obtained through the formation of a Committee such as the one I propose. My object in having this Committee formed is to get from the most authentic sources all possible information respecting the navigation of the Hudson Bay. It is my object to bring before this Committee any persons who may have records of importance respecting the navigation of Hudson Bay. Of its navigability there is no question. The only question is during what period of the year it is navigable. Upon that question there is a great diversity of opinion: some say that the immense icebergs and the peculiarity of the tides will be a permanent obstacle to the establishment of any permanent communication by sea between ports in the Hudson Bay and the seaports in Europe. On the other hand, it is asserted that from 1610, or during 274 years since the bay was discovered, ships have navigated it every year according to reports furnished by the Hudson Bay Company employees. This would tend to establish that there is at least a period in the year during which the waters of the bay are just as safe for navigation as the waters of the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is within the knowledge of every hon. member of this House that, before the system of navigation of the St. Lawrence was fully established, before the construction of our lighthouses, of the storm-signals, of the marine charts, and lately the establishment of the admirable system of telegraphy, due in great part to the patriotic energy of the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Fortin), the navigation of the Gulf of St. Lawrence was considered just as difficult as that of the waters of the Hudson Bay is at this time. I am sure that it has come before the eyes of every one who reads history that, in the 17th century and during the last century, writers in many instances showed that the Gulf of St. Lawrence was impossible to navigate. In fact, it was only due to the persevering energies of the fur traders and of the adventurers seeking a north-west passage that the Gulf of St. Lawrence was opened. In fact, we find in some authors the statement that, during the winter months, the River St. Lawrence, and part of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, was but one solid mass of ice. No doubt to-day these assertions seem to be rather exaggerated, but what can prevent us from thinking that many of the statements made in connection with the navigation of the Hudson Bay are also either beyond or inside of the truth? The Hudson Bay occupies in our history a very prominent place. It was discovered, as I stated, in 1610. Champlain had founded Quebec two years previous, and in that year he left Quebec and ascended the St. Maurice in order to discover that great sea of the north, as it was then thought the Hudson Bay was, and to find a north-west passage. In the same year, an English sailor of long experience and daring energy, Hudson, who discovered also the Hudson River which flows past New York, discovered the bay, and made the entrance by the straits which to this day have borne his name. Well, from that year the bay was frequented every year, and you know very well that it has been the theatre of naval engagements which have left in the history of our country more than one brilliant trace. Years after the discovery, it was of course between the two nations—England and France—that the contest took place for the dominion of those seas; and at the end of the 17th century we all know that D'Iberville, that giant of our history, wrote to the King of France: "Sire, I have grown tired of being obliged to conquer the Hudson Bay every year"—Je suis las de conquérir la Baie de Hudson tous les ans. A bloody strife was then raging for the possession of this mare clausum or mare ignotum, as it is even at this time pretended in some quarters that it is. That Hudson Bay, that inland sea, that sea of the north, attracted more attention in those days, or 140 years ago, than it has attracted until some five, ten, or twenty years ago. I remember that, being a member of the Provincial Government of Manitoba, and deputed here to see the paternal Government of Canada, in order to get some assistance in one way or the other, I was once laying before the right hon. Sir John Macdonald our views of what our frontier should be in the north, and I made mention that Manitoba might be some day a Maritime Province. I see still the smile of incredulity which appeared on the face of the right hon. gentleman at that time. Of course, it might have passed like a dream to have thought of such a thing, but the agitation which has been going on for three or four months has led people to study the question, and to look up documents, has led many to make searches which have not so far proved conclusive; but, with the striking of this Committee and the authority that will be given to its decision, will, I hope, Mr. Speaker, set this matter at rest. Sir, apart from the historical interest that may be attached to that portion of Canada, the cause of the agitation that has been going on in the North-West with reference to this question is the fact that we are wheat producers; that we occupy the centre of North America; are therefore very far removed from the sea-board; and that we are obliged to seek the best outlet that will enable us to reach the market the most quickly and the most cheaply; and, if the navigation of the Hudson Bay, that is to say, if the period during which the waters of the Hudson Bay are open, is established to be three or four or perhaps five months, then the farmers in the North-West will benefit on the rates of freight on the whole distance so economized, as between the port of Churchill and Liverpool and between Liverpool and Montreal. Let me give you some figures, and I will conclude these few remarks. The distance between Winnipeg and Churchill is about 630 miles. By railway route it will very likely be some 710 miles. From Churchill to Hudson Straits is 650 miles; the Straits 450 miles; and from the Hudson Straits to Liverpool 1,830 miles. The whole distance is then 2,930. From Montreal to Liverpool the distance is 2,765 miles. That is the shortest summer route; the old route was 2,990 miles. The exports of grain by Montreal last year were something like 10,498,265 bushels, that is to say, 5,798,496 bushels of wheat, 596,104 bushels of corn, a million bushels of peas, and so on. In 1881, the exports of grain reached the figure of nearly 15,000,000; in 1880, it was over 23,000,000; in 1879, 19,000,000; in 1878, 16,000,000. Now, to show how much, if the possibility of the project is once established, the farmer of the North-West will gain by the saving of such a distance, I will give you the rate of transport. A bushel of wheat from Winnipeg to Montreal, according to summer rates, costs 28 cents; according to winter rates, 49 cents; from Winnipeg to Liverpool via Montreal, a bushel of wheat by the summer rate 38 cents, and by the winter 59 cents. Now, Sir, according to the distances I have given, if the carriage of a bushel of wheat from Churchill to Liverpool will cost, say—from Winnipeg to Churchill, about 15 cents, and from Churchill to Liverpool, 10 cents—in all 25 cents—you will see what a saving of money farmers in the North-West will be able to make by having such a route—if, of course, the feasibility of the project turns out to be assured. Now, Sir, the average price of wheat in Montreal, in 1882, was $1.33 per bushel. This price, of course, was governed by the price in Liverpool, and if we can save fifteen or twenty cents a bushel in the transportation to Liverpool through Hudson Bay, the farmer will, of course, obtain just that much more for his wheat. Churchill is about six degrees further south than Archangel on the White Sea, in Europe, and we know that Archangel is a place of large trade and is frequented by a large number of English vessels. You must remember, Mr. Speaker, that Archangel is situated in the 64th degree of latitude north; and Churchill would be situated south of Edinburgh, Christiana and Archangel. We all know, of course, that places situated in the same latitude in both hemispheres have not always the same temperature, owing to certain geographical and other causes; but, in this case, I believe that the ports of Hudson Bay would be just as accessible, at least for the same period, as are those European ports which I have mentioned. If we can only establish that there is safe navigation for a period of, say, three or four months in the year, then our point will be gained, and we will have another Gulf of St. Lawrence to the west of us, and other Maritime Provinces. Sir, I believe that the untold wealth and the illimitable possibilities of that land are something beyond any human conception. I hope, therefore, that the House will agree to the motion, and that the Government will assist the Committee to their utmost in elucidating the feasibility of this scheme, and finally in setting at rest this momentous question of the navigation of the Hudson Bay.

Mr. DAWSON. In seconding the motion of the hon. gentleman from Provencher, I may say that it is very desirable that something more should be known about the Hudson Bay. Last year I called for some papers, which were brought down, and the information which was obtained went to show that the bay itself is open for at least six months in the year—in fact, it is open through the whole year, except for a certain distance along the shore where it is always frozen in winter. But the information we obtained last year certainly was not very favourable as regards the navigation of the straits. We had reports of sailors and fishermen who had spent the year in the bay, and they all went to show that in some years the straits were so blocked with ice that it was barely possible to navigate them. However, so little is known on that subject that it is highly desirable that further information should be obtained. I believe there is a channel not hitherto followed leading from Hudson Bay to Ungava Bay—the latter bay being not very far from the entrance to the straits. This channel is said to be free from icebergs, but the currents are said to be so strong as to make navigation impossible. Now, I think it is worth while exploring those straits and ascertaining whether, now that steam can be used, this channel could not be navigated. It is certainly highly desirable, in the interests of the North-West, that an outlet for its commerce should be found through Hudson Bay. So far as settlement has yet gone I believe that the traffic will go by Lake Superior, but another tract of country will be opened up which will need another outlet. Another reason for opening up a route to Hudson Bay is the very great resources existing in that region, from all that we can learn about it. Along the East Main coast, from the entrance of James' Bay to the straits, a distance of over 600 miles, there are numerous large rivers emptying into the bay from the eastward. It has now been ascertained beyond doubt that those rivers abound in salmon, and that fish of many kinds abound in the bay. Now, what a field for enterprise would be opened up if there were a line through by way of Michipicoten, or Lake Nipissing, to Hudson's Bay, what a field for various industries would be opened up to Canada, if this bay were made accessible. Not only does the bay abound in salmon and white fish, but cod fish has been found in great abundance in the straits, and we do not yet know what other elements of wealth may exist. Therefore, the opening up of this region would afford a vast field for industrial occupations, besides affording a channel for the North-West trade; therefore, I think it is highly desirable that we should have a Committee to obtain information, and to get all the knowledge we can concerning that great inland sea—that Mediterranean of the North.

Mr. WATSON. I agree with my hon. friends who have just spoken, that it is very important that the problem of the navigation of the Hudson Bay should be solved. The farmers of the North-West have especially a vital interest in the question, for they need most of all to have cheap freight rates, which, I am sorry to say, they do not possess at present. Ever since the last crop was taken off, and for the last four or five months, the people of the North-West have been discussing the problem of the navigation of the Hudson Bay. As has been stated by the hon. member for Provencher, this matter has not received proper attention from the people of the eastern Provinces; though they have also a great interest in the opening up of the Hudson Bay for navigation, we are now beginning to look to that bay for our future seaport. I believe some people regard the scheme as impracticable, but the people of the North-West who have conversed upon the subject with men who have practical knowledge of Hudson Bay, believe that it is navigable for a considerable season of the year. Last year I conversed with an engineer who had spent the preceding winter on Nelson River. He had been sent out there on a surveying party for one of the railways for which a charter was granted by this House, and he states that the Nelson River was not frozen over last year until the 1st of January. It broke up last summer on the 4th of June, and on the 8th of that month the river was clear of ice. That would give about six months to navigation on Nelson River. Of course, there remains the question of the navigation of Hudson Bay, but when we know that old fashioned tubs, old fashioned sailing vessels, have been able to navigate the straits for the last 250 years, we need have no doubt as to the possibility of navigation by ocean steamships of the present style which should be able to navigate that channel easily, because they have not to overcome the difficulties encountered by sailing vessels which have to wait for time and tide, and which could not attempt to run the channel if ice floes were coming in the opposite direction. I believe it is of the utmost importance that a Committee should be struck, charged with the duty of obtaining all possible information on the subject, and that the Dominion Government should send a vessel to examine the route as soon as possible. We in the North-West depend altogether on growing grain, and our success depends in a large measure on the facilities we have for shipping that grain to the outer world. At the present prices of grain in the North-West, farming will not pay. The freight rates are excessive, and I think they are higher even than the figures given by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Royal). During last fall the freight rate from Winnipeg to Toronto was 42 cents per bushel of wheat, and, of course, that reduced wheat to a low value in the North-West. As has been explained by the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson), the opening of Hudson Bay will be beneficial in more ways than that of creating an outlet for the North-West. Its mineral wealth and fisheries are valuable. If we have a seaport at Nelson River, I believe it will stimulate the people of the North-West; and the opening up of a Hudson Bay route, and the construction of a railway from Winnipeg or some other point to Hudson Bay, would cause farming land in that country to advance 50 per cent. There is no country, I believe, in the world which produces grain of a higher quality or a larger number of bushels to the acre than the North-West, and if we are afforded sufficient outlets and cheap freight rates it will come to the front and become one of the most prosperous Provinces of the Dominion. We trust the Dominion Government will give this matter their serious consideration, so that in the near future the problem as to whether Hudson Bay is navigable or not will be settled, and that by practical tests made by the Dominion Government. We hope the Government will not occupy three or four years in exploring the bay, because we in the North-West want immediate relief, so much so that the people would be willing to have a direct tax laid on them for the construction of a Hudson Bay Railway. We have the assurance of gentlemen who have made it their business to make enquiries that there is a company in Liverpool prepared to place on the route a fleet of ten steamers each of 3,000 tons burthen. They have no doubt as to the possibility of navigating Hudson Bay, and what they want is that a railway should be constructed to the shores of the bay to carry the grain to the port of shipment. It is well known to hon. members that two charters have been granted by Parliament to companies for the building of that road, and this House has agreed to allow the companies to amalgamate. It is of the utmost importance to the country as a whole that the Government should endeavour to give the Company building that road not only lands—because it has been stated within the last few days that lands will not build railways, and that you cannot always sell the bonds—but also a portion of the money proposed to be voted to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company which would be quite sufficient to build 600 miles of railway, for it is estimated that the whole road from Winnipeg to Churchill will only cost $22,000,000 when completed. The construction of a railway over that route would not be more difficult as regards the greater portion of it than is the building of a prairie section. We trust the Government will be able to afford the House such information as will show that Hudson Bay is navigable, that the recommendations of the Committee, when made, will be acted on by the House, and that at a day in the near future we will have a seaport in close proximity to our wheat fields in the North-West.

Mr. CASEY. We have heard from two hon. members who have just spoken for the Province of Manitoba; we have also heard from an hon. member who does not seem to be quite certain as to the Province to which his constituency belongs, and I think it will not be out of place that something should be heard from a representative of Ontario. I happen, Mr. Speaker, to agree with all the hon. members who have spoken. In the first place, I admit the vast importance of the question as to whether Hudson Bay is navigable or not. The importance of the question to the Province of Manitoba is beyond all doubt. It goes without saying that a measure which will bring Winnipeg within 600 miles of Montreal must be of the utmost advantage to that Province. The practical effect of this scheme, if carried out, will be that the port of Hudson Bay will be as near Liverpool as Montreal now is, and Winnipeg will be only from 600 to 650 miles distant from that port; that is to say, that the people of Winnipeg will occupy as favourable a position for shipping grain as do those who live only 500 miles west of Montreal. The vast importance of securing such a result would justify even stronger language than has been used by the hon. members representing Manitoba in urging the scheme. The importance of the matter to other western portions of the Dominion does not, however, stand out so clearly, perhaps, at first sight; but I quite agree with the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Royal), and the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson), in declaring that it is of importance to the rest of the Dominion. The hon. member for Provencher has very aptly said that it would create a new Maritime Province, or at all events a new seaboard, and it would give an outlet by a new direction to the grain markets of the world. The mineral wealth, the valuable fisheries, and the agricultural capabilities of the country along the shores of Hudson Bay have been lately brought before public attention by Dr. Bell and others who have explored that region, and whose declaration as to the natural resources of that section have startled the people of the older Provinces. We know there are prosperous and thickly settled communities in Europe living at a much higher latitude than this, and there are no special conditions in the Hudson Bay district to render it more unfavourable for settlement than those places to which I have referred, and to which the hon. member for Provencher adverted by name. The only possible ground of objection on the part of hon. members from the older Provinces to the adoption of the proposed motion can be an unworthy fear or jealousy that some trade which otherwise might pass through the older Provinces might seek the Hudson Bay route. I call this an unworthy fear, for, although we must look after our own local interests, I consider that Parliamentary legislators must view these questions from a Dominion standpoint, and consider whether the proposal is advisable in the interests of the Dominion as a whole. Even on the ground of local interest, there is no greater room for jealousy in regard to this scheme than to other schemes to which the Dominion is committed. We are aware that the great trunk line of the Dominion, the Canadian Pacific Railway, is seeking outlets at points outside Canadian territory. We are aware that it has been securing connection with Portland and Boston. We are aware that this has been done by money advanced, in part, if not entirely, by the Dominion, and that in spite of that fact the Dominion is proposing to advance further sums to that railway company. It seems to me a fact which will be generally admitted, that the Dominion, as a whole, should have no ground for being jealous of any railway company, because it seeks outlets to the east other than those which have hitherto been looked upon as the natural outlets for the trade of the Dominion.

Mr. WATSON.

In this case, the wealth which would be added to the Dominion by the opening of this outlet, would be wealth added to the Dominion as a whole, not only from the increase of commerce at the port itself, but by attracting trade and commerce and navigation to that great inland sea, and developing and increasing the tax-paying power of the country as a whole. I wish to say a word with regard to the means to be adopted to carry out these objects. The appointment of a Committee is no doubt an advisable and necessary step, but it can hardly be a conclusive one, because all it can do is to obtain the best possible evidence now in existence, with regard to the navigability of the bay; and I think it will be admitted that that evidence is not conclusive. The experience of the steamers which have plied upon the Hudson Bay was not conclusive, because they were not provided with modern appliances for such a service; and I do not think there has been any systematic attempt at the steam navigation of the bay. In this direction it to be sought the only conclusive settlement of this question. During the debate on the Estimates, I ventured to urge on the Government that they should take early means to secure a vessel, built perhaps in the same way as those which ply from Newfoundland and Scotland, and manned by a crew accustomed to cruising in the ice. This vessel should be kept cruising in and out of Hudson Bay through the straits; it should be allowed to be frozen up until the navigation is impracticable in the spring, and the days and months during which navigation is practicable should be reported. By keeping this up for a whole year we would have a conclusive test of the navigability of the bay; because it is not certain that the greatest obstacles exist in winter. In fact, many scientific men think that it is more easily navigable in other seasons than in summer—that is to say, before the ice and icebergs become loosened from the shore. This, at first sight, seems a reasonable idea, and it is certainly endorsed by scientific men of the greatest experience with regard to that region. I am sorry that the Government have not seen fit to carry out the suggestion which was made, not by myself alone, but by others, that they should adopt a practical means of finding out how long the bay is navigable. I think the importance of the question would justify a much larger expenditure than would be incurred in such a test. The amount expended would be only a small fraction of the amount which we have spent from time to time in deciding on the practicability of particular routes on the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Intercolonial Railway, and we would then have decided, positively and perhaps forever, the question of the feasibility of such a scheme. The labours of the Committee, no doubt, will be valuable in ascertaining on what points there is no doubt, and as to what other points further enquiry may be necessary; but the work of the Committee will be valueless if the Government do not supplement their labours in some such way as I have suggested.

Mr. ORTON. The subject before the House is so important that I may be excused for making a few remarks in the way of urging the Government to use every possible means of ascertaining fully the feasibility of the route in question. If the route should be feasible there is no doubt that it will perfectly revolutionize the future prospects of this country. Not only has the Dominion a deep interest in this question, but the British Empire is also interested in its solution. The distance between Yokohama and Liverpool, by way of Port Moody and the Hudson Bay Railway route, is 1,824 miles shorter than the route by New York and San Francisco. The route to Melbourne would be 2,214 miles shorter by Port Moody and Hudson Bay than by San Francisco and New York; and the distance to Hong Kong would be shortened 2,204 miles by this route. I hope that the effect of the labours of this Committee will be to elicit sufficient information to justify the Government in taking such steps as will result in solving completely, and, if possible, forever, the feasibility of that route. I have no doubt the Government would be justified in seeking the assistance of the British Government in carrying out the exploration, which may probably require two or three years to accomplish. While there is a diversity of opinion as to whether the bay is open around the north shore or the south, there seems to be a wide feeling in favour of the view that the straits themselves are open the whole year. If the navigation of the Straits can be made with safety, no doubt a route may be established for a sufficient length of time to make it very valuable to the future of this country.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I congratulate my hon. friend for the manner in which he has laid this matter before the House, as well as the others who have taken part in this very interesting debate. The Government and Parliament have shown their desire to assist in the construction of a railway connecting Manitoba and the North-West with Hudson Bay. Parliament has granted two charters, one for a road to Nelson River, and the other to Churchill. These two companies applied last Session for power to amalgamate—a very wise proceeding, as it is clear two railways could not be built, and that a union of energy and capital and resources would be required in order to have any chance of constructing such a road. As those two railways, having Hudson Bay termini, varied very much in route, the Government treated them as separate lines, and granted them the same land subsidy in aid of construction as was granted to the other railways—6,400 acres a mile, but at a less rate. The other companies got their land at $1 an acre; the land was given to these two companies at 50 cts. an acre; and when the companies amalgamated, the Government considered the matter of so much importance that they decided to give the amalgamated companies the separate land subsidy at 50 cts. an acre. That is, of course, a substantial aid to the railway. It cannot be expected, however, that capital will be found for the construction of this railway unless it is ascertained that Hudson Bay and Hudson Straits are accessible for a considerable portion of the year. As has been said by the hon. gentlemen who have spoken, there is a great diversity of opinion regarding the length of time during which the straits can be successfully navigated. It may be true that a vessel can get through almost every month in the year; but that is not the question to be decided. The question to be decided is, whether for a reasonable number of months in the year there is a probability, amounting to a certainty, that the navigation of the bay and straits can be regularly carried on, so as to be profitable in a commercial sense? I am old enough to remember the truth of the statement made by my hon. friend, the mover of this resolution, that formerly the navigation of the River St. Lawrence itself was considered as doubtful, uncertain, hazardous, and unprofitable, commercially, almost as Hudson Bay now is. The idea prevailed, especially in England, that the river was practically not open for more than four months in the year. That idea has been, by slow degrees, dissipated. The number of months for navigation has increased, and the introduction of steam has rendered the navigation more independent of casual obstructions from ice than formerly, when the whole trade was conducted by sailing vessels. I have no doubt it will be found, when the question is worked out by experience with steam vessels, that the period during which the straits can be profitably navigated will be considerably extended beyond the present idea. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has had this subject under his earnest consideration, and has obtained from the Hudson Bay Company log books of voyages made by their vessels for a series of years, which he is now having collated and examined carefully. From these log books, most valuable information will be obtained, which my hon. friend will place at the disposal of the Committee, showing what the variations in the seasons are, and whether in one year the navigation is open longer than another. Thus some approximation may be obtained to the fact as to how long, in an average number of years, the navigation can be considered to be fairly open in a commercial sense. The Government, I may say, has been pressed by several gentlemen in this House and by deputations, to consider the propriety of sending at once a vessel to examine the straits. One deputation proposed that we should send a sailing vessel very early this spring. That matter is now under the consideration of the Government. But it is quite true, as my hon. friend the Minister of Marine has stated, that the report of a casual vessel for one season will not give sufficient evidence to be conclusive as to the profitableness of the navigation of Hudson Bay and Straits. It would be necessary, I think, to have a steam vessel fitted out, as for an Arctic voyage, and that would involve the necessity, I think, of more than one season's exploration. As the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Casey) has said, it might be well to have the vessel remain and be frozen in, and have parties stationed at different parts of the coast, for two or perhaps three seasons, in order to ascertain what really is the nature of Hudson Bay and Straits as navigable waters. The Government have now this matter under their special consideration. This will be a matter of very considerable expense, but it is one of so much importance that I think the result will be that the Government will feel themselves authorized in coming to the House and submitting a proposition for a vote for the purpose mentioned. The importance of opening up a trade there, I think, cannot be exaggerated with respect to the future of the North-West. Not only will it be the means of access to Europe for the general products of the North-West, but it will be exceedingly valuable on account of the known mineral wealth and the wealth of the fisheries that have been alluded to by my hon. friend from Algoma (Mr. Dawson). All accounts seem to go to show that the mineral wealth is very large, and I have little doubt that, with further explorations, our present knowledge of the mineral wealth of that region will be greatly enhanced and increased. The fisheries in these great northern waters must be valuable; therefore, the importance of opening up these waters and the trade through them, is obvious, and I do not think can be well exaggerated. I would say to my hon. friend who has made this motion, that I see that Mr. Abbot is the only Lower Canadian whose name is on the list. I would suggest the addition of the names of Mr. Desjardins and Mr. Riopel. Mr. Riopel comes from the coast of Gaspé, and is acquainted with the winter navigation of the Lower St. Lawrence.

Mr. BLAKE. I am very glad to hear the announcement of the hon. gentleman as to the probable intentions of the Government with regard to this question. I think for some time it has been made very plain that, in view of the great interests involved, we should obtain that more exhaustive information which the hon. gentleman intimates he will ask us to provide the means of obtaining. My own opinion has been for some time past that this is a matter for the joint action of the Imperial and the Canadian Governments, and in view of the circumstance that the Imperial Government has not unfrequently utilized vessels of the Navy for such purposes, I think that an application of the Canadian Government for the use of a vessel, indicating their readiness to pay any extra expenses which would be involved in the prosecution of a survey by a vessel of the Imperial Navy beyond those required in ordinary stations, and making arrangements for a lengthened investigation, would be probably satisfactorily received. There is another point of view in which it is not unimportant that an effort should be made in that direction. No doubt the capital which may be required to secure the execution of this great scheme, involving, as it does, the creation of a new line of communication across the Atlantic as well as the railway line, must principally be obtained in England, and great credence will be placed on the reports of the officers and scientific persons appointed or accredited by the Imperial authorities. In that respect, it would tend to the advantage of the scheme that, if possible, such arrangements as I have suggested should be made. I would suggest also, that no delay take place, as the emergency in the North-West is pressing. The suggestion of the hon. member for West Elgin, that the vessel should remain a very considerable time will, I hope, be adopted. Much has to be done in the way of indirect exploration, irrespective of the simple question of the ice, which is, in one sense, the more important one. More information should be obtained as to the various harbours and other subjects of enquiry in an exploration of this kind, and the time spent in the bay, although not devoted to the single question of the ice, will be well spent if arrangements are made to have scientific persons form part of the staff especially chosen to undertake the work. With reference to the statement of the hon. gentleman as to the liberal provision which has to be made for the railway, certainly 50 cents an acre is a price only half that which has been set down for the land of other railways in the North-West. But if I rightly understand the arrangements made—although I am sorry to say the details have not been laid on the Table—I believe the grant for the railway in this direction is of lands in the neighbourhood of the railway itself, and that they are not supposed to be quite so valuable as those through which the other railways run.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is so.

Mr. BLAKE I think the hon. gentleman's statement has to be taken with a certain discount, with which we are accustomed to take his statements. The ordinary assumption will be that the lands through which this railway runs are not worth half as much as those through which other railways run.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Quite true, the lands are not supposed to be so valuable as those lying further south. Therefore, the grant has been doubled in quantity and the price diminished by half.

Mr. ROYAL. As other names have been suggested to be added to that Committee, I would, with the consent of the House, suggest that Mr. Macmaster's name be added to it, as he has given some study to the matter.

Mr. BLAKE. There can be no objection to the admission of the name proposed. But the hon. gentleman has not shown the usual courtesy observed in the constitution of such a Committee, since out of the fifteen names selected only two are from this side of the House. I am sorry the hon. gentleman should have felt himself so separated from us in a question of this kind that he would not trust some little share in the deliberations of the Committee to this side of the House. I think as the hon. member for West Elgin has paid some attention to this subject, his name should be added.

Mr. ROYAL. I have not the least objection that the name of the hon. member for West Elgin be added.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The rule cannot be dispensed with and the number made more than fifteen.

Mr. BAKER. I can assist the hon. gentleman by asking that my name be withdrawn. I have had twenty-five years of navigation and I do not propose to have any more.

Mr. BLAKE.

Motion agreed to, with the addition of the names of Messrs. Casey, Macmaster and Riopel and the withdrawal of the name of Mr. Baker.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS, NAPANEE.

Mr. ALLISON, in moving for copies of papers and correspondence relative to the appointment of a Collector of Customs at the Port of Napanee, said: I move for these papers because there are several worthy young men in my county better fitted in every respect for this position, whose claims could not have been properly represented to this Government at the time this appointment was made.

Mr. BOWELL. There is no correspondence in connection with this matter and I do not see what object the hon. gentleman can have in having his motion carried. I may say to the hon. gentleman, that in this case, as in other appointments, there are always others desirous of obtaining the positions filled who think they are better fitted for and better entitled to them. Before the hon. gentleman has been many years in politics, he will find this feeling in all parts of the country.

Mr. ALLISON. If there are no papers I withdraw the motion. But there must have been something to guide the hon. Minister verbally, or otherwise. I have no doubt that there are worthier men in Lennox whose claims could not have been properly presented. As there are no papers, I withdraw the motion.

FAIRFORD RIVER (MAN.) IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. ORTON, in moving for copies of all reports, correspondence, memoranda, Orders in Council and other documents in reference to the improvement of Fairford River, the outlet of Lake Manitoba; the removal of the sand bar at the mouth of Red River, and the obstructions in Nelson River, the outlet of Lake Winnipeg, with a view to draining the submerged lands in the Province of Manitoba, said: The object I have in asking for these papers is to ascertain what the Government is doing in reference to this very important subject. It may not be known to the hon. members of this House that this involves the reclaiming of an immense tract of some of the best land in the Province of Manitoba, which is submerged in consequence of the overflow of Lake Manitoba and the Red River, westward from the city of Winnipeg to Portage la Prairie, by which a very unfavourable opinion is given to the people who travel in that direction. Again, there is an immense tract to the south of the Assiniboine near to the town of Morris, comprising some thirty townships, in what is called the Boyne Swamp. On the west of Lake Manitoba, there is also an immense tract of land which is submerged and the land rendered almost useless. Also, between the two lakes, Lake Winnipeg and Lake Manitoba, there is another vast tract. I may be allowed to explain some of the causes why this land is submerged. The waters in the various streams in the North-West during the high water time are loaded with vegetable matter and with the soil of the country. When the rivers overflow, this vegetable and earthy matter is deposited upon the banks of the rivers, and also upon the banks of the lake, causing the banks to be very much higher than the surrounding country. The result is that, between the Assiniboine and Lake Manitoba, there is a basin, and, when the water overflows, it cannot get at low water either into the river or into the lake. The same occurs on the south of the Assiniboine, though the banks are higher, and the water overflows. In consequence, I may say, of the overflowing of Lake Manitoba, the waters of the Assiniboine are very much increased and the overflowing of the Assiniboine is greatly more than it would otherwise be. The result is, that an immense quantity of water overflows the south bank, and forms what is called the Boyne Swamp; the same holds good with regard to the lands submerged between the northern and southern portions of the Assiniboine before it turns westward to the Red River. There is an immense basin between the lake and the river and even on the borders of Lake Winnipegosis as well as Lake Manitoba. There is a complete basin between Lake Manitoba and the Assiniboine, to the west of that lake. This will explain why these marshes exist and are not drained during the low water time. I may mention that there is a fall between Lake Winnipegosis and Lake Manitoba of 19 feet, and between Lake Manitoba and Lake Winnipeg of 41 feet. The Fairford River, or the Partridge Crop, as it is commonly called, is the outlet of Lake Manitoba and also the outlet of Lake Winnipegosis. In some seasons, this river is comparatively narrow, and in consequence the outlet is more or less impeded. In some seasons, when the watershed is very great, it fills the streams which empty into Lake Winnipegosis, and Lake Manitoba becomes very high, and lands, which some years ago were excellent farm lands, occupied by settlers, are now submerged. One of the improvements that is required is the enlargement or deepening of Fairford River, and, from what I can learn, it will not be a very expensive undertaking. The bed of the river is somewhat hard, it is true, but not rocky. It consists of what is commonly called buckshot earth, that is, it is a mixture of clay and gravel, with perhaps some boulders. Dredging alone, perhaps, would not answer the purpose, but, from what I can ascertain from those who seem to know something about it, the river can be improved, perhaps, by dredging alone, and certainly by the use of some nitro-glycerine, which would loosen the earth, so that very little difficulty would be found in deepening the Fairford River, and so preventing the overflow of Lake Winnipeg and the Assiniboine River. An improvement might also be made by straightening the course of the Assiniboine River. The ice jams that occur there, in consequence of the tortuous, winding character of the river, increase the overflow very much, and, if the Government would straighten some of the bends in the Assiniboine River, by cutting a channel through, that could be avoided. I may say, in connection with this subject, that it is thought by some that, in order to completely and thoroughly drain the Province of Manitoba, it may possibly be necessary to make some improvements also on the Nelson River. There is no doubt that on the Nelson River, 30 or 40 miles from its source at Lake Winnipeg, there is a bar which prevents the water from flowing out freely into the Nelson River. However, that, doubtless, will be a matter to be considered in the future. The bar at the mouth of the Red River is another impediment which it is absolutely necessary, in the interests of the navigation both of the Red River and Lake Winnipeg, to remove, and I believe something is being done there. The rapids at St. Andrews also form an impediment on the Red River where improvements might advantageously be made. Now, though the expense incurred in making these improvements may be considerable, when we recollect that there is an amount of land which is estimated at closely upon 3,000,000 acres which can be reclaimed, the expense is a mere bagatelle compared with the benefit which will be derived from the expenditure, and I trust that the Government will take this matter up very seriously. Indeed, I may say, that the people of the Province of Manitoba, especially in that part surrounding these marshes, feel that this is one of their great grievances, and they believe that they have not the remedy applied because they have not the control of the lands of the Province, and the Provincial Legislature have not the revenue to make the improvements, which may appear to be of a local character. It is my opinion that a great deal would be done by the Government to allay the dissatisfaction in that country were they to take up this question seriously and show that they have a deep interest in the welfare of that Province. From another point of view, I think you may say that it is important to the whole of the settlement of the North-West that the Province of Manitoba—the gateway, the entry into our great North-West—should be made to appear as presentable as possible to those who are emigrating into that country, and those who pass through for the purpose of ascertaining the value of our great North-West. I know very well, that in consequence of the damage caused by the overflowing of the Assiniboine, there has grown up a strong feeling in favour of the Province obtaining the lands under its own control. But, whether the Government sees fit or not to give the Province of Manitoba the control of its lands, I certainly think the proceeds of their sale, after giving a reasonable share toward the construction of the public works that are being made there, should be devoted as much as possible to the improvement of that Province. This is one of the most important and urgent improvements that are required at the present time in that Province. There is no doubt the people also feel the want of railways; but that is a question of a different character.

Mr. SCOTT. This question of the lowering of the waters of Lake Manitoba was brought before the Government some years ago. The hon. Minister of Public Works sent out a corps of engineers to ascertain the cost of lowering the water of that lake; but nothing has been done since. In addition to the large quantity of lands that would be reclaimed by this proceeding—to the amount of between two and three million acres—another very important improvement would be effected. Lake Winnipegosis empties into Lake Manitoba through the Water Hen River. On Lake Winnipegosis there are some very valuable timber limits—the most valuable in the Province of Manitoba. Some of the limits were disposed of about six years ago, but up to the present time the purchasers have not been able to use that timber by reason of the impossibility of navigating the Water Hen River. In the Session of 1881-82 the hon. Minister of Public Works, from representations made to him, placed the sum of $5,000 in the Estimates for the purpose of having a thorough survey made of this Water Hen River. The report made was that it would be unadvisable to improve the navigation of that river, as by so doing a larger body of water would flow from the Winnipegosis into Lake Manitoba. Therefore, I claim that the Government would not alone receive the benefit of reclaiming the two or three million acres of land which would then be available for agricultural purposes, but that it would receive a great amount of royalty yearly from the owners of the timber limits on the east side, and principally in the islands in Lake Winnipegosis. I trust, therefore, that the Government will resume this enterprise, which has now been delayed for a number of years, and will speedily take some means by which the Fairford River may be opened up, so that the waters of Lake Manitoba may flow more readily into those of Lake Winnipeg.

Mr. WATSON. As I have some considerable knowledge of the question under consideration, I may perhaps, be permitted to say a few words upon it. I am glad to see that the hon. gentleman from Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) has taken up this matter. I brought it up last year, and got some information from the hon. Minister of Public Works as to his intentions with reference to the improvement of the Fairford River, or the Water Hen River. My hon. friend from Centre Wellington is a little astray in what he has said regarding the flooding of the lands. There is no basin existing between the Assiniboine River and Lake Manitoba; on the contrary, there is a good deal of fall between the river and the lake. When the wind is from the north, the waters flow round on the south shore of Lake Manitoba, and when the wind is from the south, they flow back again.

The tide rises in this way about 2 feet on each side of the lake, and consequently a good deal of land is overflowed. A great portion of the land on the south side of Lake Manitoba is marshy, owing to this reason; and the wet season of the past year has doubtless made it worse. An encouraging feature in the case is the fact that the water of the lake has gone down about 2 feet within the last few years. I do not think the deepening of the Fairford River is what is required to remedy the evil complained of, because the deepening of that river would spoil the navigation of Lake Manitoba in a dry season. What is required is a channel at the mouth of the Fairford River to carry off the overflow in wet seasons. If this is done, I think the result will be to reclaim the lands and to keep the water at a certain height in both wet and dry seasons of the year. Concerning the improving of the Water Hen River, I have some information derived from the captain of the steam tug which has navigated Lake Winnipeg the last three years. He thinks it will not be a very difficult matter to improve the navigation of the Water Hen River. That river is about 30 miles in length, and a connection can be much better and cheaper made by cutting a canal about a mile and a-half in length, and by putting in a lock. This would shorten the route between Lake Winnipegosis and Manitoba by some 30 miles, and I think this could be done cheaper than by improving the navigation of the Fairford River.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Where would the lock be?

Mr. WATSON. At a point between Winnipegosis and Lake Manitoba. The Water Hen River runs in a north-easterly direction, and turns right round and comes back to nearly the same point. A canal of  $1\frac{1}{2}$  miles in length would cut off 30 miles of distance, and consequently would do away with the excessive flow of water out of Lake Winnipegosis, though at high water it would probably overflow the shores of Lake Manitoba. I trust this matter will receive the early consideration of the hon. Minister, not only for the purpose of reclaiming the lands on the shore of the lake, but for the purpose of improving the navigation between Lake Winnipegosis and Lake Manitoba. As has been stated by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Scott), there are large timber limits up there that cannot be successfully operated at present. We have tried already to navigate the Water Hen River, but without success. That river runs for a distance of about 12 or 15 miles into what is called the Water Hen Lake. It is almost impossible to run logs down that stream, owing to the fact that the Water Hen Lake has a rough, stony bed but 2 or 3 feet deep. There is a great deal of shallows in the Water Hen River and at no period of the year would it be of any use for running logs for more than about 4 miles. The captain of the steamboat whom I have already mentioned, tells me that the water is 2 feet lower in Lake Winnipeg now than it was four years ago; but the channel in the narrows, between the north and south ends of the lake, remains about the same depth—it is 6 feet now, and it was 6 feet deep four years ago, notwithstanding that the water is 2 feet lower in Lake Manitoba. Apparently the current between both ends of the lake keeps the channel clear. The widening of the mouth of the Fairford River will not interfere with the navigation of Lake Manitoba at the narrows, the only place where the water is shallow. I trust the hon. Minister will give this matter his attention at once. It will not only open up the timber limits, but greatly improve the facilities for trade. The operation of these limits would also give cheap lumber for the plains in that vicinity, which is another point well worth consideration. This would require the improvement of the White Mud River, which would need to be dredged in order to allow the passage of vessels as far up as the Manitoba and North-Western Railway. If this were done, it would open up a route for navigation from Lake Manitoba to points in the

Mr. WATSON.

Province, and the North-West, up to the Saskatchewan. I hope the Government will allow the motion to be adopted.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There is no objection to these papers being brought down, but I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that in the report of the Public Works Department for 1881-82, at page 96 of the appendix, there are 20 pages of a report from the Chief Engineer of the Department, and Mr. Geddes was specially sent to the point in question to investigate this matter. I would ask the hon. member not to insist on having these reports brought down again, as they have already been printed. I will bring down papers that have not already been submitted. I am not in a position to say what the Government may do; but I may remark that we are now building a dredge for the purpose mentioned in this motion, and to meet other requirements in the North-West, at Red River and Lake Manitoba. I cannot go further, because the matter has not yet been decided by Council.

Mr. WATSON. Do I understand that the dredge is intended to open the river?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am not in a position to say that. If the hon. gentleman will refer to those reports, he will find the matter is not so simple as some hon. members believe. It is a very difficult matter, and is an engineering question, which engineers will have to deal with. Besides, it is a matter which will cost something like $300,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. Minister says the Government are building a dredge: where is it being built?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is being built on the shores of Lake Manitoba, I think, and I understand it will be ready next season.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I understand a dredge is being built on Lake Winnipeg.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am not in a position to say exactly the spot where the dredge is being built, but I will give the information to the hon. gentleman subsequently. Of course we will not be able to send it everywhere, but we will send it where we can. This whole matter, which is one of importance, will have to be considered as to whether we will undertake it or not; but there are engineering difficulties that have been pointed out, and which appear in the report to which I have referred.

After Recess.

Mr. ORTON. I desire to offer a few remarks before the motion is submitted to the House. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) thought I was incorrect when I stated that there was a basin existing between the Assiniboine River and Lake Manitoba, but I think if he remembers the position of Long Lake he will agree that I was correct; and also in regard to Fairford River, that hon. member also took a somewhat different view. From what I can learn, not only is there a bar which requires to be removed, but other work is necessary. If the bar were removed it would do a great deal of good undoubtedly, but it is generally considered that such would not be sufficient to cover all that is required, in order to give a sufficiently free outlet to Lake Manitoba.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING FACILITIES.

Mr. ORTON moved that a Select Committee be appointed consisting of Messrs. Wallace (York), Sutherland, Taylor, Thompson, Hesson, Landry (Montmagny), Benoit, Auger, Kinney, Landry (Kent), Scott, Gordon, and the mover, to enquire as to whether cheaper and easier banking and other financial facilities cannot be afforded Canadian agriculturists; with power to send for persons and papers. He said: Mr. Speaker, in order to make clear to the House the object I have in view in asking for the Special Committee mentioned in the resolution, I desire to refer briefly to our present banking system and its operation upon our industrial population. The general banking Act provides apparently, by a certain clause, that money can be loaned to the general public at no higher rate of interest than 7 per cent.; but so vague is that clause it would seem to require another Act of Parliament to interpret what the meaning of that particular clause is: or, in other words, I do not think it has ever been found practicable to recover from banks any amount charged over 7 per cent. So I desire to try and see if some plan cannot be adopted by which farmers can get money cheaper. I do not see how it can be done by the general banking system as it at present exists, and I may refer further to that system in order to show that it is utterly inadequate to the wants of this country. The capacity of our present banks to accommodate the people by credits is limited. It is limited, in the first place, by the limit placed upon their circulation. Our banks are prohibited by the general banking Act from issuing $2 of their own promises to pay, for every $1 they possess in the form of specie or Dominion securities. They are also hindered by the amount of their deposits. It is well known that during periods of depression from almost any cause, and especially the depression which may, and always does arise to a greater or less extent, from a failure of the crops, the deposits in our banks are withdrawn. Large deposits do not find their way to our banks under such circumstances, and their capacity to give the necessary accommodation to the business public is curtailed at the very time when it is most needed, and the result is general commercial disaster and distress amongst our people. I am sorry to say that, according to the system which now exists, the burden of these disasters falls eventually upon the agricultural class. We know that when the deposits are reduced the banks are obliged to curtail their accommodation to the public; they cannot discount the paper which they have been accustomed to discount. Business men who base their business on a belief, which appeared when they entered it to be well grounded, that they would receive a certain amount of accommodation so long as they were able to present paper which is considered good, find that, notwithstanding that their paper may be of the highest standing, they cannot always get a line of discount. The result is that the wholesale men have to press the retail men for early payments. Manufacturers have also to press the middlemen who are engaged, like the retail merchants, in dealing with the farmers, and the consequence is that the farmers are pressed just at the time when there should be some means of enabling them to tide over the misfortune of a bad crop. My own opinion with reference to our banking institutions is, in the first place, that the system is neither a safe one for the public nor one which should exist in a country like this. We know very well that as long as the banks are allowed to issue their own paper, a commercial panic is likely to occur, in consequence of the banks becoming afraid that a run may be made upon them by those who hold their paper. I have always believed—and I believe a great many people of this country believe with me—that the basis of our financial banking system should be the Government of our country. The Finance Department of the Government should be more completely and thoroughly than it is at the present time, at the head of our banking institutions. It should also have in its possession the latest and most reliable statistics in reference to the trade of our country—not only as to the condition of our industries, but in reference to our mineral wealth and our agricultural resources, as well as in reference to the markets both domestic and foreign, so that they might be enabled to gauge and regulate the amount of money in circulation by the wants and requirements of the people. As the first step in that direction, I think the plan might be very wisely adopted of giving to those who are engaged in creating the largest amount of wealth—and of course I mean the farmers—easier banking facilities, by the establishment of farmers' banks for the purpose of lending out money to farmers at short dates, and at reasonable rates of interest. Hence, my request for a Committee. I wish to trace a little further the unjust position in which the Canadian farmers are placed. When their crops fail and they are pressed by the retail men and the middlemen for payment, they have no facilities for getting temporary accommodation and tiding them over until they can either get a better crop, or are enabled to overcome other misfortunes which may befall them through losses by fire, sickness, or other disaster. When such a misfortune happens them now, the only way in which they can get the accommodation they require is to go to a private lender of money, or a private bank, or, if the sum needed be a large one, they are obliged to go to the loan societies, all of whom charge the highest possible rate of interest. As a matter of fact, therefore, the farmer is really obliged to pay a very high rate of interest in order to get temporary accommodation, and he is thereby crippled very much in his efforts to produce wealth from the soil. We find that private banks are springing up in every portion of this Dominion. They may be useful institutions, but there is one thing very certain: they are extorting very large rates of interest, and chiefly from the farming population. Not only are they charging high rates of interest to the farmers, but they are crippling the ability of our banks to accommodate the business public. We find that a private banker, with a capital of $20,000, can get a line of credit in the chartered banks for double that amount, thereby, I maintain, taking from the business public the money which is required to carry on their business, and lending it again to the farmer at a much higher rate of interest than is paid to the bank. Then the stockholders of our banks are not always men living in our country, and the profits which are made by our banking institutions are largely taken away from Canada to a foreign country, the wealth of this country being thereby, to a certain extent, reduced. Loan societies are institutions to which the farmers have to resort when they are obliged to borrow a larger sum than they can get on any security they can offer in the shape of endorsed notes or chattel mortgages. They are often induced by these loan societies to borrow a larger amount than they require. They are also put to enormous expense in searching titles, papers, &c., and are put to heavy legal expenses. The result is that almost every farmer in this country who borrows from a loan society, sooner or later loses his farm. Happily, the farmers are not so thoroughly in the power of the loan societies as they were a few years ago, before the Bill was passed which I had the honour of introducing here, limiting the time to which their mortgages could extend to five years instead of twenty years, as was the case formerly. One of the greatest difficulties the farmer had to contend with at that time was that he could not get any release at the time money was cheap, and could not sell his property. With the five years' term, that evil is not so great; but through the operation of our banking system, he is forced to borrow money when it is scarce, and when the rates of interest are at the highest point. When the banks press the wholesale merchants, the wholesale merchants press the retail merchants, and the retail merchants press the farmers, and money is scarce in the country. Then is the time that our agriculturalists are obliged to go to the loan societies, who charge them the highest rates of interest that can be obtained. To-day, in Manitoba, we find the loan societies lending money and taking mortgages right and left from the farmers of that country at 10 and 12 per cent. If these men had some facilities for obtaining temporary loans from farmers' banks, such as I think might be established in this country, they would not be obliged to become the slaves of these loan societies, as unfortunately, many of our best farmers have been in the past. One of the objections I have to loan societies is that a great deal of their capital is British capital. Thus a large portion of the interest which is paid by the agriculturalists of this country is sent to a foreign country, and thereby our country is impoverished to that extent; and we all know that in a very few years the principal is eaten up in interest, so that the farmer, after paying back what he originally borrowed, still owes the principal. Now, Sir, I shall just ask the House to listen briefly to an outline of my crude ideas in reference to how I think farmers might receive better accommodation. It is not my intention to place these ideas before the House in the expectation of their receiving the endorsement of this House, but they are such as have appeared to me to be feasible. The object of the Committee will be to consider, not only my views, but what views other hon. members of the Committee may have upon this question, in order, if possible, to arrive at some means of remedying one of the greatest evils that exist in this country. If the Government should see fit to charter farmers' banks, subject to all the inspections and all the regulations that are imposed on other banks, and give them a basis of circulation such as I shall indicate, providing that money should be lent to farmers at no higher rate than 5 per cent., such a measure would be of great advantage to the whole country. I maintain that 5 per cent. is as high a rate of interest as any farmer can afford to pay. If he pays more than that, and has his farm mortgaged for one-half or one-third of its value, he is virtually not the owner of the farm; for he is paying as much in interest as that farm would bring if rented. I think the Government should give to these chartered farmers' banks the privilege of obtaining a Government issue of Dominion legal tenders to the extent of one-half of the assessed value of the improved farms of stockholders or borrowers; that is, any farmer desiring to borrow or to become a stockholder in such a bank might deposit in that bank a first lien on his land to the extent of one-half of its equalized assessed value, which could be verified through the officers of the various municipalities. I think the Government ought to give the same privilege to these banks as they give to other banks—of issuing $2 in legal notes for every dollar they hold in specie or Dominion securities. These banks might also be utilized by placing under their management the savings bank business of the Dominion. One-half per cent. might be given to the Government for the expense of the legal tender issue, and one per cent. or one-half per cent. would amply pay all the costs of management, leaving with the farmer, who desired to deposit in the bank, a lien of 3 per cent. on the latent capital which he holds in his farm. I would propose, also, to limit the amount of money that might be loaned by these banks. In the first place, they should be limited to loan only to farmers, and in the second place they should be limited to loan on notes or endorsed paper, to a limited amount, say $1,000—that is, upon notes at short dates, such as two, three or four months, renewable if required, at 5 per cent. They should also have the power to loan, year after year, at 5 per cent., to any farmer who desires to borrow money and place in the bank a first lien or mortgage on his farm to the extent of one half of its assessed value. By this means those that are well-to-do would not only derive a considerable profit from their saved wealth, sufficient to pay their taxes and any other incidental expenses, but they would aid their fellow farmers to get money at a cheap rate, and the basis would be a perfectly sound one. The effect of this would be, in my opinion, to increase the agricultural wealth produced in this country to an enormous extent, and thereby increase our exports and bring into this country a very great increase in gold or in gold's equivalent. This would, consequently, prove a safeguard, to a very large extent, against the recurrence or depression or stagnation in trade, and further cause the greater part of the business of the country to be done on a cash basis. The farmer, instead of having to go on credit, would at the end of the year, have paid his debt. At present we know that merchants, if not paid at the end of the year, are obliged to carry over the farmers, if possible, and charge them interest. In some parts of the country the custom is still—I know it is in my county, and the hon. member for North Wellington, I have no doubt, knows it well—to charge on a running account 10 per cent compound interest every six months, sometimes every three months—not only to charge the farmer the highest credit price for his goods, but also, if he cannot pay, compound interest every six months at 10 per cent., thus increasing the amount he owes to a very large extent over what he would have to pay for the same goods had he paid cash. I think that all classes would be benefited by the establishment of these farmers banks. We all know that our manufacturing population and our commercial population, the residents of our cities and towns, largely depend for their prosperity on the success of farming operations, and if the business of farmers could be done for cash, not only would merchants and manufacturers of every kind succeed better and fewer failures occur, but all our labouring population would receive more employment. We have another weakness in our present system which I think this would, to a certain extent, obviate. We all know that commercial panics have a very serious effect upon our present banking institutions. Even when such depressions occur in the country bordering on ours, or one with which we have considerable dealings, they are very apt to produce more or less commercial depression in our own country. There is another danger under our banking system, to which I wish to refer, that this would also obviate. We know that under the present system, at times when money is scarce, when deposits have been removed from our banks, when our exports have not been as large as usual, banks are obliged to refuse to discount paper; but they have the power of selecting to whom they shall refuse credit, and it frequently occurs that banking directors receive large amounts, or that, through the offices of banking directors, favouritism is shown and money is lent to those engaged in the most risky, and in perhaps, illegitimate kinds of businesses, while those engaged in legitimate business, are still refused accommodation. I think that farmers' banks would have a tendency to obviate difficulties arising in that way. With regard to the basis upon which farmers' banks should be established, I think that those who advocate a gold basis cannot object, because it is well known that the gold loaners of Great Britain are ready to-day to lend to any extent to the farmers of our country—to a larger extent than I ask as the basis of this issue of Dominion legal tenders. We know that our farmers, at any rate in Ontario, are not assessed for much more than half of the real value of their property, whereas loan societies or, in other words, the gold loaners of Great Britain, are willing to lend their gold to our farmers to the extent of one-third, even one-half of the real value, which is much more than I ask as the basis for this circulation. There is another reason why this circulation can never depreciate in value, and that is, that it is better than a simple Government issue. A simple Government legal tender issue would not be as good, for the simple reason that in the case of any war complications or threatened invasion, it would depreciate very much in value, whereas an issue which depended for its basis upon the important landed property of the country would not depreciate. Capitalists well know that if this country should ever be conquered, and I am sure, with our hardy population, it never will, the land would not change its proprietorship. Money based on the landed property of a country is perfectly safe. It may be said that farmers are very poor business men, very careless, and that great deal of trouble will arise if money is loaned to them through banks. I must acknowledge that perhaps it is true that farmers are not accustomed to business, as ordinary business men, but we have amongst our farmers some of the best business men of the country, and I believe all our farmers can and would very soon acquire business habits. Therefore, that could be no possible argument against this scheme. To show that it is not altogether a wild idea, I will read a telegraphic despatch from Great Britain which I noticed in a recent paper. On the 8th of this month I noticed in the Mail the following despatch:—"Irish Lands Mortgage Bank project—the establishment of a land mortgage bank, backed by the Government, is projected in the North of Ireland, to assist the occupiers of the soil to become owners of their farms." Now, Sir, in reference to the scheme, of course I desire to lay my views before the Committee, and to have the whole question considered and all the information we can possibly acquire obtained, so as to give this important question very careful consideration, in order that the Government may be in a position to know of any facts that can be obtained that they may not be in possession of at the present time. I may add that the Torrens system of transfer of land would be a very great boon, and would simplify any banking scheme of this kind very much indeed. I hope that the scheme may be carried out, as the expense would be thereby very much lessened. I do not imagine that our legal friends in the House will, perhaps, view with as much delight as I do the possibility that that law may come into effect. I know that it could be very easily, in my opinion, carried into effect in the Province of Ontario, for I do believe that, through our county council system, the titles of all the property in our counties could be obtained very cheaply and readily, so that the titles could be settled for all time to come. In the North West the Torrens system would be an immense boon, and this farmers' banking system, in co-operation with the Torrens system in that country, would be an immense boon to the agricultural population that is going into the North-West. I shall not detain the House any longer, but I do hope that this House will not consider this question in a light manner. I believe, Sir, that nothing can possibly conduce to the welfare of this country more than to afford our farmers better facilities for developing the wealth of the soil, and anything in that direction should be welcomed by those who desire to see this country prosper.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Speaker, the object sought for by the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Orton), if it can be accomplished, I think is worthy of every consideration, and, although it might at first appear to be somewhat of an impracticable scheme, it seems that others who have given a good deal of attention to banking business entertain the idea that it can be carried out. The Grangers—a very large class of the people, especially in Ontario, belonging to the agricultural class—also hold the same idea as the hon. member for Centre Wellington. Some two or three years ago they proposed a scheme for the purpose of raising money amongst farmers to lend to farmers, and, in their prospectus, I find that they proposed to lend at a much lower rate of interest than was demanded either by banks or by loan companies. They said that farmers were a distinct class, and could not afford to pay as high a rate of interest as those engaged in mercantile pursuits or in manufacturing or other lines, because they had only one return for their labour in the year. The crop had to be sown and then, after it was grown, it had to be cut and taken to market, and then they got the return once in the course of the year; consequently, the interest they paid ought to be at most a very low annual rate. I have no doubt that many hon. members of this House have given some attention to this, and have been disposed to invest money in farms. If they tried to rent any of those farms, they would be unable to realize more than 3 to 5 per cent. on the money invested, after setting apart a reasonable amount for fencing and for keeping the buildings in repair. If money invested in that line, by men with money to spare, cannot realize any more, it cannot be expected that farmers can exercise any more economy or greater prudence in the affairs of their homes that would enable them to realize more than men engaged in those lines of investment. Again, if a merchant is investing his money, though he may receive only a small rate of interest every time he turns it over, he has the advantage of turning it over three to four or five times in the course of the year; and, if he receives only 2 per cent., it amounts in the year to 8 or 10 per cent. The farmer is deprived of this. Again, it may be said that the security is not good, but I ask, if a merchant's security given to a bank is good, with the peculiar nature of his transactions, that he may be a rich man to-day and a poor man a week hence, is it not more probable that the security given by a farmer would be a great deal better, seeing that it is landed security and cannot change hands so readily and cannot be disposed of so easily as the property of men in other lines. I believe that, if any principle could be devised—I do not pretend to say the scheme is a practical one, but it seems it has been thought of by men who have been engaged in devising means for relieving the necessities of the agriculturists of the country, finding their returns annually were not sufficient to warrant them in paying the large amount of interest they are paying now to banks or loan companies—if this Committee could devise any means, or find any other way by which a banking system could be established that would give farmers their money at a lower rate of interest, it is worthy of every consideration, and I hope the hon. gentleman who has this in charge will continue, as he has in the past, to show an interest in behalf of the agricultural class in this country, and that he will finally accomplish something in the direction of being of great service to them, and ameliorating the hardships many of them have to contend with. The fact that the Grangers have taken it up shows that it may be made a success, and the fact that men in Ireland and England are proposing to-day to establish banks on a somewhat similar system—we have not the minutiae of their system before us, but it appears to be something of this sort—is presumptive evidence that there can be such a thing. I hope the hon. gentleman will go on with the Committee, and put the scheme in a practical shape, so as to be of use to that large and deserving class who represent the agriculturists of this country.

Mr. HESSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to express my views with reference to this very important question, and I think it will be conceded generally by the House that it is a very important question and worthy of the consideration of a deliberative body like this. I hope it will not be regarded by the House in a trivial way, and that they will not look upon it as a matter of very small consequence to the farming interest of this country. We know that it is the great interest of this country and will always remain so, and every facility that can be afforded to the toilers and workers on the farm and of the soil must ultimately be to the advantage of every business man and every citizen of the country. Now I hold that there is no basis, not even a gold basis, superior or even equal in any respect to that of the real estate of the country. There can be no better basis than that. Gold may be carried away, may be squandered, may be misappropriated by the parties entrusted with the management of it, but the freehold remains, if not to the original owner, at all events to the country; and it is, as my hon. friend the member for Centre Wellington says, true that a large amount of capital is invested in this way which is apparently lying idle and yet is in itself intrinsically of greater value than the gold. Now, Sir, if the crops fail, the result may be disastrous to the farmer, and compel him to go to some of the money institutions of the country and borrow at a high rate of interest which, instead of mending matters, only make them worse. He is compelled to go to some of those shaving institutions with the history of which, in very recent days, we are all supposed to know something. The farmer may borrow on good terms indeed, but it very often results in the loss of his farm, as the chartered banks do not like to discount farmers' notes. They prefer tradesmen's notes—that class of paper that they can turn over quickly, and that is not so likely to be renewed from time to time. But that kind of accommodation is not what the farmer wants. He wants accommodation that may help him through a bad harvest, and which may sometimes extend from year to year. As a rule, their capital is invested in real estate, in machinery, houses, and things of that sort—their whole capital is so locked up that they have not a dollar that can be deposited as the kind of security that the chartered banks are permitted to issue notes upon. They are in a difficult position; their farms are locked up, and they have only to rely upon the produce of their farms when sold, or to rent their farms for about 3 or 4 per cent. of their value. Now, Sir, if we will just take a glance at the position of the Province of Ontario with regard to its farming interest, we will be able to understand the question better. While the hon. member for Centre Wellington was making his remarks to the House, I made a little calculation which will enable me to show to the House that there is an immense amount of capital of the very best kind that could be given to the Government as security for the circulation of Dominion notes—which I hold the Government alone have a right to issue. There are about 440 townships in Ontario, leaving out towns and villages. I would average these at a value of about $2,000,000 each. The assessed value, as the hon. member for Centre Wellington says, might be a little over that; but, within my own knowledge, $3,500,000 or $4,000,000 is the assessed value of the townships in my own part of the country. But, for the sake of being within the mark, I will say $2,000,000. Multiply 440 townships by $2,000,000 each, and you have $880,000,000 worth of real estate for Ontario in farms alone. Now, suppose that only one-fourth of that number would be free—would be such a property as the Government might prefer to hold as security for this issue. One-fourth of $880,000,000 would be $220,000,000, as the property that would be free from all claims whatever. The owners of this property would be the absolute freeholders of the country; they would be the only portion of the farming community that would have sufficient confidence in this institution to become stockholders. I will assume that only one-fourth of the whole number would be counted as freeholders, without a mortgage on their property, and who might become stockholders in such a bank. That would reduce the amount to $55,000,000, a sum equal almost to the entire paid up capital of the chartered banks of the country. The entire paid up capital of these banks is a little less than $61,500,000. Now, when we come to deal with the chartered banks of the country, we shall see that they are not doing business upon a gold basis; and I have no hesitation in saying here, Mr. Speaker, that the theory that they are is a fallacious one, and I wish that hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House would divest their minds of that theory, and that proposition, that the business of the banks of Canada is being done upon a gold basis. No such thing exists. When you take the total liabilities of the banks, these liabilities ought to comprise their paid up capital, because every stockholder must feel that he is interested in that stock to the extent of his paid up capital, and that he may draw gold for it if he chooses. The circulation amounts to $34,000,000 of their paper issue; each holder of that feels that he is secure for his gold. Add to that the $61,000,000 of paid up capital, and you have $94,000,000 of liability to start upon, to the stockholders and billholders. Now, come to the depositors, and where are they? About $11,500,000 are deposited in the Dominion and chartered banks of Canada to-day; about $97,000,000, leaving out fractions, are deposited by the general public. Leaving out the paid up capital, if you do not wish to protect the stockholders, or to put them in the same position, of being secure for their gold if they chose to draw it, leaving that out of the question altogether, you have $142,000,000 of liabilities in gold. Now, Sir, it will be just as well for us to look this question squarely in the face. Let us remember that any day we may have such a state of things as that which existed in a bank whose case we were considering only a few days ago—a state of things which may exist even under the most careful management. Banks may, under bad management on the part of the directors, find it impossible to meet those liabilities if they are pressed, and they may be pressed, as any private individual may be pressed. In that case what will be the result? Mr. Speaker, the entire specie held by all these chartered banks is less than $6,500,000 to-day. If you call this $6,500,000 a firm basis for $142,000,000, leaving the poor stockholder out of the question altogether, I ask you if that is the kind of basis you want for a gold issue? If so, then I would prefer the farms as security. I say, that if we deal with these men as honest representatives should deal, who profess to have the farming community at heart, we should at least place them upon an equal footing with the chartered banks of the country. I believe my hon. friend from Centre Wellington will be satisfied with very much less. He does not ask that they should be permitted to issue their promise to pay, as is granted in the case of the chartered banks; and I quite concur with him there. I think that privilege should not be extended to the banks. I go further, and say that the Government ought, within a reasonable period, and from time to time, as it is possible, cause all the present bank circulation to be withdrawn and substituted by a Dominion note issue. That is an honest basis. Then the property of the public will be responsible for the circulation. Crises could never arise then, such as we have witnessed from time to time, when the depositors, under the influence of excitement or fear, have withdrawn their deposits. These emergencies could not arise if that bank circulation was entirely withdrawn. My hon. friend, the Finance Minister, would not be called upon to redeem that circulation by the people coming to him and demanding gold. There would be no other circulation to take its place. We have no gold circulation, and we might as well honestly face that fact. The hon. Finance Minister would not have five, or ten, or twenty million dollars of notes presented to him for redemption by the people: if they did it would be for the purpose of investing in Dominion bonds at 4 or 5 per cent. It would be only an exchange that they would be asked to make. What is the position of the tradesmen and the merchants of the country to-day, elsewhere? The Government do not find any difficulty when they buy their foreign bills of exchange. It is well known that those who do business abroad are obliged to buy at the chartered banks or at private banks, sterling bills to pay drafts abroad. That can be done with Dominion notes as well as Bank of Montreal bills. It has been suggested that if I went to Japan to buy a cargo of tea or to the West Indies to buy a cargo of sugar, I could not carry out the transactions with Bank of Montreal bills or the best bills ever issued by private banks; but would have to buy exchange, which would depend on the value of exchange in other markets. The difficulty which the hon. Finance Minister may have to face some day is in danger of being greatly intensified. The Act of Parliament compels private banks to hold a certain percentage of Dominion notes, to the extent of 40 per cent. of their entire circulation. There are from ten and a quarter to ten and a half millions of Dominion notes locked up in the chartered banks of Canada. What is to prevent those great monetary institutions from accumulating Dominion notes by issuing their own bills in lieu of them, until some fine morning they come and ask the Finance Minister to redeem a large portion of that circulation. That could never arise if they were compelled, like other persons, to deal with their own resources and not trade on the credit of the country. It may be said that farmers would not be capable of managing banking institutions. What are the facts with respect to the private banks in Canada to-day? They are quite as successful as the chartered banks; but they are of that class of institutions which are more likely to shave a little, and those banks will take paper and securities which other banks will not accept. There are sharp business men at the head of those institutions, and to a large extent they trade on their own capital, unless they have the confidence of the public, and deposits are made with them; while, at the same time, they have no power to issue a circulation. That class of men might very profitably be absorbed into the management of farmers' banks, and if the Government took the responsibility of issuing Dominion notes for the circulation of a farmers' bank, under a charter granted by this House, these gentlemen would be found to give good satisfaction in the management. I feel the time must come, and the propositions recently placed before the House show its necessity for the Government to make a new departure. We can never look forward for the time to arrive here, under the present condition of things, when we shall have an honest gold basis for the circulation of the country. So long as we are exporting $7,500,000, the balance must go out either in the shape of increased indebtedness abroad or in sterling bills or gold, which is equivalent to them. A new loan will be placed on the market shortly, according to the proposition made, and the effect will be to increase still more the demand on our gold resources. The time has come when that should be changed, and the Government instead of going abroad to borrow money, should take the securities of our own people and not borrow another dollar abroad. The loan of $22,000,000 should be in Dominion notes, and the Government should have 5 per cent. profit out of it. I am not afraid to say that the Government should obtain as good terms as wholesale men and buy exchange for that circulation; that it should be provided here, and it would be the best circulation ever offered. It is but a short time since I made a trip in the United States. I took Bank of Montreal bills to Chicago; but the people there did not want them, for they said they could not look into the bank's affairs and see whether the managers were doing their business in a proper way or not, and whether the circulation was good. I then pulled out Dominion $2 notes, which were accepted, for the Dominion is pledged to redeem them as the United States are pledged to redeem the circulation of their country. When you come down to private banks, the matter is entirely different. As the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) has mentioned, the Government should issue the paper and take mortgage as security, and that security would be better than gold, and the farmers would then be enabled to handle their crops, because every farmer might hold stock up to 50 per cent. of the assessed value of his farm, and would have the advantage of obtaining 3 per cent. interest on the stock, which is almost equivalent to the rental of a farm. Again, a poor, unfortunate farmer, who is compelled to borrow money, either from misfortune or bad management, would be placed in a better position. I suppose four out of every five farmers in the newer parts of the country, when disastrous crops have been the result of the year's operations, have to borrow money under very trying circumstances. They cannot go to the banks and obtain it at 7 per cent., or secure it at that rate from private individuals, except in wealthy communities, but have to pay the banks high rates. Those parties who own land could give such satisfactory security to a farmers' bank as would cause them to lend money at 5 per cent., and this would enable them, probably, to redeem their bonds, and place themselves in a proper position, and not sacrifice the fruits of their toil. I hope the Government will grant the Committee, and that the result of the Committee's efforts may be in some way to devise a scheme which will assist in giving to this country better security than exists to-day in the hands of the chartered banks. We may fairly say that when British money lenders loan out their funds to farmers here, and pay agents commissions, we should be prepared to take the same security. I hope the Government will allow the motion to pass, and that the Committee's report will be such as will provide a boon to the farming community.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have listened with great interest to this debate, and especially to the speech of my hon. friend who moved the resolution; but I must confess that I am not yet convinced by the arguments which I have heard. However, as I am not a financier, I have no objection to our having a full opportunity of examining into this subject, but I do not think we can agree to have a Special Committee on the question, when we have a General Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. I think to that Committee the subject can be safely referred, more especially as my hon. friend who moved the resolution and the hon. gentleman who spoke last have joined to this subject of the establishment of agricultural banks, secured on the real property of the country, a scheme for the alteration of the present general banking system—in fact, calling on the Government to assume the whole of the paper circulation of the country and become the bankers of the Dominion, as well for all purposes as for agricultural banks. The subjects are so closely allied that they cannot be treated by two separate committees; they can be as well dealt with by one large Committee. The hon. gentleman who moved the resolution is a member of the Banking Committee, and I have no doubt, after the instructive discussion we have had, that the hon. gentleman will move in the Banking Committee to have a special sub-committee to examine and report upon this branch of the subject, and that the general committee will be only too glad to grant a sub-committee, and to make my hon. friend its chairman. On the report of the sub-committee being made, the whole subject will, no doubt, be fully discussed and considered by the Banking Committee. I hope my hon. friend will be satisfied with this statement and will not press his motion.

Mr. ORTON. I am satisfied.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not understand that the Committee on Banking and Commerce can deal with questions which are not referred to them by this House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The whole question of banking and commerce is referred to the Banking Committee.

Mr. BLAKE. No, no. Only such bills as are sent by this House.

Motion withdrawn.

DELAYS IN THE TRANSMISSION OF NEWSPAPERS AND PERIODICALS.

Mr. SPROULE in moving for copies of all correspondence or complaints to the Postmaster General relative to delays or neglect of postmasters in transmitting newspapers and periodicals to the office of destination, since January 1st, 1883, said: I do not make this motion so much for the purpose of getting the returns printed and laid before the House, as to draw the attention of the hon. Postmaster General to the fact that numerous complaints are being made, from time to time, on this subject. I find in my part of the country that every week or two complaints are made in some of the papers that in certain post offices papers are not delivered to subscribers. Others say that postmasters think that papers and periodicals and other printed matter, are scarcely worth attending to like letters, and that consequently they remain in the post office for a length of time before they are delivered. My attention has been drawn to the matter by several publishers in my part of the country, and some of them have supposed that if the hon. Postmaster General's attention was drawn to it he might send a circular to postmasters generally, which would have the desired effect. I believe that plan was adopted to meet similar complaints in the United States, and that it had a good effect. If, as I am informed, it would involve considerable trouble to get copies of this correspondence, I would content myself with simply calling the hon. Postmaster General's attention to the subject and leaving it in his hands.

Mr. CARLING. I am not aware that any correspondence has taken place with regard to the distribution of newspapers, but as the hon. gentleman has drawn my attention to the matter, I will have it enquired into, and, if an evil exists, will endeavour to have it remedied.

Motion agreed to.

KINGSVILLE HARBOUR WORKS.

Mr. LISTER, in moving for a copy of all petitions respecting the Kingsville Harbour Works and all communications and correspondence between the Government and any person or persons relating to the same, said: I may say, in the first place, that I make no charge against the Government as to the subject-matter of the motion. What I have to say is, that upon information received from that part of the country, I am led to believe that the expenditure at Kingsville is altogether an improper expenditure. I am led to believe that the Government, before the expenditure was undertaken at all, had been petitioned by the people of Leamington, and by the masters of vessels, asking the Government to make the proposed expenditure there instead of at Kingsville. I am told that the expenditure at Kingsville will not be of any practical benefit to the owners of vessels or to vessel men. I am given to understand that the hon. gentlemen who represent the North and South Ridings of Essex, instead of considering the advantage of the owners and captains of vessels, were influenced by political considerations—that, for the purpose of benefiting these hon. gentlemen in their elections, the public interest was overlooked, and the works were commenced at Kingsville instead of at Leamington. When the papers come down, I may have an opportunity of speaking further on this subject. I trust that this charge is not true; but it seems to me from my informant's letter, that the evidence tends very strongly to that conclusion.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). When the papers come down, I am of the opinion, from what I know of the subject, that the hon. gentleman will never bring the subject up again in this House, because, after he has examined the papers and knows the facts, he will not have the audacity to get up and presume to make such a charge as he dares to make this evening. He will then find that it has been upon the recommendations of engineers, covering several years, that Kingsville has been preferred to any other point. He will find that the greatest pains have been taken to ascertain the best harbour. He will find that it would have cost six times the amount to construct a breakwater at Leamington than it will at Kingsville. He will find that Leamington is too much exposed to be of any use as a harbour of refuge, but that, owing to the natural bar at Kingsville, a very good harbour of refuge can be constructed there at a very small expense. It is immaterial to me, as the member for North Essex, whether the harbour be at Leamington or at Kingsville, or anywhere else. It was at my instance that it was placed at Kingsville; but if I had wished to serve my friend, the hon. member for South Essex, I would have had it at Leamington, where it would have been of much service to him, and the fact of its being at Kingsville has been an injury to the hon. member for South Essex. When the hon. gentleman sees the papers, I am satisfied that his mind will be quite set at rest as to whether or not there was any political intrigue in connection with that harbour.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken uses very strong language indeed when he talks about audacity. He seeks to take the responsibility for these improvements off the hon. member for South Essex, and seems to assume it himself, in order, if possible, I suppose, to prevent the feeling which exists against these works from turning against the hon. member from South Essex. As I stated, when I made this motion, I did not do it from any personal knowledge of the work which I had myself. It may be that it has been properly done or improperly done; when the papers come down they will show. In the meantime, I do not think that the hon. gentleman was justified in using the word audacity. I suppose any hon. member in this House has a perfect right to bring any matter he thinks proper before the attention of the House. I am sure the hon. member for South Essex must be very grateful to the hon. member for North Essex for taking from his shoulders the responsibility of this job, if job it is. I can only say that the hon. member for North Essex seems to take great interest in the affairs of South Essex. I know that before the election he promised the people of South Essex that if they would support the Conservative candidate they would get a post office. Strange to say, a post office has been commenced. So it seems that the hon. member takes great interest in the public affairs of the South Riding.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). If the hon. gentleman had been desirous of obtaining information, he would have waited to make his attack after he had obtained the papers.

SICK AND DISTRESSED MARINERS.

Mr. KAULBACH, in moving for copies of all Orders in Council, or departmental orders, and all communications and correspondence respecting the passage of the Act 45 Vic., chap. 19, of the Acts of 1882, entitled, "An Act to exempt Vessels employed in Fishing from the payment of Duties for the Relief of Sick and Distressed Mariners," and all correspondence for the repeal of this Act, said: I regret having to occupy the time of this House with any comments upon this motion; but in the interests of the fishermen of this Dominion, who have suffered in some instances very severely, I am constrained to offer some few remarks to show how unfairly this class of people have been dealt with by the amendment of the Act of 1868. Since 1868, and previous to the passage of the Act amending the same, fishermen, as well as mariners engaged in foreign trade, were entitled to the benefits of the Sick and Distressed Mariners Fund, which they considered an inestimable boon, and which privilege they exercised whenever occasion required. But through the intervention of unwise promptings on the part of some person, with the view to economy, and at the same time to prevent American fishing vessels with sick seamen entering the ports of the Dominion, paying the required sick mariners tonnage dues, and thereby obtaining the benefits alike with our own fishermen, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries was induced by 45 Vic., chap. 19, of the Act of 1882, to amend the same by an Act intituled "An Act to exempt vessels employed in fishing from the payment of duties for the relief of Sick and Distressed Mariners." By using the word "exempt"—only a polite and mild way of putting it—little, it appeared, was thought of the amendment at the time, but when this Act was brought to practical use, it was found to be extremely harsh, restrictive and oppressive. I would give some instances as to the position in which some of the poor sick and distressed fishermen of my county were placed last year in consequence of the restrictions of the Act referred to; but the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries having given so favourable an answer to my enquiry on the notice papers today, when I submitted it to the House, he stating that a Bill would be prepared to meet the requirements sought for, and submitted to the House for approval, I will not occupy the time of the House with further comments, except to say that had the would-be representative who occupied a seat in this House last year, discharged his duty fairly and honestly in the interest of the mariner and fisherman, he representing, or pretending to represent, the largest and finest fishing constituency in the Dominion (I mean Lunenburg) gone to the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and stated his case, he (the hon. Minister) would, in his willingness—which he has ever exercised to do what is right—have given as a result a favourable answer, and the fishermen of this Dominion—not alone Lunenburg—would not have been inconvenienced to the extent they were last season, but their sick would have had the medical treatment and kind attendance the marine hospitals offer to the sick and distressed mariner. The party who came here last year, I have no hesitation in saying, occupied that seat most illegally, as was proved by the court in October last, at the trial before Mr. Justice Rigby in the Superior Court. He occupied that seat against the wishes of the people, not having a majority of votes—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. KAULBACH. The question was asked—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman will please confine himself to the question.

Mr. KAULBACH. I think I am quite in order when I say to you that I am desirous of placing this matter in a position to show that had the party representing the constituency of Lunenburg brought the matter to the notice of this House, the request would have been granted in the way I mention, he having been placed in that position by a partisan judge.

Mr. SPEAKER. I hope the hon. gentleman will accept my ruling and confine himself to the question.

Mr. KAULBACH. I bow to your decision, Mr. Speaker.

LIGHTS ON THE ST. LAWRENCE.

Mr. VALIN, in moving for copies of correspondence, in relation to the placing of gas floating lights in the River St. Lawrence, below Quebec, for the better guidance of steamers and sailing vessels navigating the said river, said: Not only the Province of Quebec, but the other Provinces, are interested in this important question, and I hope, therefore, that what I have to say will receive the attention of the House. A large sailing vessel or steamer coming from sea, on arriving opposite Pointe des Monts, experiences difficulty in navigation, owing to the fact that the great attraction from the iron deposits in that vicinity has a considerable effect on the compass. It will, therefore, be obvious that owing to this, considerable risk is run by vessels as they pass Bic Island, and proceed up the St. Lawrence, passing White Island, Red Island and Groen Island, where there are dangerous reefs. Thence, they come to St. Roch's traverse, where the channel is very narrow and dangerous, and higher up many places have to be passed where the water is very shallow. Suppose, for instance, a large vessel like the Parisian, with from 800 to 1,000 passengers on board, is making this passage during a very dark night and with a heavy sea, so that the buoys are invisible, how is the poor pilot to guide the vessel between these buoys through these shallow waters when it is impossible for him to see them? With the gas floating buoys all danger from that cause would be obviated, as they would show very plainly the water edge, thus enabling the pilot to judge the distance and avoid the bad leakages that to day very often take place. Often the poor pilot is brought before the board and has no defence to offer, because his only reliance was on the lead which he had ordered to be cast overboard by one of the sailors, who often has not reported correctly the number of fathoms. The poor pilot consequently is condemned to lose his branch and rendered unable to support his family. Sometimes he is suspended for months and sometimes for years. The safety of our river would be greatly increased by the establishment of these gas buoys. Large steamers, such as the Allan's, which are not insured at all, in order to give confidence to the passengers, and some of which cost as high as $450,000, are greatly exposed owing to the want of those improvements which are now the order of the day in England and elsewhere. We should place these improvements on our rivers in order to give confidence to the underwriters, who always believe they have a very bad risk in the St. Lawrence, and by placing these gas buoys we would destroy that bad reputation. I hope, therefore, the Government will give due consideration to the matter, and see that these gas floating buoys for the guidance of these large vessels are placed in the St. Lawrence.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In the absence of the hon. the Minister of Marine, I may say to my hon. friend the member for Montmorency that the correspondence in reference to the placing of the gas floating lights in the River St. Lawrence will be brought down. I must say that the hon. gentleman takes a great interest in these matters, with great propriety. He understands the position that these vessels are in when they go up the St. Lawrence, but he must not forget, on the other hand, that the Government, as well as Parliament, has provided for the lighting of the St. Lawrence, especially in the last fifteen years, in such a way as to reduce the liability of these vessels to wreck to a minimum. At all events, if these floating lights are considered better than the others, or if, instead of gas, it might be electric floating lights, of course the Department of Marine will give to this matter all consideration, and the hon. gentleman may rest assured that the Department will not fail to do its duty in that direction.

Motion agreed to.

LIGHTS ON THE ST. LAWRENCE RIVER.

Mr. VALIN (Translation), in moving for copies of all petitions or papers asking for the placing of lights on the River St. Lawrence, north of the Island of Orleans, in the county of Montmorency, in order to protect and facilitate navigation during dark nights, as there are many boulders in that part of the river, which is visited by a great number of vessels doing the local traffic, said: Mr. Speaker, I hope the Government will give to that part of the River St. Lawrence the few lights that are absolutely necessary when nights are dark. Sea-going vessels do not come to this part of the river; the traffic goes on the other side of the channel, opposite the Island of Orleans, but we have a large population on this side—that is to say, north of the Island of Orleans. We have a great many boats which are used to carry building stone to Quebec. These boats are constantly moving up and down the river, so that, night and day, very often, these boats so laden with stone, are exposed to serious dangers, and it will be easily conceived that such a boat is soon broken up and shattered to pieces if she meets with an accident, for I know that at that spot the shoals are very wide and covered with boulders. The poor boatman frequently sees his craft, which composes his whole property, completely destroyed because he has not been able to guide it safely through this intricate channel. For this reason he needs a little protection. Moreover, we have in that part of the river a great number of steamboats doing service between Quebec and Ste. Anne, this last place being a resort of pilgrims, visited by large numbers of people. In fact, last year over 80,000 pilgrims visited this place, and on one day we had the sorrow to see a steamboat stranded on the boulders, and so badly shattered that it could not be repaired and was a total loss. It is very true that most of the steamboats which travel in these parts are doing day service, but if it should happen that they should have to pass there during the night, such steamboats would be exposed to such accidents as may befall vessels of any other kind. Therefore, I hope that the Government will take into consideration the motion I now make and that they will be pleased to grant our request.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation). The two last lines of the motion of the hon. member will have to be taken off, as they express an opinion. Such remarks go very well in his speech, but not as well in his motion. I must tell the hon. member that his request will be granted. I have observed that he had pretty well strewn his speech with big boulders, probably in order to throw them at my back while I was listening to him. These boulders come under my Department, and have nothing whatever to do with the Department of Marine. I am happy to see that my hon. friend has only used imaginary boulders, and that he has called my attention on this matter. He may feel sure that I shall not forget what he has just said, and that if anything can be done in the direction pointed out by him, it will be done.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. IRVINE, in moving for copies of all correspondence which passed between any Department of the Government or member thereof, and any person whomsoever in relation to the appointment of James H. Jacques and Charles Kearney, of Carleton County, New Brunswick, both or either of them, to positions in the Civil Service of Canada; and also, copies of all correspondence and enquiries made by the Government in relation to their positions in the Civil Service, said: I moved a resolution similar to this on the 10th of April, 1883, and I received the following answer on the 4th of February instant:—

“In returning to you the enclosed Address from the House of Commons, bearing date 10th April last, calling for correspondence re appointments of James H. Jacques and Charles Kearney, in the Civil Service, I beg leave to state that there is no correspondence in relation thereto on record in this Department.

(Signed) “J. JOHNSON,
“Commissioner of Customs.”

In reference to the appointment of Mr. Jacques, the reason I moved last year was that the office was created by the hon. Mr. Mackenzie's Government, and a Liberal was appointed to it by that Administration. During the time he had that position, the Conservatives in the county declared that the office was a sinecure, and, in some way which I am not able to declare, the Liberal resigned; the office remained vacant for a time, I cannot state how long, but the present incumbent was appointed by the present Administration, and he is a Conservative. I beg leave to say that the Conservatives and Liberals in the county now agree that the office is a necessary one, and all are agreed that the officer who was removed was a very good man, and all are agreed that the present incumbent is a capable one. We are all agreed upon that, that the office is necessary, only it is now filled by a Conservative instead of a Liberal. I can promise this, so far as I am concerned, that I am perfectly satisfied with the way in which the duties of the office are being performed, and when my party get into power, which they will very soon, judging from the result of the York election, I will not remove him or recommend his being removed. There is another sign that I see on the political horizon, that the political crib will soon be empty, and the Tories never like to feed at an empty crib. In reference to Mr. Kearney, I have a stronger objection to make. On the 10th April, last year, I made the statement that the office was a sinecure, that there was no need of the appointment. I make the same statement here now and, if he is not removed, I will make it next year; and, if he is not removed, I will, if I am spared, make it the year after. I have not the power to make recommendations to the present Administration, but I have the power to protest when they abuse the power invested in them, and by virtue of the power vested in me as the lawfully elected member for the county, I protested last year and I protest again now. The grounds of my protestation are that it is not necessary to have an officer there. I live within four miles of this very road, and I know that the distance between the American boundary and the St. John River is about eight miles. As I said last year, the Mackenzie Administration created an office, and appointed a collector of Customs as well as a preventive officer, and gave him a salary of $300. In 1882 the Government collected $700 there; and in 1883, I think, they collected $500. They give this gentleman, appointed by the Mackenzie Administration, $300, and they give the gentleman appointed by the present Administration $200—I think in the whole $500, just the amount collected; so it is a square thing. I have not any objection, because I think the money might just as well go that way as any other. That is not exactly my strongest point. I made the statement last year that he was the most extensive merchant in the village, and I do not fear contradiction in that statement. The hon. Minister of Customs did not seem to be aware of that fact; he did not know the gentleman he appointed, and, strange to say, there is no correspondence in the office. I do not know what little bird made the recommendation for the appointment, but some person did make the recommendation. Last year the hon. Minister of Customs gave me the following answer, which I find on page 507 of the first volume of the Hansard :—

"But, I must confess, this is the first time that I have heard that this gentleman is one of the largest importing merchants of that village, and that is a matter, I assure him, that is worthy of consideration."

Now, I take it for granted that, owing to the great amount of energy displayed by the hon. Minister of Customs, it certainly did not take him a year to ascertain whether this gentleman is just what I stated him to be or not; and if he disputes my statement, all he has to do is to consult the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue, his own colleague in the Government, who knows that gentleman as well as I do. I make the statement here again, without fear of successful contradiction, that this gentleman is doing the largest business of any man in the village, and I say it is an injustice, a glaring injustice, first, to appoint him, and secondly, to keep him in office after the exposé I had made. It is a flagrant piece of injustice, an outrage on the rights of the people there, to keep a merchant in that position. I have not power to remove him, but I have power to protest, and I will continue to hurl my protest at the hon. Minister as long as this man remains in that office. You can keep him in if you like, but there is a limit to your power; for as there is an end to all things, there must be an end to your power. You can keep him in if you like, but I dare you to do it. I use that strong language, and I shall continue to protest till you dismiss him. He is a wealthy man—worth more property than I am. He was not appointed because he was poor, but he was appointed just before my election, for a certain purpose—a purpose, however, which he did not accomplish. And still you keep him in for a paltry sum of $200 a year—a man that reckons his wealth by tens of thousands. In return to the enquiries, I shall be glad to see the papers in reference to the enquiries made by the Government on the subject last year. I would be glad to have my statement contradicted—no; I would not, for I know it is incontrovertible.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. BLAKE moved for a statement: 1. Of the cost of the first forty miles west of Callander, built by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company; 2. Of the mileage, built by, and the payments in detail, with dates, made to the construction company in respect of the line west beyond the above forty miles to Sudbury Junction or beyond; 3. The cost of any work done by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company on this section since the cancellation of the contract with the construction company up to 31st December last, and of such cost up to the date of the accounts given to the Minister of Railways; 4. Of the names of the persons with whom the contracts of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for such work were made; 5. Like particulars as in numbers 2, 3 and 4, in respect of the line from Port Arthur, eastward; 6. Statement of the cost of the Algoma Mills Branch, divided into the usual headings under which railway construction works are divided. He said: I suppose the House will agree that fuller information than has been already brought down, is material for us to have. The first branch of this proposed address is for a statement of the cost of the first forty miles west of Callander, built by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The hon. gentleman, in the interesting financial statement he made to the House, lumped together the whole of the expenditure upon what was called the Nipissing division, thus including the expenditure made by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company before giving the contract to the construction company, with the expenditure made under the contract with the construction company, and consequently made it impossible for us to ascertain, either what the company's own work cost for that forty miles, or what amount was paid to the construction company. The second division of this address is "for the mileage built by, and the payments in detail, with dates, made to the construction company in respect of the line west beyond the above forty miles to Sudbury Junction, or beyond." We are not informed of the extent to which the sums, which the hon. gentleman specified as having been expended on the Nipissing division, are added to the completed line, and the extent to which they are due. Therefore, we do not know what the cost of the completed line, beyond the forty miles, is. Then it is also necessary, in order to understand what was paid to the construction company, to know "the cost of any work done by the Canadian Pacific Railway on this section since the cancellation of the contract with the construction company, up to the 31st of December last." There is some confusion between the financial statement and that which was laid on the Table of the House. The latter mentions the date of the 21st of December, while the statement made by the hon. Minister the other day, in one instance, at any rate, brought the payments up to a more recent date. Therefore, it seems impossible to reach conclusions without obtaining a statement—if there be any variation—of what the amount of payment was up to the date of the company's own statement of the 31st of December; and of the other statement—if there be any variation—up to the date at which the hon. Minister made his statement to the House. Then I ask for the names of the persons with whom the contracts for said work were made. I find that has been omitted—although I do not say by error of the officer, because I am not certain, but it may have been my own error. It is material, and the House ought to be informed what contracts have been made by the Government itself on other portions of the work, and copies of the contract are also material for obvious reasons, and for another reason which may not be so obvious. It was but to-day that I learned, upon what I believe to be reliable information, that one, at any rate, of the contracts which have been made upon either the Lake Superior or the Nipissing division, contained a bonus for that rapid construction of which we heard a good deal of talk, of half a million of money. And, as we have been told that no appreciable increase in the cost of this enterprise is occasioned by the rapidity with which it has been, and is proposed to be, constructed, it would be not unimportant to see the contracts, to ascertain whether they contain a large provision—as I am informed this one does—for extra price in respect to extra speed. Then I ask for the same particulars as in Nos. 2, 3 and 4, in respect to the line from Port Arthur, eastward. The other day I was desirous of knowing how much was claimed by the construction company, and what like particulars as those just described, as applicable to the Nipissing division, are applicable to this other division. Then I ask for a statement of the cost of the Algoma Mills branch, divided into the usual headings, under which railway construction works are divided. There we have a different piece of work built by the company itself, of which the hon. gentleman has given us the total costs. That total cost sums up to about $20,300 per mile. Of course, we are familiar with the usual sub-headings, into which railway construction works are divided—earthwork, for instance, ties, building culverts, rails, &c. No doubt the accounts have been kept in the usual way, and we can ascertain what the general run of that work has been with much more accuracy and satisfaction by obtaining the division. That is important to us, because as far as one can judge from the general statements made with regard to the work on Lake Superior and Nipissing divisions, a very considerable portion of the mileage which has been constructed, and a very considerable portion which is yet to be constructed, will be not very unlike, in point of cost, to the Algoma Mills branch, running through a somewhat similar country, being in the same vicinity, so to speak, and being somewhat of the same character. To know the divisions of the sub-heads will be, I say, not unimportant. I have endeavoured, as far as possible, from the very imperfect statements which we now have, to ascertain what amounts have been paid to the construction company upon the Nipissing and Superior divisions. For that purpose I have estimated, in absence of that information which I asked from the hon. gentleman to furnish, that forty miles west from Callander has been built by the company, and I compute the cost at the same rate as for the Algoma Mills branch. Deducting that amount, $812,000 from $3,250,000, and $2,300,000, which are the sums the hon. gentleman gives as the total expenditure on the Nipissing and Superior divisions, I have arrived at the conclusion that about $4,750,000 will be the amount paid the construction company, subject however to a further deduction, as to the amount of which we have no idea. How much of the total sum has been expended by the Company itself since the construction company ceased its operations, I cannot make a conjecture until this return is granted. Inasmuch as the operations of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and particularly its operations with the construction company, are of very considerable importance to us, who are now called upon to decide whether a case has been made out for the continuance of this work under the Company's supervision and by Government assistance, to a very large amount, I do not assume for a moment that the hon. Minister will decline to accede to the proposal that we shall be further informed, as this motion proposes we shall be.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not object to the passage of this motion, and I will obtain, as far as I am able, the information asked for. I do not know how far I shall be able to comply with the wishes of the hon. gentleman in obtaining the information asked for; all that can be obtained will be laid before the House.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE moved for statements: 1. Of the mileage built by and the payments in detail, with dates, to the construction company, in respect of the Canadian Pacific Railway line, from the point forty-five miles east of the Saskatchewan going westward; 2. Of the cost to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company of the line from the above point to Calgary, and also from Calgary to the summit of the Rocky Mountains; 3. Of the estimated cost to complete that part of the Canadian Pacific Railway left unfinished by the construction company, between Callander and Port Arthur, and, separately, of the equipment for this part; 4. Of the estimated mileage cost of this part divided into the usual headings, and that of the very heavy section of 100 miles so divided; 5. Like statement as in numbers (3) and (4) to complete that part left unfinished between the Rocky Mountains and Kamloops. He said: The construction company's contract for the western part of the line terminates at the point mentioned in the first sub-section. We have no details at all about the division of the work from Winnipeg west. The hon. Minister gave us a sum of $17,530,000 in round numbers, as the expenditure of the Company from Winnipeg westward, that is to the summit of the Rockies; but there is no division at all of that great mileage and very large amount. This motion proposes to obtain what the mileage built has been and what payments have been made to the construction company in regard to that part; and another motion I am about to make, will deal with the part east of that point. I ask for a division of the amount paid by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to the construction company, from the point forty-five miles east of the Saskatchewan to Calgary, and also from Calgary to the summit of the Rocky Mountains. As I am informed the part of the line from the eastern point to which I have referred, to Calgary, may be treated as a prairie line. Within a few miles of Calgary, some two miles, there occurs some heavy rock cutting, and although there is some very easy work between that and the summit, yet, upon the whole, the character of the work may be said to somewhat change there, and I thought it was not an inconvenient division to make of the question of expense. So much with regard to the statements of the past. The first and second portions of the motion simply require information as to what has passed. The third, fourth and fifth portions—are with respect to estimates, and these are very important. The hon. Minister has stated to the House that $27,000,000 is the estimate which is made by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company as the cost to complete the whole unfinished Pacific Railway, including the two main portions—that portion from the point beyond Sudbury Junction to Port Arthur, and from the summit of the Rocky Mountains to Kamloops. He has said that this sum includes all equipment; but we have no statement as to what amount is estimated for equipment, and as it now seems the $27,000,000 is rather that portion which belongs to construction rather than to equipment, and is divided between those two great sections—the section whose eastern terminus is a considerable distance to the east of Port Arthur, and the section whose western terminus is at the summit of the Rocky Mountains. It is obvious that those amounts were lumped together. They are different works with many hundreds of miles between them, but the estimates have been separately made. Those estimates are of very great consequence. Upon them depends, to a considerable extent, the decision which will be reached as to the financial standing of the Company, as it is, and as it is proposed to make it, under the proposals of the Administration. It has already been pointed out to the House, on more than one occasion, that the estimates in gross given to us without any detail, vary very considerably from the estimate made some ten or twelve months ago, of the cost of those works, and therefore it is of more importance that we should know what these estimates are. So far as I can judge of the estimates to the west of the summit, they must be of the vaguest possible character; for I do not believe that the road has been located through the Selkirks for a considerable portion of the distance, and what description of estimate it is, which has been submitted, and based on what principles, it is difficult to conceive. My own conjecture, from the meagre information which has been furnished to us, is that to the portion of the work in the prairie country east of the point at which the construction contract commences, at a cost of $14,000 per mile, there is left of the construction company's work in the western section $9,130,000; of which the part to Calgary might have cost something over $3,500,000; from Calgary to the summit, $3,000,000, leaving $2,500,000 unaccounted for. As my hon. friend from Huron pointed out the other day, the estimate at present given as the estimate, and the estimate under the contract with the construction company, differed by something like $15,000,000 or $18,000,000—the contract with the construction company affording results for unfinished work for $16,000,000 or $18,000,000 more than the unfinished work, it is said at present, will cost. These figures are large, and it is important that they should be checked. It is important that the material from which a conclusion could be reached, should be furnished us. The hon. gentleman said, with reference to the motion which has just been passed, that he would let it go, and he would procure the information if possible; but I need not tell the hon. gentleman that it is quite possible for him to get the information, as such returns are ordered to be furnished by the Railway Company, and, as the Railway Company is a suppliant for aid, whatever Parliament requires in the way of information before giving that aid should surely be vouchsafed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have only to repeat what I said before, that I have no objection to the motion, and I will do the best I can to obtain the information required, as early as possible. I may say, however, that I do not consider, in the least degree, that the Resolutions before the House at all depend on any answer that can be given, or upon a proper consideration of any answer that might be given, in response to these motions. The Resolutions have not been submitted to the House on estimates made by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company at all. Before the Canadian Pacific Railway Company intimated to me what their estimate was of the work remaining to be done, I had taken up that question with the Chief Engineer and had gone carefully into it, and it is on the statement of the officers of my own Department that these resolutions are based—statements upon the accuracy of which I have the best reason to rely, because I am in the judgment of the House when I say there has never been a Minister of Public Works or a Minister of Railways who has found the estimates of his engineer more thoroughly and constantly verified from year to year, than I have found the estimates made by Mr. Schreiber, in relation to the Canadian Pacific Railway. I challenge, without fear of contradiction, a comparison between the accuracy of his estimates and the reliability of their character with the estimates made by any Government or Minister in regard to any public work. It is upon that which I relied in accepting the estimates which I have accepted from the Canadian Pacific Railway. I have not arrived at these conclusions altogether from information which they have furnished to me, but because I found, on the closest examination, that they were verified by my own officers—those who had the best means of obtaining information on the subject. I should have felt it necessary to have gone into much more accurate and extensive details on the statement of the Company, if it had not been that I had better means, as I considered, of arriving at a conclusion than depending on the statements of any parties who might be interested in making those statements. I repeat, that I shall take pleasure in furnishing, as early as possible, all the information which the Department can furnish, and in obtaining, further, that which is not in the possession of the Government, so far as we are able to do so.

Mr. MULOCK. I am glad that the hon. Minister of Railways has said that the Department has certain data showing upon what these estimates are based. I would, with the consent of the mover, ask that the motion be amended by adding the words "and all data on which the said respective estimates, as to cost of construction, are based." It will be interesting to know whether these data are from some actual surveys or from something of a vaguer character.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would be glad to know from the hon. Minister of Railways if we are to understand from his recent statement that Mr. Schreiber has made a full examination of the western section which is to be built to Kamloops; if I remember aright. Heretofore, most of us have been under the impression that no final survey of that route has been made. Are we to understand from the hon. Minister that we were in error; that an actual location survey has been made, and that Mr. Schreiber has estimated, with the minuteness which is usual in such cases, the cost of constructing the road from the summit of the Rocky Mountains to Kamloops?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman knew perfectly well, when he asked the question, that no such location survey has been made.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That shows how much the estimates are worth.

Mr. BLAKE. I suppose there is no objection to the amendment?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

Mr. BLAKE. I have only this observation to make to the hon. Minister—that I did not at all intend this proposal with reference to estimates to be confined to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's estimates. I, myself, attach very much more importance to the estimates to which he has alluded. Nor was I ignorant, or forgot the fact he stated, that he had estimates in his own office on the subject. The hon. gentleman will observe that the estimate he gave to the House was an approximate estimate of about $27,000,000. My anxiety was to have that amount divided, so as to learn how much belonged to the Rocky Mountain section, how much to the other part, how much to equipment, and how much to construction. Therefore, I acceded to the amendment, and hope we shall get the information which is in the hon. Minister's control.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE moved for statements: 1. Of the mileage cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway line for the 615 miles west of Winnipeg to a point forty-five miles east of the Saskatchewan; 2. Of the mileage cost of each 100 miles of this part going westward, separately stated; 3. Of the mileage cost of the above, divided into the usual headings; 4. Of the names of the contractors for any works on this part; 5. Copies of the contract for such works, including Shepperd & Langdon's. He said: Analyzing the hon. Minister's statement with reference to the branches, I find that he states that 269 miles of branches altogether have been completed, of which ninety-three miles belong to the Algoma branch, leaving 176 miles to the North-West. It is stated also that there is another amount of mileage under construction, but there is no information, in connection with the sum which the hon. gentleman states is for the branches: as to how much is applicable to the part under construction, and how much to the part which has been completed, assuming that the whole amount, $1,882,000, is applicable to the 176 miles that we give as the ascertained cost of the North-West branches, some $10,700 per mile. But we have no information as to the cost of the prairie part of the line—I mean that part of the line constructed under contract by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company—the 615 miles which bring us to the point at which the construction company's work commences. The only information, therefore, upon which we can proceed at present, in making an estimate, is the Company's own statement of what it cost to build 176 miles of prairie line, and the general information one has upon this subject. You have in last year's report an announcement that the earthwork up to that period of the prairie line had been, I think, as much as 15,300 yards a mile. We have the usual statement about the ties, and some information about the rails, from which one might direct a calculation, as I understand that the earthwork cost about $3,060; the ties about $1,300; the rails, including the whole cost of transportation, about $5,000; making, in these three items, the sum of $9,360. What the other items are, or how far the whole cost is, if any, in excess of the $1,882,000, I, of course, have no means of judging. But it is important that we should understand what the cost has been, and also that the cost should be divided. Here, again, it has been intimated to me that very large prices were paid for extra speed of construction—that the conditions were arranged in such a way that a sum very much in excess of what somewhat slower progress would have entailed, was paid to the contractors of the line. In these and other obvious views, I ask for copies of the contracts, as well as other information which is applied for in this motion.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE moved: 1. For statements, in detail, of the sums of money payable and the amounts of stock deliverable to the construction company under its contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, for the work done thereunder; 2. Statement of the moneys paid, with dates, and the amounts of stock delivered, with dates, to the construction company under the contract; 3. Statement whether money was paid to the construction company in lieu of stock; and if so, to what extent; and at what rate was money substituted for stock in such payments; 4. Statement of the circumstances under which the construction company was overpaid $600,000; 5. Copy of the settlement and release between the construction company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company on the closing of their contract. He said: By the contract with the construction company, which the hon. gentleman brought down the other day, it was to receive for the eastern section—that is, the part east of Port Arthur—$14,100,000 in cash, and $20,000,000 in stock of the Company. From the statement, which the president made in his letter of April, 1883, and conjoining those statements with the copy of the circular of December, 1882, we may assume, in the absence of information, that, as between the construction company and the Company itself, the stock was rated at about 60 cents on the dollar, which would give the $20,000,000 of stock a cash value of $12,000,000. But, as I say, this is only conjecture, and it is important that we should know what the truth is, and what makes the contract price for the Lake Superior-Nipissing section equivalent to some $26,100,000 in cash; but the cash to be paid by the Company to the construction company for the work on this section was to be paid in proportion as the work proceeded, the railway company retaining 10 per cent. It is important to know what sums were payable, and what stock was delivered to the construction company for the work done. The same observation applies to the western section, for which $17,800,000 in cash and $25,000,000 in common stock was to be paid, which, rating the stock at 60 cents on the dollar, would give us $32,180,000 in all for the work between a point forty-five miles east of the Saskatchewan and Kamloops. This was to be paid for in cash and in stock, in proportion as the work proceeded. There was no agreement to pay for the work, earliest done, in cash, and that latest done in stock; and yet we find that all the work which has been done, as far as we can judge, has been paid for in cash, and that no part of it has been paid for in stock. It is important that we should know at what rate the stock was taken, when cash was substituted for stock by some arrangement of which we know nothing, between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the construction company, for upon this question, of course, depends the ascertainment of what the real nature of the contract was, as interpreted by the two parties to the contract. It is also to be observed that this contract, as far as we can judge, seems to have been departed from almost from the time of its initiation, because the Company declares that no further amount of stock than the $25,000,000 and the $30,000,000, of which $25,000,000 were issued to the original subscribers and $30,000,000 to the New York syndicate, has been subscribed at all; that is to say, in other words, that no amount of stock at all was issued to the construction company, because it was the remainder of the stock, $45,000,000, which was to be swallowed up in the operations of the construction company. Yet none had been issued. Therefore, it would seem, from the very beginning, this contract was departed from, since the terms and exigencies of the contract called for the payment of only a comparatively small proportion in cash, less than one-half, and more than one-half in stock. The result has been, the cash of the company has been exhausted in paying the construction company, contrary to the terms of the contract. That is not all.

Mr. BLAKE.

A 10 per cent. deduction is provided by the contract, but it seems it was not made. Besides not making the 10 per cent. deduction, it seems $600,000 has been paid the construction company in actual excess of the value of the work done. These considerations render it important that we should get further information with reference to this construction company, about which we can learn so little. The hon. gentleman has not yet been able to supply us with what he undertook to procure—a copy of the articles of association and the names of the associates of the company. We do, however, find some little information about it. We find that it is located, by the terms of the contract, at Walton, in the State of New Jersey. I asked an hon. friend to find out where Walton, in the State of New Jersey was. He searched all the gazetteers and the postal directories, but it seems to be a place too large and important to render it necessary that its name should appear in the gazetteer and postal directories, so that those who are obliged to resort to those sources of information to find where Walton is, are unable to ascertain its whereabouts. But, no doubt, some day or other we will ascertain where Walton is. I do not know whether there be two Northern American Construction Companies in the State of New Jersey or not; but if there be two it is a curious coincidence; and if there be but one, it would seem we have had something else to do with the North American Construction Company, for I find in the letter of explanation which Mr. Snow, the chief engineer of the other favourite enterprise of the hon. gentleman—the great European—but I will not trouble the House with trying to repeat the long name of that very short line—Mr. Snow, in making an explanation of certain discreditable circumstances which had occurred with reference to that enterprise, to Mr. Macdonald, says:

“In September last the North American Construction Company, was duly incorporated under the law of the State of New Jersey, by capitalists in the States for the purpose of building railroads and making investments in the Maritime Provinces, but more especially for the construction of a through line from Montreal to Newfoundland.

“The Short Line Railway Company entered into a contract with this construction company to build its railway, which it proceeded to do, by sub-letting the grading, bridging, and furnishing sleepers and timber to different contractors.

“The North American Construction Company has therefore, been at work in this Province for the last ten months, has expended and paid out for work, material and supplies, over $200,000 of its own money, as shown by its receipts and vouchers, has not received or asked for any aid or subsidy, and has fully completed and graded, bridged and crossed twenty-one miles and over half graded fifty miles additional.

“On or about the 20th of July, the president of the Construction Company notified me that there would be some delay in meeting the requisition of the June estimates. He said there were various reasons for this—the disturbed state of the money market in New York, the uncertainty of perfecting the necessary arrangements for obtaining continuous and connecting rights and powers from Montreal through. That the seeming hostility of the different Governments and cities and the apparent apathy of the press, had tended to create an impression that the road was not needed, and also there was a great disinclination to invest in a road lying in Nova Scotia alone. That he hoped that this association would soon change their views, and future requisitions would be as promptly met as heretofore. That the contractors need have no fear about the final result or ultimately receiving their pay in full.”

I do not know whether this is the same North American Construction Company or whether we are fortunate enough to have two North American Construction Companies engineered by United States capitalists, located in the state of New Jersey, and taking an active and benevolent interest in the construction of railway works throughout Canada. If we have two, they seem to be in many respects identical. They have the same difficulty in getting money, and they stop working readily as it suits them. This company intimated to the chief engineer that they intended to stop payment; I suppose the other company intimated to the Canadian Pacific Railway that they intended to stop payment. On the whole, it is important we should know, having at length, after great difficulty, obtained this contract of the North American Construction Company; finding it is of a peculiar character; finding its mixed transaction in stock and cash; finding that no stock has been paid over at all; and that, contrary to the contract, all that is done has been paid for in cash, thus exhausting the cash resources of the Company and placing them in a position which obliges them to apply to Parliament earlier than they might otherwise have applied; finding that the Company has been actually overpaid in cash for the cost of its works; not being able to find a local habitation for the construction company, or anything more than a name; finding that it is suspiciously identified with the company which has been operating with the hon. gentleman's pet contract in Nova Scotia and elsewhere, I think we may fairly ask for further information as to the relations between the Canada Pacific Railway and the construction company. We can ask that with the greater freedom and certainty of this motion not being denied, when we remember that from the hon. gentleman's statement, the two companies are, to a large extent, identical, because he said very many members of the Canadian Pacific Railway are members of the construction company. I shall not enlarge upon that topic. I have referred to it before and will have occasion to refer to it again, but it furnishes us good reason why we should have the fullest information as to the dealings between these wholly dissimilar corporations.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE moved: 1. For a statement of the consideration paid by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the St. Lin Branch or Laurentian Railway; of the payments made on this account with dates; and of the payments yet to be made thereon, including interest as well as principal; 2. For a statement of the particulars, with dates of the payments made by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, in respect of the Canadian North-West Land Company's stock; and of the names in which it stands; 3. For a statement of the particulars, with dates of the payment made by the Company in respect of the securities or property of the South-Eastern Railway; of the persons to whom it was made, and of the persons in whose names the securities and property stand; 4. For a statement of the particulars of the payments made by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, for the purchase of the charter of the Atlantic and North-Western Railway Company, and of the names of the payees, said: Last year, Sir, in the course of the annual discussion upon the subject of the Canadian Pacific Railway, I made a statement of such information as I was able to gather with reference to the purchase of the Laurentian Railway, or St. Lin Branch, which is the first branch of this proposed address, and I can do no better than repeat the information I then communicated, which was the best I was able to obtain:

"Then I see that they have made another little purchase. They have bought the Laurentian Railway, together with the St. Lin Branch, and there again you find a purchase which I cannot connect with the true interests of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, but for which, notwithstanding, we will have to pay. This small road, running from Ste. Thérèse to St. Lin, somewhere about fourteen miles, they made a bargain for apparently about the same time at which they bargained for the large road. They bargained for the large road through the then First Minister of Quebec, the present Secretary of State, and they bargained for the small road through L. A. Sénécal, the president and practical proprietor of the road. Now, that little branch was built on a financial scheme, and it received about $60,000 in aid from the Quebec Government. It was to have got some $50,000 from municipalities, and there were shares to the amount of $45,000 subscribed for, making a total of over $160,000. Still the road only cost about $140,000, and the contract was made on terms for the bonds, stock, etc.; but unfortunately, things took such a shape that the contractor handed over the bonds to Colonel King and Mr. Hurteau, at two different times, and apparently all that was advanced by those unto whom the bonds ultimately fell was a sum of about $60,000. Mr. Sénécal became the proprietor of all of them I believe, or of all but a fraction of them, for somewhere about $60,000 or $70,000. In that position, at the same time when the large sale was made, the small is made; and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company acquires the Laurentian railway, as it is called—a fine title, by the way, for a branch fourteen miles long—and agrees to pay these bonds in full with interest upon them calculated at 7 per cent., which, as far as I can see, has not been paid for a long number of years; so that the price to be received would be nearly $400,000 for the St. Lin Branch, representing an investment to the fortunate proprietor and vendor of $60,000 or $70,000, for which he receives nearly $400,000 for a road costing perhaps $140,000 to construct, and being worth no more."

Then I ask for a statement of the particulars, with dates, of the payments made by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, in respect of the Canadian North-West Land Company's stock. It appears, from the explanation given by the hon. member from Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), the other day, that the statement of the hon. gentleman that these moneys were expended in sustaining the stock, was not critically correct. I suppose that he had not been thoroughly accurately informed by the Company upon it. It was not connected with sustaining the stock, but it was connected with an operation for obtaining an issue of that stock upon the market. The Company, finding that the public would not take up all the shares, took up shares to an amount which was, of course, much larger than this sum of $600,000, that would represent $1,200,000, supposing the whole were paid up, because it was only half paid up—a sum of $1,200,000 upon which they have paid $600,000. I cannot agree with the view that that makes the transaction an unexceptionable one. I am sure it would not have had a very good effect upon that stock if it had been known that the vendors of the land of which the projected company were to be the purchasers had themselves, in order to complete the operation, taken up a very considerable portion of the stock. It would have been an indication which would have been rather looked upon by the public as one suspicious, and as one calculated to prevent them from investing in it if that had been ascertained; and I dare say that all concerned may now regret that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company did take up these shares in order to float this company, which it appears was not capable of being floated, but has rather sunk. Then, one wants to know the names in which the stock was taken up and the names in which it stands. If $600,000 of the Company are invested in stocks of this description, it is important that we should know how they stand. Then, no particulars or dates have been given, although it was promised and agreed that they should be given, by resolutions which passed the House, as to the payment made by the Company in respect of the securities or property of the South Eastern Railway, or of the persons to whom it was made, or of the persons in whose names the securities or property stands. This is an enormous transaction, or at least it would be enormous if we were discussing it irrespective of the much larger figures in connection with this Company, but it involves something like $1,582,000, and as $1,582,000 of money is now standing out in somebody's name in connection with this purchase or advance, it is important we should know in whose name, and all the particulars of it. The hon. gentleman stated that this transaction, like all the other transactions which are included in the sum total of the $3,500,000 of the statement of the affairs of the Company, was only one of a number which were advances, and would result in being only advances, and would be returned; but, if my information is correct, this payment is made—in one form, it is true, as a possible advance—but substantially in connection with an option purchase of the South Eastern Railway, the Montreal, Portland and Boston Railway, and another railway, and I apprehend it will be found to be something of much greater consequence than a simple advance, although an option is reserved, I believe, to the purchasers to treat it as such within a period which may or may not have expired. The remaining branch of the motion has reference to the payments made for the purchase of the charter of the Atlantic and North Western Railway Company. A lump sum of $149,000, if I remember aright, is given us for payments for charter and for works, and it would be well to distinguish between these, and to let us know how much is paid for charter, and how much is paid for works.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for a statement: 1. Of the net price received by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for each lot of $10,000,000 of stock comprising the $30,000,000 issued to a syndicate, with the dates of the payments made in respect thereof; 2. Of the date on which the $20,000,000 remaining of the original stock of $25,000,000 was taken; and of the dates at which the $5,000,000 paid in respect thereof was paid, said: It appears, from the statement laid on the Table of the House, that the stock which was issued to the Syndicate was issued in three different lots of $10,000,000 each, or rather it does not wholly appear from the statement, but it appears from that statement and also from the information published at the time. The return, however, is not full. The return indicates the average price which was received for that stock to be 52½, from which, if we deduct certain commissions and other expenses which have to be deducted, the net returns seem to be 51, but that is averaged over the whole lot of $30,000,000, whereas what is important to know is the rate at which each lot of $10,000,000 was issued under the contract. It is also important to know at what rate the $20,000,000 of the original stock of the $25,000,000, remaining unsubscribed after the subscription of $5,000,000, required by the contract was taken, and at what date the moneys paid in respect of that stock were paid. The return develops some peculiar arrangements in respect of that $25,000,000. The chartered contract of the Company requires that they should have taken and paid up in full $5,000,000 of stock, that is to say, that they should show that there was $5,000,000 subscribed and $5,000,000 paid upon that amount. Well, they did that. They took up $5,000,000 of stock and they paid $5,000,000 upon it; and then, some time afterwards—I do not know how long—that is some of the information I asked for—but some time afterwards, they allotted themselves other $20,000,000 of stock at a rate of 25 per cent., paying $5,000,000 for $20,000,000 of stock; and then they prescribed 5 per cent. per annum on the nominal stock as the interest which they should collect from themselves during construction, thus taking a rate of interest of not less than 20 per cent. upon their investment in respect to the $20,000,000 of stock which they secondly subscribed. Their statement in the returns is that the $20,000,000 was issued at a price which made the average price 25, that is, that the 20 and the 5 they had already taken, had paid up at par an average price for the whole lot of 40, and it is from that I deduce the result that they paid 25 per cent. to themselves—charged themselves only 25 per cent. for $20,000,000 of stock. This arrangement, I think, is of a very questionable character. Its result was, practically, according to their view, to turn the first $5,000,000, instead of being stock paid up in full, into stock on which 40 only was paid up. But if that is not the result, we find $20,000,000 upon which 25 p. c. only is paid up, and which yet is treated as paid in full, and which is to receive interest and dividends as if paid up in full, and upon which, as I stated awhile ago, no less than 20 per cent. interest is payable during construction, and no less than 20 per cent. is payable out of the capital, of which we are providing the largest part by the arrangement for the guarantee that has been already made, and the rest of which is to be provided for out of the capital account of the company during the remainder of construction. That is rather a handsome interest for the patriots to charge, who, from great public and national considerations, are constructing the railway for us, and who have pointed out to us so earnestly the reasons why the interests of the country require us to furnish them with further funds that they may the more rapidly construct that work. Then, if you take it at 40 per cent., which is the way they put it in the returns themselves, averaging the cost at $25,000,000, you find the rate of interest for which they have stipulated, even at that rate, is 12½ per cent., and that we are to secure to them some 7½ per cent. for ten years; and as in the other, they were securing much more, so we are now securing for ten years 7½ per cent.; and they expect to raise a considerable sum afterwards of the capital on their land grant bonds. Then, Sir, we sell $30,000,000 to the Syndicate at a price which, as I have pointed out, we do not as yet thoroughly understand, because an average price is given—but no doubt it was at a price lower, for some means or other, and for a net of 51. Well, that issue even to the Syndicate itself, was an advance of 100 per cent. on what we paid for $20,000,000—more than 100 per cent.—and 30 per cent. on the average price of their own stock. They charged the Syndicate—their friends in the Syndicate—that much; and they arrange with the Syndicate that the public should be invited to take it at a still further advance, at a price of 60 per cent., which would be an advance of 140 per cent. or nearly two and a-half times as much as they paid for the $20,000,000, and 50 per cent. advance on the average price of their whole $25,000,000 stock. Now we have heard a good deal of disaster, and about the low price of this railway stock, and about the public not absorbing that stock at what is really a fair and intrinsic price for it; but when the public learns that the original projectors of the enterprise took $20,000,000 of this stock, at 25 per cent., or, taking their whole investment, the $25,000,000 at an average of 40, and themselves sold the first lot of $30,000,000 at a net of 51—I think when the public learns that, they will think, perhaps, that they are, considering the prices which the Company themselves value the stock at what the original corporators valued the stock at when they were taking it for themselves—paying a pretty fair price for it. I find the average prices of Canadian Pacific Railway stock in New York for the week ending 28th April, 1883, 59½; 5th May, 67½; 12th May, 62½; 19th May, 61½; 26th May, 61; 2nd June, 61½; 9th June, 62½; 16th June, 63; 23rd June, 63½; 30th June, 63½; 7th July, 63½; 14th July, 62½; 21st July, 59½; 28th July, 59½; 4th August, 59½; 11th August, 55½; 18th August, 55½; 25th August, 56; 1st September, 56; 8th September, 57; 15th September, 57½; 22nd September, 58; 29th September, 57; 6th October, 56½; 14th October, 55½; 20th October, 52½; 27th October, 56; 3rd November, 62½; 10th November, 62½; 17th November, 62; 24th November, 60; 1st December, 59½; 8th December, 55½; 15th December, 56; 22nd December, 54; 29th December, 54½; 5th January, 1884, 55½; 12th January, 56; 19th January, 57; 26th January, 54½ to 54½, ex-div.; 2nd February, 55½; 9th February, 55½. Thus, you will see that the stock kept for a considerable time at or about the price that the public was invited to believe it was worth, or some where about 60, and that it has been hanging pretty steadily since that period at about 56 on the average, although, of course, those weekly averages do not represent the fluctuations which, in that stock as in numerous other stocks—as in all Pacific stocks during last summer—have existed. I have given you the averages for each week ever since the stock was first placed on the market of New York, from the 28th of April to the 9th of February. You will see that, putting to one side the periods during which this stock ran to 60 and 61, it runs at an average of about 56. We are called upon to deal with this Company in order to prevent disaster—in order to help them to keep this stock at about 56. Now, what is 56? We take $20,000,000 at 25, so that 56 would be about 124 per cent. in advance of what they themselves take. What is 56 again? Compare it with the average price of the whole $25,000,000, and it is 40 per cent. advance—even 56 is 40 per cent. advance upon the average price to the Syndicate of the whole stock they took. What is it compared with another thing? It is 10 per cent. in advance of the price they themselves attributed to the stock when they sold the first $30,000,000. They sold it for 51 net, and they complain that 56 now is a disastrous price. Under these circumstances it seems to me to be important that we should ascertain what the operations of the Company have been with reference to this stock—this Company's subscription for the stock, its payments upon stock, and its arrangements with the Syndicate, to whom they issued the $30,000,000 of stock, with some greater degree of minuteness in detail than as yet they have favoured us with.

Mr. MULOCK. I observe, on looking over the returns made to the House in obedience to an order of 29th January last, that the terms on which the $20,000,000 were issued are not given; but it is stated that the $20,000,000, together with $5,000,000 were issued to realize, in all, 40 per cent. on the gross amount. We know the $5,000,000 were issued at par, and it leaves it to be simply a mathematical calculation in order to determine at what price the second issue was made. However, in the statement furnished by the Company, it is not stated specifically what were the terms on which the $20,000,000 were issued. No doubt they were issued on the terms stated by the last speaker, namely, at a discount of 25 per cent. I may correct the last speaker, as far as I can from the information I have been able to gather from the return furnished. I find it is stated in the return that the rate of 6 per cent. was paid until last December. Now, the last issue, $30,000,000, was made on 29th December, 1882, according to this return, and the $20,000,000, therefore, were issued prior to 29th December, 1882. The 6 per cent. interest was paid for a period up to that date. Accordingly, 6 per cent. was paid on the par value of the $20,000,000 for a certain length of time; in other words, instead of 20 the rate was 24. I think it is material to know to whom the allotment of $30,000,000 was made. It is stated in the return that it was made to a syndicate, represented by one W. L. Scott. It is important to know who constituted the syndicate; who are the persons who received the $30,000,000. I think it is also due to the House that the return asked for should have been made more formal and complete. The return asked that the House should be informed as to the terms on which the respective issues were made, and it is no answer to say that one $5,000,000 issue was issued at par, and that it, with another issue, realized a certain sum; that is not a business-like statement which a man would enter in his own books. I am bound to say that if the books of the Company are kept in proper form, and no doubt they are, the terms will be explicitly set forth, that $5,000,000 was subscribed on certain terms, another $20,000,000 on certain other terms. In order, therefore, that this information may be placed clearly on the records of the House, I ask leave to move the following amendment:

At the conclusion of the first paragraph of the motion, add the words "and the names of the persons comprising the said syndicate, and of the respective amounts of the said stock taken by such persons." Also add the following words at the close of the second paragraph "and the rate at which the same was issued."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I offer no objection to the adoption either of the motion or the amendment. I do not intend to allow myself to be drawn into a discussion of side issues raised in connection with the very grave question which is now before the House. I can well understand, finding the position they occupy with regard to this debate, that hon. gentlemen opposite should feel very anxious to raise side issues, and attempt to draw the attention of the House from the position they occupy in the discussion of this question. The hon. member who has moved this resolution no doubt felt a little uneasy when he found that the hon.

member who performed the duty of replying to him had left him without a single inch of ground to stand upon; that point by point he took up every question raised by the hon. gentleman, and disposed of them in such a manner as practically to have terminated the debate in this House. That, I say, is the position in which hon. gentlemen find themselves; and I am not all surprised, under those circumstances, that by a series of resolutions asking for minute information, asking for a variety of matters which have no practical bearing upon this question whatever, they should endeavour to draw off the attention of the House. But I would like to ask the hon. gentleman, the leader of the Opposition, how he supposed the original promoters of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were going to obtain money? That they require to obtain money, everybody knows. Every person knows that the House has before it evidence as clear and indisputable as possible, that outside of all the money they received, and all the assistance they received from the Government, they required a large amount of capital in order to engage in this enterprise, and to start it. Now, what is the fact? The hon. gentleman first takes exception to the subscription by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company of stock for the purpose of floating the North-West Land Company. Why, the hon. gentleman knows that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had engaged in that transaction; that on the success of that scheme of selling a large quantity of their lands to the North-West Land Company was the very foundation of their making the lands they had received from the Government available for the purpose of getting money in order to carry on the work; and yet the hon. gentleman throws doubt on that transaction. He wishes to deny them the means of assisting in organizing a company upon a sound, substantial basis; upon a basis which would give them an ample return for their money; but of course the hon. gentleman and his friends in this House and out of it had undertaken to decry and discredit the North-West Land Company and every other enterprise connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway. No doubt the hon. gentleman gloats over the fact that his speech tended to depress, and he hopes that his remarks to-day will further depress the stock of the North-West Land Company, although he knows hundreds of good men in this country interested in that Company will be injured thereby. But great as is the interest of large numbers of our people in every section of the Dominion in that enterprise, the hon. gentleman adopts the same tone as is adopted by the press supporting the party, and is ready to throw discredit upon that and every other enterprise in this country, if it will only embarrass and injure the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in the great work in which they are engaged. The hon. leader of the Opposition first wished to deny them the means of getting money for their lands. Take this statement as he makes it to-night, and what does it amount to? It amounts to the fact that this syndicate—these gentlemen who made a contract for the purpose of constructing this great national work for Canada—put $10,000,000 of their own cash into the enterprise, before they asked a dollar from the outside public. Sir, the hon. gentleman admits that they paid $5,000,000 down in cash, and notwithstanding that admission, first, he says, they paid the $5,000,000 in cash to start the Company; then, that they subscribed the whole stock and took it; and then, he says, they took $20,000,000 more at twenty-five cents on the dollar. Putting down $5,000,000 in cash in the first instance, and $5,000,000 in the second instance, and letting the stock stand at forty cents on the dollar—assuming that to be true—what does it mean? It means that they took out of their own pockets, before they asked a dollar from the people of this country, or any other country, $10,000,000 of their own money and put it into this enterprise; and yet the hon. gentleman would undertake to throw discredit on them for doing so.

I ask the hon. gentleman what he would have given for the stock at that stage of the proceedings? Suppose the $20,000,000 stood at forty cents on the dollar, there is not a gentleman in this House, there is not a man with a head on his shoulders in this country, not a man connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway here or elsewhere, who at that stage of the proceedings, could have sold that stock for ten cents on the dollar, or could have obtained it from the public. Why, Sir, the press, representing a great party of this country, were telling the people then, as they are telling them now, that those who were putting their money into the stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway would never see it again; that all they could hope to get would be the interest which was obliged to be paid during construction on the original issue of stock. Take the Globe newspaper since this debate commenced, and what do you find? You find it declaring to the people of this country and to the world that this road will not pay expenses when it is opened from end to end; that the men who have taken stock at forty and fifty cents to the dollar will never see a farthing of their money. I ask the hon. gentleman, if his own statement is to be accepted, if these men put $10,000,000 of their own cash into the enterprise when it was in a condition when it could not be offered to the outside public, I ask him whether it is a crime in his estimation, or whether they are to be held as having done anything which was not creditable to them and advantageous to the people of this country? I say again, but for the fact that men of great wealth, great resources, men who could put down $10,000,000 to start this enterprise, and who had the courage to deal with it in spite of the hostility they met with in this House and elsewhere—but for that fact we should have no assurance, as we now have the most complete assurance, that at an early day Canada will be crossed from sea to sea by a great national line of railway, of which any Canadian will be proud. I say, taking the hon. gentleman's own statements, as he sees the opportunity of making them; accepting them to be accurate and true, they will reflect the highest credit on the gentlemen who expended $10,000,000 of cash before they asked one dollar from the outside public, and when, if they had done it, no one would have got ten cents on his stock. Why, Sir, the organ of the hon. gentleman, the organ of his party, the paper which is giving from day to day to the country the sentiments of the Liberal party, says that the stock is not worth ten cents, much less twenty-five cents, on the dollar to-day, and that people who have invested in it after the two years of construction are completed—for that is the term of the guarantee of interest—will not get a single farthing of interest or principal. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman has read us, and I wonder that he did so at so late an hour in the evening—he has kept us out of our beds listening to him as if he was anxious to waste the time of the House—he read quotations of the sales of stock which have been made week by week, month by month and day by day over a long period. Does he not know that every man is intently watching the sale of this stock every day, and that we all knew as much of the matter before he dragged us through all these weary details of monthly, weekly, and daily quotations as we do now? Why did not the hon. gentleman, when he was speaking of the difference between forty cents on the dollar, when the enterprise was in its infancy, and its price now of fifty-five or fifty-six cents—why did he not have the candour to tell the House that in the latter case the stock has the guarantee of money, put up by the stockholders, that it has $16,000,000 behind it, and that that is the reason of the difference? Instead of their being a just comparison between forty cents on the dollar, when according to his own showing these gentlemen invested their money in the purchase of stock when no one else would touch it, instead of this being a just comparison with the fifty-five or fifty-six cents which it now brings, he should take into consideration the $16,000,000 deposit for the purpose of getting that value; and if he takes that off, he will find that, so far from their having any such price, the stock is actually at a lower figure than it was issued at to the Syndicate, who first purchased before that deposit was made, and which deposit is made out of the pockets of the shareholders themselves. I said I did not intend to be drawn into this discussion, but I merely wished to draw the attention of the House to the measures taken by the hon. gentleman for the purpose of relieving himself before the House from the position in which everybody knows he and his friends stand in this debate. I ask, notwithstanding all the ability which has been displayed by the hon. gentleman, by the ablest member who can deal with it from that side, what have we heard? Instead of the hon. gentleman being able to controvert a single point or question I raised, he kept us hour after hour dealing with long, wearisome details, without raising a single point that would induce a person to take his pencil and make a single note. One would suppose that the hon. gentleman was speaking against time, when hour after hour he dragged us along in regard to one of the most important questions ever submitted to the deliberation of a Canadian assembly, without offering a sentiment or a proposition which was worthy of engaging its attention for a single moment. And when the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) had torn away the flimsy covering and left the hon. gentleman's speech in tatters, he had not an inch of ground to stand upon; but sitting down, with his wonderful industry for examining a question through a microscope—a question big enough to be seen and recognized by every intelligent man in this country—he applies his microscope and draws up a series of resolutions to distract the attention of hon. gentlemen from the real position of a question, upon which, looking at it from a debating point of view, the hon. gentleman has made the most pitiable exhibition that was ever witnessed in this House. I do not wonder, I do not blame the hon. gentlemen; it is because they feel and know, on this great question, not only that they are speaking in opposition to their own inward convictions, but in opposition to the pronounced public sentiment of the intelligent people of this country of all classes. They are paralyzed by the fact that party exigencies are driving them into opposition to this scheme, for no other purpose than to discredit the Company to whom they feel hostile, and at the same time discrediting the country of which they form a part. I say that I am not surprised, under these circumstances, that overpowered by the fact that in the three years which have elapsed since the contract was made, Canada has witnessed—what the most sanguine man in the House never believed he would see—the progress and advancement, not only of this gigantic work but of the country itself, that surpasses anything to be found in the past history of Canada. Under these circumstances, Sir, the hon. gentleman of course feels that Othello's occupation would be gone were he to do that which I believe he would have done, if he consulted his own interest as the leader of a great party, if he consulted the interest of that great party, if he consulted, above all, the interest of his country, if he had the magnanimity to say: I admit that in the past I took an erroneous view of this question; I did not believe that such progress could have been made, that such results could be achieved—as every man who will not shut his eyes and close his ears from every kind of evidence must admit—as have been achieved in this country; and, finding what it has done in the past, feeling what a shock would be given to ever commercial and financial enterprise in the country if this gigantic work were not proceeded with at the same rate of progress as in the past, I am bound to say that a case has been made out, in which it is perfectly plain and obvious that Canada, that the Government of this country, that the Treasury of this country can secure, without the contribution of an additional dollar, the completion of this great national enterprise, which is to give us a great line of intercommunication, binding the Provinces of this Dominion together, giving them free intercourse, one with another, giving free current to the trade of the country from one end to the other, opening and developing the great prairies of the North-West and the great mineral resources of British Columbia, and carrying from sea to sea the people and the products of this Canada of ours; and the time has come when I feel that I cannot ask this House to hesitate for a single moment when it has the opportunity of securing the completion of this great enterprise at the same rate of rapid progress as it has shown in the past, and I must give the proposition my hearty support. I say if the hon. gentleman had adopted that course, he would have stood higher in the estimation of the people of this country; he would have had a more solid and united party at his back than he has to-day. Why, Sir, what is he doing? He is obliged to compel every man who is giving a support to the hostility which he has evinced towards these resolutions—every man who lends his support to this continued systematic obstruction to the grandest enterprise Canada was ever engaged in—he is compelling every one of those gentlemen to take the position, in the eyes of an intelligent people, of doing all he can to prevent the advancement and the successful completion of a great national work, which has already shown to the people of Canada that it can accomplish for us more than it has accomplished, and more than has been accomplished by any other enterprise in which this country has ever been engaged.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman, Sir, has not been addressing himself to the Opposition; he has been addressing himself to his own followers. Where there is so much smoke, there must be some fire—is it true fire? The hon. gentleman obviously was touched. He suffers from the passion of anger slightly. He is excited. He is aroused. He says he will not be drawn aside to discuss the question—it is not the time to discuss it; and immediately he proceeds to discuss it. He proceeds to a comment and a criticism on my speech, and to a comment and a criticism on the speech of the hon. gentleman who followed me. We may perhaps differ in opinion as to the respective merits of those two speeches. Perhaps neither of us is the most dispassionate and disinterested judge of their respective merits. I do not certainly, on my part, intend to apply any epithets, either condemnatory or otherwise, to either of those speeches, which are not now before us. But I mean to say to the hon. gentleman that he will not dictate to me to-day, any more than I have suffered him to dictate in the past, what my course shall be. At one moment he declared that I felt myself driven by the exigencies of party leadership to oppose the resolutions, and the next moment he said I should have stood higher as a party leader if I had not opposed them at all. Well, I have told the hon. gentleman before that my ideas of party exigencies and of party leadership entirely differ from his; I have told him that I do not consider myself under any obligation as a party leader in opposition to this Government to oppose any measure which I believe on its merits ought to be supported. I have told him that I never asked any of my friends to join in opposing any measure, except on its merits. I believe that we are not bound to oppose measures because this Government proposes them, and I believe we are not bound to support measures because this Government proposes them. It is because I conceive the hon. gentleman's proposition to be indefensible that I oppose it, not because he proposes it. I am quite free to admit, from the hon. gentleman's long course, that I look with some degree of suspicion on whatever he proposes; yet, notwithstanding the quarter from which it comes, if he brings down a proposition, and the reasons for supporting it be sound, I will support it. But the hon. gentleman would not give me credit even for supporting the proposition to build the railway through the prairie country. My reward was, two Sessions afterwards, an indignant attack for presuming to oppose him in the construction through the prairie section. The hon. gentleman says I have denounced and embarrassed and obstructed the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and have oppressed and depreciated the value of their stock. Will the hon. gentleman but recall my speeches in the last two Sessions of Parliament? Will he but recall his own and his leader's utterances with reference to those speeches? Will he recall the statement made by both of them, that those speeches were exceedingly important in the interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway—that they did not wish to say one word against them—that they did not wish them criticised, because they were anxious that they should have all the weight that they could have in foreign markets and elsewhere in favour of the Canadian Pacific Railway? Will the hon. gentleman remember that I have repeatedly stated what I have affirmed to-night—that the contract was a contract which had in it the elements of a magnificent fortune? Will he remember that my position was that the Company got too much and gave too little—that they had this road for nothing, with millions besides; and how those statements could have oppressed the stock, obstructed the progress, and injured the prospect of the Company, perhaps the hon. gentleman will explain at some future day. It was not until the last Session of Parliament—even then, when I made two speeches to which the hon. gentleman and the hon. First Minister gave the character I have just now described—that I indicated the position that the launching out into the other enterprises into which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have launched out, and the speed with which they were rushing might be the forerunners of difficulty and even of disaster; and I think the House will agree with me that if I committed an error it was in delaying until last Session to so speak, and in speaking so moderately instead of more decidedly last Session, because the fruits of that policy which I indicated as containing the seeds of disaster have ripened to the extent involved in the Resolutions now before the House. For all that, the hon. gentleman cannot point to one word said by me which would be otherwise than a word in favour of the prospects of the Canadian Pacific Railway. What I say now is, that because the Canadian Pacific Railway comes before us asking aid, and because, as the hon. gentleman has himself admitted, they have put themselves before us, and the Government has put itself before us, in such a position that it was its bounden duty to give a frank and full statement of the affairs of the Company to that Parliament and to that people from which he was demanding so much in their interests, we have a right to insist on that statement being given. The hon. Minister said he was not going to take the Company's statements. He must have a formal investigation; he must have, not one, but two accountants go down to whom the Company must submit their books to be investigated; the books are to be audited by two officers of his, who are to make just such investigation as would be necessary to convince the persons about to lend money, or to go into partnership with a respectable firm of the soundness of the firm's affairs and the accuracy of its statements. We get some information, and that information I do not criticise, but draw from it statements and inferences, and the hon. gentleman is touched. He gets up and makes this speech, which, I suppose, was brewing in his mind this last hour, for while, during four or five motions, he restrained himself and kept quiet, he could not remain quiet until the end. Twenty per cent. fetched him, and he must give us this diatribe, in which he went over a great number of things, but did not touch the subject of my remarks. He said that I had been answered fully in my speech of the other evening. Well, I did not repeat my speech of the other evening. I am not discussing this question now. But he says I have shown you that the Company paid $10,000,000 of their own money before they asked the public to subscribe. No, the hon. gentleman has not. They may have done so, but they have not yet shown it. We asked for particulars relative to these statements, and the period at which the company paid their subscriptions on the stock they took and the relative dates of issue to the Syndicate. He says the stock would not have been worth ten cents on the dollar at the time the Company went into it if that stock had not been backed with their own money. I deny the statement. My opinion is the system is an erroneous one—one not contemplated by Parliament at all. I do not think there is a man in the House—except perhaps the hon. Minister of Railways himself, who may have had more intimate knowledge than the rest of us—who had the slightest idea that the stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway was at the furthest to be raised beyond $25,000,000 when the contract and the Act of Parliament was passed. We discussed the contract throughout on this basis. We discussed the question of tolls upon the idea that the maximum of stock would be $25,000,000, and I say that a system of finance under which a $100,000,000 of stock is raised, when Parliament assumed that the maximum would be only $25,000,000—not because the road wants $100,000,000, but because this affords an opportunity for stock watering and stock speculation which would not be afforded if the much smaller amount had been issued at par, and a dollar of money given for every dollar of obligation given by the Company—because this change takes place after the fashion I have mentioned of giving stock to the new syndicate at twenty-five cents, and then saying they are meeting with disaster because the public will not take the balance at fifty cents—I say that operations of that description entered into for the purpose of stock watering and stock speculation, is an operation not contemplated by the contract, not calculated to be really beneficial to the country but calculated to involve us as a people, so closely allied as the Government is becoming, by virtue of these resolutions, to the Company—not merely by the creation of the Company, but also by the relations of the Government, the Parliament and the people with the Company—in all the discredit which belongs to the system of stock watering as it exists in the United States. If you will consult the statistics, you will see that in the United States the total expenditure upon railways in the preceding year, if I remember aright, was something like $1,000,000,000; you will see that the addition to the nominal stocks and bonds of the railway companies approximates to $2,000,000,000; so that in a certain period in which $1,000,000,000 has been added to the real value or the real work, $2,000,000,000, or nearly twice the amount, has been added to the nominal stocks and bonds and capitals assumed to represent the expenditure of these various companies. That is the description of operations to which we are now asked to give our assent—to give facility for speculation—because the stock is at a low ebb. I ask is it not relevant to know what the Company themselves valued the stock at; the price at which they took it themselves, the price at which they issued it to the Syndicate, and the price at which the Syndicate sold it to the public. As to the hon. gentleman's statement that the stock was sustained by the guarantee, and that you must deduct a certain amount because of the guarantee, I say it is not so. The stock was sustained at the prices which it has since attained, and the prices were higher before the guarantee than those which it has attained in some instances since. The public was unable to perceive what was so very plain to all the capitalists and financiers in Europe and America, that if the Company took off its resources a very large sum and invested it at 4 per cent. to secure a dividend for ten years, it would add enormously to the value of the stock of a Company engaged in a large enterprise, and wanting all the money it could get to complete its work, instead of putting it aside to pay a dividend. All the capitalists of Europe and America, the hon. gentleman said, were of that opinion. But what the capitalists thought, they would not back by their money and not one of them would take hold of it. That is the state of things to which the hon. gentleman alludes. The hon. gentleman turned back to the old motion, to the motion which is not now before the House, and he said I took exception to the creation of the North-West Land Company and threw doubt on it though I knew that Company would be injured thereby. I have stated the arrangements made by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company with the North-West Land Company is an excellent good one for the Company, but not so good for the Canadian Pacific Railway. But I will say again that if the Canadian Pacific Railway, being themselves the vendors to the North-West Land Company, had announced to the intending investing public that they themselves were taking shares, he may judge for himself what effect that would have had on the intending buyers. What is worthy of complaint and of observation is that these shares were taken, as I believe, unknown to the public, by the Canadian Pacific Railway and had according to the statement of the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe, in order to prevent the proposed subscription failing. To avoid failure, the Company took $1,200,000 of stock and so the enterprise was floated. That transaction was not right; and whether it tells for the Company or tells against the Company, if such a transaction as that takes place with reference to a Company with which this country is so intimately connected, and with which it will be so much more intimately connected, I shall at all events avail myself of my privilege on the floor of Parliament to state my opinion about it.

On the main motion being put,

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to detain the House, but I must make a single observation in regard to the point which the hon. the leader of the Opposition made, as to the speeches which he delivered in favour of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's enterprise, and which he thinks should entirely absolve him from any charge of obstruction or hindrance of that great work. I quite admit, Sir, that the hon. gentleman did speak, on the occasion when the contract was submitted to the House and again a year ago, in very extravagant terms with regard to the great value of the subvention that was given to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the great wealth which the parties engaging in it were about to receive; but he forgets that he had discounted that speech by the speeches he had made for five long years, when he was connected with the late Administration. He forgets that he is capable one day, when it suits his party exigencies, of declaring that the land in the North-West is of no value, and a year afterwards, when the party exigencies demand it, of saying that it is worth $4 an acre for 25,000,000 acres. The hon. gentleman must remember that it is not very easy to give value to statements made by an hon. gentleman according to the demands of the exigencies of the party, and regardless of the facts upon which they are based. If the public and the country did not attach such great value to the exaggerated statements he made as to what the Canadian Pacific Railway were receiving and the great fortunes the Company were likely to make out of their contract, it was because they knew what the hon. gentleman's opinions were, as expressed year by year during the five years' Administration of the hon. Mr. Mackenzie. They knew, Sir, that the value that that hon. gentleman and his colleagues, and the late hon. Finance Minister, who sits by his side, placed upon the land in the North-West was not of a very exaggerated character. They knew that the late hon. Minister of Finance had stood up in his place in this House and declared that Foster could have carried out his contract, and came to them and said: I can carry out my contract for the eighty miles of the Georgian Bay Railway, for which you have given me, among other things, 20,000 acres of land in the North-West per mile, if you will take the land and give me twenty-five cents an acre for it. And they refused. Why did they refuse? Not that they did not want the contract that they had made to be carried out, but because the twenty-five cents was, in their judgment, more than the land in the North-West was worth. We have that in evidence. We have the statement made by the late hon. Minister of Finance, and given to the world as their estimate of what the land in the North-West Territory was worth, until we made a contract to give 25,000,000 acres of it to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company as a subvention. Then all their views were changed. Then all the values and calculations of this hon. gentleman as to the land in the North-West were entirely changed, and he found it convenient to give to that land, which he had given the best evidence in the world he did not consider worth twenty-five cents an acre, a value of $4 an acre. Now, Mr. Speaker, is the hon. gentleman surprised that he was not able to raise or assist the Company much by any statements he might make in this House as to the value of the subvention they had? He knows that the statements now submitted to the House, which cannot be controverted, prove the utter fallacy of all the calculations he made, and all the statements he put forth as to the enormous wealth this Company were going to acquire. What is the fact? The fact is that, after obtaining all the money they can obtain by the sale of $55,000,000 of stock, after first putting $10,000,000 of their own money into it, and then all the money they could obtain out of the disposal of $65,000,000 of stock, they find that they are unable to obtain the money from the lands, to obtain the money from the sale of stock, after having resorted to a measure in which they had advice from gentlemen whose opinion on financial questions, I do not hesitate to say, will be held to be quite equal to that of the leader of the Opposition. I think that hon. gentleman would hardly put his opinions on a question of finance against the opinions of a gentleman who was distinguished as one of the most successful managers the Bank of Montreal ever had—Mr. Angus. I think he knows that Mr. Stephen, who had been president of that bank, and Mr. Angus, who had been one of its most successful managers, would be able to form as valuable an opinion on a financial point as the hon. gentleman could form; and although it was a disaster, and although it utterly failed in accomplishing its object, it was in consequence of the renewed attacks upon the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the condition of other similarly situated stocks in the New York market—a crisis in regard to questions of that kind which had been without parallel for many years in this country. Otherwise, I think everyone will agree that that effort would have been successful. I say that, when the hon. gentleman now quotes the price of the stock, he must do so in the light of the fact that it does not stand in the position of the stock when they gave forty cents, according to his statement, but it stands with the guarantee of the Government of Canada of 3 per cent. on that stock for ten years. The hon. gentleman was not candid when he was treating the present prices of the stock and its value in the money market, and contrasting that with the unguaranteed stock which he said they had taken at the rate of forty cents on the dollar. I showed the House that there was no parallel, because, in the one case, you had a great completed road, earning money, and in the other, the works in their infancy, when no one could predicate anything in regard to them; and, I say, Sir, that the price paid, if the hon. gentleman is correct, on the first $20,000,000 at forty cents on the dollar, is a higher price than that at which, with the works in their present position and with the guarantee of the Government of Canada, they are now quoted on the market. I will not detain the House further on the matter, as that was the only point the hon. gentleman made in relation to it. But I say that he did not undertake to meet the point I made in regard to the organ of his party and the press sustaining him. I say that, when the hon. gentleman makes his statement, in the payment of forty cents on the dollar for stock, they benefited themselves unduly, in the infancy of the enterprise, he ought to take into consideration the fact that, whatever speeches he may make here—and, as I have shown, the hon. gentleman is equal to the occasion, whether it is to depress the value of the lands in the North-West or the value of the enterprise, or anything else, and the hon. gentleman knows the course he took when I asked the House to give 100,000,000 acres of land in the North-West to secure the construction of the railway—he ought not to forget that at this moment the organ of his party, the paper to which his friends in and out of this House look for the sentiments of the Liberal party, is now heralding to the world the declaration that the persons who buy a dollar's worth of stock in the Canadian Pacific Railway will never find their money again. They heralded all over this country, from end to end, the declaration that the stock is entirely worthless; that the Company will not be able to pay working expenses when the line is built. The hon. gentleman, although he made some strong statements in regard to the position of the country and the value of their enterprise, must not forget that all the time he was confining himself to the great importance of constructing the prairie section only, instead of giving us the Canadian Pacific Railway by constructing the two ends, which two hungry ends would more than devour all that the centre portion of the line would make. That was the position of the hon. gentleman, and it was not very well calculated to enhance the value of this enterprise. I say that the course of the hon. gentleman has always been obstructive; I say that the course of his party around him, in regard to this great enterprise, has, under all circumstances, been obstructive; I say the position these hon. gentlemen have taken, whether in power or out of power, has been to do all they could to prevent the construction of a great Canadian Pacific Railway, for the purpose of sustaining the views to which, unfortunately, they committed themselves in regard to this great question, and to do which they are compelled, in order to discredit this enterprise, to discredit the country itself.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I take issue in the most express terms with the last statement made by the hon. Minister. I say, Sir, if there are any men on the face of the earth who have dishonoured or discredited Canada from the day that the Canadian Pacific Railway was first talked of, they are those hon. gentlemen sitting before me. The effrontery of these men is incredible! After my hon. friend has stated his objections in as calm and dispassionate a speech as could possibly be made, we have this hon. gentleman and his friends coming up here to say that the obstacle to the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway is the unpatriotic conduct of members of the Opposition. I ask again, Sir, have those hon. gentlemen forgotten who made the name of Canada discredited throughout the whole civilized world by their infamous conduct of ten years ago? Now, Sir, if those gentlemen want to discuss this question fairly and impartially, we are prepared to do it. If they want to go back to the past history of this question, if they want to have all the infamy—I repeat the word, all the infamy—which they brought upon the Canadian Pacific Railway, and which they brought upon Canada—if they want to have all these things recapitulated, we are prepared to go through it. We are prepared to show why it was that hon. Mr. Mackenzie met with difficulties in the construction of this road. And I say this, Sir, that no man could have done more in the time and with the means at his disposal, than hon. Mr. Mackenzie did in the construction of that difficult portion of the work which he, and he alone, carried through; and when we recollect, Sir, that this hon. gentleman tried his hand at it, and all he ever did was to lay down 100 miles of railway, so badly planned, so badly engineered, that the first thing the Canadian Pacific Railway engineers did was to pull it all up, Sir, the less he talks to us about obstruction in constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway the better for himself, and the better for his party. But, Sir, he tells us just now that we were setting ourselves against public opinion. Does he know enough French to read the French press of this country? Has he ever looked at the organs of the gentlemen who support him—or of the gentlemen who usually support him—and does he see what they are saying about these Resolutions? Does he not know, as I said here a few nights ago, that for every dollar you give to the Canadian Pacific Company you will have to pay another dollar, in all human probability, to meet the demands of his followers who won't be dragged through the mire unless they get a consideration for it? Sir, the hon. gentleman, if he is going to discuss this matter, if he is going, contrary to his own declarations, to force us against our will to discuss this matter now, he would be infinitely better employed in reconciling the manifest discrepancies which my hon. friend has pointed out to him. Let him explain, if he can, these suspicious features in the construction company's accounts; or, if he cannot do that, let him hold his peace until he brings us the information we have asked for. Now, the hon. gentleman alluded to a statement I made—or that he says I made—with respect to a demand of Mr. Foster about ten years ago. Sir, it is perfectly true that land in the North-West in 1874, ten years ago, before any railway communication was made with it, either by us or by the Manitoba, St. Paul and Minneapolis Railway Company, was not of any practical value. That land was not assigned. Nobody ever supposed—I never supposed, no man ever supposed—that land in the centre of the continent could be made valuable till that railway went there. Sir, what these men did was this: They waited till there were two railways into that country, until the land had become of great value, and then, when the land had become of great practical value, they, by some bargain made in defiance of the then law, gave away the most valuable sections of that land. That is what they did. That land in 1879 had become very valuable indeed. No man disputes it; every man knows it; and what was the case in 1879 could be no rule for the value of unassigned land in 1874. No man knows that better than the hon. gentleman, although I think I heard him, who now complains that we valued the land at $2 an acre—I heard that hon. gentleman, I think, unless my memory deceives me, rate those lands at $5 an acre eight or nine years ago. Sir, I repeat, we are perfectly willing to discuss these questions fairly and reasonably; but we will not submit to be told—by the heroes of the Canadian Pacific Railway Scandal, at any rate—that we are obstructive of the progress of this work; that it is our fault if transactions of this doubtful character are looked on with suspicion by the capitalists of the world. I do not know what capitalist it was, or what financier it was, who told him that if you had $45,000,000 of stock to sell, which you expected to sell for some 80, it was going to strengthen your case to take $24,000,000 and place it in the hands of the Government of the day to secure a guarantee of 3 per cent. for ten years. I have never yet heard any reasonable explanation, either by himself or by his friends, or his press, showing that after $55,000,000 of stock had been issued and sold, as they said, it was a wise measure to guarantee the whole $100,000,000 to the extent of 3 per cent. for ten years. I could have understood that being an advantageous measure, had it been done when the stock was first emitted; but I do say, that done when it was, it was not a wise thing, and the result shows, under whatever advice it was done, that I am right. It was not a thing that was calculated in any way to raise the value of the stock. Any man who saw the original memorandum, the original declaration, emitted by those gentlemen, which intimated that $100,000,000 were going to be guaranteed, that the Company were going to deposit $24,500,000 of money or money's worth, must have seen that it would cause a more formidable strain on the resources of the Company, far more than any prices they could expect to get for the remaining $45,000,000 of stock, could have warranted. That hon. gentleman might do well to address himself to the task of explaining these things, if he is able to do so. No explanation has been offered of that yet, no more than of the discrepancies to which I have referred. Now, Sir, I do not want to detain the House, but I must say this to the hon. gentleman, that we are not going to submit to be told that we are unpatriotic, and that we have gone out of our way to injure the Canadian Pacific Railway or the North-West. I repeat again, that the North-West has been most miserably misgoverned—has been greatly injured; but the causes, Sir, are: first, the Tariff policy; next, the land policy; and third, the railway monopoly of this present Government.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

The Order for resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of Sir Charles Tupper, "That the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider certain proposed Resolutions (page 84) respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway," being read,

Mr. DAVIES. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who spoke last in this debate (Mr. Woodworth) concluded with a few remarks expressive of how deeply important he felt the subject matter to be. As I anticipated, having realized the importance of the subject so much, he did not devote much attention to its discussion. I regret exceedingly that he should see fit to take up so much time with matters entirely foreign to the Resolutions which had been submitted by the Minister of Railways. His speech in some instances was amusing; and in others it was not. I agree with him as to the importance of the vote which hon. members are called upon to give, and I hope during the rest of the discussion those who take part will confine themselves more closely to the real point which we are called upon to discuss and decide. Historical reviews are very interesting at times; but I think if the hon. gentleman wished to make a speech for his constituents, and he said that was his object, he should have taken an occasion when there was a less interesting and important debate in progress. I have one complaint to make against him, and one only, that when he introduced in the debate an old and venerable friend in the story of John Randolph, of Roanoke, and told the story which has been in every one's mouth for the past twenty years—and the story has stood me in good stead many a time, as it has no doubt other hon. members—he should have so altered the phrasology and clothed it in such coarse and vulgar language that I think I would be scarcely able to recognize it. I will, if he will accept a suggestion which comes from a very humble source, recommend the hon. gentleman, whose power of elocution are very great and whose memory is remarkably good, when he desires to recite those little pieces of poetry, to adopt the plan of reciting them at those interesting penny readings established from time to time by church societies and others for the purpose of supplementing their exhausted revenues. It is hardly fair to take up the time of the House in reciting Longfellow's "Ship of State." Nor do I desire to follow the hon. gentleman in the long review he gave of Canadian Pacific Railway matters, eight, ten or twelve years ago. His historical review was more extensive than that made by any other hon. member who has taken part in any debate since I have had a seat in the House, for it commenced with the building of the walls of Jerusalem and ended with Longfellow's "Ship of State." There is one remark made by the hon. member, and only one, to which I feel called upon to call attention and controvert, and that is the statement—and I do controvert it, because he made it, as he declared, so that it might go on the record as a matter of history—that the right hon. gentleman now at the head of the Government had been driven from power, in 1873, because he introduced a policy for the construction of a railway from ocean to ocean. Sir, if the hon. member knows or has read anything of the history of those days, he ought to know that the right hon. gentleman was not driven from power because he proposed any such policy. The right hon. gentleman was driven from power for a political crime, and not because of any particular policy. I am not going to take up the time of the House in following the hon. gentleman, but at the same time I am not going to sit silent when I hear our political history travestied by hon. gentlemen opposite. We were satisfied to let that matter rest in oblivion for the present, at least; there was no occasion for introducing it here, and its introduction does not add to the kindness of our debates in any way. But, Sir, if we are challenged to put on record our disapproval of the course which the hon. gentleman adopted on that occasion, I think it will be found that no one on this side of the House will shrink from his duty in expressing his disapproval, or voting his disapproval, if required to do so. I think, with all due deference to the hon. gentleman, he might have spared himself, and spared the House, the attack which he made on one of the most respected and venerable members of this House. He undertook to charge the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) with disloyalty, with want of patriotism, with being a man who has decried the country of his adoption, and done other things in the way of sacrificing his country at the shrine of party. Sir, if there is one man in this Parliament, one man in all Canada, who deserved less than any other man the aspersions which the hon. gentleman attempted to cast upon him in that respect, it is the hon. member for East York. Sir, that hon. gentleman has spent the best part of his life fighting on behalf of principles which we on this side, at any rate, hold very dear; and I do not think an expression can be quoted from his lips, either in this Parliament or out of it, which could be construed by his most virulent opponent into a charge of want of loyalty or lack of patriotism. He needs no defence from me; his name and fame and reputation will live in the hearts and history of his country, when the names of those who would be his detractors have long passed into oblivion. I was not surprised that the hon. gentleman attacked the leader of the Opposition, but I think that he might have had the grace—when that hon. gentleman rose in his place and denied the charge made against him, that he was the standing counsel for the Grand Trunk Railway—I think he might have had the courtesy to accept the denial and withdraw the charge.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I did; and I said "our counsel."

Mr. DAVIES. No, Sir, the hon. gentleman did not withdraw it; the only remark he made was a very contemptible attempt at wit. Now, Sir, what arguments did he and the two hon. gentlemen who preceded him on that side of the House, advance in favour of the proposition which the hon. Minister of Railways has submitted in the form of these Resolutions? They charged the Liberal party of this House, and of this country, with want of patriotism. The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) started the cry. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) repeated it, and the hon. member for King's County, Nova Scotia (Mr. Woodworth) joined in this chorus of reciprocal malignity against the party to whom I have the honour to belong, and the press of that party, for the action they have seen fit to take in regard to this question. Sir, I do not think anything in their actions or in their past history justified such a charge. What is the cause of this repeated attempt to denounce the Liberal party for want of patriotism and for decrying the country? Is it because they have preferred truth to exaggeration? Is it because they have refused to bow down to the political idols which hon. gentlemen opposite have set up for us to worship? Is it because the hon. leader of the Opposition refused to adopt the traditional role of the 4th of July orators, and proclaim that Canada is the best and the most beautiful country in the world, and is able to whip all creation? The hon. leader of the Opposition when he speaks of the resources of his country, speaks in tones and in language which commend themselves to the opinion of reasonable men; he does not adopt the role of exaggerated nonsense; he does not degrade the praises of his native country into a farce; he does not besneer it with praises which do not belong to it, but he proclaims what her resources are in language as eloquent, and more eloquent, I venture to say, than any other hon. gentleman of this House is capable of employing.

Mr. DAVIES. Hon. gentlemen say "hear, hear," but I would ask them is it for that that they denounce him for want of patriotism? is it because we have dared to raise our voices and proclaim that a high system of taxation is not conducive to the welfare of our people? Is it because we have told hon. gentlemen, time and again, that the trade relations of this country should be made as free as the law can make them? If not for these things, then I do not know for what we are denounced. But I can tell hon. gentlemen that the country at large, I believe, thoroughly understands that there is as deep a love of country, as strong a desire to advance the interests of this Canada of ours, and perhaps a more honest desire to advance her interests among the leaders of the Liberal party, than exists in the breasts of many hon. gentlemen who are so loud in their proclamations of their own patriotism. Now, Sir, while these charges are being made from time to time by hon. gentlemen, a stranger listening to them would imagine that they had always adopted the role which they say the members of the Opposition should now adopt. I say, Sir, that that has not been their past record or their past history. I say that these charges come with peculiarly bad grace, from some of those who preceded me in this debate—men who only five years ago made day and night hideous with their wails, as to the condition into which this Canada of ours had fallen. I remember when a picnic could not be held from one end of Canada to the other without the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) being present, and decrying the condition of the country, and deploring the state into which it had fallen, in lamentations, compared with which the lamentations of Jeremiah were feeble. There was no depth to which the country had not fallen, according to that hon. gentleman; and I am sure that if any intending immigrants, from the old country had read any of the diatribes delivered by that hon. gentleman, they would not have thought of coming here. Fortunately, however, people abroad did not read those speeches, though, I am sorry to say, that too many people at home were induced to listen and to give heed to his seductive tones. The hon. gentleman laughs, but I fancy a great many people are getting their eyes opened on that subject. I wish to say a word or two as to the remarks made by the hon. member for Cardwell—not that I think he grappled with the question before the House, or with the arguments of the hon. member for Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), but because he made one or two statements which should, I think, not go unchallenged. Sir, he spoke in the first place of the hon. member for Huron—and so far as his personal altercation with that hon. gentleman is concerned, as it is none of my business, I shall leave them to fight it out themselves—but he spoke of his having left the Conservative party. Well, if he did, I know the hon. gentleman well enough to believe that he had good reason to leave it; and it would be interesting to me, though perhaps not very interesting or palatable for some hon. gentlemen opposite, if some day he took the opportunity of stating the reasons, which induced him to leave that party. I do not know whether the hon. member for Cardwell would consider those reasons very palatable; but, at any rate, I will leave that question to him and the hon. member for Huron. The hon. member for Huron made use of an argument which, to my mind, seemed a strong one. He said there was a very strong analogy between the position in which we are now placed with reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway and the position in which the country was once placed in reference to the Grand Trunk Railway. He said we had to give a large amount of money to the Grand Trunk Railway many years ago, under circumstances very analogous to those under which we are asked to make this grant to the Canadian Pacific Railway. The hon. member for Cardwell challenged the accuracy of that statement, and I listened very attentively to his remarks, because I supposed that I was going to hear him show the particular point in which the analogy did not hold good; and I must say, Sir, that the explanation given by the hon. member for Cardwell thoroughly convinced me, if I had any doubt before, that the statement made by the hon. member for South Huron was strictly accurate. Why, Sir, no enquirer who desires to know the history of this matter, need do more than take up the hon. member for Cardwell's own speech. Every line of it, which has reference to this particular branch of the subject, bears strong evidence that the position in which we are now placed is just the position that Canada was in then; and reasoning by analogy, I conclude that the position of Canada ten years hence, with reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway, will be just the position we now occupy with reference to the grant made to the Grand Trunk Railway. I do not want to use a stronger argument than is conveyed by the hon. gentleman's own language with reference to the loan made by this country to the Grand Trunk Railway. He says:

"A prospectus was issued bearing, if not the direct, certainly the indirect endorsement of the Government of this country, promising to those people in England who should put their money into the Grand Trunk Railway, a dividend of 11 per cent. at least."

Has the hon. gentleman ever read the official memorandum published by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and signed by Mr. George Stephen, the President? That official memorandum—which bears almost the direct official endorsement of the hon. Minister of Railways and of himself, Sir, a very strong supporter of the Government, both in this House and in the press—makes statements almost precisely similar to those made in the prospectus issued by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and promises a dividend of 11 per cent., the very sum promised to those who would invest their money in the stock of the Grand Trunk Railway. Then the hon. gentleman goes on:

"The Government guaranteed £3,000 a mile for the railway, and took a first lien upon it as security."

We have paid so much a mile, and we are taking a first lien upon the railway as our security. In everything the two cases are precisely similar—

"But we all know that when the road came to be built, when the results came to be ascertained, it was found that instead of its paying the 11 per cent. then promised, there was no percentage at all for the people who had embarked their money in the enterprise."

Whether that will or will not be the case with reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway, is a question which the future alone can divulge; but I know, and the hon. gentleman knows, that the opinion of those who are very competent to judge, is that there will be a very similar state of things as the result of our advance and of our mortgage on the Canadian Pacific Railway. The hon. gentleman knows very well—and if he now affects he does not, he can turn to his own speech and those made by his leaders and he will find—that when the Canadian Pacific Railway contract was first introduced, it was strongly urged that for years that road could not pay. One of the arguments then made use of to justify the enormous sum which was voted was, that for many years after it was built, that railway would not be able to pay its way, and therefore it should be endowed to the enormous extent that it was with moneys and lands; and I say, judging from the facts and reasoning from analogy, that the future of the Canadian Pacific Railway will be just what the past of the Grand Trunk Railway has been, so far as our relation to it is concerned, and I fear very much that the moneys we are advancing to supplement the enormous subvention given before will be money lost to Canada just as the advances to the Grand Trunk Railway are lost. The hon. gentleman, in picturing the position of the Grand Trunk Railway, goes on:

“And when the question came before the people and the Government of Canada, as to what was to be done with regard to that guarantee, it presented itself in this form: Here were men in England who, on the strength of a prospectus practically issued by Canada—backed, as it was, by the Governor General, by her Majesty's representative, in this country—put their money into that work, without any hope of getting it back again, and without any interest whatever, except the interest which they expected to get in the form of a dividend from the construction of the railway. There was Canada, with a railway built with English money, and benefiting by the rapid development of every interest in the country which followed immediately after its construction; and the question which presented itself to us, as honest men, was this: ought we to exact the pound of flesh? Ought we, who have derived, and are deriving all the direct and indirect advantages resulting from the expenditure of that money in our midst—from the expenditure of the money itself, and the development of the country through that expenditure—ought we to exact our interest before the people in England get a dollar?”

The conclusion he came to was that the country ought not to do so. It did not; and, Sir, we shall probably stand in exactly the same position in a few years hence. People in England have, in the two past years, been asked to invest their money in this enterprise, on the faith of statements guaranteed by the Governor General in his speeches delivered to this Parliament, guaranteed by every speech which the hon. Minister of Railway makes, guaranteed in every way in which an official guarantee can be given; and if the time comes when that railway shall fail to pay any dividends, the question will be asked in this House, just as the hon. member for Cardwell says it was asked in the case of the Grand Trunk Railway: What, are you going to exact the pound of flesh?—are you going to foreclose your mortgage, and take the money which we have put into this enterprise? Before that time comes the magnates who now hold this stock and control this Company will, in all probability, have slipped out, and the holders of the stock will be the unfortunate people who have invested their money in it. I do not say that this will take place, but it is probable; and if it does take place, it will be a perfect analogy of the case of the Grand Trunk Railway. Therefore, so far from meeting the argument advanced by the hon. member for South Huron, the hon. member for Cardwell confirmed it; and I regard it as a remarkably strong argument. We have a right to infer what will take place from what has taken place, under similar circumstances; and so reasoning, I, for one, have come to the conclusion that the day will not be far distant when the representatives of the people of Canada in this House, will have an appeal made to them, not to exact their pound of flesh, not to foreclose their mortgage, but to make their lien for what we are now advancing secondary and subservient to the stock which the investors hold in the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now, Sir, there was another argument advanced by the hon. member for South Huron which struck my mind as a very strong one. That was the argument with reference to the estimates of the probable cost of finishing this road. One very important question which every hon. member who votes on these Resolutions has to ask himself is this: Is this sum which we are now giving a final sum? Is this the last time we shall be called on to supplement the enormous sums already voted to that railway? And the hon. gentleman argued to this effect: That if the estimates which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had already made were correct, this sum could not be a final sum, but that we should be called upon to vote many millions more before many years rolled by. How did he make that out? He said that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had contracted with the construction company for the latter to build the remaining portion of the road and to build it for the sum—I am not going through the details of his calculation at all, but simply take the results as he brought them out—for the sum of $23,000,000 odd for the western, and $21,000,000 odd for the eastern, which, adding cost of equipment, would make a total of $43,000,000. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company contracted with the construction company to pay them $48,000,000 to build the unfinished portion of that road. We are now told by hon. gentlemen opposite that the same amount of work, which a very few months ago it was estimated would cost over $48,000,000, can now be done for about $29,000,000. The difference between these two sums is $18,000,000; and one of two results follow: either that the construction company was being paid $18,000,000 too much, or that the estimates now being presented to this House, and which we are asked to vote, are $18,000,000 too little. Which horn of the dilemma will the hon. gentleman take? Neither is very palatable to him, because it has already been said officially in this House, in unequivocal terms by the hon. the Minister of Railways, that this construction company embraced the leading members of the Syndicate themselves. Therefore, if they were paying themselves, in the form of a construction company, $18,000,000 more than properly they ought to have paid themselves, they were guilty of something that was very reprehensible. But the hon. member for Cardwell takes the other position, that they were not paying themselves enough. He says that the construction company abandoned that contract because they were not getting enough. If they abandoned it, I put this question to the hon. member, and I would like to get an answer from the other side of the House: If those railway contractors—men who are much more capable of estimating the cost of the work than I, or possibly any other member of this House—if they, having the experience of many months in partially constructing the road—came to the conclusion that $43,000,000 was too little, with what face can we be asked to declare that $18,000,000 less than $48,000,000 is sufficient? To my mind the estimate now presented is too little. Railway men, engineers, men of experience, abandoned—according to the hon. member for Cardwell—their contract of $43,000,000, because the amount was too little; yet we are told we can build it for $18,000,000 less. Does any hon. gentleman believe that? I do not. I believe that $18,000,000 and something more will be asked from this Parliament, before many years go round, to finish that road, which the construction company undertook at one time to build. The hon. member says the security is ample. We are not discussing a mere matter of security. The Government of Canada has not become a loan company to lend money to every one who wants to borrow it, simply because the security may happen to be sufficient. That is not the purpose of a Government. If the loan is so good, if the security is so ample as the member for Cardwell, following the statement of the hon. the Minister of Railways, wishes us to believe it is, how came it that no financial company in the world could be found to advance the money? How is it the security is not looked upon as good by financial men, who have money to invest, either on this or on the other side of the Atlantic?

Mr. HESSON. Yes, it is.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. member for North Perth says it is. I hope to hear his argument. I hope he will be able to show why it has been necessary for the Government to make the advance. I was a little surprised and somewhat grieved that the hon. member for Cardwell, occupying the prominent position he does in this House, and occupying a prominent position out of this House, as editor of a newspaper, should have taken the responsibility in the speech he made—a semi-official speech made, I take it, almost at the suggestion of the right hon. the First Minister himself—of stating, in the language he used, that the farmers of the North-West; those men who have gone in there to carve out homes for themselves, and who as we have heard through his paper and the other newspapers of the country, have been clamouring against the land regulations and the other grievances under which they have suffered for years past—I was sorry to hear him make the declaration that they were a spoon-fed lot, and had no grievances. Was that a well-weighed statement, or simply a haphazard statement which he now desires to withdraw? He compared their hardships with those of the pioneers of Ontario. I do not wish to decry the hardships which the pioneers of Ontario and the pioneers of the Maritime Provinces had to undergo. They had their hardships to undergo when they came to settle the country. But I fancy that if the hon. member for Cardwell were to leave his editorial sanctum and his seat in this House, and go to the North-West and there build his little shanty, and live there through the cold winter with the thermometer at times down to thirty degrees below zero, he would find it was not all plain sailing. There are hardships to-day in the North-West as there were years ago in Ontario, when Ontario was being settled. It would, indeed, be most surprising to me that those men who know what politics are, for many of them are emigrants from the older provinces of Canada—it would, indeed, seem to me most extraordinary that they would leave their work, at the busy season of the year, assemble in their thousands and proclaim that they had serious grievances which demanded redress, if they had none. Is that all sham? Does the hon. gentleman wish the House to believe that the large meetings held in the North-West during last autumn—the conventions representing 30,000 farmers there, in which their grievances were set forth—does he mean to state that is all moonshine? Does he mean to say that these men were only repeating the cry of the wolf when there was no wolf? I do not think he substantiated his bold assertion that there were no grievances in that country. Is it no grievance to them that the lands of that country were to a large extent locked up in colonization companies.

Mr. HESSON. No.

Mr. DAVIES. If the hon. member came from the colony I come from, he would think differently. He would find in the early history of that colony that it was locked up in colonization companies. That it was divided up into 67 townships, and those townships were owned by the favourites of the then Government of England. It was peopled by pioneers from the old country. He had better ask those people, some of whom I myself have seen driven out from their happy homes, and reduced almost to starvation, because they could not pay the rents these landowners exacted—he had better ask them if there is any hardship in introducing the old landlord system of England into this country. That is just what these colonization companies mean—the introduction of the landlord system, in one shape or another, into the North-West. It was a grievance to lock up so many acres of land, as was attempted to be done by the organization of these land companies.

Mr. HESSON. Will you answer a question?

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman will, I am sure, have full time to speak, and this House will be only too glad to listen to him. I am answering the reckless statement made semi-officially by the hon. member for Cardwell, that the people of the North-West had no grievances to complain of. I have stated one. I will ask the hon. gentleman whether there was no grievance in locking up the mile belt from homestead and pre-emption along the line of the railway? I will ask him whether it was no grievance that the whole of the lands in Southern Manitoba were locked up from homestead and pre-emption? I will ask him whether the constant and ever-recurring changes in the land regulations of that country were no grievance—changes which were made so frequently and so often that no settler knew, and no pioneer knew, what land he could take, or what regulations he was serving under? Are these no grievances? The uncertainty produced by these frequent changes was one of the greatest grievances, and, last, not least, bad as the land laws themselves were, the administration of those laws was worse. Although we have not visited those lands ourselves, we know that those grievances exist. I have heard from numbers who have visited the North-West from the Province from which I come, and I know the statements I have made are well within the bounds of truth. It was unbelievable of the hon. gentleman to make the assertion he did in face of the fact that, almost at the time he was speaking, a deputation from those very farmers, representing 20,000 or 30,000 of them, was here interviewing the Prime Minister and asking that some of their grievances should be removed.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). If I may be allowed to interrupt the hon. gentleman for a moment, I would say that the hon. gentleman has entirely misrepresented what I said—unintentionally misrepresented, of course. I did not say that the farmers of the North-West had no grievances, but I said that they had the grievances incident to settlement in a new country, that they applied to both sides of the line, that they were not to be compared to the grievances of persons who settled in the old Provinces and the complaint I made was that, by the manner in which they were discussed, in relation to persons moving from the North-West Territories into Dakota, the impression was left that they were greater than prevailed in the States of the neighbouring republic.

Mr. DAVIES. Sir, the glossary the hon. gentleman has put upon his language is intended to minimize that language, but I am going to read what the hon. gentleman did say, as reported in the Hansard. The hon. gentleman, after referring to the grievances of the pioneers who settled in Ontario, said: "When you go to Ontario to-day and hear them tell the story of their settlement, one cannot but feel almost indignant that their sons should be grumbling because they have not a railway at their own doors and are not spoon-fed by the Government. The grievances in the North-West, what are they?"—and the hon. gentleman turned round and faced his party when he asked the question—"hon. gentlemen opposite have manufactured the most of them."

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES. Does the hon. gentleman imagine we manufacture things which exist, real grievances? Did we manufacture them out of nothing?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES. Had we the promulgation and formation of the land laws? Did we lock up the land belt? Did we prevent men from settling on the best land for pre-emption and homestead? Did we form those colonization companies? Did we create one of the grievances under which the country has been suffering for the last three years? Not one; and the hon. gentleman knows it well. What member of the Opposition has gone out to incite the farmers of the North-West to rebel? Their meeting in convention and the statement of their grievances were spontaneous.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh!

Mr. DAVIES. Were they not? Then I say that the laugh of the hon. gentleman is a very bitter slur upon the intelligence and ability of the 20,000 men who were represented in that convention. And, mark you, the pioneers who go to settle in that new country are generally the very best men; a man who leaves his home in Ontario or in Prince Edward Island, or in the Maritime Provinces, with all its comforts, and goes out to face the North-West, is generally a plucky, stalwart man, and to say that 20,000 of these men can be led by the nose by the hon. leader of the Opposition, and induced to say that they have grievances when they have none, is to insult my intelligence and to insult their honesty. Now, I wish to make a few remarks upon the speech delivered in this House by the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives). He followed the hon. the leader of the Opposition in reply to his speech, and I think I may fairly say that he had no reason to make the complaint which was made by one of his profession in this House a short time ago, that he was called upon to speak to a subject without a brief. I think, Sir, the hon. member had been supplied with a remarkably extensive brief by those for whom he spoke—for whom he officially spoke. He did not scruple to say that he spoke on their behalf, and I have no hesitation in saying he had been supplied with an excellent brief. In one thing I can agree with him. I will join most heartily in the expression of hope which he used that the right hon. gentleman at the head of the Government will live to enjoy health and strength when the North-West Territories are filled with a million people. I hope he will do so; but I hope he will do it as the leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, and not in the position into which he stands to-day. What is the language which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company put in the mouth, as I understand it, of the hon. gentleman from Richmond and Wolfe? He comes here, Mr. Speaker, whining like a spoiled child—I can use no other language—whining that this scheme of theirs has gone astray, and that scheme has gone wrong, and something else has happened which ought not to have happened, and all because there are some naughty people in this House and some naughty rivals out of it, who will not do exactly what they want; because there are speculators on the New York market, who will not "bull" their stock when they want it "bulled," and will not "bear" it when they want it "beared," and they come here whining that the country of the North-West is being decried by every one, and that they have rivalry to endure which it is impossible for them to endure. What nonsense! They knew well, when they undertook this large contract and went into the stock markets of the world, that they had to encounter rivals as well as anyone else who goes there. They ought to have been prepared for it; and, if their schemes have gone wrong and have not turned out as they expected they would turn out, they have to thank not those who, they allege, were their rivals altogether, but they have to thank their own want of foresight, their own want of judgment, their inordinate greed, which forced them to go far outside the bounds of their contract, which induced them to go away beyond the bounds of the legitimate contract they entered into with this Parliament, and to indulge in speculation, which might have turned out well, but of which, having turned out badly, they have a right to take the results without coming here whining about it. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman made a statement which I think he ought not to have made. He made the statement that the Opposition in this House had done what they could to prevent the sale of the stock. I venture the assertion that the hon. member cannot lay his finger upon one sentence used by any responsible leader of the party to which I belong in this House, from which the most violent opponent of the party could draw a deduction that this party had any desire or intention, or that it was their wish, to decry the stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Was it by proclaiming in this House, as the party did proclaim, was it by re-echoing it in their press and proclaiming on every platform throughout the length and breadth of this country, that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had made the grandest and most lucrative bargain that any company which ever existed in the world had ever made, that they decried their stock? Was it by telling the world that the contract was so grand, so magnificent, so wealth-producing, that, if carried out prudently, it would leave millions to the good in the exchequer of the Canadian Pacific Railway? If that was the way to decry their stock, I acknowledge the charge. I think any sensible man will say that the language used by the leader of the Opposition, by his supporters in this House, and by the press out of it, was language calculated to advance the monetary interests of the Canadian Pacific Railway, to send their stock up higher on the market, to lead foreigners to place confidence in the Company, and to breed hope and a belief in those who were going to invest their money that they would have a handsome return for that investment. If, as I said before, their stock has not gone up as they expected, if their schemes have not turned out as they thought they would, they have but themselves to thank, and their own greed. But more than that. When they introduced their scheme into this House it was pointed out to them—not by one hon. member, but by several—it was put on record by resolution emanating from this side of the House, that the very monopolies they were seeking would be the means of retarding the advancement and the prosperity of the great North-West, in which they were going to build their railway, and on whose prosperity their own was dependent. Sir, if they had come forward and given up the monopolies which they had claimed at the hands of this Parliament, and which they unfortunately received; if they had said that, having the richest country in the world, as it has been termed, and as I have no reason to disbelieve—the richest grain growing country in the world, that they were going to build their road into it, that that country was going to be opened for settlement on fair and reasonable terms, that the farmers who settled there would have a reasonable ground for believing that after growing their grain they could carry it to a fair market at reasonable rates—then, I say, they would have done much to build up the North-West, to put money in their own pockets, and to raise the value of their own stock. But they have chosen another course. They chose to hold on to their monopolies; and, Sir, because the result has not been as they expected, they have themselves to blame and not the Opposition in this House. If they had taken the advice tendered them by the leader of the Opposition, from time to time—and I am not going to state it in my own words, because it was put into much better language by that hon. gentleman sometime ago—if they had taken his advice one short year ago, and refrained from launching out into those enormous speculations which have been almost their ruin—I will not say their ruin because I have no right to say so, but their great loss—they would not have found themselves in their present position. If they had taken his advice, and confined themselves to the legitimate operations of the contract they made with this country, then, Sir, they would be in a position where their stock would command a better price in the market; they would be in a position to go on with the contract without having to come to this Parliament and ask for more help. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) stated that the Opposition in this House have been magnifying the exodus from this country for the purpose of hurting the Canadian Pacific Railway. I do not know why he made that statement. There is no occasion, I regret to say, for the Opposition to magnify the exodus from this county; it is too well known to every hon. member, whether he comes from the Maritime Provinces or from Quebec. That exodus is to be deplored, and, I think, Sir, that nobody can say that the Opposition have ever attempted to magnify it. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman says—speaking, I presume, with authority—that three dire results would follow if this House did not vote in support of the Resolutions which the Minister of Railways has tabled. These results were: First, that the Company would stop their works for five years; secondly, that some 9,000 men would be thrown out of employment; thirdly, and what seemed uppermost in the hon. gentleman's mind, and which he desired to press most strongly upon the minds of his colleagues, that the Conservative party would lose prestige. Now, Sir, let us examine these three propositions which he has laid down somewhat in detail. He said the Company would stop work for five years. What authority had the hon. gentleman to make that statement? Sir, it was not in the contract. The hon. gentleman has put forward a statement opposed to that which was made by the hon. Minister of Railways, when he moved his Resolutions here. He told us, if I understood him aright, that the Company were quite prepared to go on with the contract and carry it out to the letter—quite prepared to carry it out within the time they agreed upon a year ago—quite prepared to do everything that they had contracted to do, but that they wanted simply to do it a little more hurriedly. And now the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe comes in as the mouth-piece of the Company, with a very different story, saying: If you do not give us the money we are going to stop work entirely for five years. Is that a statement calculated to advance the interests of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in the stock markets of the world—that they have no money to go on with it? Why, Sir, he could not have made a more damaging statement. No more damaging statement could have been made than the one he has made, that unless they get so many millions more the works are going to be stopped and 9,000 men thrown out of employment. That was not the language of the hon. Minister. What did he say? You will pardon me for reading a short extract:

"I wish the House to understand, at the very outset, that no change is proposed by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in regard to their contract. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company, taking into account the property they own, the lands they possess, putting a more moderate estimate of value upon them than that of the hon. gentleman opposite, and one which I think the House will be prepared to concur in—putting the most moderate estimate on the value of their lands, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company feel that they are able to carry through the contract to completion without the alteration of a single letter."

That is the declaration made by the hon. Minister of Railways; and in the face of that declaration, Sir, his supporter comes in and tells us that so far from their being able to carry out their contract, these 9,000 men will strike employment to-morrow, and work will cease for five years, because the Company have no money to go on with it. How do they reconcile these statements, and which one are hon. members to believe, when they are called upon to vote for or against these Resolutions? But, Sir, I do not think the argument he used, that 9,000 men would be thrown out of employment, ought to have any weight in this House. Is this House to vote $20,000,000 or $30,000,000 to any corporation whatever, for fear that certain men might be thrown out of employment? If the vote cannot be justified on proper, on reasonable, on just grounds, in heaven's name do not justify it on this ground! Do not hold the threat over this House by telling us: If you do not vote the $30,000,000 we will throw 9,000 men out of employment in the middle of the winter. It is an argument unbecoming those who speak in this House on behalf of the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is an argument unworthy of them, I say, and one which ought not to have weight for a moment in the minds of those who have charge of the people's money. But, Sir, in his innocent guilelessness the hon. gentleman let out the true secret; the real reason why we are asked to vote this money is because the Conservative party will lose prestige if you do not vote it. Their pet contractors will fail; their contract will not be carried out; the magnificent promises the hon. Minister of Railways made us last year will not be realized; the predictions he made will be falsified; the Conservative party will be placed in the position of having told the people that certain things were going to come to pass which have not come to pass, and, therefore, they will lose prestige; and that is the reason why this House is asked to vote $30,000,000 of the people's money in order to maintain the prestige of the Conservative party. Sir, that is not a very good reason for hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, at any rate; and I fancy there are those on that side of the House, too, who have sufficient manliness and fidelity to the interests of their constituents, to require some more substantial reason for voting this money than that advanced by the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe. Now, Sir, when that hon. member made his statement and read from his brief, he was supposed to be replying to the speech of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. That hon. gentleman has stated that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had, from time to time, made estimates of the cost of constructing this great work, so different was the one from the other that he felt it difficult to place reliance upon the estimate which they now submitted; and the hon. member turned round and denied that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had made different estimates. He said no estimates of the cost were ever made before by that Company; and he denied the statement made by the hon. leader of the Opposition, the amusing statement, of an interview which took place between Mr. Van Horne, manager of the road, and a newspaper reporter in Montreal. While he denied it in one breath, he admitted it in the next. Mr. Van Horne, he said, never made the statement; and if he did make it, all he meant was that they had not time to make accurate estimates. You will observe, Sir, that he did not deny Mr. Van Horne's statement that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had no time to be bothered with estimates, they had a big job on hand, and were going to carry it through and get the money somehow. Oh, says the hon. gentleman, it is true that Mr. Van Horne said they had not time to make accurate estimates. We will take his own version: $1,000,000 or $2,000,000, he says, do not amount to anything. Such a sum may not amount to anything to a company which deals in such vast sums as the Canadian Pacific Railway Company deals in, but $1,000,000 or $2,000,000 mean a good deal to my constituents, and I think they mean a good deal to the constituents of every hon. member. But I contend that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have made estimates. I find in the Sessional Papers brought down last year, in the official memorandum to which I referred a short time ago, made on December 12th, 1882, and signed by George Stephen, President, that estimates were made by that Company of the cost of constructing the road. Those estimates were not carelessly made, but were made under the gravest responsibility under which they could be prepared; they were made to be scattered broadcast over the world, so that those who examined them and had money to invest might obtain an accurate idea of the position and prospects of the Company. If ever there was a time when a gentleman issuing estimates should be careful and accurate, it was when he stood in the position which the President of that great corporation occupied when he issued his official manifesto inviting capitalists to invest money in the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The President, in that document, went on to show what a good contract the Company had obtained, and the document I may say is ably drawn up. He shows there are millions in it for the Company—vast sums of money which the mind can hardly grasp. It goes on to say:

"The proceeds of the $20,000,000 of land grant bonds, as sold, are deposited with the Government, which pays interest on such deposits at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum. These proceeds are paid to the Company in agreed mileage proportions (in the same manner as the Government cash subsidy) as construction progresses; and the balance of these proceeds and of the cash subsidy coming to the Company amounts to about $31,500,000. It is believed that this sum, with the proceeds of the capital stock now remaining unissued (exclusive of $10,000,000 of the stock which is to be reserved) will be amply sufficient for the complete construction and efficient equipment of the railway, and that 1,800,000 acres of land will be more than sufficient to extinguish the outstanding $2,700,000 of land grant bonds."

Here is the President of the Company after presumably—for any other presumption would be an insult to him—consulting with his engineers, his managers and all those who had information upon the subject, proclaiming to the world that the sum of $31,000,000 was sufficient, with the Government subsidy and the lands, to build the road and leave the Company 17,000,000 acres of land beside. I want to ask the hon. gentleman whether that was an estimate, or whether it was not, and whether he will withdraw the statement that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have not put forward from time to time estimates differing so vastly from each other that an ordinary man, not acquainted with railway construction, is utterly incapable of reconciling them. I am for one, and I find there are many others in the same position. What is the President's estimate in that document? His estimate of the cost of the road, made as late as the 12th December, 1882, was that it was going to cost $90,000,000. In the letter which the same gentleman addressed to the Grand Trunk, in May last, he refers to the same statement, and makes the same estimate, that the road can be built for $90,000,000; and now he comes before this House and the people of the country and tells us that it can be built for $22,000,000 less. I want to know if there is an independent member, one who really and honestly desires to vote on the question, after forming a correct and honest opinion as to whether the sum we are now called upon to vote will complete the work upon the road, who can come to this conclusion with the estimates differing to the extent of $23,000,000, until he has the matter explained? I do not think he can. The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) was said by a very high authority to have answered all the charges made by the leader of the Opposition. I hold that, in the hon. gentleman's speech from beginning to end, in the brief from which he read, every strong point made by the leader of the Opposition was passed by; no attempt was made to answer them. Trifling and incidental points were taken up, and the time was occupied in dealing with minor matters; the grave charges made by the leader of the Opposition remaining unanswered then, and remaining unanswered now. What answer was given to the charge made, that a telegram was sent by the President of the Company to England, the language of which, to say the least, was disingenuous and misleading. This House is entitled to know something about that telegram—is entitled to the fullest and most complete information with respect to the dealing of the Company when they come here asking further aid. No explanation of any kind was offered, and the charge, unless it is answered or explained, will seriously injure the Company in the minds of those who look for straightforward, honest dealing in matters of this kind. I want to know why no explanation was made of the further charge that they had illegally paid out of capital, and in defiance of the Statute, 11 per cent. interest upon the money invested. That charge was made by an hon. gentleman who knew what he was talking about. He made it deliberately, with all the responsibility attaching to his position as leader of one of the two great parties. The charge, however, remains unanswered, and was not explained by the hon. member who followed the hon. leader of the Opposition. It remains unanswered now, and I suppose no answer will be vouchsafed. I merely mention it to call attention to the fact that a charge was made in the most direct language which the hon. gentleman is capable of using, and no attempt of any kind has been made to deny the charge, or give any explanation regarding it. I do not intend to say anything more with respect to the speeches of hon. members, nor do I intend to indulge in any historical review of the question; but I propose to call the attention of the House for a few moments to what strikes my mind, at all events, as strong and cogent reasons why the House should not commit itself to the proposition submitted without a fuller and more explicit explanation than we have had. Sir, what are we asked to do? We are asked to supplement the already princely dowry we have given to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company by an additional sum of $30,000,000. To hear hon. gentlemen talk about millions, one would imagine that a million of dollars was nothing at all; they talk about millions as flipantly and toss them about as freely as a juggler tosses balls. One would suppose that this country was a mine of wealth, that its resources were practically inexhaustible, that there are no such things as taxes in this country, and that we can go on supplementing and subsidizing, year after year, to the extent of millions upon millions, without the people of this country suffering at all. But on what ground are we asked to listen to these new demands—what is the argument advanced? The only proposition put forward is that if you give them $30,000,000, they will finish the road within the next two years. Well, Sir, if they do, they will only be doing what they have proclaimed to the world for the last two years it was their intention to do! When the President of that road issued his official memorandum, in 1882, to the stockholders, inviting them to take up the stock, what did he tell them? He told them that it was the intention to finish the road by the end of 1886, that they could do it, that they had made their calculations carefully, and that they were going to do it. We were told in the House that such was the great wealth, the great energy, and the pluck of these men that when they said this, when they took hold of a matter of this kind, they were sure to carry it out. The hon. member when he brought down his proposition, which at the time was received with applause by nearly all those who sit behind him, had not a line in which he could point to a guarantee that the road would be completed one day sooner than was mentioned in the original contract. Now, he gets up in reply to the hon. member for Cardwell—who made a mild suggestion, who hoped that some guarantee would be taken, or that something would be done, who wished no offence—the hon. Minister gets up and says that he is going to have some security. I would ask him what his security is? The House would like to be informed on that point. As I understand, the road itself and everything the Company own from Port Moody down to Montreal, is to be mortgaged, including the branch line to Portland. What additional security is he going to get? I say there is no security you can take, because if they go on for another two years and spend that $30,000,000 on the road—as I have no doubt they will do, I do not wish to charge them with anything to the contrary—but if they go on, and if at the end of that time the road is not finished you will be in this position: you cannot exact anything more from them beyond the mortgage, and the road is yours. You will have to come forward with a further supplement and further subsidies, or else take the road in your own hands. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman says that this subsidy has been asked, not in the interest of the Company. The hon. Minister of Railways says, I do not ask this in the interest of the Company. In whose interests then? He says in the interests of the country. Was there a demand made by any part of this country that this Canadian Pacific Railway Company should be subsidized still further? Has Parliament ever made that demand? Has any Province of this Dominion ever asked it? Have the newspapers voiced the opinions of any portion of the people of this country in favour of it? Has there been a public meeting held in Canada asking that this money should be voted? Not one. Where did the demand come from? It came from those who wanted the money, and not from the people of this country who pay the money, and it is not in the interests of the people that it should be given. The demand has been made in the interests of the Company and the Company alone. Why, Sir, should the people of this country burden themselves with this additional $30,000,000 of money? Is it such a great advantage to have that road built, or to have the promise that it shall be built, within two years? I think not. We have already the road built so as to give us access into the prairie land, and reaching to the foot of the Rocky Mountains. Immigrants can now come from the old country, take the cars at Montreal go on—I was going to say to Algoma Mills, but I believe that route is to be abandoned, and they are to be carried around to Owen Sound, south of Georgian Bay, thence through to Thunder Bay where they will tap the railway, and go in and spread through the prairie country. I say we have that great highway now opening up the prairie lands of the North-West to be peopled; and while building it across the Rocky Mountains and north of Lake Superior may be a good thing in itself, it is not such a good thing, and is not so absolutely essential and desirable, that the people of this country should run in debt to the extent of $30,000,000 at this time, in order to secure that boon within two years. The advantages of opening up the prairie country I can appreciate. I can understand what a great boon it will be to this country to be able to carry in thousands of immigrants to settle those lands and become taxpayers, and grow the large quantities of grain which that country is capable of producing; but I cannot understand that there is any vital importance in building the road through the Rocky Mountains, when it is a very doubtful question whether we will take any large share of the eastern trade over that line. It is a fine thing to talk about this transcontinental railway from ocean to ocean, but when you pay $30,000,000 extra for the promise of having it done two or three years previous to the time in which the Company are bound to do it, then it becomes a very serious question. The hon. Minister says that this contract is to stand without any alteration. He emphasises that point. He repeated the statement in very eloquent language, not once or twice, but at least five or six times, that no alteration is to be made in the contract, but that it is to remain just as it was signed. For what does the hon. gentleman take us? There is hardly a term in the contract which he has not altered. The very manner in which the payments for the work are to be made, has been entirely altered by him. But the hon. gentleman says that is nothing at all; here is his language:

"It is proposed to postpone the payment of that guarantee for five years, and to loan the Company $21,500,000, to be repaid on the first day of May, 1891. The conditions of that advance may briefly be stated as follows:—In the first place, it is proposed that in future the payment for work done shall be placed upon a different basis from that which

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES. We will see directly how nominal it is. He goes on to explain the contract:

"When the contract was made, it was provided that, upon the completion of every 20 miles, the Company should receive payment, according to the terms of the contract, on the 20 miles completed; but it is now found that, owing to the character of the work which remains to be done, it would be impossible, with any justice to the Company or to the Government, to carry on that mode of payment. Take the country north of Lake Superior, the whole distance, until you come to the 95 miles of enormously heavy work, and if you paid them pro rata according to the contract for the number of miles done, you would not have left the money that would be required to perform the work on the 95 miles where it is inordinately heavy. So, in the Rocky Mountains, the 30 miles that is comparatively easy would not bear any proportion to the other work that remained to be done; and it is only proposed to make a change that is based upon the principle upon which payments are made by the Government. In relation to almost all the other contracts—I think I may say to all the other contracts, on the canals, on railways, and on everything of the kind—the principle is to pay for the amount of work done."

Now, Sir, there are two reasons given by the hon. Minister for the change. One is, that it is the method adopted in relation to all other contracts, and should be adopted here; and the other is that if the Company were paid pro rata for the number of miles done, they would not have enough money left to do the balance of the work on the ninety-five miles. These are the two reasons—let us examine them both. If that was the provision in all other contracts, why did the hon. gentleman not put it into the original contract before the Company commenced the work on the prairie section? The hon. gentleman knows why—it was not in the interest of the Company that it should be put in. But when the prairie work is completed, and the Company has entered on the hard work, it becomes in their interest that the method should be changed, and he changes it. The second reason the hon. gentleman answers himself. He says that the Company have commenced the ninety-five miles, and unless we change the mode of payment, we have no guarantee that that work will be done. What! no guarantee from these wealthy men who have taken hold of this great enterprise—no guarantee that they will carry it out? I thought we had the guarantee of their names, of their respectability, and of their great wealth; the guarantee of the $1,000,000 which they deposited in the hands of the Government, and which the hon. Minister says is going to be given up—had we not that guarantee? But apart from that, the hon. gentleman answers his own argument; because, in the same speech, almost in the same breath, he says that the only reason for changing the mode of payment is that unless we change it we have no guarantee that the ninety-five miles will be finished. He states that 9,000 men are engaged in this part of the work, and that the Company are concentrating their efforts upon it. Why, Sir, they are at work now, according to the hon. gentleman's statement, and we want no more guarantee that they will do it. They have already performed, as I read the hon. gentleman's statement, 121 miles of the lighter work on the Lake Superior section, and they have been paid for that. At what rate have they been paid? They have been paid for the light work first, and paid in advance for the heavy work; and now, having paid them in advance, the hon. gentleman proposes to adopt the new mode just as they come to the 95 miles of heavy work, so that they may be paid in full for every mile of the 95 miles, after having been partially paid for it in advance. Then the hon. gentleman said: Oh, we intend to give up the $1,000,000 deposit—that is a mere nominal thing, too. What does that mean? It means that this country is giving the Company $31,000,000 instead of $30,000,000. I remember, Sir, when the contract for the construction of this road was entered into, what an amount of talk there was about the $1,000,000 deposit in the Government exchequer, as a guarantee for the completion of the road. Now, that deposit is to be given up, in addition to the $22,500,000. And while we give the Company all these concessions, what do the Company give the country? What are they asked to give? Nothing. Are they asked to surrender one of the monopolies, one of the privileges, one of the exemptions granted to them by their charter? Does the hon. gentleman ask them to surrender one of them? Not one, Sir—catch him! The Company and he are too good friends for that; he gives up everything to them that they ask, while they are to give nothing in return. The pledge comes from the hon. gentleman that, forsooth, they will alter their policy of monopoly after the road is completed, and permit other roads to be built in Manitoba. That is all that we get, and that could be obtained in a much speedier way by hon. gentlemen on this side being put in the place of hon. gentlemen opposite, for that is the policy they would adopt at once. This was a grand opportunity for the hon. gentleman to retrieve the gross blunders his Government committed when they invested that Company with all the marvellous monopolies and exemptions which have proved to be a curse in every country where they have existed heretofore, and I am quite sure will not prove to be an exception in the North-West. Now, Sir, there was a portion of the speech made by the hon. Minister of Railways which disappointed me, as a Maritime Province representative, very much indeed—a passage which I had not expected to come from that hon. gentleman. I had listened to him years ago, when he was declaring to the people of the Maritime Provinces what a glorious thing this contract was to be—how Halifax was to be the entrepot for all the trade of the west, and the winter port for all the grain and the other products grown on those western prairies—how the wharves were to be lined with shipping, and thousands of masts were to fill the harbour—oh, what an era of prosperity was to come when the road was once finished! He told them that the Government were not constructing this road on narrow commercial principles alone, but that higher principles actuated them—it was to be a national road; not an inch of it was to touch the detested Yankee soil—they would have all the benefits which were to flow from its construction—and some seaport in Canada was to be the outport for shipping the products of all that great country. What does the hon. gentleman say to-day? Does he tell the people of the Maritime Provinces that they are to have a Maritime Province port? No, Sir; but the hon. gentleman, forgetting all he has said about a Canadian seaport, not only justifies but approves of the policy of carrying the trade of the North-West to an American port, and of building up Portland at our expense. I do not want to misrepresent the hon. gentleman on this important point, and I will repeat his eloquent language—for it was eloquent, as nearly all his language is, dealt in superlatives as nearly all his speeches do, was very pleasant to listen to, as all his speeches are, but very inconsistent, as many of his speeches are. The hon. gentleman said:

“It (the contract) provides for the extension to the seaboard” —

I pricked up my ears at this. I wanted to know which what was to be the favoured port now, St. John or Halifax. I knew that the Government must fix upon one or the other; and this is what I heard:

“It provides for an extension to the seaboard, and the expenditure in connection with the St. Lawrence and Ottawa, the South-Eastern and the Atlantic and North-Western are for purchase of the bonds of those roads, and are, of course, a good asset held by them for the purpose of reaching the Atlantic seaboard from Montreal. The acquisition of the Atlantic and North-Western charter, and the expenditure under that charter of a considerable sum of money in connecting the Canadian Pacific Railway with the Grand Trunk Railway by a line around the mountain at Montreal, is, of course, embraced within their charter. The expenditure to secure a controlling interest in the South-Eastern Railway was, of course, for the purpose of enabling them to place themselves in a position to draw traffic to the Canadian Pacific Railway, from the Atlantic seaboard, whether at New York, or Boston, or Portland.”

The hon. gentleman did not say anything about the other side of the question, that it was for the purpose of enabling them by the speediest and shortest route to reach the seaboard and make an American port the entrepot of the western trade, to carry along the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and to ship from an American port the products of that great western country which he is opening up, although he promised so frequently this trade should go through British territory, and through a British port. He continued:

Why did not the hon. member give expression to his anxiety in some tangible shape? What do we value it at when it is merely a lip assurance in this House, when he does not put it in the contract, now that he has power to do so? If the hon. gentleman had taken the ground that this was a commercial road which should be built on commercial principles alone, that the Company had the right, and it was our interest to carry the produce by the speediest route to market, he then could have justified his policy—for that is his policy now—of having the seaport for the exportation of the produce of the west in the United States. But he did not do so. He built the line around the north of Lake Superior, not because, from a commercial point of view, it was the shortest or the best and the speediest, but because he wanted a line on British territory. He made it much longer than it need have been, on the ground that it must be a through Canadian line. Why does he not apply this principle when he comes down to the Maritime Provinces? If commercial principles are to be abandoned, as far as the west is concerned, why are they not abandoned when the east is concerned? If the line is to be built on national, as antagonistic to commercial, principles, I ask that the same principle be applied to the eastern section of the country, as well as the western. Now that the Company are on their knees asking the tax-payers of this county for $30,000,000 more, let the Government say to them: Yes, if you are to have it, you must give up your monopolies, your other privileges which you obtained in the first instance, and which are found to be oppressive, and you must put your winter outport, not in American but in British territory; give us the advantages to be reaped from your trade, and do not carry your trade to a foreign country! If the hon. Minister would do that, he might expect the support, not only of his own side of the House, but of a large number of people in this country, who, I am satisfied, would be opposed to the scheme as it at present stands. I was sorry to see him treat almost with ridicule—for that is practically what he did—the claim of the Maritime seaports to be the winter port of the Dominion. He talked about St. John, Halifax, St. Andrews, Louisburg, I think it was, and Quebec. But the hon. gentleman knows well he cannot have four or five winter ports. He knows very well that there can be only one winter port, and that the real terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway is Liverpool. No man knows better than he that it is as important to have cheap rates to Liverpool from our winter port, wherever it may be, as it is to have cheap rates from the west to the winter port; and he knows well he can have only cheap rates by concentrating the shipping in one place. If you diffuse the shipping over half a dozen ports, the result will be high rates, while concentrated in one port the contrary will result; as in New York, for instance, where, at times, there is a great plethora of shipping, grain will be carried for almost nothing. It is the duty of the hon. gentleman, as a responsible Minister of the Crown, to fix on a port, to declare it in his contract, and to tell this House what port he has selected. His decision, it is true, might not satisfy every section of the country, but with that we have nothing to do. It would satisfy the people, as a whole, that he had chosen the best port, and by so doing he will have carried out some of his promises, whereas now he has not carried out any. The result will be that we will be the sufferers, and the American people will be the gainers. I wish to say one word more before I conclude with respect to a question which I consider of very great importance to this House and the country, that is the question whether or not this is a final proposition. When the Canadian Pacific Railway contract was entered into, some years ago, it was argued strongly by hon. gentlemen opposite, as a good reason for entering into it, that the proposition was one which would rid us once and for all of all responsibility. I will read but one statement which came officially from a member of the Government in answer to a complaint of the leader of the Opposition that he feared very much, from reading that contract, that the $25,000,000 was not the last money we would be called on to vote. I fear, said in substance, the leader of the Opposition, that this country and Parliament will be called on at no distant day to supplement that $25,000,000 by further grants. He was ridiculed by hon. members opposite, and the hon. Minister of Public Works rose in his place to reply on that very point. He told the House there was no ground for the complaint of the leader of the Opposition, but that, on the contrary, if there was one thing that recommended this scheme to his mind, and ought to recommend it to the minds of the people, it was that it was a final scheme. Once for all, he said, the people will get rid of the constantly recurring demands which are being made upon them for money to build this great enterprise. I had better read the hon. gentleman's own language. On the 17th of December, 1880, he said, in reply to the hon. leader of the Opposition, who was complaining of this 'want of finality :

"What does the hon. gentleman want? Does he want to drive a hard bargain with those hon. gentlemen? (Those gentlemen were the Syndicate.) What reason would there be in attempting to cut them down to as small a figure as possible, in order to make the Company a poor Company? It is to our interest, and the interest of the Company, that the Company should be able to construct the railway, and to work it afterwards, so that they should not come back to us year after year and ask us for new terms."

There was the reason given by the hon. gentleman speaking officially in 1880. I grant you, he says, we are giving them enormous subsidies; I grant you we are giving them a princely dowry, but we are doing it so that it shall be final, and they shall not come back and ask for more. Where are we now? Two or three short years have gone by, and the same gentlemen are coming back and knocking at our exchequer doors and asking for thirty millions more. Where is the Minister of Public Works? What position is he going to take on this new demand? He is going to back it up. As a member of the Government he is going to support it, and to vote for it, and to ask his friends to vote for it, and to use all the power he possesses in this House to induce hon. members to vote for it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Very likely.

Mr. DAVIES. I should think it was a certainty, or he would not remain a member of the Government that brought down the proposition. But the position he takes to-day is very strange in view of the position he took three short years ago, when he sought to make the people of this country swallow these enormous subsidies. I will read on:

"We want, once for all, to settle the whole question, so as to say to the Company: 'This is the settlement, you build that railway for that amount of money and land, and work it, and we must have a guarantee for the working of it for the first ten years.'"

The Minister of Railways says that guarantee is a mere nominal thing.

Mr. MACKENZIE. He does not hear you.

Mr. DAVIES. If he does not hear me, I hope other hon. members will hear me.

Mr. DAVIES.

"a guarantee for the working of it for the first ten years, after the building of the road, because, if you work that road for ten years, we may be sure that you will work it afterwards, as there will, by that time, be population enough in the country to secure a profitable trade for the road. More than that, I say that Parliament and the Government must show the Company that they are not our enemies, but that they are the friends of the country; and that we must treat them in the best way possible, taking into consideration the interest of the country at large. If we starve them now by giving them a small subsidy in land and money, and then tax them after they have built their road, the result will be that they will come back to us afterwards and say: 'We cannot go on. We do not want that; we want a strong company that will be a credit to the country, and be competent to carry forward that great national work, the Pacific Railway.'"

Further on he says, in the same speech, about twenty lines further on:

"We expect that our country, which is great in many ways, will be as great in certain respects as the United States; and we want a great and good railway, and also to put it on a proper footing, so as to prevent its owners coming back to us and saying: 'You starve us to death, and we want more money.'"

Here is the refrain running through all his speech: I grant you we are giving them immense amounts of money, but we are doing it on the principle that it is final, once and for all, and they must never come back. And I fancy, if the hon. gentleman had been asked then, what will you do if they come back, how indignantly he would have exclaimed: "I would not give them another cent; I would not listen to any further demands." The hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Casgrain) said, in answer to that, "We have the guarantee," and the Minister of Public Works said; "We have the guarantee, no doubt; but, perhaps, the hon. gentleman would prefer to see them come to ask for better terms. I am not of that opinion, nor is the Government." He was not of that opinion then; what is he now? where is he now, Sir?

Mr. BÉCHARD. He has changed his mind.

Mr. DAVIES. Yes, he has changed his mind; and so have all the members of the Government changed their minds, and they ask the country and they ask their supporters to change their minds, and to make another raid upon the Treasury of this country to the tune of $31,000,000. Well, Sir, let us see whether we have any guarantee whatever that this is to be final. I say we have no guarantee, and I argue it in this way: I see by the statement I read from the Company's official document, put forth in December, 1882, that they there stated that the road could be built from Montreal to Port Moody for the subsidy of $25,000,000, the land grant bonds of $20,000,000, and the proceeds of $90,000,000 of Canadian Pacific Railway bonds at 60 per cent., or $54,000,000, making in all $99,000,000. In April, 1883, Mr. Stephen writes to the Grand Trunk Railway directors: "In other words, taking the $90,000,000 of share capital at the issue price of 60 per cent., the actual cash cost of the 3,544 miles of railway and 17,000,000 of acres of land to the shareholders will be $54,000,000,"—the result of the sale of the bonds at 60 per cent., $25,000,000 of subsidy, and $20,000,000 of land grant bonds. So we have there two distinct statements made by him at distinct times, one to his own shareholders, when asking them to invest, one to the Grand Trunk Railway, in both of which he declares that the cost of the road would be $99,000,000, and now we have a statement which he made public the other day, I think it is dated February the 5th, laid upon the Table of the House here in the Returns, in which he makes the following estimate:—Instead of costing $99,000,000, they have already expended, he says, $58,695,000, and the cost of completion will not exceed $27,000,000, making altogether $85,000,000 odd. Now, there is a discrepancy of $13,000,000 between the estimate made by Mr. Stephen, in December, 1882, and repeated by him, in April, 1883, and his estimate made now, when he considers it desirable to ask us for more money. Which statement are we to accept? Which is correct? The hon. the Minister of Railways stated that he had an additional guarantee of the accuracy of this statement from the report of his subordinate, Mr. Schreiber; but, when he was pressed upon the point, he was compelled to acknowledge that Mr. Schreiber's report was not based upon any data, that there had been no actual survey made of the line, that it was a mere acceptance by Mr. Schreiber of the statement made by the Canadian Pacific Railway gentlemen themselves, to which no weight can be attached. But that $13,000,000 does not represent the discrepancy between the two estimates. Why? Because, in that last estimate of $85,000,000, which is $13,000,000 less than the first estimate, there are two items contained which are not in his estimate of $90,000,000 at all—one of $3,500,000 spent in acquiring the line to the seaboard at Portland, and the other of $6,000,000 out of the $8,710,240 which they have deposited with the Government as security for the interest on the bonds. Neither of these two items, making together $9,500,000, was embraced in their first estimate at all. So the House stands to-day in this position, that Mr. Stephen now, and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company now, estimate the cost of the construction of that road, when they are applying to us for relief and for money, at $77,000,000 of money, whereas a year ago they estimated the cost of the same road at $99,000,000. There is a discrepancy of $22,000,000. I can never satisfy my mind that there can be any finality in this measure with that discrepancy existing. I have no doubt in my own mind—I may be wrong, but I form my conclusions from what I have stated to the House, and it seems to me the argument is a good one—I have not the shadow of a doubt that, before two years roll over the head of the people of this country, an application will be made here to advance that $22,000,000 additional. What position will you be in then? You will have to grant it. Every argument that can be used now in favour of this proposal will be used with ten-fold effect then. Talk about 10,000 men out of employment. They can put 19,000 men on for a time, while the proposition is being made, and threaten to turn them out, threaten that the work cannot go on. The grand speech the Minister of Railways made, the appeal to our patriotism and so on, can be made then. Those who opposed it will be denounced in the very same language—as decrying their country, as having no patriotism, simply because, Sir, on reasonable and fair grounds, they refuse to vote away $30,000,000 of the people's money until they have some better reasons advanced for it than those put forward during this debate. Now, Sir, there is one other statement of the hon. Minister of Railways which I would like to deal with. That hon. gentleman stated, and he made it a very strong ground of appeal to this House, that the Company had already expended out of their own funds over $23,000,000 on the contracted line. The statement, Sir, if true, is a very strong argument in favour of the position which the hon. gentleman assumes—that they had expended $23,000,000 of their own money. I have the hon. gentleman's language here, and I would like to read a few words. He says:

“On the main line between Callander and Port Moody—on the eastern and central sections—with improvements made on the Government line west of Cross Lake, the expenditures have been as follows—

“Now, Sir, of cash received from Government sources there was—
And he gives the items, making in all $21,795,999.

“showing an excess of expenditure on the main line made by the Company over all they have received from Government sources, of no less than $23,743,305. Under these circumstances it will hardly be said again by any intelligent man that they have taken the money that they have received from the Government under their contract, and put it into outside operations.”

I wish to tell the hon. gentlemen on that side of the House, that “these circumstances” do not exist; that the statement is not a fair statement of the facts; and, I think, I will be able to show it in one moment. Now, Sir, let us analyse for one moment the statement made by the hon. Minister showing a total expenditure of $58,000,000, and showing the startling figures that they had expended on their main line out of their own pockets, $23,743,000. I say that statement is not a correct one when you come to analyse the figures. I say it is not correct, Sir, because that statement includes the following payments, which have nothing whatever to do, directly, with the contract they made with this country. It includes, in the first place, the Credit Valley Railway bonds, $485,000. The hon. gentlemen will not contend that that is part of the original contract, or that it has anything to do with the original contract, or that it is part of the main line, as I hear an hon. gentleman suggest on the other side. Then there was $600,000 embraced in it which they have advanced to the Canada and North-West Land Company, or spent in sustaining the stock of the Canada North-West Land Company. I say that is no part of the bargain we made with this Company. Then there was the South-Eastern Railway, $1,582,000; the Atlantic and North-Western Railway Company, $157,000; the St. Lawrence and Ottawa Railway Company, $70,000; and the steamers, $552,000 making a total on that western branch of the line, of money spent by them outside their contract with us, and which the hon. Minister has embraced as within the contract, of $3,446,000. Now, Sir, come down further eastward. On the line from Montreal Callander and Brockville they spent $3,270,000. That was not in the original contract. The rolling stock, shops, materials, &c., for this line between Montreal and Brockville and Callander, $2,140,000; on the Algoma branch and the Western Division branch, $3,760,000, making a total of $9,170,000 on that part of the road. Not one of these sums was within the contract they made with us, and still the hon. Minister embraces them in his calculation. Then, Sir, there is the advance which they made to secure the guarantee by the Government for the payment of interest on their bonds, for the next ten years, $8,710,000. Then there is an item of $460,000 for fuel, which surely ought to be charged to running expenses and not to capital expenditure. There is a general stores item of $844,000; advances to carriers, $473,000, making a total of $10,487,000. Then there is the floating debt which we provide and pay, and which the hon. Minister included in the sum which they had expended, provided for by them. Why, Sir, we are asked to take it out of the Treasury and pay it now, ourselves. They did not provide it, except in the most limited and technical sense; substantially we provide it for the railway to pay. The hon. Minister has also included the advance to the contracting company of $600,000. Now, Sir, is there an item I have read to this House which can be properly charged as expenditure, which should be included on the expenditure of the line they contracted to build? Not one dollar. That makes a total of $31,203,000. Deduct that from the $58,700,000 which they say they spent—and I have no reason to doubt the accuracy of their figures in that respect—and the actual expenditure on the line they contracted with this company to build is only $27,597,000, including the interest—as my hon. friend reminds me they have paid it on their stock. Now, Sir, of that $27,500,000 how much have they received from us? They have received, in subsidies, $12,300,000; they have received in land grant bonds, $9,200,000, although I see that it is about $100,000 more than they give credit for, which $100,000 are in the hands of the Government. For bonuses, $250,000; for town sites, $480,000; so, Sir, of the $27,500,000 which they have spent on the line they have contracted to build, they have received $22,230,000 from this Government, and from this country—leaving what, as put in by themselves—leaving the sum of only $5,000,000, the original amount of their stock put into this great enterprise by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, so far as it relates to the line they contracted with this country to build. So, Sir, I say that, instead of having put in $23,000,000 of their own money, as the hon. Minister stated, they have put in but the $5,000,000 of stock they have subscribed, and not a dollar more. I say that the argument upon which he based his statement, that because they had put in so much of their own money, no further charge should ever be made that they had applied Government moneys to outside projects, and that, therefore, no further opposition should be made to the scheme, I say, so far as that argument was based upon these figures, it is a fallacious one, without any foundation whatever. But my strongest argument against the proposition is, that it is not a finality. It was said that the interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the interest of the country were so bound up together that the two were like man and wife. Sir, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is not Canada's bride yet. The bans were published once, and when they were published we gave her a dowry greater than any princess ever received from mortal man. The bans are being published now a second time, and we supplement the magnificent dowry with $30,000,000 more. When are the bans going to be published the third time? I wonder when they are so published, if any further demand will be made. Will they ask, in the historical terms, send me another $10,000; or will it be, send me another $10,000,000? This Company does not deal in thousands, it does not think in thousands; as their manager says, one or two millions more or less is nothing to them in an estimate. A demand will come, "Give me another $10,000,000;" and when it comes, I will venture to predict that it will come with greater, more irresistible force and supported by stronger arguments than those which have been advanced in favour of this proposal. I oppose this present scheme, therefore, because of the want of information justifying the House in voting $30,000,000. I oppose it because, to my mind, it has been proved demonstratively by my leader that a prudent expenditure of the means within their grasp would have enabled them to carry out this contract without asking Canada to expend another dollar. I oppose it because, to my mind, it presents no element of finality, and because, I believe, that before another two years have passed over our heads, we will be asked to add to our present endowment another $30,000,000.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I think the House will fully appreciate the difficult circumstances which surround me in attempting to speak upon this question. I think I feel as deeply as any hon. member opposite feels the importance of this question, the importance of the issues which are involved, and of the consequences which will result from our decision. I also feel that the subject presented to us is, in its main points, exceedingly simple; its salient points are but few, and these have been so thoroughly discussed by the strongest minds in this House, on both sides of it—and that is a compliment to the hon. member who has just sat down, which I am glad to make—that it leaves me very little chance with the exception of going over most of the ground which has been travelled before. We had, in the first place, the very lucid and very strong statement by the Minister of Railways dealing with this whole matter. Following him, we had an equally strong and equally long statement by the hon. leader of the Opposition, placing his side of the question before the House. Then, Sir, he was followed by the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), who in a temperate, well digested and lengthy speech, in which

I thought I detected something of a malicious spirit as if he intended to dig into all sides of this question and thoroughly exhaust every possible calculation so as to try the ingenuity of those who might be so unfortunate as to come after him. When that hon. gentleman concluded the House was treated to a speech on this question by another hon. member who, in his clever, striking and rollicking way, finding there was not much to hit in the question itself, struck right and left as each idea seemed to come out of the experience or incidents of the past. Then we had a comparatively short but remarkably able and patriotic speech by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), who dealt with the question not only to the amusement and interest of the House, but also to the edification of the country. I must not omit to state that the hon. gentleman was followed by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Casgrain), who with his massive figures and logical presentation of facts made that same remarkable impression upon the House which he almost always makes upon it when he addresses it, and contributed his quota to the elucidation of this great subject. Then the House was treated to an hour or two hours disquisition by the hon. member for King's (Mr. Woodworth), not King's, New Brunswick, but King's, Nova Scotia, for whom I have somewhat of a fellow feeling, because we represent constituencies of the same name if not exactly of the same character. That hon. member laid the heavy hand of contribution upon all history, modern and profane, upon philosophy, moral and otherwise, and exhausted the poets, both sacred, ancient and modern. And now, Sir, we have listened to the elaborate and vigorous and strongly put, if not altogether argumentative and pertinent arguments of the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies). Sir, I was a little amused, I am still a little amused; he began by complaining very much that other hon. members had not the remarkable power of concentration which he always exhibits, of omitting all outside issues and centralising his great power and strong reasoning upon the only issue before the House and the country. He complained very much that some other hon. members had taken up the time of the House in speaking a long time on topics outside of the point at issue; and yet by the clock which faces me he spent one hour and five minutes before he came to the point at all, when he announced that he was going to give strong and cogent reasons why this proposal should not be looked upon with favour by the House. Sir, the hon. gentleman had fault to find with the hon. member for King's, N.S., because he commenced at Jerusalem and ended at Longfellow's "Ship of State." I could not help feeling, before the hon. gentlemen had spent an hour or an hour and a quarter in getting to the point, that it was better to begin at Jerusalem and end at the "Ship of State," than to begin nowhere and end at the same place. The hon. gentleman started out with a very vigorous attack upon the malignity displayed by this side of the House, and then with remarkable truthfulness he turned round to his own side of the House and administered to it a full slap on the forehead when he pronounced that malignity a reciprocal malignity. We do not talk of reciprocity between members of the same family; we talk of reciprocity as a means of communication between members of different families and different nations; consequently, if this malignity which he declares has been shown by hon. members on this side of the House is reciprocal malignity, his own side, by his own admission, must have as large a share as we have. The hon. gentleman talked a little while about Conservative want of patriotism, and then in a very dark and mysterious but remarkably knowing way he hinted that if the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) only wished he could give the House very interesting information as to some very dark and tricky ways of which he had had experience while a member of the Conservative party. Well, that is characteristic, we know. You will always find when a man has not facts at hand and arguments which he can produce, he will always say that if he desired he could produce them, and if they were necessary they could be brought forth. Why did not the hon. gentleman in that long review of all pic-nics which had taken place from the western coast of British Columbia to the furthest point of Cape Breton, give a single quotation from these speeches of my hon. friend from Cardwell (Mr. White) in which were uttered those damaging and damning statements with respect to this country, thereby displaying a terrible lack of patriotism? It is all very well to say, in general terms, that such and such a thing could have been done, or has been done. I have often had a man come to me and make a great, big, large, general assertion; but the only thing which was necessary to quiet and cow such a man was to take him by the button hole and say: "Sir, I want the bill of particulars," and you had him quite cowed when you made that demand. It is easy to deal in general assertions; any person can do that, but it is a difficult thing to bring things specifically to a point. There are not many men, comparatively, who can do it, and I am inclined to think my hon. friend from Queen's, P. M. I. (Mr. Davies) falls amongst the latter category. The hon. gentleman begged the indulgence of the House for reading from Hansard. I was glad that he did read from Hansard, and I do not think he had any reason for begging pardon from members of this House for doing so; in fact I came to the conclusion that if the larger portion of his speech had consisted of quotations from Hansard, it would have contributed quite as much to the edification of this House and very much more to his own reputation than it did. The hon. gentleman delighted in representing the Syndicate, or the Railway Company, as being on their knees before this House and before the country. Sir, that is not an honest way of putting the matter; it is not an ingenuous way of placing it. I do not know of any set of men who are on their knees abjectly begging before this Parliament. Let us take a parallel case. Let us suppose that the hon. gentleman who sits in his seat before me, smiling so complacently, should engage a contractor to build his house, that the contractor had started upon the house, that he had made his plans and calculations for raising the money, but found when the house was three-fourths completed, that his plans had, somehow or other, not turned out as he anticipated. Suppose he came to the hon. gentleman and said: "Sir, you see the amount of material I have; the amount of property I possess; I want an advance of money from you, as a loan, of so many thousand dollars. I have property good and realizable to the extent of five times the amount, and, if you will give me that loan I will finish the contract in two months instead of eight, and I will pay you a percentage on your money as large as you can get elsewhere." Would the hon. gentleman be justified in stating to his neighbour that this contractor was down on his knees, before him, asking for money? I think not, and I take it that this is an exactly similar or nearly similar case in point. The hon. gentleman delights in representing this amount as a drain upon the Treasury, and not having the fate of many hon. gentlemen on his side of the House in his eyes, he indulges in precise prophecies. Sir, the preciseness of Vennor's prophecies amounts to nothing beside his; Wiggins snow storm fame has no chance to light a candle beside the hon. member for Queen's, comparing the preciseness, the earnestness and the certainty with which they respectively predict. And he is equally precise as to the time; he does not leave himself much of a margin. He does not say, at some future time, or in a number of years, but in two years. In two years he says the Company will be, where? They will be here; they will not be importuning the Government somewhere else, but before this House, this Parliament, and for what? Asking them for a sum of money. And with what delightful precision the hon. gentleman states that sum of money; it will be exactly twenty-two and a half millions, not a dollar less or a dollar more. Now, Sir, let me hold up before the eyes of the gentlemen present, this prophecy. Let me ask my hon. friend from Queen's, especially, to jot it down in his note book, for fear he may forget, and if he and I live just two years from this 12th day of February, 1884, we will meet some place, and compare notes with reference to this prophecy. If I am not greatly mistaken, if I had a reputation to lose, I would not care to risk it in such a reckless way as the hon. gentleman has risked his reputation to-day. The hon. gentleman, like two or three others before me, attacked my hon. friend from Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), on a point on which my hon. friend's words probably led him to be misunderstood as conveying an idea which he did not wish to convey. It was this: that the Conservative party would lose their prestige, or, in other words, that it would be bad for the Conservative party if these Resolutions were not carried, and that, therefore, the Conservative party must vote for them, not because it was good and necessary for the country, but because it was good and necessary for the Conservative party, and thus party considerations were placed above patriotic considerations. Sir, that, I apprehend, was not the intention of the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe. What he meant to say was this: that the Conservative party in this railway policy had a record which had gone before the country, and that record should not be falsified by their not carrying out, to the very letter, the idea with which they started, and with which they went before the people. What was that policy? The policy of the Liberal Conservative party has been: a railway, a railway on Canadian territory, a railway completed just as quickly as it possibly can be completed. In pursuance of that policy, in 1880 and 1881, they made a contract with the Syndicate which bound them to build the road by 1891. Sir, the Conservative party went to the country largely on that question, they relied on these terms and conditions, and the country took them at their word, and sent them back here with a majority of seventy to carry out that idea. I say that we have an honourable and honest right to state, that the Conservative party has a policy and a record in this respect—a policy in favour of building this trans-continental line of railway as soon as it possibly can be built; and that the Conservative party, by the vast majority by which it was returned, in 1882, has been sent here, commissioned to carry out that idea, and that they would fail in their record, fail in their duty to this House and to the people who sent them here by such a majority, if they did not carry out that idea with all the speed and promptness compatible with safety and security. That is what the hon. member from Richmond and Wolfe meant; that is what hon. members knew he meant, and that is something which should not be misunderstood or misrepresented. The hon. gentleman has asked a question and asked it with a great deal of earnestness. He asks: "Has a single meeting been held in this country, in favour of this loan?" The hon. gentleman knows that that is just the reverse of the way in which it should be put. When the people make no sign, what is the inference therefrom? That they acquiesce; that they are in agreement with, and favour the plan which is proposed. Ever since this House sat, and it sat early, it has been before the country that additional legislation would be had with reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the idea has been mooted and sent abroad that that additional legislation would either make a provision for an increased out-and-out gift or a subsidy, or would take the form of a loan. That information has been before the country for a month or more. For nearly two months that idea has been before the country; and yet I challenge the hon. gentleman to point to the record of a single public meeting which has been called to protest against the proposed action of this Government. I say that is proof conclusive that the public mind has settled down to acquiescence in these proposals. Before his argument can have a feather's weight with the country or this House, the hon. gentleman will have to get up an agitation outside the party press, and show a spontaneous uprising of the people here and there throughout the country in protest against these terms.

After Recess.

Mr. FOSTER. In the remarks I was addressing to the House, I was dealing with the new or salient points of objection that had been raised by the hon. member for Queen's. I did not exhaust all the points which were made, and which were merely iterations or repetitions of those that had been made and largely answered in speeches which preceded. In the remarks which I shall now address to the House, I wish to speak first, Sir, of three broad, general facts, upon which is based a necessity, as I think, for the position which we take with reference to this whole railroad question. I wish, then, to speak for a few moments of the question as it is presented to us in the Resolutions which are before the House; and afterwards I propose, with the kind indulgence of the House, to take some notice of the points which have been raised and put forth as arguments why these Resolutions should not pass. In the first place, then, with regard to the three broad or general facts upon which, as I think, is based the railroad policy of this party, as embodied in its latest phase in the Resolutions before the House, we often hear the remark, Sir, that a country does not amount to much without a people. That is very true; but I think it is equally true that a people never amounts to much without a country. I believe, Sir, that the material is not by any means the most important factor in the development of national greatness, and the upbuilding of national permanency. I believe, Sir, that there is a sentiment, indefinable, but very strong and very creative, which is sometimes known by the name of patriotism, which is written as one of the broadest facts upon the history of the past, which is no less a fact in the development of the present, and which no statesman and no deliberative assembly can afford to ignore. It is that feeling, Sir, which makes us proud and confident of our own country, which creates within us a desire, an overmastering desire, to make it rival, and if possible excel, any other country, which calls forth the best energies of a people to embody and realize that desire, which joins together dismembered parts and diversities of opinion and of interest in order to attain the object desired, which throws its halo, Sir, of hope and confidence over the darkest period of a nation's development, and which crowns seeming impossibilities with triumphant success. This feeling, Sir, I believe to be a factor which is indispensable in the development of any people, dowered even with the richest material resources, and a factor which has been proved over and over again in the history of the world, to have brought forth wonderful transformations, to have built up splendid and enduring nationalities out of elements which have been disjointed, disunited and surrounded with difficulties. If you, Sir, and the House will pardon me for a moment, I may be allowed to remark that years ago, when seated, as a school boy, on the school form and making my first explorations into that wonderful field of geography and history, following out, with all a boy's eager enthusiasm, the birth, the progress, the growth and the splendid outflowing of national greatness, I was interested in every step, I participated in every struggle, I felt sad at every reverse, and I rejoiced at every victory; and I remember perfectly well the feeling that often and often came foremost in my mind, that I wished I, too, were a citizen of a country which was large and great—which either had in its storied past a grandeur to fall back upon, or which had a future out of which it could carve that grandeur for itself. I felt the lack of that, I felt a spirit stirring within me, a desire that that void might be filled. As I have grown, I have felt more and more the yearning for a country of which I might be proud, of which the future possibilities were grand, and might be said to be almost illimitable. There were many other boys in similar forms, in similar schools, all over this Dominion, that were feeling the very same lack and had the very same desire stirring within them. There had been boys of generations previous who had felt the same lack, and had been stirred with a similar desire. These boys, of generations past, have grown up to be men, but they have not lost their desire. Those of my own generation are growing up to be men, but they have lost none of the ardor and strength of that desire, and out of that desire, born generations back and nurtured through the generations that intervened, there sprang the idea of Confederation, which, in 1867, became a fixed fact. I welcomed the idea of Confederation. I welcomed it at the outset, outside of all the difficulties and conditions which surrounded it. I left the arrangement of these difficulties to older heads. It was sufficient to me that the idea which had been born within me, which had been nurtured and was strong within me, had at last come to its embodiment and had been engrafted in the country. Our four Provinces became a country. The provincial life which had been bounded by narrow limits flowed out afresh in a wider sweep and came back again to the different parts of the confederated Provinces fraught with a new life and a new impulse. But that was not all that was needed. These four Provinces of Canada that became merged in one Dominion were old; their names were familiar; they had been known from the seventeenth century. The names of Upper and Lower Canada, New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia, were old familiar names, the mention of which excited no fresh enthusiasm, awakened no new interest, had no new attractive power. Outside of the impulse which the confederation of those four Provinces gave to the life of the people of those Provinces, the Confederation of 1867 stopped short of that which was needed. There was needed after that the electric shock of a new idea; the new idea that there was a background of illimitable resources, that there was a country with a great prospect and a wonderful fertility which should stand as the background of the old picture to attract to us the attention, not only of people nearly related to us in blood and friendship, but the attention and the gaze of the civilized world. The very same thing should occur here that was necessary when the life of Europe had become stagnant in its veins. Its people, looking out across the Atlantic Ocean, descried the far distant shores of a new country, opened up to themselves a new world and were filled with an impulse to which they had been strangers for centuries past. New enterprises were set on foot, and out of the older world streamed into the newer many immigrants; out of it flowed many a department of progress which found not only its development in the new world, but brought back that width of movement, that breadth of idea, that strong spirit of liberty, which, returning upon the motherland and fatherland, have done more to bring about liberty of Government and liberty of social development than any one influence with which we are acquainted. The very same was necessary when the New England States had grown to be old. All at once the great west was opened; a wonderful background of widest promise for the development of the richest resources, and this attracted the gaze of Europe and brought its stream of emigrants and made its enterprise and spirit and impulse of life, wide and broad and deep. That same thing was necessary for our Confederation of 1867, and it came in 1870-71 and 1872. The new North-West was opened to the gaze of the world, was annexed to the older Provinces, and we possessed a Dominion which extended from the Atlantic to the Pacific and which then had its wide resources, great fertility, and wonderful power, first opened to the gaze and attracting the attention of the world. In 1867 we gained a country. In 1870 and 1872 we extended that country to wide bounds and made it more a country to be proud of, with greater resources and greater possibilities than we had hoped for at the period of the first amalgamation of the Provinces. But something was necessary besides this. The elements that made up this new country of 1871-72, were widely diversified and widely scattered. British Columbians had hardly heard of Nova Scotians and New Brunswickers. The Province of Quebec with a different language, different blood, and a different mode of expressing its religious aspirations lay very largely unknown to people of the Maritime Provinces and the people of even the western and newer Provinces. It was necessary, in order that we should have a great country of which we could be proud, that we should have a united country. The very same spirit which drove us into Confederation in 1867, which drove us to the extension of our territory in 1870, stopped not, would not stop, will never stop until the country is amalgamated and united in the best possible way. What are the different methods of growing people together and uniting them? If we go back and take a slight look at the history of the world what do we find these things to be? They are first race and language. The people of the same race, the people of the same language, separated from others of a different race and a different language, and necessarily thrown in upon themselves, are amalgamated, are united, are forced to make a community in themselves and grow up with mutual interests and mutual objects. These, Sir, were the two chief things that united the nationality of the Greeks, which, with a different language and a different blood, sprung up from the old world, which, with a language that was not spoken by those who bordered upon them, made of the outside world barbarians, and united them together in the strong and permanent bonds of a national life. Sir, there is another influence which may unite countries together—it is the influence of government. One country grows up with a republican form of government, another with a monarchical form of government. The very fact that these two exist side by side—different forms of government—has a tendency to throw together all who live under the one form of government, and to throw together all who live under the other form of government, and so to make the two nationalities cling closer together in their interests and in their mutual relations. There is also, I think, Sir, another influence which binds nationalities together. It is this, Sir: it is the influence of similarity or oneness of institution—institution in its broadest sense, taking in the benevolent and charitable institutions, taking in the religious institutions, the educational institutions, all that we may group under this broad name of the institutions of a people. These, I think, are the three chief influences which, in the past, and, to a certain extent, in the present, tend to unite groups of people in the oneness of a national life, in a unity of aim and of interest. Now, Sir, the point of my remarks, in travelling thus far, as it may seem to some hon. gentlemen, outside of the record, is this: to show that, in this new country, neither of these three can be considered a factor in making a complete and united nationality of the Dominion of Canada. It cannot, Sir, be race and language, for the country to the south of us has the same blood in its veins, speaks the same language, and it forms no dividing line between the two; and, consequently, it throws neither the one nor the other back to seek a unity and oneness amongst itself. Neither is there a sufficient difference in government between ourselves and the country to the south of us. There is, when we come to dig down to the essence of these two forms of government, a fundamental difference which is of the greatest importance, and which I hope, standing here with my present thought and my present feeling, to see perpetuated instead of to see obliterated; but, for the general mass of the people of these two countries, there is no very perceptible difference of government which should keep the two apart. Neither is there any perceptible difference of institutions. Our forms of education, our religious establishments, all those which are grouped under the name of institutions are very much the same. What is it, then, that, in this day and on this continent, with respect to these two peoples of which I am speaking, the Canadian people and the people of the United States, can tend to bring us, draw us, and hold us together in bonds of national unity, with a oneness of aim and a oneness of interest. I think I will speak within the knowledge of all when I say that there is only one thing to do it, that is, a continuous, a speedy, and an uninterrupted bond of communication between all parts of the country, making every distinct member and section of this country easy of access to every other member and section of the country. That is the element that is to bind us together. Our merchants are to know each other from British Columbia to Cape Breton; our people are to become acquainted with each other from the Provinces by the sea to the Provinces in the far North-West, as long as and wherever they may be formed; we are to draw together as the members of one family; Ontario is to cease sitting down here by the broad lake, thinking that she is sufficient to herself, and caring nothing for those who are about her, especially the smaller Provinces away by the sea; the smaller Provinces down by the sea are to forget their prejudices against these upper Provinces, and are to become better acquainted with them in interest and in social relations; the Province of Quebec is to come and join hands with the people of the other Provinces, and we of the other Provinces are to become better acquainted with our confrères of the Province of Quebec, and, learning to know them better, are to learn to like them better. So, in all ways, whatever can take place to bind together the trade interest, the social interest, all the interests of the different parts of this great Confederation, is the thing which shall draw us together, keep us together, and make of us a living and progressive unity, in a national or country point of view. Now, one step farther. What is the kind of communication which we can have which shall join these Provinces together? Can we have a water communication which would be sufficient? No, Sir; that is impossible. Outside of the difficulty of having a water communication at any season of the year for more than one half the width of this great continent of ours, there is another half of the year when the ice king lays his hand upon that form of communication, and makes it impassable to us. The only form of communication which is adequate, which is continuous, which is uninterrupted and uniform is that communication which comes from the construction and opening and completion of a trans-continental line of railway, which shall gather, Sir, in one hand the outlying Provinces of the far east, and in the other the outlying Provinces of the far west, and shall unite in bonds of intercourse and trade and social communication all the different parts of this country with every other part. Now, the whole point of this latter train of thought, in connection with the other two, is this: I honestly believe that, if all the politicians of 1867 and all the newspapers of 1867 had joined themselves to battle down this idea of the confederation of the Provinces, they might have retarded it, but a generation or two would have raised up a new set of politicians and planted a new set of newspaper presses which would have brought to its development and embodiment that longed-for, wished-for idea of a union of these Provinces. I believe in the same way that, if all these different influences had chosen to pit themselves against the attainment, against the opening up and joining to these Provinces of the North-West Territory and the more remote Provinces, they might have hindered and retarded it for a time; but it was in the hearts of the people, and could only be hindered for a time, it must reach its fruition and have its embodiment. In the same way, I earnestly and honestly believe that this same idea is as warm and deep and earnest in the hearts of the people, that the confederation of the four Provinces is not complete, that the confederation and joining together of every part of this Dominion is not complete, that it will not be held to be complete, until the iron bands of a railway, trans-continental and Canadian, shall join every part of this great Dominion together in the bonds of commercial and of social intercourse. Therefore, I was in favour of Confederation because it gave us a country, I was in favour of this expansion to the bounds we now have, because it gave us a great and illimitable country, I am in favour, and cannot but be in favour, of the speedy and quick and certain construction of that which is essentially necessary to make us a united, and so a permanent, a successful, and a progressive people. So much then for these thoughts, these three broad facts which lead up inevitably to the policy which has been adopted by this party, and which is propounded by the Government which this party has formed, which has been initiated by them, and in furtherance of which the Resolutions which we at present have before us are being discussed. Now, Sir, when we come to this solid foundation, that a railroad, a trans-continental railroad, is necessary for us in order to complete the idea of the unity and oneness of this country, three great plans are presented, or have been presented, to the people of this country. There was, Sir, the plan of 1872, which offered to grant 54,700,000 acres of land and $30,000,000 to a company for the building of the road. There was a second plan of 1874 by which it was proposed to grant $10,000 cash as a subsidy per mile, 10,000 acres of land as a subsidy per mile, and 4 per cent. on any balance which was considered necessary to complete the different contracts, for the period of twenty-five years. In 1881 there was a third plan, which we are now discussing—to a certain extent—by which a company was to be given $25,000,000, 25,000,000 acres of land, and completed railway to the amount of $28,000,000. I may state, Sir, that very early in the consideration of this great question it came to be a settled fact that this road should be constructed, if possible, not by a Government but by a company. Well, Sir, of these three plans, which can we assent to, and which do we consider to be the best in the interests of the country? The two plans that I mentioned at first are out of the calculation. Why? Because no one could be found to avail themselves of the terms which were offered. The third one became feasible because a company was found who was willing to take hold of it under those terms and to push the railway to completion. Therefore I say that those who believed in the necessity of a trans-continental railway believed that it should be built as quickly as possible, and there was no plan to take hold of, but the plan of 1880-81, which was taken up by a Company and which thereafter looked as if it might be carried through. And so, Sir, the discussions of 1880-81 took place. Parliament came to a certain conclusion; it ratified the contract; it made the conditions firm, and it looked then to a completion of this road by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the amounts which I have mentioned. Now, Sir, there were there considerations why the country and why this Parliament took hold of and ratified that contract. First, because it gave a prospect of a complete road within a definite time, which was never held out to the people before. It held out the prospect of the completion of the road in 1891. A definite period was fixed and we had something sure to look forward to. There was another reason for which Parliament and the country, I believe, were disposed to ratify that contract, and that was that there was what the hon. gentlemen opposite have talked so much of, an element of finality about it. The cost was fixed; there was a certain number of acres of land and a certain amount of money. It measured the liabilities of the country, and the people were glad that they knew at last what the cost of this Canadian Pacific Railway would probably be to the country. There was also a third reason, which was this: That the line had better not be built by a Government. Now, Sir, I am free to say that I have no objection whatever to a Government running a railway. In fact, Sir, as I grow older, and look a little deeper into things, I am of the opinion that it would not be a bad thing for the Government to own and run all the railways of a country. I am not disposed, therefore, to be against the running of a road by a Government. But I appreciated the danger which other hon. gentlemen appreciated, and which, I am sure, this country appreciated—the danger of the risk involved in a Government attempting to build a railway of such dimensions, and of such enormous expenditure. Sir, the patronage, and the vindictiveness of party which is involved in the letting, and making, and criticism of contracts are almost insuperable objections to a company undertaking to build a road of such dimensions and involving such cost. So, Sir, I say the country was willing to ratify that contract for three especial reasons: First, because it fixed a time at which the road should be finished; secondly, because it made a finality, as far as expenditure was concerned; and thirdly, because it had the road built by a company, and avoided the risk and the danger incident to the building of such an immense road by a Government organized on a party basis. So much, then, with reference to the contract. Now, Sir, in 1881, that Company went to work. It has, I am bound to say, displayed an immense amount of push and energy—a fact that is not questioned by the country at large, or by any section of the people. It has kept good faith with reference to its contract, and has built a bona fide road much better than the road which was laid down to guide it as a model. It has put force and energy and power into the enterprise, so much so that at the end of 1883 it stands before us with 1,131 miles of completed road on the main line west, with 269 miles of completed, equipped, and running branches on that same line west, and with 470 odd miles east of Callander, taking in the branches and the main line from Montreal and Brockville, and as far West as Callander and running up to Algoma Mills. That is what has been done by the Company, and more than that has been done. Such has been the energy and push they have displayed, such has been the rapidity with which they have constructed the work, that they have raised the belief of the people that the road would be finished in 1886, and not in 1891. So that they stand before the country and before the world in the latter part of the year 1883 as having accomplished all that work of which I have spoken, and as holding out to Canada and to all countries interested in Canada, the hope that this road would be built entirely by 1886. Now, Sir, a new phase of the question is presented to us—a phase of the question, I am bound to say, as unwelcome as it was unexpected, a phase of the question which is equally painful to gentlemen on this side of the House as it was to gentlemen on the other side of the House; a phase of the question which we and the country had hoped would never be presented, and which we are sorry has ever been presented. What is that phase? Sir, they come to Parliament in the Session of 1884, through the Government, and they say: we have raised the hopes of Canada and of the world that this road would be finished in 1886. We based those hopes upon calculations that we thought were good and would hold. We have to come to you to-day and say that we must fall back on our original contract and finish that road by 1891; or else, in order to finish it by the end of 1885, we must ask you for a loan. That is the question that is presented to Parliament and the country—1891 on the one hand, and 1885 and a loan on the other hand. Now, Sir, I, as an Independent member of this House—

Mr. FOSTER. I supposed, Sir, that we should have a general chorus of hear, hear, from the opposite side of the House. I say to the hon. gentlemen opposite who are so prodigal just now with their hear, hear, that though it may be a most unheard of, and unthought of thing to them, for a man to sit on one side of the House, and whilst he supports with all his power, and with all his earnestness, the party of his choice on broad lines of policy, it is still quite possible for him to make up his mind, as an independent thinker and investigator, upon every subject which does not come within party lines. I am supported in this opinion by what has taken place in this House this Session. There has been more independent and scattering voting on this side of the House by members supporting the Conservative party, than there has been on the other side. And so I say, as a man who supports a party and yet who does and will think independently, and conclude independently, I am bound to take this matter into my consideration and find out whether or not it is reasonable. Now, Sir, what reasons did the Company give when they came to this Government and Parliament. They said this: owing to hostility and hostile combinations at home and abroad; owing to shrinkage in values and a decline in the price of stocks; owing to the difficulty of realizing such large sums as are necessary to carry on this gigantic work, from lands which are, to a certain extent, locked up from a speedy realization, and which, if thrown upon the market would bring but ruinous prices, we come and say: we have resources sufficient; we want a loan; we will pay you a fair interest; we will finish the road by the end of 1885; we ask your consideration as to whether or not our proposal is a reasonable one. Sir, the Company does not come on bended knees before this House. This Company comes as a man would come walking straight on his feet, looking up straight with his eyes and saying to this Government and Parliament: we have a fair proposal to make to you; we ask you for a loan; we will give you as high a rate of interest as you can get elsewhere and even better; we will place within your hands sufficient security; that is your part of the bargain—will you do it? We will be helped in certain particulars; you will be helped in certain other particulars; if you will accept our proposition, well and good; if you will not, well and good; and we fall back on the terms of the original contract. What I have to conclude in my own mind is whether these are reasonable grounds or not. As to the first one. Has there been hostility manifested, and have hostile combinations been entered into with respect to this Company? I think that no hon. member will deny it; I do not think hon. members opposite will deny it. I call to mind that the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Davies), acknowledged that such was the case but he did not see any reason why, if such were the case, the Company should go whining around, as he elegantly and classically expressed it. Then there was a hostile spirit. It was expressed in what way? It was exhibited by hostile combinations of rival roads in the great stock markets of the world. It was shown in hostile articles which were written from this country to American papers, and in telegrams sent from this country to American papers, and in cablegrams sent to the Old Country. In these and a hundred different ways, the fact is as clear as the sun at noon-day that there were hostile combinations, that there was hostility both at home and abroad, and that this hostility must have had and did have an effect on the securities and assets of the Company. Sir, is the second contention a reasonable one—that there was a shrinkage of values generally throughout the country and a demoralization and fall in the value of stocks. We have only to read the stock list, to take the most cursory glance at the commercial records of the world for the last eight, six or four months, to establish the fact. Looking at these points I say, it is a reasonable contention on the part of the Company that they were prevented from realizing many of their assets by the demoralization of the stock market and shrinkage in values. As to the third contention, it is an eminently reasonable one. To meet the expenditure necessary, to raise the amount necessary to meet that expenditure, and to raise the amount within a period of two years upon lands which are slow sales comparatively, and on stock for which there was no market at that particular time on account of the demoralized condition of the market—it is a reasonable contention they urge that in these respects they have encountered difficulties which they had not reckoned upon when they made their calculations and estimates years and months ago. As an independent member, making up my mind from data presented before me, I cannot refuse to admit the contention that these are reasonable reasons, and that I am bound, as one considering the issues involved, to give them my fairest and most impartial consideration. Apart from these considerations, the question narrows itself down to this: Is there any great or important reason which commends itself to my mind, and which leads me to believe that it is better for the country's welfare to have the road finished in 1885, rather than have the completion postponed until 1891. That is the first question I have to settle with myself. Mind you, I am in favour of the road as a means towards national unity and national progress. Mind you, I believe this Company have done exceedingly well in the progress of the work so far. Remember that I take into consideration, as I must do, their contention that owing to the circumstances to which I have referred they have been thrown out in their calculations. The question for me to decide is this: is there any counterbalancing advantage in having the road opened in 1885, sufficient to make us take upon ourselves to do what is embodied as reasonable and necessary in the resolutions before the House. I think I have settled that question, so far as to make me, at least, act in a certain way. One reason that it is better to have the road finished by the end of 1885, is because it is in the interests of Canada abroad that such should be done. I know that what I am going to urge as a reason will be called by hon. gentlemen opposite a sentimental reason. I do not therefore refrain from urging it. By the push and energy exhibited by this country, with its 4,500,000 of people, determining to do what, on the part of the country to the south, with its 38,000,000, was considered a bold and daring enterprise, Canada has obtained a certain name and prestige among the people of Europe, and even the people of the civilized world. If a person advertised himself to perform some great athletic feat, and when it came near the time of performance, and when the spectators had gathered and the thought of the community was centered upon him, and if his previous performances had led to the conviction that he was able to do that which he had set himself to perform, and he failed at the last moment, his reputation would be lost. Just so in a similar, but in a larger and more important way, would the prestige and fame of Canada be diminished if we were to fail now in the prosecution of this work. In hundreds and thousands of homes in England, Ireland, and Scotland they are sitting round their firesides to-night talking about that plucky Canadian Dominion, which, with its 4,500,000 of people, has undertaken to weld all its parts together by building a railway 3,000 miles in length. They are reading documents which have been scattered by this Government, and by means of this very same railway organization, and their thought and feelings and sympathies, are being drawn out to this country of Canada as a field for immigration, and as a country whose people are full of energy, full of enterprise, as shown by the very fact that they have undertaken, and promised to perform, this gigantic work, and have it finished by 1886. Now, Sir, are these promises to be falsified? Once let this idea be overthrown, and they shall assemble again about their firesides and say, ah! there has been a failure over there in Canada; they undertook more than they could carry out; they promised well, but they failed in performance; and there goes down the prestige of Canada; there goes down at least a part of that attraction which this country has had, as a field for immigration, and there, I believe, the name and the fame and the interest of Canada will suffer in a very vital and important way. Therefore I conclude, in my own mind—hon. gentlemen may take it for what it is worth—that it is important that this scheme should be carried out; that it is the general sentiment that it should be carried out, and that it is all important that it should proceed because of the interest and the fame and the credit of Canada in countries abroad. But intimately connected with this is the great subject of immigration. No one doubts that this very building and construction and completion of this trans-continental railway has been one of the best things which this country has put forward as an attraction for immigration, in all parts of the world from which we draw our immigration. It is no doubt a fact that the opening up of such an immense country by an unbroken line of railway, so that these people might have communication with the Old Country, and have intercourse in different ways with the outside world, has been of the very greatest importance and utility in attracting immigrants into this country, and not only in attracting those who have already come over here, but in starting that spirit of desire, that spirit of looking forward, that spirit which says: there is the country to which, if we change we shall change to; a spirit which is as seed sown in a fertile soil, which will bring forth, as year passes on year, its increasing harvest of immigration to this country. I believe that if to-day the Parliament of Canada should decide that this great work should stop and not be carried to its promised completion, that it shall loiter along and hesitate till 1891, the immigration interests of this country would be sadly and importantly affected by that course of conduct. So, I am in favor of having this work pushed through by the end of 1885, for the sake of our immigration interests. There are reasons at home, too. One of the first is the North-West development. A gentleman speaking on the other side of the House said: cannot we get into the North-West now? True, but we have to cross a foreign country.

Mr. FOSTER. Hon. gentlemen have not lived to the length of years to which they have lived, and felt the snows which have fallen on their heads, and seen the ice which has taken hold of river and harbour in all these years, without knowing that there is a large portion of the year in which it is impossible to carry on that speedy and safe and uninterrupted communication, which we need for the purposes for which this trans-continental railway is to be built. Sir, there is a sentimental reason which comes in, but it is a forcible one. What would you think of your family life, what would be your interest in your home, if, every time you got up from your breakfast table to go to your library, you had to pass through apartments which were owned and controlled by some other person? Would you feel that you had a home of your own? Would you feel the same love for its roof? Aside from the inconvenience which would be inevitable, there would be a taking away of the feeling that it was your own home, and that you were under your own roof. Hon. gentlemen opposite may think that this is a very pleasant thing, and they may smile about it, but it has force with me, and with the people of this country; it has force, and it will have force, in shaping our policy on this question. A person knows very little about railroading if he does not know that when a company has a line of railway 1,000 miles long away over there, and a line of railway 500 or 600 miles long on this side, and between them there is only a means of joining them by running their freights and passengers on a road which belongs to a different country, with hostile tariffs, and with another system, and all the possible inconveniences which may arise—I say a person knows little of railroading if he does not know, that the expense and inconvenience incident to that sort of thing, is one of the strongest arguments that can be used to those people to obtain an independent, self-controlled, and through line of communication open for themselves. I say, therefore, that we have not an open means of communication, such as is at all adequate, from these older Provinces to the heart of the North-West Territory. I say we need that line, that the development of the North-West depends on it, that the number of immigrants we get there, the amount of produce which is raised there, the amount of minerals which is taken out from their mines, and all the vast development of that country depend, more perhaps than we think, upon the speedy, continuous, and uninterrupted communication which shall take place between this part and that part of our country—this an older and stronger one, but that a newer one, and full of greater possibilities, and capable of the greatest amount of expansion. Our British Columbia development needs it. Sir, since our confederation with British Columbia, that Province has stayed away out by itself for all these years, with three-fourths, five-sixths, yes, nineteen-twentieths of her people strangers to us, commercially and socially, and is she to remain there until 1891, with all the disadvantages which result from that isolation? But if we carry out this idea, and complete the road by 1885, there are six years in which British Columbia and all of its resources are opened to free course for the stream of enterprise which will rush in, and the stream of trade and commerce which will rush out. Is that nothing for British Columbia—is it nothing to this Dominion? I hold that it is something to the Provinces by the sea, and that it is something very important to the rest of this great Dominion which lies east of it. But, Sir, our trade, our industries demand it. We are building a trans-continental line of railway, and do we not know that trade springs up in proportion to the facilities for trading? Sir I want to have it as thoroughly impressed upon my mind as I possibly can, that conditions differ now from what they were in the old time of pioneer settlement in this and other new countries. To-day people rush in where there are facilities for rushing out as well as facilities for going in. They follow the course of the railroad; and with reference to branch lines, I maintain that if the main line is thoroughly finished and equipped by 1885, instead of 1891, you will have a far larger number of branch lines built by the end of 1891 than you possibly could have if you carried the building of the main line through all those years until 1891. Some hon. gentlemen are very anxious to have branch lines built. The hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) declared that he believed it would have been better for the country and the North-West, if this railway had stopped at Winnipeg, and the people had been allowed to build branch lines west of Winnipeg. Branch lines where, pray? Why, each one of those branch lines would become a main line. What use is a line of railroad that does not run into a market centre? Those branch lines would have to run into Winnipeg, at least, and make connection with the main line. So that the building of the main line must be antecedent to the successful, continuous and rapid building of branch lines. I believe the interest of our own country, the interest of our trade and industries in the eastern Provinces, demand that this line of communication should be opened up. Sir, what has been accomplished in the last five years? There has been developed and opened up a trade between our eastern industries and British Columbia and Manitoba; and to-day no inconsiderable feeder for the industries of the eastern Provinces is to be found in the population which is producing from the lands and from the mines of those western parts of our newly opened territory. Sir, if this line is put through by 1885, these industries will not be harmed. They will feel the impulse. They will then be able to send their wares through without any interruptions, in the shape of bonding or of hostile tariffs, through the whole heart of that country, and to send on to British Columbia what is necessary for the people of that Province. I believe that our own industries will not be injured, but, on the contrary, will be very much helped by the speedy construction of this road. These, Sir, are the reasons which, amongst others, induce me to favour the completion of this road by 1885, rather than have it set back until 1891—that is, provided we think we can reasonably do it. Now, Sir, I wish for a moment to look at the nature of this loan. What is it? The Company come and ask this Parliament for a loan of $22,500,000. Recollect that we must argue upon the idea that this is a bona fide transaction. But someone asks, what about the $7,380,000, part of which has been postponed until 1888, and the rest of which is due in 1888? What about it? It is no liability to this country until 1888, and if the Company fulfil their part of this agreement, which we believe they will, it will not then become a liability to this country, because it will then be paid. That is one of the conditions of this agreement. So that the loan is this—$22,500,000 to be paid in 1891, and a contingent loan of $7,380,000, which is only contingent upon the possibility or the probability, however you may choose to regard it, that in 1888 the Company will not be able to pay that amount. Now, Sir, for this loan the Company agree to pay 5 per cent. interest—a better rate of interest than we can get elsewhere—a rate which is greater than that at which we borrow. So that, if this is a bona fide transaction—and we must argue it upon that line—we are to loan $22,500,000 at 5 per cent., and we are to have this percentage paid to us half-yearly. Now, then, the second great question which comes to my mind for conclusion is this: Granted that it is better to have this road built by the end of 1885; granted that we are able to provide the loan asked for, is the security sufficient? And until I can convince myself, with all certainty, so far as certainty is possible, that the security is sufficient, I, Sir, would not vote for these Resolutions. One moment, then, Mr. Speaker, while we take a glance at the nature of the security. In the first place, we have a railroad of some 1,131 miles of main line, the construction value of which is $23,078,929; we have 269 miles of branches west of Callander, worth, at construction value, $3,759,793; we have expended on improvement of the line west of Cross Lake, $353,606; we have rolling stock, plant, lake steamers, and the like, $6,870,045; and we have materials and supplies, less the advance of rails, $4,025,604; making a total of $38,087,977. This is the amount, in actual cost value of the line west of Callander, which is to be placed in our hands as part security. In addition to this, there is east of Callander 457 miles of extension main line and branches, $3,270,351; rolling stock, worth $900,000; shops and machinery, worth $516,032; tools and machinery, $352,230; real estate for termini, worth $390,790; making a total of $5,429,403, the value of security east of Callander.

If we add these together we get a total present railroad security of $43,517,370. That is the actual value at present of the security placed into the hands of this Government for the loan asked. But I am not unaware of the fact, and I am alive to its importance as well, that this security is of such nature that it appreciates with every dollar the Government pays out to their call of the loan which has been stipulated for. That, with me, weighs as an important point, and I believe it weighs as an important point with this House. Of the loan of $22,500,000 which this Government is asked for, $7,500,000 go for floating liabilities and $15,000,000 are to go into the road. There is besides the subsidy yet to be paid which the Company owns, which we have guaranteed the Company, by the contract of 1881, and which, if they carry out their contract is no more ours than a section of land in the moon is ours. That $12,710,788 has also to be paid out and applied to the construction of the road, making a total of $27,710,788 to go into its construction. Now, my point is this: The very moment we can float this contract and make them the loan of $22,500,000, we have the present value of the railway worth $43,517,370. The Government has to see that every dollar of the $27,000,000 that they pay to the Company is represented by actual construction of the road, so that when the two years have past, and the end of 1885 has come, and all this loan and subsidy are paid to the Company, we will have an actual railway value of $27,710,788 to add to the other $43,517,370 as a gross security for the payment of the loan. That is we have a security in a railway which is not a diminishing but is an appreciative security, and which grows by the amount of every dollar which is paid over of that loan and that subsidy into the hands of the Company. That gives us, at the end of two years, a railway security worth, in construction value, $71,228,158. But that is not the only security we have. We have also the security of the land, amounting to 21,240,600 acres. Against this 21,240,600 acres of land handed over to the Government as additional security, there is a loan of $1,123,115, which leaves, if we can take the value of the lien at the price which has been already realized for what has been sold—$2.36 an acre—we have a balance of some $49,019,795 represented to us in worth of lands placed in the hands of this Government as additional security. That is, we have in Railways and landed security, at that rate of calculation, $120,247,953. Is that sufficient security for a loan of $22,500,000 and a contingent loan of $7,380,000, which never will be called for if this agreement is carried out. Is a security of $5 for every dollar that is loaned considered to be sufficient security? There is another point which adds greater force to this—will that railway property depreciate from this till 1891, supposing it runs so long? Will it depreciate in value between this and 1885? No, Sir; it is constantly appreciating in value. The railway property which is represented in the equipment and rolling stock of the road is kept and must be kept up to its level and can be kept up to its level, because it has a paying traffic. It is therefore a security that will not depreciate but appreciate in value. How is it with reference to the lands? I have calculated these lands at the rate of $2.36 per acre. Does that calculation seem to be too high? I think not. I think we can test it very well by the amount which has been already received for what has been already sold, and that is at the rate of $2.36 per acre. I think, however, we can take a little more in argument out of analogous roads. I go over to the Union Pacific road and I find that its lands sold, from 1880 to 1883, at from $4.28 to $4.82 an acre; I find that the Kansas Pacific lands sold at from $4.03 to $4.93 an acre; I find that the sales of the Central Pacific lands averaged, since 1870, $4.85 per acre; I take the Northern Pacific, which is more analogous to our own road, because it has the element of newness to a certain extent, and their lands, in 1882, sold for from $2.60 to 3.60 per acre. Now, we have this fact that the lands already sold of the Canadian Pacific Railway have averaged $2.36 per acre; that sales of lands on analogous roads averaged from $2.60 to $5 per acre in round numbers, and I think I have fair ground for the contention that the remainder of those lands of our road will be worth an average of $2.36 per acre, at least. Will these lands depreciate or appreciate in value? They must appreciate in value every year, on account of the increased impetus which is being given to buying and selling them, so that the value of real estate will creep up, especially within a certain distance of the great line of railway, and these lie within that distance. To my mind, there is no question that the security offered for the loan asked is amply sufficient. If it comes to be a fact, if the possibility ever becomes a probability, and that probability ever merges into a fact, that the Company makes default and is not able to carry out its obligation, I, as a humble member of this Parliament, will not be sorry to see so valuable a property fall into the hands of the Government and the people, at so small a price. It would be a good thing for the country and a bad thing for the Company, after the expenditure of all the energy and capital they have put into this gigantic enterprise. There is one other consideration I will trouble the House with, in reference to this. Is the road, provided it falls into our hands, going to be a dead weight? or will it be a live and realizable security? That is, supposing this road were finished to-morrow, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and the Company made default, and it came into our hands, would it be a bill of expense or a means of income to us? That is a very important point, because upon that rests in part the value of the security in the contingency that the Company shall make default and that the property shall come into our hands. What have we to say in reference to this? Will the road be a dead security or a living and paying security? We have but three things to go upon. We have experience in the first place. What is that experience? In 1882, the gross receipts of the Canadian Pacific Railway were $2,449,824. In 1883 they were $5,420,913; and the net of nine months' traffic comes to pretty nearly a million of dollars. I think that, so far as the road between the Rocky Mountains and Port Arthur, added on to the road between Algoma Mills and Sudbury Junction and Montreal, is concerned, it settles the fact conclusively that that portion of the road, at least, is a paying property and will give a net earning over and above all expenses. We have only to ask ourselves this question: whether, when that line of communication between Sudbury Junction and Port Arthur, around the north of Lake Superior, is filled in, and when the gap across the Rocky Mountains to Kamloops is filled in, and the whole trade of the country has a chance to extend and grow up on this line, we think, in the light of the past experience of the road, this will be a paying road, or will involve us in expense? I believe it will pay for its running and give a profit in net earnings every year. Have we anything to back up this contention? Yes, we have the analogy of the roads I have mentioned before. Take the Union Pacific, and its net earnings have risen from $5,000,000 and odd in 1874, to $7,000,000 and odd in 1879, and, after the consolidation, from $7,000,000 and odd in 1879, to $12,000,000 in 1882. Are the lands and the country and the capabilities of the country through which our road goes so infinitely inferior; is the extent of country that is to be traversed which gives nothing to feed the line with traffic so infinitely greater in our own country, that we can hope for this analogy to have no force and weight when applied to our own road? I believe the reverse is the case. I believe the capacities and capabilities of our own lands through which our road runs; I believe the lesser tract of barren and unproductive country which cannot feed the line of travel; I believe the shorter line following the meridian between the centres of traffic on the east and the centres of traffic upon the west, are immeasurably in favour of our own line, and I believe, Sir, that if that line shows such an increase in gross earning as it has, our own line may safely be asserted to be beyond the possibility of doubt, and reasoning by analogy, a line that will pay its way and leave something to the net. Take the analogy of the Central Pacific. In 1871, the net earnings were $5,000,000 and odd; in 1882, they have risen to $8,000,000 and odd. Take the Northern Pacific: in 1882 the gross earnings were $5,000,000 and odd, and in 1883 they were $9,000,000, and a little more. Taking all this into consideration, I say the conclusion of the argument from analogy will be that our road will not be a dead security, but a paying and constantly increasing paying investment. Then we are to take the element of probability in. I started to make a calculation just about the time the Speaker took his Chair. I am exceedingly sorry, looking at the country's advantage and the enlightenment of this House which would have been possible, that the Speaker took his Chair as early as he did, before I had an opportunity of completing that interesting calculation; but I will give you the germ of the calculation, and hon. gentlemen can work it out themselves. I said to myself, is it too much to ask, is it too much to think, that, during the next ten years, we shall have at least 50,000 people yearly thrown into our North-West? Does that appear reasonable to the members of this House, that, during the next ten years, an average of 50,000 people a year will enter that country? Does it appear reasonable to say that, of that 50,000, 40,000 will belong to the agricultural classes? I believe it is not unreasonable. Is it unreasonable to say that, of these 40,000, one out of four will hold a farm; that is, that, out of that number of people, there will be 8,000 farmers, and that each of these will bring under cultivation twenty acres of good grain lands each year? If you take that, and put it on the rate of progression, and count it up for ten years, you will be surprised at the vista it opens up of production, accelerating and increasing production, which will feed the line of traffic, and develop and make prosperous a trade of the dimensions of which we to-day can form no actual—can scarcely form a probable—estimate. So I believe in the probabilities. Facts showing that to-day the road is paying as far as it is built, probabilities leading us to believe that a large increase will take place in the productiveness of the soil which will form a basis for trade in the future, I think we are altogether within the mark when we conclude that that line of road, once built, will not be a loss to whoever may happen to own it, but will be a means of income and a source of profit. Therefore, when they come and ask for a loan of $22,500,000, and offer us securities worth $141,247,953—because I add the $35,000,000 of stock, at the rate of 60 per cent., which will make $21,000,000—I believe the security is ample. I believe they come in an honourable and manly way and say, we want a loan which you can give better than others; we offer securities which we would not like to give into the hands of any other; we make the bargain for mutual advantage, and we trust for mutual benefit to the two parties concerned. Now, Sir, that exhausts about the line of thought that I conducted with myself, and brings me to this result: that it is a foregone conclusion with the people, and a necessity of this country, that the line of trans-continental road shall be built, that the Company, having proceeded so far with unexampled push and energy towards the completion of that road, and having been involved in these temporary difficulties, if such you may call them, are reasonable in coming before us and in asking us for a loan which shall accrue to the mutual advantage of the Company and of the country; and I, for one, am prepared to vote for loaning the $22,500,000 with the contingent loan which may possibly come upon us in 1888, taking the security which is offered us and the percentage they promise to pay; and I believe that the country outside, which, despite all that was said against that contract in 1880-81, approved of it and sent back those who framed and those who ratified it with such a large majority, looking upon that road in the light of a necessity now as then, will regard those who put this through in this Parliament, and vote for the speedy completion on such terms, as having only carried out their behests, as having done what was given them to do, and will approve of their action when they next come before the polls to ask the suffrages of the people. Now, I will ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments whilst I present a different thought. Not only were the propositions made by this Company, and the propositions entertained by the Government, brought before me as a subject for investigation and approval, but I thought that something else was necessary. I believed that wisdom did not reside solely in myself. I knew that human nature on this side of the House was fallible as is human on the other side of the House, or as human nature is generally; and I said to myself, it is possible that new light may be thrown upon this question, and I will wait and listen. I will carefully observe, I will weigh, as far as I possibly can, the arguments of those hon. gentlemen who are opposed to this measure, and if they give me good grounds for rejecting this proposal, I am willing to take the onus and responsibility of rejecting it. So, Sir, I listened earnestly and attentively to the Minister of Railways, who expounded this matter to us, and I listened with an equally earnest attention to the hon. leader of the Opposition who made out the opposite case, and who contended against the Resolutions which are placed before us. Now, Sir, what did I extract from the long and able speech of the hon. member for West Durham? I listened to it from first to last. I did not content myself with that, but I have read that hon. gentleman's speech over three consecutive times since I received it in the Hansard. I think no hon. gentleman on this side of the House, or on the other side, will be able to say that I have not given it an attention and an investigation equal to all that it deserves at my hands; and I did it with a desire of finding out what were the strong points—if there were any strong points—which might be urged against the resolutions before the House. Well, Sir, what do I find? I find this: that, with that facility for bringing up buried issues and points about questions that have been settled over and over again, the hon. gentleman occupied nearly the whole of his speech with debating issues and questions which had been settled by this Parliament, and settled by the country after they had been settled by this Parliament. That hon. gentleman did not like a great many things; he was curious to know a great many more things; and what he did not like, and what he was curious to know, in nine cases out of ten, were questions which, in my humble opinion, had no more to do with the settlement of the question which is now before us, than a magazine article upon Bacteria has to do with chemical notation. In the first place, the hon. gentleman did not like this Company coming back again to Parliament. Well, Sir, we would all much prefer that they should never have come back and asked for a re-arrangement, or a reconsideration of this question. We would have much preferred to see them go on with their contract, and complete the road in 1886. But the point to be observed is that they came back, and whether we liked it or not was not the question. That was the problem we had to solve, and it is no use for us to grumble because they came back when we did not want them to come back. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman satirized the able resources of the Syndicate. He seemed to make a good deal of merit over the fact that this Syndicate had been lauded in years gone by as composed of exceptionally able gentlemen, financially; and now that this Company has come back to us in the way it has, he supposed that he had good grounds for turning back upon the Government, and the party who support the Government, because the great advantage we hoped to obtain through this Syndicate was not realized. Well, Sir, I do not think there was any man, in 1881, or since 1881, who for a moment supposed that any syndicate were going to take money enough out of their own pockets, or had pockets deep enough, out of which to take the requisite money, to complete the gigantic enterprise of building a line of railway from Callander to the Pacific Ocean. It was not that for which we looked for a set of able men, but we looked for a set of able men who, by their financial character and standing, should be able to put the Company in the shape of realizing from the assets which should be placed at its disposal, and supplementing the deficiencies by their credit. This, Sir, the Company has done, and having done that it is not open to the ridicule and satire which was heaped upon it by the hon. gentleman. He has declared that speed meant cost. Sir, that whole question was discussed in the debate on the Address. The hon. gentleman went into elaborate calculations then to prove to this House that speed meant cost. He proved it to his own satisfaction then; he did not any more than prove it to his own satisfaction this time. Possibly, speed does mean cost in some cases, but, to my mind, the construction of that part of the Canadian Pacific Railway that has been constructed is not one of those cases. When you take into account that you might just about as easily take in supplies for 10,000 people as for 7,000; when you take into account that railway building to-day is largely done by new and improved machinery; when you take into account that the speed with which it is carried out leaves less dead capital lying on their hands, and puts them into a position of realizing more quickly on the outlay—I believe when you put all these things together, you will come to the conclusion that in this case, and in many cases, it is not true that speed means cost. In this case there are two prior considerations. Speed means benefit to the Company, because it keeps dead capital from lying on its hands; and speed means benefit to this Dominion, because it opens our highway just so many years earlier than it otherwise would be opened. Sir, the hon. gentleman opposite dislikes the mode of building. He did not like the construction company and the directors which form part of that construction company; he took it for granted that the directors did form part of the construction company. Sir, that is a question that is not germane to the issue which is before the House. The construction company, the mode in which the road was built—those are matters which I think do not touch directly upon the question whether things being as they are to-day, it is proper for this Parliament to make the loan which is provided for in the Resolutions. He also complained of the change of route; but the change of route is also outside, in my judgment, of the question which is before us. He is also opposed to the issue of stock and the manner in which it was issued. I think the ground is tenable here, that if we make a contract with the Company and pay them so much to do the work, and provide that our rates upon the railway afterwards are dependent upon the actual amount of money that is used in the construction of the road—I say, in that case, it is not very germane to the subject as to how they issue, or how they dispose of, the stock which is their own, and which does not enter as a factor, therefore, into the cost with reference to the road. Again, the hon. gentleman was opposed to monopoly and disallowance. But this disallowance is apart altogether from the question at issue, and this monopoly was thoroughly discussed and settled when the contract was ratified, and the people have already passed upon it. He also ridiculed the opening up of a United States port; and my hon. friend from Queen's County, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), grew virtuously indignant because we were going to have connections of this road reaching to some great city or cities in the United States. Sir, I yield to no one in this House in my desire to see a line of railway which shall pass through Canadian territory from the extreme east to the extreme west. I will go as far as any hon. member in putting forth the power of the country to have that idea thoroughly carried out; but at the same time I will never consent to build up a Chinese wall between us and the United States, with respect to the running of this road and the points from which it shall gather or to which it shall carry the traffic which comes to it. I will not go for that. But I hold that, for commercial and prudent reasons, and for national reasons too, if you like, it is within the competence and duty of this country to see that we plant our hands wherever we can draw in a single dollar of traffic or make our road more profitable than it would otherwise be. I think it will go without saying, before this House, that the point of shipment directs or controls the destination of the freight which is shipped. We have a trans-continental line of railway. A great deal that will be shipped across that line will be shipped from American ports in the west—will be shipped from Asia, China or Japan, with a destination in some of the eastern ports of the United States. It will be a detriment to our road, a detriment to the increase of trade and commerce upon that road, if we are not prepared to receive and forward freight by the cheapest and most rapid means within our power, over our road, as far as we can, and then forward it to the destination for which it is freighted. There is a large amount of traffic which we hope to draw over the road, which will not begin in Canada but outside of the Dominion; a large amount of traffic from the eastern seaboard of the United States, which we hope to carry over the road. Now, can we do so, with the best prospect of increasing the volume of our trade, unless we have connections so as to hold out inducements in the centres where the trade starts to take hold of the traffic and carry it right through to its destination. Therefore, I say that it is of the utmost importance that the road shall throw out its connections towards the great seaports of the United States, in order to gather traffic from them and bring up to the Company's main line. There are two divisions of trade. There is one which will start from the west in and out of Canada and end at an eastern port of embarkation for Europe, going through our own country. That is the kind which we must keep within our own control. That is the traffic which starts in the west and goes towards the east, bound for the old country markets, and that is the kind which I would be no patriot and not worthy of the trust reposed in me, if I did not declare should embark at Canadian ports. But although I believe in that doctrine, we should not place ourselves so as to be unable to gather traffic destined for the eastern cities of the country south of us, and carry freight at the lowest cost, and thereby increase our volume of trade. The traffic which starts west and is bound for the old country, let us keep for our Canadian ports; but, as regards all that we can profitably draw from outside sources—traffic which begins in countries outside, and is carried to countries outside our own, on this continent, let us have every facility for carrying that traffic. So much with respect to this matter of United States outlet. There is just one expression which particularly struck me in the hon. gentleman's speech, and which I will quote as he gave it. He said: "We may be exposed to the risks" (speaking about this partnership with the railway company) "but it is not likely we shall have any of the profits." In my opinion that is the cardinal defect in the criticisms given to these Resolutions by hon. gentlemen opposite. They have taken the ground that the Canadian Pacific Railway is an enemy to Canada, and must be watched; that it is of no national importance; that the Company have all the advantages and we have all the risk and none of the advantages. If by the power of my arms I could take up the whole Canadian Pacific Railway and throw the track into the deep sea, I want to know what would be the sensation with which Canadians would awaken to-morrow when they realized the fact that they had no Canadian Pacific Railway, no line running from Montreal, Brockville, and Callander across to the far west, 1,131 miles, with its steel rails through that great undeveloped, but rich and promising country? Would they think there were no advantages connected with the building of that road? We may give the Company all the money and subsidies we have given them, and even supplement those amounts with this additional aid in the form of a loan; and yet with all these risks and gifts, I undertake to say that the benefit which the Dominion realizes from the operation of that road, is far greater than the cost involved to the country. Sir, I will make another confession. I had the curiosity this morning to read the whole of the speech of the hon. leader of the Opposition, delivered in the House of 1880-81, upon the Canadian Pacific Railway contract; that was when the contract was being submitted and the House called on to decide as to whether it should be ratified or not. I read that speech from the beginning to the end; and what are my conclusions? Simply these: that the hon. gentleman, when he made his speech on the Resolutions now before the House, had the same set of models and patterns as he had in 1880-81. The only thing new is the little different material he has ran through them. It was "may be" and "may happen" from the beginning to the end of his speech in 1881; it is "may be" and "may happen" almost from the beginning to the end of his speech this Session. One of the hon. gentleman's "may be's" in 1881, was this: "may be the Company would never begin to construct the road." But they did begin it. Another was that "may be the members of the Company would abscond." They have not done so. Another was, that "may be the Company would never build the Lake Superior section." But they have shown their earnestness in commencing that work. Another was, that "may be the Company would lock up the lands and hold them until some future period when they could get higher prices for them." But they have not held the lands; they have sold all they possibly could sell. Another was, that "may be the scheme would ruin the country." But the country has not been much ruined by it. Another was, that "may be the scheme would ruin and submerge the party." But the party still stands intact. Sir, at the conclusion of all those "may be's," the hon. gentleman stood up straight and spoke to the hon. members on this side of the House in the following language:—

Mr. FOSTER.

"I shall not venture to hope that this House will reject it but I do not doubt that an indignant country, although you will not give it time now to raise its voice, will take the earliest opportunity to inflict a summary penalty upon those persons, offenders for a second time, who having once betrayed, when entrusted with power, their country's honour, and having been forgiven, have now taken advantage of the opportunity which a too confiding people conferred upon them to betray, in the same transaction, her most vital and material interests."
